Naled is commonly sprayed by airplanes and trucks to kill mosquitoes in Louisiana. It poses a "small, small potential risk" for humans who come in contact with the chemical, said Rear Adm. Craig Vanderwagen, Emergency Response Team commander for the U.S. Public Health Service, part of the Department of Health and Human Services.

If administered properly, naled "can be used to kill mosquitoes without posing unreasonable risks to human health or the environment," according to the Environmental Protection Agency.

About 1 ounce per acre will kill flies and ½ ounce per acre will kill mosquitoes, Vanderwagen said. Naled degrades rapidly in the environment and is rarely harmful to birds, mammals and fish, according to the EPA.

Flies and mosquitoes are plaguing the area, and officials are monitoring for outbreaks of illness resulting from insects infected with West Nile, dengue and other diseases.

break a tie for a 23-20 victory that won't soon be forgotten.

"That's gotta lift morale," Bartley said.

All across the city, wherever there were batteries and radios, residents plopped down and listened to the game, desperate for some sense of normalcy and hoping a win by the home team would signal better things to come.

In front of Harrah's New Orleans Casino, where police and the military have set up a makeshift command center, the game blared out of a radio inside one of the New Orleans Police Department's mobile command trucks.

Officer Derek Brumfield, who had tuned in the game, should have been on the sidelines Sunday — he typically works security detail for the team — but instead tried to stay as close to the truck as he could.

"To listen to the game and listen to the Saints again, it feels like home, it feels like normalcy," he said.

"It takes our minds off what we're going through," said Joe Bode, an apartment building manager in the French Quarter who sat in an abandoned strip club at Chartres and Iberville streets listening to the game on his own radio. "If they win this game, do you know how important that would be to this city?"

On a folding chair outside, Susie Cagnevert said she believed the spirit of Buddy DiLiberto, the legendary sports radio talk show host who died last year, was cheering the team on from the great beyond Sunday.

"He's seeing it up there," she said. "He's dancing in heaven."

At Johnny White's, troopers delivered bags of ice to keep the beer cold while animal rescue workers brought in cat food so employees of one of the only bars operating in the city could tend to the Quarter's strays.

As patrons dined on Fire Department-delivered burgers topped with salsa because ketchup was nowhere to be found, Marcie Ramsey ran outside to deliver the score to a heavily-inebriated patron. "17-7, Saints," she cried out as the man flipped over in his folding chair. Whether it was by coincidence or out of shock remained unclear.

John Pyles, a retired secret service agent who was assigned to the World Trade Center in New York four years ago Sunday, said things as simple as a hometown team win can help heal suffering cities.

"This is the way you get life back, business back," he said, taking a break from his security work in New Orleans with a cold beer. "It's forced normalcy."

Temporary housing needed faster, state says

hoods up and down the river were a welcome cacophony.

Farther downriver, though, all remained quiet save the monotonous lapping of water over what used to be home sites, boat launches and grocery stores. South and east of Alliance, residents remain barred – possibly for another month – from the area that suffered near-total destruction of homes and businesses.

Rousselle estimated 6,000 homes were lost in lower Plaquemines, which caught the brunt of Katrina's wrath in the parish.

In Baton Rouge, state authorities upped the hurricane's death toll to 197 and took more shots at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, this time complaining that the federal government is moving too slowly in bringing temporary housing into Louisiana for displaced hurricane victims.

With tens of thousands of Louisiana residents in evacuation centers in the state and more dispersed across the country, FEMA has not moved swiftly enough to bring in trailers and mobile homes or find vacant apartments or homes for the displaced victims, said Col. Jeff Smith, deputy director of the state Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness.

Two weeks after disasters struck in other states, FEMA had temporary housing in place for the displaced, Smith said. The state will need housing in the form of trailers, mobile homes or apartments for roughly 500,000 people, said Mark Smith, public information officer for the state Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness.

As of Sunday, there were more than 48,000 evacuees housed in Louisiana shelters, and more than 70,000 in shelters across the nation.

President Bush flew to New Orleans on Sunday, his third trip to the region since Katrina made landfall Aug. 29. He planned to spend the night aboard the USS Iwo Jima, the amphibious assault ship that is docked near the Riverwalk and is being used as a command and control center for relief efforts. He is to get a briefing on relief efforts this morning before touring New Orleans and parts of the Mississippi Gulf Coast.

Nagin appeared on NBC-TV's "Meet the Press" Sunday morning and was grilled by moderator Tim Russert over his failure to order a mandatory evacuation of New Orleans on the Friday before Katrina's arrival, coinciding with Bush's advance declaration of an emergency, while public transit and school buses were still available for use to transport evacuees.

"That's one of the things that will be debated," Nagin conceded. "There has never been a catastrophe in the history of New Orleans like this. There has never been any Category 5 storm of this magnitude that has hit New Orleans directly.

"We did the things that we thought were best based upon the information we had. Sure there were lots of buses out there. But, guess what. You can't find drivers that would stay behind with a Category 5 hurricane, you know, bearing down on New Orleans."

About 60 percent of the city has evacuated for prior storms, but about 80 percent got out this time, Nagin said.

"We were in a position of trying to encourage as many people as possible to leave because we weren't comfortable that we had the resources to move them out of the city," he said. "We encouraged people to buddy up, churches to take senior citizens and move them to safety, and a lot of them did. And then we would deal with the remaining people that couldn't or wouldn't leave and try and get them to higher ground until safety came."

The day's most uplifting development might have come from Charlotte, N.C., where the exiled New Orleans Saints won their season opener against the Carolina Panthers in dramatic fashion, 23-20. For the region's dispersed sports fans, it was a gratifying daily double just hours after the LSU Tigers had pulled out some last-minute heroics of their own in their first game of the season.

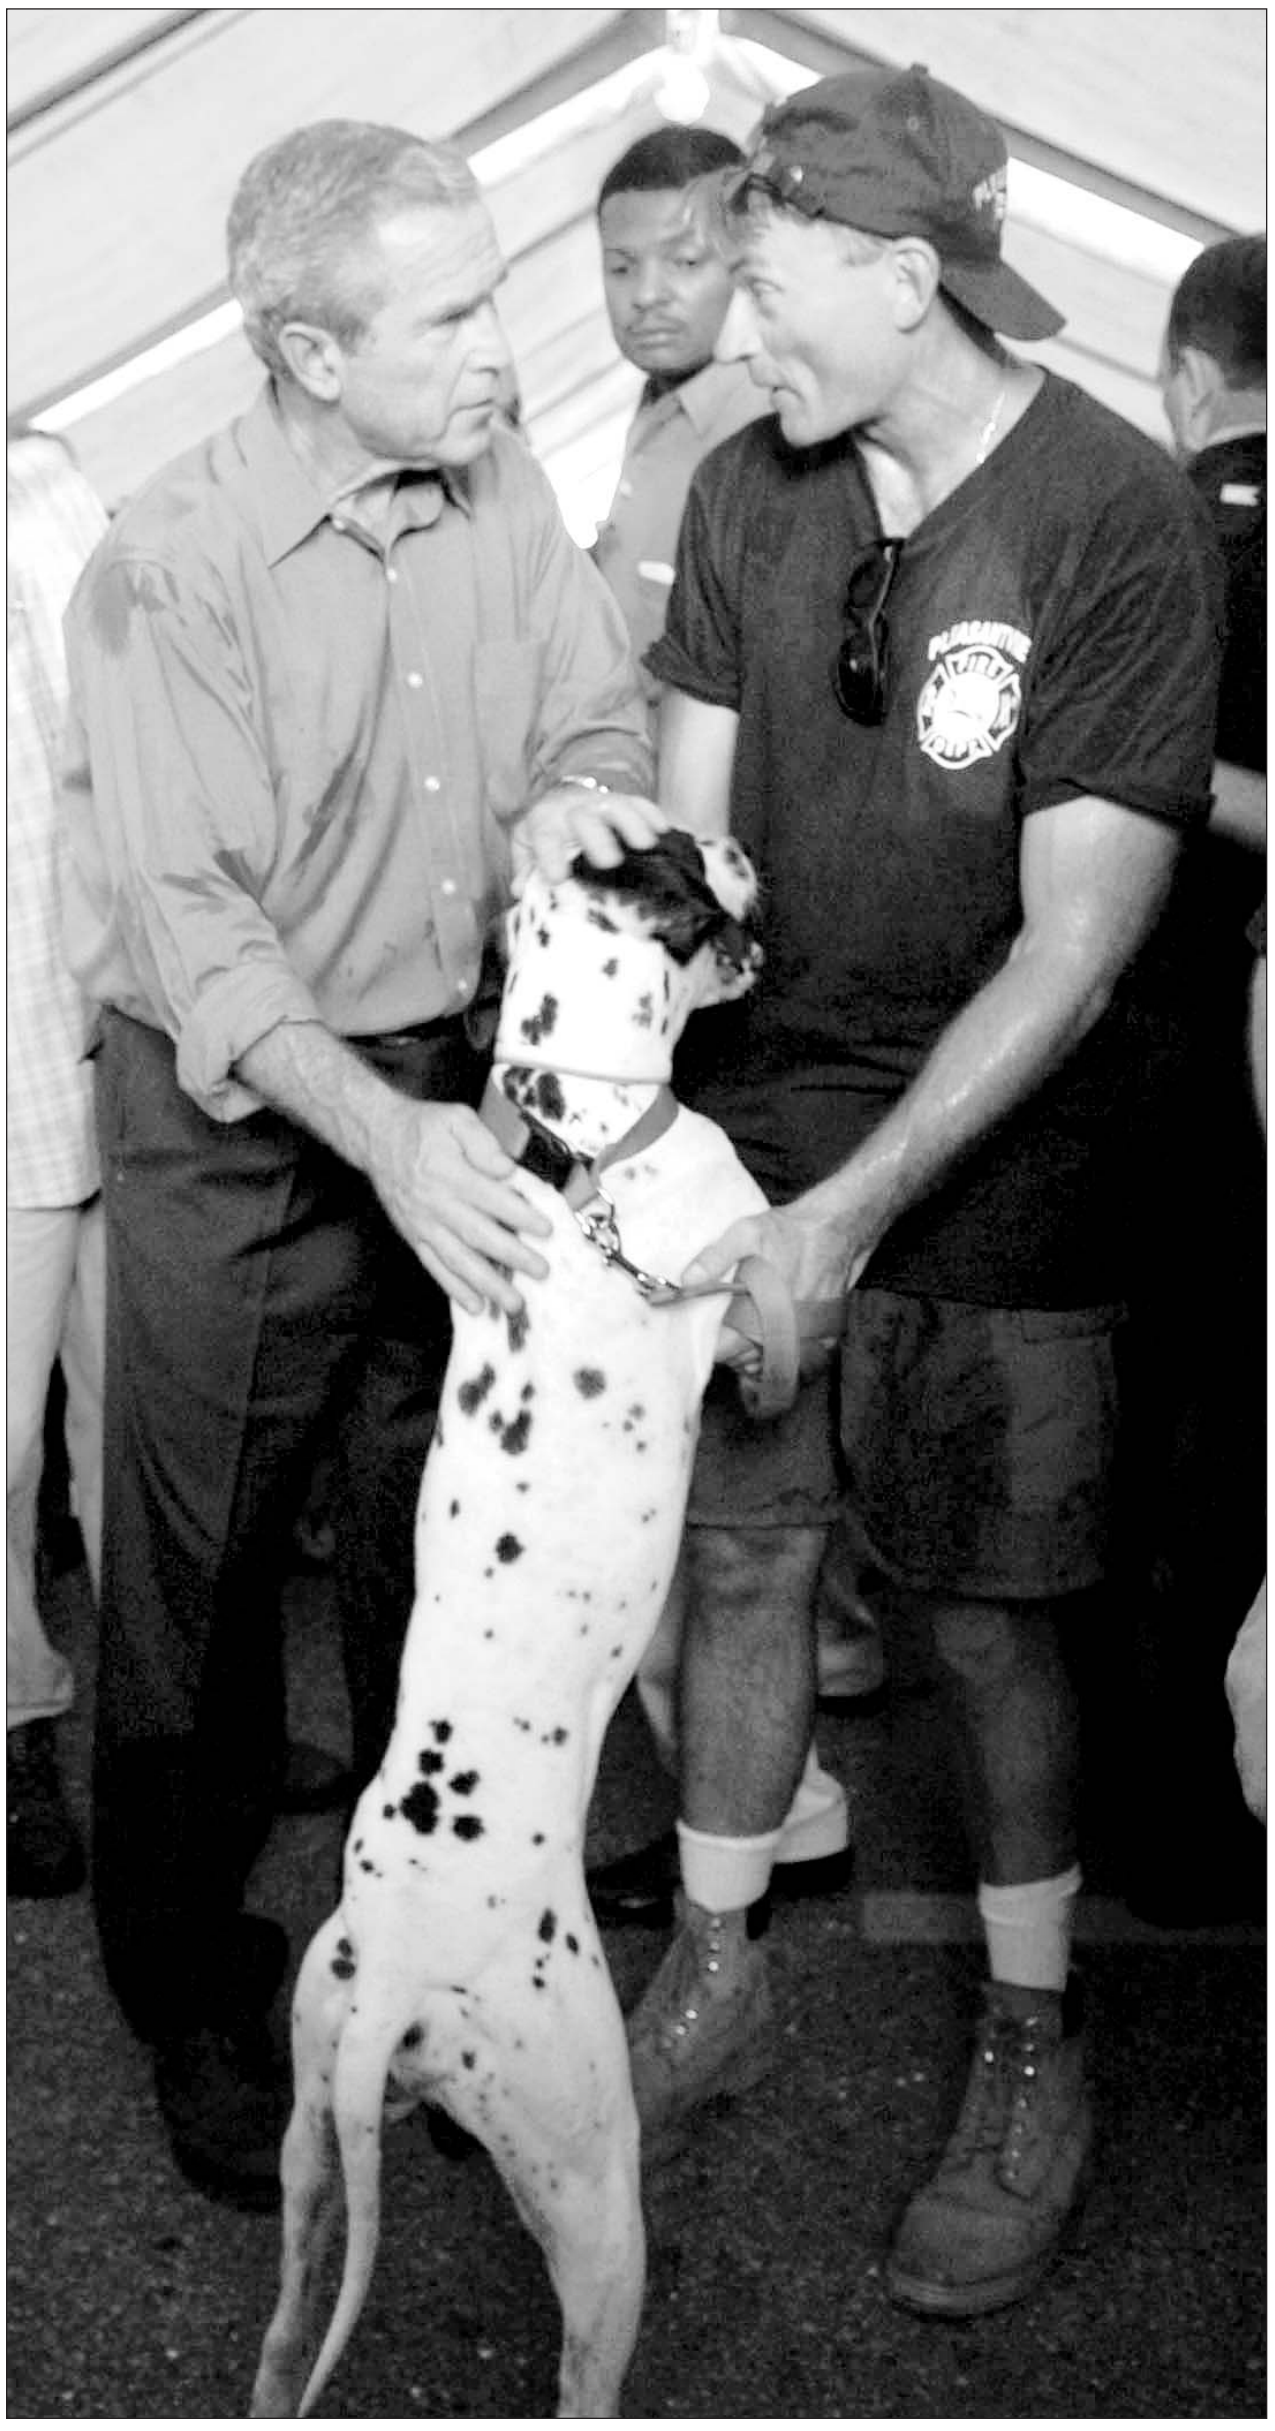
At Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport, commercial cargo traffic was reinstated Sunday. Limited passenger service will resume Tuesday with about 30 flights a day, airport Aviation Director Roy Williams said.

While Orleans, Jefferson and St. Bernard parishes remain off-limits to residents, other parts of the metro area are seeing people return to their homes and some semblance of their everyday lives, and those will provide a base for restored passenger traffic into and out of New Orleans, Williams said.

The airport averaged 174 daily flights prior to Hurricane Katrina, and the 30 daily departures resuming this week should grow to 60 to 70 by the end of October, he said.

Northwest, Delta, Southwest and Continental airlines are expected to be the first commercial airlines to resume passenger service.

Early Sunday, hundreds of firefighters who have converged on New Orleans from across the country to assist in firefighting and rescue operations gathered for a ceremony commemorating the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.



Fire officials from New York and New Orleans addressed the crowd that assembled on the lawn at Our Lady of Holy Cross College in Algiers.

The event prompted many of the visiting firefighters to compare their experience of the past two weeks in the hurricane flood zone with what they remembered from 9/11. Many spoke of the similarity of emotions wrung out by the disaster but noted one striking difference between the terrorist attacks and the wrath of Mother Nature.

"People here lost their homes," one New York firefighter said. "This is a different ballgame. We lost a lot of firefighters (on 9/11), good friends, but we had our homes to go back to. A lot of these firemen have no homes to go to."

Staff writers Matthew Brown, Frank Donze, Ed Anderson and James Varney contributed to this report.

President Bush arrived in storm-ravaged New Orleans for the second time Sunday, flying over the city by helicopter, and then, with Mayor Ray Nagin at his side, shook hands with firefighters from New York and elsewhere who were remembering Sept. 11.

Nagin greeted Bush at Louis Armstrong International Airport in New Orleans when Air Force One touched down just before 4:45 p.m. The pair then traveled via Marine One to the USS Iwo Jima, the amphibious assault ship that is the headquarters for the federal operation assisting New Orleans in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Neither the mayor nor the president spoke to reporters or took questions, and the pair seemed relaxed together. Nagin had been sharply critical of the waddling pace of the federal relief effort in the first days after Katrina, and the White House has clearly tried to put a more aggressive public face on Bush's role in the ongoing operation.

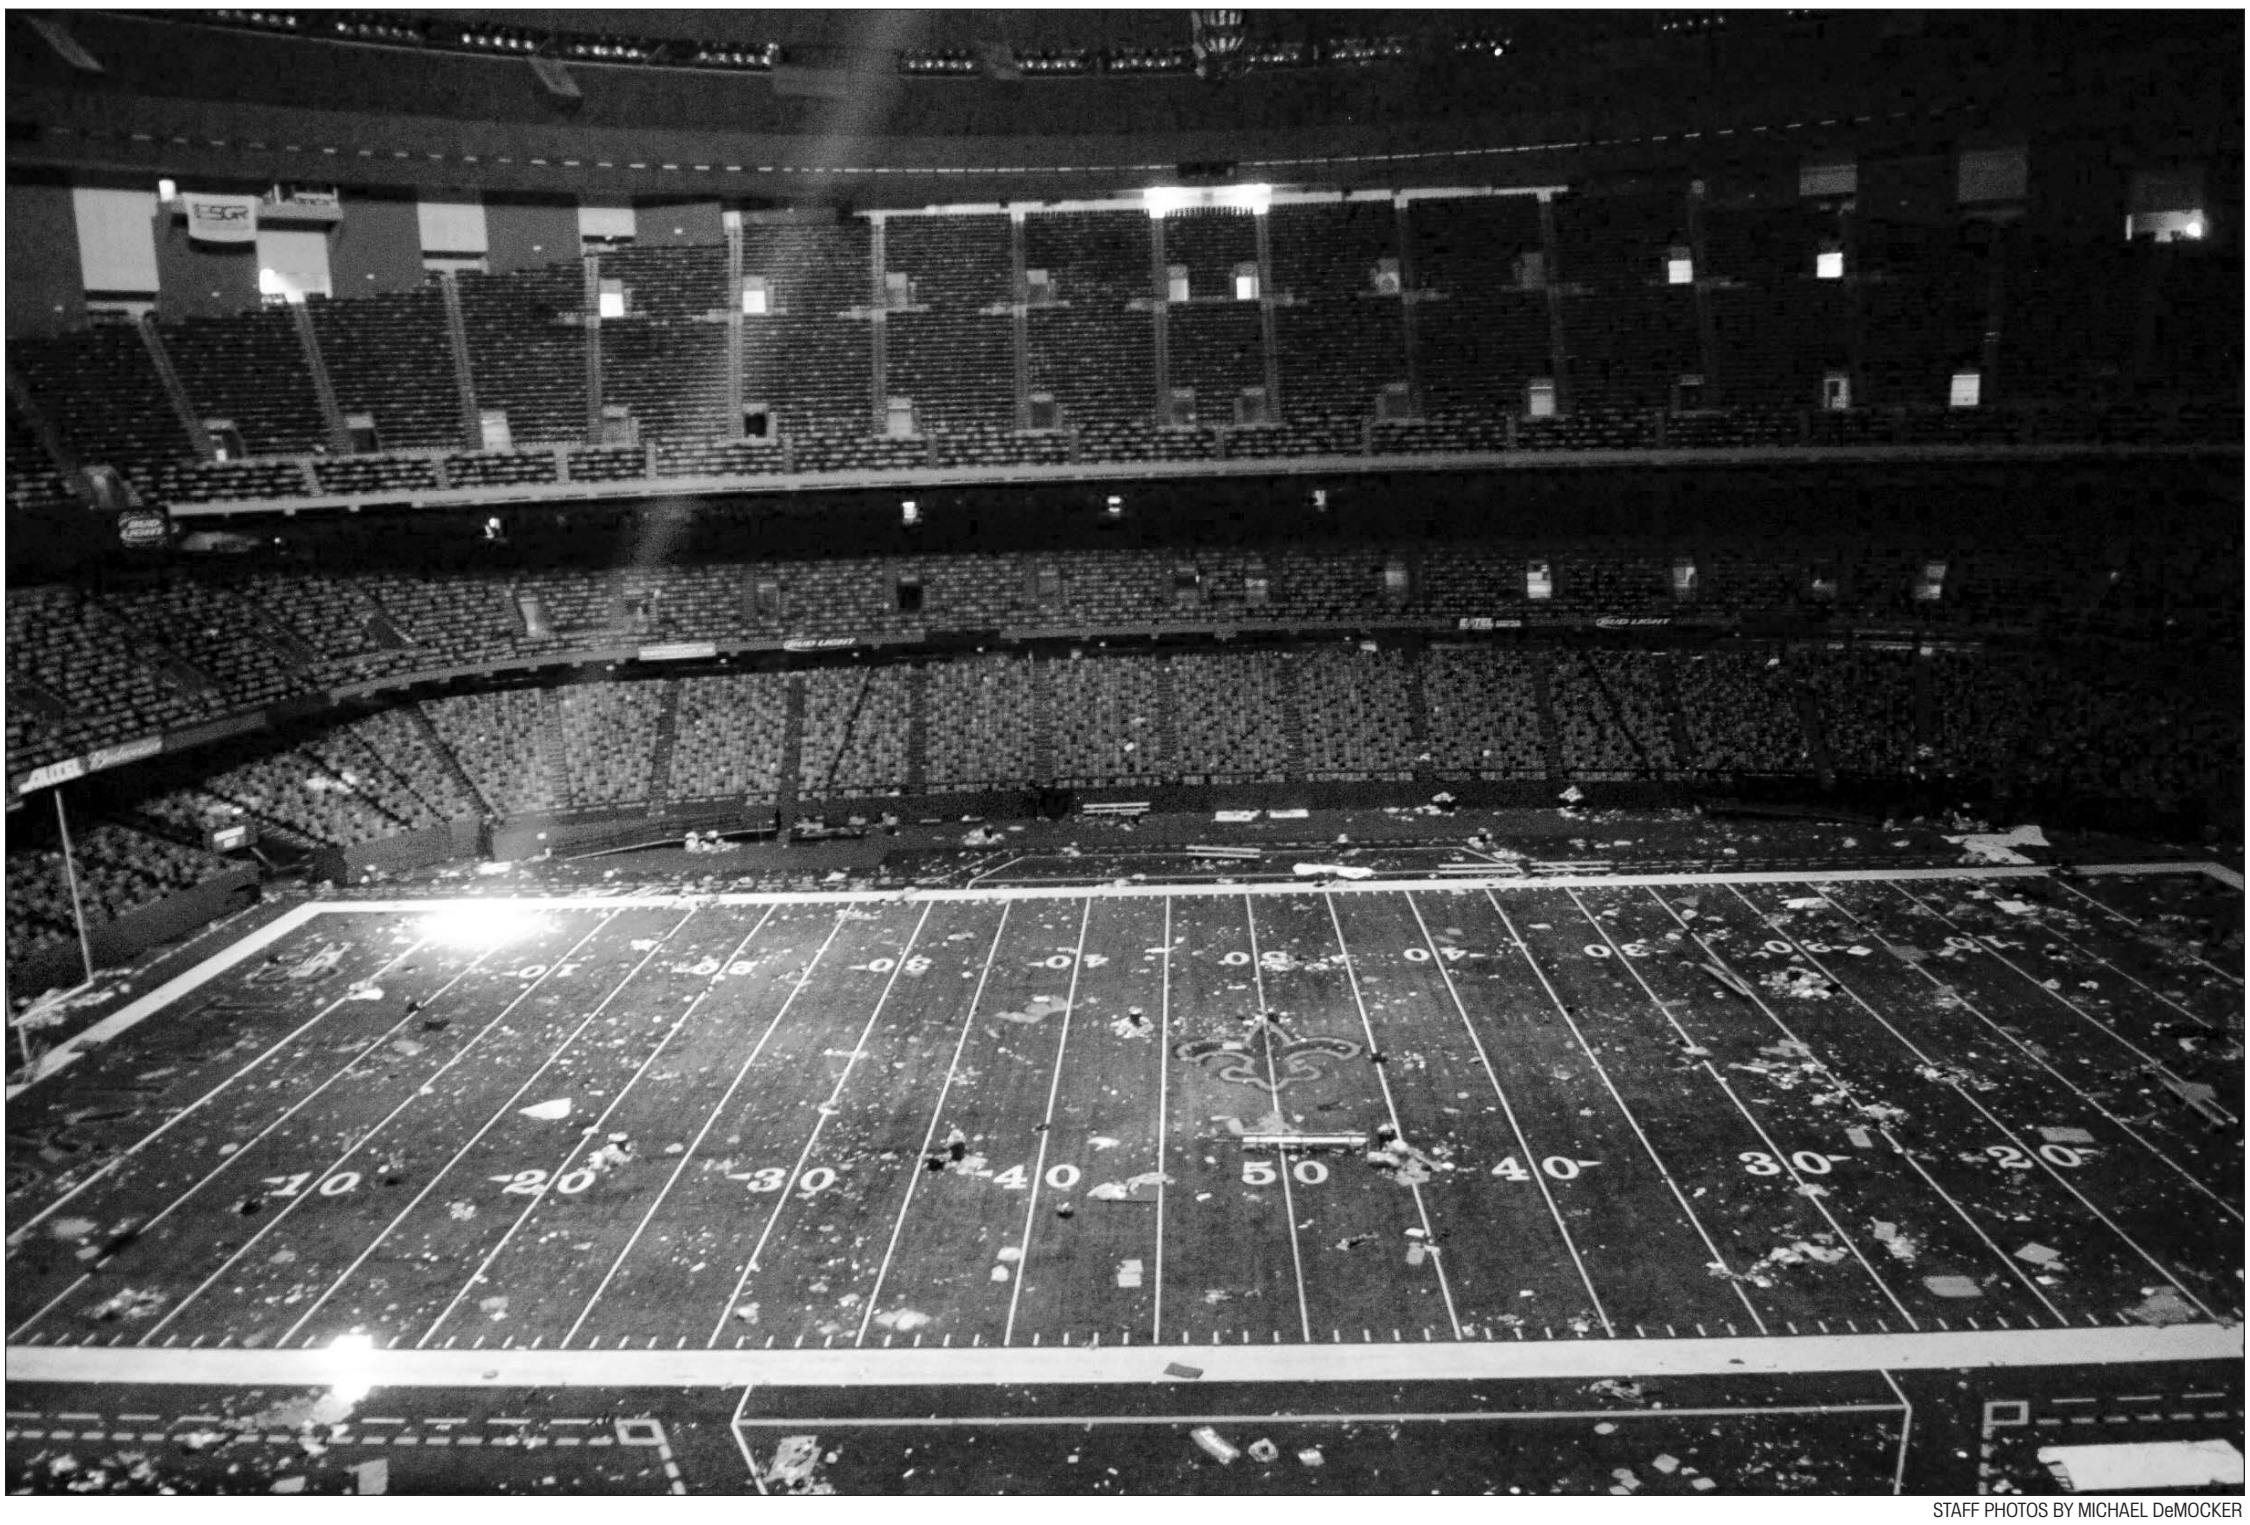
On the Iwo Jima, where eight bells and the announcement "United States arriving" over the ship's loudspeakers indicated the arrival of the commander in chief, the men chatted briefly with Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, head of the post-Katrina operation, and Vice Admiral Thad Allen, the newly appointed FEMA head.

Those four and possibly other officials are scheduled to hold a briefing early today, and then meet with area parish presidents, administration officials said. A tour of New Orleans by foot and helicopter will follow, although the timetable and the specific locations to be visited were not released by the White House.

Bush, Nagin, Honore and Allen then cranked up their caravan and headed over to the West Bank, where they made a surprise visit to the hundreds of out-of-town firefighters based at Our Lady of Holy Cross. In the mess hall and at various spots around the campus, the men shook hands and greeted troops and volunteers, leaving some bemused as they ate dinner among a horde of reporters, Secret Service agents and other officials.

Nagin sat at one table with Allen, Honore and a firefighter, talking about people who want to return to New Orleans and check on their homes, as well as the Saints victory on Sunday. He then walked by a line of about 100 firefighters, shaking hands and thanking them for their help. Several firefighters asked the mayor to pose for pictures with them, asking if he had a second.

"Sure I do," Nagin replied. "I'm not going anywhere."



Patty Schick, a firefighter from Lake Zurich, Ill., was elated by the arrival.

"The president's in there," she told her buddies gathered around the mess tents and seemingly confused about the hive of activity. "Go on in, I just shook his hand."

Schick said she was happy to be in New Orleans to help, a city she visited just once before for a conference last year.

"It looks a little different now," she said. "But the people down here are incredible."

A shaft of sunlight from a hole in the Superdome ceiling shines onto the garbage-covered field as officials on Friday toured the facility that housed evacuees from Hurricane Katrina.

Tour of Superdome reveals the ravages of city's symbol

beat-up car that has lost its primer. Sixty percent of the roof was damaged, said Doug Thornton, regional vice president for SMG, the company that manages the state-owned facility.

Thornton tagged the cost of damage at between $50 million and $100 million, less than some that have been tossed around in recent days, but substantial nonetheless.

After the 9/11 terrorist attacks, the World Trade Center became an icon of their wreckage. After Hurricane Katrina, it's the Superdome. Via helicopter fly-overs, TV networks beamed countless images of the hurricane-ravaged arena around the world in the days after the storm. As before, it symbolizes the city.

The unyielding eye of the cameras, however, never peered inside the 30-year-old landmark, which has been under armed-guard lockdown since the last of the 25,000 storm victims who sought shelter there were evacuated Sept. 4.

Assessing damage

On Friday, Thornton led a team of 22 contractors and a handful of Superdome employees on a tour of the facility to assess the damage caused by the hurricane and the storm victims who used the building as a refuge. It was the first time anyone other than Thornton or National Guard troops had been inside the building since Sept. 4.

The group included representatives from several national companies that specialize in environmental disaster abatement and demolition services. They donned gas masks, white jumpsuits and rubber hip boots. Some even rubbed Vick's Vaporub under their noses to block the stench.

"You been in yet, Tim?" one of the specialists asked Superdome Commission Chairman Tim Coulon as he slipped on his suit and mask. "It's like asking if you've ridden a big ride before. You want to know how scary it is before you get on."

Inside, the Dome's 1.8 million square feet looks trashed. Its floors, concourses, ramps, meeting rooms, offices and restrooms are littered with debris and refuse from the evacuees who endured hellish living conditions in the building for as many as five days after the storm.

The floor and Momentum Turf playing field have been transformed into a mushy lake of inch-deep black water. The fetid soup coated a sea of trash and spoiled food. The bathrooms on the 200 level overflow with human feces and urine. In one men's room, the human waste spilled out of the entrance and into the concourse. Blood stains several walls. Stagnant for days in the still air, the water, spoiled food and human excrement will require decontamination and will be removed by professionals.

Garbage and sewage fill the hallways of the Superdome, trashed by refugees of Hurricane Katrina. Crews toured the facility Friday to assess the damages.

"You could put a petri dish in here and just see what grows," one technician said. "The flies are telling you there's a biohazard."

The leftovers run the gamut – from mundane items such as clothes and blankets to the more personal, car keys, wallets, photo albums. One collection includes an organ donor card, a personal identification card, and another card with worn edges showing the picture of the Virgin Mary on one side and text on the other that reads, "I Am A Catholic. In case of accident please notify a priest."

On the desk in the Dome's office, ransacked by the people seeking shelter in the building, lay a neatly handwritten note on a small piece of folder notebook paper:

"Search and Rescue Team
Please Get
Old woman and legless old man
@ 2432 Ursalines Ave. (N.O.)"

'The ultimate test'

Officials said at least 10 to 12 people died in the Dome, including a man who jumped or was pushed 50 feet to his death from one of the pedestrian walkways. A military police officer also was shot in the leg during an assault.

Sgt. Tony Small, a major crimes cold-case investigator for the New Orleans Police Department who was in the unit assigned to the Superdome, said at least four rapes occurred in the Dome, and the victims included a 2-year-old girl.

"That's not rumors," Small said. "It was horrendous."

It's not known whether any arrests were made in those crimes.

Thornton slept on a cot in his office for four days behind the security of armed guards. "There were a lot of bad people in there," he said.

On the suite level, windows were shattered; holes and graffiti marred several walls. Damage to the luxury boxes varied from suite to suite.

In one, the liquor cabinets had been broken into and the chairs were rearranged but everything else was unharmed. Down the hall, one of the New Orleans Saints' suites was ransacked. Leather couches were turned over. Holes were punched in the walls and pictures were shattered. A 10-by-18-inch picture of former Saints running back Ricky Williams lay in tatters on a bed of broken glass and splintered wood.

The Dome's upper levels, which didn't house storm victims, were in relatively good shape. Water, which seeped through the exposed roof's sheet metal and seams during the storm, did most of the damage. Hardwood floors were buckled 6 inches high.

On the Dome's perimeter concourse, knee-high piles of refused ringed the building as workers with shovels and forklifts worked to remove the fly-ridden heaps.

"She's taken a hit," Thornton said after striding into the fresh air and daylight. "She's been given the ultimate test."

Thornton said the damage was far greater than what the Dome endured in 1998 when 14,000 evacuees looted and trashed the building while taking shelter from Hurricane Georges in 1998.

"It's a mess," said Brian Messisco, a vice president for LVI Services Inc., an emergency response specialty company from Salisbury, N.C., that oversaw the remediation of the Pentagon and World Trade Center sites after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. "It's going to take a lot of work. But I think it can be done. It's bad but not as bad as I thought."

Future uncertain

Friday's tour was the first step in a two-month evaluation process to determine whether the Dome should be salvaged, renovated or destroyed.

There is a strong possibility the costs to save the facility will be too high. Thornton has estimated it could cost $50 million to $100 million to repair the Dome and as much as $500 million to $600 million to demolish it and build a new one.

The future of one of country's world's most recognized buildings, one that has hosted some of the biggest events in American history and along the way became one of New Orleans' most enduring symbols, is now uncertain.

Six NFL teams won Super Bowls in it. The LSU Tigers celebrated the 2004 college football national championship in it. Frank Sinatra crooned in it. The Rolling Stones rocked it. And Pope John Paul II prayed in it.

"Who can tell?" Coulon said. "I tried to prepare myself for what I was going to see, but it's in worse shape than I thought. And there's so much you can't see with the molds and spores. We'll just have to wait and find out."

The evaluation will be a laborious process. Thornton hopes to receive bids from the contractors by the end of this week.

"One guy asked me why we wouldn't just want to tear down the Dome because it harbors so many bad memories of the storm, but we had 30 years of good memories here before the hurricane," Thornton said. "It could be a symbol for the rebuilding of New Orleans, something people could rally around."

But, he added, "there is a possibility that they've played the last game in the Superdome as we know it."

HURRICANE KATRINA AFTERMATH

Passenger flights return to N.O. airport

Service limited to 30 trips daily

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport opened to cargo traffic Sunday and will resume limited passenger service Tuesday with about 30 flights a day, airport Aviation Director Roy Williams said Sunday.

"We are not saying Orleans and Jefferson parishes are open for business, but we have customers from St. Charles and St. John the Baptist parishes" that can be served, as well as other parts of south Louisiana that were not significantly affected by Hurricane Katrina, Williams said.

"There is a lot of customer use'' outside of New Orleans and Jefferson Parish, Williams said. "We are the I-10 of the air" for the state, serving about 80 percent of its passenger and cargo needs.

He said he expects 30 daily departures starting Tuesday and that will build to "60 to 70 or more by Halloween."

Under normal conditions, more than 26,000 passengers arrive and depart each day from the airport, which averages 174 daily flights.

Williams said the first airlines expected to resume service should be Northwest, Delta, Southwest and Continental, while international carriers Grupo Taca and Air Canada may "take a longer time to resume service."

The airport has been operational since Aug. 30, the day after Hurricane Katrina struck, but one concourse has been used as a makeshift medical center to treat injuries and the sick who were evacuated.

Williams said that more than 5,000 military and civilian personnel have been based at the airport. In the baggage claim area, conveyor belts that usually carry luggage have been converted into beds for troops stationed at the facility.

With the opening of the airport, he said, the troops will be moved and the baggage claim area will be back in service.

Williams said Concourses A and B will be used for arriving and departing passengers, while Concourse C has sustained damages from Katrina and Concourse D will remain closed to treat the evacuated patients.

Williams said since the airport has been closed to commercial traffic, it has been used for "humanitarian relief flights and civilian and military rescue missions." He said that in the past two weeks, the airport "has seen a flurry of activity with over 30,000 evacuees departing" on military and commercial airliners.

A week ago, he said, the airport was home to 10,000 evacuees, but that number has dwindled. He did not know what the evacuee level at the airport was Sunday.

Each day the airport is closed, Williams said, the airport loses about $250,000 in fees: about $50,000 from concessionaires and $200,000 from the airlines that use the facility. He said the airport's budget is about $70 million a year, which is based upon the airline fees and fees from the restaurants and shops at the airport.

Overall, the economic impact from loss of revenues at the airport could be a $40 million hit on the New Orleans area.

Williams said for the time being, the airport will see a decline in usage, but in the long run he expects "a pretty good recovery" with architects, engineers, contractors and others flying into the area for the reconstruction effort. It will also be a major link when displaced Louisiana residents return home, he said.

"We are extremely pleased to reopen Armstrong International to commercial air service," Williams said. "Scheduled passenger and cargo service enhances the airport's ability to support the city and the region in its recovery."

Without clean water, city is called unlivable

Inhabitants run risk of disease, experts say

By John Pope
Staff writer

Too much water drove New Orleanians out of their homes after Hurricane Katrina struck. Now health officials say a water shortage should persuade holdouts to leave and keep evacuees from returning.

Even though water still stands on some city streets, there is no reliable source of clean water for drinking, washing, preparing food, cleaning house or properly disposing of bodily waste, state epidemiologist Raoult Ratard said.

"There is no question that the best place to be is out of the city," New Orleans Health Department Director Kevin Stephens said. "There is no other option. Water is not drinkable, and most people don't have power. There are significant hazards that you'd be exposing you and your family to by staying here. It's better to go out and come back. I see no reason to stay in your home."

When people come into contact with polluted water, they risk not only becoming infected but also making existing infections worse, Ratard said.

"This is not small stuff," he said. "People who stay are going to cause a problem for everybody. They're going to scream for help, and it won't be easy to get to a hospital."

Among people who have stayed in New Orleans since Katrina struck, medical personnel are most concerned about the possibility of digestive and foot infections that come from spending several days in sewage-tainted water, said Dr. Robert Tauxe, chief of the foodborne and diarrheal diseases branch of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Anyone with an open wound who spends time in foul water runs the risk of infection with Vibrio vulnificus, a bacterium also found in unclean oysters, as well as campylobacter, salmonella and norovirus, all of which can cause digestive afflictions, he said.

Skin infections and boils are possible, too, Ratard said.

To get a better idea of what must be done to improve health in New Orleans, Stephens said about 30 representatives of city, state and federal health and environmental agencies are analyzing conditions and are expected to issue an action plan within days.

But at the same time, health officials are downplaying talk of such rare diseases as cholera and typhoid fever, both of which Tauxe dismissed as highly unlikely.

"Talk of 'toxic gumbo' is a wild exaggeration," Ratard said.

Hospitals ready for patient influx

Facilities open in Jefferson, Tammany, River parishes

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – Hospitals in Jefferson Parish and Slidell that have reopened since Hurricane Katrina are staffed and equipped sufficiently to deal with the current flow of patients suffering effects in the storm's aftermath, as well as the expected re-entry of thousands of people who might return to their homes in the next few weeks, a federal health official said Sunday.

The hospitals will be healthier the sooner people start moving back into the area, said Rear Adm. Craig Vanderwagen, the emergency response team commander for the U.S. Public Health Service, part of the Department of Health and Human Services.

Speaking at a briefing coordinated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, Vanderwagen said five hospitals are operating in the New Orleans metro area and have 500 vacant beds.

The five open hospitals within the Louisiana Hospital Association's New Orleans region are East Jefferson General Hospital, West Jefferson Hospital, Ochsner Foundation Hospital, North Shore Regional Medical Center in Slidell and St. Charles Parish Hospital.

Also, a health care command team and rescue center is operating out of Kindred Hospital New Orleans, 3601 Coliseum St. Meadowcrest Hospital in Gretna is providing immunization and other services but is not admitting patients.

Other local hospitals that are open include River Parishes Hospital in LaPlace and St. Tammany Parish Hospital and Lakeview Regional Medical Center, both in Covington.

Now that the hospitals are back in action, it is "critical" from a human resources standpoint that those services be used, Vanderwagen said. Hospital workers scattered throughout the state and the country during the storm, and the community needs to bring them back for the long term.

The hospitals need more patients to operate efficiently and to keep medical personnel in place, Vanderwagen said. A large influx of people into the area will not strain the resources.

"I think the capacity is there," Vanderwagen said.

The hospitals are keeping track of diseases that are diagnosed, so they can have a coordinated response to possible outbreaks, he said.

Vanderwagen is helping restart medical services in the storm-ravaged city, a job he held in Iraq when the United States was trying to revamp that country's health care system.

Capt. George Havens with the National Disaster Medical System said his agency has deployed 1,200 personnel who have treated more than 16,000 patients. His agency is also treating military personnel.

The disaster medical system is helping operate field hospitals in Covington, at Nicholls State University in Thibodaux and at the Chalmette Refinery. Other operations are at Zephyr Field and Louis Armstrong International Airport.

We need housing, state tells FEMA

Agency moving too slowly, La. officials say

By Ed Anderson and Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – The Federal Emergency Management Agency is moving too slowly to bring temporary housing into Louisiana for displaced victims of Hurricane Katrina, state officials said Sunday.

Col. Jeff Smith, deputy director of the state Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness, said that with tens of thousands of Louisiana residents in evacuation centers in the state and more dispersed around the country, FEMA has not moved swiftly enough to bring in trailers and mobile homes or find vacant apartments or homes for the displaced victims.

"We have a main concern with temporary housing,'' Smith said. "We don't feel that process is moving fast enough. There needs to be trailers rolling and things happening that just aren't happening . . . This is truly a national issue."

In response, FEMA spokesman David Passey said Sunday that the agency is forming a housing task force and has provided travel trailers for 10 families in Patterson, a small town in St. Mary Parish. He said hundreds of trailers and manufactured homes are on the way.

"The effort is progressing quite well," Passey said.

To set up temporary housing, the agency must locate large sites capable of providing electricity, water and sewerage, Passey said.

Smith said temporary, long-term housing is needed immediately so Louisiana residents can start to return to the state.

Smith said two weeks after disasters struck in other states, FEMA had temporary housing for the displaced.

Last year, Tropical Storm Bonnie and Hurricane Charley hit Florida in mid-August, followed by Hurricanes Frances on Sept. 4, Ivan on Sept 16 and Jeanne on Sept 25. On Sept. 20 last year, FEMA reported that 1,082 manufactured homes were in place as temporary housing for displaced families, of which 447 were occupied at that time.

Mark Smith, public information officer for the state Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness, said the state will need housing in the form of trailers, mobile homes or apartments.

"They (FEMA officials) are planning," Smith said. "Our (state) leaders would like to see a little less planning and a little more action.'"

As of Sunday, there were more than 48,000 evacuees housed in Louisiana shelters, and more than 70,000 in shelters around the nation. Others are at churches or other private centers or living with friends and relatives. The state has offered to put trailers or mobile homes in all state parks.

Col. Smith said FEMA wants the state to come up with an estimate of the number of homeless and how many housing units will be needed, but Smith said because of the enormity of the situation, that is not yet possible.

"There needs to be trailers rolling and things happening that just aren't happening. . . . This is truly a national issue."

COL. JEFF SMITH
deputy director of the state Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness

The colonel called on FEMA to "start thinking outside the box" on creative ways to move housing into the state.

FEMA owns hundreds of housing units stationed in Fort Worth, Texas, and at sites east of New Orleans, Passey said. The agency probably will have to procure more units to fill the need, he said. The aim is to set up housing as close as possible to the communities where people normally live, he said.

Passey could not provide specific figures Sunday afternoon on FEMA's temporary housing supply.

Meanwhile, Passey said, a substantial amount of temporary housing has been provided for public officials and emergency personnel dealing with the storm's aftermath. A cruise ship in New Orleans is housing public safety and essential public workers, while 400 housing units in Slidell are available to first responders, those dealing with the storm's immediate effects. And public officials in New Orleans are using 300 housing units provided by the federal government, he said.

People interested in obtaining temporary housing can visit the Web site www.DHRonline.org, Passey said.

Some streetcars still under water

Half of buses may be beyond repair

"There's a lot that has to be assessed, but we believe it's imperative to get some kind of rail back in service as soon as possible. Our streetcars are icons and it's important that our citizens see them up and running."

MARK MAJOR
RTA finance director

Much of New Orleans' public transit infrastructure, including the brand-new Canal Street streetcars that debuted to considerable fanfare in April 2004, the riverfront trolleys and at least half of the 350 buses in the fleet, remain partially submerged in floodwaters and may be beyond repair, Regional Transit Authority officials said.

The 24 apple-red streetcars – assembled largely by hand by RTA artisans as part of a $161 million project that restored rail service to Canal Street after an absence of nearly 40 years - were stored at the A. Philip Randolph Operations Facility in the 2800 block of Canal as Hurricane Katrina approached the Louisiana coast.

The RTA also used the Randolph facility to house about 175 buses and the seven streetcars that have comprised the riverfront line for the past 16 years. When transit workers evacuated the building nearly two weeks ago, water levels in the parking lot had already risen "up to the steering wheels" of most of the vehicles.

"It wasn't a pretty sight,'' said Mark Major, the agency's finance director. "Those new streetcars have a lot of delicate electronics. Even if they were sitting in clear pool water, it would have caused serious problems. The fact that the water is filled with gasoline and other corrosives is not good news."

He said the same holds true for buses.

In the 16 months since they began operating, the Canal streetcars, which cost almost $1 million each, became very popular among locals and visitors, boosting ridership on the line beyond expectations.

Major said the 35 streetcars on the historic St. Charles Avenue line appear to have escaped serious water damage, although the condition of the tracks and the bed beneath them, the overhead electrical system and the power stations is unknown.

"We're hoping the metal bodies (of the streetcars) are OK," he said. "But until we get a look inside, we won't know what can be salvaged. Some may be in good shape, some may have damage and some may need total replacement."

While all streetcars and buses are covered by insurance, it is unclear how much depreciation will play into what the RTA can recover and how soon.

The bottom line, Major said, is that even when New Orleans' transit system gets back in business, rail service probably won't be part of the equation at first.

"Large portions of Canal Street are still sitting in water," he said.

"There's a lot that has to be assessed, but we believe it's imperative to get some kind of rail back in service as soon as possible. Our streetcars are icons and it's important that our citizens see them up and running."

The RTA did not store any of its buses at the agency's headquarters in eastern New Orleans, which suffered some of the worst flooding in the city.

Some 150 buses that were moved to the Poland Avenue Wharf in the Lower Ninth

Ward appear to have fared well, but about 70 of those vehicles were commandeered by the police and fire departments, the National Guard, and in a few cases by individual citizens who used them to evacuate family members, friends and neighbors.

The RTA is in the process of recovering those buses and other unaccounted-for vehicles. The agency has learned that two buses wound up in Lafayette, one in Opelousas and one in Bunkie. Two other buses were found in the Ninth Ward, where residents used them several days for shelter.

In what may be the only bit of good news, RTA spokeswoman Deslie Isidore said it looks like the passengers on the pirated buses "did not lay a finger on the fareboxes."

In the short term, the RTA will offer all functioning buses in its fleet for use in the recovery effort.

FEMA officials have asked that some of the buses be made available as early as next week for transport between Baton Rouge and New Orleans for staffers, clean-up crews, construction workers and other participants in the rebuilding process.

Major also said RTA buses and drivers soon may be rolling through the streets of Baton Rouge to help relieve the pressure that tens of thousands of south Louisiana evacuees have placed on the capital city's traffic.

Millions in work planned for region

Kellogg Brown & Root Services of Arlington, Va., has been awarded three contracts worth $29.8 million for work related to Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts, the Department of Defense announced Friday.

A $10 million contract will be for reconstruction, roofing, debris removal, water and mold mitigation and interior repairs to most buildings; repairs to waste treatment plants; and other work at the Naval Support Activity New Orleans, Joint Reserve Base New Orleans.

A second contract for $7.8 million is for other repairs at the facilities.

Both contracts were awarded as extensions of a 2004 contract for repairs at those facilities.

The company also was awarded a $12 million contract for similar repairs at the Gulfport and Pascagoula naval air stations, Stennis Space Center and other Navy installations.

TJC Engineering Inc., of Louisville, Ky., was awarded a $5 million contract for Katrina repairs at the Meridian, Miss., Naval Air Station. That contract was awarded as a sole source bid under Small Business Administration rules.

Moss Bluff park becomes evacuee home

Donations, new friends keep them afloat

By Jaquetta White and Susan Poag

MOSS BLUFF – Dressed in a blue pinstriped shirt and khaki pants, Joe Gilyot, assistant principal of Marion Abramson Senior High School in New Orleans, looked ready to walk the halls of his school Wednesday.

Instead, he walked purposefully through the towering pines at Sam Houston Jones State Park in Moss Bluff to read the day's news on a message board set up for Hurricane Katrina evacuees.

"This community has wrapped their arms around us so tightly."

JOE GILYOT
assistan principal of Marion Abramson Senior High School

Gilyot, his wife, two children and his mother-in-law are among more than 200 New Orleans and Gulf Coast evacuees finding refuge at the park, nestled deep within this small community of about 25,000 nine miles northwest of Lake Charles. The Gilyots arrived Aug. 27, the day before Hurricane Katrina submerged their eastern New Orleans home, and now are living in a 23-foot-long pop-up travel trailer.

For at least the month of September, and probably longer, a moratorium on state park fees will keep dozens of hurricane evacuees at the Moss Bluff park. Although the park is not receiving assistance from the Red Cross, volunteers and donated supplies are overflowing. For many of the displaced, the outpouring of support has made the park feel like home.

"This community has wrapped their arms around us so tightly. They are our Moss Bluff angels; they are saving us," Gilyot said.

"It's been wonderful," said Pamela Huhner of Jefferson, whose camp was set up about 20 yards from where three men played a game of horseshoes and a few paces from a children's play area. "We are like a community here now."

Many families have worked hard to make their campsites resemble home. At campsite T-18, a family of eight has found a way to install air conditioning in each of the four tents donated to them.

John Heath cut square holes in the tents and put air conditioning units through them. The units are connected — along with a donated television, microwave and electric fans – to nearby electric outlets by a tangle of extension cords.

The air conditioner is used only at night, said Heath, who shares the space with his children, his ex-wife Gwen Killen, her husband and sister, and two dogs, two rabbits and a duck.

Greg Killen, with daughter Cassidi Lynn on his lap, sits with John Heath of River Ridge and Killen's wife, Gwen, in their 'living room,' a tarp-covered area near their campsite at Sam Houston Jones State Park in Moss Bluff, a tiny southwest Louisiana community.

During the day, the evacuees busy themselves with plans to rebuild, at least temporarily, in Moss Bluff and nearby Lake Charles.

Heath, a self-employed plumber whose River Ridge home escaped damage, said he can't go back until there's work available. Much of his work comes from the metro New Orleans area, so he has taken a job at a Moss Bluff plumbing company for now.

"This is not going to be anything permanent. But I've got to stay here now. I'm going to do what I can while I'm here to try to make a few dollars," Heath said.

"We're just like everybody else, we live paycheck to paycheck. You miss one paycheck and something is out of sync."

While Heath prepared for work, Killen enrolled three of their four children in school, one each in the local elementary, middle and high school.

"I have heard that the schools are good. Their education is a big factor," she said.

Gilyot, too, enrolled his children, ages 12 and 15, in school in Moss Bluff.

"The city is underwater. I can't wait," Gilyot said. He's also talked with a principal about job openings in the school system for him and his wife Alorea, a teacher at Lake Forest Montessori School.

"I am signing up to be a substitute teacher. Before being an administrator, I was a math teacher. The thought of unemployment is unappetizing. I have never been unemployed," he said.

Already Gilyot is using the park's address as his own. "This is my life for now until I get a job," he said. "I am in combat mode, my administrative mode. I have told my son 'work the problem, don't let the problem work you.'"

Still, Gilyot like others at Sam Houston Jones, longs for the comforts and certainties of home.

"What hurts most are the little things. Not losing the house but hearing my son listen to a song and say 'Daddy has that album at home' and knowing that it doesn't apply anymore," he said. "Thinking of an album or a piece of something I had on the computer. It is the little things that just crush you."

Fighting back tears, Huhner said the hardest thing she has to deal with is not knowing what will happen to her lifelong home.

"New Orleans is not New Orleans anymore," she said. "Even for those folks living on the West Bank or in Jefferson Parish, New Orleans is the heartthrob of everything. It makes everything else work. If they rebuild it it's going to be a slow process."

Whenever the city is ready to receive him, Heath will be there.

"It would be ridiculous not to go back," he said. "New Orleans is my home. I've got to go back."

HURRICANE KATRINA AFTERMATH

Return to Plaquemines begins

12,000 allowed to view devastation firsthand; 6,000 homes likely lost in lower areas

By Matthew Brown
West Bank bureau

When he returned to his Belle Chasse house Sunday after being forced out for two weeks by Hurricane Katrina, Alan Bonvillian knew he was one of the lucky.

A few trees were down. A piece of siding was missing from the exterior of his one-story brick house on Alfred Street. And a freezer's worth of steaks and shrimp had gone bad when the electricity went out.

But compared with the awe-inspiring ruins of what were once communities in the south and east sections of Plaquemines Parish, home to 27,000 people, he knew the damage was inconsequential.

"The house is still standing, no water damage, and everything is replaceable," said Bonvillian, 48, a retired welder. "We'll make do."

Sunday was the first day an estimated 12,000 of the parish's residents were allowed to return home to gauge Katrina's toll. Blocking the return of remaining residents – possibly for another month – is the near-total destruction of homes and businesses south and east of the community of Alliance.

Officials in neighboring parishes have tried to persuade residents to stay away from their homes or to visit and then leave until utilities and public services are fully restored. In New Orleans, the city has taken the unprecedented step of saying it will forcibly remove people who refused to evacuate on their own.

Plaquemines Parish President Benny Rousselle is taking a different stance.

"The sooner I can get the population back, the sooner we will recover. These people will take care of their own," he said Sunday.

The human toll of Katrina likely will be highest in Orleans and St. Bernard parishes, where densely populated communities swamped by floodwaters are feared to have suffered mass casualties. But the storm wreaked perhaps its greatest physical toll in the area known as Lower Plaquemines, which was buffeted by winds estimated to have topped 150 mph and a storm surge that towered 20 to 25 feet over surrounding marshlands.

Although lingering high waters have impeded a complete assessment of the hardest-hit areas, Rousselle estimates that 6,000 homes were lost in the fishing villages and oil industry communities that dot Lower Plaquemines. This number would include virtually every house, trailer, cottage and camp along a 15-mile stretch of Louisiana 39 on the east bank, from Phoenix to south of Pointe a la Hache, and a 45-mile stretch of Louisiana 23 on the West Bank, from Myrtle Grove to Venice.

Located at the extreme southeast tip of the state, most of Plaquemines is composed of brackish marshland. A thin strip of habitation lines both sides of the Mississippi River, where clusters of houses are tucked between massive levees that shield the land from the river on one side and tidal marshes on the other.

Those defenses came up far short during Katrina. First, the Mississippi River topped both of its banks, sending huge quantities of river water flooding into the parish. Later, when the tidal surge rolled in, the marsh-side levees suffered four massive breaches: three on the West Bank, near Home Place, Sunrise and north of Empire; and one on the east bank, near Pointe a la Hache.

Until the levee breaches are repaired and remaining floodwaters pumped out, a process that could take at least two weeks, Lower Plaquemines will remain largely off-limits, Rousselle said. The clearing of debris revealed by the receding water could take another week or two, Rousselle said, meaning it could be as long as a month before Lower Plaquemines residents can get back to the remains of their homes.

In excess of 90 percent of Plaquemines residents had fled in anticipation of the storm, according to parish officials, who credit the exodus with keeping the casualty count to date at just three confirmed dead.

Port Sulphur resident Keith Delahoussaye has been one of the few Lower Plaquemines homeowners who have managed to get through police and military checkpoints to check on his property. He fared better than most of his neighbors: Floodwaters picked up and moved his house, a former bank building, only three feet, leaving it tilting at an odd angle against a large oak tree. The trailers and houses that belonged to many of his neighbors and extended family were carried as far as 100 yards before smashing into trees or one another.

That scene differed remarkably from those encountered by residents to the north, where an estimated 375 vehicles per hour poured back into the parish beginning at 6 a.m. The rush to return caused a mile-long backup along Belle Chasse Highway and Lapalco Boulevard. By midmorning, the recovery Rousselle had envisioned already was taking shape in Belle Chasse, Jesuit Bend and Cedar Grove, with business owners tackling makeshift roof repairs and homeowners clearing debris and pulling carpets in areas that had moderate flooding.

At Hunter's Seafood Restaurant in Belle Chasse, where the steak and lobster specials on offer when the storm hit still could be seen on the blackboard, owner Karl Hunter already was plotting how much of a loan he would need from the federal Small Business Administration to fix a collapsed ceiling.

"We're going to come back," Hunter promised. Even in his native community of Port Sulphur, where not a single building was unscathed by Katrina, he said people will be determined to return.

"I remember when (hurricanes) Betsy and Camille hit. All they had was trailers down there, and they had nothing after the storms. It was all gone. They came back."

Plaquemines Parish Coroner Lawrence Giambelluca walks through his debris-strewn home Sunday after about 12,000 residents were allowed to re-enter certain areas of the hurricane-ravaged parish. In excess of 90 percent of Plaquemines residents fled before Katrina hit, parish officials said.

Lack of communication during Katrina proved crippling

Rescue, safety, recovery efforts were hindered

By Laura Maggi
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Practically from the moment Hurricane Katrina barreled across the New Orleans area, state officials complained that one of the major problems with rescue, safety and recovery efforts was the sheer inability to communicate.

"Part of the big problem is the communications network is down," Gov. Kathleen Blanco said the day after the storm; cell phones, BlackBerries and land lines were useless at the moment when coordination among the various branches of government was the most critical.

Local officials, including emergency personnel, often were unable to contact the state and even had problems communicating with one another within a parish.

Katrina's Category 4 winds certainly packed a powerful punch, but officials had warning that communications could be significantly disrupted during a major disaster.

There was the example of Sept. 11, 2001, in New York, when firefighters and police could not talk to one another. Since then, U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, noted last week, the federal government has doled out about $280 million – $19 million of which went to Louisiana – to make it easier for emergency workers from different agencies to communicate. But in many cases, communications have not improved, he said.

In Louisiana, problems had surfaced in far less serious storms, for example, during Hurricane Lili and Tropical Storm Isidore in the fall of 2002. Leading politicians, including then-Gov. Mike Foster, noted the difficulties in coordinating the activities of various agencies, from the State Police to the National Guard to shelters.

State officials last week said that before Hurricane Katrina they were moving aggressively toward "interoperability," the buzzword that means allowing local and state agencies to communicate with one another. They also wanted to implement greater "redundancy": having the technological backups to guarantee coverage if things go awry.

The problem was money, said Lt. Col. Joey Booth, who is in charge of the crisis response and special operations section of the State Police.

But that is no longer a problem. Since Katrina, Motorola Inc. has received a $16.9 million contract, which FEMA is paying for, to make the radio infrastructure in the New Orleans area interoperable, with sufficient backups. The State Police plan to have the new system up and running in New Orleans in a week's time.

But when Katrina hit, plans to revamp the emergency communications systems were still in the works.

During the aftermath of the storm, the major issue wasn't necessarily interoperability, but just making sure first responders had radios, Booth said.

The New Orleans Police Department had no real communications system. A big tower used for radio communication in Jefferson Parish went down during the storm, while transmitters got soaked in flooded St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes, said Kelly Kirwan, a vice president of sales for Motorola, which provides radio services for many of the parishes surrounding New Orleans. Radio capabilities have been restored in Jefferson, but it could take a while to fix the problems in the more water-logged parishes, he said.

As technicians worked to get the system back up, it became overloaded with users as local emergency personnel, as well as those on state and federal levels, started using it, said Rex McDonald, director of the information technology division for the State Police.

Hurricane Katrina also sent many first responders in southeast Louisiana back to a less technologically advanced time. In some of the rural parishes, the major link to the outside world involved the old-fashioned ham radio operators who volunteer their time at local emergency centers and relay messages back to the state Office of Emergency Preparedness.

In Washington Parish, local officials reached the state through a ham operator, who set up at the emergency center after the storm and worked with other radio aficionados to help coordinate the evacuation of a local nursing home. State Sen. Ben Nevers, D-Bogalusa, and Parish President Tory Taylor also resorted to driving to Baton Rouge to ask for food, water and supplies.

After the storm, the federal government also brought in satellite phones, which officials have given mixed reviews.

Even when short-range communication was possible, the fact that different agencies operate on different frequencies – often using incompatible equipment – makes executing rescue missions in St. Bernard Parish even more difficult, state Sen. Walter Boasso, R-Chalmette, said. Firefighters and police officers could not talk to one another, or with the ferry operator who needed to bring evacuees to Algiers Point.

"It seems like we should have one system, so everybody can talk to each other," Boasso said.

As the federal money to rebuild the communications networks comes pouring into the state, several officials said a priority should be making sure it is done right. "If we don't solve this interoperable problem, we will be back here again," said state Sen. Robert Barham, R-Oak Ridge, chairman of a select committee on homeland security.

Gatemouth Brown dies after evacuating to Texas

Renowned musician had cancer, heart disease

By Keith Spera
Music writer

Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown, the guitarist, fiddler, vocalist and composer who wove threads of blues, big-band swing, Cajun and country into his own unique, self-described tapestry of "American music," died on Saturday. He was 81.

Mr. Brown had been in declining health for months, as he battled emphysema, heart disease and lung cancer. As Hurricane Katrina approached, he fled from his home on a Slidell bayou to Orange, Texas, the town where he grew up. His Slidell home was subsequently destroyed by the storm.

His fans included Eric Clapton, ZZ Top's Billy Gibbons and scores of music lovers who reveled in his effortless command of multiple idioms. He released his first blues 'n' boogie single, "Okie Dokie Stomp," more than 50 years ago. His music clearly drew on the sounds of southeast Texas and southwest Louisiana.

After a stretch of relative obscurity, Mr. Brown relaunched his career in the 1990s with a series of acclaimed albums, including "Gate Swings" and "American Music, Texas Style." He and his band, Gate's Express, toured throughout the world, from South Africa to China. He won a Grammy, numerous Handy Awards and scores of other accolades.

Clapton invited Mr. Brown to sit in during an appearance at the House of Blues in New Orleans in the mid-1990s. Mr. Brown immediately took over the show, calling out songs as he relegated a grinning Clapton to the role of sideman. Clapton subsequently enlisted Mr. Brown as the opening act for arena tours in Europe and America.

Mr. Brown rejected the label of "bluesman," preferring to think of his music as more broad-minded, complex and celebratory. He conjured lean, concise solos that depended more on fleet progressions of precise notes than on showy displays of sustain. He was equally at home arranging songs for his Gate's Express ensemble or the swinging horn-heavy big band he sometimes recorded and performed with.

A colorful, outspoken character, Mr. Brown did not hesitate to offer up less than complimentary assessments of other, better-known musicians. When not on the road, he often piloted his vintage black Cadillac from Slidell to New Orleans for nighttime excursions. Outfitted with an honorary sheriff's badge and a pistol, he'd make the rounds of music clubs, holding court at every stop. The House of Blues restaurant honored him with his own dedicated booth, to which he had exclusive rights.

When he was diagnosed with lung cancer last fall, Mr. Brown opted to forgo treatment; neither did he give up his omnipresent pipe. He resolved to play music as long as possible.

He continued to tour on a limited basis, traveling and performing with a portable oxygen tank at his side. In March, his ailments left him bedridden for weeks; he struggled to autograph an allotment of souvenir New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival posters bearing his likeness.

But as he had so many times before, he rallied to make brief appearances in New Orleans clubs, often sitting in with keyboardist Joe Krown, a longtime member of Gate's Express. Mr. Brown expressed his determination to honor his commitment to the 2005 Jazzfest.

He succeeded in that ambition. Occupying the slot just before B.B. King, Mr. Brown rendered a triumphant set to an enormous crowd at the Fair Grounds. Decked out in his trademark Western shirt, boots and cowboy hat, he led Gate's Express in a spirited show. Seated center stage, he sang, introduced songs and switched off on guitar and fiddle, all without the assistance of oxygen.

Afterward, he appeared exhausted but exultant, posing for a picture with King and signing autographs at the festival's record tent.

Mr. Brown continued to perform locally after Jazzfest, but his stamina waned as summer wore on. The hurried Katrina evacuation to his boyhood home in Texas proved to be his final tour.

He reportedly died at his brother's home in Orange. Survivors include three daughters and a son.

Musician Clarence 'Gatemouth' Brown plays the fiddle at the 1996 Newport Folk Festival in Newport, R.I. Brown died Saturday in his hometown of Orange, Texas, where he had gone to escape Hurricane Katrina.

In the battered CBD, some see opportunity

'It's a chance to arise like a phoenix'

By Greg Thomas
Real estate writer

Judah Hertz has become the owner of more top-end commercial real estate in the Central Business District than anyone else in the past two years, but now he may be the owner of the biggest headaches among landlords.

His Texaco building, LL&E Tower and Dominion Tower all were roughed up by Hurricane Katrina. His Poydras Center lost its roof. And the New Orleans Shopping Centre, which sits across the street from what's left of the stinking and now-notorious Louisiana Superdome, now arguably is a bad location.

Is he ready to throw in the towel? Nope. Not at all.

"This has been terrible tragedy, but it's a chance to arise like a phoenix, to rebuild like never before," said Hertz, whose Hertz Investment group owns 2.5 million square feet of top-end commercial space in the Central Business District, or more than 25 percent of the total.

Like several other top real-estate executives contacted by The Times-Picayune, Hertz laments the loss of life and the destruction of property in Katrina's wake, but he sees opportunity amid the chaos.

He points out that the city's core and its "heart and soul" – the French Quarter, the Central Business District, the area's major hotels, the Garden District – are basically intact and can come back.

"And this is an urban planner's dream: to build a city with great housing, rebuilding schools, entire neighborhoods."

He is not alone. The Trump Group headed by Donald Trump and developers Poydras LLC on Wednesday said they would not let Hurricane Katrina detour their plans to build a 60- to 70-story high-rise condominium – a Trump International Hotel Tower – on Poydras between Magazine and Camp streets.

And Joseph Canizaro, the man responsible for developing much of the New Orleans skyline, said, "I am not negative."

"Done properly, we've got the opportunity to bring the city up to modern urban design," Canizaro said, adding that he thinks the CBD will be up and running much faster than some initial reports that suggested the area could remain a ghost town with armed troops for months.

For other sections of the city, "we have a blank piece of paper." With cooperation between the business community, government and churches, "and a real master plan," areas such as Lakeview, Mid-City, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes, devastated by the storm, can be built in a rational, new urban setting.

"We have an opportunity to re-do our schools, a chance to improve those things that have been a problem" in the 300-year-old city. "It's an opportunity to do something stronger, better" and end up with a better New Orleans, though he expects there will be a smaller population.

"We have to save New Orleans. I don't know of any cities that have the heart and soul of New Orleans."
JUDAH HERTZ
real estate investor

Not all share that kind of enthusiasm.

John McIlwain, a senior research fellow at the Urban Land Institute in Washington, D.C., said the notion of reopening the CBD quickly sounds like "bravado and positioning. A lot of people are smelling a lot of government money. … With the feds talking about $100 billion to $150 billion in (rebuilding aid), you're going to see some quick grabbing at that government money.

"I think there are just too many unknowns."

One unknown: What can be done to protect the city from future storms? Developers will need loans to rebuild, but the lenders are going to want assurances that their collateral won't get blown away or flooded in the next hurricane. The New Orleans levee system was built for a 100-year storm. But with some scientists warning of warming oceans, are these events going to become 50-year storms? Twenty-five-year storms?

"Look at Holland," McIlwain said. Ten years ago it began, and then completed, a levee protection system for a one-in-1,000-year event. Is that what it will take for lenders, tenants and business in general to reinvest or return to New Orleans?

"The reality is, they don't know. No one knows what New Orleans is going to look like 10 years from now, or one year from now."

Still, there are examples of New Orleans developers who say they are willing to rebuild. Malcolm Ehrhardt and his son, Marc, of the Ehrhardt Group public relations firm, said the Giannasca Development Group LLC of Baltimore plans to move forward on its plan to transform the Plaza Tower building on Howard Avenue into condominiums. In fact, Marc Ehrhardt said, Giannasca wants to accelerate plans. And he wanted word to get out that the project would create 700 construction jobs for New Orleans.

As for improving the levees, Hertz said it was short-sighted of government not to invest $10 billion to $14 billion to make the city impervious to hurricanes, instead of facing what may be a $100 billion rebuilding effort.

"Think if we spend that $10 (billion) to $14 billion to prevent anything like this in the future. Where else could you do that?" Hertz asked. "You couldn't do that in a Los Angles or a San Francisco to protect those cities from earthquakes. And (for those cities), you'd never hear talk about not rebuilding. We know we can prevent this from ever happening again" with the federal money that will pour into disaster repair efforts.

"We have to save New Orleans. I don't know of any cities that have the heart and soul of New Orleans."

In fact, Hertz said, he's still looking for buildings to buy in the city. He said Friday that he's gotten a $1 billion line of credit to buy buildings in New Orleans.

Of course, the grander city envisioned by Hertz and Canizaro and others depends on a large amount of businesses coming back. On that score, commercial brokers report generally good news: Most relocating businesses do plan to return, at least based on anecdotal evidence.

For example, Mike Siegel, a broker and top executive of Corporate Realty in New Orleans, who's in Austin, Texas, helping New Orleans office tenants relocate, said those businesses are seeking temporary, not permanent, locations.

"I would say the vast majority of clients are planning on returning to New Orleans," Siegel said. "Only a very small minority is talking about not coming back."

The largest nearby city that is seeing a good deal of office relocations is Houston. "The good news, from a New Orleans standpoint, is that these firms are not looking for long-term leasing," said Mark Preston, a top office broker with the Houston firm of Moody Rambin Interests.

Houston has the fourth-largest office market in the country; Downtown Houston alone has 5 million square feet of vacant Class A space, about half the entire Class A market of 9.5 million square feet in the New Orleans CBD. "Office space isn't the problem" for relocating firms, Preston said. "Human resources are the critical problem."

Preston said landlords are taking short-term leases, some month-to-month, some one-year and some three-year deals with a one-year exit clause.

Mere yards separate hope from heartache in Lakeview

Rescuers in boats find living, dead

By Dan Shea
Staff writer

NEW ORLEANS: When the 17th Street Canal failed here, a 12-foot wall of water poured into Lakeview, sweeping away three homes and knocking gaping holes in others.

Nowhere is the difference between those who will recover quickly from Katrina and those who will endure months of uncertainty and dislocation more plain than on Veterans Memorial Boulevard where it crosses the 17th Street Canal.

To the west, Veterans is clear, the traffic lights are on, and businesses wait for customers to return home soon. To the east, heralded by a ghastly smell of sulfur, is dreary heartbreak.

Lakeview is still a lake. The water is lower by a few feet than its peak level last week, but it is halfway up first floors, fermenting the piers and frames of those few houses that could be worth saving.

At the edge of the water line, Capt. Jack Weise, a battalion chief of the Los Angeles Fire Department, leads a group from several California departments that makes forays into the heart of Lakeview in small Coast Guard flatboats. They call their search area "Golf Course west," the City Park course providing a recognizable map reference to those not from the area. The mission is a methodical, door-to-door search to find the living and the dead.

"Numerous people have been killed," Weise said. "We're still finding bodies. As the water goes down, we are finding more and more. Hopefully, we will find more people alive as well."

On Saturday, a man who had been in his attic 13 days was found by firefighters checking his house. On Friday, they had discovered a woman who was too afraid to open her door after 10 days of isolation, even though the water was only a few feet deep, Weise said.

"We're still in a rescue mode," he said, though they are encountering more people dead than alive.

When the dead are found, they are tagged, their GPS coordinates are noted and the bodies are secured. Another group of hired contractors will remove them when the firefighters finish their search.

Between searches, the LAFD members run missions for the many local firefighters and police officers who call Lakeview home. "We help them get whatever we can from their homes," Weise said.

On Friday, the mission of a neighboring search group in Bayou St. John was to rescue the father of a firefighter. "We tried first with a car, then with a helo," he said. "The man came out of his house with a knife. He said he survived World War II and he'll be damned if anyone is going to take him out."

As some try to rescue people, others try to rescue their belongings.

Jason Davis, his brother Jonathan and his friend Robert beached the flatboat they used on a search for the remains of his home at 144 W.

Harrison Ave.

"I knew it was bad, but I didn't realize how bad," he said. "I can't see the neighborhood going back to the way it was; it is going to have to be bulldozed."

He shook his head. He lived two doors from local landmark, the Basin Bar. "It never closes," he said. "It is closed now."

Davis said his house was 5 feet from the road but had water to the roof. The water had dropped a few feet, but was still 12 feet deep in the western part of Lakeview. The homes of his father-in-law and two sisters-in-law were in worse shape. "The water got to the tops of their roofs."

It's the nature of the water that stays with Davis. "It's horrible," he said. "I saw a couple of dead rats. If it is killing rats, it's got to be bad."

Farther toward Lake Pontchartrain, at ground zero, the intersection of Stafford Place and Bellaire — where a breach became a chasm and a trickle became a wall of water — it is clear the restoration of Lakeview in any form is months away.

At least three houses are gone, scoured away. Across Bellaire, a solid, brick house had a gaping hole. Another had its first floor ripped away, down to the studs. Others still had water to the roof. At least one broken gas line sent bubbles to the surface, and a diver braved the waters from a motor barge to try to shut it off.

Across the canal, residents of Metairie have been drawn to the breach site, setting up a civic memorial of wooden pallets, shopping carts and chairs pushed up to the levee wall. Residents climb to view the breach, shaking their heads and saying thanks that the waters broke through on the other side.

While most of Metairie was spared, Old Metairie was not. With the water backing up in New Orleans, canal water spilled down historic Northline and inundated the area's most expensive homes.

But even here, progress could be seen. The water was within 200 yards on the lake side of the railroad tracks running along the edge of Metairie Playground. Across the tracks, in the heart of Metairie Park Gardens, the water had pulled back from Country Day School and was much lower along Northline. Airline Highway, solid with water Wednesday from the parish line to Labarre Avenue, was dotted with islands and lakes.

NEW ORLEANS: Even this brick house was unable to withstand the force of the water pouring over the 17th Street Canal.

Torah scrolls rescued from local synagogues

It was part of mission to save people, pets

By Mark Schleifstein

The Jewish community of Baton Rouge topped off a week of rescue missions into New Orleans on Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath, with a successful collection of more than 25 Torah scrolls from four New Orleans and Metairie congregations, the Hillel Foundation at Tulane University and the New Orleans Jewish Day School.

The Torah is a handwritten scroll containing the first five books of the Bible, written in Hebrew, and is read during Jewish Sabbath services.

"The Torah scroll is the central sacred object of Judaism," said Rabbi Stanton Zamek of Beth Shalom Synagogue in Baton Rouge. "It's almost not a book, but a living teacher.

"Leaving them alone in an empty synagogue is an unbelievable thought," he said.

Several of those used by congregations in New Orleans survived the Holocaust during World War II in Germany or other occupied countries in Europe.

A convoy of seven cars and vans staffed by several Reform rabbis from Beth Shalom and B'nai Israel synagogues in Baton Rouge, Temple Sinai in New Orleans and the Washington, D.C., office of the Union of Reform Judaism and officials of the Baton Rouge and New Orleans Jewish federations was escorted to New Orleans at 7 a.m. Saturday by off-duty deputies of the East Baton Rouge Sheriff's office.

They collected Torahs from Shir Chadash Conservative Congregation, Congregation Gates of Prayer and the New Orleans Jewish Day School in Metairie, and from Touro Synagogue, Temple Sinai and the Hillel Foundation –- the Tulane University Jewish student center — in New Orleans. The convoy was back in Baton Rouge by 12:30 p.m., said Baton Rouge businessman Richard Lipsey, who helped organize the effort.

He said the rescues were conducted at Jewish institutions for which keys or an individual with access were available.

Rabbi Martha Bergadine of the Beth Shalom Synagogue in Baton Rouge gathers the Torah scrolls rescued from the New Orleans area on Saturday.

Torahs at Beth Israel, Congregation Anshe Sfard, and the Chabad House in New Orleans and the Chabad Jewish Center in Metairie, all orthodox Jewish congregations, were not collected on Saturday because officials there did not want to break their rules against working on the Sabbath. Rabbi Martha Bergadine, a congregant of Beth Shalom, said the importance of their mission touched her the most at the day school.

"I was carrying a children's Torah and the wrapper came off and I saw that it had been written by children," Bergadine said, tears running down her face.

Several of the Torahs will be taken to Houston, where members of several New Orleans congregations have taken up temporary residence.

Lipsey said the mission was an unusual end of an unusual week that began when Jewish leaders in Baton Rouge began fielding telephone calls from around the nation with names and addresses of Jews left behind in flooded areas of the New Orleans area. With the assistance of off-duty deputies, members of both congregations traveled by boat to the various addresses, rescuing about 50 people.

And it turned out that many of those rescued weren't Jewish, Lipsey said.

"We had specific addresses where mostly the elderly and infirmed were," Lipsey said. "We found people sheltering in upstairs rooms in water that was 9 or 10 feet high."

In half the rescue attempts, nobody was in the building, he said.

"We brought not only the Jewish people out, but anybody in the house or apartments next to them," he said. "They got in the boat and we brought them back to Baton Rouge, placed all of them in homes, none in shelters.

"People saw our van picking people up, and we got them in the van, too," he said. "We pulled out black, white, Jewish, Catholic, Muslim. In one case, we picked up a paraplegic, in another, a retired salesman, and several people with their animals."

B'nai Israel in Baton Rouge also is helping non-Jewish families relocate, Lipsey said.

"Yesterday, we helped one family of 11, and today a family of 12, to go to San Diego," he said. "We also helped people fly to Harrisburg, Pa., and a dozen more flew to different parts of the country."

OUR OPINIONS

Welcome back, Mr. President

Dear Mr. President,

Welcome to our wounded city. This is your third visit since Hurricane Katrina devastated metropolitan New Orleans and the Mississippi Gulf Coast two weeks ago. You will see that the obituaries for the Crescent City were premature. You can detect a pulse, albeit a faint one. New Orleanians, who are known for resilience and love of their hometown, are clamoring to return and rebuild. Commerce is stirring in the French Quarter, in the Central Business District, and in Jefferson, St. Tammany, St. Charles and St. John the Baptist parishes. Substantial numbers of federal troops finally arrived to restore law and order. Much too late, but they are welcome nonetheless.

But don't kid yourself, Mr. President. This is only the beginning of what must become a gargantuan and sustained effort by you and your administration. A vast stretch of our homeland, your homeland, has been wrecked, submerged, washed away, contaminated, gutted. A huge diaspora of Americans has been scattered across the land. New Orleans, a crown jewel among American cities, is deeply stricken. What you are seeing today, Mr. President, is the aftermath of the worst, the most widespread disaster to befall an American city and its surroundings in the history of our country.

Such a catastrophe, Mr. President, calls for a commensurate response from you. It is not enough to have sent a massive deployment of troops. It is not enough to have visited three times. And, though we appreciate your intention, it is not enough to have removed the ineffectual head of FEMA from the scene.

Now comes the real test of your intention to make New Orleans work once again.

But don't kid yourself, Mr. President. This is only the beginning of what must become a gargantuan and sustained effort by you and your administration. A vast stretch of our homeland, your homeland, has been wrecked, submerged, washed away, contaminated, gutted. A huge diaspora of Americans has been scattered across the land. New Orleans, a crown jewel among American cities, is deeply stricken.

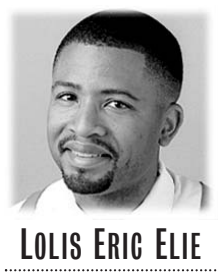
Mr. President, we're well aware that we cannot rely on government alone, that we must help ourselves. Already our people have begun to do so: rescuing, sheltering and raising money for the most desperate victims. But faced with a disaster like this hurricane, no community can fend for itself.

Many of us cannot return to our homes because they were flooded, due to inadequate levees and an inadequate effort to restore the coastline of Louisiana. These are problems that successive administrations, including yours, have ignored. All of us deserve a chance to return to decent homes.



New Orleanians also deserve to know that our federal government has made an all-out effort to ensure that a disaster like Katrina cannot happen again. Such an effort should include concrete and dirt, creative thinking, and a commitment that will last for years.

It also means a promise to do whatever it takes, whatever it costs, to restore Louisiana's coast. New Orleans cannot exist as a coastal city surrounded by levees so high they cast a shadow over our dwellings. It was once an inland river port, and it must be one once again.

The waters will recede, and the death toll may fall below earlier estimates. It will become easy — with no evacuees on roofs, no starving, clamoring people at the Superdome and Convention Center — to decide that you have fulfilled your commitment to New Orleans.

That would be a huge mistake, Mr. President. The New Orleans that we and the nation deserve will be protected by thriving marshlands, walled off for floods, rebuilt even for its poorest citizens. It will be endowed with the schools, roads and new infrastructure that will allow it once again to be a viable urban center, a vital port, a cultural treasure to America and the world.

We need to stick together and rebuild

LOLIS ERIC ELIE

If you listened to the national news reports, you heard that the Faubourg Treme was one of the areas hard hit by Hurricane Katrina.

You heard that a large percentage of New Orleans has been under water since the levee broke more than a week ago.

You heard that the devastation of New Orleans dwarfs that seen by many veteran war correspondents in areas where actual warfare has taken place.

You heard that many of us have no homes to go back to and those of us who do face a huge cleanup and rebuilding effort.

I was in the city of my birth over the weekend. Although I did not tour those areas hardest hit by the storm — the 9th Ward and eastern New Orleans — I saw much of the city, from the Riverbend to Esplanade Avenue, from the river to Mid-City.

What you have heard about the state of our city is both true and untrue.

Most of the older neighborhoods, Central City, the Garden District, the French Quarter, Carrollton and others, are remarkably intact.

Although the authorities have cleared most of the trees from the streets, there are trees and tree limbs all over the place. Huge, strong trees cracked in half. Large, old ones were uprooted and blown on their sides.

I saw houses with missing weatherboards, missing roofing tiles and, in some cases, missing walls. But, I dare say, most houses showed little visible damage.

A storm of this magnitude probably caused leaks in some of the roofs that look to be intact. There are probably a lot of broken windows and damaged rear walls that I could not see from the street.

There are also inexplicable anomalies in what I saw. The portion of the Faubourg Treme closest to North Rampart Street suffered relatively little damage. But the closer you move to North Claiborne Avenue, the more you see evidence of flooding.

I saw a few houses in various neighborhoods that had simply fallen down. But some old buildings that looked to have been blighted before the storm stood their ground.

The disparate damage created by this hurricane has the potential to tear our city apart.

Those in areas less hard-hit might be willing to settle for a modest effort to rebuild the city since, based on the view from their front porches, there is no need to fight or wait for a more substantial undertaking.

Those whose houses are relatively intact might well be tempted to complain when people from the 9th Ward and eastern New Orleans demand just compensation for their losses.

As for me, I think this is an appropriate time to redefine tout ensemble, the phrase that governs efforts to preserve the historic charm of the French Quarter. Translated from the French, tout ensemble means all together.

In the context of the French Quarter, the phrase reminds us that the look and feel of that area cannot be tied to any specific building or buildings. Rather, the only way to preserve that part of our city is for the entire area to be kept relatively intact.

New Orleans owes its uniqueness not merely to the old buildings in the historic district. We are unique because our people have a different attitude toward life. We have a different style.

The people who exemplify this attitude live all over the city.

Unless most of these people come back, unless much of our lost housing stock is rebuilt and made inviting to those who wish to return, our city runs the real risk of losing a substantial portion of its very soul.

Relief groups exploring 'uncharted waters'

In some cases, workers are also victims

By Lynne Jensen
Staff writer

As a member of one of the nation's largest disaster response committees following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the Rev. Larry Snyder, president of Catholic Charities USA, knows the effort involved in restoring life after incredible devastation.

Yet faced with the disaster of Hurricane Katrina, "we are having to rewrite the book," Snyder said Thursday. "These are uncharted waters."

Snyder estimated that more than 1 million people have been displaced by the Category 4 storm, including Gordon Wadge, president of Catholic Charities of the Archdiocese of New Orleans, now working out of the organization's Baton Rouge headquarters.

"It's a very humbling experience," Wadge said. "We are in this for the long haul."

One of many nonprofit organizations offering hurricane relief, Catholic Charities is offering immediate help, such as shelters and air mattresses, and is working toward a five-year effort to help victims find permanent housing and jobs, "especially for low-income folks," Wadge said.

Training programs in demolition and construction, expected to be two high-demand jobs in the wake of the storm, will be offered, he said.

Catholic Charities is "the frontline response for displaced persons and evacuees," Snyder said. The organization is partnering with relief groups such as The American Red Cross and Second Harvest Food Bank, he said.

Monetary donations following Katrina have surpassed the enormous outpouring of help following Sept. 11, American Red Cross spokeswoman Sheila Graham said.

Nine days after the terrorist bombings, the Red Cross had received $141.4 million, Graham said. Nine days after Katrina, donations of $439.5 million had poured in, she said.

As of Thursday, the Red Cross had helped about 160,000 hurricane survivors in 650 shelters in 17 states, Graham said.

About 5.4 million hot meals were served and 5.5 million snacks, she said. More than 95 percent of the people serving victims are volunteers, she said.

The Red Cross also is helping to reunite families through its registry at www.RedCross.org. As of Monday, 105,000 people had registered at the site, Graham said.

But the Red Cross can't handle the relief effort alone.

The St. Vincent de Paul Society is among the organizations "trying to fill the gap," said Michael Acaldo, the organization's CEO in Baton Rouge.

The society is distributing donations of clothing collected by the Red Cross, Acaldo said. Still needed are deodorant, backpacks and duffle bags, diapers, and baby food, he said.

The best donation is money in the form of a check "so we can zero in on specific needs," he said.

St. Vincent de Paul also is providing meals to private shelters, Acaldo said. The group had served more than 22,400 meals by Tuesday, he said.

The organization also has a community pharmacy that provided more than $20,000 in prescriptions by Tuesday, Acaldo said.

Salvation Army donations Thursday were about $55 million, spokesman Matt Meenan said. About 1,700 evacuees are being housed in 22 shelters.

The response for help is most likely the largest single emergency response in the United States in the 126-year history of the organization, he said.

To donate to the American Red Cross, call 1(800)HELPNOW. To receive help, call the Red Cross chapter in your area or visit a shelter. See www.redcross.org.

To donate to the Salvation Army, call 1(800)SAL-ARMY or send a check to your local Salvation Army center, earmarked for disaster relief. Donations also accepted at Wal-Mart and Sam's Club outlets.

To donate to or get help from Associated Catholic Charities, call (225) 336-8700.

To donate to St. Vincent DePaul, send checks to St. Vincent de Paul Hurricane Katrina Relief Fund, P.O. Box 127, Baton Rouge, LA 70821, or visit the processing center and warehouse at 1010 Nicholson Drive. Those who need items can go to 2655 Plank Road.

WINNING SPIRIT

The Saints give the ravaged Gulf Coast a lift with an inspired opening victory over the Panthers

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — You got the feeling early on that the Saints were meant to win this game, that everything would fall into place for this team on this day – like the storybook already had been written.

You got that sensation during the Saints' first possession, when Aaron Brooks' third-down pass was deflected into the waiting arms of receiver Joe Horn.

You felt that way when the Saints scored a touchdown on that opening drive – something they never did last season.

And something was certainly amiss when two Carolina touchdown passes were called back just before halftime because the receivers ran out of bounds before catching the ball.

But in the end, nothing was handed to the Saints.

They had to fight for a 23-20 victory Sunday that was not sealed until John Carney's 47-yard field goal with three seconds remaining.

"I hate that it had to come down to the wire. Honestly, we should have put it away a lot sooner," said Horn, who lamented his two dropped passes, as well as the entire offense's lull during the third and fourth quarters, which allowed the Panthers to come back from a 17-7 deficit and tie the score at 20 with 1:04 remaining.

But Carolina never took the lead.

And Horn, who said that every time he was on the sideline he was remembering the pleas of the fans he met at a Hurricane Katrina evacuation shelter last week, wasn't about to give up this game.

"Those fans told me, 'Give us something, give us some kind of hope,' " said Horn, who caught five passes for 66 yards – including an 11-yard pass and a 25-yard strike from Brooks on the winning drive. "I had a couple drops, but it was a great feeling when Carolina gave us one more chance to close it out with 50 seconds left on the clock.

"When I got back on that field, everything Aaron Brooks would have thrown, I would have caught."

That kind of emotion and energy consumed this game.

It overflowed and, at least hopefully, the Saints said, spilled out into those shelters throughout Louisiana and Texas where the evacuees were able to watch the game, a brief distraction if not a greater sign of hope.

"Those fans told me, 'Give us something, give us some kind of hope.' "
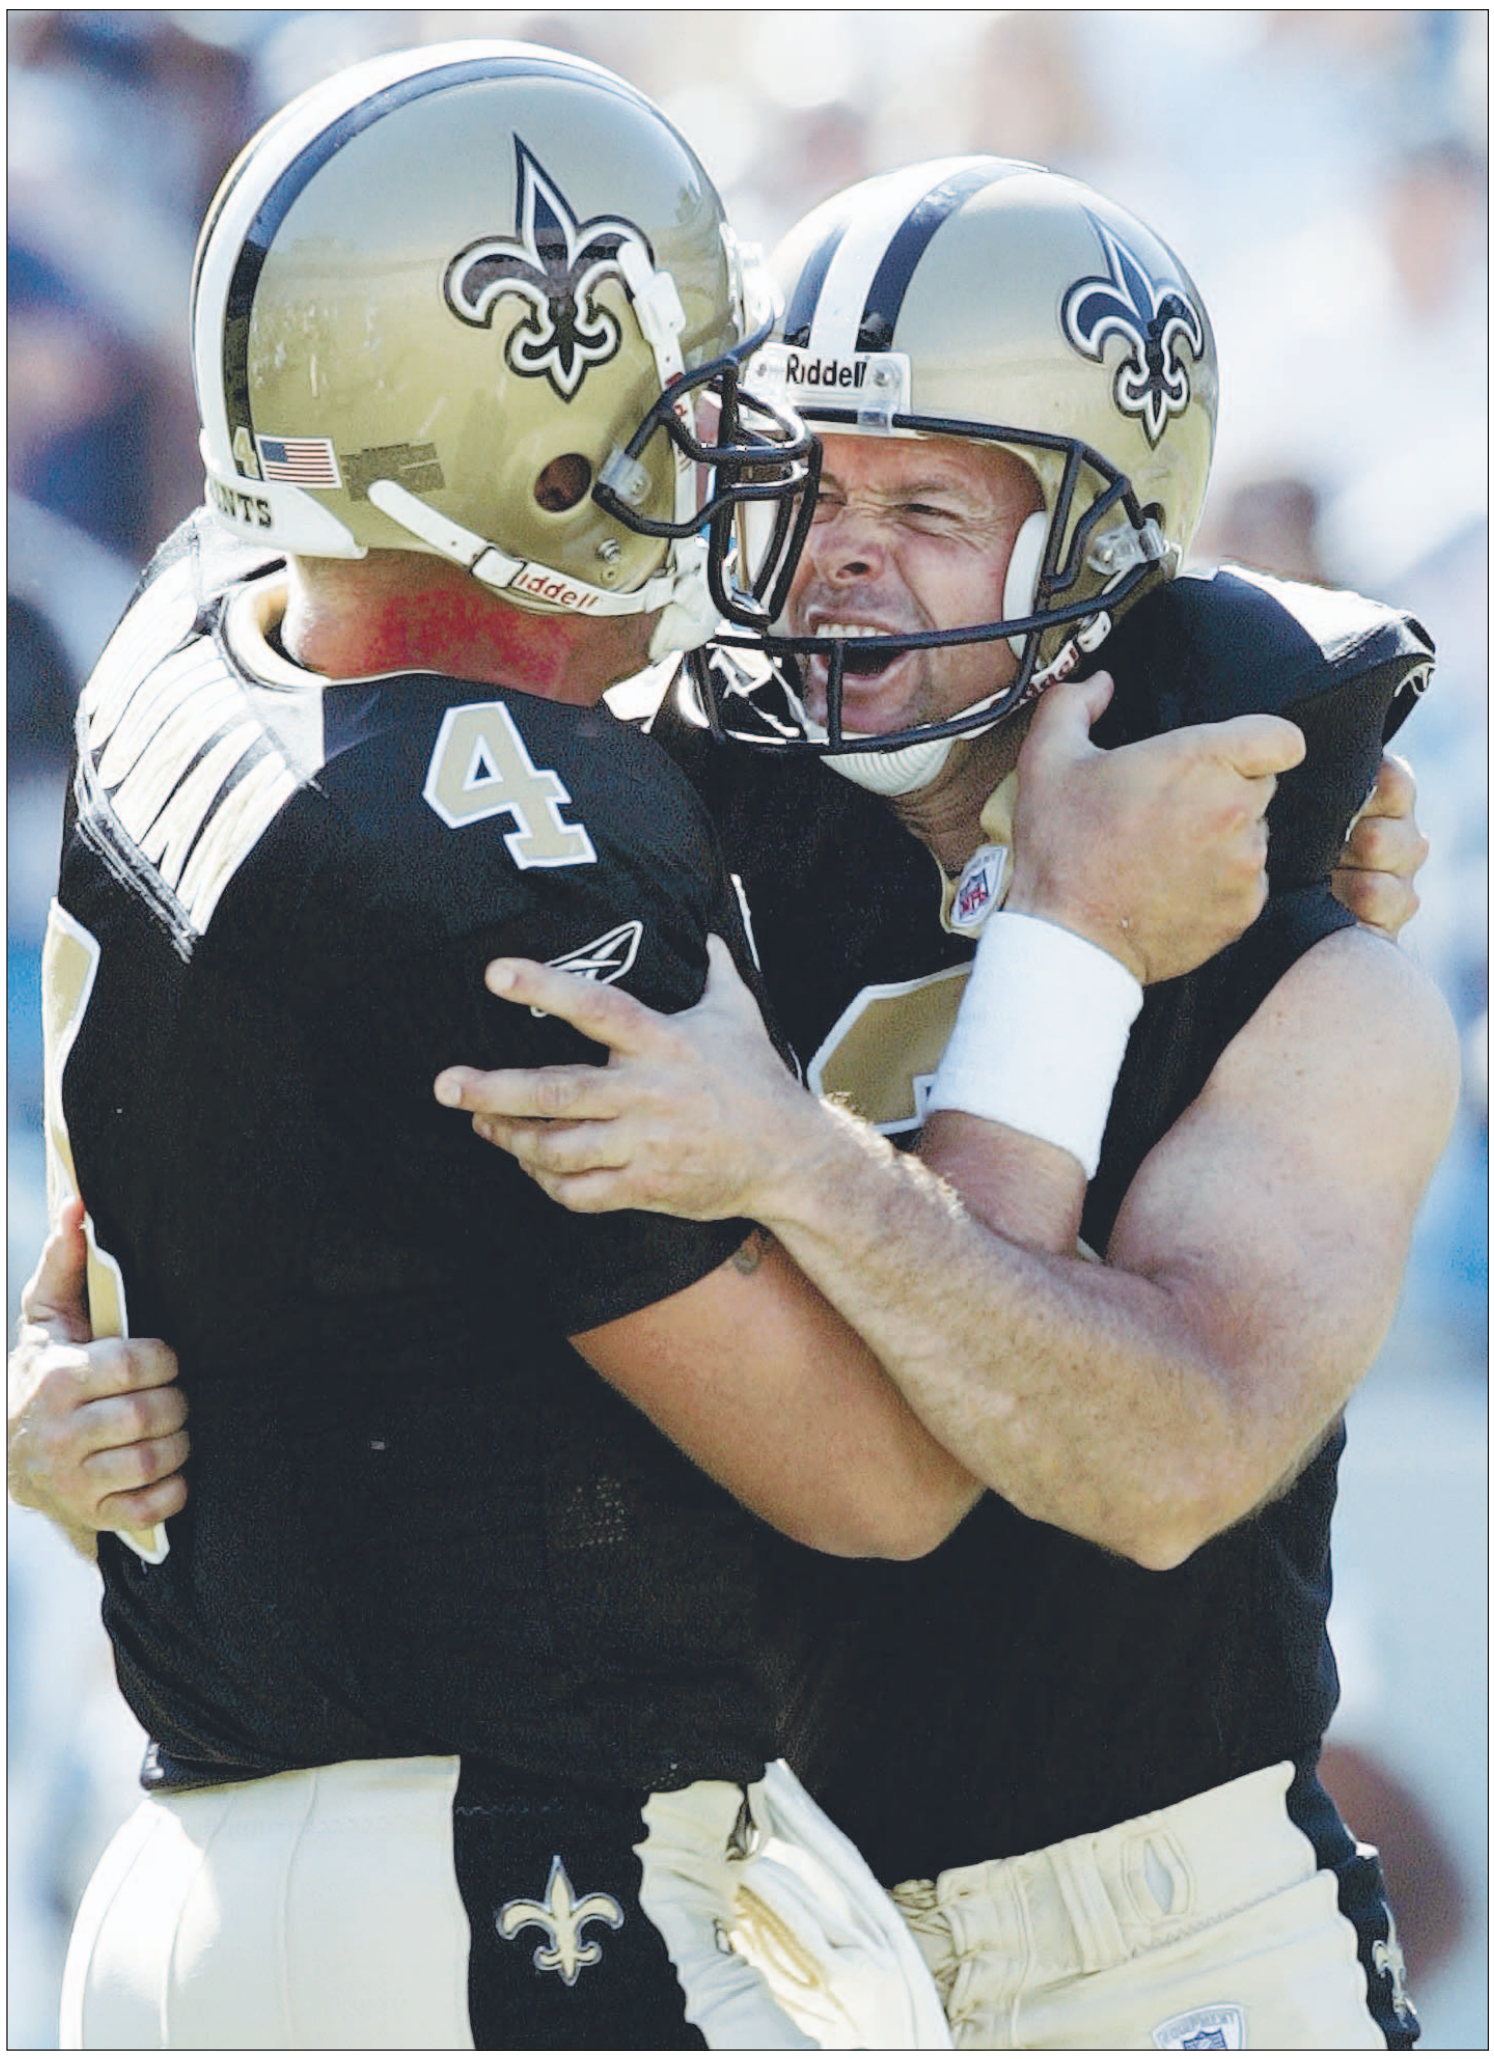
JOE HORN
wide receiver



Saints coach Jim Haslett was so overcome with emotion Saturday night while reading a letter to his team from New Orleans mayor Ray Nagin that the team's director of player development, Ricky Porter, had to finish for him.

After the game, Haslett said one game ball would go to Nagin and the city of New Orleans, and one would remain in the Saints' trophy case in recognition of the people of the Gulf South.

"We feel as if we're carrying the weight of the city on our shoulders," center LeCharles Bentley said. "In a way, we're the last true representation of the city right now."

But defensive end Charles Grant added, "This one game can't just be for the people. We're going to dedicate this whole season to the people back in Louisiana. So for us to keep going and make the people proud, as well as ourselves, we've got to play hard like this Saints kicker John Carney, right, celebrates with holder Todd Bouman after hitting a 47-yard field goal in the closing seconds to lift New Orleans to a 23-20 win against Carolina on Sunday.

Saints' victory is biggest in history of franchise

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — All around the locker room, the more they talked you could almost hear Hurricane Katrina's winds howl and see the waters rise.

"I could feel it on the bus coming to the stadium," said Jim Haslett of the ride that took him to the most significant victory in the history of the New Orleans Saints.

PETER FINNEY

"I knew we were really into it. I went to sleep Saturday night so excited about LSU winning. It makes you realize, on the field, it's still a kid's game. But, once you get off the field, you're back to reality."

Off the field, reality has been cruel, deadly, historic.

On the field Sunday at Bank of America Stadium, reality was Saints 23, Panthers 20.

Reality was John Carney booting a game-winning 47-yard field goal with three seconds remaining.

Reality was Carney saying before he put his foot into the football, "All I thought about was making contact. There was a little left to right breeze and, when it went through, I realized what it all meant to the city of New Orleans, to the people on the Gulf Coast. Then I thought about my wife and kids, safe and sound, back in San Diego, and that made me realize how lucky I am."

Lucky, indeed, said Joe Horn.

"Put this down," said the loquacious receiver. "This one was for the people in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. All game long the words from the people back home kept going through my mind. God bless those people. I'm still crying for them."

Tight end Ernie Conwell wasn't crying, despite making six clutch catches before exiting with a concussion and dislocated jaw.

"I saw a guy at the hotel before we left for the game," he said, "and he told me he lost his house but he still has the Saints. I think he had a few pops but he was speaking from the heart."

It didn't take Conwell, who played his college football at the University of Washington, long to realize what football meant to the South and to the franchise

CHARLOTTE, N.C. – Carolina Panthers quarterback Jake Delhomme had the better statistics, but the Saints' Aaron Brooks was more than his equal with the game on the line.

Brooks made clutch plays late in the fourth quarter, leading the Saints on a six-play, 49-yard drive to set up John Carney's 47-yard winning field goal with three seconds remaining Sunday at Bank of America Stadium.

"The key was not turning the ball over," said Brooks, who completed 18 of 24 passes for 192 yards. "We've got a minute left, tie ball game and we've got to travel a significant distance just to get a field goal. (Offensive coordinator Mike) Shepherd did a great job calling the plays. The offensive line did a great job protecting.

"It was up to me to get the ball there, and the guys, particularly the receivers, did a great job catching the ball - and John capped it off."

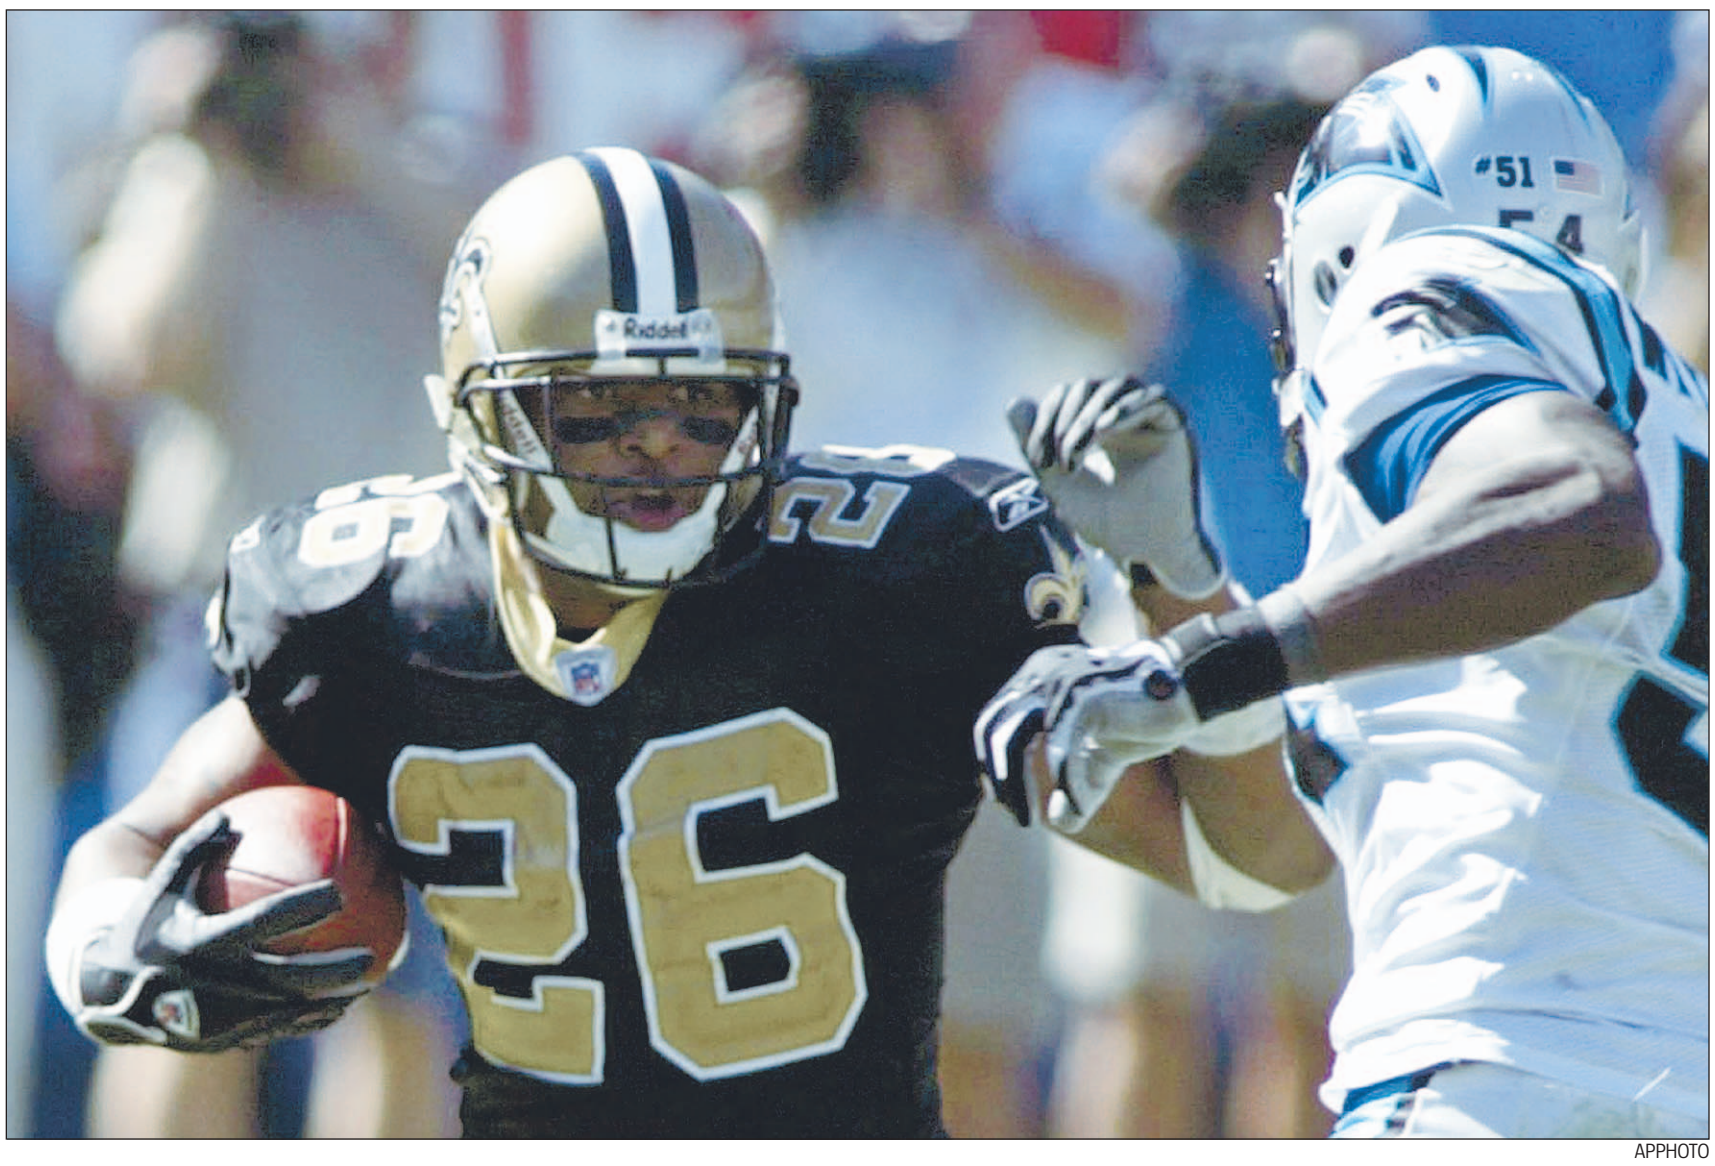
Brooks went 3-of-4 on the final drive for 41 yards, including two completions to wide receiver Joe Horn, to push the Saints downfield against a Carolina pass rush that seldom managed to produce much pressure. A three-yard run by Deuce McAllister to the Panthers' 30 set up Carney's kick.

"We knew we had to get to the 30 for an attempt," Saints coach Jim Haslett said. "John came through like he did all day. I thought Aaron did a good job running when he had to. I thought that was a big play when he took off and ran and made some key throws.

"So I thought we did well in the two-minute drive. We didn't even practice it this week."

Said McAllister, who rushed 26 times for 64 yards and two touchdowns: "We executed the two-minute drive as well as we wanted to. We made plays when we had to."

Delhomme, a former Saints player and standout at Louisiana-Lafayette, completed 19 of 31 passes for 212 yards and a touchdown, but also threw two interceptions. He led Carolina to a tying John Kasay field goal with 1:04 remaining, but Brooks and the Saints went one drive better.



"We didn't make enough plays," Delhomme said. "We knew it would come down to the wire. It came down to the last seconds, and we didn't make enough plays. That is what's frustrating. We were close, but close doesn't get you anything in this league."

Brooks, who led a Saints victory that knocked Carolina out of the playoff picture in last season's finale, is growing in confidence in pressure situations, McAllister said. The opener is a sample of what the Saints expect from their quarterback, he said.

"He came up big, and that's what we expect him to do," McAllister said. "We're going to try to keep him out of those pressure situations as much as possible, but sometimes he's going to have to step up and make plays for us."

Said Brooks: "It was just one of those days when you have to have confidence in your quarterback, a team as a whole. And we had that today."

Running back says Saints should play at LSU for fans

By Herb White

CHARLOTTE, N.C. – Although the Saints players presented a united front to Gene Upshaw, the executive director of the NFL Players Association, stating their desire to play their home games in San Antonio this season, tailback Deuce McAllister said he is in favor of Baton Rouge.

"If it's up to me, I want to make it as easy as possible on the fans," McAllister said. "A lot of them are evacuated, they don't have anything. And the little money they do have, I don't want them to spend it on gas or flights.

"I understand the situation where some guys want to play in San Antonio. But if I had a personal decision, I would play somewhere as close as possible, in Louisiana."

The league should be closer to making a decision on the location of those home games today, when Commissioner Paul Tagliabue and Saints owner Tom Benson are scheduled to visit with LSU officials in Baton Rouge.

LSU officials have said they have been working with the Saints on playing three games in Tiger Stadium this year, but possibly more if it is the NFL's desire.

CARNEY MONEY UNDER PRESSURE: John Carney has made his share of pressure-packed kicks in 16 NFL seasons, but Sunday's game-winner at Carolina might be the most satisfying.

His 47-yarder with three seconds left gave the Saints a 23-20 victory in their season opener, but more important delivered an emotional victory over an NFC South rival.

"It ranks up there," he said.

Carney, who converted all three field-goal attempts, had a long of 48 yards that pushed the Saints' lead to 20-14 with 11:56 left. A couple of John Kasay field goals, including a 46-yarder with 1:04 remaining, tied the score but left the Saints enough time to rally.

"Aaron (Brooks) played a great game" moving the offense, Carney said. "I don't know if he made any mistakes. He played a real strong game and moved the ball downfield consistently."

With the ball at Carolina's 30 with seven seconds left, Carney trotted onto the field and drilled the game-winner to close the door on Carolina.

"When I'm out there kicking I'm thinking about place-kicking and doing the best job I can," he said. "But when the buzzer sounds and the game's over, you realize how much it means to a lot of people."

"Besides the two (false start) penalties, he played pretty damn good," Saints coach Jim Haslett said. "He's going to be about as good as you can get. The reason we drafted him is because Carolina has Peppers. We feel that if we wanted to win this division, or have an opportunity to win this division, we've got to negate that defensive line. Jammal and (right guard) Jermane Mayberry, those are the main reasons we signed those guys."

BENSON, BRIEFLY: Benson has offered little comment about his team's predicament, except through prepared statements. When approached by reporters after his team's dramatic victory Sunday, he said it was "wonderful," for his team and for the fans back home. But he said, "this is the coaches' and the players' time" and said he might be available for comment after today's meeting.

CONWELL 'CLUTCH': Tight end Ernie Conwell had his most productive day as a receiver in a Saints uniform, catching six passes for 71 yards. He left the game in the second half with a concussion and dislocated jaw after a shoulder-to-helmet hit by Panthers safety Marlon McCree.

"They were going to try to take Joe (Horn) out of the game, obviously, and try to contain Deuce and keep him to a minimum number of yards and make the other guys play," Brooks said. "Ernie Conwell came up huge today. He made a lot of clutch catches to help move the chains."

INJURY REPORT: Saints receiver Az-Zahir Hakim re-injured the hamstring injury that kept him out of all four preseason games. Haslett did not know the timetable on his or Conwell's returns.

Hakim was activated in place of receiver Devery Henderson. Also inactive for the Saints were safety Steve Gleason, linebackers T.J. Slaughter and Alfred Fincher, defensive tackle Rodney Leisle, offensive tackle Ben Archibald and tight end Shad Meier.

THIRD DOWN: New Orleans and Carolina were equally effective on third down, converting 8-of-13 (62 percent), but the Saints did a better job in goal-line situations, completing 2-of-3 compared to the Panthers' 1-of-3.

BEADS FOR THE BAYOU: The "Beads for the Bayou" fund-raising drive sponsored by the Panthers at Bank of America Stadium raised $176,000. Proceeds will go to Hurricane Katrina relief efforts along the Gulf Coast.

Inspired Saints get win at Carolina

SAINTS, from A-14

every week."

Haslett said his players were fired up all week.

He said you could feel it Saturday night at the team hotel. You could feel it on the bus on the way to the game.

You could see it on the field, too, during such moments as when Grant picked up a referee's flag and waved it vigorously after he was held on one of those would-be Carolina touchdown passes in the first half (one of two penalties on the play).

"All of it. All of it was emotion," receiver Michael Lewis said.

And for so many reasons.

Because they were playing for their fans, for their city, for the Gulf Coast.

Because they were playing, period, after a weeks-long journey that took them from training camp to Oakland, Calif., to San Antonio and finally to Charlotte.

And because they were playing against the Panthers, a division rival and a team predicted by most to win the NFC South.

It seems like every time these teams play, it comes down to the wire – which it has seven of the past nine games.

"We play Carolina, we always know it's going to be a close game," Bentley said. "Come in and step it up."

The Saints came right in and did just that Sunday, receiving the opening kickoff and beginning a methodical 15-play, 80-yard drive that included eight runs and seven passes and lasted 9:37 by the time Deuce McAllister scored on a four-yard run.

"I think it sent out a statement and set a tempo for us," said McAllister, who ran for another touchdown in the second quarter and finished with 64 yards on 25 carries. "That's what we want to be as an offense."

The Saints had been preaching a power rushing attack all offseason, and it worked exactly as planned in the first and second quarters, as they chewed up 18 minutes.

The second half wasn't as smooth.

The Saints lost the ball once on a fumble by Brooks – the ball slipped from his grasp when he cocked his arm to pass – and they settled for three field goals by Carney, including a 48-yarder and the winning 47-yarder.

But aside from the fumble, Brooks was poised and efficient. He completed 18 of 24 passes for 192 yards. He also scrambled for a 22-yard gain on third down midway through the fourth quarter.

"He was outstanding," Haslett said of Brooks, who completed his first eight passes. "He made key plays, and he made key runs when he had to. He didn't force the ball."

The Saints' run defense was better than advertised. The pass defense allowed a couple of big plays but also made a couple, including interceptions by Mike McKenzie and Jason Craft.

Defensive end Will Smith forced a fumble late in the first half, but Darren Howard made an ill-advised decision to pitch it to McKenzie, who couldn't catch it, giving the ball right back to the Panthers.

The game had more than its share of sloppy moments, including six fumbles (four of them lost) and 20 penalties (nine by the Saints).

But for the most part, the Saints kept their composure and gave the better performance throughout.

"We made some mistakes, but we overcame them. We did some dumb things, but we overcame them," Haslett said. "I thought as a whole, we played pretty darn good."

Haslett and Lewis said they watched a similar performance by the LSU Tigers late Saturday night.

LSU, which also carried the banner of Hurricane Katrina's victims, rebounded from some early mistakes to steal a dramatic 35-31 victory in the final minutes at Arizona State on Saturday night.

"That motivated me more. That was just the start of giving some kind of happiness to Louisiana, then we came out today and continued that," Lewis said. "I didn't think the same thing would happen, coming down to this at the end, but it was cool."

Saints pull together, give N.O. something to cheer about

he joined two years ago.

"When you talk football down here," he said, "you're speaking from the heart."

Something Ole Miss' Deuce McAllister learned long ago.

"What the hurricane did was bring a close team a lot closer," Deuce said. "The whole atmosphere, staying in a hotel, apartments, condos, in San Antonio. The hurricane left people fighting for their lives and we want them to know, if they don't give up on us, we're not going to give up on them."

Offensive lineman Wayne Gandy, a 12-year veteran out of Auburn, said the stories he heard from evacuees were "right out of a Steven Spielberg movie."

"Listening to them talk about it, listening to what they went through, seeing dead people up close, was worse than the pictures you saw on TV. Stuff like that you can't get out of your mind."

So, yes, corny and cliché as it might seem, Hurricane Katrina was there with the Saints on Sunday.

This was a Saints offense that set a confident tempo, taking the opening kickoff and marching 80 yards in 15 plays and nine and a half minutes, with Aaron Brooks going 7-for-7, with his gang converting three third-down opportunities.

This was a Saints defense that gave up some big plays, but made more big plays on their own, intercepting Jake Delhomme twice, both times shifting from man-to-man coverage to zone, making the Carolina quarterback a bit tentative down the stretch.

This was a pass rush that sacked Delhomme only once but constantly saw him hurried by Charles Grant, Darren Howard, Will Smith and Brian Young, a rush reflected in Delhomme finishing 19-for-31.

This was a Deuce McAllister who welcomed pounding one of the finest fronts in the NFL, finishing with a mediocre 2.5 yards per carry, but making two move-the-pile carries, one for four yards, one for two yards, worth 12 points.

This was an Aaron Brooks in complete control, going 18-for-24, never forcing a pass, once running his team out of trouble with a 22-yard scramble, beginning the final drive with an 11-yard strike to Horn, then moving the ball into Carney distance with a 25-yard fastball to Horn.

"I don't think I've ever seen Aaron more composed," Deuce said.

Or the Saints more dedicated to a mission.

When you factor in the circumstances, there's not a doubt in my mind this was the biggest Saints victory in history.

For a team with one playoff win in 37 seasons, it might seem like a left-handed accolade. But, on Sunday, the Saints defeated a Super Bowl-caliber opponent, fair and square, in their back yard, after having the lives of the players, and immediate family, turned upside down.

Standing there Sunday, Ernie Conwell, his jaw back in place, put it best when he seemed to be groping for words and offered, "What makes this moment so satisfying is knowing that we brought, if only for a day, some joy into the lives of people who bleed for football."

MAKING THE GRADE

Rating the Saints performance against Carolina

OFFENSE: B+

Sure there was a lull in the middle, but you can't argue with the way the Saints started or finished. They played exactly according to the plan they made in February - controlling the clock and methodically moving downfield. The two first-half touchdown drives lasted a combined 15:23. They were the only touchdowns for the Saints, but the last-minute, winning field-goal drive was equally impressive. Aaron Brooks completed his first eight passes and finished 18-of-24 with 192 yards. He fumbled once, but threw no interceptions. Deuce McAllister ran 26 times for 64 yards and two touchdowns, and tight end Ernie Conwell had his best performance as a Saint, with six catches for 71 yards, before leaving with a dislocated jaw.

DEFENSE: B

A couple big plays hurt the Saints – a 33-yard touchdown pass from Jake Delhomme to Steve Smith in the first quarter when cornerback Mike McKenzie seemingly had Smith wrapped up, and a 39-yard run by Stephen Davis in the third quarter that led to a touchdown. But for the most part the Saints run defense was better than usual, and on run and pass plays, the Saints tacklers wrapped up and did not allow extra yardage. The Saints made big plays on defense – interceptions by McKenzie and Jason Craft, and a forced fumble by Will Smith that was recovered by Darren Howard. Too bad Howard fumbled the ball away on a pitch attempt, but it didn't hurt the Saints.

SPECIAL TEAMS: A

In his 16th season, kicker John Carney had one of his best performances, making all three field-goal attempts - including a 48-yarder and a last-second 47-yarder. Mitch Berger's two punts were both outstanding – a 54-yarder and another placed inside the 10-yard line in the fourth quarter. The Saints' kick coverage was decent. Michael Lewis fumbled a punt return, but the ball went out of bounds.

Manning gets help in Giants' victory

By Aaron Kuriloff
Contributing writer

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.Y. — Strong performances by the New York Giants defense and special teams helped Eli Manning endure an inconsistent performance in a showdown with his former mentor as the Giants beat the Arizona Cardinals 42-19 Sunday.

Manning completed 10 of 23 pass attempts for 172 yards and two touchdowns; he also threw two interceptions – one returned for a touchdown. In contrast, Cardinals quarterback Kurt Warner, who last year helped guide Manning through his rookie season, finished 27-of-46 for 264 yards, one touchdown and one interception.

But the Giants didn't need their quarterback's best game. Special teams players returned a punt and a kickoff for touchdowns, and two running backs scored.

"The defense bailed us out a couple times," Giants coach Tom Coughlin said. "Special teams was outstanding."

But of Manning, he said, "There's no question he can play better."

Manning started strong, completing his first pass, an eight-yard strike over the middle to Plaxico Burress, brought in by the Giants this summer to add depth at receiver. Manning then led a 10-play, 81-yard scoring drive, capped by a 20-yard touchdown pass to Jeremy Shockey.

But two possessions later, with the Giants backed up against their own end zone, Manning, who prepped at Newman, threw a pass that bounced through the hands of receiver David Tyree and into the arms of Cardinals defender Karlos Dansby, who returned the interception 18 yards for a touchdown to put the Cardinals up 10-7.

The Cardinals added another field goal, and Manning's second interception killed the Giants' final drive of the half, sending New York into the locker room down 13-7.

"At halftime, we realized we were probably putting a little too much on Eli," said New York running back Tiki Barber, who had 62 yards and a touchdown on 13 carries. "We went back to running the ball a little bit."

On the first drive in the second half, Manning connected with Burress for a 44-yard gain that gave the Giants a first down on the Cardinals' 11. Brandon Jacobs ran in the ball to put the Giants up 14-13. Then New York safety Gibril Wilson picked off Warner's next pass, and Barber broke free for a 21-yard touchdown on the next play to give New York a 21-13 lead.

After Warner found receiver Larry Fitzgerald for a one-yard touchdown pass with about seven minutes left in the third, the Cardinals 21-19. But Willie Ponder returned the ensuing Arizona kickoff 95 yards to put the Giants up 28-19. The New York defense held the Cardinals scoreless for two more possessions before Manning led a six-play, 52-yard drive that concluded with a 13-yard touchdown pass to Burress.

Chad Morton returned a Cardinals punt 52-yards with 8:25 remaining to cap the win.

Several Giants players expressed satisfaction with the win, which followed pregame ceremonies marking the anniversary of the 9/11 terrorist attacks, echoing Coughlin, who said, "There was no way we were going to lose at home, on this date." But Manning said he wasn't satisfied.

"That performance was not OK by me," he said. "I've got to play better."

Miami Dolphins coach Nick Saban wasn't disappointed too often Sunday as his team beat the Denver Broncos 34-10 in his first game as coach of the Dolphins.

Creative Dolphins successful in Saban's debut

Frerotte throws for two touchdowns; Broncos lose Bailey

By Steven Wine
AP sports writer

MIAMI — When Randy McMichael strutted into end zone for the first touchdown of the new season, Jason Taylor jumped for joy and Gus Frerotte did a dance.

Nick Saban, in his first game as coach of the Miami Dolphins after leaving LSU earlier this year, kept pacing the sideline with a stoic expression. For the new Dolphins coach, one touchdown - and one victory - is merely a start.

Frerotte led a creative offense by throwing for 275 yards, Taylor returned a fumble 85 yards for a score and Miami successfully kicked off the Saban era by routing the Denver Broncos 34-10 Sunday.

The Broncos lost cornerback Champ Bailey and running back Mike Anderson to injuries, wilted in the 90-degree South Florida heat and dropped an opener for only the third time in 13 years under Coach Mike Shanahan.

Denver's all-time record in Miami fell to 0-7.

Frerotte, starting his first game for his sixth NFL team, went 24-for-36 with touchdown passes of two yards to McMichael and 60 yards to Marty Booker. Receiver Chris Chambers ran 61 yards on a reverse to set up a field goal, and the defense did the rest.

Taylor punctuated the victory on the final play by knocking the ball out of Jake Plummer's grasp, scooping up the fumble and sprinting for a touchdown. It was his fifth fumble return for a score, tying the NFL record set by Jessie Tuggle.

The game was 20 minutes old before Plummer completed a pass on his seventh attempt, and the Broncos' lone touchdown was set up by a fumbled punt. Miami mounted a goal-line stand in the second quarter to protect a 6-0 lead, stopping the Broncos five consecutive times after they had a first down at the 3.

It was a lot to cheer about for Miami fans who endured a 4-12 record in 2004, the Dolphins' first losing year since 1988. The dismal season led to the hiring of Saban, and it took Miami little time to fulfill his pledge for a more imaginative offense.

On Miami's second possession, Chambers took a handoff from Ronnie Brown on a reverse and dashed down the sideline, accompanied by a convoy of blockers including Frerotte. That set up a 29-yard field goal by Olindo Mare to put Miami ahead to stay, 3-0.

The first touchdown came with a new wrinkle: Defensive end Taylor lined up as a tight end and took two defenders with him to clear out the flat for McMichael, who caught the scoring pass.

Rookie Brown gained 57 yards, and the Dolphins occasionally looked as self-destructive as last season. Five false-start penalties in the opening half prompted boos by the crowd, and twice Miami failed to convert a fourth-and-1.

But as often happens in early-season games in Miami, the visitors wilted in the sweltering weather. Denver cornerbacks Darrent Williams and Lenny Walls were both hampered by cramping in the second half, and the Dolphins scored touchdowns on three consecutive possessions in the second half.

Anderson, who missed all of last season with a groin injury, departed in the first quarter with a rib injury. Pro Bowl cornerback Bailey left in the third quarter with a sprained left shoulder.

On the goal-line stand, two carries by Tatum Bell went for no gain, stopped by Zach Thomas. After an offsides penalty on Miami, Plummer again threw incomplete. Bell was stopped for a 1-yard loss by Thomas and Taylor on fourth down.

Losman shines as Bills prevail

Ex-Tulane QB in control as Bills roar past Texans

From wire reports

ORCHARD PARK, N.Y. – Who said former Tulane quarterback J.P. Losman needs time to develop?

Making his NFL debut as a starter Sunday, Losman engineered scoring drives on each of Buffalo's first five possessions, leading the Bills to a 22-7 win over the Houston Texans.

Losman, a 2004 first-round draft pick who has taken over for Drew Bledsoe, completed 17 of 28 passes for 170 yards and a touchdown. Rian Lindell hit a career-high five field goals, one short of the franchise record set by Steve Christie in 1996.

Buffalo's defense did the rest, generating five turnovers, five sacks and limiting Houston to 107 yards. The Texans had seven possessions of three plays or less.

The Bills led 12-0 four minutes into the second quarter before Houston gained its initial first down.

Houston quarterback David Carr completed nine of 21 passes for 70 yards and three interceptions. Pro Bowl receiver Andre Johnson had two catches for seven yards.

Buffalo began erasing the frustrating memories of last season's 0-4 start, and it established renewed confidence in Losman, who was coming off a shaky preseason. The Bills also won in style, wearing throwback blue-and-white uniforms and white helmets featuring a standing red buffalo, honoring Buffalo's 1965 AFL championship team.

Losman completed eight of his first 10 attempts and consistently scrambled out of trouble. The only knock was an inability to find the end zone. The Bills settled for field goals, including a 42-yarder, on their first four possessions.

After the Texans cut the lead to 12-7 on Carr's one-yard fourth-down scamper, the Bills responded on their following possession.

Leaning on running back Willis McGahee, who accounted for 50 yards, Losman capped the 61-yard drive with a one-yard pass to tackle-eligible Jason Peters, who was wide open in the end zone. Losman got the Texans leaning the wrong way with a great fake handoff to McGahee.

McGahee finished with 117 yards rushing, the eighth career 100-yard performance for the second-year starter.

Tampa Bay defense stifles Culpepper

Bledsoe shines, Favre struggles in openers

From wire reports

The Tampa Bay Buccaneers forced five turnovers, including two interceptions by Brian Kelly, to defeat the Minnesota Vikings 24-13 Sunday.

"That's the type of thing we can do on defense," Simeon Rice said. "We want to do something special."

Vikings quarterback Daunte Culpepper lost two fumbles and threw three interceptions, the second one glancing off Moe Williams' hands to Kelly at the Tampa Bay six-yard line with 1:45 left and Minnesota trailing by four.

After winning the Super Bowl in the 2002 season, the Bucs went 12-20 the past two years, losing 15 games by one touchdown or less. But finally, the tide turned their way in the fourth quarter.

COWBOYS 28, CHARGERS 24: Drew Bledsoe's reunion with Bill Parcells is off to an impressive start.

Bledsoe threw three touchdown passes, two to Keyshawn Johnson, and became the 10th NFL player to throw for 40,000 yards in leading the Cowboys at San Diego.

Bledsoe passed the 40,000-yard mark on a 15-yard completion to Terry Glenn on the first play of the fourth quarter. Bledsoe was 18-of-24 for 226 yards, giving him 40,034 yards in his career.

San Diego's LaDainian Tomlinson was held to 72 yards on 19 carries

LIONS 17, PACKERS 3: Two of Brett Favre's three turnovers led to 10 points, and Detroit won its opener for the third consecutive year.

Joey Harrington threw two touchdown passes, including one to rookie Mike Williams with 4:13 left. Favre then drove to Detroit's 12 before he was sacked twice and threw his second interception, a heave on fourth down from the 33 that was caught by Terrence Holt in the end zone.

Favre, the three-time MVP, finished 27-of-44 for 201 yards with two interceptions and one fumble.

STEELERS 34, TITANS 7: Willie Parker, a college backup at North Carolina, had a dazzling first career start with 161 yards rushing and a long reception, and Ben Roethlisberger threw for two scores in Pittsburgh's home victory.

"He's got the kind of speed you can't coach," tackle Marvel Smith said of Parker. "He's a raw talent, basically, but he's so fast and he's just all over the place. He broke a lot of tackles out there."

Parker set a club record for rushing yards in a season opener.

JAGUARS 26, SEAHAWKS 14: Jimmy Smith caught seven passes for 130 yards and two touchdowns and Fred Taylor ran strong in his return from a serious knee injury.

Smith, 36, showed he hasn't lost a step. Taylor broke tackles, took hard hits and gained 76 yards despite a bulky brace on his left knee. And rookie quarterback-turned-receiver Matt Jones emerged as a triple threat in Jacksonville's new offense.

The defense returned to form, too. After giving up consecutive 100-yard rushers to end last season, the Jaguars held Shaun Alexander to 73 yards on 14 carries.

The defense also intercepted three passes and forced a fumble. Special teams forced a fumble on the opening kickoff that led to a field goal.

"Just getting rid of that stench from last year, taking advantage of this fresh start, that's what this game is," linebacker Jeff Ulbrich said. "To win in a game that's truly meaningful, that's great."

Rattay, a Louisiana Tech product who beat out top draft pick Alex Smith to retain his starting job, went 11-of-16 for 165 yards, but his offense was shut out in the final 25 minutes.

REDSKINS 9, BEARS 7: Chicago was driving in Washington territory in the fourth quarter, seemingly poised to make a winner of a rookie quarterback on opening day. Then, in one cruel sequence, the Redskins rattled the drive into oblivion. After three false starts, Kyle Orton was sacked by Demetric Evans. Suddenly, it was third-and-38. The Bears' last good scoring chance was over, and Washington's defense showed it hadn't lost a beat from last season in a home victory.

The Redskins allowed 166 total yards, overcame three turnovers, several untimely penalties and the loss of starter Patrick Ramsey, who was injured in the second quarter by blitzing linebacker Lance Briggs. Ramsey, who played at Tulane, has a mild neck sprain, but Coach Joe Gibbs would not commit to a starter for next week's game at Dallas.

BENGALS 27, BROWNS 13: Carson Palmer threw two touchdown passes and the Bengals spoiled Romeo Crennel's coaching debut.

The Bengals haven't had a winning record since 1990. In winning an opener for the first time since 2001 and their first opener on the road since 1995, they're also 1-0 for the first time in three seasons under Coach Marvin Lewis.

Bad starts have doomed Lewis' first two seasons with the Bengals, who began the past two at 1-4 before recovering to go 8-8.

CHIEFS 27, JETS 7: Kansas City's revamped defense, ranked 29th or worse the past three seasons, came within 29 seconds of handing New York its first shutout in almost 10 years.

"We really wanted that shutout at the end. I know our fans did, too," said defensive end Eric Hicks, who blocked a field goal attempt. "I'm sorry we couldn't get it for them."

Larry Johnson rushed for 110 yards and two touchdowns on nine carries and Priest Holmes added 85 yards and a touchdown.

DEVILS MADE 'EM DO IT

LSU wasn't perfect, but that can be expected when opening on the road against a quality foe like Arizona State

By William Kalec
Staff writer

TEMPE, ARIZ. — Out here, in the land of grassless lawns and scalding steering wheels, mirages can easily deceive a visitor's perception of reality.

Need proof?

Check out the Internet message boards following LSU's 35-31 come-from-behind victory against Arizona State on Saturday night at Sun Devil Stadium. Notice the progression.

Shortly after Sam Keller's failed fourth-down pass to Terry Richardson with just over a minute remaining deep in LSU territory, Web-lurkers let out a collective cyber sigh of relief. Then, when pulses resumed pumping at a normal rate, the digital venting ensued.

The mirage they've concocted throughout all the preseason fluff hardly resembled the view inside Sun Devil Stadium or living rooms back in Louisiana.

Bo Pelini's defense was exposed! Too many stupid mistakes! What's the deal with Les Miles' Britney Spears' headset?

Let's break this down rant by rant.

OK, so Pelini's debut as the Tigers' defensive coordinator wasn't exactly dazzling - though it wasn't a total dud like his Oklahoma finale in last season's FedEx Orange Bowl when Southern California's Matt Leinart and Co. put 55 on the Sooners' defense.

Yes, Keller completed 35 of 56 passes for 461 yards, four touchdowns and no interceptions. And yes, All-American wide receiver Derek Hagen couldn't be covered. And yes, for as much as LSU fans rave about their speed at linebacker, Sun Devils tight ends Jamaal Lewis and Zach Miller were able to get vertical more than once.

Oh, and despite the Sun Devils' aerial ways, they still were able to average four yards per carry — hardly one-dimensional.

Now, here is the good news.

Scan the remainder of LSU's schedule and try to find an opponent with a more prolific offense than Arizona State. Tennessee? Um, Rick Clausen could be the Vols' starting quarterback or it could be sophomore Erik Ainge. Auburn? Not unless Jason Campbell, Ronnie Brown and "Cadillac" Williams have some hidden eligibility left. Florida? Maybe, but let's see what Urban Meyer's system does beyond recent displays against non-conference fillers.

Also, keep in mind that these players are learning a new system from the pin-your-ears-back demeanor under former coach Nick Saban's reign and that when needed, they were able to come up with a big turnover (see Ali Highsmith's third-quarter forced fumble inside LSU's 10-yard line with Arizona State set to take a 24-7 lead). There's no reason not to think this unit should improve.

Next, the mistakes.

LSU would have benefited tremendously if it had been able to host New Orleans Bowl staple North Texas last week. There were a bundle of dropped passes, a nice set of them compiled by scapegoat-turned-savior Early Doucet. Xavier Carter dropped a sure touchdown pass - probably the best ball JaMarcus Russell threw all night - in the second quarter. LSU was without Dwayne Bowe, not to mention Craig Davis was injured early on, but that's no excuse for the contagious slippery fingers.

LSU also racked up 100 yards in penalties.

Hey, it was the Tigers' first game. Get worried if these same problems linger into October and November. Until then, it's a tad quick to electronically denounce this team's focus and discipline.

Next, of course, Miles' futuristic head set.

Talk about nitpicking. Give the guy a break. Sure, it looked a little goofy, especially when he cupped his hand around the microphone. But in the grand scheme of things, who really cares?

Look, Miles is not Saban. It's just not him. That's not to say one approach is wrong and the other is correct. They are just different.

Considering everything placed on Miles' shoulders this past offseason, it's amazing the guy has maintained his posture. Fans dumped national-championship expectations on him as he was consistently reminded of Saban's greatness, and then was given the daunting burden to win his home opener on the road against a ranked foe so that a hurricane-ravaged region could enjoy a temporary diversion. So far, the new guy has done everything asked.

No it wasn't a perfect, dominating performance, but it did keep the distant vision of competing for that crystal football within sight.

For LSU, football has a stark look this season

From wire reports

"This is not a made-for-TV movie," Coach Les Miles said. "This was a real-life trauma where friends and family had to stay in the dorms, and the town swelled to take in New Orleans evacuees. We are treating people that are injured and disadvantaged 200 yards from our stadium. We have a scrimmage, and Blackhawk helicopters are flying people from New Orleans over our heads."

The Tigers traveled halfway across the country to play their "home" opener Saturday night — a 35-31 victory over No. 15 Arizona State in Miles' debut as LSU's coach in Tempe, Ariz.

The game should have been the second this season in Baton Rouge, but Hurricane Katrina washed out the opener against North Texas on Sept. 3 at Tiger Stadium. A week later, the Tigers were in Tempe, forced off campus by the influx of people who turned the Pete Maravich Assembly Center into what Athletic Director Skip Bertman called the largest triage center in the United States.

"Our team has had the longest camp in the history of camps," Miles said.

With the win, LSU moved up two spots in the Associated Press Top 25 to No. 3. If fifth-ranked Tennessee beats Florida on Saturday, the Sept. 24 game between the two teams in Baton Rouge will be the second game this season pitting two teams ranked in the top 5.

Making the biggest move of the week was Notre Dame, which is a top-10 team for the first time in three years. Charlie Weis' Fighting Irish are No. 10 in the AP media poll released Sunday, jumping 10 spots after upsetting Michigan 17-10 on Saturday to improve to 2-0.

Weis is the first Notre Dame coach since Knute Rockne in 1918 to win his first two games on the road, helping the Fighting Irish to their highest ranking since they were seventh in late November 2002.

In 2002, Tyrone Willingham's first season as coach, Notre Dame started 8-0 and reached as high as No. 4 in the AP poll before finishing 17th in the final poll. The Fighting Irish started the 2003 season ranked 20th, but were out of the poll for good by Sept. 14. They were ranked 24th twice in 2004.

Southern California now has been No. 1 for 21 consecutive polls, a run that dates back to late in the 2003 season and matches the record set by Miami from 2001-2002.

The Trojans were idle this week, and Texas' 25-22 win at Ohio State helped the Longhorns make up some ground on the Trojans.

Southern California received 56 of 64 first-place votes, down from the 61 it had last week. Texas pulled in eight first-place votes, up from four in the first regular-season poll.

"I was just so impressed with Texas coming into Ohio State and playing as well as they did," said Doug Harris of the Dayton Daily News, who moved the Longhorns past the Trojans. "In covering Ohio State for six years, I haven't seen team speed quite like that. The only team that I can compare it to is Miami the year Ohio State played them in the national championship game."

Virginia Tech is No. 4, the Hokies' highest ranking since Oct. 19, 2003. Tennessee will be No. 5 when it plays at No. 6 Florida next Saturday. It'll be the first time since 2002 the Volunteers and Gators will both be in the top 10 when they play.

No. 7 Georgia and No. 8 Florida State are followed by Ohio State and Notre Dame in the top 10.

In the USA Today coaches' poll, Southern California, Texas and LSU are the top three. Tennessee and Virginia Tech are tied for fourth and Georgia is sixth.

In the AP poll, Michigan dropped 11 spots to No. 14 as the upper echelon of the Big Ten took a hit on Saturday. The Big Ten went into the weekend with three teams in the top 10, but now has one.

Ohio State fell five spots to No. 9 after losing to Texas, and Iowa tumbled 14 spots to No. 22 after a 23-3 loss to Iowa State. The Hawkeyes played most of the game without quarterback Drew Tate, who left with a concussion but is expected to be back in the lineup next week.

No. 11 Louisville is followed by Purdue and Miami. Then come Michigan and California, ahead of No. 16 Georgia Tech, Boston College, Arizona State, Texas Tech and Clemson.

Oklahoma dropped three more spots to No. 21 after struggling for three quarters to beat Tulsa. It's the Sooners' lowest ranking since they were No. 24 in October 1999. Iowa is 22nd, followed by Fresno State, Iowa State and Virginia at No. 25.

A week after jumping into the poll at No. 22 by upsetting Oklahoma, TCU is out of the rankings after SMU knocked off the Horned Frogs, 21-10.

Iowa State is the lone new team in the rankings. The Cyclones were last ranked in October 2002.

Federer ends Agassi's magical ride

Champ wins sixth Grand Slam title

From wire reports

NEW YORK — Roger Federer, a man of panache and unparalleled perfection in finals, withstood Andre Agassi's spirited upset bid to capture a second consecutive U.S. Open and sixth Grand Slam title.

Federer responded to his few moments of pressure by reeling off seven consecutive points in the tiebreaker that turned the match around, then blew Agassi away in the fourth set to win 6-3, 2-6, 7-6 (1), 6-1 Sunday and run his stunning record in finals to 23-0.

Federer moved into a tie with Stefan Edberg and Boris Becker for Grand Slam titles among Open era players, and one behind John McEnroe and Mats Wilander. Pete Sampras holds the record with 14 Grand Slam titles, but at 24 years old Federer could well have a shot at that.

Federer shrieked and leapt in the air when Agassi's backhand return looped long on the championship point.

Though the 35-year-old Agassi was the oldest U.S. Open men's finalist in 31 years, age had less to do with the difference in this match than Federer's sheer strength, variety of serves, and superior balance of attacks from the baseline and the net that wore down Agassi.

Federer forced the action, going for winners more aggressively, dancing around the court with poise, unrattled even when Agassi had him down a break at 4-2 in the third set. For a while there, Agassi seemed to be on the verge of pulling one of the great upsets in sports history - on the order of Muhammad Ali's shockers over Sonny Liston and George Foreman.

An 8-1 underdog, Agassi was a few months removed from a career-threatening back injury that shot crippling pain down his right leg, led to his loss in the first round of the French Open and caused him to skip Wimbledon. He was playing a man who doesn't lose in finals, is at the peak of his game and health, and is coming off his third consecutive Wimbledon championship.

If this was Agassi's last U.S. Open after 20 straight - he won't decide until the end of the year whether to retire - it was remarkable even in defeat.

"It's been a tough road, but it's been a great road," Agassi told the cheering crowd. "Roger played way too good today. Congratulations Roger, well done.

"This certainly isn't easy to do at any age, especially 35. It's been a privilege to compete against so many great champions over the last couple of decades or so. Without exception, Roger has been one of most enjoyable to compete against. Thank you New York for the last 20 years. It's been a great ride."

Federer became the first man in the Open era, which started in 1968, to win Wimbledon and the U.S. Open back-to-back for the second consecutive year. Three players have done it twice, though not in consecutive years: Jimmy Connors, McEnroe and Sampras. The last player to accomplish the feat was Don Budge in 1937-38.

Federer beat Agassi for the eighth consecutive time in the past two years after losing their first three meetings. Three of Federer's victories in that streak have come at Grand Slam events, including the quarterfinals of the U.S. Open last year and the Australian Open this year.

"This is probably the most special Grand Slam final in my career," Federer said. "To play against Andre in New York, it's a dream.

"I had to play my best match of the tournament. It happened I played my best in the finals, as usual. I don't know how I do it, but it definitely feels great every single time."

Roger Federer held off a valiant comeback to defeat Andre Agassi in four sets to win the U.S. Open Sunday that earned him his sixth Grand Slam title.

Agassi's dream crushed by Federer's power

Popular star hints at retirement after four-set loss

From wire reports

NEW YORK — Andre Agassi's run sure was fun while it lasted.

The oldest finalist at the U.S. Open in 31 years teased fans Sunday, playing some of his best tennis in years for three sets and looking as if he might finish off his magical run with a title.

But like virtually everyone else the past few years, the 35-year-old couldn't keep up with Roger Federer.

When his backhand return sailed long to end the match 6-3, 2-6, 7-6 (1), 6-1, he congratulated Federer and then walked quickly to the sideline. Fans gave Agassi one last salute as he put his racket in his bag, and he smiled and waved. But his brown eyes were somber when he sat down and stared straight ahead for several minutes, a towel to his mouth, perhaps wondering how many more chances like this he'll get.

"Thank you New York for the last 20 years," Agassi told the crowd. "It's been a great ride."

When his picture was shown on the scoreboard afterward, fans cheered again. Agassi smiled and got up to salute the fans with his traditional bows and kisses, and even Federer clapped.

"It's been a great road. Regardless," Agassi said, stopping when a fan yelled out, "I love you, Andre!"

"I love you too, thank you man," Agassi replied.

No one, not even Agassi, would have expected a run like this a few months ago. After a herniated disc in his lower back sent pain shooting down his leg, leading to a first-round loss at the French Open, he wondered if his career was over. He missed Wimbledon, and didn't return to the tour until July.

But he won in Los Angeles and reached another final in Canada, and he was dazzling at the Open: Playing with the spirit of his youth, he played three consecutive five-setters for the first time in his career to reach the final.

And when he broke Federer to go up 4-2 in the third set, the fans at Arthur Ashe Stadium sensed - hoped - he might pull the whole thing off. They gave him a standing ovation, and there were dozens of cheers of "Let's Go Andre!"

But no one can kill momentum like Roger Federer. He broke Agassi back, held serve to even the set at 4 and then forced a tiebreaker. And when Federer sprinted through the tiebreaker, winning seven consecutive points, Agassi was all but finished.

The crowd tried to rally him, but he didn't have anything left. Those shots he'd been hitting with pinpoint precision now landed long or wide. Instead of chasing balls down with ease, he could only watch as they blew by him.

He did manage to fight off two match points in the sixth game of the last set, holding serve with a winner down the line to avoid being shutout. But it was only delaying the inevitable.

NBA stars in Houston for hurricane relief

By Kristie Rieken

HOUSTON – Chris LaRoche doesn't have any clothes, toys or a place to go home to, but Sunday the 12-year-old's dream came true when he played basketball against LeBron James, Kevin Garnett, Chauncey Billups, Ron Artest and a host of other NBA stars.

LaRoche and about 1,100 other Hurricane Katrina evacuees living in Houston's George R. Brown Convention Center got a morning visit from about a dozen NBA players in town for an evening charity game.

"I can't believe it," LaRoche said, a huge grin on his face. "I was guarding LeBron. It was so crazy."

James and the other players spent about 90 minutes playing with kids, signing autographs and greeting fans.

"Hopefully we can put some smiles on their faces and maybe for just that little moment they cannot think about what happened," James said.

TNT basketball analyst Kenny Smith organized the game, played at the Toyota Center before a packed crowd that included at least 5,000 evacuees who were given free tickets to the game. Smith said each of the almost 30 players participating in the event donated a minimum of $10,000 in money or supplies to the relief effort.

Louisiana Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu thanked the players and the city of Houston for its support before Jerry Stackhouse treated the crowd to a spirited rendition of the Star Spangled Banner.

"This is an American tragedy that brought us to our knees," Landrieu said. "And the American people have reached down and lifted us up. We will rebuild."

Kobe Bryant, who spent the day visiting victims, said he was inspired by their positive attitudes.

"I had in my mind that it was just going to be a really sad sight," Bryant said. "But when you walk in you see that everybody was just real spirited. There was a lot of energy in there - a lot of resolve and determination to bounce back."

Charles Barkley, who helped with the TNT broadcast, said he was proud of the outpouring of support the NBA showed Sunday.

"Everybody has got to do a little part," he said. "We're all in this world together, and I appreciate them doing something positive with their time."

Allen Iverson arrived about 10 minutes before the game, causing quite a stir. He didn't play but got perhaps the biggest ovation of the day when introduced. He posed for pictures, signed autographs and encouraged the East team from their bench.

The West won the game 114-95.

FG, La. horsemen close to agreement

Deal could be 35- to 40-day meet

By Bob Fortus
Staff writer

Fair Grounds and Churchill Downs officials and Louisiana horsemen are hammering out details for what might be a 35- to 40-day meet at Louisiana Downs to make up for the cancellation of the New Orleans racing season, Fair Grounds president Randy Soth said Sunday.

Soth said that progress was made Friday in talks among himself, Fair Grounds director of racing Ben Huffman, Churchill senior vice president of racing Don Richardson, Churchill chief executive officer Tom Meeker, Churchill chief operating officer Andy Skehan, Louisiana State Racing Commission chairman Bob Wright, commission executive director Charlie Gardiner and Louisiana Horsemen's Benevolent and Protective Association president Sean Alfortish.

"We tried to come to some basic agreement," Soth said.

Churchill spokesperson Julie Koenig stressed that, as of Sunday, the details were not completed.

"Hopefully, we'll have something to announce tomorrow or Tuesday at the latest," she said Sunday.

Soth, Huffman and Richardson still are talking about the length of the proposed season, Soth said. A ballpark number of days is between 35 and 40, he said.

"The basic beginning and end (of the season) is somewhere in the neighborhood of Thanksgiving and somewhere closing in mid-January,'' he said. "It's moving in that way."

Wright said: "They're supposed to have a proposal solidified by Monday afternoon for everybody to evaluate."

Last week, Alfortish said that Louisiana horsemen are seeking at least 40 racing days in a Fair Grounds season shifted to another Louisiana track. He couldn't be reached for comment Sunday.

If the parties agree on a proposed season, the racing commission must approve it.

By law, the Fair Grounds must run 80 days in 20 consecutive weeks to keep its racing license. Wright said that he didn't expect problems obtaining a waiver to allow for a shorter season. An executive order from the governor might be sufficient to allow the season, he said.

He also said that the commission is investigating whether the Legislature would need to act on the matter. "I wouldn't think that's necessary," Wright said.

Hahnville proves ready to play

Rolls past Central Lafourche 43-7

By Lori Lyons
River Parishes bureau

It was Thursday before Hahnville returned to the practice field for the first time since Hurricane Katrina hit. But the lack of preparation time didn't show much, as the Tigers defeated Central Lafourche 43-7 on Sunday afternoon in Mathews.

The Tigers amassed 395 yards on offense. With Early-Larry James and B.J. Young platooning at quarterback, the Tigers passed for 156 yards. Running back Terrance Isaac had 113 yards and one touchdown on 16 carries. Six other Tigers scored. James ran for a 1-yard touchdown, Jordan Stephany caught a 15-yard pass from James, Jeremy Barnes scored on a 4-yard run, Ivory Washington scored on a 41-yard run, Kentrell Lockett blocked a punt for another score and kicker Devin Samaha added four extra points and a 23-yard field goal.

Hahnville's defense held the Trojans to 190 yards and a touchdown. Central Lafourche quarterback Neil Adams connected with Ross Blanchard on a 19-yard touchdown with 4:02 remaining.

It gave Hahnville coach Lou Valdin reason to smile. But he was most satisfied that the game was played.

"I couldn't see starting practice Thursday and getting them back and not having something for them to look forward to at the end of the week," Valdin said. "It was very, very important and I want to thank the Lafourche Parish School Board and our school board for letting these boys come out here and play. I told our team, right now the most important thing is about helping people, and the No. 1 thing we can do is, for a couple of hours on a Sunday afternoon, people can come out and watch the Hahnville Tigers and forget about everything else that's going on back in St. Charles Parish."

"We wanted to play real bad," Isaac said. "We wanted to come out and get ready for the season. I knew we were going to come out and execute and just play Tiger football."

Valdin said his team was ready to play despite the two-week layoff from school and almost two weeks without practice. Very few Hahnville players had to be treated for cramping during the game despite the 3 p.m. start time.

"I think that's a lot to do with training camp," Valdin said. "And our whole offense and our whole defense and special teams are in, so we didn't have to go back and put all that in."

Although they have returned to the field, the Tigers still do not know when they will return to the classroom. St. Charles Parish teachers are to report Monday, but no definitive start date has been set for students.

Valdin said that might give this week's opponent an edge. The Tigers will play East St. John in a non-district game at 3 p.m. Saturday. The teams will play later in the season in a district game. Next Saturday's game will have to be played during the day because the lights at Hahnville's stadium were damaged. St. John the Baptist parish students return to school today.

"It's going to be tough because we're not in school," Valdin said. "Obviously, I wish we were back in school, back to our routine. I think East St. John is going to school so I think that definitely gives them an advantage."

President Bush got his boots on the ground of New Orleans on Monday, touring some still waterlogged areas in the 7th Ward and Mid-City before conducting an ad-hoc press conference under the elevated Interstate 10 at Cleveland and South Claiborne avenues.

Flanked by Mayor Ray Nagin and Gov. Kathleen Blanco, Bush said the federal government is prepared to offer whatever assistance Louisiana's leaders require but that the design and implementation of the Hurricane Katrina recovery plan would be led locally.

"This great city has ample talent and ample genius to set the strategy, to set the vision," Bush said at Cleveland and South Claiborne avenues, a spot that until late last week was still under water and where the smell of the septic glop now coating much of New Orleans was noticeable.

"My attitude is this," he said. "The people of New Orleans can design the vision. They can lay out what New Orleans ought to look like in the future, and the federal government can help."

Bush deflected criticism of both the federal government's response to Katrina, which has been widely excoriated for its dawdling pace, and notions that the strain the ongoing war in Iraq has put on the armed forces somehow made them inadequate to handle the nation's worst natural disaster.

Floodwall breaches still a mystery

Could structural flaw be to blame?

By John McQuaid

One of the central mysteries emerging in the Hurricane Katrina disaster is why concrete floodwalls in three canals breached during the storm, causing much of the catastrophic flooding, while earthen hurricane levees surrounding the city remained intact.

It probably will take months to investigate and make a conclusive determination about what happened, according to the Army Corps of Engineers. But two Louisiana State University scientists who have examined the breaches suggest that a structural flaw in the floodwalls might be to blame.

"Why did we have no hurricane levee failures but five separate places with floodwall failures?" asked Joseph Suhayda, a retired LSU coastal engineer who examined the breaches last week.

Traveling by pirogue through the flooded Broadmoor neighborhood Saturday, two men spotted a body floating in a side yard at Rocheblave and Octavia streets. They reported it to National Guardsmen and a civilian airboat operator, who said they were aware of it.

For 13 days in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, the body of Alcede Jackson lay on a porch at 4732 Laurel St., wrapped in a plastic bag and covered in a blanket beneath a sign quoting the evangelist John and commending Jackson to "the loving arms of Jesus."

Across town, a left turn at Fern Street in the Carrollton neighborhood provided a clear view of the corpse of a man lying face-down on the sidewalk near a vacant lot. He wore blue jeans. His head was uncovered. Residents who witnessed the scene also informed a pair of National Guardsmen stationed on North Claiborne Avenue. They said they knew.

Nearly two weeks after Hurricane Katrina tore a deadly path through the New Orleans area, grim sights like these still dotted the vacant urban landscape as the official number of bodies collected and sent to a makeshift morgue at St. Gabriel rose from Sunday's count of 197 by the Department of Health and Hospitals to 279 on Monday.

With the total expected to rise, Kenyon International Emergency Services, the firm brought in last week by the Federal Emergency Management Agency to help recover corpses, announced Monday that it would not formally extend its short-term agreement to have about 100 people on the

Runways reopen today to passenger flights

Air Force personnel haul in passenger benches Monday in Louis Armstrong International Airport, which will welcome two Northwest Airlines flights today from Memphis, Tenn. Only Concourses A and B will receive flights in the coming days; Concourse C has roof damage, and D is still being used as medical facility. TOP, An electronic board is tested Monday in preparation for the about 60 flights a day that are expected by the end of week. Passengers are likely to include relief workers and residents of less-damaged areas such as the River Parishes.7

Below-normal traffic expected through 2007

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

With armed military personnel roaming the grounds and one concourse still serving as a hospital, Louis Armstrong International Airport reopens today to passenger traffic, 16 days after the last commercial flight took off.

Only four flights are scheduled, a pair of round trips from Memphis, Tenn., by Northwest Airlines, and Aviation Director Roy Williams predicted 60 flights per day by the end of the week. Before Hurricane Katrina struck Aug. 29, Armstrong averaged 350 flights daily.

Williams doesn't expect normal traffic for 18 months, largely because New Orleans' vital convention business has all but shut down.

"You don't have to lose many of those to lose a significant amount of your traffic," he said. "Nobody knows, even if all the hotels are back in place, people's proclivity to come back."

Many airlines have waived fees and penalties for passengers who want to reschedule flights they planned before Katrina. Some said they have given passengers refunds for canceled flights.

"We are currently working with those customers," said spokeswoman Ginger Hardage of Southwest Airlines, the busiest carrier at Armstrong.

Armstrong last saw a commercial passenger flight leave Aug. 28 at 4:30 p.m. After Katrina passed the next day, the airport morphed into a transit point for inbound relief supplies and outbound evacuees and a way station for emergency medical care. Cargo traffic resumed Sunday.

But the rows of people on stretchers and in wheelchairs no longer vie for attention in the lobby outside Concourse D. Soldiers have replaced the lines of cots with rows of airline passenger chairs in Concourse B, where an estimated 2,000 military personnel were living. They have now moved into tents in an airport employee parking lot.

Williams said he doesn't know how many people will be on today's Northwest flights.

Other airlines are still assessing their resources and demand for New Orleans flights, he said. Among the issues: fuel supplies and security. Southwest, which normally commands 30 percent of the market at Armstrong, flew in 21 employees from Dallas to examine its facilities, Southwest project manager Mark Petteway said.

"Everything looks great here," he said, referring to computers at the ticketing terminals.

Williams said flights in the coming days will attract a combination of people who live in areas with less damage, such as the River Parishes, and people involved in helping southeast Louisiana recover and rebuild.

Passenger service couldn't start earlier because of the emergency work. At one point, Williams said, Armstrong became the busiest airport in the United States.

Altogether, Armstrong evacuated 23,000 people, including 13,000 in one day, said Mike McCormick, a spokesman for the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"Imagine this filled with stretchers," he said, pointing at a lobby of soldiers and emergency officials outside Concourse D, still somewhat of a medical center.

As Armstrong sputters back into normal operation, all passenger flights will leave out of Concourses A and B. Concourse D is still used as an evacuation and medical facility, although it hosted only one patient Monday. Concourse C suffered roof damage, Williams said.

The shops and stores in the airport will reopen slowly, with at least one food and one or two gift shops opening Thursday, Williams said.

CORRECTIONS AND CLARIFICATIONS

Taxation figure corrected: A story in Saturday's newspaper incorrectly described the amount of personal income in Louisiana eligible for taxation. About $40 billion of the state's $125 billion in personal income that is eligible for taxation comes from the New Orleans area.

Brown resigns FEMA post

Nagin: Stepping down won't solve problems

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Three days after being relieved of responsibility for managing the federal government's Hurricane Katrina relief effort, Michael Brown stepped down Monday as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

His departure comes after an avalanche of criticism that the federal relief effort, particularly in New Orleans, parts of Jefferson Parish, St. Bernard and St. Tammany parishes, has been slow, inept and largely ineffective.

"It is important that I leave now to avoid further distraction from the ongoing mission of FEMA," Brown said in a written statement.

Brown's resignation was expected after the Bush administration in effect issued a no-confidence declaration Friday by removing him from day-day-management of the relief operations, replacing him with Vice Adm. Thad Allen of the Coast Guard.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said Brown's resignation will not solve the problems.

"I think it's bigger than any one person," Nagin said. "If you think that's going to fix it, it's not. It might make people feel better. It doesn't make me feel better."

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said that while Bush has "now addressed the leadership issues" with FEMA, he must still deal with "the resource and organizational issues, which hindered our national response to this tragedy."

Sen. David Vitter, R-La., said the departure of Brown, whom critics said lacked solid experience handling disaster management, was appropriate.

"On the positive side, I'm very impressed so far with Vice Admiral Allen," said Vitter, who praised him for quickly taking charge and demonstrating complete command of the current rescue operations.

R. David Paulison, head of FEMA's emergency preparedness force, was named to take over the beleaguered agency.

Paulison is a career firefighter from Miami who was among emergency workers responding to Hurricane Andrew in 1992 and the crash of ValuJet Flight 592 in the Florida Everglades in 1996, according to a biography posted on FEMA's Web site. He also has led the U.S. Fire Administration since December 2001, according to the site.

In an interview Monday with The Associated Press, Brown said he last talked to Bush five or six days ago, but decided his resignation would allow the relief effort to move forward with the least controversy.

"I think it's in the best interest of the agency and the best interest of the president to do that and get the media focus on the good things that are going on, instead of me," Brown said.

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., who asked Bush to replace Brown last week, called his departure "the right thing for the country and for the people of the Gulf Coast states."

U.S. Postal Service working to restore deliveries to city

Transient evacuees urged to check in

By Mark Waller
Staff writer

As most New Orleans-bound mail gets channeled to Houston in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, U.S. Postal Service officials are urging displaced residents to sign up for address changes, no matter how temporary, so mail carriers can find them.

People can file address changes on the Internet at www.usps.com, by telephone at 1 (800) 275-8777 or by filling out a form at any open post office. Evacuees who move again can register another change, and the mail will go to the latest location on file.

"The sooner we get those change-of-address forms out, the better for us," said Dave Lewin, a spokesman for the Postal Service who is based in Houston but is working in Baton Rouge to help manage the emergency.

Postal Service officials working from Baton Rouge said 60 New Orleans area post offices are back in service, including eight that came online Monday in Belle Chasse, Harvey, Kenner, Lafitte, Marrero, Metairie and Westwego. Home delivery is not yet restored in all of those places, but customers in ZIP codes with working post offices can retrieve mail at the counter.

U.S. POSTAL SERVICE

*The suspension of standard mail delivery, including letters and periodicals, remains suspended in ZIP codes that begin with 395, 700, 701 and 704. The suspension has been lifted for ZIP codes that begin with 369, 393, 394 and 396.
*Temporary change of address forms are available at any post office or https://moversguide.usps.com/mgservice/ECOA

On Friday, 37 post offices in St. Charles, St. Helena, St. James, St. John the Baptist, Tangipahoa and Washington parishes reopened, some with limited services.

"We're doing everything we possibly can; we're getting all available mail we can out there," said Victor Dubina, a postal service spokesman from Cleveland who is also in Baton Rouge. "It's a question of patience."

Lewin said the service is using more than 30 generators to power some stations where electricity remains out, and it's using 26 mobile buildings in areas where post office buildings suffered hurricane damage.

Late Monday, officials said they were extending the time that people from areas with no mail delivery can pick up Social Security checks. The check pickups at post offices in Baton Rouge, LaPlace and Des Allemands were originally scheduled to end Monday, but will now continue today.

The Baton Rouge Downtown Station at 750 Florida Blvd. serves residents from most New Orleans ZIP codes seeking their Social Security checks. The Des Allemands post office at 17242 U.S. 90 covers Venice, Boothville, Buras, Port Sulphur, Barataria and Algiers. The LaPlace post office at 190 Belle Terre Blvd. serves residents of Pointe a la Hache, St. Bernard, Violet, Meraux, Chalmette, Arabi and Braithwaite. West Slidell Station distributes checks to all Slidell residents.

He said the service is trying to re-establish its presence in communities hit by Katrina as quickly as possible, partly to reassure residents that life is slowly returning to normal.

"I think it's important for the people in the area to see our people out there," he said.

The Postal Service is also still trying to find some of its own employees, who themselves were affected by the storm, asking them to call 1 (877) 477-3273 to report on their well-being, whereabouts and availability for work.

"A lot of them suffered the same damage everyone else did," Lewin said.

At least one employee who evacuated to the shelter at the Astrodome in Houston is working in post office operations there, he said.

Port prepares to open for business this week

Housing a problem for returning workers

By Jeffrey Meitrodt
Staff writer

NEW ORLEANS — As he drove his boss around the Napoleon Container Terminal, Joseph LaBarriere yanked the wheel of his Ford Explorer left and right to avoid hitting dozens of four-ton steel boxes scattered across the yard by Hurricane Katrina.

"Looks like Legos on a child's playroom floor, doesn't it?" said Gary LaGrange, president and chief executive officer of the Port of New Orleans.

But the task of cleaning up the yard is actually one of the less daunting tasks LaGrange said he will face in the coming months.

Not a single ship has been unloaded at the port in two weeks because there's nobody left in New Orleans to unload them, and because the trucks and trains that transport cargo entering the port can't get through.

That could change Wednesday, when the port is scheduled to unload its first ship. Within a month, after rounding up workers and borrowing much-needed equipment from the federal government, LaGrange said, business will bounce back as much as 50 percent. He's betting the port will reach at least 80 percent of capacity in three months.

That will be a tall order, according to transportation leaders, who say there are still many unknowns when it comes to moving cargo in and out of New Orleans. But it's not an impossible goal.

"We were wounded; we weren't totally wiped out," said state Sen. Walter Boasso, D-Chalmette, who owns a liquid bulk shipping business and has been helping coordinate rescue efforts. "We've still got infrastructure here that doesn't exist anywhere else in the country. That gives us some advantages."

One of the most immediate problems is housing. With much of New Orleans under water and facing a mandatory evacuation order, there's no place to put the thousands of people whose jobs are related to the port.

On Thursday afternoon, help started to trickle in when the crane ship Diamond State arrived from Orange, Texas. Port officials said the ship can house about 40 workers, and it will soon be joined by three training ships capable of accommodating as many as 1,000 people, LaGrange said. Typically, when traffic is heavy, there are about 2,000 people involved in loading and unloading ships, he said.

"These cabins will be dedicated to anybody who is working the port in any capacity at all," LaGrange said. "That includes truckers, terminal workers, stevedores, warehousemen, line handlers, tug operators and security personnel."

Also on the list: state-commissioned pilots, who have the job of guiding foreign vessels up and down the Mississippi River. One of the casualties of Katrina was Pilottown, an island community near the mouth of the river that has served as a base of operations for two of the region's three pilot groups for about 100 years.

"Pilottown got wiped out," said Ed Peterson, executive director of the Louisiana River Pilots Association.

Peterson said the storm has complicated a river that was already considered one of the most challenging waterways in the world to navigate.

One of the biggest problems: a lack of navigational aides. Of the 120 lights and buoys that once blinked along the river, helping pilots fix their position and plot their course, just three remain. As a result, ships can only move during daylight, causing delays of 10 to 12 hours.

"The river looks totally different," Peterson said. "It is so much wider, and the levees have disappeared. The pilots are feeling their way to find the deepest part of the channel because it is not marked. It is pretty stressful, but they're doing it. They want to keep this river open."

It took five days to reopen the Mississippi, Peterson said. Initially, traffic on the river, which is popular with shipping companies because its deep channel typically provides 45 feet of draft, was limited to 35 feet, greatly reducing the amount of cargo those ships could carry. The limit has since been increased to 39 feet, Peterson said.

"That is a huge impact," Peterson said. "That is a lot of tons that don't get loaded. But we're going to overcome that in short order."

"We're probably doing 60 percent as many ships as we had been before the storm," Peterson said.

For now, virtually all of those ships are heading to grain terminals north of the city, which are working at about 85 percent of capacity, or to facilities near Baton Rouge, whose port was largely unaffected by the storm.

Glen Guillot, vice president of two trucking companies that do business with the port, said restarting cargo handling operations will be hampered by a shortage of diesel, which is needed to fuel both his trucks and the generators that will be used to provide power to the dock workers. Conventional electricity isn't expected to reach most docks for weeks, if not months.

Overturned cargo containers are strewn at the foot of two damaged loading cranes at the Napoleon Avenue A wharf.

Another obstacle to truck traffic is getting past the checkpoints operated by State Police, but port and parish officials said they are discussing an agreement that would allow commercial traffic in the parishes sometime this week.

Guillot said his biggest challenge is finding his workers. Of the 20 drivers at Southeastern Motor Freight, he's been able to locate only seven – and they're spread from Atlanta to Houston. The rest evacuated without leaving any forwarding information.

"That is going to be a challenge, and one I look at with great apprehension," said Todd Spencer, executive vice president of the Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association, which represents 129,000 truckers around the country. "The primary response we're getting (from members in that area) is no response whatsoever."

Spencer said he knows of several truckers in the area who lost everything, including their trucks. "I suspect that is going to be a pretty common situation for the guys who worked the port," he said.

By contrast, finding stevedores and other dock workers should be fairly easy, according to officials at P&O Ports and Ceres Gulf Inc., two companies that expect to be back in business this week at the port.

"We have 92 managers and employees, and all 92 have been located and are intact – and that's the best news of the whole week," said Dave Morgan, senior vice president of Gulf operations for P&O Ports.

Jim Campbell, president of the local chapter of the International Longshoreman's Association, said he has located virtually all of his 250 or so members.

"If I had to put together 100 men today, I could do it," Campbell said late last week.

Though LaGrange said he sees challenges almost everywhere he looks, he is confident the port, which is the nation's fourth or fifth largest in terms of tonnage, will rebound quickly. His main argument is the river itself, which connects to 15,000 miles of inland waterways crossing 33 states, reaching 62 percent of the nation.

"No other port has that," he said. "The river is still here. The railroads are still here. All the parts that make our port great are still here. All we have to do is get power and get our people back here."

Flooded property records can be saved, official says

And they'll be moved from court basement

By Greg Thomas
Real estate writer

Most of the property records in the basement of Orleans Parish Civil District Court are salvageable from floodwaters and may be ready to use within the next few weeks, Custodian of Notarial Records Stephen Bruno said Monday.

Stored in the courthouse basement, which took on nearly a foot of water during Hurricane Katrina, moisture was the biggest enemy to property records. Abstractors, who conduct title searches before a real estate transaction closes, should have access to them within the next few weeks, Bruno said.

The records include titles, mortgages, conveyances, liens, wills and other documents.

Munters, the Swedish records restoration company hired to preserve the nearly 12 million pages of titles, liens, mortgages and other records, is drying the documents in freeze containers, Bruno said.

Bruno and other city officials are seeking a permanent – and safe – location to keep the records.

"I'll tell you one thing. They'll never be stored in the basement of the courthouse again," he said.

Documents stored in the New Orleans Research Records Center on the third floor of the former Amoco building at 1340 Poydras St. also survived, but broken windows have left the records threatened by exposure to heat and humidity, Bruno said.

Those records, considered more important from a historical perspective, date back several hundred years and include slave records and land grants, handwritten in French and Spanish, from the Colonial period, Bruno said.

Munters is pumping air conditioning into the Research Center through a broken window to dry out the records instead of risking further damage by moving them to a more protected area.

According to Bruno, the building engineer at 1340 Poydras said the structure's heating and air-conditioning system is relatively intact.

Bruno is working with Register of Conveyances Gasper Schiro and Recorder of Mortgages Desiree Charbonnet. Both were unavailable for comment Monday.

Onsite Munters official Bob Harrison said he thought only a few inches of water entered the basement. Bruno had heard that as much as 3 feet of water had flooded the basement.

Bruno said that he has made arrangements to store the conveyance and mortgage records at the old Jefferson Parish Courthouse in Gretna.

Until the records are available, it is virtually impossible to sell or buy a piece of property in Orleans Parish.

ground to aid FEMA and the state in removing the dead from private homes and public areas.

Louisiana officials railed against the overall recovery effort Monday, saying that even with Kenyon on the job, too few people were working to handle the dead. FEMA policy, a spokesman said, prohibited any of the tens of thousands of National Guard troops or municipal police officers on the ground in New Orleans from touching the bodies, except to tag them and report their location to higher authorities.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said the slow pace of body removal was disrespectful to the deceased and said he didn't understand the holdup.

"I can't imagine going into a house, and I've got a bloated dead body of my father," he said. "They need to get them out and try to identify them as quickly as possible."

"How long do we want those bodies to sit out there and rot?" asked U.S. Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, adding that when residents return to check their property in the inundated parishes of St. Bernard and Plaquemines, "they'll get in and see all the bodies on the ground because FEMA can't handle its business."

U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu said the dead must be honored now because "our federal government failed these individuals in life."

The reaction marked the start of a third week of scathing criticism of FEMA, which has been lambasted for its handling of rescue efforts and distribution of aid to evacuees. Ricardo Zuniga, the agency spokesman, said Monday that the recovery of corpses is being handled in a methodical, prudent manner.

"I can't imagine going into a house, and I've got a bloated dead body of my father. They need to get them out and try to identify them as quickly as possible."

Mayor RAY NAGIN

FEMA had 3,700 workers deployed across the region Thursday in search and rescue missions, Zuniga said. On the same day, 60 people – 15 teams, each with four experts in handling bodies in disaster scenarios – were assigned to collect corpses from sites identified by military, police or citizens who called in to report where their neighbors or loved ones might be found dead, he said. He did not have more recent statistics.

"It's not a haphazard approach," Zuniga said. "We're going block to block, house to house, room to room in some cases."

Still unclear Monday was the scope of the recovery job as officials at all levels have suggested than an initial call for 25,000 body bags was overblown. Melissa Walker, a spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Hospitals, the state agency leading body recovery, said she did not know whether a complete survey of ravaged parishes had been undertaken.

"I have not heard that there is a need for more (recovery) people, but honestly I cannot tell you if there is or not," she said. "I can tell you that they're bringing in bodies every day."

Gov. Kathleen Blanco's spokeswoman, Denise Bottcher, said there currently aren't enough people retrieving bodies, which means the dead aren't being taken care of with appropriate "dignity."

Kenyon, an international firm that aided in body recovery after the 2001 terrorist attacks, is on retainer with FEMA to offer support during and after disasters, Zuniga and a Kenyon spokesman, Bill Berry, said.

Berry said his company would not "desert" southeast Louisiana, but he would not say how long Kenyon intended to continue working here or how many workers it would devote.

"We would continue to work as a courtesy because we would definitely not want our services to FEMA to end," he said. "We're going out of our way to not leave them in any kind of (bad) situation if they have other people that they're wanting to bring in."

Bottcher and Melancon said late Monday that the state was negotiating with the company to continue its work under state contract, which would have to be approved by FEMA for federal reimbursement.

Reaching Out to Shell and Motiva Employees

Our thoughts are with everyone hurt by Hurricane Katrina. Our greatest focus now is to assure the safety and welfare of our employees and their families in the devastated Gulf Coast communities.

If you are a Shell or Motiva employee affected by this natural disaster who has not already contacted your supervisor, we urge you to do so immediately. They can help as you try to manage both your personal and work-related needs.

Contact our emergency response lines at 1-866-745-5489 or 1-877-40-SHELL. They are open daily from 7 am to 10 pm Central Standard Time, including weekends. Or, if you can access the Web, send an email to katrinahelp@shell.com for Human Resources assistance.

These communication lines are dedicated to address your questions related to replacement or redirected payroll, disruptions in banking and mail services, loan assistance, prescription drugs, location-specific information and more. Also, go to www.shell.com/us to find other employee assistance information that could provide you some much-needed relief.

Officials: Rebuild should be locally based

Washington-run design a big worry

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Local residents and civic and political leaders, not Washington policy-makers, should take the lead in charting the future for New Orleans and the Gulf Coast region in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said Monday.

"We know how people like to have their houses built and where they want to stay," Landrieu said after a press conference with Louisiana clergy. "While we appreciate the help in rebuilding and expect attention and support unprecedented in the nation, it will be led by the people of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama."

Landrieu was reacting to what she said was a "general sense" that members of Congress already are hatching plans to redesign the city of New Orleans.

As the scope of destruction from the Aug. 29 storm has started to become clear, powerful lawmakers have all but insisted that New Orleans be fundamentally redeveloped to ensure it doesn't fall victim to future hurricanes. Unsaid, but implied, is the fact that Congress would resist approving the billions of dollars necessary to rebuild unless the plans meet with lawmakers' approval.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., has said it doesn't "make sense" to rebuild New Orleans the way it was before Katrina struck and that whole neighborhoods should be bulldozed. He also said it is important that as New Orleans is revived "we rebuild smart."

He didn't explain what he meant by "smart," but urban planners, architects and construction firms around the country already have begun to float ideas for mega-levees slicing through the city where submerged neighborhoods now stand, towering flood walls partitioning New Orleans to keep flooding in check and massive landfill operations to raise low-lying areas that frequently flood.

At the same time, lawmakers have discussed legislation to clamp down on the federal flood insurance program, which effectively would deny coverage to homes in frequently flooded areas; such legislation would require a large-scale redevelopment of the areas now under water in New Orleans and surrounding suburbs. One member suggested a large park in New Orleans to replace submerged neighborhoods; it would serve as both a memorial to flood victims and a buffer against future disasters.

This week, the Louisiana delegation hopes to unveil its package of legislation intended to put a local mark on the flurry of Katrina-related legislation in Congress.

Rep. Thomas Tancredo, R-Colo., went furthest in raising fears about who will sketch the plans for a rebuilt New Orleans. He urged Hastert and other Republican leaders last week not to give any rebuilding money to Louisiana officials because of what he called "mind-boggling incompetence" in dealing with the disaster and a "long history of public corruption." He has offered a resolution, so far without much support, to create a 15-member House commission to oversee the disbursal of $62.3 billion in disaster assistance already approved by Congress.

During a visit to New Orleans on Monday, President Bush gave support to the idea that the city should chart its own future.

"My attitude is this: The people of New Orleans can design the vision, the people of New Orleans can lay out what New Orleans ought to look like in the future, and the federal government will help," Bush said. "I think the best policy is one in which the federal government doesn't come down and say, 'Here's what your city will look like.' "

BUSH, from A-1

In addition, he said the view that race played a role in Katrina's destructive path or its aftermath was faulty.

"The storm didn't discriminate, and neither will the recovery effort," he said.

Bush flashed some irritation at the questions about Iraq and insinuations that grossly inadequate planning and initial action had characterized the federal response. Although Bush has acknowledged that mistakes were made and promised a full investigation, he declined to address the issue Monday.

"There will be plenty of time to play the blame game, and that's what you're trying to do," he told a television reporter.

The day began with a briefing on the USS Iwo Jima, the amphibious assault ship docked behind the Riverwalk mall that serves as the floating headquarters for the federal relief mission. After that, the elected officials, accompanied by military generals and Bush appointees, took a circuitous overland route to Royal Street behind the St. Louis Cathedral, where they boarded light mobile tactical vehicles to continue their odyssey.

After taking St. Ann Street and wrapping around the Municipal Auditorium, the trucks lumbered through a handful of 7th Ward neighborhoods, cut over across Esplanade Avenue, and then turned down Cleveland. Longtime members of the White House press corps said they could not remember the last time they saw the president riding in an open car in an American city, calling the exposed journey nearly unprecedented.

"Well, we don't normally cruise through American cities that have been virtually emptied of people," said one Secret Service agent in the entourage.

Greenish-brown floodwater, leaving behind inches of thick black slime as it recedes, still covered some of the area the president's truck toured, and he, Nagin and Blanco often had to duck to avoid overhead wires.

After that trip, Bush returned to the Iwo Jima, where he and the top Louisiana officials made another tour of the city in Marine One, the presidential helicopter. As the chopper banked over Metairie and flew low over Lakeview and Gentilly, sunlight bounced off whole swaths of the city that remain inundated. City Park, too, is a watery plain dotted with cypress and other trees.

Before heading off to the Mississippi Gulf Coast for the final leg of Bush's visit, the helicopters landed at a former ExxonMobil office building at the Chalmette Refinery. There Bush met for more than an hour with leaders of seven parishes. The conversation focused on specific environmental cleanup tasks, such as the oil spill in St. Bernard Parish that now covers 3.3 square miles, mosquito-spraying projects and the like, administration officials said.

Nagin, who seemed upbeat and warm while greeting Bush on Sunday, was considerably more glum Monday. He said his mood was not the product of dismay with the White House, however.

"I think the president is really focused on the job at hand, and they are really starting to move," Nagin said. "On almost anything that I want to do now, I get a nearly instantaneous response."

Nagin said there did not appear to be any fallout from his interview on Sept. 2, four days after Katrina struck, when he lambasted federal officials for dragging their feet.

"Not at all," he said. "In fact, the president told me he appreciated my frankness and bluntness, and I told him I was sorry if anything I said had been treated as disrespectful."

The enormity of the Katrina disaster continued to reveal itself layer by layer in disclosures that at another time would be stunning, but now are routine: The Department of Corrections acknowledged Monday that 14,000 local felons who are supposed to be checking in regularly with parole officers are scattered and unaccounted for.

By Monday the official death toll in metropolitan New Orleans stood at 279, said Melissa Walker, a spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Hospitals. Officials expect it to go much higher, even as it appeared more clear that the count would be well below Nagin's early estimate of 10,000 deaths.

That number did not include a utility worker from Kansas who was electrocuted Monday while trying to restore power to a neighborhood in Kenner.

At a remarkable event in Baton Rouge, meanwhile, the displaced St. Bernard Parish Council met for the first time in the chambers of the state House of Representatives. A crowd of 3,000 displaced constituents overflowed the room and the Senate chambers and filled nearby committee rooms watching on closed-circuit television.

Nowhere in the New Orleans area was there more concentrated damage than in St. Bernard. The low-lying parish of 67,000 flooded wall to wall. Hundreds of choked-up neighbors encountered one another for the first time since the storm, exchanged embraces and wept together.

The news they received was brutal: "You'll probably be able to return in two to three weeks, but plan not to live in St. Bernard until at least next summer," Councilman Craig Taffaro said.

Bush's visit came as the metropolitan area continued slowly to heal. Little signs continued to accumulate:

▶ Water continued to drain from the city.

▶ New Orleans police said they were prepared to issue passes to business owners permitting entry to the Central Business District.

▶ Entergy officials reported that about a third of their 790,000 customers around metropolitan New Orleans were back on the power grid.

▶ The Associated Press reported a plane carrying equipment to rebuild New Orleans' mobile phone networks took off from Sweden on Monday after waiting more than a week for a go-ahead from the United States. The shipment included network equipment donated by the Swedish cell phone giant LM Ericsson.

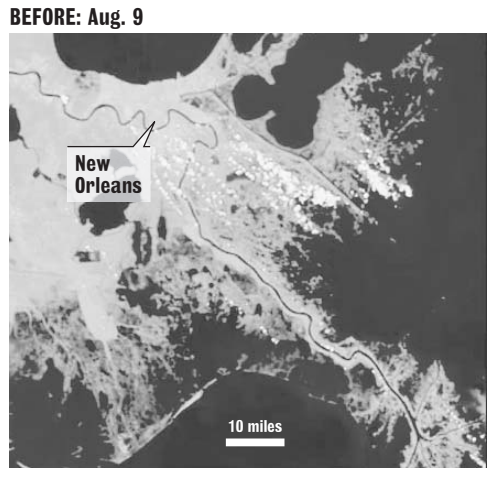
▶ The military was to begin widespread spraying for mosquitoes to keep down the threat of mosquito-borne disease, particularly St. Louis and equine encephalitis and the West Nile virus.

▶ The federal government is preparing to provide temporary housing for as many as 200,000 people displaced by Hurricane Katrina for the next three to five years, FEMA's housing area coordinator, Brad Gair, said Monday.

Stories continued to leak out of ordinary people rising to extraordinary heights of service during the storm. The stories of New Orleans' hospital employees have become one recurring source.

State authorities said Monday they removed the bodies of 45 patients who died at Memorial Medical Center's Baptist campus. Isolated by floodwaters, its generators dead and with looters trying to break in, the hospital's staff struggled to care for desperately ill patients, said Mary Carstens, a New Orleans resident who evacuated to the hospital with her husband.

Staff members ventilated patients manually and fanned them by hand with bits of cardboard, Carstens said.



As they died, their patients were set aside with the utmost care, she said.

MORE WATER, LESS LAND

BEFORE: Aug. 9

AFTER: Sept. 4

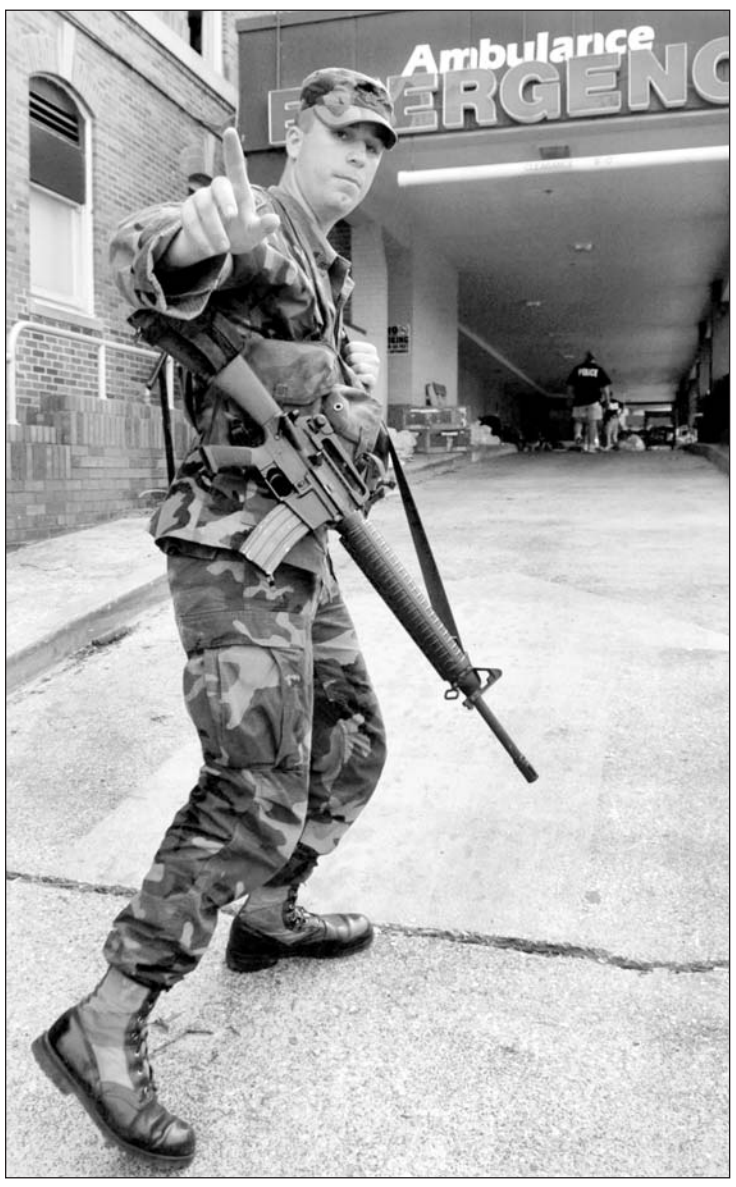
These NASA satellite images show the huge bite Hurricane Katrina took out of the Louisiana coastline.



It remains to be seen how Louisiana's wetlands will survive the storm. Much of the water is contaminated by spills from oil and gas installations and from vehicles trapped in the storm.

According to the U.S. Geological Survey, Louisiana has lost an average of 34 square miles of wetlands a year since the 1930s as efforts to control the Mississippi River kept its muddy waters out of the marshes, depriving them of needed infusions of sediment.

Forty-five patients died at Memorial Medical Center's Baptist campus during Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath, despite the best efforts of staff who struggled in nightmarish conditions to keep the frail and elderly alive as floodwaters rose and looters broke in.

"You could smell death," said Command Sgt. Major Earl Hackney of the Army National Guard. "But it wasn't as bad as the floodwaters."

Despite horrendous conditions, hospital staff struggled to accord dignity to the dead, moving at least a dozen bodies into a chapel and covering each with a blanket or placing them in body bags.

The bodies were not recovered from the hospital until days after the storm passed, officials said.

"Everything was done to protect the remains," Hackney said, adding that security workers remained until Thursday or Friday after the storm to watch over bodies that were scattered all over the hospital, including the top floors where some had been brought in the hope of rescue by helicopter.

The staff managed to evacuate 270 patients, he added.

Outside the abandoned hospital on Monday, pools of dark, fetid water had receded to reveal shards of broken glass. The ramp to the hospital's emergency room was littered with tell-tale signs of the tragedy: abandoned gurneys, surgical masks, latex gloves, bags of intravenous fluid and an oxygen tank inside an inflatable raft.

Department of Health and Hospitals spokesman Bob Johannessen confirmed the recovery of the 45 bodies at the hospital, not counting the ones in the morgue.

Bill Berry, a spokesman for Houston-based Kenyon Co., which is assisting with the recovery of bodies, said the largest numbers are being found in hospitals and nursing homes and that the death toll at Baptist is among the highest he has heard about.

The 317-bed Uptown hospital at South Claiborne and Napoleon avenues is owned by Tenet Healthcare Corp. Tenet spokesman Steven Campanini said that some of those found Sunday had died before the hurricane hit, and that none of the deaths resulted from lack of food, water or electricity to power medical equipment. Many of the patients were seriously ill, he said.

Mary Carstens, a New Orleans resident who evacuated to the hospital with her husband, a computer systems contractor there, described "heroic" efforts by staff to keep patients alive.

"Nurses stayed up all night, literally, fanning patients with paper or pieces of cardboard just to keep them cool. There were older people lying on the floor on mattresses or right on the floor. Others were manually giving them oxygen for hours at a time," she said, describing the resuscitation bags that were used after electrical ventilators stopped working.

Generators failed the day after the storm, leaving the building dark, hot and humid, said Carstens, who had arrived at Baptist with her husband on the eve of Katrina's landfall.

To reach helicopters landing on the roof of an adjacent parking garage, staff moved patients through a hole smashed in the side of the building to avoid floodwaters below, Carstens said.

Inside the garage, some patients were placed in the bed of a pickup truck and driven to the top of the garage to wait for helicopters.

Some of the dead later found on the hospital's upper floors apparently were taken there by staff hoping they would be rescued from the roof, Hackney said.

But the helicopters couldn't take people fast enough. On Wednesday, two brothers from Thibodaux arrived with an airboat to transport their mother, who was a patient in the hospital's hospice unit, Carstens said. The woman died before she reached dry ground.

But the brothers stayed anyway, evacuating several hundred staff, patients and others, four or five at a time, to a dry spot at Napoleon and St. Charles avenues.

By then, water and food were starting to run low, Carstens said.

Looters continued to break in, some to forage in the hospital's pharmacy.

"It was really hot, the bathrooms were overflowing," Carstens said. "People were going to the bathroom in the hallways."

Carstens, her husband and their dogs were rescued by boat on Thursday, three days after Katrina struck.

"As far as I'm concerned, the staff did whatever they could to get the living and the dead out of there," Hackney said. "They were truly heroic."

Parish President HENERY 'JUNIOR' RODRIGUEZ

Most homes in St. Bernard to be razed, residents told

Homeowners can't return for at least six months

By Paul Rioux
St. Bernard bureau

BATON ROUGE — Scattered across the Gulf South by Hurricane Katrina's near total devastation, about 3,000 St. Bernard Parish residents filled the Louisiana Capitol on Monday for a town-hall meeting marked by tearful reunions and a no-punches-pulled assessment of the damage.

Officials said that virtually all of the parish's 27,600 houses will have to be bulldozed and that it will be more than six months before the lucky few whose homes can be repaired are allowed to return.

About 400 people packed the House chamber, while thousands more piled into the Senate chamber and five large meeting rooms equipped with video or audio feeds. Others spilled into the hallways, catching bits and pieces as parish officials painted a bleak picture of what remains of their homes.

"I'm not going to sugarcoat it for you," Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez said. "I hope all of you remember St. Bernard because when you go back, you aren't going to recognize it."

Shrieking winds, tornadoes and a 20-foot storm surge swamped St. Bernard on Aug. 29, flooding virtually every house and washing away entire villages in the parish's eastern half.

Parish Council members took turns giving detailed descriptions of the storm damage in their districts. In Arabi, the surge lifted at least 45 homes off their foundations, depositing one on Judge Perez Drive. In Violet and Poydras, the water reached the gutters of one-story homes. It was even higher in the central parts of the parish. And of the hundreds of homes and camps in communities from Reggio to Delacroix, only 16 homes are left standing.

Despite the grim assessment, many residents said the meeting filled them with hope for the parish's rebirth.

"We heard so many rumors about people who didn't make it that it's good to see them in the flesh and blood," said Meraux resident Sheila Carlin, who now lives in a camper in Walker.

While some rumors were put to rest, many questions remained about when residents will be allowed to return to retrieve what little the storm did not destroy.

Officials said some residents might be able to return to assess damage in Arabi and parts of Chalmette in two or three weeks. But Rodriguez warned people about exposure to toxic chemicals and mold, telling residents to bring rubber gloves, protective masks and rubber boots, and to leave children behind.

Residents in other areas of the parish would be allowed later, officials said, as part of a staggered re-entry plan that they expect to announce in a few weeks. Parish officials tried to prepare returning residents for what they will see.

"Some of you are going to find that your home isn't there anymore," Parish Council Chairman Joey DiFatta said. "Others are going to be wondering, 'How did the damn refrigerator get in the bedroom when we could barely get it in the house when we bought it?'"

The event became an emotional reunion for relatives, friends and neighbors who had not seen each other since they evacuated before the Aug. 29 storm. DiFatta's voice cracked as he opened his remarks by asking his son, whom he had not seen since before the storm, to look for him.

As she walked to the Capitol, Carol Licciardi of Chalmette raced through traffic on Third Street to wrap her arms around Gursline Roger, a fellow parishioner from St. Mark Catholic Church in Chalmette.

"I was worried I'd never see my church friends again," Licciardi said after releasing Roger from a 15-second bear hug. "I couldn't stop screaming when I saw her, but I better get my emotions under control. I don't want to survive the hurricane and then get hit by a car."

State Sen. Walter Boasso, R-Chalmette, urged the crowd to sign a petition calling on the state Legislature to shut down the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet, a waterway to the north and east of St. Bernard that topped levees during the storm.

"If we didn't have MR-GO, we would have had some problems, but we wouldn't have had 30,000 homes flooded," he said.

His statement drew loud applause from the crowd, but other officials said there was no way to prevent much of the damage caused by the powerful Category 4 hurricane.

"There are no levees that could have protected us from Hurricane Katrina," Rodriguez said. "That was the perfect storm."

Residents flooded officials with questions ranging from the status of their jobs to how to deal with insurance companies and creditors, including mortgage lenders.

U.S. Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, said he is cosponsoring a bill with U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., to suspend mortgage payments on homes destroyed by the storm. Details were unavailable Monday.

Parish officials said they also are meeting daily with FEMA officials to discuss temporary housing and long-range plans for rebuilding the parish. But Parish Councilman Craig Taffaro cautioned that residents should plan on living elsewhere until at least next summer.

That's much longer than most residents expected to be out of St. Bernard. Mary Ann Francingues, a culinary arts teacher at Andrew Jackson Fundamental Magnet School in Chalmette, said when she evacuated before the storm she assumed she would return in a day or two.

"It's hard to think about not going home for months, but there's a camaraderie here. We're crying and laughing together," she said after signing into an e-mail and phone list to keep track of displaced residents.

"I don't have any doubt that the parish will be rebuilt," Francingues said. "My concern is whether it will be in my lifetime."

Water level dropping, but plenty remains

Gentilly, Lakeview still pretty wet

By James Varney, Gordon Russell and Gwen Filosa
Staff writers

Despite signs the water is receding in New Orleans, much of the city remained flooded Monday afternoon.

The specifics of how high the water is in certain neighborhoods, or which neighborhoods might have dried out since Hurricane Katrina tore into the city on Aug. 29, remain imprecise.

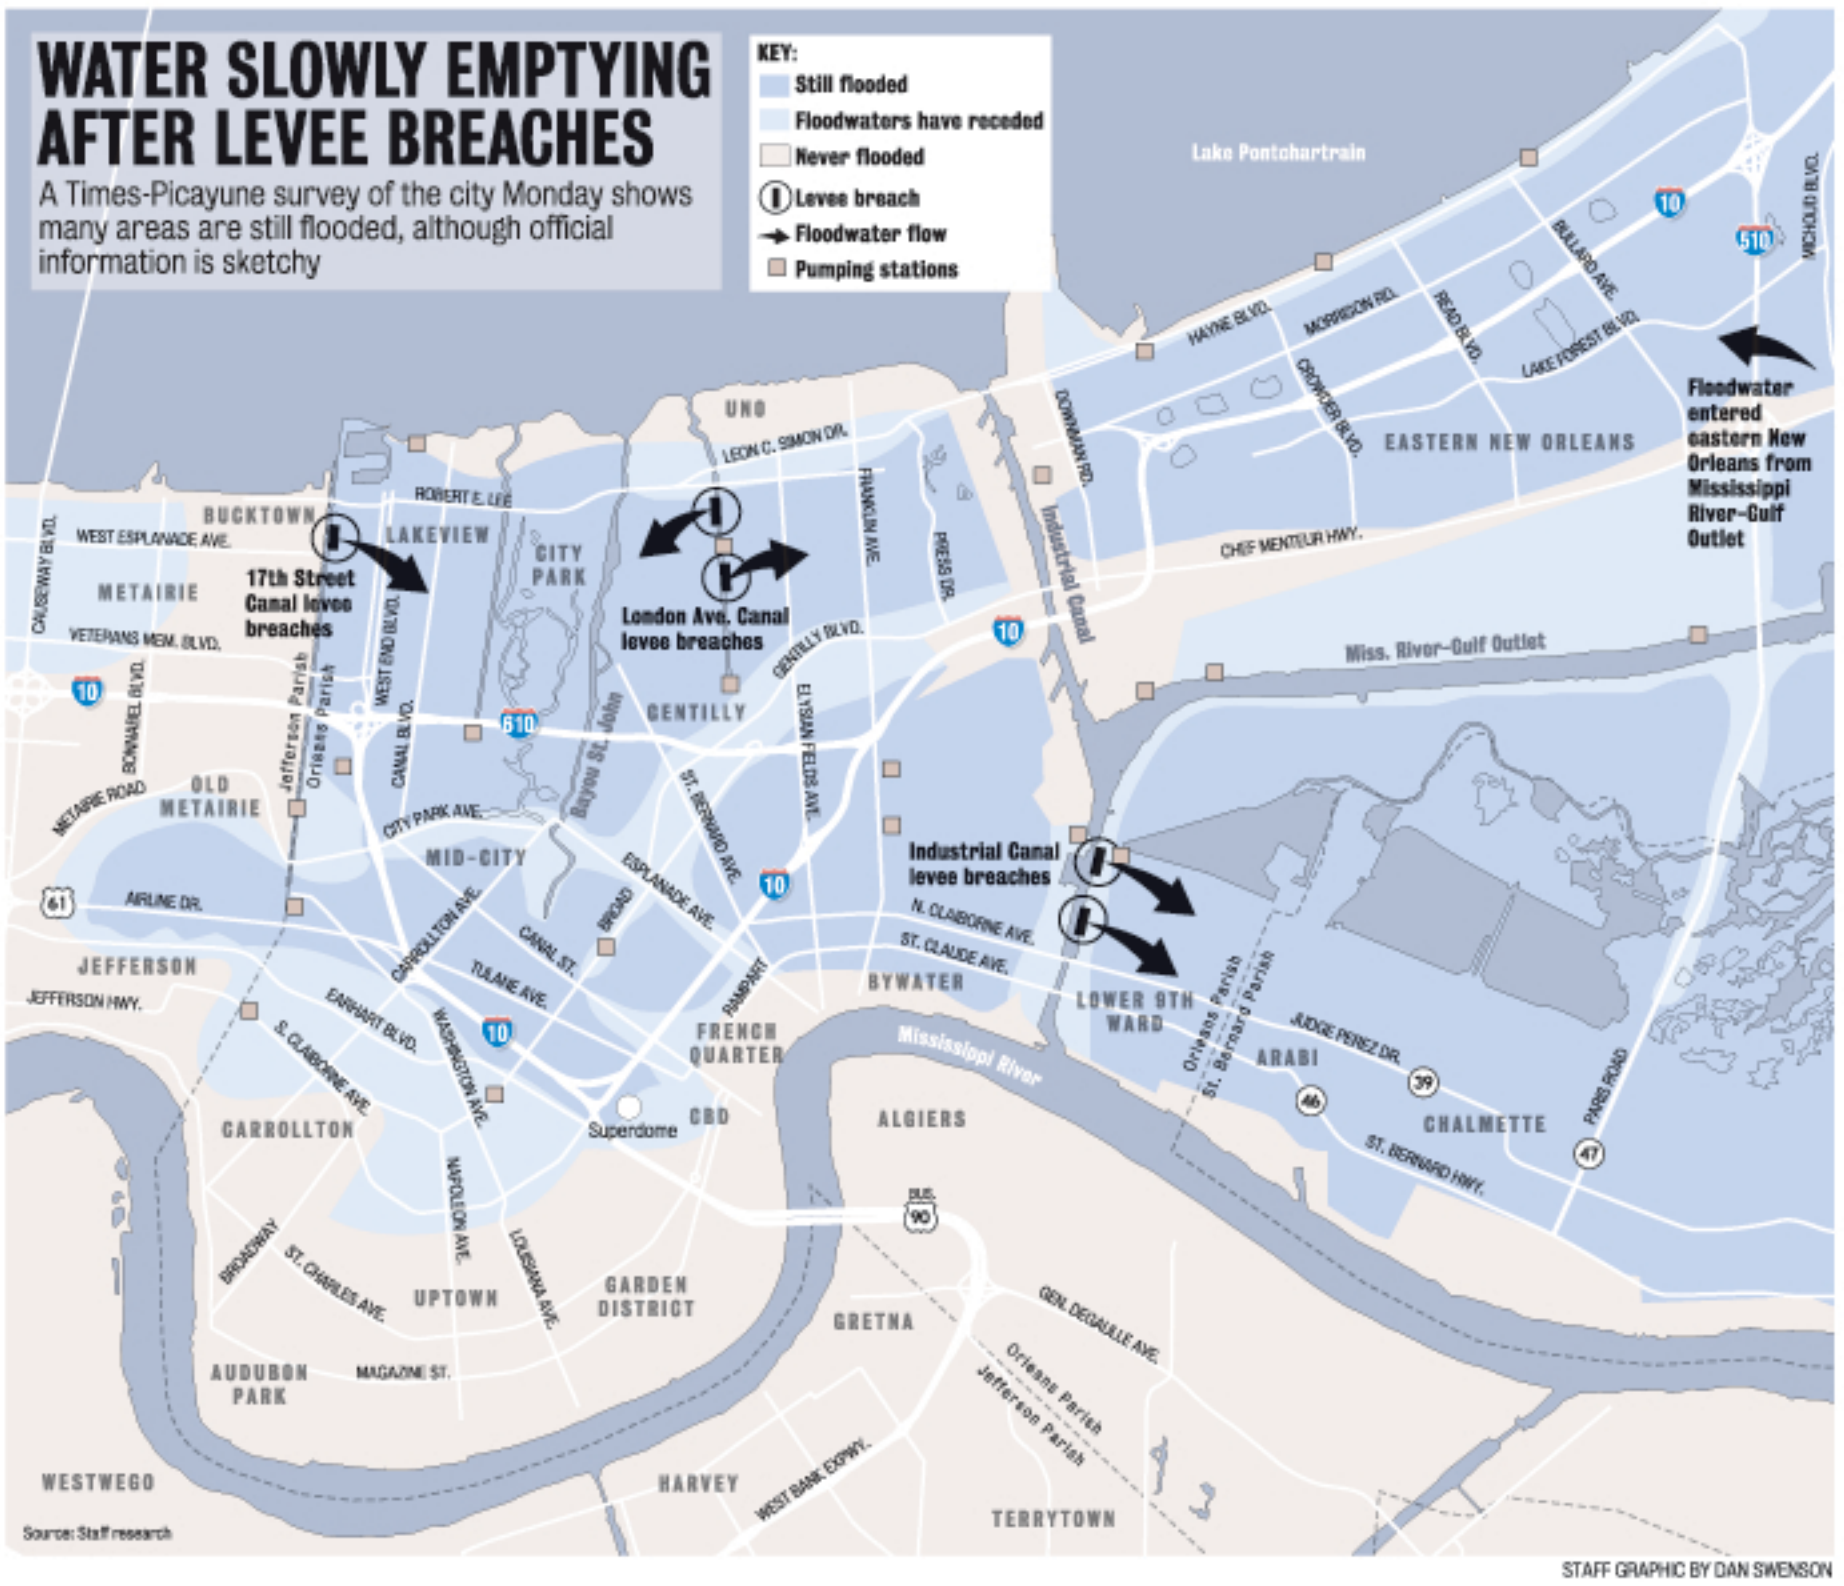
The New Orleans Sewerage & Water Board, faced with the greatest crisis in city history and with tens of thousands of residents desperate for information, has been unable to provide detailed updates.

Nevertheless, a ground survey by The Times-Picayune, coupled with an aerial tour of the city by President Bush, Gov. Kathleen Blanco and Mayor Ray Nagin in the Marine One helicopter early in the day, showed a mix of progress and seemingly intractable floodwaters.

On the bright side, both the New Orleans Country Club and Metairie Country Club now have visible golf courses, albeit in a deathly mix of brown and wheat tones that may spell long-term problems. Cars could be seen moving near the lake into eastern New Orleans. And the route to Chalmette along St. Claude Avenue now can be made in a compact car.

Yet much of Gentilly, for example, remains under water, as do swaths of Lakeview, Mid-City, and Uptown neighborhoods on the lake side of St. Charles Avenue. City landmarks like the Criminal Court Building on the corner of Tulane and Broad remain inaccessible by foot.

Along Veterans Memorial Boulevard near the Jefferson Parish line, it is clear that water levels have dropped by as much as 5 feet, although most houses in Lakeview still remain encircled by water. Most of Broadmoor, along with the area around Xavier University and Gert Town, has drained as well, with formerly flooded Napoleon Avenue dry until its terminus at Broad Street.



Much of Mid-City and the 7th Ward are now unwatered also. Apart from the portion around the criminal justice center, Broad Street, for the most part, is dry. The drying was aided in part perhaps by the activation late Sunday of one pump at the London Avenue Pumping Station No. 3. The pump was shut down Monday, however, after water sent by the pumps began pouring over sandbags placed in one of the breaches in the London Avenue Canal, according to those at the pumping station.

Patrols run by the military and the New Orleans Police Department push farther out each day. The city's hospital complexes around the Central Business District and the elevated Interstate 10 expressway, for so long provinces explored only by kayakers, are now dry.

Everywhere, however, the odor and the slime left by floodwaters seasoned for weeks with bloated corpses, human waste, debris, and untold quantities of various chemicals hangs over the city like a sword.

Huge parts of eastern New Orleans were still badly flooded Monday, with Read Boulevard at Dwyer Road a virtual lake. Water on Read was at least 4 feet deep in some spots, swallowing up entry to Joe Brown Memorial Park, Marion Abramson Senior High School and the 7th District Police station.

In scores of neighborhoods off Chef Menteur Highway, Downman Road and Hayne Boulevard – suburban enclaves dotted with one-story ranch-style houses – water had receded by four feet, according to dirty watermarks lining the homes, mostly beneath the front windows.

Initial data: 'catastrophic structural failure' at root

BREACH, from A-1

"That suggests there may be something about floodwalls that makes them more susceptible to failure. Did (the storm) exceed design conditions? What were the conditions? What about the construction?"

Ivor Van Heerden, who uses computer models to study storm-surge dynamics for the LSU Hurricane Center, has said that fragmentary initial data indicate that Katrina's storm-surge heights in Lake Pontchartrain would not have been high enough to top the canal walls and that a "catastrophic structural failure" occurred in the floodwalls.

Corps project manager Al Naomi said that the Corps' working theory is that the floodwalls were well-constructed, but once topped they gave way after water scoured their interior sides, wearing away their earth-packed bases. But he said some other problem could have caused the breaches.

"They could have been overtopped. There could have been some structural failure. They could have been impacted by some type of debris," Naomi said. "I don't think it's right to make some type of judgment now. It's like presuming the reason for a plane crash without recovering the black box."

Officials long had warned about the danger of levees being topped by high water from a storm surge. Absent topping, floodwalls are supposed to remain intact.

The floodwalls lining New Orleans canals consist of concrete sections attached to steel sheet pile drilled deep into the earth, fortified by a concrete and earthen base. The sections are joined with a flexible, waterproof substance.

Floodwalls were breached in the 17th Street Canal, at two places in the London Avenue Canal, and at two places in the Industrial Canal, Suhayda said. Naomi said last week that one of the Industrial Canal breaches likely was caused by a loose barge that broke through it.

Suhayda said that his inspection of the debris from the 17th Street Canal breach suggests the wall simply gave way. "It looks to have been laterally pushed, not scoured in back with dirt being removed in pieces," he said. "You can see levee material, some distance pushed inside the floodwall area, like a bulldozer pushed it."

He suggested that because the walls failed in a few spots, the flaw may not be in the design but in the construction or materials.

"Those sections in the rest of the wall should have been subjected to the same forces as that section that failed," he said. "Why did one side fail, not the other side?"

Drainage canals typically are lined with floodwalls instead of the wider earthen levees that protect the lakefront because of a lack of space, engineers say.

"It's a right-of-way issue," Naomi said. "Usually, there are homes right up against the canal. You have to relocate five miles of homes (to build a levee), or you can build a floodwall."

Constructing a more expensive earthen levee also would require building farther out into the canal itself, reducing the size of the canal – and the volume of water it could handle.

Naomi said that an earthen levee also could have been breached if the surge had pushed water over the top. "A levee failure might be more gradual than with a floodwall," he said. "It means you may have flooded a little slower."

The central question for engineers investigating the breaches will be whether the floodwalls were topped – and that's still unclear.

The levee system, floodwalls included, is designed to protect against an average storm surge of 11.5 feet above sea level. The Corps adds several more feet of "freeboard" to account for waves and other dynamics.

Naomi said the Industrial Canal floodwalls were topped by water coming in from the east. But scientists don't yet know exactly whether Katrina's Lake Pontchartrain surge was high enough to go over the wall in the two other canals.

Many storm surge gauges stopped functioning during the storm, LSU climatologist Barry Keim, though initial data point to a mid-lake height of eight or nine feet. Heights typically are higher at the Lakefront area because wind pushes water higher against the levees.

Suhayda said the debris line on the lakefront levee adjacent to the canal was "several feet" below the top. The levees are 17 or 18 feet high in that area. The canal levees, however, average only 14 feet. Storm surges have waves and other dynamics that push water still higher than the average height.

"There are big implications for as little as a one-foot change in elevation" of the storm surge, Suhayda said.

If the water did not top the levees, the breaches could prove more mysterious. Typically, the pounding of wave action would be the most likely way to cause a breach, scientists say. But there isn't much wave action in canals.

"Waves constantly breaking on the structure start to erode it and make it become unstable," said LSU coastal geologist Greg Stone, who studies storm-surge dynamics. "But I don't think that was a major factor in the canals. You just don't have the (open area) to allow wave growth to occur."

URS

To Our Employees, Clients and Friends

We are deeply saddened by the destructive effects of Hurricane Katrina on Gulf Coast residents and their communities. With more than 700 employees in offices directly impacted by this catastrophe, URS has been working vigorously to determine the safety and welfare of our people and their families.

In the storm's aftermath, we activated a response team to reach out to all affected employees and developed a plan that is enabling us to provide temporary assistance to meet their needs.

Many of our Metairie and New Orleans employees have temporarily relocated to our Baton Rouge office, which is fully functional and ready to serve our clients in any way. We are working closely with numerous government agencies and have mobilized more than 1,100 employees to assist in the assessment of damage and the development of plans to rebuild New Orleans and the Gulf Coast region.

URS is committed to helping our community meet the challenges ahead, and our thoughts and prayers are with everyone affected by this event.

FEMA plans temporary housing for 200,000

Communities could be bigger than most La. towns

By Keith Darcé
Business writer

In an unprecedented undertaking, the federal government is preparing to provide temporary housing for as many as 200,000 people displaced by Hurricane Katrina for the next three to five years, Federal Emergency Management Agency's Housing Area Coordinator Brad Gair said Monday.

Work on the first of what will be dozens of mobile home communities around Louisiana will begin this week in the Baton Rouge area, he said.

"It may not be quite on the scale of building the pyramids, but it's close," Gair said. "This is big. We've never done anything like this."

He would not say where the new communities would be sited, but said most would be in Louisiana.

In a few cases, the effort will create new towns larger than most towns in the state. The largest evacuee communities could house as many as 25,000 mobile homes and come with their own security force, utilities, government services and even schools.

Smaller clusters of trailers will blend in with surrounding communities.

FEMA is first targeting state parks, recreational vehicle facilities and vacant parcels of all sizes, Gair said. "We're prepared to set up temporary housing anywhere in the state."

Gair couldn't say how much the housing effort will cost taxpayers.

"This is going to be expensive – clearly the most expensive housing situation that we have ever been involved in," he said.

The agency's main goal is to move people into better accommodations than they're in now. "We are not planning any tent cities for victims," he said.

The government housing couldn't come any sooner for Christina Sentmore.

The pregnant mother of three has lived in a shelter in West Baton Rouge Parish since evacuating her home on St. Ferdinand Street in New Orleans two weeks ago. She hasn't been able to find an apartment or house in the Baton Rouge area.

Sentmore, who is due to give birth any day, doesn't want to bring a newborn child into a shelter that could be filled with germs and illness.

"You don't know what other people might have," she said Monday afternoon.

FEMA has gathered more than 6,000 trailers and mobile homes in Louisiana and the agency has contracts with manufacturers to produce up to 500 units each day, Gair said. Some trailers and mobile homes may be purchased from retailers. "We've ordered well over 100,000" units thus far, he said.

The units will be offered first to people still in shelters, he said. But they will be available to those who can't find housing. State officials will play a primary role in distributing the units.

Initially, the temporary communities will be located throughout the state, wherever land and services are available, Gair said. Over time, evacuees will be moved closer to their original homes, which could mean some evacuees moving again before landing in a permanent house.

The water and sewer pipes, roads and electrical wires required for the temporary communities should serve as incentives for cities throughout the state to welcome the new neighborhoods, Gair said. "Many parishes already have plans for future development. This could help get infrastructure that they wanted anyway."

Maravich center's stint as hospital is over

By John Pope
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — After 10 days and 6,000 patients, the 800-bed field hospital at the Pete Maravich Assembly Center has closed.

Even though the basketball arena at LSU was a major destination for ambulances and helicopters delivering critically ill people from areas ravaged by Hurricane Katrina, it needed to be closed as quickly as possible because the facility wasn't sanitary enough to be a long-term hospital, said Dr. Chris Trevino, the medical director.

"This is not a hospital," he said. "There are lots of federal laws and regulations that were being broken right and left, but that's OK if it's not for a long time. That was why we shut it down as quickly as we could."

The center, which has been described as one of the biggest facilities of its kind ever created, stopped treating patients Wednesday.

St. John welcomes 956 displaced students

District is first in area to reopen after storm

By John John Williams IV

STAFF PHOTO BY BRETT DUKE

Eighth-graders Miriam Martinez and Isheika Riley share a math book at Lake Pontchartrain Elementary School in LaPlace, which has taken in many of the 956 students who had registered in St. John the Baptist Parish public schools through Monday.

Diamond Nicholson, a spunky 11-year-old from Gentilly, was set to begin her reign as head cheerleader at Parkview Academy in New Orleans this school year.

But Hurricane Katrina changed those plans Aug. 29.

In one swipe, the storm flooded her family's home, ended the school year in New Orleans and separated Diamond from her friends. On Monday, she found herself as the odd kid out when she entered the unfamiliar halls of Lake Pontchartrain Elementary school in LaPlace.

Surprisingly Diamond, who is living now with her aunt in LaPlace, was upbeat.

"I have a nice teacher and I feel comfortable," she said.

And she plans to try out for the cheerleading squad.

The scene was played out many times Monday at St. John the Baptist Parish schools, as the district became the first in the metro area to reopen after Hurricane Katrina.

With schools in many districts destroyed or still sitting in floodwater, students have had to look elsewhere in metro New Orleans and beyond. Statewide, about 135,000 students were displaced by the storm. St. John, so close to New Orleans, yet suffering much less damage, has become a hot spot.

On Friday, St. John district officials said 901 new students had signed up for classes. Another 55 registered Monday, parish schools superintendent Michael Coburn said.

Lake Pontchartrain received many of those new students. Also seeing substantial growth were LaPlace Elementary, East St. John Elementary and East St. John High School. Private schools in the parish have grown by 1,000 students.

"It's wild over here; we have students all over,'' said Ann LaBorde, the district's executive director of legal services and personnel. "Every home is doubled up."

Diamond's new classmate Todd Ferniz was in the process of running for student council at Belle Chasse Middle School in Plaquemines Parish. But, like Diamond, he now has to start the process all over.

"Yesterday was my best friend's birthday,'' he said. "I guess I'll have to make new friends."

Barely looking at his classmates, Todd walked to an empty chair in the back of the classroom and sat down.

Joshua Euper, Todd's new teacher, said many of the displaced students have been shy.

"It takes time for people who are even native to the area to adjust," Euper explained. "I'm just trying to make them feel welcome."

Twelve of the 20 students in Euper's social studies class were displaced students from other parishes.

"Not all are here,'' Euper said. "There are more to come."

Coburn said if the total number of new students reaches 1,000, the district will need to bring in portable classrooms to accommodate the surge.

Coburn said he has been in contact with state education Superintendent Cecil Picard.

"He said, 'Sign the students up and there will be funding,'" Coburn said. "It's going to all work out."

St. John has also received more than 100 applications from people seeking jobs ranging from principal to maintenance worker.

"For the first time we have bus drivers. We're thrilled,'' LaBorde said.

One of those lucky enough to get hired is Nick Mitchell, who was hired as a special education teacher at Lake Pontchartrain. He had taught at Dwight Eisenhower Elementary in New Orleans and applied to St. John when Orleans Parish announced schools would be closed for the remainder of the school year.

"I wanted to go back to work," said Mitchell, one of seven new teachers at Lake Pontchartrain. "I knew it wouldn't happen in New Orleans. I'm just thankful."

Mitchell said he has spoken to a couple of co-workers who have found jobs in Baton Rouge and Texas.

"They're probably there for good," he said.

St. Tammany's hardest-hit schools may not reopen

Local officials waiting on damage estimates

By Christine Harvey
St. Tammany bureau

The Louisiana Department of Education is reporting that a handful of St. Tammany Parish's most badly damaged public schools will be unable to reopen, though school officials said Monday that they are waiting for an assessment of damages to those schools to be completed before they are comfortable making such a determination.

Though most of the parish's 52 schools received some form of damage, including damage to roofs, gutters and windows, as a result of Hurricane Katrina, five in Slidell bore the brunt of the storm's winds and water.

Initial reports indicate that Salmen High and St. Tammany Junior High sustained the most severe damage, including significant flooding and downed trees. In addition, Slidell Pathways had considerable water damage, while Brock and Abney, both elementary schools, had water damage as well as damage to their roofs.

Linda Roan, the system's spokeswoman, could not confirm Monday whether the system plans to shutter the five schools in question, saying that Superintendent Gayle Sloan will make that decision once the damage assessments are complete. Sloan said last week that she hopes to begin classes in St. Tammany on Oct. 3.

In the meantime, six of the parish's Catholic schools are set to reopen Monday. They are Mary, Queen of Peace, in Mandeville; Pope John Paul II, in Slidell; and St. Paul's School, St. Peter School and St. Scholastica Academy, all in Covington. St. Margaret Mary in Slidell also plans to reopen and will work in conjunction with Our Lady of Lourdes School, which was badly damaged during the storm, to accommodate the needs of those students. Our Lady of the Lake School in Mandeville will reopen by Oct. 3, at the latest.

None of the Catholic schools will have bus service until the public schools reopen.

The hurricane forced the public school system to begin devising contingency plans for student enrollment with the idea in mind that some schools may be unable to reopen early next month.

Sloan said she hopes to know the results of inspections at the schools in the next week or so. If certain schools are unable to reopen, she said, the system could open temporary school sites in the parish, incorporate affected students into other parish schools or institute a system of "platooning," in which some students attend school in the morning and others in the afternoon on the same campus.

"We really think it's important to get the schools up and running as soon as possible,'' Sloan said.

She is also working on a plan to salvage the system's athletic programs, including football, volleyball, cross country and swimming, which take place in the fall.

Sloan said she believes students can make up the 24 or so days that they have missed as a result of the hurricane by attending classes during holiday periods. If so, summer vacation should be unaffected, as would graduation dates.

The system has received a number of calls from evacuees requesting placement in the system when school reopens, Roan said. Officials have yet to assess how many students may need placement, though they expect to begin looking at those inquiries this week.

"We're going to welcome students who have been displaced," Roan said.

"We're going to fold them into the student bodies and give them the best education we can."

System administrators, principals, and members of the maintenance and custodial staff returned to work Friday, meeting with Sloan to discuss the best way to get the system ready for the start of school. Sloan asked each principal to create a checklist of needs at the schools and take photographs of the damage to their schools.

Hundreds of troops from the National Guard and the Marine Corps are assisting the system with its cleanup effort, Roan said. She added that once cleanup is completed at some schools, employees will be asked to help at others.

About half of the system's schools had power restored as of Friday, with assurances from CLECO that returning power to the remaining schools is a priority, Roan said.

"I think we came out pretty well, considering,'' she said. "We've got our work cut out for us."

Some of eastern N.O. still underwater

Water marks, vandalism, sludge tell tale of devastation

By Gwen Filosa and Trymaine Lee
Staff writers

Vast stretches of eastern New Orleans remained flooded and filthy Monday, two weeks after Hurricane Katrina tore through the area.

Read Boulevard at Dwyer Road was under at least four feet of water in some places, marooning the 7th District Police Station, the 4th District Fire Department, Marion Abramson Senior High School and Joe Brown Memorial Park.

Access required a boat – and the will to risk exposure to probably toxic water, and the black-brown sludge beneath it.

At about 4 p.m., a fishing boat carrying contract-workers in blue decontamination suits dragged a second boat holding three corpses. The bodies were bloated and draped in black plastic.

The men on the boats would answer few questions, but one said they came from a nearby hospital. "Get out of there," one boater yelled at a photographer and a cameraman viewing the scene.

"Respect the dead!"

Abramson High, like much of the east, was a swampy mess filled with sludge — and eerie remnants of daily life before the hurricane.

From a blown-out window in Mr. Gibbs 10th-grade civics class, nearly a dozen not-so-long-forgotten essays clung to the walls, the only artifacts not wet or under water.

Bright red A's stood boldly against the mildewing white-lined papers, along with the names of the students who wrote them: Yanna Davis, Demetria Myers, Lesha Bartholomew.

Soaked textbooks littered the classroom, the halls and most corridors.

A toppled metal detector lay in the mess.

The school's gym, cafeteria and auditorium were empty. A water mark on the first-floor auditorium entrance showed that the building had flooded to a depth of at least six feet. In the front parking lot, about 30 cars were tossed about like Tonka toys, some having bashed into others.

Upstairs, two dead white rats lay in a science lab sink, and soggy pieces of ceiling left a trail through the hallways. The dank smell of decay wafted through the air, despite the sunlight splashing through shattered windows.

Contradicting rumors that hundreds of evacuees poured into the school for shelter, only to meet a watery grave, a stroll through the school on Monday revealed no corpses.

Outside the school's gates, in the lake that once was Read Boulevard, signs tilted like cattails in the still high, but receding, water.

For about 500 yards in each direction, there was nothing but water. Buildings along the near horizon were set in a shadowy haze, their business wrecked and strewn with rubble.

Chef Menteur Highway was dry, but here, too, businesses were ruined, as far as the eye could see, and on residential lots, religious statuary and yard ornaments were cracked or headless.

"It was like a bomb blew it open," moving company manager Billy James, 43, said. "The whole place is shot. I lost cars, seven or eight trucks," he said of the firm, called The Movers. "We're starting from scratch. We'll probably have to expand to the north shore or Baton Rouge."

James conceded that hundreds of customers probably lost their belongings in the trashed warehouse at 8200 Chef Menteur. "They may not want it," James said of the stored goods. Most of his 50 employees were safe and accounted for, he said – except one man, Ray, whose last name temporarily had slipped James' mind.

Ray was believed to have ended up at the Houston Astrodome. "They scooped him up on the street down here," company driver Sidney Byrd, 53, said.

"He wasn't expecting to go to Houston," said James, cracking a smile.

"He wasn't happy about that. He'll be calling for a bus ticket."

James said the owner of the business wants to keep The Movers going, but it's not possible in New Orleans right now.

The company parking lot showed signs of looting. Someone tried to rip off the steering wheel of one big truck, leaving a burst of exposed wires below the dash. The giant padlock on the warehouse was intact, but someone managed to take off the bolts and smaller lock on the other side to get inside.

Though mostly abandoned to U.S. Army soldiers and some random dogs, the east was not entirely without signs of life on Monday.

Orlando Pena Morales, 59, a Cuban immigrant who moved to the region in 1979, rode out the storm in his trailer off Chef Menteur.

Some mobile homes in the trailer park, behind Tokyo Modeling in the 7700 block, were on their sides and Morales' belongings were ruined. He and his neighbor had painted the parking lot with an appeal for food and water.

A carpenter by trade, Morales laughed as he recalled his decision to stay through the storm. "I didn't want to go anywhere. I don't' want to go anywhere. I like New Orleans. I don't know why. You drink the Mississippi River."

Morales said the floodwaters at one point rose up to his neck. "What am I gonna do?" he said.

Next door, at the Sugar Bowl, floors and bowling lanes had buckled and bowling balls littering the sidewalk. Daylight came in through the wall that once backed the pinsetting equipment. A video poker machine looked as if it had been pummeled and pushed onto its side.

At Chef and Downman, as in neighborhoods all across eastern New Orleans, the floods had receded Monday to reveal bleached-brown grass and a coating of scum. Many a ranch-style, one-story home was spray-painted with zeros, signaling that the place had been searched and that no one was inside, dead or alive.

Jeff works to get back to business

Firms allowed in to begin cleanup

By Rob Nelson
Staff writer

Tossing ruined ceiling tiles into the trash amid the pungent smell of mildew and mold, Dave Beard had a simple reason for returning to his debris-ridden workplace Monday.

"I've got to make a living," said Beard, who works for Pemco, a Harvey company that builds power plants for the oil and gas industry. "The sooner we get back on our feet, the sooner we can make some money."

Businesses throughout Jefferson Parish made a firm push to resume commerce on Monday, the first day leaders officially allowed company owners and some of their employees back in the parish in an effort dubbed Operation Jumpstart Jefferson.

Beard endured miles of heavy traffic along U.S. 90 to return to Jefferson on Monday morning. Annoyed by officials' efforts to keep him out because he lives in LaPlace and had no proof of his Jefferson work address, Beard said he drove around the barricade and made his way to work. There, he found a large hole in the second-story roof, spilling water, debris and mold throughout the building.

Meanwhile, the smell of spoiled chicken wafted through the World of Wings restaurant in the 1600 block of Manhattan Boulevard in Harvey. Co-owners and brothers Kerry Nichols and Koy Nichols spent the day chucking out the chickens and cleaning the store, eyeing a reopening later this month.

Koy Nichols praised the speed of Jefferson's rebuilding. "The recovery has been faster than we thought," he said. He lamented, however, the financial difficulty for some of his workers.

"The worst part is that the employees take the hardest hit," he said, adding that his staff depends heavily on tips and hourly wages.

Several business managers said they are still searching for their workers, many of whom fled Hurricane Katrina and are now scattered throughout the country.

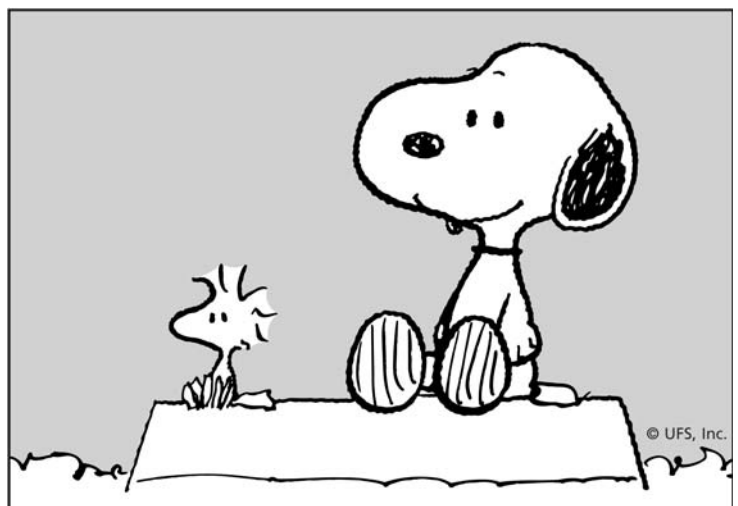
At the Heritage Plaza office building in Metairie, Roddy Orgeron, owner of a Mandeville computer consulting company, and two of his buddies hauled several computers and boxes of equipment down 16 flights of stairs. Orgeron's client asked him to retrieve computers from the office, which had sustained roof and water damage, Orgeron said.

With sweat pouring through his shirt in the powerless building, Orgeron said the insurance company badly needed their computer files. "When everything is flooded, you do what you have to do," he said. "They needed these as soon as possible."

Down the road, in the 3500 block of Veterans Boulevard in Metairie, Sherry Perkins and her husband, Ed Perkins, spent the day cleaning out one branch of their restaurant, Lee's Original New Orleans Hamburgers.

While their Metairie home remains flooded, the couple, who sent their children out of town for school, will live in an apartment above the restaurant.

Luckily, the business suffered little damage, Sherry Perkins said. "This is home," she said. "This is our life, these two businesses. As soon as (Sheriff) Harry Lee says Jefferson is unlocked for business, we're ready."



In the meantime, the couple continues to commute from Oakdale, a four-hour haul from Metairie.

At Dorignac's Food Center in Metairie, Scott Miller, director of operations, said rainwater spilled into the store from a roof tear, but several workers returned to aid with cleanup.

The damage "wasn't as bad as we thought, and it wasn't as good as we thought," he said, saying the 40-year-old store could reopen late next week. In red spray paint, Miller wrote on plywood covering the store's front windows: "Opening Soon!!"

While stores planned reopenings, several banks and savings associations swung their doors open Monday. At a Hibernia branch in the Marrero Shopping Center, Mary Meyers, 68, said she was the first in line at the bank at 8:30 a.m., more than two hours before it opened.

With two armed soldiers guarding the door and about 40 people in line about 11 a.m., Meyers said she needed some of her Social Security money to pay bills. Surprisingly upbeat, Meyers said she remains confident in the metro area's upturn. "It'll come back," she said. "It'll bounce back. New Orleans will bounce back, too."

Aaron Broussard was right

Thank you, Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard, for saving Jefferson Parish. You are a hero. The Times-Picayune owes you a Page 1 apology for ridiculing you as an alarmist just three weeks before Hurricane Katrina.

As for New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, he is the goat. Assuming he has no responsibility for the 17th Street Canal, it still takes little forethought to realize that the citizens in the Superdome would need food, water, portable toilets and security. This newspaper has continuously praised Mayor Nagin during his tenure. His only accomplishment thus far is that he is perceived as honest. An honest fool is no match for a hurricane. The truth is he has been learning on the job and failing.

It is not too early to assess responsibility and demand accountability. In fact, it is two weeks too late.

Nobody's home

A front-page photo in the Washington Post Friday shows agents breaking down the door to a locked house in New Orleans, looking for survivors. Many people locked their doors and evacuated. How do we communicate to the rescue forces that we don't want them to break our doors down and expose our homes to the thugs?

I shared this article with my family, which is spread out all over the United States because of the storm. I am writing for all of them and for others in the same situation. The last thing any of them needs is a broken-down door exposing their home. The Times-Picayune has access to the officials. I am asking for your help to set up a Web page or phone number where safe residents can put their addresses, so that their homes are not broken into. This would also reduce the number of homes officials would have to search.

OUR OPINIONS

A world of help

The Gulf Coast is in a world of hurt right now, and there's no foreseeable end to the pain that is pouring out of this region as families continue to mourn the loss of loved ones and their homes. But there is a world of help out there, too, and the international community's response to our crisis is something that our region and our nation should never forget.

More than 95 countries have stepped up with offers of money, oil, supplies and people trained in everything from medical care for the living to forensics to help identify the dead.

Canadian warships delivered supplies, and Air Canada planes helped evacuate people. The Vancouver Urban Search and Rescue Team was the first to arrive at inundated St. Bernard Parish. They rescued 119 people before the U.S. military arrived.

But help has come not only from close neighbors and wealthy, developed nations. It is also coming from places that could hardly be expected to look past their own pressing needs. Perhaps the most moving offers came from war-torn Afghanistan and Sri Lanka, which is still struggling to recover from its own catastrophe, last December's tsunami, which claimed far more lives and caused more destruction than Hurricane Katrina.

Sri Lanka wants to send $25,000 to recognize the response of Americans to the tsunami. Indonesia's director of tsunami reconstruction told the Los Angeles Times that his country is also willing to share what lessons it has learned in its recovery.

The help that is pouring in from the rest of the world is borne, many times, of remembered pain. Croatia, for example, has offered forensics experts. That country's war in the early 1990s has given it expertise in identifying the dead that, tragically, the United States might need.

"There should not be an assumption that because America is the wealthiest and most powerful country in the world, this isn't a major challenge and a major crisis," Australian Prime Minister John Howard said on Australian radio.

He's right, of course, and the world has been quick to recognize that, even though there has been criticism from international quarters, too.

For Americans, it's not completely comfortable to be on the receiving end of generosity. We are accustomed to thinking of ourselves as strong and self-reliant. We respond to other people's disasters, and this turning of the tables is disorienting. But this is no time for pride, and it's good that the federal government is not rejecting the world's generosity. "We've turned down no offers," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday. That's the right attitude, and it needs to continue.

European Union nations expressed some frustration late last week that they have not been able to get supplies and personnel to the disaster as quickly as they would like because they are awaiting the U.S. government's go-ahead. That's something that needs to be rectified, but the U.S. government's decision to reach out to NATO for help in delivering food, medicine, bedding and other aid from European nations is a good sign that progress is being made.

Making sure that the right people and things are sent to the right places is important, of course, and managing the flood of help will present its own logistical challenges. But our government needs to make sure that accepting and coordinating international offers are given a sufficiently high priority.

No one should go without something that's waiting in a truck a world away.

DAVID TYREE

WWL radio host dies of cancer

'God didn't create a better human being'

By Dave Walker
TV columnist

New Orleans radio talk host David Tyree died early Monday of prostate cancer.

Originally diagnosed with the disease in 1996, Tyree suffered a relapse last fall and later left his job at news-talk WWL 870 AM to live and seek treatment near family in Alva, Okla.

"They were very close, watched him, tended to him daily," said Jack Savoie, Tyree's producer at WWL. "I talked to David at least twice a week. He always put on a brave face. He was tough to the very end."

A Vietnam veteran and former TV anchorman in Lafayette, Tyree had done an earlier stint as WWL talk host and was working as a reporter at WVUE-Channel 8 and as a talk host at WGSO radio when he first was diagnosed with cancer.

He became a crusader for early detection. After treatment delivered what he described as a "clean bill of health" by his doctors, Tyree eventually returned to the airwaves, first in Baton Rouge in September 1999 and then in December 2000 at WWL.

At WWL, Tyree established himself as a hard-to-categorize talk host. A hawk on the war in Iraq - or, more precisely, a hawk on the overall war on Terror - Tyree leaned less to the right on many social issues.

He was a tireless proponent of New Orleans and its frequently confounding charms.

"Anybody who knows New Orleans has a love-hate relationship with New Orleans," Tyree told The Times-Picayune on the occasion of his 2000 return to WWL. "It can drive you crazy, it can be infuriating, but there's no place like it in the country. It's got that magic, whatever that magic is."

Former WWL-Channel 4 anchorman Garland Robinette, one of several temporary hosts who filled in for Tyree during the early stages of his relapse, became Tyree's permanent time-slot replacement in May.

At the time, WWL managers said they would hold a job for Tyree until he recovered, a promise Robinette made a condition of his own employment at the station.

According to Jay Mitchel, Tyree was glued to television coverage of Katrina and the storm's aftermath, and spoke by phone with several Louisiana leaders.

Several family members watched Sunday's New Orleans Saints victory with Tyree.

"That was the last thing he got to see before he passed," Mitchel said. "He was surprised that they won, but he was happy."

Diane Newman, WWL programming director, said she last spoke with Tyree as Hurricane Katrina approached the Louisiana coast.

"All he cared about was that I was OK and that everybody else here was OK and how sorry he was that he couldn't be here (on the air)," said Newman, whose station was forced from the city by Katrina and has relocated its base of operations in Baton Rouge. "And I know these past two weeks, all David was thinking about was not his cancer and his dying – he was thinking about us.

"God didn't create a better human being."

Tyree's funeral is scheduled for Thursday at 10 a.m. at Marshall Funeral Home in Alva.

Instead of flowers, Tyree's family requests a donation to the American Red Cross relief fund to aid Hurricane Katrina victims.

Saints work out deals to play at Tiger Stadium, Alamodome

BATON ROUGE — The Saints, displaced by the ravages of Hurricane Katrina, will play four home games at LSU's Tiger Stadium and three at the Alamodome in San Antonio, NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue announced Monday.

The first Tiger Stadium game could be the most popular: Oct. 30 against the Miami Dolphins, led by former LSU coach Nick Saban, who guided LSU to the 2003 BCS national championship and left for the Dolphins in December 2004.

The Saints' other games at Tiger Stadium are Nov. 6 against the Chicago Bears, Dec. 4 against the Tampa Bay Buccaneers and former LSU receiver Michael Clayton, and Dec. 18 against the Carolina Panthers.

The games in San Antonio are Oct. 2 against the Buffalo Bills, Oct. 16 against the Atlanta Falcons, and Dec. 24 against the Detroit Lions. One other Saints home game against the New York Giants already has been moved to Giants Stadium as part of a Monday night doubleheader Sept. 19.

Tagliabue met with Saints owner Tom Benson, chairman of the LSU Board of Supervisors Bernard Boudreaux, LSU chancellor Sean O'Keefe and Superdome Commission chairman Tim Coulon, among others, at the Tiger Den Suites on Monday morning to hash out the agreement.

Tagliabue said the priority for the rescheduling "has to continue to be recovery and rebuilding from the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina."

"If you look ahead for the next two weeks, the next month, we should stay out of the way of those priorities being met," Tagliabue said. "The appropriate time for the Saints to start playing games at LSU would be against the Dolphins on Oct. 30."

Benson said the Christmas Eve game was scheduled in San Antonio so players could be with their families, most of which have relocated there.

"I'd like to thank the commissioner of the National Football League for stepping up to the tremendous problem we have, not only the Saints, but the NFL, of getting this behind us so now we know what our schedule (is), where we are going to play the rest of the season," Benson said.

The Saints evacuated New Orleans to the San Francisco Bay Area before their final exhibition game at Oakland, and later moved their operations to San Antonio, where Benson has long-standing business and personal ties. The team has continued to practice there. On Sunday, New Orleans won its season opener at Carolina 23-20.

FEMA is occupying the Saints' Metairie practice facility, and the Superdome was heavily damaged by the hurricane and by its use as an evacuation center of last resort.

Tagliabue and Benson declined to answer

Benson urges San Antonio fans to rally behind Saints

By John Reid
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — Saints owner Tom Benson urged San Antonio residents Monday to support his team with sellout crowds for three games that have been shifted to the Alamodome.

But he declined to make any long-term commitment to San Antonio, saying the residents of South Louisiana affected by Hurricane Katrina need something to take their focus off the devastation caused by the storm.

"The only hope they got left is this football team," Benson said. "They need us."

The Saints cannot play at the Superdome this season because of damage caused by Hurricane Katrina, so they will play a split home schedule with the three games in San Antonio and four games at Tiger Stadium in Baton Rouge.

The Saints' three games at the Alamodome are Oct. 2 against the Buffalo Bills, Oct. 16 against the Atlanta Falcons and Dec. 24 against the Detroit Lions.

"A little over two weeks ago we were in California, and we just played the Raiders and we didn't know where we were going," Benson said.

"So it went back and forth to see what could be done. The Alamodome has some restrictions on what games could be here. LSU had restrictions, too. So it was a lot of conversations about different games."

Benson praised San Antonio for welcoming the team with open arms, but reiterated the city has an opportunity now to show if it is serious about supporting an NFL franchise.

"It's most important for everyone involved to make certain capacity crowds attend every game that we have here," Benson said. "This is something brand new, never happened before in the National Football League.

"I expect these games to be televised nationally and it could make me not only proud of our football team, but it would also make the (San Antonio) mayor proud to show what kind of great city you have here in San Antonio. This effort and this schedule will help rebuild Louisiana and the Gulf South."

Several San Antonio elected officials attended Monday's news conference, but former San Antonio mayor Nelson Wolff said they can't worry about trying to land the Saints long-term.

"If we do well and support them right, I think we will be considered for something down the road," said Wolff, who now serves as a county judge. "Right now we just have to do a good job and see where it leads."

Saints coach Jim Haslett said most of his players would have preferred to play most of their home games in San Antonio because their families have relocated there.

"Again, I know what their (NFL) agenda was, they would like for us to play in our home state and our players like that, too, to be honest with you," Haslett said. "It's just more of a travel and family issues. But I'm sure their families and friends will go to Baton Rouge to see the game to be with them."

Giants next challenge for charged Saints

Haslett hopes team's effort carries over to Monday night game

By John Reid

SAN ANTONIO — Saints coach Jim Haslett saw his players pushing beyond their limits Sunday against the Carolina Panthers.

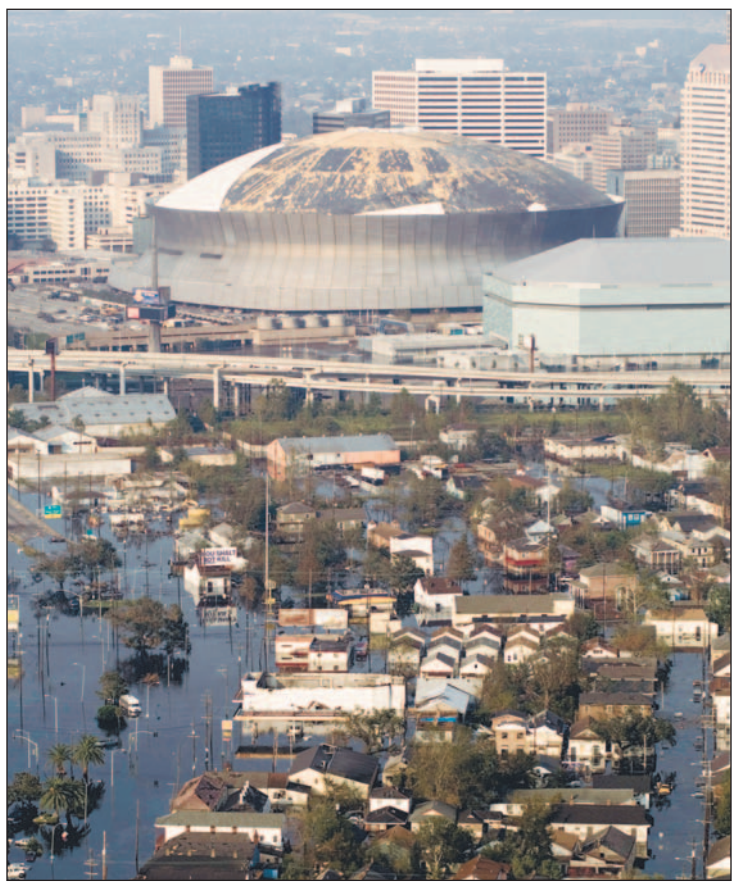
They successfully controlled the clock with a rushing attack that featured Deuce McAllister, who rushed for 64 yards and two touchdowns on 26 carries.

Although a few times defensively they bent, giving up a few long runs by Stephen Davis, they didn't break to the point of not being able to hold their lead.

They were emotionally charged, eager to give their fans, many who are displaced as a result of Hurricane Katrina, something to feel good about.

It was a good day to be Saints fan after New Orleans pulled out a dramatic 23-20 road victory that wasn't sealed until John Carney made a 47-yard field goal with three seconds left.

But that's over.



Now comes the real challenge. Can the Saints be as emotionally charged for this upcoming Monday night's game against the New York Giants?

Saints coach Jim Haslett thinks so.

"I don't think it will be problem, they'll be excited about playing on Monday night, they'll be excited about the opportunity to play in New York, and hopefully we can continue playing well," Haslett said.

Haslett said he's confident his players will be emotionally charged because he has seen it

New Orleans Arena, top right, did not sustain the damages of its neighboring Superdome as a result of Hurricane Katrina. Hornets officials say the facility could be ready to host games by the NBA All-Star break.

N.O. Arena not nearly as bad as Superdome

Hornets could play home games by All-Star break

By Jimmy Smith
Staff writer

Damage to New Orleans Arena, home of the Hornets, was relatively minor and the facility could be ready to host NBA games by the midseason All-Star break, a top official of the building's management company said Monday.

Doug Thornton, regional vice president for SMG, toured the Arena on Sunday and reported that with any luck at restoring power in the area soon, the necessary cleanup and repair should only take a couple of months.

"The good news in all this is the Arena is not nearly as bad as the Dome," Thornton said. "If we can get in quickly and get to work, we can fix it quickly.

"The bottom line is we think we can get the Arena in shape and ready for use by the first quarter of 2006, if not sooner. That's our goal."

Unlike the Superdome, which housed tens of thousands of evacuees as a shelter during Hurricane Katrina, the Arena was used only as a special medical needs facility and access in the building was restricted to the concourse areas.

The Arena came through the storm without significant structural damage, Thornton said.

"I think there's minor roof damage that needs to be remedied," Thornton said, "and some water damage on some of the carpet and drywall in the locker room areas. Obviously, there's some damage to the exterior skin; a couple of panels that have come off. And there are a couple of panels on the exterior since last season, when they closed out the season with four consecutive victories to finish 8-8.

"It really was a carryover to this week, they started off that way in practices and it carried over in the game," Haslett said. "Obviously the Hurricane hitting the city played into it. But really the way we practiced, started last year."

Haslett was so emotional the day before the Carolina game that he couldn't finish reading a letter to his team from New Orleans mayor Ray Nagin, which described some of the devastation he saw in the city resulting from Hurricane Katrina.

Haslett still had some emotions carry over from Sunday's game into Monday, wishing he could answer only questions about how his team performed rather than whether San Antonio is a good place to play three games that has been designated for the Alamodome. But Haslett answered every question at length.

Still, it didn't take him long to shift his focus toward the Eli Manning-led New York Giants, who also won Sunday.

"They really got a pretty good offense and they have a heck of a group of linebackers," Haslett said. "I think they're a good team and didn't watch the game yet from (Sunday), but they must have scored a couple on special teams. I think they are much better."

He suffered a dislocated jaw in Sunday's game and Haslett said he would be listed as questionable for Monday's game. … Wide receiver Az-Zahir Hakim re-injured his hamstring and is listed as questionable. … Haslett said Monday that he has never been on the LSU campus, where the Saints will play four home games this season.

Four games in Baton Rouge not enough for N.O. fans

JOHN DESHAZIER

If they can play four Saints home games in Baton Rouge, they could've played six or seven.

End of story.

So, no, it certainly doesn't appear that Saints fans won in Monday's announcement that the team's seven regular-season games will be split 4/3, with four at Tiger Stadium in Baton Rouge and three at the Alamodome in San Antonio.

Definitely, it could've been worse. NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue could have succumbed to the wish of the organization, which was to play most, if not all, of the home games in San Antonio, where the team is headquartered and practicing.

"Wait 'til next year" could have taken on a whole new meaning if they'd have been blanked, or San Antonio would've been given four, five or six Saints games.

But that's little comfort for fans in and close to Louisiana, who, for 12 weekends instead of eight, will have little or no chance of seeing in person the team they've grown up unconditionally loving, loving to hate or hating to love.

Unless, that is, they still retain the kind of disposable income after Hurricane Katrina that will allow them to travel to one of the eight regularly scheduled road games, or one of the other four (please, let's not call next Monday's game in East Rutherford, N.J., a "home" game for the Saints) that have been designated as home games but sure appear to be "away." And that isn't likely.

Maybe the thinking was that San Antonio was owed a debt of gratitude beyond "thank you," and that's understandable. The city has been more than generous to New Orleans' football franchise and any of its displaced citizens who also might have landed there.

But payment shouldn't have been to award the city almost as many games as the Saints will play in Baton Rouge. That's no knock against the wonderful citizens of San Antonio. It's a defense of many in and around Louisiana who have little to take solace in now that they've lost almost everything they have called their own.

Now, they can't even call the Saints all their own, at least for this season.

"I don't want to leave Louisiana," Saints owner Tom Benson said from LSU's campus, after the announcement had been made.

That makes it sound like his arm was twisted. Maybe that actually was the case. But whatever happened that led to the decision, it just doesn't seem that the best interests of Saints fans fully was taken into consideration. Otherwise we'd be talking about six or seven games in Baton Rouge, one or none in San Antonio.

Obviously, the logistical concerns with staging an NFL game at LSU, now that hundreds of thousands of evacuees have settled there and taken up residence in Baton Rouge hotels, sufficiently were alleviated. So the obvious question for Saints fans is this: Why couldn't they be ironed out for six or seven games?

Why is it that the people who need to see the Saints in person the most will be watching them on television, playing in San Antonio almost as many weekends as they'll have access to them?

The best possible scenario for Saints fans would have been for New Orleans' football team completely to take root in Baton Rouge for seven Sundays, 90 minutes from the home it cannot occupy, where its scattered fans have a better chance of convening and watching their team on gameday without having to spend its more-precious-than-ever dollars on a hotel room.

But that's not going to happen.

It could've been worse. We all know that the franchise wanted to play most of its games in San Antonio; Tagliabue easily could have satiated that desire.

But it could've been better, too.

It should've been better.

Dolphins game could draw most interest

questions about the future of the Superdome, and Benson declined to talk about the Saints' future in New Orleans. Before the storm, Benson and the state were wrangling over the terms of the Saints' agreement with the state.

"I don't want to leave Louisiana," Benson said.

State officials felt it was important for the Saints to return to Louisiana to play at least some of their home games. That would give fans, most of them storm victims, something positive and it would aid in the recovery.

"It was a Herculean task this morning that we accomplished with the cooperation of Mr. Benson and the commissioner, and I have to commend LSU for their efforts," said Coulon, the state's chief negotiator with the Saints. "As you know, they are dealing with many, many logistical issues here. No doubt every person in that room was sensitive to not having a negative influence on the recovery. But it was also the sentiment that the Saints need to be a part of our rebuilding initiative. We made the best of a difficult situation."

Benson and LSU officials said many of the details of playing at LSU, such as security, ticket sales, media rights and concessions, have yet to be worked out but some of those matters were discussed in preliminary talks last week.

"The people who met today aren't the people who work out the nitty-gritty details to make things happen," LSU associate athletic director Herb Vincent said. "LSU will obviously be reimbursed for expenses and would not suffer financial losses from this arrangement. Beyond that, not a lot of details have been settled. They will emerge in the days to come."

One important issue is the distribution of tickets, which Benson said is a priority. He said he planned to set up a staff in Baton Rouge as soon as possible, and that season-ticket holders' tickets will be good in Baton Rouge and San Antonio.

"That's the first thing we'll be working on," Benson said.

"We'll work together to make the distribution of tickets as fan friendly as can be," Tagliabue said.

Tagliabue said he was confident hotel room availability would not be a problem because the first game in Baton Rouge is 49 days away. Evacuees have taken most available hotel space within a large radius of Baton Rouge, but that situation is expected to ease by Oct. 30. The NFL needs about 260 rooms to accommodate the teams and personnel required to put on a game.

Another hurdle that must be cleared is the turnaround time for the Miami and Chicago games. LSU plays North Texas, the rescheduled game from Sept. 3, on Oct. 29, and its homecoming game against Appalachian State on Nov. 5. That will leave about 14 hours between the end of the LSU games and the noon kickoffs for the Saints. But a source close to the negotiations said the kickoff for the game against the Dolphins might be moved back to 3 p.m., and that the game against the Bears might be moved to Monday night.

Hornets still committed to N.O.

LED screens missing, but we don't know the extent of the damage there.

"We don't think there's any significant damage to the electrical distribution system or the mechanical systems such as the elevators or escalators. We've got those issues at the Dome, but not the Arena."

Cleanup crews are clearing the facility of debris around the outer concourses, Thornton said, and SMG soon will put out a bid to do the environmental cleanup inside of the Arena to dispose of refuse and medical waste that was left behind during the evacuation process.

That effort could be slowed somewhat by the lack of electrical power and sewer availability in the area surrounding the Arena.

Thornton said he spoke with Hornets owner George Shinn on Sunday following the inspection tour of the facility and updated Shinn on the damage, the first time Shinn had received first-hand knowledge of the Arena's status.

He said Shinn reiterated to him the team's desire to move back into New Orleans as quickly as possible, though, officials are still in fact-finding missions around the state and the country, touring possible venues to hold some of the team's home schedule.

Several of the facilities at which the Hornets are looking are operated by SMG, including those in Oklahoma City, Bossier City and Baton Rouge.

That, Thornton said, is merely coincidence, though New Orleans Arena's game operations employees would be available to work Hornets games in any SMG-managed arena, which would make any transition much easier.

"I think," Thornton said, "the Hornets are appreciative of that."

LSU officials are awaiting word as to when the Pete Maravich Assembly Center, a possible alternative venue, would be cleaned up so that Hornets officials can tour the building, according to LSU senior associate athletic director Dan Radakovich.

The PMAC was used as a medical evacuation facility until last Thursday, preventing members of the Hornets' fact-finding team from visiting the arena.

"We're just waiting to hear from the cleanup people," Radakovich said.

Efforts to reach Hornets president Paul Mott were unsuccessful Monday.

Panthers' Jenkins out another season

Redskins make change, Walker out

From wire reports

Carolina Panthers defensive tackle Kris Jenkins will miss his second consecutive season because of injury.

Jenkins, a 2003 All-Pro, tore the anterior cruciate ligament in his right knee during Carolina's 23-20 loss to the Saints on Sunday. Although he was injured in the first quarter, he said Monday he didn't realize the severity and briefly returned to the field in the third quarter.

"I didn't think it was that bad ... it felt like I had hyperextended it at first," he said. "I could still run on the thing. I know that's a little odd. When I went back out there, I realized then I had torn something big."

Jenkins, a two-time Pro Bowl player, missed 12 games last season with a shoulder injury.

RAMSEY WON'T START: Quarterback Mark Brunell will start for the Washington Redskins Monday night against the Dallas Cowboys, retaking the quarterback job from Tulane alum Patrick Ramsey.

Coach Joe Gibbs had prepared for nearly a year for Ramsey to be the starter, but the coach changed his mind after Ramsey threw an interception and fumbled twice in Sunday's victory over the Chicago Bears before leaving with a mild neck injury. Brunell came in to lead the victory.

Ramsey completed six of 11 passes for 105 yards, and his first drive ended with an overthrow that was picked off by Nathan Vasher. Ramsey fumbled on third down on his second drive, but teammate Jon Jansen recovered to turn a potential turnover into a punting situation. On his third series, Ramsey lost the ball on the play he was injured. Brunell was 8-for-14 for 70 yards.

BOLLER WILL MISS GAME: Baltimore Ravens quarterback Kyle Boller will miss Sunday's game against Tennessee with a hyperextended right big toe, so Anthony Wright will start for the first time since facing the Titans in the 2003 playoffs.

Boller was injured this past Sunday night when he was sacked by Larry Tripplett in the third quarter of the Ravens' 24-7 loss to the Indianapolis Colts. He was replaced by Wright, who went 19-for-31 for 214 yards and two interceptions.

The Ravens have a bye following Sunday's game, so Boller would get three weeks rest before Baltimore plays at home against the New York Jets on Oct. 2.

PACKERS LOSE WALKER: Green Bay wide receiver Javon Walker suffered a torn anterior cruciate ligament in his right knee Sunday, and will miss the rest of the season.

Walker was hurt in the third quarter of the Packers' 17-3 loss at Detroit.

Walker, who made the Pro Bowl last season after catching 89 passes for 1,382 yards and 12 touchdowns, threatened to hold out this year if the final two years of his contract weren't renegotiated. But he showed up in training camp on time, saying he wanted to prove he was worthy of a blockbuster contract.

AROUND THE LEAGUE: One Dolphins player says Nick Saban's defense will get even better after forcing three turnovers in a 34-10 opening victory over the Denver Broncos.

"Our defensive playbook is like a phone book, and we didn't get through the A's," rookie linebacker Channing Crowder said. "We have a lot of things we can pull out if we need to, or we can let our great players make plays." … Broncos cornerback Champ Bailey has a dislocated shoulder and running back Mike Anderson has separated cartilage in his ribs, and their status for this week's game against San Diego is unknown … Jaguars offensive line coach Paul Boudreau returned to work Monday, a day after collapsing in the locker room from "heat and dehydration." Boudreau, 55 and a former Saints assistant, fell ill following Sunday's 26-14 victory over Seattle and was transported to a hospital. He was released Monday morning and back in his office that afternoon.

TAKING A BREAK: Several members of the National Guard took a break from relief efforts Monday to test the layout at Audubon Golf Club. The course escaped flooding but damaged trees present new obstacles. The National Guard has set up headquarters near the course. There is no word as to when the course may reopen.

Green Wave finds a home in Ruston

La. Tech campus, game-week routine lift players' spirits

By Fred Robinson
Staff writer

RUSTON — After two weeks of traveling from one city to the next and not knowing what its next move was going to be, Tulane's football team arrived "home" Monday evening.

Louisiana Tech, nearly 300 miles from Tulane's Uptown campus, will be the Green Wave's home for the next three months.

"I wouldn't call it home, but it'll do for now," said Tulane senior offensive lineman Chris McGee.

The Green Wave, displaced by Hurricane Katrina, traveled to Jackson, Miss., the day before the hurricane hit. It then traveled to Dallas before the athletic administration was able to place the football team at Louisiana Tech for the fall semester. In all, the Green Wave has spent more than 36 hours riding buses.

"It's been an adventure," linebacker Anthony Cannon said. "It's all about adjusting."

Once the team arrived in Ruston on Monday, the players went through an orientation, picked up their books at the school's bookstore, got their class schedules and had dinner. Following dinner was a team meeting at the Thomas Assembly Center, Tech's basketball arena.

The team will be housed at Caruthers Hall, also home to more than 100 Katrina evacuees, according to a university security guard. In Dallas, the Doubletree Hotel was the team's home, and at least once the team used Southern Methodist University's practice field. Tulane will meet SMU on Sept. 24.

Settling in new quarters isn't expected to be a problem.

"I think everybody will adjust just fine," McGee said. "We've adjusted just fine wherever we've gone so far."

Cannon said this stop will be better than the team's first two stops - Jackson State University, and then Dallas. Now, Cannon said, the picture is much clearer for the team.

"We're here now. We have a home, and we're finally relieved to know we have a set schedule for now and know what we're going to do next," Cannon said. "We have somewhere to call home and we appreciate Louisiana Tech and Ruston for opening their arms to us."

Next for the Green Wave will be classes today. The team will practice at 1 p.m. today in preparation for Saturday's game against Mississippi State at Independence Stadium in Shreveport.

Game-week, players said, will make a huge difference with the team.

"Now that the season's starting, we have something to get everything else off of our minds," McGee said. "Now we have games to worry about. We'll start focusing on what's important, and all the little things won't matter much - like our sanity and free time."

The Green Wave's Sept. 4 season opener with Southern Miss was pushed back to the weekend following Thanksgiving, meaning Tulane will play 11 consecutive weeks without a break.

"I've been waiting for this for six weeks. Six weeks of camp, it's the longest camp in history," McGee said. "I think this week will make all the difference in the world."

Recovering from a disaster isn't new for safety Sean Lucas. A week before he was to leave his Georgia home to become a freshman at Tulane, a house fire destroyed all of his belongings. Katrina hit one week before Lucas was to begin his senior season.

Getting over a disaster takes the right attitude, said Lucas, whose apartment near South Claiborne and Napoleon likely received flood waters.

"I rebounded (from the fire) and I'll rebound again," Lucas said.

Call was all bad news for Green Wave's Smith

Tulane receiver finds house was damaged by hurricane winds

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

RUSTON - New Orleanians have been getting those calls the past couple of weeks – those calls about their homes, or what's left of their homes.

Fred Smith got one of those calls while evacuated in Houston. A neighbor from St. Rose had stayed in town during Hurricane Katrina.

"They told us the house was messed up," said Smith, a Tulane receiver. "But we didn't expect that much damage."

Smith laughed after saying that. The damage was unfathomable, so all he could do was laugh at the absurdity.

"It's done," Smith said of his mother's home. "You can't prepare yourself for it. We had a lot of wind damage. The roof came off."

Because Smith is injured and wasn't with the team, which spent the past 13 days in Dallas, the junior had the opportunity to visit his house. On Monday, he reunited with his teammates at Louisiana Tech, where he will begin classes today. Smith won't play this season because of a knee injury suffered in the preseason.

"It's good being back," Smith said. "The guys are like my other family right now."

PULLING THE STRINGS: Jim King has been the logistical savior for Tulane football. So who is he?

He is the vice president for student affairs at Louisiana Tech, and in the past week King has been orchestrating the unprecedented move of a Division I-A football team into the home of another Division I-A football team, and about 11,000 other students. King oversaw housing and meal planning, and helped coordinate the academic and athletic facets.

King said the number of transplanted students at Louisiana Tech "is growing every day." On Monday, he said approximately 400 students from other schools were on campus, including Tulane's 88 football players.

"The challenges have been varied," King said. "Such as massaging an eight-story high-rise."

Caruthers Dorm had been closed and was scheduled for demolition before Katrina hit. Louisiana Tech officials decided to repair the building's air conditioning system and take in evacuees. On Monday, the Green Wave moved into the fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth floors, sharing a facility with "3-month old babies to 90-year-olds," King said. "Our hearts go out to the people who have been displaced. And when you hear their stories, it's amazing. . . . It's emotional because of all the unknown."

Tulane football also knows about that.

THE ENVELOPE PLEASE: Tulane has selected its football captains for the season: all 17 of the seniors. The Green Wave season begins Saturday against Mississippi State, in a 7 p.m. game at Shreveport's Independence Stadium.

TELETHON TO BE HELD DURING MSU GAME: A telethon will be held during Saturday's to assist youngsters in relief centers and help rebuild Boys & Girls Clubs damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

The game will be played at the Independence Bowl Stadium in Shreveport.

The phone number and Web site for donations will be shown during the game.

ESPN to televise Tigers-Vols game

Despite previous requests from Tennessee officials to move the Tigers-Volunteers' Sept. 24th game to a daytime kickoff for fans' travel purposes, ESPN snatched up the possible top five matchup and set a 6:45 p.m. kickoff.

The SEC announced CBS will pick up either Arkansas at Alabama or Florida at Kentucky. Should Tennessee and LSU maintain their current positions in The Associated Press poll after this week, it will mark the first time since Oct. 31, 1959 that two opponents ranked in the top five play a game in Tiger Stadium.

The LSU-Tennessee game is sold out. Prices on eBay already are as high as $125 per seat.

WROTEN HONORED: LSU senior defensive tackle Claude Wroten was selected SEC Defensive Lineman of the Week. Wroten blocked a field-goal attempt that sparked a 28-point fourth quarter and lifted the Tigers to a 35-31 victory at Arizona State.

On the block, Wroten was able to penetrate the Sun Devils' line, deflecting the ball backward in the air. Cornerback Mario Stevenson returned the ball 55 yards untouched, reducing the deficit to 17-14.

Wroten had three tackles, two for losses, a pass deflection and a quarterback hurry.

Wroten received the same honor following his performance against Vanderbilt last year.

AWAY TICKETS: The LSU Ticket Office is shipping tickets for those who purchased seats to LSU away games Sept. 19, except if the buyer's address is in one of the following parishes: Orleans, Jefferson, St. Bernard, St. Tammany, Washington, Tangipahoa, Plaquemines and several counties along the Mississippi Gulf Coast.

People in the areas listed above can pick up their tickets at the LSU athletic administration building during business hours.

Fans who wish to update their address prior to ticket delivery must make those updates by 5 p.m. Thursday by using a form available at www.LSUsports.net, under the ticketing link.

Players learn brothers are alive

Ex-Auburn player organizing relief effort with Jets

From wire reports

An Auburn football player who spent days believing his two younger brothers were killed in Hurricane Katrina and not knowing his father's whereabouts has discovered that all three are alive and staying in Houston.

Alonzo Horton, a New Orleans native, said he learned Sunday night that his family members were alive after calling a cousin to tell them of the boys' deaths.

"He said, 'Man, that didn't happen because your daddy's right here with me. I was like, 'What?'" Horton said Monday evening.

"I heard their voice and the phone died out, so I knew that they were OK."

Horton said another cousin had told him 6-year-old Delorean and Jerry, who just turned 8, died after taking refuge in the Abramson High School gymnasium in New Orleans. Horton had said Saturday that his father remained unaccounted for.

He said that was the only confirmation he had received of their deaths. Horton's mother and other family members are staying in Atlanta.

His reaction to the good news? "Just a sigh of relief," he said. "I can't really explain how I felt when I heard that. I just can't wait to see them. I can't wait to talk to them again.

"I still kept hope in the back of my mind," Horton said. "I prayed every night that they were all right."

Horton said he didn't know whether the youngsters ever took shelter in the gym.

I don't know and I don't really care about it, as long as they're OK," he said.

In other Katrina developments:

• New York Jets Kevin Mawae, John Abraham, Jerald Sowell and Oliver Celestin will travel to Baton Rouge to visit evacuees, volunteers and workers involved in the relief efforts.

Mawae, an LSU graduate, makes his offseason home in Baton Rouge. Sowell, of Baker, graduated from Tulane. Celestin's family relocated from New Orleans to the New York area with the help of the Jets.

Mawae and his wife, Traci, will organize a food drive Saturday in Garden City, N.Y.

• Carmelo Anthony and Ray Allen are among 15 NBA and WNBA players teaming up with Wheel of Fortune to raise money for Katrina victims.

The players will tape shows Thursday for the game show's NBA week, airing Oct. 31-Nov. 4. Each player will partner with a fan from their team's city, and the fans will play for cash and NBA-themed prizes.

The players will compete for their favorite charities and for the Red Cross, with a minimum of $100,000 of their winnings going to the relief efforts.

Hall of Famer Bill Walton also will play.

• Falcons running back Warrick Dunn, a native of Baton Rouge, La., challenged every player in the National Football League — except the New Orleans Saints — to contribute at least $5,000 to relief efforts early last week. In two days, Falcons players raised $295,000, said Todd Peterson, the team's players' union representative.

Proceeds will be distributed through charities designated by the NFL Players Association. \

St. Paul's, PJP II teams return to practice field

Both hope to open season on Sept. 23

By Marty Mule
Staff writer

St. Paul's and Pope John Paul II, St. Tammany Parish's only two Catholic high schools that play football, returned to practice Monday in hopes of beginning their seasons Sept. 23.

Both schools are expected to reopen next Monday.

St. Paul's coach Ken Sears welcomed 72 of his 100 players back to practice Monday, their first since Hurricane Katrina struck two weeks ago.

Pope John Paul II also returned to the practice field with 27 of 65 players participating.

Pope John Paul II is scheduled to host Live Oak in a non-district game Sept. 23.

The game, scheduled for 7 p.m., may have to be moved to an afternoon start because the stadium lights may have been damaged in the storm, school officials said.

"Our scoreboard is blown down, and our lights have to be checked out," Pope John Paul II principal Richard Berkowitz said.

"The important thing is to play at night,"' said Jaguars coach Chris Lachney, who then reversed himself. "No, the important thing is to play."

St. Paul's is scheduled to play Mandeville in the District 4-5A opener for both schools Sept. 23. St. Tammany public schools, however, are not scheduled to resume classes until Oct. 3.

St. Tammany teams cannot compete unless school is in session.

However, a meeting is scheduled today for the parish's coaches and athletic officials.

A decision could be made then to begin play before school resumes.

All eight District 4-5A teams, including five St. Tammany Parish public schools, are scheduled to begin district play on the weekend of Sept. 23.

Northlake Christian School said last week it will begin its season at Gueydan on that date. It will be the school's first varsity game.

Wildcats scramble to find normalcy

Destrehan QB Eugene relieved to play close to home after Katrina

By Lori Lyons
River Parishes bureau

For a week, Destrehan quarterback Jai Eugene didn't know if he would be playing at home or in Texas.

When Hurricane Katrina was bearing down on the region and St. Charles Parish was evacuated, Eugene and his family went to Houston. And after the storm, when all the news reports began showing the catastrophic destruction to the New Orleans area, Eugene was wondering what would become of his senior season.

"I was so scared," he said. "I must have called Coach (Stephen) Robicheaux 50 times that week, trying to find out what was going on. I was thinking my whole senior year was going down the drain. We were preparing to stay in Texas, and I was going to go to school there."

But the Eugenes soon learned that St. Charles Parish had been spared the worst of Katrina's wrath. There was only minimal flooding in some areas and there was no damage to the high school.

"I was so excited," Eugene said.

The day Eugene returned from Texas, his coach called with news that isn't usually greeted with joy by high school football players. Practice would be held the next day.

"They were excited when I called to tell them there was a meeting," Robicheaux said. "They were ready to get back to the routine."

And the news only got better. On Friday, Robicheaux was able to work out arrangements with Thibodaux coach Lenny Ford to play a game Sunday afternoon in Thibodaux. Then, after three practices — only one with an opponent in mind — the Wildcats defeated Thibodaux 14-0.

"As a coach, it was a logistical nightmare," Robicheaux said. "It's not like you can just pick up the phone and say, 'Hey. Let's play.' And then you've got no film, no nothing. We really weren't prepared. But what was important is that the kids played. They were so excited to be playing. They're all looking for some normalcy."

Robicheaux said he was pleased when his team went 86 yards on its opening drive for a touchdown.

"We pretty much stayed vanilla," Robicheaux said. "Then we were able to adjust to what they were doing."

Eugene completed 11 of 16 passes for 163 yards. He also had one of the Wildcats' three interceptions. Brandon Braxton had two. Raynor Derkins ran for 71 yards on 15 carries.

"We were a little bit out of rhythm as a team," Eugene said. "But when we took that first drive for a touchdown, we settled down."

"There were some mistakes," Robicheaux said. "But you don't know how much of that had to do with the lack of practice time. We don't know how good we are right now. We've got good athletes. I'm optimistic that, with what we have, we're only going to get better."

SCHEDULE

The first detailed computer model of Hurricane Katrina's storm surge shows a gargantuan, 15-foot dome of water forming in the Gulf of Mexico. The model later shows water flooding the rest of New Orleans from Lake Pontchartrain through levee breaches. Meanwhile, Katrina's giant wave continues its relentless northeast course, pushing a 30-foot wave toward Mississippi, over the Biloxi-

Fall elections in Jeff, N.O. postponed

Makeup dates still unknown, state says

By Mark Waller
East Jefferson bureau

Hurricane Katrina has forced an indefinite postponement of the fall elections in Orleans and Jefferson parishes, the Louisiana secretary of state's office said Tuesday.

Oct. 15 was the primary date for special elections for School Board, Kenner City Council and the state's 5th Circuit Court of Appeal in Jefferson Parish, and runoffs were set for Nov. 12 if necessary. Three New Orleans neighborhoods had Nov. 12 referendums planned on fees or taxes to finance security patrols and other local improvements.

"Those are delayed," Jennifer Marusak, spokeswoman for the secretary of state's office, said of the Jefferson and Orleans voting plans. "They may be rescheduled. We just can't reschedule them yet, because we don't know when they'll be able to reschedule."

Officials do not know whether they have enough voting machines to hold the elections.

Officials do not know whether they have enough voting machines to hold the elections, Marusak said.

Three candidates had qualified to run for a vacancy in the Jefferson Parish School Board's 4th District: Mary Bartholomew, director of the culinary arts and hospitality program at Delgado Community College; Ellen Shirer Kovach, a lawyer with the New Orleans firm of Frilot, Partridge, Kohnke & Clements; and Ryan Roemershauser, a lawyer with the Blue Williams firm in Metairie.

The Jefferson School Board vacancy was created when Julie Quinn resigned to run for the state Senate. She won in July, and Cameron Henry is filling the School Board seat until an election can be held. The term lasts through 2006.

Three candidates also signed up to run for the 2nd District seat on the Kenner Council seat: David Lavarine, who owns a graphics and imaging company; Bill Schwertz, a real estate investor; and Joe Stagni, a chiropractor. They are seeking to succeed Lavarine's brother, John Lavarine III, who won an at-large council seat in an April election. Michael McMyne is filling the 2nd District seat until an election is held. The term expires in June.

The two candidates for the Circuit Court seat, elected from throughout Jefferson Parish, are judges Rebecca Olivier of 1st Parish Court in Metairie and Fredericka "Ricky" Wicker of the state's 24th Judicial District Court in Gretna. They hope to succeed Sol Gothard, who planned to retire Aug. 31. The term runs through April 2009.

In New Orleans, the City Council had set Nov. 12 for voting in the Kingswood, Touro Bouligny and Twinbrook neighborhoods.

In Kingswood, part of eastern New Orleans, the now-delayed proposal is to assess an annual fee of as much as $240 on each residential lot to pay for "beautification, security and overall betterment" of the neighborhood.

In the Touro Bouligny neighborhood, part of Uptown, the proposal is to levy a property tax of as much as 16.2 mills for security patrols.

In Twinbrook, also Uptown, the postponed referendum is for a fee of as much as $500 per year on each lot with a building to pay for security patrols.

Staff Sgt. Travis Sigfridson with the 1st Battalion, 186th Infantry Regiment, Oregon Army National Guard, patrols Lakeview in an airboat on Tuesday. The security patrol was prompted by an overnight flight by Army OH-58 Kiowa reconnaissance helicopters equipped with thermal and infrared sensors that can detect body heat. The flight spotted warm bodies in the neighborhood.

A small rowboat gently tapping the front door at 6069 Argonne Blvd. caught the attention of National Guardsmen patrolling Lakeview Tuesday, seeking survivors, looters and the dead.

A second-floor balcony door was open, and through it they could see a woman's black purse hung on a door knob. Lt. Col. Todd Plimpton, commander of Oregon's 1st Battalion, 186th Infantry Regiment, weighed whether to send in his soldiers. He announced his presence instead.

"Hello, we're taking your boat," he said. Getting no response, he ordered the soldiers to it. Staff Sgt. Travis Sigfridson kept a cautious watch for movement in the house as Spec. Joe Gallagher, a Rhode Island Guardsmen, reached out to the boat. Gallagher towed it to the intersection of Argonne and Filmore Avenue and promptly sank it.

"If they were in there, they're pissed off," Plimpton said. "The next group (of passing soldiers) will catch them wading in the water."

Fifteen days after Katrina, soldiers like these National Guardsmen continued to sweep New Orleans streets, seeking looters who are breaking into peoples' homes using small boats.

On Monday, Guardsmen arrested a man who used a kayak to get into Lakeview, claiming he was a veterinarian for the City of New Orleans who was checking on cats, said 1st Lt. Paul Dyer, a platoon leader in 1/186th. The man was allowed to pass. Shortly after, another group questioned the man, and he said he was a veterinarian from Oregon. The soldiers arrested him when they found jewelry stashed in the kayak, Dyer said. They arrested another looter in the area the same day.

Tuesday's security patrol, launched at Canal and Robert E. Lee boulevards, was prompted by an overnight flight by Army OH-58 Kiowa reconnaissance helicopters equipped with thermal and infrared sensors that can detect body heat. The flight spotted warm bodies in the neighborhood.

"It could have been dogs," Plimpton said. "It could have been search and rescue" personnel.

Survivors continue to be found in Lakeview, he said. On Monday, 12 people were rescued from area, Plimpton said. In the past week, his soldiers found five bodies.

The soldiers on this patrol found no bodies. But they did find several small, unattended boats, including a yellow kayak in front of 6069 Argonne Blvd. This time, Plimpton ordered his soldiers into the house.

"Sig, why don't you lead in and take both MPs with you," he said to Sigfridson, a veteran of the Iraq war. Sigfridson stepped onto the porch with his M-4 carbine and went in through the open door.

"Anybody in there?" Sigfridson yelled. When no one responded, Plimpton ordered the soldiers to search. They returned shortly afterward empty handed.

Dyer punctured the kayak, making it unusable. More often the boats are pulled from the houses and tied to trees or street signs, said Darel Bryant of Leeville.

"You see a lot of them tied in the middle in here," said Bryant.

N.O. residents find wiggle room in police directive

Need to see homes trumps decree

By Coleman Warner and Gordon Russell

A boat lies in the road near West End Park on Tuesday in New Orleans, near a man walking with a bicycle. Though some had gone through official channels, some residents with flimsy reasons were able to navigate military checkpoints to return to the city.

Among sections of Uptown New Orleans that suffered a relatively mild blow from Hurricane Katrina, streets and yards saw the beginnings Tuesday of what promises to be a cleanup frenzy, with military and utility convoys blending with a smattering of private vehicles headed to individual houses or businesses, testing the limits of government directives that citizens should be leaving, not returning.

David Ratowitz, a New Orleans real estate developer, returned to the city before dawn, joined by his father and a friend, determined to get to his house on Laurel Street near Jackson Avenue. They drove in from the east, by way of Highway 11, pulling in close behind a cleanup truck bearing credentials. Their strategic position got them through a National Guard checkpoint at the edge of Orleans Parish.

"We just stayed right on their tail, and they (soldiers) just assumed we were together," said Ratowitz, 35, who wanted to "get some clothes and some personal things. I own a business and there's some documents I need."

He also wanted to grab a batch of his home-brew beer, with variations named "Black Beer" and "Gold Beer" in honor of the New Orleans Saints. Ratowitz also gave voice to the increasingly common view among displaced residents that, despite the hazards of being in a storm-ravaged city, they should be allowed to play an immediate role in removing limbs and trash from neighborhoods.

"Those guys from OMNI are great and all, but I don't need them to clean up my front stoop," he said, referring to a cleanup company under contract with the city of New Orleans.

Another Uptowner, Jim Bartkus, a professor of economics at Southeastern Louisiana University, managed to get into town Tuesday by hitching a ride with an out-of-town newspaper reporter. Bartkus said National Guardsmen verified the identity of the reporter, who was driving, but ignored him.

"I saw a lot of other people looking at their houses," said Bartkus, who has been staying in a dorm room at the Hammond college. "I just wanted to get my personal stuff — my photo albums, artwork, my journal — the irreplaceable things."

He said he also collected his fish, which were alive. His home near the intersection of Marengo and Loyola streets was relatively unscathed, although water got into the house, he said.

While there, he met a neighbor who had ridden out the storm and stayed for the duration. The neighbor, who had recently received a delivery of supplies, offered him several cold beers, Bartkus said.

Guardsmen stopped by while Bartkus was inside his house, but they didn't pressure him to leave, he said.

"They just told me to lock the door when I left," he said.

An assortment of private vehicles mixed with official ones on Magazine, including a smattering of rented moving vans. Near the corner of Octavia and Magazine streets, a business owner was hurriedly loading contents of a building into his truck. He said he had a business permit, but was uneasy when asked how he gained access to New Orleans.

"It's actually a permit from Jefferson Parish," he added, declining to give his name. "I guess they didn't notice."

Others had gone through more official channels.

Joe Wink III, market manager for Universal Personnel, a contract staffing company for the oil and gas industry headquartered in the Energy Centre downtown, had secured a New Orleans permit allowing him to come in and take care of the business.

Wink and two other employees were removing "hardware, software, and contract files," he said. The company, which has about 30 employees, will retain a presence in New Orleans but is moving its headquarters to Houston, where it already has offices, he said.

"We're going to have a much greater emphasis on serving Houston," he said.

While in the city, Wink managed to check out his home in Lakeview, which was essentially destroyed by floodwaters.

In Uptown sections that were hard-hit with flooding, on the downtown side of Freret Street, soldiers were much in evidence near Broadway, manning a checkpoint and patrolling some intersections on foot. One man who was assisting a relative on Audubon Boulevard said he was able to enter the parish on business-recovery grounds — he has ties to a local hotel.

In the 1600 block of Broadway, a bedraggled lawyer, Patrick Baker, 43, said that since the hurricane he has been living "all around; now I'm in Baton Rouge," but felt compelled in the past two days to get back to his home. He said he has been "removing crud, taking stuff that was in the basement out, taking pictures." He declined to say how he was able to navigate military checkpoints.

On Tuesday about 3 p.m. on St. Charles Avenue, a personal vehicle was pulled up on a side street beside the Octavia residential complex. On the third floor, someone had opened wide the doors to a balcony and was tossing bags of food items over the rail. The bags spilled rotting food items as they hit the street while the man who launched them gave a look of disgust from above.

'I take responsibility,' Bush says of slow response to hurricane

Katrina exposed lack of readiness, he says

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — President Bush accepted responsibility Tuesday "to the extent the federal government didn't fully do its job right" in responding to the devastation of Hurricane Katrina and conceded the disaster exposed shortcomings in U.S. preparedness for a future terrorist attack.

At the same time, the White House announced that Bush will address the nation Thursday at 8 p.m. from Louisiana, making it his fourth visit since the hurricane slammed into the Gulf Coast 16 days ago. The White House said he will talk about the recovery efforts and offer new details about his administration's plan for the longer-term rebuilding.

Bush's comments on placing responsibility were a departure from earlier statements in which he declined to play "the blame game," and marked a rare admission of shortcomings by an administration that has been reluctant to concede mistakes.

Asked at a news conference with the president of Iraq whether the slow response to Katrina raised questions about the government's ability to respond to a terrorist attack, the president said:

"Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government," Bush said. "To the extent the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility."

R. David Paulison, who took over as acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency late Monday, said the agency would escalate efforts to help find more permanent housing for the tens of thousands of evacuees now in shelters. He took over the agency after Michael Brown, whose oversight of the initial relief efforts was widely criticized, resigned Monday. He had been stripped of his management role for the Gulf Coast relief effort on Friday.

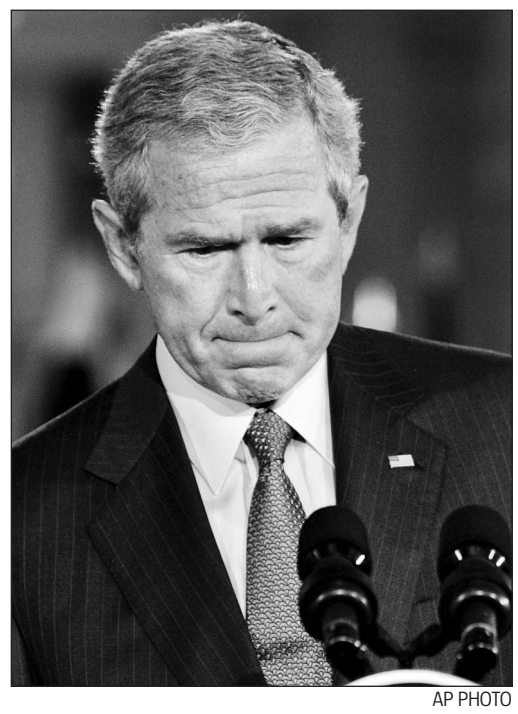
The new tone from the White House was welcomed by Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., who along with other congressional Democrats had been critical of the president and the federal relief efforts.

"The president's comments today will do more to move our country forward from this tragedy than anything that has been said by any leader in the past two weeks," Landrieu said. "Accountability at every level is critical and leadership begins at the top."

Sen. David Vitter, R-La., who made a major floor speech Tuesday in which he compared devastated sections of his state to a war zone, said FEMA and the state of Louisiana's hurricane preparation and emergency bureaucracy "failed us miserably."

"I've heard many Washington talking heads say that heads must roll," Vitter said. "I'm all for that and have my own personal list. But that alone isn't enough. We need to look at the big picture – not just what people failed but also what institutions and models failed and, just as importantly, what others worked against all odds."

Norm Ornstein, the veteran political analyst for the American Enterprise Institute, a Washington think tank, said the president's pronouncement that he'll take responsibility for shortcomings is significant because Bush and his advisers view admissions of mistakes as "giving aid and comfort to their adversaries."



The administration, he said, has tried to rebound from the widespread criticism of initial recovery efforts with a stepped-up federal response and regular visits to the Gulf region. "The president has been all over the map there to help out and commit the government's full resources and the expectation was it would have people talking again about his compassionate conservatism," Ornstein said. "But it just hasn't worked out."

In his comments Tuesday, Bush said he wants to learn why the initial relief efforts fell short.

"I want to know how to better cooperate with state and local government, to be able to answer that very question that you asked: Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack or another severe storm?"

Bush said he was impressed during his three visits to the Gulf region with "how hard people are working."

"I'm not going to defend the process going in, but I am going to defend the people who are on the front line saving lives," Bush said. "Those Coast Guard kids pulling people out of the floods did heroic work. The first responders on the ground, whether they be state folks or local folks, did everything they could. There's a lot of people that have done a lot of hard work to save lives."

President Bush, speaking at a news conference with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, said, 'Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government.'

Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, said Bush got a new perspective on the hurricane after visiting St. Bernard Parish, among the hardest-hit areas.

"Clearly, he understands now the tremendous challenges we face and how much we are counting on FEMA and the resources of our nation," Melancon said. "The president, by his statements today, is demonstrating the leadership and accountability needed to get the inadequate federal response to this crisis behind us and move forward with rebuilding Louisiana."

Senate begins work on economic recovery plan

Eased regulations, tax breaks on table

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — The Senate Finance Committee on Monday unveiled the first comprehensive proposal to aid the recovery of individuals and businesses who suffered devastating economic damages from Hurricane Katrina.

The proposals include tax breaks for businesses that hire workers who lost jobs because of the hurricane and penalty-free withdrawals from retirement accounts to help people with their immediate cash-flow problems.

Some of the tax benefits are modeled after relief given to businesses and people who returned or relocated to lower Manhattan after the World Trade Center towers were toppled in the 2001 terrorist attacks.

"With this first initiative from the Finance Committee — and there will be more in other areas where we have jurisdiction — we want the victims through all of the affected areas to know that they can count on us to create a set of measures that will return vitality and vigor to the Gulf region," said the panel's chairman, Charles Grassley, R-Iowa.

Meanwhile, two members of the House's Tax Writing Committee, Republican Peter King and Democrat Charles Rangel, both of New York, announced that they are introducing legislation to create what would be the nation's largest empowerment zone in which businesses would qualify for tax breaks and low-interest loans for redevelopment projects in hurricane-ravaged communities.

"We want to provide very significant tax incentives for businesses to locate there, incentives for housing, and attempt to minimize as much of the red tape as possible by creating one central clearinghouse for government programs," King said.

Sens. Mary Landrieu, D-La., and David Vitter, R-La., said they are working with other members of the Louisiana congressional delegation on a package of tax breaks and incentives to facilitate recovery in Louisiana. One component will be "bridge loans" to enable struggling businesses to get back on their feet quickly.

Daniel Hamermesh, a labor economist at the University of Texas in Austin, said that while Congress is focusing on tax incentives and loans, the real key to getting businesses to come back to metro New Orleans is "restoration of key infrastructure as quickly as possible." He said the city could also draw a lot of interest by redeveloping in a manner that takes advantage of the latest technologies, perhaps becoming the first city almost entirely focused on wireless telecommunications rather than relying on traditional copper wires.

Jack Kemp, a Republican who headed the Housing and Urban Development Department for President George H.W. Bush, said that a large-scale empowerment zone, along with subsidies for businesses that hire displaced workers and fewer regulations on building, would be important inducements for companies deciding whether to return to hurricane-ravaged communities. He said that fewer regulations could speed the recovery, but that there should be strong regulations to limit development in flood-prone communities.

It won't be easy for small businesses displaced by Hurricane Katrina, said Brian Drum, president and CEO of Drum Associates, an executive search agency in lower Manhattan. After the World Trade Center towers collapsed in 2001, about 300 yards from the firm's own office building, the company went overnight from its best economic returns to "zero" sales. "Our office was unusable, and we came pretty close to running out of cash," he said.

He said his company was eventually able to recover, retaining most of its original employees and even lately expanding its staff from 32 to 35 workers.

"I know this is not something any business would want, and the challenges facing those in New Orleans are greater than what we faced because we at least had our homes, but it does provide an opportunity to start over with the benefit of all that you've learned in the years since you started your business," Drum said. "All off us know so much more than when we started."

The Senate package, unveiled Monday by Grassley and the Finance Committee's top Democrat, Max Baucus, D-Montana, includes the following provisions:

▶ No tax liability for debts forgiven by commercial lenders. Currently, a forgiveness of debts is considered income and therefore taxable.

▶ Eliminates penalties for early withdrawal from retirement plans for those in the hurricane-affected communities.

▶ Extension of a tax credit for businesses that hire welfare recipients to include those who lost work because of the hurricane. The credit would apply to businesses that hire displaced workers who have moved into their communities through Aug. 28, 2006, and for businesses within the federally declared disaster area through Aug. 28, 2008.

▶ A 40 percent tax credit for wages paid up to $6,000 if paid after August 28, 2005, and before Dec. 31, 2005, for employers located in the disaster zone.

▶ An additional $500 exemption from federal income taxes for people who take in a hurricane evacuee for a minimum of 60 days in their principal residences.

▶ Provide an enhanced tax deduction for businesses that donate food to relief efforts.

▶ Extend deadlines for up to one year to file tax returns and make payments and deposits for income, estate and gift taxes.

Relieved Jeff school officials plan for comeback

Damage not as bad as many had feared

By Rob Nelson
Staff writer

In a T-shirt, jeans and sneakers, Paul Solis Elementary School Principal Ginny Dufrene spent most of Tuesday with coworkers cleaning up the Terrytown school, where electricity is spotty and the air conditioner is still on the fritz.

The school suffered roof damage, with winds scattering insulation and shingles across the campus. Still, only one of the school's nearly 40 classrooms saw significant flooding.

"It's nothing we can't handle," Dufrene said, applauding National Guard troops who helped clean debris outside. "It looks worse than what it is from the outside. I think we're going to be OK."

Despite lingering uncertainty about the Jefferson Parish public school system's fiscal stability, Superintendent Diane Roussel told principals to return to their schools Tuesday for damage assessment and preparation for students' return. Since the storm, the school system has shifted its administrative operations to Baton Rouge.

At a School Board meeting last week, its first since Hurricane Katrina struck on Aug. 29, the board approved a resolution setting Oct. 3 as the targeted reopening of schools, though officials admit some schools might open later that week.

The board has called for another emergency meeting in Baton Rouge today to begin discussions on system finances and other issues, system spokesman Jeff Nowakowski said Tuesday.

Including Solis, Jefferson has classified nine schools as the most severely damaged in the parish, and Nowakowski said the School Board must decide what do with those.

The other schools are East Jefferson High School, Bonnabel High School, L.W. Ruppel Elementary School, Ames Elementary, Lincoln Elementary, Shirley Johnson/Gretna Park Elementary, Woodmere Elementary School and the Thomas Jefferson High School, which was slated to open for the 2006-07 school year. An adult education building in Gretna was being converted into the magnet high school.

Overall, about 42 of the system's schools, about half, are expected to be useable by the Oct. 3 reopening target date.

Despite her school's ranking on the "hit list," Dufrene said the damage at Solis is not as bad as feared and that the school could be ready in October.

On Tuesday, principals also tried to get a handle on what work will be needed to open classrooms to students. At Woodmere Elementary in Marrero, twisted metal was strewn across the campus, the school's roof destroyed by Katrina.

At the Marrero-Estelle Fire Station next door, Principal Gretchen Williams, who returned to town Tuesday after fleeing to Noble, said the extensive damage took her breath away but that it is far from insurmountable.

"I know it's going to be an opportunity for us to improve a lot of things parishwide," she said. "We lost some things, but not everything. We didn't lose the will to keep going."

Williams said Woodmere may not be ready for the Oct. 3 reopening date, but she said she is confident her students and the school system will move forward.

She already has a motto, calling Katrina's damage "a minor setback for a major comeback."

Despite being named by the Jefferson Parish School Board as one of the most severely damaged schools in the parish, Dufrene is confident that Solis will be ready for the planned Oct. 3 reopening date for public schools. 'It looks worse than what it is from the outside,' Dufrene said. 'I think we're going to be OK.'

3 West Bank cities will be reopened to residents

Rest of Jefferson being evaluated

By Matt Scallan
Staff writer

Three West Jefferson cities invited their residents home to stay beginning today at 5 a.m. The mayors of Westwego, Gretna and Jean Lafitte say conditions are good enough to bring residents home.

"These cities have what it takes to have sustainable living," Parish President Aaron Broussard said Tuesday, saying the three cities provide their own water and sewer services and that electricity in those areas has been largely restored.

Jefferson Parish has been closed to residents since Thursday to give utility repair crews more room to work.

Broussard said he will discuss conditions with the mayors of Kenner and Harahan today. Those cities provide their residents sewer service but use the Jefferson Parish water system, which is still under repair.

Broussard said too much work remains in unincorporated Jefferson Parish to open up the parish to all residents.

Mayors Ronnie Harris of Gretna and Robert Billiot of Westwego said stores in their cities are beginning to open but that they need customers. Mayor Tim Kerner of Jean Lafitte said one store is open there and that returning residents should bring provisions.

"We think we're ready for our people to come back," Harris said.

However, returnees should be prepared to show identification to prove they are residents or business owners or employees, eligible to enter under the parish's "Jump Start Jefferson" plan.

Plaquemines Parish residents also will be allowed into the parish because Jefferson Parish is a major access route into the area, Broussard said.

To accommodate the returnees, the parish is altering its curfew to a more lenient 5 a.m. to 8 p.m.

Gretna Police Chief Arthur Lawson said his department would mount checkpoints throughout the city at night to keep people who have no business in the city away.

Gretna has 17,000 residents, Westwego has 11,000 residents and Jean Lafitte has about 2,200 residents. The cities make up only 7 percent of the parish's population, but they will give some businesses the economic traction to reopen.

"There are a lot of Jefferson business owners who are trying to make a decision about whether to stay here or relocate," Broussard said. "This is to show them that we are well ahead of my self-imposed three-week deadline to reopen the parish to everyone."

Broussard predicted that Jefferson will become the staging area for the reconstruction of New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish.

"I predict that every house that was on the market before the storm will be sold and that every vacant apartment will be filled."

State seeks $2.4 billion from U.S. to pay teachers

N.O. schools' plans to be revealed today

By Mark Waller, Lynne Jensen and Rob Nelson
Staff writers

With about 25,700 Louisiana public school employees displaced by Hurricane Katrina and three local systems warning they will soon run out of money to pay their workers, state Education Superintendent Cecil Picard said Tuesday that he is asking Congress for $2.4 billion to help cover salaries and benefits of educators left without open schools.

The money would help Louisiana avoid permanently losing many of its displaced teachers, Picard said.

"Keeping educational staff is critical," Picard said. "We want them to return to Louisiana."

At the same time, however, New Orleans school officials advised their employees to look for new jobs elsewhere, according to officials with the school system and its financial management firm, Alvarez and Marsal, who will gather this morning to announce the fate of the system.

"These people are not being laid off," said Bill Roberti, chief restructuring officer for Alvarez and Marsal. Still, he urged employees to seek unemployment benefits if necessary. "We'd like to have them come back."

Acting Orleans Superintendent Ora Watson said teachers will be paid salaries that the school system already owes them but that, "We are encouraging them to get another job if they can get another job."

Last week, Alvarez and Marsal and Orleans school officials "had to go in with police escort" to retrieve back-up tapes containing payroll information to pay employees, spokesman Steven Alschuler said. At a news conference today, Orleans officials plan to announce the fate of the system and "we'll be able to tell people how they can get paid," he said.

"We would love to pay everybody what they deserve, but we don't have the money or the students. It's like any other business: If you're out of business, you don't continue to pay ... employees."

"We would love to pay everybody what they deserve, but we don't have the money or the students," said Orleans School Board member Jimmy Fahrenholtz. "It's like any other business: If you're out of business, you don't continue to pay ... employees."

The School Board will meet Thursday to "talk about everything," concerning the fate of public schools, he said.

A telephone hot line for Orleans employee information is (877) 771-5800.

In Jefferson Parish, officials said the school system could be weeks away from bankruptcy without an infusion of federal cash. They might use a second emergency School Board meeting in Baton Rouge today to begin discussing layoffs, system spokesman Jeff Nowakowski said.

Jefferson school leaders met with Federal Emergency Management Agency officials Tuesday and learned that FEMA's grant programs can help pay for construction and rebuilding but that no such programs exist for operational expenses, including salaries, Nowakowski said.

Jo Ann Rossell and Jennifer Mehaffie apply for jobs Tuesday with St. Charles Parish public schools. They used to work at W. Smith Jr. Elementary School in St. Bernard Parish, which will continue to pay its teachers through Thursday.

The district's $24 million in reserves can cover only the next two paycheck cycles, one on Thursday and another on Sept. 30, he said. After that, he said, finances remain very much unclear in the system's $330 million annual budget.

"We just don't know," Nowakowski said.

Picard's request for the $2.4 billion aid package could be Jefferson's only remaining hope to keep the system financially afloat, Nowakowski said.

The recovery and solvency of Jefferson schools have become particularly critical as officials expect displaced residents from far more devastated parishes of Orleans, Plaquemines and St. Bernard perhaps to send their children to Jefferson schools. Jefferson has set Oct. 3 as the target to reopen at least some schools.

Enrollment among Jefferson residents remains unclear in light of massive evacuations and relocations, but Jefferson officials are encouraging the influx from other areas as another means of financially strengthening the district.

Under the state's school financing formula, local school systems receive money largely based on student enrollment.

"We need dollars, which means we need students," Nowakowski said.

Typically, the state determines a school system's official enrollment based on student attendance on Oct. 1 of each school year, a process thrown into uncertainty since Katrina struck the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29.

In St. Bernard Parish, officials said the school system will pay employees until Thursday. But Superintendent Doris Voitier said Monday that payments cannot continue in the future without a bailout from state or federal governments.

Not only is St. Bernard facing the threat of losing its per-pupil state financing, but also revenues from sales and property taxes are uncertain in the almost entirely destroyed parish. She urged teachers to find employment in other school systems for the rest of the 2005-06 school year.

Louisiana hires firm to help recover bodies

Blanco says FEMA moved too slowly

By Michelle Krupa
Staff writer

Recovery of bodies from the storm-ravaged streets, homes and medical facilities of southeast Louisiana is expected to ramp up by week's end after state and local officials started howling Monday that corpses still dotted sidewalks and occupied long-drained buildings two weeks after Hurricane Katrina's landfall.

State officials announced Tuesday that they had contracted directly with Kenyon International Emergency Services, which has been in the area under federal authority since Sept. 7 collecting the remains of dead hurricane victims. The state stepped in, Gov. Kathleen Blanco said, because federal emergency managers were not moving quickly enough to extend the short-term contract, which was set to expire Tuesday.

"In death, as in life, our people deserve more respect and dignity," Blanco said Tuesday as the state's official number of those who died as a result of Katrina rose to 423. "The failure to execute a contract for the recovery of our citizens has hurt the speed of recovery efforts."

Meanwhile, a Kenyon spokesman said the company will boost the number of its workers on the ground to handle the increased workload as putrid flood waters recede in the hardest-hit neighborhoods.

"Our numbers will increase," spokesman Bill Berry said. "We are prepared now to grow to meet the need. We would expect to see the roughly 115 people to increase by the tens and twenties at least, if not more."

Kenyon, which worked at the World Trade Center site in 2001 and retrieved bodies of Australian citizens in Thailand after last year's tsunami, arrived in the New Orleans area nine days after Katrina under a short-term agreement with the Federal Emergency Management Agency to support the state's Department of Health and Hospitals in its recovery of corpses.

Members of the military search a home Friday in the Lower 9th Ward. Officials estimated that as many as 10,000 people have remained in the city, despite most of it being deluged with murky water with a stench so strong that crews smell it 300 feet in the air.

Under that arrangement, Berry said, Kenyon personnel, who are required to wear hazardous-material-proof suits and undergo toxic decontamination daily, were living at a Baton Rouge funeral home and commuting about four hours round-trip to visit work zones. They also traveled in civilian vans that could not access areas that had a few feet of water or downed trees, he said.

"Nothing was made available to us," he said. "We have simply asked for that relief, and it had not yet been found."

A FEMA spokesman could not be reached to respond to those comments.

Berry said the state deal promises his company "proper lodging" somewhere in New Orleans, military vehicles to trudge through severely damaged areas and a central communications truck to dispatch tips about the location of corpses to forensic retrieval teams in the field.

"We will have more commitment from the Louisiana National Guard in their support and escort duties," Berry said. "Things are just moving very effectively. They were already beginning to develop, but this is simply going to give us the might of the state of Louisiana that has the governor saying, 'Bring my people home. It has been long enough.'"

David Passey, a FEMA spokesman, could not say why active-duty and National Guard soldiers have not been participating in body collection even though they constitute the largest relief personnel presence in the New Orleans area.

"I don't know that they can't," Passey said. He speculated that it might be because state and federal authorities want to be sure the process is handled "with dignity" by people with experience in such delicate tasks. Another FEMA spokesman, Ricardo Zuniga, said Monday that the agency's policy bars military and municipal police officers from touching the bodies, except to tag them and report their location to other authorities.

"The general feeling is that if you have people who are trained and experienced, there's less likelihood that there would be a disturbance that would affect the identification of that individual," Passey said.

Berry said Kenyon aims to collect corpses intact or in as "physically compact a group of remains as possible." He said victims have been found in various states: in large groups at nursing homes; floating in flooded basements amid bobbing machinery; and alone on city sidewalks.

"We're finding remains in many different conditions," he said, adding that the recovery process is handled in a dignified manner based on "cultural" norms. No religious services are conducted at the site of retrieval.

Blanco aides did not say how long Kenyon will be retained or how much it will be paid. Passey said the state will be reimbursed under FEMA's public-assistance program for any money it spends on corpse retrieval.

RECOVERING THE DEAD

FEMA's Disaster Mortuary Operations and Response Team or DMORT, oversees the grim task of processing the hurricane's dead.

After a body is located:

▶ Body is removed from a marked location. Details are noted at the scene, like address or personal belongings.

▶ Refrigeration trucks escorted by police take the dead to a morgue that can handle 144 bodies a day.

At the morgue:

▶ Body is numbered and is decontaminated for forensic purposes and to protect specialists.

▶ Personal identifications are catalogued and photos taken.

▶ Identification tests are made. Notes are made of scars that might reveal a specific surgery.

▶ The body is prepared for storage.

Evidence of a crime:

▶ A person is assigned to track each body through the process; if there is evidence of a crime, such as a gunshot, the coroner takes over.

Cause of death:

▶ Coroner determines cause of death, signs death certificate and releases body to family.

JUDGE ROBERT PITRE, chief judge of the 24th Judicial District Court in Gretna

Yenni building repairs could take year

But offices often frequented by public largely OK

By Joe Darby
Staff writer

The top floors of the Joseph S. Yenni Building, Jefferson Parish's main government facility on the east bank, were severely damaged by Hurricane Katrina, and repairs could take up to a year.

"The roof opened up right over (deputy chief administrative assistant) Deano Bonano's office" on the top floor, Jefferson Parish Councilman-at-large John Young said. "It was a pretty big break. Then all the rainwater came in."

Damage was severe to some offices on the seventh, eighth, ninth and 10th floors, he said, adding that renovation of the 10-story structure could take nine to 12 months. However, the second-floor Parish Council chambers and other offices frequented by the public probably can be accessed much sooner, Young said.

Judge Robert Pitre, chief judge of the 24th Judicial District Court in Gretna, tempered the bad news about the Yenni Building with word that the Jefferson Parish Clerk of Court's office will begin to accept legal filings in the new government building in Gretna within a few days.

Speaking after a meeting of judicial, law enforcement and other parish officials Tuesday afternoon, Pitre said the 24th Judicial District Court hopes to begin conducting civil and criminal hearings and non-jury trials by Oct. 10.

The Louisiana Supreme Court has granted Jefferson's district court a suspension of judicial activity from the time of the hurricane to Oct. 1. That means the time prosecutors have to provide a defendant with a speedy trial will be lengthened.

No jury trials are likely until about Jan. 1, Pitre said, because there probably won't be enough Jefferson residents returning to their homes before then to provide a sufficient jury pool. "And people are going to be worrying about fixing their houses rather than serving on juries," he said.

Prisoners won't return to the Jefferson Parish Correctional Center until Nov. 1, he said.

Pitre said the judges will try to make arrangements with West Jefferson Medical Center and East Jefferson General Hospital to provide constitutionally mandated medical care for prisoners because Charity Hospital will not be available.

Judges already are handling bond settings, sometimes by telephone and sometimes in person, for newly arrested Jefferson prisoners being held temporarily at state prison facilities. Prosecutors will screen new cases as soon as sheriff's deputies can get the paperwork to them, Pitre said.

The power of hope.

Volunteer worker gives comfort and hope.

Our hearts go out to them. Our thoughts are with them. But what they really need, is our donations. That's why Entergy has established a fund to help those who were impacted by Hurricane Katrina. The fund, called the Power of Hope, will be used to help disaster victims rebuild their lives in the aftermath of the storm. Entergy Corporation has started the fund with a corporate contribution of $1 million.

As Entergy continues the largest power restoration in our company's history, we are equally concerned about reaching out to help our neighbors restore their lives. Together, we can rebuild and put this storm behind us. Because the power of Katrina is no match for the power of hope.

Nagin says Bush initially got 'bad information' about storm

better than expected.

"I'm starting to get into the mode of how do we re-open the city," Nagin said, speaking from the steps of Washington Artillery Park in the French Quarter, one of four areas targeted for early reopening. The others are Algiers, the Central Business District and dry parts of Uptown. "We are out of nuclear crisis mode and are in to day-to-day crisis mode," Nagin said.

Nagin did not deny that the city continues to face daunting challenges. Though he backtracked from earlier comments that New Orleans is "bankrupt," the mayor said the city coffers have been drained. City workers were paid electronically for the most recent payroll cycle, but there's nothing left to pay the contractors busy scraping gargantuan piles of trash and fallen tree limbs out of unflooded areas.

New Orleans is negotiating a line of credit to see it through the end of the year, and it is relying on the charity and faith of thousands, said Nagin, who is setting up a nonprofit agency to receive tax-deductible donations to the relief effort that have been pouring in from around the world. In the meantime, companies are continuing to work based on the assumption the city will get access to money, Nagin said.

Standing water covers many parts of the city, Nagin said, though he acknowledged that it is drying out faster than initially projected as additional pumping stations come back on line, notably Pumping Station No. 6 on the 17th Street Canal, the "big daddy" of pumping stations, as Nagin called it. A drive Tuesday through the Lower 9th Ward revealed mostly dry streets.

Nagin noted that the pumping station that drains Interstate 10 as it dips below the Southern Railroad overpass near the Jefferson Parish line also is working again and that the all-important supply route into the city from the west should be usable in a few days.

'They'll come back'

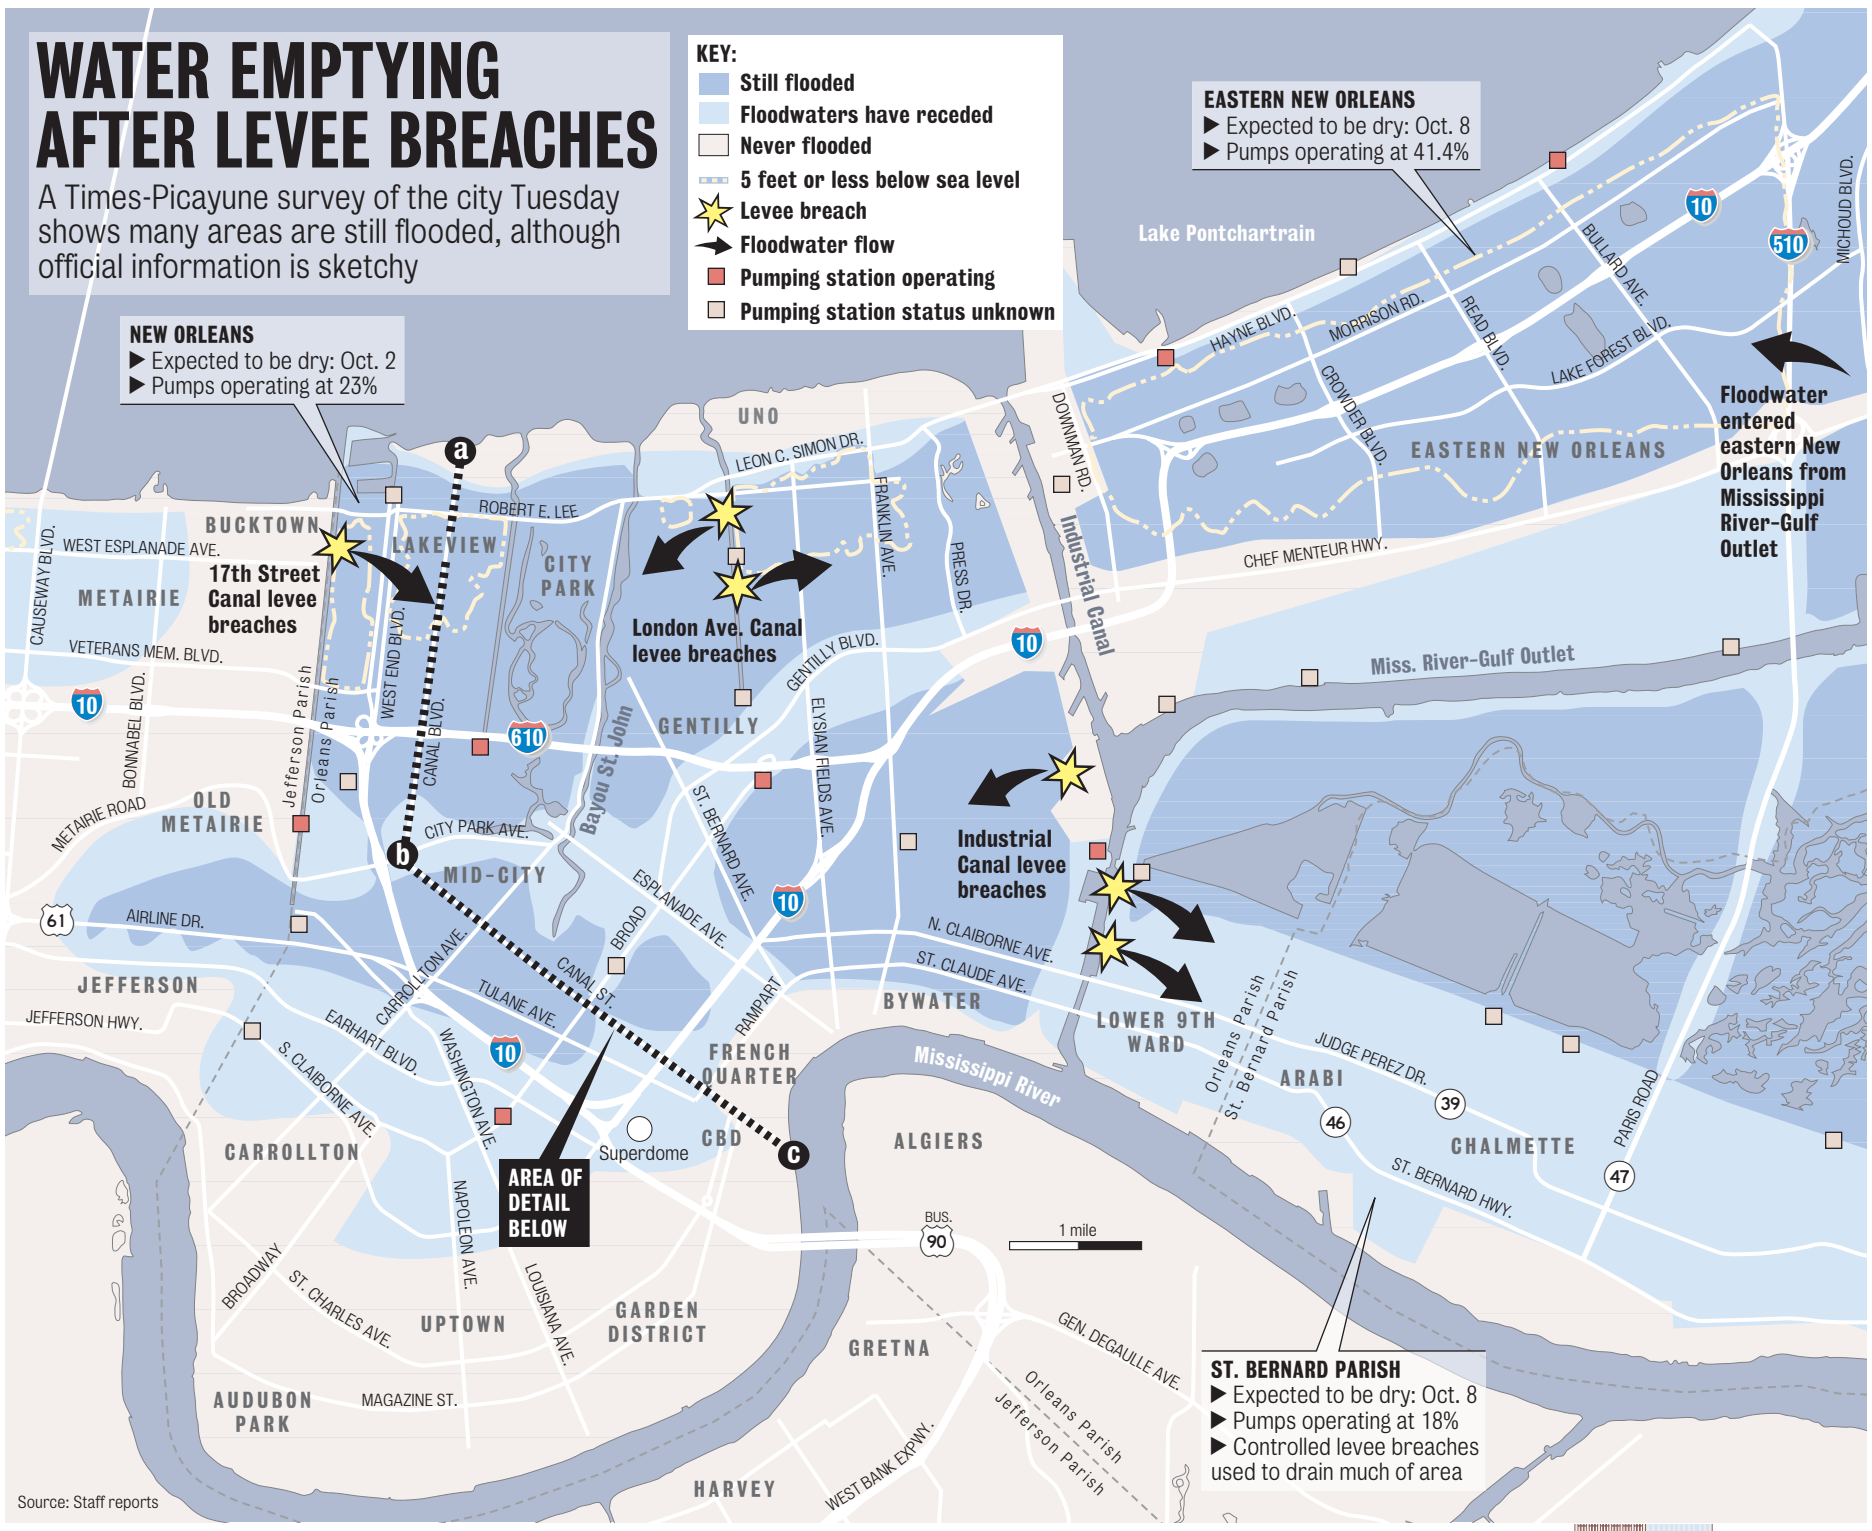
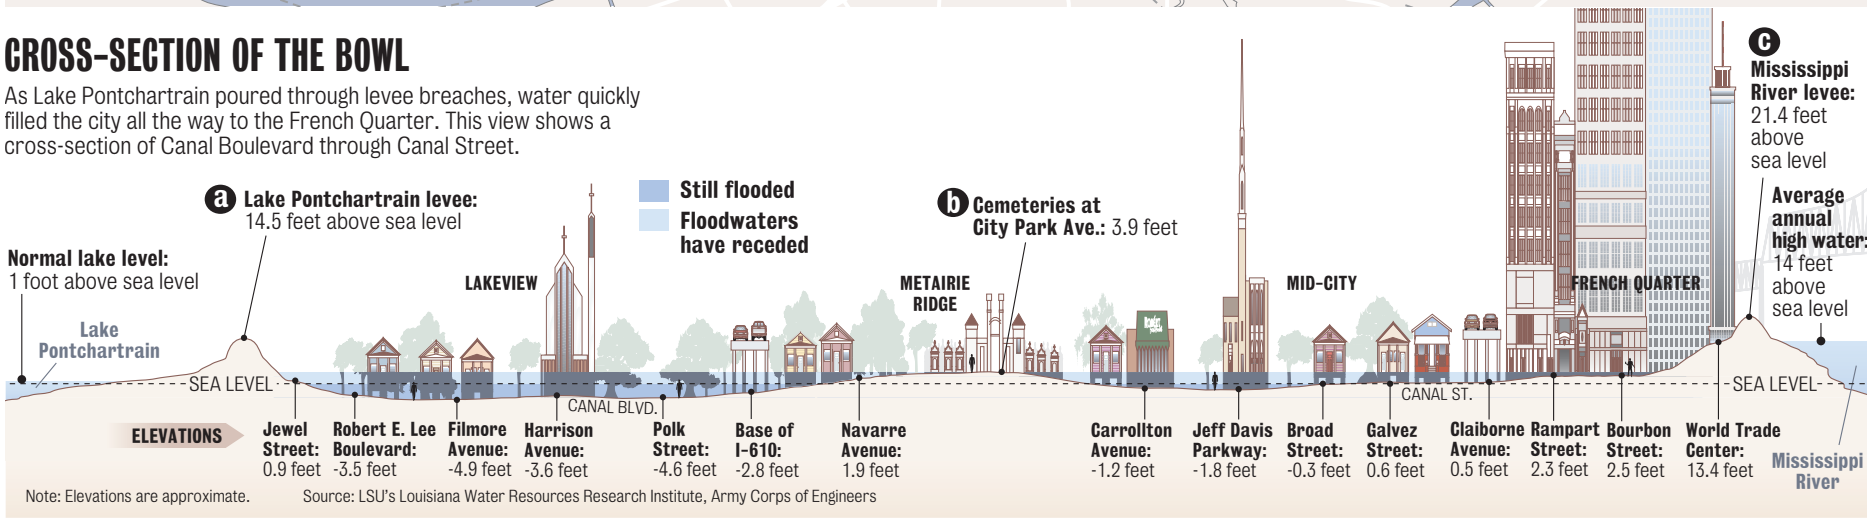
Nagin, wearing a New Orleans Hornets polo shirt and in a generally ebullient mood, predicted a big comeback for the ravaged city.

"I know New Orleanians, and once the beignets are in the oven, once the gumbo is in the pot, and red beans and rice are being served on Mondays, they'll come back," he said.

As he spoke, helicopters occasionally clattered overhead and fire engines wailed in the distance, a soundtrack familiar to the roughly 3,000 people still burrowed in the city's unflooded homes and buildings.



"I'm tired of hearing these helicopters," the mayor said. "I want to hear some jazz."



That won't happen, however, before the federal Environmental Protection Agency delivers the report Nagin requested. Preliminary information from the EPA "looks good," Nagin said, adding that he might have the full report later in the day .

Algiers, which was spared the brunt of Katrina's wrath and which was never subject to the ongoing but sporadically enforced evacuation, already has potable water and working sewerage, and power is being restored there quickly.

"My guess would be Monday," Nagin said when asked for a return date to the four designated areas. "Once the dust settles, you're going to have 150,000 people in New Orleans," he said.

Nagin conceded the return of residents could create some confusion and perhaps complicate the sprawling relief effort to restore power and drinkable water to the city's east bank. He plans to enforce a dusk-to-dawn curfew. But a return to the normal rhythms of city life is preferable to the current ghost town, he said.

David Smith gives the floors at Bandito's Restaurant and Tequila Bar a good scrubbing Tuesday in the CBD. Despite early predictions that it would be months before the city's businesses would be able to again open their doors, many are hoping it will be much sooner — and they are preparing for that eventuality.

Change in tone

When questions turned to the broader controversies swirling around the hurricane and the government responses at every level, Nagin abandoned earlier belligerence in favor of a more diplomatic approach. He said he thinks President Bush, with whom he has twice toured the city, got "bad information" in the hours after the storm but since then has offered unequivocal support.

Nagin conceded that officials at every level probably made mistakes.

"In the final analysis, we could have all done things better," he said, adding that, for his part, he would have reacted differently had he known significant federal help was not going to arrive for two or three days. In general, officials said, the problem was not a lack of will or alacrity, but the storm's unsurpassed fury.

"The system didn't break down," said Terry Ebbert, the homeland security chief in New Orleans. "The system just wasn't designed to handle something so catastrophic."

Nagin also began to unveil his plans for a committee that "will define how the city will be rebuilt." It will include 16 business and community leaders, eight of them black and eight of them white, he said.

"The storm was a giant reset button, in my opinion," he said.

Among the committee's charges, he said, would be to "make sure we stay unique."

He pointed to the redevelopment of the former St. Thomas housing development as a model that could be replicated in other parts of town.

Power to the people

In the more immediate future, Nagin said he is hopeful that safe water and power will quickly be restored.

Entergy CEO Dan Packer said 264,000 customers, the vast majority of whom are in the New Orleans area, remain without power, down from a record 1.1 million immediately after the storm. He estimated power would be fully restored to the CBD within two weeks, and to Uptown and the French Quarter within a month.

Power already has been restored to much of Algiers, a neighborhood where Nagin said anyone who has "a few pennies might want to buy a lot of dirt" across the river, since property values will likely skyrocket as those displaced by the storm and wanting to remain in New Orleans seek high and dry neighborhoods.

Officials expect Algiers to have full power within days.

This week, about 200 temporary permits were issued to businesses in the CBD needing to make emergency repairs or recover essential documents or equipment. Although Nagin said the city "screwed up" that process by giving out incorrect information about how to obtain permits, he promised the permitting process will soon be back on track. Anyone seeking a permit should call (504) 599-5541, according to the New Orleans Police Department.

Once residents return, the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center will become a temporary general store, with retailers – likely including Wal-Mart, Home Depot and Lowe's – addressing "essential needs" until other businesses begin operating again, Nagin said.

Two hospitals, Touro and Children's, should be ready to reopen "in the next day or two," although getting staff back could take longer, Nagin said.

Noting the heavy local military presence, Nagin said the city is "probably the safest it's been in many, many years."

He said he has been assured the military will remain in the city as long as it's deemed necessary, but he did not venture a guess as to when that might be.

"Once we get people back, we'll do a hard assessment of what our security needs are," Nagin said.

Simulation to help Louisiana prepare for the next hurricane

SURGE, from A-1

Gulfport area.

The computer model — done on a Louisiana State University supercomputer — was created with a program called AdCirc that's used by the Army Corps of Engineers, the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other agencies to model storm surge dynamics.

Researchers from LSU and the corps will study the computer simulation to help reconstruct what happened during the Aug. 29 storm: which areas were flooded when, how levee and drainage systems performed – or failed to. They will look for clues on how to engineer the landscape for the next hurricane.

AdCirc, developed by researchers at five universities, the corps and the Navy, is considered the state-of-the-art program for storm surge modeling. It creates a virtual landscape, including detailed data on ocean, lake and river depths, and ground and levee heights relative to sea level. Using basic fluid dynamic equations, it shows how a wind-driven storm surge forms and moves across open water, then rises up and changes shape as it hits land.

The Katrina model is still a work in progress, said Joannes Westerink, the University of Notre Dame engineering professor who is overseeing the simulation. For example, the current version shows extensive flooding in East Jefferson Parish that did not occur. The error occurred because of incorrect data on the floodwalls and other features in AdCirc's virtual landscape that are being corrected.

The model dramatically illustrates how over 36 hours Katrina's enormous surge built up against the fragile Mississippi Delta, overwhelming New Orleans from the east and via Lake Pontchartrain, then barreled into the Mississippi Gulf Coast.

It shows water from the huge wave moving against levees and rising as much as 15 feet along the lower Mississippi's east bank a full day before the storm makes landfall. The area of deep water expands and moves northward toward New Orleans.

"That's what is piling up that water," Westerink said. "All of this flow is building up because it's being caught by something – shallow water or the levees."

COMPUTER MODEL OF KATRINA'S STORM SURGE

A state-of-the-art computer model called AdCirc, done on a Louisiana State University supercomputer, shows how over 36 hours Katrina's enormous surge built up against the fragile Mississippi Delta, overwhelming New Orleans from the east and via Lake Pontchartrain, then barreling into the Mississippi Gulf Coast.

IMAGE ONE: As the storm approaches, a 15-foot dome of water forms a day before landfall in the Gulf of Mexico, driven by 140-mph winds into the levees east of the city, flooding eastern New Orleans, the city's Lower 9th Ward and St. Bernard Parish. The area of deep water expands and moves northward toward New Orleans, piling up as it goes.

IMAGE TWO: As the storm moves closer to New Orleans, the model shows northeasterly winds pushing a wall of water directly against the hurricane levee adjacent to the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet and over the top, flooding St. Bernard Parish and the Lower 9th Ward. The model shows Katrina's surge rising above hurricane levees that run toward the center of New Orleans, flooding eastern New Orleans, the Industrial Canal and neighborhoods to the west.

IMAGE THREE: Finally, the model shows a north wind pushing water in Lake Pontchartrain against south shore levees and into canals, where breaches flooded the rest of New Orleans. As the wave moves northeast and rises to 30 feet, it batters the Mississippi coast, causing massive destruction.

An array of pumps snakes from a flooded New Orleans neighborhood, sending water back into the Industrial Canal on Monday. A new computer simulation shows how Katrina pushed that water into New Orleans.

As the storm moves closer to New Orleans, the model shows northeasterly winds pushing a wall of water directly against the hurricane levee adjacent to the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet and over the top, flooding St. Bernard Parish and the Lower 9th Ward. Photographs and surveys show that levees in the area took heavy damage in the storm.

The model shows Katrina's surge rising above hurricane levees that run toward the center of New Orleans, flooding eastern New Orleans, the Industrial Canal and neighborhoods to the west.

As Katrina moves toward Mississippi, the model shows a north wind pushing water in Lake Pontchartrain against south shore levees and into canals, where the rest of New Orleans flooded via the canal breaches. Finally, the wave rises up 30 feet as it hits the Mississippi coast, where it caused massive destruction.

The model may not resolve a key question facing corps investigators and other researchers: how floodwall breaches formed. Corps officials say the canal floodwalls were probably topped and their structures eroded from the inside, but LSU researchers have cast doubt on that scenario, in part because some data indicate water wasn't high enough.

The model does not show water in canals topping levees. But it does show lakefront surge heights may have reached 12 feet or more, which could have been enough to top levees or floodwalls, which are built to withstand a maximum surge of 11.5 feet.

An animation of the computer model can be found at http://www.nd.edu/~adcirc/katrina.htm.

Attorney general says law required evacuation

NURSING HOME, from A-1

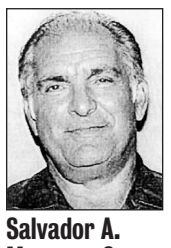
Foti said.

The couple own St. Rita's Nursing Home near Poydras, where Katrina's massive storm surge flooded the one-story building to the ceiling in 30 minutes, overwhelming bed-ridden patients in one of the deadliest storm-related incidents.

The Manganos' attorney, James A. Cobb of New Orleans, said his clients are innocent.



"It's ridiculous to arrest these two people considering the problems with the evacuation at all levels of the government," he said.

As the hurricane raged Aug. 29, neighbors and firefighters rescued about two dozen of the nursing home's residents, many of whom were floated out on their mattresses. But the waters rose too quickly to save the rest, Foti said.

Echoing assertions made last week by parish officials, Foti said Mable Mangano, the home's licensed administrator, refused two evacuation buses

Mable B. Mangano
Allegedly refused two evacuation buses the day before storm

Salvador A. Mangano Sr.
He and his wife each face 34 counts of negligent homicide the day before the storm. He said she also failed to call an ambulance company under contract to provide ambulances and helicopters for patients with special needs.

"They had adequate notice that the worst nightmare for the state of Louisiana was about to occur and they did nothing," he said. "Their inaction resulted in the deaths of these people."

Cobb, the Manganos' attorney, said the couple was concerned that the stress of an evacuation would harm more residents than the storm.

"You are presented with a horrible choice," Cobb said, citing reports of patients from other nursing homes in the New Orleans area who died during previous hurricane evacuations.

But Foti said the nursing home owners had no choice at all. He said they were required by law to follow a mandatory evacuation plan filed with the parish government for hurricanes stronger than Category 2. Katrina made landfall as a Category 4.

"Everyone kept saying over and over that this was the storm of the century," the attorney general said. "I don't know why they decided to stay."

Foti said Mable and Salvador Mangano could not be located after they rode out the storm at the nursing home. After learning that authorities had obtained arrest warrants for them, the couple made arrangements to turn themselves in at the East Baton Rouge Parish Jail, where their bonds had not been set late Tuesday, Foti said.

If convicted, they each face up to five years in prison for each count of negligent homicide.

The decomposing bodies of those who drowned at St. Rita's were removed last week from the still-flooded home. They were taken to a makeshift morgue at a St. Gabriel warehouse, where none has been identified, St. Bernard Parish Coroner Bryan Bertucci said on Tuesday.

In a parish where many families have lived for generations and residents take pride in looking out for one another, the tragedy at St. Rita's has left many searching for answers.

"I don't know what went wrong," said Parish Councilman Tony "Ricky" Melerine, whose district includes the nursing home. "I've known Mable and Sal to be nice, friendly people, but they should have gotten those residents out."

News of the arrests provided no comfort to Debra Marshall of Violet, whose 85-year-old mother, Laura Lae, lived at the home. She said authorities have not been able to tell her whether her mother was rescued or whether she drowned at the home.

"My house was destroyed, but I don't even care about that," said Marshall. "I just want to know what happened to my mother."

The residents rescued from the flooded home were taken by helicopters to a triage area on Interstate 10 in Metairie. From there, they were sent to shelters and hospitals throughout the region, Bertucci said.

"We didn't have time to take names," he said. "People's lives were at stake."

Marshall said her mother uses a wheelchair and is in the advanced stages of Alzheimer's disease. She broke down as she began describing what her mother looks like.

"I don't know what she was wearing, but I had just polished her fingernails," she said through tears. "They were bright pink."

Marshall said she made the difficult decision to evacuate without her mother after the home assured her that she would be safer there.

"One of the managers told me, 'If it's any comfort to you, whatever happens to the patients is going to happen to us, too,'" she said.

After Marshall evacuated, her husband, Michael Marshall, stopped by the nursing home on his way out of town the night before the storm hit. The outer bands of Katrina were already pounding the area with rain when he pulled into the parking lot about 7:30 p.m. on Aug. 28.

"They said they had everything under control," he said. "It seemed like any other night, except the owners were there."

He said he visited his mother-in-law briefly in her room.

"She was having one of her good days," he said. "She was in good spirits, and she recognized who I was."

As usual, he gave her a Hershey's chocolate bar, and she insisted that he eat half of it. The TV in the room was blaring urgent reports about the approaching hurricane, but Michael Marshall said his mother-in-law seemed oblivious to the danger.

"She asked where Debra was, and I told her she was visiting relatives," he said. "Then she said she was going to sleep, and I kissed her good-bye."

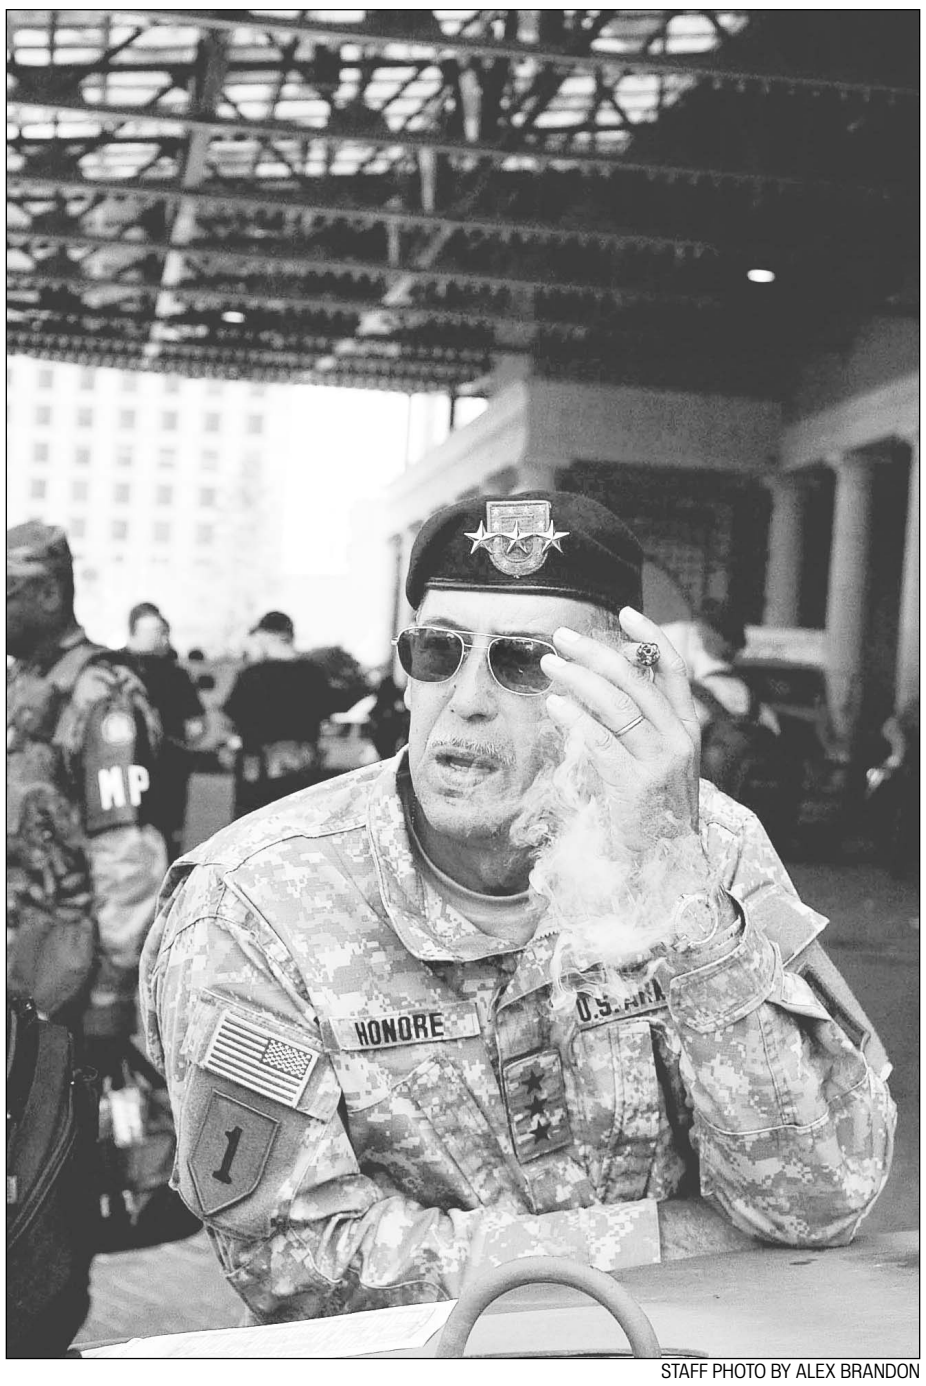
U.S. Army Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honore, who is leading the military response to Hurricane Katrina, said that if he had been attacking the Gulf Coast, he would have used the same tactics as the deadly storm.

Honore said Katrina's wrath amounted to a "classic military maneuver," using overwhelming power and the element of surprise to cripple communications and block transportation routes. And the storm covered its flanks by breeching levees and destroying railroads.

The result was "a disaster of biblical proportions," he told a group of editors and writers from The Times-Picayune on Tuesday.



Honore said the recovery effort, if it can be compared to a football game, is still in the first quarter. The second quarter will start, he said, once the water has been drained and people can get in to assess damage to their property, some of them in areas where houses have taken in so much water that they must be condemned.

"Those places have to have the opportunity to come have closure," he said.

Continuing the football analogy, Honore said people should focus on the future rather than placing blame for a response that many have criticized as too slow.

"We've got three quarters left," he said, adding that it's better to map a strategy rather than berate the players. "Would you want to be told how to attack for the next three quarters, or do you want to be reminded" of bad past performances?

He said he and his troops will be in the area helping Gov. Kathleen Blanco and FEMA save lives until the state can operate on its own.

The recovery effort is "going to have to have a local face on it with federal support," he said.

Honore disputed a well-publicized report of sniper fire on a rescue helicopter at Charity Hospital, noting that it has not been confirmed.

"The hysteria about the sniper was so crazy," he said.

Stock flies off the shelves of Baton Rouge area stores

Evacuees buy maps, cell phones, pillows

By Ronette King
Business writer

BATON ROUGE - Corkscrews, diapers and maps are in short supply in Baton Rouge, thanks to the influx of New Orleanians.

Retailers are accustomed to the usual run on storm supplies – including batteries, water and gas cans – before and immediately after a storm. But the extent of Hurricane Katrina's devastation, coupled with the forced relocation of so many New Orleanians to the state's capital city, is causing a crush at some Baton Rouge area stores.

One Sprint store off Perkins Road ran out of cell phones. The mobile telephone company is experiencing a flood of customers in Baton Rouge and Houma, prompting a run on phones, batteries and car chargers, said Kristin Wallace, a Sprint spokeswoman.

To keep its shelves stocked in Baton Rouge, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. is pulling merchandise from as far away as Searcy, Ark., 50 miles north of Little Rock, in addition to trucking in goods from the three distribution centers that normally serve the area.

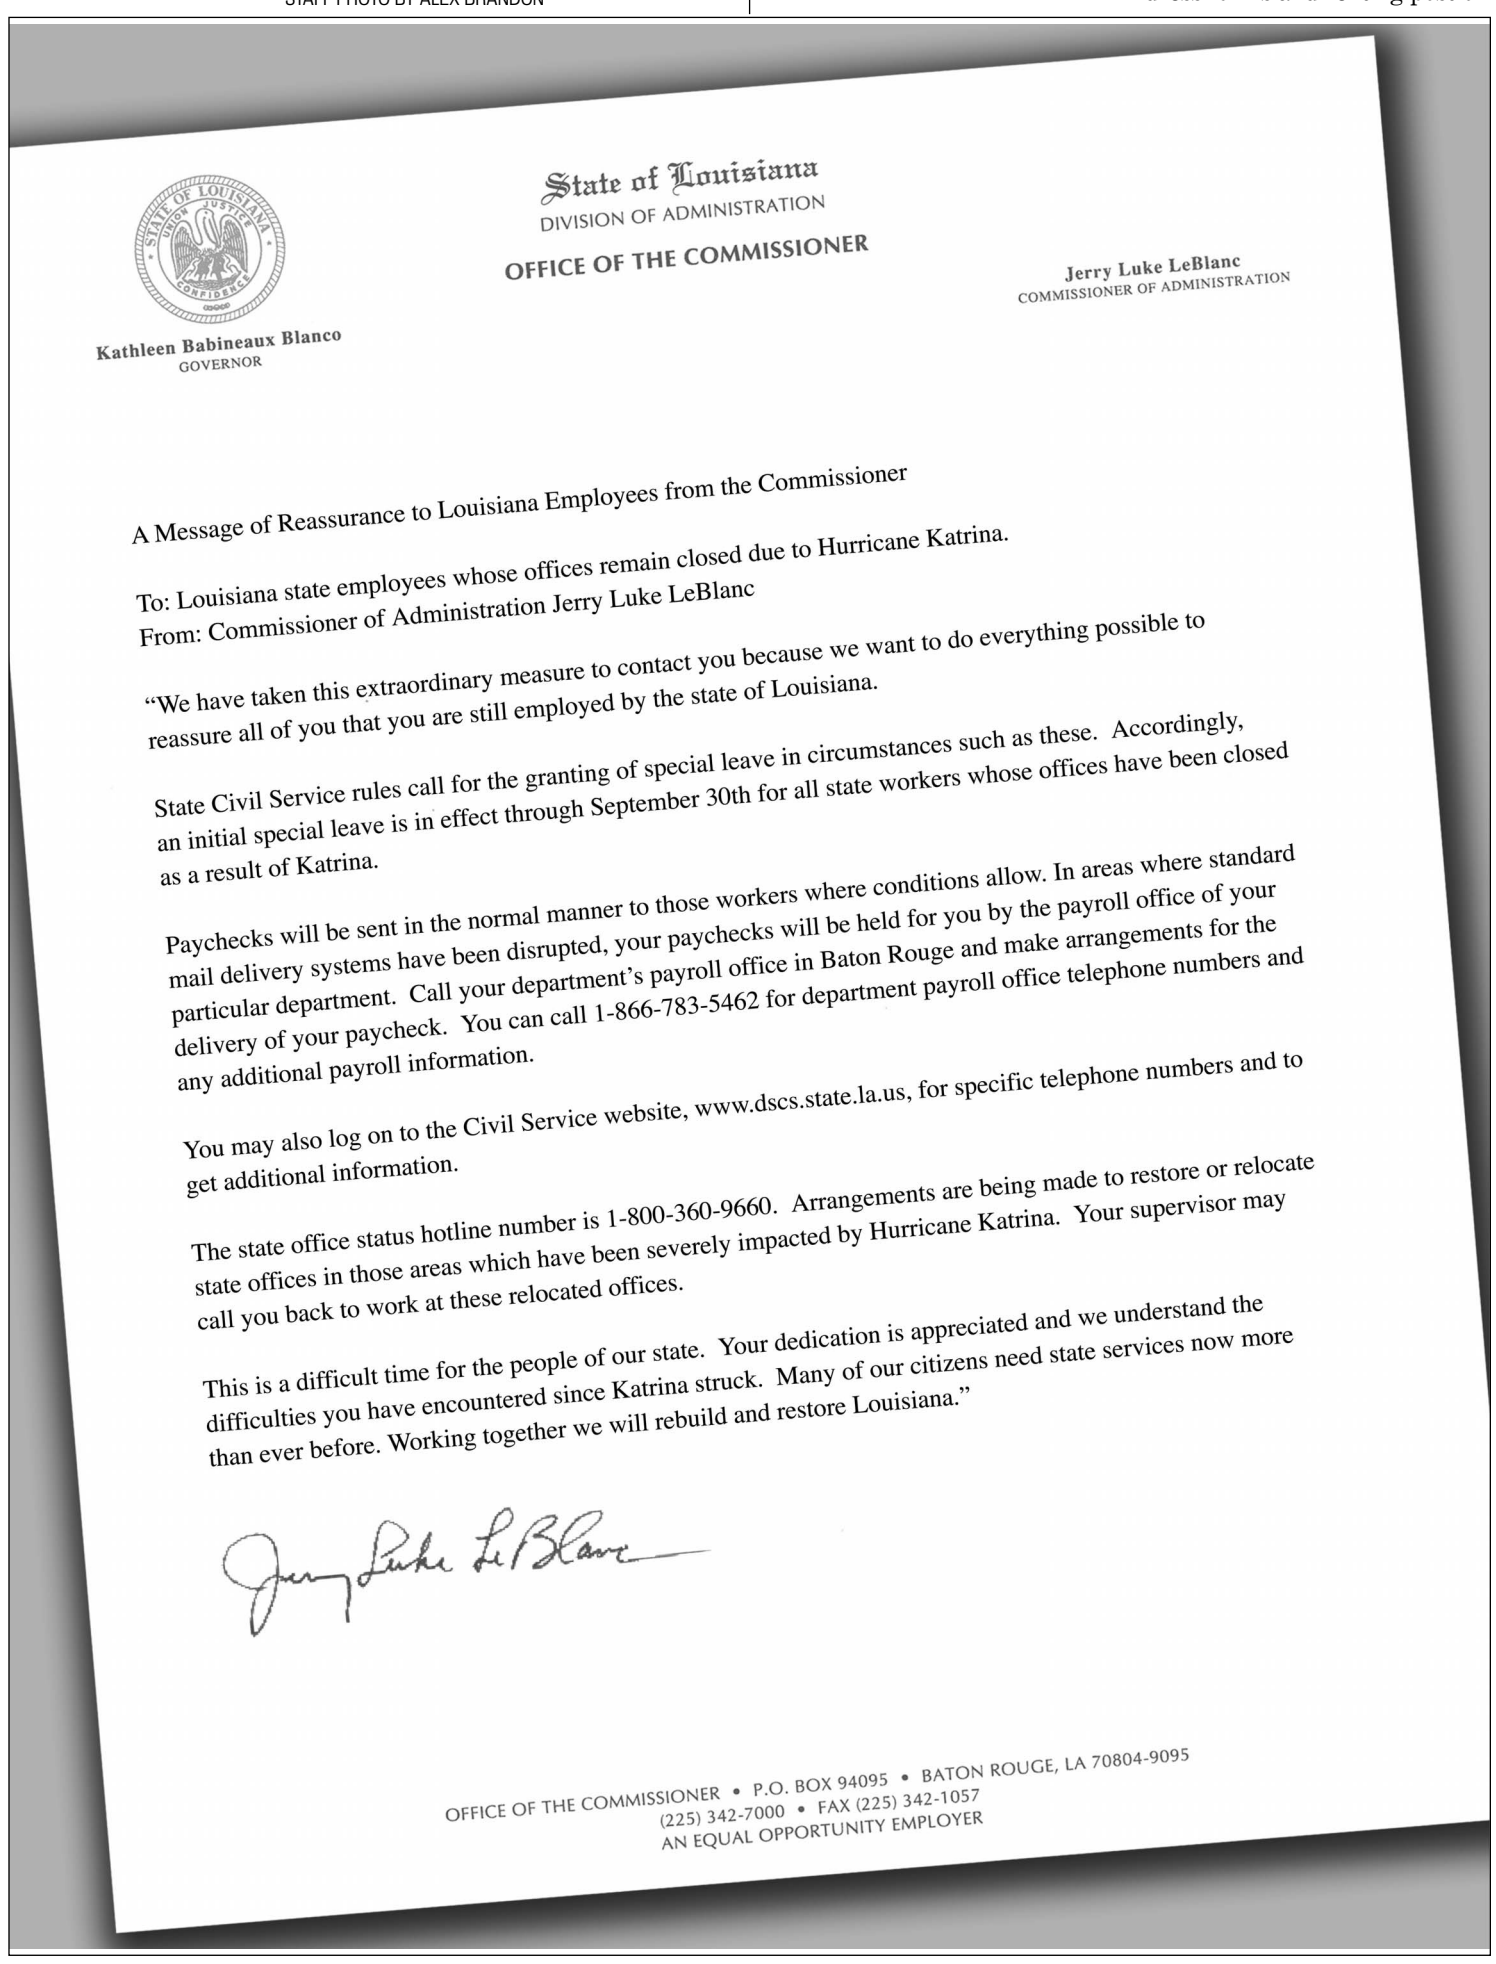
"It's like Christmas every day from a customer-traffic viewpoint" said Wal-Mart spokeswoman Sharon Weber. "It's such an intense time and so many customers are needing things, not just for a few weeks but to set up house and buy things to donate through churches or the Salvation Army."

Stores that normally operate 24 hours are now closing at 10 p.m. to allow workers to concentrate on restocking shelves, Weber said.

Baked lasagna has evidently been on many menus, as the stash of lasagna noodles in town has dwindled. There must be some pralines and yummy desserts out there as well, because brown sugar is in short supply. Coffeemakers and microwave ovens are much needed for new kitchens. Pillows and air mattresses could help soften nights on borrowed floors, if only those comforts can be found.

At some Walgreens pharmacies, customers had to drop off prescriptions by noon and return after 4 pm. And any orders placed after 12 p.m. couldn't be retrieved until the next day. Similar waits were required at Rite Aid pharmacies.

"Some locations in the Baton Rouge area are dispensing two, three or four times as many prescriptions as they normally do," said Walgreens spokesman Michael Polzin.



"A lot of evacuees left the area with nothing or have run out of medication," Polzin said. "That's taking a lot of time with the pharmacy staff, trying to contact the doctor and looking up patient history" to figure out what medication is needed, and sometimes dispense an emergency supply, he said.

Walgreens said it needs extra help at its 17 Baton Rouge area stores, especially pharmacists and pharmacy technicians. Sometimes patients don't know which medications they need, so the pharmacist has to play sleuth, asking what condition the medication was used to treat and what the pill looked like.

"We're hoping our Baton Rouge area customers are patient and understand because of the influx of patients from the New Orleans area" they're very busy, Polzin said. The company has stepped up the number and content of shipments, especially for drugs used to treat chronic conditions such as diabetes, heart disease and high cholesterol.

To process prescriptions faster, Walgreens rolled out a system that allows prescriptions to be scanned into a computer and sent electronically to a store in a neighboring state that isn't as busy. That store then transfers the approval to the pharmacy that will dispense the medication.

A Message of Reassurance to Louisiana Employees from the Commissioner

To: Louisiana state employees whose offices remain closed due to Hurricane Katrina.
From: Commissioner of Administration Jerry Luke LeBlanc

"We have taken this extraordinary measure to contact you because we want to do everything possible to reassure all of you that you are still employed by the state of Louisiana.

State Civil Service rules call for the granting of special leave in circumstances such as these. Accordingly, an initial special leave is in effect through September 30th for all state workers whose offices have been closed as a result of Katrina.

Paychecks will be sent in the normal manner to those workers where conditions allow. In areas where standard mail delivery systems have been disrupted, your paychecks will be held for you by the payroll office of your particular department. Call your department's payroll office in Baton Rouge and make arrangements for the delivery of your paycheck. You can call 1-866-783-5462 for department payroll office telephone numbers and any additional payroll information.

You may also log on to the Civil Service website, www.dscs.state.la.us, for specific telephone numbers and to get additional information.

The state office status hotline number is 1-800-360-9660. Arrangements are being made to restore or relocate state offices in those areas which have been severely impacted by Hurricane Katrina. Your supervisor may call you back to work at these relocated offices.

This is a difficult time for the people of our state. Your dedication is appreciated and we understand the difficulties you have encountered since Katrina struck. Many of our citizens need state services now more than ever before. Working together we will rebuild and restore Louisiana."

Casino damage deals state a difficult hand

Tom Martin of South Windsor, Conn., left, and Doug Mycko of Alberta, Ala., grill burgers for rescue workers Sunday outside the closed Harrah's New Orleans Casino. Harrah's says it doesn't know when it will reopen, but it has continued to make its minimum daily payments to the state.

La. to lose $10 million a month in revenue

By Rebecca Mowbray
Business writer

Louisiana will lose nearly $10 million a month in tax revenue from casinos closed by Hurricane Katrina, officials say.

The three New Orleans area riverboats, which have been closed since Aug. 27, usually generate about $5 million a month in state tax revenue, the Louisiana Gaming Control Board said at its monthly meeting in Baton Rouge on Tuesday.

Nearly one-third of the state's video poker machines, or about 5,000 terminals, were shut down by of the storm. Combined, those machines generate about $4.6 million a month in tax revenue.

But there are some bright spots. The Boomtown and Treasure Chest riverboat casinos say they can reopen soon, which will minimize their tax revenue losses. And Harrah's New Orleans Casino has continued to make its minimum daily payments to the state, even though it is not required to because the casino is closed. Harrah's pays the state about $164,384.56 a day in taxes, or about $5 million a month.

The Belle of Orleans riverboat in eastern New Orleans, formerly known as Bally's, was the hardest hit casino in Louisiana. The boat was ripped from its moorings, the marina was destroyed and the terminal building was damaged. Columbia Sussex Corp., the owner of the vessel, said it doesn't know how long it will take to reopen it and is concerned about what will happen to its business if customers don't return. Still, Gonzalo Hernandez, general manager of the vessel, said Columbia Sussex has no plans to ask to move it.

The Boomtown, on the West Bank, plans to reopen Sept. 30. The Treasure Chest, in Kenner, said it is working on its reopening plan. Harrah's said it has no reopening date set and that it needs to assess the timetable for completing its hotel in light of more pressing construction projects around the city.

Plans for a slots casino at the Fair Grounds Race Course are also likely delayed. Churchill Downs Inc., the owner of the casino, had planned to start construction in September and to open the facility next summer. Whenever the Fair Grounds casino does open, it may be with only 500 slots instead of the 700 that it would get if Harrah's generated $350 million in revenue during a 12-month period. Harrah's had been projected to reach that threshold in the spring, but now the 12-month clock will need to be restarted when Harrah's reopens.

Meanwhile, about 3,771 video poker machines remained out of service Tuesday from the storm and will likely need to be replaced because of water damage. The gaming board passed an emergency measure temporarily suspending a rule that video poker operators whose machines are out of service for 30 days will lose their licenses.

State treasurer wants safeguard for Katrina funds

Auditors should review expenditures, he says

By Jan Moller
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — As state and parish government agencies prepare to recoup billions of federal dollars in costs associated with Hurricane Katrina, state Treasurer John Kennedy said Monday that there are not enough safeguards in place to prevent fraud, waste and abuse.

Kennedy said he has complained to Gov. Kathleen Blanco about a decision to let the Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness serve as the main conduit for Federal Emergency Management Agency money expected to begin flowing this week.

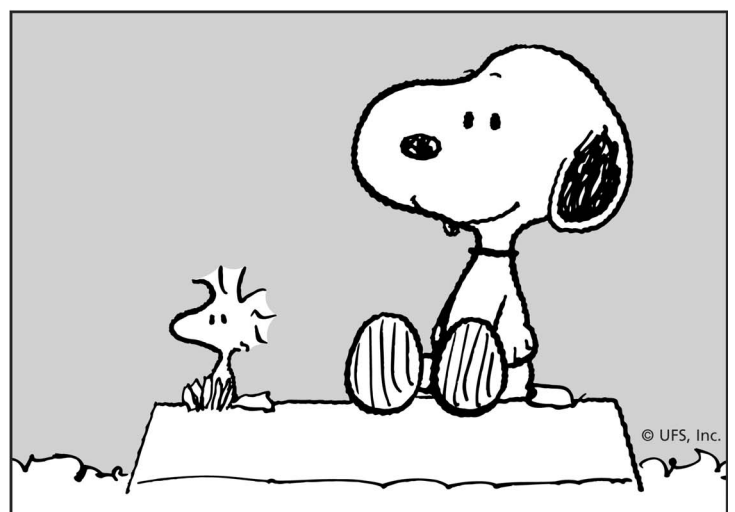
Kennedy proposed that each expenditure of federal cash over a certain threshold be reviewed and authorized in advance by his office and by Legislative Auditor Steve Theriot.

He said the need for careful checks and balances is particularly acute in Louisiana, which has a well-earned reputation for political corruption.

Under FEMA's public assistance program, state and local agencies can apply for reimbursement for unbudgeted costs associated with major disasters. The program, which typically constitutes about two-thirds of the federal money that flows to disaster areas, pays for everything from debris removal and generators to overtime pay for rescue workers and other unexpected costs.

But the money comes with strict paperwork requirements, as government agencies must carefully document that the federal money they are seeking is really going to reimburse them for hurricane-related costs. And that means complying with a dizzying array of federal rules.

Theriot said he has already assigned several auditors to help local authorities navigate the paperwork process and let them know what kind of expenses the federal government will reimburse. He said it's especially important to reach out to local governments in the early stages of disaster recovery, when some of them are receiving advance federal payments that they will have to document later.



"I don't want local governments to fall into the trap that they get the money and then don't submit the documentation," Theriot said. "Because then the second time (they apply for reimbursement) they won't get the money."

State homeland security could not be reached for comment Monday. But Art Jones, who heads up the agency's hurricane recovery efforts, said Saturday that that the first public assistance payments, totaling about $200 million, are expected to be made this week to the governments of Orleans, St. Bernard, Plaquemines and Lafourche parishes.

Kennedy said the homeland security office isn't equipped to handle the task of reviewing documentation submitted by local governments, called "project worksheets," and fears that the process will be ripe for abuse.

But Barbara Goodson, assistant Commissioner of Administration for management and finance, said the homeland security office is a natural conduit for the money because of its extensive experience responding to natural disasters and their aftermath.

"They have more experience than anybody else in the state in handling the flow of the FEMA money and the projects," Goodson said.

Northrop reopens Avondale shipyard

Work force, at 12%, provides a lift to local economy

By Keith Darcé
Business writer

Northrop Grumman Corp. has reopened its big military shipyard in Avondale with about 12 percent of its usual 6,000 workers, breathing an important burst of life into the New Orleans region's storm-crippled economy.

The Monday opening of the region's biggest manufacturer brings a growing number of workers back to metropolitan New Orleans who will be earning paychecks and spending at least some of their money at local businesses, said George Yount, the shipyard's vice president of operations.

"If we're not open again, in addition to the agony wrought by the storm, you would have 6,000 families without income. That would trickle down to other families" in the region, he said Tuesday from the shipyard's headquarters, known as the Rock House.

More than 700 shipyard workers were on the job Tuesday. That number should increase steadily during the coming weeks as more displaced workers are located and arrangements are made to temporarily house the workers in the area and transport them to the yard, Yount said. Housing provided by the shipyard will not be available to family members of workers, he said.

Within a year, the yard's work force should reach at least half the size it was before the storm, Yount said. "If we can get 3,500 people back, I would be thrilled," he said.

Northrop is transporting workers by bus from Thibodaux, Raceland and Houma daily, he said. More buses will begin daily runs from Baton Rouge and the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain soon.

Shipyard managers are trying to locate crew barges – essentially floating dormitories – that could be moored along the yard's docks for housing workers during the work week.

The yard's relatively quick return to operation was due to the small amount of largely cosmetic damage sustained during Hurricane Katrina. The yard's sister shipyard in Pascagoula, Miss., formerly known as Ingalls, wasn't as fortunate.

Katrina's storm surge swept 6 feet of water over the Mississippi yard, flooding the factory's manufacturing shops and putting them out of commission for weeks.

Yount and about 80 other workers rode out the storm at the Rock House, where many of them have remained.

They relied on police and firefighters for news from the outside world. They distributed pistols after a small group of men tried to enter the yard and threatened them. They built a makeshift barricade around the Rock House with cars, concrete barriers and barbed wire. They crafted an outdoor shower out of an emergency eye-washing system. And they bartered part of their 100,000 gallon stockpile of diesel for supplies.

"It was kind of a cross between 'Survivor' and 'Big Brother' here. We think we would be strong contestants," Yount said.

Filmmakers roost in Shreveport As New Orleans starts recovery

North Louisiana gets chance to benefit from industry

By Jaquetta White
Business writer

Dozens of companies, hundreds of workers and millions of dollars in film production have moved from New Orleans to Shreveport in the two weeks since Hurricane Katrina tore through the area, taking Hollywood South north, at least for now.

The move is a good sign for the state, which could lose millions in revenue to competing states and countries without the projects slated for production in Louisiana.

"I can't say that we're going to get them all back," said Alex Schott, director of the Governor's Office of Film and TV. "But I haven't gotten any official word that any are pulling out."

Schott's office has been helping film industry businesses set up satellite offices in Shreveport.

"We want to maintain an open-for-business philosophy," he said.

Among the firms making the move is New Orleans production company Lift, which has produced several feature films and television movies. The company is spending $1.5 million to set up an office in Shreveport and assist workers with relocation costs.

Malcolm Petal, the firm's chief executive officer, said about $80 million in production or post-production work scheduled to be done in New Orleans will be relocated to Shreveport, Monroe and Natchitoches.

"There are projects that the original plan was to for them to be shot somewhere in the greater New Orleans area, and that's not an option now," Petal said.

In one case, a television pilot scheduled to film in the Lower Garden District of New Orleans has been moved to a swanky Natchitoches neighborhood.

Of the nine television shows Lift was working on, none was set in New Orleans or Louisiana, making it easy to move them. Also making the move smooth is the fact that the film industry is extremely mobile; crews and equipment often travel between locations.

Schott said the industry chose to relocate to Shreveport in part because Baton Rouge is too crowded and didn't offer enough space for the industry's businesses and workers. Another reason, Petal said, is that unlike Baton Rouge and New Orleans, Shreveport and surrounding cities have not yet reaped the benefits of the growing film industry.

"I think it was important for us to show that you can make movies in north Louisiana," Petal said. He plans to keep Lift's Shreveport office running after New Orleans is operating again.

"Our focus was to keep the business in the state," Schott said. "Shreveport offered the most attractive option."

The move to Shreveport doesn't mean that the industry will never return to metro New Orleans, Schott said.

UNO's Robert E. Nims Center for Entertainment Arts and Multi-Media Technology in Elmwood, which houses a soundstage used in feature films, was left relatively unscathed, Schott said.

"They're on the fast track to getting it up and running," Schott said. "We're looking to getting it back in business in a month or so."

Petal agreed.

"It is purely an expansion," he said.

5 students arrested after fight at school

Soda can thrown at evacuees

The Associated Press

HOUSTON — Three teenagers were hospitalized and five were arrested after a fight Tuesday morning at Jones High School that broke out when a student from Houston threw a soft drink can into a group of evacuee students, a school district spokesman said.

Officials said the fight involved 20 to 25 students.

A student from New Orleans was treated at Memorial Hermann Hospital for facial injuries, and two Houston teenagers were treated for face and rib injuries.

Terry Abbott, a spokesman for the Houston Independent School District, said such dissension would not be tolerated.

"The quickest way to earn a ticket out of Jones High School and into detention is to hurt one of those students from New Orleans," Abbott said in a story in Tuesday's online edition of the Houston Chronicle. "They've made it very clear to the Jones High School students that the children from New Orleans are our guests. We must treat them with all the dignity and respect we can."

He also reminded the 200 evacuees attending Jones High School that they are not exempt from school regulations.

The five arrested students, whose ages ranged from 15 to 18, were charged by school district police with disruption of school activities, a Class C misdemeanor. Two were evacuees from New Orleans, and three were Houston residents, officials said.

Abbott said that all of the arrested students would be placed at alternative sites.

HURRICANE KATRINA AFTERMATH

Celebration in air as flights return

Evacuees come back, others fly for work at reopened airport

By Matt Scallan
Kenner bureau

As Northwest Airlines Flight 947 from Memphis, Tenn., lined up for its approach to Louis Armstrong International Airport on Tuesday, Stephen Kishner of Metairie looked hard out of the window for his neighborhood.

"All we saw was the lake," said Kishner, who hasn't seen his home or his wife, an East Jefferson General Hospital employee, in two weeks.

Kishner was one of 29 people on the first commercial passenger flight into Armstrong since Aug. 28, the day before Hurricane Katrina blasted the Gulf Coast. A Delta flight from Atlanta soon followed, and a second Northwest flight from Memphis landed later in the afternoon.

Sandy Rodriguez of New Orleans, who had evacuated to Memphis on one of the last flights out of Armstrong, also returned on Northwest 947. She said she was anxious to see her lakefront home.

"Maybe we were one of the lucky ones," she said.

Airport officials celebrated the return to commercial passenger service as if it were the long-awaited 10 millionth passenger they had hoped to see pass through the terminal in 2005. In Katrina's wake, having any paying passengers was a reason to rejoice.

"The airport gets 90 percent of its revenue from passenger fees, so we hope to be a going concern as quickly as possible," Aviation Director Roy Williams said.

Before the storm, an average of 174 commercial flights a day landed at Armstrong, paying for the $70 million-a-year operation. Katrina closed it to regular traffic for 16 days.

Williams reiterated hopes that federal grants would help the airport pay its bills, including $20 million in annual debt service.

Airlines say they are working on refunds, credits, rebookings and other relief for passengers who were scheduled to travel through Armstrong for the period it shut down.

For now, the airport will receive flights in the 30-year-old concourses A and B, which weathered the storm with minimal damage. Concourse C suffered more damage, and Concourse D is still being used to house some of the Katrina relief troops.

Though Armstrong has been open to cargo flights since Sunday, the first FedEx flight wasn't scheduled to arrive until Tuesday, with UPS to follow today.

In addition to passengers returning on Tuesday's Northwest and Delta flights, several passengers flew out of Armstrong. Brophy Boudreaux, a pharmaceutical sales executive from Mandeville, was headed for Knoxville, Tenn., and anxious to get back to work.

"I've been trying to get power on at my house all week," he said. "Maybe it will happen while I'm gone."

Larry Numa, an employee of Praxair, which manufactures gases such as acetylene at a plant in Taft, was off to Jacksonville, Fla., with his wife, Mona, to work in the company's offices there.

Williams expects perhaps 60 flights per day by the end of this week, as other airlines assess their facilities, fuel supplies and passenger demand. But a true return to commercial air travel rides on the revival of New Orleans' convention and tourism business.

"We still don't have the hotels, the rent-a-cars or the other services travelers need," Williams said.

The larger question, he said, is how much of Louisiana's New Orleans-based professional class remains in such places as Baton Rouge or Houston — and for how long.

"Those are the people who fly the most," he said. "I think the worst-case scenario is that we're back where we were in five years, but I think it's going to happen much sooner than that," he said.

OUR OPINIONS

Razed lives

St. Bernard Parish officials could offer nothing but painful news to the 3,000 evacuees who crowded the state Capitol on Monday to hear about the fate of their homes and community.

Virtually all of the 27,600 homes in the parish are flooded, and nearly all of them will have to be razed. Even those who still have homes are looking at a six-month exile. That's a bitter draught for St. Bernard residents who clung to friends and neighbors they found in the throng in Baton Rouge.

Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez said he would not sugarcoat the situation, and he certainly didn't. "I hope all of you remember St. Bernard, because when you go back, you aren't going to recognize it," he said.

That's a grim diagnosis, but now that it's been delivered, St. Bernard's leaders need to offer their dispossessed and dislocated constituents more than just brutal honesty and the solace of memory. People want to know, and need to know, the exact condition of their own property.

Parish officials should strive to provide detailed assessments and make the information readily available. But St. Bernard evacuees also need to see for themselves what they have left and what was lost to the wall of water that Katrina sent into St. Bernard. These people don't have homes, neighborhoods, houses of worship, schools or, in many cases, places of employment. They shouldn't be expected to do without solid, specific information, too. In fact, they can't begin to put their lives back together and plan for the future without it.

People from Arabi and some parts of Chalmette might be able to return in two to three weeks to take stock of their damage; the rest will be allowed in on a staggered basis. Obviously, the sooner that can happen, the better. Working out a rapid plan to allow residents back for a survey should be a priority for parish government.

People are going to be shocked and dismayed by what they'll find, but waiting and wondering is its own form of torture. That, at least, is something these Katrina victims shouldn't have to endure a moment longer than necessary.

N.O. plans nonprofit corporation

Donations will help rebuild city

By Frank Donze
Staff writer

New Orleans is moving quickly to set up a nonprofit corporation that can accept cash contributions, large and small, to help finance the mammoth recovery effort from Hurricane Katrina.

Describing the project as a work in progress, aides to Mayor Ray Nagin said Tuesday that it is too early to discuss specifics, including a fund-raising goal, how the nonprofit will function and what the donations will be spent on. But with offers of aid pouring in from around the globe, city officials said, it is imperative to get a mechanism in place to accept the help.

"I can't tell you exactly what the money would be used for," said Nagin spokeswoman Tami Frazier. "But anything we do will be geared toward helping New Orleanians back on their feet, by taking care of whatever their essential needs may be."

City officials said the possibilities include temporary housing assistance, helping small businesses acquire startup inventory and paying for expert advice on urban planning and economic development.

The administration has decided to name the nonprofit America's New Orleans Fund Inc.

Chief Deputy City Attorney Evelyn Pugh, who is coordinating the project, said she hopes to have state approval to establish the fund by today and to set up an account with Chase Bank before the weekend.

Once the nonprofit is authorized by the secretary of state's office, contributions will be accepted at any Chase branch or a post office box the city designates, Pugh said.

The nonprofit, to be headed by the mayor, will have a 501 3-C tax classification that makes donations tax deductible. Besides Nagin, plans call for the fund to be overseen by his top aides, including Chief Administrative Officer Brenda Hatfield, Chief Financial Officer Reggie Zeno and City Attorney Sherry Landry.

Before the city begins to solicit contributions, the administration will publish a mission statement that outlines the program's goals and guidelines for how the money will be spent, Frazier said. She added that the city expects millions of dollars to flow in quickly.

"So many are contributing already – movie stars, activists, businesses. We think that by establishing a fund that can be specifically directed to New Orleans assistance, we can help a lot of people," Frazier said.

Nurse recounts rising waters, rapidly deteriorating situation

She says no one abandoned by staff

By Peter Finney
Staff writer

AP PHOTO

Nurse Margaret Kane was working at Memorial Medical Center when Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast. 'If anyone suggests we abandoned a single patient, it's a flat-out lie,' Kane said. Forty-five bodies were recovered from the center Sunday, including 16 at the chapel.

She's called Peg.

Margaret Kane is a nurse. She was part of a pre-hurricane planning team at Memorial Medical Center, a 317-bed hospital on Napoleon Avenue.

She arrived for work at noon on Aug. 28, the day before Katrina arrived. Three days later, Peg was sitting at a piano, a baby grand, on the first floor, doing her best to lift the spirits of patients and their loved ones, trapped and headed into days of marooned uncertainty, chaos, fear.

And death.

"Would you believe," Kane said, "one of the songs I played was 'Michael Row the Boat Ashore?' "

Obviously, Monday's news that 45 bodies were found at Memorial Medical left Margaret Kane saddened.

And angry.

"If anyone suggests we abandoned a single patient, it's a flat-out lie. They don't know what they're talking about. You keep asking yourself why more could not have been done. When I look back, I know all the nurses were putting their lives on the line, doing the best they could. You just hate to see people you're caring for — already near death — go because you don't have the means to keep them alive. It tears you up."

The days before Katrina arrived, there were approximately 2,000 people at Memorial Medical Center, including 260 patients.

By the time Katrina passed Monday, it seemed Memorial Medical might have dodged a bullet.

Kane went for a quick walk Tuesday.

"It was pretty dry outside," she said. "There was some water coming out of the sewers, but it didn't seem threatening. I went to my car, which was in the hospital garage, looking to explore the immediate area. This time, I saw some water, slowly rising. When I got to Ursuline Academy, which was a few blocks away, it was serious. By the time I made it back to the garage, the streets were beginning to flood.

"I parked on the second floor. That's when I learned the hospital was in a locked-down position. Would you believe all this happened in less than 15 minutes?"

Kane was quickly back to work on the fourth floor, at "4 Clara Center," involved in the care of 24 patients.

No one on the hospital staff had any idea the levees had failed. The hospital kitchen was soon under water. By early Wednesday, Memorial Medical was without power — no communication with the outside world.

"We began using cardboard fans to lower the body temperature of some patients," Kane said. "Patients in stable condition became critical. It wasn't long before the chapel on the second floor was turned into a morgue. Bodies were wrapped in sheets and placed there. Some were placed in hallways. One man died sitting straight up in his wheelchair with his son and daughter-in-law at his side. A patient died of a heart attack on one of the stairwells. One man suffered a self-inflicted stab wound to move up on the list of those hoping to be evacuated."

There was evacuation by boat and helicopter.

And there was waiting and waiting and waiting.

The flooded ramp to the emergency room became a launching pad for arriving boats.

On Katrina plus four, a Friday, Kane and five nurses were evacuated by boat.

They were taken to dry ground near St. Charles Avenue, followed by a truck ride to nowhere — that is, to the airport, back to Causeway Boulevard and Interstate 10, and finally a ride to a truck stop in LaPlace in the company of State Police.

Kane would find her way to Raceland and rejoin her anxious husband, James, in Ruston, at the home of relatives.

"I'll never forget a 95-year-old patient telling jokes," Kane said. "He was hilarious. And he made it out, God bless him.

"And I'll never forget how great that portobello mushroom tasted, one I brought with me. And I'll never forget how bright the stars looked at night when everything around you was pitch black."

How does it feel to be a hero?

"I'm no hero," Kane said. "I was just trying to do my job, like all the other dedicated nurses. I would like to say I'd like to see the Saints wear a red fleur de lis on their helmets this season. And I'd like people to look in on a new Web site, www.desirenola.com. It's all about bringing the city back."

How about Memorial Medical Center?

"I'm praying the lights go on and it returns to a new life," Kane said. "I'll always look on it as my second home."

Toy stories are just what region needed

The night before John Carney kicked a game-winning, 47-yard field goal for the Saints in Charlotte, N.C., Early Doucet caught a game-winning 39-yard pass for the LSU Tigers in Tempe, Ariz.

Geography tells us Saturday's catch and Sunday's kick were a country apart.

PETER FINNEY

The sporting heart tells us the two moments would have hit somewhere in between, hit New Orleans with a euphoric impact, had the city not been scattered to all points of the compass by Category 4 winds that will be forever known as Katrina.

Carney is 41, the oldest Saints player on Jim Haslett's roster, a trooper who has been around the block enough to appreciate the fact a game like football will always be part of life's toy department.

But Carney wasn't too old to appreciate what his foot had done this time.

"The longer you play games for a living," he was saying in Sunday's winning locker room, "you tend to get jaded. For me, football's a business. You can forget what it means to the people out there, cheering, spending their money to be in the stands, to be part of your life."

"For me, football's a business. You can forget what it means to the people out there, cheering, spending their money to be in the stands, to be part of your life."
JOHN CARNEY, Saints placekicker

Probably there have been few, if any, weekends like the past one to illustrate how important, how magical, a toy department can be for the human spirit.

Age-wise, Carney is in a better position than 19-year-old Doucet, who may have no idea what one catch did for a displaced fan base.

Think about it.

Doucet calls New Iberia home.

JaMarcus Russell found his way to Tigertown from Mobile.

Which means, you draw a line from one city to the other, and it was inside those bookends that Katrina left her lethal mark on the Gulf Coast.

Earlier on Saturday evening, Doucet had dropped three on-target strikes thrown by his quarterback. Then, on fourth-and-10, at do-or-die time, he runs away from double coverage and comes up with the catch of his young life in a come-back-alive, 35-31 victory.

"That dude was clutch," Joe Horn was saying the next day about Doucet pulling it in.

It may have fired up Horn as much as it did Haslett, who was in search of any available motivational tool against the Carolina Panthers.

What made these back-to-back victories in life's toy department even more dramatic is that LSU's came in the final minute-and-a-half, the Saints' in the final three seconds.

On Saturday, Katrina's destruction brought a late game to Sunday morning prominence, mixing the Russell-Doucet highlight with cheering fans watching TV inside Tiger Stadium.

On Sunday, the Saints' upset became the No. 1 feel-good story on the NFL menu, moving another upset, this one by Nick Saban's Dolphins over the Denver Broncos, to the back burner.

There's an irony here. On the weekend Saban was making an impressive professional debut, Les Miles, his successor in Baton Rouge, may have won a game on the road against Arizona State that Tiger fans, wiped out by Katrina, may remember more fondly than Saban's Superdome victory over Oklahoma.

Of course, there's another side to the coin.

It wasn't long before LSU fans, caught up in Saturday's drama, were asking if the Tigers were capable of winning any kind of championship with a defense that surrendered 461 passing yards to Arizona State.

We'll get closer to an answer in two weeks when LSU and Tennessee, the SEC team holding the best national championship credentials in the eyes of most pundits, tee it up at Tiger Stadium.

Tiger Stadium, now the official 2005 home of the Saints for four games.

Before the matter was settled, I asked Horn about "home."

"I liked the idea of playing in San Antonio because we practice there," he said. "But, you know me. I can catch passes in Louisiana as well as Texas. Just throw me the ball."

It's a given.

Aaron Brooks plans to do just that.

COURTS OF APPEAL

Hornets consider Baton Rouge, Oklahoma City as sites for some 'home' games

By Jimmy Smith
Staff writer

The Hornets are considering playing some "home" games this season in Baton Rouge and Oklahoma City, a league source said Tuesday.

The Ford Center in Oklahoma City is one possible venue, while either the Pete Maravich Assembly Center or the downtown River Center in Baton Rouge could be the team's home for anywhere from eight to 12 games, the source said.

The Ford Center, which opened in 2002, seats more than 19,000 for basketball, with 3,300 club seats, seven party suites and 49 private suites. The facility is also managed by SMG, the same group that operates the Hornets' permanent home, New Orleans Arena, and the River Center.

It's unclear what part of the Hornets' schedule this season would be played away from the Arena, which received minor damage from Hurricane Katrina.

Doug Thornton, regional vice president for SMG, said Monday that the Arena could be ready for occupancy by the mid-February All-Star break. Whether the city would be ready to accommodate visiting teams in major hotels by then is much more uncertain, however.

But the fact that the Ford Center is run by SMG affords the Hornets the opportunity to utilize the same SMG game-day staff that is accustomed to the game-day operations at New Orleans Arena, which could make the transition in the temporary venue easier, as it would be in the SMG-managed River Center.

Dan Radakovich, LSU's associate athletic director for internal affairs, said Tuesday that Hornets officials are scheduled to tour the PMAC some time Wednesday.

Hornets president Paul Mott confirmed Tuesday that he would be in Baton Rouge on Wednesday and Thursday, along with an NBA representative whose job it is to "evaluate venues and markets. That's what he does. He's all over the place. He's coming in to finish the fact-finding that (Hornets front-office executives) Sam Russo and Steve Martin started a week ago.

"We also want to see the River Center, look at potential office space, prospective practice facilities, where the players might reside, as well as the two arenas," Mott said.

The PMAC is currently being cleaned and decontaminated after its use as an evacuation hospital in the hurricane's aftermath. That medical facility closed late last week.

Last Friday, Oklahoma City mayor Mick Cornett, along with SMG employees, gave NBA officials a guided tour of the Ford Center.

There are no apparent scheduling conflicts in Oklahoma City. The minor league hockey team that the Ford Center houses during the fall has agreed to relocate 22 games that could conflict with Hornets' games to a facility across the street.

In Baton Rouge, there are about 10 potential conflicts between Hornets' home games and events scheduled at the PMAC. It's uncertain whether there are date conflicts at the River Center.

Tim Frank, spokesman for the NBA, said the league hoped to make a determination about where the Hornets would play home games in the next week to 10 days.

"We're not going to break it down city by city," Frank said. "Once it's complete, we'll have an announcement."

There also has been talk of the Hornets playing games in Nashville, Tenn.; Louisville, Ky.; Kansas City, Mo.; Las Vegas and Puerto Rico.

SAINTS (1–0) VS. NEW YORK GIANTS (1–0), in East Rutherford, N.J., 6:30 p.m., ABC

First 9-11, now Hurricane Katrina - for the New York Giants and the displaced Saints from New Orleans, misery indeed loves company.

The teams square off Monday night in a game that has been moved from the Superdome to Giants Stadium because of the storm.

Nearly four years ago, the teams played following the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon in Washington. In mid-September 2001, NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue suspended games for two weeks. When play resumed Sept. 30, the Giants defeated the visiting Saints 21-13 in an emotionally charged game that helped restore a bit of normalcy to a grieving and shocked nation.

The roles will be reversed Monday night. This time the Saints, who have been forced to move their base of operations to San Antonio and will split their remaining home games between the Alamodome and Tiger Stadium, will have the emotional edge.

The Saints no longer are playing for themselves. The adage "us against the world" no longer applies to this star-crossed franchise, because the world seemingly is rooting for them. This team in exile is playing for underdogs everywhere, particularly the Gulf Coast region that has been crippled by a natural disaster. The wind beneath their wings is an untold number of supporters, by compassionate folks from all walks of life whose heartstrings have been tugged by a story of widespread devastation.

"Our fans are everywhere," wide receiver Joe Horn announced after the Saints' opening 23-20 road victory Sunday against the Carolina Panthers. Who could argue?

LAST MEETING: The Saints won 45-7 on Dec. 14, 2003, at the Superdome, in a nationally televised game highlighted by Joe Horn's infamous end zone "cell-abration." Horn acted like he was calling on a cell phone after scoring a touchdown, following one of his four touchdown catches. His antics resulted in a $25,000 fine from the league office.

GIANTS ON OFFENSE: The Giants scored 42 points in their opening victory against the Arizona Cardinals, their highest output in more than two seasons. Second-year quarterback Eli Manning completed 10 of 23 passes for 172 yards and two touchdowns. He also threw two interceptions, one of which was returned 18 yards for a touchdown by linebacker Karlos Dansby. The Giants have a number of options, beginning with the heart of the offense - running back Tiki Barber rushed 13 times for 62 yards and one touchdown against the Cardinals. Manning has several capable receivers, including tight end Jeremy Shockey and wideouts Plaxico Burress and Amani Toomer. Shockey and Burress caught scoring passes against Arizona. Rookie running back Brandon Jacobs, 6 feet 4 and 265 pounds, opened his NFL career by rushing for 39 yards and one touchdown and returning a kickoff 39 yards. The offensive line has been bolstered by the off-season acquisition of right tackle Kareem McKenzie (6-6, 335) from the New York Jets. McKenzie, who signed a six-year, $36 million contract in March, sprained an ankle against the Cardinals and is listed as probable. Veteran Bob Whitfield played in McKenzie's absence. The Saints' defensive plan is simple: contain Barber and force the Giants to rely on inexperienced Manning.

GIANTS ON DEFENSE: Although a shade lighter (255 pounds) and longer in the tooth (33), right defensive end Michael Strahan remains the Giants' defensive force. He made seven tackles and 1 ✪ sacks against the Cardinals. "I think it should quiet down those people who say I'm too old and that my weight is down too low," Strahan said. "I'm fine, and I don't think 33 is too old." Underrated defensive end Osi Umenyiora starts opposite Strahan. Middle linebacker Antonio Pierce made his presence felt in his first game since coming over from the Washington Redskins during the offseason. He led the Giants with 11 tackles and half a sack. Curtis Deloatch replaced incumbent Will Peterson at right cornerback against the Cardinals, and contributed seven tackles and defended a pass, but was also beaten by Cardinals' wide receiver Larry Fitzgerald, who caught a career-best 13 passes for 155 yards and one touchdown. Peterson apparently ended up in Coach Tom Coughlin's doghouse last week. The Saints will want to get running back Deuce McAllister going early and allow quarterback Aaron Brooks to exploit the Giants' soft spot on defense.

GIANTS ON SPECIAL TEAMS: For the first time in 50 years, the Giants returned a punt and kickoff for touchdowns in the same game. Willie Ponder returned a kickoff 95 yards for a touchdown in the third quarter, and former Saint Chad Morton returned a punt 52 yards for a score in the fourth quarter. Both were part of 35-point barrage in the second half against the Cardinals. No doubt Saints special teams coach Al Everest will emphasize those plays in his preparations. Jay Feely made all six extra-point attempts.

THE WORLD OF SPORTS

FOOTBALL:

EX-SAINTS KICKER FRITSCH DIES:

Toni Fritsch, a former soccer player for Austria's national team who was discovered by the Dallas Cowboys and became a record-setting NFL place-kicker, died Tuesday. He was 60. The Austria Press Agency reported that Fritsch collapsed and died of heart failure in Vienna. In 1971, with soccer-style kickers becoming popular in the NFL, the Cowboys sent a group of scouts to Europe in search for strong-legged soccer players who could be taught to boot footballs. Fritsch led the NFC with 22 field goals in 1975. After playing for San Diego and Houston, he finished his NFL career kicking for the Saints in 1982. He still holds an NFL record by having kicked a field goal in 13 consecutive playoff games.

AROUND THE NFL: Larry Johnson turned himself in to police Monday night after an altercation with his girlfriend early Saturday at a bar. A police department spokesman said the Kansas City Chiefs running back was cited for domestic abuse assault. Johnson posted bond and was released, with a court date set for Sept. 20. ... Tampa Bay Buccaneers cornerback Torrie Cox was jailed early Tuesday after being charged with driving under the influence, his second drunken driving arrest in nine months. ... Kicker Nick Novak signed with the Washington Redskins, who cut kick returner Antonio Brown. The Redskins needed a kicker after John Hall strained his quadriceps in Sunday's 9-7 victory over the Chicago Bears. ... The Cincinnati Bengals signed fullback Nick Luchey, filling the spot of injured running back Kenny Watson. ... The Seattle Seahawks signed veteran defensive end Rodney Bailey and released wide receiver Jerheme Urban. ... The Chicago Bears signed former St. Louis Rams offensive tackle John St. Clair and waived tackle Marc Colombo.

COLLEGES

UNO-KANSAS ON TV: The UNO men's basketball game at Kansas on Dec. 29 will be broadcast on ESPN2. The Privateers' originally scheduled home game against Norfolk State for that day was rescheduled. The teams likely will play in November of next season in Virginia and then return to New Orleans for the 2007-08 season. UNO officials also announced that its women's basketball tournament Dec. 2-4 at Lakefront Arena also has been moved to Lawrence, Kan. Host Kansas will play Birmingham Southern at 6 p.m. on Dec. 2, and the Jayhawks and Lady Privateers will play Dec. 3 at 1 p.m. UNO and Birmingham Southern finish the three-day event Sunday, Dec. 4, with a noon contest.

BASKETBALL ROUNUP: Connecticut point guard Marcus Williams was given 18 months probation and ordered to perform 400 hours of community service for his role in the theft of four computers from a campus dormitory. Williams was accused of trying to sell four computers worth about $11,000 that were stolen from campus dorm rooms between June 9 and June 14. ... Defending champion Syracuse, Texas Tech, Wake Forest and Florida will all host a four-team regional in the season-opening 2K Sports College Hoops Classic benefiting Coaches vs. Cancer. The regional rounds will be held Nov. 8-11, with the winners advancing to the semifinals on Nov. 17 at New York's Madison Square Garden. The championship game will be Nov. 18. Syracuse will play Bethune-Cookman on Nov. 8, and St. Francis, Pa. will face Cornell in the other game. Florida will face St. Peter's on Nov. 9, with Albany meeting Oakland, Mich. in the other game. Texas Tech will host San Jose State in the first round, with Portland meeting Georgia Southern in the other game. Wake Forest opens against Mississippi Valley State and George Mason plays Cal-Irvine.

FOOTBALL ROUNDUP: Oklahoma coach Bob Stoops said he'll decide later this week whether suspended tailback Adrian Peterson will start Saturday against UCLA. "We'll see. At this point, we anticipate him playing," Stoops said. "Start or not depends on how we feel practice is going, what we feel we need to do. Depending on what further happens from here, we'll see." Peterson, who rushed for 220 yards and three touchdowns in Oklahoma's 31-15 win against Tulsa on Saturday, was suspended from practice Monday and Tuesday after missing classes. ... Troy Smith will start for No. 9 Ohio State on Saturday against San Diego State in place of Justin Zwick, the starter the first two games this season. ... Northwestern State is ranked No. 15 and McNeese State is ranked No. 19 in this week's Division I-AA Top 25. Grambling State and Nicholls State received votes but were not in the Top 25.

NBA:

O'NEAL AIDS ARREST: Shaquille O'Neal provided an assist to police over the weekend, trailing a man who allegedly assaulted a gay couple before alerting an arresting officer. The 7-foot-1 Miami Heat center, who is in the process of becoming a Miami Beach reserve officer, was driving on South Beach around 3 a.m. Sunday. He saw a passenger in a car yell slurs at the couple, who were walking, said a spokesman for the Miami Beach Police Department. The man then got out of the car and threw a bottle, hitting one of the pedestrians, who was not seriously hurt. The man got back in the car, which sped off. O'Neal followed, flagging down an officer who made an arrest.

AROUND THE LEAGUE: A judge acquitted Minnesota Timberwolves center Michael Olowokandi of misdemeanor charges of criminal trespass and disorderly conduct at a downtown nightclub last fall. Olowokandi was arrested about 3 a.m. Nov. 25 after he refused to leave the nightclub and had to be subdued by police with a stun gun. The Timberwolves suspended him for two games for "conduct detrimental to the team." Olowokandi said he was trying to retrieve a sweatshirt from the club. ... The Denver Nuggets re-signed off guard DerMarr Johnson, who started 40 games last season. ... Cleveland Cavaliers first-year coach Mike Brown added assistants Michael Malone and Melvin Hunt to his staff. Malone is the son of Brendan Malone, a former Cavaliers assistant who served as Cleveland's interim coach last season after Paul Silas was fired.

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL:

AROUND THE LEAGUE: An MRI of Boston Red Sox outfielder Johnny Damon's left shoulder showed no structural damage. Manager Terry Francona said Damon will remain in Boston for treatment. ... Cleveland Indians reliever Arthur Rhodes has left the club because of a family illness and will miss the rest of the season.

AUTO RACING:

TRUEX DOCKED: Reigning Busch Series champion Martin Truex Jr. was penalized $10,000 and 25 points by NASCAR for using an obscene gesture during last week's race. The punishment tightens Truex's hold on the Busch points lead; he now holds just a 69-point advantage over Clint Bowyer with seven races remaining. Truex was side-by-side with Mike Wallace late in Friday night's race at Richmond International Raceway when Wallace pinched Truex into the wall. Truex twice flashed an obscene gesture at Wallace that was caught on the television broadcast.

Agreement reached to shift FG races

La. Downs to take 37 racing days

By Bob Fortus
Staff writer

Churchill Downs officials and Louisiana horsemen have reached a preliminary agreement to shift 37 Fair Grounds racing days to Louisiana Downs in Bossier City to make up for the cancellation of the New Orleans racing season, Churchill announced Tuesday.

Under the agreement, a transferred Fair Grounds season would begin Nov. 19 and run through Jan. 22. Racing generally would be held four days a week. Hurricane Katrina wiped out an 83-day Fair Grounds season that was to run from Nov. 24 through March 26.

"We're glad that we're able to come to an amicable resolution," Sean Alfortish, president of the Louisiana Horsemen's Benevolent and Protective Association, said Tuesday. "It's tough to get by a situation where the whole city is hit by a hurricane. Just to have a meet, to put all the parameters in place, is a feat by itself."

Churchill chief operating officer Andy Skehan said in a press release: "Our ability to work cooperatively and put the industry's best interests above our own will send an important message to our customers – and to countless Gulf Coast residents affected by this terrible storm – that Fair Grounds racing will go on."

Purses during the season would average about $270,000 per day.

The stakes schedule would include two major event days.

Louisiana Champions Day, with 10 stakes for Louisiana-bred thoroughbreds and quarter horses, would be run Dec. 10. Four stakes races — the Grade III Risen Star Stakes, Grade II Silverbulletday Stakes, Grade III Bayou Breeders' Cup Handicap and the Duncan F. Kenner Breeders' Cup — would be run Jan. 14. The Grade II New Orleans Handicap would be run Jan. 7.

But the Louisiana Derby and Fair Grounds Oaks – the track's most prestigious races for 3-year-olds and 3-year-old fillies, respectively – are not part of the tentative stakes schedule. "They'll be back in full force next (season)," Alfortish said.

A consequence of shifting thoroughbred dates to Louisiana Downs would be a shift of that track's quarter-horse dates. A Louisiana Downs quarter-horse meet is scheduled to start Oct. 28 and run through Nov. 27.

"That's an issue that the HBPA is handling," Ray Tromba, Louisiana Downs vice president and general manager, said late Tuesday.

Alfortish said that Evangeline Downs is cooperating with all parties and would add Louisiana Downs' quarter-horse days. As a result, Evangeline, which has its own fall quarter-horse meet, would be running quarter horses into December, he said.

A final agreement must be approved by the horsemen, Churchill, Louisiana Downs, Evangeline Downs and the Louisiana State Racing Commission. The commission must approve all changes to the Louisiana racing schedule.

Also, by law, the Fair Grounds must run 80 days in 20 consecutive weeks to keep its racing license. Racing commission chairman Bob Wright said that he doesn't expect problems obtaining a waiver – possibly through an executive order from Gov. Kathleen Blanco – to allow a shorter season to be run.

"I can't speak for her. But, knowing the attitude in general, I don't think it'll be any problem getting that approved," Wright said.

Tromba said the next step is for Louisiana Downs and Churchill officials to work out operational details for the season.

"We've obviously been participants from the standpoint (that) we've reached out our hands, tried to be facilitators to do something that made sense for the industry," Tromba said.

Tulane enduring makeshift conditions

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

RUSTON - On Tuesday, Tulane coach Chris Scelfo was asked if he has seen tape of Mississippi State, his opponent in five days.

"That tape is somewhere floating in New Orleans," he said.

On the campus of Louisiana Tech, Tulane is trying to piece together its program after Hurricane Katrina rushed the team out of town, and then took a knockout swing at the remaining equipment at the team's headquarters. Tulane loaded its buses with enough equipment for a week of practice and one road game. In actuality, it loaded the buses for the 2005 season.

The Division I-A football program now is a skeleton.

"It's something we can use to keep us hungry," safety Tra Boger said. "And I think it's going to add to our mental toughness, not having everything when you want it."

Scelfo has said time after time how Louisiana Tech has been unbelievably accommodating. Tulane athletic director Rick Dickson is similarly appreciative: "Imagine if an athletic program showed up at our doorstep?"

But as Tulane settles in its temporary home, the reality does, too. Boger said it in one word: "Makeshift."

The football offices are really just one big office. It's a workspace at the Thomas Assembly Center, the school's basketball arena, with cubicles and computers. All they need is a water cooler. Scelfo has his own office - in the basketball officials' dressing room.

Down the hall is the room where Tulane holds its positional meetings. The room is divided by patricians, set up like a maze. On Monday afternoon, assistants were taping flat pieces of styrofoam to the partitions to serve as walls. Sheets of paper were slapped to the entrance of each area: "DBs" or "QBs" or "WRs."

Boger sat in a meeting with the Tulane secondary, and a coach began barking at the players. As the players digested the criticism, another coach began yelling. Then another.

"You could hear everyone," Boger said. (Incidentally, offensive coordinator Frank Sceflo and defensive line coach Lorenzo Costantini were the loudest, according to some).

The locker room is a bunch of chairs with equipment bags placed in front of them. But the players are used to this – they spent about two weeks at the Dallas Doubletree, where athletic tape was put on the wall to designate space as imaginary lockers.

Tulane was able to get a bulk of its equipment on those buses. The team does have practice essentials, such as helmets, shoulder pads, soft pads, pants and practice cleats. And Tulane has its road uniforms.

"That's all we need," Chris Scelfo said. "We don't have a home stadium, so we don't need those home jerseys."

But Tulane doesn't even have its game helmets. John Mendow, the assistant equipment manager, said there wasn't enough time to load them. So the team will play in their practice helmets, without decals.

There is a litany of things Tulane left behind.

Mendow and the equipment staff are working the phones like a telethon, getting donations in the forms of "helmet hardware, strings, socks, gloves, backup shoes, footballs - anything and everything."

But the biggest deficiency?

"Manpower," Mendow said.

Tulane normally has six workers at practice dealing with equipment and manager duties, including students, interns and full-time staff members. In Ruston, it's just Mendow and his assistant, Chico Rodriguez. Because Tulane's athletic program is scattered at numerous campuses, so is its staff.

The ordinary medical staff of six is now two - trainer Justin LeDuc and his assistant, Miesty Woodburn.

Before practice Tuesday, the line of players waiting to be taped was "never-ending" Woodburn said.

"I saw that long line today," Boger said. "And I just threw my ankle braces on."

At practice, LeDuc was running around in sandals – he didn't have time to change into his shoes. Scelfo's 11-year-old son, Joseph, was helping distribute water. Some water jugs remained empty, because there weren't people to refill them.

Mendow was unfamiliar with the electrical buzzer he sounds before each practice period, and he pressed the wrong button, shutting off the team's video camera. Kickers and punters worked the chains and down markers during 11-on-11 drills.

"You really see how important everyone is," Boger said.

During practice, a car drove by on a busy street, and a guy yelled out, "Roll Wave!"

Some of the players responded with a cheer.

They know they're playing for others, playing to represent a school and a city. So they endure.

Despite sloppy play, Tulane has good day

By Fred Robinson

RUSTON – As Tulane assistant equipment manager John Mendow passed through the gate leading from the practice field, he looked to his right and said, "One down."

The Green Wave had just wrapped up its first practice at Louisiana Tech, its home for the 2005 football season. The Tuesday afternoon practice, Tulane's first in five days, was sluggish and filled with mistakes. But, on this day, it was going to take more than a sloppy practice to get Tulane coach Chris Scelfo bent out of shape.

"It was a great day," Scelfo said following the nearly two-hour workout. "I thought the effort was good, but we were a little sluggish after taking five days off. There were a lot of unforced errors, but that was expected. The kids seemed to have a smile on their faces; it was the first time in five days the coaches have had some enthusiasm. It was great."

After being forced to flee New Orleans because of Hurricane Katrina, the Green Wave spent the past two weeks moving from one city to another before settling in on Louisiana Tech's campus on Monday. The team began attending classes Tuesday and hit the practice field in helmets, shoulder pads and shorts. It will play Mississippi State on Saturday at the Independence Bowl in Shreveport.

"For the first time in five days, we're just trying to get in the swing of things," said senior linebacker Anthony Cannon, the team's leading tackler last season. "Once that ball is kicked off Saturday, we'll be alright. We need to hit somebody other than white and green."

A NEW SCELFO: Well, maybe not new, but certainly a more mellow Chris Scelfo, at least on the surface. Call it the after effects of Katrina.

The concerns Scelfo had about his team and the season going into fall camp have changed.

"I am not worried about anything that happens on the field," Scelfo said. "Everything's in perspective. So, I'm not worried about anything. I'm worried about the safety of my players and us being able to represent hope for a lot more people than I think anyone realizes, including myself. That's my goal for this football team."

When asked earlier about Mississippi State, he said he was worried more about his team than State. As for the tapes on the Bulldogs, "they're floating somewhere in New Orleans," Scelfo said. Tulane's Wilson Center reportedly had five feet of water.

EXTRA TIME: While Scelfo says there wasn't anything good to come from Hurricane Katrina, the postponement of its game with Southern Miss has provided the Green Wave time to get a couple of ailing players healthy and more time for the freshmen to catch on to the new system.

Wide receiver Bubba Terranova, who had knee surgery early into fall drills, is healthy and in much better condition.

Meanwhile, placekicker Barrett Pepper, who has been suffering with a hip flexor since mid-August, is progressing slowly. On Tuesday, he was participating in one-step kicking drills.

Pepper said there is a possibility he will be ready to play against Mississippi State on Saturday.

THE BILL COMES DUE

FLOOD-DAMAGE INSURANCE LIMITS PROVING PAINFUL

By Jeffrey Meitrodt
Staff writer

Carol Hess hoped she had shed her last tear over the ruins of what used to be her lovely four-bedroom house in Slidell. But an hour after the adjuster from State Farm came to visit her hurricane-ravaged property this week, Hess was crying again.

Though Hurricane Katrina's storm surge dumped the contents of two neighboring townhouses into her back yard, crushing the back of her garage and driving a mountain of debris into her living room, the adjuster told Hess that virtually none of the damage would be covered by her homeowner's policy.

His explanation: The debris came by water, not wind. And that means Hess' claim will be filed through her flood insurance policy.

The debate about whether claims should be filed under homeowners or flood insurance policies is one that several hundred thousand policyholders are coming up against as they try to figure out how to pay for Katrina-related property damage.

"It's not a black-and-white answer because each claim is different," said Bill Mellander of the Allstate Natural Catastrophe team in Northbrook, Ill.

Homeowners policies provide compensation for damage resulting from high winds, but do not cover flood damage. The only water losses covered under a homeowners policy are those that occur after a windstorm has damaged a building, such as when water pours into the structure because a fallen tree created a hole in the roof.

Flood damage is covered by federal flood insurance, which is a type of coverage held by a fraction of homeowners. Flood insurance, however, only covers damages up to $250,000.

As a result, many homeowners would prefer to see their claims handled through homeowners insurance. And some policyholders are arguing that wind from the storm caused the levee breach that flooded the city, and that any water damage should be covered under a traditional storm policy.

"In this event, the big (question) will be: What's wind and what's water?" said Bob Hunter, director of insurance for the Consumer Federation of America.

Hunter said it will be hard to make a case that wind led to the flooding. "I think that argument may have a class-action lawsuit to follow it," he said.

The debate was ad-

Workers on Wednesday successfully cleared Interstate 10, a vital transportation link from New Orleans to the airport and points west, by opening a drain that sucked massive amounts of toxic floodwater from the beleaguered Lakeview neighborhood it had soaked for more than two weeks.

The highway, covered in mud and debris, is not open to the public but is passable for emergency vehicles and trucks aiding the relief effort. It remains inaccessible from the east, however, due to massive damage to the twin spans that carry it over Lake Pontchartrain.

TO OUR READERS

The Times-Picayune today is expanding the number of pages and the number of copies it is printing as residents return and businesses reopen in the metro New Orleans area after Hurricane Katrina.

Today's paper was printed at The Mobile Register, which like The Times-Picayune is owned by Advance Publications. Since Katrina, the paper has been printed at the The Courier in Houma, a member of the New York Times newspaper group.

"Moving our printing to Mobile allows us to increase the number of pages in the paper to meet advertiser and reader demand, as well as expanding our color capabilities," said Ashton Phelps Jr., Times-Picayune publisher.

"We are forever grateful to The Courier for stepping in without notice to house some of our staff and allow us to print in the early days after the storm," he said.

The Times-Picayune was forced to evacuate its Howard Avenue plant as floodwaters rose on the morning of Aug. 30.

Governor admits 'failures at every level' on response

By Laura Maggi
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Acknowledging that state errors contributed to the suffering in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Gov. Kathleen Blanco told state lawmakers Wednesday night that "there were failures at every level of government" and pledged to examine the missteps that crippled the response to the storm.

Echoing President Bush's acceptance of accountability from a day earlier, Blanco told a rare out-of-session meeting of the Legislature that "the buck stops here, and as your governor, I take full responsibility."

The governor has taken some heat about the speed and depth of her response to Hurricane Katrina, the subsequent flooding and civil unrest. She did not deal directly with that criticism, but used her speech to articulate her commitment to the New Orleans area, which is the primary economic engine of the state of Louisiana, but whose citizens are now scattered throughout the country.

"To anyone who even suggests that this great city should not be rebuilt, hear this and hear it well: We will rebuild," Blanco said, who added that as with the 9-11 tragedy the federal government should foot the bill for 100 percent of the costs from the disaster.

For the state's part, Blanco said she would issue an executive order directing agencies to limit spending, while also saying she would appoint an outside adviser to work with state officials to ensure that all of the federal money that flows into state coffers is properly spent.

Blanco did not give many specifics of the congressional package that would help encourage people and businesses to return to the area, but said that she expected it would include an extension of unemployment benefits, "significant financial help" to rebuild homes, and business tax relief.

Along with the congressional package, which Blanco said will be steered by Sens. Mary Landrieu and David Vitter, the governor said that federal authorities need to direct more energy revenue to the state to help rebuild the levees and restore the state's dwindling coastline.

The governor said more than 1 million people have been uprooted from their homes and scattered around the state and country, saying that she wanted to encourage them to come "back home." The state would help put these people back to work, Blanco said, citing recent efforts to create temporary housing at the state's refineries to help the plants get back up and running.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency, which has already let several no-bid contracts to deal with cleaning up the New Orleans area and housing evacuees, should make sure that Louisiana companies are participating in the reconstruction projects, Blanco said.

With hundreds of thousands of people living in shelters, Blanco said that these buildings must be improved to make them more community spaces that can help people get back on their feet. As officials try to move these people into temporary housing, Blanco said that she has asked the American Red Cross and Federal Emergency Management Agency to revamp the existing shelters.

Blanco offered only a few specifics to her vision of rebuilding the New Orleans area, saying that they would make a "historic effort" to revamp the city's troubled public education system. She also pledged to restructure the state's instutionalized health care system, offering "primary care" to people in the neighborhoods they live in.

Blanco has continued to spar with FEMA this week, criticizing the pace of providing shelter residents with better housing and saying the department should have stepped up the efforts to recover the corpses of people who died during the storm.

But in her speech, Blanco praised Bush, saying "I want the people of Louisiana to know that we have a friend and partner in President George W. Bush."

About three-fourths of the Legislature was in attendance. Lawmakers punctuated Blanco's 18-minute speech with the occasional standing ovation, including when she recognized the police, firefighters and other first responders at the side of the room.

Blanco said that although it's "impossible to name every group involved" in the rescue effort, she singled out several police officers, doctors, National Guard soldiers Coast Guard members and state Fish and Wildlife agents for praise.

"They were joined by an unprecedented brigade of ordinary citizens who drove a fleet of school buses we commandeered, steered hundreds of private boats down flooded streets and toiled without pause to rescue at least 70,000 people."

Blanco said one of the lessons to be learned from the storm is that all levels of governments must work together.

"To the legislators here tonight, I ask you to join me in this endeavor. We need your courage and your energy to restore and reinvigorate our damaged communities and economies."

Lawmakers are expected to in the next few months to consider legislation to deal with the impact the storm will have on the state's budget and other changes in state law needed to cope with the disaster.

Getting past checkpoints no problem, they say

Donald 'Bucks' Barkemeyer cleans up his yard on Haynes Boulevard on Wednesday. Though he had had 18 inches of water in the yard, none got in his home. Many New Orleans residents were finding it easier than expected to return to their homes.

While much of displaced New Orleans awaits word on whether neighborhoods that didn't flood will reopen early next week, some residents and business owners are making the trip on their own timetable: now.

They were out and about for the first time Wednesday, reporting no problem getting past checkpoints. But it was unclear whether the access was government-sanctioned, a slip in procedure or a look the other way.

"They didn't check anything," said David Bergeron, who made it to his Uptown ice cream shop, Creole Creamery, by taking River Road through Jefferson Parish to Prytania Street. "No questions, no nothing."

A block down, Ben Lazich swept up glass on the sidewalk in front of his Prytania Street business, The Wine Seller.

"I saw troopers, but they didn't stop me," he said, as the stereo in his SUV played in the background. "I was more worried about traffic."

Down on Magazine Street, resident Chris Chocheles reported that guardsmen asked to see his driver's license, but let him in after a quick glance at it.

"I said, 'I live here,' and they just asked for ID and waved me in," Chocheles said.

Residents have whispered about sneaking into the city on back roads or using connections to a friend in law enforcement or some other emergency-related profession to maneuver their way past guards in the weeks since Katrina.

Wednesday's anecdotal activity suggests restrictions may be easing. Mayor Ray Nagin said this week that, pending environmental testing and other reports, he hopes to reopen parts of Orleans Parish that didn't flood — Uptown, Algiers, the French Quarter and the Central Business District — as soon as Monday.

Emergency preparedness fails post-9/11 test

Communication was the problem

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Hurricane Katrina provided the first major test of the government's emergency preparedness following Sept. 11, 2001 — and it failed.

That's the consensus from the White House to Capitol Hill; despite a huge investment of billions of dollars for communications efforts, the failure of communications systems was a deadly problem.

"At this point, we would have expected a sharp, crisp response to this terrible tragedy," said Senate Homeland Committee Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, who began a hearing on the matter Wednesday. "Instead, we witnessed what appeared to be a sluggish initial response."

President Bush said Tuesday that the bottom-line question is, "Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack or another severe storm?" He said he hopes to learn how the federal government can better cooperate with state and local government in meeting disaster needs.

On Capitol Hill this week, a group of lawmakers said they want to begin by looking at the communication problems that left Federal Emergency Management Agency officials in Baton Rouge and Washington unaware of the chaos and squalor facing tens of thousands of people at the New Orleans Superdome and Convention Center.

Thomas Kean, chairman of the 9/11 Commission, which investigated the 2001 terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, called the failed communications that slowed rescue efforts a "national scandal," given the four years officials had to fix a problem that left firefighters and police at the World Trade Center unable to communicate with each other or emergency dispatchers.

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., joined fellow Democrats this week to propose a $5 billion-a-year program to develop a communications system that would allow police, firefighters and homeland security officials to talk to each other.

"A communications system that is robust and dependable is a vital, necessary cornerstone to homeland security, whether we're trying to save San Francisco, Boston, New Orleans, Mobile or Baltimore," Landrieu said. "And we have known this before 9/11."

San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom said that the delays in getting timely help to residents in New Orleans and other nearby communities is further evidence that residents in his city, who face the threat of catastrophic earthquakes, need to be prepared to care for themselves and their families for 72 hours before the government could mobilize a major rescue effort.

The likelihood, he said, is that the two major bridges out of San Francisco would be damaged in a severe earthquake, leaving only one southern route out of the city — making it hard for people to evacuate and for rescue workers to come to the city's aid.

"Hurricane Katrina clearly illustrates the need for both governmental and individual emergency readiness," Newsom said.

At Houston's Methodist Hospital, which treated 194 displaced nursing home patients from New Orleans, officials met Wednesday to evaluate their own emergency-preparedness plan, taking note of the New Orleans hospitals that ran out of medicine and other supplies while generators that were supposed to power lights and air conditioners ran out of fuel.

Michael McCann, president of McCann Protective Services and the United Nations' former director of security, said the slow Katrina response highlights the need for "redundancy": multiple communications systems, multiple sites to assemble supplies and equipment, and extra rescue teams in quick proximity in case resources are overtaxed.

Erik Larsen, associate director of emergency medicine at White Plains (N.Y.) Hospital, treated patients brought to the Louis Armstrong International Airport. He said he wished his fellow volunteers could have done more to help the sick and injured in the Superdome and Convention Center.

"We had teams of emergency medical workers that were deployed to the Superdome, but they had to retreat out of there with their lives because there was just no security presence," he said. "So, in putting together an emergency-preparedness plan, I would think that we'll need to put more of a priority on security, whether with local police or the military."

Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, said there are a number of things the government can do to better prepare for a natural disaster, and that includes returning the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency to Cabinet status, outside the control of the Department of Homeland Security.

"You have to give the director some clout to get things done," he said.

On Wednesday, the Senate rejected a proposal by Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., for an independent, bipartisan commission, patterned after the 9/11 Commission, to determine the causes of the slow rescue effort. She needed a two-thirds vote but could only muster 44 votes, all from Democrats and independent Sen. Jim Jeffords of Vermont.

Feds to monitor recovery contracts

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — The federal government is sending teams of auditors to monitor whether taxpayers get a good deal from the billions of dollars in contracts being awarded to aid ravaged Gulf Coast communities.

Many of the contracts are exempted from the requirements of competitive bidding.

"The message has gone out very clearly to everybody that we're going to be efficient, we're going to cut through red tape, but we're not going to cut through the laws," said Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff as he announced Tuesday that his agency is dispatching 30 auditors to the Gulf Coast. He said the government will have zero tolerance for fraud and misuse of government funds.

As an example of the rush to get things going, the Army Corps of Engineers announced this week that it will quickly award $1.5 billion in hurricane cleanup contracts for Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Lt. Col Norbert Doyle, chief of contracting for the corps, said the contracting procedures are being expedited, meaning bidding that would normally takes months should be wrapped up in days.

So far, Congress has authorized $62 billion for relief efforts, with $50 billion directed to FEMA. The agency has spent more than $9 billion so far, spokeswoman Natalie Rule said.

It's not just contracts that have officials and lawmakers concerned about waste.

As part of its emergency assistance legislation, Congress has authorized federal officials to make purchases with government credit cards for up to $250,000. Normally, the maximum purchase is $15,000.

Sens. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, and Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., said that such a high threshold for purchases leaves room for "abuse and misuse."

The Office of Management and Budget announced this week that it is working on rules that would require employees to get a senior contracting official in his or her agency to sign off on large credit card purchases.

Meanwhile, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, joined by other Democrats, has asked the General Accountability Office, the investigatory arm of Congress, to establish a team of experienced auditors to help avoid the waste, fraud and abuse they say has plagued Iraq reconstruction and Homeland Security allocations.

FEMA officials said the needs are so great that the government has no choice but to issue contracts without the usual bidding procedures and oversight.

"You have 200,000 people who were displaced, possibly more," FEMA spokesman James McIntyre told the Associated Press. "We needed to get families into housing as soon as possible and off the floor of the stadium. We need the contracts to hit the ground running to get that process up and running."

In another development this week, several dozen House members, including Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, proposed legislation that would bar the Bush administration from moving forward with its plan to waive a federal law that requires government contractors to pay workers prevailing wages.

Floodwaters still a health threat, EPA says

By Mark Schleifstein
Staff writer

Floodwaters remaining in the New Orleans area continue to pose a significant health threat, Environmental Protection Agency administrator Stephen Johnson said Wednesday. The agency has found extremely high amounts of e. coli and fecal coliform, both of which indicate the presence of human and animal feces that could contain dangerous bacteria or viruses.

Johnson outlined four major sampling programs EPA is conducting in the city: on floodwater, air, the sediment remaining after floodwaters are drained, and the water in the Lake Pontchartrain drainage basin, the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico.

The agency's sampling program has just begun, but already it has been criticized by EPA employees, by scientists advising the agency on how to conduct the sampling program and by environmental groups, who say the agency hasn't moved quickly enough to protect the health of emergency personnel and residents who have stayed in or returned to New Orleans.

New water samples released Wednesday were similar to those released by the EPA last week, except the levels of e. coli and coliform, were 10 times higher. Several samples contained as many as 18,000 colonies of bacteria, compared to the 200-colony EPA standard for recreational swimming.

They also contained small amounts of a variety of chemicals and heavy metals that could be expected in wastewater sloshing through urban neighborhoods, including herbicides, arsenic, mercury, zinc and copper.

Several samples also showed significant levels of lead and small amounts of toluene, a volatile organic compound often associated with gasoline or refineries.

Conspicuously absent, however, were any readings of benzene, a chemical used in the manufacture of gasoline to boost octane, or other chemicals found in crude oil or gasoline.

That led longtime EPA internal critic Hugh Kaufman, senior policy analyst for the agency's Office of Solid Waste and Emergency Response, to call the results "bogus."

"Benzene and compounds like benzene are in the oil products in the water that everyone can see," Kaufman said. "If they come up zero on readings of benzene, the sampling is bogus. Whether it's incompetence or malice, I don't know, but there's no way to have all that oil in the water and have zero benzene."

Kaufman urged the agency to conduct detailed investigations of the water and the sediment left behind before allowing the public back in and urged that emergency workers be provided with protective clothing and respirators until it's clear there are no toxic chemicals in the water.

Meanwhile, Michigan State University professor Joan Rose, a specialist in biological contamination of wastewater that makes it way into the Gulf of Mexico and a member of the EPA's Science Advisory Board, said officials should be looking at more than just e. coli and fecal coliform in its tests of storm water and sediment.

That's because neither of those organisms is a particularly good marker when it comes to predicting the presence of harmful bacteria and viruses in water as brackish as what flooded New Orleans, she said.

She recommended testing for more specific organisms that could be linked to diseases, and also recommended that federal officials begin a long-term program to monitor the health of those exposed to contaminated water or sediment.

Johnson stressed that the agency's sampling effort was just beginning.

New Orleans Mayor RAY NAGIN

Recruiters target dislocated businesses from New Orleans

Nagin says poachers are 'sick people'

By Robert Travis Scott

BATON ROUGE — Other states and even some parishes and cities around Louisiana are trying to attract New Orleans businesses dislocated by Hurricane Katrina by offering inducements for companies to permanently relocate to their communities, a trend that Mayor Ray Nagin says he wants to stop.

As New Orleans businesses cope with the aftermath of the storm and a scattering of employees, many companies large and small have moved temporarily to other cities as they wait for the waters to recede and livable conditions to return.

That leaves those businesses vulnerable to offers from aggressive recruiters elsewhere who want lure the transplanted jobs to their areas, potentially holding back the New Orleans economic recovery.

"There are some sick people out there who don't want to see us come back," Nagin said.

Don Hutchinson, director of economic development for New Orleans, said Tuesday he knows of instances in which officials in other parts of the state have labeled their incentives to New Orleans companies with the prospect of working in areas that are "hurricane-proof." He declined to identify them.

Nagin said he would ask Gov. Kathleen Blanco to declare a moratorium on such offers made in the state.

The state Department of Economic Development, which works closely with local authorities around the state in recruiting jobs, did not respond Tuesday to questions about corporate poaching.

Nagin has announced that parts of the city spared from flooding could be reopened next week, bringing back residents and businesses to those places with power, depending on health and safety issues.

"I'm going to err on the side of protecting lives first," he said.

Nagin said some city officials had erroneously reported that the city was arranging for business owners to obtain permits to visit their sites in the city. Hutchinson said that business people can call (225) 219-0040 and leave information with a phone attendant about their desire to check on their work locations, but no permits are being issued nor appointments made for trips to town.

The city will let the businesses know at the appropriate time, probably through the media, Hutchinson said.

Alden McDonald Jr., chief executive of New Orleans-based Liberty Bank and Trust, told a state legislative panel Monday that Liberty continues to make loans and do business by operating at its Louisiana branches outside the storm-stricken area, but a critical factor in the bank's future is the ability to get employees back on the job in town as soon as possible.

"The longer we stay out of the city, the longer we'll have a more difficult opportunity getting the economy going again," said McDonald, who also is president of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce.

Jefferson denies he misused military help

Vehicles, copter diverted to congressman's home

By Ed Anderson and Bruce Alpert
Staff writers

Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, denied Tuesday that he used military resources for his own private use and delayed Hurricane Katrina rescue efforts during a tour of his flooded district Sept. 2.

Jefferson said he was in New Orleans with President Bush that day and had met with evacuees stranded in the Superdome. He said he then wanted to survey his district and was told he couldn't do that without a military escort — which he said had been provided to other members of Congress as well as to visiting officials from the Bush Cabinet.

The eight-term congressman said the National Guard provided a truck and that he got close-up views of the flooded city and the damaged 17th Street Canal levee. When he got near his own neighborhood, Jefferson said, he wanted to take a "quick look" at the damage to his house, which he said "is just human nature." He said he was pleased to see that other than some minor wind damage, his home was in pretty good shape.

Jefferson said reports by some national media outlets that he intentionally diverted resources from rescues and that he took a lot of time inside his house — leaving the National Guard members waiting for as long as an hour — aren't true. He said that when he arrived at the house, an elderly man approached them and said he didn't want to evacuate, but needed some water.

Jefferson said he brought some water out of his home to share with the man, although he pleaded with him to heed the advice of the soldiers to evacuate with them.

Jefferson said he had no intention to do anything but take a quick look at his house, but the truck got stuck in the mud, so he took the opportunity to grab some suitcases that "were already packed" for his daughters and wife, along with a laptop computer.

He said he had never asked for a military escort, and in fact had said he didn't want one. "But I was told it was too dangerous, that I had to have one," Jefferson said.

Lt. Col. Pete Schneider, a spokesman for the National Guard, said the Guard supplied Jefferson with a high-water vehicle to tour his congressional district.

"As part of that tour, he asked to be taken to his residence," Schneider said. "He left the vehicle, went into his house and took some things out."

Schneider said he did not know what Jefferson took, or how long he took to get it.

Schneider said that after the truck got stuck in water and muck near Jefferson's home, a backup vehicle from the Superdome had to be called to transfer Jefferson, his property and the National Guard crew.

He said a Coast Guard helicopter tried to make a rescue at the scene. A person rappelled down to get Jefferson but was waved off and told the "mission was not a search and rescue."

Schneider said the National Guard provides military vehicles when requested to do so for civilian purposes.

"President Bush rode in a Guard vehicle when he was in New Orleans," Schneider said. He said Jefferson's request filtered down from his chain of command.

The tour of the district and Jefferson's visit to his Uptown home to remove items came as Coast Guard, National Guard and other rescue workers were helping people on rooftops, on balconies and in hospitals, as well as providing security at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center and the Superdome.

"There had been rescues going on," Schneider said. But he said the Guard was given the job of providing a vehicle to Jefferson, "and we performed a mission that we were tasked with."

U.S. transportation chief pledges aid

Mineta tours port, I-10 spans, airport

By Matt Scallan
Staff writer

U.S. Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta toured damaged areas of Louis Armstrong International Airport and the broken Interstate 10 twin bridges between Slidell and New Orleans on Wednesday, saying he will ask Congress to remove caps on emergency aid to states stricken by disasters such as Hurricane Katrina.

"Transportation will not be a chokepoint to the economic revival of this area," he said.

Currently, emergency transportation aid is limited to $100 million per state and must be spent in 180 days.

Mineta committed $15.2 million to airport repairs and $5 million in emergency aid to repair federal highways damaged by the Aug. 29 hurricane.

"This is just a small down payment on the assistance that you need," Mineta said.

His visit represents the Bush administration's latest efforts to demonstrate its response to the Katrina disaster, after it took political flak and suffered a slide in public opinion in the hurricane's immediate aftermath. President Bush has visited the Gulf Coast three times and is scheduled to return today, and Vice President Richard Cheney also paid a visit.

Mineta answered questions about the grants in the airport's Concourse C, under a gaping hole in the roof. Airport officials say it suffered about $50 million damage from the storm, and they expect it to take a $70 million hit in lost revenue over the next five years due to lower traffic. That's equivalent to an entire year's revenue.

Louisiana Transportation and Development Secretary Johnny Bradberry told Mineta that Katrina-related damages to Louisiana roads eligible for federal money total $1.5 billion. He said the current federal funding formula requires the state to spend the money out of its own coffers first, then seek reimbursement. But the state is out of ready cash, he said.

"We're about to go over a cliff on that," he said.

Mineta toured the I-10 twin bridges, where 285-ton segments of roadway were tossed around like a child's toys. He asked project engineer John Horn of David Volkert & Associates how the existing structure could be made more resistant to future problems.

Horn said the best way would be to raise the bridge from its current height of 8 feet above water to 22 or 25 feet.

A temporary repair of the bridge is under way thanks to a $31 million federal grant. The emergency repairs will involve scavenging pieces of the two damaged bridges to make a single, two-lane crossing. Later, the more-damaged western span will be repaired.

Mineta also visited the Port of New Orleans, where he toured two ships from the U.S. Maritime Administration's Ready Reserve fleet. They are providing electrical power and housing to port workers.

The port received its first cargo shipment Tuesday, and Port

Director Gary LaGrange said that could not have happened if the port had not been able to give workers a place to sleep and office space for administrative operations.

About 600 port workers have bunks on the ships. Four more ships are on their way to Katrina-affected areas.

"Get us the cargo, and we'll get you the labor," said James Campbell, president of the International Longshoreman's Association Local 3000.

The Katrina relief effort marks the first time in history that the ready reserve fleet has been sent to a domestic port.

"Usually, they're sent overseas when there is a disaster," Mineta spokesman Robert Johnson Jr. said.

Recovery chief says corpse retrieval lagged

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – "We give thanks that this person was found … We ask that they may be made whole in God's arms …"

That prayer has been read aloud many times in the streets and homes of New Orleans by chaplains standing over the corpses of the unidentified dead left by Hurricane Katrina.

An ecumenical appeal accepted by government authorities, it will be repeated many more times as medical teams, joined with chaplains, continue to pick up bodies more than two weeks after the storm, a process so slow it has drawn the wrath of the governor and public disgust.

On Wednesday, the leader of Katrina relief operations said the gruesome job of collecting the deceased, some lying for two weeks on the street, might have been expedited if Army troops, vehicles and medical equipment had arrived sooner.

Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, principal officer of the federal response to the hurricane, said state, local and federal agencies working together with coroners and private contractors to find, collect and identify the dead are doing their job deliberately and respectfully.

Asked what could have been done differently to make the process move faster, Allen said an earlier deployment of Army units and other federal medical assistance would have helped.

National Guard units from Louisiana and other states under the supervision of Gov. Kathleen Blanco were on the ground the first week, but President Bush did not give the order to send in Marines and regular Army troops until the fifth day after the storm, and the divisions did not begin arriving in substantial numbers until one week after Katrina struck.

During the first week, Blanco and Bush disagreed about who would control the Guard and Army units, a debate that reached an impasse by the time Bush called up the Army. In the end the two leaders kept control of their respective forces, coordinated by a joint task force. Both sides have said the dispute did not determine the timing of the federal troop deployments.

About 7,000 regular Army personnel are at work in the New Orleans area, and thousands of those are assisting the operation to search for more living and to collect the dead, said Col. Tony Daskevich, defense coordinating officer for the Department of Defense. The soldiers are not handling the bodies but are providing assistance to the crews that are collecting and searching for them, he said.

Speaking alongside Allen on Wednesday at the FEMA command center in Baton Rouge, Dr. Louis Cataldie, medical incident commander in charge of the body retrieval, admitted the operation had problems.

"Are we doing a good enough job? No," Cataldie said, and he took responsibility for any shortcomings. "I'm kind of surprised they let me up here, to tell the truth," he said at the podium.

Allen said that, once the Department of Defense support was in place, a body retrieval process was negotiated with state and local officials to create a unified command center to receive reports of the dead.

The locations of bodies that were found were noted and reported to the command, which dispatches a retrieval team of four specially trained people and a chaplain. The chaplains read the following prayer before the bodies are removed to a facility in St. Gabriel for DNA, X-ray and fingerprint identification:

"We give thanks for this person's life. We give thanks that this person was found. We give thanks for the persons that found them. We ask that they may be made whole in God's arms and that they know peace."

Twin span repair continues; Causeway open to work crews

By Meghan Gordon
St. Tammany bureau

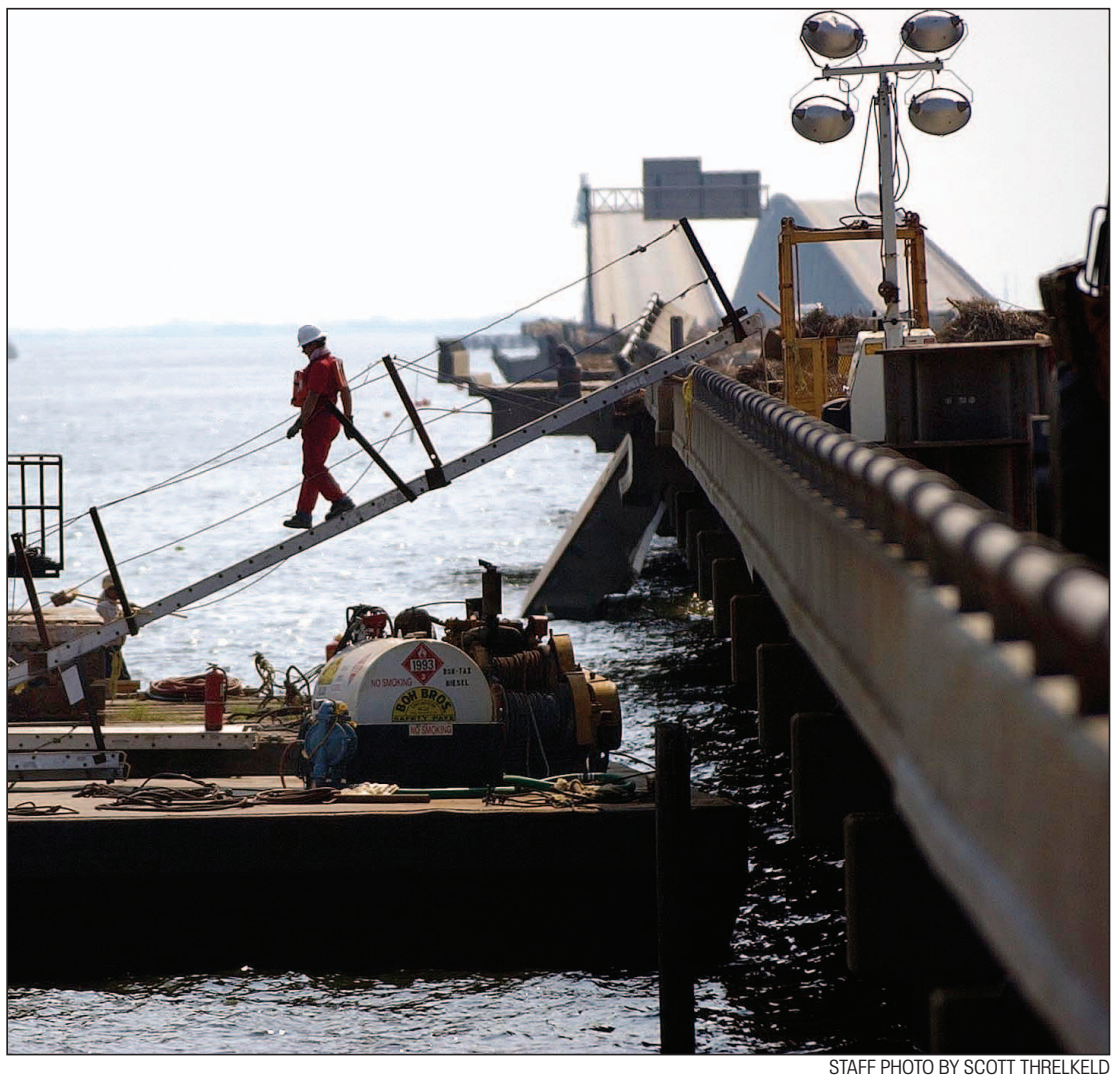
The two bridges over Lake Pontchartrain that escaped substantial damage from Hurricane Katrina remained closed to the public Wednesday, while emergency crews and business owners continued to flow into the south shore.

Officials who govern the Lake Pontchartrain Causeway and the U.S. 11 bridges have not announced when they will allow all motorists to use the routes over water into Jefferson Parish and eastern New Orleans. But once the bridges reopen, they will provide the only access to the south shore until the battered Interstate 10 twin spans are restored.

Boh Bros. Construction Co. crews worked their third day of a $30.9 million contract to repair the I-10 bridge. The contractor has 45 days to patch missing sections of bridge, after which they will be penalized $75,000 a day. The hurricane's tidal surge affected about 40 percent of the roadway, pushing it either askew on its pilings or into the lake.

In the first phase, Boh Bros. will use sections of the more seriously damaged span to patch the other bridge, allowing two-way traffic between Slidell and eastern New Orleans.

Next, the crews will install portable panels on the more severely damaged span, creating a one-lane bridge by January. The state highway department plans to take bids early next year on a new six-lane bridge to replace the twin spans.



Meanwhile, Causeway traffic has been relatively brisk as police, military, utility trucks and other emergency crews have used the closed bridge. This week, Jefferson Parish business owners who secured entry permits were also given access to the bridge linking Mandeville and Metairie.

Robert Lambert, the bridge's general manager, said he's in daily contact with Jefferson Parish officials to determine when to open the bridge to the public.

"I don't think that's too far down the road, but I don't have any timetable," he said.

Boh Bros. wrapped up work to both ends of the southbound bridge Sept. 5, restoring small sections of limestone and concrete that were eroded by Hurricane Katrina's tidal surge. For several days, Causeway police routed southbound traffic on a crisscross path over sections of both bridges. "We removed the detours last week," Lambert said. "Of course, we're quite proud we got that done in such a short time."

The U.S. 11 bridge remains under the same restrictions, said State Police Sgt. Sgt. Emery Tumulty, who did not know when the public would be allowed to cross.

Helicopter regiment carries out new mission

Blackhawks pilots fresh from Iraq

By Paul Purpura
West Bank bureau

Seven months ago, members of Louisiana National Guard's 1st Battalion, 244th Aviation Regiment, returned to New Orleans after a yearlong combat tour in Iraq.

Now they're back on active duty, this time flying missions in their UH-60 Blackhawk helicopters over southeast Louisiana and the massive damage wrought by Hurricane Katrina. Some of the battalion's soldiers and their families were left homeless by the storm. The battalion itself is displaced, as Katrina caused heavy damage to its hangar at the New Orleans Lakefront Airport.

The battalion's Blackhawks are part of a military and civilian helicopter force currently larger than that patrolling Iraq.

"This is personal," said Maj. Patrick Bossetta, the 1/244th's commanding officer and an Algiers resident whose childhood home in Lakeview is awash in murky flood water. "It's our community. It's our house, our neighbors. We're the home team."

Before Katrina made landfall on Aug. 29, the battalion's helicopters were flown to safe havens in Alexandria and Texas. The battalion was among the 4,000 Louisiana Army and Air National Guard members positioned to react after Katrina passed.

The idea that the military was slow to react, as some have said, angers Brig. Gen. Gary Jones, superintendent of Rapides Parish public schools who now heads National Guard efforts in Louisiana in an operation the military calls Task Force Pelican.

"That's baloney," Jones said. "We were here. We did it. We responded."

But Katrina caused more damage than anyone expected.

"We knew as soon as (Katrina) quit that this was such a massive disaster that no amount of preparation would work," Jones said. "It obviously overwhelmed us, and in my opinion, FEMA was a little slow to respond."

Katrina's passing started a frantic search-and-rescue operation by air, land and boat. The 1/244th and Coast Guard helicopters were the first to respond, doing so in Katrina's immediate aftermath as 50 mph winds still whipped the aircraft.

"At first, it was just chaos," said 2nd Lt. Luis Sologaistea, a pilot and Mandeville resident whose missions ranged from rescuing people from rooftops to flying stranded hospital patients to Louis Armstrong International Airport.

When the Industrial Canal levee was breeched and spilled water into the 9th Ward, the Jackson Barracks, the Louisiana Guard's headquarters at the Orleans-St. Bernard parish line, began flooding. The 400 soldiers and airmen who rode out Katrina there, like thousands or residents in the area, were trapped.

The Guard members made their way to the Mississippi River levee, where the 1/244th aircrews evacuated them to the Superdome, said Lt. Col. Sherry Brannan, an Abita Springs resident who is executive officer of the 204th Air Traffic Services Group.

At the Superdome, Brannan and others in the unit began planning to manage the helicopter flow. They knocked down light poles at the Superdome's parking areas to create more landing pads, Brannan said.

As floodwaters deepened, pilot Chief Warrant Officer Wayne Griffin of Belle Chasse said he and other pilots spotted people gathering on rooftops or on elevated roadways and bridges.

"Every time you'd leave and come back, there were more people," Griffin said. "We were running 24 hours a day."

Nursing home owners dispute that parish offered to help

Deaths blamed on levee break, not negligence

By Paul Rioux
St. Bernard bureau

A day after the owners of a St. Bernard Parish nursing home were booked in the deaths of 34 residents who died when the facility flooded during Hurricane Katrina, the couple's attorney painted a scene of desperation where staffers tried valiantly to stave off the storm and frantically began rescuing residents when water raged into the building.

James Cobb, a New Orleans attorney representing Mable B. Mangano, 62, and her husband, Salvador A. Mangano, 65, said the Manganos are "heroes" and called their arrest a "rush to misjudgment."

Parish officials scoffed at the notion.

The Manganos, owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home near Poydras, were booked Tuesday on 34 counts of negligent homicide. Authorities say the nursing home ignored the parish's mandatory evacuation order and refused offers by the parish to send buses to evacuate the facility.

The Manganos, who were released on their own recognizance, were not available for comment Wednesday. But Cobb, speaking on their behalf, said they described to him a hellish scene in which torrents of water consumed the home within 20 minutes. He said the Manganos also dispute that the parish made an offer to help them evacuate as Katrina bore down Aug. 29.

Cobb said the Manganos told him it wasn't even raining after the storm when they went outside, but that they heard some noise and saw water coming toward the home. "The water kept coming and coming to the point they had to bust out the windows and float out patients on their mattresses," he said.

Inside the home Wednesday, muck 6 to 8 inches deep covered the floor. Furniture, wheelchairs and mattresses appeared tossed about as if in an explosion, testament to the flood's power. A water mark smirched the wall above most doorways. Oddly, in room after room along the long main hallway, pictures of residents' loved ones still hung on walls, seemingly undisturbed.

A mud-caked doll lies under a resident's bed at St. Rita's on Wednesday. The home's owners were booked with multiple counts of negligent homicide after 34 residents died when the facility succumbed to Hurricane Katrina's floodwaters.

Cobb said the home had never flooded before, not even during Hurricane Betsy in 1965. He blamed levee breaks – not the lack of an early evacuation – for the deaths.

He said the Manganos and others at the home scrambled to get boats, in some cases shooting locks off nearby gates, to help save 52 people. Of those, 24 were residents; the others were staffers and their families.

"They're heroes, not criminals," Cobb said. "Somebody ought to be giving them medals."

Cobb disputed that St. Bernard coroner Bryan Bertucci offered two buses to evacuate residents before the worst of the storm hit. Cobb said the Manganos said they spoke with Bertucci before the storm, but that it was a routine conversation about removing the body of a woman who had died earlier of natural causes.

But parish and state officials say the home is to blame for the 34 deaths.

State Attorney General Charles Foti, in announcing the arrests Tuesday, said the home is required by law to follow a mandatory evacuation plan filed with parish government for hurricanes stronger that Category 2. Katrina made landfall as a Category 4.

Told of Cobb's reference to the Manganos as heroes, Larry Ingargiola, St. Bernard Parish's director of emergency preparedness, flashed his middle finger and asked a reporter: "Can you quote this in your paper?"

Bertucci, meanwhile, was adamant that he had offered the home two buses with drivers who would take residents to safer ground. "They should have evacuated and people are dead because they didn't," Bertucci said.

A Foti spokeswoman, meanwhile, said there was no rush to judgment in arresting the Manganos.

Kris Wartelle, the spokeswoman, said the attorney general has a responsibility to act immediately when there is evidence of wrongdoing.

"It's pretty glaring that 34 people drowned when they should have been evacuated," she said.

The waterline in one resident's room, its walls covered with cards and letters from loved ones, shows that floodwaters reached the bottom of a wall clock.

LOUIS COCHRAN, 72, West End boat owner

West End still standing, but barely

The West End — a New Orleans dining and drinking playground for decades —may now be the worst end.

Bruning's, a historic bar where generations of customers downed raw oysters, and the porch at Jaeger's, where crawfish and cold beer accompanied sunsets over Lake Pontchartrain, now exist as rotting wood piled 20 feet high on the opposite side of the 17th Street Canal near the site of Sid-Mar's of Bucktown, also laid to waste by Hurricane Katrina. Pilings that once supported restaurants and bars are nothing more than seagull perches.

"The old Bruning's house had been there for a hundred years, and now it's gone," said Louis Cochran, 72, who bicycled over to Bucktown with friend Mark Adolph, 49, to check on their boats in the nearby marinas.

The only way into West End for civilians these days is by foot or by bike, across the pedestrian bridge over the canal, and that can be precarious, for Katrina's wind and storm surge peeled away some of the bridge's hand railings.

Cochran and Adolph carefully navigated the dinner plates, flatware and broken wine glasses in the West End parking lot that was coated by cracking mud. At nearby Coconut Beach, the once-pristine white sand of the 17-net volleyball complex is now a muddy gray minefield of twisted metal siding, glass and roof material.

The Municipal Marina Yacht Harbor and the boathouses that line its waters fared better, but not by much. Boats and cars are lodged against oak trees along North Roadway. Cinderblocks and red bricks from the public bathroom near the fishing dock are sprinkled across the roadway along with crab traps that washed ashore from the lake, their prisoners still baking in the sun.

Mike and Gloria Branford, both 50, have visited the area several times since the middle of last week, checking on Boathouse No. 84, their home for almost two years.

None of the boathouses escaped damage, but some are worse off than others. Owners who made recent renovations will have less to repair, Mike Branford said.

Many of the structures have collapsed, or their walls are blown away. At the living room of a friend's home, Gloria Branford pointed out where the floor dropped away, creating a pool of insulation and broken boards.

"On the first day, I was emotionally destroyed," she said. "I couldn't talk without crying."

Remarkably the bars inside many of the boathouses seem intact, their liquor bottles unbroken, which could be seen in the houses missing their exterior walls.

"There's something about liquor that doesn't knock over that easy," Mike Branford said.

At the Branfords' boathouse on Breakwater Drive, water swept through the downstairs area, taking with it the wallboards and some personal belongings. But the damage seemed minimal compared to the houses on either side, each seemingly smashed by a wrecking ball.

Mike Branford, a former carpenter turned auto-body mechanic, said he designed his house with storms in mind. Still, the devastation around the marina, the West End and elsewhere in New Orleans is not lost on the couple. They remember the West End when New Orleans residents flocked to restaurants and clubs such as The Bounty, The Port Hole and Augie's Delago. The area stagnated for a while, but it seemed to begun a mini-renaissance in recent years with the arrival of The Dock, a restaurant and bar that used live music to attract a hipper crowd.

Just as the Branfords have gradually become more adamant in the past two weeks about rebuilding, they also have hope that life will return throughout West End. They envision an alternative to the French Quarter, with boardwalks, hotels and other attractions that play up the beauty of the lake.

"This could be a blessing. It has potential," Mike Branford said.

He stood on the front deck of his boathouse, gazing at the lake as if willing the destruction around him to fade away.

"You just can't look sideways or look back," he said.

Federal flood policies don't cover loss of use

dressed on Friday at a meeting of the Joint Legislative Committee on Insurance. At the meeting, some Louisiana lawmakers said they would like the federal government to create a special appropriation to cover the difference between flood insurance and homeowner's policy payouts.

Carol Hess and her husband, Bobby, have paid $364 a year for their flood policy. And State Farm adjuster Steve Evans said his week that the Hesses will be able to recover a maximum of $155,800 for damage to their Eden Isles home and its contents under the policy. If the adjuster had blamed the damage on the hurricane, the Hesses could have gotten as much as $277,918, according to their homeowners' policy, which cost $1,640 annually.

The news blew them both away.

"My house is demolished and you're telling me it was a flood," complained Bobby Hess, 58, a retired air-conditioning mechanic. "But water didn't pick up this roof and dump it in my back yard. This furniture didn't come by water. It was pushed here by the wind. It makes no sense to me. I am totally disgusted with the whole thing."

Carol Hess couldn't hide her disappointment: "I paid $1,600 a year for nothing."

This scene will likely be replayed countless times in the coming months, as insurance adjusters spread out across southeastern Louisiana, where most of the damage from Katrina was caused by water, not wind.

While representatives of various insurance companies promise that each claim will be handled on an individual basis, they also note that the rules of the insurance business haven't changed in Katrina's wake. That means any damage caused to a home by rising water is covered by flood insurance, not a homeowner's policy.

"A flood is defined as rising water, and it doesn't matter why the water is rising," said Jeff Albright, chief executive of the Independent Agents and Brokers of Louisiana. "If it rains faster than it can be pumped away, that's a flood. If a wind blows the Gulf of Mexico or some other body of water ... into the city, that is a flood and it is covered under flood insurance. Rising waters, by definition, are excluded from a homeowner's policy."

For insurers, the distinction could save them billions of dollars. Any losses from flood insurance are covered by the federal government, and with damage from Katrina now estimated at $200 billion, it's easy to see why adjusters aren't anxious to make exceptions.

In many parts of New Orleans, most of which lies below sea level, flood insurance is required by mortgage companies. But according to the Insurance Information Institute, about half of New Orleans residents still don't have flood insurance, compared with a national average of about 80 percent.

Some homes in the New Orleans area that were affected by the 17th Street Canal flooding don't carry flood insurance because they are not in a flood plain.

Bobby and Carol Hess could have gotten rid of their flood policy last year, when they paid off their 15-year mortgage. But they didn't even consider a change.

"I always took the advice of my insurance agent," said Carol Hess, 57, an administrative worker for the IRS in New Orleans. "I asked several times if I had adequate coverage, and they said yes."

Based on several property sales near their home on Moonraker Drive, Hess figures her house was worth about $350,000 before the storm. She estimates the family's personal property, including two small boats, was worth about $70,000.

Most of that property is now lying in her driveway or the front yard.

To mitigate the damage to his two-story home, Bobby Hess, right, removed everything that got wet when 3 feet of water inundated the property. He watches as insurance adjuster Steve Evans takes measurements in the living room.

"This is the worst I've seen so far," said Evans, who has visited hundreds of water-logged homes in his six years as a catastrophe specialist for State Farm.

To mitigate the damage to the two-story home, Bobby Hess removed everything that got wet when 3 feet of water inundated the property, including the kitchen cabinets, the first-floor furniture, the carpeting and the appliances. He even ripped out four feet of sheet rock on every wall, figuring it was the only way to stop mold from taking over the entire house.

He also hauled out an eight-foot dresser that belonged to a neighbor across the nearby canal. It was one of many artifacts that washed up in his living room. The fact that so much debris made it into his house still stuns him.

As he does ever time a major storm marches across the Gulf toward New Orleans, Hess covered each door and window of his home with a half-inch of plywood, all of it carefully labeled. Then he and his wife headed to a hotel in Montgomery, Ala.

Despite his precautions, storm surge drove debris right through his sliding glass doors, shattering the glass and bending the frames. The water also dumped about five feet of shattered timber in his back yard, as well as a water heater and two refrigerators. The only thing Carol Hess recognizes in the mess is their riding lawnmower, which is barely visible.

"Who is going to clean up this mess?" she asks Evans, who works as an adjuster on behalf of both the National Flood Insurance Program and State Farm. "The majority of this is not ours. Does the parish pick this up? Does the insurance company?"

Once again, because Evans has determined that the primary cause of the damage was rising water, the answer comes as a blow. Hess is told that her policy will only cover the removal of debris that is in her house or touching it - she and her husband are responsible for everything else.

After studying a copy of her homeowners' policy, Carol Hess walks over to Evans and points to an item marked "loss of use." She asks him what it means.

Evans acknowledges that her home is now "uninhabitable," and says that if the damage had been caused by a hurricane, she would have been entitled to up to two years of additional living expenses. But the government offers no such coverage with flood policies, he notes.

For Carol Hess, the answer is the last straw. She and her husband have been living in their sons' small Madisonville home for the past two weeks, but their daughter-in-law is expecting a baby next month. They will have to move out soon and were hoping to rent a trailer and live in their driveway with air-conditioning supplied with a generator. Now, they don't know how they will pay for it.

"What are we supposed to do?," asks Hess, crying.

Evans suggests contacting FEMA, which is expected to hand out billions of dollars in disaster relief.

"There is a lot of money coming into this state," Evans says. "I'm sure a lot of it is going to help people like you with your uninsured losses."

That doesn't console Hess. "I called FEMA a week ago. I have yet to hear from them."

Six hours after arriving at their home, Evans hands Bobby Hess a check for $10,000 to cover damage to their personal belongings. Ultimately, he says, the couple will get $31,400 for their personal property - he just needs them to finish an inventory first.

Evans said it would take another week to give them a check for the damage to their home. Again, he said it could reach their policy limit of $124,400 - or less than half of what the owners think it is worth.

Evans is apologetic. "I wish there was something different I could tell you," Evans told the Hesses. "But the government wrote this policy; we're just here to administer it."

Carol Hess isn't mollified. "I know the coverage is dictated by the government, but the damage is being determined by State Farm."

NAVIGATING THE INSURANCE MAZE

Consumers with Hurricane Katrina-related property damage will have to navigate a complex maze of insurance issues that has already been the subject of a debate by the Joint Legislative Committee on Insurance.

Whom do I call to begin the filing hurricane-related insurance claims?
Contact your insurance agent or insurance company. If you don't know the phone number, look it up by going to the Louisiana Department of Insurance's Web site www.ldi.state.la.us and clicking on "Hurricane Katrina Information." The Web site of the Insurance Information Institute also lists phone numbers: www.disasterinformation.org/findins.htm.

▶ The phone numbers of three of the larger insurance companies operating in Louisiana are:
Allstate: (800) 547-8676
Farm Bureau: (800) 772-6535
State Farm: (800) 732-5246

▶ If you don't remember which company you're insured with and can't reach your agent, contact the Louisiana Department of Insurance at (800) 259-5300 or (225) 342-5900. You can also send e-mail to the department at public@ldi.state.la.us.

▶ If you don't have insurance, contact the Federal Emergency Management Agency to see if you qualify for assistance through that agency. Call FEMA at (800) 621-FEMA or go to www.fema.gov.

Which insurance policy should I file a claim under?

▶ Homeowner's insurance usually covers losses caused by wind, storm or broken water pipes, but not surface flooding.

▶ Flood insurance covers most losses caused by surface floodwater. Information on filing your flood insurance claims is available at www.fema.gov/hazards/floods/tips_flood_claim.shtm

Be sure to contact every insurer who may be involved in your losses. This means contacting your auto insurer if your car has been damaged and your flood insurer if your home has flooded.

I know whom to call. What do I do next?

▶ Call your insurance agent or company, describe the damage your property has sustained, and find out whether it's covered by your policy. Ask how long you have to file a claim, how long it will take to process the claim, and whether you'll need estimates for repairs.

▶ Take reasonable steps to protect your property from further damage. This could involve pulling a tarp over a damaged roof, boarding up broken windows, or tearing out soaked carpets. Insurance companies are relaxing this requirement for homeowners who have not been allowed to return to their neighborhoods. But keep a record of any repair expenditures you are able to make.

▶ Begin to document your loss. Your insurance company will try to determine the value of your loss by asking you to complete a proof-of-loss form or sending an adjuster - a person professionally trained to assess damage - to your home. Prepare for the adjuster's visit by compiling an inventory of damaged or destroyed items along with the cost of each. Identify structural damage to your home. You may want to take photos of the damages and get written bids from licensed contractors. Keep copies of all of the information you are providing to your insurance company.

I have been forced to temporarily relocate as a result of Hurricane Katrina. Will my living expenses be reimbursed while I am displaced?
Homeowner's insurance policies often cover these expenses. And some flood insurance policies, but not all, also cover them. Whether or not an individual lives in an area under mandatory evacuation can also come into play in determining whether or not a policy covers temporary living expenses. It is probably wise to save your receipts in case your expenses are covered.

I'm waiting on my insurance company(ies) to settle my claim. Is there anything I can do for my home before official repairs begin?

▶ When it is safe to return to your home, be sure to take the following items with you: flashlight, battery-operated radio, dust mask, drinking water, trash bags and safety clothing such as hard hats and gloves.

▶ Your home will dry out more quickly if you can reduce the humidity inside. To do this, open up the house, and if you have power, run fans and dehumidifiers.

▶ Wash and disinfect the parts of your home that flooded.

I have both flood and homeowner's insurance policies. Which policy will ultimately cover damages to my property?
File claims under both policies. The adjusters visiting your property will make the final determination.

I received a settlement from my insurance company, but it is not enough to cover my losses. What should I do now?
Read over your settlement documents. If you believe a mistake has been made, contact your insurance agent. If you are still not satisfied, your agent can tell you how to contest the settlement. Next, call FEMA at (800) 621-FEMA. FEMA may be able to help cover losses that are uninsured. To begin the FEMA disaster application process, register online at www.fema.gov. You also need to write a letter to FEMA explaining your situation and include a copy of the settlement or denial letter from your insurance company.

CULICCHIA NEUROLOGICAL CLINIC REOPENS

There are so many aspects to recovery in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, a tragedy that has changed our lives and New Orleans.

But our city will recover.

For the last two weeks, many of the neurologists and neurosurgeons at Culicchia Neurological Clinic have been treating victims 24/7 at area hospitals. We are now able to return to our offices to resume our practices.

Culicchia Neurological Clinic's office at West Jefferson Medical Center is open to treat patients with neurological conditions.

would not be able to withstand the effects of high winds and flooding from a hurricane.

Water would take out the main emergency generator and electrical switches in the hospital's basement, leaving only a few smaller generators to power life-sustaining equipment. Windows would shatter once sustained winds climbed above 60 mph, well below hurricane level.

"I knew that before the storm, and I've known that for seven years," said Thomas, the hospital's chief executive, to a state Senate committee Wednesday.

But as the post-Katrina recovery effort got under way, state and federal officials said this week that a side effect of the deadly storm might actually jump-start LSU's efforts to build a 500-bed facility to replace the aging hospitals that made up the Medical Center of Louisiana-New Orleans.

Donald Smithburg, who oversees the statewide charity hospital system as head of LSU's Health Care Services Division, said it's unlikely that Charity Hospital will be reopened as a hospital. "We suspect the building will be deemed unfit," he said, although inspections did not begin work until this week and results won't be known for days or weeks.

And although preliminary plans are in the works to use University Hospital as an outpatient clinic, possibly as soon as April, LSU officials would prefer to use federal reconstruction money to build an entirely new facility.

Planning for a replacement hospital had been progressing, albeit at a snail's pace, before Katrina. But with Charity Hospital rendered virtually inoperable, its structural flaws exposed to the world in the storm's horrifying aftermath, LSU officials say the momentum and money exists for a long-term reconfiguration of Louisiana's unique statewide hospital system.

"This is an opportunity to design a health care delivery system, at least for south Louisiana … and do some true regional planning that's probably unprecedented for this region," Smithburg said.

What such a system might ultimately look like, however, remains to be decided. "We don't really know what New Orleans is going to be conceptualized as," Smithburg said. "(But) we have the advantage of a lot of spadework that has already been done."

The state could be in line for a substantial payment from the Federal Emergency Management Agency's public assistance program. The program is designed to pay state and local governments for unforeseen costs associated with natural disasters that insurance won't cover.

David Fukutomi, who leads FEMA's infrastructure branch, said the federal government would normally pay to restore publicly owned health care facilities to their "prestorm" condition. But federal rules also allow states to put that repair money toward new construction, if the new facility is used for the same purpose as the old one.

Similarly, the state would be free to redirect FEMA repair money meant for the Superdome toward construction of a new stadium should it so choose, Fukutomi said. "We try to grant states some flexibility" in how they spend public assistance money, Fukutomi said.

But FEMA funds likely would only cover a fraction of the cost of a new hospital, which Smithburg would like to see built near Charity's present location.

U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, said there is a chance that additional federal money could be made available as part of a Katrina-related spending bill being crafted on Capitol Hill. "I think you will see … an explicit consideration of the health care infrastructure" included as part of the bill, Jindal said, adding that it's too early to know how much, if any, would be included.

Even before the storm, studies had made clear that the 21-story building that most of New Orleans knows as "Big Charity" needed a major face-lift. A detailed 2003 report by Washer-Hill & Lipscomb and Adams Project Management found that the building, built in 1938, was "outdated in both design and building systems and has numerous serious building system issues that must be addressed in the near future."

The study estimated that $158 million in repairs were needed to the Charity campus alone, and that a 600-bed replacement hospital would cost $332 million.

Overall reconstruction costs for state buildings could be steep. Jerry Jones, who directs the Office of State Buildings for the Division of Administration, said damage estimates for state buildings won't be available for weeks. He said the state owns about 19 million square feet of property with an insured value of $1.9 billion in the six parishes most heavily affected by Katrina, only about $125 million of which is covered by insurance.

"We'll burn through that pretty quickly," Jones said.

In the meantime, LSU officials are developing interim plans for getting the charity system up and running in New Orleans while a new facility is planned and built. Smithburg said one option is to convert University Hospital into an outpatient clinic, which could be ready by April once mold and other flood-related damage is cleared out.

Another option is to set up temporary facilities in hospitals that have been abandoned, while setting up a network of neighborhood clinics to serve residents returning to the New Orleans area.

Jindal said it will likely be up to state and local government to decide how and where such money would be spent, but said the expected influx of funding presents an historic opportunity to shake up the state's long-troubled health care delivery system.

"We had health care problems before Katrina," Jindal said. "Now is the time to think about how we'd like to fix that."

Debris clogging drain removed piece by piece

DRAIN, from A-1

Restoring access from East Jefferson was a victory for relief workers, who stayed on the job as police vehicles and trucks quickly took advantage of another way in and out of the city.

"It's drained tremendously. Yesterday, I didn't think an 18-wheeler could get through there," said Ralph Lagrue, a foreman with the state Department of Transportation and Development who was using a small bulldozer to keep debris from clogging the large drain where the highway dips under the railroad trestle near the Metairie Road exit.

"You can see how high the water was," Lagrue said, pointing to a water line near the top of sound walls along the interstate that average 20 feet in height.

Workers said they had been at the site all day, struggling to keep ahead of the debris build-up with tools that ranged from an excavator to bare hands. It was a tedious task, with items such as garbage cans, trash, tree limbs and even a small boat getting caught in the water's rush out of the adjacent neighborhood.

"Water was already coming through there. We just had to find out where the trash was," said Henry Smith, a heavy equipment operator for the Army Corps of Engineers. "It started to flow real good after we cleared it."

Smith said he was headed with the excavator to clear more debris at Pumping Station No. 19 at 4500 Broad St.

An 18-wheeler makes it through the water under the railroad trestle on I-10 as more water from Lakeview drains under the sound barriers on Wednesday. This is one of the major ways to access New Orleans and it has been blocked because of the water since Hurricane Katrina struck more than two weeks ago.

At its height, the floodwater from Hurricane Katrina reached the bottom of the railroad trestle that crosses the interstate near the Orleans/Jefferson parish line. With a major pumping station along the interstate operational, only a small pool of water remained as a filthy waterfall continued to rush out of Lakeview, under and through grates in the sound walls.

The West End/Florida Boulevard exit, navigable only by boat a few days ago, was drivable at least to the edge of Lakeview, the first neighborhood to flood after Katrina breached the nearby 17th Street Canal. The street was even visible in places, although filled with trees and mud-encased vehicles strewn across yards and the neutral ground. Rooftops surrounded by eight feet of water or more in the days after the storm were beginning to look like homes again, albeit many of them likely damaged beyond repair. "We're trying to get it back," Lagrue said. "If we can get the water out, we can do it."

SHEILA STROUP

Away from home, but not reality

France.

It seems weird that we evacuated to a place 4,000 miles away, but our bike trip to celebrate 40 years of marriage had been planned for months, and already paid for, too.

"What can you do here without power or phones? Just go," our neighbor Bob told us. He said he'd take care of our animals like he always does when we're away.

So Stroup spent that Tuesday clearing trees out of the driveway and along the road, hoping there'd be some way to escape from St. Tammany Parish.

It seemed doubtful at first. Roads in every direction were littered with huge pines and live oaks. Our neighborhood near Abita Springs had suddenly become a giant graveyard of trees, and everywhere we looked, broken-off pine trunks stood stark against the sky, jagged spears aimed toward heaven.

"Our landscape will never be the same," Bob said.

Pangs of guilt

It was eerie driving toward Covington on Tuesday evening. What had been roads two days earlier were strange woody caves, barely wide enough in some places for my Jeep to pass through. All day, men armed with chain saws had been making a path through the rubble. From one patch of road to the next, neighbors helped neighbors clear a way.

I felt guilty for leaving.

"Part of me doesn't want to make it to the Interstate," I told Stroup, as we tried one blocked road and then another.

But we made it to the Interstate, to Atlanta, and finally to Paris. We didn't see the International Herald Tribune or turn on CNN, though, until we reached Avignon in southern France.

When I found out the extent of the hurricane and its terrible aftermath, I cried. For the people in the Superdome, in the 9th Ward, in Mississippi, everywhere.

The scenes we saw, the stories we read seemed unreal. They were too much to take in.

Going home

We were gone 12 days.

"I haven't been away from home this long since I went to college," I told Stroup when we were driving back to Louisiana.

I guess I'm not much of a traveler. We had spent the night at our daughter Claire's house near Atlanta, but we both woke up about 2:30 a.m. and decided to get on the road.

On the drive back, we talked about how we had tried to enjoy our vacation, but how our hearts were never really in Provence.

"It's just that after going through the hurricane, everything else seemed sort of anticlimactic," Stroup said.

We pulled into the driveway a few minutes before noon, reeling from the broken landscape we'd been seeing for miles. Our power lines were still braided through the branches of a live oak, and dead catfish, starved for oxygen without the fountain running, floated on our pond.

But our dogs, Rosy and Harry, ran across the yard when they heard my voice, and our donkey Nathanial met us with a boisterous bray. Stroup righted the flagpole that had been lying on the ground for two weeks and went inside to get the flag. It felt right to be home.

Life in St. Tammany returning to normal

Power is restored to much of parish

By Charlie Chapple
St. Tammany bureau

St. Tammany Parish President Kevin Davis reflected Wednesday on his first tour of the parish during the waning winds of Katrina on Aug. 29 as the hurricane ripped into Mississippi. What Davis saw, he said, will forever remain etched in his memory.

"It was total devastation everywhere," he said. "That picture will be on my mind forever. And once I saw the picture, I felt sadness for the people and what they would see of their homes and businesses when they returned to the parish."

Little did Davis and others know that St. Tammany would be well on the road to recovery only 16 days after a storm that inflicted unprecedented damage parishwide, especially in the Slidell area, where storm surge reached to Gause Boulevard and flooded more than half the city along with subdivisions south, southeast and southwest of the city.

St. Bernard may return sooner, not later

First few residents could visit on Saturday

By Manuel Torres
St. Bernard bureau

In another sign that their recovery is gaining traction, St. Bernard Parish officials Wednesday announced that they might allow the first parish residents to return to the stricken area as early as Saturday.

Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez said officials might unveil a re-entry plan by Friday. He said the first area to reopen will likely be south Arabi, where residents will be allowed to return for a few hours to view their homes.

"We want people to come back to assess damage as soon as possible," Rodriguez said.

The parish government also said business owners can come into the parish now to assess damage to their stores and businesses but must first receive a government permit.

Wednesday's announcements marked a day of visible progress as crews continue cleaning streets and as business owners began streaming into the parish just more than two weeks after Hurricane Katrina ravaged most of the area.

The positive signs included an announcement that all parish streets are expected to be clear of water and debris by the weekend, and that toxicology testing had uncovered no signs of infec-

Signs of normal life were popping up Wednesday on the West Bank: traffic on the West Bank Expressway was increasingly heavy and more businesses were opening their doors to customers.

While Gen. de Gaulle Drive in Algiers remained sparsely traveled, with only emergency and official vehicles in sight, grocery stores, service stations and some specialty shops in West Jefferson were up and running, as were the post offices in Gretna and Westwego.

The West Bank took much less of a blow from Hurricane Katrina than other areas took, and businesses seemed eager to welcome customers back. One of earliest West Bank stores to reopen

Jeff debris collection picks up

Organic matter is ground into mulch

By Michelle Hunter
East Jefferson bureau

While the stench of garbage and other rotting refuse can be caught in the breeze in Jefferson Parish, the smell of freshly ground mulch wafts throughout Lafreniere Park in Metairie.

That's where the Army Corps of Engineers has set up its storm debris collection headquarters for the entire east bank.

In five days, trucks have hauled in more than 100,000 cubic yards of pine tree trunks, oak limbs, cypress branches and other organic debris, piling it in the southwest corner of the park on the baseball fields.

The crews have created an arboreal wall 800 feet long and 35 feet high in some places. The piles will only get bigger, and nobody knows by how much.

"There's no way to estimate that right now," said Deano Bonano, Jefferson Parish's deputy chief administrative assistant for operations. "We only have about 30 percent of our population back." There are still a lot of trees and other debris on homes and businesses and in yards. When more residents return, additional storm debris will be put out for collection, Bonano said.

About 23,000 cubic yards of debris in roughly 800 truckloads rolls into Lafreniere Park each day. By Wednesday afternoon, crews had already burned through two giant mulchers. And the white smoke pouring out of the latest grinder seemed to signal the need for another replacement. But workers were able to keep the machine

Tax relief sought for Katrina victims

Assessors will ask lawmakers for help

By Charlie Chapple
St. Tammany bureau

Tax assessors in hurricane-ravaged areas of the state will ask the Legislature for changes in tax laws to give owners of ruined homes and businesses adjustments on this year's property tax bills, St. Tammany Parish Assessor Patricia Schwarz Core said Tuesday.

In St. Tammany Parish, an estimated 15,000 to 20,000 homes were heavily damaged or destroyed. Tens of thousands more were destroyed or damaged across south Louisiana.

Core said state tax laws do not allow assessors to re-value properties damaged or destroyed by natural disasters after Jan. 1 of the current calendar or property tax year. Those changes have to be made in the following year, she said.

But Core and other area assessors want the Legislature to call a special session and change the laws so home and business owners can be given relief in their 2005 property tax bills scheduled to be mailed in December, she said.

Core, like many residents, returned from Florida Tuesday to find her home in Port Louis, west of Madisonville, destroyed by Katrina.

"If it were left up to me, I would remove all uninhabitable homes from the rolls" and tax only the value of the land or home site, Core said, "because I know what everybody's going through . . . But legally, I can't do it because there's no provisions in the law to account for catastrophes or major disasters."

There also should be changes in the law to allow for adjustments this year in the values of all properties that flooded, Core said.

If the laws are changed and property value adjustments for storm damage are allowed this year, Core said there will be a negative impact on local government agencies which levy property taxes. They will get significantly less property tax revenue for 2005 early next year, she said.

"For example, in the Slidell area, some of the most expensive homes in St. Tammany were completely destroyed by the hurricane," Core said. If those homes are taken off the rolls, there will be a significant dip in tax revenues for agencies which that levy millages in the area, she said.

Because of Katrina and possible changes in the laws to allow assessors to re-value properties destroyed or heavily damaged by the storm, the state Tax Commission has removed the Nov. 15 deadline for certifying this year's tax rolls, Core said.

Core said Katrina hit on Aug. 29, the final day of a two-week period for the public review of this year's St. Tammany property tax rolls. Core said she is keeping the public review period open indefinitely for residents to file appeals of their assessments.

Core said her Slidell office in the Towers Building is out of commission, and residents who filed appeals of their assessment at that office may need to refile their appeals "if they don't hear from us in a couple of weeks."

Most of water in parish drained

tious diseases in the water still draining from a few areas. But keeping their perspective in check, officials said 70 to 80 percent of the structures in the parish may have to be razed.

Most of Katrina's waters, which two weeks ago reached 20 feet in some areas, have drained from the parish. But a thick layer of muck still makes many streets impassable. Officials, however, say a company hired for the cleanup expects to have the streets clear soon, allowing for the first round of returns.

The first part of Arabi targeted to reopen will be that part from Jackson Barracks to Chalmette Refining and from St. Bernard Highway to the Mississippi River levee.

But officials asked residents to wait for details before making plans to return. Those returning to assess the damage should come with gloves and boots, and no children.

"Please be patient. We don't want anybody to get sick," said state Sen. Walter Boasso, R-Chalmette.

In the meantime, officials are allowing business owners to come back to the parish and assess damage to their properties. Business owners can do that now, but those returning must have identification and must obtain a pass. Passes can be obtained through the parish Web site, www.stbernardparishgovernment.com. Officials said they will post details of the general entry plan on the Web site.

Also Wednesday, the head of a Federal Emergency Management Agency medical team working in the parish said toxicology tests in the parish found no traces of infectious diseases. Don Decker, however, said people working in the parish and planning to return should get shots for tetanus and hepatitis.

Officials will make the vaccines available for resident in St. Bernard at their makeshift command center at Chalmette Refining.

Prescriptions being dispensed

was the Walgreens at the West Bank Expressway and Stumpf Boulevard in Gretna. Manager Ed Mitts said the store opened Sept. 8, staffed at first by only managers, and it has dispensed several thousand prescriptions.

"There were old ladies coming in with bags full of empty prescription vials, needing their medicine, and that made it all worthwhile for us," Mitts said. The drug store also has sold plenty of food staples, such as milk and bread, and visiting National Guard soldiers have been among its most steady customers.

Walgreens spokesman Michael Polzin said the Gretna store is one of 15 in the New Orleans area that are open, including ones in Kenner, Westwego and Marrero, as well as two each in Slidell, Mandeville, Covington and Hammond, and three in Metairie, he said.

All of the open stores have fully operating pharmacies, Polzin said by telephone from Deerfield, Ill. "We put a priority on opening the pharmacies, especially the first week or two after the storm," he said.

Ragusa Supermarket on the West Bank Expressway in Marrero opened Tuesday, and Marrero residents Jerry Weaver and Lisa Bush were happy Wednesday to see signs of civilization returning to their neighborhood.

"We're here to get a few groceries," Weaver said. "This is important because I called some friends of mine who weren't going to come back yet, but when I told them there was a place to get food, they said they will return soon."

Although the Nations Rent store at the West Bank Expressway and Jung Boulevard in Marrero opened the day after the storm to provide generators and light towers to Westwego police and other law enforcement agencies, it now is open to regular customers. District Manager Chris Scott said the store is renting plenty of generators, safety supplies and clearing equipment.

Officials initially thought it could be months before electricity was restored to a majority of the parish. But 70 percent of the 80,000 Cleco customers across southern St. Tammany had power Wednesday, and the remaining 30 percent should have electricity within two weeks, utility spokesman Danny Schaus said.

About 55 percent of Washington-St. Tammany Electric Cooperative's 20,000 customer across northern St. Tammany and areas around Slidell have power, according to the utility.

With the restoration of power and other services to most of the parish, a sense of normalcy has returned to St. Tammany, whose residents realize that although they were hit hard by Katrina, others received knockout punches.

"We were one of the fortunates of the misfortunates," said School Board member Charles Harrell of Bush on Wednesday after a daily briefing on recovery efforts.

After that meeting, Davis acknowledged that the parish made significant and quick strides in recovering from the storm, but he said the road to full recovery will take months as owners of lost homes and businesses rebuild.

Davis said the parish recovery effort is focusing on restoring power to parts of the parish that don't have electricity, providing temporary housing to thousands of displaced residents, and ensuring that all water and sewer systems are operating adequately.

Restoration of power is being handled by the two utilities. Providing temporary homes for displaced residents is being done by FEMA.

Davis said the parish has located 10 to 15 sites throughout the parish where FEMA can put 40 to 1,000 mobile or temporary homes.

"My deal in St. Tammany," Davis said, "is to get residents as close to their homes as possible. I want to keep them close so they can work on their houses."

Davis said 15,000 to 20,000 homes in St. Tammany were destroyed or heavily damaged by Katrina. He said the parish has asked for as many as 20,000 temporary homes for residents, "but initially, we'll get 5,000 to 6,000."

And the parish will be getting those homes "in drips and drabs" in about two weeks.

The parish is also keeping a close eye on private utility companies, which serve most of the unincorporated areas of southern St. Tammany, to make sure they are working diligently to restore services.

Davis said the parish has given Coast Waterworks Inc., which provides sewer and water services in the Eden Isles-Oak Harbor area south of Slidell, 14 days to have systems destroyed by Katrina up and running. If not, the parish will take over the systems, which serve about 5,000 customers, he said.

Davis and the leaders of St. Bernard, Orleans, Jefferson, Plaquemines and St. Charles parishes met Monday with President Bush, other top federal officials and Gov. Kathleen Blanco. During that meeting, held at a St. Bernard refinery "that looked like a war zone," Davis said, the president signed a personal note to St. Tammany residents.

The note said, "To the people of St. Tammany Parish, my thoughts and my prayers are with you. We are going to help you."

Davis said he has that note framed in his office and points it out to federal officials when he meets with them. "I've used it a couple of times already," he said.

Other signs of the parish returning to normal include the recent reopening of all local government agencies, the state district court in Covington, the resumption of practice for school system athletic teams planned for Monday and scheduled reopenings of public and private schools.

Clerk of Court Malise Prieto said about 80 percent of her staff has returned and that all services have been available to the public since Monday. She said business hasn't picked up this week as much as she had anticipated.

Prieto and other workers spent Friday clearing out the sixth-floor clerk's office at the Towers Building in Slidell, where windows were broken and a corner of the roof blew off. They rescued some computers and all original filings submitted the Friday before the storm.

Prieto said the annex stored second-copy books, so no records were lost because of the damages.

She asked all lawyers who practice in the 22nd Judicial District Court to provide their new contact information to the clerk's office at (985) 809-8700.

Civil and criminal jury trials will resume at the Covington courthouse Sept. 26.

Public school students are due to resume classes Oct. 3. Christ Episcopal School in Covington has reopened, and most other parochial and private schools are set to reopen next week.

The School Board will hold an emergency session tonight at 7 p.m. in its C.J. Schoen meeting room to discuss the resumption of classes and other matters related to Katrina's aftermath.

The Parish Council will hold a special session at 7 p.m. in the parish government complex on Koop Drive north of Mandeville to get a storm recovery update from Davis and to adopt any emergency measures related to the hurricane.

As the basic needs of residents are restored, the economic effects of the hurricane on St. Tammany and the region will gradually take center stage, Davis said. He said that on Monday, Bush predicted an economic boom in the region.

"I think the president is right," Davis said. The demand for housing in St. Tammany has gobbled up available real estate inventory in the parish, he said.

"Right now, you can't buy a house in the parish," he said.

Davis said he met recently with the St. Tammany Parish Home Builders Association and asked the organization to continue building homes in subdivisions in the midst of the upcoming rebuilding effort.

Davis said he's also had strong feelers from New Orleans companies that want to temporarily relocate to the parish.

Archdiocese struggles to pick up the pieces

Church is serving its flock from borrowed B.R. space

By Bruce Nolan
Staff writer

Working from a temporary nest of offices 85 miles from its landmark cathedral, its charities, its city schools and its suburban parishes stuffed with Catholic families, a wounded Archdiocese of New Orleans is struggling to dispense healing in the carnage of Hurricane Katrina.

"I've heard the archbishop say it many times in the last few days: Our priority is people. People need to be taken care of first," said Jeanette DeMelo, an archdiocese spokeswoman. "Then it's about parishes and schools."

Katrina scattered most of the area's nearly 500,000 Catholics.

It destroyed or damaged dozens of churches and schools, shattered the archdiocese's network of centers serving the poor – and simultaneously swamped it with tens of thousands of newly hungry, homeless, helpless persons in need of care.

It also drove the archdiocese's headquarters to Baton Rouge.

Squeezed temporarily into the headquarters of the Baton Rouge Diocese, Archbishop Alfred Hughes and his staff are trying to assess the damage to nearly 150 church parishes, locate missing staff, and help the scores of people who arrive at the diocese's Catholic Life Center at 5:30 a.m. daily in search of money, transportation, housing and jobs.

Within days, the archdiocese hopes to relocate into a Baton Rouge office park, then return to New Orleans as quickly as possible, DeMelo said.

Two weeks after the storm, a significant portion of its own staff of up to 9,000 full-time, part-time and seasonal workers is still scattered, she said.

"We know we've got people still in shelters. If they went to the Superdome and got on a plane, they could be anywhere," said Sister Anthony Barczykowski, director of the archdiocese's department of community services.

About 130 of 180 of the archdiocese's active and retired priests are now accounted for, DeMelo said.

Most of the missing are thought to be safe – except for the Rev. Arthur Ginart, who is missing and feared drowned after he refused to evacuate his low-lying St. Nicholas of Myra Parish, near the Rigolets.

In the first days after the storm, displaced priests unable to return to their churches in New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish are doing ministry among evacuees in Baton Rouge shelters.

Many of them are homeless, their rectories and belongings flooded and ruined.

Bishop Roger Morin's small church-owned home across South Carrollton Avenue from Notre Dame Seminary burned to the ground.

Some have been able to return to their own parishes to say Mass, if without power.

It's a powerful time to be a priest, some said.

"It's just a very emotional time," said the Rev. Ronald Caulkins of Mary Queen of Peace Parish in Mandeville. "Every encounter is emotional. There are tears and hugs."

Caulkins' church and parish were relatively undamaged. At Mass last week, he looked out over a sea of new faces – strangers blown into his parish by the winds of Katrina.

"The message was simple: You're welcome. Everybody is welcome here," he said.

Like Caulkins' church, many are coming back quickly in areas with the least damage, deMelo said.

Sunday Masses are returning in St. Charles, St. John the Baptist and St. Tammany parishes, she said. Jefferson Parish is more problematic. New Orleans is still under lock-down, and St. Bernard was wiped out entirely.

"We had nine churches there. They're gone," she said.

At the same time the archdiocese is struggling to dispense care in the face of unprecedented need, said Jim Kelly, director of Catholic Charities for the Archdiocese of New Orleans.

The archdiocese's food banks distributed 3 million pounds of food last week and are sending out 400,000 pounds a day this week, said Beth Millbank, a Catholic Charities spokeswoman.

At centers in St. Charles Parish and Baton Rouge, church workers are arranging for housing and transportation, even dispensing emergency checks, said Kelly.

Case managers are working through a growing internal database that matches evacuees' needs with offers of jobs and housing from thousands of families across the country.

Archdiocesan counselors have taken over a respite center, talking traumatized police officers, firefighters and other emergency workers through the emotional and psychological wounds of the past two weeks.

Meantime, archdiocesan workers are trying to manage their own difficulties.

"I'm telling some people, 'I know you just lost your home, but would you please counsel this person who just lost his house?'" said Kelly.

Finally, Kelly and other archdiocesan leaders are trying to locate the remainders of their own missing staffs in the face of hugely ramped-up need.

"If we normally service 125,000 people, the question now becomes: How do you suddenly service maybe quadruple that, overnight?" he said.

Frantic though the pace is, the reality is that "we're maybe in mile three of a 26-mile race," he said.

"But I tell you this. We'll get through this," he said. "We'll get through it with God's grace. It's all about grace."

Uses for mulch sought

purring.

The Corps is handling storm debris collection for all of Jefferson Parish except Kenner, where the city has contracted with a private company. But Kenner Chief of Staff Phil Ramone said the city is in talks with the Corps about possibly taking over debris removal.

Kenner work crews have already made one sweep through the city, collecting more than 11.4 million cubic yards of debris, Ramone said. It has not been mulched yet, only stockpiled at two sites – one at 32nd Street and Arkansas Avenue and the other at Kenner Avenue and 18th Street.

The East Jefferson project outside of Kenner is being coordinated by AshBritt Environmental Inc., a Florida company contracted by the Corps of Engineers to oversee debris pickup in the parish. Through the company, subcontractors were hired and assigned to 28 debris zones in Jefferson, Bonano said, allowing parish officials to track their performance. The vast majority, 95 percent, are local construction companies from Jefferson Parish, Bonano said.

About 250 trucks haul the debris to Lafreniere Park in Metairie in East Jefferson and a site on Peters Road in Harvey on the West Bank, Bonano said. The cost is covered by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Once storm cleanup has been completed, the mulch will be used around several Jefferson public buildings. "But obviously, there's going to be a lot of it," he said.

Parish officials also are looking other beneficial uses for the mulch, including wetland restoration, selling it to paper mills for use as pulpwood or selling it to garden centers for residential landscaping.

7 schools likely won't be useable this year

Facing the logistical nightmare of resuming operations of one of the state's largest school systems, Jefferson Parish public school leaders are pushing parish officials to allow school district employees to return to the area as soon as possible.

At a School Board meeting Wednesday in Baton Rouge, Superintendent Diane Roussel said she would ask Parish President Aaron Broussard to allow teachers and administrators back in the parish, an option recently extended to Jefferson business owners and employees in an effort to breathe life back into the area's commerce after Hurricane Katrina.

In a wide-reaching meeting, the School Board also presented a timeline ahead of a planned Oct. 3 reopening of schools that were mostly or completely spared hurricane damage. District administrators will begin returning to the parish this week, with the goal of having all supervisors report by Monday and all employees back by Sept. 21.

Registration for new students is tentatively scheduled to begin Sept. 26 at "registration centers" throughout the parish that have yet to be established. "Reporting (to work) is critical for continued employment and compensation," Roussel said.

After Katrina damaged dozens of schools and ravaged the system's administration building in Harvey, officials shifted all administrative functions to Baton Rouge. The School Board will continue to meet weekly, possibly in Jefferson, until the October reopening.

Wednesday's meeting came amid continuing worries about the system's finances. Its $24 million in reserves is enough to cover two payroll cycles, one today and another on Sept. 30.

Chief Financial Officer Raylyn Stevens called the situation "dire" but downplayed concerns about possible bankruptcy, saying the system is still operating with 2004 property taxes collected earlier this year.

She said additional financing could come from the state if Jefferson sees an influx of students from more devastated parishes. Typically, additional revenue from increased enrollment does not hit system coffers until the following fiscal year, but school leaders plan to lobby the state to see a boost in dollars for this school year, Stevens said.

State Superintendent Cecil Picard has asked for $2.4 billion in federal dollars to sustain metro area school systems.

Roussel is pushing for a timely reopening of Jefferson schools, saying the longer the system waits to resume, the higher the risk that students and their families will not return to the parish.

The state of the school system has become particularly critical in Jefferson, which officials hope will become a recovery hub as the worst-hit parishes of Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaquemines slowly recover and lean on their neighboring resources.

In other updates from the meeting:

* Roussel has executed several contracts for restoration of schools and technical support for the system's facilities department. The Louisiana National Guard also is helping clean up several schools, which officials said has been a huge help.

After Katrina damaged dozens of schools and ravaged the system's administration building in Harvey, officials shifted all administrative functions to Baton Rouge. The School Board will continue to meet weekly, possibly in Jefferson, until the October reopening.

* Many of the system's administrative offices will shift to an annex building along River Road in Marrero.

* Employees can call (866) 563-6559 for information, and the system will run radio and newspaper ads throughout the Gulf Coast to touch base with evacuees in other cities. Employees also are urged to visit www.louisianaschools.net to inform the system of their whereabouts and employment plans. On the site, residents also can volunteer to help with cleanup efforts.

* Officials will begin revising the school calendar, considering options such as extended school days and weeks as well as elimination of some holidays. Officials are aiming to start high schools at roughly the same time to cluster graduation ceremonies in the summer.

* The East Bank regional office has moved to Hazel Park Elementary, and the West Bank regional office now is housed at Gretna No. 2 Kindergarten Center.

* The board will meet again Wednesday, most likely in the Jefferson Parish government building on the West Bank.

* Any decision about possible layoffs or "platooning" of students, a schedule in which some students attend morning classes while others attend evening ones, will not be made until an official enrollment count can be made. Personnel and student records are safe.

* The system has received a waiver from the state to provide free lunches to all returning students, and the system is exploring ways to establish temporary housing for teachers.

Officials released the latest list of schools classified by extent of damage. The list likely will change and leaders hope a final assessment will be ready next week. As of Wednesday, the groupings are as follows:

* No damage or little damage and can likely open in October: Airline Park, Birney, Bissonet Plaza, Boudreaux, Butler, Cherbonnier, Clancy, Cullier, Deckbar, Dolhonde, Ellender, Ellis, Estelle, Fisher High, Grand Isle, Green Park, Greenlawn Terrace, Gretna Middle, Harris, Haynes, Hazel Park, Hearst, Janet, Jefferson Elementary, Maggiore, Marrero Middle, Matas, Metairie Academy, Middleton, Pittman, Rillieux, Riverdale High, Riverdale Middle, Miller Wall, Washington, West Bank Community, Westwego Elementary, Woodland West, Woods, St. Ville, Strehle, Waggaman, Riviere, Schneckenburger and Patrick Taylor Academy.

* Schools with moderate damage that could open after October: Adams, Ames, Audubon, Bridge City, Bunche, Chateau Estates, George Cox, Helen Cox, Douglass, East Jefferson High, Ehret High, Ford, Gretna No. 2, Harahan, Hart, Harvey Kindergarten Center, Higgins, Homedale, Gretna Park, Solis, Truman, West Jefferson High, Worley, Meisler, Pitre, Roosevelt, Ruppel, Keller, Grace King, Lafitte Elementary, Livaudais, Live Oak Manor and McDonogh 26.

* Schools with significant damage that likely won't be useable this school year: Alexander, Bonnabel, Jefferson Community, Lincoln, Woodmere, Terrytown and a Gretna adult education building that was slated to house a magnet high school in the 2006-07 school year.

Banks back in business, under loosened rules

Feds allow leeway to aid storm victims

By Mary Judice
Business writer

Federal regulators are bending some rules to help Louisiana banks recover from the ravages of Hurricane Katrina, an official said Wednesday.

Donald Powell, chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., which regulates banks and insures deposits, told bankers gathered at Omni Bank in Gretna that most banks are back in business and customers should not be concerned that some branches are not open.

"Money is safe in insured institutions," he said, adding that customers can get access to their deposits by check, debit card, through withdrawals at automated teller machines and at more branches every day.

Powell said the FDIC has relaxed rules governing branch openings, which has allowed banks in Jefferson Parish to open 13 branches this week in shared locations. Each of those 13 branches has as many as five banks or savings institutions set up at desks in the lobby.

"It is like having competitors such as Bill Gates and Steve Jobs set up a computer company under one roof," he said.

The agency has also allowed banks to open 33 temporary locations in the three states hardest hit by the hurricane.

"We've gotten very open-minded," he said of the federal agency.

Regulators also are allowing customers some leeway by reducing the amount of identification they need to open accounts. Regulators have encouraged institutions to waive fees and allow customers in the storm area to skip payments.

"I am not worried about any bank," Powell said in answer to a question about the health of local financial institutions. "There will be stresses."

After meeting with a group of about 20 bankers, he said banks are still struggling to get power restored, to restore their infrastructure and automated teller machines, and to locate employees.

Powell said that as of Tuesday, 280 FDIC-insured banks in the hurricane-hit area were operating and have 93 percent of their branches open. A total of 361 branches remain closed.

In the first days after Hurricane Katrina struck, banks experienced heavier withdrawals, and having enough cash on hand was an issue. But that is no longer a concern, he said.

Bankers said that after the wave of withdrawals, customers are again making deposits, with relief checks from the Federal Emergency Management Agency and from insurance companies.

John Ducrest, Louisiana banking commissioner, said his office has opened a hotline to help customers find their banks and to identify branches that were open for business.

"People were displaced and needed immediate living expenses," he said, adding that some banks helped consumers, who were not their customers, contact their banks and obtain money.

Peter Gwaltney, chief executive of the Louisiana Banking Association, said bankers will ask regulators for more leeway in making loans to customers as they return home. "Banks will make loans they ordinarily wouldn't make," he said. "Under the circumstances, banks need to make loans to get the economy moving."

Plans for reopenings vary for Jeff private schools

Arden Cahill Academy, Gretna – Staff has been asked to return Oct. 3, and classes are tentatively set to resume Oct. 10.

Damage report was unavailable, but repairs have begun.

John Curtis Christian School, River Ridge – Had planned to start the year the day Katrina hit. Now eyeing Sept. 23 or 26.

Katrina damaged trees and put a hole in the roof of one third-grade classroom. The hole has since been patched. Electricity, water, telephone and cable television have been restored.

"Our campus was perfect, the way we left it for open house," said Jeff Curtis, teacher, coach and member of school's founding family. "We just had to clean up the debris."

Ecole Classique School, Metairie – Hopes to reopen Oct. 3.

Damage report was unavailable, but cleanup is progressing.

Lutheran High School, Metairie – Will reopen at the largely intact Atonement Lutheran School in Metairie, possibly Oct. 3. The two schools will operate in shifts.

Katrina inflicted major roof damage, weakened some walls and left some trees leaning on buildings at Lutheran High.

"For us, it's looking much better than we thought it might," said the Rev. Don Little, Atonement's senior pastor.

Metairie Park Country Day – January is targeted for a full reopening, though a partial reopening may come earlier. Emphasis will be on restoring programs for high school seniors.

Katrina left as much as 3 feet of water on the ground, as well as water in the lower school, auditorium, and middle and upper school library. Many raised buildings escaped flooding.

"I know from many phone conversations and e-mails that several of you have been through harrowing experiences and that most of us have felt the kind of disruption or loss that painfully forces us to search deep within for strength," Headmaster David Drinkwater wrote to families and employees. "I can assure you that we are determined to see our school community whole and thriving again soon."

Ridgewood Preparatory School, Metairie – Was to start the 2005-06 school year Aug. 29, the day Katrina hit. Plans to reopen soon, but no date has been set.

Storm damage was minimal, and electricity and telephone service has been restored.

"The trees that blew down, they fell in the right place. They didn't hit anything," Headmaster Milton Montgomery said. "So we were extremely lucky."

Salem Lutheran School, Gretna – Reopening uncertain. Principal Joseph Althage is seeking contractors for repairs and holding "re-registration" to determine how many students might return.

St. Martin's Episcopal School, Metairie – Reopening set for Oct. 3. Has already re-enrolled 255 students. Mandatory faculty meeting set for Sept 27 and 28 in Hammond, with housing and food provided.

Little storm damage reported other than downed trees.

"Do all you can do to rejoin our community and know that we will always have a spot for your children at St. Martin's, whether we see you in October, January or next year," new Headmaster Chris Proctor wrote to parents.

City Hall staff improvise in exile

Nagin aides go back to basics

By Frank Donze
Staff writer

Chief Administrative Officer Brenda Hatfield was tucked away in a tiny basement room at the state Capitol, while other top aides to Mayor Ray Nagin camped out with a spare phone and computer terminal in office space donated by Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu and other state official.

City Attorney Sherry Landry and Finance Director Reggie Zeno established a beachhead in a Gonzales apartment complex just outside Baton Rouge.

Meanwhile, those City Hall officials – including Nagin – who stayed behind to cope with Hurricane Katrina's nightmarish aftermath turned several third-floor meeting rooms inside the battered Hyatt Hotel into a makeshift City Hall annex.

Over the 2½ weeks since the storm turned his city upside down, Nagin has been operating a government in exile. But now that floodwaters are receding and lights are blinking back to life downtown, most of the mayor's team began drifting back home Wednesday. Much of the city is still without power or drinkable water, and Nagin is being forced to take some extraordinary steps.

For the immediate future, administration officials will be housed either at the Hyatt across Poydras Street from City Hall or along the Mississippi River aboard one of the cruise ships commandeered by the U.S. Army.

"Mayor Nagin felt it was time to unify the staff," Hatfield said from inside City Hall where only sections of a few of the nine floors had electricity. "Today is the first time many of us have been really able to communicate with one another in weeks."

Phones across southeast Louisiana were virtually useless in the days after the hurricane came ashore, forcing the Nagin team, at times, to rely exclusively on their Blackberry wireless devices' keyboards.

"It was indescribably frustrating," Hatfield said. "We were wearing out our thumbs sending text messages."

Slowly but surely, members of Nagin's Cabinet are beginning to slip back into the roles they were hired to fill.

In the days after Katrina passed when large sections of the city were thrown into chaos, job titles had little meaning. For example, Landry and Zeno, who unlike their colleagues were able to communicate with the outside world, had little need for their respective legal and accounting expertise. For a time, both became procurement officers.

"Back in the city, they were running out of diesel fuel to run pumps and generators, ammunition for police officers, gas for police cars," Landry said, recalling the frantic, frightening week she spent separated from her colleagues.

"As we struggled to locate supplies, we tried to find the right balance of begging and bossy." Needless to say, Landry had little time to dwell on legal issues such as requests for proposals.

"It was a life and death situation," she said. "We didn't worry about how much things might cost. It was always do you have it, how fast can we get it and we'll pay for it later."

At times, Landry said, she was dealing with tasks better left to an engineer, including locating a portable, 450-gallon tank retrofitted with pumps to fill police cars and other municipal vehicles.

When the crisis began to subside and the National Guard and the military arrived to relieve exhausted police and fire personnel, Landry and Zeno switched from purchasing agents to travel agents, reaching out to the mayors of Atlanta and Las Vegas and airline and hotel officials to coordinate all-expense-paid, rest-and-relaxation getaways for the city's public safety workers and their families.

One of the most important city documents produced during the crisis shows how city officials improvised. With no computers or word processors to call on, the administration was forced to use primitive means to get the job done.

Asked by Nagin to fast-track a mandatory evacuation order, Landry said she prepared the hand-written document during a plane ride to from Baton Rouge to New Orleans.

"It wasn't pretty," she said. "But it's legal."

Orleans public schools plan gradual reopening

Employees can collect paychecks for August

By Susan Finch
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE - Later this year or early next, New Orleans public schools will gradually welcome students and teachers chased out by Hurricane Katrina, according to officials of a company helping restructure the system's chaotic finances.

"We want families to know if they come back to New Orleans, schools will be open for their children," Bill Roberti, managing director of Alvarez & Marsal, said Wednesday at a news briefing Wednesday. Every school reopened, he said, is a "victory against despair, a victory against defeatism."

As a team of architects and engineers began to access the damage to the system's 116 schools, Roberti and his Alvarez & Marsal public sector colleague Sajan George outlined steps the school system is taking retain teachers and other classroom workers they said are anxious to get back to work.

Roberti said that as of Wednesday, a day earlier than predicted, teachers and other classroom workers could go to any Western Union office in the country, present a government-issued picture identification and collect the last paycheck they'll get for a while, unless the federal government comes through with money to help tide over educators in the hurricane-affected areas.

The payments will be an estimate of the amount due to employees. Payments to teachers will cover the payroll that was due Sept. 2 for work from Aug. 11 to Aug. 24 and also will cover work performed from Aug. 25 to Aug. 28, the last day before the hurricane. Non-teachers, who have a different payroll calendar, received a paycheck Aug. 26 for work from Aug. 4 to Aug. 17 and will receive a payment that covers Aug. 18-28.

These payments will be estimated. When a team of Alvarez & Marsal and school system employees returned to Algiers to retrieve the backup computer tapes containing the payroll information, they found that the building was severely damaged by the hurricane and the information technology department was flooded. Since then, the team has been working at an IBM Disaster Recovery Center in Tuxedo, New York, to recover the data.

It is a complex and time-consuming effort, officials said, and rather than have employees endure continued delays while exact payroll data is restored, estimates will be distributed. Adjustments, if needed, will be made once the data-recovery process is complete.

Roberti, who is serving as chief restructuring officer for the New Orleans public schools, said that, given the school system's precarious financial situation, there would not be another payroll until schools begin to reopen.

He urged the federal government to provide financial assistance to help school system employees who may be living on unemployment insurance or lower paying temporary jobs.

Alvarez & Marsal also is working with other school districts to accept displaced New Orleans public school students and their teachers. "With their increased enrollment, they will have opportunities for our employees," he said.

But Wilson Boveland, member's rights director for United Teachers of New Orleans said some school districts have told UTNO members that "to work for us, you have to resign from the Orleans Parish public schools. Louisiana Federation of Teachers executive director Steve Monahan said his group has asked state education superintendent Cecil Picard to intervene.

When New Orleans schools reopen, George said, demand for their services may well exceed supply. Portable classrooms and classes in platoons or shifts could help address that issue, he said.

Federal money is available to pay for repair of school buildings. And if the damage is 50 percent or greater, FEMA will pay to replace the facility, he said.

Katrina's arrival changed his company's mission in New Orleans, Roberti said. "We have gone from turning around a broken school system to creating one from scratch," he said, adding that his firm will donate $300,000 toward the effort.

In a letter to President Bush, Alvarez & Marsal asked the federal government to create a program for payroll assistance to any public school in the affected region to make up the difference between their normal pay and unemployment compensation or temporary jobs.

Priest feared drowned in storm

Church, rectory smashed by surge

Like a loyal ship's captain, "Father Red" rode out hurricanes for decades at his tiny Catholic church on Highway 90 near the Rigolets. In the wake of Katrina, he is feared dead, a drowning victim of the powerful storm.

The archdiocese has received unofficial word that the Rev. Arthur "Red" Ginart's body has been recovered near St. Nicholas of Myra Church, where he served as pastor for 28 years, but "no one wants to speak the final words," Bishop Roger Morin said Wednesday at the temporary New Orleans archdiocesan headquarters in Baton Rouge.

On a recent routine visit to St. Nicholas, Ginart told Morin that he would never leave his beloved church during a storm. The pastor told his superior "I never want to be moved from here. I want to stay here until I either retire or die," Morin said.

Ginart "used to pride himself on never having evacuated, and he used to tell people he never would," Morin said.

Like most of the waterfront camps along the peninsula known as the Lake Catherine community, between the Chef Menteur Bridge and the Rigolets, the church and rectory were smashed apart by Katrina's storm surge. Also gone is the historic Rigolets lighthouse and the Tally Ho Club, perhaps the oldest established hunting club in the country.

SLU launches temporary bus service

St. Tammany bureau

Students who attend Southeastern Louisiana University can take advantage of a new, short-term bus service being offered between St. Tammany Parish and Hammond. The free service will be available today through Sept. 30.

In addition, the university will resume classes previously offered at the St. Tammany Center on Koop Drive north of Mandeville beginning Monday at Fontainebleau Junior High School. The school, adjacent to Fontainebleau High, is at 100 Hurricane Alley, just off Louisiana 59 south of Interstate 12.

Classroom assignments will be posted outside the main office.

For students traveling to Hammond, the bus will make four stops at locations throughout St. Tammany Parish at the beginning and end of each day, delivering students to SLU at 7:45 and 8:45 a.m., and leaving campus at 3:30 and 4:30 p.m. The university's police department, on Virginia Avenue, near Cefalu Coliseum, will be the drop-off and pick-up point.

Buses to the Hammond campus will operate on the following schedule, though times are approximate, depending on traffic conditions:

— Slidell: 6 and 7 a.m., 150 North Shore Blvd., near the Dillards Men's Department.

— Slidell: 6:15 and 7:15 a.m., 39142 Natchez Drive, near Wal-Mart and Lowe's.

— Mandeville: 6:30 and 7:30 a.m., 4100 Louisiana 59, in the Winn-Dixie parking lot.

— Covington: 6:45 and 7:45 a.m., 401 N. U.S. 190, in the Books-a-Million parking lot behind Sicily's restaurant.

For information on the bus service, call (985)549-5250. For classes held in St. Tammany, call (985)893-6251 or visit www.selu.edu/sttammanycenter.

Jake Staples describes how he crouched down to remain out of sight as looters entered the D-Day Museum in the days after New Orleans was hit by Hurricane Katrina. Staples, the museum's assistant director of facilities, said the exhibits were left largely undisturbed.

D-Day Museum became sanctuary for official

Staples says looters left exhibits alone

By Doug MacCash

It was a disorienting journey through the D-Day Museum's unlit upper galleries on Tuesday. The narrow twisting passages, designed to guide visitors through the history of World War II's Pacific theater, took on the tone of a Halloween haunted house as flashlight beams chased across the garishly colored cartoon war posters that paper the walls. When the lights were turned off, the place plunged into an inky, depthless darkness.

Jake Staples, the museum's assistant director of facilities, depended on the darkness and labyrinthlike exhibit spaces to hide him during his harried days alone in the museum, when police protection in the Warehouse District evaporated and looters marauded through the museum's ground floor amid the vintage landing craft and tanks.

Before the flood, Staples spent his days seeing to the maintenance of the museum he loves. He understands the workings of the building and exhibits as well as anyone, down to the sounds the structure makes as it expands and contracts with the heat of the day. The stocky, bearded Army veteran chose to stay inside the museum during Hurricane Katrina, fearing only "the wind or a funnel cloud or a lightning strike on the roof," he said.

Though "slight, slight tremors shook the building" during the worst of the storm, Staples said, he was utterly confident of his safety.

"Those walls are 28 inches thick," he said. "I felt very secure. We could have opened Tuesday morning (after the storm) if we had power and water."

Staples sat tight through Tuesday, eating the provisions the museum had stockpiled before the storm and listening apprehensively to radio reports of the floodwaters that crept across the city following Katrina. He knew his situation was changing for the worse.

"By Wednesday evening this area was completely void of police protection, EMTs, anything," he said.

From the vantage point of a raised staircase inside the museum's huge, glass-faced atrium, he watched as groups of young people, who seemed to be simply wandering the streets, streamed past the museum. One group caught his attention because even behind the glass wall of the museum he could hear a young woman berating a group of five young men, alternately cursing them and begging them not to abandon her.

"Then one of the men stopped and backhanded her," Staples said. Then he witnessed a gang rape.

"Afterwards, she got up, pulled her pants up and kept following them. They were her meal ticket, I guess. ... This area was a jungle."

D-Day Museum Director of Facilities Frankie Harelson walks through the museum store on Tuesday. Looters rummaged through T-shirts and souvenirs at the shop.

Now acutely aware of the violence outside, Staples was careful to remain unseen behind the museum's transparent walls, watching from vantage points behind the front desk, on the stairs and even surveying the reflection of the atrium in a polished door.

Wednesday at 8 p.m., Staples heard glass breaking as looters smashed through the door to PJ's, the museum's coffee shop at the corner of Magazine Street and Andrew Higgins Drive. Around 2 a.m. Staples heard intruders break the plate glass double doors into the museum gift shop, where they rummaged through the T-shirts, hats and other souvenirs. At sunrise they smashed through the doors into the atrium. Nothing else stood between Staples and them.

By his estimate 30 to 40 looters at a time scurried beneath the bomber and fighter planes. Some tried to access the cash inside an ATM, chipping futilely at the strong box.

Staples retreated to the darkened exhibit, often taking refuge in a tiny theater dedicated to the battle of Leyte Gulf, located in what the museum calls the "serpentine wall." Using his flashlight he positioned benches to create stumbling blocks in the deep darkness as a crude early warning system. Occasionally he ventured out to assess the situation. To his horror, he found that looters had begun venturing to the second floor.

"Some went to the second floor, but someone down below yelled in really vulgar language to get back down because they might be seen from outside."

For the next 48 hours, Staples caught 20-minute catnaps as he strained to hear disturbances in the darkness of his hideaway. "I was so intent on hearing that I didn't really think about things, he said. "This museum makes a lot of noises. I had my ears up with such an intensity that there wasn't time to be a philosopher about the situation."

Asked if he was frightened, Staples said: "Yes and no; I had enough sense not to be frightened. I knew the situation was grave, and I tried not to be my own worse enemy. I tried not to be afraid, to stay out of sight and be quiet and call. ... They never saw me. I'm sure they would have sounded the alarm if they had."

As a pilot in the Vietnam War, Staples twice was forced to land in rice paddies where he had to await rescue by helicopter. He said he feels those experiences helped prepare him for his lonely vigil after Katrina.

Even when his wait for rescue was over, the ordeal continued.

"At 2:34 Saturday morning – I looked at my watch – I saw flashlights in the exhibits. I thought, 'Oh my God, these punks have flashlights.' Then I heard voices that sounded military. They said, 'Call down and tell someone there may be someone behind the wall.' ... I was in a well-hidden place; it took observant men to find me.

"So I rattled the door and said 'There is someone.'

They said, 'Put your hands out,' and I did. Then they put me on the floor and checked my ID. They called me a 10-12, whatever that means. Then they took me down to the atrium. I don't know if they were Army or SWAT or what. They had camouflaged uniforms and M-16s. They were very professional. They treated me in a firm dignified manor. I was pleased with the situation."

In the aftermath of his saga, Staples was relieved to discover that the looters took little interest in the antique engines of war that surrounded them. They took two vintage knapsacks from a half track, and they hid behind the landing craft to relieve themselves, but overall the heart of the museum was intact.

Staples said that he would do it all again if the need arose. "I'll stay during any future problems, because I want to. It's in my blood. I'm very proud of this place. This will be my last job. The day I pass on, I plan to spend working here. It's a place I look forward to coming to every day."

Bring the Saints home

I realize that this concern is trivial compared with the real suffering of thousands because of Katrina. I pray that they and all of us come out of this whole and better than ever.

Still, for the city to be truly whole, it needsthe Saints. It really annoyed me that the team will be playing three "home" games in San Antonio, Texas. Why can't the Saints play all of their home games in Baton Rouge or another location more centrally located to New Orleans and Gulf Coast evacuees? To me,the situation smells like an attempt by the Saints and the NFL to test-drive San Antonio as an NFL city before actually buying. Given the current circumstances, that stinks!

Team owner Tom Benson admitted that for many impacted people, the only hope they have left is this football team. Nice words, how 'bout backing them up? The NFL and Tom Benson should pledge that the Saints will continue to play in New Orleans until at least 2010, period. All kinds of people, with a lot less means than the Saints, are making sacrifices. Mr. Benson and the NFL's country club owners should step up and do the same.

Let the city heal

Does New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin think cliches will fix the city or does he actually have an intelligent plan that would make it possible for homesick citizens to return? Based on comments reported Tuesday, I have my doubts.

"I know New Orleanians, and once the beignets are in the oven, once the gumbo is in the pot, and red beans and rice are being served on Mondays, they'll come back," he said.

First, I'm not sure I want to eat that gumbo or those beans if they're being cooked with tap water from Uptown, the CBD or the French Quarter, the areas Mr. Nagin is talking about resettling. And aside from these cliché foods of the city that forgot to care, what does Mr. Nagin expect me to return to?

A city that still has water in many streets, water that may still pose health hazards of many kinds? A city whose houses in both flooded and non-flooded areas need to be carefully assessed for safety before anyone can live in them again?

A city that has no functioning economic structure for the most essential needs, such as food and hospitals, let alone things that at this point are truly luxuries, such as the "jazz" Mr. Nagin says he longs to hear?

A city which, with no meaningful jobs or functioning schools, can't bring back the familiescrucial to making it vital again?

A city where my safety depends on an armed military presence and my willingness to adhere to a dawn-to-dusk curfew? Guess I'll be eating that gumbo at a jazz brunch if I want to go out for music.

The city is a very sick patient right now. It needs to be left alone so the doctors can figure out the best possible plan for its rehabilitation. Ray Nagin's comments make him sound like a meddling relative who thinks the patient is fine and just needs to eat some rich food, toss back a drink and do a second line. I think he would serve her better by sitting quietly in the waiting room.

An opportunity for change

Now is the opportunity for great changes to take place in the development of a better urban environment for our city. There is no doubt that New Orleans and the surrounding areas can and should be rebuilt.

But before any reconstruction begins, a comprehensive, sustainable strategy for reconstruction and developments needs to be in place that acknowledges the distinction of our neighborhoods while providing an alternative to the pockets of poverty that have hindered any real changes in our city for decades.

The numerous challenges that we are facing require a coalition of planners, policy-makers, architects, artists, former mayors of progressive cities (Stephen Goldsmith of Indianapolis and Vera Katz of Portland are two that come to mind), developers, environmentalists, engineers and landscape architects to study the social, cultural and physical terrain of one of the most unique cities in our country.

Current federal government initiatives are only set up to provide short-term solutions to housing and basic needs, but New Orleans needs a plan for our future.

First and foremost, the major areas of concern are the environmental controls to prevent a repeat of the type of natural disaster that has taken place from Katrina. These issues include the reconstruction of the surrounding levees to withstand a Category 5 hurricane, the installation of a new surge protection gate between the Gulf of Mexico and Lake Pontchartrain and the recreation of the barrier islands. Also, coastal erosion must be addressed.

Since we are facing the very real possibility that most of the houses between Claiborne Avenue and Lake Pontchartrain, in the Lower 9th Ward, eastern New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish are beyond saving, how will these homes and businesses be replaced? Suburban models or blocks of multifamily housing complex are not the answer. The ideal of an energy-efficient city that encourages walking, provides housing and shopping close to work and an expansion of the successful streetcar system would be ideal.

We do not have to look far for an example; the Vieux Carre pattern of life offers a wonderful and successful alternative. This model allows for a more humane density that encompasses living and working areas in order to decrease the need for automobiles. The school system could be reorganized to create smaller schools within walking distance of students' homes. This would provide more effective educational models where truly no child is left behind.

Most of the city has years of planning and implementation before any reconstruction or new development can take place, but the rehabitation of the 20 percent of the city least affected by Katrina must begin as soon as possible. Those of us in those areas can help to clean up and put things back together, beginning the task of planning for an enhanced community for everyone to come back to.

This is either going to be an amazing opportunity to create a new model for a diverse, modern and socially conscious city ñ or New Orleans will cease to exist.

In order to start a dialogue on this, we are asking Mayor Nagin to create a series of town hall meetings to bring together our citizens and begin a series of discussions that will lead to the planning and the development of our future.

A city without children?

The closure of all Orleans Parish schools for up to an entire school year seems bizarre. How can a city exist without children? Isn't it obvious that many of the people we will need to restore our city, the sales people, the shop owners, the bus drivers, the restaurateurs, their staffs, are likely to be parents?

Mayor Ray Nagin should be the first person to demand of the state that we absolutely need some schools to open at the very latest by Jan. 1. We desperately need the parents of these children to return to work to rebuild the city and to operate the businesses we hope will be in place by then.

Secondly, we will almost certainly have temporary housing in place by then: Will the children residing there be denied schools?

Lastly, even the idea of a city without schools for an entire year is damaging to the concept of a rebuilt New Orleans. This idea has got to be publicly scrapped now: New Orleans cannot exist as a city without children.

Mystery at the floodwall

There are a number of theories on how Hurricane Katrina came to overwhelm the floodwalls in the 17th Street, London Avenue and Industrial canals. So far scientists have not settled on a firm explanation for it, but getting answers swiftly is crucial. Of all the lingering issues that will determine the New Orleans area's prospects, figuring out how to prevent a repeat of the inundation that followed Katrina is the most fundamental.

All of the metro area's earthen levees withstood the hurricane's assault, but that wasn't true of the concrete floodwalls that also form a crucial part of the hurricane protection system. As long as the storm surge caused by a hurricane doesn't top them, the floodwalls are supposed to remain intact.

As Katrina pushed water against the levee system, five gaps opened up along three canals. The working hypothesis at the Army Corps of Engineers, according to project manager Al Naomi, is that the floodwalls were built appropriately, but water flowed over them and scoured away their interior sides. Getting solid numbers to verify or falsify that theory might not be easy, because some of the gauges that measure storm surge stopped working during the storm.

There are other possibilities. Joseph Suhayda, a retired coastal engineer from Louisiana State University, says the breaches could be the result of faulty construction or materials rather than a flawed design.

Regardless, figuring out how to shore up the levee system is imperative. This presents some obvious challenges; raising the earthen levees along drainage canals would require a wider right-of-way and would likely reduce the volume of water that could sit in the canals. Clearly, any solution will draw heavily on the creativity of the Corps and other engineers.

In the future, the Corps also needs a backup plan in place in case any portion of the levee system fails. In the days following the breach, the Corps tried out a number of solutions for days to close off the breach in the canals before meeting with success.

As Katrina showed, a hurricane doesn't need to overwhelm the entire levee system to turn into a catastrophe. A few weak spots were enough to inundate vast areas of the city.

Football as therapy

At any other time, South Louisiana would still be glowing from this weekend's double victories on the football field. And even though football can't carry us through the trying days ahead, the Saints and Tigers gave our stricken region something to cheer about when we desperately needed it.

Louisiana State University's match up with Arizona State in Tempe and the Saints contest with the Carolina Panthers provided a distraction for Katrina victims scattered across the country. But we needed something more than just a few hours of diversion or a topic of conversation that's not related to Hurricane Katrina. Weneeded something positive to happen.

After losing so much, we needed to win.

Both teams must have felt the weight of fans' expectations. Saints receiver Joe Horn said that storm victims told him to "give us something; give us some kind of hope." That's a lot to ask of a game.

But the players rose to the challenge. Saints officials talked about the charged atmosphere on the team bus and at the team's hotel on Saturday. The intensity showed on Sunday.

Neither of the teams was handed victory. The Tigers came from behind to beat the Sun Devils, 35-31. Saints kicker John Carney put the winning field goal through the uprights with three seconds to go. But a hard-fought victory seems, in a way, more satisfying than a rout would have been. The Saints and Tigers overcame, and we can, too.

The players surely felt the fans pulling for them from their damaged or flooded houses, from evacuation shelters, hotel rooms or new homes in unfamiliar cities. What fans felt as the clock ran down was something even stronger: hope.

Katrina's dead deserve utmost respect

The body of Alcede Jackson is laid out on his front porch at 4732 Laurel St.

STEPHANIE GRACE

I'm trying to picture Alcede Jackson in my mind.

Until a couple of weeks ago, he lived on my street, just about three blocks down. I drove by his house every day on my way to work. I'm trying to remember which house. Did he used to sit on the front porch and watch people pass? Did he wave, and did I wave back? I hope so.

I never met Mr. Alcede, as I imagine he must have been called, but I know a few things about him. From public records, it looks like he had a wife named Violet; that he was at least 79; and that, before he moved to the 4700 block of Laurel Street, he lived around the corner on Bordeaux.

And I know for a fact that he had a front porch, because I've seen pictures of his body there, wrapped in a plastic bag and covered in a blue blanket, just as it was for nearly two weeks after Hurricane Katrina blew through town.

Without the benefit of a computer database, the person who laid him out ó a Baptist chaplain who had stopped by to check in on the elderly couple, according to press reports ó couldn't even say when Mr. Alcede's life had begun. But he knew exactly when it ended.

ìAlcede Jackson,î the hand-written sign in the window said. ìB _____, D Aug. 31, 2005. Rest In Peace In The Loving Arms of Jesus.î

Our street largely ducked Katrina's wrath. But the storm must have been too much for him. Or maybe it was just his time. We'll probably never know.

What we do know is that his horrible, long wait is a scar on our neighborhood, and our city.

Even though they lost a loved one, Mr. Alcede's relatives are luckier than some. Thanks to the efforts of that chaplain, and the happenstance of dying in a dry neighborhood heavily traveled by reporters, his relatives do not have to wonder about his fate, and they will be able to give him a proper burial at some point. Newspaper readers all over the world know at least a sliver of his story, and mourn him.

Of the many images from Katrina, perhaps the most haunting are signs like the one on Alcede Jackson's window, fighting against the chaos for dignity in death. They practically scream out their message: that this is a person, not a body. That the storm's victims matter ó each and every one.

It's the same impulse that led neighbors to construct a makeshift grave for Vera Smith on Magazine and Jackson, with the spray-painted plea: ìHere lies Vera. God Help Us.î It's what prompted people stranded at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center to pin notes to relatives who didn't make it and who would be left behind in abandoned wheelchairs, telling anyone who bothered to look that this person had a name, and people who cared enough to write it down.

It's why I jotted down as much information as possible about my friend's father ó where he worked, what his sons do for a living ó after I went to check on him a week after the storm, and a kindly cop who showed up to help found him dead of an apparent heart attack.

Alcede Jackson, Vera Smith and my friend's father died on the city's highest ground along the Mississippi River, not in Lakeview, eastern New Orleans or St. Bernard. There were people around to bear witness. How many others died anonymously, their bodies so disfigured by floodwaters that even their loved ones wouldn't recognize them?

There's been some recent squabbling between the state and federal government over the slow pace of body retrieval, but nobody wants to see more finger-pointing. You just have to think about the signs, the hand-scribbled notes, to know what's at stake.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the painstaking task of identifying the victims was a top priority, and it was handled with the utmost respect.

Like them, the people who died in the New Orleans area had neighbors, friends and loved ones. They deserve more than bureaucracy. They deserve all the closure the government can muster.

Evacuees find humiliation, not help

LAFAYETTE — The stories — freakish, tragic and sadly true — continue to come out of New Orleans in an awful, unending rush, like blood from a sudden gaping wound. The stunned survivors have scattered to places like Houston, Dallas, Baton Rouge and here — Lafayette — where the Cajundome (yet another sports palace turned homeless shelter) rises like a giant mushroom from the flat, shimmeringly hot landscape.

JoAnn Kelly, 25, and her sister Nicole, 28, were sitting on a low brick ledge outside the Cajundome when I walked up. Each was holding a nervous Chihuahua. "This is Pebbles," JoAnn said. "That one's Powder. We kept them with us the whole time."

The two women, who lived in the Magnolia projects in New Orleans, were tired but eager to tell their story. Like so many others, they thought the worst was over when the winds from Hurricane Katrina subsided and the weather began to clear.

"The sun was out," Nicole said. "But the water started coming right up the street and it kept rising. Then we heard Gov. Blanco saying on the radio that they couldn't stop the water and everybody should just get out.

"So we started calling 911, but we couldn't get any help."

The sick feeling of panic began to rise up in the residents who had stayed in the projects during the hurricane. "There were helicopters flying by," JoAnn said. "We were up on the fire escape waving white towels, pleading for somebody to help us."

Eventually a few men from the neighborhood began showing up in stolen boats and trucks. The elderly and small children were the first to be evacuated. JoAnn, Nicole and the dogs were bundled into a milk truck crowded with people. Once again they thought the worst of their ordeal was over, and once again they were wrong.

Packed with hot and filthy evacuees (and crates of rapidly souring milk), the truck crossed a bridge from New Orleans to Jefferson Parish, where the desperate occupants were promptly and grotesquely humiliated by several heavily armed plainclothes officers.

There were dozens of men, women and children in the truck when it was stopped. They were hungry, thirsty and frightened. It should have been obvious to any sentient being that they were fleeing the flood. Nevertheless, said Nicole, they were ordered out of the truck at gunpoint, with their hands up. One young man was thrown to the ground. The others were ordered to get on the ground, face down.

The occupants of the milk truck were black, and they were in dire need of assistance. But in the midst of one of the greatest emergencies in the nation's history, the opportunity to gratuitously humiliate them proved irresistible.

"They laid us out on the ground," JoAnn said. Her voice quivered and tears began to leak down her face. "I was pleading. I was saying, 'Sir, pleaseÖ' And then we all went to praying. Crying and praying.' "

"We were all praying," Nicole said, "because we were afraid, the way they were acting, that they would shoot us."

Eventually, the officers let the group go. No one was charged with any crime. "They even helped us start the milk truck," Nicole said. "The last thing they told us was, 'Y'all get on out of here. And don't come back.' "

The milk truck made its way west on Interstate 10, and the homeless, bedraggled occupants ultimately were directed to the Cajundome, where, according to JoAnn and Nicole, the officials and volunteers couldn't have been more gracious and helpful.

Reality scuttles a great plan

Among the many achievements of the human race — Chartres Cathedral, the Mona Lisa — surely the New Orleans emergency preparedness plan must rank among the greatest, and the fact that this plan turned out to be irrelevant to reality should not detract from its stature as a masterpiece of bureaucratic thinking.

The plan (which is viewable online at www.cityofno.com/portal.aspx?portal=46&tabid=26) begins with the insight: Be prepared. Or as the plan puts it, "Individuals with assigned tasks must receive preparatory training to maximize operations."

The plan lays out a course of action so that all personnel will know exactly what to do in case of a hurricane. The Office of Emergency Preparedness will coordinate with the Louisiana Office of Emergency Preparedness in conjunction with the Comprehensive Emergency Management Plan by taking full advantage of the courses offered by the Louisiana Emergency Preparedness Association and other agencies "as well as conferences, seminars and workshops that may from time to time be available, most notably state hurricane conferences and workshops and the National Hurricane Conference."

In addition, the plan continues, the administrative and training officer of the Office of Emergency Preparedness will maintain close communication with the state training officer of the LOEP, making sure workshops are conducted at the Emergency Support Function level, reviewing Emergency Operating Center/ESF standard operating procedures and undertaking more "intensive work sessions with elements of the emergency response organizations in order to enhance unified disaster planning."

One can imagine the PowerPoint presentations! The millions of cascading bullet points! The infinity of hours spent planning a hurricane response that would make a Prussian officer gasp with reverence!

Furthermore, the plan instructs the OEP director to execute Mass Casualty Incidents scenarios; work with the Association of Contingency Planners and other groups to coordinate disaster organization responses; coordinate, facilitate and encourage other agencies to conduct emergency self-assessments; engage in assessment processes in preparation for the Agency Disaster Report; and produce after-action reports with the OEP shelter coordinator in conjunction with the Louisiana Statewide Hurricane Exercise.

The paper flow must have been magnificent! The quality of the facilitating must have been surpassed only by the magnificence of the interfacing!

The New Orleans emergency preparedness plan offers a precise communications strategy, so all city residents will know exactly where to go in times of crisis. It recommends that two traffic control officers be placed at each key intersection. It recommends busing the thousands of residents unable to evacuate themselves to staging areas prestocked with food.

In short, the plan was so beautiful, it's too bad reality destroyed it. The plan's authors were not stupid or venal. They are doubtless good public servants who worked in agencies set up to prepare for this storm. And yet their elaborate plan crumbled under the weight of the actual disaster.

But of course this illustrates the paradox at the heart of the Katrina disaster, which is that we really need government in times like this, but government is extremely limited in what it can effectively do.

Katrina was the most anticipated natural disaster in American history, and still government managed to fail at every level. For the brutal fact is, government tends toward bureaucracy, which means elaborate paper flow but ineffective action. Government depends on planning, but planners can never really anticipate the inevitable complexity of events. And American government is inevitably divided, and power is inevitably devolved.

For example, the Army Corps of Engineers had plenty of money (Louisiana received more than any other state), but that spending was carved up into little pork barrel projects. There were ample troops nearby to maintain order, but they were divided between federal and state authorities and constrained by regulations.

This preparedness plan is government as it really is. It reminds us that canning Michael Brown or appointing some tough response czar will not change the endemic failures at the heart of this institutional collapse.

So of course we need limited but energetic government. But liberals who think this disaster is going to set off a progressive revival need to explain how a comprehensive governmental failure is going to restore America's faith in big government.

Bankers, HUD offer help for owners

Mortgage payments can be postponed

By Greg Thomas
Real estate writer

Two housing programs designed to assist residents impacted by Hurricane Katrina were unveiled this week.

The National Mortgage Bankers Association said mortgage holders in areas declared disaster sites by President Bush may miss payments during the next 90 days without penalty.

Cheryl Crispen, spokeswoman for the group, said mortgage holders who fail to make payments will not be reported to credit agencies and will not be charged late fees. Any payments missed during the next 90 days will be tacked on to the end of the mortgage. And mortgage bankers are postponing foreclosure actions against those in the disaster states.

The vast majority of mortgages in the area, about 98 percent, are with lenders participating in the MBA program, Crispen said.

Crispen urged mortgage holders affected by Hurricane Katrina to contact their mortgage service companies and inform them of their situation.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development has set up an emergency mortgage program – 203(h), the "h" for hurricane – that offers 100 percent loans for housing repairs, rebuilding or home purchasing, according to Mike Anderson, president of Essential Mortgage LLC and a board member of the Louisiana Mortgage Lenders Association.

Anderson said the HUD 203(h) loan was available for borrowers whether they had an existing mortgage or not, a highly unusual provision. The HUD announcement and other disaster information can be found on its Web site at www.hud.gov.

Borrowers can get help finding their lender or service provider from the Louisiana Office of Financial Institutions at www.ofi.louisiana.gov.

Further, the National Mortgage Bankers Association is attempting the set up of a Web service that will help mortgage holders to find their mortgage service company or lender. The service is not yet set up and represents a gigantic task for the agency, she said.

The Federal Insurance Deposit Corporation, or FDIC, is also putting out lender contact information and asking the institutions for their cooperation in assisting victims of Katrina. Information can be obtained at www.fdic.gov.

Sid Seymour, chief examiner of the Louisiana Office of Financial Institutions, has operated phone banks to assist borrowers in contacting their lenders. Borrowers who relocated out of state can call (866) 783-5530, and those still in Louisiana can call (888) 525-9414. The phones operate seven days a week from 8 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. Seymour said they have assisted more than 2,500 borrowers.

Most of the local lenders are in the same boat as their clients, dislocated and seeking temporary offices to get back in business, compounding the ability of borrowers trying to contact their lenders to discuss their financial concerns during the crisis.

Region's phone service improving

Damages repaired, systems adjusted

By Keith Darcé
Business writer

Those irritating busy signals and congested network messages on your telephone soon may be a thing of the past.

After more than two weeks of sporadic service because of Hurricane Katrina, telephone lines in southeastern Louisiana are slowly returning to normal as phone companies not only repair storm-damaged networks but adjust their systems to contend with population shifts.

Meanwhile, the Louisiana Public Service Commission on Wednesday asked wireless phone companies in the state to give customers free service for September and October because wireless phones have become the only means of communication for many evacuees. Whether they will remains an open question.

Despite the overall improvement in phone service, about 150,000 BellSouth Corp. phone lines remained dead Wednesday, mostly in the parishes of Jefferson, Orleans, Plaquemines and St. Bernard, said Merlin Villar, a spokesman for the region's biggest local phone service provider. Much of those parishes remain evacuated.

Outside of the hardest-hit area, most outgoing local and long distance calls Wednesday were connected on the first try, an improvement from a couple of days earlier. But many people calling into Baton Rouge and other southeastern Louisiana cities still had to dial several times to complete their calls.

BellSouth workers have repaired more than 100 breaks in the company's buried fiber-optic cable network that serves as the backbone of the region's local phone system. AT&T technicians had installed a new fiber-optic line between the Mississippi state line and Bay St. Louis, Miss., to bypass a pair of flooded computer switches in eastern New Orleans that are part of the long-distance company's high-capacity network in the region.

"There has been a lot of progress in bringing back up cell sites."
PATRICK KIMBALL
Verizon spokesman

Wireless phone companies also have repaired antennas, also known as cell sites, in areas that weren't flooded.

Verizon Wireless has restored cell sites in Armstrong Park on the edge of the French Quarter, on the roof of Royal Sonesta Hotel in the French Quarter and on top of a residence hall at the Uptown campus of Tulane University, Verizon spokesman Patrick Kimball said.

"There has been a lot of progress in bringing back up cell sites," he said.

Cingular's wireless network in southeastern Louisiana was 85 percent restored by Wednesday afternoon, Cingular spokeswoman Dawn Benton said.

Even with the progress, dialing into the region from outside Louisiana remained a problem for many, particularly during peak calling hours. To prevent the high calling volumes from jamming networks, some long-distance companies were limiting incoming calls so outgoing calls from storm victims and relief workers could be completed.

Other companies, such as Sprint, were rerouting many long-distance calls through other Southern cities because regional switches in New Orleans were submerged or otherwise inoperable. The rerouting caused problems for some Sprint customers along the Gulf Coast from Louisiana to Florida, Sprint spokeswoman Kristen Wallace said.

Call volume on Sprint's network in southeastern Louisiana has doubled since the storm, she said.

Wireless service providers encouraged customers to send more text messages because they use up smaller amounts of network capacities and are easier to complete.

The request for free cell service for customers was made by the public service commissioners, who do not regulate wireless phone networks. They sent their request to the Federal Communications Commission, which has jurisdiction over the companies.

Many wireless service providers already have offered breaks on some services, phones and accessories.

For example, Sprint customers from areas affected by the hurricane will not be charged for long-distance calls, roaming on outside networks, sending text messages or exceeding the number of calling minutes on their service plan.

FEMA offers hotels business, help

Metairie resident Harriet Cross, a florist, takes on a new volunteer job as a sidewalk cleaner Tuesday outside Bandito's Restaurant and Tequila Bar, which is attached to the Ambassador Hotel in the Central Business District. Hotels in the area are hoping to reopen quickly, since a FEMA program — which needs 10,000 hotel rooms — could bring instant, long-term business.

Agency wants 10,000 rooms for 200 days

By Rebecca Mowbray
Business writer

Hotel operator Michael Valentino, with an entourage of insurance adjusters, Shaw Group Inc. construction experts and Federal Emergency Management Agency officials, tromped through Valentino's three French Quarter properties Wednesday, hoping that his hotels can participate in a program that promises speedy repairs and instant business.

FEMA wants 10,000 hotel rooms for 200 days to house emergency workers, and it has hired the Baton Rouge construction firm the Shaw Group to fix the damage at hotels, according to the Greater New Orleans Hotel and Lodging Association.

"As an independent hotel, I have a better shot of getting services to my hotel by getting involved with disaster recovery people," said Valentino, managing partner of Valentino New Orleans Hotels. "I get my properties open, and there's a built-in market for some extended period of time."

With the muscle of the federal government and one of Louisiana's biggest companies, the deal is the hotel industry's best shot at making quick, hassle-free repairs, hanging on to workers before they take jobs in other parts of the country, and taking guests at a time when there is no tourism business.

"FEMA and the Shaw Group have the firepower to speed up the opening and reconstruction of the hotels," said Bill Langkopp, executive vice president of the hotel association.

The six-month time frame of the FEMA hotel contract, coupled with the projected April reopening of the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, also sets a target date for restarting the New Orleans tourism industry. If reconstruction efforts go smoothly, then the tourism industry needs to be ready to go in April.

Many hotels sustained water damage from flooding or blown-out windows or holes in their roofs, and hotel operators fear that mold will set in if they don't fix the problems and get the air conditioning on soon. In addition, the hotels need electricity, water and sewer service to open.

FEMA declined to talk about its efforts to secure hotel rooms, who would ultimately foot the bill for repairs or how rates are negotiated, saying that details of the contract still are being ironed out.

Hans Wandfluh, general manager of the Royal Sonesta Hotel on Bourbon Street, is contracting with FEMA for 200 rooms for the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Wandfluh's 500-room hotel is unusual in that it wasn't damaged, and it's already 60 percent full with television crews, BellSouth telephone technicians, insurance adjusters, the FBI agents and 30 employees who are living and working there.

The hotel is getting electricity from a generator and has enough water pressure to flush toilets and run showers on all floors. On Tuesday, a CNN news crew helped Wandfluh attach a chlorination system to a water pipe entering the hotel to make the shower water cleaner. Wandfluh also has a water engineer and exterminator on site to help keep the hotel clean.

But the Shaw Group aspect of the FEMA deal will help with the Royal Sonesta's sister property, the Chateau Sonesta, which is located in a section of Canal Street that flooded. Wandfluh said prices for fuel, construction materials and labor are going up by the day, and getting involved with the FEMA/Shaw deal enables him to skip the hassle of haggling for goods and services.

Prices are rising and supplies are hard to get, Wandfluh said. "If I would do this work myself, it would take a little longer."

With the unwitting help of a classic French Quarter restaurant, a grateful Orleanian serves a National Guard unit a dinner to remember

Well DONE

STAFF ILLUSTRATION BY KENNETH HARRISON

I was walking around the French Quarter Saturday, surveying the hurricane clean-up efforts 12 days after the storm, when I came upon Finis Shellnut, who possesses one of the best names I've ever known.

"Come here," he told me. "I'm going to show you something you will never believe."

Shellnut is a real estate wheeler-dealer in the Quarter but is perhaps better known as the (now ex-) husband of Gennifer Flowers. They're originally from the Arkansas power network: He takes credit for introducing the Clintons into the Whitewater deal; she conducted more personalized business with the ex-president.

CHRIS ROSE

Together, they opened the Kelsto Club on St. Louis a few years ago and he held court behind the bar while she sang torch songs in the front of the windows that open across the street from the legendary Antoine's restaurant.

But they divorced just weeks before Katrina, which he weathered in the French Quarter. And after the storm passed, he immediately established himself as the go-to guy for goods and services on the street. Lumber, gas, cash, ice, backhoes, clean-up crews, cold champagne: Finis Shellnut can get it all. Within the hour, generally.

MY STORM STORY

Hurricane Katrina: In their own words

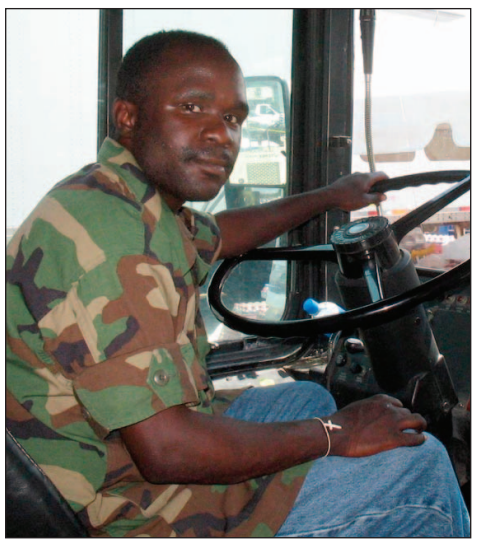
I didn't evacuate because my sister and them wanted to stay home. Everybody was like, 'The storm ain't gonna be that bad.' So we slept there. In the morning, the water was up to our beds.

"The second day, we went up in the attic and we slept in there. We couldn't open the window. It was so scorching hot. My little niece was sick, and I really needed to get her some medical attention. I said, 'It's time for me to get my family out of here.'



"So I got out, and I saw a bus driver on Canal Street by Foot Locker. He took like a stick and broke the (attic) window, and pulled them through there. And then they were on top the bus. And you know the emergency exit? He pulled them through there.

"The bus driver went to turn towards Canal Street. And we could see guys fighting, violence, a whole lot of bodies floating on top of water. He saw the guys with the guns, he didn't say anything at all. He got off the bus and ran.

"We were about to crash into the Holiday Inn, so I jumped on the floor and grabbed the brakes with my hands and pressed. I (grabbed the steering wheel and) tried to circle around. One (passenger) was kind of panicked, and I was telling her to calm down. As I'm driving the bus I see elderly women and I just started picking them up. Some people were on their roofs as we passed and they were jumping on the bus and we were taking them in from the emergency exit. I was trying to squeeze a lot of people in. This woman and her kid . . . I said, 'I'm sorry ma'am, we don't have enough room.' I didn't want to leave her out there, but I had no other choice. Ever since then, I've been worried about that woman and her kid. I've never seen them again.

"A lot of people were saying, 'Just please don't hit the bodies.' I was trying to drive around them. They were just kind of hitting the bus.

"I hit Highway 90 and I met up with a Thibodaux policeman and he escorted us over here. Everybody keeps calling me a hero. I'm not a hero. If you were in New Orleans, you would've done the same thing.

"I've been here in Thibodaux for 15 days straight.

"I'll never go back."

RUSTIC REFUGEE

A city boy takes shelter down on the farm

BIG BEND, LA. – There is no Community or CDM coffee and chicory at the Wal-Mart in Marksville.

But there's a good supply of attitude-adjustment beverages for later in the evening and, more importantly, an even larger supply of the nicest people you've ever met, catering to all the lost souls like me who have relocated to Avoyelles Parish.

ANGUS LIND

New Orleanians and their neighbors from surrounding parishes are now domiciled from coast to coast, and I'm going to do my best to attempt to describe where I have temporarily put down roots. This I know: I am still in the Pelican State. But exactly where is somewhat confusing, because people up here call it by different names – Big Bend, Bayou des Glaises, Bordelonville.

Whatever you call it, it is on Highway 451 on the Bayou des Glaises Loop. This is not to be confused with an interstate loop around a city, like I-610 or I-310 – far from it. This is the twisting, turning loop of the bayou, a 50-mile long waterway that stretches from Simmesport to Cottonport.

And where I am on the loop is east of Bordelonville, Moreauville and Mansura, and southeast of Marksville, which is south of Alexandria.

Now that we've got that geography all cleared up, all you really need to know is that this is farm country. This is rural.

A grateful Orleanian serves a National Guard unit a dinner to remember

ROSE, from C-1

"I'm like Mr. Haney from Green Acres," he said. "I can get anything anybody needs."

And then he proved it.

He led me around the corner, to an unmarked delivery entrance for Antoine's, where a guy named Wilbert has been reporting to work every day, trying to keep on top of the food situation before it all rots and stinks - and then he trudges "back over to the projects," as he says, to sleep in a tenement with no tenants and no power.

So Wilbert deals with rancid butter and tomatoes that have gone to black. But there's one thing he hasn't had to deal with, and that's what Shellnut wanted to show me.

He positioned me in front of a big storage cooler that is probably about 40 years old and then he pulled the door open and a cloud of frost blew out. Inside, it was cold. Real cold. Not only had the ice inside of Antoine's meat and seafood locker not completely melted – it hadn't even started to melt.

Don't ask me how this is possible. I do not know. And I did not take down the name of the ice company nor the refrigerator manufacturer but I should have, because they've got a good bit of P.R. to capitalize on.

Because together they had saved shelves and shelves of lobster tails and soft shell crabs and tubs of lump crab meat and filets and New York strips and tenderloin tips. Thousands of them.

This wasn't just a big pile of food. This was the overabundant but abandoned inventory of the city's glorious tradition of over-consumption. It was like looking at a small piece of New Orleans history.

And 12 days after the storm, when the city's survivors had long acclimated to diets of looted Doritos, Salvation Army cheeseburgers and pre-packaged MREs from the National Guard . . . it made me hungry.

And speaking of the National Guard: We're standing there looking at all this food and Shellnut says to me, "What are we going to do with this?"

He told me he'd been trying to give it to NOPD officers, but they were all too individually stressed out to embrace the concept of fine dining and there was no discernible central command to alert to this situation.

And this was one hell of a situation.

I asked Shellnut if he was sure – IF HE WAS POSITIVE – that this was what it looked like: Fresh food. I mean, how could it be?

So Sunday morning I went back to visit Shellnut. "Are you sure it's OK to take these?" I asked, and he assured me he had cleared it with the restaurant and I hope that is the case and if it is not: Mr. or Mrs. Guste – or whoever currently runs that classic culinary landmark – we'll clear this up later. Somehow. I give you my word.

He shrugged. He said this is how they found it, him and Wilbert. So we cut open a filet and we popped a lid on the lump crabmeat and smelled them and they smelled . . . beautiful.

So I proposed this: Uptown, where we have been operating an ad hoc "news bureau" by generator from inside a reporter's house, we are under the protective operations of the California National Guard.

They patrol our area and have given us their MREs (the beef ravioli is to die for) and they have generally treated us with more respect, grace and kindness than one has a right to expect under martial law.

Fact is, every one that we have come in contact with – and there are plenty of them – has been a Good Joe.

Back home in California, these men and women are cops and teachers and businessmen who were given about 12 hours notice to tie up any loose ends in their lives and say goodbye to their families and come to New Orleans to bring some serious heat and restore order on our streets.

And they're doing a helluva job and that big pile of meat looked like a real good way to put into action what we've been putting into words for them for two weeks: Thank you.

But first, I figured we better test it. Despite its alluring physical appearance, if it was, in fact, rotten – as every other steak in this city most certainly was at this point – then I did not want to be personally responsible for wiping out an entire unit of the California National Guard.

With all the bad headlines coming out of this town, that's not one I wanted to add to the pile.

So I tested it on my colleagues. I brought home about a dozen massive beef filets and I seasoned and cooked them and they were excellent. (No one would try the crab meat; despite appearances, the implications seemed daunting.)

In the morning, I polled my group of housemates and found no reports of constitutional distress – at least no more distress than usual, considering our fairly unhealthy living conditions. But enough about that.

So Sunday morning I went back to visit Shellnut. "Are you sure it's OK to take these?" I asked, and he assured me he had cleared it with the restaurant and I hope that is the case and if it is not: Mr. or Mrs. Guste – or whoever currently runs that classic culinary landmark - we'll clear this up later. Somehow. I give you my word.

So we packed up 240 filets and tenderloins and I dropped them off at Sophie B. Wright Middle School, where the California Guard unit is stationed.

Then I hustled a few grills off of some front porches in my neighborhood - which is basically in preserved physical condition, so if the worst thing that happened to you in Katrina was losing your old Weber, then I don't want to hear about it.

It went to a good cause.

Then I called in a delivery of 20 bags of charcoal from a colleague in Baton Rouge and we set up at the corner of Prytania and Napoleon, under the oaks (they're still there!) and we had us a Sunday afternoon barbecue.

And when I was informed that 240 steaks were not going to be nearly enough for the 600 Guardsmen and women based at the site, I dispatched a team of them to go down to the Quarter and find Shellnut – which is not hard to do – and they came back with him and also a few hundred more steaks.

The Guard, they went nuts. Absolutely nuts. As platoons came back from patrols, they were greeted by four grills going full steam, a much better smell than our city streets, in these hard times.

At one point, several company cooks returned and were thrilled to have some real cooking to do so they relieved me of duty. That was their prerogative. It is, after all, martial law.

So then I just watched. Shellnut and I leaned against my car and took in the scene and all these guys, they just fell over us with gratitude, like we were the heroes – an absurd notion. But maybe for one afternoon, we did a little bit of good on behalf of our city, our people, and particularly Antoine's world famous restaurant.

And with my story told, I'd just like to add – gently, so as not to sound like I'm complaining – but if we ever have a storm like Katrina headed this way again, if Wilbert or someone else down at Antoine's could toss a few hundred pounds of potato salad into that cooler before it hits, that would be great.

Because it would have been really nice to have some fresh sides with all that meat. Now that would have been something.

In Big Bend, he finds the farm living easy

LIND, from C-1

This is John Deere's world. The mooing of cows, the crowing of roosters and the singing of birds wake you up in the morning and the calls of crickets, frogs and other critters put you to bed at night. And you can see stars like you never can in the city.

It ain't all bad.

I'm in a rambling old house that basically hasn't been occupied since 1993 and is equipped with the latest 1930s technology, such as a wood-burning stove to keep warm in the winter. The other morning it was 62 degrees, so I took a quick look in the stove, then made some hot coffee.

Some folks call it "the old Blakewood home." The original home was built in the 1870s, but the Great Flood of 1927 washed it away and it was rebuilt in 1930. The missus and I are calling it home for now thanks to a lifelong pal, William Marshall, whose mom lived in the house until she died 12 years ago.

We haven't yet bought overalls and pitchforks, but the thought has crossed our minds. We've seen lots of cotton and soybeans and other growing stuff that city folks like us can't identify. But whatever it is, there's lots of it and it looks healthy. This is a fertile area, no doubt about it.

And despite the depressing images of our city that continue to flicker across the TV screen, we've started to smile and laugh once in a while. You have to – because some of what has happened in our new world is funny.

We recently bought new numbers and letters to put on the mailbox next to the highway, exactly 160 yards from the house. I know that because I stepped it off. You have time to do things like that in Big Bend.

And there it stands, something I thought I'd never see: a highway mailbox that bears the name "A. Lind."

When an electrician drove up to the house, he introduced himself: Brian Bordelon. Well, why not? This is Bordelonville. The next day the TV repair guy came by. He introduced himself also: Stacy Bordelon, some distant cousin of Brian Bordelon.

We're catching on.

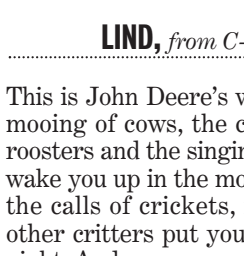
We knocked down scores and scores of wasp nests on the porches. We set mouse traps in the house and so far have bagged four. We washed dishes and pots by hand in the sink.

We hooked up a new "old" washing machine on the porch so we could wash the few clothes we evacuated with – in cold water only. When your gas heater has a butane tank small enough to fit in your average backyard barbecue, the hot water is best left for showers.

And hanging clothes on a clothesline is an adventure, especially when the neighbor's playful Labrador hunting puppy is trying to jump up and grab what you've just hung. Clotheslines were once a major part of the American landscape – you could watch a family grow up by watching the changing sizes on the clothesline. They're still around, but are rare sightings. We like to think we're doing our part to keep the past alive.

Our very first night here, as we put our heads down on an old four-poster bed that somehow survived the 1927 flood, my wife and I got a special treat. A skunk crawled under the house and sprayed it.

With all that our fellow Orleanians were enduring that night, falling asleep with a little essence of skunk in the air didn't seem so bad. I said a little prayer for Katrina's victims, for my displaced friends and relatives, for the uncertainty of what lies ahead. And I thanked God for sparing my family and settling me in my new home.



God bless Big Bend.

HOT FUDGE SUNDAE BLUES
By Bev Marshall
Ballantine Books, $12.95

Gulf Coast residents know all too well about the "Hot Fudge Sundae Blues," a feeling "as rotten and low and as hopeless as can be" that only sweetness can cure. But imagining yourself in Bev Marshall's world is an antidote to despair. The Ponchatoula novelist has already staked her claim to the territory of Southern women's fiction in three novels set in Zebulon, Miss. — "Walking Through Shadows", "Right as Rain," and now "Hot Fudge Sundae Blues," which conjures those lazy summer afternoons and that time in a girl's life when she's praying that God will please — finally! — make her breasts grow, and that all the stories in Nabokov's "Lolita" will make sense, and that the good-looking swim instructor who's bound for Tulane Law School in the fall will take a second look. Marshall returns to the '60s South for this coming-of-age tale of 13-year-old Layla Jay Andrews, a 13-year-old who has messed up her love life almost as much as her mother, an Elizabeth Arden saleswoman with a taste for inappropriate flashy red dresses and the hots for preacher man who turns out to be anything but holy. Readers who have a lot to worry about will be delighted to make a great escape in her sweet, surprising, funny company.

His disdain of marriage may hide fears

DEAR CAROLYN:
My boyfriend and I have been together for 4 1/2 years and living together for two. We have a wonderful, loving relationship that has progressed at a very natural pace for both of us. Lately, though, I've been wanting to get married, while he doesn't feel any great urgency. He does want to get married someday, but he doesn't feel our relationship is missing anything by not doing it now. Recently we were debating the topic, and he argued that in a relationship like ours, where we live as a married couple and have the same love and commitment, civil marriage is really just a societal construct that has no real significance for us. He does feel religious marriage would have significance, but totally separate from civil marriage, which I agree with.

CAROLYN HAX

The first part I didn't agree with, yet I didn't have any cogent argument for my view besides, ``That's just what two people do when they love each other and want to spend the rest of their lives together.'' So I've been thinking about it since then and come to this conclusion: Nowadays, with marriage not practically essential for two people to share their lives, it's just something that humans need and put significance on because they're human. Logically, he and I don't need to get married except for some legal and monetary reasons, but nobody is completely logical. People in our position get married because it has some sort of sentimental significance that can't logically be explained. What do you think about the significance and purpose of marriage?

— Anonymous

DEAR ANONYMOUS:
Ask a gay friend.

Those ``legal and monetary reasons'' directly affect things emotional and life-altering. Who raises children, who inherits property, who qualifies as family, who speaks for you when you get hit by a bus and can't speak for yourself. Before you decide what marriage means to you, be sure about the scope of those legal and monetary reasons. Check your employers' policies and local and federal law. Revisit Terri Schiavo.

If civil marriage really isn't significant to your boyfriend, and if he really believes you're together whether you're married or not, then there's nothing keeping him from marrying you for no other reason than to make you happy.

Plus, marriage is our society's way of expressing life commitment. If you aren't game to buck society, then you aren't. That's OK.

Something else a gay friend can tell you: The sole fact of being denied something can make it significant.

He's essentially telling you that his rationale carries more weight than your feelings. Ow. Maybe you'll never agree on this, but there are less dismissive ways to disagree.

Not only that — his ``logic'' had the neat (and let's call it unintended, give him the benefit of the doubt) effect of forcing you to put your beliefs under hot lights, while his get to sit there unchallenged.

Challenge them.

If civil marriage really isn't significant to your boyfriend, and if he really believes you're together whether you're married or not, then there's nothing keeping him from marrying you for no other reason than to make you happy.

Either this hasn't occurred to him, in which case he should be happy to marry you — or he wouldn't be happy to marry you because he has a legitimate, as-yet-unspoken reason for saying no. He owes it to you to speak it, even if it isn't a cogent or logical reason, but instead an emotional one. A fear of insignificant social constructs, perhaps.

Giants quarterback Eli Manning's dream of playing in the Superdome takes a drastic detour

AP PHOTO

Giants quarterback and New Orleans native Eli Manning has always wanted to play in the Superdome, but because of the damage to the building he might not ever get the chance.

By Aaron Kuriloff
Contributing writer

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. – Eli Manning may never get to play in the Superdome.

This weekend was scheduled to be his homecoming – his first trip back to New Orleans as an NFL quarterback like his father and brother before him. He was supposed to play in front of his friends and family, against the team he worshipped growing up.

Now that dream may never come true. Of course, now it doesn't seem remotely important, either.

"My family all got out," said Manning, the second-year quarterback of the New York Giants. "They left two days before the hurricane. I haven't heard any horror stories about close friends or people we know. From what I've heard, those people have gotten out."

The flood damage and heartbreak from Hurricane Katrina are minor wounds compared to some of those he has seen on television and during a recent trip to the area.

Manning, who visited Hurricane Katrina evacuees in Baton Rouge with Peyton, has a hard-nosed coach demanding perfection, the hopes of America's largest city on his shoulders, and on Monday night faces his father's own New Orleans Saints.

"I grew up a Saints fan," Manning said. "I went to every home game. I remember going to one preseason game with my dad. We went and saw them play Green Bay, it might have been a scrimmage, where I was on the sideline and got the tee after kickoff. ... That was my team growing up."

The Saints also may be sentimental favorites everywhere else in the country and, judging by stories coming out of the Gulf Coast, a rare bright spot for many in the New Orleans area. But Manning is still planning to beat them as badly as he can.

He's already feeling pressure from Giants coach Tom Coughlin, after completing 10 of 23 passes for 172 yards in the Giants' opening 42-19 thrashing of

Hornets weighing Baton Rouge sites

Team still looking into viability of two arenas

By Jimmy Smith
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Hornets officials continued their reconnaissance missions around Baton Rouge on Wednesday, hoping to determine whether the city will be a viable place in which to play some displaced home games this season.

Team president Paul Mott spent the day dealing with what he called "internal issues" while NBA representatives, along with Hornets front office personnel Sam Russo and Steve Martin, went about gathering information on the Pete Maravich Assembly Center on the LSU campus and the downtown River Center.

"Based on what I hope, maybe there's a way we could do that (return to the Arena sometime this season). I'd certainly love to do that. The way things are moving right now, that could be a great celebration of renewal for the city."
PAUL MOTT
Hornets team president

Yet while conceding that, on Wednesday at least, it seemed doubtful the Hornets could play any games at New Orleans Arena during the 2005-06 season, Mott held out hope of a return to the devastated city this season.

Doug Thornton, regional vice president of SMG, the Arena's management firm, said Monday that damage to the Arena from Hurricane Katrina was minor and, with luck, the building could be operational by the February NBA All-Star break.

"I would say based on what I know, the answer is no, but I don't know if we'd rule it out," Mott said. "If there's no (major) structural damage to the building that changes things, so I don't know if we'd rule it out. I haven't talked to Doug personally, but I know he and his crew

Saints' cost to play at LSU $1.2 million

Bertman says school unlikely to make a profit

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — The Saints will pay LSU about $1.2 million to play four of their games at Tiger Stadium, LSU athletic director Skip Bertman said Wednesday.

The money — approximately $300,000 per game — will be used to cover game expenses and wear and tear on the field. Bertman said LSU will realize little, if any, profit.

"You can't run a football game in Tiger Stadium without 1,500-1,600 people to help," Bertman said, "and most of them are not volunteers.

"There will be wear and tear on the field, and I don't want to have to pay to make the field right. I'm assuming we're going to expend some effort to keep the field in shape, not that the field is in bad shape."

Bertman said team owner Tom Benson and the Saints "have been real good about everything."

Bertman will go before the LSU Board of Supervisors on Sept. 23 to get formal approval to allow the Saints to play at Tiger Stadium. He added there also will be a request to allow beer to be sold for Saints games only. The NCAA does not allow the sale of alcoholic beverages at member events.

Earlier this week, an agreement was reached for the Saints to play four of their home games at Tiger Stadium, starting with an Oct. 30 meeting against the Miami Dolphins, who are led by former LSU coach Nick Saban. The Saints are scheduled to return the following Sunday (Nov. 6) to play the Chicago Bears, and also are scheduled to play games there against the Tampa Bay Buccaneers (Dec. 4) and the Carolina Panthers (Dec. 18).

The Saints will play three other home games in San Antonio: Oct. 2 vs. Buffalo, Oct. 16 vs. Atlanta and Dec. 24 vs. Detroit.

Bertman said a typical Saturday night game at Tiger Stadium requires about 450 uniformed police officers from four agencies, all paid to provide such amenities as security and traffic control.

Then there are numerous game marshals, ushers, ticket takers, concession stand workers, doctors, Red Cross workers and ambulance personnel.

"You have to have electricians and plumbers available," he said. "It's like a large city, 100,000 people, on a given Saturday. The chances of nothing going wrong are zero."

Field conditions are a big concern, especially if it rains. The field is sand-based for better drainage and the added use could tear it up because it is designed for seven games per season.

Even more stressful for the field is that the teams are scheduled to play back-to-back days on consecutive weekends. The Tigers play North Texas on Oct. 29 before the Saints play Miami, then Appalachian State for Homecoming on Nov. 5, the day before the Saints and Bears play.

Tulane QB Ricard emerges as leader

He says adversity last season helped

By Fred Robinson
Staff writer

RUSTON — Lester Ricard was primed and ready to go.

Since the end of last season, the Tulane quarterback had been preparing to take over as the leader of the Green Wave's offense. He had done his homework and lifted his weights.

Then came Hurricane Katrina, sending Tulane's season into disarray. But Ricard never lost focus. He just did his job – leading.

When Ricard and his teammates were uprooted from their home and their scheduled nationally televised season opener Sept. 4 at Southern Miss postponed, Ricard wasn't about to start asking why.

Instead, he took another route.

"Everything happens for a reason," Ricard said Wednesday as he walked off the practice field at Louisiana Tech, where Tulane's football team now attends school and prepares for the 2005 season.

"The delay was tough, not only for myself but for this team. I was looking forward to getting back out there and playing, but things happen and you

Sugar Bowl eyes Baton Rouge, others

Hotel space is key to keeping game in La.

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

If enough hotels in the New Orleans area can be in operation by December, this year's Sugar Bowl will be played at LSU's Tiger Stadium.

If not, an alternative site, most likely Atlanta's Georgia Dome, can be host.

That's the message Sugar Bowl executive director Paul Hoolahan and president Mark Romig plan to give to the commissioners of the 11 Division I-A conferences at a BCS meeting Tuesday in Chicago.

"Obviously this will not be a normal New Orleans Sugar Bowl experience," said Hoolahan, who got his first look since Hurricane Katrina at the bowl offices in the Superdome on Wednesday. "But I think everyone will take a little disruption, maybe more than a little disruption, to get this done.

"Our preference is to play the game in Louisiana, because the Sugar Bowl is a Louisiana event. But we are pursuing a parallel track to insure that there is a Sugar Bowl this year."

In the long term, however, the future of the bowl, which was first played in 1935, will de-

NFL trying to make Saints feel at home

Monday night's game at Giants Stadium to have N.O. flavor

By John Reid
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — The NFL is making sure the Saints feel a little bit like the designated home team Monday night against the New York Giants, even though they will be on the road. The game was switched to Giants Stadium after the Superdome was deemed unplayable for the season because of damages caused from Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath.

Giants spokesman Pat Hanlon said there will be Saints signage at the stadium, the Saints will wear their home black jerseys and the team's colors will be painted in one of the end zones.

New Orleans native Harry Connick Jr. and Branford Marsalis will perform the national anthem on piano and saxophone and New Orleans jazz trumpeter Irvin Mayfield will play "America the Beautiful." The band 3 Doors Down, from Escatawpa, Miss., will perform at halftime.

The NFL has designated this week's games as Hurricane Relief Weekend, which will include a fund-raising telethon that will be part of ABC's "Monday Night Football" coverage to raise funds and bring attention to the massive needs of the New Orleans area and Gulf Coast region devastated by Katrina.

The league announced that every game played this week will include elements that highlight and contribute to the national relief effort.

Giants officials said Wednesday several thousand tickets remain unsold.

PLAYER OF THE WEEK: John Carney, who kicked a 47-yard field goal with three seconds remaining to lift the Saints to a 23-20 victory Sunday against division rival Carolina, was chosen Special Teams Player of the Week by the league.

Dating to last season, a Saint has earned the award five consecutive weeks, the first time that has been accomplished since the award was established in 1993. Carney also made field goals of 28 and 48 yards against the Panthers.

BACK TO WORK: The Saints will return to practice Thursday for the first time since Sunday's victory. After going through team meetings and film review sessions Monday, the players were given Tuesday and Wednesday off. But the coaching staff began game preparations for the Giants on Wednesday.

"Everybody had Tuesday off to get all of their personal issues out of the way such as their housing, banking, cars and anything else, so they can worry about football the rest of the year," Coach Jim Haslett said.

Earlier this week, the Saints' coaches moved into the Alamodome's offices after spending more than a week working from the San Antonio Convention Center.

IN DEMAND: Several hundred fans began lining up outside the Alamodome ticket office shortly after 9 a.m. Wednesday to purchase tickets to the three Saints games scheduled to be played in San Antonio. The Saints play the Buffalo Bills at the Alamodome on Oct. 2, the Atlanta Falcons on Oct. 16 and the Detroit Lions on Dec. 24.

At a news conference earlier this week, Saints owner Tom Benson urged residents of the city to sell out the 65,000-seat Alamodome. "The initial returns from today's ticket sales effort have been unbelievable," San Antonio mayor Phil Hardberger said in a statement.

Team officials did not release the number of tickets sold Wednesday.

INJURY UPDATE: TE Ernie Conwell (jaw), WR Az-Zahir Hakim (hamstring), LB James Allen (knee) and TE Shad Meier (knee) are listed as questionable. The Giants have TE Jeremy Shockey listed as questionable with an ankle injury.

Ticket prices set for San Antonio

Saints season ticket holders get to apply credits toward games

By John Reid
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — The Saints announced home ticket prices and polices Tuesday for the three designated home games that will be played at the Alamodome.

They are still working on plans for the four games that will played at LSU's Tiger Stadium.

Individual game tickets in the club seating areas of the Alamodome range from $75 to $125. A three-game season ticket in the section range from $210 to $360. Individual game tickets in the plaza seating areas range from $55 to $90.

All current Saints Superdome ticket holders have the right to apply their funds to tickets in the Alamodome or Tiger Stadium, or to apply credits toward the 2006 season. The Saints Ticket Policy is included in this release.

The New Orleans Saints will play three games in San Antonio, Texas at the Alamodome, starting with the Buffalo Bills on October 2, the Atlanta Falcons on October 16 and the Detroit Lions on December 24.

The Saints will play four games in LSU's Tiger Stadium in Baton Rouge, starting with the Miami Dolphins on the weekend of October 30, the Chicago Bears on the weekend of November 6, the Tampa Bay Buccaneers on the weekend of December 4 and the Carolina Panthers on the weekend of December 18.

Partial proceeds from all tickets sold will be applied to the New Orleans Saints Hurricane Katrina Relief Fund. Pricing for Saints games at the Alamodome during the 2005 season is as follows:

Alamodome Saints tickets will go on sale today at 10 a.m. by calling the Saints at 210-208-9520 or Ticketmaster at 800-877-0898. Tickets are also available on-site at the Alamodome box office and online at both www.NewOrleansSaints.com and www.ticketmaster.com.

Superdome 'home' for Manning

Arizona. He threw two touchdown passes but also two interceptions, including one the Cardinals returned for a touchdown.

That looked familiar to many in New York. Last season, in Manning's first seven games as the team's starter, he threw for six touchdowns and nine interceptions. That stretch included four games in which he threw no touchdown passes, and one horrible afternoon in Baltimore where he completed four of 18 passes, earning a passer rating of zero.

Manning has made undeniable progress since then. He led a flawless 10-play, 81-yard scoring drive to open last Sunday's game, and then came back from his first-half interceptions by opening the third quarter with another touchdown drive.

Maybe expectations are changing. But on Monday, Coughlin emphatically said during a press conference: "We have to have a better passing attack."

Manning's teammates viewed the performance more charitably.

"It's a team game," defensive end Michael Strahan said. "Your quarterback isn't always going to have his best week."

Running back Tiki Barber suggested that the team was "probably putting a little bit too much on Eli," by not running the ball enough during the second quarter.

But Manning's not making excuses. "That performance was not OK by me," he said after the game.

So with all due respect to the memory of his favorite childhood Saints — Ricky Jackson, Pat Swilling, The Dome Patrol. – he hopes to find every weakness in the current team's defense.

"I still got to play the game," he said.

He's also a bit wary.

"That's such a strong motivation to play for, when you have people who've been through such tragedy saying, 'Hey, we're rooting for you. Go out there and do well.'"

He doesn't really want to dash those people's hopes, but it's his job to do so. And the Giants aren't about to turn down an extra home game.

"We need a spot to play the game," Manning said. "We've still got to play a tough team. Obviously, you wish you weren't playing this game at home because of the circumstances."

AP PHOTO

Eli Manning has had some ups and downs as New York Giants quarterback. Even after he led the Giants to a win in Week 1, Coach Tom Coughlin was insisting the passing game needs to get better.

But as a New Orleanian, he can understand what people back home are feeling. He has been getting reports on his parents' house.

"From what I've heard, there wasn't a whole lot of flooding and not too much damage," he said. "But it's still not positive in that respect."

And he really would have liked to play in the Superdome.

"Growing up, my brother played there four times," he said. "Our high school used to play there every year. When I got around they canceled that. So we never played there."

Playing at Tiger Stadium not cheap

LSU associate athletic director Herb Vincent said the field will probably be re-sodded during a 19-day break in November between the Saints-Bears game and the LSU-Arkansas game Nov. 25. It was already scheduled to be completely replaced — drainage system and all — after this season.

Vincent said LSU officials got some tips from their trip to Arizona last Saturday for the LSU-Arizona State game. Sun Devil Stadium is shared by Arizona State and the Arizona Cardinals.

"They re-sod between the hash marks four times a year," Vincent said. "Skip always says when you go on the road, bring back at least one thing."

LSU may not be alone in the task. SMG, which staffs and manages game day operations for the Saints and the New Orleans Hornets, has offered its services in meetings between the Saints and LSU. SMG regional vice president Doug Thornton said that, while LSU knows how to put on a football game, there are some NFL specific areas such as field security and game production in which it might need help.

"We've not had the opportunity to discuss what role SMG will play, but we've offered our assistance to the extent that it is necessary," Thornton said. "LSU and the Saints want our help."

Other issues to resolve include hotels, ticket distribution and the Tiger Den suites and club seating. The Saints are responsible for finding the approximately 260 hotel rooms needed for the teams and NFL personnel. NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue said he is confident the crunch on hotel space in the Baton Rouge area will have eased sufficiently by the end of October.

Benson said determining how to distribute tickets and how to handle season ticket holders are priorities and that he would set up a staff in Baton Rouge soon to handle that.

Bertman said Tiger Den suiteholders have the right of first refusal on "the next event" at Tiger Stadium.

"The suiteholder will be offered whatever package the Saints put together first," Bertman said. "That's in the contract. My guess is they probably should do that for the club section as well. I don't know how that is going to work."

THE WORLD OF SPORTS

LSU's Johnson is top rookie

Former LSU point guard Temeka Johnson was selected the 2005 WNBA Rookie of the Year, the WNBA announced Wednesday on ESPN.com. Johnson, the sixth overall selection in the draft, received 44 of a possible 50 votes from a national panel of sportswriters and broadcasters. She started all 34 games for the Washington Mystics, and ranked second in the WNBA in assists per game (5.2 apg) and first in total assists (177). Among rookies, Johnson ranked first in scoring (9.3 ppg), assists, steals and minutes played (973), second in free throw percentage (78.8) and fourth in field goal percentage.

NFL

STEWART SIGNS WITH RAVEN: The Baltimore Ravens signed New Orleanian Kordell Stewart to back up quarterback Anthony Wright. Stewart, 32, was the Ravens' backup last season while Wright recovered from shoulder surgery. "It's the logical choice," Coach Brian Billick said. "Kordell was great for us last year. A great team member, understands the role. Hopefully there's enough carry-over for him, verbiagewise, that he can adjust quickly. It's a nice comfort zone having him back." Wright is replacing Kyle Boller, who was injured in the opener last week against the Indianapolis Colts.

MCNABB SAYS HE'LL PLAY: Philadelphia Eagles quarterback Donovan McNabb said he won't let a chest injury keep him on the bench. McNabb didn't practice Wednesday because of a bruised chest, but the five-time Pro Bowl quarterback said he'll play in Philadelphia's home opener against San Francisco on Sunday. "Nothing will stop me from being on that field," said McNabb, who was injured in the first quarter in the Eagles' 14-10 season-opening loss at Atlanta on Monday night. If McNabb can't play - he's listed as questionable – either Koy Detmer, who has started eight games in nine seasons with the Eagles, or Mike McMahon, who started seven games for the Lions in four seasons, would replace him.

RAM EXEC IN TROUBLE: Samir Suleiman, an executive with the St. Louis Rams, will be reprimanded for leaving a threatening phone message on the voice mail of a St. Louis Post-Dispatch columnist, according to the team.

"It's shocking that he would leave a message like that," Rams president John Shaw told the Post-Dispatch. "It's the type of behavior that we don't condone at any level. He will be reprimanded, and it will be handled internally." On Aug. 28, sports columnist Bernie Miklasz wrote that he was disturbed by "infighting and politics" within the Rams organization, and said executives owe any head coach their support. "Be it (Mike) Martz or another man, I don't care who sits in the head coach's office at Rams Park. The head coach should be backed, not back-stabbed, by associates," Miklasz wrote. Suleiman left a message on Miklasz's voice mail, stating, in part, "tell your source that I'm not a back-stabber, I'm a (expletive) throat slasher, and he'll know the difference before it's all said and done." Suleiman, director of football administration, has worked for the Rams for six years. He assists president of football operations Jay Zygmunt on salary cap issues and contract negotiations.

AROUND THE NFL: Seattle Seahawks defensive coordinator Ray Rhodes plans to be at Sunday's game against Atlanta, but will not be calling plays. Rhodes was hospitalized last week after suffering from dizziness. He did not accompany the team to Jacksonville, where Seattle lost 26-14. Linebackers coach John Marshall filled in for Rhodes and will call the defense again against the Falcons. "He's coming back a little at a time. We're going per doctors orders on this," coach Mike Holmgren said. "If they say 'No, he can't be there,' he's not there." . . . Atlanta Falcons cornerback Kevin Mathis, who was kicked out of the season opener against Philadelphia after a scuffle in pregame warmups, won't be playing this week, either. Mathis injured his left knee in practice Wednesday, and the Falcons fear it could be serious. He was on crutches in the locker room and being sent for an MRI exam. . . . The Cleveland Browns will be without linebacker Matt Stewart and kick returner Joshua Cribbs this Sunday, but could have cornerback Gary Baxter back in the lineup. Baxter practiced Wednesday for the first time in more than three weeks after sustaining a concussion in an Aug. 20 exhibition game against Detroit.

NBA

NETS CLOSER TO BROOKLYN: The New Jersey Nets moved closer to making a new home in Brooklyn when the Metropolitan Transportation Authority voted to sell an 8.3-acre railyard to team owner and real-estate developer Bruce Ratner. Ratner will pay $100 million for the downtown Brooklyn site where urban planner Robert Moses once turned down the Dodgers' push for a domed baseball stadium, prompting the team's move to California in 1957. The vote keeps the Nets on schedule to be playing by November 2008 in a Frank Gehry-designed Flatbush Avenue arena at the heart of a 21-acre office and apartment complex.

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL

CLEMENS PITCHES DESPITE MOTHER'S DEATH: Roger Clemens' mother died early Wednesday, and the Houston Astros pitched later that night in her honor. Bess Clemens died at 4:30 a.m. in Georgetown, Texas, because of complications from emphysema, an Astros official said. She was 75. Roger Clemens was scheduled to start a key game against Florida at home Wednesday night. The Marlins lead the NL wild-card race, with Houston 1 1/2 games behind. The seven-time Cy Young Award winner often shared his affection for his mother, saying her health was an important factor as he weighed retirement the past two offseasons.

ESPN ADDING GAMES: ESPN will start a series of Monday night baseball broadcasts and gain greater flexibility to move games to Sunday nights under a new eight-year contract worth $2.368 billion. The agreement announced Wednesday on the network's web site runs through 2013, and allows the network to have a team appear on its exclusive Sunday night games up to five times per season, up from 11 in a three-season span under the six-year contract that is expiring. Baseball is getting $200 million from ESPN in the final season of its current deal. The sport will average $296 million under the new agreement, a television and a baseball official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of a confidentiality agreement in the deal. "You worry about oversaturation, but this is a sport that its fans follow and live on a day-by-day basis," baseball commissioner Bud Selig said. "I do not worry that this will produce a glut." The sport's six-year contract with FOX, which runs through 2006 and covers the regular season, All-Star game and postseason, is worth about $2.5 billion. Selig and his staff have been planning to launch baseball's own cable network next year.

COLLEGE FOOTBALL

BUCKEYE GETS HATE MAIL: Ohio State tight end Ryan Hamby has received a couple of hate letters since dropping a potential touchdown pass during the Buckeyes' loss to Texas last week. Cutting over the middle into the end zone, Hamby was open when Justin Zwick's pass bounced off his chest and into the air. He had a second chance to grab it but was slammed by a defender just as the ball touched his hands. A touchdown would have given Ohio State a 10-point lead in the third quarter. The Buckeyes lost 25-22. "I can't think about it too much because we still have a lot of football to play," he said as the ninth-ranked Buckeyes prepared for Saturday's game with San Diego State. "I'm not going to lie. I think about it some times. But you've just got to move on."

RUSSELL, BENNETT HONORED: LSU quarterback JaMarcus Russell and McNeese State's Trey Bennett were selected players of the week by the Louisiana Sports Writers Association.

SEC WELL REPRESENTED: In a survey of NFL opening day rosters conducted by the Associated Press, the SEC has five schools ranked in the top eight for producing pro football players. Florida State ranks first with 42, but Florida (37), Tennessee (37) and Georgia (35) are second through fourth. Auburn is seventh at 31, and LSU is tied for eighth at 30.

GOLF

MALLON OUT OF HOSPITAL: Meg Mallon, who made the clinching putt when the Americans won the Solheim Cup, was released from a hospital Wednesday after being treated for a rapid heart rate. Mallon, 42, was taken by ambulance after closing ceremonies Sunday afternoon when her heart rate increased to as many as 290 beats per minute. Dr. Richard Fogel said she was diagnosed with a cardiac rhythm disturbance that results in a racing heartbeat. Mallon went through a procedure Tuesday in which heat distributed through a catheter destroyed a small piece of tissue where the rhythm arises. She is expected to make a full recovery.

BATON ROUGE — Three men, three different perspectives, one shared opinion - it's a game destined for exaggeration.

Political strategist James Carville watched every play on TV, hypnotized until the last play snapped him out of his trance.

Former LSU athletic director Joe Dean succumbed to ESPN's late kickoff, dozing off midway through the third quarter. His inner fan disrupted his sleep seconds before Early Doucet's winning touchdown, a blurry halo framing reality just this once.

And Sam Nader, a sideline staple at LSU for more than 30 years, was tall enough to glance over the barricade of photographers when Doucet stole a page from Peggy Fleming's routine by planting a toe on the green grass, three feet from the white sideline. On the long trip home, Nader developed all the mental snapshots he'll share for years through interviews and random retellings of LSU's 35-31 victory over Arizona State.

"Somebody once said, 'There's no great victories without adversity,' " said Nader, LSU's associate athletic director of football operations. "Taken just as a football game, this has to be one of the best. But when you add the significance of all the other events, it really makes it special."

Sure it was "special," but was it 1959 Ole Miss special, or Bluegrass Miracle special, or even BCS national title game special? It was definitely a great game, but does it compare with 2003's Georgia thriller or the 2001 SEC title upset?

Well, there are days to dissect this thing. With another off week, fans can catch their breath again one game into this slow-motion season and still have plenty of downtime to debate what rung on the LSU football hierarchy the Diversion in the Desert belongs.

"I think it's clearly - in terms of interest and emotion – got to be in the top five," Carville said. "From not knowing where the game would be played, to everything on campus, to having a new coach ... considering the emotional obstacles from a player's perspective, it might be one of the greatest wins in college football.

"It was a big intersectional game, and there are a lot of those. But what happened made it a national headline."

Hurricane Katrina evacuees were dying across the street from the Tigers' practice facility. The city swelled to a soundtrack of sirens and rumbling bus caravans. Fire codes became obsolete as players opened their tiny rented spaces and fit as many loved ones as possible, sacrificing beds for the floor, making supply runs well after 2 a.m.

Shyrone Carey couldn't find his brother. Many of the stores Skyler Green frequented growing up in Avondale were stripped to their structural skeleton from looting.

And then a week later, they played football.

"I was there the night Cannon made his run," Dean said. "I was there the night Doug Moreau caught that pass against Ole Miss. And I was there the night Eddie Fuller caught the touchdown pass to beat Auburn 7-6. I've seen a lot of wonderful experiences. But I thought this has to go down in history for us because of emotional involvement."

Carville received such a massive influx of adrenaline from the win that he couldn't sleep, choosing to yap on the phone with friends back home, unaware that Les Miles was delivering a relatively hidden speech. It had the powerful, vivid characteristics to heighten the lore of this game.

"Our team has had the longest camp in the history of camps," Miles said. "And it's been surrounded by a real-life problem, not a made-for-TV. A real-life trauma where friends and family have to stay in the dorms and the town swelled to take those people who evacuated from New Orleans. And we're treating people that are injured and disadvantaged 200 yards from our stadium. We have a scrimmage and Black Hawk helicopters are flying people in from New Orleans into the PMAC so that they can be triaged and move on to other areas.

"It's a terrible distraction. This team stepped across the white lines for two hours every day and they played football. They played hard. And they wanted this game for the people back home."

Earlier that morning, Carville told ESPN that only those from the region, who have an understanding of the Louisiana culture, could truly understand the significance of a perceived trivial event.

AP PHOTO

LSU receiver Early Ducet was the hero of Saturday's 35-31 win at Arizona State with his touchdown catch in the closing seconds.

"Here, there's not a second sport to football," Carville said. "It's football, football, football. It's just the nature of it. And throughout the state, Tulane just doesn't register. We don't have a North Carolina-North Carolina State or a Michigan-Michigan State. So you've got one school and one sport where people place all there emotions."

Nader said if the game were theoretically played in a vacuum, with no subplots or sidebars, Tiger fans still would remember it. Think about it. There was a 28-point fourth quarter highlighted by two special teams touchdowns and a 39-yard prayer into a wave of hands. That sequence of events alone is too corny for most studio execs.

Now set these theatrics behind a foreign backdrop passed off as a home game, with 18- to 22-year-olds handed the unfair burden to uplift a tattered region.

"Let me say this: We needed it," Dean said. "We all needed something positive to happen. I felt, even watching it, what a wonderful experience for us, because we've had so many bad experiences. It meant a lot to me. It almost brought me to tears."

Tulane's Spincer gains strength in tough times

Senior LB keeps football in perspective

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

RUSTON — They met in the laundry room.

Tulane senior linebacker Brandon Spincer was washing his whites when he started chatting with two fellow New Orleanians. The three wound up in Ruston because Caruthers Hall, on the campus of Louisiana Tech, is housing New Orleans evacuees.

The two, both women, lost their homes in Hurricane Katrina.

Spincer said he knows his apartment and his parents' house were hit. But he doesn't know how hard.

"Now that we're there living with them," Spincer said of the women, "they see that we're no different than them, and in no better situation than they are. They're no different than these guys, except for the fact that they put on pads on Saturday and play a game."

Football is what keeps Spincer going. The two women, Spincer guessed, had never seen a Tulane football game. But they're going to. Some hope these days comes in the form of pigskin.

"They were encouraging us to go out and win," Spincer said. "Living with people who evacuated from different parts of the city, we feel blessed. It feels good to be in there with those people, to be able to talk to them and get a sense of hope."

Spincer, 23, has emerged as a symbol of perseverance – and a symbol of his city and school. Sure, all the Green Wave seniors were selected as captains for this season. But Tulane coach Chris Scelfo defines his weakside linebacker as, "the most productive leader on this football team."

Spincer found out a lot about himself when his phone wouldn't ring. He waited and waited in the days after Katrina, yearning to hear from his 20-year-old brother, Christopher. It took two days of fearing the worst before he found out the best – that his brother had survived and had helped lead people to safety at New Orleans' Fairmont Hotel.

"Everything happens for a reason, and going through a tragedy can only make you stronger," said Spincer, whose team will face Mississippi State at 7 p.m. Saturday at Shreveport's Independence Stadium. "It let me realize that I'm a lot more mentally strong than I thought. I learned that staying mentally strong is a very important thing, because all of this is really mental –- seeing images and visions of your home and your property and peoples lives being destroyed. I've been strong for me, my teammates and my family. That's what I've learned through this whole deal."

Being mentally strong through a natural disaster makes getting through the fourth quarter seem effortless.

Spincer's career at Tulane has featured stints at safety and linebacker. He was academically ineligible in 2002. Now he is on pace to graduate, and has dreams of playing in the NFL.

"I told him a long time ago," Scelfo said, "if he can go to the NFL, and he has a shot, then I wish him luck. But if he doesn't, he's going to be on my staff as long as I'm a head coach."

Ricard more of a leader every day

can't hold your head down when you're facing such circumstances. You just have to look at the things you're given and deal with them."

While Ricard awaits his chance to redeem himself following a bittersweet 2004 season, he shows his teammates how calm he can be while facing a different kind of pressure.

"He's just been a positive influence," offensive coordinator Frank Scelfo said of his junior quarterback. "His attitude has been so positive through the three nights in Jackson (Miss.), the week in Dallas and now back to here.

"He's been smiling, and he hasn't been down at all. He's trying to spread it around the team. There are always some people who are unhappy about certain situations, and he's getting guys over it and getting them to the point where they can be productive."

That's just the way Ricard operates. Last season was his first as the Green Wave's starting quarterback after transferring from LSU and sitting out the 2003 season. He spent half of the season being criticized for his failures.

But things quickly turned around in the sixth game when he threw for more than 400 yards and six touchdowns in a 55-50 upset over nationally ranked Alabama-Birmingham.

It was during that game that people began to recognize there was a mountain of talent under an equal amount of rust. Scelfo said he wasn't surprised by Ricard's breakout performance. He said he saw it coming a week earlier in a 49-24 loss at Memphis.

"I think the turning point for him was the Memphis game," Scelfo said. "It was the week before UAB when Memphis blitzed and was relentless. (Memphis defensive coordinator) Joe Lee Dunn was relentless that day with pressure. But, every time Lester got hit, he got back up and set his feet and made the next throw. He overthrew our guys, but his reads and his decision making was right on."

But just as Ricard was beginning to peak, he broke his right wrist on the first series of the second half of a 45-31 victory over Army. He missed the final 2½ games, but a rough start had turned into a future filled with hope.

Healthy again and returning with valuable game experience, Ricard sums up the 2004 season with one word — priceless.

"You can't beat experience," Ricard said. "It doesn't matter how much film you watch, or how much someone tells you what to do. Until you're out there taking reps and getting you head beat in, you won't know what to do. I don't think I would have had the success I had last year had I not gone through that."

During the first half of the season, when he was intercepted seven times in the first five games, Ricard was not swayed by what others said or thought. The support surrounding Ricard, from Tulane's coaches to his teammates to his parents, kept him on track.

"I wasn't worrying about people outside of this football team. This football team still had confidence that I could get it done."

Even though Ricard had the kind of support from the team to keep him on the right path, he admits he lacked the confidence needed to lead the team.

"I was wondering if I was made for this," Ricard said. "Even Coach Frank (Scelfo) would talk to me and tell me I had to get my confidence up. He would say, 'You say you have confidence, but you really don't.' At the time, I didn't. I was doubting myself, even when I was out there playing. I was out there making bad throws and saying, 'This is ridiculous.'"

What now awaits Ricard is a challenge every bit as big as the one he faced last year. This season, he enters with 8½ games of experience as a starter and knows how fast the game is played.

"When he transferred from LSU, he still didn't understand the work ethic needed to be successful on the college level," Scelfo said. "He was always the best in everything that he did, and it was hard for him to understand that everybody was just as good as he was when he got here.

"Sitting and watching J.P. (Losman) work, I really think put it all in perspective. He had to change, and he did. His physical talent and preparation are going to take over because he's done a good job with that. You're going to see a better player back there, a more confident guy."

During the past six months, Scelfo has watched Ricard take charge – in the weight room and on the practice field. And he's watched Ricard show that maturity and leadership in the past two weeks when there was so much uncertainty surrounding the Green Wave.

"I think he's been able to draw from the tough times and last year's experience," Scelfo said. "Tomorrow's going to come. We're going to have another day, and he's going to get another chance to prove himself."

NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue and Saints owner Tom Benson met recently to announce the Saints are playing four games at LSU's Tiger Stadium. If there are enough hotel rooms in the Baton Rouge area available after the first of the year, the Sugar Bowl could be played there as well.

Other cities lining up to steal game

pend on how quickly the Superdome is restored to playing status, something that is expected to take at least a year.

The new BCS contract cycle begins in 2006. The Sugar Bowl is scheduled to play host to the national championship game after the 2007 season and the "regular" Sugar Bowl under the double-hosting format that starts next season.

Hoolahan said playing the game anywhere but New Orleans would be difficult beyond 2006.

That could mean the BCS awarding the Sugar Bowl spot in the championship rotation to another bowl.

Last year, before a decision was made to keep the title game among the Sugar, Rose, Orange and Fiesta bowls, several other bowls - including the Gator, Cotton, Peach and Capitol One - had put in bids for what was being called the "fifth BCS bowl."

"I wouldn't be honest if I didn't tell you I'm feeling the pressure," Hoolahan said. "And I'd be foolish not to acknowledge that the commissioners don't have some of those thoughts in their minds right now. So we're already protecting our flanks. The best way to do that is a commitment to rebuild the Superdome bigger and better, and I am fully confident that the state will do that."

Romig added that the Sugar Bowl committee is dedicated to continuing the game at the highest level.

"Our job is to be part of the recovery of the economy," he said. "We realize that there will have to be a reassessment of the Superdome, and issues like rebuilding the levees will take first priority. But it is our hope that major league football remains in New Orleans on both the college and professional level. I don't want to speculate any more beyond this year, except to say that the Sugar Bowl will still be around."

For now, though, the focus is on this season's game, scheduled for Jan. 2. The game would match the SEC champion - provided that team is not playing for the BCS championship in the Rose Bowl - and an at-large team.

"Our priority is this season and doing all we can to help the Sugar Bowl be part of the recovery of New Orleans," said Big 12 commissioner and BCS coordinator Kevin Weiberg. "But it's far too early to speculate on anything beyond this season."

Hoolahan has been in discussions with LSU athletic director Skip Bertman about playing this season's game at Tiger Stadium, and neither see a problem with the use of facilities or preparing the stadium for the game.

The problem is hotel space. Sugar Bowl fans normally occupy as many as 30,000 hotel rooms in New Orleans, something the Baton Rouge area couldn't approach.

But, Hoolahan said, many of the major hotels in New Orleans have indicated their desire to return to business as soon as possible.

"If they operating, they're going to need customers," he said. "We can provide that.

"In fact, we would be honoring our original charter, which was to promote tourism in New Orleans during a normally slow time, and it's certainly going to be a heck of a lot slower for a while."

That would leave working out the logistics of transporting fans to the game.

"We might have to spread the party between New Orleans and Baton Rouge," Romig said. "But everybody is dedicating their hearts and minds toward getting this done."

However, if there are insufficient hotel rooms, an alternate site within the SEC would be found.

Atlanta and Jacksonville, Fla., have been those most prominently mentioned, but Jacksonville appears out because Jan. 2 is also the date of the Gator Bowl; hotel space would be unavailable.

The Peach Bowl in Atlanta is scheduled for Dec. 30, largely eliminating the hotel space problem.

Georgia Dome general manager Kahlil Johnson said Wednesday his office has not been contacted by either the Sugar Bowl or SEC, but that his facility would be available.

Birmingham's Legion Field is another possibility, but that stadium lacks amenities such as luxury suites.

SEC commissioner Mike Slive said the league's preferences mirror those of the Sugar Bowl.

"The Sugar Bowl and the SEC share a long, rich tradition," he said. "We want to see the game remain in Louisiana if at all possible."

Slive also said that, although there is no firm date on when a decision would have to be made on the site of the game, a much clearer picture would be available by next week's BCS meeting.

"When we have enough accurate information to develop a business plan, we will make a decision," Hoolahan said. "It basically will be made jointly with the SEC, and we feel that the other commissioners will go along with us."

SEC assistant commissioner Mark Womack is heading a subcommittee acting as liaison to the Sugar Bowl.

Hoolahan, who evacuated to Houston with his family, also said that wherever the game is played, the Sugar Bowl would have no problem meeting its financial obligation to stage the game.

"The Sugar Bowl isn't going anywhere," he said. "The Sugar Bowl is synonymous with New Orleans, and we are totally invested in rebuilding the Superdome.

"This is an opportunity to look at a new beginning for New Orleans. We want to be part of that."

St. Tammany seniors lament missed games

Athletes left to make the most of their season that remains

By Tammy Nunez
Staff writer

The vision was vivid, and perfect.

It was how Daniel Cassisa's first football game of his senior year was to unfold.

"It was going to be against Parkview Baptist, there," the Fontainebleau running back said. "It was going to be 80 degrees, packed, though mostly with Parkview Baptist fans because it was there, and we put a hurting on them, and I rush for 105 yards."

But the game never happened. Hurricane Katrina swiped the first football playing date off the board along with two others. There has been no high school volleyball cross country or swimming in St. Tammany Parish.

The seasons, though, can be salvaged. The St. Tammany Parish School Board cleared the way to resume practice for varsity sports, with the first available date Monday.

For senior student-athletes, however, three weeks of memories are lost. Three weeks of chances to impress college scouts missed. Three weeks of training gone.

"It takes you three weeks to get into shape and one week to get out of shape," St. Paul's cross country coach Terryl Chatham said.

Wolves senior runner Marc Stubbs said he knew this was his year to take command of the team. He ran eight miles a day five days a week with teammates during the summer.

But as Katrina approached, Stubbs was in a cramped car on a six-hour trek to Winnsboro. When he returned home, anything but sports was on his mind.

"It was like two weeks where I couldn't do anything," Stubbs said. "I had to work in the yard, moving trees and stuff."

St. Paul's finished third in the state last year. Without the training and early season meets, the Wolves' high expectations may not be met.

"I don't think we could be as good as we could've been," Stubbs said. "We can still be good. We just have to concentrate on ourselves."

Cassisa's team had high hopes, too. The Bulldogs are coming off a state semifinals appearance, their best season ever. Cassisa finally moved into a starting role after the graduation of running backs Steven Korte (LSU) and Christian Ducre (Tulane) and relished the thought of all the eyes on his team looking to him.

The Bulldogs might recover better from the disruption than others. Several players, including quarterback Ross Goodlett, were nursing minor injuries and have come back healthy. But Cassisa says he feels cheated.

"The first thing we always talk about is football," Cassisa said. "That's all we ever talk about. It's football, working out … Friday night lights and getting the first down and the touchdown — that's what we remember."

Seniors with aspirations of college athletics can't ignore that impact, either. Cassisa said not playing three games could have cost him getting noticed by college coaches and scouting services.

"That's been very frustrating," Cassisa said.

Stubbs said he planned to attend Tulane. "Now, I'll go to LSU," he said. "I'll probably (not run and) get a job."

Mandeville has one of the most heavily recruited volleyball players in Rachel Lindelow. LSU is giving her a look, but Lindelow says she missed her chance to impress additional recruiters in matches against St. Joseph's Academy and Newman, which were canceled because of the hurricane. Lindelow has moved to Texas and is enrolled in school there.

Coach Jody Walker said Lindelow will be back when school resumes in St. Tammany Parish on Oct. 3.

"I don't think it will hurt her," Walker said. "(College coaches) are wrapped up in their seasons now. They have pretty much done their recruiting already."

Nonetheless, with players scattered across the South and their coaches left to pick up the pieces after the havoc wreaked by Katrina, the "senior experience" is unforgettable for all the wrong reasons.

"It makes you sad when you think of the memories these kids won't make," Chatham said.

Riverside sweeps East St. John in volleyball

Lady Rebels triumph despite performance of Wildcats' Cooper

By Lori Lyons
River Parishes bureau

Both Riverside's and East St. John's volleyball teams managed to get a jamboree match in before Hurricane Katrina struck. But since then, neither team has been able to play or even to practice much.

But on Wednesday afternoon, they got to play each other. And Riverside got a sweep.

The Lady Rebels took a 25-19, 25-21, 25-21 victory in Reserve.

Marci Martin led Riverside with 11 kills, and Erica Oubre had 10 kills and four digs. Oubre and Heidi Garsish also had four digs.

They all had to combine to overcome East St. John's Ashlee Cooper, a 6-foot-5 outside hitter who finished with 13 kills and two blocks.

"It's been two weeks since we've played," Riverside coach Missy Martin said. "And we haven't even practiced much over the past two weeks, to tell the truth. They were intimidated (by East St. John), I know that. They were in the same jamboree as us and we saw them, so they were intimidated. But once we saw we could play with them, we just kind of went with it."

East St. John started strong. The Wildcats built a 16-7 lead before the Lady Rebels found their rhythm. Then Riverside stormed back, outscoring East St. John 18-3 to take the win. Nicole Poirrier had three kills and Ashley Heckathorn had two aces to spark the rally.

Riverside carried the momentum into the second game and built a lead. But East St. John tried to come back. There were six ties, the last at 21, before the Rebels pulled away on a series of Wildcats return errors.

The third game was tighter, with neither team taking more than a four-point lead. The last tie was at 12. Heckathorn had a pair aces and scored the winning kill.

East St. John coach Sandi Stein was philosophical after the loss.

"When you play against yourself all the time, you get kind of sluggish," Stein said. "We found out today that you can't play sluggish and win. They weren't as excited as they needed to be."

Nevertheless, Stein was thrilled that her team was able to play at all.

"It's huge," she said.

Flowing Wave still homeless for Oct. 1 game

Tulane's game against SLU still looking for home

From staff reports

RUSTON – The Tulane football team's next home game, scheduled for Oct. 1 against Southeastern Louisiana, will either be played in Shreveport or Hattiesburg, Miss., and a decision will be made by Monday.

The Green Wave scheduled its first home game of the season – this Saturday against Mississippi State – for Shreveport's Independence Stadium. Tulane athletic director Rick Dickson said he would plan each home game this season on a game-by-game basis.

While Shreveport has offered its stadium for the season, Southern Mississippi has offered Hattiesburg's M.M. Roberts Stadium for its next game. The Golden Eagles are on the road that weekend at East Carolina.

"They think their community won't travel in mass to East Carolina, and would be respective and supportive of us being there," Dickson said. "Also, the Hammond group we were expecting, the indication was 5,000 to 10,000 were coming to New Orleans. And the drive (to Hattiesburg) is under two hours.

"The only part I'm uncertain about is I'm not sure how convenient it is for displaced New Orleanians. So we're weighing that against whatever we see happen this weekend in Shreveport."

Dickson also said his intent is to play at least one of Tulane's games in Mobile, Ala., at Ladd-Peebles Stadium.

"We just have to figure out the appropriate one," Dickson said. "We've always had a good following across the Gulf Coast. And it's still a two-hour drive from New Orleans. … Considering we're not at home, we have got to find the place that's most advantageous in all aspects. Not only for convenience but also at the gates. Those are two pieces that have to keep this account alive.

"(Tulane's players) know they're not going to be home. Rather than saying this one house is the next best thing to home, they're open to kind of being America's team, and going into environments that embrace them."

Hornets to visit shelter

The New Orleans Hornets announced Wednesday that owner George Shinn and six players will arrive in Baton Rouge on Thursday to visit three evacuation shelters.

"This is just the beginning of our commitment to provide relief to our family, friends and fans who have been affected by Hurricane Katrina," Shinn said. "New Orleans is our home, and we are focused on helping to rebuild and revitalize our great city."

Louisiana natives P.J. Brown and Brandon Bass will join J.R. Smith, Chris Paul, Chris Andersen and David West on the tour of the shelters.

The tour will begin at Destiny Baptist Church, located at 13855 Plank Road, from 11 a.m.-noon. From there, it will continue to Istrouma Baptist Church at 10500 Sam Rushing Road from 1 p.m.-2 p.m. The tour will conclude at the Baton Rouge Rivercenter at 275 South River Road from 3-4 p.m.

Shinn and the players will be delivering two tractor trailers full of goods (supplied by the National Basketball Players Association's Operation Rebound and Feed The Children), meeting with evacuees, signing autographs and posing for pictures at all three locations.

The NBPA will also be spearheading a relief effort tour in Mississippi on Thursday.

High school volleyball

Covington High volleyball coach Christine Beauvais said her squad will have a meeting at the school at 3 p.m. Monday. Please contact the school at (985) 892-3422 with any questions.

"Based on what I hope, maybe there's a way we could do that (return to the Arena sometime this season). I'd certainly love to do that. The way things are moving right now, that could be a great celebration of renewal for the city. It's very encouraging. The sense of optimism we're seeing now is lifting all of our spirits."

Mott said the Hornets have gleaned enough information from Oklahoma City, which is likely to host part of the Hornets' home season this year, along with Baton Rouge.

"I think we've got a good feeling about the opportunities there," Mott said. "We know about Oklahoma City. Now we've got to confirm where we are with Baton Rouge."

Of the two facilities in Baton Rouge, Mott said the priority would be to play at the PMAC, "because it's probably more ready for NBA games."

As part of a two-day visit, Mott and his staff will also be touring potential practice facilities as well as investigating corporate housing for employees and possible office space.

FROM JACKSON SQUARE, BUSH FOCUSES ON REBUILDING

'There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans'

STAFF PHOTO BY DAVID GRUNFELD

Standing alone in front of St. Louis Cathedral, President Bush on Thursday vowed to the state and the nation that the federal government would make a massive commitment to rebuild the Gulf Coast region.

By John McQuaid
Staff writer

President Bush fixed his gaze on the future of New Orleans Thursday night in a prime-time speech to the nation from the city's high ground in Jackson Square, saying that the federal government would "do what it takes … stay as long as it takes" to rebuild the city and the storm-shattered Gulf region.

"All who question the future of the Crescent City need to know: There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again," Bush said, standing with the St. Louis Cathedral and the statue of Andrew Jackson as a backdrop.

Visiting the city for the third time since Hurricane Katrina struck Aug. 29, Bush is seeking to find his voice and political footing in the midst of heavy criticism about the government's post-storm recovery efforts. The confused and halting federal response in the aftermath of the hurricane as anarchy erupted in the flooded city has helped drive his popularity to the lowest levels of his presidency.

Bush acknowledged the disaster response problems, but focused mainly on the enormous tasks ahead: cleaning up, rebuilding and resettling the region and planning better to deal with future catastrophes.

The White House and Congress have loosened the purse strings in the aftermath of Katrina, already approving $62.3 billion in federal funds for the post-disaster cleanup and rebuilding. Before it's done, the figure is expected to exceed $200 billion, far above the federal price tag of any disaster in the nation's history.

Some critics have questioned if the government knows what it is doing dispensing so much money so quickly – and especially whether the small and beleaguered Federal Emergency Management Agency, which will administer much of the aid and reconstruction contracts, has the resources to handle so much cash.

New Orleans businesses and residents can begin returning to four unflooded parts of the city on a staggered schedule that begins this weekend for some, Mayor Ray Nagin announced Thursday.

"It's a good day in New Orleans," Nagin said at a morning news conference. "The sun is shining. We're bringing New Orleans back and this is our first step. This city will start to breathe again."

The announcement followed the release Wednesday of tests by the Environmental Protection Agency that found air quality satisfactory in the city, but high concentrations of pollutants in lingering floodwaters and the mud left behind after they recede.

BATON ROUGE — In an attempt to force insurance companies to cover billions of dollars in hurricane damage instead of foisting it on the federal government, a group of 15 families from the New Orleans area filed suit Thursday asking a state judge to rule that any flooding from Katrina should be covered by homeowners policies.

The class-action lawsuit, which does not seek any monetary damages, came amid a chorus of complaints from state lawmakers

HANO relocates to Houston to place La. residents

By Laura Maggi and Robert Travis Scott

BATON ROUGE — As the federal government begins moving 200,000 mobile housing units into Louisiana for Hurricane Katrina evacuees, the Housing Authority of New Orleans has relocated temporarily to Houston and is placing thousands of former city residents who receive public housing assistance into homes throughout Texas.

The events highlight the social and economic challenges of returning families and workers to New Orleans, as local and federal authorities struggle to meet the immediate housing needs of displaced citizens while hoping as many as possible can move back to the city in the long term.

At least 5,000 former Orleans Parish residents who fled to Houston are getting housing assistance, either in public housing developments or from so-called Section 8 vouchers that help people pay for housing in private homes or apartments, said Adonis Expose, director of communications for HANO.

The housing assistance is a federal benefit that people can take with them when they move, and Expose said HANO is having success finding housing for those people in a number of Texas cities.

"The reality is, if they're doing better where they are, they're probably not coming back," Expose said.

That potential outcome chills some local politicians. State Sen.

La. treasurer says local governments may default

Lost tax revenue risky, he warns

By Jan Moller
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — State Treasurer John Kennedy said Thursday that although he is confident the state can remain fiscally solvent in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, he is not as confident that local governments can weather the loss of tax revenue.

"The real challenge in the state of Louisiana is going to be local government," Kennedy said as the state Bond Commission convened for the first time since the storm hit Aug. 29.

Local governments in the areas affected by Katrina owe a combined $8.1 billion in bond debt, Kennedy said, only $4 billion of which is covered by insurance. "I cannot guarantee you that there will not be defaults at the local government level," he said.

Any city or parish that wants to file for bankruptcy must first get permission from the Bond Commission, Kennedy said.

Kennedy said he has proposed to the National Bond Lawyers Association and the state's congressional delegation that a pool of federal money be established for local governments that are in danger of defaulting on debt payments. That proposal could be included as part of a broad relief package the delegation is crafting.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said earlier this week that the city is essentially broke, even though it's expected to receive $102 million in Federal Emergency Management Agency money this week for overtime and equipment costs associated with the storm.

Kennedy also is working with Gov. Kathleen Blanco's office on a proposal that would enable Louisiana banks certified by the U.S. Small Business Administration to be designated as "preferred" lenders, which would speed the flow of government-guaranteed loans to businesses affected by the storm.

Although the state budget is preparing for a big storm-related hit as much of its New Orleans-area tax base receded with the floodwater, Kennedy said the $387 million in the state's rainy-day fund, along with two lines of credit worth $200 million each, will be enough to avert bankruptcy.

Credit-rating agencies on Wall Street are paying close attention to see whether the state can pay its bond obligations, and they put Louisiana on a "watch list" shortly after the storm.

State officials are still weeks away from determining how much tax revenue will be lost due to Katrina. Charles Castille, undersecretary of the Department of Health and Hospitals, said the agency won't have a rough estimate until Oct. 1 on how the $5.3 billion Medicaid budget will be affected, and it likely will be several weeks after that before the agency has more definitive projections.

Castille said he expects the state will see higher-than-projected health care costs for the month of September due to storm-related illness and injuries, and a rush of new applicants for public assistance. After that, however, "I think you'll see a decline (in costs) because of the mass migration of Medicaid recipients to other states."

But it's too soon to tell whether that will be enough to offset the loss of tax revenue from the New Orleans area.

"We just don't know," he said.

Katrina tax relief passes House, Senate

Bills expected to cost $82 billion over 10 years

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — The U.S. House and Senate passed tax-relief bills Thursday in the continuing barrage of legislation aimed at helping victims of Hurricane Katrina. Yet the partisan bickering still rages over how to handle the post-storm investigation.

Estimated to cost $82 billion over 10 years, the tax bills were passed unanimously by the House and Senate, and contain minor differences that will have to be reconciled. Both chambers waived tax penalties on early withdrawal from 401(k) retirement accounts, created tax deductions for those housing evacuees and businesses willing to hire them, and approved tax incentives for charitable giving to relief and recovery efforts.

"This can't come soon enough," Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, chairman of the tax-writing Finance Committee. "We need to get these tax incentives on the books and help people make a fresh start."

Grassley and Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., also are pushing legislation estimated to cost $5 billion to $7 billion to extend health insurance coverage, including mental health care, to storm victims by loosening Medicaid eligibility rules. They are hoping for a vote this week.

The flurry of activity on Capitol Hill coincides with President Bush's fourth visit to the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast since the storm hit Aug. 29. The president addressed the nation Thursday night from Jackson Square in New Orleans. A separate congressional delegation is expected to visit today.

The Senate was expected to pass a House-approved bill to ease the 30-hours-per-week requirement for welfare benefits. And senators approved amendments creating housing vouchers worth $600 a month for six months for displaced storm victims and granted a year-long extension for the repayment of loans to the Small Business Administration.

Passage of the parallel tax packages were cheered by Louisiana lawmakers, who unveiled their own wish list for helping the state recover from the storm, which displaced hundreds of thousands of people. The ambitious seven-page outline includes tax relief, but also looks down the road to rebuilding parts of southeastern Louisiana swamped in Katrina's aftermath.

"Right now, we're transitioning from immediate issues of saving lives to long-term issues of rebuilding, including rebuilding the job base," Sen. David Vitter, R-La., said.

The rebuilding plan, called Project Pelican, seeks an array of assistance from the federal government, including $14 billion to repair the state's eroding coastline, $20 billion to improve levees, money to rebuild 150 schools damaged by the storm, financial assistance for virtually every sector of Louisiana's agricultural economy, $50 billion in community development block grants to construct new housing, and tax incentives to restore local businesses and attract new ones. The delegation already has filed some of the legislation, but the bulk of it will come next week, members said.

One of the bigger-ticket items is a request to have the federal government pick up 100 percent of the relief and recovery costs associated with the storm, which many in Congress are estimating will top $200 billion for Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. President Bush granted a waiver in the days after the storm committing the Treasury to paying all storm costs for 60 days. The Louisiana delegation wants to extend it to three years.

Congress already has approved $62.3 billion in emergency relief and recovery assistance to Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. An additional emergency appropriation is expected next month, although details have not been hammered out.

"This unprecedented national disaster requires an unprecedented national response," Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said.

Louisiana lawmakers aren't the only ones lobbying for Katrina-related federal financing. The National Trust for Historic Preservation wants Congress to create a $60 million grant program to help owners of historically significant buildings rebuild. As talk increasingly turns to redeveloping New Orleans, preservationists are worried that historic buildings that may have sustained wind or water damage will be bulldozed.

Group President Richard Moe said teams have been dispatched, mainly to New Orleans, to assess the damage.

"We're concerned about any unnecessary demolition of historic buildings," Moe said. "That has been the pattern in the past with disasters."

The bipartisan good will on display over passage of the tax bills does not extend to the investigation into the bungled government response to Hurricane Katrina.

Democrats continued to object to a Republican-backed plan to form a bipartisan committee to look into the failures by local, state and federal governments. The committee would reflect the partisan divide in Congress, which means it would be dominated by Republicans. Democrats say they won't participate in any investigation that isn't evenly balanced between the two parties. They have called instead for an independent commission like the one that looked into the intelligence failures surrounding the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Jefferson staffer says she was subpoenaed

Grand jury probing Nigerian telecom deal

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — A staffer for U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, notified the House of Representatives on Thursday that she had been subpoenaed by a northern Virginia grand jury investigating business deals connected to the congressman.

Angelle Kwemo, a legislative assistant to Jefferson, was required to make the disclosure under House rules. She didn't provide any further details.

In a brief phone call, Kwemo declined to comment and quickly hung up.

The U.S. Department of Justice is investigating Jefferson in connection with a telecommunications deal he was trying to arrange in Nigeria, according to those familiar with the case. The probe came to light Aug. 3 when the FBI raided the congressman's homes and, according to published reports, carted off cash from a freezer.

Jefferson has declined to comment.

Kwemo's name first surfaced in August in subpoenas seeking a broad array of documents relating to Jefferson and a Kentucky-based telecommunications firm, iGate Corp. The firm sought the congressman's help in breaking into the fast-expanding high-speed Internet market in Nigeria. The grand jury has been impanelled in Alexandria, Va., a Washington suburb.

Jefferson hired Kwemo, a native of Cameroon, in July. She holds a law degree from a French university and an advanced law degree from American University, and spent five years as a corporate lawyer in Africa, according to a biography provided by Jefferson's office. She also has worked with AIDS activist groups.

On Aug. 3, the FBI also raided the Maryland home of Nigerian Vice President Atiku Abubakar, seeking documents connecting him and his wife, Jennifer, to the congressman and the telecommunications deal. Jennifer Abubakar, a graduate student at American University, founded the Gede Foundation in Washington, D.C., to combat AIDS in African and other developing countries.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco

Blanco rebuts ex-FEMA chief's criticism

She defends La. storm response

By Laura Maggi
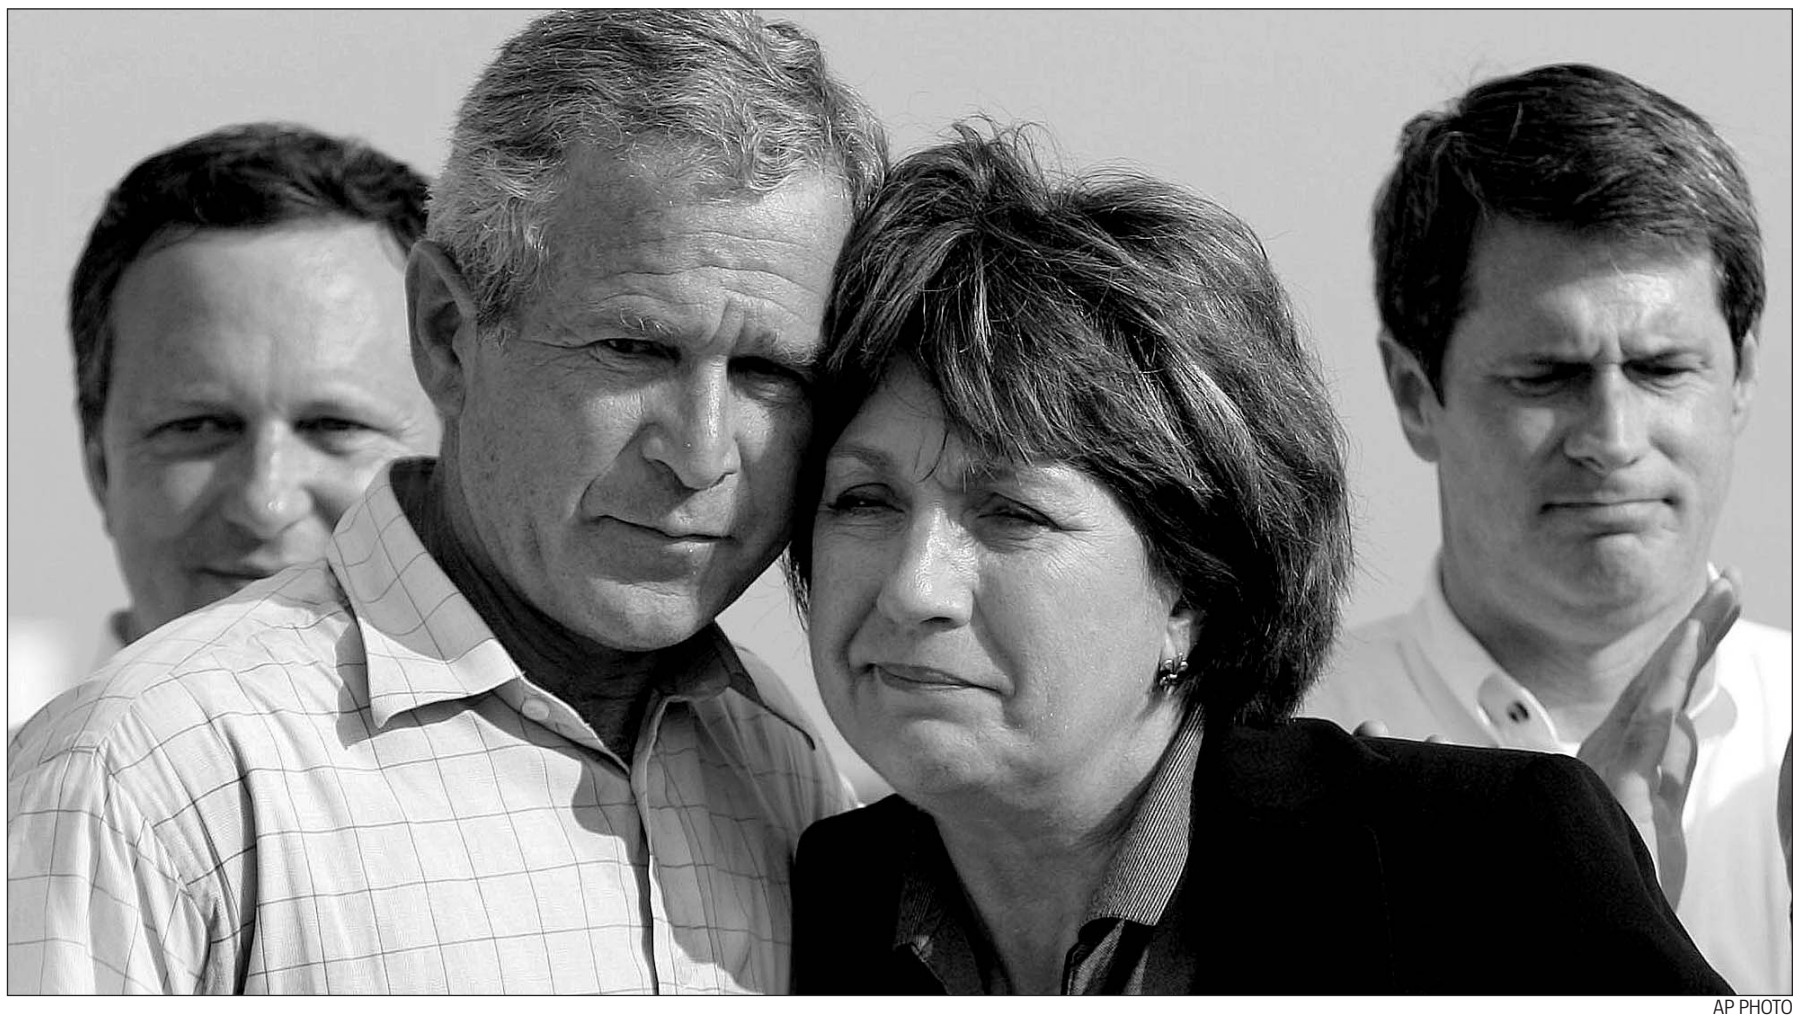
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Gov. Kathleen Blanco sharply disputed criticism Thursday by the former chief of the Federal Emergency Management Agency that Blanco and her staff were incapable of mounting an effective response when the agency came to help with the unfolding disaster wrought by Hurricane Katrina.

"The simple fact is that we needed something as simple and basic as buses delivered in a timely fashion from FEMA in order to save lives. They didn't do that," Blanco said in a written statement rebutting comments made by former FEMA chief Michael Brown in an interview with The New York Times.



"The president addressed that issue when he removed Mr. Brown, and I thank him for that," Blanco said.

Blanco has repeatedly sparred with FEMA over storm-response issues, even after Brown was removed from overseeing the federal relief effort along the Gulf Coast almost a week ago. Brown later resigned as FEMA chief.

The governor has questioned the pace of certain activities, and she recently said the effort to recover bodies from the disaster area has been too sluggish.

In the newspaper interview, Brown described Louisiana leaders as overwhelmed by the tasks before them, saying they couldn't even tell him what they needed on the ground in New Orleans and the surrounding area. "I never received specific requests for specific things that needed doing," he said.

Blanco's communication director, Bob Mann, said Blanco was frustrated that Brown and his FEMA staff needed to be told exactly what assistance the state required at a time when southeast Louisiana was deluged with flooding and New Orleans was becoming increasingly violent.

In an address to the Legislature on Wednesday night, Blanco said mistakes were made on every level of government and that the state would need to examine its own actions. "As your governor, I take full responsibility," she said.

In their reflections on the first few days after the storm, Blanco and her staff have acknowledged they needed federal assistance and couldn't handle the surmounting problems on their own.

Brown's account of a Blanco administration in disarray from the moment that the storm hit the Louisiana coast Aug. 29 does not jibe with a statement that he made at a Baton Rouge press conference the day the storm came ashore. "What I've seen here today is a team that is very tight-knit, working closely together, being very professional, and in my humble opinion making the right calls," Brown said.

Blanco is not the only public official Brown criticized in the interview. The former emergency chief suggested the secretary of Homeland Security and the White House chief of staff did not understand the significance of what was unfolding in Louisiana. Brown recounted numerous frantic phone calls to Michael Chertoff, the Homeland Security chief, and Andrew Card, the White House chief of staff.

A spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security told the Times that the agency did everything it could in the days after the storm.

La. wants to speed up restoration plans

Fast track sought for federal permits

By Bob Marshall
Staff writer

Saying Hurricane Katrina has provided all the cost-benefit analysis the nation should require, Louisiana officials are asking the federal government to provide emergency financing and fast-track permitting for a $34 billion hurricane protection and coastal restoration plan that would cover southeast Louisiana from the Pearl River basin to Morgan City.

Officials with the state Department of Natural Resources said the plan includes a system of levees tall enough to withstand the 20-foot storm surges expected with a Category 5 hurricane. It also envisions floodgates at natural passes such as the Rigolets and Chef Menteur, as well as manmade waterways. The project would include integrating some levees and gates already in place but would require construction of miles of new levees as well as rebuilding of many current levees.

That work would incorporate the $14 billion plan for coastal restoration the state already had been pushing in Congress with little success.

"This is a comprehensive plan to accomplish both crucial goals simultaneously: protect New Orleans from future flooding, and reconstruct the coast to help in that job," said Sidney Coffee, Gov. Kathleen Blanco's executive assistant for coastal activities. "They go hand-in-hand. You can't do one and not the other.

"Just as importantly, we have to start now. We're not saying we can get all this done tomorrow, but we are saying we have to start tomorrow. We can't wait the five years it can take for the Corps (of Engineers) to do a cost-benefit analysis. We told them for years what a bargain this would be. Now I think they can see our plans were pretty darn cost-effective compared to what the costs are now."

Randy Hanchey, assistant secretary of DNR, said the state made the proposal to its congressional delegation, the Bush administration and the office of the Secretary of the Army, which commands the corps. He said the emphasis is on the following areas:

- Immediate financing of the $32 billion plan, plus enhanced revenues for the state from offshore oil and gas royalties to maintain the system once the work is completed.
- Putting the project under the oversight of the Mississippi River Commission so that control would include civilian governments, not just the Army Corps of Engineers.
- Congressional waivers for many federal planning regulations to speed implementation, specifically for cost-benefit analysis studies that take as long as five years. The state would not seek waivers from environmental requirements, he said.
- Assurances that the state would be involved in the implementation of the plan.

With Washington already pledging almost $100 billion in aid to the storm-damaged region, financing seemed less of a concern to state officials than the speed with which the plan could be implemented.

"We've been telling people in Washington for years we don't have time to wait; now they can see for themselves why time wasn't on our side," Coffee said. "We're not asking for exemptions from NEPA (National Environmental Protection Act), regulations concerning environmental safeguards. We want all those in place. But we can't wait the average of 10 years it takes to get a single project online."

Hanchey said the state would ask for the same streamlining of regulations that was granted to New York City after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. "Washington allowed them to streamline things and get work done quickly, because it was important not just to New York, but to the nation," Hanchey said. "We're in that same situation here."

The hurricane protection portion of the plan contains a corps proposal first made in the 1980s called the "barrier plan," because it would use levees and floodgates in an attempt to keep storm surges out of the region. It originally drew objections from fish and wildlife officials as well as environmental groups who were concerned that the barriers would block the flow of marine life in and out of estuaries. Hanchey said the revived barrier plan would include modifications to accommodate that flow.

Mark Davis, executive director of the Coalition to Restore Coastal Louisiana, said he did not expect opposition from the environmental community because typically it has supported Louisiana coastal projects even thought they seldom earned a cost-efficient rating on traditional government scales.

"I think they'll be concerned, but ultimately supportive," Davis said. "Look, an accountant might have looked at actuarial tables and said it wasn't cost-efficient to have levees to protect against a Category 5 storm because the odds of that hitting the area were slim, and the odds of it overtopping levees even if it hit were slim as well.

"Now we know even that remote possibility makes protection cost-efficient."

Two Norco refineries resume operations

Flaring at Motiva signals startup

By Jenny Hurwitz
River Parishes bureau

Two major St. Charles Parish refineries are up and running at full or nearly full capacities after about two weeks of stalled and limited operations brought on by facility damages and power outages resulting from Hurricane Katrina.

While Norco, where both refineries are located, escaped the catastrophic damage felt in some areas, both plants shut down entirely, due in part to flooding and other damage inflicted by the storm. They have only recently resumed normal operations, according to spokespeople from both plants.

At its height, Hurricane Katrina knocked out 10 refineries representing 25 percent of the nation's refining capacity, said Sharon Dey, director of communications for the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association, based in Washington, D.C.

As of Thursday, four refineries, representing 5 percent of the total U.S. refining capacity, remain shut indefinitely, Dey said.

"We took a very strong blow to that region," she said. "I can't speculate on how long it would be — it could be a couple months before they're back up," she said.

In St. Charles Parish, the Valero Norco Refinery, which has a 260,000 barrel-per-day capacity, was operating at maximum capacity as of Thursday, Valero spokesman Ron Guillory said. And the Motiva St. Charles Refining plant, with a 240,000 barrel-per-day capacity, was nearing capacity Thursday, said Darci Sinclair, senior media relations specialist with Shell.

A third, smaller refinery, Shell Chemical in St. Rose, also was damaged but should be back up soon, although Sinclair was not able to say when. That plant produces 55,000 barrels per day.

The Valero plant sustained flooding in certain areas and minor structural damage to a holding tank, Guillory said.

But the main reasons for stalled operations were a lack of electricity and staffing, he said.

At Motiva St. Charles, frequent flaring – often seen as large flames from smokestacks - has been occurring as part of the start-up procedure, Sinclair said. That flaring, which enables the plant to burn excess fuel, will continue for the duration of the start-up sequence. Sinclair could not say how long it would last.

While the refineries in St. Charles Parish appear to be regrouping, industry analysts say the effects of the storm are continuing to affect consumers at the pump.

Safe houses vital for pump crews, Jeff says

Communications also near top of list

By Sheila Grissett
East Jefferson bureau

Jefferson Parish officials want to start the 2006 hurricane season with "safe houses" to shelter drainage station crews from deadly winds and storm surges so they can keep the pumps operating during tropical storms and other heavy rains.

Design of the safe houses began this summer. But that was no help during Hurricane Katrina, when the crews at Jefferson's 18 major pump stations were evacuated to the north shore for more than 24 hours as part of the administration's new "doomsday plan" to safeguard critical equipment and essential personnel in the event of a Category 4 or 5 hurricane.

"I think those safe houses, as well as improved communications, will be very high on our agenda," said Parish Councilman Louis

Congemi, who estimated that 50 percent of the homes in his district, which includes much of Kenner and parts of Metairie, flooded.

Parish officials said they don't know how long the drainage pumps were off during and after Katrina. A loss of power knocked out computer telemetry.

But a timeline pieced together during discussions with evacuees and representatives of several government agencies indicates that the pumps might have been down from Aug. 28 at about 7 p.m., when the crews were evacuated, until they returned and began restarting the pumps late on Aug. 29 and early the next morning. The eye of Katrina, a strong Category 4 hurricane, passed over the Gulf Coast the morning of Aug. 29.

Congemi and East Jefferson Levee District personnel, who didn't evacuate, agree that street flooding began Aug. 29 after sunrise and gradually increased. Residents in some Metairie and Kenner neighborhoods began reporting home flooding late that afternoon.

"It's sad to say, but maybe this disaster is what it takes to get the federal government to realize that they can't keep turning a cold shoulder when we tell them we have to have more flood control projects and coastal restoration and our pump-to-the-river project that will put some of this water into the Mississippi River, so that it doesn't have to all flow north to these pump stations on Lake Pontchartrain," Congemi said.

Congemi said he thinks that flooding might have been aggravated by the pumps being off while operators were evacuated. But he said some flooding was inevitable.

"It's just a shame that things were difficult to get our operators back to the pump stations," he said.

"But I understand the need to protect them. The pump houses we have now aren't made to stand up to these storms ... which brings us back to why we need to get these safe houses built."

Pump operators staff and run the giant drainage machinery that moves water out of interior canals, over levees and into larger water bodies such as Lake Pontchartrain. They were among a caravan of some 1,500 people – key parish personnel and their families – who were evacuated to several shelters in Washington Parish, including a school in Mount Vernon.

Parish President Aaron Broussard, Chief Administrative Assistant Tim Whitmer, Emergency Operations Director Walter Maestri and an assortment of other high-level administration staffers were among the 20 or so who stayed behind in the bunker-like Emergency Operations Center in Marrero. Parish Council members hunkered down in a variety of locations on both sides of the Mississippi River, including East Jefferson General Hospital in Metairie and West Jefferson Medical Center in Marrero.

Sheltering some in Washington Parish may have saved their lives, Broussard said, and it also ensured there were officials available to pick up the reins of government had Katrina shifted westward and obliterated Jefferson Parish.

"A government deliberately placed in exile can come back," Broussard said.

Administration officials said it's too soon to start second-guessing how the lack of pumps might have aggravated flooding north of Interstate 10 between the St. Charles Parish line and Causeway Boulevard area.

"The parish president made the decision that he wouldn't risk the lives of the pump station operators, and we evacuated those people to the shelter closest to us," Maestri said. "You want to know who's responsible for the flooding? Katrina's responsible."

But everyone agrees that the pump operators were unable to return quickly to their stations, because Katrina did widespread damage where they were sheltered in Washington Parish.

"This was such a devastating storm that the north shore was damaged," Broussard said. "Giant trees were down everywhere. Live electrical wires were dangling about the building. Communications went out. I couldn't even get a helicopter to get them back because the winds were too high."

Jefferson Parish drainage pump operators and levee district employees cut trees and clear debris and power lines from Louisiana 25 on Aug. 29. The crews stayed in Washington Parish when the storm hit, then hacked their way back to the Jefferson pumping stations on the south shore.

Ultimately, it was East and West Jefferson Levee District personnel who helped bulldoze, chop and hack out a path along rural Washington Parish roads blocked by huge trees, fallen utility lines and storm debris.

"We had no communication, and it looked like a tornado had been through where we were," said parish Drainage Director Kazem

Alikhani, who accompanied his pump station workers back to Jefferson.

"We had a bulldozer in front of us. We had a chainsaw, and we had a parish electrician who was dealing with the fallen lines," he said. "And when we finally got to the Causeway bridge, we had to wait until it was inspected ... and then we had to convoy all these operators across because of damage."

On Aug. 29 at around 9:15 p.m., the east bank pump operators were picked up at the Causeway's south toll plaza by East Jefferson Levee District President Pat Bossetta and the district's police chief, Rocky Daigle, driving a 2½-ton truck.

"Rocky and I delivered them to their pump stations, but we were driving through two to seven feet of water to do it," Bossetta said. "The only way we could differentiate between water and road was the telephone poles. The people in the back of the truck were using flashlights to spot for us. It was truly wild."

By Aug. 30 at 3:30 A.M., Bossetta said, they had delivered personnel to four pump stations. He said soldiers carried workers to the last two east bank stations. Alikhani said National Guard personnel weren't able to collect West Jefferson pump operators from the bridge until about midnight.

Despite serious damage to several pump stations, Alikhani said, all east bank pumps are now working. In West Jefferson, he said, 95 percent of the pumps are up and running.

Federal contracting center to move back to city

About 2,400 employed at two facilities

By Keith Darcé
Business writer

Two federal contracting facilities that employ about 2,400 people in New Orleans plan to move back to the city once their buildings are repaired, spokesmen with the facilities said Thursday.

Neither of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's National Finance Center in eastern New Orleans nor the Navy's Space and Naval Warfare Systems Center on the lakefront campus of the University of New Orleans appeared to have suffered significant damage from Hurricane Katrina and the flooding that followed the storm, the spokesmen said.

Plans to return the centers to New Orleans are a boost to the fast-growing effort to restore major portions of the region's storm-crippled economy.

But at least one state official wants the assurances in writing.

State Rep. Steve Scalise, R-Metairie, said Congress should insert language into legislation requiring the Agriculture Department and the Navy to restore their centers fully in New Orleans.

"These large federal employers have created a lot of high-paying jobs for the region, and they are a hub to help small businesses grow. There should not be any question about whether they will come back," Scalise said.

"We need to make sure that other states don't cannibalize our businesses. We don't mind if they give help in our time of need, but we want the (centers) to come back," he said.

For the time being, many of the workers at the two centers have relocated temporarily to offices in other cities in Louisiana and other states.

About 400 of the finance center's 1,400 workers have set up shop near Dallas and in Philadelphia, agriculture department spokesman Ed Loyd said.

On Monday, the workers processed paychecks for 564,000 federal employees, he said. "That's a major testament to the employees. Some of them literally only have a suitcase with them, and they still have been working to get this done."

The finance center, located at NASA's Michoud Assembly Facility, performs administrative support work under contract to numerous federal agencies, such as the Department of Labor and the Coast Guard.

Many of the 1,000 workers at the Navy center, which operates personnel and pay systems for the military, now are working in Pensacola, Fla.; Fort Worth, Texas; Millington, Tenn.; and Washington, D.C., said Navy spokesman Lt. Ohene Gyapong.

Others workers have remained closer to home.

Apogen Technologies, one of the main contractors at the Navy center, has relocated a portion of its 172 New Orleans workers to temporary offices in Baton Rouge, company spokeswoman Piper Conrad said.

Workers from both centers eventually will return to New Orleans, possibly as soon as the end of the year.

"It's going to be a long process to get (the finance center) back up and running again. We are prepared to operate elsewhere for the first couple of months," Loyd said.

At UNO, a team of contractors already is working on the Navy center's building, Gyapong said. The center's commanding officer, Capt. Fred Mingo, is hoping to be back in the facility before Jan. 1, the spokesman said.

JOEY DIFATTA, parish council chairman

St. Bernard reveals staged re-entry plan

Residents to visit starting Saturday

By Manuel Torres
St. Bernard bureau

St. Bernard Parish residents aching to see what Hurricane Katrina left of their homes will get their chance beginning Saturday, under a plan for a staggered re-entry that will divide the parish into sections and give every resident a date to return by Sept. 30.

Residents will be allowed to stay during the next two weeks, and possibly longer, Parish Council Chairman Joey DiFatta said Thursday, as officials revealed the plan.

But officials said most people will not want to "rough it" in a parish where Katrina submerged almost all structures under as much as 20 feet of water and everything remains covered in a cake-like layer of foul-smelling muck.

"They can stay at their house if they want. But what are they going to stay on? The muck?" DiFatta said. "Anything you can touch is nasty."

The much-awaited re-entry plan will break St. Bernard into seven areas and give residents in each section a two-day window to return.

Areas of south Arabi and Chalmette along the Mississippi River will be the first to reopen at daylight Saturday, and residents of other areas to the north and eastern parts of the parish will be allowed to return in the following days.

Officials, however, said residents should come prepared to face harsh conditions and a lack of basic public services, which have yet to be restored. Streets will be cleared of muck and other storm debris, including flooded vehicles and leveled homes, by the time residents stream in. But mud and debris will litter curbs and lawns.

The parish has no electricity, no telephone service, and no trash pick up. The water treatment plant is working, but water pressure is low, so many areas won't have water. Officials said residents, who must show a driver's license with a St. Bernard address to enter, need to bring food and enough gasoline to leave the parish.

Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez has asked residents to bring rubber boots, gloves and protective masks. He has also urged them not to bring children.

The days for re-entry into each section of the parish are as follows:

— Saturday and Sunday: Arabi and Chalmette neighborhoods extending from Jackson Barracks to Paris Road, and from St. Bernard Highway to the Mississippi River.

— Sept. 19 and 20: Areas of Arabi and Chalmette from Jackson Barracks to Paris Road, and from Judge Perez Drive to St. Bernard Highway.

— Sept. 21 and 22: Areas of Chalmette and Meraux from Paris Road to the Violet Canal, and from Judge Perez Drive to the Mississippi River.

— Sept. 23 and 24: All areas north of Judge Perez Drive from Jackson Barracks to Paris Road.

— Sept. 25 and 26: All areas north of Judge Perez Drive from Paris Road to Palmisano Boulevard.

— Sept. 27 to 28: All areas north of Judge Perez Drive from Palmisano Boulevard to the Violet Canal.

— Sept. 29 and 30: All remaining areas south and east of the Violet Canal.

Residents who miss the dates specified for their neighborhoods won't be able to enter the parish until Sept. 30. The parish also may ask all residents to leave by Oct. 1, officials said, if repair crews have not made "significant progress" in restoring utilities. Evacuating the parish once again would accelerate that work, the parish said.

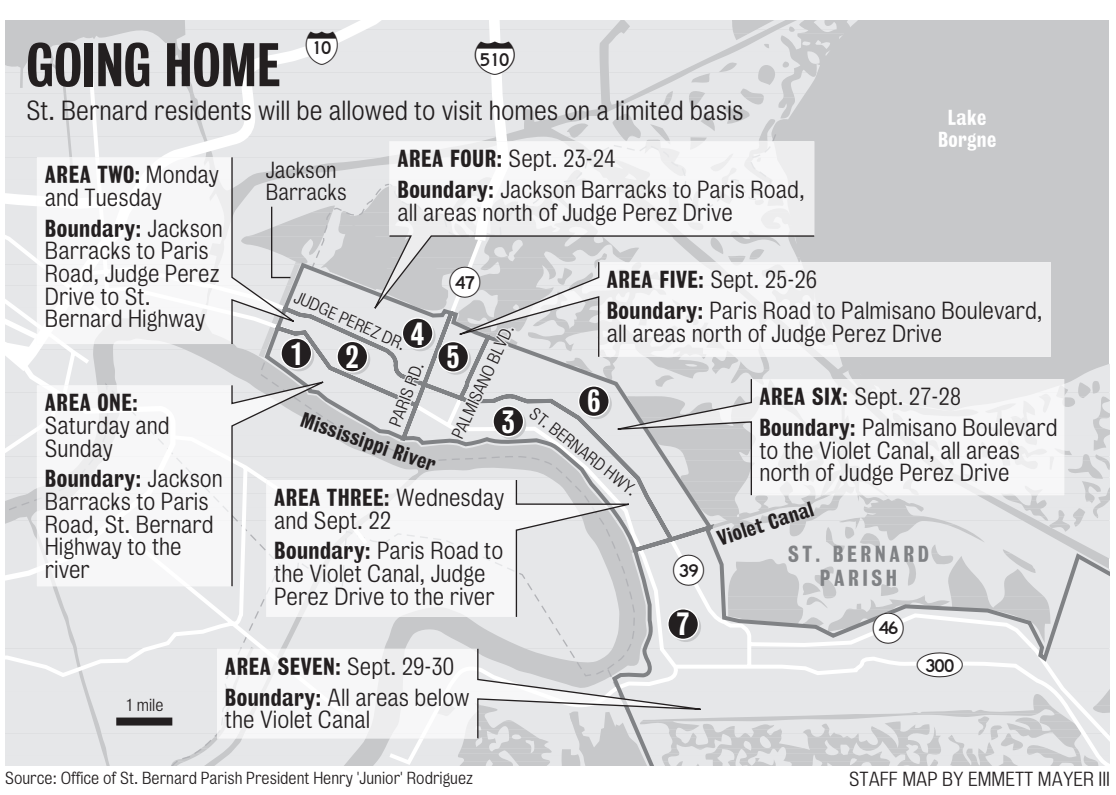
The re-entry plan includes areas of Chalmette affected by an oil spill from the Murphy Oil refinery in Meraux. But DiFatta said officials with the Environmental Protection Agency have given preliminary indication that an ongoing cleanup will let residents enter the area by the time those sections are reopened.

Those planning to return may face another obstacle: finding a way to reach the parish. The two access roads from Orleans Parish, St. Claude and Claiborne avenues, remain closed because of flooding and security restrictions in Orleans Parish, DiFatta said. The main re-entry point will be Paris Road, accessible from Interstate 10 and Chef Menteur Highway via I-510.

The I-10 twin span from New Orleans east to Slidell was damaged during the storm and remain closed. But St. Bernard officials said the Louisiana 11 bridge is working.

DiFatta said they also are seeking an alternate route by reopening ferry service from Chalmette to Algiers, though as of Thursday he did not know whether the ferry would be available by Saturday.

Officials said the St. Bernard Parish Sheriff's Office will enforce a nighttime curfew.



A cormorant covered in oil walks across the top of a levee in St. Bernard Parish. Oil spilled from Murphy Oil in Meraux during the hurricane and inundated blocks of houses. The parish has no electricity, no telephone service, and no trash pick up. The water treatment plant is working, but water pressure is low, so many areas won't have water.

Nearly three weeks after Hurricane Katrina struck, crews retrieve oil from a canal near Meraux in St. Bernard Parish, using a device that separates oil from water. Parish officials say residents will soon be able to return, but they said people shouldn't 'rough it' in a devastated place where most structures were submerged.

Crews rewiring Uptown, restoring power

Myriad trucks join systematic effort

By David Meeks
Staff writer

STAFF PHOTOS BY ALEX BRANDON

Crews work Thursday to restore power on Chestnut Street at Napoleon Avenue. Dozens of trucks lined neighborhood streets as workers began rewiring and bringing blocks back online, house by house.

Kerry White of Tomball, Texas, left, signals to a colleague. Workers said the area's electricity equipment is outdated, but they will check every house and restore power at each one, where it's possible.

Moving block to block, pole to pole and, finally, house to house, the rewiring of Uptown is under way, and an army of electrical trucks are working streets where for the past two weeks National Guardsmen cleared trees and inventoried the downed lines.

Mayor Ray Nagin has announced a plan to allow residents into Uptown starting Monday, and the crews are working furiously to ensure that those New Orleanians cleared will return to fully powered homes.

CenterPoint Energy of Houston arrived like a brigade Thursday morning, lining up dozens of trucks on neighborhood streets to begin a systematic approach to restoring electricity that is as simple as one might think: Start at the nearest power station and get started, one house at a time.

"The first thing we worry about is safety. Some of these lines are hot, some are not, and we have to tell our folks which precautions to take. We've got to do it house to house," said Butch Barger, a CenterPoint manager in charge of the crews that worked Thursday in the neighborhood bounded by the Mississippi River to St. Charles, and Jefferson to Napoleon avenues.

Surveying the work to be done from the corner of Robert and Laurel streets, Barger said, "As far as hurricane damage, this is about the worst that's ever been – and this isn't even one of the hard-hit areas. We haven't even seen those. But we spent 53 days in Florida last year with all those hurricanes, and it wasn't nearly as bad as this damage."

Teams were working in one direction away from the river and one-way parallel to Tchoupitoulas, and Barger said progress depends on the level of destruction on each block. Getting the lines hooked to each house is a slow process, he said, but his company checks every house, not just the infrastructure.

"You'd be surprised – the smaller the stuff, the longer it takes," he said. "But we're one of the few companies that, when we leave, no one has to come behind us. If the customer's house can take service, it will have service."

Barger said crews will try to reattach meters if they were pulled loose but weren't damaged. Only those homes with severely damaged meters won't have power restored right away, he said.

"Even then, we'll run the lines right up to the meter but fold them back and tape them off so they can be hooked up once it is fixed," he said.

Although many downed lines might seem beyond repair, most can be spliced together and reused, he said. More time consuming is damage to the cross arms on the poles which, in the area where the teams were working, are wooden and more prone to shattering during a storm.

Every broken wooden cross arm has to be removed and replaced with a new one, which must be completely rewired. In other cities, utilities have changed to steel cross arms, which can better withstand wind and, even if they are pulled loose, usually can be reattached with their wiring intact.

"This stuff here is old, really old," said James Kohler, a CenterPoint worker from Sugarland, Texas, who was moving methodically with his crew up Robert Street. "A lot of the stuff that's here, we don't even use anymore. In Sugarland where I'm from, 80 percent of our stuff is underground."

Worker Tony Loivas said, "An upgrade here would help."

The crews work from ZIP code maps, and Barger estimated it takes from a day to three days to restore power in a typical neighborhood bounded by major thoroughfares, depending on the level of damage. The quick work is a product of so many trucks coming in to each neighborhood, he said.

Barger said he has worked in the aftermath of disasters all over the South, but never in New Orleans. "I've been here many times, but never for storm duty," he said.

Asked whether he'd be back once the city recovers, Barger didn't hesitate. "Oh yeah. I'll definitely come back."

Return will be determined by location

NAGIN, from A-1

The waters contain very high levels of coliform bacteria, an indicator of human fecal matter, but Kevin Stephens, the city's health director, said that was "the only significant health care concern" for returning citizens.

The mayor's "repopulation" plan calls for allowing business owners in Algiers, the French Quarter, Uptown and Central Business District areas to begin returning to the city Saturday.

Algiers will be reopened to residents Monday, Nagin said, followed on Wednesday by residents of Uptown's 70115 ZIP code district. On Sept. 22, a week from today, residents of the 70118 ZIP code, also Uptown, will be allowed to return.

Residents of the French Quarter will be allowed back a week from Monday, he said. Nagin cited the area's density and historic value in saying that the return of residents to the Quarter was being delayed so that wiring could be "double- and triple-checked" before the electricity is turned back on. The hope is to ensure that "if a fire breaks out, we won't lose a significant amount of what we cherish in this city," Nagin said.

Environmental experts expressed concern that EPA testing is incomplete and that health hazards may persist. The air sampling to date has been from overflights used for screening purposes that then require follow-up monitoring.

EPA collects data and leaves to local officials any decision on whether to repopulate a given area, said Elizabeth Sweeney, spokeswoman for EPA's Dallas regional office.

Former Xavier University toxicologist Marcus Iszard, who started a new position at the University of Missouri-Kansas City School of Pharmacy three weeks before Katrina, said he is concerned that New Orleans residents don't understand the long-term and short-term risks they may face in re-entering the city.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, with Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, right, announced the repopulation plan of the New Orleans area, which begins with businesses in certain areas Saturday.

He stressed that there's not clear evidence that there is a risk of re-entering the city, but that there's also no evidence that there is no risk. Lead, for example, found in high concentrations in floodwater, could become airborne after the water dries up and deposits it as sediment.

The mayor said Treme would be the next section repopulated after Uptown, but did not offer a date when resettlement would be allowed. A strict dusk-to-dawn curfew will be in effect in all the reopened areas, Nagin said.

The areas scheduled to reopen contain about 182,000 residents, or a little more than a third of the city's pre-storm population. Over the next six months, Nagin said he expects the population to "settle in" at about 250,000, and then "ramp up over time."

"The strategy is to repopulate the city in the safest areas for now, to get enough critical mass so that the economics start to flow," Nagin said.

Because it's unclear how long it will take for business owners to get back on their feet, Nagin said he plans to use the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center – a scene of misery just over a week ago when it sheltered homeless storm survivors – as a depot in which major retailers will sell vital supplies ranging from lumber to groceries.

As the city begins to rebuild – a process that the mayor predicted would be "the biggest economic recovery project in the country's history" – Nagin said he expects New Orleans to become as populous or more so than it was before Katrina struck.

"I imagine building a city so original, so unique, that everybody's going to want to come," he said.

It's too early to tell how much of the city will have to be torn down, Nagin said, although he offered a "swag" – slang for a "scientific wild-ass guess" – that about half the city's approximately 160,000 homes might be salvageable.

"If I'm 'swagging,' we'll probably be able to rebuild 80,000 or 90,000 houses," he said. "I take it from talking to the experts that most of the homes that were flooded, that stayed in water for a number of weeks, will have to be destroyed."

Money for initial efforts should begin flowing in soon. Nagin said it is his understanding that the Federal Emergency Management Agency has released $500 million to the state. Nagin said he has asked Gov. Kathleen Blanco to turn $102 million over to the city for emergency relief efforts. If that doesn't happen, he said, the city expects soon to receive a line of credit from JPMorgan Chase Bank.

When residents begin to return, most are expected to have power. Entergy New Orleans CEO Dan Packer said that 90 percent of Algiers already has power, and that number will be close to 100 percent by Monday. Power already has been restored in about three-quarters of the areas targeted for resettlement, he said.

Water, however, may be a different story. While the water and sewer systems are fully operational in Algiers – and have been since the storm hit – the water on the east bank of the Mississippi River is still not suitable for cooking, drinking or bathing, Nagin said. It can be used to flush toilets, however.

As for health care, Nagin said plans call for opening Touro Infirmary and Children's Hospital for emergencies in the near term. Officials from Ochsner Medical Center have promised to take in patients on an emergency basis, Nagin said.

In response to questions from reporters, Nagin issued a warning to would-be criminals plotting a possible return to the city. "We've got a drug-free, violence-free city now, and our intent is to keep it that way," he said.

Nagin added that the Police Department "is not taking any crap," and added that military and police units from around the country remain in force. About 1,350 of roughly 1,700 officers from the NOPD have been accounted for, Nagin said.

The various law enforcement personnel have an impressive arsenal, containing everything from M-4s to M-16s to night-vision goggles, Nagin said. "They might even have a couple of bazookas they're saving for special people," he quipped. "So if you're coming back to this city and expecting it to be what it was before, we have a rude awakening for you."

So many cops and soldiers are in town that the city is actually "over-resourced" in that area, Nagin said. He said it might soon be time to allow some of the law enforcement officers to leave, adding that he expects a military presence to remain indefinitely.

Nagin said he likely will ask the City Council to give him the authority to relax the city's controversial domicile rule, which requires all city employees and police officers to reside within the city limits.

Nagin also offered a rebuttal to recent remarks by a Gretna official seeking to justify that city's controversial decision to turn back at gunpoint a group of New Orleans storm survivors who crossed the Crescent City Connection bridge on foot. Gretna acted as it did because there was no plan in place for handling evacuees, the official said.

"My conscience is clear," Nagin said. "We allowed people to cross because people were dying" at the Convention Center and the Superdome. Nagin said those who crossed were met by "attack dogs and armed people with shotguns" and ordered back over the bridge.

"We made our decision based upon people. If they made a decision based on assets, not people ... then they're going to have to live with that," Nagin said.

ADONIS EXPOSE, director of communications for HANO.

Officials worry many evacuees might not return to N.O. area

HOUSING, from A-1

Edwin Murray, D-New Orleans, criticized HANO's move to Houston and said the agency should be focused on keeping people in Louisiana.

But Mayor Ray Nagin's administration and City Council President Oliver Thomas said HANO is right to move people expeditiously out of the shelters and find them comfortable accommodations. When those people eventually come back to town to assess their damaged homes and belongings, they will stay, provided the right opportunity and incentives are in place, Thomas predicted.

HANO, originally a city agency that is now under the control of the federal Housing and Urban Development agency because of past financial problems, had to move operations out of the storm-damaged city and accepted an offer to occupy space made available by the housing authority of Houston, where about 25,000 New Orleans area residents sought refuge in the Astrodome, Reliant Center and other facilities.

Meanwhile, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, coordinating an effort with the state, is setting up mobile housing units: trailers and manufactured housing.

FEMA spokesman David Passey said the agency is assuming that 300,000 such units will be needed in the states affected by Katrina, including 200,000 in Louisiana. The agency's goal is to have 100,000 units ready for occupancy by the end of October, he said.

But deployments of the homes are moving at a crawl while FEMA tries to establish sites that can handle the electricity and water needs of the new mobile home parks. Gov. Kathleen Blanco has criticized the pace.

Only 491 mobile units are occupied so far.

Specifically for those working on rebuilding the New Orleans area after the storm and providing relief efforts, the agency has secured housing for 3,366 people on cruise ships docked in New Orleans and 11,000 hotel rooms throughout the state.

The Baton Rouge-based Shaw Group Inc. is one of the companies hired by FEMA to help put together the temporary housing. The company — whose chief executive, Jim Bernhard, is head of the state Democratic Party — will help with all aspects of the housing job, according to a company press release.

The contract, which could be as high as $100 million, calls for Shaw to help with the site assessment, design, and construction of temporary housing, as well as with support services such as managing facilities and hooking up utilities. In addition, Shaw will register Louisiana citizens who currently are living at emergency shelters in Texas and other states.

Separately, private companies, some working in cooperation with the state economic development agency, are setting up their own temporary housing communities to keep workers on the job.

Creating these new communities will be tricky for FEMA, which usually provides temporary trailers for people to park on their own property while repairs are made. This will not be possible in many cases in the New Orleans area, which means that the state and federal governments will need to make available such services as transportation, education and health care.

"None of this has been done before; all of this is new ground," said Kim Hunter Reed, the head of Gov. Kathleen Blanco's policy team.

The state Department of Social Services will have responsibility for helping figure out what kind of services need to be provided for people who move into the new trailer communities.

State Facilities Manager Jerry Jones said Louisiana officials are asking FEMA to prioritize moving people out of shelters in other states into temporary housing in Louisiana. While the state also wants to quickly move the residents of in-state shelters into more hospitable living arrangements, it is important to bring people back from out of state before they begin to settle down and get jobs, he said.

"We don't want to give (other states) our work force," Jones said. "We are going to need those people to help us rebuild New Orleans and southeast Louisiana."

There are 2,000 people in Dallas who are going to be put into HUD-subsidized homes in that city, said Donna White, a spokeswoman for the federal agency. There are another 5,600 units of public housing within a 500-mile radius of New Orleans that also could be used to house Katrina evacuees.

In the Miami area, public housing officials have offered to house 3,000 people, White said. The federal agency is asking public housing authorities to make Katrina victims the priority, she said.

Bush: Katrina catastrophe bigger than government

BUSH, from A-1

Bush sought to allay such concerns, sketching the first outlines of a rebuilding effort he called "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen."

"When that job is done, all Americans will have something to be very proud of," he said, "and all Americans are needed in this common effort."

The federal government will work in "close partnership" with state and city governments in Louisiana and Mississippi to coordinate planning, he said, and that a team of investigators would monitor spending to ensure that the huge stream of money flowing into the rebuilding effort is well spent.

"Federal funds will cover the great majority of the costs of repairing public infrastructure in the disaster zone, from roads and bridges to schools and water systems," he said. "Our goal is to get the work done quickly."

Bush pledged a federal commitment to protect the city from future catastrophic hurricane flooding – an engineering feat, complicated by storm damage, that the Army Corps of Engineers has estimated would cost $2.5 billion and take two decades to complete.

"Protecting a city that sits lower than the water around it is not easy, but it can and has been done," he said. Federal and local officials will work "to make the flood protection system stronger than it has ever been," he said.

Bush put a special stress on poverty, much on display during the disaster as many members of New Orleans' lower income, predominantly African-American neighborhoods were rescued from rooftops and gathered at the Superdome and the Convention Center. The president traced the poverty to the legacy of racism.

"We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action," Bush said. "Let us rise above the legacy of inequality."

Bush proposed a range of policy changes to accompany the rebuilding meant to address poverty – among them, stimulating affordable housing construction and home ownership in poor neighborhoods, tax incentives for minority businesses, and $5,000 federal accounts to get displaced residents back on their feet.

He noted, that "In New Orleans and surrounding parishes, more than a quarter million houses are no longer safe to live in. Hundreds of thousands of people from across this region will need to find longer-term housing."

Gov. Kathleen Blanco met President Bush as he arrived by helicopter on the USS Iwo Jima docked on the Mississippi River. Blanco accompanied Bush to Jackson Square, where he addressed the nation.

Bush, who said on Tuesday he accepted responsibility for the government's slow response to the crisis, reiterated the statement.

"I as president am responsible for the problem - and for the solution," he said.

He conceded that government planners were not prepared for a catastrophe on the order of Katrina.

Bush said that every cabinet department would review emergency plans, and the Department of Homeland Security, responsible for emergency response, would undertake a top-to-bottom review of its performance and planning. He urged more planning at all levels of government for the next disaster.

"I also want to know all the facts about the government response to Hurricane Katrina," Bush said. "It was not a normal hurricane – and the normal disaster relief system was not equal to it."

Bush urged more planning at all levels of government for the next disaster.

"Our cities must have clear and up-to-date plans for responding to natural disasters, disease outbreaks, or terrorist attack … for evacuating large numbers of people in an emergency … and for providing the food, water and security they would need," he said.

Emergency planners have said the death and destruction caused by Katrina shows the continuing weakness in the government's ability to respond to a terrorist strike four years after 9/11. "I consider detailed emergency planning to be a national security priority," Bush said.

Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, applauded Bush's pledge to combat poverty with a raft of new programs.

"That is critically important to bring the region back," he said.

BLUEWILLIAMS, L.L.P.

The family that is Blue Williams wishes to express our thanks for the support and concern expressed by our colleagues and clients in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. Although several of our family members have suffered profound losses of their homes and possessions, we suffered no serious injuries or loss of life. Our hearts go out to all who have suffered so much as a result of this disaster.

Due to our main office in Metairie sustaining some damage, we have temporarily expanded our office in Mandeville. We are also opening an office in Baton Rouge to provide uninterrupted service to our clients. All of our files and data were preserved. We will be returning to our main office as soon as repairs have been completed.

Blue Williams is prepared to assist our clients and businesses in our community with the recovery from Hurricane Katrina. The firm specializes in many areas that will be vital to businesses as they recover from this unprecedented disaster. Some of those include insurance coverage, construction law, employment law, tax incentives and abatement, environmental and clean up, corporate reorganization and bankruptcy. We can also assist with FEMA and federal disaster assistance, SBA business claims, real estate development, leasing and debt restructuring.

SEN. JAMES DAVID CAIN, R-Dry Creek, chairman of the Senate Insurance Committee

Lawsuit aims to force coverage for damage

about the insurance industry's response to Katrina. At a joint legislative hearing Thursday, representatives of the state's three largest insurers were accused of shirking their responsibility to residents whose property was destroyed by the storm.

State Rep. Peppi Bruneau, R-New Orleans, said insurers had taken an "adversarial position" to policyholders by declaring that flood damage caused by Katrina is not covered under homeowners insurance policy. Instead, insurers have told residents that such claims must be submitted through the federal government's flood insurance program. Lawmakers said fewer than half of the residents in metropolitan New Orleans have flood insurance.

Bruneau warned that "World War III" would break out if the companies don't change their position.

"I would hope you all would take a very strong message back to your companies that you are going to have some extremely angry people who are not just going to sit there," said Bruneau, who later added, "I think we can do with a little less of the wringing of the hands and a little more creativity."

While insurance company representatives promised to do whatever they can to pay claims as quickly as possible in Louisiana, they balked at lawmakers' request that they pay claims not covered by homeowners insurance.

"No doubt there are lawsuits that will come out of this," said E.L. "Bubba" Henry, a lobbyist for State Farm Insurance. "But the insurance policies cover what they say they cover. To tell insurance companies that they must pay for damages that aren't covered – and that we didn't collect a premium on – is to bankrupt the industry."

Bruneau wasn't swayed. "I don't want to see the industry go bankrupt, but I don't want to see 50,000 to 100,000 people go bankrupt, either."

Though homeowners policies provide compensation for damage resulting from high wind, they don't cover flood damage. Instead, such claims are covered by federal flood insurance, which limits reimbursement to $250,000 – no matter how costly the actual damages are.

Insurance Commissioner J. Robert Wooley said it's possible that some insurance companies will broaden the types of claims they're covering from Katrina, given the exceptional ferocity of the storm. Damages from Katrina are expected to reach $200 billion, a record for a natural disaster in the United States.

Wooley likened the situation to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, when insurance companies opted to pay about $20 billion to cover losses, even though acts of war are specifically exempted from most policies.

"I think you will see that coming into play in some instances" for Katrina victims, Wooley told lawmakers Thursday, though he said he isn't certain how far the companies could afford to go.

Wooley acknowledged there are "huge gaps" in the losses covered by flood insurance and those covered by homeowners policies, but he said he is confident the Federal Emergency Management Agency will ultimately deliver for the state. He said the agency did an "admirable job" in delivering aid to previous disaster victims.

But lawmakers were upset that FEMA was not represented at the hearing; the agency's representative left shortly after it started. Lawmakers said the crisis won't be resolved until state officials can hold a hearing at which all of the major players are present: the insurance industry, state government and FEMA.

"Someone has to take some leadership in this state," said Sen. James David Cain, R-Dry Creek, chairman of the Senate Insurance Committee. "We can't keep dancing around. It's either going to be the insurance commissioner or the governor or this committee. … And if nobody else is going to do it, we're going to do it. Somebody's got to bring this bunch together."

Cain threatened to issue subpoenas for FEMA representatives in Louisiana if the agency misses another committee hearing.

FEMA officials declined to comment.

Cain asked Wooley who he thinks should pay for the flood damage: insurers or the federal government.

"I'm not God," Wooley said. "I'm not able to answer that question."

Wooley cautioned lawmakers not to squeeze the insurance industry too hard. "We have an obligation not to bankrupt an entire industry," he said.

Former Insurance Commissioner Jim Brown, who is acting as an unpaid consultant for the 15 families who filed the class-action suit Thursday, said fears of bankruptcy were being overblown.

He said the companies involved in Katrina have reserves of $500 billion, which are more than enough to offset the estimated $50 billion in losses they face over the hurricane. Furthermore, he said, about 80 percent of those losses will ultimately be covered by huge reinsurance companies in Europe and elsewhere around the world, which took on that risk as an investment.

Brown predicted insurers won't have trouble taking on an additional $20 billion or so in losses to cover the flood damage they are now trying to shift to the federal government.

"I'm sure it's going to hurt, but it's not going to be a bankruptcy situation," Brown said.

The lawsuit says that as many as 160,000 homes were rendered uninhabitable by the hurricane, mostly because of flood damage caused by levee breaks in the 17th Street Canal and the London Street Canal.

The suit, which was filed in East Baton Rouge Parish, asks that a judge declare that any flooding caused by those levee breaks does not fall within the industry's standard "rising water" exception and is thus covered by homeowners policies.

Though the lawsuit does not address flooding caused by storm surge, which inundated homes in St. Bernard and St. Tammany parishes, attorney Joseph Bruno said that issue will be addressed soon, either in another lawsuit or within the existing case.

Bruno said his firm does not expect to make any money on the litigation, which is being financed by three big firms that have won billions of dollars in class-action lawsuits in recent years. The firms are Bruno & Bruno, Fayard & Honeycutt, McKernan Law Firm, and Vernon P. Thomas. Bruno predicted expenses will top $100,000.

"Frankly, getting paid is the last thing I'm worried about right now,'' Bruno said. "If someone in the future can get us paid, I'll take it, but that is not my motivation."

Bruno has asked that hearings on the case be expedited, but he said residents should not expect a quick resolution. Even if the dispute moves quickly, he said, it will be at least six months before the matter reaches the Louisiana Supreme Court, which he expects will make the final ruling on the suit.

The case is one of two lawsuits filed against the nation's big insurers Thursday. Mississippi's attorney general also sued the industry in an attempt to force it to pay for flood damage, saying standard insurance policies led homeowners to believe they were covered for all hurricane damage, whether from wind or flooding.

"The residents and/or property owners of Mississippi Gulf Coast purchased these policies from defendants for the primary purpose of insuring against any damage that could possibly result from hurricanes originating from the Gulf of Mexico," Attorney General Jim Hood said in his lawsuit.

In Louisiana, lawmakers chafed at the slow process of the nation's insurance giants, asking why they can't simply write checks for the limits of policies in areas that are likely to be declared a total loss by FEMA, such as the lower 9th Ward in Orleans Parish and most of St. Bernard Parish.

As it stands, adjusters won't be able to visit some of those areas for weeks, if not months, because they can't inspect properties until homeowners return.

Sen. Ann Duplessis, D-New Orleans, whose eastern New Orleans was flooded by the storm, said insurers don't even have to send an adjuster to some areas because it's obvious whole swaths of the city were under eight feet of water or more for two weeks.

"I'd like to know why you can't just pay the face value of the policy so people can get on with their lives," Duplessis said.

Henry said the company can't pay that kind of money without actually visiting the property, but he noted that State Farm has handed out $2,500 checks to about 90,000 homeowners hurt by Katrina. Those payments were considered an advance on their covered losses, and they cost the company about $225 million.

Though it may take a long time to rebuild the region, Henry said, "I don't think it's going to take two to three years to pay those claims."

WAR IN IRAQ

Suicide bombers kill 31 more in Baghdad

Bombings called retaliation for successful army sweep

By Slobodan Lekic
Associated Press Writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Suicide bombers inflicted another day of mayhem in the capital Thursday, killing at least 31 people in two attacks about a minute apart that targeted Iraqi police and Interior Ministry commandos. The carnage left nearly 200 people dead in just two days.

A dozen bombings during a nine-hour spate of terror Wednesday killed at least 167 people and wounded nearly 600 — Baghdad's worst day of bloodshed since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

U.S. officials blamed the bombing onslaught on efforts by the Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency to answer the Iraqi army's successful offensive in the northern city of Tal Afar and to undermine the Oct. 15 referendum on Iraq's new constitution.

"These spikes of violence are predictable around certain critical events that highlight the progress of democracy," said Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, the chief American military spokesman.

"Remember, democracy equals failure for the insurgency. So there has to be heightened awareness now as we work our way toward the referendum. That's power, that's movement toward democracy."

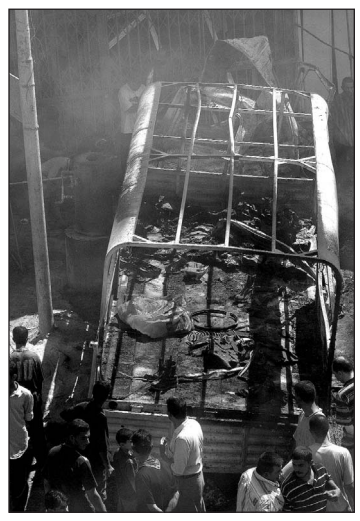
Al-Qaida in Iraq, headed by Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, claimed responsibility for the bombing campaign launched after an Iraqi-U.S. force of 8,500 soldiers stormed Tal Afar, an insurgent bastion, this week.

Al-Zarqawi then purportedly declared "all-out war" on Shiite Muslims, Iraqi troops and the government in what the United States has called a desperate propaganda campaign to derail the political process.

Leaders of the Sunni Arab minority in Iraq have vowed to defeat the constitution, which they claim favors the Shiite majority and the Kurds.

Lynch said the joint force killed 145 insurgents and captured 361 in the second operation in a year to rid Tal Afar of militants, including foreign fighters crossing from Syria.

Now, he said, U.S. forces along with the Iraqis were fighting to regain control of the Syrian border, near the western insurgent stronghold of Qaim, well to the south of Tal Afar.



"The focus is ... to restore control of the border and in this particular case the border with Syria," he said. "We believe that the terrorists and foreign fighters are entering Iraq across the Syrian border, down the Euphrates River Valley into Baghdad."

Recent violence only served to deepen the misery in Baghdad, where streets were noticeably quieter Thursday — deserted in the southern Dora district where the latest bombings were concentrated.

U.S. and Iraqi forces using loudspeakers roamed the district warning residents to stay indoors because five more suicide car bombers were believed to be in the area.

Many victims of Wednesday's attacks were killed shortly after dawn when a bomber lured day laborers to his small van with the promise of work, then detonated his explosives in the heavily Shiite Kazimiyah district.

The massive bombings took place with both Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari in the United States.

AP PHOTO

Iraqis gather around a burned-out police truck near the site of a suicide bomber's attack in Baghdad's Dora neighborhood on Thursday. Two suicide bombers struck within about a minute of each other and about a half-mile apart, killing at least 31 people, officials said.

Meanwhile, The Associated Press obtained the text of minor, final changes to Iraq's draft constitution. The United Nations is to print the draft in Baghdad and ensure its distribution before the referendum, but the world body said it was awaiting final approval. There were conflicting reports on when Iraq's parliament would sign off on the document.

Two articles in the draft were changed, one was dropped entirely and one was added. Of those, the main change was a new clause noting that Iraq was a founding member of the Arab League, an addition Sunni Arabs sought to underline the country's links with the Arab world.

The dropped passage gave the constitution precedence over international human rights agreements, which the United States asked to be removed.

Roberts tells Senate he's no ideologue

Testimony ends; confirmation likely

By David Espo
AP special correspondent

WASHINGTON — Chief Justice nominee John Roberts said Thursday there is no room for ideologues on the Supreme Court, declaring an "obligation to the Constitution" and to no other cause as he concluded three grueling days of confirmation testimony.

"If the Constitution says that the little guy should win, the little guy's going to win in court before me," Roberts told the Senate Judiciary Committee. "But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well, then the big guy's going to win."

Roberts' confirmation as successor to the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist appears secure, the only question the size of his vote total and in particular his Democratic support. The Judiciary Committee is to vote its recommendation next week.

The White House and Republican leaders hope for approval by the full GOP-controlled Senate in time for the 50-year-old appeals court judge and former Reagan administration lawyer to take his seat on the opening day of the court's term Oct. 3.

Conservatives pronounced themselves satisfied as Roberts wrapped up his appearance before the committee.

"His testimony on the right to privacy mirrored that of Clarence Thomas during his Supreme Court confirmation hearing," read a memo circulated by Leonard Leo and Jay Sekulow, two prominent conservatives who lead organizations that are working to clear the way for confirmation.

The right to privacy underpins the right to abortion, and Thomas has voted as a member of the high court to overturn the 1973 ruling that established a constitutional right to abortion.

In his testimony earlier in the week, Roberts said he believed the Constitution provides a right to privacy. But he offered no hint about how he would come down on the abortion issue, which is expected to come before the court in the coming year.

Roberts opened his appearance before the committee Monday by declaring, "I have no agenda." He closed with a reformulation: "My obligation is to the Constitution. That's the oath."

After two largely futile days of trying to learn Roberts' views on controversial issues, Democrats spent much of their final round of questioning trying to determine what Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., called his "core values."

Egyptians struggle to control border

Leaders are worried terrorists can sneak in

By Maggie Michael
Associated Press writer

RAFAH, EGYPT — Palestinians blasted holes in an Israeli-built wall and overwhelmed Egyptian troops on the Gaza border to flow by the hundreds into Egypt on Thursday, foiling attempts to impose control after days of unhindered crossings.

Israeli and Palestinian leaders expressed fears that militants and al-Qaida terrorists will infiltrate Gaza and Israel through the border, which has been open since Israeli troops withdrew from the Palestinian territory.

Egypt had promised to reimpose border controls by Thursday evening, and in the morning several hundred police officers were deployed at the main crossing points, more than the few dozen seen in past days. They allowed Palestinians to return to Gaza and managed to slow to a trickle the number entering Egypt for part of the day.

But after hours of pushing and shoving at the Saladin border crossing in Rafah, the police line broke and hundreds of Palestinians crossed the border. Faced with the large crowds, many police officers gave up and the crossing became almost as open as it was in the past days.

The so-called Canada crossing was closed by police but less than a mile away, hundreds of Palestinians passed through an olive grove and crossed freely through a break in the wall at the border.

Egypt has yet to deploy the bulk of the 750 border guards it promised to station on the frontier under a deal with Israel.

A local official said it could be three more days before the guards, who are more heavily armed than the police, are in place.

Razor wire secures Mississippi firms, homes

Troops, cops use it to keep out looters

By Vicki Smith
Associated Press Writer

GULFPORT, MISS — Concertina wire is being rolled out in hurricane ravaged areas of the Mississippi coast to keep looters and sightseers out of damaged homes and businesses, officials said Thursday.

The razor wire, which already has been placed in some areas in Long Beach and Pass Christian, is a necessary and cost-efficient way to "keep people who don't need to be in that area out of that area," said Joe Spraggins, Harrison County's Civil Defense director.

Soldiers and police have had difficulty securing certain areas because people have managed to avoid checkpoints on roads and streets.

Spraggins said he was not concerned about the negative image the wire could create because he believes people understand it makes more sense than assigning large numbers of soldiers to guard private property.

"It was very quick to put up, and it's very quick to take down, and we'll take it down when we get this problem under control," he said.

Residents of the devastated areas are allowed to pass through checkpoints because they have valid reasons to be there, Spraggins said.

"The people that don't need to be there, the people that just want to go looking, the people that want to pilfer something, they are not getting through," he said.

The fatality count in Mississippi has stood at 218 since Tuesday, and with recovery workers finding fewer bodies, officials can concentrate on other problems that plague the area.

The Mississippi Department of Health said Thursday it had set up a state-of-the-art water treatment system developed by the Office of Naval Research to convert salt water to safe drinking water.

Only two units of its kind exist in the world, health officials said.

The treatment system, which can provide 120,000 gallons of potable water per day, is serving the Biloxi Regional Medical Center.

Other mobile water treatment centers have been set up in Waveland and Biloxi in recent days. Those systems are capable of cleaning up contaminated water in areas that are under a boil water restriction.

About 26,152 homes and businesses that are capable of receiving power were still without it Thursday, down from 800,000 immediately after the hurricane. The outage number does not include the thousands of homes and businesses that were destroyed or are too damaged to receive electricity.

In other late developments, the state College Board announced it was waiving tuition for nonresidents displaced by Katrina.

And military leaders at Camp Shelby near Hattiesburg said Thursday they were setting up a program that assists the dependents of soldiers and Department of Defense workers who were displaced by the storm.

Ophelia soaks North Carolina coast

Slow hurricane 'just beating us to death'

By Margaret Lillard
Associated Press writer

SALTER PATH, N.C. — Hurricane Ophelia crawled along the North Carolina coast on Thursday, prolonging its punishment of the Outer Banks with rain and wind as coastal residents elsewhere returned home to damaged homes and businesses.

While the weakening storm's center was expected to stay just off shore, the northern side of Ophelia's eyewall, the ring of high wind surrounding the eye, could remain over the Outer Banks until midday today, the National Hurricane Center said.

Gov. Mike Easley said getting a handle on the scope of damage was difficult because of the storm's slow path, first affecting the state's southeastern coast on Tuesday and then crawling north and east Wednesday and Thursday to its position off the Outer Banks.

"It's almost like working three different storms," Easley said.

More than 81,000 homes and businesses remained without power Thursday in eastern North Carolina, utilities said.

It appeared the mainland had dodged the severe flooding many had feared, but the wind and waves had taken a toll.

Ophelia, an erratic storm that has looped and meandered north since forming off the Florida coast last week, stalled early Thursday afternoon, then drifted east-northeast at about 3 mph, the hurricane center said.

Its top sustained wind speed had eased back to 75 mph, barely strong enough to be classified as a hurricane. Since it was weakening and its direction was toward open ocean, a hurricane warning for the North Carolina coast was reduced to a tropical storm warning.

City still has creature comforts

We arrived at the Catina Street house by boat. It was the only way.

As late as Sunday afternoon, two weeks after Hurricane Katrina unleashed her wrath, the entire Lakeview area near the West End exit off I-10 was under several feet of dark, dirty water.

Two weeks ago, a cat named Buddy had been left in the house with plenty of food and water.

Was that food still dry? Was the cat still alive?

I dared not ask those questions aloud.

On the boat, there were three of us: Steve Rushing, a Mississippi fisher who owns and captains the small motor craft; Gary Eldredge, a private investigator who lives in the Catina Street house; and me.

Eldredge literally had begged the Humane Society to allow him to help rescue animals. He felt that unlike many of the rescue workers from out of town, he was well-qualified to navigate the city, even areas still under water.

Twice, he went to the animal shelter in Gonzales, only to essentially be told, "Don't call us. We'll call you."

When I told a mutual friend that I was interested in doing a story on pet rescue, she introduced me to Eldredge. He introduced me to Rushing at 5 a.m. on the day we launched our mission.

While I figured the mission was to save pets from specific houses whose owners later could be found, Eldredge was interested in no such compromise. Every dog or cat he saw — even those that were probably strays before the flood, even the two pits bulls who snarled at us from a Mid-City balcony — he wanted to save.

There was no itinerary. We started in Mid-City because we could park on the Jefferson Davis overpass and launch the boat near Tulane Avenue. From there we moved toward Carrollton Avenue on Banks Street.

It wasn't easy traveling. While much of Mid-City was under water, there were places where the water was shallow or where fallen trees and abandoned cars created a formidable obstacle course.

We had keys to some homes. At others, the owner had given us permission to break in. In Mid-City, we rescued several cats and a small white dog. When we couldn't get in, or when we couldn't capture the animals, we left food and water for them in the driest possible spot.

Then we went back to the Jefferson Davis Parkway overpass, hitched the boat back to the car and drove on to the West End exit off I-10. There we put the boat back in the water and made our way toward Catina.

Eldredge, who had given his morning over to saving other's people's pets, finally had a chance to save his own. But when he finally made it to his own front door, he had trouble turning the key. He was nervous, I think. I opened it with relative ease.

He waded into the house with long rubber waders that looked like rubber overalls. I followed him.

What wasn't wet was moldy. What wasn't nailed down was floating, including the refrigerator.

"Buddy?" Eldredge called out. He heard a faint "meow."

That was a hopeful sign, but the response had come from one of the cats in the cages still on the boat. There was no sound

Many poor who chose to stay behind are helping clean vacant neighborhood streets

'I sit here every day and worry about my sister, who has a nice house on General Taylor,' said John Lacey, TOP, who remains in his Central City apartment. Lacey, shown ABOVE wondering the streets of his neighborhood, is one of just a few residents staying in the area after Hurricane Katrina. 'I'm all by myself, talking by myself, answering myself,' he said.

By Gwen Filosa
Staff writer

Throughout Central City, one of the roughest parts of New Orleans and home to the C.J. Peete public housing development, churches, barber shops, corner stores and hundreds of modest shotguns, John Lacey was a lone figure one day this week.

He was sweeping up the mess from the storm.

Lacey, who remains in his apartment off Jackson Avenue, said the National Guard has been checking on him regularly. "They got a nice attitude," he said. "They dropped by the other day and gave me a cigarette lighter."

That may be all he's getting. The days of dropping off Meals-Ready-to-Eat and bottled water to holdouts in New Orleans are over, said Lt. Col. Pete Schneider, spokesman for the National Guard.

"We can't keep doing a supply mission," Schneider said Wednesday in Baton Rouge. "The policy has shifted a tad. We tell them we can get them out, but we can't keep dropping off provisions."

That won't help the remaining survivors, such as Alvira and Troy Theriot, a mother and son who rode out the storm.

"I could use some food," Alvira said. "I don't want to leave. I wasn't afraid of the storm."

Theriot, 67, on her front stoop Wednesday morning, said she was fine. She had a little food left and had water – tap water. In the 2200 block of Harmony Street, just blocks away from a National Guard headquarters at the Sophie Wright Middle School on Napoleon Avenue, Theriot and her son, Troy, 41, said they had been checked on by a military outfit.

Candles burned inside to light the rental. Theriot, a retired housekeeper, asked a visitor if the Wal-Mart was open. She hasn't heard of the looting that went on directly after the storm and that the big box retailer was now a military compound.

The Theriots didn't want to leave the city, nor did they consider taking shelter at the Superdome, which city and federal officials dubbed the shelter of "last resort."

"No," Alvira Theriot said. "With all those people?"

Now, the mother and son are stuck in New Orleans, their choice — as much of a choice as the working poor have these days.

Also stuck is Lacey, 51, who had a broomstick in his hand as he swept in front of Sadie's Beauty Salon in the 2300 block

Teen's funeral to take place on Sunday

By Karen Baker
St. Tammany bureau

Chuck Billiot of Chalmette called the office at Mary, Queen of Peace Catholic Church in Mandeville this week with a simple request: "I just want to bury my daughter."

Billiot's daughter, Charie, 16, was among three St. Bernard Parish teenagers killed Aug. 21 when their car slammed into a tree on Louisiana 16 near Sun on their way home from a Bogue Chitto River tubing trip.

Charie's funeral was scheduled to take place at Our Lady of Prompt Succor Catholic Church in Chalmette on Aug. 30. Billiot said the family wanted to wait for their other daughter, Chrissie, 15, to be released from the hospital, who was also injured in the crash.

But then Katrina roared in, and the Billiot family found tragedy heaped upon tragedy.

"It has been a very trying time," said Billiot, who is staying with relatives in Mandeville. Billiot's stepson, Brian LaFontaine, was also killed in the Aug. 21 crash.

Brian's funeral took place before the hurricane, he said.

"We have had a couple of private ceremonies for Charie to have some closure, but we are looking forward to having a service," he said.

Visitation will take place Saturday from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. at Mary, Queen of Peace Church, 1501 West Causeway Approach in Mandeville, followed by a Mass at 1 p.m.

"We have had overwhelming support from this community,

'We're going to have Mardi Gras,' Kern pledges

Many floats unhurt by Katrina

By Doug MacCash
Staff writer

Though electric company trucks with telescoping arms and camouflaged Humvees are the attention-grabbing vehicles plying New Orleans streets these days, people involved with planning Mardi Gras predict that beginning in February they will have been replaced by convoys of colorful Carnival floats. They believe there will be a Mardi Gras next year, though the exact state of the celebration remains a question.

The smiling fiberglass alligator that not long ago greeted visitors at the parking lot of Mardi Gras World on the West Bank now looks out over an ad hoc supply depot where armed, camouflaged soldiers distribute donated clothing, cases of bottled water and other necessities to hurricane victims. Like it did at practically every other landmark in The City That Care Forgot, Hurricane Katrina has drastically altered the tenor of activities at the world's largest maker of Mardi Gras floats.

The row of yellow sheet metal warehouses in the shadow of the Crescent City Connection is a tourist draw, giving people from across the world a year-round glimpse at the grandly garish creations. Though two Kern warehouses a few blocks upriver were largely demolished by Katrina's winds, leaving a fleet of the brightly painted floats in various states of damage within the crumpled sheet metal walls and beneath the shattered grid of industrial windows, most of the other floats stored at Mardi Gras World were unscathed.

They remain in neat rows, their sculpted figure heads in the shapes of monsters, mythic heroes and cartoon animals awaiting their midwinter moment to shine. The fear in the minds of many New Orleanians in the days since Katrina is that their moment, the 2006 Mardi Gras, the Crescent City's signature celebration, might be another of the storm's casualties.

Army Sgt. Peter Callies and Sgt. Marcus Bernardez of the 1st Cavalry Division in Fort Hood, Texas, walk through Mardi Gras World on the West Bank on Wednesday. 'Maybe I'm an eternal optimist, but we're going to have Mardi Gras this year,' said Mardi Gras World owner Blaine Kern.

sculpting floats and theme park attractions in industrial studios from Valencia, Spain, to Galveston, Texas, said he thinks not.

"I'm over here in Destin," he said over a hissing cell phone. "I got four dogs, two cats and a parrot in the car with me. It's like Noah's ark. ... Maybe I'm an eternal optimist, but we're going to have Mardi Gras this year."

Kern is so optimistic that he believes there's a possibility of a sort of welcome home even before Mardi Gras. "We might do a parade when we're all back in the city," he said.

Though Carnival is only a few weeks long, Mardi Gras preparations go on year-round. Kern said he bases his optimism on the fact that the floats for many of the major parades are practically finished, awaiting only last-minute touches before they're ready to roll.

of Jackson Street. Lacey rode out Hurricane Katrina in his apartment in the back of the building.

"Ain't nobody stay but me and the dogs," he said, wearing black gloves and a black visor sideways. "I'm just a lonely person living in a one-man house."

The water rose, but it didn't get into his house, he said. The neighborhood, a short drive from the tony mansions of St. Charles Ave., was dry last Friday, but in some places the water marks on homes rose to five feet.

Lacey returned to New Orleans four years ago after a 28-year stretch at the maximum state prison at Angola for what he called a "simple robbery."

"Can't nothing hurt me but God," said Lacey, who added that he would take any job cleaning up New Orleans, a city he said he loved and would never leave.

Across the city, in Hollygrove, several New Orleans men already were working such jobs. Daral McNeil, 45, a bricklayer by trade, said his eastern New Orleans home was ruined.

"I lost everything," McNeil said, taking a break from cleaning Monroe Street to watch a line of federal disaster team white vans — the symbol of dead-body recovery in New Orleans these days — and white-jacketed workers retrieve a body from a home. "That's why I'm out here now, trying to regain."

John Lacey takes a nap during the middle of the day, when the sun is hot. He is continuing to stay in his cramped, one-bedroom apartment. Lacy, who spent 28 years in Angola, says he was picked up by gun-wielding members of the military after Hurricane Katrina and driven to the airport to be evacuated. 'I don't like being locked up, like I'm in prison. I'm a free man,' he said. 'And as soon as the man looked the other way, I escaped and walked back to New Orleans.'

Raymond Guild, 54, of Algiers, is working too, earning $100 a day for 10 hard hours. He used to work offshore for PSC.

The men said they got the jobs at a federal disaster headquarters set up at an Algiers stadium.

"My job is under water," said another man who identified himself as Big Dog, of his prior job as a cook at the Hyatt hotel on Canal Street.

But clearing tree limbs, trash, and debris from damaged homes was paying these days, they all acknowledged. It would do for now.

The water marks around Hollygrove were at least six feet, but locals said they heard many rooftops were swallowed up during the worst of the flooding. A drive along Olive Street — from Gert Town off of Earhart Boulevard and through Pigeon Town to Hollygrove — was a debris-filled ride through neighborhoods where water marks were up to mailboxes on houses. The house at 3340 Joliet St. appeared to have a six-foot water mark.

Both neighborhoods, along with Central City, were virtual dead zones. Central City close to Louisiana Avenue typically would be filled with children and adults on a hot summer afternoon. The scattered bars — many of which have signs saying "No loitering," or in one case, "No one under 30" — were shuttered by the storm.

Over by C.J. Peete, the area was nearly vacant, occupied by a few dogs who had been left behind. Houses had been spray-painted with zeros or "2 dogs" by law enforcement. Across from 2101 Third St., a white Chevy pickup lay on its side by the street corner.

"Am I my brother's keeper?" asked the sign at the First House of Prayer Baptist Church on Lasalle Street.

from the house itself.

"Buddy?" Eldredge called again as he went into the second room.

Again, there was a response. A squeaking door? An irrelevant noise? Who could tell?

He's probably in the back room, Eldredge said, but I had no faith.

On the boat, Rushing whispered doubts that Buddy could have lived through this. Through the house, I walked several paces behind Eldredge. I didn't want to be the first to spot the corpse of the beloved cat.

"Buddy?" Eldredge called again.

"Meow," came the response. This time there was no mistaking it: There was a cat in the house.

"I'm coming, Buddy!" Eldredge yelled. "I'm coming."

Moving quickly, purposefully, he made his way across a pond of debris. There, in the back room, Eldredge found Buddy, a large black and white cat.

What I remember of those next few moments has less to do with the details of the action than with the meaning of the scene as I watched it unfold.

Eldredge had lost everything. A couple of decades' worth of memories and files were floating in dirty water.

Then I understood that no matter how much Eldredge loved this cat, at that moment Buddy was as much a vestige of an old life and a drowned past as he was a beloved pet.

Buddy is one of the precious few things from Eldredge's life that Hurricane Katrina left high and dry.

helping us to get through this," Billiot said.

News of the fatal crash sent shockwaves through the schools and communities of St. Bernard Parish.

"These were all wonderful kids, wonderful students from good families, involved students in their schools," St. Bernard Parish schools Superintendent Doris Voitier said Aug. 22. "It's just a community tragedy."

Billiot said he just wants Charie's many friends from Chalmette High School who might be in St. Tammany to know that they can come say goodbye to his daughter, the honor student with the "beautiful smile who had an incredible force for life."

Charie is survived by her father, Chuck Billiot; her mother, Tina Tammaseo; her stepmother, Marleen Billiot; a sister, Chrissie Billiot; a stepsister, Tracy Duplantier; and a stepbrother, Neil Duplantier.

Flooding reported at Rex float site

MARDI GRAS, from B-1

The floats lost in the storm belong to several different krewes, spreading the damage more or less evenly.

"We lost two dens (float warehouses) in Gretna with 40 to 50 floats," Kern said. "We had some damage in our lumberyard, and some props and some floats were damaged. But the Rex parade is finished, Bacchus is 95 percent, Endymion is 80 percent. We're in good shape. "

What Kern may not have known at the time was that water had risen past the 5-foot mark in the Rex den on South Claiborne Avenue, where horizontal bands of brown sludge marked the water's incremental coming and going on the colorful canvas sides of the assembled floats. Inside the darkened warehouse, fetid with the peculiar industrial/organic odor of floodwaters, an enormous, purple sculpted mosquito, a nude woman bearing a water urn and a portion of a coral reef stood surreally on floats above the muddy, littered floor. The iron wheels of the antique chassis were orange with rust.

"We had water," said former Rex captain John Charbonnet of the flooded den, "but I don't have a report yet."

Like Kern, Charbonnet is confident that the will of New Orleans to celebrate Carnival survived storm and flood.

"I believe that all of the major parading organizations want to parade," he said, "and as we all get back together, we have three or four months to work on it. I think we'll have an enjoyable, perhaps a little subdued Carnival. We've got a lot to overcome, with damage to props and costumes, but right now the push is on. Everyone needs to take inventory. … But if we ever needed a Mardi Gras, this is the year."

Not far from the flooded Rex den, near the corner of Tchoupitoulas and 6th Street, the Hermes den was also significantly damaged. A long section of the warehouse's cement block wall had collapsed near the roofline, exposing props sculpted by Royal Artists, Kern's competition in the float-building trade. Through a storm-created slit in the warehouse's sheet metal wall, the faces of Neptune, Hercules and Pan could be seen, the floats they dominated apparently intact, though rubble from the roof was scattered across the floor around them.

But the availability of floats is only part of the challenge. The availability of the army of police necessary to monitor Mardi Gras, the availability of cleanup crews and other city-provided amenities are all factors in staging Carnival 2006.

Then there's money. All Carnival parades are privately funded by the membership dues of the riders, who spend thousands of dollars a year to stage the elaborate celebration. But Carnival krewe dues may be a very low priority in many New Orleans households this year, and parade budgets will surely drop.

"I certainly think there will be examples where that will be a concern," said Charbonnet. "Only God knows how individuals will react. Anybody could say, 'Hey, this year I've got to step aside.' "

As anachronistic and un-American as it may seem, there is no corporate sponsorship of Mardi Gras parades, no product banners or krewe endorsements. Carnival traditionalists have long held out against the seductions of such a ready source of funding. But now the appeal of sponsorship has become especially acute.

"I'm the last person in the world to want corporate sponsors," said Kern. "It's what keeps us so blessedly unique. But say with some of these smaller krewes, in an emergency, it might be necessary. Kentucky Fried Chicken and Universal Studios, they would like to help if necessary. If it takes that, then at least we have a standby. But I don't think we'll need it."

Members of Orpheus, one of the youngest major krewes, planned to celebrate their 13th year with a parade dedicated to superstitions New Orleans style. Among the theme floats already created for Carnival 2006 are "Lightening Strikes," "The Storm Dragon" and "The Hurricane Bringer."

But co-founder Sonny Borey, riding out the storm's aftermath in Clear Lake Shores, Texas, is confident that despite this year's cataclysmic bad luck, the show will go on.

Mardi Gras World sustained little damage from Hurricane Katrina and has becoming a staging area for relief efforts.

"There's going to be a Mardi Gras this year," he said, "I don't know how large. But we're going to show the world that Mardi Gras will always be here. … I don't think there's a krewe in the city that's not going to make a concerted effort to have Mardi Gras this year. We have an obligation.

"The money issue is something the krewes will have to work out on their own. I've spoken to many of our members, and they're dedicated to having Mardi Gras. … We have a very strong, young business-type membership. You pay as you go. … Listen, there's financial worry every year. It's discretionary money."

Endymion is New Orleans' biggest parade. Held the Saturday before Mardi Gras, Endymion is like a fireworks display on wheels, a 60-vehicle affair, with segmented, multi-chassis floats carrying as many as 200 bead-throwing riders, all lit with skeins of flashing light strands. A spectacle among spectacles, Endymion takes 3 hours to wind through the crowd-choked streets of the city on a route all its own ending on the floor of the now-damaged Superdome. If there's a parade that will tax the resources and logistics of the recovering city, it will be Endymion.

"If Mayor Nagin says we don't have the police or whatever," said founder Ed Muniz, from Destin, Fla., "we'll just put the floats in mothballs and I'll be disappointed. … If it's up to Endymion, then Endymion's going to roll. Mayor Nagin is one of our members. If he tells me I've got the green light, we'll do it.

"This is our 40th year, and this year I was really going to throw the dice. It was going to be the biggest parade in the history of Mardi Gras. The theme is 'The Legends and Lure of Gold.'

"We're all very sad about the tragedies. A lot of our members lost their homes. But in six months, we're going to be looking forward, not back. Mardi Gras is what New Orleans does best. Financially, Mardi Gras is the equivalent of four or five Super Bowls. Cab drivers, beauticians, the hotels — everybody benefits. Just try to get a restaurant reservation in the last five days of Carnival.

"I know for a fact that Las Vegas is right now trying to do a Mardi Gras. We can't let Mardi Gras go to Las Vegas. This is something we do naturally. We should bring back all the press that was here for the hurricane and put them up on balconies for Mardi Gras."

Trailers will house workers at area plants

Workers will clean sites, then return to their jobs

By Ed Anderson and Allen Powell II
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – The Shell Oil Terminal in St. James Parish on Thursday moved 161 trailers onto its site to put its Hurricane Katrina-displaced employees back to work, state officals said.

Don Pierson, assistant secretary of the Department of Economic Development, said that by the end of business Thursday about 525 trailer housing units supplied by the Federal Emergency Management Agency will be in place for employees of "critical, strategic industries" in south Louisiana. That includes oil refineries and chemical plants. Another 545 units are on order and are expected to be in place "in a week to 10 days'' Pierson said.

The number of plant workers without homes was not available, officials said. The industries put in requests to the state for the housing.

"This is hard-hat housing," Pierson said.

He said as soon as the trailers are in place, workers can return to their jobs, start drawing paychecks and get the local economy "up and running."

"We have to get those (industries) strategically important to America back on line," he said. "The effort to get the refineries back on line is important."

Pierson said the housing will not be for contract workers, but the plants' employees who will first be put to work cleaning up the sites, then return to their regular jobs when the facilities are back in operation. Other plants in line for the temporary housing in the coming days include Dow in Plaquemine and Exxon in Baton Rouge.

Some trailers will be connected to municipal water and electrical hookups, while others are being located at industries that have their own self-contained electrical and water sources.

Department officials said another 20 trailers were en route late Thursday to the Shell complex in Norco.

Pierson said despite Katrina's damages, Louisiana remains "open for business."

LT. GOV. MITCH LANDRIEU

Restart sought for 'cultural' economy

Lt. governor to meet with N.Y. officials

By Rebecca Mowbray
Business writer

Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu will travel to New York today to meet with officials in New York to see how that city's experience managing million of dollars of aid after the 2001 terrorist attacks — and its experience restarting its tourism industry — can help Louisiana, Landrieu said Thursday.

In New York, Landrieu will participate in disaster fund-raising efforts and meet with New York state and city officials on how to make the best use of assistance offers. He also will meet with officials from the Travel Industry Association of America and the Travel Business Roundtable, an industry group headed by Jonathan Tisch, chief executive of Loews Hotels, which has a property in New Orleans.

Landrieu, de facto head of the state's tourism industry in his role as lieutenant governor, said tourism faces a long and difficult road, but can be re-built because the city's cultural assets survived. The French Quarter and other historic areas survived the storm as did the city's unique musical and culinary heritage.

"It's becoming painfully obvious that our cultural assets are critically important to what the city looks like," said Landrieu, who heads an effort to build what he calls Louisiana's 'cultural' economy. "One of the things we learned from this storm is that the things that we took for granted are the most valuable to us."

Landrieu will hold a meeting of tourism leaders on Tuesday in Baton Rouge to announce the state's tourism recovery plan, and said he believes it is possible to get federal money to help promote Louisiana tourism the way New York did after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

He said that it will be a challenge to hang onto the city's musicians, artists and chefs while the city is shut down, but by using the opportunity to rebuild New Orleans while solving its problems, the city can lure back its intellectual assets.

Landrieu added that while New Orleanians are away, they will pick up new ideas from other places that they can bring back to the city, but they'll also realize that New Orleans has things that other cities don't.

"This is a competition," Landrieu said. "At the end of the day, we're competing for citizens."

Westwego officials restarted old pumps

Police kept city together in chaos

By Joe Darby
Staff writer

As Hurricane Katrina took aim at south Louisiana and winds climbed to 60 mph, Westwego Police Chief Dwayne "Poncho" Munch and Councilmen Ted J. Munch and Larry Warino made a final tour of the city on the evening of Aug. 28.

They noticed the water levels in city canals were already rising. "I knew it hadn't rained that much at the time, and the canals shouldn't have been that high," the police chief said.

He soon learned Jefferson Parish had pulled its pump operators out, and the pumps that drain Westwego were not operating. So the chief and the councilmen broke into Westwego Pumping Station No. 1 and turned it on, hoping to save the city from flooding.

Parish officials confirmed that pump operators were among a contingent of essential personnel evacuated just hours ahead of the storm. They said pump stations are not designed to withstand hurricane-force winds and storm surges, and that operators would not be safe.

Ted Munch said that, immediately after the storm passed, he, a city worker and two National Guard soldiers went to a second pumping station, cut the lock on the door and flipped it on as well. The councilman said the storm caused some flooding in parts of the city, but he believed that having the two stations working likely saved the city from more severe flooding.

With the pumping station operating, the police department rode out the storm on the third floor of Worley Middle School, stocked with a good supply of food and water. Anticipating possibly catastrophic flooding on the West Bank, the police tethered boats to the school building. Some of the newer patrol cars were parked on upper floors of the West Jefferson Medical Center parking garage.

"I was hearing that we could get winds of 175 mph, and I told my officers I couldn't be responsible for their safety, and I wasn't going to force them to stay," the police chief said. "But no one left."

During the days following the storm, Westwego police worked long hours with little sleep, performing duties ranging from feeding and protecting about 500 evacuees at Worley to transporting critically ill people to Terrebonne General Hospital in Houma. Poncho Munch estimates about 10 percent of Westwego's 10,500 residents remained in the city during the storm.

The chief's home was damaged by the storm, and he has been living out of his Avenue A office, outfitted with a single bed mattress and a refrigerator next to his desk.

Officers took turns catching a nap in their patrol cars, while another officer parked beside to keep watch. Some police cars suffered "blown engines" because they were used so much, the chief said.

The evacuees were in the school for four days. "We had food and water for them, but they were hot and aggravated," Poncho Munch said.

All telephones in the city were out, and officers had to rely on radios from the department's new mobile command center for communication. Officers put the city on a "lockdown," and only two looting incidents are known to have occurred.

"They had it together and they functioned really well. We all cooperated and worked together with the city," Ted Munch said.

This week, life slowly started returning to normal in Westwego. On Thursday, the city welcomed residents back to cleared streets and open businesses.

"When the people come home and they want to thank somebody, they shouldn't thank the politicians who have been on TV," Munch said. "They should thank the police, the firefighters and the city workers out on the streets for what they did."

HOME IN RUINS

While the water is down in this 9th Ward neighborhood off North Claiborne Avenue, there is little that won't have to be rebuilt from the ground up. As the federal government begins moving 200,000 mobile housing units into Louisiana for Hurricane Katrina evacuees, the Housing Authority of New Orleans has relocated temporarily to Houston and is placing thousands of former city residents who receive public housing assistance into homes throughout Texas. The events highlight the social and economic challenges of returning families and workers to New Orleans, as local and federal authorities struggle to meet the immediate housing needs of displaced citizens while hoping as many as possible can move back to the city in the long term.

Each one of us at MGM MIRAGE stands committed to all our Beau Rivage employees, their families and the entire Gulf Coast community. We have created an internal response team to assist in the recovery from this devastating storm and have established the following initiatives to help provide both short and long term relief:

PAYROLL & BENEFITS

- Payroll and benefits to be retained by all eligible employees through December 6, 2005.
- Co-payments and employee contributions on medical, dental and prescription drug claims are being waived.
- "Out of Network" restrictions on doctors and pharmacies have been lifted.
- 401K contributions will continue to be matched.
- A commitment by Beau Rivage to rehire employees when the resort reopens.

BEAU RIVAGE RECOVERY CENTER

- Now opened in the Beau Rivage employee parking lot.
- Payroll check distribution.
- Assist employees to secure jobs with companies restoring and rebuilding at the resort and throughout the Gulf Coast area.
- Job opportunities matching employees with open positions at other MGM MIRAGE properties.
- Direct Internet access provided to the American Red Cross and FEMA.
- Meals from an on-site Dining Hall.
- Clothing and other appropriate items from the resort's retail warehouses.

RECOVERY FUND

- A special Recovery Fund has been established as part of the company's employee-funded Voice Foundation.
- MGM MIRAGE will make an initial donation of $1 million and also will match, without limit, dollar-for-dollar every employee donation made.
- Funds to be devoted to Beau Rivage employees and their families.

PHIL CAPITANO, Kenner mayor

Kenner, Harahan making slow, steady comeback

Residents putting lives back together

By Matt Scallan
East Jefferson bureau

Henry and Verlee Isaac's University City home in Kenner had flooded before, but Katrina pushed about 5 feet of water into the Tulane Drive residence.

"It's never been this bad before," Henry Isaac said Thursday, the day his city and Harahan officially opened to residents. "We'd get a couple of inches once in awhile, but nothing like this."

"I just don't know what we're going to do."

He was among the residents who rolled in to both cities Thursday, in some cases assessing damage to homes and businesses for the first time.

When Cleveland Fontanille arrived Thursday to his home of 29 years on Holy Cross Place in Kenner, the several inches of water was almost too much to handle.

"I'm supposed to be strong for my family, but this is like some kind of beast on my back," said Fontanille, whose home has never before flooded.

Kenner Mayor Phil Capitano said residents need a chance to begin putting their lives back together.

"Now is the time because the vast majority of the homes have electricity and we have the basic services that people need to live here," he said.

Several grocery stores, drug stores and gas stations are open in the city and more are coming on line soon.

A crew of workers has already been stocking a Radio Shack store at the intersection of Loyola Drive and West Esplanade Avenue. District Manager Moe Moghis, wearing a sweat-soaked black tennis shirt, said the store could be open as soon as today.

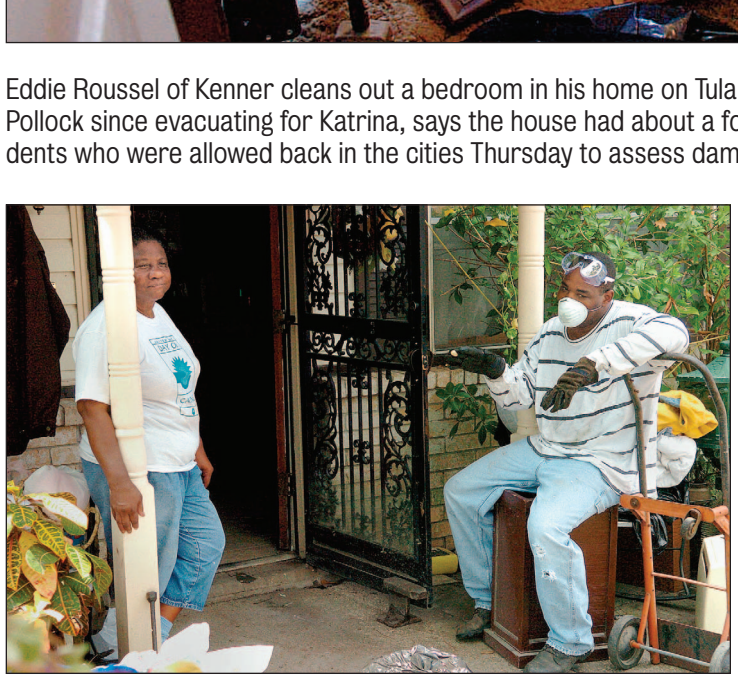
A major problem: finding employees for the five stores that the company plans to reopen in Jefferson Parish.

"We've contacted a lot of our workers who would love to come back, but have no place to live," said Steve Ramsey, a regional manager who came in from Houston to ramp up the chain's operation. "You can tell people that we're hiring."

While some cities are having trouble meeting payroll, Kenner, which has a population of about 71,000, is not because of a $4.6 million surplus.

"We are able to pay our workers, even though we spent an extra $500,000 on overtime for the last two weeks," Capitano said. "We're going to get reimbursed for that, but when? It's not like we're collecting any tax revenue at the moment," he said.

Capitano said that while garbage collection has resumed, the volume is such that collection is behind schedule, partly because Waste Management, the city's garbage contractor, is having trouble rounding up its workers.



Capitano said it will take six to eight months to clean up the storm debris that lines some parts of the city like levees.

Nowhere is that more evident than the Driftwood subdivision, a once-leafy enclave now strewn with fallen oaks and magnolia trees.

Eddie Roussel of Kenner cleans out a bedroom in his home on Tulane Drive on Thursday. Roussel, whose family has been staying in Pollock since evacuating for Katrina, says the house had about a foot of water in it. He was among the many Kenner and Harahan residents who were allowed back in the cities Thursday to assess damage and begin cleaning up.

Barbara Stewart, left, and her son-in-law, Ninas Jenkins, take a break from cleaning out Stewart's home on Tulane Drive in Kenner on Thursday. The house is uninhabitable, so Stewart will be staying in LaPlace until her home is ready.

Gelpi Drive resident Kendra Calamari stood on the edge of her now-muddy backyard swimming pool and pointed out several trees that toppled and punched holes in her neighbors' roofs.

"Look at that. It took up half their yard with it," she saidPolice Chief Nick Congemi said he didn't detect a throng of people returning to Kenner on the first day.

"People need time to pack and get here," Congemi said. "I think we're going to see a lot more in the next few days."

In Harahan, Mayor Paul Johnston wasn't expecting a huge rush of evacuees because many residents had already arrived.

"We worked for the first three days to cut our way through the streets so that Entergy could get in and fix the power lines," he said. "We've been clearing the streets ever since."

"Some people ask why Harahan is a city. This is why," he said. "We were cut off from the rest of the parish for days, but we were able to act on our own, to clear the streets and protect our citizens."

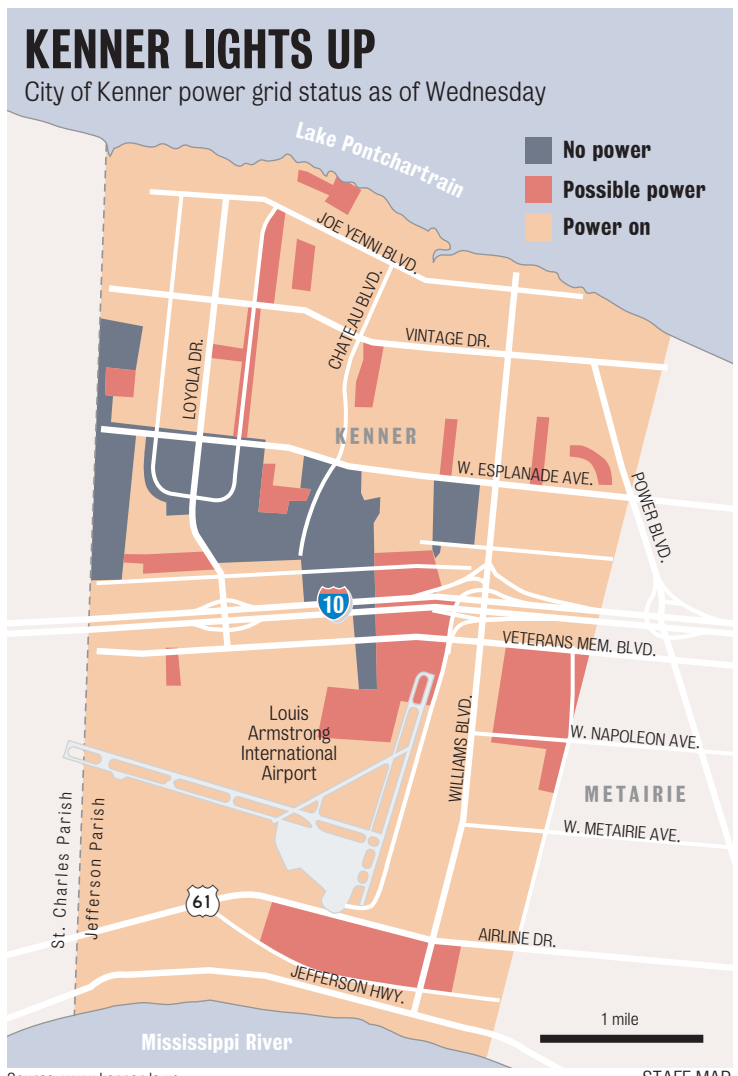
However, Johnston said the city desperately needs money to make payroll.

"I've got a $250,000 payroll next week, thanks to overtime costs, and we don't have that much money in the bank," he said. A normal biweekly payroll totals about $62,000, he said.

He said he needs at least $1 million to pay storm-related expenses, which included commandeering a gas station to fuel city vehicles after the storm.

Grove Avenue resident Kevin Cedor, who arrived Thursday, said he's happy with the way the city looks, even though his backyard shed looks like a crumpled beer can and his roof may have been nicked by a tree.

"It looks a heck of a lot better than it did when I came in last week," he said.



"We were very lucky," said Ashlawn Drive resident Bryn Whatley, as a city contractor scooped up branches to be hauled to the Harahan Playground, which is now a tree cemetery.

Ricky Lehmann of J&W Tree service said he has been working 10 to 12 hours a day every day since the storm to move fallen limbs from the city.

But like the cobbler whose children go barefoot, he hasn't had time to remove the pecan tree that is lying on top of his Houma Boulevard home.

BATON ROUGE — Catholic schools in the Baton Rouge area will open their doors to New Orleans area students, and one closed school may reopen, the Rev. William Maestri, the New Orleans archdiocese's superintendent of schools, told a packed meeting for parents Tuesday night in Baton Rouge.

Maestri told the parents that if they are planning to stay in the Baton Rouge for more than eight or nine weeks, they should enroll their children in local Catholic schools.

However, Maestri said, those students enrolled at parochial schools in Jefferson that have projected opening dates of Oct. 3, and students in St. Tammany, which are slated to open Monday, should not try to enroll in Baton Rouge schools.

St. Jude, St. Teresa, St. George and St. Isidore elementary schools in the Baton Rouge area will expand to accept more students, Maestri said. St. Pius, which is closed, might reopen depending on the need.

Maestri said St. Michaels, a high school in Baton Rouge, will accept 1,000 new students, starting Sept. 19, for evening classes.

Maestri instructed parents who intended to stay in Baton Rouge to fill out forms listing contact information and details regarding their children. He said parents should expect a call from archdiocese officials by the end of the week about placing their children in local schools.

The meeting, held in the Catholic Life Center auditorium, drew more than 500 parents, bearing notepads and pens, many wearing expressions of exhaustion and bewilderment.

Genevieve Rodick, of Lakeview, was frustrated by the lack of information regarding tuition. She already paid for her two children to attend schools in New Orleans and now is having trouble getting her money refunded, she said.

"At this rate, I'm thinking about moving out of the state altogether," she said.

Others worried about the logistics of starting a new school year, given their recent losses.

"I live in north Kenner and everything in the house flooded," said Lisa Giusti, whose daughter is enrolled at Archbishop Chapelle High School in Metairie. "All her books flooded, school shoes flooded, everything. Should we just show up for the first day of school?"

Maestri cautioned parents to avoid becoming anxious at the thought of their children missing a month of school. He said the school year might be extended, or holiday vacations might be eliminated, to make up for missed time.

"You're not going to lose the year," he said.

Maestri said the meeting was a way to assess how many students need placements, and that more information will be available to parents in the future.

"This is to be continued," he said. "This is just our initial assessment and approach."

The dolphins were washed out of the oceanarium's tank during Hurricane Katrina. The staff recovered two injured dolphins earlier in the day and returned to the pod to train the younger dolphins for transport.

JACKSON, MISS. - Two dolphins that were swept from their aquarium tanks into the Gulf of Mexico by Hurricane Katrina were rescued Thursday, but six others remained at sea.

The two rescued dolphins were captured after scientists in a boat coaxed the trained animals into sliding onto mats.

The dolphins had cuts and appeared to be the worst injured of the eight, Jeff Foster, a marine specialist with the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. They were being moved to a hotel swimming pool.

Trainers and scientists hope to catch more of the dolphins on Saturday, but said that may be tougher because the dolphins "get pretty wise to our tricks," Foster said. Nets are also an option, a NOAA spokeswoman said.

The marine mammals had spent much of their lives in captivity at the Marine Life Oceanarium in Gulfport. After Katrina's storm surge washed them away, they were spotted Saturday swimming off Gulfport by NOAA scientists conducting an aerial damage survey.

Scientists worried that the dolphins might not have the instincts to avoid predators and boat traffic.

The dolphins' home had been a 30-foot high tank. The Marine Life Oceanarium was destroyed by Katrina.

Moby Solangi, the aquarium's owner, said the staff had been worried that the dolphins had died. "We are just thrilled that they have stayed together during the past couple of weeks," Solangi said.

70-plus arrested for lootings in Kenner

Congemi: Officers who lost homes sleeping in station

Kenner bureau

Kenner Police Chief Nick Congemi said his department has arrested more than 70 people on looting charges since Hurricane Katrina.

Most of the arrestees were Kenner residents.

"I can understand if someone who doesn't have food or water and see it separated from them only by a pane of glass, but some of these people stole hi-fi's and whiskey," he said. "They are the lowest of the low."

Congemi also said about 15 police officers lost their homes to flooding during Katrina, but are being forced to sleep on air mattresses in the police station because there are no hotel rooms available in the area.

Congemi made the remarks at a Kenner City Council meeting Thursday night. The council approved an ordinance ratifying Mayor Phil Capitano's declaration of an emergency during Hurricane Katrina.

The council set a special meeting for Sept. 22 at 4 p.m. to take up special matters.

Capitano praised city workers who weathered the storm and began the rebuilding.

"As I said, we are still in crisis, but within a few weeks, Kenner no doubt will be thriving again," he said.

NBC, CNN to open full-time bureaus in New Orleans

By David Bauder
AP Television Writer

NEW YORK - Anticipating that the Hurricane Katrina recovery will be a big story for months to come, both NBC and CNN said Thursday they are opening full-time news bureaus in New Orleans.

NBC News said its bureau will operate out of space at WDSU-TV, its local affiliate, and will help the network and MSNBC originate shows in the city. Brian Williams anchored the "NBC Nightly News" from there on Thursday in advance of President Bush's speech.

Frieda Morris, currently chief of NBC's Atlanta bureau who has been living out of a trailer in Biloxi, Miss., since the storm, will be in charge of the New Orleans bureau. NBC had no immediate details on how many people will staff the operation.

CNN said it had obtained office space in downtown New Orleans and is moving equipment, journalists and a production crew there soon. It moved up its announcement by a day after NBC made its news.

"The story of the devastating wrath of Hurricane Katrina will unfold for years to come as the coast recovers and rebuilds," said CNN/US president Jonathan Klein.

PARISH PRESIDENT AARON BROUSSARD

Jeff fully open to residents by Wednesday

Staggered re-entry schedule announced

By Michelle Hunter
East Jefferson bureau

Almost all of Jefferson Parish will be open to residents by Wednesday at 5 a.m., Parish President Aaron Broussard said.

"This is the news that all my Jefferson Parish residents in exile have been waiting for," he said Thursday evening as he announced a plan for staggered re-entry.

Residents of Kenner, Harahan, Westwego, Jean Lafitte and Gretna have already been invited to return home. Because of the devastation in Grand Isle, Broussard said he is letting Mayor David Carmardelle determine his town's re-entry schedule.

The latest re-entry schedule is:

—TODAY

All West Jefferson residents living west of the Harvey Canal.

All east bank residents living south of Airline Drive except those living in the Rio Vista neighborhood in Old Jefferson.

— SATURDAY

All West Jefferson residents living east of the Harvey Canal.

All Metairie residents living between Kenner and Transcontinental Drive.

— SUNDAY

All Metairie residents north of Interstate 10 between Transcontinental Drive and Orleans Parish line.

— MONDAY

Rio Vista residents.

— WEDNESDAY

All remaining Metairie residents living in the area bounded by I-10, Airline, Transcontinental and New Orleans.

Residents may return beginning at 5 a.m. on their scheduled day, Broussard said.

Interstate 10 inbound on the east bank is off limits to the public, but the West Bank Expressway is open, Broussard said. Authorities will enforce a strict curfew of 8 p.m. to 5 a.m.

Rio Vista and the central portion of Metairie are on the tail end of the re-entry schedule because those areas were hit by power outages and flooding from the 17th Street Canal break, Entergy representative Gary Silbert said.

Availability of power and sewerage services also decided the schedule, Broussard said.

As of Thursday, only 10 percent of West Jefferson was without power, 20 percent on the east bank.

As residents return, Broussard said, they will still find scattered utility failures. If the power outages are due to damage to the meter box or the weather head, residents must contact a private electrician.

Now that floodwaters in St. Bernard Parish have gone down, the cleanup is beginning. Crews remove mud Tuesday in the middle of Judge Perez Drive near Palmisano Blvd.

Reflections from St. Bernard Parish

It's been more than two weeks since Hurricane Katrina.

I still don't think I fully understand what has happened. This is just too surreal.

Growing up in St. Bernard Parish, with most of my family from Delacroix Island, we always heard of Hurricane Betsy. Yet Betsy was never real to me. Betsy was a tale from history — the legendary beast from the heavens that left nothing in her path. Now, Katrina, of the new generation of catastrophic heavyweights, has earned her crown.

It's one thing to lose your home, but to lose your entire parish is incomprehensible. Roots can survive rain, but being ripped up and tossed 50 feet is a different problem.

I keep wondering, will another storm follow in 40 years the way Katrina followed Betsy? Will residents again try to ride out Mother Nature's fury?

Like a dysfunctional family, our parish was beaten and battered, then abandoned by the home-wrecking wrath of Katrina. It's an event that may keep us in need of therapy for years, fearing her return or who she will send in her place. Will she give the world of psychology a new phobia?

An intense fear engulfing one's mind every year on June 1: the Katrina complex.

Our homes can't wait

As a resident of Jefferson Parish, I went back to see my home during Labor Day week. However, due to heavy traffic, we did not arrive until much later in the evening than we had planned.

Unfortunately, my house sustained water damage, and mold and mildew has begun to set in. There is much work to be done in my home, including moving heavy furniture, removing carpeting and cleaning the mold and mildew.

Because of the lateness of the hour, we did not get as much accomplished as we had wished. The curfew of 6 p.m. had arrived, and we did not wish to spend the night in our home. As we are staying so far from home, it was not feasible for us to return the next day, which was the last day we could legally return.

Because Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard is not letting us back into our homes for several weeks, the damage will be worse and unfixable. I can understand that he wishes to have everything up and running, but our home is being destroyed in the meantime.

Our home could have been salvaged by now, but it may be too late by the time we can return.

This has me very upset, and I believe we should be allowed to return home sooner.

Rebuild the attractions inland

The only real long-term solution to the destruction of New Orleans would be to faithfully rebuild and replicate the French Quarter inland.

All landmark establishments would have their relocation and construction defrayed. The state and federal governments would recover their investment as tourism soon returned.

I would also suggest that both ends of the replicated French Quarter be anchored by deluxe hotels and malls. This rebuilding would boost both the state and city economies.

Why not a nonpartisan investigation?

I want to know why the media are not talking about this phony investigation that the Republicans support involving Hurricane Katrina. The Republicans want to investigate themselves?

This reminds me of the investigation of 9/11. President Bush wanted to let the foxes investigate themselves until widows of 9/11 came forward and embarrassed him into having a real investigation.

We need a totally independent panel to see what went wrong. Let's learn from our mistakes, move forward and kick out the ones who failed us. How many times can Americans be fed tainted, incorrect information?

So, President Bush, what went wrong?

Jeffrey Levin

FEMA slow to help family

If what my family and I are experiencing dealing with FEMA is indicative of that agency's policies, then God help us all. Everyone at FEMA should be fired, not just the head clown.

We are a middle-class working family. We have paid payroll taxes for 37 years and never asked the government for help before. When Mayor Ray Nagin advised us to evacuate, we did. We left our home in Algiers and have been on the road for more than two weeks, paying as we go for everything out of our pockets. We didn't drive to the Superdome expecting the government to take care of us. We didn't pillage the Dome. We didn't rape anyone. We didn't murder anyone. We didn't loot our neighbors' homes. We did the right thing: We evacuated, despite the fact that I'm awaiting spinal surgery and possible bypass surgery when we return to New Orleans.

Last week on TV we saw the unfortunate people in the shelters in Texas receiving their $2,000 awards from FEMA. It was money badly needed by them and everyone who has evacuated. Unfortunately, some of those receiving the money may be the pillagers, rapists and murders from the Superdome and Convention Center. I went online and filed a claim with FEMA. Twenty-four hours later the response I received online from FEMA about my claim was that "an inspection of my home was necessary."

Since then, I've called FEMA every day to explain that an inspection of my home is a little difficult given we aren't allowed into New Orleans. Every day I've been told their hands are tied. Today I received a new excuse why I wasn't being given the same help as other evacuees: I was told my application was flagged and being held up because my wife and I both work and we make money. Guess we just have to keep digging into our money until it runs out, and then that will force our government to help us.

OUR OPINIONS

Homecoming in sight

An exile that seemed certain to last for months will end in a matter of days for some New Orleans residents, and that has to be the most hopeful development the city has seen since Hurricane Katrina sent Lake Pontchartrain pouring over floodwalls a little more than two weeks ago.

Mayor Ray Nagin released a schedule Thursday for the reopening of specific parts of the city, starting with Algiers Monday and moving through Uptown, the CBD and the French Quarter in subsequent days. The reopening of Algiers will fall on the three-week mark. That's remarkable, considering initial projections that the city would be uninhabitable for three to four months.

The quicker return is a significant step to recovery. New Orleans can't possibly recover without New Orleanians. Getting people back into their homes and businesses wasn't the first priority, but it's just as important to the city's ultimate recovery as getting the floodwater out and the power grid restored.

People have work to do, and they want and need to get started. Not everyone who can return next week will be able to do so immediately. Or they may not be able to stay. The first trip back might be short for many, a journey to seek reassurance, assess damage and grab essential paperwork or personal items that were left behind.

The neighborhoods that are reopening are home to 182,000 people, and Mayor Nagin expects the city will resettle 250,000 during the next three to six months. Returning to the half-million mark will take more time, but he is optimistic.

"I imagine building a city so original, so unique that everybody's going to want to come," he said. That sounds like a description of New Orleans before Katrina hit the city. The many people who loved the city then, those who called it home, are eager to get back now.

As the city begins filling up with people again, New Orleans will no longer seem like a lost world, and we will no longer seem like a lost people. We're counting the days.

In the eye of the beholder

The sights and sounds that make the New Orleans area beautiful, that make it home, are likely to be in short supply for the immediate future. Who knows how long it will be before the smell of roasting coffee or sweet olive wafts through the air instead of the scent of Lake Pontchartrain muck? Before we can boil shrimp instead of boiling water?

We've always had a talent for finding something to celebrate, though, and that's going to help us get through these difficult days. As Mayor Ray Nagin noted, we're longing for the sound of jazz instead of the thump of helicopter rotors, but we also have a new appreciation for mundane things we never stopped to think about before.

Sure, we miss music, but the sound of chain saws is welcome to the ears of St. Tammany Parish residents whose homes and businesses are being liberated from the crushing weight of toppled pine trees. The hum of traffic in Covington andSlidell, the ring of school bells in St. John the Baptist Parish signal thereturn of people and the start of recovery. So, too, do thehand-painted plywood signs going up in front of stores that proclaim them open for business.

Men in camouflage and khaki have never seemed so appealing. A convoy of utility trucks moving down the street is more exciting than any parade. Forget about throwing us something, the return of electricity is thrill enough.

Then there's the wonder of ice. We're not so concerned any more if it's hand-chipped or machine-made. Just as long as it's cold and plentiful. A hot shower is the most decadent pleasure imaginable. And despite the many wonderful meals that live in our memories, anything that hasn't come out of a can or pouch tastes pretty delicious right now.

Contact from a loved one, a decent night's sleep, the prospect of getting back into the city pretty soon — these are the things that buoy our spirits right now. No one doubts that recovery will be an arduous process. But every step, large and small, that gets us closer is something to embrace.

We know, too, that someday we'll be able to take things for granted again, and that will be the sweetest moment of all.

OTHER OPINIONS

Once you fall, you'll never be the same

St. Charles Avenue is empty in the late afternoon Sept. 6. A resident left the sign for passers-by.

Black people have a phrase for the kind of love that's indistinguishable from stupidity. The person so afflicted is said to have his "nose open." If my nose hadn't once been as wide open as a canyon, I may never have set foot in New Orleans.

When people ask me how I ended up in New Orleans, I usually say "a job." It's true that an internship with The Times-Picayune gave me an official excuse to be in the city, but it wasn't the job that drew me to place. I came to New Orleans for a woman, a woman who had been sending plenty of signals that she didn't want me anymore. I pursued her anyway. Stupidity has never been so richly rewarded.

JARVIS DEBERRY

I had been to New Orleans three times before my internship began and had hated the place more with each successive trip. I blamed New Orleans for my girlfriend's waning affection. I felt boring. That wasn't a new feeling at all, but I thought my boringness must have seemed all the more conspicuous to her contrasted against the neon lights of Bourbon Street. New Orleans was stealing my woman, and I hated the place the way I'd hate any romantic competitor.

Still, I moved in. If New Orleans was where the battle for her heart was being waged, I needed to be on the front line. But wouldn't you know it? She's the one who eventually left the city, and I'm the one now writing love songs to it.

New Orleans attracts tourists because of its perceived exoticism. But I chose to call it home because its traditions felt so natural. On return trips to my birthplace in northern Mississippi, I've tried to greet family and friends with a kiss on the cheek. They're expecting a stiff-armed handshake. A place where people don't hug hello now feels foreign to me. Not just foreign, but backwards.

New Orleanians are sometimes criticized for being uninhibited folk. Granted, there's value in some inhibitions — and it would be nice if the city's tourists would observe some now and then — but New Orleanians figured out long ago that emotional restraint and stoicism just aren't natural. Consequently, grown men aren't afraid to call other grown men "baby," and mourners can dance at a relative's funeral without fear of being thought undignified. In fact, there's a greater chance they'd be talked about if they didn't dance.

One Tuesday evening in Treme, I watched the neighborhood throw a parade for a homeless man. He had passed away behind a nearby funeral home. Everybody knew him. So somebody had the idea that they ought to honor his memory. There are places where highfalutin people don't have parades held in their honor. In New Orleans a homeless man was honored. The crowds wouldn't have danced any more jubilantly if he had had a mailing address in Eastover.

Maybe my nose is as wide open for New Orleans as it used to be for the woman who drew me there, but when I stood in Treme last week, I found myself silently agreeing with residents who were defying Mayor Ray Nagin's order to leave town. "If I leave New Orleans, where the hell I'm gon' be after that?" a stalwart Robert Thomas asked me. I interpreted his question two ways. He wanted to know to which mystery location he'd be shipped if he consented to leave, and he was also asking how he could possibly make his home somewhere else or why anybody would think he'd agree to such a thing.

Those who left the city weren't exactly agreeing to go. They left because they could see no other way to make it where they were. Some folks seem not to understand that. Barbara Bush said last week that living in a Texas evacuation shelter was no big deal for some New Orleanians because so many of them were underprivileged anyway.

Leaving home under duress would be catastrophic for any human being, but leaving New Orleans is more stressful still. We love that place with all the tenacity, defiance and ferocity we can muster. Others might find our love of the place incomprehensible, but to us, nothing makes more sense.

Amid ruins, dire questions arise

WAVELAND, MISS. — "What town is this?" I asked the young man standing on the lawn with arms folded.

"Waveland," he says. "Or it used to be."

"It will be again," I assure him.

"I hope so," he says. His tone suggests his expectations aren't particularly high. It's hard to blame him. In Waveland, railroad tracks are ripped from track beds and twisted like plastic bag ties. Cars are stacked in piles and neighborhoods have been stomped flat, peaked roofs sitting atop mounds of rubble maybe 5 feet high. Other houses seem to have simply exploded, leaving nothing but a field of debris.

LEONARD PITTS

I am parked in the driveway of what used to be a home in a very nice neighborhood. The ocean is across the street. Once in a while, cars go by slowly and people look around, faces slack, expressions numb.

Just a few days ago, I might have told them about Hurricane Andrew. I rode out that beast 13 years ago in a bedroom closet. It ripped the roof from the house, drove a tree through my wife's car, took virtually everything we owned.

So I found myself trying to comfort Katrina's victims by assuring them from experience that, although things are difficult now, they will get a little better every day. But the words have come to feel facile. There is no comparison between Andrew and Katrina. The difference between them is the difference between severe damage and total destruction.

To properly understand what has happened in this region, it helps to think in terms larger than "just" a cataclysmic storm. Think in terms of events that altered history, that obliterated cities. Think the San Francisco Earthquake of 1906, or the Great Chicago Fire of 1871, and then realize that this storm destroyed not just one major city, but an entire region, and did so in the poorest quadrant of the country.

There is another area in which Andrew and Katrina do not merit comparison: Government response. The day after I crawled from the wreckage of my home in 1992, the Federal Emergency Management Agency was there with water. Shortly thereafter came low-interest loans and other forms of help.

By contrast, a woman who saw me conducting interviews in Bogalusa, La., seven days after Katrina struck marched up and demanded to know whether I was, finally, the man from FEMA because her house was split in two and she and her husband and children and grandchildren were sleeping on the porch.

President Bush - this would be the same President Bush who failed to react to the storm until two days after it hit - has promised to lead an investigation into the government's laggard response. In other words, the fox has promised to lead an investigation into the slaughter at the henhouse.

Beg pardon, but we need to not play the usual games with this. That's why I'm gladdened by news that Congress has grown a spine and is launching a bipartisan investigation of this tragedy and the botched relief effort that followed. Among the questions that desperately need answers:

It has long been widely known that flooding would bring catastrophe to New Orleans, a city of 484,000 that lies below sea level. What, if any, was the role of local, state and federal intransigence, incompetence or inertia in the failure to strengthen the levees on which the city counted for protection against disaster?

Where was FEMA? Did its incorporation into the Department of Homeland Security hamper its ability to respond quickly to this disaster?

Based on their performance in a natural disaster that had been forecast, why should Americans have confidence in FEMA's or Homeland Security's ability to react quickly to a surprise terrorist attack?

Why were the indigent, the infirm and the old left in the path of the storm?

These are just a few of the questions to which all of us should now be demanding full and forthright answers. We owe at least that much to the people who once lived in the debris field where Waveland used to be.

Gee thanks, Mr. Benson

Word will have spread quickly through the evacuation shelters. For the first time in weeks, the desperate and the dispossessed will have cracked a smile, given one another a high-five and cried, "Good old Tom has come through for us again!"

That's right; it takes more than a killer hurricane to make Tom Benson forget what matters. Some might have contemplated the wreckage and despaired, but Benson's purpose never wavered.

The masses, meanwhile, were no doubt praying that Benson's yacht was docked somewhere far away from Katrina's ravages. But for the millions we have given him in subsidies, he might have taken the Saints far away by now. Let's just hope he doesn't blame us for any losses he suffers from the storm.

Typically, however, Benson was thinking only of the fans. He did not keep us in suspense for long before announcing his plans for fans who had bought tickets for the home games scheduled for the Superdome before it was knocked out of commission.

A less resourceful businessman might have figured that since the fans could no longer receive what they had paid for, they were entitled to a refund. A weaker character might have thanked Providence for his own millions and felt a tad sorry for all the Ain'ts who ain't got a job no more and could really use a few bucks.

But let it not be said that Benson is offering no relief. He has announced that "All current Saints Superdome ticket holders will have the right to apply their funds to tickets in the Alamodome or Tiger Stadium," where the Saints will play their home games this season.

That's right. If you've already paid to see a game, Benson will not dispute your right to attend.

He could hardly be more considerate than that, you might think, but you would be wrong because there is one other option. Those who don't want, or cannot afford, to make the trek to San Antonio or Baton Rouge will be permitted to "apply credits toward the 2006 season."

The Saints' initial reaction to Katrina was to intimate that this might be a good time to pick and move to San Antonio permanently, which certainly made sense if profit is the overriding consideration.

Well, it's something to look forward to when our current woes are over.

The "ticket policy" that Benson has just announced will affect fewer people than it would have a few years ago. Saints ticket sales were so sluggish for this season that, not long before the storm, Benson said he was ready to resume the negotiations with Gov. Kathleen Blanco that he had earlier insisted could wait until next year. Benson wanted to be sure of keeping the entire $186 million promised in a weak moment by Blanco's predecessor Mike Foster and minimize his contribution to renovating the Superdome. He evidently decided that any further delay would weaken his bargaining position as fans grew weary of rising ticket prices and his constant demands for state hand-outs.

He had been whining about the inadequacies of the aging Dome long before Katrina, with an assist from evacuating vandals, left it in ruins. Maybe we will wind up with a superior stadium without any great charge on the public purse if the insurance companies and FEMA are in a sympathetic mood. It won't happen otherwise, because the public purse is more or less nonexistent right now. If we ever could afford to pay for a new or improved stadium, we sure can't now.

The Saints' initial reaction to Katrina was to intimate that this might be a good time to pick and move to San Antonio permanently, which certainly made sense if profit is the overriding consideration.

That seemed a tad heartless so soon after a historic disaster. NFL owners are not a sentimental bunch.

Perhaps we will lose the Saints when this is all over, but, for the moment, talk of relocation has been suspended amid the euphoria of the last-minute victory over the Panthers in the season opener.

Benson must know how much a winning season would mean for the city's morale in these parlous times, and he evidently does not wish to be denounced as a selfish old skinflint when so many are suffering privation.

So he is making it clear how much he sympathizes, announcing that "partial proceeds from all tickets sold" in San Antonio and Baton Rouge "will be applied to the New Orleans Hurricane Katrina Relief Fund."

It just does your heart good.

IT TAKES A MEDIA VILLAGE: Canal Street in the Central Business District has turned into a city of television trucks, satellite dishes and the army of journalists and technical crews that go with them.

AIR PATROL

New Orleans is now occupied by two armies: the military troops who are restoring order, and the TV crews bent on broadcasting the destruction and rebirth of an American city.

THE ONLY MUSIC on Canal Street Tuesday was the drone of gas-powered generators.

Its citizens evacuated, New Orleans belonged to the military and the media.

With floodwater receding and the Hurricane Katrina story entering its third week, finding the TV troops was easy. Several networks have set up base camps on the Canal neutral ground beside the French Quarter. The NBC camp was on a parking lot next to WDSU-Channel 6's Central Business District building.

CBS's outpost — two rented RVs, a satellite uplink truck and a security guard - sat atop rusting streetcar tracks at the intersection of Canal and Galvez.

CBS had a total of about 40 staffers in greater New Orleans, and one of them was correspondent Byron Pitts, who'd arrived in town the Thursday after landfall.

"We were seeing the back end of the worst of it by that time," said Pitts, relaxing for a moment in the cool air inside one of the RVs. Opposite him at the small table, producer Betty Chin reviewed video footage shot earlier that morning. "They were beginning to move people out of the Convention Center. There was still chaos, violence, some looting. Tons of despair."

Pitts, one of several CBS staffers who were embedded with combat units during the first few days of the Iraq war, has covered many disasters, natural and man-made.

He was reporting at the base of the World Trade Center when the first

MY STORM STORY

Hurricane Katrina: In their own words

"I usually ride out hurricanes, but a lady friend I trust said, 'Don't stay.' I left about 1:30 Sunday afternoon. The winds were blowing, and the roads were already clogged. I drove for 17 hours. I zigzagged, would go north and then west. People at every hotel just waved me away through the glass doors. No vacancies anywhere. At 4 a.m, I stopped at a Ramada Inn (in Lake Village, Ark.). I told the clerk, 'Lady, I don't care what it costs, may I just sit on that sofa in the lobby and go to sleep?'

"The next day local churches were bringing food and stuff to the Ramada. The next night I had a room in the family center of the McGehee Baptist Church with an air mattress and a ping pong table turned on its side for a door.

"Now I have an apartment here. I went back to New Orleans to check on things there, and while I was gone, the people here furnished my apartment with new furniture, food and linens.

"My heart is transient now, like everyone else. Something guided me here (to southeast Arkansas). I just went, plop! I have had an amazing human and musical experience here. It's not about a career; it's about being honest with my music, playing sincerely and touching people's hearts. Here, I see so many people giving from the heart. These are not money-generated relationships. They walk the walk.

"I have been asked to play in both traditional Christian churches and black gospel churches. And I always play the piano after I eat in the community hall here. Sometimes I play serene music, and sometimes flat-out ratty raw music, but I think all music is spiritual. There's New Orleans in everything I play. I just have that in me now.

"This is the best time of my life. These honest, caring people are stronger than armies or rulers of countries. They are needed much more than all the negotiations and all the lip service given to peace in this world.

"I heard one of the music ministers here say, 'Katrina has brought the community together.' I might just stay here for awhile and see what I can give back."

Saving Lieutenant Ryan

Former Marine found a different kind of warfare in post-Katrina N.O.

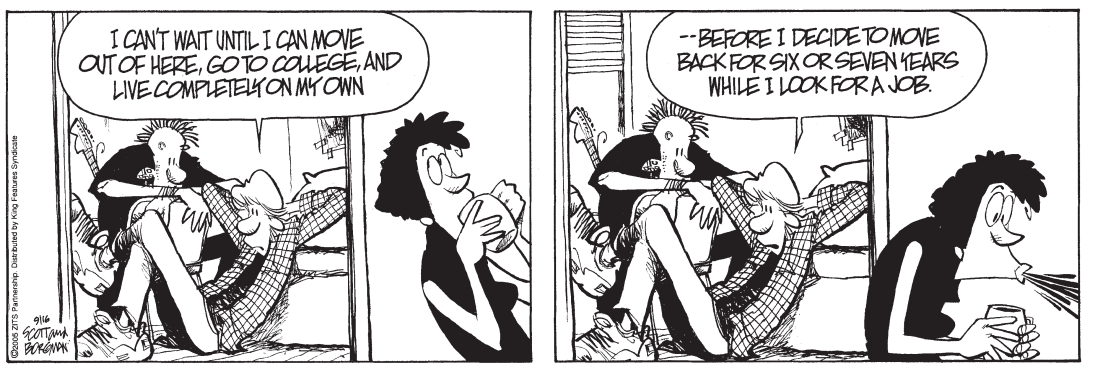
Bill Ryan survived the treacherous jungle warfare of Vietnam. He was wounded three times — so much so that he couldn't return even though he wanted to. He lost an eye, had his shoulder torn up and was awarded three Purple Hearts and a Silver Star during his tour of duty.

The former Marine Corps lieutenant, as anyone who knows the Irish leatherneck would tell you, is the toughest of the tough guys, a survivor who has seen it all — or so he thought.



After dispatching his wife Pam, daughter Meaghan, older son Neal and his new wife Mimi to Louisville, Ky., Ryan and his younger son Andy stayed behind in Uptown New Orleans in the aftermath of Katrina to help neighbors because . . . that's what the Bill Ryans of the world do in life-and-death situations.

tower fell. He covered the Asian tsunami, the Florida Presidential recount, the past Iowa Caucus.

"The thing that surprised me most (about post-Katrina New Orleans), having covered disasters in other parts of the world (in) Central America, Kosovo, Haiti, Indonesia, was the amount of bodies still on the street three days, four days after the hurricane," he said. "That amazed me then and it still amazes me now.

"Even in Third World countries where I've been covering disasters, an effort is made, if not by the government but by the people and certainly by the people in Muslim nations, to bury the dead as quickly as possible.

"Conditions here were horrific, but they've been horrific in other places. I can understand not being able to get bodies in the water, but we saw bodies on I-10, a body mingled with a group of people trying to survive.

"For me, in many ways, that was ... an indication of how overwhelmed the system was - local, state and national."

More overwhelmed than "the system" was after the tsunami, he added.

A comparison between the two disaster scenes seems apt.

"The smell is the same," he said. "Whether it's death in Indonesia or death in New Orleans, death is the same.

"The international response, certainly the American response, seemed far more efficient in Indonesia than it's been here, and it's still that way. Seven days into Indonesia, it was hard to find a community without food and water.

"In New Orleans, it was 10 days and people were still struggling with no food and water."

Pitts' dramatic "CBS Evening News" story the night before had been about the local 911 operators who'd taken the calls from flood victims trapped in their houses as water rose.

Early Tuesday, a piece about the first post-Katrina commercial flight into Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport, complete with audio of the plane's captain welcoming passengers to the ravaged city, appeared to be as good a candidate as any for that night's newscast.

"We're still digging," Pitts said. "Early on it was like picking fish out of a cup. Now we're back in the ocean. Most of the people are gone."

Early in Katrina Week Three, the story had shifted from the micro to the macro, to bureaucrats and blame from search-and-rescue.

"For those of us who like to tell human stories, it's getting a bit more challenging," said Pitts.

Due to rotate out of the city late this week, Pitts, who's on the road for CBS about half the year, said he'd been scheduled to return to Iraq in October, but would probably request a return to New Orleans to check on the recovery.

"I'm an optimist," he said. "When I came here, I didn't think, 'Oh, my God, how awful New Orleans looks.' I thought, "Oh, my God, (look at) how much New Orleans looks like the rest of the world.

"Maybe there's some good in this, if it caused Americans not to be so comfortable, not to be so cocky about where they are in relation to the rest of the world.

"A lot of Americans saw that many parts of this country are one disaster away from being a Third World country. Maybe some good will come of that."

The air conditioning inside WDSU's headquarters was bracing.

Entergy had restored electricity to the building just the day before, and the skeleton-crew "bureau" that had been working there on generator power since the first weekend after Katrina hit had gained that creature comfort, at least.

Air mattresses have become standard-issue newsgathering tools in the past couple of weeks.

Bunking in editing bays, the WDSU New Orleans bureau has pumped out live shots and reported stories for Katrina coverage that has otherwise originated from Jackson, Miss., and Orlando, Fla. — cities in which WDSU's parent company, Hearst-Argyle Television, operates other TV stations.

Sports reporter/anchor Fletcher Mackel rode out Katrina at Harry Lee's command center in Jefferson Parish. He'd left the city when looting near the station prompted management to order everybody out, but he'd returned a few days later and hasn't left since. "I said, 'If I don't go back, I may quit,' " he said. "I was born and raised here. I had to come back and see what it looks like.

"The third day here, we saw a body floating down Elysian Fields. We've seen some horrible stuff, rough to see.

"I've seen a lot of good people coming back to do a lot of good things. A lot of good things.

"I've seen people who are so optimistic. What you want to feed off of, I guess, is that optimism." In addition to reporting, Mackel has been trying to reach his mother's home near the lake.

"That's been an ongoing thing, trying to get to my childhood home," he said.

Mackel said he'd broken down only one since Katrina hit, while watching the NBC benefit special that featured New Orleans musicians like Harry Connick Jr. and Wynton Marsalis playing New Orleans music.

"I think I'll have another breakdown when my mom gets to her house," he said. "She was a big picture-taker. For 30 years, me, my brother, my dad who's not alive anymore."

Mackel, whose father, Frank, was a beloved local golf pro, said his mother had moved a lot of her pictures onto the dining room table and the pool table, but the water in her home was still much higher than that. "When I go into her house, the house I grew up in, and see the pictures of me and my brother, I think I'll have another little moment," he said.

Lately, WDSU News Director Anzio Williams has been badgering Mackel to rotate out of the city, take a breather.

"I told Anzio, 'Where am I going to go?' " Mackel said. "My brother's in Orlando. My mom's safe in Austin, Texas. My home stinks because it had water. Her home is still underwater. My friends have all evacuated. I have nowhere else to go."

• • • • • •

In the parking lot behind WDSU, a catering truck was serving lunch to NBC's New Orleans deployment - and clouds of black flies.

Up walked Chris Matthews, MSNBC political analyst/animal and who was in town to do a few days of "Hardball" live feed.

A former speechwriter for Jimmy Carter who also worked as an aide to Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill, Matthews has fond memories of covering the 1988 Republican convention in New Orleans for the San Francisco Examiner.

He has a visitor's deep affection for the city, which, he said, you'd have to put among the great American cities you'd count on one hand.

Fascinated, no surprise, by the political implications of the enormous recovery effort that will take place in New Orleans over the next however long it takes, Matthews said that securing the city from future storms should be an engineering feat worthy of a tourism following of is own.

Citing Holland's water-control system, Hoover Dam and even the Panama Canal, Matthews proposed turning the massive task of waterproofing New Orleans into a new wonder of the engineering world.

More urgent, he said, is picking the perfect person to lead the overall recovery effort.

A lot of towns take "perverse pride" in civic corruption, he said.

But New Orleans and Louisiana will have to rehabilitate that undeniable trait for the coming rebuild effort to succeed. The city's continuing existence now rides as much on the purity of political will as it does on drainage pumps and dump trucks.

Monitoring the effort will be the local media's biggest job, bigger than covering the storm itself.

If recovery money is treated like spoils, New Orleans is doomed. "Politics is a spectator sport," Matthews said, "until you're given the football."

coal. It was so hot you couldn't sleep. There were running bands of thugs better armed than we were."

But the Ryan boys stayed to help neighbors and friends. There were cars and driveways blocked by trees and branches. The Ryans had chainsaws, so they went to work.

"It was amazing," he said. "I'm a pretty tough bird, but my son Andrew was one of the greatest troopers I've ever seen. He worked 12 to 14 hours a day with a chainsaw. We were like the neighborhood chainsaw brigade except we carried (weapons) with the chainsaws."

That allowed neighbors to get into their cars and flee.

One neighbor, Hal Roark, didn't have a car. Ryan gave him his daughter's car and a sidearm. That car also carried Tommy Lemann and his wife, author Sheila Bosworth.

"They almost got carjacked," he said.

"There were prowlers all through Uptown. They demolished Magazine Street, Perlis, Gentry, Whole Foods. At night, Andy and I were on the back porch with shotguns and side arms. It was amazing. I'm talking to a kid who's never talked to me about Vietnam — ever. I'm 60 and he's 25 and he's asking me what it was like. I told him — up to a point."

Ryan said he told Andy as they lay on the floor in the darkness, "Son, we may have to shoot our way out of this. If they come in, you shoot the first shot up in the air. Then you lower the guns and shoot."

Mercifully, it never came to that.

Ryan said there was a lady with her kids in a house nearby. One car had two flat tires and no spare and the other had a dead battery and no gas. They swapped things around and got them out.

They heard sporadic gunfire at night, but it was all small arms fire. "It wasn't like there was anyone shooting cannons at you," Ryan said. "But everyone we saw who had stayed was openly carrying weapons. It's not quite the way we think of Uptown.

"One of the craziest things of all," he said, "is that we didn't see a policeman or National Guardsman for three days in Uptown New Orleans — you didn't see anybody."

Amazingly, at Ryan's home near Audubon Park, one old land-line phone worked.

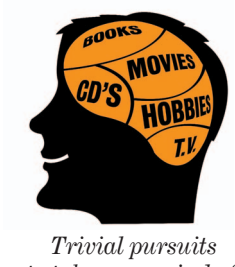
"We had the only phone working in the whole neighborhood. People were queuing up in the back yard to use it once they found out. And that old land line — it never went down."

The Ryans gathered up some prized possessions and even recovered from a neighbor's house the wedding dress of the neighbor's daughter, who is engaged. They packed all that and three dogs into their car and finally hit the road on Thursday morning around 11 a.m. They made their way to River Road, then got over the Huey P. Long Bridge and headed to Louisville.

That, he said, "was the first time we saw any police or military presence."

"I spent many nights crying," he admitted. "It's unbelievable. I'm from New York but this is my home. I've been here more than 30 years. I spent lots of time thinking how I am going to help rebuild this city."

Ryan is a lawyer and businessman. And he is also the ultimate can-do guy. Surrounded by enemies, death and danger 37 years ago on foreign soil, surrounded by the same in his hometown today, Ryan remains undaunted. His city will come back.



"Situations like this don't build character," he said. "Situations like this bring character out."

The Hornets toured evacuation centers Thursday, bringing supplies and, perhaps just as important, a much-needed sign of hope to thousands of misplaced fans

BAKER — Hornets forward David West, a black baseball cap sitting slightly askew atop his head, wandered around the evacuation shelter at the Bethany World Prayer Center, his countenance bewildered.

Strewn around the floor of the building that once housed more than 1,000 displaced New Orleanians, a figure that's now about 400, were mattresses and pillows, and the few worldly possessions that remained of families who once lived in areas such as the Lower Ninth Ward, Gentilly, Chalmette and parts of Plaquemines Parish.

"I can't even put it into words," said West, who rode out the storm in Raleigh, N.C., and had seen some of the evacuees who'd been brought to that city in the days after Hurricane Katrina washed over metro New Orleans. "There were 65-, 70-year-old people who have to start from scratch. It's nuts . . . people don't have anything anymore."

Just then, an elderly man, whose eyes reached about chest level on the 6-foot-8 West, offered a bit of levity that brought a smile to West's face.

"How's the weather up there?" asked Howard Lockwood, who once lived on Lloyds Avenue in Chalmette.

"Good," West said. "How is it down there?"

West, along with teammates P.J. Brown, Chris Andersen, Chris Paul and Brandon Bass, accompanied by owner George Shinn and a dozen or so other Hornets employees, toured that shelter and two others in the Baton Rouge area Thursday, handing out boxes full of NBA hats, T-shirts, school supplies and dozens of autographs to just some of displaced individuals who remain homeless.

In all, the Hornets brought two 18-wheel tractor-trailers that were packed with supplies for distribution to various shelters.

"I can't even put it into words. There were 65-, 70-year-old people who have to start from scratch. It's nuts . . . people don't have anything anymore."

The players said they were inconvenienced, more than impacted, by the storm, save for Brown, whose Slidell home was looted in the days following Katrina's landfall.

But each empathized with the plight of those less fortunate and the city that the Hornets have called home since 2002.

"I was in the process of having a house built in English Turn," said rookie Chris Paul, whose home may not have been affected. "It's just unbelievable. It's such a tragedy. People back home (in North Carolina) are always asking me, 'How's your house?'

"You can replace houses. You can't replace people. I mean, it's left me speechless. I was talking to P.J. about it. When the storm hit, I just kept it on CNN and watched the whole thing. Just seeing Canal Street,

Jefferson schools may merge into one district

Proposal faces several hurdles from principals

By Mike Strom
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Jefferson Parish Public Schools have a possible option to merge their five Class 5A football teams – Bonnabel, Ehret, Higgins, King and West Jefferson - into one district and compete for championship honors this season if the schools can regroup in time to field teams.

To be reunited, though, the Jefferson schools must clear four hurdles.

First, principals at Assumption, Destrehan, East St. John and Hahnville must agree by majority vote to release Ehret and West Jefferson from District 5-5A by voiding the current district schedule and adopting a new one that involves games between the four remaining teams.

Second, Bonnabel, Higgins and then would have to accept Ehret and West Jefferson into what remains of District 7-5A, void their current schedules and adopt a new schedules involving all five Jefferson schools. Abramson, Easton, McDonogh and Reed are the other members of District 7-5A, but those Orleans Parish public schools will not field teams this season.

Third, the five Jefferson schools also would have to be certain that their football teams can resume play by Oct. 7, the sixth playing date of the regular season, in order to a complete a four-game district schedule, with the champion advancing to the state playoffs.

Once those three criteria are met, the Louisiana High School Athletic Association executive committee would have to approve the revised District 7-5A that would operate only for the 2005 football season.

The possibility of Jefferson reuniting its five Class 5A schools surfaced Thursday during a special meeting of the executive committee. Jefferson Parish Public Schools athletics director Manny Barocco met with LHSAA commissioner Tommy Henry on Wednesday and appeared before the committee Thursday to explore what options were available to the Jefferson schools, which are

Saints' smooth offense impresses Coughlin

Simplified schemes improve production for New Orleans

By John Reid
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — It wasn't just the Saints' intensity that caught New York Giants coach Tom Coughlin's attention when he reviewed game tape from New Orleans' 23-20 victory last Sunday against the Carolina Panthers.

Coughlin, who will guide his team against the Saints on Monday night at Giants Stadium, noticed very quickly how well the Saints executed offensively.

They went into the red zone four times and scored twice. They kept the ball for 32 minutes, 36 seconds, compared with the Panthers' 27:24.

Their offensive line was physical, helping tailback Deuce McAllister rush for 64 yards on 26 carries.

Quarterback Aaron Brooks didn't force passes, patiently waiting for his receivers to break open. And if Brooks' wide receivers were covered, he looked for other targets.

"They do crank it up and run the football, I think, very well," Coughlin said. "But all I look at is 18-of-24 for 192 yards and no interceptions (by Brooks). I think that speaks well for the style in which they are playing, and winning time of possession as well."

That new style comes from Mike Sheppard, who was promoted to offensive coordinator in the offseason after three seasons as the team's quarterbacks coach.

Sheppard's playbook is much thinner now than that of former offensive coordinator Mike McCarthy, now with San Francisco 49ers. Gone are the complicated motion sets and trick plays. Now it's mostly basic plays and basic reads.

"We do the same things over and over,

Tigers' Pelini has faith defense will come around

Coaches certain performance against ASU was anomaly

By Jim Kleinpeter

BATON ROUGE — LSU defensive players spoke with a measure of relief before last Saturday's delayed season opener against Arizona State.

No longer saddled with the mental baggage of former coach Nick Saban's high-tech defenses, defenders were ready to let it rip under the simplified plan of new coordinator Bo Pelini.

But in the course of allowing 560 yards - 461 passing - in a 35-31 victory, the Sun Devils did the ripping while LSU defenders at times looked more confused than in their worst moments under Saban.

LSU coach Les Miles chalked it up mainly to a first-game shakedown combined with a quality opponent. Players blamed themselves; Pelini laid it on coaching for not getting the message across. One thing Pelini didn't blame was the system.

LSU fans might already be drawing parallels between Pelini and Lou Tepper, whose stint as defensive coordinator in 1998 precipitated the fall of Coach Gerry DiNardo a year later. Opponents ran roughshod over the defense Tepper installed, helping to end a streak of three straight winning seasons. Might it be happening again? Don't bet on it, Pelini says, and don't expect wholesale changes.

"I believe in my system, I believe in what we do," said Pelini, who joined LSU after stints at Nebraska and Oklahoma the past two years. "It's not neces-

Volunteers face familiar foe with a new look

PETER FINNEY

College game of the week?

That would be Tennessee-Florida.

Yes, the Vols are ranked higher than the Gators in two major polls, No. 5 to No. 6 by The Associated Press, No. 4 to No. 7 by the coaches.

So why are the Gators favored by a touchdown?

Two reasons.

They're playing in Gainesville.

And Urban Meyer is the Florida coach.

After only four years as a head coach, two at Bowling Green and two at Utah, Meyer became the hottest ticket in the land coming out of the 2004 season after taking the Utes to a 12-0 record and a No. 4 ranking in the final polls, doing it with a spread-the-field, guns-away offense that ran up 582 yards against Texas A&M, 669 against North Carolina and a 35-7 runaway win against Pittsburgh in the Fiesta Bowl. It embellished an already-impressive resume'.

Notre Dame, which fired Tyrone Willingham believing school officials could attract Meyer, had to accept New England Patriots assistant Charlie Weis as a consolation prize which, at the moment, doesn't seem that shabby a choice.

Still, in college circles, Meyer remains the golden boy of 2005. On Saturday, he'll be facing a polar opposite in Phil Fulmer, as conservative as Meyer is wide open, a coach who has seen 35 head coaches in the SEC come and go during his 12 seasons in Knoxville, a longevity that has made him the dean of SEC coaches.

What does Fulmer think of Meyer?

"Their offensive scheme is a proven scheme," said Fulmer. "It's effective if you have the right people running it."

Last year running things for Meyer was Alex Smith, taken by the San Francisco 49ers with the first pick in the 2005 draft. This year Chris Leak, who came into the season with 45 touchdown passes, is in charge of an offense that places the quarterback in a shotgun setup that includes the option, shovel passes, reverses and lots of motion.

knowing I was there just a few days before the storm and seeing all those stores I went in being under water. Unbelievable."

Andersen's home on the West Bank had some wind damage, he said.

"But it's nothing like these people here," Andersen said. "I don't even worry about that. It's material things, minor things. I just want to be here to support all these people because they support us. A lot of people lost family members. That's got to be a more excruciating pain than just losing a house."

"It's hard to see all of this," said Bass, a former LSU player whose family lives in the Baton Rouge area. "This is big, but it's little, too. With the help of God, anything is possible. I think eventually, everybody will be all right."

VENUE UPDATE: Sources familiar with the process said the NBA will file a mostly favorable report on the Pete Maravich Assembly Center as a possible site to host up to a dozen Hornets games this season, splitting time with Oklahoma City as a home court until the team can move back into New Orleans Arena.

A tour of the PMAC was completed Wednesday, as well as possible practice sites for the displaced Hornets by team representatives and Peter Fink, the NBA's vice president of NBA events and attractions.

Fink was scheduled to forward his findings to league headquarters Thursday.

An announcement from the Hornets and the league as to just how the schedule will break down, and what games will be held in Oklahoma City and Baton Rouge, could be forthcoming early next week, Shinn said Thursday.

With damage to the team's New Orleans Arena home said to be minor enough that the building may be operational by the NBA All-Star break, Shinn said he'd like nothing better than to play some games there under the right circumstances.

"I just got off the phone with (NBA commissioner) David Stern and he'd just spoken with the mayor (Ray Nagin)," Shinn said. "I've spoken to David every day. He's been a real rock to me through this whole situation. He's assured me they're going to stand behind us the whole way and make the right decision.

"When we come back and what we do is a real good question. We're looking at Oklahoma City and here in Baton Rouge. Playing in the Arena has good and bad possibilities. If we could do it in a way that we'd have a full crowd, it would be ecstatic. If we have 1,500 people, it would be horrible. That might send a signal there was no hope there."

Vols fans slam LSU over game time against Tigers

"It's different from what Florida ran with Steve Spurrier," said Fulmer. "The way they run the option makes it different."

It's an option that involves the principles of a quarterback running the Veer attack, one that puts the quarterback at risk, suggesting Leak will be a prime target for punishment against a veteran Tennessee defense.

Let's say this for the Vols. They're looking at the kind of schedule – back-to-back road games against Florida and LSU – that Nick Saban faced last year when, during a four-week span, the Tigers traveled to Auburn, Georgia and Florida.

Right now, in the post-Hurricane Katrina atmosphere, you already have some Tennessee fans giving LSU grief over the 6:45 p.m. starting time of next week's game in Tiger Stadium.

Tennessee officials pushed for an afternoon kickoff to allow Vol fans more time to travel out of a city jammed with evacuees. The kickoff was set by ESPN and will remain at 6:45.

Tennessee's side: It's wrong for LSU to want a night game.

AP PHOTO

Urban Meyer's spread option is a new wrinkle that Tennessee will have to contend with when it faces SEC East foe Florida.

UT fans can't get a hotel. LSU can provide a level playing field.

An LSU fan put it this way: "We could care less about how UT fans feel slightly inconvenienced. Imagine this scenario: A UT fan travels to Tiger Stadium and, upon returning to Tennessee, finds that he won't be able to go home for six months. He won't even be allowed to get back to his home and gather personal belongings. And he faces the uncertainty of not knowing if he has anything left. This is what hundreds of thousands of Louisiana residents are facing. This is about life in Louisiana getting back to normal and a big part of that is Saturday night in Tiger Stadium."

N.O. Bowl vows to play on, maybe in Lafayette

Sports Foundation has had 'preliminary talks' with ULL officials

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

Lafayette is the first choice for a relocated New Orleans Bowl, said executive director Billy Ferrante of the Greater New Orleans Sports Foundation.

Ferrante said Thursday that the foundation intends for the game to be played this year despite the unavailability of the Superdome and even though he has just begun exploring alternative sites.

"We have had some very preliminary talks with the folks at Louisiana-Lafayette, and our first choice is to keep the game in Louisiana," he said. "Hopefully we will have a decision wrapped up in a couple of weeks."

The 5-year-old bowl matches the champion of the New Orleans-based Sun Belt Conference against a team from Conference USA. ULL is a Sun Belt member. This year's game is scheduled for Dec. 20.

Sun Belt commissioner Wright Waters said his office and C-USA had been prepared to take over the game this year but applauded Ferrante's decision.

"That's what's best for everyone," Waters said. "It's good to know that the Sports Foundation is up and running. We're very interested in hearing their plan, but we'll do whatever we can to make this work."

Waters also said he favored Lafayette for the game.

"First off, it's one of our conference members," he said. "And beyond that, Lafayette is a city with plenty of amenities to entertain the teams and fans."

Ferrante said any decision on the bowl's future beyond this year will depend on the restoration of the Superdome, a project that is expected to take at least a year if it's done at all.

"This is the Sports Foundation's signature event," he said. "And we want to be part of the rebuilding of New Orleans. It may mean we have to relocate some of our other events around the state in the coming year, but we're going to stick around."

Waters and some staff members have relocated the Sun Belt offices to Tuscaloosa, Ala. Waters said he intends to inspect the conference offices in the Pan-American Life Building next week, but he is uncertain when the league might move back to New Orleans.

THE WORLD OF SPORTS

NFL

GIANTS SAY STADIUM DEAL NEAR: The New York Giants say they are close to deals for a new football stadium at the Meadowlands Sports Complex to be owned and operated jointly with the New York Jets. The announcement Thursday came as the Giants submitted a revised plan for a new stadium to the Jets and the New Jersey Sports and Exposition Authority, which runs the Meadowlands. The Giants and Jets are tenants at Giants Stadium. The plan was delivered a day before the sports authority is to consider whether to recommend that New Jersey walk away from its agreement with the Giants on a new stadium. That opinion could hinge on whether the Giants reach an accord with the Jets, who have proposed a design of their own for the Meadowlands. The Jets appeared to have a different view of the status of negotiations. "I think at this point we are far apart," spokeswoman Marissa Shorenstein said. The 80,000-seat stadium and adjacent practice facility proposed by the Giants would cost $800 million and be paid for by the teams, said John K. Mara, the Giants' chief operating officer. It is designed to accommodate a retractable roof, at a cost of about $200 million more, which Mara said he hoped the state and NFL would help pay for.

ROETHLISBERGER QUESTIONABLE: Pittsburgh Steelers quarterback Ben Roethlisberger was downgraded to questionable because of a bruised knee bone. Thursday's practice is considered the most important of the week by the Steelers, and players who don't practice or practice little often are held out of games. Roethlisberger didn't practice Wednesday and had limited work Thursday. "He worked a little bit, but not as much as I hoped he would," coach Bill Cowher said. "There's not really any kind of setback. ... His status is day to day." If Roethlisberger can't play, backup Tommy Maddox will start at Houston.

FALCONS LOSE CB: Atlanta cornerback Kevin Mathis tore the anterior cruciate and medial collateral ligaments in his left knee during practice Wednesday. Mathis, 32, is out for the season. Atlanta placed Mathis on the season-ending injured reserve list and signed Christian Morton off Washington's practice squad. Coach Jim Mora indicated Mathis will undergo reconstructive surgery early next week.

BAILEY BETTER: Denver Broncos cornerback Champ Bailey, who hasn't missed a game in his seven-year NFL career, practiced in pads and said he expects to keep the streak going Sunday against San Diego despite a dislocated shoulder. "If I'm in pads during the week, I'm probably going to play," Bailey said. "So, there's no doubt that I'll probably be out there. As long as I don't have any setbacks, I'll be fine." Bailey has started all 97 regular-season games since he entered the league in 1999.

NINE FINED: Nine players were fined for their roles in a fight before Monday night's game between the Eagles and Falcons, with Atlanta defensive tackle Chad Lavalais drawing the biggest fine – $7,500 – for a hit on Donovan McNabb. Lavalais was fined for using his helmet on McNabb, who hurt his chest on the play. McNabb is questionable for Philadelphia's game Sunday against San Francisco because of the injury. For the pregame fight, which resulted in Falcons cornerback Kevin Mathis and Eagles linebacker Jeremiah Trotter being ejected before kickoff, both players got $5,000 fines. Also receiving a $5,000 hit was cornerback DeAngelo Hall for unsportsmanlike conduct for grabbing an opponent's facemask and then throwing the opponent's helmet. Two Falcons were fined $2,500 for entering a fight area, which made them active participants: safety Keion Carpenter and cornerback/kick returner Allen Rossum. Safety Kevin McCadam was fined $1,000. Along with Trotter, the three Eagles fined for entering a fight area were linebackers Keith Adams, Jason Short and Mike Labinjo.

McNABB IMPROVES: Philadelphia Eagles quarterback Donovan McNabb practiced for the first time this week after suffering a chest injury Monday against the Atlanta Falcons. McNabb said he felt a little sore, though he reiterated the injury won't keep him out against the San Francisco 49ers on Sunday.

BILLICK: BOLLER'S THE MAN: The toe injury that forced Kyle Boller out of Sunday's game against Tennessee will not cost him his job as the Baltimore Ravens starting quarterback. Eager to clarify his remark Wednesday that Anthony Wright "will be our starting quarterback until circumstances change," Coach Brian Billick emphasized Thursday that his confidence in Boller has not waned. "Kyle Boller is our starting quarterback," he said. "If Kyle is able to return in the two- to three-week prognosis that we currently have, he will be our starting quarterback." Boller could be available to face the New York Jets on Oct. 2, which follows the Ravens' bye week. "Anthony Wright is the starter for an undetermined period right now due to injury," Billick said. "Kyle Boller is our starting quarterback. If I left it open to interpretation, if I left that in a way that led to speculation that we did not have the faith in Kyle, that our faith is wavering, that was not my intent." Boller hyperextended his right big toe and injured his ankle in last Sunday's 24-7 loss to Indianapolis. He is wearing a protective boot.

COLLEGE FOOTBALL

SPARTANS RB MAY RETURN: Michigan State running back Jason Teague could play Saturday against Notre Dame after being suspended for last week's game against Hawaii. Teague will travel with the team and is expected to be in uniform for Saturday's game at No. 10 Notre Dame, Michigan State associate athletic director John Lewandowski said Thursday. Teague is not listed on the team's depth chart. Teague had 89 yards and a touchdown on 15 carries in Michigan State's 49-14 win over Kent State on Sept. 3.

FSU–MIAMI TO OPEN ON ESPN: Florida State and Miami will again open their seasons against each other on Labor Day in 2006, but ESPN will be televising the game in prime time instead of ABC, which has carried the game the past two seasons. A week after the Sept. 4 game between the Seminoles and Hurricanes, ESPN will begin airing NFL Monday Night Football. The Florida State-Miami game was moved to the start of the season in 2004, when the Hurricanes joined the Seminoles in the Atlantic Coast Conference. Last year's game was scheduled to be played in the Orange Bowl on Labor Day night but had to be pushed back because of Hurricane Frances.

REBELS ADD MIZZOU: Ole Miss' first meeting with Missouri in 27 years highlights the Rebels' 2006 football schedule, Athletic Director Pete Boone said. The Rebels will play the Tigers on Sept. 9, 2006, in Columbia, Mo., in the first meeting between the schools since 1979. Missouri, a Big 12 member, will visit Oxford on Sept. 8, 2007.

NBA

MINNESOTA HIRES ASSISTANTS: The Minnesota Timberwolves hired Bob Thornton, Rex Kalamian, Vince Taylor and Aleksandar Dzikic as assistants to coach Dwane Casey. The four join former Orlando head coach Johnny Davis on Casey's staff. The team also announced that Brent Haskins has been promoted to assistant coach-advance scout.

CLIPPERS SIGN GUARD: Free agent guard Yuta Tabuse, the first Japanese-born player to appear in an NBA game, has signed with the Los Angeles Clippers. Tabuse, who played at BYU-Hawaii, averaged 1.8 points and 1.0 rebounds in 4.3 minutes over four games with Phoenix last season. Tabuse, 5 feet 9 and 165 pounds,scored a career-high seven points in 10 minutes in the Suns' opener against Atlanta. Tabuse, who turns 25 next month, was released by the Suns on Dec. 18, and later played with Long Beach of the ABA, where he averaged 9.0 points and 6.3 assists in 12 games.

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL

YOUNG BACKS OFF: Tampa Bay Devil Rays prospect Delmon Young said Thursday that critical statements he made about the organization for not promoting him to the majors this month were not aimed at players on the last-place team. "I never meant any disrespect to the Devil Ray players. I have nothing but the highest respect for these guys and I know how hard they have worked to get there," the 19-year-old outfielder said in a statement. "I am just so frustrated that the team would not give me the opportunity to play with and against the best players in the game, so that I could continue to learn and develop in the major league environment." Young, the brother of Detroit's Dmitri Young, was named Baseball America's Minor League Player of the Year this week, and during a conference call with reporters he expressed unhappiness over not being promoted at the end of his season. Asked why he felt he was not called up, Young replied: "The only thing I can think of is they're being cheap. When it comes to free agency, no use trying to stay around there for the long haul," he added. "Get your six years and leave." Young said some of his remarks had been "twisted" in a way that distorts what he was trying to say.

Independence Bowl making Tulane at home

Shreveport pulls out stops for Wave's season opener

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

RUSTON — It was a sign of normalcy. Off Interstate 20 in Shreveport, next to Independence Stadium, an electronic billboard read: Tulane vs. Mississippi State. Saturday 7 p.m.

Tulane football players peered at the sign as their bus zoomed by on Monday. It was, finally, game week. For the folks at the Independence Bowl, normalcy comes in December. But they have opened their doors – er, gates – to the Tulane football family. And that means it's game week for them, too.

"With this one, the only thing that's been challenging has been the turnaround time," said Missy Setters, interim executive director of the Dec. 30 bowl. "You don't have a lot of time to get everything set up and situated for it. But we're used to doing a bowl game, so everyone on the staff is very skilled and experienced in what they do. So you just draw on that and kick it into bowl-week mode."

The Independence Bowl staffers aren't the only workers putting in overtime this week. Conference USA, the city of Shreveport and Tulane employees have united their resources to put on a Tulane home game in a stadium 341 miles from Tulane's home.

"In terms of operations of the stadium, it will all be Shreveport," said Shreveport chief administrative officer Ken Antee, who estimated 100 city employees will assist Saturday.

Tulane can bring in only a portion of its normal game-day staff. So C-USA will assist.

"When you look at the overall picture, Tulane brings their staff in from all over the place," said Russ Anderson, C-USA's assistant commissioner. "And they haven't played in this stadium. Everyone's very appreciative of the help that the Independence Bowl people are giving. A lot of the people involved, running the game operations, have never been in that stadium. ... But if we're organized, we'll be able to minimize the glitches."

C-USA unveiled a marketing plan Wednesday, hoping to persuade locals to attend the game. Fifteen radio channels have aired promotional ticket giveaways. And Tulane's sports information staff, as well as C-USA's media relations staff, have fed press releases and information to North Louisiana media outlets.

But who is going to come?

Dan Holden doesn't know for sure. Tulane's director of ticket operations has been working out of Shreveport with minimal resources. His office was inundated by floodwaters.

"I pretty much don't have anything," he said.

Among the items back home are thousands of tickets already purchased, which were set to be mailed the first week of September. But Holden did obtain one file with season ticket-holder information. He has been working the phones, calling fans and receiving calls from people who bought tickets, didn't get them, but want to come to Shreveport.

"The fans who can come will come to the will-call window," said Holden, who said about 12,000 season tickets have been sold for this season.

Tulane communicated with Ticketmaster – where tickets can still be purchased online – and had new printed tickets sent to Shreveport this week. Holden said about 1,000 tickets have been sold through Ticketmaster.

Mississippi State fans purchased 2,700 tickets, and Holden said he expects "a couple thousand more" fans to show up Saturday night.

"I think it will be a huge walk-up crowd, and a last-minute thing for people in Shreveport," he said. "We're really dependent on that.

"I don't know how many of our season ticket-holders are going to come – I don't know if we'll get 500 season ticket-holders or 5,000. I'm going to say (a total attendance of) 15,000 to 20,000 is realistic."

"Hopefully, we can get a big crowd out there," Antee said, "because God knows those kids deserve it."

Tulane will gain the majority of profits from Saturday's game. The city of Shreveport offered the stadium free. Mississippi State waived the $200,000 fee Tulane owed it for the game. There will be a telethon during the game. At the stadium, Tulane will get ticket money and a percentage of parking money and concessions.

And, of course, the game-day normalcy is priceless.

WTIX CAN'T AIR TU GAME: Tulane's football game with Mississippi State on Saturday night at Shreveport's Independence Bowl Stadium will not be broadcast over its flagship radio station in New Orleans.

WTIX 690-AM will be unable to air Tulane's opener because of damage caused by Hurricane Katrina, according to ISP Sports Network.

"They've got some technical issues that will prohibit them from broadcasting," said Taylor Durham, ISP's recruiting manager, who handles the southeast region. "I think TIX is an integral part of our coverage, and we're looking forward to getting them back on the air. We will carry every major market (in Louisiana)."

Durham said several radio stations, including WJSH 104.7-FM on the north shore and WSKR 1230-AM in Baton Rouge, will air Saturday's game. Stations in Alexandria, Lafayette, Lake Charles, Shreveport and West Monroe also will air Tulane's game.

The game will also be televised by College Sports TV and on the I Network, formerly PAX (local channel 49).

Harvey's Jones still on fast track for Bulldogs

Ex-West Jeff standout learning on the job for Mississippi State

Mississippi State running back Jerious Norwood missed practice time this week with a bruised shoulder, but he is expected to get the ball plenty against Tulane.

Mississippi State runs the West Coast offense, but Bulldogs players know they must be able to run the football to be successful Saturday against Tulane. The teams meet Saturday at 7 p.m. in Shreveport.

"We have receivers who can do it all," said Mississippi State tight end Jeremy Jones. "We have a quarterback (Omarr Conner) who is really underrated. We have three or four tight ends who can go in and do whatever. But what we're really going to try to do is pound the football."

That means utilizing running back Jerious Norwood, who didn't practice before Thursday because of a bruised shoulder.

"Hopefully he's back," Jones said. "He's the key to everything."

That Jones can even talk about the offensive output is surprising. Jones, a redshirt freshman from Harvey, started at tight end against Auburn in the Bulldogs' 28-0 loss last weekend. Jones thought he would be playing defensive end this fall.

"Yeah, that's what I thought," he said, laughing. "I don't know what happened. I showed up for two-a-days, and I was a tight end again."

And what would he prefer to be playing?

"It doesn't matter. I play where they tell me to play."

Which is how he became a tight end in the first place at West Jefferson High School, as a senior, in his only season of football there.

Jones went out for football in the spring before his junior season after being an all-district basketball player as a junior. It didn't take.

"To be honest," he said, "it was hot. I wasn't ready. I wasn't committed. I felt like I was wasting my time and Coach's time."

Coach felt the same. "When I got here (at West Jeff in 2002 after a sterling career at Archbishop Shaw), I heard there was this great athlete at the school, but I couldn't get him to come out," said West Jeff coach Hank Tierney.

When he did, before his junior year, he was there a day.

"He said he just didn't want to play. He was out there for all the wrong reasons," Tierney said.

So Jones went back to basketball. He was quite a player: 6 feet 4, 275 to 280 pounds and quick. He could drive. He could shoot. And he was as strong as a bear. He made all-district again.

Tierney kept asking when he saw him in the halls and on the court.

"Coach kept on," Jones said. "He told me that if I would just put in the effort, good things would happen for me. I didn't believe him."

In May 2003, after West Jeff went 5-5 in Tierney's first season, Jones asked if he could come back.

"My mama kept on me," Jones said. "She believed Coach about what could happen. Basketball just wasn't going to take me anywhere."

"At Shaw, we didn't allow seniors to go out for football. I just felt it wasn't fair to the seniors," Tierney said. "But we were desperate."

So Jones came out. But what would he play?

"He said he wanted to play defensive end, and he could have. But we were in bad need of a tight end," Tierney said.

Jones became a tight end.

"I understand why he can do both (offense and defense), because he's an amazing athlete," Tierney said. "He's agile, with great feet and great quickness."

Amazingly enough, by midseason, big-name colleges were calling. LSU, Tennessee, Southern Cal. All wanted to talk to this kid who was still learning on the job.

"I'd like to say we made him into a player," Tierney said. "But we didn't. We showed him how to block and who to block, and he took it from there. He's just a natural."

So natural that he signed with LSU in November, a couple of weeks after hurting a knee badly in the ninth game of West Jeff's undefeated regular season.

LSU coach Nick Saban wanted Jones to "grayshirt" or go to LSU for a semester then be put on scholarship for the second semester. There were grave concerns by many about whether the knee was ready.

His mother intervened again. She refused to allow Jones to go to LSU, and he was released. He signed with Mississippi State and hasn't looked back.

He redshirted as a freshman, then hurt his knee again in March. He almost quit.

"But what was I going to do, go back there and do nothing?" he said. "I knew what I had to do to rehab, and I did it."

So much so that he was in on 20-22 plays against Auburn.

Now he'll be playing against an old teammate, Antonio "Freeway" Johnson, a defensive tackle for Tulane.

"I know what they've been through, because I've been through it some," Jones said of the displaced Tulane team. "My family is in Texas. They got out the day before the storm."

His family home in Harvey was damaged, and, like most of the West Bank population, he doesn't know when it'll be OK to go home.

"I'm sorry about what they're going through, but we've got to play," he said.

He knows he has far to go, he said, but he's working hard to get there because he has people who believe in him.

"I never had a player come so far so quickly," Tierney said. "I'm not surprised at anything he does."

The Saints leave the practice field Thursday in San Antonio. After winning an emotional opener at Carolina, New Orleans is hoping for similar results in its 'home opener' at the New York Giants.

New offensive system successful in debut

and we're getting good at them," Saints coach Jim Haslett said. "We're trying to play team football, take advantage of our offensive line and the players we have at wideout. Mike has done a great job with that so far."

It wasn't that simple last season, especially when the Saints lost three of four games last October.

"Last year, we had stuff that we work on practice, and 25 percent was never used in the game," said backup running back Aaron Stecker. "Now everything is condensed, and we just line up and play football."

Brooks enjoys the new simple scheme and holds Sheppard in high regard.

"I don't even think he understand and realizes how much he means to me," Brooks said. "He's just a good guy who cares about his players and values opinions.

"As a player, that's all you want. So in turn, I was elated when he received the offensive coordinator's job. I know he would do everything in his power to make us successful."

The Saints are likely to see more blitzes than they saw from the Panthers.

The Giants are also likely to mix up the secondary coverages, keying on wide receiver Joe Horn and trying to contain short passes across the middle to the tight ends.

But no matter what happens, the Saints' offensive players are confident.

"Right now we are really enjoying the play-calling," starting offensive guard Kendyl Jacox said. "It's not that things are being called our way, it's just that calls are being made to put us in position where we can win. Where we're not backpedaling every play. He's putting us in a great position where we come off and be aggressive. ... Anytime you start at your own 20 and drive it 80 yards on the opening possession and take 10 minutes off the clock, you wear down a team's will."

Brooks says Saints always deserved attention

SAN ANTONIO — Saints quarterback Aaron Brooks has noticed a change.

The Saints are drawing a substantial amount of national media attention unlike past seasons as a result of being displaced by Hurricane Katrina.

Because of damages caused by Hurricane Katrina and the facility being used as an evacuation, the Saints are practicing in San Antonio for the season and will split their home schedule between Baton Rouge and San Antonio.

"It's just unfortunate that we're part of the 32 teams in the NFL and it takes a national disaster for the media and NFL to show us some love," Brooks said.

"That's really uncalled for. There are a lot of great players on this football team and we're a team in the middle of the pack that deserves attention."

NEARING MILESTONE: With nine more rushing yards, running back Deuce McAllister will become the Saints' all-time leading rusher, passing George Rogers, who had 4,267 when he played for the Saints from 1981-84.

STAYING TUNED: Wide receiver Joe Horn said he keeps his television set tuned to the news networks to monitor the recovery effort going on in New Orleans.

"I'm more impressed with the speedy recovery right now and we were thinking next year sometime, but the mayor (Ray Nagin) is telling some residents that they will be able to come back soon," Horn said. "I'm sure the clean-up is going to be quicker than we thought."

BACK AT WORK: Despite being listed as questionable for Monday night's game against the New York Giants, tight end Ernie Conwell practiced Thursday.

Conwell suffered a dislocated jaw and injured his wrist in last week's game against the Carolina Panthers. He had a cast on his right wrist Thursday.

GETTING READY: Alamodome officials are putting down the turf,, but it's still not ready for the Saints to begin practicing.

GOOD DRAW: Conrad Kowal, the Saints' senior director of marketing, said the team sold more than 50,000 tickets on the first day of sales for the three games that will be played at the Alamodome this season.

"It was overwhelming, and we were a little overwhelmed," Kowal said. "It was a terrific start."

Wildcats coach laments loss of lineman Johnson

Dauterive blasts LHSAA rule allowing star OL to play at Evangel

By Lori Lyons
River Parishes bureau

It's been a time of give-and-take for East St. John coach Larry Dauterive.

On the one hand, Dauterive, whose squad will open its season against Hahnville in Boutte on Saturday at 3 p.m., lost big. Senior Jamar Thompson, a 6-foot-6 offensive lineman with major college prospects, evacuated LaPlace and ended up in Shreveport. For the past two Friday nights, he has played football for Evangel. Thompson, Dauterive said, apparently, isn't coming back.

On the bright side, Dauterive has picked up about 20 players from Orleans and Jefferson parishes. He's glad to have those players, he said.

But he's not happy about losing Thompson.

Thompson's father returned his son's equipment to the coach Tuesday. Dauterive said that came a week after Jamar Thompson returned to LaPlace, met with him and promised he would be at practice the next day.

"He told me he was going to come back," Dauterive said. "He shook my hand. But he's done now."

Attempts to reach Thompson and his family were unsuccessful.

According to the emergency ruling made by the Louisiana High School Athletic Association in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, students in the parishes affected by the storm - St. John the Baptist was one of those - may enroll in the school of their choice and be immediately eligible. The ruling was intended to give students displaced by the storm a chance to attend school and play sports.

But Dauterive, who is the only River Parishes coach to have lost a player, said the rule should not apply to River Parishes students because none of the area's schools was closed longer than three weeks. St. James Parish schools reopened Sept. 6. St. John the Baptist resumed on Sept. 12, and St. Charles on Thursday.

"If a kid's been displaced and he needs a place to go to school and a place to play, I've got no problem with that," Dauterive said. "But our school is open.

His house is fine. And once we started back up, he should have to come back. That's my point."

But Dauterive is moving on and working on a game plan for Saturday's game against Hahnville – a team Dauterive has been unable to defeat in his previous three tries. This week's game is a non-district contest, scheduled because both teams were originally supposed to play Orleans Parish schools. East St. John was to play St. Augustine. Hahnville was to play Sarah Reed. Hahnville and East St. John will meet again Oct. 7 in a District 5-5A game.

But Dauterive doesn't want to minimize the importance of Saturday's game. "It's still Hahnville-East St. John," he said. "The magnitude of this game hasn't changed."

No, but the numbers have. Dauterive estimates he will dress out a total of 140 players Saturday. Some are displaced students from Orleans and Jefferson parishes. The rest are freshmen he promised would dress if they attended a certain amount of his summer workouts.

"I'm keeping my commitment to them," Dauterive said.

He's trying to indoctrinate the 20 new players he has picked up from the New Orleans area schools. Some are students who already lived in the parish but attended private schools in the city.

Others are students whose home and school were lost.

Kenton Hill, who was a senior cornerback at Bonnabel, said he was heartbroken when he learned his senior season as a Bruin would be lost.

"I was like, 'What's going to happen to my senior year?' " he said. "But then my grandmother said she would try to get me in at East St. John. I said, 'I would love to play for East St. John. They're going to make me a better player.'"

Dorian Price was a senior linebacker at Bonnabel. He, too, is grateful that his senior season can be salvaged.

"I didn't know if I was going to get to play again or not," he said. "I was excited when I found out I'd be playing here. I know nobody is going to hand me anything. I know I'm going to have to work hard to play on this team."

The influx of students and football players has affected those already at East St. John, too. But senior running back Joshuelle Tuesno said everyone is adjusting.

"I have to help them learn, but also they are bringing out the best in me," Tuesno said. "Everybody's got a chance here. If you can play, you're going to play."

Tuesno said he has a great deal of compassion for his new school mates, some of whom have lost everything.

He is now sharing his own house with 17 family members and friends from the 9th Ward.

"Everybody's trying to show everybody love," he said. "It could very easily have been the same way for me."

Hahnville principal objects to proposal

scheduled to reopen Oct. 3.

"We are going to play football this season," Barocco told the executive committee. "Our superintendent (Dr. Diane Roussel) is excited about restarting athletics (because) it is a rallying point."

Jefferson's other options are to have their Class 5A schools remain in their present districts and compete, or withdraw from championship competition in their current districts and form one or more independent leagues that could not send teams to the state playoffs. Under the independent league scenario, Barocco said he envisioned two four-team leagues set along geographical lines with Bonnabel, East Jefferson, King and Riverdale competing on the east bank and Ehret, Higgins, West Jefferson and Cox competing on the West Bank.

That scenario would have Cox, East Jefferson and Riverdale withdrawing from their respective Class 4A districts and playing against the larger parish schools. Fisher, Jefferson's ninth football-playing high school, competes in Class 2A.

West Jefferson is not interested in participating in any form of independent league play, Barocco said. Cox, East Jefferson, Fisher and Riverdale would be unaffected by a merger of 5A schools.

"I don't think that there is an ideal scenario in all of this," Barocco said.

Barocco acknowledged that Ehret and West Jefferson prefer to be reunited with their Jefferson rivals, who face the same challenges they do in reviving football teams that have been dormant for four-plus weeks. Ehret and West Jefferson also would be forced to compete against three of the state's top programs in Destrehan, East St. John and Hahnville, which will have a four-week head start in resuming their programs.

"It is a disadvantage for Ehret and West Jefferson to go in and play those teams, especially at that level," Barocco said.

"The school system's problem is numbers because everything is based on numbers. We don't know what kind of numbers we will have when we return to school."

Barocco also is uncertain if Jefferson schools can be ready to play games by an Oct. 7 deadline.

Also unanswered is whether Bonnabel, Higgins and King would be agreeable to accepting Ehret and West Jefferson into their district. Those three schools balked at a reclassification proposal by Ehret last October that would have merged all of Jefferson's Class 5A schools with Destrehan, East St. John and Hahnville. The three schools instead petitioned the LHSAA to merge them with the Orleans Parish public schools.

Hahnville principal Barbara Fuselier, an executive committee representative, told the committee that she had spoken to principals at Destrehan and East St. John and that all three schools would prefer for Ehret and West Jefferson to remain in District 5-5A for the football season.

Hahnville already has tentative road games scheduled against Airline on Oct. 14 and West Monroe on Oct. 21 to replace West Jefferson and Ehret.

But the St. Charles Parish school would prefer to play closer to home and losing its home game against Ehret would cost the school at least $5,000, Hahnville coach Lou Valdin said.

During a break from the five-hour meeting, Fuselier seemed to soften her stance after speaking with Barocco and Henry.

Fuselier was advised by Henry that allowing Ehret and West Jefferson to leave the district likely was the right thing to do.

Fuselier said she would ask principals Lorel Gonzales of Destrehan and Debra Schum of East St. John, who serve as co-chairpersons of 5-5A, to hold a district meeting to address the issue. Fuselier also asked the executive committee not to discuss the matter Thursday until the 5-5A principals have an opportunity to meet.

"Ultimately all of these decisions should be about what's best for the kids," said West Jefferson coach Hank Tierney. "In trying to reach our kids over the past week, many have been displaced and I don't know how many we'll get back."

Henry also said that Ehret and West Jefferson would have to play their district games against the River Parish schools or risk forfeits, if they're operating and fielding football teams as members of District 5-5A. By LHSAA rules, teams that forfeit two games in one season are not allowed to participate in that sport for the following two seasons.

Salmen to call Northshore 'home' this season

Spartans to practice, attend classess at rival school

By Marty Mule'
Staff writer

Salmen football will have a new look this season.

The Spartans will practice, play games at Northshore and also attend classes at the school.

"Anything that's mine is his," said Panthers coach Frankie Jabbia of Salmen coach Jerry Leonard. "Just as I know it would be if the situation were reversed."

Salmen, located in the southern-most part of Slidell, near Lake Ponchatrain, was ravaged by Hurricane Katrina and may not be suitable for use for months.

The Salmen student body will be platooned at Northshore, according to Jabbia, who is also administrative assistant for discipline at the school.

Northshore's school hours will be the normal 7:30 a.m. to 2:45 p.m. "When that bell rings in the afternoon," Jabbia said, "this will become Salmen High."

Salmen's teachers, administrators and students will then conduct that school's business for the next seven hours.

When Northshore is in session, the Spartans will practice on the auxiliary field or on the Panther Stadium field, sites that Northshore will utilize in the afternoon.

"The thing is, the season for those kids has to be saved," Jabbia said.

Northshore wasn't heavily damaged by the storm and has been used by the Red Cross.

"We weren't damaged that badly," Jabbia said. "And, in emergencies like this, everyone has to do what they can for everybody else."

Leonard has a major task on his hand in trying resurrect the team's schedule. District 10-4A was essentially wiped out by Katrina. None of the other district teams - Chalmette, Douglass, Carver and Kennedy - likely will play this season.

"As I read that," Jabbia said, "that makes Salmen the district champion (which qualifies the Spartans for the playoffs)."

Leonard is working to put together a make-shift schedule to accumulate power points. The Louisiana High School Athletic Association has said that teams affected by Katrina could make schedules as best they could among each other. Though other St. Tammany schools will start playing on Sept. 23, Salmen may not be able to until Oct. 7.

Northshore's athletic facilities are in need of repair, with the press box blown down and the scoreboard torn in half. The Panthers' first game was scheduled to be at home against Ponchatoula, but Northshore will instead play at Ponchatoula.

"It'll be three weeks before we'll be able to play at home," Jabbia said. "But, you know, we're much better off than we could be."

Tigers say new system easier to execute

sary to change. It works. It's proven."

Not here, not yet. But Pelini, 37, has earned some serious credibility. He's worked under such NFL names as George Seifert, Pete Carroll and Ray Rhodes, in addition to his big-time college stops.

Two years ago, Nebraska led the nation in turnovers (47) and pass-efficiency defense (88.66) and was second in scoring defense with Pelini running the same defense. So what happened Saturday?

"We didn't execute the things we did in practice," he said. "They (Arizona State) didn't give us anything out of the ordinary, that we didn't expect. We practiced against a lot of the things they made plays on. We just didn't execute very well throughout the course of the game. That's more on us as coaches than anything else."

Pelini's defensive philosophy is built around aggressiveness and turnovers – he likes lots of both. Unlike Saban, who preferred man-to-man coverage in the secondary, Pelini likes zone. And although he will blitz, it won't be nearly as much as Saban's defense did.

Saban was a chess master once the offense broke the huddle, giving his players many options and relying on them to pick up the changes quickly. Pelini wants his players' minds uncluttered so they can take the shortest distance to the ball – and be ready to take it away when they get there.

"You play with great effort and get 11 hats to the football," Pelini said. "That's where great defense starts. We talk about it all the time.

"When you get there you have to get there in a bad mood with the awareness that you're not going there just to make a tackle but get the ball out, too."

LSU players welcomed the change, although they couldn't argue with the success they had under Saban. Last year, LSU was No. 3 in total defense, No. 5 in pass defense and No. 7 vs. the run, and most of that crew returned.

But these days, when a defense is called from the sideline, the confusion ends there. Usually, regardless of what the offense lines up in or changes into, Pelini's defenses play the hand they've been dealt.

"(Under Saban) we would get two or three calls at a time, and we'd make the call according to the formation," said middle linebacker Cameron Vaughn, who calls the defensive plays. "That was good, but a lot of times we lacked communication because it's hard with 92,000 people screaming in your ear. We had a lot of busts doing that.

"With Coach Pelini, the call is going to be the call 90 percent of the time. We'll check it sometimes, but usually it will just play out. We have a lot fewer communication busts."

Said safety Jessie Daniels: "It's much easier to execute when you have so much less to think about. We made a lot of mistakes Saturday, but if we execute this defense the way we're supposed to, we'll be fine. The guys really like playing it."

Toms rushed to hospital during first round

From wire reports

FARMINGTON, PA. - David Toms was rushed to a hospital after developing a rapid heartbeat during the 84 Lumber Classic on Thursday and was later taken by helicopter to a Pittsburgh hospital.

Toms, who played at LSU, was even par through nine holes - he started on No. 18 - before being taken off the course on a stretcher, according to PGA Tour officials. He was taken first to Uniontown Hospital, then was flown to Pittsburgh's UPMC-Presbyterian University Hospital.

Toms' caddie, Scott Gneiser, told The Associated Press that Toms was airlifted to Pittsburgh because "his heart rate went way up," but that he was "doing better now."

DEVASTATION, DEATH HAUNT THE LOWER 9TH WARD

Homes off North Claiborne Avenue in the Lower 9th Ward are vivid illustrations of the destruction of Hurricane Katrina. The emptiness – the only sounds the faint howls of animals and the roar of helicopters – underscored the nearly complete depopulation of the neighborhoods.

AFTER THE WATER, UTTER EMPTINESS

By Brian Thevenot
Staff writer

Staff Sgt. Robert Andrade and his two-Humvee patrol rolled past a Lower 9th Ward house Monday when one of the soldiers noticed a dog chained up in front of a house. They figured someone had to have secured the chain, so they approached the house and yelled inside.

"Anybody in there?"

No response.

On Tuesday they rolled again past the St. Claude Avenue home, now dry several days after Hurricane Katrina had turned the thoroughfare into a 15-foot canal and a death trap.

No dog. They called into the house again, now nearly certain that the dog's owners had pulled him inside. They called again. No answer. So they left a bottle of water on the porch.

On Wednesday, the water was gone. On Thursday, they left two MREs and a bottle of water, and the next day those were gone as well.

After three days of feeding a ghost in a dead village, surrounded by hungry dogs standing menacingly atop imploded houses, that was the closest Andrade's patrol came to seeing any sign of life. The utter emptiness – the only sounds the faint howls of animals and the roar of helicopters – underscored the nearly complete depopulation of massive swaths of the city and the Herculean, perhaps impossible, task of rebuilding.

All veterans of a recent tour in Baghdad, the soldiers got so bored they took a picture of a dog defecating on a roof, laughing as they pulled the image onto a laptop computer.

When some subjects came up, they didn't joke.

"It's not the ghosts that scare me, it's the nightmares," Staff Sgt. William Thompson said. "That's the bad stuff, the stuff that keeps you up at night."

Asked if he had seen bodies, he closed his eyes, rubbed his temples for several seconds, and said, "Yes. I don't think they'll ever get an accurate count of the dead."

Bush plan could be New Deal for N.O.

Programs combat 'legacy of inequality'

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — As his aides released details of plans to restore Gulf Coast communities crippled by Hurricane Katrina, President Bush said Friday that he hopes the programs will generate new opportunities for those who have faced years of poverty and inequity.

The Bush plan, revealed Thursday in a nationally televised speech from Jackson Square in New Orleans, includes a Gulf Opportunity Zone to foster job creation through tax breaks and small business loans; worker recovery accounts of as much as $5,000 to pay for job training and child care; an urban homesteading program that would give low-income residents the chance to buy into 4,000 single-family homes in return for "sweat equity"; and federal aid that would provide as much as $7,500 for each dislocated Gulf Coast student taken in by public or private schools.

The latter would allow Bush to create, on a temporary basis, the kind of large-scale school voucher program he has been unable to pass through Congress during his first term.

And despite urging from some, Bush on Friday ruled out raising taxes for the massive reconstruction effort, which aides said could cost $200 billion or more. The scope of the Gulf recovery plan surprised some observers.

Body count will likely jump in hard-hit areas

Flooding likely caught many by surprise

By Michael Perlstein

Tentative optimism that New Orleans' death toll from Hurricane Katrina might be far lower than first projected gave way to somber reality over 36 hours as search and rescue squads turned up bodies by the dozen in the hardest hit areas of the city.

By midafternoon Friday, the black triangles used to designate human remains were multiplying on an emergency command center map. Federal Emergency Management Agency rescue squad liaison Charles Hood said a spike in discoveries Friday started to take an emotional toll on rescue workers.

"Our squad members are getting access to trauma and grief counselors," Hood said. "It's becoming a very difficult task."

The state is in charge of releasing Katrina's official death total, which stood at 579 Friday night. Hood said the periodic reports from his seven 80-person squads indicate the casualty count is going to jump in the coming days, but declined to speculate on what the number would reach. One squad alone located and marked more than a dozen houses containing bodies Friday.

"Parts of the city have become a target-rich environment for human remains," Hood said. "We're just now getting into the areas that experienced the most rapid inundation."

Large chunks of the city, including parts of Gentilly, the Desire-Florida area and Upper 9th Ward, have revealed telltale signs that the two breaches of

In the immediate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, some families were forced to enact the most gut-wrenching of escape strategies: separating children from parents to get everyone out of harm's way.

"The circumstances were so dire" that at some crowded evacuation points, parents were told to "pass all of the babies forward," said Nancy McBride, national safety director for the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. "Things were in such a state of confusion trying to get people to safety."

Sediment may be health hazard

Drying sludge may contain petroleum, fecal matter

By Mark Schleifstein
Staff writer

The sediment left behind by floodwaters in New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish contains bacterial and petroleum contamination in amounts that could pose a health risk for returning residents, officials with the Environmental Protection Agency and Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality said Friday.

And the material may be dangerous in the weeks and months ahead as it dries and becomes airborne, they added.

The most immediate concern is with residents returning today to St. Bernard, where a major oil spill at Murphy Oil in Chalmette left contaminated sediment in homes and yards, said DEQ Secretary Mike McDaniel.

He said the decision to allow residents to re-enter St. Bernard Parish today "causes me a great deal of concern" because of the potential exposure to petroleum products and fecal matter in the sediment left behind by floodwaters.

"I'm hopeful that there's going to be some form of a thoughtful process in making sure people aren't placed in unsafe conditions on their return, or don't run into additional health problems while they're in there," McDaniel said.

EPA and DEQ on Friday released results from 18 sediment samples taken Sept. 10, promising it was the first of many more in the days and weeks to come.

They said there are still no results from air samples taken anywhere in the New Orleans metropolitan area, other than limited data gathered by EPA's ASPECT aircraft, used to sniff out dangerous chemicals from fires and overturned rail cars.

The mix of chemicals found in crude oil and petroleum products poses a variety of short-term and long-term risks, EPA officials said. Some, such as diesel and fuel oils, can cause skin irritation.

Breathing fuel oils for short periods can cause nausea, eye irritation, increased blood pressure, headache, light-headedness, loss of appetite, poor coordination and difficulty concentrating. Breathing diesel fuel vapors for long periods can cause kidney damage and lower the blood's ability to clot.

The National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health recommends that those exposed to fuel oils wash with soap and water, flush the eyes, remove contaminated clothing and receive immediate medical attention if contaminated soil is ingested.

EPA officials estimated that the sediments in the St. Bernard area contained one-tenth of 1 percent of petroleum products, an amount they said could take several years to disappear without treatment.

Three of the 18 samples released Friday had slightly elevated arsenic and lead levels. The level of lead detected is typical of that found in urban areas, they said.

The officials said the results are only the beginning of an extensive sediment testing program that already is being adjusted to address EPA Science Advisory Board concerns that they include samples taken inside buildings and from building walls, and include tests for a longer list of substances.

McDaniel said petroleum products also are being found in some locations in New Orleans and Jefferson Parish, which he said was not unexpected.

"We have 350,000 vehicles and about 50,000 boats that were under water, and lots of underground storage tanks and aboveground tanks," he said.

"And then we've got the Murphy Oil spill," 19,000 barrels spilled near Chalmette. "That will pose special problems with the cleanup."

McDaniel predicted that environmental officials will run into several hot spots in New Orleans and surrounding communities during the cleanup, "perhaps in industrialized areas or in commercial areas where a business is storing hazardous waste."

He said the process may eventually include the cleanup or demolition of 160,000 homes and businesses in New Orleans.

EPA Acting Deputy Assistant Administrator for Science Bill Farland said officials also are concerned about the sediment becoming airborne as it dries.

"First, there's the question of all this coarse particulate matter being created as it dries up," he said. "People driving across, moving the material, and then it will be entrained in the air."

Farland said he doesn't believe the sediment will be considered hazardous waste, based on the contaminants it contains.

But he couldn't say whether oil-contaminated wastes would have to be disposed under federally mandated oilfield-waste rules, which require such wastes to be placed in separate landfills or treatment facilities from construction debris or household solid waste.

EPA Deputy Administrator Marcus Peacock said this first set of sediment samples did not include tests to determine whether asbestos fibers are a byproduct of the floodwater removal.

"We expect to see some asbestos," Peacock said. "We also expect to be dealing with lead, and old lead paint."

He said federal and state environmental officials are drawing up plans to assess individual homes for hazardous materials to determine how they will be demolished.

First look at N.O. damage leaves delegation stunned

Senators vow to rebuild city

By Jeff Duncan
Staff writer

They had seen the TV reports and read the stories of heroism and tragedy, but nothing prepared a U.S. congressional delegation for the experience of a personal look at the devastation in New Orleans.

A contingent of 14 U.S. senators, led by Louisiana's Mary Landrieu and David Vitter, took a 2-hour multi-parish tour Friday in four Army Blackhawk helicopters, then alit in downtown New Orleans for a first-hand survey of the damage. For most, it was their first visit to the hurricane-ravaged area.

"I've always said that if a picture is worth a thousand words then being on the ground is worth a thousand pictures," Sen. Mike Enzi, R-Wyoming, said. "That's exactly what I've seen today."

The group toured most of the New Orleans metropolitan region in the morning, before heading east to visit afflicted areas in St. Tammany Parish, Pass Christian, Miss., the Keesler Air Force Base in Biloxi, Miss., and Dauphin Island, Ala.

For Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., Hurricane Katrina and its devastating aftermath was personal. His wife Vicky graduated from Tulane and still has family in New Orleans and Crowley.

"You can see the television coverage millions of Americans have seen over the past days, and you can read the stories, the heartbreaking stories and the stories of courage that we've all read in the last few days," Kennedy said. "We can even hear from some of the evacuees, which my wife Vicky and I have listened to up in Cape Cod, Mass., where we have 290 evacuees. But nothing – nothing, nothing, nothing – compares with seeing for ourselves the devastation that we have seen for the last few hours and we'll continue to see."

Echoing the sentiments of President Bush in his Thursday night speech from Jackson Square, lawmakers pledged full support in the effort to rebuild the city, decimated by Hurricane Katrina 19 days ago.

"We're here to send a message that our first priority and our highest obligation is to help all of those affected by this disaster," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine. "All of us are united to help the Gulf Coast recover from this extraordinary natural disaster."

The contingent of powerbrokers included Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, as well as the leaders of several Senate committees.

"I stand by President Bush in his pledge to aid all those affected by this violent storm, and will work with my colleagues to ensure Congress acts swiftly and decisively in helping rebuild this battered region," Frist said. "The homes that we flew over today, each one is a catastrophe, a story that we've reached out to and responded to."

Congress already has appropriated a record $61 billion toward the relief efforts in Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi. And more help in the form of military and medical personnel and funding is on the way. Some lawmakers have estimated the final tally could soar to $200 billion.

"The resources are going to be there to get the job done," said Sen. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., chairman of the powerful Appropriations Committee. "I think the president was right. We're going to do what it takes and we're going stay here as long as it takes, and we're going to come back again and again to see that it's done right."

POWERFUL LOBBY

Fourteen U.S. senators participated in a tour of the hurricane-affected areas of Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi on Friday. They were met by Sens. Mary Landrieu and David Vitter:

- Max Baucus, D-Mont.
- Thad Cochran, R-Miss.
- Susan Collins, R-Maine
- Chris Dodd, D-Conn.
- Richard Durbin, D-Ill.

Decisions about reconstruction should be made, Landrieu said, 'on the banks on the Mississippi River, not on the banks of the Potomac.'

Louisiana's congressional delegation has campaigned for local control of the funds.

While insisting that the reconstruction job "must be rooted in principles of accountability," Landrieu added that "Louisiana will be rebuilt by Louisianians. New Orleans will be rebuilt by New Orleanians."

Decisions should be made, Landrieu said, "on the banks on the Mississippi River, not on the banks of the Potomac."

Others think independent out-of-state auditors should oversee the money and how it is spent.

"It is our job in the United States Senate to work together in a non-partisan way to give the appropriate oversight to make sure that money is spent wisely," Frist said. "And that is exactly what we're going to do."

Vitter, who has been in and out of the city several times since the storm hit Aug. 29, said he's seen significant progress in the past week and expects to see more in the future as residents return to the city next week.

"(Last week) was tough. It was hard," Vitter said. "Now we're here a week later and things are turning the corner. People are upbeat. We came here to listen, to learn, to talk to people and to analyze what went wrong. And so far we've learned a lot."

CORRECTIONS AND CLARIFICATIONS

Quote was Vitter's: A story published Sept. 8 incorrectly attributed to a Federal Emergency Management Agency official a quote about flooding in New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina. It was Sen. David Vitter who said, "I don't want to alarm everybody that, you know, New Orleans is filling up like a bowl. That's just not happening."

Funeral date corrected: A headline in The Times-Picayune's Friday edition gave the wrong date for the funeral of traffic accident victim Charie Billiot of Chalmette. The funeral will be today at 1 p.m. at Mary, Queen of Peace Catholic Church in Mandeville.

Not all lenders offer grace periods: A story in Thursday's Money section about lending institutions providing hurricane victims a grace period on mortgage payments implied that all lenders are giving 90-day extensions on payments in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. The Mortgage Bankers Association says that although 98 percent of its members are offering some grace period, not all are offering the same support and some mortgage companies are not offering grace periods at all. Furthermore, not all lenders are postponing foreclosures. Borrowers need to contact their lenders or the service companies handling their loans to find out the specifics on what, if any, grace period they are eligible for and how any missed payments will be handled. The Louisiana Office of Financial Institutions has set up hotlines operating seven days a week from 8 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. to help borrowers find their lenders. Borrowers relocated out of state should call (866) 783-5530. People still in Louisiana can call (888) 525-9414.

Lack of policy dooms some pets, official says

Animals stranded in N.O. homes

By Ed Anderson
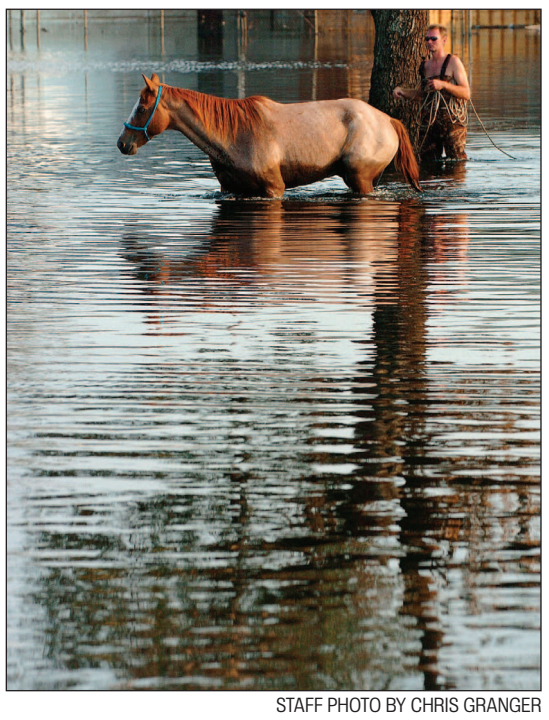
Capital bureau



BATON ROUGE — Although about 5,000 animals have been rescued from the floodwaters of Hurricane Katrina, tens of thousands have been abandoned and possibly left to die because there is no policy in place to save them, the national president of the Humane Society of the United States said Friday.

Wayne Pacelle criticized both the state and federal governments for not having a standing policy to rescue animals in a disaster. He said that animal control officers and animal lovers have been "going door-to-door" in the New Orleans area, looking for animals to save.

Pacelle said a few days ago, rescuers found a St. Bernard on the roof of a house – he did not say where – and the dog had not eaten or had potable water for two weeks. "He should have weighed 90 pounds but he weighed 40 pounds," he said.

"This constitutes the largest animal rescue effort in the United States," said Dr. Joel Goldman, the U.S. Agriculture Department's area federal veterinarian in charge. "Time is getting critical for the ones still stranded."

Pacelle estimated that based on national figures, 65 percent of all homes in the nation have pets, and at least 50,000 animals were left behind by evacuees from the New Orleans area.

Jasson Bartell of Durham, N.C., tries to persuade a stranded horse to walk toward dry land on Earhart Boulevard after Hurricane Katrina. Many horses have been rescued from the New Orleans area after the storm, and many more pets still await rescue.

STAFF PHOTO BY CHRIS GRANGER

Pacelle called on state and federal forces in Louisiana to adopt a policy that would commit resources to rescuing animals. He said in addition to private citizens and groups that have helped rescue stranded animals, the National Guard has saved some on its own.

"National Guardsmen have pets, too,'' said Guard spokesman Maj. Ed Bush. "But (rescuing) human beings are absolutely our first priority."

More than 5,000 rescued animals are being housed in the Lamar Dixon Center near Gonzales, and Louisiana State University's Parker Coliseum has been the safe haven for thousands of pets that evacuees could not take with them to evacuation centers, apartments or hotels.

Goldman said about 600 of the 5,000-plus animals at the center have been reunited with their owners.

Bush said there is no Guard policy dealing with rescuing animals but said if there was space in a boat or vehicle, pets were evacuated with their owners. He said troops at the Superdome also set aside an area for pets to be fed and watered.

Bush said if an animal becomes "aggressive" toward police, soldiers or other rescuers, or attacks a dead victim, the animal "is put down."

Madeleine Pickens, the wife of wealthy businessman T. Boone Pickens, was in Baton Rouge this week to fly a second planeload of dogs, cats, birds and other animals made homeless by Katrina to California for care and housing.

She said if the state and federal government want the nation to help rebuild New Orleans, then officials should be more sympathetic in handling animal rescues.

"Why not fill a barge with a large number of animals and float it up the river (for animal care)? I will pay for it. But they won't address these issues," Pickens said.

Goldman said more than 8,000 requests for animal rescues have been made to a call center in Baton Rouge in the past two weeks. Anyone knowing of a stray or abandoned animal can call (225) 925-3980, he said.

Dr. Rustin Moore, director of Equine Health Studies at LSU's School of Veterinary Medicine, said horse rescue teams were out Friday in Plaquemines Parish and Algiers corralling stray horses. He said seven had been located.

Moore said that as many as 60 to70 horses a day have been rescued. He said about 350 horses have been rescued and 75 have been reunited with their owners.

Blanco adviser lobbies for insurer

Witt hired to help La. with disaster recovery

By Sharon Theimer
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON – As former federal disaster chief James Lee Witt advises Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco governor on hurricane recovery, he is also working for an insurance company lobbying Congress to create a fund to ease insurers' burdens from disaster claims, records show.

The former Federal Emergency Management Agency director and his firm, James Lee Witt Associates, registered this week to lobby for Allstate Insurance Co. Their mission: "to draft and introduce model legislation creating a natural disaster catastrophe fund," according to the registration, posted Thursday by the Political Money Line lobbying tracking service.

Witt's lobbying for the fund comes as he works for the state of Louisiana. Blanco hired him this month to advise her on the state's Hurricane Katrina relief effort.

Witt is mindful of the potential appearance of a conflict of interest, so he and his firm are turning away prospective clients that want them to lobby in Louisiana, said Barry Scanlon, a firm partner and lobbyist. They also are refusing to do such work for existing clients, he said.

"We're not doing any business in the state of Louisiana," Scanlon said. "We're not representing anyone in Louisiana other than the state of Louisiana. That's where our loyalty lies."

Though the Allstate lobbying registration was filed Tuesday with Congress, the firm's work for the company began Aug. 1, nearly a month before the hurricane hit, Scanlon said.

AP FILE PHOTO

Former Federal Emergency Management Agency Director James Lee Witt won't accept lobbying work from Louisiana insurers while he works as an adviser on hurricane recovery to Gov. Kathleen Blanco, said a partner in his firm. James Lee Witt Associates registered this week to lobby for Allstate Insurance Co.

Blanco spokeswoman Denise Bottcher said Witt's move to avoid lobbying for anyone else in Louisiana, including Allstate, eased any concerns the governor might otherwise have had about his lobbying work. Witt's contract with the state is still being worked out; he has been operating under an oral agreement, Bottcher said.

Witt directed FEMA in the Clinton administration. His Washington firm lobbies on disaster issues for several clients and also consults on disaster preparedness planning, training and assessments. Less than 5 percent of the firm's revenue comes from lobbying, said Scanlon, a special assistant to Witt while they were at FEMA.

Witt's FEMA experience was one reason Allstate hired him, said Allstate spokesman Michael Trevino.

"He's an expert," Trevino said. Allstate, the second-largest homeowners insurer in Louisiana, believes the state would benefit from a national catastrophe fund, he said.

Under the proposal, insurers would cover homeowners' natural disaster-related claims up to a certain amount. The state affected by the disaster would pay claims over that limit up to a certain level, and the federal government would cover claims beyond that.

"It's not a bailout," Trevino said. "It's not a retroactive solution that we're advocating. It's ensuring that there is adequate protection for consumers. Our ability to protect consumers is finite."

The proposal would affect states, particularly those prone to natural disasters, such as hurricane-afflicted Louisiana. There is no price tag attached, but it would likely require billions of taxpayers' dollars.

Besides Allstate, Witt's lobbying clients this year include Nextel, whose issues include the interoperability of public safety communication; Los Angeles County, on whose behalf his firm has lobbied FEMA; and Whelen Engineering Co., based in Connecticut, whose issues include potential changes to FEMA guidelines on outdoor warning systems.

Witt isn't the only former emergency management chief with a prospering lobbying business.

Joe Allbaugh, President Bush's first FEMA director, also has a Washington lobbying firm that represents several clients on disaster and domestic security issues. They include the government contractor Kellogg, Brown & Root Services Inc. of Arlington, Va.; Shaw Group Environment of Baton Rouge; and defense contractor Northrop Grumman.

Agriculture, forestry take $1.1 billion hit

Timber industry takes biggest loss

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – Hurricane Katrina dealt the state's agriculture and forestry industries a $1.1 billion blow, according to early crop loss estimates released Friday by Agriculture and Forestry Commissioner Bob Odom.

Odom said more than half of the losses, between $600 million and $700 million in damages, were sustained by the timber industry.

He said at least 75 percent of the timber in Washington, St. Tammany and Tangipahoa parishes was damaged, and only about 30 percent can be salvaged.

The numbers do not include at least $150 million – and possibly as much as $500 million – in damages to the seafood infrastructure and markets in south Louisiana. Last week, the Department of Wildlife and Fisheries said preliminary estimates indicated the state's seafood industry was dealt a $1.3 billion loss over the next two years.

Odom said preliminary loss estimates to other crops include:
▶Sugar cane, $145 million to $200 million.
▶Citrus crops, mainly in St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes, about $11 million.
▶Dairy industry, more than $21 million.
▶Cotton in north Louisiana, damaged by high winds, about $220 million.
▶Christmas tree farms, $2 million to $3 million.

Odom said that although his office and rescue workers have been making regular drops of hay and water to stranded cattle on levees in St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes, about 11,000 head of cattle is missing.

"That's about an $11 million loss," Odom said.

Additionally, Odom said, there have been "25 to 30 forest fires" in the Florida parishes in the past few days that firefighters have had trouble reaching because of fallen and damaged trees.

Odom said damages to the dairy industry may be severe enough to decrease the 200 dairy farmers in the area to 100.

"In the Florida Parishes, they (dairy farmers) had to pour milk out because they don't have ways to get it to processors or the processors are closed," Odom said. "They had to run generators to be able to milk cows,"

He said the sugar cane can be harvested although much of the cane "is twisted" and will mean a lower yield of sugar. He said it may take the crop three years to fully recover.

DAN GILBERT, Orleans Parish Communication District

Emergency communications needs rescue itself

FEMA is sending in $2.2 million in gear

By Frank Donze
Staff writer

Add New Orleans' 911 network to the list of Hurricane Katrina casualties.

Much of the emergency communications system was either destroyed or rendered inoperable by floodwaters that inundated the city in the days after the storm passed.

The good news is that only a tiny fraction of the city's population was left behind and there have been few calls for police, fire and medical service over the past three weeks.

But now that Mayor Ray Nagin has given the all-clear for residents and business owners from Algiers, the Central Business District, the French Quarter and parts of Uptown to return over the next two weeks, the agency that oversees the 911 system is scrambling to bring the service back to life.

"The current situation is unacceptable," said Dan Gilbert, deputy director of the Orleans Parish Communication District. "As we repopulate, stuff will happen. People using chainsaws will cut themselves, there will be auto accidents, and people will have heart attacks. We have to get up and running."

For now, Gilbert said the communications district is being jury-rigged to get by.

A handful of call-takers are stationed at the Royal Sonesta Hotel in the French Quarter, where New Orleans Police Department dispatchers have established a temporary home. Unable to record calls and enter the information into a computer, the skeleton crew has gone primitive, making hand-written notes.

That should change by the middle of next week when the agency plans to open an interim 911 call center in a third-floor ballroom at the Hyatt Hotel across from City Hall, where the mayor and members of his executive staff are based.

Gilbert said $2.2 million in new communications equipment, being paid for by the Federal Emergency Management Administration, is scheduled to arrive late Sunday. The city hopes to have the center open for business by Wednesday.

The interim center will be staffed by about 15 call-takers, half the normal complement. But Gilbert said those numbers should be more than sufficient to handle the reduced population the city is expected to have over the next several months.

The communications district, which collects about $3.2 million annually from fees on all phone service in New Orleans, has been planning for years to bring all the components of its 911 system under one roof in a secure location.

Parts of the now broken network, which fields more than 1 million calls annually, are scattered across the city, from Mid-City to the French Quarter to the second floor of police headquarters on Broad Street.

The city was scheduled to break ground early next year on $16 million communications complex on a largely vacant site south of City Park Avenue between Canal Street and Interstate 10.

The board of the Communications District, which includes the directors of the police, fire and health departments as well as representatives of the Louisiana National Guard and the State Police, chose the 5.5-acre parcel adjacent to Cypress Grove Cemetery because it is located on a natural ridge. Nonetheless, plans call for the building to be raised by several feet to guard against flooding.

Under the design concept, the building's windows and exterior would be strong enough to withstand a Category 5 hurricane and would feature backup generators as well as kitchen, storage and sleeping areas, allowing emergency personnel cut off from the outside world to function autonomously for nearly a week.

While Gilbert said the agency intends to move forward with the project, the start of construction likely will be delayed while government officials digest Katrina's impact.

Even with all the safeguards incorporated into the new building's design, Gilbert said he is not sure the 911 system would have continued to operate after the hurricane passed.

"But we would have been in 1,000 percent better shape right after," he said. "I think we would have been able to come back on line quicker, maybe two or three days later."

Papers chased: Case far from closed for law school grads

Storm might have soaked bar exams

By Leslie Williams
Staff writer

The list of people injured by Hurricane Katrina might include some of the more than 700 men and women who took all or parts of the nine-part Louisiana bar exam this past summer.

A week after Katrina thrashed and soaked the New Orleans area, the Louisiana Supreme Court's Committee on Bar Admissions started a process – that may end in 10 days – to determine whether any of the exam results were destroyed, said Scott Whittaker, the committee's chairman.

The hurricane might have washed away or rendered illegible parts of the exam administered in July to law school graduates, mostly from Tulane, Southern, Louisiana State and Loyola universities.

"Some examination papers were likely lost to Hurricane Katrina," according to the committee's Web site, www.lascba.org. "Our efforts reveal that the overwhelming majority is secure and grading is going on."

The 14-member committee's audit has not confirmed that any exams "have been irretrievably lost," Whittaker said. But the fact-finding mission has revealed "there were instances where exams were left in places where they might not be retrievable," he said.

Whittaker estimated at least 60 to 75 sections of the exam might have been soaked in floodwaters or blown away by Katrina's powerful winds. Some of the 450 Louisiana attorneys grading the exams took sections of the test to their homes in St. Bernard Parish and the Lakeview area of New Orleans, both of which were heavily flooded, he said.

Those parts of the exam – even wet – still may be legible, Whittaker said.

"We just don't know yet," he said

Applicants must pass seven of the nine parts of the bar exam to practice law in Louisiana, so even if a part or two were destroyed, the applicant could still pass. And at least 130 applicants took the exam on a computer, which means there's an electronic backup, he said.

Getting in contact with those grading the exams has been a challenge, he said. Many of those grading the tests were displaced by Katrina. As of Friday, about 60 percent of those grading the exams had been contacted.

No one has determined what will happen if the pass or fail status of an applicant cannot be determined because of Katrina-related damage.

"We need a better understanding of the scope of the problem before confecting a solution," Whittaker said

Whittaker urges applicants not to call and ask about the status of the search. Updates will be posted on the committee's Web site, he said.

The final grades were to be announced Sept. 30, with a swearing-in ceremony Oct. 14, Whittaker said. Those dates might change. The Supreme Court will determine whether the dates for the announcement and swearing-in ceremony, normally at the Municipal Auditorium in New Orleans, will be pushed back, he said.

Mathews and her husband, John, lost nearly everything in their home during Hurricane Katrina. 'Let me get you out of here before you start crying again,' John Matthews told his wife before leading her to their truck, loaded with a few salvageable trinkets.

Stare into the face of someone in the New Orleans area, and the first thing you see is the exhaustion, both emotional and physical. Beneath that weariness, though, runs a range of feelings — from grief to relief, from cheer to fear — as returning residents pick up the pieces and try to answer the one question that is occupying nearly everyone's mind: What now?

Day by day, the water keeps going down, revealing the unparalleled mess left behind by Hurricane Katrina. From the foul muck left behind in city streets, to the colonies of mold growing on wallboard throughout the metro area, it is evident that recovering from Katrina will involve quite a bit more than merely drying out.

'It's going to cost whatever it costs'

BUSH, from A-1

"I really didn't expect him to come off sounding like FDR, even though he mixed in some standard Republican proposals like enterprise zones and school vouchers," said Bruce Buchanan, a government professor at the University of Texas in Austin.

Speaking Friday at a prayer service for victims of Hurricane Katrina, Bush talked about his commitment to helping the poor, including many African-Americans, who N.O. officials said were not well-served by the initial federal response to the disaster.

"As we clear away the debris of a hurricane, let us also clear away the legacy of inequality," the president said.

Bruce Ransom, a professor of political science at Clemson University, said some will see the president's declaration as "politics as usual," but he believes there's more to it.

"I think this tragedy has resonated so much – seeing the destruction of a good portion of a great American city and so much suffering – that it's almost a paradigm moment in our history and caused a shift in thinking not only by the president but a great many Americans as well," Ransom said.

Ronald Utt, a housing expert at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said that although some conservatives are complaining about the likely cost of the president's proposals, he was pleased the administration pulled away from its earlier plans to put tens of thousands of dislocated Gulf Coast residents in temporary shelters, such as cruise ships and recreational vehicles, probably located far from population centers and jobs.

Utt said that although Bush didn't say so directly Thursday, he signaled he's prepared to give displaced Gulf Coast residents housing vouchers they can use to rent vacant apartments in areas where they have family connections or a chance at a job.

Aides fleshed out a few details of the president's plan during a briefing Friday.

The Gulf Opportunity Zone would cover the most stricken Gulf Coast communities, including the New Orleans area. It would provide a 50 percent tax write-off for investment in buildings or equipment. For small businesses, it would provide a 100 percent write-off for investments of as much as $200,000 and subsidized loans of as much as $10 million.

"The president believes very strongly that this is going to have a major, major impact on economic growth and economic growth in the short run, which is so important to creating those jobs where people will come back to New Orleans, southern Mississippi and southern Alabama," said Al Hubbard, director of the president's National Economic Council.

Another component is a $5,000 worker recovery account, which displaced workers can use for job training, child care, transportation or even housing costs – if related to their pursuit of a job. Eligibility would be determined by regional and state officials, and it would be limited to those designated as the "hardest to employ."

Those in the program who find work after receiving unemployment insurance for less than 13 weeks could get 60 percent of leftover recovery account funds as an "employment bonus," Hubbard said, and the remaining 40 percent could be theirs if they keep their jobs for at least six months.

The president's homestead proposal would make available about 4,000 single-family housing units, mostly homes repossessed by the federal government. An estimated 1,000 are in the New Orleans area.

The administration said details still are being worked out, but officials want to make the units available through a lottery to low-income residents who agree to fix them up through sweat equity, with the help of nonprofit groups such as Habitat for Humanity.

All the units are habitable, according to Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso Jackson, and they generally need about $5,000 to $10,000 worth of renovation.

The administration also plans to provide displaced residents with an initial payment of $2,000. For those who owned a home damaged severely in the hurricane, another $26,000 in federal financing would be available to cover long-term housing, as a supplement to their insurance, or to help those left without any coverage.

Jacob Vigdor, an assistant professor of public policy and economics at Duke University, said he wonders whether that assistance will be enough, given that in many cases, even those with insurance live in homes whose insured value is less than the cost to replace the structure.

Some Democrats, including former President Clinton, have suggested Bush should, at least temporarily, pull back extending the tax cuts from his first term in office, at least for the most affluent Americans, to defray the cost of the Katrina rebuilding efforts. Some Republicans complained Bush had proposed an immensely expensive proposition without targeting spending that could be reduced to offset the cost.

Bush said he won't raise taxes because it would hurt the economy.

"You bet it's going to cost money. But I'm confident we can handle it and I'm confident we can handle our other priorities," he said during a news conference with Russian President Vladimir Putin. "It's going to cost whatever it costs."

He said he favors looking for ways to cut other spending.

NINTH, from A-1

on Caffin Avenue, Fats Domino's house was empty, the wreckage inside one room visible from the sidewalk: a twisted and warped grand piano, white with gold trim, standing on its end; couches piled on top of one another in the 6 inches of muck on the floor; and bundles of paper records buried the mud.

"Really, that's his house? Where?" asked Andrade, unaware and a bit shocked that a star of Domino's magnitude lived in a block that, in his words, "looked like an A-bomb dropped."

The soldiers' Humvees and boots crackled over crisp dry chips of gray mud, which gave the historic neighborhood the feel of a battered moonscape. The dried muck, the end product of the brown and black slime that poured into homes, coated the grass and climbed halfway up buildings.

Just inside a tiny church a few houses away, pews and pianos lay in a heap of wreckage. A composition book marked "Queen Ester Temple .. Building funds ... Pastor Bishop Adams" contained just two entries, handwritten: "Bishop Adams ... $100 ... Sis. Betsy Grant ... $50."

"The thing that blew me away was the barge," Thompson said, referring to the dark red barge that appeared to have to blown through the levee a few hundreds yards north of the Claiborne Avenue bridge and now sat in the middle of the neighborhood, atop the wreckage of homes and cars. Next to it sat a short yellow school bus, the kind used for disabled students. "Anybody there didn't get out. It's beyond anything I've ever seen. I'm an artist and I couldn't even begin to draw it.

A stray dog is the only sign of life at Tennessee Street and North Claiborne Avenue on Thursday.

"It just looked like toothpicks everywhere" from the viewpoint of the bridge, Andrade said.

The day after Katrina smacked the city, Daniel Weber, who had watched his wife drown, wept and screamed about the barge, how it had "just killed so many people." He had barely escaped by floating on a piece of wood until rescued 14 hours later.

"It's just not right, it's not right," he sobbed. "It just came rushing in so fast. I was looking at the levee, and water was just splashing over it a little – and then, BOOM! The barge hit, and it filled up in less than five minutes."

The other direction on Caffin Avenue from where the soldiers parked, Martin Luther King Elementary School, one of the system's nicest school buildings had mud pouring out its front door. At the curb, tens of thousands of dead minnows lay in a shallow pool. A school office phone lay draped over the fence outside, along with an office chair. At the front entrance, one of the thousands of DVD cases strewn about the area, as if a Blockbuster had exploded, a weather Channel special titled "Hurricanes!" lay caked in mud.

Flooding likely caught many by surprise

DEATHS, from A-1

the London Avenue Canal led to a rapid rush of floodwaters that caught scores of residents off guard. The surprise factor was only worsened by the fact that the fast-rising water, more than 12 feet in spots, came well after the storm had passed.

"Those are areas where the people were probably asleep when the water rushed in," Hood said.

The urban search and rescue squads were bracing for inspections of neighborhoods that experienced rapid inundation, such as the Lower 9th Ward. The inspections are referred to as "secondary searches," in which squad members are breaking into homes to conduct room-to-room searches, Hood said. In some cases, workers have been breaking through roofs and attics before checking off houses as "all clear."

"Parts of the city have become a target-rich environment for human remains. We're just now getting into the areas that experienced the most rapid inundation."

CHARLES HOOD
Federal Emergency Management Agency rescue squad liaison

Thursday and Friday's developments were mostly grim, but the discovery of a 70-year-old man, alive and well after being trapped for 17 days, brought cheers from the beleaguered rescue squads. He was the first "live" discovery by the squads in two days, Hood said. The man was found in an area near the University of New Orleans, but other details about the rescue were unavailable late Friday.

"That is really going to help give momentum to everybody," Hood said. "As bad as things are out there, we're still holding out hope that we can find others like him."

Heard the one about the hurricane? Humor helps heal a nation's wounds

Comics take aim faster with Katrina

By David Bauder
AP entertainment writer

NEW YORK — The joke rattled through e-mails across the country even as lives hung in the balance after Hurricane Katrina: What's President Bush's position on Roe v. Wade?

Answer: He doesn't care how people get out of New Orleans.

The shock and sadness that muted comedians after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks hasn't been repeated four years later, largely due to some easy targets. This time, joking about a tragedy comes as a welcome relief from the pain, tension and emotion.

"The anger that fuels comedy has built up," said Stephen Hill, executive producer of the upcoming BET comedy awards. "We fully expect Katrina to become part of the comic lexicon of the show."

BET gave only a "fleeting thought" of canceling the show, which airs Sept. 27. And producers of Sunday's Emmy Awards — which was postponed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks — promise a mix of laughs and calls to help victims, hosted by comedian and New Orleans native Ellen DeGeneres.

Comedy can help heal a nation's wounds, said Robert Thompson, a professor of popular culture at Syracuse University. He likened it to "a sorbet to cleanse the palate."

"People watch four or five hours of coverage of a very sad story. Humor has always been a way to smooth that over," Thompson said. "It's one of the ways you can process things."

Four years ago, comedian Gilbert Gottfried famously learned the perils of puncturing the national mood. Three weeks after the terrorist attacks, he was speaking at a Friar's Club roast of Hugh Hefner and joked that he had to leave early to catch a plane to Los Angeles.

He couldn't get a direct flight, he said, so he had to make a stop at the Empire State building.

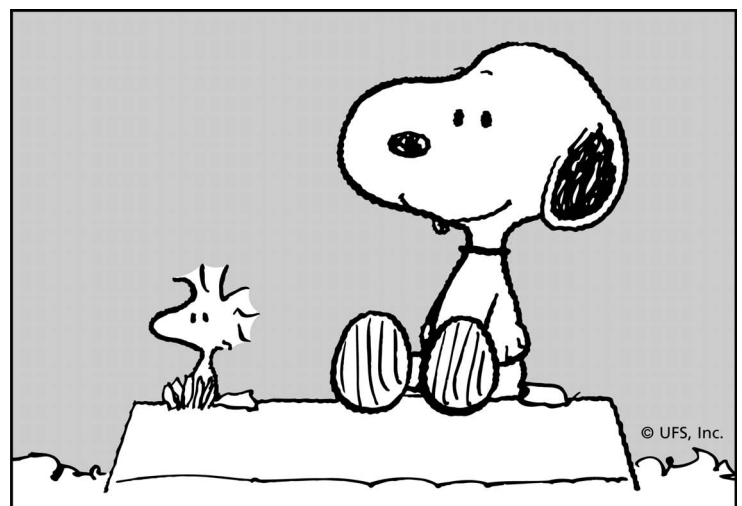
He heard a collective gasp. Someone shouted out, "Too soon!" Gottfried retreated by telling the filthy, hoary joke immortalized in the current movie "The Aristocrats."

"I had to go into safe territory," he said, "like incest and bestiality."

After Sept. 11, entertainment briefly stood still. The Emmy Awards were postponed and people talked about the death of irony.

It didn't die. It was just stunned.

"With (Katrina), it's almost like the sequel that doesn't live up to the original," Gottfried said. "It's certainly a shocking event and a tragedy, but somehow as a big event it doesn't seem to carry as much weight with the public as 9/11 did."



That day was sudden and unfathomable. The attacks' terrifying randomness affected people in all walks of life. Every American could relate to the victims. The Katrina story, however, built up over several days. It also particularly hurt one class of people, which may play a subtle part in the reaction, Thompson said.

Jon Stewart of Comedy Central's "The Daily Show" came back from a vacation after Katrina with guns blazing at Bush. In 2001, the show went off the air for a week.

Most of the late-night TV comics' barbs have been directed at the Bush administration.

When told it was going to take 80 days to drain flood water out of New Orleans, Conan O'Brien joked that Bush said, "that's almost half a vacation." Jay Leno said the Federal Emergency Management Agency head recently appeared at his doorstep and said, "I'm here for the earthquake damage you had back in '94."

Officials tracking cases for reunion of children

MISSING, from A-1

As a result, about 2,800 children have been reported separated from parents or caretakers since the storm. Of those, about 760 have been reunited, according to figures released by the center Friday afternoon. The center is operating a Web site, www.missingkids.com, which has photos of children reported missing. The Red Cross, the Louisiana Department of Social Services, local law enforcement agencies and the FBI also are working to reunite families.

"When you see all these people working on it, I feel hopeful that people will be reunited," Laura Bush said Friday at the center's headquarters in Alexandria, Va.

But Marketa Garner Gautreau, the assistant secretary for the Louisiana Office of Community Services, said the number of children reported missing to the national group may be inflated because the children could be with one parent without the other's knowledge.

She said state officials typically have been successful in reuniting children with family within three days of locating the children.

When relatives or guardians cannot be located, the state is authorized to assume custody of the child and place him or her into foster care.

"When you see all these people working on it, I feel hopeful that people will be reunited."
LAURA BUSH

Gautreau said 50 children have been placed into foster care since Katrina hit. She said 35 of those children were found in shelters in Texas and the remainder came from shelters in Mississippi, Arkansas and Louisiana.

Gautreau said Louisiana is very hesitant to place children into foster care because it often can be traumatic, which would only exacerbate the stress children have faced as a result of the storm.

Gautreau added that officials are still attempting to locate 500 foster children missing in the wake of Katrina.

She said progress is being made in locating the children thanks to anecdotal information from caseworkers who received reports from foster families before they evacuated the storm. State policy requires all foster families to check in before they leave the state for any reason.

However, Gautreau noted, about 15 percent of the caseworkers from New Orleans still have not been located, which means they cannot supply information on the missing children.

Those working to reunite children with parents say they are inspired by the success stories. McBride said she met with a family at a Red Cross shelter in Palm Beach County, Fla. that had been rejoined Wednesday, more than two weeks after the hurricane hit. The three children were taken to the Astrodome in Houston, and the parents were brought to the Florida shelter.

McBride hopes that the task of rejoining families is mainly one of coordination and finding families scattered around the country, but she suspects that some endings won't be happy.

"We know many people didn't survive and we don't know how many yet," McBride said. "That's going to impact children in shelters."

As people move out of shelters and into more permanent housing, the task of reuniting children with parents will become more monumental, Laura Bush said.

"And right now, as many of the shelters are - people are moving out of the shelters into apartments and into hotel rooms, we know that the crowds will disperse and that might make it a little more difficult to find people," Bush said.

In Louisiana, 2,560 children have been reported missing by parents or have reported themselves missing, and 691 of those have been reunited with family as of Friday at noon, according to Oname Thompson, communications coordinator of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

In Mississippi, 217 children were reported missing and 66 were recovered. In Alabama, 35 children were reported missing and three reunited.

The center is also keeping tracks of adults reported missing: 7,565 since Katrina; 1,016 of those reported missing have been found.

The Katrina Missing Persons Hotline is (888) 544-5475.

Mass evacuation poses housing dilemma

Communities wary of trailer homes

By Jan Moller and Laura Maggi
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – As state and federal officials prepare to move hundreds of thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees from shelters into more-permanent trailer communities around Louisiana, concern is growing in some areas that are being asked to absorb the new arrivals.

St. John the Baptist Parish officials are urging that local zoning laws be obeyed as the Federal Emergency Management Agency scouts for possible locations for trailers. In East Baton Rouge Parish, Mayor-President Kip Holden is working with the federal government to get as many people as possible into apartments and other permanent housing instead of the large trailer communities that FEMA is planning to stage around the state.

And in East Feliciana Parish, government officials worry about the effect that 10,000 new residents could have on a parish that only had 21,000 inhabitants before Katrina.

"We're willing to do our part, but within reason," said Judith Kelly, secretary-treasurer of the East Feliciana Police Jury. She said parish officials haven't been told how many evacuees will eventually settle there, even though FEMA representatives have dropped in on several occasions to scout locations, including a Boy Scout camp.

Although "backlash" is too strong a word to describe residents' reaction to the influx, "they're concerned," Kelly said. Among the chief worries, she said, is how the state will provide water and sewerage service to the new arrivals.

"We're a poor parish," she said.

State and federal officials, meanwhile, are being asked to accommodate the interests of several groups that might not always coincide: evacuees, who want a choice of where and how they live; state officials, who have said their top priority is bringing people back to New Orleans as soon as possible; and local communities that are being asked to find rooms for semi-permanent trailer communities that might house evacuees for as long as two years.

Alphonso Jackson, secretary of the federal Department of Housing and Urban Development, said government officials "will do everything in our power to accommodate those persons who do not want to leave" Louisiana.

But Jackson said the agency also has identified 34,000 vacant public housing units around the country that can be made available for people who evacuated public housing units in and around New Orleans. Jackson said the agency's goal is to get people into something semi-permanent as quickly as possible.

"That is not our goal, to keep people in trailers and transitional housing," Jackson said.

Holden, who said he expects Baton Rouge to host about 8,000 people in transitional units, said he views the influx as an opportunity to redevelop long-neglected parts of the inner city using federal money that he expects to flow into the state. "He (Jackson) told me there would be plenty of money coming our way," Holden said.

St. John the Baptist President Nickie Monica said his parish, which has a population of about 45,000 people, has swelled by 18,000 since the storm, mostly evacuees who are living in hotels or with friends and relatives. On Friday he received his first visit from a FEMA representative, who was looking at possible sites for a trailer community.

Monica said the trailers would be welcome, but that he hopes they are confined to areas already zoned for such use. "We're going to maintain our zoning ordinances as much as we can through this event," Monica said. "We worked hard over the last 20 years to establish our zoning."

State officials insist their top priority is to get people back to Louisiana as soon as possible, but state Rep. Cedric Richmond, D-New Orleans, said officials might be ignoring options that might help people return quicker to the New Orleans area. For example, Richmond said, it might make sense to put up some displaced people in hotel rooms in the city, which will need workers as the rebuilding gets under way.

"We can't just allow them to form trailer housing projects," Richmond said.

The idea of establishing large trailer communities has been criticized by a number of people outside the state, who question what kind of living environment they will provide. Instead of putting people in cramped trailers that might not be located near services or jobs, it makes more sense to help people rent apartments, said Bruce Katz, a vice president at the Brookings Institution, a Washington, D.C., think tank.

"What we need to put at the highest priority level is the health and welfare of these displaced people," Katz said, even if that means temporarily relocating them in apartments outside Louisiana.

But state officials, long concerned about Louisiana's stagnant population at a time when other Southern states have boomed, are fearful that evacuees won't want to return once they have settled into new lives in other states. But Katz noted that people from Louisiana have "deep roots" and predicted that many will eventually come back.

Katz said FEMA should note the example of the 1994 Northridge earthquake, after which California public housing authorities distributed rental vouchers to displaced residents. Officials then worked with landlords to increase the number of apartments that would accept the vouchers, which go to low-income renters.

Federal and state officials have said that people won't just be dropped into trailer developments, and that physical infrastructure will be built up around the communities along with social services. That includes helping people with job training and transportation, said Kim Hunter Reed, Gov. Kathleen Blanco's policy director.

"This will be much more than housing for our citizens," Reed said.

Katrina affected one-sixth of Alabama's businesses

Nearly 75 percent of La. workers affected

By The Associated Press

BIRMINGHAM, ALA. — Hurricane Katrina caused more than one-sixth of Alabama's business to close at least temporarily, but that was not nearly as bad as Mississippi and Louisiana.

The U.S Bureau of Labor Statistics said 22,223 businesses, or 17.7 percent of Alabama's total, were closed by the hurricane. Many were closed a few hours or few days because of power outages, but some coastal businesses remain closed due to extensive building damage.

The report showed that 317,206 workers, or 17.1 percent of Alabama's work force, were affected by the storm.

In neighboring Mississippi, 41,941 businesses — or 63.3 percent of that state's total — and 729,466 workers were affected by Hurricane Katrina.

Louisiana fared worse with 83,177 businesses — or 71.6 percent of the state's total — at least temporarily shut down by the hurricane. More than 1.37 million workers, or nearly three-fourths of the state's work force, were affected.

The bureau's report said 38 percent of Louisiana's and Mississippi's businesses were within 100 miles of the center of Hurricane Katrina's destructive path.

Before hitting the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29, Katrina struck the Miami area, affecting more businesses in the Sunshine State than in Alabama.

About 177,249 businesses, or 33.8 percent of Florida's total, were closed temporarily due to the storm, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Cherished Readers

The newspapers of the state of Texas send this heartfelt message to our neighboring newspapers as a salute to the courageous publishers who continue to publish in the face of the adversity dealt by Hurricane Katrina.

The newspaper industry is a Brotherhood of Community Newspapers doing in each community what this newspaper is doing in your community. We support the newspapers that support their readers.

"A newspaper knits the community together and provides an invaluable service to its readers, chronicling a town's history and the lives of its people."
— Judy Johnson, The Hometown Press, TPA president 2005-06

"The newspaper business, is in fact, newspaper people. Often the only reason a community has a newspaper at all is the dogged tenacity of a newspaper owner, a couple, a family that simply won't give up. When it comes to love of community, there aren't many who can match newspaper people. I hope those towns realize just how lucky they are to have those newspapermen and women in the trenches beside them fighting to save their way of life." — Bob Buckel, TPA past president 2002-03

"Everyone who has spent more than a couple of years in this segment of newspapering understands and accepts certain givens. First of all, it's hard work. There is never quite enough help. You become a generalist of necessity and a perfectionist in the great drive to publish the very best product you can — every time you publish. Early on you recognize the wonderful opportunity and capacity to make a difference in your small corner of the world." — Willis Webb, TPA past president 2003-04

"Newspapers record history one day at a time. In community newspapers, that role as chronicler of current events gains even greater significance because size and proximity often allow editors the rare privilege to tell a man's story from the beginning of his life to the end." — Wanda Garner Cash, TPA past president 2004-05

Kenner tenants lack relocation options

KENNER: Maria Sagastome, left, and her son Mario Sagastome Jr. are leaving Redwood Apartments in Kenner, but many of the other tenants of the sprawling 53-building complex say they have nowhere else to go.

Officials pin hopes on mobile homes

By Matt Scallan
Kenner bureau

Miguel Ramos rode out Hurricane Katrina in his home at the Redwood Apartments in Kenner, and he heard the roof come off the building.

"Plywood was flying everywhere," said Ramos, a gardener who has continued to live in the sprawling 53-building complex that caters to working poor people.

Dorvin Development, owner of the complex, is asking residents to leave as quickly as they can so it can begin repairs. But many residents say they have no other options.

"My apartment is destroyed. I don't know where else to go," said Carla Rosales, holding her 9-month-old son, Alfredo, in her arms. Rosales, an immigrant from Honduras who has lived at Redwood for five years, spoke through an interpreter.

The residents' dilemma is one faced by tens of thousands of New Orleans-area residents whose homes were damaged by the Aug. 29 storm.

Temporary housing is available for some. As many as 1,000 Port of New Orleans workers, for example, could soon be living on a docked ship. Government-supplied mobile homes are being set up at manufacturing plants for hard-hat workers who have lost their homes. Kenner Police Chief Nick Congemi said more than a dozen officers who lost their homes are sleeping on air mattresses at the police station.

"All they have is the clothing on their backs," he said.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency estimates that Louisiana needs 200,000 mobile homes for storm victims.

There seems to be plenty of demand. Real estate developer Henry Shane said half of the 7,000 apartment units that he owns in the New Orleans area were damaged in the storm.

"We have 100 percent occupancy on the units that are undamaged," he said. "If I had a choice, I would fill them with people trying to rebuild the city, like policemen and firemen."

Many of Shane's current tenants have lost their jobs and are unable to pay rent.

"Under normal circumstances, if you don't pay your rent, I evict you very quickly. But these aren't normal times," he said.

The Redwood Apartments have long attracted immigrants from Central America. The privately owned complex operates under a federal program that provides affordable housing to working poor people.

"This place is like a little city on its own. It's a trampoline into the American dream," complex manager Jorje Picado said. "People start out here and go on to buy houses in Kenner."

Still, Picado is trying to discourage the 1,800 residents from returning to the complex.

"We couldn't handle it," he said.

Dorvin executive Howard Raymond said he is concerned about the residents' safety, and is asking Kenner officials to help relocate them.

"What I'm worried about is what happens when it starts raining again," Raymond said. "Some of these units still have electricity. What happens when the water starts pouring in?"

Kenner City Council President John Lavarine III said he is trying to persuade FEMA to locate mobile homes on a city playground near the complex.

"We want these people to stay in Kenner," he said. "We want them to continue to participate in our community and our economy."

Empty bus catches fire on I-12

No one hurt in tie-up south of Covington

St. Tammany bureau

A charter bus caught fire Friday afternoon as it was being towed along Interstate 12 south of Covington, creating a spectacle of smoke and flames that backed up traffic in both directions.

The bus was empty, and the tow truck driver was uninjured.

The unidentified driver for Hidden Valley Wrecker Service of Houston told State Police a tire on the bus blew out and started smoking as he drove the disabled bus back to Texas on I-12 near the Tchefuncte River overpass.

By the time the wrecker pulled off the highway and stopped, the back of the bus was engulfed in flames. The rear half of the bus appeared destroyed.

By the time the Covington area's 12 Fire Protection District extinguished the blaze, traffic was already backing up on I-12 in both directions

Residents should avoid unnecessary vaccination

Supply of shots is threatened

By Allen Powell II
River Parishes bureau

Due to a limited supply of several vaccines, Louisiana health officials are urging local residents to avoid unnecessary vaccinations before they return to their homes in Hurricane Katrina affected areas.

State Health Officer Jimmy Guidry said officials have received a rash of requests in the aftermath of Katrina for vaccinations for diseases ranging from hepatitis A to cholera, although there is little to no danger of residents contracting those diseases in the course of normal clean-up activities.

Guidry said that concerns that outbreaks of cholera, typhoid and typhus could occur are completely unfounded since none of those diseases existed in large numbers in the New Orleans area before the storm. Guidry blamed the fear of outbreaks on rumors and erroneous reports from some media sources, and said many residents are straining the health care system by requesting unnecessary vaccinations for hepatitis A and B and tetanus.

Those requests are taxing the supply of vaccinations needed for first responders and other at-risk individuals, he said.

Guidry noted that most residents only need a tetanus shot if they are returning to the areas affected by the storm. He added that most of the medical problems in Katrina's aftermath have dealt with injuries sustained during rescue and cleanup efforts, not communicable diseases.

However, officials are still on the ground watching for possible disease outbreaks in areas where standing water is prevalent and mosquitoes could be breeding.

"It's still not yet safe for all of these residents to return to their homes, although we're making great progress," Guidry said.

Guidry reminded residents that water-boil orders are still in effect for many areas, and added that residents should not take showers in places with contaminated water supplies.

Dr. Raoult Ratard, a state epidemiologist, agreed with Guidry's advice, and noted that there have only been about 50 reported cases of hepatitis A in Louisiana this year. Ratard acknowledged that the disease can be underreported, and estimated that no more than 40 people in the New Orleans had the disease. However, he noted that that is far too few people to cause a mass outbreak.

Strapped city ponders payroll

Money to pay workers sought as areas reopen

By Frank Donze
Staff writer

Evidence of recovery is everywhere in New Orleans, with hotels, grocery stores and government agencies slowly emerging from beneath the muck and debris that Hurricane Katrina left behind.

But out of public view, reconstruction of another kind is moving forward as City Hall struggles to reassemble a work force that has scattered far and wide across Louisiana and the nation.

And now that four areas of the city are scheduled to reopen, Nagin administration officials say it is imperative that essential personnel be in place to provide basic services, from garbage removal to traffic control to granting permits to businesses.

The first challenge facing the city is to find far-flung workers and determine whether they are ready and willing to return. As part of a tracking system, employees are contacted and asked a series of questions about job titles and duties, whether children are enrolled in schools outside of the city, the status of their home in New Orleans and long-term plans for returning.

The larger dilemma is how to pay them.

Nagin has said the city's coffers are effectively empty pending an infusion of cash from the state, the federal government or a line of credit. Even as commerce returns, the city budget picture will be grim for months, if not years, because property and sales tax collections are expected to be minuscule.

While the Federal Emergency Management Agency has pledged financial assistance, the Nagin administration has encountered what could be a huge problem: Federal regulations limit the level of aid cities can receive to make payroll.

"FEMA only reimburses for overtime during emergencies," said Finance Director Reggie Zeno. Zeno said the administration has asked FEMA to waive those regulations immediately and provide full base pay for the foreseeable future for all city employees deemed essential to the recovery and repopulation effort.

While the request is "moving up the chain of command," Zeno said Thursday that the city has not gotten a reply.

"FEMA only reimburses for overtime during emergencies."
REGGIE ZENO
Finance Director

City officials, who meet regularly with FEMA executives, have not put a dollar figure on their request. But Zeno said on average, New Orleans spends about $20 million a month on salaries.

"The bottom line is we have no money coming in," Zeno said. "Rules are rules, but this is an unprecedented emergency. In the history of the United States, I don't know if there's ever been a case where a large American city was knocked out of commission for this long. There are no regulations to cover this."

In the meantime, Zeno said he is working with representatives of Foley & Judell, the city's bond counsel, "to put our hands on any source of funds we can find."

Nagin confidant David White, a Mandeville businessman who is assisting the negotiations with FEMA, called the payroll dilemma "the biggest issue now facing the city."

"To be fair, FEMA is totally committed to providing temporary housing for city workers" who have been displaced, White said. Indeed, the cruise ships Ecstasy and Sensation have been moored at the Poland Avenue and Julia Street wharves to provide housing. Nagin and some other city brass are housed at the Hyatt Regency Hotel, which also is being used for office space.

"But if the city can't pay them and they can't take care of their families, that means they probably can't come home. This is a problem that needs to be resolved and resolved quickly," White said.

City workers can contact the city at (877)751-2415. Sewerage & Water Board employees are asked to call (877)863-9405.

Leader of state's Democrats steps down

Shaw chief swamped with recovery work

From staff reports

BATON ROUGE – The chairman of the state Democratic Party resigned Friday, saying he needs to focus on his company, which has landed several large contracts to help with the rebuilding efforts after Hurricane Katrina.

Jim Bernhard Jr. said directing The Shaw Group Inc.'s relief efforts will be a full-time job.

"The people of our state who have been so tremendously and adversely affected by this disaster require all the available help that exists, and I feel an obligation to contribute to those needs," Bernhard said in a letter to party Vice Chairwoman Mary Lou Winters.

"Though political action will be part of the state's response, I do not believe I can fairly divide my energies between the party and my relief and recovery efforts and totally fulfill the obligations of both important jobs to my satisfaction or yours," he wrote.

Winters, who lives in Columbia, will take over his duties, according to the letter.

Bernhard founded the Baton Rouge-based industrial construction and engineering company and serves as the chairman and chief executive officer.

He became head of the Louisiana Democratic Party for about eight months after becoming actively involved in state politics in the 2003 governor's race.

While Bernhard backed former Attorney General Richard Ieyoub in that election, he supported Kathleen Blanco in her successful runoff campaign and helped run her transition team before she took office.

Since Hurricane Katrina, the Shaw Group has been awarded two large no-bid contracts from the federal government: a $100 million contract from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to provide temporary housing for evacuees and a $100 million contract from the Army Corps of Engineers to assist in the efforts to drain floodwater from New Orleans.

Contracts awarded without bid, which also have gone out to firms like Bechtel Corp. and Kellogg, Brown & Root Services Inc., have been questioned by some critics of the Bush administration, including prominent national Democrats.

For example, House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi has noted that the Shaw Group and a couple of other contractors have used former FEMA head Joe Allbaugh as a lobbyist. Allbaugh, a close friend of President Bush, also managed his 2000 campaign.

But Andrew Koneschusky, acting executive director of the state Democratic Party, said the Shaw Group is the logical company to work on the recovery efforts. It is the only business based in Louisiana that can compete for the large contracts, he said. A company spokesman also noted that Shaw typically uses Louisiana-based subcontractors to help with its work.

Entergy seeks rate increase to cover costs

Major displacement means lost business

By Keith Darcé
Business writer

Entergy Corp.'s southeastern Louisiana electric utilities will seek rate increases to pay for some of the costs from Hurricane Katrina and to compensate for lost business from some evacuees who won't return home soon, if ever, senior utility executives said Friday.

"We are going to have to do something," said Dan Packer, chief executive officer of Entergy New Orleans. "Our revenue requirement was based on 250,000 electricity customers and 150,000 (natural) gas customers. We're not going to have that anymore."

Even as hundreds of utility workers move into the hardest hit areas to restore power, senior executives with Entergy New Orleans, which supplies power to Orleans Parish, and Entergy Louisiana, which supplies power to the city's suburbs, have begun crunching numbers to figure how much more income the utilities will need to keep their businesses afloat.

"We started meetings on (possible rate increase requests) last week. I've got more meetings on it next week," Packer said during a morning news conference on Poydras Street in New Orleans' Central Business District.

Packer and Entergy Louisiana Chief Executive Officer Renae Conley would not predict how much rates might increase for the two utilities' 1.1 million customers in the region, but Conley said requests for the increases could be filed with regulators fairly quickly.

Entergy New Orleans is regulated by the New Orleans City Council while Entergy Louisiana is regulated by the state Public Service Commission.

Entergy executives had anticipated losing some customers from a direct hurricane hit as part of disaster drills before Katrina, so they were prepared to consider the financial implications for the companies. But they never imagined the massive population displacement produced by this storm, Packer said.

"I think the reality of it is different than our war games. I think it's worse," he said.

Both executives said their companies, at least for the time being, remain financially sound. But that could change in the coming months as revenue from their businesses tumble because of lost customers and bills mount from the recovery effort.

Though none of the major bond rating firms had altered their ratings for Entergy New Orleans or Entergy Louisiana, the New Orleans utility remained under review by Moody's Investor Service for a possible downgrade.

Meanwhile, utility workers continued to restore power to parts of the city that weren't badly flooded and Jefferson Parish communities in the suburbs.

About 250,000 Entergy utility customers remained in the dark Friday, but many of those homes and businesses were in the hardest hit areas that will not be repopulated for weeks or months.

About 20 percent of New Orleans, including much of the neighborhoods along the Mississippi River from the Bywater to Uptown that escaped flooding, should have electricity within two weeks, Packer said.

That was good news for the business people and residents who will start returning to the city over the next week.

Power will return more slowly in more heavily damaged areas such as the lower Ninth Ward in New Orleans, St. Bernard Parish and lower Plaquemines Parish, he said.

"The most difficult restoration after Katrina has just begun. Some areas require complete reconstruction. This damage was catastrophic," he said.

Workers must replace hundreds of utility poles and miles of electricity lines that were blown down in the storm, he said. In New Orleans alone, nine of the city's 17 substations were flooded and required repairs.

Water remained a problem for utility crews in some parts of the Central Business District on Friday even though the area's streets had been dry for days. Even though most of the district was connected to the regional power grid, some buildings still couldn'taccept juice because basement utility substations continued filling with water after days of pumping.

Utility workers were having trouble figuring out where the water was coming from or when it might subside, Packer said. "It could be coming from the municipal water system, or it could be residual water" from the flooding, he said.

Feds aim to funnel cash to schools in storm areas

$2.6 billion in aid could be on the way

By John Pope
Staff writer

To help school districts educate the more than 372,000 Louisiana and Mississippi students displaced by Hurricane Katrina, the federal government is proposing a $2.6 billion program to pay as much as 90 percent of the cost of schooling evacuated pupils in this academic year, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings announced Friday.

The aid, which Congress must approve, could amount to as much as $7,500 per pupil, though that amount would vary depending on the school district. It represents a marked increase from the 9 percent the federal government generally allocates for students in kindergarten through high school, she said.

It would also include students in private and parochial schools, with $488 million to help families meet tuition costs, Spellings said in a telephone news conference in which she defended the amount by stressing the uniqueness of the situation.

"The president believes this is appropriate for kids who were in private education, particularly coming out of Louisiana," she said. "We're not trying to provoke a voucher debate but to provide aid to these kids and their families."

Money for public school students would go to school districts except in Louisiana and Mississippi. In those states, Spellings said, it would go directly to the state education departments to give them flexibility in deciding how to divide the aid between districts coping with an influx of new students and districts shut down by the storm that are trying to reopen.

This program, which could cost as much as $1.9 billion, is one part of the overall $2.6 billion package for students from kindergarten through college who were forced to leave their local schools and enroll elsewhere.

Calling the proposal "a big step in getting our schools' financial needs met," state Education Superintendent Cecil Picard said the money "not only addresses the needs of our devastated school districts but also takes into account the additional costs to those schools that are accepting Katrina's kids with open arms."

For that factor, he said, "I am grateful."

Picard said he wished federal money also was available to pay salaries of teachers forced to flee.

"Many of our teachers want to return to their home districts to reopen their schools but can't do so without a paycheck," he said. "It is critical to our children's future that we do not lose our high-quality educators. Louisiana's children need to come home to Louisiana teachers."

At the college level, a $227 million allotment is designed to provide relief on student-loan payments and help colleges that have received displaced students or have been forced to close.

The Education Department said it would forgive six months of interest payments on student loans for borrowers in hurricane-affected areas of Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi, and that it would provide as much as $1,000 for each student a college accepted because of the storm.

Institutions forced to close temporarily would retain aid they had already received, according to the department, and students there would not be required to repay financial help they had received for this semester.

To help people who need help in finding work, the federal Labor Department on Friday proposed accounts for states to design that would provide as much as $5,000 to each person needing extra training or for such services as child care or transportation.

Toll-free hotline for people seek-

"They said they refused to recognize that this was a forced evacuation. I said, 'Well, I suggest you go pick up a newspaper and look at it.' "
MACKIE SHILSTONE, Garden District resident

Living expenses reimbursed, sometimes

14-day limit is likely to be sticking point

By Jeffrey Meitrodt
Staff Writer

Like many New Orleans residents, Mackie Shilstone's first post-Hurricane Katrina conversation with his insurance company didn't go well. Though he had run up thousands of dollars in expenses after evacuating his family to Houston, the Chubb agent he reached on the telephone refused to offer a penny of assistance.

"They said they refused to recognize that this was a forced evacuation," Shilstone recalled. "I said, 'Well, I suggest you go pick up a newspaper and look at it.' It really surprised me."

But two days later, Shilstone said, the company agreed to send him a check for $6,800 to cover his hotel bills and a bunch of other living expenses, including food and clothing – even though Shilstone didn't know whether his Garden District home had sustained as much as a scratch.

After a few days of confusion, in which many legitimate claims for living assistance were rejected by insurers, most companies are now paying off like slot machines. In fact, money typically is being handed out before a claims adjuster has even looked at a policyholder's home.

Any money provided for living expenses is not subject to a policyholder's deductible.

At State Farm, the largest residential insurer in Louisiana, representatives said they have sent out 90,000 checks to homeowners in the three states affected by Katrina. Each of those checks was for $2,500.

"In some cases, $2,500 may be more than the legitimate claim is," said Mike Tucker, a State Farm executive who testified at a joint legislative hearing this week.

So why is State Farm handing out the money without first peeking at the damage?

"We realized this was a drastic situation," said Robert Phillips, a team leader for State Farm's catastrophe team. "A lot of people didn't have the money they needed to feed themselves or house themselves. They were in a bad situation, and we wanted to get help to them as quickly as possible."

But don't get used to the assistance. In most cases, policyholders in the New Orleans area won't receive money for so-called additional living expenses – ALE in insurance jargon – for more than 14 days, insurers said. That's because the vast majority of homes in this region were damaged by water, not wind, and there are major differences between flood insurance and homeowners insurance when it comes to providing such assistance.

In short, flood insurance – which is issued by the federal government – provides no money for living expenses.

By contrast, a homeowners policy provides at least 14 days of assistance, as long as the civil authorities ordered a mandatory evacuation or didn't allow residents to live in their homes in the aftermath of the hurricane, which includes Orleans, Jefferson, St. Bernard, Plaquemines and portions of St. Tammany parishes. That benefit is paid even if your home sustained no damage whatsoever, insurers said.

There is no dollar limit to the amount of such help, but insurers said policyholders must support their expenses with receipts and may be asked to repay any unspent advances. What's more, payments will be reduced if someone went beyond their normal standard of living, such as a splurging on a suite at the Waldorf-Astoria in Manhattan or eating every meal at an expensive restaurant.

"The idea of this benefit is to accommodate your normal standard of living," said Michael Trevino, spokesman for Allstate Insurance Co., the state's second-largest residential insurer.

Allstate customers received up to $5,000 to cover their post-Katrina living expenses, Trevino said, but he declined to say how many policyholders received such checks or provide a total dollar figure.

Not all insurers have been so generous. Louisiana Insurance Commissioner J. Robert Wooley said a number of companies have called his office to "apologize" for not providing such assistance to their customers. Wooley told state lawmakers that some of those companies simply couldn't afford to take the risk of shelling out the money without knowing the actual damage suffered by the policyholders' homes.

Wooley's office declined to identify the companies that have refused requests for living assistance.

For policyholders whose homes sustained major wind damage, the customer could be reimbursed for virtually all of their living expenses while their homes are repaired or rebuilt. This benefit usually lasts one or two years, depending on the company. Typically, there is no dollar limit.

Because most damage in this area was caused by flooding, which limits living assistance help to 14 days, some lawmakers are concerned that people will need much more assistance with living expenses than their insurers have provided.

"A lot of that money has been exhausted," Wooley said. "We're rapidly reaching the point where everybody needs that assistance."

To help fill the gap, many residents will turn to the Federal Emergency Management Agency. However, there are strict limits on how much help FEMA will provide for living expenses.

Dear Hospital Family including our Patients, Physicians, Employees, Volunteers, Business Partners, Jefferson Parish officials, Fire Departments, Sheriff and officers, DMAT, United States Military, National Guard, Businesses, Extended West Jeff Family and Community:

Words cannot begin to express my feelings of gratitude for all of you who have contributed to our ability to serve the needs of this area during Hurricane Katrina and her ferocious aftermath. We were the only hospital on the West Bank and one of only three in Jefferson, Orleans, and St. Bernard. Professionalism, Compassion, Humanitarianism, Dedication, Family: these are the words that resound throughout the halls of West Jefferson Medical Center, the Physicians Center, and the other facilities in the West Jefferson Healthcare System. These are the words that are synonymous with the West Jefferson Staff.

Because of you, because of your presence in the hospital, because of your assistance on our behalf off-campus, because of the hand you extended from your base of operations and all of the hard work you have done amidst less than ideal circumstances, we have been able to maintain essential healthcare services and more. We were always safe, our needs have been met and all patients received excellent care. To the more than 2,000 persons who rode out Katrina with us despite not knowing how your homes and loved ones fared during the storm, I applaud you for remaining loyal to our mission; you put our patients first.

I am indeed deeply sorry for your personal losses, especially for anyone who lost a loved one as a result of Katrina. You and your family are in my thoughts and personal prayers. I have long been aware of "random acts of kindness" but never before have we been in a position to be both the recipients and donors of such largesse. I am grateful.

It is my hope that a disaster such as this never be repeated in our community or visited on any other. However, because of your response to Hurricane Katrina and the lessons she provided, we are stronger now and will be more so in the future. We are humbled by the outpouring of love and aid from around our nation and the world. Jefferson Parish leadership has been and will continue to be a "Beacon of Light and Hope" for the future rebuilding of our wonderful community.

You have my admiration and sincere thanks for all you have done and continue to do to safeguard the health and vitality of our community.

To those of you on your way back to the Medical Center, please have a safe journey. The hospital, our staff, and our community need you. Please go to www.wjmc.org today.

Thank you one and all,

Rescuers leave city angry and disillusioned

Counselors hear about frustration with leaders

By Bruce Nolan
Staff writer

Scores of New Orleans police and firefighters coming off the most intense duty of their lives are deeply angry at their commanders, charging that their departments let them down after Hurricane Katrina and left individual groups of officers to care for desperate people on their own.

The sentiments are emerging in debriefings with counselors and psychiatrists at a Baton Rouge respite center, said Dr. Elmer Rigamer, medical director of Catholic Charities, Archdiocese of New Orleans, which is running the center.

For days, police and firefighters have been checking in at the center, headed for a few days relief out of town. They get vaccinations, apply for federal relief and make travel arrangements to see their families.

Many are also debriefed by Rigamer and Dr.

Some Orleans schools to open on West Bank

New registration begins Sept. 26

By Susan Finch
Staff writer

Orleans Parish public school officials hope to launch the system's 2005-06 term by Nov. 1 on the West Bank, where a team of experts this week found most school buildings had sustained little storm damage, interim Superintendent Ora Watson said Friday.

"We intend to start registration of teachers and students on Sept. 26." Watson said, adding that parents should let the School Board know whether they'll be enrolling their children, and the board needs to find out which teachers will be available to report for duty.

She called the West Bank the "most logical place" to begin bringing the city's public schools back to life, not only because school buildings there are in good shape but also because many

Investors want to open Lowe's

Capitano calls developer 'quick-buck' artist

By Matt Scallan
Kenner bureau

A land developer is seeking to erect a Lowe's Home Improvement outlet in tents or trucks near The Esplanade mall, but Kenner officials derided the proposal Thursday, with Mayor Phil Capitano calling the developer a "quick-buck artist."

The pitch came from Greg Clayton of Hahnville, representing an investment group that is trying to buy the property from Louis Armstrong International Airport. He asked the Kenner City Council on Thursday to speed the rezoning and resubdivision of a 26-acre tract, saying Lowe's is interested in selling merchandise immediately from tents or trucks while a permanent store is built.

"Kenner is going to be able to use all the building material that it can get for the next five years," Clayton said.

But most council members opposed the idea, saying the move would set a bad precedent and that plenty of retail space is available in Kenner if Lowe's wants a presence there. Council

St. Charles schools open to some

Displaced students will wait two weeks

By John-John Williams IV
River Parishes bureau

School resumed Thursday for nearly 10,000 St. Charles Parish public school students, but more than 1,600 displaced pupils who moved to the parish after Hurricane Katrina will have to wait two more weeks before attending classes.

On Thursday, the School Board discussed different plans to deal with the influx of 1,603 students and the need to hire adequate staff to accommodate the bump in enrollment. Officials said the additional students will push the district's pupil-to-teacher ratio from 20-to-1 to 22-to-1.

Board members agreed to absorb the additional students starting Sept. 26 and have them attend the school closest to where they currently reside. The board will take formal action at its meeting Wednesday.

"We need to do this in a quality, orderly fashion," said Superintendent Rodney Lafon.

District officials hope to register displaced students Sept. 21-23 from 9 a.m. to 1 p.m. and from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m. East bank students will register at Harry Hurst Middle School in Destrehan and Albert Cammon Middle School in St. Rose, while west

NOWHERE TO CALL HOME

Slidell workers await promised trailers

By Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

Sitting next to his wife in one of the Slidell emergency operations center offices, veteran Slidell city worker Ralph Galliano slumped in the blue-cushioned chair in a brief moment of relaxation followed by flashes of anxiety as he spoke Friday.

"We had 7 feet of water," he said of what used to be their home on Brookwood Drive in south Slidell's Dellwood subdivision. "The roof was torn open in a couple of spots. The garage was torn up. Everything in the house was flooded."

While his family evacuated to Arkansas, Galliano stayed close to home as Hurricane Katrina bore down on St. Tammany Parish. The municipal vehicle maintenance foreman hunkered down in the shop and slept – when he could – on an air mattress on floor.

Since then, he's been lucky if he could get a few hours of unbroken sleep a night. Galliano and many others worked virtually around the clock the first four or five days, then 18-hour shifts, then 12-hour ones and finally, beginning Monday, 10-hour shifts.

Galliano allowed workers an hour or two to check on their homes and then get back to work. It was almost a week after Katrina hit before he went to see his own, as the water was slowly draining and being pumped out of badly flooded south Slidell.

'They've helped as much as they could'

TRAUMA, from B-1

Cheryl Person, psychiatrists with specialties in mass disaster response.

Ordinarily, police and emergency crews thrust into the acute human suffering of a major natural disaster like an earthquake feel a sense of overwhelming sadness, knowing that earthquakes are not preventable, Rigamer said.

Anger is for other kinds of disasters – a terrorist attack, for instance – because a human cause is behind the suffering, he said. "You want to go bomb something," he said.

"But the dynamic here is fascinating. Sad to admit it, but the predominant dynamic here is anger and disillusionment," Rigamer said.

"They really feel let down at all levels."

In scores of conversations this week, Rigamer and Person have heard tales of frustration from police and other rescuers coming out of flooded neighborhoods, especially in the first four harrowing days after Katrina stuck Aug. 29.

"It's fascinating what we've seen. Regardless of background or experience, they were simply heroic. Sometimes showing heroism of mythic proportions," Rigamer said.

But in many cases, officers told the psychiatrists tales of being stranded with small bands of people, of being promised by commanders that help was coming, of passing the word to those under their care – only to see hours and days go by with no relief.

"This is a big-time thing with these guys," Rigamer said. "They really feel let down."

One person Rigamer interviewed complained bitterly about his department's perceived lack of preparedness.

Consulting a notebook on his lap, Rigamer read a fragment of the interview: "This city begins to prepare for next year's Mardi Gras the day after this year's. They did nothing to prepare for this."

Even so, the overwhelming majority of those he has talked to are clear they want to remain in their jobs as police, firefighters or paramedics, he said.

But a "significant percentage," he said, have spoken about wanting to resume their career elsewhere after their own departmental experiences.

In sessions with police and others, Rigamer and Person said they are urging their patients to focus on the good they were able to do and the rescues they made.

Even now, days after the worst of the crisis, many officers are still running on adrenaline, still suffering sleep disturbances, Person said.

"They're having trouble coming out of the hyper-vigilant phase," she said.

By and large, it is too soon to tell whether police and firefighters are at risk for suffering post-traumatic stress syndrome, said Rigamer and Person.

In their favor is the reality that they are a tough, self-selected group – already among the most self-reliant individuals, Person said.

"Generally, they're physically exhausted, though not damaged," Person said. "They are extraordinarily resilient. The few problems I've seen revolve around very appropriate anger."

"They know what they've been through," Rigamer said. "They know they've helped as much as they could, in the absence of adequate support."

Workers stretched to breaking point

WORKERS, from B-1

"I was in awe," he said. "I lost everything. It was so unimaginable. It was either laugh or cry, but crying was no option at that point."

Galliano is hardly alone.

The ranks of the hurricane homeless include more than 140 of Slidell's city employees – about 45 percent of the civilian and police work force, from laborers all the way up to the mayor, police chief, the council administrator and several City Council members.

They're staying with family or friends, in the operations center in the new city barn that serves as a makeshift City Hall or in motels. Almost all of them continue to report for another long hard day of work and have been since shortly after the storm.

In the early aftermath, with no power or telephone service and amid grinding turmoil, one of the greatest concerns was the lack of communications with family members who had scattered to various safer locations.

Now many are just weary, emotionally drained. Some are stretched to the breaking point, city officials say. They're also anxious about whether, or at least when, the federal government is going to send some of the help President Bush and others keep promising.

Among the many are recreation and parks employee Mary Reyes, whose Windward Place home in Eden Isles south of Slidell was demolished by winds as strong as any that ripped through New Orleans and the storm surge from Lake Pontchartrain.

"I live in fear, just like everybody else, that they are not going to be there for you," she said of the widely criticized Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Mike Provenzano, a vehicle maintenance technician for only nine months, had been living with his parents on Sanctuary Drive off Eden Isles Boulevard before Katrina struck. He, too, no longer has a home to stay in. He's been sleeping on the shop floor.

"There was 4½ feet of water and lot of debris in the yard," he said. "The water went down pretty fast, but the mold took over very fast."

It's been a struggle to keep working. "I don't have much left in me, not much to keep going. The stress level is pretty high," he said. "But there's plenty of good people around you to help keep you going."

Provenzano believes the family home is salvageable, but he hopes FEMA, or someone, will provide him and his co-workers with a small trailer or some other temporary residence so he can "get off the shop floor" while the rebuilding goes on.

Mayor Ben Morris and other city officials have been working frantically to get temporary housing – trailers, other mobile residences – from FEMA for the displaced city employees and others who keep plugging away at the job.

"Some of them don't have anything – zero!" he practically shouted in a now-familiar rant at the sluggishness of FEMA's recovery response. "They (the workers) are breaking down."

Morris, Chief of Staff Reinhard Dearing and others have been trying to bring 400 house trailers to two mobile home parks, one off Interstate 59 near Pearl River and one off U.S. 190 East, or Shortcut Highway, near the Indian Village area.

The temporary residences would be for displaced personnel from the city, the Slidell area fire protection district, Defense Information Systems Agency, Slidell Memorial Hospital and other public and quasi-public agencies contributing to the recovery effort.

At one point, Morris went into a rage when he thought FEMA had reneged on the 400 trailers, which Councilman Ray Canada had arranged through a FEMA representative in Baton Rouge about two weeks ago.

On Friday, he fretted that St. Tammany Parish President Kevin Davis, who has parishwide authority in declared emergencies, would snatch up most of the mobile residences that Morris believed had been set aside for Slidell.

So a group of Slidell officials put in a rare appearance Friday at the daily late-morning briefings Davis has been holding with municipal officials, power companies and others throughout the parish.

Although the trailers issue wasn't brought up, Davis said later that FEMA had control over such matters and noted that Slidell representatives seldom attended the meetings he's been holding to coordinate recovery and assistance efforts.

Back in Slidell, Dearing acknowledged Davis' executive-order authority, under state law, in a parishwide disaster.

Davis "has assured us that he will do everything in his power to provide FEMA housing, to make sure that not only city employees that have been made homeless, but private residents as well, will have someplace," Dearing said. "And I do believe he is sincere in that."

Group wants to buy land

member Michele Branigan cited the vacant former Wal-Mart store at 1000 W. Esplanade Ave.

Clayton's investment group includes Latter & Blum owner Robert Merrick, Barriere Construction Co. and Clancy Developments. The group is negotiating to buy the 26 acres from the airport. Any sale of the property would need approval of both the New Orleans Aviation Board and the New Orleans City Council.

The property abuts 32nd Street, eastern entrance to The Esplanade. It was a residential neighborhood until the airport bought out the property owners as part of its noise mitigation program in the mid-1990s.

Kenner owns the rights of way for streets, controls the zoning and determines whether the residential lots can be consolidated into large parcels. Clayton said the investment group would pay the city $1 million immediately for the streets if the council approves the deal.

Capitano criticized the proposal for a temporary store and said Clayton was trying to take advantage of the situation. He said a tent store would violate many of Kenner's building code regulations, and he added that he would prefer to negotiate directly with Lowe's.

"We want people who will take a stake in this city, not a tent stake," he said. "If we allow this, where will it end?"

Capitano later apologized for the "quick-buck artist" remark, saying that he had gotten only an hour's sleep the night before.

Councilman Dominic Weilbaecher, who has clashed often with Capitano in recent months, told Clayton that the mayor doesn't have the final say on the property.

"These seven people up here are the ones who are going to make the decision," he said, referring to the council.

Clayton said his group has been working on the project for some time, and that the idea for a tent was simply a "wild idea" to help residents after the storm.

"We'll go back and do this the regular way," he said.

Most schools unharmed on West Bank

parents of public school students own homes in that area of the city.

Of 21 schools — including some on the east bank — surveyed earlier this week by a team of experts from the Council of Great City Schools, five were found with damage that would make their immediate use impossible, Watson said. The five were L.B. Landry High School and Paul Habans Elementary in Algiers, as well as Alcee Fortier High School, Eleanor McMain Magnet School and Lusher School extension, Watson said.

Watson said plans are still tentative, but the configuration being considered would send ninth- through 12th-grade students to O. Perry Walker or Edna Karr High Schools while kindergarten through eighth-grade students would been sent to Henderson Middle School, Rosenwald Elementary, Fischer Elementary, Alice Hart Elementary, Martin Behrman Elementary or Eisenhower Elementary.

Watson's comments came one day after the School Board, holding its first meeting since the hurricane in Baton Rouge, approved the controversial charter application of Lusher School, which would remove one of the school district's highest performing schools from the direct control of the school district administration. The application had won the backing of the school's faculty and the overwhelming majority of the students' parents in August.

Words of support for the measure came from Watson and from Flozell Daniels Jr., executive director for state and local affairs at Tulane University, which is providing $1.5 million in private gap funding to help the transition from the school district to the charter operation.

Daniels, the husband of board member Heidi Lovett Daniels, said the university is retaining its 7,000 full-time employees through the storm recovery, at an operational loss of $42,000 a day, to make sure that New Orleans' largest private employer stays in business. Ensuring that those workers can send their children to a quality public school goes hand in hand with that effort, he said.

All the board members voted for the charter plan except for Heidi Daniels, who abstained, and board president Torin Sanders. Sanders expressed misgivings about a provision that treats children of Tulane employees as residents of the Lusher district, thereby giving them preference for admission ahead of students from other areas of the city.

The scores of school system employees who packed the meeting, held in an auditorium at the Department of Education's headquarters in the state capital, were there to find out what will become of their jobs, for which they received their final pay this week until the system recovers.

The board passed a resolution putting them on "disaster leave," a status that gives them no income or benefits but assures them the same pay as their old jobs, though not necessarily at the same sites, when they return to work.

The lapse of health insurance coverage was of particular concern to the teachers and administrators. State Education Superintendent Cecil Picard said he is working with the insurance carrier to get the coverage extended.

Picard noted, too, that the state Department of Labor has made an exception for school system workers, allowing them to receive $250 a week in unemployment compensation instead of the standard $95.

Joe DeRose, spokesman for the United Teachers of New Orleans, said Friday that the union is happy to see the board making efforts to open schools as soon as possible.

The Thursday meeting began with a chorus of calls from board members to work together to improve the schools and to abandon rancor that divided them before the hurricane.

The divisiveness reappeared, however, when board member Phyllis Landrieu sought to add to the agenda a resolution that called for hiring former U.S. Secretary of Education Rodney Paige as acting chief academic officer for the district and installing William Roberti, of the financial turnaround firm Alvarez & Marsal, as acting superintendent. The plan called for honoring Watson's contract, with her duties to be determined by Paige.

The proposal drew a roar of disapproval from the audience of mostly teachers, principals and other school employees.

Though board members Jimmy Fahrenholtz, Lourdes Moran and Una Anderson joined Landrieu to support her proposal, state law requires that at least two-thirds of members – in this case, five — approve adding items to published agendas. Sanders, Daniels and board member Cynthia Cade voted no.

More teachers will be hired

bank students will register at Raymond K. Smith Middle School in Luling.

"The students will be contacted by the schools in regard to registering," said Rochelle Cancienne, the district's director of public relations. "At registration they will be told their official start date."

With the additional students, the district plans to hire 41 full-time teachers and 10 half-year teachers. Sixteen of the new hires will replace teachers who resigned following Katrina. More than 300 teachers applied to work in the system since the storm, and district officials interviewed half of them Tuesday.

School system officials do not think that all of the new students will remain with the district for the remainder of the school year.

Lafon said he recently spoke to Jefferson Parish Superintendent Diane Roussel who told him that she planned to open many of her schools Oct.3.

"She's working hard to get them open," Lafon said. "They need to get their kids up and their numbers back. We think some (students) will leave. I think a lot will leave after Christmas."

Some seem to think that displaced students from St. Bernard and Orleans parishes will remain with the district until the end of the school year — and maybe longer if their families decide to settle in St. Charles Parish.

"I think a lot will stay," board President Mary Bergeron said.

For tales of life and death, the writing's on the walls

Rescuers' language of painted scribbles awaits homeowners

By Michael Perlstein

As the floodwaters subside and rescuers complete their last searches of attics and barricaded rooms, police and military troops are fanning out across the city with cans of spray paint, pinpointing the dead and clearing the way home for the living.

Hurricane Katrina has turned New Orleans into a marked city.

In what is sure to become one of the lasting reminders of the storm's devastation, ground squads are going door to door and marking doors, walls, fences and sidewalks with coded inscriptions in colors that range from Day-Glo orange to charcoal black.

They are moving across the city, neighborhood by neighborhood, block by block and in some districts house by house, leaving behind the FEMA schematic that will be read by workers conducting the next stages of the recovery: collecting bodies and turning on utilities.

"What we are doing is unheard of in the history of recovery operations," said Charles Hood, an urban search and rescue commander for the Federal Emergency Management Agency. "I searched for space shuttle debris for 17 days, but I've never searched house to house in a city this size."

Hood, normally the deputy chief of the Phoenix, Ariz., Fire Department, said the markings are borrowed from generations-old firefighting protocol.

To most returning residents, the markings will be strange and meaningless hieroglyphics, destined to be painted over. But inevitably, some marks will remain, to serve as harsh memorials of the perfect storm.

Parts of town that stayed dry – the French Quarter, parts of the Central Business District and a large slice of Uptown – are only lightly painted. Some areas have only a single symbol on the street or sidewalk to designate "all clear" for an entire block.

In areas that saw significant flooding, every house is marked. Some sport the shorthand "EXT" for exterior search only, or "NE" for no entry. But in areas where the water topped 5 ½ feet, the search teams were ordered to pry open doors or break windows to conduct room-to-room inspections. In still-inundated areas of Lakeview, the marks are being painted on rooftops and the break-ins are being conducted through attics.

Markings on the side of a house on Gov. Nicholls Street in Treme indicate it has been checked. Starting at the top of the X and moving clockwise, the markings indicate the house was checked on Sept. 11, it was not entered, there are no dead and no animals in the house, and the numbers 3505 indicate the team that checked the house.

The Sheriff's Office in New Jersey's Passaic County was among the military units, police squads and fire departments that made up the 28 inspection squads. Detective Lt. Neil Van Ess and Sgt. Kevin Taylor of the New Jersey group were working their way up and down Octavia Street on Thursday. They left their mark, NJ1, in several pockets of the city.

"At some point, people are going to come back, and everything's going to be cleaned up except for these marks," Van Ess said. "They're going to be here for a long time."

Taylor compared the mission to his work in Manhattan after Sept. 11.

"The hurt is the same, but here the people are gone," Taylor said. "In New York, you could see the hurt on the people's faces. Here, there are no faces. It's abandoned. Compared to Sept. 11, the scale is huge. Just the smell of it, the damage that the water does, it's amazing."

Taylor and Van Ess said they didn't break into many houses Uptown, but in other parts of the city, like the 7th Ward, room-by-room searches were necessary to make sure no survivors were left behind.

"We enter if there is some suspicion that somebody is in there," Van Ess said. "Maybe there are cars in the driveway or flies on the window (a sign of a dead body). Of course, you usually know when you have a body. You can smell it from 200 feet."

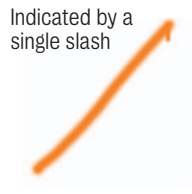
Hood conceded that a shattered window or busted-in door might be a rude awakening for some homeowners whose houses were otherwise unscathed, but such is life and death at the center of the nation's worst disaster.

"We don't want to create any more damage than absolutely necessary," Hood said. "But in areas that had high water, we have to go in. There's still a chance that somebody might be in these residences."

Hundreds of houses are painted with a second set of markings left by the Louisiana Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, designated as "LSPCA." In these homes with abandoned pets, the animal rescue workers have left food and fresh water, plus a mark with the date and how many pets were left inside.

"We're authorized by law to go in and provide food and water," Louisiana SPCA Director Laura Maloney said. "Some people are getting a bit liberal with the spray paint, but we need to know if we have to go back in to leave more food."

Van Ess, who normally would be investigating murders and robberies, said returning residents should not view the markings left by him and his officers as cold scribbles left by strangers.



"We've gone inside the houses and we've seen the family pictures on the wall," he said. "It's like working in the twilight zone because none of the people are here, but we can feel it, we can feel the connection."

X MARKS YOUR HOUSE

Every house, scathed or not, in the flooded areas will be marked with a spray-painted 'X' and other notations within the four sections of the mark. Here is what residents could find when they return and what the markings mean:

Classrooms become bedrooms for some teachers

Group of new hires displaced by storm

By John-John Williams IV
River Parishes bureau

Each day, long after all the students have left, when Principal Patricia Triche's legendary booming voice can no longer be heard in the halls, and even after the last trash can has been emptied, a group of seven teachers remains at Lake Pontchartrain Elementary School in LaPlace.

The group of new hires displaced by Hurricane Katrina and calls the school home. After the storm hit just east of New Orleans, thousands of people sought housing in surrounding areas, including LaPlace, making it nearly impossible to find any type of housing.

Bunking the new hires in classrooms became a temporary solution for the school district.

Efforts are being made to secure permanent housing by both the teachers and the district. But in the meantime, home is the elementary school classrooms.

Kelly Eldridge, who had been a teacher at McDonogh 42 Elementary School in New Orleans, said she accepted a job in St. John the Baptist Parish to stay close to the children and city she has grown to love.

"We wanted to do something for our Orleans kids," Eldridge said. "They (displaced students) light up when we say we are from Orleans Parish."

St. John has been inundated with nearly 1,500 displaced students since Katrina hit, many of them from New Orleans. Lake Pontchartrain alone has more than 200 displaced children. The district hired 25 teachers to deal with the influx.

Sean Duncan, who also taught at McDonogh 42 and now teaches at Lake Pontchartrain, said he decided to stay in the area because he loves New Orleans.

"I always liked the city — the culture; there is always something to do," Duncan said. "And the kids … they really need someone looking out for them."

Two classrooms have been turned into sleeping quarters, and a third classroom is being used as a lounge area.

"This is our chilling-out area," Eldridge said with a laugh as she opened the door to a classroom with a large black futon. "I live down the hall. It's the shortest commute ever."

Duncan, the lone male teacher in the group, has his own classroom to himself but usually sleeps on the futon in the lounge area.

"It starts to take its toll on you," Duncan said. "It's awkward. I'm trying to stay focused and motivated. The classroom is the most stable part of our lives."

Teachers said they pass the time talking to each other, watching television in the school library and trying endlessly to telephone friends, family and the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"That can take all night," said Joanna Rich, who taught at A.D. Crossman Elementary School in New Orleans before getting a job as a third-grade teacher at Lake Pontchartrain. She said one advantage to sleeping at the school is the ability to get a jump-start on the next day of work.

"It's easy to come back and do something in our rooms," she said.

After school, the teachers have had to work feverishly to secure permanent housing, obtain the last checks from their former school districts, apply for federal aid, shop for groceries and run other errands. The teachers must be back in the building before 7 p.m., when the maintenance workers leave.

"We've been locked out before," Rich said.

Rich said she dreads taking cold showers in the school's locker room every morning but wouldn't have it any other way.

"I know I have a bed in another state," Rich said. "I have a choice. I chose to be here. It's a challenge. I definitely feel displaced, but I wanted to serve the same community. I got as close as I could."

There are 29 teachers working in the district that have been displaced by Katrina and do not have a permanent place to stay.

"They are staying at teacher's houses, they are staying with friends," said Ann LaBorde, executive director of personnel and legal services for the district. "Some are commuting from Baton Rouge and Gonzales."

Katrina might have left the teachers without homes, but it hasn't stopped their desire to educate youth.

"My family says we are amazing," Eldridge said. "I don't think we are amazing. We are finishing the job we came to do."

Watching hurricane coverage on television in the three-bedroom home of their Baton Rouge relatives, members of the Emery family gather for breakfast. They have been cooking assembly-line-style, going through entire cartons of eggs and pots of grits each morning.

Four generations find shelter in family home

By Mark Waller
East Jefferson bureau

BATON ROUGE — Into the third week of the Hurricane Katrina evacuation at the Emery household, the washer and dryer still ran nonstop, a tower of bottled water remained stacked by the carport, and parking all 10 vehicles in the driveway continued to pose a daily puzzle centered on the question of who needed to leave first in the morning.

At the peak of its population, 25 visitors, mostly relatives whom the storm chased from Jefferson Parish, slept in the three-bedroom, two-bathroom house that is usually home only to Caleb and Thelma Emery and their two children. At night every bed, couch and patch of carpet was occupied.

Seventeen people from four generations continued to live there this week, already well beyond the time they expected to stay. Yet they managed to maintain jovial spirits as they cooked assembly-line style and crowded in front of the big-screen television set.

The Emery family contributed more than its share to the suddenly overpopulated city of Baton Rouge, where thousands of people from the New Orleans area have temporarily settled, pushed there by Katrina. And among the family members were examples of several major types of hurricane hardship: employment uncertainty, education uncertainty, ruined houses and a lost loved one.

There was the matriarch, Verlina Lewis, 65, of Kenner, mother of eight children, including Thelma Emery and five others who are staying in the house along with their children. Lewis had a 60-year-old brother, Jake James, who was weak with cancer. But on Sept. 1, amid the post-Katrina confusion, he died.

Andrea Thomas throws a blanket over her niece, Zaire Lewis, 4, as she sleeps next to her cousin, Austin Lewis, in what used to be a dining room.

He had been in hospice care when the storm threatened. He moved to Kenner Regional Medical Center while his family evacuated. Lewis figures the abrupt move and loss of family by his side might finally have overwhelmed him.

With parts of the New Orleans area slowly coming back now, she said, she had no idea how to plan her brother's funeral. She couldn't even be sure where to find his body.

"I guess all the funeral homes are underwater, too," she said.

Then there was Lewis' daughter Diana; Diana's daughter, Taneika; and Taneika's four-year-old daughter, Zaire. They returned to their Kenner house when officials first let people back in to check their property in Jefferson Parish, only to discover the roof caved in and the place ransacked, presumably by squatters.

They found unfamiliar clothing, an unfamiliar TV, a different computer in place of theirs and a mess on their gas stove. The little girl's monogrammed jewelry set was gone.

"They turned over things. They dumped every single last drawer out the dresser. They were probably looking for money," said Taneika Lewis.

However, she said, "They were courteous enough to set buckets and trash cans to catch the water."

And there was Verlina's daughter Valencia, and Valencia's daughter, Brianna, a senior at East Jefferson High School in Metairie, whose plans for football games, dances and a timely graduation are now in doubt. Enough water got into their Metairie house to make it a lair of mold and stench.

"She wants to go wherever all of her friends are, and now everybody's separated," Valencia Lewis said of her daughter. "She's like, 'I have five friends in Texas. Can we move to Texas?'"

This week Brianna registered to enroll at Baton Rouge's Bellaire High School and begrudgingly tried on her new school's uniform. Some Jefferson Parish public schools aim to reopen Oct. 3, but East Jefferson High suffered some of the worst damage in the Jefferson system and could remain closed indefinitely.

Meanwhile, Valencia awaited news of when she could return to work as a minute clerk for the 24th District Court in Gretna; Oct. 3 is a possibility. Taneika, a medical assistant at a Kenner doctor's office, had no specifics on the return of her job. Another of Verlina's children, Andrea Thomas, who works for Lake Lawn Metairie Funeral Home in New Orleans and who lived in a Bridge City house that now has three holes in the roof, searched Baton Rouge funeral homes for temporary employment.

Seeing all the cars in the Emery driveway, neighbors donated food and supplies. Lacking space for all the suitcases indoors, family members went out to their car trunks to retrieve clothing. Those with beds had to be careful not to step on someone when getting up.

There were a few perks, however. Thelma Emery said it was as if her house had morphed into a full-service hotel: Everyone else did the cooking, cleaning and even lawn-mowing.

"It surprised us that so many could be congested in a small area and manage to get along pretty well," said Caleb Emery, who, in contrast to his wife, came from a smaller family unaccustomed to such crowding.

The situation may even have drawn the family closer together, figuratively speaking. As relatives came and went late in the week, trying to get back to check on their houses, and the census at the Emery home fluctuated, Thelma Emery said the experience made her reflect on growing up with seven siblings.

"It's something we just had to do," letting everyone stay at her home, Thelma said. "Everybody was welcome. So many family members (who) came in needed a place to stay because of a lack of hotels.

"We never complain," she said. "It just felt like old times again, like a big family reunion."

Students at the University of Southern Mississippi sort clothes and other donated items at the Hattiesburg, Miss., campus. The items, which included a pair of sneakers with a note from a woman in Michigan, were to be loaded onto a truck and shipped to the Gulf Coast.

A long way from her home in Biloxi, Miss., hurricane evacuee Imunique Shaver, 2, kisses grandmother Sheila Shaver in a Detroit church on Friday as Louisiana resident Tracey Marrero, background, holds niece Dylan Rabathaly. Sheila Shaver said she still has not located a large part of her family since fleeing Katrina.

A truck driver swings open the back of his truck in D'Iberville, Miss., unloading storm debris from Hurricane Katrina onto a trash fire. An estimated 50 million cubic yards of debris is being removed from the Mississippi Gulf Coast in the wake of the storm.

A pack of canine evacuees elicits a round of oohs and aahs Friday from people in Shawnee, Kan. The puppies were on display at the Sunflower Humane Society, which announced it would be adopting the Humane Society of South Mississippi in Gulfport.

Workers unload truckloads of storm debris at a landfill in D'Iberville, Miss.

They are homeless and heartbroken, but residents of coastal Mississippi, like people from the New Orleans area, are determined to rebound from Hurricane Katrina. And people across the country are reaching out and pitching in to make sure the Magnolia State comes back, bigger and better than ever.

Sgt. Richard Caudill of the Alabama National Guard answers questions as hundreds stand in line for disaster food stamps Sept. 12 in Covington.

Slidell is hurting, too

While I respect New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's courage and tenacity, I respectfully disagree with his statement that New Orleans should receive most of the money available from the federal government. Perhaps he is not aware that Slidell has been destroyed. Most of the town is flooded, and all of the businesses have received some damage. They are, as of today, not receiving very much in the way of help. FEMA has only a very small presence (perhaps because they are all across the lake in New Orleans), the people cannot get around and if they could, they would not have anywhere to go anyway.

While I understand that Mayor Nagin loves his city very much, I think before we talk about rebuilding barrooms and the Superdome we need to think about getting everyone a place to live — regardless of their town. New Orleans was not the only place hit by the storm. In fact, some other places were actually hit by the eyewall of the storm.

Nagin's turn to take blame

Gov. Kathleen Blanco has admitted the state made mistakes during the horror and tragedy that occurred in New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina. Now it is New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's turn. He did not employ every bus available to get citizens out of harm's way. The lame excuse of not finding enough drivers just isn't going to wash.

To take responsibility for the office that he holds, he must answer the following questions: Why did he wait until Sunday morning to call for a mandatory evacuation, when the National Weather Service put out a warning of catastrophic flooding for New Orleans on Friday evening?

How and when was the process initiated to find bus drivers to get our citizens out of harm's way?

Why wasn't a backup supply of food and water provided for those who were being housed at the Superdome, with officials knowing full well that New Orleans could flood during a catastrophic storm, leading evacuees stranded for days there?

Time for the meek to inherit the earth

I am 33 years old and have lived in New Orleans for eight years. I was neither born nor raised there, but every significant event of my adult life has taken place there. I met my wife there, solidified my career there; we bought our first house there, had our daughter there. There isn't really anyplace else I want to live.

I love my city. I love it for the food, for Mardi Gras, for Jazzfest. I love it for the Indians and the Bone Gangs and for second lines. I love it because everyone calls you baby. I love it because nothing happens so fast that you'll miss it. I love it because life happens in the street and on the porches, because children play their trombones and trumpets outside on the way to school. I love it because a boil anywhere in the neighborhood means a plate of crawfish for everyone.

But my city hides its real self. It hides itself on the maps we give out to tourists. It hides itself in the kitchens of restaurants, the laundry rooms of hotels and on street corners outside the French Quarter. My city's real self was exposed by Hurricane Katrina. We are a city ravaged by poverty. We graduate our students at an abysmally low pace and incarcerate an astronomically high percentage of our citizens. I heard on CNN that the average wage in New Orleans was $9 an hour; I don't believe it's that high, but even if it were, that's not even above the poverty line for a family. Our mayor in the not-so-distant past put our real unemployment rate at 49 percent. Our murder rate leads the country. As a teacher, I personally saw nine of my students buried in the past three years.

Many of those 250,000 houses that President Bush called "now uninhabitable" Thursday night were uninhabitable before the hurricane.

The president spoke about what we should see in our city when it is rebuilt. He said we should see minority-owned business, we should see more home ownership and less rental property. We should have seen those things three weeks ago, but three weeks ago nobody cared about the Third-World-like conditions in New Orleans.

"Should" is a suggestion. I never hear the president use the word "should" when he talks about Iraq or other issues he cares about. For those issues he speaks with conviction. Conviction in our case would have had the president saying ìwillî ñ we will see minority-owned business, we will see more home ownership.

That's what my city needs, for the president to act with conviction for its people. I'm not talking about enterprise zones to bring in new business and new people to make new fortunes in our fallen city. I mean housing and ownership. The president could do it, too, not just on federally owned land, and please not through a lottery. I mean do it everywhere. The houses are going to be torn down anyway; the landlords can collect the insurance money. Buy up the land, build housing and give it away, give low- and no-interest loans to renters who were displaced — all of them. Make us a city of homeowners. Make us proud of every street because it is ours.

This could be President Bush's great social experiment, trickle-up economics — his legacy. He could jump-start the American Dream for a whole city of impoverished citizens. He could fulfill some of the promises that his party made 140 years ago.

Mr. Bush is a man of faith. Jesus had no time for the moneylenders; Psalms 37:11 says the meek shall inherit the earth. Maybe God wants to start in New Orleans.

Where were the ward bosses?

I am just as angry as everyone else about the federal government's near-abandonment of the people who were left behind in New Orleans in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. I believe President Bush's behavior is not the result of racism, but rather the result of his frat-boy cluelessness, which should be apparent to all by now. Believe me, you will never see a member of the Bush family waiting in line to buy gas.

Although I was shocked at how long it took for the cavalry to arrive, I still have a nagging question about why all those people were left in New Orleans in the first place. It is common knowledge that when election time rolls around, New Orleans' poor are transported to the voting polls by a well-oiled "get out the vote" mechanism. As a registered New Orleans Democrat, I ask why this efficient "get out the vote" machine, which has put so many people into positions of power, was not kicked into gear to transport New Orleans' poor out of the path of a Category 4 hurricane.

A Katrina commission

The Gulf Coast and the nation as a whole shouldn't have to wait years for an independent, bipartisan investigation of what went wrong at all levels of government in preparing for and responding to Hurricane Katrina.

Bush administration reluctance delayed just such an examination of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. As a result, Congress didn't establish the 9/11 Commission until late in 2002, and its report was not published until July 2004 — nearly three years after the attack. Now, Senate Republicans have scuttled an effort to set up a Katrina commission that would follow the 9/11 Commission model.

Their resistance is frustrating. Sen. Hillary Clinton, who authored the bill, said that it's not appropriate for the government to investigate itself. Certainly that approach will suffer serious credibility problems, even if it manages to be objective and free of partisan maneuvering.

The White House, in particular, has said repeatedly that focusing on the "blame game" should not be the first priority; rescuing those in danger and getting recovery under way is far more important.

No one in South Louisiana or Mississippi would argue with that. The monumental task at hand is to begin to clean up damaged homes and businesses, recover the dead and help those who are displaced find a place to live. No one who has lost a home or business would want attention to be distracted from the rebuilding of this region.

But the breadth of this disaster and the failings of the government's response to it demand a full and impartial analysis. The best way to do that is to turn the investigation over to an independent body, one that would enjoy the public's confidence.

Sen. Susan Collins, who chairs the Homeland Security Committee, convened the first hearings on Katrina on Wednesday. She criticized the government's response as sluggish and disjointed and said it had failed the first major test since Sept. 11. But despite that candid assessment, Sen. Collins insisted that the committee focus on what needs to be done for Katrina's victims — not figuring out who blew it.

That may have been the right call for now. Katrina's victims need help, no question about it. So does our region. But this nation eventually needs to figure out why the response was sluggish and disjointed and how to make sure that future disasters aren't met with the same inadequate response.

The public clamored for an independent panel to get to the bottom of the Sept. 11 attacks, and polls show that a majority of Americans want the same kind of scrutiny for Katrina. That's hardly surprising. No one is immune from disaster, whether it's caused by terrorists or by nature. Americans who saw babies lifeless from dehydration and elderly people expiring from heat on the streets of New Orleans want to be sure that the mistakes of Katrina are not repeated the next time disaster strikes, possibly in their city.

They have every reason to be worried, and their legitimate concerns shouldn't be dismissed as a "blame game." Those of us who are living in Katrina's aftermath are growing weary of that phrase. An independent assessment of what went wrong is vital, not only to our future but to the future of the entire country. Those who don't want to see that happen are playing a game, too. It's called dodgeball.

We'll want to celebrate

After enduring more than two weeks of dislocation, destruction and gloom, New Orleanians are finally beginning to see some hopeful signs. Floodwaters have receded in much of the metro area. Power is coming up faster than anticipated. Hundreds of thousands of evacuees are tantalized by the possibility of going home.

And now, some of the most important figures in the Mardi Gras world are predicting that the New Orleans area's signature celebration will go forward as usual in 2006.

"Maybe I'm an eternal optimist," Mardi Gras World owner Blaine Kern said this week, "but we're going to have Mardi Gras this year." Mr. Kern, of course, is Carnival's most influential float maker, and officials of several major krewes say they're ready to roll no matter what.

It won't be surprising if the 2006 celebration is somewhat more subdued than in the past. Many families will be hurting for money, so krewes may have trouble getting riders. Local governments will likely have less money available to pay police along parade routes. But with a little creativity, these obstacles will be surmountable.

It won't matter how many krewes put on parades or how many out-of-towners attend. If Mardi Gras comes off as scheduled, it will be proof of southeast Louisiana's resilience. It's bound to be the best Carnival ever.

Looting isn't always looting

My Duke University class on family and community had no trouble with the New Orleans "looters" who smashed store windows for food and clothing. They had done their reading, so they understood that an important element of what makes a community work is the willingness of people to abide by agreed-upon rules.

But the floods and impending starvation on the Gulf Coast, they agreed, suspended the rules. Survival was an overriding "virtue," they said — so long as the necessities weren't taken directly from another person in similarly desperate straits.

And maybe even then, some of them thought. Although a few would choose to die rather than wrest food from the gnarled hands of a starving old woman, several thought that the biological imperative to survive might trump even such uncivilized behavior as that.

No senseless looting for material goods, even if the purloined laptop might become the price of a ride to Baton Rouge. No firing on rescue workers. No carjackings. But if the waters were rising swiftly enough, and the helicopter lifts were working slowly enough, one could, perhaps, justify elbowing one's way nearer to the front of the rescue line. After all, though one might defer to a weaker blood relative or spouse, survival is the most basic urge there is.

Survival was an overriding "virtue" — so long as the necessities weren't taken directly from another person in similarly desperate straits.

Then I reminded them of what they all knew: that sometime in the next few weeks, when things have returned to normal and Katrina has been replaced by Supreme Court confirmation hearings or escalating slaughter in Iraq as Topic A, they will see on the 6 o'clock news some teenager accused of shooting a shopkeeper or robbing a convenience store or selling crack. And the youngster's explanation for his dreadful behavior? "You got to survive."

The point of this small exercise was neither to justify lawlessness nor to raise looting to a level of particular importance in the catastrophe that befell the Gulf Coast. It was, rather, to observe that the rules that make our communities work — legislated and otherwise — don't exist as moral abstractions. We uphold them because they work for us ñ at least until we find ourselves under water.

What we forget is that some people in some communities see themselves as under water pretty much all the time.

Our rules — deal fairly with one another, avoid violence, obey the law — don't always make sense to them because the rules don't always make their lives more livable. And yet we think they should go on following our rules because it makes our lives more livable.

I'm talking about poor people, of course, but not all poor people. Some poor people are among the most law-abiding people I know. But some see themselves as outcasts reduced to basic survival.

They see themselves this way, in part, because many Americans don't see them at all. Erstwhile visitors to New Orleans still remark how surprised they were to see the masses of the very poor holed up in the Superdome or on freeway overpasses. They had no idea!

And most of us have no idea of the desperately poor in our own towns. They don't exist for us except when crime or social cost or catastrophe puts them on our television screen.

And even then, we are likely to miss the point of their existence. They wouldn't be poor, we tell ourselves, if they lived by our rules. A number of e-mails of the past few days make the point: Poor people are often the cause of their own poverty.

It's mostly true. There are people who, like many of those pitiful souls we saw waiting to be rescued from the floodwaters last week, are in dire straits because they ignored our well-meant advice. But some, like those ride-less New Orleans residents who couldn't get out, simply haven't been able to translate our advice into action: stop having babies, save enough to move away, get married.

I'm not saying it's all society's fault that our rules don't work for them. But I am saying that it is in society's interest to make sure they do, rather than sit blithely while the growing gap between them and us produces a community destroying economic disequilibrium.

What can we do? At the very least, we should see to it that no one who works hard all week has to live in poverty and without access to good health care.

THE OMENS ARE NOT GOOD

Cronyism, conservative agenda to guide recovery

STAFF PHOTO BY CHRIS GRANGER

A rescuer from Houma tows a boat loaded with three casualties of Hurricane Katrina down Read Boulevard in eastern New Orleans on Sept. 12.

PAUL KRUGMAN

Now it begins: America's biggest relief and recovery program since the New Deal. And the omens are not good.

It is a given that the Bush administration, which tried to turn Iraq into a laboratory for conservative economic policies, will try the same thing on the Gulf Coast. The Heritage Foundation, which has surely been helping Karl Rove develop the administration's recovery plan, has already published a manifesto on post-Katrina policy. It calls for waivers on environmental rules, the elimination of capital gains taxes and the private ownership of public school buildings in the disaster areas. And if any of the people killed by Katrina, most of them poor, had a net worth of more than $1.5 million, Heritage wants to exempt their heirs from the estate tax.

Still, even conservatives admit that deregulation, tax cuts and privatization will not be enough. Recovery will require a lot of federal spending. And aside from the effect on the deficit ñ we are about to see the spectacle of tax cuts in the face of both a war and a huge reconstruction effort ñ this raises another question: How can discretionary government spending take place on that scale without creating equally large-scale corruption?

It is possible to spend large sums honestly, as Franklin D. Roosevelt demonstrated in the 1930s, presiding over a huge expansion of federal spending, including a lot of discretionary spending by the Works Progress Administration. Yet the image of public relief, widely regarded as corrupt before the New Deal, actually improved markedly.

How did that happen? The answer is that the New Deal made almost a fetish out of policing its own programs against potential corruption. In particular, FDR created a powerful ìdivision of progress investigationî to look into complaints of malfeasance in the WPA. That division proved so effective that a later congressional investigation could not find a single serious irregularity it had missed.

This commitment to honest government was not a sign of Roosevelt's personal virtue; it reflected a political imperative. His mission in office was to show that government activism works. To maintain that mission's credibility, he needed to keep his administration's record clean.

But George W. Bush is no FDR. Indeed, in crucial respects he is the anti-FDR.

Bush subscribes to a political philosophy that opposes government activism. That is why he has tried to downsize and privatize programs wherever he can. (He still hopes to privatize Social Security, FDR's biggest legacy.) So even his policy failures do not bother his strongest supporters: Many conservatives view the inept response to Katrina as a vindication of their lack of faith in government, rather than as a reason to reconsider their faith in Bush.

And to date the Bush administration, which has no stake in showing that good government is possible, has been averse to investigating itself. On the contrary, it has consistently stonewalled corruption investigations and punished its own investigators if they try to do their jobs.

That is why Bush's promise on Thursday night that he will have ìa team of inspectors general reviewing all expendituresî rings hollow. Whoever these inspectors general are, they will be mindful of the fate of Bunnatine Greenhouse, a highly regarded auditor at the Army Corps of Engineers who suddenly got poor performance reviews after she raised questions about Halliburton's contracts in Iraq. She was demoted late last month.

Turning the funds over to state and local governments is not the answer, either. FDR actually made a point of taking control away from local politicians; then as now, patronage played a big role in local politics. And our sympathy for the people of Mississippi and Louisiana should not blind us to the realities of their states' political cultures.

Last year the newsletter Corporate Crime Reporter ranked the states according to the number of federal public-corruption convictions per capita. Mississippi came in first; Louisiana came in third.

Is there any way Bush could ensure an honest recovery program? Yes. He could insulate decisions about reconstruction spending from politics by placing them in the hands of an autonomous agency headed by a political independent, or, if no such person can be found, a Democrat (as a sign of good faith).

He did not do that on Thursday night, and probably will not. There is every reason to believe the reconstruction of the Gulf Coast, like the failed reconstruction of Iraq, will be deeply marred by cronyism and corruption.

Sick and abandoned after Katrina

It was the stuff of nightmares. Poisonous water moccasins were swimming in the filthy water of the flooded first floor, and snipers, rats and even a 12-foot alligator were roaming the treacherous area just outside the hospital's doors.

"To me, it was like being in hell," said Carl Warner, the chief engineer for Methodist Hospital in the hard-hit eastern part of New Orleans. "There were bodies floating in the water outside the building, and our staffers had to swim through that water to get fuel for the generator."

The patients and staff at Methodist could have been evacuated before Hurricane Katrina hit. But instead they were condemned to several days of fear and agony by bad decision-making in Louisiana and the chaotic ineptitude of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Some of the patients died.

Incredibly, when the out-of-state corporate owners of the hospital responded to the flooding by sending emergency relief supplies, they were confiscated at the airport by FEMA and sent elsewhere.

The time to evacuate the hospital was when it became clear that New Orleans was in the path of a Category 4 or 5 hurricane. "We had about 137 patients," said Dr. Jeffrey Coco, the hospital's chief of staff, "and we had a company called Lifeguard that was going to take them out."

But apparently there was a reluctance to evacuate without some sort of governmental guidance. When the mayor of New Orleans, Ray Nagin, issued a mandatory evacuation order, hospitals were exempted. Dr. Fred Cerise, secretary of Louisiana's Department of Health and Hospitals, said Methodist officials could have decided on their own to evacuate, but that never happened.

Some of the patients were extremely ill, requiring ventilators or dialysis treatment or major surgery. When the hurricane hit, part of the roof blew off, windows were blown out, the atrium was badly damaged, and the hospital was drenched with rain. On Monday night, the power went out, and on Tuesday, after the levees broke, the first floor became hopelessly flooded.

By midweek you had a bizarre situation in which hundreds of people (patients, doctors, nurses, administrative staffers, relatives and people seeking emergency shelter) were stranded, cut off from the rest of the world, in a badly damaged hospital in a major American city.

Staffers with flashlights worked heroically in a sodden, stench-filled environment in which temperatures reached 110 degrees. Elevators did not work, and some patients weighing more than 400 pounds had to be carried up dark, reeking staircases. When ventilators shut down with the loss of power, volunteers worked in shifts to do the difficult hand-pumping necessary to keep patients alive.

Nevertheless, according to Dr. Albert Barrocas, the chief medical officer, the decline in the well-being of the patients was both palpable and widespread. "All of them were deteriorating in the sense of becoming weak," he said. "You could see in their faces the fact that they were scared."

By Tuesday evening, four patients had died, and a dozen were dead by the time the hospital was finally evacuated on Friday. Doctors believe half of the deaths were caused by the dreadful conditions in the hospital.

Everybody's suffering would have been eased if the emergency relief effort mounted by the hospital's owner, Universal Health Services in King of Prussia, Pa., had not been interfered with by FEMA. Company officials sent desperately needed water, food, diesel fuel to power the hospital's generators and helicopters to ferry in the supplies and evacuate the most vulnerable individuals.

Bruce Gilbert, Universal's general counsel, told me on Wednesday, "Those supplies were in fact taken from us by FEMA, and we were unable to get them to the hospital. We then determined that it would be better to send our supplies, food and water to Lafayette (130 miles from New Orleans) and have our helicopters fly them from Lafayette to the hospital."

Significant relief began to reach the hospital on Thursday, and by Friday evening everyone had been removed from the ruined premises. They had endured the agonies of the damned, and for all practical purposes had been abandoned by government at all levels.

When you consider that the Methodist Hospital experience was just one small part of the New Orleans catastrophe, you get a sense of the size of the societal failure that we allowed to happen.

Welcome to the United States in 2005.

Unflooded areas poised for real-estate boom

Housing shortage likely will increase prices in key areas

By Greg Thomas
Real estate writer

Neighborhoods that weren't flooded after Hurricane Katrina will likely see their home values climb as residents looking to start over seek higher ground, local real estate brokers said.

Property values in West Jefferson, River Ridge, Kenner, Mandeville, Covington and parts of Slidell – all of which emerged from the storm relatively unscathed – are expected to jump 10 percent to 15 percent.

"In those areas there is just going to be substantial premiums being paid" for housing, said Wade Ragas, recently retired professor of finance at the University of New Orleans and former head of its Real Estate Market Data Center.

Ragas said he expects strong demand and higher prices in St. Charles Parish.

Ragas and Arthur Sterbcow, president of Latter & Blum Realtor Inc., also expect River Ridge in Jefferson Parish and Uptown New Orleans, two areas where flooding was minimal to nonexistent, to see strong demand and resulting price increases. Ragas said he was hesitant to put a percentage increase on every area. Specific data on post-Katrina real estate sales are unavailable.

West Jefferson, which also saw little if any flooding, will be another high-demand area for housing. But the incomplete levee protection system will keep prices there from climbing too far.

"The only reason the West Bank didn't flood is because of the path the storm took," Ragas said. He said if the federal government agrees to spend the estimated $70 million needed to complete the levee protection system, especially along the Harvey Canal, home prices in Harvey, Marrero and Terrytown could jump higher.

"Buyers are more frightened about being closer because of the flooding in Metairie."

WADE RAGAS
Recently retired professor of finance at the University of New Orleans

But the Katrina-related flooding in Old Metairie likely will leave some suburban buyers with a psychological inhibition about moving too close to the city.

"Buyers are more frightened about being closer because of the flooding in Metairie," Ragas said.

Kenneth Levy, a Latter & Blum broker in the Slidell area, said the inventory of available homes is far short of demand and that the demand will soar once repairs begin on damaged homes.

Some contractors are finding innovative ways of getting quick starts on repairs. They are offering the owners of some damaged but inhabitable homes the chance to get their dwellings repaired for free, as long as the workmen are allowed to live in the home they are working on, Levy said.

"That's one of the few win-wins" in the market," Levy said.

The already bustling Baton Rouge real estate market is also experiencing a surge of activity as Hurricane Katrina evacuees in need of housing snap up properties.

When multiple offers are made on Baton Rouge properties, New Orleanians are making "outrageous" counter offers, said Nancy Abney, an owner and broker with Prudential Unlimited Properties, which was recently bought by Prudential Gardner Realtors inc. of New Orleans.

Sterbcow spoke of one New Orleans businessman who looked at a $600,000 Baton Rouge home as a place to relocate employees and crank up business. After hearing that a second offer on the home was imminent, the businessman "doubled (his offer) and paid cash," Sterbcow said.

The flurry of activity has resulted in some complaints of price gouging in the Baton Rouge market. But the state attorney general's office has said a state law that prohibits price gouging during disasters does not address home prices.

"It's an unbelievable market," said Barbara Dixon of Dixon Realty Inc. of Baton Rouge. "I've had sellers call and say they want to double the asking price for their homes. I'm sure I'm going to make a lot of enemies, but that just shouldn't be. I want business, but I don't want bad business. I won't take their listing."

In Baton Rouge, Ragas estimates that the premium being paid on single-family homes in Baton Rouge is probably about 30 percent. "That's the typical premium being paid, and that's a mistake for many buyers," Ragas said.

Terry Moore, a broker whose territory includes the Mandeville-Covington area, said the scope of the reconstruction effort will result in shortages – and price run-ups – in key building materials.

As a result, home values will rise not only in southeast Louisiana, but across the country.

"Think of it as the ripples caused by a pebble thrown into a pond. They just haven't hit the shore yet," Moore said.

Business is brisk, but workers in short supply

Retailers encounter many obstacles

By Ronette King
Business writer

Keeping the ovens stoked at Domino's Pizza is a job that usually requires six workers to assemble the pizzas, four managers and more than a dozen delivery drivers.

But in the post-Hurricane Katrina workplace, with workers still scattered, just six people have been working at a Domino's in Slidell.

That means things aren't normal. For one thing, the menu is limited to cheese or pepperoni pizza. And forget about deliveries.

The hours are much shorter, too. "People show up at 10:30 (in the morning) and just stay until we close," said assistant manager Nick Guidry. The store's 7 p.m. closing time is much earlier than the usual midnight or 2 a.m. closings.

For business owners who have returned to the hurricane ravaged area, one of the biggest problems — after cleaning up and getting electricity and water service restored — is finding enough workers.

To fill the void, many local entrepreneurs are relying on family members — and their own stamina — to get their shops open. Some national drugstores and restaurant companies have recruited volunteers from other states.

The Domino's location, for example, opened a week after the storm with help from out-of-state workers who volunteered via the Domino's corporate office. Guidry returned to work after fulfilling his Army National Guard duties in Chalmette, on the West Bank and in Slidell.

Rite Aid Corp. was ready to reopen some of the 43 stores shut down in Katrina's wake but didn't have enough people.

"Some (store) buildings were ready but needed staff to run them," said Jody Cook, spokeswoman for Rite Aid. So the company recruited workers from around the country, she said. For that plan to work, the company had to set up four of its own shelters to house the workers. Hotels weren't an option, because they were filled with evacuees. So Rite Aid turned some of its vacant storefronts into shelters, setting up cots, portable showers and kitchens.

By this week 18 stores were reopened, each with a complement of imported staff living in shelters.

"We're trying to make them as comfortable and convenient as possible," Cook said.

Anthony's Ace Hardware owner Brian Tobin fled the area as the hurricane approached, as did about a dozen workers at his Destrehan store. Most haven't returned to work because they live in Jefferson Parish, where residents aren't yet allowed to remain full-time.

So, Tobin said, he reopened the store with a limited staff: "four people and my mom." Normally about a dozen workers keep the place going – Tobin's mother isn't usually among them.

At first, the Anthony's Ace was open just a few hours each day, but now Tobin is there from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Several store operators said the shorter hours are partly dictated by police curfews that require everyone be off the streets by a certain time. But limiting hours of operation also avoids overworking the few staffers who show up.

Other stores have used ingenuity to stay open. Randy Gros closed his Dekle Drugs store in Marrero on the day the storm hit. Since the store is near West Jefferson Hospital, immediately after the storm the hospital called on him for help. With no electricity to run the cash register, Gros kept notes on what the hospital picked up, and he stored drugs that needed to be kept cool in his home refrigerator, which was powered by a generator.

"Sheriff's deputies and Jefferson officials knew where I lived, and they would contact me through my wife and let me know there was a need, and I'd go there and take care of what they needed," he said.

But for those stores that have managed to open, business has been good. Demand for goods and services is high, and competition is low.

The Slidell Domino's, for example, did more than double its usual business, and that was without delivery service, Guidry said. One recent night, the store sold 120 pizzas in the last 30 minutes of the day.

Tobin, the hardware store owner, said residents of the nearby Ormond Estates area want chain saws, masks, bleach, blades to cut out soaked carpets, and chemicals to clean darkened pool water, among other items to help clean up. In fact, as soon as the storm passed, customers started leaving notes on the memo board Tobin keeps posted at the store.

"Chain saws are mostly what we're dealing with," Tobin said. Residents want them because of a worker shortage in another discipline: tree services.

"All the tree services are booked solid, so they can't get to residences. So residents are dealing with the trees them-

REPAIRING HOMES AFTER KATRINA'S CHAOS WILL REQUIRE PATIENCE AND PREPARATION

EVERYTHING OUT: Mitigating the damage from Katrina's water will in most cases involve removing virtually everything from the home. But experts caution that property owners should photograph all damage before disposing of anything to preserve a record for the insurance company.

MENDING A BROKEN HOME

HOME REPAIR in the wake of Hurricane Katrina is enough to boggle the brain.

Ruined refrigerators are the common denominator of damage, but past that, other things seem to come in layers. Wet wood that sat in 2 feet of rainwater for two days is usually salvageable, but wood that soaked in 6 feet of toxic water for three weeks may not be – and since no city since Atlantis has sat underwater as long as parts of southeast Louisiana after Katrina, experts are still debating what can be saved and what must be bulldozed, and conditions will vary widely from neighborhood to neighborhood.

Air-conditioning can be an important tool in drying things out, but experts advise against turning it on until it can be checked for electrical damage and the ducts cleaned of mold spores and other potential health irritants. After spending a couple of weeks unchallenged, mold is likely not only to coat your walls but to threaten your health as well.

By Karen Taylor Gist, Renee Peck and Judy Walker
Staff writers

"There's nothing generic about the damage from this hurricane," said Bill Coulbourne, a structural engineer in charge of risk management services for Citigate Sard and Verbinnen, a consultant to Fortune 500 companies. "It will have to be judged on a case by case basis."

One thing is clear: Each plan of action depends on the homeowner's specific circumstances, and those are only apparent after you go home again, something that New Orleans metro-area residents will be doing en masse in the coming days.

Here's an overview of what you should plan for if your house has less than catastrophic damage. A more detailed list begins on C-4.

RE-ENTER CAREFULLY

You've been away for a long time, and you're eager to get back inside your house. But experts warn that patience is important: Enter your home only after examining the exterior for structural damage and evidence of gas leaks. If there is evidence of the latter, retreat to a safe distance and call your natural gas provider, who will give you further instructions. If there is obvious structural damage, you won't want to go inside until a building inspector can assure you that it's safe.

When you're ready to go inside, treat the entry like TV characters working a crime scene: Carry a face mask (to protect your lungs from mold and other allergens); gloves (to protect your skin from infectious residue); and a camera (to document damage to your home and belongings for your insurance company). Take pictures before you move anything, and include close-ups.

The extent of the damage will depend on the depth, duration and velocity of the floodwaters, Coulbourne said. Velocity likely will be a problem only for houses near the levee breaches, where fast-moving water may have scoured the homes' foundations, undermining them and causing potential settling. Depth will be a more widespread problem, affecting everything from floors and framing to power and plumbing.

"You don't have to have water very far off the floor to do electrical damage," Coulbourne said. "The same is true of air-conditioning and heating systems."

Chris Paul of Paul Davis Restoration in Alexandria, who is certified in mitigation and remediation for mold, fire and water damage, said floodwater is divided into three grades: clean water (washing machine hose breaks, tub overflows, etc.); gray water (toilet that backs up before flushing, etc.) and black water (floodwater containing bacteria and pathogens). Katrina's floodwater is black water, and anything porous that soaks it up, such as drywall, insulation, carpet or upholstery, must be removed and discarded.

Rain that entered homes through roof gashes qualifies as clean water, which is easier to mitigate. However, if that water was left standing for weeks, Paul still recommends using gloves and face masks when cleaning up residue.

MOLD: IT'S INEVITABLE

Forty-eight hours. If you had water in your house for at least that long, you can expect to find a house filled with mold.

"Mold remediation is a big job," said Jeff Pothast, a certified industrial hygienist from Colorado who specializes in mold removal.

Despite the occasional alarmist overreaction to the presence of "toxic mold," the presence of mold is not a fatal blow to every home. "I've seen three-story houses stripped back to bare studs, then restored," Pothast said.

But in combination with other factors, it may be more practical to rebuild a mold-infested house than to clean it.

"A house that was fully impacted by floodwater is probably going to be cheaper to tear down and rebuild than remodel," said Martin King, technical advisor to the Association of Specialists in Cleaning and Restoration. "If you have to strip the interior completely, it's often not economically feasible to salvage the house.

"Wood framing should survive flooding, but on a square-foot basis, it's more expensive to repair and remodel than to build new construction."

If structural damage is less severe, he said, a germicide should be used to clean exposed framing, studs and the like.

Paul suggests putting furniture up on blocks or moving it to a dry room. It is possible to extract water from carpet, but not after it has been damp for as long as the floors of Katrina victims returning to their homes this week.

"If it's been sitting four or five days, you want to just get it out of there," King said. "It's a hundred times easier to physically remove water than to dry it out. Take (wet) carpet out or the substructure will start buckling."

And about that refrigerator: If it has been sitting in floodwater for days or weeks, it can't be salvaged. If it simply sat without power for a few weeks, it may be. In either case, whatever you do: Don't open it inside the house.

"I moved my mama out last Wednesday (from Metairie) and the first thing I told her was not to open it. Get it out of the house. Duct tape it up and remove it from the house," Paul said.

The fridge likely leaked, and the fate of the floor beneath it depends on the material it's made from. Ceramic tile is nonporous, so it can be cleaned as usual, although the grout, which is porous, may require special effort. Linoleum lets water in around the edges, and must be removed for the subfloor to dry. Nonporous materials, such as Corian countertops or stainless steel, can be cleaned.

THE AGONY OF THE STINK

For lingering smells, Paul recommends using a machine that puts ozonated oxygen into the air, microscopic particles that get down into the pores of furniture, draperies and other interior fabrics and surfaces to root out odors.

Damp drywall must be removed as quickly as possible, taking with it odors and at least a

A city stirs from its slumber

Glimpses of normalcy provide a glimmer of hope

Amid the devastation, you have to look for hope. Forward progress of any kind.

Even the smallest incidents of routine and normalcy become reassuring. For instance, I was driving down Prytania and at the corner of Felicity, the light turned red.

Out of nowhere, in total desolation, there was a working stoplight. I would have been less surprised to find a Blockbuster Video on Mars.

And the funny thing is, I stopped. I waited for it to turn green and then drove slowly on my way, even though there were no other cars anywhere and the likelihood of getting a ticket for running the only traffic signal in town seems very unlikely right now.

Considering.

Also on Prytania, there was a gardener watering the plants on the porch of Nicolas Cage's mansion and I guess that's a good sign. Life goes on. In very small ways.

The toilets flush now and I never thought that would be a sound of reassurance. An even better sound was finding out that WWOZ is broadcasting on the Web — radio in exile — laying out their great New Orleans music.

That's important. I have no idea from where they're operating or which deejays are spinning the discs but I can tell you this: The first time I ever hear Billy Dell's "Records from the Crypt" on the radio again, I will kiss the dirty ground beneath my feet.

Guys with brooms have started cleaning Canal Street and Convention Center Boulevard; until recently, any tidying up required either a back hoe, a crane or a Bobcat.

God only knows where they're going to put all this garbage, all this rubble, all these trees, but they're gathering it up all the same.

The streets of the French Quarter, absent the rubble of the CBD, basically looks and smells like the day after Mardi Gras, except with no broken strands of beads in the gutter.

OK, maybe it was a real windy Mardi Gras, but you get the point.

It just needs a little face lift, a little sweeping up and a good hard rain to wash away . . . all the bad stuff.

A counterpoint to that scene would be Broadway Avenue Uptown — Fraternity Row — where the street is actually CLEANER than usual and that's because the fine young men and women of our universities had not yet settled into their early semester routines of dragging living room furniture out onto their front yards and drinking Red Bull and vodka to while away their youth.

I wonder where all of them are? When this is over, who will go there and who will teach there?

What will happen to us?

One thing's for sure, our story is being told.

The satellite trucks stretch for eight blocks on Canal Street and call to mind an event like the Super Bowl or the Republican Convention.

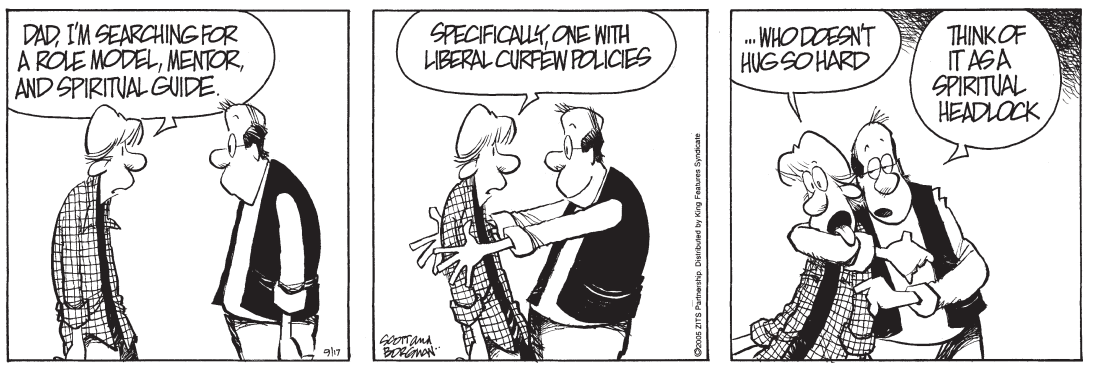
It's a strange place. Then again, anywhere that more than 10 news reporters gather becomes a strange place by default.

I saw Anderson Cooper interviewing Dr. Phil. And while Cooper's CNN camera crew filmed Dr. Phil, Dr. Phil's camera crew filmed Cooper and about five or six other camera crews from other shows and networks stood to the side and filmed all of that.

By reporting this scene, I have become the media covering the media covering the media.

It all has the surrealistic air of a Big Event, what with Koppel and Geraldo and all those guys wandering around in their Eddie Bauer hunting vests and impossibly tall and thin anchor women from around the region powdering their faces and teasing their hair so they look good when they file their latest report from Hell.

"And today in New Orleans . . . blah blah blah."



Today in New Orleans, a traffic light worked. Someone watered flowers. And anyone with the means to get online could have heard Dr. John's voice wafting in the dry wind, a sound of grace, comfort and familiarity here in the saddest and loneliest place in the world.

It's a start.

YOUR HOME AFTER THE HURRICANE: A GUIDE TO PROPERTY MITIGATION

TAKE YOUR BEST SHOT

Unless you're an emergency worker or have been living in a shelter for an extended period, the only extra shot you need, according to state and federal health officials, is a tetanus shot if you have not had a booster in the past five years. If you have health problems or you have any questions about whether additional vaccinations are warranted, check with your doctor or a health clinic.

FIRST THINGS FIRST

If you haven't talked to your insurance agent yet ... redouble your efforts to do so now! Find out EXACTLY what documentation is needed for reimbursement – some companies may ask you to keep a piece of your soggy carpet, for example, to prove loss – and how much work you may and may not do on the property before the adjuster arrives.

STAY SANE ...

- Prepare yourself emotionally. Have Kleenex ready, and a shoulder to cry on.
- Set a realistic and manageable schedule. Don't try to rehabilitate your house in one day or, for that matter, one month.
- Keep the family together, but don't take infants (they tend to put things in their mouths), anyone who is pregnant or has health problems, or pets.

... AND STAY SAFE

- Injuries from chain saws and carbon monoxide poisoning are common during recovery efforts. Take every precaution.
- Don't enter a building that has serious structural damage or signs of imminent collapse.
- If you smell gas or suspect a leak, retreat to a safe distance and call authorities immediately.
- Wear protective clothing and rubber gloves when cleaning. If there has been a backflow of sewage in the house, wear goggles, rubber boots and rubber gloves.
- Disconnect main electrical switches and circuits.
- Remove covers from all outlets and fuses or multi-breaker boxes.
- Snakes and vermin are often present after hurricanes and floods. Stay away from feral animals that may be rabid.
- Do not combine ammonia and bleach as a cleaning agent.
- Never use generators, pressure washers, or other gasoline, propane, natural gas or burning devices inside your home, basement, garage or camper, or even outside near a window, door or vent. Carbon monoxide is odorless, colorless and can build up inside and poison people and animals.
- Wash skin that may come in contact with hazardous materials.

ASSESSING THE EXTERNAL DAMAGE

- Take stock of the house from the outside. Look for visible, physical damage. Are there broken pilings? Cracks in the foundation? Are the walls or floors slanted? If you see obvious damage, you are going to need professional help. Have a building inspector check the premises before you go in.
- Check the exterior door. If it is swollen with moisture only at the bottom, it can be forced open. If it sticks at the top, your ceiling may be ready to fall in. You can force open the door, but wait a few minutes to make sure nothing falls.
- If doors are too swollen, you may have to enter through a window. Lean inside and check the ceiling before you do.
- If your roof has been damaged and you're unable to cover it yourself, call the Corps of Engineers at (888) 766-3258 and members of "Operation Blue Roof" will perform temporary repairs.

ASSESSING INTERNAL DAMAGE

- Turn off the electricity. Structural engineer Bill Coulbourn recommends using a wooden stick to turn each circuit breaker to the off position.
- Unplug all appliances and lamps, remove light bulbs and then take off outlet covers for any electrical outlets that got wet. (Once you are sure the electrical system is undamaged – preferably after a licensed electrician checks it out – you can turn the breakers back on.)
- Check the ceiling for signs of sagging. If necessary, use a stick to poke a hole at the edge of the sag so that water can begin draining. Don't stand under the sag.
- Remove mirrors and heavy pictures from walls; they can fall from wet surfaces.
- Check furniture to make sure a chest or armoire isn't ready to topple.
- Document the damage by taking pictures of each room as you inspect it. Start making list of damages for your insurance company.
- Rescue valuables first. Remove them to a dry second story, or place in plastic bags.

DO NO (MORE) HARM

- Before starting clean-up, protect your home from further damage from wind and rain.
- Open windows if weather permits. This will start the drying-out process. If windows are swollen shut, don't break the glass; remove the sash and panes with it.
- Cover holes in exterior walls with tarps or plastic sheeting. Nail them down with wooden strips or secure with duct tape.
- Use lumber or 4-by-4's to brace sagging ceilings or walls. If the damage is severe, you may need to call in a contractor.
- Check for broken or leaking pipes. If you find them, you will need to turn off the water at the valve at the water meter. If you can't find it, call the Sewerage and Water Board.

CLEAN-UP

- Do a form of triage: Decide what can be saved and what can't. If in doubt, throw it out.
- Start with your refrigerator. If it was underwater, it can't be saved. Clean-up specialist Chris Paul advises wrapping it shut with duct tape and removing it from the house.
- If it wasn't underwater and you think you can salvage it, take a deep breath, cover your nose, and throw away everything in the refrigerator. Unplug the appliance and take out all removable parts. If there is one, empty the defrost water disposal pan. Wash all parts thoroughly with hot water and rinse with disinfectant made from 1 teaspoon chlorine bleach to each gallon of water. With a solution of hot water and baking soda (or 1 cup vinegar or household ammonia to 1 gallon of warm water) wash the interior, including doors and gaskets. Leave the door open for the appliance to ventilate it. WARNING: Do not mix ammonia and bleach as it can release poisonous gas.
- Strip the house of all furnishings impacted by flood waters. Cover salvageable items with plastic and leave outdoors to dry.
- If the carpet got very wet, it has to go, since carpets harbor mold. Saturated carpet is heavy, so remove in 6-foot sections, roll them up with the pad and take them to the dump or put it out with the trash. (High quality oriental or wool rugs may be able to be saved; try not to fold them and get them to a cleaner as soon as possible.)
- Throw away anything porous that got wet: bedding, books and papers, upholstered furniture, kitchen utensils.
- Remove linens and clothing to a dry place; they may be able to be laundered and restored. Nonporous dishes can be cleaned after the water is declared safe to drink and the sewer lines are clear.
- If you have mud: Shovel out as much as you can, being careful to wear protective clothing such as rubber boots and gloves. Then, if you have running water, hose down the floors, washing mud out the doors. Don't allow the water to sit on the floor for long; use a wet vac or squeegee mop to remove it promptly.
- Any food including canned food that has been touched by flood water must be considered contaminated and discarded.
- Remove limbs, debris and trash.
- Start the interior drying-out process.
- Open up closet and cabinet doors. As cabinets dry, you should be able to remove swollen drawers.
- Use fans to move the air. Do not use central air conditioning until ducts have been inspected and cleaned. If ducts run through the slab or were flooded they may contain debris and bacteria, which will just be blown into your home.
- Run dehumidifiers and window air conditioning units.
- Use dessicants (materials that absorb moisture) in closets or other enclosed areas. These include chemical dehumidifying packets used to dry out boats, cat litter made of clay, or calcium chloride pellets used to melt ice in the winter. Hang the pellets in a pillow case in the closet and place a pan beneath to catch dripping water.
- Start removing waterlogged surface materials. Wallboard acts like a sponge; even several inches of water can be soaked upward in what is called a wicking effect. Wallboard will have to go. Plaster survives a flood better than wallboard, but takes a very long time to dry. If plaster separates from the wall laths (studs) as it dries, it will have to be replaced. Wood swells and distorts with moisture intake, but generally regains its shape as it dries.
- Even if walls and ceilings look undamaged, open them at various places to check for mold and mildew. If you see either, drywall must come out.
- Remove, bag and throw away all insulation in the walls. This will have to be replaced.
- Clean all non-porous surfaces with a disinfectant. Ceramic tile is nonporous, so it can be cleaned as usual, although the grout, which is porous, may require special effort. Nonporous materials such as Corian countertops or stainless steel also can be cleaned.
- Vacuum floors if possible with a vacuum that has a HEPA filter. Do not use your regular vacuum unless you can cover the exhaust with a filter or direct the exhaust outside; you may simply blow bacteria around your house.

MOLD REMOVAL

- The rule of thumb is that anything that stays wet for 48 hours has potential mold growth. And anything porous – sheetrock, ceiling tiles, insulation – will host mold. So if you had any standing water for more than two days, you should remove all porous materials.
- Always wear protective clothing when dealing with mold; respirators, preferably made of neoprene, are recommended.
- The Terrebonne Readiness and Assistance Commission recommends that you use the following mixture to clean all moldy surfaces to keep mold from spreading as you remove porous surfaces: In a garden pump sprayer, mix 3/4-gallon bleach and 1/4-gallon TSP (trisodium phosphate, a common ingredient used in pressure-washing, available in paint and hardware stores) with 1-1/2 gallons water. Spray infested surface so that it is wet to the touch. The kill time is 10 minutes MINIMUM. Scrub infected area if necessary. Allow drying to the touch. Repeat procedure. Others recommend a mixture of one part chlorine bleach to nine parts water, but the chlorine smell will linger. Acceptable as well are phenolic or alcohol-based germicides available at janitorial supply stores.
- Remove and discard all porous materials (that is, anything that will absorb water): wallboard, ceiling tiles, insulation, carpet, etc.
- Remove Sheetrock in the following manner: Make a horizontal cut parallel to the floor at least 3 feet above the level of flood water contamination; if the water was 1 foot high in the house, go up to 4 feet of sheetrock and cut it out. If flood waters were 4 feet or above, the entire wall needs to be removed.
- Disinfect studs and other exposed structural wood with a good germicide and then seal them with a fungicidal encapsulant, such as Kilz.
- Be prepared to remove flooring, since most ceramic tile is installed on top of drywall or greenboard. Spaces between floors and subfloors can harbor mold and bacteria.
- Allow exposed walls to dry thoroughly before starting restoration. This will take at least a week or more. Moisture meters can test for wood moisture.
- While wood frame homes will survive flooding, those fully impacted by flood waters may not be good candidates for repair. On a square-foot basis, new construction is cheaper than remodeling.

KEEP IT IN PERSPECTIVE

Use the above information as a general guideline, but understand that every situation will be different. Katrina left thousands of homes under a foot or two of water for a couple of days, thousands of others under seven feet of water for a couple of weeks. Every situation will require a tailored response, often with the help of professionals in structural engineering and disaster recovery. If you're overwhelmed or don't know where to begin, seek help before taking on the task of recovery, starting with your insurance company if available. And be prepared for the extra energy that the emotional toll of cleanup will require. As many public officials have said about the larger rebuilding process, it's a marathon, not a sprint. So, too, is recovering your home.

TWO WORDS TO KNOW:

MITIGATE: to "soften the blow." Hurricane mitigation applies to repair of hurricane damage and prevention of damage from future storms.

REMEDIATE: To correct a deficiency. Mold remediation involves getting rid of same.

WHAT TO PACK

- Camera to record everything before you touch it
- Heavy rubber gloves (elbow length if you can find them)
- Rubber boots
- Neoprene respirator or surgical masks (look for them at hardware and drugstores; get the ones with rubber sealants on either side)
- Goggles
- First-aid kit
- Vicks Vap-o-rub (apply under your nose for smell)
- Heavy-duty 30-gallon garbage bags and twist ties
- Mold remediation supplies, including 10-gallon sprayer
- Bleach and fungicidal disinfectants
- Rags
- Buckets
- Duct tape
- Full set of tools, including a chainsaw or handsaw, shovel and something to get into house if doors and windows are swollen shut, such as an axe or crowbar
- Flashlights to see into dark closets
- Wooden stick for turning things over, scaring away snakes and moving electrical wires
- Tarps to secure openings in windows or roofs
- Insect repellant and sunscreen
- LOTS of drinking water and non-perishable food
- Change of clothes for immediately after your cleanup portion of humidity.

"There's a lot of secondary damage from humidity," Paul said. "I've walked into houses before that only had 2 inches of water but the ceiling was dripping because of the humidity, probably four days later."

The Environmental Protection Agency points out some health risks associated with humidity: Long-term increase in humidity can foster growth of dust mites, a major cause of allergies and asthma, and microorganisms that cause allergic reactions can grow in standing water, even if it came from rain.

"Some people are going to (take drywall out) themselves," Paul said. "It just seems dangerous to me. When we do it we're full-suited up in black-water cases."

King cautions those determined do-it-yourselfers to "start off on the right foot by removing the things that need to be removed. Don't try to save anything you're doubtful about. Even bathroom fixtures are probably going to have to be removed and cleaned, although they can probably be reinstalled. Even if you don't see surface damage, you should open walls and ceilings to inspect for mildew."

Don't count on air-conditioning to make things any easier.

"It's better to leave it off (until it can be serviced)," Paul said. "The humidity will have found its way to the vents. If mold is growing in your living room, it can be growing in the vents, too. And if you have mold on the lower dry wall, you could be recirculating mold spores. Have the ducts cleaned before you use it."

INVOLVE YOUR INSURANCE AGENT

Every decision you make about the mitigation of your property should be made in consultation with your insurance agent or adjuster. Bill Bailey, managing director of the Hurricane Insurance Information Center, said the speed of your settlement will depend on how quickly you get confirmation of damages.

"Once you start picking up the trash, the adjusters show up the day afterward," he said.

It can't be stressed enough to document the damage with photos, particularly before attempting to rearrange or repair parts of your home yourself.

"Not that anyone's saying you're a crook," Bailey said. "Companies require verification to give damages."

When hiring professionals to help with clean-up or repairs, Bailey's golden rule is: Trust, but verify.

"Don't sign contracts until after contacting your agent," he said. "An insurer might say, 'We'll pay $107 per square foot for roofing materials,' but the contractor may quote $200."

In a high-demand environment such as the post-Katrina Gulf Coast, a gap often exists between the going rate for labor and materials and the insurance company's normal and customary rates for reimbursement. You're stuck in the middle. Be prepared to negotiate.

"It's possible that the insurance company low-balled because it didn't take into account normal price increases, but check first," Bailey said.

"Rule No. 1 is do not give contractors money up front until you've checked them out thoroughly. They should tell you what it's going for, and they should show you they've used your money to buy what they need to fix your roof. Not everyone can dig into his own pockets (for the materials up front). If they expect you to put up money, make darn sure the money went to your materials and it went to your property."

Also, verify that contractors have proof of insurance, he advised.

Many homes – and in some neighborhoods, most homes – will be beyond repair. The insurance adjuster will make that call, based on the percent of the property that's left intact.

But making those determinations won't be easy after Katrina, the first hurricane to introduce "toxic soup" as a mitigating factor.

"In 22 years, mostly in claims, I don't recall toxicity ever being such an issue," Bailey said. "Very serious questions will remain even when the water is drained and everything in the water cleaned out."

After withstanding the turmoil of fleeing from Hurricane Katrina, Tulane finally gets to open its season tonight against Mississippi State

After coping with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Coach Chris Scelfo and the Tulane Green Wave will take the field today against Mississippi State in Shreveport.

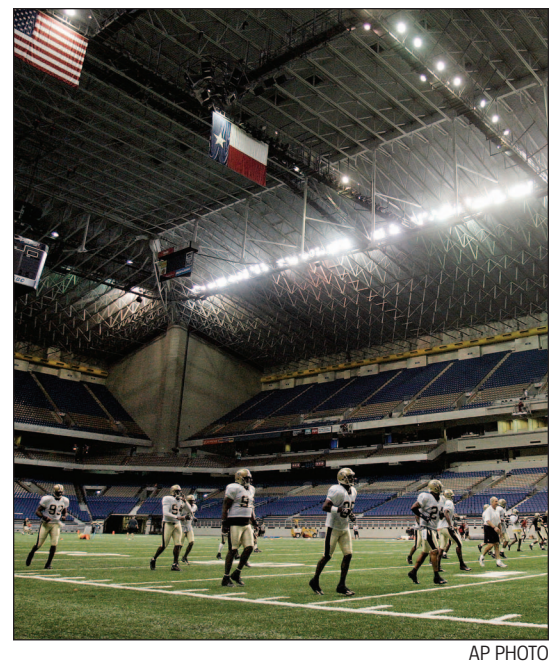
SHREVEPORT — Just like a year ago, Tulane's first game of the season will be against Mississippi State. Unlike a year ago, when all the media attention was on Mississippi State's Sylvester Croom, the first African-American head football coach in the SEC, this year's spotlight is on Tulane.

After being forced to relocate more than 300 miles away because of Hurricane Katrina, the Green Wave has been the focus of the national media, from Sports Illustrated to "NBC Nightly News" to ESPN.



For many of Tulane's players, football has been a welcomed distraction. For others, concentrating on football has been difficult. The players haven't seen home since Aug. 28, when the Crescent City was under a mandatory evacuation order, and they likely won't see it again for several months. Whatever home-field advantage Tulane might have had going into tonight's game with the Bulldogs in Shreveport has been erased. Tonight, the Green Wave will be trying to ignore the past.

Green Wave coach Chris Scelfo has said football, as his team knew it a month ago, isn't the same.

"It isn't about winning or losing," he said. "It's about persevering and providing hope."

Tulane, for sure, is lucky to be playing football this season. Although the lives of Tulane's play-

SAN ANTONIO — Earlier this week, Andrea Delaune was one of several Alamodome executives scrambling to get everything in order for the Saints, the facility's temporary tenants for the next four months.

Delaune, the marketing manager at the Alamodome, was on the phones, trying to reschedule the complex's previously scheduled events.

"We've been busy, but everybody has been real positive and very cooperative about it," Delaune said. "We're happy to help out in a time of need, and that's the way we are kind of looking at this, like LSU, who are also having the Saints use their facility."

This week, the NFL announced that the Saints would play four games at LSU and three at the Alamodome. The Superdome cannot be used because of damages caused during and after Hurricane Katrina.

The Saints' opening game at the Alamodome is Oct. 2 against the Buffalo Bills. New Orleans, which temporarily has moved its headquarters to the Alamodome, also will play the Atlanta Falcons on Oct. 16 and the Detroit Lions on Dec. 24 at the facility.

On Friday, there were still boxes of office equipment and computers outside the Alamodome's lower corridor, where meeting rooms were located. That area will house the Saints' offices.

The Alamodome will not undergo any major makeover to become NFL ready this season, Delaune said. The same field turf that was used at last season's Alamo Bowl game will be used for the Saints, who practiced on the surface for the first time Friday. It is similar to the playing surface at the Superdome.

If the Saints were to move to San Antonio permanently, a major renovation, likely to cost millions of dollars, would have to occur at the 65,000-seat Alamodome, which has 38 suites compared to the Superdome's 137.

Dickson and Tulane again are 'fighting to exist'

Katrina chaos puts Wave athletic director back on offensive

By Benjamin Hochman

SHREVEPORT — Smart people said Tulane should consider dropping its Division I-A athletic program, but Rick Dickson knew better. So the athletic director disregarded sleep. He saw his family as often as his dentist. He volunteered for pressure.

Two years ago he traveled the country, begging strangers for millions to financially resurrect his athletic program. He fought for the jobs and lifestyles of dozens of employees, and inspired them to work tirelessly despite looming gloom. Dickson didn't rest because of the student-athletes: They came to Tulane to play D-I sports, and he would keep it that way.

Dickson's plan overcame the scrutiny of the athletic review.

Green Wave just glad to be back on the football field

JOHN DESHAZIER

Forget the Ws and the Ls. Instead, concentrate on the games, and the joy and the passion with which Tulane will play football this season. Because that, and not numbers on a scoreboard, will be the fairest, best way to judge the Green Wave.

"My kids and my coaches all know my position on this," Coach Chris Scelfo said as the Wave prepared to play Mississippi State today. "It's not about winning and losing. It's about us providing three hours of therapy."

He was talking about one game, but may as well have been talking about the season. Because therapy really is what Tulane's season will be all about.

Realistically, a team with Tulane's talent still has a good chance to play in a bowl game.

LHSAA warns schools to be vigilant about new athletes

Schools risk forfeits if displaced students aren't registered

By Mike Strom
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Schools that do not register their displaced student-athletes with the Louisiana High School Athletic Association by Thursday risk forfeiting any games the new students participate in after that date, the LHSAA executive committee ruled Thursday.

The LHSAA said it had processed nearly 700 displaced-student reports through Wednesday that involved 523 state students and 157 out-of-state students. But Commissioner Tommy Henry said he was concerned that far too many schools may not be in compliance with new legislation that requires principals to report all new student-athletes who enroll in their schools as a result of evacuations.

LHSAA officials hope the new rule will help prevent schools from playing ineligible athletes and being forced to forfeit games.

"This rule applies to the residency and transfer rule," Henry said. "If a school plays an ineligible player, however, it's going to involve a forfeit. So you're taking a chance when you play one of these (non-reported) kids."

The executive committee's ruling Sept. 1 allowed leeway in permitting displaced students to play immediately. But the conditions of the legislation required that a student meet the age-requirement rule and that his or her principal makes the best effort to assure that the student is eligible under all other LHSAA rules.

"My deal is, don't play these kids if they're not registered," Henry said. "This is one place we're drawing a line in the sand. If a kid is too old or is past eight semesters (of eligibility), we're not backing off of these two. If the records show that they're not eligible, then schools and individuals must show proof otherwise."

Those rules were among many topics covered by the executive committee during a meeting called by Henry to address hurricane-related topics. The committee discussed but rejected the idea of extending football's regular season by two weeks, which would have delayed the Nokia Sugar Bowl Prep Classic until Christmas week.

'It's about persevering' for Wave

TULANE, from C-5

ers were turned upside down by the hurricane, one thing hasn't changed: The Green Wave wants to win.

After finishing the 2004 season 5-6 and winning four of its final six games, the Green Wave returned to school in August beaming with confidence.

"The expectations are still up there for this team, and even higher because of the media attention," senior linebacker Anthony Cannon said. "As a team, we're doing everything possible to keep the ball moving forward.

"We're not just going to show up. This is my senior season, and we're not going to let that happen. To give up is not the character of this team. It's not going to happen."

"The hurricane would be the perfect excuse for us," center Joe Traina said. "The test for this team will be if guys won't use that perfect excuse."

After being told what Scelfo said early in the week, quarterback Lester Ricard said: "I don't know what he's talking about – we're going out there to win."

Offensive tackle Chris McGee said Ricard's attitude is the team's attitude.

"Yeah, we have all the excuses right now. And if we don't do anything, everybody will understand. But we don't want to use the excuses," McGee said.

"There's no reason to go out there if you're not trying to win. We're not just trying to go out there and just play football. We want to go there and win football games. Persevering and giving hope, all that's good, but it's not the same as winning. It's definitely about winning. I've been playing football a long time, and I've never had fun losing."

The Green Wave reported Aug. 8-9, and was a week away from its Sept. 4 opener with Southern Miss when the hurricane hit, forcing the schools to postpone game until Nov. 26. Tulane will be the last Division I-A school to start the season.

"Words can't really describe the feeling," Traina said of finally getting to play. "We've been going through so much, and we've been practicing so long, it seems like we've been in camp for two months. It's just great to finally have our sights on a game and know that we're going to play it. Everything's been so uncertain that it's nice to have something that's definite."

And after all the chaos the Wave has been through, playing the game will be a piece of cake.

"I think it'll be the easiest thing we've done since the hurricane," McGee said. "We can put everything behind us. We don't have to think about anything that's happened. For three hours, it's nothing but football."

Season's mere existence is success for Tulane

DESHAZIER, from C-5

There's a reason Scelfo was as upbeat as he's ever been entering a season, and it had everything to do with returning lettermen who already had been in the fire, who already had performed under pressure. That includes a quarterback (Lester Ricard) who looks about as big-time as all the other recent NFL draft picks who have played the position at Tulane.

But here's a dose of reality, too, provided by of Hurricane Katrina: Game-wise, the Green Wave probably is farther behind than any team in the nation. Today's game will be Mississippi State's third. Tulane is playing its opener.

Think a team, entering its third game, hasn't already worked out a few kinks? Think a team, entering its first, won't have to overcome first-game jitters and the likely spate of miscues that accompany the adrenaline and game rust?

"From a competitive standpoint, obviously, they're at a great advantage," Scelfo said.

And still, that's so secondary, it's almost comical.Wave players are attending class and practicing at Louisiana Tech in Ruston, bumping into other displaced New Orleanians who were forced to flee the city. Those whose families reside in areas that were hit by Katrina had so much more to worry about than blocking, tackling, throwing and catching.

"No question, (the game) is secondary," Scelfo said. "It's third-ary, fourth-ary and any other 'ary' you can come up with. It's unrealistic for me to look at it any other way. This (Hurricane Katrina) has affected thousands and thousands of people. I have it in perspective."

And, certainly, we must keep it there, too. Because to judge this Tulane team on its results this season would be to overlook the big picture - that it's pretty impressive Tulane even is having a season.

A lot of juggling had to be done, and a lot of people had to agree to the juggling, in order for the Wave to have somewhere to live, practice, attend class.

"I'm trying to get them in a normalcy mindset," Scelfo said. "That's my goal. If we get something good out of football, so be it."

There will be plenty of good that comes of it, even if it doesn't show up on the scoreboard. His players, like most others who have been affected to varying degrees, need to get back to doing what they love, as quickly as possible. That will be as therapeutic for them as it will be for Wave fans, because anything that resembles routine only can be considered a positive when your life has been turned upside down.

"The season is already on the positive," Scelfo said. "Just being able to play it."

He's right. This isn't a time to worry about bowl games and all the other trappings, even though Tulane was a good bet to play an extra game before Katrina and still may be a solid choice, even after a two-week delay to the commencement of the season.

For this season, forget the Ws and the Ls.

Just enjoy the games as much as Tulane's players will, as much as they'd like for you to.

Dickson, Wave again struggling to survive

DICKSON, from C-5

Then Hurricane Katrina threw him a counterpunch.

Tulane's athletic family evacuated New Orleans while Katrina ravaged Tulane's athletic epicenter. Just like two years ago, the fate of athletics was uncertain.

Should Dickson cancel the season, or should Tulane scrap and scrape together its athletic program, because it was the right thing to do?

"We're fighting to exist again," Dickson said. "But I think (the first fight) was more specific to us – it was whether Tulane athletics should or would continue. This one, I think we feel the responsibility to others – to Tulane, to New Orleans, to others that don't have the ability to help themselves. And we have that ability."

It is now 16 days since Dickson slumped in a hotel lobby chair, wearing another man's clothes, admitting his uncertainty about this athletic season. Since then Dickson has galvanized support, while uniting with Tulane president Scott Cowen, who in 2003 was the realistic arbitrator, seeing both sides of Tulane's quandary. Tulane is competing this season – teams are on campuses in Texas and other parts of Louisiana, taking classes and playing games. The first football game is today at Shreveport's Independence Stadium.

Said Tulane associate athletic director Scott Sidwell: "If you look at what happened in the last two weeks and step back from it – and it's hard for us to step back, because every minute there's something new to tackle – it's certainly unprecedented. And I think it will go down as one of the better stories in college athletics that has ever happened."

"We could have opted to tell our kids to fall in line with the other 13,000 Tulane students and say, 'We'll see you in the spring.' " Dickson said. "But we chose it, and I think we did it knowing it wasn't just about sticking together and competing – it was about a purpose."

Dickson has served as the father of Tulane athletics. It's a familiar role – he's already the father of a Tulane athlete.

Kelli Dickson plays volleyball for the Green Wave, so Dickson knows the personal side of nurturing these athletes during this time of turmoil. He had to watch his daughter leave for Texas A&M, where her team will attend classes this semester. He has to make sure that she and her fellow athletes assimilate into foreign surroundings, and try to focus on midterms and side outs, and not flooding and looting. He has also made it mandatory that every Tulane athlete goes through counseling.

"I can't put these kids a position of doing this – maybe the greatest challenge we've all ever been faced with – if they're not in a stable place," Dickson said.

"He's done a tremendous job of staying on top of everything, not only with the football program but all the sports programs," Tulane football senior Tra Boger said. "Going through this – and not having a blueprint – just speaks volumes of what he can do."

But for all the paternal aspects of running a scattered athletic program, Dickson is running a business, too. He doesn't have access to university bank accounts. And while he began the year on a "zero-based budget," the difference between Tulane and other programs is Dickson can't receive a university subsidy. Tulane doesn't have access to its season ticket profits, which Dickson said should be about $1 million. Also, Dickson said Tulane would have been about one-sixth through its fundraising campaign by this week – last year they received about $2.2 million.

"So we would have already seen some of that coming," he said. "Typically, in our almost $22 million budget, which we almost split down the middle, and in the first school term you'll expend the $11 million range. As we speak (on Wednesday), I have $308,000 from NCAA, $50,000 (donated) from the Orange Bowl and $200,000 back from Mississippi State (Tulane's guaranteed payment for Saturday's game), plus what a couple people have sent."

Dickson is running Tulane's athletic budget out of a Dallas-based checking account. "It's truly been operating the athletic enterprise on a cash-on-cash basis," he said.

"Anything you see us do, like when the buses rolled into Ruston, you pay for it out of that account. When they go somewhere the night before the game, or you see them eating chicken out of the boxes for lunch, that comes from the checking account."

The initial objective was providing for athletes housing, tuition, food, books and counseling. Dickson said the cost to do so weren't overwhelming. Southern Methodist, Texas A&M, Texas Tech, Rice and Louisiana Tech, like the numerous other institutions taking in Tulane students, took care of tuition issues for visiting Tulane student-athletes.

"And in most instances," Dickson said, "the other things have come at the graciousness of the people hosting us."

Dickson continues to coordinate. He is eternally on a conference call. He has made trips to each campus with Tulane student-athletes. He has continually reassured coaches everything will be all right, while sometimes having to do so for himself as well. He remains constantly preoccupied with work; he couldn't even find time to get new prescription glasses, until his wife, Brenda, demanded it.

"She has experienced my driving at night without glasses . . . it's been pretty dangerous," Dickson said. "So that was a good step. That was the first attempt to get both my feet on the ground."

"Any time you face adversity, face challenges, I think that you find out the type of people that are around you," Sidwell said. "And there's no doubt that Rick Dickson is the rock of our organization. And we're going to persevere."

Again.

Vanderbilt creating unexpected excitement

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

Things have been buzzing in the Volunteer State this week.

After all, who wouldn't get excited about an early-season matchup of undefeated SEC teams with major bowl implications?

It's not Tennessee-Florida we're talking about. We'll get to that one.

The game in question is 2-0 Vanderbilt playing host to 1-0 Ole Miss today in Nashville.

Yes, that's 2-0 Vanderbilt, four words that haven't been used together since 1988. And we're not talking about victories against East Cupcake Community College.

The Commodores went on the road and beat two BCS-conference teams – Wake Forest and Arkansas - by 24-20 and 28-24, rallying in the fourth quarter in both.

The victory at Arkansas was Vandy's first in an SEC opener since the Commodores beat LSU in 1990, and the 2-0 start on the road is the school's first since 1943.

There are plenty of other "firsts since" about Vandy's start, but you get the picture – the SEC's longtime whipping boy is suddenly a force to be reckoned with.

Sorta.

"I think it's a little too early to say we've turned the corner," said Vanderbilt coach Bobby Johnson. "But we're very pleased with the way we've stayed in the games and come back to win both of them.

"That says a lot about the mindset and discipline of our players."

Indeed, the Commodores are doing the little things it takes to win. In two games, they've had four penalties for a total of nine yards. They've been intercepted twice but have not lost a fumble.

Against Arkansas, Vandy trailed 24-21 after a missed field-goal attempt with 2:46 left. But the Commodores got the ball back 24 seconds later and drove to score the winning touchdown on Jay Cutler's six-yard pass to Marlon White with 26 seconds to go.

That's effective clock management.

"Vanderbilt is one well-coached team," said Ole Miss coach Ed Orgeron. "You can see it in their play calls and how their players know exactly what their assignments are.

"They're always in the right place at the right time."

Well-coached, yes. But given Vanderbilt's academic restrictions compared to the other teams in the conference, the Commodores are always fighting an uphill battle, arguably the most difficult of any school in a BCS conference.

In Johnson's first three years in Nashville, his teams won two games each season. A lack of improvement probably would have meant a coaching change.

But Johnson got a break when Cutler opted to return for his senior season rather than enter the NFL draft. Not only does Cutler lead the SEC in total offense (321 yards per game), but Johnson says he is a sublime leader.

"Jay believes in the program, and the other players believe in him," he said. "That's because, even though Jay has proven himself, he never quits working hard to improve.

"When your players buy into what you're doing, that's the fun part of being a coach."

Of course, with success come more expectations.

Vandy fans can look at the schedule and see that a victory today followed by ones against Richmond and Middle Tennessee in the next two games would put the Commodores at 5-0 going into the Oct. 8 game against LSU. That's just one victory from a winning season and bowl eligibility.

Vanderbilt hasn't achieved either since 1982.

Although LSU, Georgia, South Carolina, Florida and Tennessee occupy the bottom half of the schedule, there's also a very winnable game against Kentucky.

Certainly Vandy fans are excited. More than 500 of them, plus the band, met the team when it returned from the Arkansas game at 2 a.m. Sunday.

Today's game is a sellout, something that only happens when visiting SEC fans fill the Commodores' 40,000-seat stadium.

"We have a very loyal fan base. But, like any fans, they respond best when you put a winning product on the field," Johnson said. "So the more we win, the more they will come to see us play. We just hope we can keep it up."

That other game

Even the Ol' Ball Coach will be watching Tennessee-Florida tonight.

"Let's see, we should be wrapping up with things about the time they begin," said ex-Gators and current South Carolina coach Steve Spurrier. "So I imagine we'll come up to the office and see whatever game's on."

He should.

It was Spurrier's building of the Gators' program into a powerhouse that helped make the Florida-Tennessee game the SEC's signature event the past decade-plus.

That CBS is airing it prime-time is proof of that, even though neither school has won a conference championship since 2000.

This year's game is even more intriguing because it's the debut of Florida coach Urban Meyer and his spread option against the Vols.

Whether the offense that ripped through the Mountain West Conference the past two years can be effective against the superior talent of the SEC is one the game's top story lines.

"It's all relative," said Tennessee coach Phil Fulmer, who's 5-8 against the Gators. "The guys Utah was playing against were pretty much the same kind of football players, and it worked very efficiently up there.

"The things that go with their offense are tough to defend. It gets back to people and gets back to the best players doing their assignments and making plays."

Another story line is Meyer's introduction to the rivalry that Spurrier fueled with offseason shots at the Vols.

But Meyer, who never referred to rival Toledo by name when he was at Bowling Green or Brigham Young when he was at Utah, has been nothing but respectful of the Vols.

"I've always admired Tennessee's consistency," he said. 'Whenever a staff has stuck together as long as they have, it means they're winning a lot of football games. We've been looking for weaknesses in Tennessee this week, and they're very difficult to find."

The game features an intriguing quarterback match-up.

Tennessee is starting senior Rick Clausen after sophomore Eric Ainge struggled in the Vols' season-opening 17-10 victory against UAB. Florida's Chris Leak is a Heisman Trophy hopeful, but he's 0-2 against Tennessee.

Besides preparing for Tennessee, Leak has spent the week telling Meyer about the intensity of game.

"I have no words for it," he said. "The atmosphere and the crowd are amazing. It's really special for the coaches, players and families."

Not to mention the viewers.

QUICK PICKS

Mississippi State at Tulane, 7 p.m., CSTV
The Green Wave has gained the country's admiration for having the fortitude to have a season. That effort deserves to be rewarded with a victory.
Line: Mississippi State by 3; Pick: Tulane, 14-10

Tennessee at Florida, 7 p.m., CBS
All eyes will be on the Gators' spread option. But it's the Vols' offense that needs improvement.
Spread: Florida by 6; Pick: Florida, 20-17

Ole Miss at Vanderbilt, 11:30 a.m., CBS
Commodore Fever! Catch it!
Spread: Vanderbilt by 3; Pick: Vanderbilt, 21-14

Alabama at South Carolina
2:30 p.m., CBS
Steve Spurrier vs. Mike Shula. Doesn't seem fair, does it?
Spread: Alabama by 2 ½; Pick: South Carolina, 17-16

Kentucky at Indiana
5:45 p.m., ESPN Classic
ESPN Classic? Is this some kind of joke? Somebody must think this is a basketball game.
Spread: Indiana by 2 ½; Pick: Kentucky, 24-20

Florida State at Boston College
6:45 p.m., ESPN
The Seminoles welcome the Eagles to the ACC.
Spread: Florida State by 1; Pick: Florida State, 19-17

Miami at Clemson
2:30 p.m., ABC
The Tigers have impressive road victories at Texas A&M and Maryland. And the Hurricanes didn't look too good at Florida State. That can only mean a Miami victory.
Spread: Miami by 7; Pick: Miami, 27-24

Michigan State at Notre Dame
2:30 p.m., NBC
Welcome to the Charlie Weis bandwagon. Beware though that the Spartans have won in their past four visits to South Bend.
Spread: Notre Dame by 6 ½; Pick: Notre Dame, 32-27

Pittsburgh at Nebraska
2:30 p.m.
We're joining Panthers fans in jumping off the Dave Wannstedt bandwagon. The Cornhuskers haven't been very impressive though.
Spread: Nebraska by 10 ½; Pick: Nebraska 13-7

Last week; 6–4, 5–5 vs. spread; To date: 14–6; 10–7 vs. spread

EXTRA POINTS

Two weeks into the season, WAC and Sun Belt teams are a combined 0-21 against Division I-A teams outside their conferences. ...Also through last weekend's games, there have been a total of 77 calls reviewed in 101 games. Of those reviews, 26 were reversed, most notably Michigan's goal line fumble against Notre Dame. Conference USA officials must be doing the best job. Nine plays have been reviewed in C-USA home games with none overturned. C-USA is the only league in which the referee makes the final ruling. ...Ohio State fans obviously were upset by their team's loss to Texas. The Ohio Stadium cleanup crew removed 43.6 tons of garbage after the game, almost three times as much as was left behind after the Buckeyes' opening game victory against Miami of Ohio. ...Clemson has beaten two Division I-A opponents to start the season for the first time since 1968. ...The SEC has extended the contract of Commissioner Mike Slive through 2009. ...SMU's 21-10 victory against No. 21 TCU was the Mustangs' first in 23 tries against ranked teams. ...Retired Army parachutist Dave Larson, who broke his hip with a hand landing on the field before the Washington State-Nevada game, has vowed to be jumping again within three months. ...Speaking of Washington State, Grambling coach Melvin Spears, whose team plays the Cougars today, has refused to exchange game tapes. Spears also demanded a forfeit from Alcorn State when the Braves refused to move their game to Grambling because power was out on the Alcorn campus following Hurricane Katrina.

Auburn freshman defensive end Alonzo Horton, who prepped at Abramson, learned this week that two brothers he feared had been killed during Hurricane Katrina were instead alive and well with their father in Houston. ...Michigan's loss to Notre Dame marked the sixth consecutive year that the Wolverines have lost a game in September. ...Trivia Time: Was Dion Byrum's 85-yard interception return that gave Ohio a 16-10 overtime victory against Pittsburgh the longest, or perhaps even first since Division I-A went to OT in 1996? Nobody knows. The NCAA doesn't keep such statistics. ...

Atlanta may be closer for his team's fans, but count Auburn coach Tommy Tuberville among those hoping that the Sugar Bowl can be played at LSU this year. "One of the great things about playing in the Sugar Bowl is the atmosphere of New Orleans," he said. "Our fans loved it and our players loved it last year. We understand that, even if the game can't be played there this year, we would be all for having the game as close to New Orleans as possible."

CRESCENT CITY CONNECTIONS

Curtis Baham, Clemson, WR , Sr., (John Curtis); and Nick Watkins, Clemson, LB, So., (Karr)

Baham had two touchdown receptions and Watkins a team-high six special-teams tackles in the Tigers' 28-24 victory at Maryland. They were named Clemson's offensive and special teams players of the week for their efforts.

"Here are two guys from New Orleans with all that their families have been going through having great games on national TV," said Clemson coach Tommy Bowden. "I don't think that happened by accident.

"Both of them knew their families and friends are hurting. I think they wanted to do something to make those people feel a little bit better, and their concentration and effort levels went way up."

Coach's Corner

"You throw your visor once and people expect you to do it every game for the next 20 years." – South Carolina coach Steve Spurrier.

Lewis solid in debut for Southern

By Bob Fortus
Staff writer

J.C. Lewis waited behind some talented quarterbacks before getting his chance to start for Southern University.

Two years ago, Jaguars quarterback Quincy Richard was the SWAC offensive player of the year. Last year, the Jags' Thomas Ricks won that honor.

In Southern's opener last week at Mississippi Valley State, Lewis, a redshirt sophomore from Walnut Creek, Calif., took charge of the offense.

Despite a Delta Devils' defense designed to pressure him, he played solidly – just as Southern coach Pete Richardson had expected.

"I wasn't really surprised, because he had been on the team, and he had played a little the last year, and he had played well for us, and he had an excellent spring,'' Richardson said. "The only thing he needed was playing time."

Lewis completed 24 of 39 passes for 312 yards and a touchdown, with one interception, in a 31-28 loss to Mississippi Valley.

Tonight, he'll lead Southern in its home opener against Prairie View A&M. Kickoff at A.W. Mumford Stadium is at 7 p.m. (Cox Sports Television).

NORTHWESTERN STATE AT LOUISIANA-LAFAYETTE (7 p.m. at Lafayette): The Ragin' Cajuns, the host team in the Herbert Heymann Classic, have started 0-2 for the seventh time in the last nine years.

MCNEESE STATE AT SOUTHERN MISSISSIPPI (6 p.m. at Hattiesburg, Miss.): The Golden Eagles, who lost their opener at Alabama, 30-21, will try to rebound against the Cowboys.

LOUISIANA-MONROE AT GEORGIA (noon at Athens, Ga.): The Indians, coming off a 38-0 loss to Wyoming, haven't scored since the second quarter of their opener against Northwestern State.

LOUISIANA TECH AT KANSAS (6 p.m. at Lawrence, Kan.): The Bulldogs couldn't prevent big plays in losing their opener at Florida, 41-3. The Gators gained 475 yards, 231 on six plays of at least 20 yards.

GRAMBLING VS. WASHINGTON STATE (6 p.m. at Seattle): After opening with a 44-0 rout at home last week against SWAC rival Alabama A&M, the Tigers will face a much tougher test against the Cougars (2-0).

CHENEY UNIVERSITY AT NICHOLLS STATE (2 p.m. at Thibodaux): The Colonels (0-1), who showed a strong running game in a near-upset of Indiana last week, face Division II opposition in their home opener today against the Wolves (2-1) from Pennsylvania.

Nicholls lost at Indiana 35-31 on a touchdown scored with 47 seconds left. The Colonels, who outgained the Hoosiers 459 yards to 405, rushed for 408 yards. Running backs Anthony Harris, Broderick Cole and Joseph Tobias ran for more than 90 yards apiece and combined for four touchdowns.

Cheney is coming off a 13-10 victory against St. Paul's College.

LSU, former teacher agree to settlement

Lawsuit involved alleged academic fraud by football players

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — LSU has reached an undisclosed settlement with former kinesiology instructor Tiffany Mayne, who sued the university over alleged academic fraud involving football players, the school said Friday.

Michael Ruffner, vice chancellor for communications and university relations, said in a press release that the school agreed to settle to avoid the expense of further litigation. He said the university "continues to deny wrongdoing relative to Mayne's former employment at LSU or otherwise."

Mayne, an instructor for 10 years, sued LSU and department head Amelia Lee in 2002. Mayne claimed that in 2000 she was pressured to change grades of LSU football players and hide academic misconduct to keep them eligible for the 2000 Peach Bowl. She said in her suit that 10 players who received failing grades were allowed to get extra credit and remain eligible.

LSU admitted to five secondary NCAA violations after an investigation. The NCAA accepted LSU's self-imposed penalties of two lost scholarships and four recruiting visits during the 2003-04 recruiting year.

In November 2004, LSU paid former kinesiology professor Caroline Owen $150,000 and gave her an apology and three letters of recommendation after Owen sued over similar issues. Owen claimed LSU players plagiarized work and she was told by Lee to "keep the matter quiet."

Lions taking to the air for Northern Colorado

By Tammy Nunez
Staff writer

Southeastern Louisiana coach Dennis Roland walked out of Strawberry Stadium on Saturday with the season-opening game ball tucked under his arm, smiling and with his first victory as head coach.

The obstacle of winning in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina was behind him. But he knew he would have an equally tough job readying his team for its second game.

The Lions will play at Northern Colorado (1-1) at 2 p.m. today in a non-conference game. The team took a charter flight out of Baton Rouge on Friday morning.

For a school that hasn't flown to a game since 2003, it's a big deal. Many of the Lions have never flown on a charter flight.

"I think (the players) have got a little bounce in their step, excited about the victory," Roland said. "The true test — if you want to impress me — go out and get ready to play this ball game in a business-like way. We've got to win the travel and then win the game."

The game should be challenging enough. Southeastern and Northern Colorado are similar in their ball-control offenses, solid kicking games and scrappy demeanor. Northern Colorado showed resolve in rallying in a game it lost 28-23, Roland said. The Bears scored the final 16 points after falling behind 28-7. After allowing 318 yards in the first half, Northern Colorado's defense allowed 109 in the second.

"They play harder than any team I've seen in a long time," Roland said.

Southeastern played well in the second half last week, also. The Lions scored 27 third-quarter points in a 48-21 victory against Alcorn State. The offense, led by first-year starting quarterback Trey Willie, showed versatility in rushing for 223 yards and passing for 236. Willie surpassed his previous career high by completing 16 of 30 passes for 236 yards and three touchdowns.

SOUTHEASTERN LOUISIANA (1-0, 0-0 in Southland Conference) at NORTHERN COLORADO (1-1, 0-0 in Great West)
TIME: 3 p.m.
LOCATION: Nottingham Field in Greeley, Colo.
NOTES: Northern Colorado quarterback Nick Hager passed for five touchdowns and 304 yards in the first game of the season. But Hager didn't get the Bears' offense going until the second half in week two. Kicker Justin Zaitz is 4-for-4 this season in field-goal attempts (42, 24, 25, 28 yards) and has a streak of 36 consecutive successful extra-point attempts.

The victory came after a disjointed week for the team. Kicker Jim Hall said the team is much better prepared this week.

"With the storm, there were a couple players on our team that lost everything. I think football put a little peace back in their hearts and minds," Hall said. "We didn't really have the practices ticking last week. This week, they are like ticking. This week, we practiced really well."

Hall was chosen Southland Conference co-special teams player of the week after kicking two field goals (31, 36 yards) and going 6-for-6 on extra-point attempts.

Hall said the emotion might be a little less intense this Saturday, but not the effort.

"The team is very much upbeat because it was our first rodeo last week, winning our first game," Hall said. "But we've got to go up there and play businesslike. Not be excited about the flight, be excited about the game."

Saints get familiar feel in new place

By John Reid

SAN ANTONIO — After waiting two days for the FieldTurf surface to be installed, the Saints finally practiced inside the Alamodome on Friday.

Since last week, the Saints had been busing to a sports complex site in San Antonio for practices.

"It was a chance to get out of the heat,'' Saints coach Jim Haslett said. "I wanted to get on the FieldTurf because that's what we're going to play on (Monday night at Giants Stadium)."

Haslett plans to alternate his practice schedule for the rest of the season between the Alamodome and the outdoor sports complex site.

MOTIVATIONAL BOOST: Last week, Haslett read a letter from Mayor Ray Nagin the night before playing the Carolina Panthers to inspire his players. This week, former Saints coach Bum Phillips (1981-85) spoke to the team after Thursday morning's walk-through.

"I didn't know he was coming," Haslett said. "It was the first time I met him, and it was an honor.

He's a friend of a lot of people in the organization when he coached here in the '80s."

PLEASED: Haslett has been pleased with the work habits of his players during this week's preparations for the Giants.

"The guys got a spirit about them that I hope will continue for the rest of the season,'' Haslett said.

ROAD WARRIORS: The Saints are 25-16 on the road during the six seasons Haslett has coached the team.

Tailback Deuce McAllister said Friday his teammates focus more when they are on the road.

"You have less distractions like you may would have at home, with a lot of family and friends coming in," McAllister said. "You have that mentality that when you step on the field, you know you only have maybe 200 people in that stadium that are for you."

McAllister needs nine yards Monday night to become the franchise's career-leading rusher, surpassing George Rogers who rushed for 4,267 yards from 1981-84.

"It's really something for the guys upfront and the other guys who have helped me achieve like the fullbacks I played with," McAllister said.

home field of an individual school also is unlikely.

Henry said LSU, Shreveport's Independence Stadium, Louisiana-Lafayette and Southeastern Louisiana have expressed interest in hosting all or part of the Nokia Prep Classic, which cannot be played at the Superdome because of the effects of Hurricane Katrina.

Henry said the Superdome might not be available in 2006 either.

"We may have to play these games away from the Superdome for a couple of years,'' Henry said. "I think there will be another Superdome (Prep Classic). It may not be next year, but there will be one."

Bids for the Prep Classic are due Oct. 7, and the executive committee will select a site or sites Oct. 19. Shreveport would like to host all five games at 50,000-seat Independence Stadium, Gaspard said. Independence Stadium is the only facility among the four sites with artificial turf.

The Prep Classic will be played over three days, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, with no more than two games on Friday and Saturday.

LHSAA RULES ON HURRICANE-RELATED ISSUES

The Louisiana High School Athletic Association executive committee met Thursday and passed several hurricane-related rules:

ONE-TEAM DISTRICTS: Football schools left as the only school in their district as a result of Hurricane Katrina will be declared district champion without having to play any league games. Such schools are free to schedule other non-district games in place of the district contests. Schools, particularly those that lost games because of Katrina, are allowed to play an extra game after they are eliminated from the playoffs as long as the game is played prior to the state championship games.

ELIGIBILITY: Displaced students are eligible when they return to their original school even if the school is located outside of their residence zone. This would prevent private school students, particularly those from the metro area, from being penalized for breaking the chain of residency requirements.

DISPLACED COACHES: Schools are allowed to employ two displaced coaches per sport similar in concept to those employed under the Coaches' Education and Certification Program. Displaced coaches are not required to pass the CECP exam.

VOLLEYBALL: Schools will be allowed to play a third volleyball match each week if the game is against a displaced school from a storm-affected parish. The girls volleyball state tournament will be held either at the University of Louisiana-Lafayette Cajundome or Comeaux High School in Lafayette on its original dates, Nov. 9-12.

SWIMMING: The format of the state swimming championships, already awarded to LSU in place of UNO, was changed to have preliminary competition and finals contested on the same day. Division IV will be held Nov. 16; Division III Nov. 17; Division II Nov. 18; and Division I Nov.19.

WRESTLING: The state wrestling tournament still is scheduled for the Pontchartrain Center on Feb. 17-18.

SOCCER: The divisions I, II and III state soccer championships are scheduled for Louisiana-Lafayette on March 3-4.

San Antonio has NFL presence

SAINTS, from C-5

"There is not much you can do for this season. We have 30 or so suites finished out, and maybe there's some money in the budget to finish out some more," said former San Antonio mayor Nelson Wolff, now a county judge. "There are certainly things you can do to improve for the future. But we have to concentrate on what's happening right now."

Right now, Saints owner Tom Benson is happy that San Antonio has welcomed his team while the recovery efforts continue in New Orleans.

"The outstanding people at the (Alamodome) here have bent over backwards 24 hours a day to help us,'' Benson said. "We moved the whole staff, and they welcomed us. We got in their way, they've had events going on, and I just can't say enough nice things about them.

"Our practice facility in New Orleans was taken over by the federal government (FEMA) and we don't know when it will ever be back again available, so we're going to worry about the present."

It's that kind of uncertainty that has some elected officials in San Antonio hoping the Saints will permanently relocate to San Antonio, where Benson has several business interests.

But most of San Antonio's elected officials are maintaining the party line, that the city is helping the Saints for the short term.

Unlike Texas' biggest population centers, Houston and Dallas, San Antonio has one professional sports franchise — the NBA's San Antonio Spurs, who won their third NBA championship since 1999 in June by defeating the Detroit Pistons in Game 7 in San Antonio.

Although the city has supported the Spurs well for years, San Antonio's real passion has always been football. The Alamodome was built in 1993 for $183 million to help land an NFL franchise. But none came.

The Saints' game Oct. 2 will be the first time that the city will host an NFL regular-season game.

"Of course, we're not unmindful of the fact that it's going to be very good for San Antonio," said San Antonio mayor Phil Hardberger. "We're going to do everything we can to make this a success.

"The statistics show that when you have a professional football team, exclusive of concessions and tickets, it brings $8 to $9 million dollars into the city per game. So that's a great opportunity."

More than 50,000 tickets were sold in the first eight hours of ticket sales for the Saints' three games at the Alamodome.

Atlanta, Houston, Miami vying for 2010 Super Bowl

Site to be chosen Oct. 6 in Detroit

From wire reports

ATLANTA — With New York out of the running for the 2010 Super Bowl, the NFL next month will pick from three cities that lost a bid for the 2009 game — Atlanta, Houston and Miami.

New York was awarded the 2010 game on the condition it build a new 75,000-seat stadium in Manhattan that would have become the Jets' new home. The stadium, which also was part of the city's unsuccessful Olympic bid, failed to win government approval. Atlanta, Houston and Miami lost out to Tampa Bay for the 2009 game at NFL meetings in May.

Instead of going through another extensive round of bidding, the league decided to pick from the three cities that already had made extensive proposals. The 2010 site will be chosen at an Oct. 6 meeting in Detroit.

"We want to get it awarded," league spokesman Greg Aiello said Friday. "Those cities did a lot of work and had three good presentations."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution first reported next month's vote.

Atlanta, which hosted the 1994 and 2000 games, was considered a slight favorite for the 2009 game because its bid included $150 million in improvements for the Georgia Dome. But Tampa Bay beat out Atlanta in the final round of voting after a strong push by Buccaneers owner Malcolm Glazer.

Atlanta and Houston will go into the 2010 vote as favorites, since Miami already has been picked for the 2007 game.

This season's Super Bowl will be held in February 2006 at Detroit's Ford Field. The 2008 game was awarded to a new stadium being built in suburban Phoenix.

NFL ROUNDUP

Bucs rookie suspended

Tampa Bay rookie fullback Rick Razzano was suspended four games Friday by the NFL for violating the league's policy on anabolic steroids.

Razzano, a seventh-round draft pick from Mississippi, said through the team that he tested positive for a substance he used in training before joining the Buccaneers. He did not identify the substance.

"I take full responsibility for my mistake and encourage all athletes to be fully aware of all substances which may be prohibited by the NCAA or their respective sports and leagues," Razzano said.

"I apologize to my family, my coaches, teammates, the ownership and Buccaneer fans for the embarrassment and distraction I have caused. Let my experience be a further lesson for all."

Razzano, a third-stringer who plays behind Mike Alstott and Jameel Cook, was inactive for last Sunday's season opener at Minnesota. He will be eligible to return to the active roster on Oct. 10, a day after Tampa Bay plays the New York Jets.

The suspension follows the arrests this week of reserve cornerback Torrie Cox and offensive assistant Jay Gruden, younger brother of Bucs coach Jon Gruden, on drunken driving charges.

McNabb will start Sunday

Dononvan McNabb's bruised chest won't keep the quarterback out of the starting lineup for the Eagles' home opener Sunday against San Francisco.

Coach Andy Reid said Friday that McNabb would be in there "unless something crazy happens."

McNabb, who was injured in the first quarter in the Eagles' 14-10 season-opening loss at Atlanta on Monday night, practiced for the second straight day Friday. He looked fine during running drills, dropping back and making little-defended passes with ease.

McNabb didn't miss any plays after a crushing hit from Chad Lavalais sent him wincing to the sideline, but he struggled the rest of the game against the Falcons. Lavalais was fined $7,500 for using his helmet on McNabb.

McNabb missed practice Wednesday.

Hasselbeck has sore arm

Seattle Seahawks quarterback Matt Hasselbeck was added to the team's injury report due to arm soreness Friday, but coach Mike Holmgren said his starter will play in the team's home opener against the Atlanta Falcons.

Hasselbeck is listed as probable on the injury report after being limited at practices all week.

"His arm's sore, so we just backed him off," Holmgren said. "He'll play Sunday."

Hasselbeck appeared to injure his arm on the final offensive play of last week's 26-14 loss to Jacksonville, but he would not admit to any injury afterward.

He spent most of the Wednesday and Thursday practices watching backup Seneca Wallace run the No. 1 offense while rookie David Greene ran the third team.

Roethlisberger practices

Ben Roethlisberger practiced with the Pittsburgh Steelers on Friday, but is still listed as questionable for Sunday's game in Houston.

Coach Bill Cowher said it likely would be a game-time decision. If Roethlisberger can't play, former starter Tommy Maddox will take his place.

Roethlisberger was held out Wednesday and Thursday with a bone bruise on his knee, and was downgraded from probable (75 percent chance of playing) to questionable (50 percent) by Cowher.

Roethlisberger, the 2004 NFL Offensive Rookie of the Year, is 14-0 as a regular-season starter. He was hurt while throwing for two touchdowns in a 34-7 victory Sunday over Tennessee, but was pulled from the game because of the big lead rather than the injury.

The Steelers normally hold out any players who do not practice on Friday, so Roethlisberger's participation could be a sign he might be ready to play. He didn't practice Wednesday and had only limited work Thursday.

"The biggest thing is just make sure I'm ready to play for Sunday," Roethlisberger said. "I'll be ready by Sunday, hopefully."

Maddox began the 2004 season as the Steelers' starter, but injured an elbow during a Week 2 loss to Baltimore and was replaced for the next 13 games by Roethlisberger. Maddox started once more the rest of the season, a Jan. 2 game at Buffalo in which Roethlisberger was held out with a minor injury.

The last time Pittsburgh played Houston, in 2002, Maddox had two interceptions and a fumble returned for touchdowns.

Toms released from hospital

From wire reports

FARMINGTON, PA. — David Toms was released from a Pittsburgh hospital Friday and plans to play in next week's Presidents Cup matches despite being stricken by a heart problem during the first round of the 84 Lumber Classic.

Toms, taken off the Nemacolin Woodlands resort course Thursday with what his caddie said was a rapid heartbeat, said Friday in a statement issued by his charitable foundation that his problem is "treatable and curable."

According to the statement, the condition - supraventricular tachycardia, a general term for a rapid heart rate originating above the ventricles - is not life-threatening. Doctors told Toms it can be treated with medication or cured with minor surgery.

The 38-year-old Toms, No. 4 on the PGA Tour money list and No. 11 in the world rankings, grabbed his chest and complained about not being able to breathe properly halfway through his round and was taken off the course in an ambulance.

The once-tidy cottage on Lebeau Avenue in Arabi had been home to five generations of Susan Probst's family, from her grandparents to her 9-year-old grandson.

So Probst made sure she was among the first in line Saturday at dawn when St. Bernard Parish officials allowed residents in her neighborhood to return and salvage the few possessions that Hurricane Katrina had spared.

Despite dire warnings about the devastation throughout the parish, Probst and her husband, Tony, held out hope and had even rented a small moving van to haul away their possessions.

But that all changed with one glimpse through the home's windows.

"Oh, my God! Oh, my God!" she screamed as she fell to her knees and her words dissolved into a piercing wail.

The refrigerator lay in the middle of the kitchen floor, surrounded by slimy muck. The living room was a jumbled mess of mildewed furniture tossed about by floodwaters that had nearly reached the tops of doorways. Mold was spreading on the walls and ceilings.

Once she gathered herself enough to go inside, Probst discovered more heartbreak. Her collection of Mickey Mouse memorabilia was destroyed, and the water had smeared the ink on scores of pictures of her five grandchildren, blurring their faces so she couldn't recognize them.

"I tried to prepare myself for what I might see, but I never imagined this," she said. "Maybe I was just trying to fool myself."

"Looks like we won't be needing the truck after all," Tony Probst said.

Similar scenes played out throughout Old Arabi as about 300 carloads of residents returned to the parish Saturday to see what they could salvage. Most left virtually empty handed.

"People are shocked by what they're seeing and this is the least impacted area," Sheriff Jack Stephens said.

"It's only going to get worse."

In the coming days, residents will be allowed to return in stages to other areas of the devastated parish, where virtually all 27,600 homes flooded, including

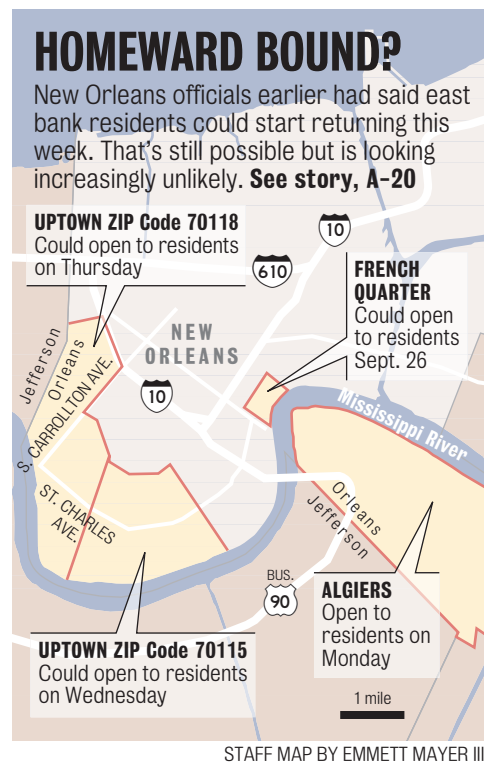
Roland Adams walked into his Faubourg Marigny restaurant Saturday morning for the first time since Hurricane Katrina struck and found a surprise: Everything was just as he had left it three weeks earlier.

Tables inside Marigny Brasserie at the corner of Royal and Frenchman streets were perfectly set with clean white linen cloths, china and glasses. The bar was stocked with a full supply of liquor, wine and beer. Even the $400 in cash left behind by the owner was still in its place.



"We're so lucky," Adams said. "No water damage. No looting."

Business owners began assessing Hurricane Katrina's damage Saturday, the first day they were allowed to enter New Orleans. Their work marked the start of the long process of resurrecting the city's battered economy.

From Uptown to the Marigny, workers swept shattered storefront glass from sidewalks, emptied rotten food from kitchen freezers and carried important files and computers to moving trucks.

Just off Poydras Street, along the city's main high-rise office strip, Sal Cannatella stuffed equipment from his copier, printer and litigation consulting business into a

BATON ROUGE — Twelve days after Hurricane Katrina, as the worst of the storm's physical perils subsided, about 60 business people and public officials from New Orleans gathered in Dallas with Mayor Ray Nagin to discuss the future of the city.

The room full of "type A" personalities, as one participant described them, showered advice on the mayor. But it was New Orleans-born trumpeter and composer Wynton Marsalis, one of several people participating by phone, who passionately made the point that seemed to resonate most with the group: New Orleans must rebuild its cultural, as well as its economic, strength.

For a city suffering an almost total exodus of residents and standing on the precipice of historic change in its population size and demographic makeup, the challenge of Marsalis' message struck deeply, according to people who attended the Dallas meeting Sept. 10. One huge concern is the potential loss of a disproportionately large number of African-Americans whose

WASHINGTON — It was 8:30 a.m., shortly after Hurricane Katrina made landfall Aug. 29, and Donald Bordelon was feeling pretty good.

Katrina's 145-mph fury was still raging outside his Arabi home. But in St. Bernard Parish, where residents look up at the Mississippi River, the real worry is water. Always, the water.

For the time being, the levees were holding back the forces of nature that daily threatened to render his neighborhood just one more south Louisiana swamp. His relief didn't last long.

Forty minutes later, water swirled up around the stove in his kitchen. He jumped into his boat and gave up his home to the storm.

Evacuations trip up Democratic strategy

Return of reliable voter base uncertain

By Laura Maggi
Capital Bureau

BATON ROUGE – With so many New Orleans residents in evacuation centers and temporary housing arrangements across Louisiana and the rest of the country, political analysts say that Hurricane Katrina could prove a turning point in the state's political history.

The potentially permanent diaspora of voters – especially the poor and black residents who make up the Democratic Party's most loyal constituency and may lack the resources needed to return – could change the calculations for getting elected to statewide office for years to come.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco and other leaders are beginning to assess the task of rebuilding the city and surrounding region, emphasizing that they want all of the Louisiana citizens to come back home. Those displaced lower-income residents currently without jobs, they say, can be put to work on the massive construction projects that are soon to come to the area.

The city of New Orleans has always been key in statewide elections, where well-established political machines have historically been able to turn out a large Democratic vote.

African-American voters make up about 63 percent of the registered voters in the city and 29 percent in the state. They have historically vote overwhelmingly for Democrats, making them essential to a winning strategy.

The well-organized black voters in New Orleans have been an essential factor in statewide elections, allowing Democrats to compete in a way that they haven't been able to in neighboring Deep South states such as Mississippi and Alabama, said Jim Nickel, a former chairman of the party.

"Unless there is a very significant, almost complete return, the math gets very complicated for Democrats," Nickel said.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco
Emphasized that she wants all La. citizens to return

It is unclear exactly how many people from southeast Louisiana have left the state since Katrina struck the coast three weeks ago, although Blanco estimates that 1 million residents from the region have been dispersed. Many of them are now out of state, including an estimated 250,000 in Texas alone.

Which of those Louisianians choose – or are able – to return will set the political landscape.

Residents already have begun to return to St. Tammany and Jefferson parishes, which have majority white populations that often back Republican candidates. Both parishes went for Blanco's GOP opponent, current U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, in the 2003 governor's race and gave Republican George W. Bush some of his highest percentages in the state in 2000 and 2004.

People from the flood-ravaged parishes of St. Bernard and Plaquemines are unlikely to be able to return as quickly because of the extensive flood damage. But those rural parishes, which are almost entirely white, are less politically predictable, evenly split between Democrats and Republicans in competitive races.

The real question mark remains Orleans Parish. Heavily black neighborhoods such as the Lower Ninth Ward and eastern New Orleans suffered extensive flooding, which could take months, if not years, to rebuild.

At the same time, thousands of lower-income New Orleanians, most African-American, who were unable to leave the city before the storm waited for days to be evacuated, often without food, while increasing violence dominated the streets. Many have expressed anger at their state and local leaders and reluctance about returning to the area. One recent poll of evacuees at shelters in Houston found that 44 percent intended to permanently relocate outside New Orleans.

State Rep. Cedric Richmond, D-New Orleans, said that it may be too soon to tell whether people will be unwilling to return to the city because of their experiences during Hurricane Katrina. An African-American politician, Richmond acknowledged that the exodus of large numbers of black voters would be significant for state Democratic politics.

"If we don't get people home, it is going to be very hard for Democrats to be elected," he said, while emphasizing that politics isn't the priority right now. "The main goal is to create a new city that everybody who was displaced would want to come home to."

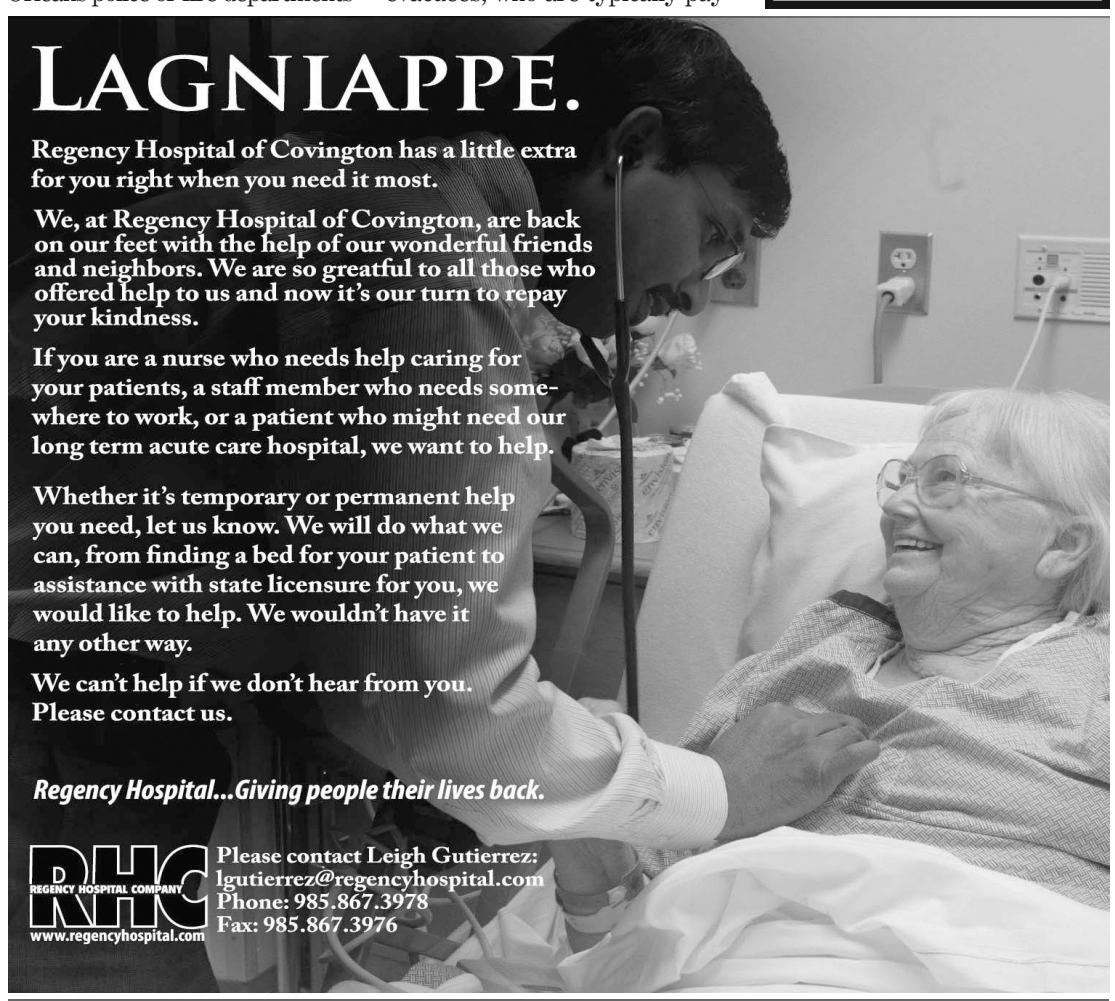
Bernie Pinsonat, a pollster and political consultant with Southern Media & Opinion Research in Baton Rouge, said it likely won't be clear for at least three months how the storm will impact the voter base in New Orleans.

For current leaders, the political impact of Hurricane Katrina could be problematic even if people do return to the state. A survey of 680 people at shelters in Houston, almost all of them from New Orleans, found that evacuees were critical of politicians at every level.

Fifty-eight percent disapproved of Blanco's handling of the storm's devastating aftermath, when flooding and violence overtook the city and thousands of people were stranded with little assistance for days. About 53 percent disapproved of New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's actions, while 70 percent found fault with President Bush.

The survey showed that people experienced a total collapse of local and state services, said Robert Blendon, professor of health policy at the Harvard School of Public Health, who helped conduct the survey, along with the Kaiser Family Foundation and The Washington Post.

Only 7 percent of respondents said they were helped by the New Orleans police or fire departments or a state agency, compared with 25 percent who said they received assistance from the National Guard or other military units.



"There was a real skepticism about the ability to rebuild and make things work in the future at the state and local level," Blendon said.

As the survey polled only people in emergency shelters, it is not a representative sampling of all New Orleans-area people who have evacuated to Houston, capturing generally low-income people who stayed in the city during the storm and needed government help to get out. More economically well-off evacuees, who are typically paying for their own housing or staying with family and friends, were not included.

GOV. KATHLEEN BLANCO

Blanco to nation: Our people will return

Radio address promotes teamwork

By Laura Maggi
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – Gov. Kathleen Blanco was tapped to deliver the Democratic Party's weekly radio address Saturday, using the national forum to thank people around the country for their generosity to Louisiana citizens in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

Blanco said the state is expecting to bring back residents who have been scattered across the nation – an exodus that some have called the greatest U.S. population shift since the end of the Civil War.

"Accept our thanks and hear our resolve: We will bring our people home as soon as we can," she said. "We need and want our people back."

While the Democratic address is often a counterpoint to President Bush's weekly radio address, Blanco used her time to thank the president for his pledge to commit the federal government to rebuilding New Orleans.

"We are prepared to work as partners. Some issues reach beyond party," said Blanco, who has been critical of the Federal Emergency Management Agency in the weeks since the storm struck. "In the face of the human tragedy, which lies behind us, and the task that lies ahead of us, there is no room for partisan politics."

Blanco and Bush both touched on many of the same issues in their radio addresses as in speeches given early this week, with the president explaining the programs he has proposed to help bring residents and businesses back to the devastated Gulf Coast.

"Our reconstruction efforts will be guided by certain principles: When cities are rebuilt, those cities should have many new businesses, including minority-owned businesses," Bush said. "When houses are rebuilt, more families should own, not rent, those houses."

Bush also sounded a theme of faith-based optimism that has replaced the earlier finger-pointing and pessimism that colored the earliest days of the strategy.

"In the life of our nation, we have seen that wondrous things are possible when we act with God's grace," Bush said. "From the rubble of destroyed homes we can see the beginnings of vibrant new neighborhoods. From the despair of lives torn asunder, we can see the hope of rebirth. And from the depth of darkness we can see a bright dawn emerging over the Gulf Coast and the great city of New Orleans."

Square away insurance before filing for FEMA aid

Grants issued for various expenses

By Mary Judice
Business writer

Making a claim on your insurance policy, if you have one, should come before filing for FEMA assistance, insurance industry representatives said this week.

As a rule, individuals should get insurance settlements first and then talk to FEMA "to determine if you qualify for government public assistance," said Jeff Albright, chief executive of the Independent Insurance Agents and Brokers of Louisiana in Baton Rouge.

That's because FEMA does not duplicate the coverage provided by insurance policies.

"If you get FEMA money, insurance companies wouldn't refuse to pay," said Don Beery, a vice president at Eustis Insurance Co. in New Orleans. However, if you receive an insurance settlement, you may have to reimburse FEMA because the federal agency will not duplicate coverage.

But Louisiana insurance brokers say many people file for everything -- homeowners insurance and FEMA assistance — and "sort things out as they go," Albright said.

FEMA offers a wide range of financial assistance.

The agency may be best known among Hurricane Katrina victims for its $2,000 temporary housing grants.

But FEMA also issues grants for a variety of other needs, including personal property replacement and medical, dental and funeral expenses, said Dean Cushman, a Baton Rouge spokesman for the agency.

These income-based programs mostly benefit those who have no insurance, Cushman said. But those who have insurance may also apply.

"If it looks like insurance is not enough to complete your home repairs, FEMA will come out and see if we can make an adjustment to add to your funds," Cushman said.

FEMA programs provide up to $26,200 per individual or household for housing and other needs. This includes up to $5,200 to make home repairs, said Pam Glasschroeder, a FEMA spokeswoman.

The FEMA program also includes assistance for repairing or replacing an automobile.

FEMA awards $500 for auto repair, as long as the vehicle is inspected, insured and registered. The assistance is most frequently made available to drivers who do not have full insurance. However, consumers with full insurance may still get an award.

Glasschroeder said a consumer may submit receipts for additional repairs, up to a total of $4,500.

FEMA grants are not intended to cover deductibles for those with insurance. Consumers with full insurance protection, which includes comprehensive and liability coverage, will generally be ineligible for assistance.

CORRECTIONS AND CLARIFICATIONS

Writer misidentified: A story published Sept. 1 under the headline "Baton Rouge real estate activity surges" had the wrong byline. It was written by Times-Picayune real estate reporter Greg Thomas.

Rate increases not sought: A headline and story in Saturday's edition about electric utility rates were incorrect. Entergy New Orleans and Entergy Louisiana have not sought rate increases from regulators. Over the coming weeks, the utilities will study changes in their customer bases and in costs related to Hurricane Katrina and the resulting evacuation. The utilities might request changes in their rates if they are needed to maintain their financial health, Entergy spokeswoman Amy Stallings said.

FEMA sets up clinics for minor ills in Jefferson

Residents get free help for medical complaints

By Rob Nelson
Staff writer

STAFF PHOTOS BY RUSTY COSTANZA

At Westwego Elementary School, Wendy Spino, left, of Chalmette is given a shot by nurse Sherry Holland of Columbia, Md. With them is emergency medical technician Chip Miller, center, a captain with the Ellicott City Volunteer Fire Department in Maryland. Ten sites throughout Jefferson Parish are being used as makeshift hospitals where residents can receive free, walk-in medical service, including vaccinations, drug refills and care for minor injuries.

Doctors and nurses moved swiftly around the room, some taking temperatures or monitoring blood pressure, others providing canned water for a steady stream of patients.

There were boxes of equipment, prescription drugs, a gurney and even a seating section for those awaiting a word with doctors.

It had all the feel of a typical hospital, with one glaring exception: the action was taking place in the cafeteria of Westwego Elementary School.

As part of a FEMA-run initiative dubbed "Operation Lifeline Depot," 10 sites throughout Jefferson Parish are being used as makeshift hospitals where residents can receive free, walk-in medical service, including vaccinations, drug refills and care for minor injuries.

The depots have been running for about two weeks and might end sometime next week as local hospitals come back on line, officials said.

Kelly Hudson, a FEMA spokeswoman, said Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard initiated the idea so residents who did not evacuate could still receive care.

"This is the largest-scale event I've ever been a part of," said Mike Millin, a doctor at Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore who is running the depot.

He and several workers on his 20-member staff, including many from Johns Hopkins, volunteered to work in Louisiana and expected to find heavy trauma cases when they arrived.

Instead, the more than 700 residents who have come through the depot have seen more basic needs such as treatment for hypertension and diabetes and prescription drug refills, Millin said.

In addition to medical attention, some residents, still traumatized or stressed by the storm, are looking for something beyond medicines and X-rays, he said. "They need the human touch," Millin said.

The centers are generally open from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. and transportation is available to area hospitals for more serious cases, Millin said. Overall, the centers have served about 3,500 residents since Sept. 7.

Westwego resident Robert Kennedy, who rode out the storm in the city because his mother refused to evacuate, called the center a blessing. He said he has not been feeling well the past several days and came to the depot Saturday to have his blood pressure and blood sugar checked.

"It's great," he said. "It's good for the community. It gives people somewhere to go. Some people say (FEMA) didn't come in fast enough, but better later than never."

Sitting at a table waiting to be seen by a nurse, Edward Matherne said his evacuation to New Iberia forced him to go without his blood pressure medication for three weeks. A friend told him about the depot when he returned to town Friday.

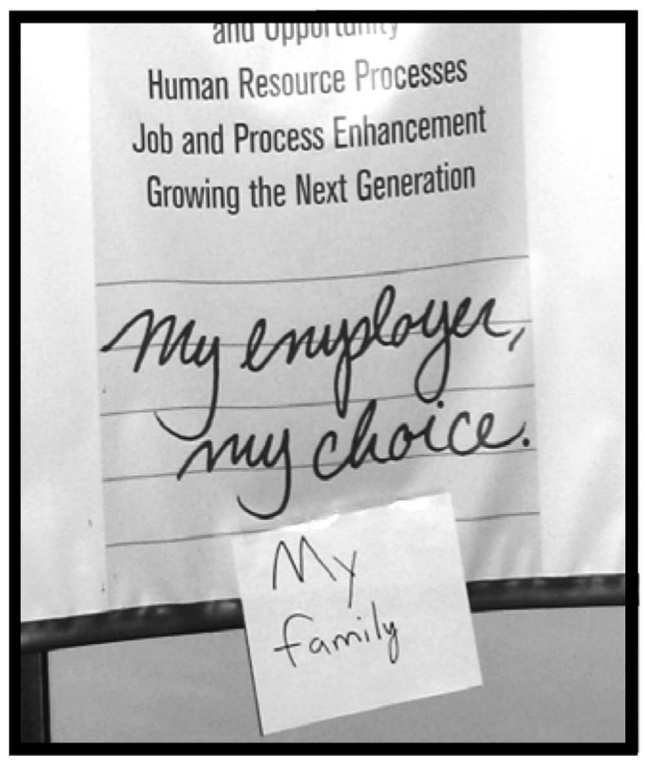
"It's great," he said, moments before his name was called. "People need their medication."

Meanwhile, inside the recreation center near Belle Terre Playground in Marrero, further recovery efforts bustled. The center has been turned into a headquarters for FEMA officials, U.S. marshals and firefighters from around the country.

More than 500 firefighters voluntarily came to Louisiana to help, including roughly 40 in Jefferson Parish.

Many spent the first few days after the storm helping with search and rescue efforts throughout the region.

Once those frantic days ended, the firefighters turned their attention to community outreach, traveling door-to-door with fliers containing FEMA information as well as supplies of food and water. They answered residents' questions and, in some cases, also provided minor medical care that officials believe saved nearly 20 lives in the first days after Katrina.



With a smaller number of firefighters, those efforts will continue as most Jefferson residents return home, but will eventually be disbanded as FEMA establishes disaster recovery centers throughout the area.

"Whatever the immediate need was, that's what we did," said Idaho firefighter Shane Arak, referring to his first few days in Louisiana. "This is history. This is what we do for a living."

The enormity of the disaster struck Marc Maiello, a colleague of Arak's from Idaho. "You can't grasp it until you are in it and it hits all of your senses," he said. "You have to walk through it. You have to smell it. It just leaves you with a numb, sober feeling."

Team rescues embryos from east N.O. clinic

Frozen tanks taken by boat to safety

By John Pope
Staff writer

The day before Hurricane Katrina tore across New Orleans, staffers at an eastern New Orleans fertility clinic moved swiftly to protect their most precious asset: 1,000 frozen embryos in four 80-pound tanks.

Before anyone knew how much damage the storm would inflict, specialists at the Fertility Institute of New Orleans moved the bulky tanks from the clinic to the third floor of nearby Lakeland Hospital at Bullard Avenue and Interstate 10, said Dr. Sissy Sartor, a fertility specialist. Then they refilled them with liquid nitrogen, which keeps the embryos at a safe temperature of 150 degrees below zero for three weeks or more, even if electrical service fails.

Katrina swamped much of eastern New Orleans. The clinic and hospital were not only flooded but also surrounded by about 8 feet of water, Sartor said, but the embryos were dry and safe – for the time being.

Even with a three-week margin of safety, Sartor said she and her colleagues didn't want to risk leaving them there that long. So on Sept. 9, they began arranging to remove the embryos, some of which had been stored there since 1989.

The effort took off after one strategically placed call to an acquaintance, state Rep. John Alario, D-Westwego, who just happened to be en route to a meeting at Gov. Kathleen Blanco's office with representatives of the State Police and the National Guard.

Alario brought the concern to the meeting's attention. "I told them the problem I had," Alario said, "and said we were looking for people – anywhere, anyhow – who were ready to go."

As a result of that encounter and more telephone calls, a coalition was formed. On Sept. 11 at 7:30 a.m., a Fertility Institute contingent met members of the State Police, the National Guard and the Illinois Conservation Police at Bullard and Chef Menteur Highway to start what Sartor called Operation Embryo Rescue.

The Illinois group was there because it had three flat-bottomed boats: valuable assets, Sartor said, because they encountered high water a block from the intersection.

The group of 20 climbed onto the boats and started paddling down Bullard toward the clinic. Although the water had started to recede, Sartor said, cars were still submerged, and some houses held 6 feet of water.

"It was mind-boggling," she said. "When we got the hospital door open, it was as if a dam had opened up. Water started flowing out."

Spotting a dinghy bobbing nearby, Roman Pyrzak, the clinic's lab director, clambered aboard and paddled down the aisles and halls of the dark, dank building, followed by members of the State Police and National Guardsmen in waders. When they reached a stairwell, Pyrzak, who had been in charge of moving the embryos to the third floor, led the way to the tanks.

Their first priority, Sartor said, was to ascertain that the nitrogen levels were still high enough to sustain the embryos.

They were. Then it was time to get them out. With two men carrying each heavy tank, the group slowly descended two flights of stairs, sloshed back through the hospital's first floor and loaded them onto the boats for the ride back to Bullard and Chef Menteur. The tanks were transferred to trucks for the ride to the Fertility Institute's branch at Lakeside Hospital in Metairie, which had power and nitrogen.

Once the embryos were safe, Fertility Institute staffers started notifying clients of the rescue.

"They were ecstatic," Sartor said.

So was Alario.

"It's almost like saving 1,000 lives at one shot," he said. "Maybe some of them could be twins."

A State Police officer helps Greg Hunter, right, a member of the Illinois Conservation Police, carry a tank of frozen human embryos out of Lakeland Hospital in eastern New Orleans on Sept. 11. Rescuers moved 1,000 frozen embryos in four 80-pound tanks to a Metairie hospital for safekeeping.

Colo. town 'adopts' stricken Pearlington

Officials send aid, bypass red tape

By The Associated Press

CARBONDALE, COLO. - This town has found its own way to help Hurricane Katrina victims.

It has "adopted" Pearlington, Miss., to provide help and supplies directly to a town that isn't in the national headlines but is in need of as much help, if not more, than New Orleans, officials said.

The idea was developed by Town Manager Tom Baker, Police Chief Gene Schilling and Fire Chief Ron Leach after an online search of the Gulf Coast communities destroyed or severely damaged by Katrina.

On Monday, a Carbondale ambulance and other vehicles are set to roll out Monday to help Pearlington. Leach said that bypasses "the bureaucracy and red tape" of working with the federal government or national aid groups.

A team of area emergency response experts will go along to assess the situation and determine Pearlington's needs as it tries to recover. Leach said the Carbondale community will be asked to help collect whatever is needed.

On Sunday, cash donations will be sought at the annual street dance and a local Cub Scout pack, as part of a national project called Project Backpack, will fill backpacks with needed items to be taken to Pearlington.

The town and fire department both donated $5,000 to get the project rolling, but they don't want to spend a lot of taxpayer money on the relief effort. Baker said he hoped the effort would serve as a model for other communities that want to help.

Officials in Pitkin County and the towns of Aspen, Snowmass and Basalt say they are working to "adopt" an area as well.

An unincorporated community of about 1,700 people in Hancock County, Pearlington is about halfway between Slidell and Waveland, Miss., both severely damaged by Katrina. It is only a few miles from the Gulf of Mexico, just east of Lake Pontchartrain and 35 miles east of New Orleans.

Together we will rebuild our community

Each one of us at MGM MIRAGE stands committed to all our Beau Rivage employees, their families and the entire Gulf Coast community. We have created an internal response team to assist in the recovery from this devastating storm and have established the following initiatives to help provide both short and long term relief:

HURRICANE KATRINA AFTERMATH

Little peace found at funeral homes

Temporary burials, cremations increase

By John Pope
Staff writer

It was Aug. 27, a sunny, hot Saturday in New Orleans. But despite the picture-postcard weather, Cal Johnson, a funeral-home manager, refused to schedule any more services because he had an uneasy feeling about the hurricane churning toward Louisiana through the Gulf of Mexico.

"I had a gut feeling that after that storm, we would have no electricity and no way of operating," he said. "I didn't want to have someone's loved one floating at my facility if those remains had been entrusted to me."

Johnson's premonition was right. In its march across southeast Louisiana, Hurricane Katrina disrupted the local funeral industry and made mourners' grief even more intense.

Beset by a loss of electricity and rising floodwater, some mortuaries and the Orleans Parish Coroner's Office had to ship bodies where they could be kept safe and chilled. Some families who fled the storm's wrath and have no idea when they'll be able to return have had to hold services near their temporary homes.

Local funeral homes have been hamstrung because they have not been allowed into New Orleans to pick up bodies or inspect their businesses, said Cecilia Robert, president of Majestic Mortuary Service.

These restrictions have been hard on family members too, said Johnson, manager of Littlejohn's Funeral Home, whose two New Orleans branches flooded.

"They're emotionally torn up," said Ceatrice Johnson, his wife, who is a funeral director at Littlejohn's.

"One lady stayed back after evacuating her home so she could bury her son or know where he was going," she said. "She had a nervous breakdown."

Because of the inability to conduct funerals in New Orleans and the uncertainty of a return date, there has been a big increase in cremations and in temporary burials until people can return home, said Gene Walters, executive director of the Louisiana Funeral Directors Association.

"Funeral directors need to tell families that this is the only option for burying a loved one for a while, because we don't know when they'll be going back to New Orleans," Walters said. "If they want to get Mama buried with Daddy, they may have to wait until next year."

The state Cemetery Board is contacting local cemetery operators to determine when their graveyards can reopen, said Lucy McCann, its executive director.

Even though temporary burials are unusual, funeral homes and cemeteries are working to accommodate families' wishes, using unsold space on a rental basis, she said.

As a result of such kindness, "people are grateful," said Billy Henry, Bultman Funeral Home's manager, who has been working at mortuaries in Lutcher and Marrero until he can return to New Orleans.

He recalled one man who showed up at Alexander Funeral Home in Lutcher. He was trying to find his mother's body, which had been moved five times since the storm hit.

She was there, Henry said. "He just wanted to touch her. I wheeled her into the room, and he sat with her for 30 minutes and cried like a baby."

Because of flooding, the morgues for Orleans, Plaquemines and St. Bernard parishes have been moved to the St. Gabriel warehouse that is also being used to identify bodies of storm victims, Health and Hospitals Department spokesman Bob Johannessen said.

Once enough information is available to make a presumptive identification, he said the coroner of the dead person's parish will be notified, along with the family-assistance center being operated by the health department and the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The center notifies the next of kin, Johannessen said, and the funeral home the family selects will retrieve the body.

Michigan volunteers help evacuees find new jobs

By The Associated Press

SOUTHFIELD, MICH. — Hurricane Katrina evacuees have come to Michigan seeking food, shelter, refuge — and jobs.

Whether families of evacuees stay or go will be largely determined by their ability to find jobs in Michigan, experts said.

Many are searching for work in Detroit-area hotels and restaurants, even with the state's unemployment rate at 6.7 percent, one of the highest in the country. But Michigan can handle a few more job-seekers, experts said.

"I could see there being a problem if there were planeloads of people being dropped off, but that's not the case," said Robyn Boyle, an urban affairs professor at Wayne State University.

Among those looking for work is Tanjie Watson, 31, of Biloxi, Miss., who drove to Detroit with her husband and their four children, ages 6 months to 10 years.

The family is staying at the Homestead Inn in Southfield with help from the Red Cross. The 14-day arrangement ends in a week, Tanjie Watson said. After that, they have to fend for themselves.

"We're trying to find our way, but we don't really have funds," she told the Detroit Free Press for a Saturday story. "How are we going to find anything when we don't have funds?"

Watson most recently worked at the reservation desk of a Biloxi hotel and casino. Her husband, Duane Watson, a 31-year-old truck driver, also is looking for work.

At the Ramada Inn and Convention Center in Southfield, which has housed about 360 evacuees since the beginning of September, volunteers are organizing a job room as a resource for evacuees in the area.

OCHSNER ACCEPTS ALL MAJOR HEALTH PLANS

Uptown hospitals delay reopening ER services

Touro, Children's need time to clean, restock

By Gordon Russell
Staff writer

Throwing another wrench into Mayor Ray Nagin's ambitious plan for repopulating parts of Uptown, officials from Touro Infirmary said Saturday they do not expect to reopen their hospital for emergency services until Wednesday, while their counterparts at Children's Hospital said their facility may remain shuttered for 10 days or more.

The lack of functioning hospitals in the city is one of several major obstacles that could get in the way of the mayor's plan, announced Thursday, to allow residents to return to those parts of New Orleans not devastated by Hurricane Katrina and the flood that followed it.

Because they were relatively undamaged, Touro and Children's were the two hospitals Nagin said he hoped would be open by the time the city – now populated by an odd mixture of city and federal workers, the military, journalists and stragglers – gets some of its residents back. The other hospitals were too badly damaged or flooded to open quickly. Officials at both institutions said their facilities are in relatively good shape, but noted that there is a lot of work to be done before they can accept patients.

"There's a whole process we have to go through to get back online," said Brian Landry, a spokesman for Children's Hospital. "But we're moving very quickly."

"Certainly, the place needs a good cleaning," said Les Hirsch, Touro Infirmary's chief executive officer.

It's not clear whether Touro alone can handle the emergency services for returning residents.

Some health care professionals said emergency room visits tend to rise steeply after events like Katrina. With traffic lights out, car accidents can be frequent, and others injure themselves while attempting home repairs.

After Hurricane Hugo battered South Carolina in 1989, the number of emergency room visits doubled, said Dr. Joe Guarisco, director of Ochsner Foundation Hospital's emergency department. About 80 percent of those visits were for injuries from do-it-yourself home repairs.

Chain saw injuries send the most people to emergency rooms, Guarisco said, followed by injuries from falling off ladders or roofs.

Although both hospitals have had power for several days, they still must be scoured from top to bottom. Supplies that needed refrigeration, ranging from drugs to blood to food, have to be thrown out and replaced. Equipment must be inventoried and recalibrated. And the hospitals have to make sure they have the right medical staff in place, and that the employees have a place to live.

Saturday morning, both hospitals were teeming with cleanup crews from ServiceMaster and Aramark. Hundreds of workers milled about, sweeping up, bringing out soiled linens and testing equipment. At Children's Hospital, air "scrubbers" were fired up in an effort to freshen the stagnant air inside the building.

"We're going to try to open our ER as fast as we can," said Mary Perrin, vice president of operations for Childrens Hospital. "It's possible we'll open at the very end of next week. But more likely, it will be the week after that."

At the same time, she said, the hospital will not reopen until it's safe. Apart from the cleanup, hospital officials are concerned about the quality of city water, which has thus far been deemed unsafe for cooking, drinking and bathing.

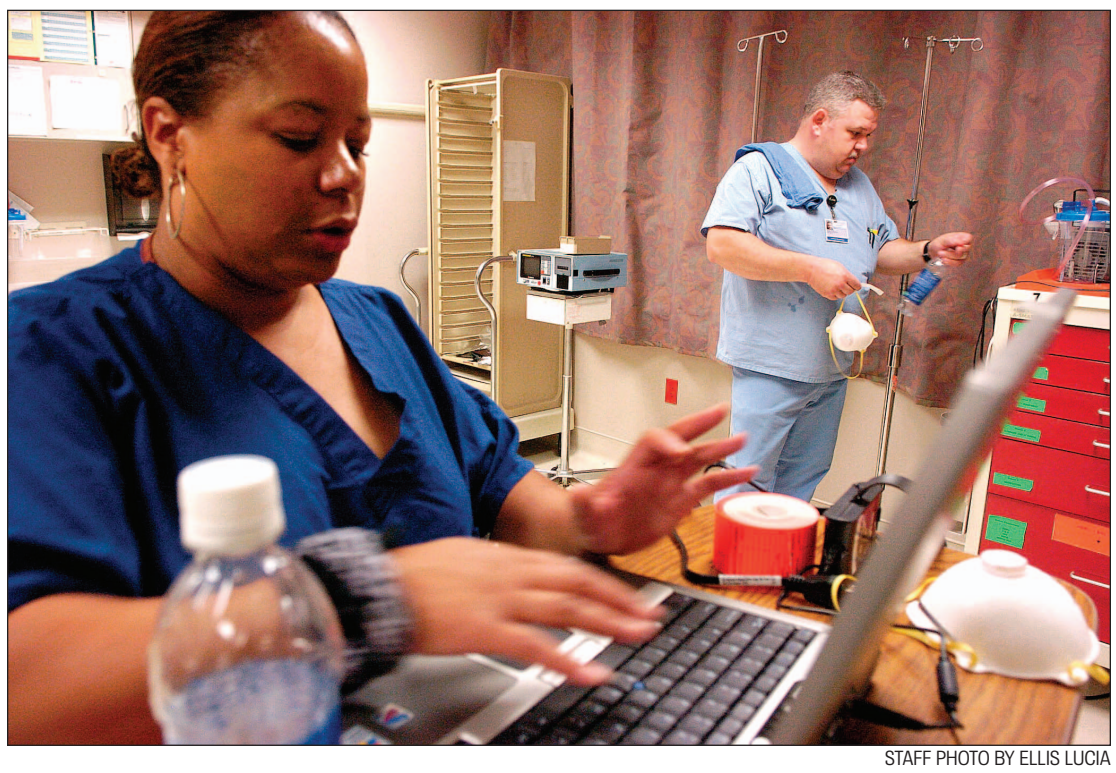
Perrin said the lack of potable water wouldn't necessarily stop the hospital from reopening. Some water can be brought in, she said, and doctors can wash their hands with a waterless hand gel.

The outlook was more optimistic for a quick turnaround at Touro Infirmary. While Touro took on a small amount of water, its floodgates held for the most part, Hirsch said.

Hirsch said current plans – which, he emphasized, are subject to change – call for the hospital to open for emergency patients on Wednesday at 7 a.m.

"The plan assumes no issues with potable water, with sewerage, or any other public health concerns that would be outside the control of Touro," Hirsch said. "Based on what I know at this moment, we'll be open Wednesday, but there may be developments beyond my control."

City officials, in a checklist released Friday, cited security as one of the few bright spots in the restoration of services. But it hasn't always been so, according to the security chief at Children's Hospital.



Chad Clayton of Clarence M. Kelley & Associates, a Kansas City firm that has been handling security at the hospital since the Saturday after the storm, said his team had encountered a number of problems in the early days.

"There's still some gang activity, unfortunately," he said.

Safety improved dramatically with the arrival of the National Guard, which has been bivouacking nearby in Audubon Park, Clayton said.

WHITNEY BANK ANNOUNCES

HURRICANE ASSISTANCE LOAN AND PAYMENT RELIEF PROGRAMS

Helping our communities is a Whitney tradition. In order to assist victims of Hurricane Katrina in affected areas in Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi, The Whitney is offering a special Hurricane Assistance Loan, as well as a Payment Relief Program for victims of the storm:

HURRICANE ASSISTANCE LOAN

Whitney is offering individuals a 90-day single payment loan at 7% Annual Percentage Rate with no fees. No repayment is required for 90-days, during which time most insurance claims should be processed. At that time, the insurance proceeds can be used to repay the loans. Visit any Whitney Bank or apply online at whitneybank.com. Subject to credit underwriting criteria.

CONSUMER LOAN CUSTOMERS

- All payments will automatically be deferred for 90 days.*
- Automatic payments from checking accounts related to these loans will be suspended during the deferment period.
- Individual hardship cases not addressed by the policy will be handled on an individual basis.
- No late fees will be assessed during this period.
- No credit reporting will occur during this period.

MORTGAGE CUSTOMERS

- Whitney Bank mortgage customers impacted by Hurricane Katrina may request a suspension of first mortgage loan payments up to three months for mortgages held by Whitney Bank. There will be no credit reporting on these accounts and no late charges will be assessed during this period. Customers should contact Whitney Bank at 1-800-436-1022 for details.

SMALL BUSINESS CUSTOMERS

- Updated hurricane relief details may be viewed at whitneybank.com.

ALL WHITNEY CUSTOMERS

- Evacuated clients can conduct business at any operating Whitney branch. See whitneybank.com for a complete list of open branches.
- Clients may call Whitney's toll-free customer service line at 1-877-611-9448 to speak with a Whitney Banker.
- Whitney's BillPay service is operational at whitneybank.com. Consumer clients not currently using our online bill payment service can sign up by clicking the Personal BillPay link on whitneybank.com.
- Whitney's fees for using non-Whitney ATMs have been waived.
- Checks, deposits, and other transactions, including Automated Clearing House (ACH) files used by some business clients to pay their employees, are being processed through our Houston processing center.

Please visit whitneybank.com for updated information and other ways Whitney Bankers are assisting our clients and communities to recover from the storm.

State looks at ways to keep folks in La.

Firms, homeowners could get tax credits

By Laura Maggi
Capital Bureau

BATON ROUGE – State officials are working on an economic development package they want Congress to consider to help jump-start businesses in New Orleans, as well as encourage people to rebuild their homes in the area, Gov. Kathleen Blanco said in an interview Saturday.

Based on the tax breaks and other incentives that were created for New York City after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the state is trying to craft "sellable" tax credits program for homeowners and businesses that would benefit anyone who rebuilds in the 10-parish area affected by the storm, Blanco said.

The package is still in its conceptual stages, Blanco said, being worked out in partnership with Mississippi officials, who will have similar problems rebuilding along the coastline.

"A lot of the details are not yet identified, but we want it as liberal as possible," Blanco said, adding that any incentives would likely have to be in place for as long as a decade. "We want it to work for re-employing our people."

Among the ideas:

▶A $50,000 tax credit for homeowners who rebuild in the area or a $20,000 tax credit for renters who return. People whose tax liability is less than those amounts would be allowed to sell those credits.

▶An accelerated depreciation schedule for businesses, allowing them to write off 50 percent of their investment in the first year.

▶A $30 billion bond issue allowing businesses that want to rebuild to get tax-free bonds, as well as providing businesses that reopen in the New Orleans area with a $100,000 tax credit.

The state already is working with large companies to get their work forces back into the area, Blanco said, by helping set up temporary housing at facilities. This will help get the larger employers up and running, she said, providing a boost for the stalled economy.

In a phone interview before she traveled to Alexandria to meet with troops coming back from the war in Iraq, the governor said she had a good meeting Wednesday night with New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin. The mayor has been critical of the state's post-hurricane response, saying that he did not get enough support as flooding swamped the city and violence became more pervasive.

"We began the process of debriefing each other, sharing what our unique experiences were," Blanco said. "I know the mayor felt very desperate in his hour of need."

But Blanco said that because of the communications network breakdown, Nagin was unaware of all that was going on at the state level to deal with the crisis. "We came to some new levels of understanding that were absolutely necessary," she said.

Although Nagin endorsed opponent Bobby Jindal during the 2003 governor's race, Blanco said she has developed a good working relationship with the mayor since she took office. "We re-established our friendship," Blanco said of their conversation.

Miss. begins Katrina cleanup, but where will the garbage go?

By Matt Apuzzo
Associated Press writer

D'IBERVILLE, MISS. - In a sandy construction site on the outskirts of town, more than a dozen trucks await their chance to unload tree limbs and feed a huge bonfire that will burn from dawn until dusk every day for months.

In an abandoned tanning salon a few towns away, members of the Army Corps of Engineers kneel on the floor and look for available dump sites on maps laid on the carpet.

The Hurricane Katrina cleanup represents the biggest waste-disposal job in U.S. history, dwarfing in volume the debris carted off after the World Trade Center's twin towers fell in 2001, officials said.

In the past few days, a loose network of contractors, government officials and out-of-work residents has sprung up to scoop, sort, grind and dispose of not just mountains of garbage, but whole mountain ranges of the stuff.

With entire communities reduced to rubble, engineers and environmental officials are scrambling to figure out where to put the debris. The largest dump site in southeastern Mississippi is already nearing capacity.

Zogas Costas, the Corps engineer leading the cleanup in two southeastern Mississippi counties, said aerial photos suggest Mississippi has as much as 50 million cubic yards of debris — enough to fill Atlanta's Georgia Dome nearly 13 times.

Louisiana, where thousands upon thousands of flooded homes in and around New Orleans probably will have to be razed, could have nearly as much.

"I was at 9/11. That was done in about four months," Costas said. "This is going take longer."

The cleanup in Mississippi follows a process that probably will be adopted in Louisiana.

First, construction crews use bulldozers and backhoes to load trucks with debris and haul it to "reduction sites." There, most household debris — mattresses, vinyl siding, toys, rusted metal, lumber and the like — is separated and ground up together. Trees, shrubs and brush are burned or turned into wood chips.

Air conditioners, refrigerators and other items that could contain hazardous materials such as coolant are set aside. The dangerous substances will be removed before those items are ground up, too.

To handle the load, Mississippi will need dozens of new landfills and reduction sites amounting to hundreds of acres, said Mark Williams, a program manager with the state Department of Environmental Quality.

Some closed sites may be reopened, existing landfills may be expanded, and people with land to spare have called the state, looking to get in on the action.

"Land is going to be at a premium," Costas said. "It's a huge, enormous task."

Approving such a site normally takes months, but environmental officials have speeded up the process.

Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., is preparing a bill that would allow the Environmental Protection Agency to waive certain environmental rules during the cleanup, although EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson said there is no immediate need for such waivers.

As for how long the cleanup could last, Costas said much of the debris will be removed from streets within three months. But burning and grinding it all could take years.

trailer. For the time being, Cannatella has relocated Southern Imaging Solutions from the sixth floor of the Freeport McMoRan Building at 1615 Poydras to locations in Kenner and Baton Rouge.

"The building will be closed for two and a half to three weeks," Cannatella said. "In my heart I feel there will be greater opportunity for those who stick it out and stay here. I'll be back."

Saint Jones had the same view standing in front of Big Daddy's, a Bourbon Street strip club famous for the pair of mannequin legs that swing out from its front window.

Workers have cleaned up the club. All it needs now to reopen is electricity and girls.

Eight dancers are waiting in other cities to return to the club's stage and tabletops as soon as soon as possible, Jones said. But that won't be nearly enough to handle the flood of business he expects from the security officers, firefighters, recovery workers and reporters who now make up the bulk of the city's population.

"They've all been banging on my door everyday asking when I'm going to open," he said. "They're going to have a lot of money to spend."

Jones expects to hire another 32 dancers to meet customer demands. The only trick is finding women willing to work in the city during the early phase of reconstruction.

But Jones said he thinks the dancers will be drawn by the opportunity to make money. "This is bigger than any convention that we've ever had," he said.

In the Central Business District, workers hauled cartloads of computers out of Hibernia National Bank's operations center at the corner of Common and South Rampart streets and loaded them into a pair of trucks bound for Shreveport. The equipment is going to a temporary customer call center for the bank, said Kent Wedel, a network facilities manager for the bank.

Not everyone was pleased with the progress.

Kay Vereen complained about the pace of restarting commerce in the city while walking her dog Sabrina a few blocks from The John, a bar that she owns at the corner of Burgundy and Frenchman streets in the Marigny.

Vereen, who never evacuated, said she's been ready to reopen for days but won't do it, because of health concerns, until utility services are restored.

"I'm tired of the press conferences. Get me up and running," she said.

Annan presses nations on U.N. reform

Overhaul targets poverty, terrorism

By Nick Wadhams
Associated Press writer

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Kofi Annan, armed with what he called the most significant blueprint for reform in the United Nations' history, said Saturday the 191 member states should quickly create new human rights and peacebuilding machinery and address the growing risks of nuclear proliferation and "catastrophic terrorism."

While Annan sought to spur momentum for change after a three-day summit of world leaders, Iran's new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, was certain to take the spotlight with a speech later Saturday responding to a European demand for Tehran to halt uranium enrichment.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice diverged from her prepared remarks at the opening session of the General Assembly and omitted a reference to Iran as a "leading sponsor of terrorism." But she still accused Iran of having "unilaterally walked away from" nuclear talks.

Tension over Iran's intentions was one of the biggest side events to the debate, which opened less than 12 hours after the summit closed. That event saw world leaders adopt a document committing them to an overhaul of the world body and efforts to fight poverty, human rights abuses and terrorism.

Annan had wanted more, and many sweeping changes were gutted because of bitter diplomatic disputes.

But Annan and several leaders defended the summit's achievements, telling the General Assembly that leaders did more at one time than ever before in 60 years of U.N. history.

"Now we turn to a new task: to implement what has been agreed, and keep working to bridge differences that remain," Annan said, adding he would "speak plainly" if leaders fall behind. "And I have no doubt that global public opinion will keep a close eye on our progress."

For the first time, leaders accepted a collective international responsibility to protect people from genocide, war crimes and ethnic cleansing.

They also agreed to establish a new Human Rights Council to replace the long-discredited Human Rights Commission, tainted because countries accused of rights abuses ó including Cuba, Zimbabwe and Libya ó have gained membership.

In addition, Annan urged them to make good on the promise to set up a Peacebuilding Commission to help nations recover from war.

"Let's each do our part so that the Peacebuilding Commission can begin its work before the end of the year," Annan said.

Yet one of the summit document's failures was that it never mentioned the issue of nuclear nonproliferation and disarmament because leaders could not agree on what to say.

Annan had called that a disgrace, and on Saturday he said the world faces growing risks of "proliferation and catastrophic terrorism."

He urged nations to strengthen the three pillars of the nuclear arms control regime: nonproliferation, disarmament and peaceful uses.

"The stakes are too high to continue down a dangerous path of diplomatic brinkmanship," Annan said.

Rice followed with a plea for world leaders to adopt a sweeping anti-terrorism convention and include a definition of terrorism that outlaws attacks targeting civilians. The absence of that definition of terrorism was one of the key failings of the summit document.

"No cause, no movement and no grievance can justify the intentional killing of innocent civilians and noncombatants," Rice said.

Leaders praised the summit document as a first step toward bringing change to the United Nations and helping the world's poor. But they acknowledged that some saw it the other way ó as a document that made little difference to the rest of the world.

"Who is right? The answer, I believe, is up to us," said General Assembly President Jan Eliasson of Sweden. "The document should, as one speaker put it, be a beachhead of common ground from which we launch ourselves forward with urgency and common purpose."

The original thrust of the U.N. summit was to take action to implement goals set by world leaders at their last summit in 2000. Those include cutting poverty by half, ensuring universal primary education and stemming the AIDS pandemic, all by 2015.

Jamaica's Prime Minister P.J. Patterson, speaking on behalf of the Group of 77 developing countries, echoed many leaders when he lamented that the world was nowhere near on track to meet the targets, called the Millennium Development Goals.

"At the current pace, some regions and countries will miss several of the MDGs by decades," Patterson said. "In certain areas, such as the elimination of hunger, we would be centuries away."

BUILDINGS CAN BE REPLACED. LIVES CANNOT.

Don't endanger your life by disregarding safety as you return home. Hurricane Katrina left Entergy's gas and electric systems in the New Orleans area severely damaged. As we work to repair the gas system and restore electrical power, we ask that you make safety your top priority. Full power and gas restoration will be a long and difficult process. And with your help and patience we can rebuild what was destroyed. The storm is over. But the danger is not. Below is a list of guidelines and safety precautions to keep in mind when assessing your damage.

Stay away from downed power lines and areas of debris. Energized power lines may not be visible among the rubble. Report downed lines immediately to Entergy at 1-800-ENTERGY (1-800-368-3749). If a power line falls on your vehicle while driving, continue to drive away from the line.

Generator safety. Use generators in accordance with the manufacturer's instructions. Never run a generator indoors. Carbon Monoxide from the exhaust can kill. Electricity and water don't mix. Keep the generator dry and do not use in rain or wet conditions. To protect from moisture, operate it on a dry surface under an open, canopy-like structure. Dry your hands if wet before touching the generator. Never connect a generator directly to a building's wiring without a licensed electrician. It can create a lethal safety hazard for you, your neighbors, and Entergy's linemen working to restore power.

IF YOUR NATURAL GAS IS TURNED OFF, FOR SAFETY'S SAKE, LEAVE IT OFF

If you have pipe damage, you'll need a licensed plumber

To help ensure your personal safety and the safety of your property, Entergy has likely turned your natural gas service off. Please do not attempt to turn it on yourself. This could cause a safety hazard for you and your property.

If your home was flooded or sustained structural damage, you should contact a licensed plumber to inspect gas piping and make repairs.

Please do the following:

1) Have repairs made by a licensed plumber
2) Have repairs certified by a city inspector
3) Call Entergy at 1-800-ENTERGY (1-800-368-3749) when the repairs are completed

We will arrange to have gas service turned on at your home as soon as you have had a certified plumber and city inspector confirm that gas service is safe to turn on. Someone must be present for your gas to be turned on.

If you smell gas at your home or any in other building, you should leave the area immediately and go to a safe area and call us at 1-800-ENTERGY (1-800-368-3749) to report the location of the suspected leak.

Vietnamese businesses must start over — again

Many made homes in eastern New Orleans

By Doug MacCash
Staff writer

The grass in the neighborhoods along Chef Menteur Highway beyond Interstate 510 is a cadaverous gray color, seemingly lifeless after being submerged for days beneath floodwaters.

Bass boats, V-bottomed pleasure craft and even one forlorn Sunday-in-the-park paddleboat are grounded on the four lanes' shoulders, medians and side streets – evidence of a hectic exodus. Car washes, mobile homes and threadbare motels dating from the era when Chef Menteur, also known as U.S. 90, was a thoroughfare to the Gulf Coast, seem to have exploded into rubble along the roadside.

Other, more substantial architecture is merely scoured by the wind, missing shingles and gutters. Cypress and cedar trees are bent to the ground, their roots pulled summarily from the earth like garden weeds. As other New Orleans neighborhoods seem poised for a speedier-than-expected comeback, eastern New Orleans is still utterly humbled by Hurricane Katrina's power.

Near the corner of Chef Menteur and Alcee Fortier Boulevard, where for 30 years Vietnamese lettering has replaced English on the roadside shop marquees, businessman Huang Tran, 49, surveyed the damage with nervous dismay Friday.

"I feel very down," he said. "It's so terrible. Before I came back I thought I could rebuild in a few weeks. Now I think it will take five or six months."

Tran pointed to several of the storefronts in the block-long strip malls that line the intersection, each owned by a member of his immediate or extended family, all of them damaged. His younger sister owns the jewelry store, his wife's older sister owns the pharmacy, and his older sister owns the Vietnamese ham factory, where, he said, the hundreds of pounds of meat have certainly spoiled.

Other family members ran small businesses in neighborhoods across New Orleans, most, he said, damaged to some degree by the storm. Everyone, he said, escaped to Carrollton, Texas, near Dallas, where they waited for his report on the damage.

Tran's own business, a second-story video rental store, had survived both wind and floodwaters. Ironically, this fact only seemed to add to his frustration, since somehow he'd misplaced the keys, making the long drive from Texas to retrieve valuables and begin the repair process in part useless.

"I've almost lost my mind," he said, patting his forehead, the heat of the midday sun rippling from the muddy, littered pavement around him.

As a 19-year-old, Tran was one of thousands of Vietnamese who escaped their war-ravaged homeland to take permanent asylum in the somewhat familiar heat and fecundity of the reclaimed wetlands in New Orleans' eastern reaches. There they'd established a largely self-sufficient Southeast Asian community superimposed on a typical American suburb of tract houses, modest yards and chain-link fences.

"I feel the same thing as then," he said. "I have to start at the beginning, just like when I came here in 1975."

A fishy smell filled the air from the nearby bayou, which had returned to its banks only days before. The staccato pulse of helicopter blades could be heard in the distance. The streets of the neighborhood were almost completely vacant, except for a rare passing car with wide-eyed occupants inspecting what the flood had left behind.

Tran had not abandoned his neighborhood and business easily. He drove through the limb-strewn streets while Katrina's winds still wailed. He forded the same streets as the tide rose, leaving only when the waist-deep water threatened to drown the engine of his Ford pickup. Now he was among the very first to steal back in for a peek. He said he believes that many of his Vietnamese neighbors will return.

"The young people are gone, he said. "The old people, yes, they'll come back for the church."

He was referring to Mary Queen of Vietnam Church on Dwyer Boulevard a few blocks away, a modern sheet-metal structure adorned with subtle Asian motifs, but with part of its roof torn away and dropped like a shed snakeskin in the adjacent parking lot.

"Now I have to go back to Dallas to see what to do next," he said.

Unexpectedly, Tran went to the back of his truck, returning with cold Cokes to share.

Inside the truck's large cab, two of Tran's employees, Willie Watson, 56, and Michael McKinley, 22, waited somewhat impatiently, dust masks pasted to their foreheads with sweat. In the front seat sat Phat Quach, 26, introduced as Tran's daughter's boyfriend, a newly minted Xavier University pharmacist.

The next and last stop on Tran's expedition was Quach's house, a mile away down Chef Highway on a short cul-de-sac that was no longer marked with street signs.

The modest low-slung ranch house had one of the now-familiar rescue schematics spray- painted on the door, a crossed circle indicating no one was found inside, dated 9-10. The house had taken in a foot of water that drew a greasy brown tidemark around the inside of the living room. The floor was slick with mud, the walls polka-dotted with quarter-sized mold colonies. Scenes of Vietnam's long-ago war with China and da Vinci's "Last Supper," rendered in mother of pearl, shared the wall with formal, old-world, family photos.

"I just kind of expected it," Quach said of his musty, waterlogged home. "But it's just now hitting me that it's real. You have to step into your house and see it for yourself."

Quach was most interested in retrieving two articles. The first was a sheaf of papers including the permits and licenses for the pharmacy he and Tran were on the brink of opening in Mid-City when the storm struck.

"We were going to open in October," he said, a faint smile of pride, or perhaps irony, lighting his face as he handed the documents to Tran for safekeeping.

"I work 365 days," said Tran, standing in the doorway. "I never close. In the evening I go fishing for a couple of hours. I go home and have a couple of beers and go to bed and get up again every day."

"He's a good boss," Watson said. McKinley nodded in agreement. "But it's going to be a long while before we're back. Just look at the place."

Quach clutched the other object he hoped to salvage, a suit he said he'd recently paid $1,000 for, stored in a now-dripping vinyl carrying bag. No one stated the obvious, that the suit was a lost cause.

Unexpectedly, there was the sound of another vehicle on the road and a heavily accented voice called out to Tran's party.

Three police offers had arrived, parking their black pickup across the driveway, trapping Tran's vehicle. One wore an NOPD T-shirt. The other two, a man and woman, wore black and khaki combat gear, complete with flak jackets, spare clips and leather-sheathed gear clustered on their belts. He carried an assault rifle with sniper scope; she, a bulky pistol.

Special Agents Kim Wright and Manual Noudewo, accompanied by officer Douglas McGowan, were on looter patrol. They politely asked for ID, never assuming a threatening posture – never needing to. In their regular life, they said, they are Drug Enforcement Administration officers in Miami. Agent Noudewo, with the distinct accent, was born in Cameroon.

Once the IDs were produced, the officers chatted for a few minutes with Tran's expedition party. "It's the bad luck of our people," Tran said, explaining his belief that every 30 years the Vietnamese have been forced to leave behind one life for another. In 1945 they escaped Japanese occupation; in 1975 they fled the communist takeover; now it's Katrina.

His father, he said, had seen it all, but since he is now in his 80s, Katrina will probably be the old man's last exodus.

Heading back to the black pickup, Wright said, "Whatever doesn't kill you makes you stronger."

"You'll get it, you'll get it," Watson said reassuringly as Tran and the others stepped to the Ford, preparing for the long trip to their temporary home. "You're a businessman; you've seen hard times."

REBUILD, from A-1

neighborhoods endured some of the most damaging flood waters and whose low incomes hinder their return.

Reaching agreement on how to rebuild New Orleans won't be easy. Nagin's effort already has run up against a Louisiana political environment rife with historical divisions and turf wars. The city's initiative also will face a headstrong wave of federal aid and free-market forces that will play a role in making or breaking a new grand plan, whatever it turns out to be.

"We can talk in the abstract about what a rebuilt New Orleans would look like," said Jim Schwab, senior research associate with the American Planning Association. "In the end that is not going to matter nearly as much, I hope, as what the people of the region themselves decide they want."

And while critics from across the political spectrum darkly warn about the dangers of "social engineering" as a strategy for rebuilding the region, costs, safety issues and what insurance companies are willing to underwrite may be the determining factor in many decisions.

Urban planners who have studied the history of communities struck by disaster recommend they begin by building a consensus about what they want to preserve and create, Schwab said. But Katrina makes that job especially difficult.

"Every time you've done it before, you still had people in the community," Schwab said.

In Dallas alone, as the mayor's group met, thousands of evacuated citizens from New Orleans filled shelters and hotels, including about 2,000 people being placed there in federally subsidized housing. Nagin was in Dallas primarily to rent a place for his family and to settle his children into school until they can re-enroll in a New Orleans school.

Marsalis and others participating in the Dallas meeting predicted that if the diverse peoples of New Orleans do not return, its distinctive neighborhoods, musical inspirations and culinary traditions probably won't, either.

Confusion, hard feelings

The Dallas meeting was an early lesson in the difficulties facing those who seek a consensus on a plan for the future. It quickly ignited a controversy and led to miscommunication and hard feelings among some political leaders.

One of its organizers was Nagin's Regional Transportation Authority chief, Jimmy Reiss, a white businessman who was quoted that week in the Wall Street Journal saying that some people who want to rebuild the city foresee a town with a new demographic of fewer poor people. To some in the city, the story painted an impression of an elitist cadre of white New Orleans leaders callous to the plight of the city's poor.

"It was an extremely unfortunate article," said Bill Hines, a lawyer and leader of the economic development group Greater New Orleans Inc. who attended the Dallas meeting.

The story enraged a number of black state lawmakers and New Orleans City Council members, including Council President Oliver Thomas, state Rep. Cedric Richmond, D-New Orleans, and Sen. Diana Bajoie, both D-New Orleans, who confronted Nagin in a public meeting Sept. 12 at the state Capitol. As the legislative hearing room gained the air of a formal inquiry, Nagin responded sharply that he had no such intention and said he had made that point clear at the Dallas gathering.

"So don't worry about this city being hijacked by a small group of people who are trying to take us backward," said Nagin, who is black.

Reiss, contacted at his home in Aspen, Colo., would not comment. In a letter to The Times Picayune, he said, "there was no selfish politics, no parochial goals" at the Dallas meeting. "We all shared the same objective: Make New Orleans a prosperous city that provided jobs and a high quality of life for all of its citizens, and preserving the diverse cultural and ethnic heritage that makes us special."

Some of those who joined the Dallas meeting, which lasted several hours, said it was positive and unified, and that Nagin persuasively articulated his dream for a prosperous city. In addition to Marsalis, there were other African-Americans who participated, including Entergy New Orleans chief Dan Packer, who is the board chairman of the Louis Armstrong International Airport, businessman David White and state Sen. Derrick Shepherd, D-Marrero.

Still, the event fed Nagin's reputation as an aloof leader indebted to the white business establishment that helped elect him. Nagin himself is a businessman with no experience in elected office. Few have forgotten that Nagin, a Democrat, endorsed conservative Republican Bobby Jindal in the 2003 governor's race over Kathleen Blanco, the Democrat who won.

He also has strained relations with council members and the black legislative delegation from New Orleans, many of whom feel shut out by his administration, especially in this time of crisis. Those same people were unaware of the Dallas meeting until it was over.

"You don't need to fight these battles by yourself," Thomas told Nagin at the hearing.

"You may have done it that way in the past," state Rep. Karen Carter, D-New Orleans, told Nagin. "But you don't have to do it that way in the future."

Nagin explained that he had been dealing with urgent and stressful conditions hampered by dysfunctional communication systems. He made his mea culpa and announced he would appoint a racially balanced task force dedicated to planning the city's revival. He was adamant that New Orleanians, not state or federal officials, will determine the new plan for New Orleans.

Limited local leadership

Bernie Pinsonat, a consultant with Southern Media & Opinion Research in Baton Rouge, said the public perceives the Katrina political landscape as devoid of outstanding leadership from the president on down.

"Louisiana produced no Giuliani figures for the rest of the country," Pinsonat said, referring to former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani's much-lauded handling of the 2001 terrorist attacks on his city.

Leadership is critical to the recovery process, and Nagin seems determined to emerge as the one setting the agenda for the future.

But the city has long been limited in determining its own affairs and revenue base. For example, state commissions own the Superdome and the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, and the Legislature ultimately decides how much room tax New Orleans hotels will charge to pay for the buildings. The state, represented by the governor, is the primary negotiator in deals with the New Orleans Saints. Local sales and property taxes are capped by state law.

The city's public housing authority, which has temporarily moved to Houston, is under the control of the federal Department of Housing and Urban Development because of past financial problems. Financing for future public housing projects will depend largely on the impetus of the federal agency.

Last week, the state Bond Commission, acting on a request that preceded Katrina, approved a federally backed $49 million financing package to continue a redevelopment program for three of the city's major public housing developments, one of which was severely flooded. It won't matter if people don't come back to occupy the apartments; the financing is not based on occupancy.

One senator on the commission questioned whether the panel was moving too fast considering the many unknowns about New Orleans' public housing scene. But the commission decided it was better to have the money in the pipeline than to derail the projects while waiting for a grand new plan.

The federal government has its own recovery agenda, announced by Bush last week, and it plans to contribute billions of dollars. There has been much talk about the possible appointment of a federal tsar for the recovery effort.

Federal Emergency Management Agency money for the city will pass through state agencies. It remains to be seen whether state or federal authorities will interfere or attempt to dictate the city's plan.

Blanco wrote President Bush this week requesting that federal dollars cover 100 percent of the cost for Katrina recovery, and lawmakers at the state Capitol last week were nearly universal in their expectation that federal money would take care of New Orleans, leaving state budgets to continue providing the same services and projects elsewhere in Louisiana.

Late last week, Nagin spent considerable time building political allies and staking out a national media presence to put a confident face on the daunting recovery effort. Now out of crisis mode, he can spend more time on the future.

"We have a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to rebuild the greatest city in the world," Nagin said. "It's been a wild ride, and we're getting ready to get on another wild ride."

MOMMA'S MISSION

Amid the devastation of Hurricane Katrina, one woman stayed behind with a simple goal: to take care of those who need it the most

STAFF PHOTOS BY TED JACKSON

Activist 'Momma D,' center, tries to get a laugh out of Jim Osborne, one of the Treme residents she checks on daily. Another resident who stayed in Treme through Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath is Debra Allison, in the wheelchair at left.

By Trymaine D. Lee
Staff writer

Diane "Momma D" Frenchcoat rises early each morning and pushes a cart of food and supplies through the sludge-spoiled streets of Treme and the 7th Ward.

She delivers food and hope for the hungry. She serves the delusional and dejected, the junkies and the flood survivors who have remained in the city despite its mass evacuation.

Each day, she pushes her cart up and down Esplanade Avenue and Dorgenois, Aubry and North Tonti streets, calling to those too ill or too old or too stubborn to leave the neighborhoods that they've loved for so long.

"You need something to eat?" Frenchcoat yelled to a skinny, shirtless man perched in a second-floor window of a home on Esplanade near Treme Street, earlier this week. "You hungry? You want some food?"

The man peered down from his post to the mud-crusted block below and responded with silence.

"You need some food, baby?" Frenchcoat hollered again.

The man stood there for a moment then vanished into the darkness.

"So many of them are scared to come out of their homes. But they're hungry, I know they are. So, I just come by every day and let them get used to my voice and hope they come out."

She marches on each day, up and down Treme and St. Philip and St. Ann streets calling out to the frail and the frightened, to those who shudder at the sounds of the military machines grinding on their blocks or hovering above their humbled homes.

Her cart is usually packed with baby formula, deodorant, canned soup and sandwiches. Some of it has been "liberated" from local groceries, she said, where it would have gone to waste in the wake of the hurricane and flood. Some had been given to her by out-of-state soldiers sympathetic to her cause.

"I can't think of a better gift in the face of this tragedy than Momma D," said Lt. Ken Noack, 24, of the 82nd Airborne out of Ft. Bragg in North Carolina. "She's just the sweetest woman."

Noack and his men piled out of a military vehicle Wednesday onto Dorgenois Street, bearing bags of ice.

"With this city being so sad right now, to see her so willing to help brings smiles to our faces," he said, "the only ones we've had in two weeks."

Noack said Momma D has helped them find dozens of people in need of help who otherwise might never gotten attention.

Frenchcoat said she has too much work ahead of her to leave the city. And she said she won't be forced out either. Not by New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, not by New Orleans Police Superintendent Eddie Compass and not by any other official pressing people to leave their homes.

"This is me. This is my home," she said, pointing to the brown gravel beneath her feet Wednesday. "This is me to the bone.

"Why would I leave now?," she said. "Why would I leave my people when so many of them are still here, suffering."

Her graying dreadlocks flowed down the nape of her neck, spilling over her sturdy, sloping shoulders as she spoke of a city she hopes will be reborn from the loins of her people.

Momma D has a loyal following of community activists working to help stabilize Treme from the grassroots up. They've stayed behind to help their people, their neighbors and themselves.

They call themselves the Soul Patrol, a loosely organized group led by Momma D. The Soul Patrol was on the front lines battling the floods and the hunger following Hurricane Katrina.

In the midst of the crisis, Soul Patrol members said they were about 30 strong. As time went on, the numbers dwindled. Tragedy gripped a few, some losing family members, others physically and mentally worn down.

"I ain't going nowhere," said Soul Patrol member Earl Barthe, 45. "I'm the son of a bricklayer. I'm ready to cut some sheetrock, lay some block, anything to rebuild the city."

Diane Frenchcoat, known on the streets as 'Momma D,' calls for people still living in Treme, so she can supply food and water to the flood survivors remaining in the neighborhood.

Lt. Ken Noack of the 82nd Airborne greets Diane 'Momma D' Frenchcoat as they make their rounds. 'I can't think of a better gift in the face of this tragedy than Momma D,' Noack said.

Members of the Soul Patrol said they "liberated" nearby McDonogh Elementary 42, where they evacuated hundreds of area residents during the flooding. The fire department then shipped the residents to the Superdome and Interstate 10, said Manuel Mercadel, 48.

"We had facilities there, dry land and a roof for those people," Mercadel said.

Mercadel said Frenchcoat has been an inspiration to the entire movement. She's been like a big sister who always has your back and treats everyone as an equal, he said.

"How can the city demand that we evacuate our homes but then have thousands of people from across this country volunteering to do the things that we can do ourselves?"

DIANE "MOMMA D" FRENCHCOAT
Treme resident

"She has a love affair with this city," said Jerome Smith, 64, a fellow activist and friend who said he's known Momma D since the early 1960s. "A love affair that she's had for a very long time."

Last week, Smith went looking for Frenchcoat to coax her out of New Orleans to a shelter in Texas. Smith said he had wanted to use her clout to organize the now evacuated young men from the community and prepare them to re-enter the city as a productive work force.

Smith called on Compass to help him find Frenchcoat.

Compass, who did not support the idea of residents remaining in the city for any reason, extended the police resources to get Momma D.

Smith and a convoy rolled down Esplanade, where the sight of a short woman in dreadlocks and bright yellow waders brought a smile to Smith's face.

The two activists met in the middle of the road, embraced and exchanged notes. The pair huddled and whispered.

Momma D had a plan.

"Rescue. Return. Restore," she said, each word seeming to freeze from her lips and hang before falling into the other.

"Can you here what I'm saying, baby? Listen to those words again," she said, leaning closer.

"Rescue, return, restore. We want the young, able-bodied men who are still here to stay to help those in need. And the ones that have been evacuated, we want them to come home and help clean up and rebuild this city. How can the city demand that we evacuate our homes but then have thousands of people from across this country volunteering to do the things that we can do ourselves?"

Pope's last words: 'Let me go to the house of the Father'

Vatican issues tome detailing final days

By Frances D Emilio
Associated Press writer

VATICAN CITY — Struggling to swallow and breathe, Pope John Paul II mumbled his final words weakly in Polish: "Let me go to the house of the Father." Six hours later, the comatose pontiff died, the Vatican says.

The account of John Paul's final hours appears in a meticulously detailed official report on his last weeks just released by the Vatican in what might be an effort to ward off any doubts about how forthcoming it has been about his illness and April 2 death.

There was much speculation in past decades about how some pontiffs died and what caused their end.

John Paul I's brief tenure of 33 days as pope in 1978 spawned conspiracy theories that he did not die naturally in his bed, as the Vatican said. Some wondered whether the pope might have been killed because he had information about an Italian banking scandal in which the Holy See's bank was later found to be involved.

While no one has publicly suggested anything amiss about John Paul II's final hours, the Vatican said nothing for years when it was apparent to observers that the globe-trotting, widely beloved pontiff was suffering the symptoms of Parkinson's disease.

The Vatican already revealed many of the details in the new report, but the 220-page volume provides more description of John Paul II's decline. It went on sale at the Vatican in recent days, the Holy See's publishing house, Libreria Editrice Vaticana, said Saturday.

The book, published as a supplement to the Vatican's official journal, has entries in chronological order, starting with Jan. 31, the day the Vatican's press office announced that the pope's audiences were being suspended because he had flu symptoms.

It chronicles John Paul II's symptoms, care and response to treatment during two hospitalizations and then during his last days in his Vatican City apartment.

After the second hospitalization, which included Feb. 24 throat surgery to insert a breathing tube, John Paul's convalescence was hampered by "very difficult swallowing," laborious attempts to utter words, "nutritional deficit and marked weakness," the account says.

Swallowing and breathing problems were consequences of the progression of Parkinson's disease, which the 84-year-old pope suffered from for years, doctors have said.

Six hours before his death, John Paul said in Polish, "with a very weak voice and with mumbled words, 'Let me go to the house of the Father,'" the report said.

The official account is quite close to one offered last month by John Paul's longtime personal secretary, now Krakow Archbishop Stanislaw Dziwisz. He told an Italian TV interviewer that a nun who was near the pontiff heard him say: "Let me go to the Lord."

Media accounts published at the time of John Paul's death said he looked toward the apartment window and whispered "Amen." The Rome newspaper La Repubblica quoted a Polish priest, Jarek Cielecki, as saying the pope died "an instant" after he made a great effort to say, "Amen."

The Holy See's new book said the pope's longtime physician, Renato Buzzonetti, declared John Paul dead after running an electrocardiogram for more than 20 minutes, "according to Vatican rules."

Thousands of faithful had gathered to pray aloud and keep vigil in St. Peter's Square below the apartment in the days before his death. Dziwisz said last month that John Paul heard the crowd and their prayers.

According to the Vatican account, the pope uttered his final words at 3:30 p.m. "A little before 7 p.m., he went into a coma," it said.

"According to a Polish tradition, a small, lit candle illuminated the twilight of the room, where the pope was expiring," the account said.

Shortly after the pope died, the Vatican press office announced the time of death as 9:37 p.m.

The account is particularly elaborate about John Paul's turn for the worse on the morning of March 31 at his private chapel when he was "hit by a shaking chill, followed by a sharp rise in temperature" to about 103.

"Then very grave septic shock set in, with cardio-circulatory collapse, due to a diagnosed infection of the urinary tract," the account said.

"The explicit desire of the pope to stay in his apartment was respected," it said of the decision not to hospitalize the pope despite his deteriorating condition.

The Vatican account describes the pontiff as experiencing various levels of participation in what was going on around him.

John Paul's eyes were practically closed during a Mass celebrated at the foot of his bed in the late afternoon of March 31, the account said.

"But at the moment of the consecration, he weakly raised his right hand two times, that is, on the (raising up) of the bread and wine. He made a gesture indicating he was trying to strike his chest during the recitation" of the Lamb of God prayer, the Vatican said.

Jefferson Parish springs back to life

Residents return, businesses reopen

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

Backing away from a phased return order that had stretched through next Wednesday, Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard announced that all Jefferson Parish residents are welcome to return this weekend.

"He feels the parish has come back enough," said Walter Maestri, the parish's Director of Emergency Management. "That was his commitment that he could bring more and more people in as the infrastructure would admit."

Maestri estimated Saturday that about 75 percent of electricity and sewerage is working in the parish. But he said the hardest-hit areas of Old Metairie, Bucktown and Terrytown remain without those services. Parish officials say about 65 percent to 70 percent of the parish's residents have already returned.

Beginning Monday at 5 a.m., residents will have total access to the Causeway bridge, said Causeway General Manager Robert Lambert. Previously, the commission had restricted access to emergency personnel and those with special business permits, in an effort to help adhere to the curfews enforced in various parishes, Lambert said.

But as of Monday, each parish will have to decide how it wants to handle the curfews in light of the Causeway's opening, he said. "The parish will have to enforce (curfews), not the Causeway Commission," he said.

With more and more residents arriving, Maestri said the biggest challenge facing the parish now is finding temporary housing for thousands of citizens left homeless by the storm. West Bank residents have been allowed to return, with the main problem area being Terrytown, Maestri said.

Also, the parish is lifting the restriction against recreational vehicles and trailers in driveways, as long as residents get a permit from the Jefferson Parish Department of Inspection and Code Enforcement, Maestri said. There is no charge for the permit.

He didn't have an estimate of how many businesses have reopened, but said more are springing to life every day.

"Today's the first active day," said River Ridge resident Sandra Couvillion, standing outside a McDonald's on Jefferson Highway on Saturday.

The fast-food restaurant's lobby was closed at lunchtime, but the line for drive-through stretched onto the highway.

Many businesses advertised not just that they were opening, but that workers were needed.

"We're hiring for every position," said Lowe's zone manager Dwayne Dempster, at a Veterans Memorial Boulevard location. Employees from Lowe's stores throughout the country and Lowe's vendors are helping out at New Orleans area stores, Dempster said.

In addition to the new businesses opening, there were other signs of life returning closer to normal.

In River Ridge, only the crumpled awnings and damaged signs signaled the storm that came through nearly three weeks ago.

Traffic was brisk along Jefferson Highway where the median was dotted with spray-painted signs announcing that various restaurants were open for business.

At Colonial Lanes bowling alley in Harahan, owner Chuck Ferrara threw a party for police and firefighters who hepled the city reopen. "It's just a little bit of appreciation for the people who helped get us back on our feet again," said Ferrara, as the emergency workers bowled and ate pizza.

An RTA bus that was commandeered by New Orleans evacuees to escape the city in the days after the storm is parked in front of City Hall. The dozen people on the bus weren't booked with a crime, but were brought to the evacuation center at Louis Armstrong International Airport.

"I understand why they did what they did," Police Chief Peter Dale said.

Business owners return to city

Officials stall on plan to let residents in

By Gordon Russell
Staff writer

Business owners on Saturday streamed in to four unflooded parts of New Orleans, and plans remained in place for Algiers residents to return home Monday. But city officials were taking a wait-and-see stance on whether to stay with a plan that would let some Uptown residents start returning next Wednesday, with French Quarter residents to follow a week from Monday.

Col. Terry Ebbert, the city's director of homeland security, said city officials will make a daily evaluation of progress toward restoring vital services to those neighborhoods, ranging from trash pickup to water and sewer service to electricity. "The lessons we learn this weekend will be incorporated into the next phase. We will move very carefully."

While most services have been largely restored in Algiers, east bank districts are less ready. Utility crews have been out in force, for instance, but most of the areas the city hopes to resettle soon still lacked power Friday.

Entergy New Orleans CEO Dan Packer said Friday that crews must work slowly because of the hazards left by Katrina.

"You're really asking for trouble," Packer said. "There is the potential for everything from fires to electric shock. We want to be really slow and deliberate about bringing it back. This is not a typical restoration as with some of the other tropical storms and hurricanes."

Despite good news on some fronts, Ebbert said many challenges remain.

"We're working toward some of the goals the mayor laid out," Ebbert said. But the resettlement "is going to be dependent on our ability to bring the central services back. We're faced with a very fragile infrastructure."

The city now has a functioning 911 system, Ebbert said, but it is not capable of handling the roughly 2,000 daily calls for service the city receives in normal times. A new system is on order, and officials hope to have it up by midweek.

Elaborating on plans for reopening the city, Ebbert said there would be nine primary checkpoints around the city and two major entrance points: the West Bank Expressway and Interstate 10, which is now open from the west.

The city will distribute two-page information packets to everyone entering the city. Roughly 100,000 have been printed, Nagin spokeswoman Sally Forman said.

The packets contain a list of warnings, beginning with: "The city of New Orleans remains a hazardous site."

Among other pointers, residents are being advised to bring in all the food and water they'll need, as supplies in the city are limited. For the time being, only those in Algiers will be able to drink and bathe with city water.

Ebbert also warned that a relatively minor storm, one bringing three or more inches of rain, could cause the remaining floodwaters to rise again, reflooding parts of the city. A storm with strong winds could compromise the repairs to the levee breaches as well.

Those who return will be forbidden from going into the neighborhoods outside the eight ZIP codes outlined in the plan. Asked about the potential for looting and other mayhem in the non-populated areas, Ebbert said that with thousands of soldiers and police officers in the city, keeping people out of places they shouldn't go won't be a problem.

Residents in these ZIP codes are included in the plan: 70112, 70113, 70114, 70115, 70116, 70118, 70130 and 70131.

'It's only going to get worse,' sheriff says

ST. BERNARD, from A-1

hundreds that were simply washed away in eastern St. Bernard.

On Saturday, warped doors and jammed locks forced many residents to break into their own homes.

Residents wore masks, rubber gloves and knee-high boots as they dragged moldy furniture to the curb. Soggy photo albums and other valuables were delicately placed into plastic bags.

Mary Ann Hoover, 79, insisted on personally inspecting the damage to the Friscoville Avenue home, where she has lived for more than 50 years.

"She's got things stashed away in there that only she knows how to find," said her son, Jesse Hoover.

Wearing a flowered shirt and matching slacks, Mary Ann Hoover donned a white mask and green rubber gloves. She then shuffled toward her side door past a refrigerator filled with rotten food.

"Good thing I lost my sense of smell," she said.

"What in the world is that?" she said, looking at a large mold-covered object in her darkened living room.

"That used to be your coffee table," Jesse Hoover said.

"You've got to be kidding me," she said.

Authorities have estimated that 75 percent or more of St. Bernard's homes will have to be razed.

Parish Councilman Craig Taffaro said an informal poll of residents returning to the 800-home Old Arabi neighborhood suggested that six out of 10 don't plan to rebuild.

Even so, Councilman Mark Madary, whose district includes Arabi, said he saw some encouraging signs.

"It was uplifting to see people cleaning out their homes," he said.

"The rebirth of St. Bernard depends on people coming back. And like childbirth, it ain't always going to be a pretty sight."

Carol Becnel said she can't imagine rebuilding her shotgun in the 300 block of Angela Drive, which took on precisely 36 2/3 inches of water, according to her husband's tape measure.

"I spent the first half of my life renovating this house. I'm not going to spend the rest of my life doing it all over again," she said, holding back tears. "I try not to cry because if I start, I might never stop."

Displaced from the close-knit parish where people pride themselves on looking out for each other, Becnel said she has had to rely on the kindness of strangers:

The waitress in Houma who tore up their dinner bill when she heard their house had flooded.

The woman who offered to replace the shoes Becnel bought for her son's wedding next month.

Even the postal clerk who handed her a phone book brought tears to her eyes.

STAFF PHOTOS BY CHRIS GRANGER

'I tried to prepare myself for what I might see, but I never imagined this,' said Arabi resident Susan Probst, who salvaged a picture from her wall. 'Maybe I was just trying to fool myself.'

"The rebirth of St. Bernard depends on people coming back. And like childbirth, it ain't always going to be a pretty sight."
MARK MADARY
parish councilman

"I wish I was the one being kind," she said. "I don't like being on the receiving end, but God is working through these people."

Children were conspicuously absent from Saturday's recovery efforts, which took on the feel of a reunion as neighbors spoke to one another for the first time since before the Aug. 29 storm.

For safety reasons, parish officials had urged residents to not bring their children.

Brenda Schaubhut, whose recently restored shotgun double was ruined by the storm, left her two children with friends at a Shreveport hotel.

She said they are doing well and have treated the family's evacuation, including a week at a makeshift shelter in Chalmette, as an adventure.

Mallory, 7, told her grandmother how they "got" to sleep on cardboard at the shelter. And Dylan, 5, was thrilled by the sight of helicopters buzzing over New Orleans as the family was evacuated on a crew boat up the Mississippi River to Baton Rouge.

But Schaubhut said the children's resilience is being stretched thin as the days have turned into weeks. "Dylan just about broke my heart the other day when he asked me, 'Does Santa Claus come to hotels?' " she said.

Saturday's return of Arabi residents took on the feel of a reunion as neighbors spoke to one another for the first time since before the Aug. 29 storm. About 300 carloads of residents returned to the parish Saturday to see what they could salvage.

Returnees warned about cuts, infections

St. Bernard to offer vaccinations

From staff reports

The biggest health risk for people returning to St. Bernard Parish is the possibility of accidental injuries such as cuts or infections when open wounds are exposed to foul water, Health and Hospitals Secretary Fred Cerise said.

Tetanus shots are available at entrance points to the parish for people who have not had a booster in the past 10 years, but Cerise said no other immunizations are necessary.

To protect themselves as much as possible, people returning to the parish are advised to wear long pants and long-sleeve shirts, gloves and, in areas where indoor mold is dense, masks.

People also should use mosquito repellent, beware of stray animals, drink only bottled water and use restrooms before entering the parish, health officials say.

Even though people are eager to see their homes, Cerise said older people, children and anyone with chronic health problems such as asthma, allergies or a weak immune system should not go back yet.

▶ Bush tries to seize control of National Guard troops from Blanco. She refuses.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 3

▶ Bush orders 7,000 active-duty soldiers to the region. They arrive throughout the day.

Getting 'boots on the ground' proved particularly difficult

RESPONSE, from A-1

Elsewhere in the hurricane's tailwinds, a brief sense of security swept across much of southeastern Louisiana and the nation. In the early afternoon of that Monday, it seemed, the 287-year-old city had once again been spared a direct hit by a major storm. A headline in a national press service assured, "New Orleans Weathers the Storm."

That assumption was dead wrong.

As surely as water seeks the lowest level, Katrina was about to lay bare the shortcomings of disaster plans by local, state and federal officials.

And as levees were breached around a city resting mainly below sea level, years of disaster planning gave way to finger-pointing, legal wrangling and denial that things were as bad as they clearly were – even as residents suffered through unimaginable conditions just to survive.

A million evacuate

Days before it struck, Hurricane Katrina commanded a fear and respect uncommon along the Gulf Coast, where residents are annually menaced by several hurricanes that are often false alarms and near misses.

More than 1 million people fled the region ahead of the massive storm under a new evacuation plan. Many had heeded New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's stern warning to "treat this one differently." Those left behind – some who chose to stay, others who couldn't afford to leave – were promised a shelter of "last resort" in the Superdome. Nagin said the city "planned for them to be in there for four of five days."

Amtrak offered its last train out of town Saturday night, which had room for several hundred passengers. A railroad spokesman said the city declined and the train left empty.

On Sunday, Nagin ordered the first-ever mandatory evacuation of New Orleans. Police with bullhorns combed neighborhoods for stragglers.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco also issued a mandatory evacuation and Michael Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, described "a phalanx of supplies" positioned in a semi-circle around the city ready to deploy once the storm had passed. President Bush had taken the extraordinary step Saturday of declaring a state of emergency, activating for the first time the much-vaunted National Response Plan created in the wake of the 9/11 terrorist attacks.

"We've planned for this kind of disaster for many years because we've always known about New Orleans and the situation," FEMA's Brown said on NBC's "Today" show as the hurricane made landfall. "We actually did catastrophic disaster planning for this two years ago, so we've put all of those in place. One year ago we actually did a tabletop exercise with the state of Louisiana, so they've been through this drill."

But, as Nagin had said in urging residents to evacuate, this was not a drill.

FEMA's role

His frequent public pronouncements notwithstanding, Brown clearly saw himself in a supporting role in the disaster drama. He issued a directive to FEMA employees Monday not to respond to hurricane-ravaged areas "without being requested and lawfully dispatched by state and local authorities."

The directive revealed an allegiance to bureaucratic processes that proved maddening to some as FEMA demanded written requests for food, troops and fuel. A Florida congressman said the agency turned down an offer for flat-bottomed air boats because it didn't want to sign a contract with the supplier.

Save for the Coast Guard's dramatic air rescues, a detached, legalistic approach set the tone for the federal government's response. Brown is a lawyer as is his boss, Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. And the founding document of U.S. disaster planning reads like a legal brief.

The National Response Plan is chock full of legalese, case law and statutes, but it doesn't clearly spell out something as basic as who is responsible for getting food and water to flood victims. The 426-page plan was supposed to have remedied the command-and-control problems that plagued the response to the terrorist attacks in New York City. But it's hardly a model of clarity. Its authors thought it necessary to attach an 11-page glossary of "key terms" and a three-page explanation of acronyms. On the seminal question – Who's in charge? – the Federal Response Plan is murky.

It says incidents are "typically" managed at the lowest levels of government. On the same page, however, it says that "Incidents of National Significance" put the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security in charge. The next page seems to reverse course again. It says that "Incidents of National Significance," emergencies declared by the president, puts the federal government in a supporting role to protect state sovereignty. That is, unless the president decides he wants to be in charge, in which case the governor is secondary. Under those circumstances, the plan says, the president will consult with the governor, "if practicable."

Desperate situation

Legal nuances meant little to those in the disaster zone. In many parts of New Orleans, the water was on the rise.

Three breaches in the Industrial Canal levee poured water into the Lower Ninth Ward and Bywater. Two others breaks along the London Avenue Canal sent a deluge into Gentilly. Another along the 17th Street canal levee flooded Lakeview, City Park and Mid-City. As long feared, the barriers that had been built to keep the water out were now trapping it in.

The thousands of people who hadn't evacuated scrambled to keep above the rising water. By mid-afternoon Monday along Claiborne Avenue, a man and his family could be seen peering out a window from his attic as 12 feet of water churned below. Many people were forced to cut their way through their roofs to escape the rising tide. Some were being plucked off roofs by Coast Guard helicopters or lifted into boats, both which were suddenly in short supply.

By nightfall, a helicopter pilot flying over the darkened city reported seeing dozens of flickering lights below, signals from desperate flood victims hoping for a ride. Most would spend the first night after Katrina on their roofs. Some would be there for days.

Rule of law falters

Lawlessness became the story Tuesday. Looters smashed store windows and pried open doors. Some of the looters sought food and health supplies. Others went for the big-ticket items.

New Orleans Police Chief Eddie Compass said that his 1,500 officers were too busy rescuing people to worry about looting. But some officers took more than a passing interest. At the Wal-Mart on Tchoupitoulas Street, an officer was seen loading a shopping cart with a 27-inch flat-screen television and a personal computer.

Some residents began arming themselves. Keith Williams said he began carrying a handgun in his Uptown neighborhood after seeing the body of a gunshot victim slumped on a sidewalk.

"What I want to know is why we don't have any paratroopers with machine guns on every street," Williams said.

RESPONSE, from A-21

Nowhere was the need for law and order more acute than in the Superdome. About 25,000 people had taken refuge in the domed stadium and the situation quickly deteriorated. The lights went out. The air-conditioning stopped. The plumbing failed.

Violence, deprivation and worse were widely reported inside. Thousands were trapped.

Buses that the city was to have provided to get people out had been parked on low ground and were now stuck in water. It took at least three days for Blanco and federal officials to round up enough buses and drivers to haul people out.

For the moment, Nagin remained calm. Asked whether he had enough troops to keep order, he answered: "Absolutely. There are 3,500 National Guard officers that are on their way and should be here tomorrow. So we have enough resources to get the job done."

What Nagin didn't know was that the rescuers were having problems of their own.

The National Guard staging area at Jackson Barracks had flooded, and a downed radio tower crippled communications. The water in many parts of the region was too deep to drive in trucks pulling rescue boats, yet too shallow for top-grade Coast Guard vessels.

"No one is satisfied with the response early on," said Russ Knocke of the Department of Homeland Security.

Third World scenes

By Tuesday afternoon, the enormity of the disaster was becoming clear to almost everyone. It seemed to knock officials back on their heels. After a helicopter tour, Blanco called the devastation "untenable" and "heartbreaking." FEMA's Brown predicted it would be "weeks and weeks" before people could return home.

On national television Americans watched Third World scenes play out in a beloved American city.

Viewers couldn't help but notice that the vast majority of those pleading for help from atop roofs or outside the Superdome were African-American. Some of the victims asked whether the response would have been quicker had their skin color been lighter. Although many white residents were stranded in other places outside the majority-black city, race became an undercurrent of criticism of the federal response.

On Wednesday, Bush cut short his Texas vacation and went back to Washington. On the way, he peered out over the disaster zone from Air Force One as it passed high above.

At the White House, Bush hastily convened a Cabinet meeting and appointed Chertoff to the helm of a new hurricane task force. The political master stroke, though, was the appointment of Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, a brash, media-savvy Louisiana native, as the federal government's new face in New Orleans.

The imposing three-star general barked out orders to soldiers and obliged countless reporters enthralled by his cigar-chomping style. Even Nagin was impressed, calling him "that John Wayne dude."

Assessing the federal government's response from the comfort of the Department of Homeland Security in Washington, Chertoff on Wednesday liked what he saw.

"We are extremely pleased with the response that every element of the federal government has made to this terrible tragedy," Chertoff said.

Dangerous refuge

Chertoff, he would later confess, had not yet seen what was unfolding at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center.

Thousands of people since Tuesday had begun seeking refuge in the Convention Center in the high ground along the Mississippi River. The massive halls soon became desperate scenes of deprivation.

Outside, the body of a 91-year-old man slouched in a lawn chair. His wife said he died in the back of a Ryder van during the evacuation and was deposited on the neutral ground.

Inside, there were reports of armed men from rival public housing developments in an atmosphere teeming with danger. A doctor said he saw at least four dead bodies uncovered, uncared for.

Help, it turned out, was only a few doors away. A contingent of 250 armed National Guardsmen had decamped in one of the convention halls nearby. But a Guard spokesman said that they held back attempting to quell the violence awaiting reinforcements.

Getting enough "boots on the ground" proved a difficult task in the aftermath of Katrina. Legalistic wrangling between Gov. Blanco and the White House would keep active-duty soldiers out of the disaster zone until five days after the hurricane had passed.

Blanco said she expected to see a heavy federal military presence soon after she spoke with President Bush on Sunday.

"I asked him, 'Send me everything he's got,'" she said.

But the administration said Blanco hadn't been clear on what she needed. On Wednesday, she asked for 40,000 troops. Bush administration officials say Blanco wanted active-duty soldiers, who aren't by law allowed to act as police. But, Blanco aides said she requested any combination – National Guard or regular Army – just as long as there were enough to help restore order and help in the rescue effort.

"She didn't know what she wanted or what she needed," an administration official said.

Afghan polls prepared amid violence

Rebels seek to disrupt parliamentary vote

By Steve Gutterman
Associated Press writer

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — Officials urged Afghans on Saturday to defy Taliban insurgents and powerful warlords by turning out in force for todayís landmark parliamentary elections despite a wave of rebel attacks that killed 12 more people.

Security forces reported thwarting an attempt to blow up a big dam in the south and three other bomb plots, underlining the threat to a ballot aimed at bolstering Afghanistan's fragile democracy and marginalizing insurgents after decades of bloodshed.

Top U.N. envoy Jean Arnault said militants failed to disrupt poll preparations with a surge of fighting that has killed more than 1,200 people the past six months, including seven candidates and four election workers.

"We are very confident that those extremists will also fail to disrupt and derail voting day," Arnault said at a news conference. "The Afghans will not let anyone stop them from participating in this election."

Some 12.4 million people registered to vote in Afghanistan's first parliamentary elections in more than 35 years — a span during which the country has been scarred by a Soviet invasion, a devastating civil war and the oppressive rule of the Islamic hardliners of the Taliban.

Voters also will choose 34 provincial councils.

Coming 11 months after Afghans flocked to polling places in defiance of insurgent threats and elected Hamid Karzai as president, the ballot is the last formal step in instituting a democratic system envisioned when a U.S.-led coalition drove the Taliban from power in 2001 for harboring Osama bin Laden and al-Qaida camps.

A U.S. military spokesman, Col. James Yonts, predicted "a massive number" would vote today.

"This election will send a powerful message to the Taliban that their influence is waning and that the overarching grip they've had on this country for several years is no longer there," he told The Associated Press.

The comment came a day after a Taliban call for an election boycott. Taliban fighters said they would not attack civilians going to vote but would target areas where U.S.-led coalition forces are deployed.

Militants ambushed a security patrol on the outskirts of Kabul, killing a district police chief and two officers in the first attack so close to the capital in some time, Interior Ministry spokesman Luftullah Mashal said.

"The Taliban and al-Qaida are trying their best to create problems," Mashal told AP.

Security forces aided by U.S.-led coalition troops captured 20 militants as they laid explosives trying to blow up the hulking Kajaki Dam in southern Helmand province, Defense Ministry spokesman Gen. Mohammed Saher Azimi said. Thousands of people live nearby.

Mashal said government forces also stopped planned car bombings in volatile Ghazni and Paktika provinces and a fourth bomb plot near the border with Pakistan, where two Pakistanis suspected of being Taliban members were caught with explosives.

Guerrillas ambushed a patrol on the highway linking Kabul with the southern city of Kandahar, triggering a firefight that killed seven militants, local government chief Gulam Rasool said. He said a rebel rocket set a police car on fire, but the officers escaped.

The U.S. military said it had discovered seven roadside bombs across the country.

About 100,000 Afghan police and soldiers and 30,000 foreign troops were on alert to guard the election. In Kandahar, the former Taliban stronghold, all vehicles were banned from driving after midday Saturday due to car bomb fears.

In Pakistan, thousands of soldiers stood by near the border with Afghanistan. Militants based on the Pakistani side of the mountainous frontier are believed to cross into Afghanistan to stage attacks.

Amid the violence and concerns about voters being pressured by local warlords, the chairman of the Afghan-U.N. electoral body, Bismillah Bismil, assured voters their ballots would be secret.

"Do not be intimidated or frightened by the empty threats of those who attempt to influence your vote," he said.

Arnault, the U.N. envoy, hailed the election as a victory over violence.

"We are seeing today an unmistakable confirmation that there is in the country the emergence of a new political culture," he said. "A sense that the legacy of the rule of the gun can be resisted is now taking root."

Car bomb kills 30 outside Baghdad

Sectarian slayings surge in 'all-out war'

By Steven R. Hurst
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Four days after al-Qaida in Iraq declared all-out war on the Shiite majority, more than 250 people have been killed, 30 of them by a car bomb Saturday outside a produce market in a poor Shiite suburb east of Baghdad. The blast underlined one of the bloodiest weeks since the U.S.-led invasion.

In all, at least 52 people were killed or found dead throughout the country Saturday, victims of mounting sectarian killings promised by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian-born leader of the terrorist organization and a moving force behind the Sunni-dominated insurgency.

After a suicide car bomber exploded his vehicle Wednesday in the midst of assembled day laborers in a largely Shiite neighborhood in north Baghdad, an audio tape posted on the Internet that claimed to be from al-Zarqawi announced "all-out war against Shiites everywhere. Beware; there will be no mercy."

The death toll from at least 14 bombings Wednesday was 167, marking the worst day of violence in the capital since U.S. troops invaded and overthrew Saddam Hussein 2.5 years ago.

In Saturday's remote-controlled car bombing, Interior Ministry police Maj. Falah al-Mhamadawi said the vehicle was parked in front of fruit and vegetable stands in the market at Nahrawan, about 20 miles east of Baghdad.

Victims were taken to Baghdad's al-Kindi hospital in pickup trucks and minivans, police Lt. Abdulal Ibrahim said.

Some of the wounded - including those who lost limbs - lay bleeding on the hospital grounds.

"I came with my brother Hamid, whose right leg was blown off below the knee," Alaa Mohammed said outside the hospital. "I saw neighbors putting him in a truck so I just jumped in with him."

Shiites have suffered the brunt of a massive campaign of bomb and shooting attacks, which al-Zarqawi said would continue against "any of (Iraq's) national guards, police or army (who are found to be) agents of the crusaders (American forces). They will be killed and his house will be demolished or burned - after evacuating all women and children."

But as the indiscriminate bombings continued into the weekend, the majority of the dead were Shiite civilians, prompting Islamic clerics from both the Sunni and Shiite sects to call for an end to the killing of innocent people.

"I call for a meeting ... of all the country's religious and political leaders to take a stand against the bloodshed," Sheik Mahmud al-Sumaidaei said during his Friday sermon at Baghdad's Um al Qura Sunni mosque.

"We don't need others to come across the border and kill us in the name of defending us," he declared, a reference to foreign fighters who have joined the insurgency under the banner of al-Qaida. "We reject the killing of any Iraqi."

Throughout Iraq on Saturday, police reported finding 16 bodies that were blindfolded, bound hand and foot, and shot. Two other people died in bomb attacks and four more were killed in shootings.

The bombing campaign, al-Zarqawi said, was launched in retaliation for a joint Iraqi-U.S. operation that chased his fighters and other insurgents out of their stronghold in the northern city of Tal Afar, near the Syrian border. Hundreds of insurgents reportedly were killed or captured.

The incessant attacks since Wednesday also have blunted the Iraqi military's ability to gain broader recognition for what, by all accounts, was a highly successful operation - the first in which Iraqi forces outnumbered Americans.

Earlier this week, the U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad said the spasm of violence was to have been expected after the operation in Tal Afar and before the Oct. 15 referendum on a new Iraqi constitution.

"These spikes of violence are predictable around certain critical events that highlight the progress of democracy," Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said.

"Remember, democracy equals failure for the insurgency. So there has to be heightened awareness now as we work our way toward the referendum. That's power, that's movement toward democracy."

Also Saturday, a suicide car bomber attacked a U.S. convoy near Abu Ghraib prison west of Baghdad, destroying three vehicles, and insurgents shelled the notorious lockup with seven mortar rounds, police Lt. Alaa Hussein said.

In the same area, he reported, insurgents fired rocket-propelled grenades at a second U.S. convoy, damaging three armored vehicles.

The U.S. military issued no immediate casualty reports in any of the incidents.

Abu Ghraib was scene of the torture and execution of countless political prisoners under Saddam and of serious prisoner abuse by American forces after they toppled the dictator.

SHEILA STROUP

Getting back in the saddle

Sharon Diebold never intended to leave her home in Violet, never intended to abandon her beloved horse Casey, her pygmy goat Pepper, or her collection of rescued animals.

But when she heard Katrina was a Category 5 hurricane headed toward St. Bernard Parish, she changed her mind.

"I asked myself, 'Do you want to live or die?' In my heart, I knew I had to go," she said.

She loaded her four rescued dogs in her 15-year-old pickup, turned Casey, Pepper and the other animals loose, and headed for western St. Tammany Parish, where Howard Austin and his family had offered her a place to stay.

Before leaving, she handed over her air-conditioned car to neighbors so they could evacuate their disabled son to Florida.

"I thought, 'Even if I can't save my horse, I can save this family,' " she said.

Waiting on news

It was hard to leave Casey behind.

Sharon, 45, had owned the Tennessee walker for 15 years and loved her every one of them. The gentle horse had seen Sharon through the loss of her mother and her brother. She'd been a lifeline during times of tragedy.

"I knew Casey depended on me, and I walked away, knowing I had let her down," she said.

Sharon sat out the hurricane with her friends, the Austins, who let her know she had a place to stay as long as she needed one.

"I've known them since I was a little girl," she said. "Howard always said I was his adopted daughter, and now I know he meant it."

Most news from her home on Farmsite Road has not been good: a tree through Casey's barn, five feet of water in the house her parents bought 40 years ago, everything she left behind ruined.

"My family pictures are floating in St. Bernard Parish," she said.

A reunion

One piece of news made up for the rest, though.

Ten days after the hurricane, Sharon learned that three horses had been rescued from Farmsite Road and taken to the Lamar-Dixon Expo Center in Gonzales, where pets separated from their families are being sheltered.

"I had so much faith I took a horse trailer when I went to look for her," Sharon said.

She searched for two hours among the 300 horses, but no Casey. She was crying as she made her way past stall after stall, about to give up, when suddenly, there was her chestnut mare. She was 200 pounds lighter, but it was Casey.

"And when I went in the stall, my little goat Pepper was there by the door," Sharon said.

Casey is staying in a portable pen on a piece of property Sharon happened to buy April 15. It's only two miles from the Austins' house, so they're spending lots of time together.

Sharon isn't sure what the future holds, but she knows one thing.

"Three weeks with no makeup and no home, but I'm doing fine," she said. "I got my girl back. I will recover."

Colleges to seek billions in federal aid

Officials hope influx strengthens systems

A tattered American flag was tacked to a thin plank of wood just inside the door of Delgado Community College's main administration building, a hurricane relic that soldiers from the Oregon National Guard plucked from a tangle of storm debris.

The shredded flag could serve to symbolize the blow suffered by several campuses that are beginning to restore crippled physical plants. Preliminary assessments of damage to campus buildings, equipment and lab materials has set the stage for a historic request of as much as $5 billion in federal aid.

Louisiana Commissioner of Higher Education Joseph Savoie said Saturday that congressional staffers are working out the details but that the request should be introduced in Congress as soon as Monday. Savoie said the total is "subject to all sorts of strategic decisions they're going to have to make." In addition to rebuilding damaged buildings, the money would be used for scholarships, faculty stabilization, economic development and to restore damaged research, Savoie said.

To fine-tune the damage assessment, "we're hoping to have people on site this week looking at all those campuses," Savoie said.

But in interesting ways, despair over the havoc wrought among institutions so important to New Orleans' economy and culture is giving way to optimism that the storm may have provided an opportunity. College and university leaders meeting regularly in Baton Rouge as part of the higher education response team have begun talking about how wise use of federal aid could ultimately

Thousands of minnows lie dead in the street in St. Bernard Parish. An estimated 4,800 commercial fishers from St. Tammany, Jefferson, Orleans, St. Bernard, Plaquemines and Lafourche parishes took a beating from Katrina, and hundreds more were affected in Mississippi and Alabama.

Hopedale oyster farmer Charles "Charlo" Inabnet lost it all with Katrina — his home, his car, his boat — even his teeth.

Inabnet, 58, watched as the storm ripped away all he had labored for in the marshes and bayous of St. Bernard Parish. Winds of 130 miles an hour flattened his house. Floodwaters submerged one of his cars. The tidal surge left his oyster boat, the Captain John J, stranded on high ground, its cabin ripped off and lost. Displaced mud covered his oyster leases on the bottom of Turkey Bayou, probably suffocating thousands of pounds of oysters ready for harvest. And Inabnet said he spit out his dentures to make breathing easier as he swam in the 20-foot surge that overtook him near his house.

"I started praying the Hail Mary," he said between drags on a Liggett Select cigarette tucked between his toothless gums. "I duct-taped my driver's license to my leg in case I did not make it."

Heaped on top of the myriad troubles that already had hobbled the fishing industry – increasing foreign competition, high fuel prices and ever-tighter government rules— analysts say that despite Louisianians' best intentions to rebuild, Katrina's punch is likely to push Inabnet and thousands of other fishers out of the trade altogether. In Louisiana, that would put a

Ban on fishing in lake sought

Federal officials concerned about pollution in water

By Matthew Brown
West Bank bureau

Federal health officials have asked Louisiana to put a ban on all fishing in Lake Pontchartrain until fish, crustaceans and other marine life can be tested to ensure that polluted floodwaters being pumped out of New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish have not turned the lake's seafood into a health hazard.

The request comes as Louisiana's battered seafood industry is struggling to reassure consumers that its products are unlikely to be tainted by the 225 billion gallons of water being pumped out of New Orleans. Those waters are a "toxic stew" of sewage, petrochemicals and other pollutants.

"The FDA would like to see the state take action to put a preventative closure in place," said Donald Kraemer, acting director of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration's Office of Seafood. "Obviously there's pain associated with a closure like that. From a public health standpoint, it's a necessary action."

But others say the FDA's request could further undermine public confidence in Louisiana seafood, already shaken by images of fouled water being dumped into Lake

Residents of Old Metairie shocked by flooding

Mess is worse 'than you think'

By Bob Ross
East Jefferson bureau

Anne Hebert Winston tried several times in the past couple of weeks to reach her mother's home in Old Metairie. But the high water that stubbornly engulfed much of the area, even as other sections of East Jefferson dried out, were too much to overcome.

Winston and her husband finally arrived Wednesday at the 500 block of Rosewood Drive, just south of the railroad tracks and almost halfway between Metairie Road and Airline Drive.

"It was shocking," she said of that first walk into the three-bedroom, two-bathroom home where she grew up. "You always think your house is going to be sealed up tight. But it wasn't."

Though it is raised, the 1,700-square-foot house took on 2 feet of water, and the water had its way with the possessions of Winston's mother and grandmother.

"All the furniture floats around, and the chairs are turned over, and it just looks like it has been ransacked," Winston said. Green mold grows on some of the furniture, "and it looks like science experiments all over the place."

Winston's mother lived in one of the sections of East Jefferson that had the deepest flooding after Hurricane Katrina passed Aug. 29. Although many east bank neighborhoods dried quickly, a swath from Severn Avenue to the 17th Street Canal, between Metairie Road and Airline Drive, still held water in the streets, and some houses, until only recently.

Alan Hebert, who came with his wife from Wichita Falls, Texas, to help, said the extent of water damage staggered him.

"There is no such thing as cleaning up," he said. "You just extract the things you can find, the memories. Everything is gone from the waist down in there."

sharp dent in a $3-billion-a-year industry, and deliver a profound blow to the state's vibrant coastal culture.

Yet many who have spent much or all of their adult lives trapping crabs, netting shrimp, farming oysters or hooking red snapper are stubbornly pledging to return. It may take years to rebuild, they say, but it's the only life they know — a life that had treated Inabnet well. He said he earned enough to buy a 50-foot boat, two cars and a shotgun-style house and to put his daughter through college.

"I've been in oysters for 36 years. I've got a seventh-grade education. Who the hell wants me?" he said. "As a fisherman, I make meals for my fellow human beings. That's what I know."

An estimated 4,800 commercial fishers from St. Tammany, Jefferson, Orleans, St. Bernard, Plaquemines and Lafourche parishes took a beating from Katrina, and hundreds more were affected in Mississippi and Alabama.

Many not only lost their property but also no longer have access to ice houses, fuel docks, processing sheds, seafood dealers and restaurants that were the backbone of the industry. Legendary fishing villages such as Venice, Buras, Empire, Yscloskey and Delacroix in southern parts of St. Bernard and Plaquemines are now a jumble of overturned boats, tattered marinas and clogged canals.

The economic toll in Louisiana alone is expected to top $1.1 billion in retail sales over the next year. Losses to the oyster industry, which took the biggest pounding, are expected to continue to rack up an additional $148 million per year, possibly through 2008.

Yet with the exception of oysters, the fish themselves are expected to bounce back, state and federal management officials said.

Shrimp and crabs have a one-year life cycle, so even if they took a significant hit, a new generation would be right on its heels. Red snapper, tuna, amberjack and other deep-water species live far enough out in the Gulf of Mexico that they probably had a chance to move out of the storm's path, said Roy Crabtree, regional administrator for the National Marine Fisheries Service, a branch of the U.S. Commerce Department.

"If you look at past hurricanes and storms like this, it's the humans and the infrastructure that take a while to come back. Mother Nature kind of rolls with the punches," Crabtree said.

But oysters face a grim assessment. Rooted to the bottom of marshes, the shellfish could not escape from the storm or relocate when mud and sediment blanketed vast areas of oyster reefs, said John Roussel with the state Department of Wildlife and Fisheries.

An estimated 81,200 acres of reefs were affected, with some experiencing mud up to two or three feet deep, Roussel said. Inabnet said he expects to salvage little from his 1,100 acres of reefs that he spent years building up to prime productivity.

The price tag for rebuilding all ruined reefs from scratch could top $860 million, according to the state's preliminary damage assessment. It remains unclear who might pick up such a bill.

Even if the oyster farmers bounce back, their product still may suffer from an image problem. Concern over petrochemical spills and the pumping of toxic floodwaters from New Orleans into Lake Pontchartrain led the state on Aug. 30 to close all oyster beds between the Mississippi state line and Timbalier Bay west of Grand Isle.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration has asked the state to extend that moratorium to cover all fishing in Lake Pontchartrain. No action has been taken on the FDA's request. Pollution is considered less of a problem for other species. But A.J. Fabre, president of the Louisiana Shrimp Association, said having healthy shrimp means little if you can't sell them.

"You put money into a shrimp boat, that's fine," said Fabre. "But if the boat doesn't have anywhere to unload, if a boat doesn't have anyplace to get fuel, if a boat doesn't have anyplace to get ice, it's not going anywhere."

Also, few retail seafood sellers have reopened in the New Orleans area, one of the biggest markets in the state. At the Westwego fish stalls off the West Bank Expressway, only one of more than a dozen businesses was back in operation by the end of last week.

There were no crabs or fish for sale at Amy's Seafood Mart, only shrimp. Stall operator Sandy Theriot said the shrimp came all the way from Houma since her regular suppliers in Venice and Grand Isle are grounded. "Fresh shrimp right from Louisiana," Theriot said. "We're getting pretty good business. A lot of people said they were tired of eating beef."

In the past five years, as prices for shrimp fell in the face of competition from cheaper imported shrimp, thousands of shrimp fishers across the Gulf of Mexico docked their boats, according to Crabtree.

Yet Howard Johnson, a fishing industry consultant based in Portland, Ore., is among those who argued there were still too many boats on the water. Johnson said profits for individual fishers have been diluted by the bloated status of the fleet, and in the wake of Katrina, he sees an opportunity to fix that imbalance.

"There would seem to be an opportunity to buy these people out," he said.

But Johnson acknowledged that while his argument makes sense from a macro-economic perspective, it could be tough on individual fishers.

U.S. Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, whose coastal district includes many of the fishing villages destroyed by Katrina, said he is in discussions with federal agencies on the possibility of turning idle fishers into a legion of cleanup and recovery workers.

That promises to be a potentially tough transition for folks such as Inabnet and Plaquemines Parish shrimper Edward Wallace, 42, who spent the past four years living in Empire aboard the Instigator, a 30-foot shrimp boat Wallace built from scratch.

The boat, which was not insured, was docked at an Empire marina where dozens of boats were destroyed. Wallace said he has not been able to get down there to check on his own vessel, but expected it to be lost.

"I'll be back," Wallace said of shrimping. "I love it. I used to work with my daddy as a deckhand, since I was 14. It took me four years to build my boat, and I'll build another one if I have to. You've got to be tough to shrimp or you're not going to make it."

How Louisiana coffee is helping Louisiana schoolchildren.

Dear Neighbors,

For over 85 years Community Coffee has been a family-owned, Louisiana company with a history of giving back to the community. We appreciate the outpouring of support across Louisiana as you open your hearts to evacuees of Hurricane Katrina and your schools to their children. So we're expanding our long-running Community Cash For Schools® program to provide relief for Louisiana and other Gulf Coast schools. We are:

Donating a total of $50,000 to schools enrolling student-evacuees.

Contributing a percentage from the sale of every pound of Community® Coffee between now and December 31, 2005, up to $100,000, to help rebuild New Orleans and other Gulf Coast schools.

Providing up to $250,000 that your school can earn its share of through the Community Cash For Schools program.

Matching an additional 25% of the funds your school earns through the program to be directed towards rebuilding schools.

With your support we can begin to help restore communities affected by this tragedy.

Sincerely,

Matthew Saurage

Campuses covered by water

AID, from B-1

strengthen the institutions, Savoie said.

"There's a growing sense of opportunity; people are thinking of ways they can improve their circumstances," he said.

Last week, conditions at several campuses appeared grim. A sheen of white and brown muck marked building windows and was cracking in the sun.

Floodwaters covered two-thirds of the Tulane University's Uptown campus between Freret Street and South Claiborne Avenue, to depths of three or four feet in many places. The brackish water tossed debris about a baseball stadium that was under renovation, ruined virtually all of the university's vehicle fleet and spilled into the basement of Howard-Tilton Memorial Library, where a world-famous jazz music archive is stored, officials said. The university hired a document salvage firm, but it was unclear Saturday how much of the archive will be saved. Much of the campus was strewn with large tree limbs.

"We're going to be buying a lot of stuff," said Senior Vice President Yvette Jones. "We're moving quickly."

Floodwaters still covered most of the Southern University at New Orleans campus Wednesday, the first day anyone representing SUNO could access the property near the Lakefront to check on its condition, interim Chancellor Robert Gex said. There were reports of water as deep as 14 feet around the campus after the storm, and by Wednesday the receding water was still an inch deep in the administration building. A state damage assessment team hadn't yet begun its work, he said.

"In every building, some damage has taken place. We need people to look at foundations and things," he said Thursday. "It's been hard on everybody. We're trying to make the best of the situation."

At the University of New Orleans, floodwaters at some point covered about a third of the Lakefront campus, mostly on its south and west sides, invading the first floor of a dorm and the city's premier high school, Ben Franklin, at the edge of the college campus. But "most of the academic buildings didn't have water," Chancellor Timothy Ryan said. Still, he estimated that building repair and equipment replacement needs will top $100 million.

Storm refugees brought from rooftops by helicopter to open ground at UNO broke into many buildings and spent days on campus, with the bulk of them, 1,500 or more, apparently sleeping at Kirschman Hall, a new multi-story business complex, Ryan said.

"Apparently there was some miscommunication, because they were left there for several days," Ryan said, adding there was "some substantial damage done, but reparable damage." Some of the displaced residents apparently broke into soft drink machines, he said.

Cleanup workers on Wednesday said they found human feces and mounds of trash inside the business hall, and more than 100 chairs from the building had been dragged out and left in a grassy field.

"For somebody to have that much trash in there, it had to be a whole, whole bunch of them," said Ricky Burch, director of a private cleanup crew hired by UNO.

Xavier and Dillard universities, both hit hard by what appeared to be at least a few feet of flooding on ground floors, were strewn with tree limbs and other debris last week. Damage at Xavier, near South Carrollton Avenue and the Pontchartrain Expressway, had yet to be formally assessed, Savoie said.

In addition to flood damage, Dillard lost three buildings to fire, said Savoie, who did not know which buildings burned. A drive past the campus suggested that the stately buildings along Gentilly Boulevard had been spared. But dried muck and downed tree limbs across much of the campus gave it a look of devastation.

Dillard and Xavier officials weren't immediately available for comment.

"Dillard requires significant cash investments from alumni, government, foundations, corporations and friends to restore the physical facilities and infrastructure, equipment and academic instructional materials," Dillard's Web site says.

"We are dedicated to the success of our students and the entire Dillard community, and all of us eagerly await our return to fair Dillard."

Floodwaters invaded ground-floor medical facilities of Tulane University and Louisiana State University in the Central Business District, damaging records, killing laboratory animals and disrupting hundreds of research projects, Savoie said.

Money for shoring up such research projects will be sought from Congress, he said.

Nunez Community College in Chalmette, part of a swath of destruction caused by storm surge in St. Bernard Parish, saw six to seven feet of water on the bottom floors of its four buildings, spokeswoman Teresa Smith said. Some of the buildings also sustained roof damage, and mud from the storm waters filled parking lots, one of which was littered with marooned boats. A damage assessment for Nunez was incomplete last week.

Delgado received some flooding on the back sections of the City Park campus, and soldiers from the Oregon National Guard found in the main administration building trash that appeared to have been left behind by a small colony of storm refugees.

But the unit, which had more than 240 soldiers camped out at the campus, found no major damage or evidence of looting, said its spokesman, Sgt. 1st Class Cameron Hanson.

Using Delgado equipment, the Oregon soldiers mowed the lawn.

Other than minor wind damage, Our Lady of Holy Cross, located in Algiers, and Loyola University, off St. Charles Avenue Uptown, were left relatively unscathed by Katrina, officials said.

AN IMPORTANT MESSAGE FROM WASTE MANAGEMENT.

Waste Management Is Rolling Back into New Orleans.

Our thoughts are with the great city of New Orleans and all of those who have been affected by Katrina. To help the city — and its people — begin rebuilding, we are launching WM Works. WM Works is a call for drivers, mechanics, and other transportation professionals to take the lead in rebuilding New Orleans. From hurricane clean-up efforts to regular trash removal services, WM Works will help New Orleans feel like home again.

We are currently looking for people to join WM Works in the following roles:

Drivers
Immediate opportunities exist for CDL drivers to help with debris removal and trash removal routes. WM drivers earn competitive salaries and some of the industry's best benefits. Join us on the front lines of rebuilding New Orleans.

Mechanics
Immediate opportunities exist for mechanics with heavy-duty truck and equipment experience. Earn a competitive salary, incredible benefits and use your technical skills to keep WM moving forward in this critical time.

Justin Winston looks over some old photographs he took of his mother-in-law's Old Metairie home on Rosewood Drive, in one of the sections of East Jefferson that had the deepest flooding. The waterline is visible on the house's exterior.

'What wasn't hit with water was exploded by the mold'

OLD METAIRIE from B-1

By Friday, hardly any water stood in Old Metairie's streets. But its signs were visible virtually everywhere.

On Airline Drive, several makeshift pipelines still stretched west from near Causeway Boulevard to beyond Severn Avenue. They were hooked up to generators and portable pumps to help drain Old Metairie, including more than 10 feet of water that pooled on Airline beneath Causeway.

Parish President Aaron Broussard created the system to move out water that normally drains east through the huge Pumping Station No. 6 just across the 17th Street Canal in New Orleans, Jefferson Drainage Director Kazem Alikhani said.

Station No. 6 normally moves water into the 17th Street Canal and into Lake Pontchartrain, but officials shut it down after a breach in the canal's eastern wall flooded parts of New Orleans and, eventually, Old Metairie.

"That water wasn't going anywhere," Alikhani said.

Airline remained closed at Causeway on Friday. It could reopen as soon as a state Department of Transportation and Development team inspects the area, Alikhani said.

On Ridgewood Drive, Lance Letellier returned to his house from Houston this week, knowing full well it had taken a huge hit from the flooding. That's because Letellier and his fiancee stayed in the house through Katrina's assault, until rising waters finally chased them out Aug. 30.

They used duct tape and cable wire to bind two air mattresses. Armed with drinking water, flashlights, batteries, a television set and a radio, they pushed off from the roof. Paddling with whatever they could find, they headed toward Airline Drive, just a couple of blocks away. Their goal was to reach Causeway Boulevard to the west.

"By the time I had paddled to Airline, I though my arms would fall off," Letellier said.

A neighbor in a boat passed by, and the two were rescued. They later evacuated to Houston and returned Wednesday.

"Somehow, it still was worse than you think," he said. "I put things up high on the refrigerator to be safe, but then the refrigerator floats around and those things fall off."

Pictures and other memorabilia that had been placed on top of beds, tables and countertops also were claimed by the water, he said.

"I'm thinking it can't get that high. But guess what? It did," he said.

Like many residents, Letellier said he survived the hurricane's initial blow with only some siding and roof damage. The water rose only as high as the sidewalk — at first.

But hours later the water started rising again, and the couple retreated into the attic. They tried to catch the attention of a couple of helicopters before eventually rigging their homemade raft and floating to safety.

"It's so ugly. It's so nasty. It's so dirty," said Letellier, a campaign manager for the United Way of Greater New Orleans.

"What wasn't hit with water was exploded by the mold."

Oysters may be at greatest risk

FISH, from B-1

Pontchartrain.

"We've got a big problem with the rest of the country thinking all seafood in Louisiana is tainted. It's not," said Harlon Pearce, chairman of the Louisiana Seafood Promotion and Marketing Board.

Kraemer said a closure would reassure the public that Louisiana seafood that does make it to market is clean.

Oysters are considered to be at the greatest risk of contamination, both because of the way they feed, filtering water to strain out small bits of nutrients, and because they cannot swim away to avoid contaminated water. Oyster reefs from the Mississippi state line to west of Grand Isle have been closed since the storm because of potential contamination. No oyster dredging had been allowed in Lake Pontchartrain for years.

The regional administrator of the National Marine Fisheries Service, Roy Crabtree, said in a recent interview that other seafood species including shrimp, red snapper, tuna and amberjack probably are not at risk. By the time the contaminated floodwaters reach the Gulf of Mexico, where many of those species live, it is expected to be too diluted to pose a threat. Kraemer added that some of those species can break down any petrochemicals during the digestive process.

State and federal officials say they will participate in a conference call Monday to discuss the request from Kraemer's office.

Kristen Meyer, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Health and Hospitals, said little or no fishing is occurring now in Lake Pontchartrain, so the issue is not considered urgent.

The Army Corps of Engineers, which is coordinating the pumping of water from flooded areas, estimates it will be 15 to 30 days before New Orleans is dry, said agency spokesman Mitch Frazier. St. Bernard and lower Plaquemines Parish are expected to be dry by Oct. 8.

Frazier said that as the pumping gets down to the last remaining pools of water – those thought to hold the most pollutants – the Corps will consult with the Environmental Protection Agency to make sure the lake is protected. Some pumps in St. Bernard already have quit pumping because of 250,000 gallons of spilled oil from the Murphy refinery in Meraux, he said.

We believe that by serving our community during its time of need, we give back to the people who have helped make us so great.

Katrina has swamped many lives and submerged many dreams…but she has not broken our spirit.

We are happy to announce that the Louisiana Heart Hospital located just outside New Orleans – in Lacombe – has weathered the storm and continues to deliver non-stop, full-service acute patient care. We want to thank our brave and selfless associates and physicians who have not stopped serving patients, even though their personal losses have been significant. We would also like to thank the staff and leadership in our network of hospitals and diagnostic centers nationwide who contributed time, energy and supplies to keep this hospital up and running. Throughout our network, we have a multitude of clinical and non-clinical opportunities available. We would like to invite those who have found themselves unemployed due to the devastation caused by Katrina to join our family. Below is a sampling of current openings at our hospitals, diagnostic centers and corporate office.

Mayor Ray Nagin and Gov. Kathleen Blanco greet President Bush on the USS Iwo Jima Thursday in New Orleans.

Meeting's aim was to unify New Orleans

Robert Scott's article on nola.com Tuesday does not accurately reflect the meeting between Mayor Nagin and some of his associates and a biracial group of community and business leaders who pledged to work together to renew the city. It's important to set the record straight.

The meeting arose out of deep concerns by business people who care about our city and all of its citizens. A lot of us had been in touch and believed, as did Mayor Nagin, that holding the meeting made sense and was productive.

We all had one goal: finding the best action plan to rebuild and renew New Orleans in order to make it a national showcase for success for everyone in our city.

Mayor Nagin thanked the group for coming together and expressed his appreciation. He agreed that a biracial task force should be set up to work under his direction to deal with rebuilding issues concerning infrastructure, housing, education, culture and business.

There was no selfish politics, no parochial goals. We all shared the same objective: to make New Orleans a prosperous city that provides jobs and a high quality of life for all of its citizens and preserving the diverse cultural and ethnic heritage that makes us special.

Among the most active and helpful participants was Wynton Marsalis, whose views on ethnic and cultural diversity were enthusiastically received and adopted by all of us.

Why Mayor Nagin would criticize this meeting and the offers of hard work by concerned leaders is puzzling and a disappointment. Reading his statements, one might infer that it consisted of white businessmen. Actually, in addition to the mayor and Wynton Marsalis, important African-Americans who provide strong voices for our future, including David White, Dan Packer and Derrick Shepherd, participated. It bears stressing: The group was unified, not divided.

The meeting adjourned with everyone making a commitment to work in a spirit of cooperation.

We have a unique opportunity to renew New Orleans and make it a 21st century model of success for our state, our region and our nation. We can achieve that success for all of us, but only if we work together. Let's not allow politics to tear apart honest, focused efforts to get our city moving again. We're rolling up our sleeves to pitch in and help. We have high confidence that this is also the mayor's intention.

No room for youngest displaced students?

I read the article by Mark Waller about displaced students. I have called state Superintendent Cecil Picard six times since Sept. 6 (I spoke to a not-very-compassionate aide twice) and Gov. Kathleen Blanco's office twice (spoke with a student who seemed to be interning on Sept. 14), and no one seemed to think it mattered that the East Baton Rouge School District and the state Department of Education made no provisions and deemed it "not mandatory" (their words) that preschool and prekindergarten students be eligible for enrollment. It is not a priority, I was told.

I was also told there are roughly 3,000 to 5,000 prekindergarten students displaced from Orleans, St. Tammany and Jefferson parishes, many of whom ended up in Baton Rouge.

Please tell me why my 4-year-old does not deserve some semblance of normalcy and a social outlet to deal with her displacement. And please tell me why I cannot get a call or even an e-mail from someone with a can-do attitude in the offices listed above.

The aide told me the superintendent was too busy to call me back. He said to register my child, and they would get to me. Excuse me? It is "not mandatory," and no spaces were even opened for our kids.

Fine words aren't enough

The president's prime-time Thursday speech from New Orleans was designed to restore confidence in his ability to lead, to establish in the minds of the American people a belief that he cares about the people who resided in the area ravaged by Hurricane Katrina, and that he will demonstrate his concern by pouring in tens, if not hundreds, of billions of federal dollars to rebuild the region.

The words uttered by the president were fine, a well-written presentation which, of course, was produced not by him, but by a team of skilled writers. It will require far more than words, though, to begin to aside the horror of the abandonment of so many of society's most vulnerable individuals.

It is ironic that a president who touted a program which has as its lofty goal "no child left behind" ultimately left behind not only children, but the elderly, the infirm, and the poor to suffer hideously and to die before our eyes on national television.

President Bush did not create the situation that caused New Orleans to be a city teetering on the verge of obliteration through flooding, and the federal government headed by the president shares culpability in this catastrophe with the mayor of New Orleans and the governor of Louisiana, who also froze in the face of disaster.

In the final analysis, though, the buck must stop with George W. Bush. The horrific images of delay, death, and abject human misery which were beamed all over the world from the most powerful and rich nation in the world, are commonly and accurately attributed to him.

The president has paid lip service to taking responsibility for the catastrophic failures in providing rescue and relief, and has stated that he will "make it right." How in God's name will he "make it right" to those who died and their survivors, and those who suffered what no human being should ever have to endure?

The president has more than three long years left in his second term, but it will take far longer than that for the United States to recover from Hurricane Katrina, our international shame and mortification.

Sickened by deaths at nursing home

It makes me sick to†hear about those poor elderly people left to die in their nursing home.

How could the owners live with themselves, knowing what they did? They were nice enough to tag them! That sounds like premeditated murder to me.

There should be no bond. And if there is a lawyer out there who is helping them, he should be in the same place they end up.

God be with the families of residents of this so-called nursing home and with the people who I believe are responsible for so many deaths.

Our Opinions

Ready for the second line

President Bush outlined his plans for rebuilding the Gulf Coast on Thursday night, and his emphatic show of support for this metropolitan area in particular was heartening and reassuring. "There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans," he said, addressing the nation from a podium in front of St. Louis Cathedral, "and this great city will rise again." He even invoked the traditional jazz funeral, in which a slow, mournful dirge gives way to a second line — a loud, raucous, irrepressible outpouring of joy.

To bring relief to an afflicted region, the president offered a number of substantive proposals. The creation of an "opportunity zone" in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama would provide tax incentives for employers and worker training accounts of as much as $5,000. Whether those tax incentives are as great as needed remains to be seen. The president also described an urban homesteading plan, in which the federal government would give free home sites to those who could not otherwise afford them.

The details of these and other efforts will need to be worked out ñ and worked out quickly. It was not immediately clear, for example, how much federally owned land in the New Orleans area will be suitable for new home construction.

Nevertheless, the considerable reach of President Bushís proposals suggests that he recognizes not just the scale of the destruction wrought by Hurricane Katrina but also the vital importance of rebuilding the Gulf Coast. Reconstruction money is not a giveaway. Southeast Louisiana is home to extensive fisheries, major oil and gas production and refining facilities, not to mention some of the nationís busiest ports.

Already, proposals for an ambitious federal post-Katrina effort are being picked apart by clueless lawmakers such as Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., who told The New York Times that he doesnít think "everything that should happen in Louisiana should be paid for by the rest of the country." He went on to suggest that "certain responsibilities" should be borne by the people of Louisiana. Itís as if thousands of New Orleanians skipped work for a three-week luxury vacation. On the Astrodome floor.

Sen. Coburn would surely be more sympathetic if the storm had threatened to wipe Oklahoma City off the map, rather than New Orleans. Anyway, Louisianians are already paying for this disaster, and we will keep on paying for it indefinitely. Many New Orleanians have lost homes, vehicles and jobs. Some of us left our homes or our initial places of shelter with little more than the clothes on our backs. Even with extensive assistance from outside, recovering from the storm will be costly and difficult.

This newspaper has argued time and again that, in the long run, spiraling budget deficits threaten the security and prosperity of the United States. But leaving the Gulf Coast in shambles would have the same effect right now. If this spendthrift Congress finally has found fiscal religion, surely lawmakers can make cuts in the existing budget to make room for the survivors of Katrina.

To judge from his speech, President Bush understands the impact of the hurricane upon the metropolitan area. In theory, his recovery plans could promote homeownership in New Orleans, which has long had a high percentage of renters. The president also took pains to acknowledge that poor African-Americans suffered disproportionately during the storm and suggested that minority-owned businesses should benefit from the relief effort.

The administration and Congress must be careful. After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, emergency preparedness money was spread out across the country, and areas at the highest risk of terrorism got shorted. That must hot happen again. The federal recovery plan has to be focused on the areas hit hardest by the storm.

Another caveat: With the huge flow of government money coming in, transparency and accountability will be crucial. Louisiana politicians have a reputation, often deserved, for putting political connections ahead of public needs. The federal government has a long history of letting itself be gouged by contractors, too. But post-Katrina reconstruction costs are likely to be huge, so wasting even a dime of public money would be shameful.

New Orleans suffered badly after the hurricane, and parts of the city remain under water. Vast areas of St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes have been utterly devastated. Even in parts of the metro area where the damage wasnít as bad, the recovery process will go on for years.

Nevertheless, it's now possible to see past the destruction to a brighter future for the metro area. And the presidentís public commitment of federal help lightens the heavy burden now facing Hurricane Katrina's many victims.

Members of the 3rd Platoon of the Ohio National Guard paddle the floodwaters in eastern New Orleans as they began their search and rescue mission.

Critty Hymes is a physician. Like so many of New Orleans' black doctors, lawyers, accountants, dentists, politicians, professors and entrepreneurs, she made her home in eastern New Orleans, an area hit especially hard by the floodwaters that followed Hurricane Katrina.

Despite its devastation, the area known as New Orleans East, the other part of the 9th Ward, hasn't gotten much attention since the storm. There are probably multiple reasons for that. First and foremost, the human drama was playing out elsewhere. Media attention was focused on the poorer areas of New Orleans because that's where so many people were gathered on their rooftops, crying out to be rescued. If we assume that people with means were more likely to flee the storm, then they wouldn't have been around to draw attention to their neighborhoods.

JARVIS DEBERRY

Drowning houses can't cry out like drowning people do.

Besides, the area was largely inaccessible. Soon after Katrina passed through that Monday morning, I joined a Times-Picayune team that tried to make it to the East. We couldn't even get as far as the high-rise over the Industrial Canal, the water was so high.

But I suspect that there's a third reason the East has been largely ignored: Despite the wealth, fame or stature of many of its residents, for too many people now covering New Orleans, the area simply doesn't exist. It's not a place they ever think about.

Hymes, who worked as a gynecologist at Methodist Hospital on Bullard Avenue, was in Houston with her family during the storm. When reached there by phone Friday morning, she had heard a rumor that New Orleans officials are planning to bulldoze New Orleans East, which, to her, sounded like a plan to throw dirt over the city's black middle class.

I had to pay special attention to understand her through her weeping.

"My practice is under water," she said. "I have no more patients. Now you're going to tell me I have no more home?"

What Hymes has heard about the East in particular seems to jibe with what Mayor Ray Nagin has said about New Orleans in general. He predicts that only half of the city's 160,000 homes will be salvageable and that the others will have to be destroyed.

Still, I don't know what bulldoze means. Does it mean tearing down houses irreparably damaged by the water so that the owners can build again? Not even the most sentimental person should stand opposed to that. Or does "bulldoze" mean the demolition of an idea? The idea that upward mobility and neighborhood stability are as attainable for black New Orleanians as they are for other races. Does it mean the city will throw out the black middle class with the floodwater?

Even when slavery was the law of the land, New Orleans had a significant number of free people of color who, with their commitment to education, industry and self-reliance, defied all stereotypes of black inferiority. Centuries later, other Southern cities would develop black middle classes that would dwarf New Orleans'. But that doesn't mean the one in New Orleans ever went away.

At least it hadn't before Katrina.

Despite the vital role that black professionals have played in the history of New Orleans, Hymes said she thinks they've been given short shrift during this crisis. She thinks the East took a backseat to Lakeview.

"You want to tell me that a country that can put a man on the moon can't drain two areas of the city at the same time? Send the (Army) Corps of Engineers out there the same time you sent them to the 17th Street Canal."

It's too soon to know what the political fallout from Hurricane Katrina will be. It's not even clear at this point who will return to the city to vote. But if I held elective office in New Orleans, I'd be trembling at the thought that my constituents thought I'd done nothing to bring them relief.

Even through Hymes' sobs I heard her anger. She perceives disrespect. And if anything else is said or done that makes her feel less important than those in other ZIP codes, she vows not to return to her birthplace.

"It's like we are the forgotten out there," she said. "I'm well-educated, and we were just left. Left like we didn't even exist."

So sorry, but we don't cover water damage

Almost everyone — and certainly every reader of The Times-Picayune — knew what would happen when the big one hit, but only a minority took out flood insurance.

Some, no doubt, were reckless, but many of those now ruing their oversight were apparently under the impression that their homeowner policies would replace all that was lost.

Insurance adjusters have seen many a jaw drop as they explain that they will pay for damage caused by wind, but not by rising water. Policyholders contemplating the destruction of their homes and possessions naturally view this distinction as picky, a legalistic pretext for companies to cut their losses and leave Katrina's victims in the lurch.

JAMES GILL

Companies take the view that they should pay for losses only if they collected premiums to cover them. It is hard to dispute the logic of that position, although hardly anyone is in the mood for logic right now. Besides, insurance companies took a generous stance after 9/11, electing to ignore policy limitations for humanitarian reasons. The Gulf Coast region may feel it is no less deserving.

Even those who did take out flood insurance may find they are seriously out of pocket. The maximum payout under flood insurance, which is run by the federal government, is $250,000, and many a burgher lost much more than that when the levees broke and some of our ritziest neighborhoods went under.

There is no political advantage in siding with the insurance companies on this issue, and they got quite a pounding at a joint legislative hearing last week. Rep. Peppi Bruneau, R-New Orleans, warned that "World War III" would break out if the companies did not learn a little flexibility. To look at parts of the New Orleans area right now, you'd think World War III had already broken out; the insurance companies are merely shooting the survivors.

They would appear to have no legal obligation to pay for losses excluded in homeowner policies, but that ultimately will be the Louisiana Supreme Court's call. A class-action lawsuit filed in a Baton Rouge district court asks for a judgment that the companies are responsible for damage caused by post-Katrina floods.

That will be a ticklish one for the Supreme Court, which in recent years has been notably sympathetic to business. But a vote for the insurance companies will be remembered by hundreds of thousands of hurricane victims come re-election time.

The stakes are pretty high. The insurance companies, if they are forced to adopt a more liberal payout policy, could be on the hook for $50 billion, or about a quarter of Katrina's costs.

State Farm lobbyist Bubba Henry claims that extracting payments for uncovered losses would bankrupt the insurance industry, but then nobody appearing before a legislative committee ever understates his case. Former state Insurance Commissioner Jim Brown, who is advising the plaintiffs in the lawsuit, points out that the companies facing Katrina claims have reserves 10 times greater than their potential exposure. Furthermore, insurance companies always lay off their major bets, and most of the Katrina risk will have been shunted to reinsurance conglomerates around the world.

We can be sure that, regardless of which way the courts rule, the insurance companies will survive. We can be reasonably confident that the victims will ultimately be made whole too, even if it is not by way of their homeowner policies. If only for political reasons, President Bush is clearly eager to compensate for the fiasco of the Katrina aftermath by making a success of reconstruction. His speech on Thursday suggested that money would be no object. It is thus hard to imagine that a quirk in insurance coverage will be allowed to ruin citizens who did their best to prepare for disaster.

The only catch may be that the obvious agent for federal largess is FEMA, which may be slightly less clueless since the departure of director Michael Brown, but still does not command total confidence in its ability to handle a multibillion-dollar effort. If legislators at the joint hearing hoped FEMA might provide some clues as to its future role, they were in for a disappointment. No sooner had the hearing begun than the FEMA representative up and walked out. The money needed for reconstruction may not be a problem, but competence may be.

Now is the chance to remake New Orleans schools

When Gov. Kathleen Blanco thanked heroic first responders during her first post-Hurricane Katrina speech last week, the state legislators who made up the bulk of her audience stood and applauded, just as they should have.

After the governor introduced ordinary people who rescued tens of thousands of hurricane victims via boat and school bus, they leapt to their feet once more.

Blanco's other vows ñ to rebuild the shattered city and suburban parishes, to bring far-flung evacuees back home and to call on FEMA to hire local companies and workers ñ also met with enthusiastic responses.

But when the governor promised to seize an extraordinary opportunity to remake New Orleans' dreadful schools, many applauded, but some didn't.

Here's the statement that prompted the surprisingly lackluster response: ìWe're not going to simply recreate the schools of New Orleans,î the governor said. ìTonight, I am calling on all Louisianans and all Americans to join an historic effort to build a world-class, quality system of public education in New Orleans. Our children who have weathered this storm deserve no less.î

On its face, who could argue with such a call?

Don't those kids deserve no less than a fully committed partnership from the state lawmakers who will be making key decisions about the system's future ñ whether or not their constituents are directly affected?

Instead, the initial response hinted of business as usual ñ in other words, a return to the old pre-Katrina order of heated debate over whether to stick with the urban-district model, open a bunch of independently-run charter schools, or just turn the whole mess over to the state or city.

Before the storm, there were legislators who wanted to keep the Orleans Parish School Board intact, others who wanted to pull students out of the broke, failing system by any means possible, and still more who seemed ready to give up.

Apparently, that's still the case, despite Blanco's commitment and President Bush's subsequent promise of massive federal aid to rebuild.

That's a shame, because it is vital to figure out how to create a quality system out of what is now basically nothing.

In his Jackson Square speech Thursday night, President Bush vowed not just to improve levees and rebuild homes, but to confront the deep-seated problems that the storm exposed. As we've known all along, a key component in any plan to attack the city's poverty and social ills is a healthy school system.

There's tremendous room for debate over what form the new schools should take. Urban planners from all over the country see New Orleans as a laboratory, and the same goes for educational reformers. That means it's especially urgent that locals of all stripes stay engaged.

Maybe the legislators who sat on their hands during Blanco's promise to rebuild, vague as it was, are just fatigued over years of dysfunction, although their silence might be mistaken for lack of interest. No matter what the reason, they need to get over it.

The Legislature and Louisiana's other political institutions are about to go under a microscope more powerful than they've ever imagined. They need to think long and hard about what the world will see.

Athletes pitch in to help with relief

Magloire, Floyd organize donations

By Jimmy Smith

It began with modest contributions of $1 million each from the NBA Players Association and Major League Baseball.

Nearly three weeks after Hurricane Katrina devastated New Orleans and other parts of the Gulf Coast, groups and individuals from the sports world have contributed countless millions more in monetary donations, supplies and volunteer efforts aimed at storm relief.

Each day, another story of financial aid comes to light, one of the most recent from Hornets center Jamaal Magloire.

Magloire will host a benefit gala in his native hometown of Toronto on Sept. 29, with the proceeds going to his adopted hometown of New Orleans, he told Toronto media last week, putting aside whatever personal losses he might have incurred at his in-season home in the Warehouse District as minor compared to the ravages of what he has seen in the news.

"All that stuff is trivial to me," Magloire said. "People lost their lives; people without home insurance lost their homes. My stuff can be replaced, because I've been blessed. Lives can't be replaced. Friends of mine are still looking for their siblings and their mothers and fathers. I don't care about my stuff."

Magloire has put together a fund-raiser ó at $300 per ticket ó that includes dinner, live entertainment and a silent auction at a theater in downtown Toronto.

Magloire said he'll deliver the proceeds to the Crescent City.

"I will go to the school with the roof blown off, or homes that have been damaged, and make sure they're OK," Magloire said. "But I can't do this on my own. I need help, and I want to show the people of New Orleans the people of Toronto care.

"New Orleans is a good, loving environment, and I'd like to try to help get that back. I want to be a part of it."

PETER FINNEY

After one hurricane and one victory, they're calling the 2005 New Orleans Saints "America's Team."

That's nice.

It's fitting and heartfelt.

But what about the 2006 Saints?

And beyond?

For example, will there be a "New Orleans Saints" in 2010?

It's a question worth posing because some Big Easy lovers with a sporting bent have suggested a city that experienced a change-of-life catastrophe should be awarded the next available Super Bowl (2010), which, in the case of New Orleans, would be No. 10.

The timeline suggests it

NEW YORK — Three hours.

That's what the Saints can give New Orleans on Monday, according to Jason Sehorn.

SAINTS VS. GIANTS
6:30 p.m.
Monday ABC

Almost exactly four years ago, in the wake of the 9/11 terrorist attacks, New York asked the same thing from Sehorn and the Giants. The same three hours.

The Giants delivered. The Saints came to the Meadowland as spoilers and the Giants beat them in front of 80,000 cheering New Yorkers. For three hours, Giants fans worried about something else.

Now the roles are reversed. Now it's New Orleans that could use its three hours and the Giants playing spoiler. They should be playing in the Superdome. But that's not an option. The Saints have become nomads. So even though it's New Orleans' turn, even though the Saints probably could use a break, the teams once again will meet in the Meadowlands.

Nobody said life was fair.

"It's the worst situation possible," said Sehorn, who

SHREVEPORT — The therapy session came with a complimentary beer.

Patients united at the Wow! Wingery recreation vehicle, plush with air conditioning, couches and televisions. The adults wore Tulane hats and polo shirts, the kids wore football jerseys and cheerleader outfits.

"It's going to be three hours of therapy," said Stephen Mott of Covington.

Not a lot of Tulane fans could make it. It was understandable. Since Hurricane Katrina, the thought of attending a football game has been fleeting for most. But other Tulane fans did make the excursion to Shreveport. These fans sure have some problems back home, but today was game day, and they decided to lose themselves in Saturday-afternoon normalcy.

LEGENDARY LOCAL FAMILY FINDS KATRINA WAS 'WORSE THAN EVERYTHING'

CAMPOS: STUNNED BY DESTRUCTION

By Bob Marshall
Outdoors editor

After living in the St. Bernard marshes all of his 87 years, Blackie Campo thought he'd probably seen and heard it all — even when it came to hurricanes. It was a hubris Campo earned by watching storms wipe homes away in 1947 and 1956.

So as he and his son, Ken, waited in the Poydras home of his grandson, Kenny, for Hurricane Katrina on the night of Aug. 28 Blackie — arguably the best-known marsh man in south Louisiana — thought there could be no surprises.

He was wrong.

"This was worse than everything I've ever seen before combined," Campo said Friday from his refuge in Baton Rouge. "I thought we'd have some water. I thought there would be winds. But I never thought it would be like this — just all gone.

Honor for Mills lost in all the aftermath

By Brian Allee-Walsh
NFL columnist

I've had way too much time to think about Sam Mills' death and now his aborted induction onto the Superdome Wall of Fame.

His banner would have been unfurled today at the Saints' home opener against the New York Giants, but the devastation to our city caused by Hurricane Katrina forced the game to be moved to Monday night in East Rutherford, N.J.

As far as I'm concerned, his tribute will proceed as planned, no matter what.

Let the credits roll.

During nine stellar seasons in New Orleans and later with the expansion Carolina Panthers, Mills, a 5-foot-9, 225-pound rock of a man, established himself as one of the premiere middle linebackers in the NFL.

Simply, he climbed over people on his way to the top of the Wall to join Jim Finks, Archie Manning, "Pistol Pete" Maravich, Eddie Robinson, Dave Dixon and Rickey Jackson.

Does Mills belong with such illustrious company?

Arguably, he might own the Wall, if the criteria for selection were based solely on the size of the fight in the dog.

No disrespect to the previous inductees, but the Littlest Rhino defied the odds, beginning with a decision that he made 25 years ago to reject a popular belief that he was too small to play in the NFL.

Mills' critics harped too much about his lack of physical stature. If they had probed deeper into his background, they might have discovered the heart of several lions.

My hope was to have Mills stand at midfield in the Superdome, flanked by his family, former Saints coach Jim Mora and fellow linebackers Pat Swilling, Vaughan Johnson and Jackson, with a sell-out crowd hanging on every word.

It was wishful thinking on my part.

Truth be told, Mills should have been inducted before he succumbed to intestinal cancer in 2004, long before Katrina changed our lives forever.

The Wall of Fame selection committee and Saints owner Tom Benson dropped the ball with regard to Mills. C'mon gentlemen, a life-size statue of the man stands outside Ericsson Stadium in downtown Charlotte in recognition of his many contributions to the Panthers' organization.

Why the delay? What did Carolina officials see in Mills that we in New Orleans did not see in his body of work that covered nearly a decade?

Mills should have been recognized while he was living for his accomplishments in New Orleans as the exemplary gentleman/citizen/consummate pro/role model that he was.

Better-late-than-never wasn't the appropriate decision. Now it may be never. Because of Katrina and all that has ensued, the Superdome Wall of Fame may never bear Mills' name. Furthermore, the Superdome may have suffered irreparable damage and never be home to the Saints again.

"We've got months before we can determine the future of the building,'' Superdome spokesman Bill Curl said Friday. "Certainly our intention would be if the Superdome is restored, we would continue the Wall of Fame, and Sam would be a part of it. That's our intention.

"But the future is indefinite."

My bet is Mills' spirit will be standing alongside Saints coaches and players Monday night at Giants Stadium, proudly wearing No. 51, eager to help make a difference.

That's the man, teammate and person he was.

Sam, on behalf of Saints fans home and away, congratulations. You richly deserve to be on the Wall of Fame. Hopefully, in the foreseeable future, we can pause and reflect on your life and career and make it a banner day.

Meantime, please keep our ravaged city and region in your prayers. A good word from you should go a long way.

New York can empathize with New Orleans

NEW YORK, from C-1

played cornerback for the Giants in the 2001 game. "It really (stinks), to be honest with you."

There are parallels, Sehorn said, but no comparison. And in the Giants' locker room last week, players agreed. The Giants weren't forced to leave their homes and city behind. They weren't separated from family and friends. Their stadium wasn't wrecked, or their fan base scattered. They didn't watch their home debut transferred to a foreign stadium, full of hostile fans.

In the past two weeks, Saints players have visited shelters and met with storm victims. They've distributed good wishes, food and money. But they've been asked for three hours.

Any Giants who was here four years ago knows what that's like.

"It was kind of naïve," Sehorn said. "We looked at it as taking people's minds off what happened. There's no way you can do that. But maybe you can just help them take their minds off it for those three hours."

AP PHOTO

The Giants, playing with inspiration on the heels of 9/11, gave the Saints and Aaron Brooks fits.

A city's undivided attention

That awesome duty was obvious to New York players every day leading up to the Saints game. From the parking lot at Giants Stadium, on the way to practice, they could see the World Trade Center rubble smoldering.

In the days after the attacks, that parking lot became a collection center for emergency vehicles and donated relief supplies. The NFL halted its schedule, and the illuminated signs outside the Meadowlands read "No Game Today."

With the week off from football, the Giants' organization and its players got involved in relief efforts. On Sept. 15, players visited the site that later became known as Ground Zero. A second group of Giants returned Sept. 18. Football resumed. The Giants beat the Cardinals on the road and Arizona fans gave them a standing ovation.

But the first home game was the big one. That's the game they had to win. The other New York teams were doing their part. Mike Piazza had hit a bottom-of-the-ninth, game-winning home run during the Mets' first game back. The Yankees had just embarked on what would become one of the most thrilling postseason runs in memory. And the Jets weren't scheduled to play at home until Monday night. For three hours Sunday, the Giants would have the city's undivided attention.

On Saturday, Coach Jim Fassel invited the family members of slain rescue workers to practice. A mother asked star defensive end Michael Strahan to sign a photograph of her lost husband, a fan.

"It amazes me when people say 'Thank You,'" Strahan told reporters at the time. "What are you thanking us for? But it made me realize that what we do is important to them."

Like most of the nation, the Saints also tried to pitch in as best they could, taking up locker room collections and soliciting donations in New Orleans for the New York recovery efforts. But the Saints were conference rivals, known for hard hits and grinding defense and coming off a playoff season. To New Yorkers hoping the Giants would defend their 2000 NFC title, the Saints were indisputably the bad guys.

Emotions ruled the game

Game day was damp and gray, with temperatures around 56 degrees. The Harlem Boys Choir sang the national anthem. The Giants lined up behind a color guard made up of representatives from the New York police and fire departments, along with the New York Port Authority Police Department. Many on the team donned NYPD and NYFD hats.

"The locker room atmosphere was much different than for a normal game," Sehorn said. "Far quieter. Everyone acts differently to prepare for a game, but that game everyone was in the same mode."

Emotions ruled the game. In the first seven minutes, the two teams combined for six penalties, four of them personal fouls. Strahan ran over then-Saints tackle Kyle Turley for three sacks, while Turley racked up four penalties by himself.

Giants quarterback Kerry Collins found Joe Jurevicious for a 46-yard touchdown with six minutes remaining that iced the victory. It started raining. Penalties killed the Saints' final drive.

After the game, the Giants celebrated unabashedly. Strahan called it one of his most satisfying victories. Even today, playing on the anniversary of the 9/11 attacks still moves him.

"The fans of the city are here to support us on a day that is very tough for everybody here and we didn't want to go out there and not perform our best for them," Strahan said after the Giants beat the Cardinals at home last week on Sept. 11. "We went out there and we did it and I hope for the few hours that we were out there a lot of people had their minds off the past."

A heavy burden

That Saints want the same thing for their fans. The desire is the same.

"When I went to shelters, I just kept telling people 'Hold on,'" Saints receiver Joe Horn said in San Antonio last week. "Just keep holding on.

"And what they asked of me was 'Joe, you guys go and do what you've been doing – play football games and win football games."

But their burden is much heavier. This time, the stadium itself became Ground Zero and the players joined everyone else evacuating the city. Fans fear the Saints won't ever play in New Orleans again – that the team will make permanent its relocation to San Antonio.

"Their situation is so much more difficult," Sehorn said. "We weren't forced from our town, forced into a hotel away from our friends and family. We weren't forced to play on the road."

Such factors add significantly to the Saints' challenge this weekend. But several Giants noted that hardship has granted the suddenly vagabond Saints permanent underdog status, a lot of motivation and a sudden burst of national popularity.

"That's a strong motivation to play for when you have people who've gone through such tragedy say, 'Hey, we're rooting for you, go out there and do well," said Giants quarterback Eli Manning, a native New Orleanian who prepped at Newman.

Coach Tom Coughlin praised the Saints for maintaining focus and gutting out a 23-20 victory over Carolina last week.

"Knowing the Carolina team and how good they are, knowing what New Orleans has been through, knowing the anguish that has accompanied all of them – coaches, players, the organization, their families being uprooted what have you.... I would say that the whole National Football League takes its hat off to the job they did," Coughlin said.

Strahan put it succinctly.

"I was pulling for them myself," he said.

But not this weekend.

"Once you get out on the field, all that stuff stops."

Just visitors

The Saints may have become America's team, but to New York fans, they're just visitors. The Giants passed the hat for relief efforts – just as the New Orleans team once did for New York – but they're still planning to beat the Saints.

That's partly why Saints coaches are scoffing at the league's efforts to make Giants Stadium more welcoming.

It's not that the efforts aren't impressive. New Orleans Police Chief Eddie Compass and other members of the Crescent City police and fire departments will assist with the pre-game coin toss, along with former president George H.W. Bush, who co-leads the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund. Harry Connick Jr. and Branford Marsalis will play the national anthem, while Irvin Mayfield will play "America the Beautiful." The Saints will wear their black home jerseys. Ground crews will paint the Saints logo on the west end zone. Some 600 New Orleanians will be flown in by relief agencies for the game.

But none of the hoopla impresses Saints coach Jim Haslett.

"They don't need to paint that field with any fleur-de-lis or anything," he said. "This is a home game for the Giants and we'll leave it that way."

That might be for the best. The Saints are 25-16 on the road since Haslett took over as coach, second only to the Philadelphia Eagles in the same time period. But at least the Giants know where home is. The Saints spent Tuesday and Wednesday looking for new housing in San Antonio.

"Everyone can put sheepskin over their eyes and act like it's not a home game for the Giants," Horn said. "But we all know. I'm sure the fans and the Giants football club care what happens and their heart goes out to us. We will appreciate that, but we're also not crazy and thinking it's a home game."

The Saints are scheduled to play four games in Tiger Stadium. Maybe then they'll get a real homecoming, with nearly 100,000 Louisianians cheering them on. But they're also playing three games in a suddenly black-and-gold San Antonio.

As if Saints fans didn't have enough to worry about.

But that's the future. On Monday night, the Saints will try to deliver all they can: another three hours.

"Take the game for what it is – a game," Sehorn said. "Then get back to reality after."

Saints-Giants game to feature telethon

RELIEF, from C-1

the Gulf Coast region have mobilized to lend their support and clout to various relief efforts.

Former UNO and Hornets coach Tim Floyd, whose sister lost a home in Mississippi, has helped organize an online sports auction that will benefit Habitat for Humanity's relief fund.

The Miami Heat and NBA champion San Antonio Spurs have tabbed their exhibition opener in Miami Oct. 10 as a relief effort game.

The Heat will donate all proceeds from ticket sales, concessions, parking and retail sales to the American Red Cross, and tickets will be sold at regular-season prices in an effort to maximize the contribution.

Last week, Heat center Shaquille O'Neal and his wife, Shaunie, organized a major relief effort in the Miami area, with O'Neal chipping in to help load 18-wheelers with supplies trucked into the Baton Rouge area.

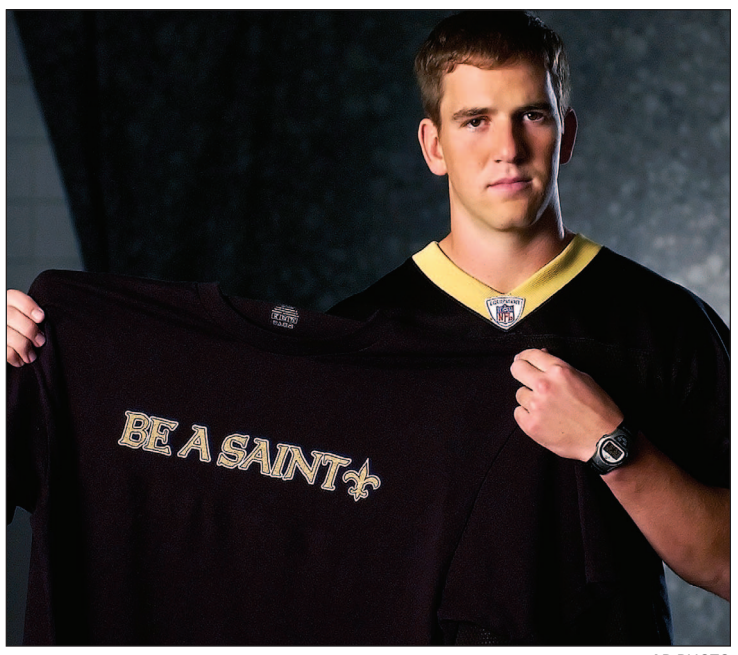
"I commend everybody who's helping out in some way," O'Neal said last weekend. "When it's monetarily or going to the stores and buying cases of water, bundles of ice ... there's a lot of people chipping in, and my hat goes off to every American and non-American that's helping."

O'Neal, after a quick visit to Louisiana following the storm, said he decided to formulate a plan in which he could lend a hand.

"I'm just doing what I've been taught by my parents to do," he said. "This is the right thing to do, and I'm trying to urge other people to do it."

Football efforts are taking center stage this weekend.

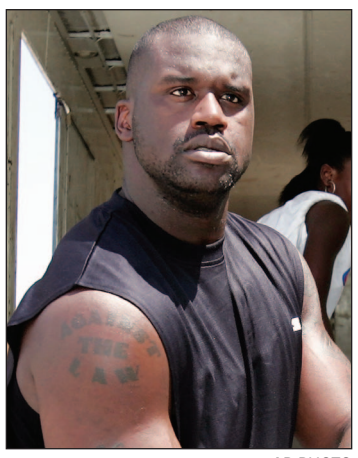
On Saturday, a telethon was to be held during Tulane's game against Mississippi State in Shreveport's Independence Bowl Stadium.



The game was touted as the "Big Game for the Big Easy" and was to be telecast by Collage Sports Television. Proceeds obtained during the game — a telephone number through which viewers can make donations was to be superimposed on the screen — will assist children in various shelters and help rebuild Boys and Girls Clubs damaged by the storm.

The federal Department of Education says more than 370,000 elementary and high school students have been displaced by the storm,

And the Saints, who will play at the New York Giants as part of a "Monday Night Football" doubleheader being promoted as the culmination of the NFL's "hurricane relief weekend," will also be part of a major, daylong fund-raising telethon on ABC.



Current and former NFL players, including several members of the Pro Football Hall of Fame, will be part of the telephone bank that will answer calls and accept pledges during the telecast.

Donations will benefit the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund, which is led by former Presidents George Bush and Bill Clinton. The fund serves as an umbrella organization for three special funds established by the governors of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama to assist in long-term recovery plans.

MLB

▶Donated $1 million to relief efforts.

COLLEGES

▶USC and former UNO and Hornets coach Tim Floyd among group that organized on-line sports auction to benefit Habitat for Humanity. Also joining the effort are Texas Tech's Bob Knight and Duke's Mike Krzyzewski.

▶NCAA has suggested schools use Midnight Madness and two basketball exhibition games to support relief, as well as asking for voluntary donations at other sports exhibitions this year.

▶Telethon during Saturday's Tulane-Mississippi State game to help rebuild Boys and Girls Clubs affected by storm.

Media rooting for Saints to remain in Big Easy

FINNEY, from C-1

may be too early in the game to provide a valid reply, too early to get a feel as to what role Hurricane Katrina played in the long-term future of an NFL franchise.

Alongside Katrina's arrival, the on-again, off-again talks between owner Tom Benson and Gov. Kathleen Blanco regarding the future of the franchise amounts to little more than a hill of beans.

Still, you can't minimize what role, if any, the Saints will play in a city's revival measured, not in years, but decades.

In a meaningful way, Commissioner Paul Tagliabue moved quickly to give the 2005 Saints as much Louisiana-flavoring as possible, realizing it made sense for a team practicing in San Antonio to play four of its "home" games in Tiger Stadium, the other three in the Alamodome.

All of which takes us back to the first question: What about the 2006 Saints? Will they have one "home"? Or two? Or more?

Because the Saints' practice facility dodged the brunt of Katrina's wallop, because, barring an unforeseen turn of events, it will be ready to welcome back a vagabond football team next year, the 2006 Saints will be practicing at home, indoors and outdoors.

Does it mean they will be playing eight "home" games in Baton Rouge?

That's a matter squarely in the hands of Tom Benson and Paul Tagliabue.

By that time, the viability of the Superdome – Can it be restored for $100 million? Does it make more sense to build a "new" one for, let's say, $600 million? – will be determined.

Of course, logic tells you a new Superdome would not be built without some long-term agreement between the state and the Saints. And let's not forget the NFL.

Katrina came at a time Commissioner Tagliabue is using all of his powers to land a franchise for Los Angeles. How do the Saints play into this reality? How valuable is it to the league, to keep the small-market Saints where they have been since 1967?

Meanwhile, as the Saints face an uncertain future, in a way, so does the shape of a new New Orleans.

"The great tragedy," said Mark Wigley, the Dean of Columbia University's Graduate School of Architecture, "would be to embalm New Orleans by simply rebuilding it the way it was."

Another person worried about the city becoming a Disneyland, losing the charm of "the quaintness and the crooked walls and the old shutters."

Katrina left the Superdome, also home to the Sugar Bowl and Tulane, with shafts of light pouring through holes in the roof, a football field littered with trash.

Will a brand new giant mushroom rise from a scene akin to primeval ooze?

We know this: No one is rooting more for the Big Easy than the media.

Pat Forde led off an ESPN.com package on New Orleans with his thoughts on the city:

"It's ancient without feeling outdated, modern without feeling theme park-ish, cool without feeling pretentious."

When Forde recalled that Charlotte, hosting a Final Four, converted a downtown bank into a "faux" nightclub, it reminded me of the Super Bowl in Pontiac, Mich. It featured "Bourbon Street North," one with cardboard French Quarter lights, with a "Pat O'Brien's" serving hurricanes in Dixie cups.

With Roy Blount Jr., author of "Feet on the Street: Rambles Around New Orleans," the memory he wrote for ESPN.com was being in town for Super Bowl IX with the Pittsburgh Steelers. "Who wanted to sleep? Somehow I wound up with rooms in two different hotels and two rental cars, one of which I lost track of. Every now and then, I still wake up wondering whether I'm ever going to get a bill."

"All I know is," wrote Dan Jenkins, "they should hold every Super Bowl there so you wouldn't have to care about the game, which is usually an overrated, over-covered deal anyhow."

Jay Mariotti recalled "jogging through a park with (boxing champion) Thomas Hearns" and seeing "a young Britney Spears wearing beads on Bourbon Street."

Ivan Maisel was in town to watch Muhammad Ali win his last fight in 1978 in the Superdome, a decision over Leon Spinks. He enjoyed the fight but enjoyed more the red beans and rice at Buster Holmes, served, as he recalled, "with a baton-sized portion of French bread and a Barq's root beer."

Apparently, good memories never die.

THE WORLD OF SPORTS

LSU RELEASES MEN'S BASKETBALL SCHEDULE

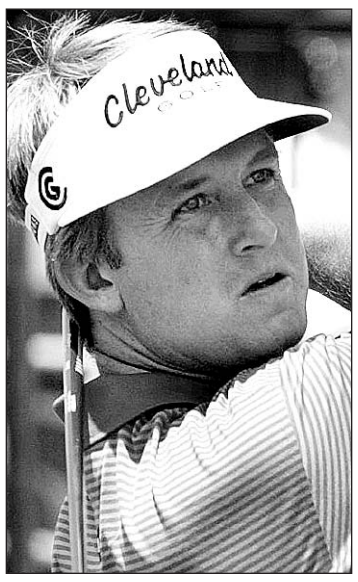
The Pete Maravich Assembly Center wasn't the only thing the LSU basketball program had renovated. The Tigers released their upcoming schedule Saturday, the most ambitious in John Brady's nine years as coach.

LSU will play 10 opponents ranked in the top 50 in RPI last season, and it includes games against non-conference powers Connecticut, Cincinnati and Ohio State.

"We have made a commitment to improve our schedule and we continue to do so," said Brady. "With only one senior in Darrel Mitchell, we will have to grow up in a hurry. But we have some young, athletic, exciting players on this year's team anchored by SEC Freshman of the Year Glen Davis."



LSU, 20-10 last season, has 16 games scheduled for television and will play Louisiana-Lafayette, UNO, McNeese State and Southern, which is the home opener Nov. 18. The road schedule starts with a visit to Elite Eight finisher West Virginia on Nov. 26, and includes meetings with Northern Iowa and Cincinnati on Dec. 22-23 in the Las Vegas Classic, a trip to Ohio State on Dec. 31 and a CBS nationally televised game with 2004 national champion Connecticut on Jan. 7. "Our schedule this year is by far the most challenging we have had," said Brady. "Our road games against West Virginia, Ohio State and Connecticut will be great for our young team"

Season-ticket renewal letters are being mailed to season ticket holders with a deadline of Oct. 14.

GOLF

TOMS THOUGHT HE MIGHT DIE: An intravenous tube dangling from his arm and a heart monitor beeping above his head, David Toms watched as emergency medical technicians sprayed nitroglycerin and jabbed aspirin tablets under his tongue to try to calm his out-of-control heart. Moments before, the Louisiana native and one of the world's best golfers was fretting about his three putts on No. 18 at the 84 Lumber Classic. Now his world had changed in a heartbeat. Unable to quiet a heart that was beating more than 170 times a minute, the technicians gave 38-year-old Toms a shot that intentionally stopped his heart, then used electrical impulses to start it back again.

"It was a scary situation," Toms said Saturday after returning to the

AP PHOTO

Despite his health scare, Louisiana native David Toms said he will play in this week's Presidents Cup.

Nemacolin Woodlands Resort, where he plans to rest before going to the Presidents Cup matches. "I really didn't know what was going on. It got obviously kind of hairy there for about 45 minutes. . . . I knew right away my vitals weren't very good, and I was hurting real bad in my chest. At that point, they don't know if you're having a heart attack. I didn't know what was going to happen to me, really."

"One girl started to try to put an IV in my left arm, and I said, `I've got to go hit my second shot or I'm going to be disqualified,' " Toms said.

If he weren't playing in the Presidents Cup matches in Gainesville, Va., he would have stayed in Pittsburgh and had corrective surgery Monday. Instead, Toms will take medication, play his matches, then have an operation that can last six hours. Toms said he is so committed to playing next weekend, he will stop using the medication if it disrupts his game, though it seems unlikely any doctor would knowingly allow him to do so. "I will be OK, and he can count on me for some points," Toms said.

CAMPBELL ROUTS GOOSEN: U.S. Open champion Michael Campbell routed top-seeded Retief Goosen 7 and 6 Saturday to advance to the final of the World Match Play Championship. Campbell will play for the title Sunday against 11th-seeded Paul McGinley, who defeated second-seeded Angel Cabrera 4 and 3.

"Cabrera was tough today," said McGinley. "I hit him with some hard punches. He didn't buckle."

Goosen did not have a birdie in the first 11 holes as his bid for the first prize of $1.8 million - the biggest in golf - vanished.

"I played terrible," Goosen said. "I just didn't make a putt and was wayward off the tee and missed a lot of fairways. Michael got on a roll at the start, but if I had played a bit of a game out there it would have been nice."

McGinley took the lead at the 10th with the second of four straight birdies. "He holed more putts than I did," Cabrera said. "I was always struggling when he birdied four holes in a row."

STRANGE LEADS IN TAIWAN: Scott Strange shot an 8-under-par 64 Saturday to take a one stroke lead heading into the final round of the Taiwan Open. Strange shot eight birdies to equal the course record at Chung Gung Golf Club near Taipei and record a three-day total of 13-under 203.

GILDER LEADS CHAMPIONS: Bob Gilder shot a 5-under 67 Saturday to maintain a two-stroke lead after two rounds of the Constellation Energy Classic. Gilder birdied the par-4 18th to reach a tournament-record 13-under 131 after 36 holes at Hayfields Country Club. D.A. Weibring and Morris Hatalsky are tied for second at 11 under. Two-time U.S. Open champion Curtis Strange (66) and Senior British Open champ Tom Watson (68) are three strokes back.

AUTO RACING

STEWART WINS POLE: Tony Stewart struck just the right note for a guy hoping to get off to the right start in NASCAR's 10-man, 10-race championship playoff, winning the Nextel Cup pole at New Hampshire International Speedway.

"It's a perfect place to start when you're in the Chase for the championship," Stewart said after driving his No. 20 Joe Gibbs Racing Chevrolet to the fastest lap of 131.143 mph on the 1.058-mile oval.

"We've done everything we needed to do so far this weekend," the series leader said. "The car was really good in race trim and now we're on the pole. Now we've got everybody else in the top 10 scratching their heads wondering what we're doing."

Stewart, who won at NHIS in July, was easily the best of the championship contenders in qualifying. Among the others in the Chase, Matt Kenseth was fourth, Rusty Wallace seventh, Jeremy Mayfield eighth and Jimmie Johnson 10th.

BASEBALL

BONDS WANTS TO LOSE WEIGHT: Barry Bonds used to commit any spare time before games to lifting weights, working meticulously to build up his leg strength. His bum right knee no longer allows it. He is carrying a few extra pounds around his middle and vows to spend the offseason bringing his playing weight down from more than 228 pounds to about 200.

"I'm going to be skinny," said Bonds, who weighed 185 pounds as a rookie in 1986 but has not been near 200 for many years. "I want to get my legs strong again. Hopefully I'll train hard all winter. I can hit it, but I don't feel like I feel when I'm strong. I can tell out there. I'm older now. It's harder."

BASKETBALL

CAVS SIGN HENDERSON: Free agent forward Alan Henderson signed a one-year contract Saturday with the Cleveland Cavaliers. Henderson, 32, spent last season with Dallas after playing nine seasons for the Atlanta Hawks.

"Alan is a proven veteran with playoff experience who will be a valuable asset to us on the floor and in the locker room," Cavs general manager Danny Ferry said. "He can give us toughness and depth in the post."

The Cavaliers will begin the season without forward Anderson Varejao, who dislocated his shoulder playing for Brazil at last month's world championships and recently had surgery.

TENNIS

DAVENPORT, SCHIAVONE IN FINAL: World No. 2 Lindsay Davenport advanced to the Wismilak International final on Saturday with a lopsided 6-2, 6-2 win over China Li Na. Top-seeded Davenport will face fourth-seeded Francesca Schiavone in Sunday's final after Schiavone defeated Patty Schnyder, who retired after the second set due to heat exhaustion.

Some TU fans happy to visit for home game

TULANE, from C-1

"He's calling us every 15 minutes," Steven Ballard said. "He's dying to know how everything's going on."

"We support Tulane athletics," Torry Ballard said. "I think it's a way to come together with other people from New Orleans and help each other stay strong. … I think the adjustments the team had to make, they need to feel that support, we need to support them for the city. And to be honest, we need an outlet for all the stress from our businesses and our friends and family. There was no question that we would be here today."

Standing outside Independence Stadium, Randall Toepfer and Chris Storey, both 2003 graduates, reminisced about the good old days of 2004. Storey said being outdoors reminded him of Tad Gormley Stadium, the City Park home of Tulane for its homecoming game.

"Every year at homecoming," Toepfer said, "we go out at 6 a.m. and set up a huge tailgate. We have about 50 people who come, we fry turkey, and we have this huge iron tailgate and barbecue pit."

Asked where that was Saturday, he said, "under five feet of water."

Mott and his friend, Chris Gallagher, drove up from Covington, Green Wave flags flying. Neither man went to Tulane, but both are New Orleanians and Green Wave fans. Mott's place in Covington wasn't hit too badly, but Gallagher's home in Uptown had major damage.

"I was telling him on the way up here," Mott said. "I don't think I've ever been more proud to wear a Tulane hat in my entire life, than coming up here today. … We've got the tailgate going, we've got beer, we're relaxing today."

"It's my mission to make every game this year," Gallagher said. "They're going through so much, and I know a lot of people aren't fortunate to make all the games, and I've got time that I can take off, and we need fan support."

Before the game, Gallagher spotted Tulane offensive coordinator Frank Scelfo.

"We're going to all the away games this season," Gallagher screamed proudly.

"They're all away games," Scelfo said, smiling.

Eugene, Destrehan throttle Terrebonne

Lutcher, Riverside, St. Charles roll

It was no surprise that when Destrehan found itself in a bind, it turned to its all-star player.

And he came through every time.

Quarterback Jai Eugene threw for 225 yards and three touchdowns, and he ran for 61 yards and a score to lead the Wildcats (2-0) to a 35-13 victory at Terrebonne on Friday night in Houma.

With his team leading 7-0 late in the first quarter but facing a third-and-34 play, Eugene broke free from pressure and threw a 41-yard completion to Joshua Martin. Four plays later, Destrehan took a 14-0 advantage on Raynor Derkins' one-yard run.

Edwin Reed scored his second long touchdown on a 29-yard catch in the end zone, on which he stole the ball from Terrebonne defensive back Edrik Johnson.

With 10:09 remaining in the first half, Destrehan led 21-0.

But the Tigers (0-2) came back with two quick scores to start the second half, and the lead was trimmed to eight.

"Coach said that if we have it that big, we've got to take it down," Eugene said. "Even though we let them have a little, we had to maintain our ground and play hard.

(At halftime) Coach told us we were going to run the ball more, and I had to take over."

He did.

After rushing for six yards in the first 24 minutes, Eugene had 55 in the second half, including runs of 16, 17 and 24 yards. He also scored the clinching touchdown from seven yards out with 2:26 remaining.

"He's a great athlete, and he can do it all," Destrehan coach Steve Robichaux said. "He's got a lot of good guys around him, and he keeps finding them to make big plays. He makes them when he has to, and that's what's most important."

LUTCHER HOLDS OFF THIBODAUX: Thibodaux turned what started out to be a Lutcher rout into a close game by scoring 14 points in the fourth quarter.

In the end, however, Lutcher's defense prevailed, and the Bulldogs escaped with a 20-14 non-district victory Friday night.

After scoring two big-play touchdowns and stopping a Lutcher drive short of midfield, the Tigers were driving. Thibodaux had the ball at the Lutcher 46 with 30 seconds remaining. But on fourth-and-five, Lutcher lineman Jyron White sacked Thibodaux quarterback Zach Chauvin to end the threat.

"I was surprised when it was 20-0, to tell the truth," Lutcher coach Tim Detillier said. "But it just seems like, whenever we play the St. Amants, the Thibodauxs, this is the kind of game we play. Last week (against St. Amant), we didn't get a break. Tonight, I felt like we got some breaks. 'Bout time. But it's nice to finally win one we're not supposed to win."

Thibodaux (0-2) muffed two punts, both of which were recovered by Lutcher. The first resulted in a 25-yard field goal by Terrence Jeffrey. The Tigers also had 85 yards in penalties.

After Thibodaux punted on its second possession, a personal foul penalty was tacked onto the return. The Bulldogs then took 11 plays to drive 55 yards. On fourth-and-goal at the 4, Rashad Webster threw a halfback pass to Juan Johnson for the touchdown. Jeffrey's extra point increased Lutcher's lead to10-0 with 8:16 to play.

Bulldogs running back Wayne Albert, who rushed for 108 yards on 17 carries, made it 17-0 when he grabbed a short screen pass and ran 35 yards for a touchdown. Lutcher took that lead into halftime and added to it with a 28-yard field goal by Jeffrey to open the third quarter. That would be all the scoring for the Bulldogs.

But Thibodaux was just getting started.

After forcing the Bulldogs to turn the ball over on downs at the Tigers' 20 with 7:13 left in the game, Thibodaux took eight plays to score. Chauvin passed to Demetrius McCoy for a 25-yard touchdown with 4:35 to play, then Chauvin ran for the two-point conversion.

The Tigers then forced Lutcher to punt after three plays and took over at their own 29. After an incompletion, Chauvin again passed to McCoy, who broke a tackle at the Lutcher 45 and sprinted the rest of the way for a 71-yard touchdown. The failed.

The Tigers again contained Lutcher on its next drive. After Albert gained a yard, Poche fumbled and recovered back-to-back snaps, and the Bulldogs had to punt.

From the Tigers' 30, Chauvin threw to Kelvin Adams for 19 yards, then he ran for six yards to the Lutcher 45. A screen pass to Chaz James lost a yard, then Chauvin threw incomplete over the middle. On fourth-and-five, Chauvin dropped back and found only Lutcher linemen Jordan Gant and Jyron White in his face. White dropped Chauvin for the loss.

REBELS OVERWHELM FALCONS: For a little more than two hours, the home-team Riverside Rebels and the St. Thomas Aquinas Falcons provided high school football fans with a respite from flood waters and flood insurance and FEMA on Friday.

For a little more than two hours, play-action and sweeps and fumbles and interceptions became the order of the day, as Hurricane Katrina was temporarily relegated to the back burner.

The Rebels' offense (2-0) displayed the ability to score with quick strikes and methodical marches in a 27-0 non-district victory.

Riverside scored on its first snap and on its next possession to take a 12-0 lead against the Falcons (0-2), who struggled on offense, finishing with 62 yards rushing and 56 yards passing.

Sophomore running back Jarid Caeser led Riverside with 190 yards rushing on 17 carries and scored three touchdowns and a two-point conversion.

After the Riverside defense held on the game's first series, Caeser broke through on the first snap and scored from 55 yards at the 10:09 mark.

The 6-0 lead doubled on the next series, as Riverside marched 91 yards in 10 plays. Caeser and quarterback A.J. Delaneuville opened the drive with 11-yard gains. Then Caeser again shook free and scored from 40 yards with 2:26 to play in the first quarter.

Delaneuville completed a 37-yard pass to Chase Emerson on the next series, but the drive resulted in a missed field-goal attempt.

Riverside did not manage another first down in the half.

"We had too many penalties," Riverside coach Mickey Roussel said. "That was problem No. 1. The other was some foolish mistakes."

Riverside picked up six players from schools affected by the hurricane, and Roussel expects to add two more.

"It does not affect our kids," Roussel said about any possible change in the depth charts.

"I thought this was a pretty good effort tonight. The defense was outstanding."

The Falcons started the second half with Kyle Musacchia recovering the opening kickoff at the Rebels' 25. But Riverside's defense sacked quarterback Chris Graves for a 12-yard loss, and the threat ended with an interception by Collin Yeargin that he returned 20 yards.

Riverside's third scoring drive covered 77 yards. It was highlighted by a 24-yard gain by Delaneuville, who scored untouched from 30 yards following a fake handoff.

Caeser returned a punt 45 yards to set up his 34-yard touchdown run with 6:46 in the game.

St. Thomas Aquinas' Justin Burns attempted a 43-yard field goal with 48 seconds to play, but it was wide.

"We are a very young team, with just nine seniors," St. Thomas coach Randy Johnson said. "For two weeks our defense has played very well, so we just need some help from our offense."

Bill Bumgarner

ROBOTTOM PROPELS COMETS: A couple of acrobatic catches, some weaving runs, and threatening kick returns drew attention to St. Charles Catholic junior receiver Casey Robottom on Friday night in a home non-district game against H.L. Bourgeois.

The Comets' defense did the rest, pushing St. Charles to a 28-7 victory.

Robottom began his work in the second quarter. He burst up the middle and weaved around tacklers toward the left sideline on a 51-yard touchdown run that gave St. Charles Catholic (2-0) a 14-0 lead with 4:50 remaining in the half.

H.L. Bourgeois (0-2) answered. Jake Hebert threw a 79-yard touchdown pass over the middle to Willie McKinley, who caught the ball in stride, cutting the margin to 14-7.

But Robottom struck again. He caught a 34-yard pass while backpedaling that put the Comets on the Bourgeois 28-yard line. Four plays later, Christopher Jones caught Philip Sutton's six-yard touchdown pass to extend the Comets' lead to 21-7 with 52 seconds left until halftime.

Robottom finished the first half with two carries for 72 yards, two catches for 48 yards, and one kickoff return for 25 yards. He finished the night with 196 all-purpose yards (91 rushing, 79 receiving, and 26 return yards).

He made a diving catch at the end of the third quarter, scooping up the ball just before it hit the grass on a third-and-17 play, gaining 26 yards.

Though that drive stalled on a sack, St. Charles blocked an H.L. Bourgeois punt on the next drive and Darin Helm recovered the ball and ran eight yards for the touchdown that put St. Charles ahead 28-7.

The Comets' defense allowed one big play in the second quarter, but held the Braves to 66 yards rushing, 26 in the first half. Most of Jake Hebert's 128 passing yards came on the touchdown pass. The Comets' Jared Nowell ended another Braves drive with an interception deep in St. Charles territory.

St. Charles scored on its first possession when Matthew Walters ran two yards for a touchdown, capping a 10-play, 50-yard drive.

N.O. can thrive, but only as nature allows

By Bob Marshall
Outdoors editor

The dividing line between good and bad could not have been starker.

Inside the levees that formed the border of Port Sulphur - the Mississippi River levee on the east, the so-called hurricane protection levee on the west - the scene was one of utter, ugly ruin. Islands of debris that had once been homes, marinas and schools floated in a sickening black sea of fetid water. Even at 300 feet in a seaplane, the odor of what had happened there permeated the humid air.

It was a different story outside the levees. On one side green oyster grass sliced by bayous rested under the sun, clean and quiet. On the other the big river flowed easily toward the Gulf. Nature seemed at peace.

We all saw the contrast. Wildlife biologist Scott Burdett spoke first. "There's a lesson to be learned from that picture, and some serious questions to be asked," he said.

Indeed.

In the immediate wake of Hurricane Katrina, the obvious question coming from all parts of the country went like this: Why rebuild a city that sits on sinking lands in a hurricane zone?

The answer is equally obvious. For the same reason we're not moving Los Angeles or San Francisco, which sit on major fault lines. Or Miami or Tampa, which sit on the coast in hurricane zones. Or Denver and Las Vegas, which are sucking local aquifers dry.

It would be too expensive and far too inhuman to attempt to move a million or more people. Further, those cities represent important cogs in the nation's economy. In our case, the city's port is indispensable to the economies of all those states that touch the Mississippi River and its tributaries, easily one-third of the nation.

That said, this disaster should finally teach the nation a lesson it has refused to learn for 200 years: Our communities must live within the infrastructure of the ecosystems upon which they are built. If we allow ourselves to grow beyond those limits we are courting disaster, whether on the Gulf Coast, the Great Plains or the arid west.

We can live safely in New Orleans, but only if we respect the natural storm defenses that once existed. If we hadn't allowed industry to destroy half the marshes that were found south of the city 100 years ago, Katrina's blows would have been much less severe. If we had put parochial concerns aside 20 years ago and united behind plans to rebuild those marshes, many more of us would be dry today, and the nation would be $100 billion richer. If we hadn't allowed developers to put houses and businesses in areas prone to flooding, we would have a smaller city – but we would have had much less death and destruction.

We can live here in safety, but not if we try to ignore nature. Yes, we will need to build levees that are high enough and strong enough to withstand a Category 5 storm, but we must also rebuild the wetlands we've destroyed, even if that means removing some old developments and curtailing future growth. If not, we'll soon be an island in the Gulf too vulnerable for levees of any height to protect.

This lesson isn't only for New Orleans. Disasters on a similar scale are building across the nation, just from different forces of nature, and all because our planners put "growth" ahead of respect for their ecosystems. Western cities like Denver and Las Vegas that were built on dry or semi-arid landscapes have been allowed to grow without limits. Now they face the prospect of running out of water in 30 or 40 years, leaving millions of people homeless.

Yet the solutions being discussed point to further development – trapping water in endless reservoirs, piping it down from Canada, taking it from the sea. Even if possible, those ideas would cost billions and still not solve the problem, because the continued growth would soon out-pace the new supply.

They can have their cities in the desert just as we can have our city on the delta – but only if we respect the natural systems we're building on. The penalties we court for ignoring and destroying those systems can be found in New Orleans today.

Like many, Campos struggling with effects of Katrina

CAMPO, from C-1

"I'll tell you, we're lucky we got out of there with our lives." They have little else left.

Katrina is being called the most destructive natural event in the nation's history, a storm that spawned a million stories of horror, escape and lives suddenly changed. The Campos have one such story.

If a family and a place can be an icon for a tradition as old and cherished as fishing in southeast Louisiana, it has always been the Campos and Blackie's Shell Beach hoist. They have been fixtures not just on the Lake Borgne fishing scene, but in the hearts and dreams of three generations of metro-area residents. Saying "Blackie's" in a New Orleans crowd is almost like saying "Archie." The name brought instant recognition, and visions of a place as much a part of the local culture as Jackson Square. The Campo clan had been there since the 1800s, running their hoist since 1931. They seemed permanent, even in a region where land disappeared at the rate of 35 square miler a year.

Today they are gone, and the future is uncertain. Blackie and his wife, Mabel, are staying with family in Baton Rouge. Ken, 57, and Kenny, 33, are earning a wage working on hurricane cleanup crews in St. Tammany Parish.

"We're making a living, and happy to have it," said Kenny. "But did I ever dream it would come to this? Not until that day.

"And I can tell you exactly when everything changed." It was 11 a.m. On Monday, Aug. 29, and the Campo men were in a celebratory mood. Katrina's eye and its vicious 145-mph winds had passed close to the area, but they had come through unscathed in the house just 200 yards from the river levee. They really weren't surprised.

"When I built my house, I chose that land in Poydras because everyone said it had never flooded there, ever," Kenny said. "That's why we evacuated there. We had locked down Grandpa's house, the hoist and the business on Sunday, our families had gone to Baton Rouge, and we'd come to my house because – like Grandpa said – it never floods in Poydras.

"And after the first part of Katrina passed, it still hadn't flooded." With a new generator purring, the men watched the storm's progress on TV and were preparing to have some lunch. Kenny went outside bare-chested and barefoot to pick up the few shingles blown off his roof. That's when he heard a peculiar hissing sound, and looked up the street.

"Water was coming down the street, then from the other yards, then up the street, it was just pouring in from everywhere," he said. "By the time I got back to the house, it was up to my knees."

His alarms dumbfounded his father and grandfather.

"Kenny comes in yelling 'We got to get out of here! We got to go!' and I didn't know what he was talking about," Ken Sr. said. "Then the water started coming in the house."

The men ran to their two pickup trucks, Blackie joining Kenny in one, Ken Sr., in the other, and with the water rising fast made a hurried, fateful decision.

"As we're getting in the pickups, I'm thinking about where we should go," Ken recalled. "At first I thought we should try to get to St. Bernard High School, then maybe the courthouse. But the levee was right there, so we just took off and drove up to the top of the levee.

"Let me tell you, maybe 15 minutes had passed since Kenny saw that water until the time we got to the top of the levee, but by then there was seven feet of water in his house, and it was still rising. We were on the only high ground left. If we'd tried to go anywhere else, we would have all drowned."

They were safe, but only for the moment. Katrina's winds returned, blowing from the northwest with a vengeance.

"It was so strong it was rocking those pickup trucks, and several gusts almost rolled us completely over," Ken said. "We finally decided we had to drive part way down the river side of the levee. That got us some protection, but we were still being bounced by the gusts.

"We stayed like that for two hours, but it seemed like weeks. It was really, really scary. Several times I thought we'd be rolled into the river."

When the wind and rain finally eased, the men drove north on the levee to Violet, where Ken's brother, F.J., had planned to ride out the storm in his 55-foot shrimp trawler. What they saw along the way made them anxious. The parish was a lake broken only by the roofs of homes, many holding people begging for help. They rescued a few, including several relatives.

Each mile made them fear the worst for Violet and F.J. But he was fine, and the shrimp boat became their home for the next three days.

"We had a whole bunch of people living on boats, waiting to find out just what had happened," Kenny said.

The survivors helped open the Violet floodgates with hand power, and on the Wednesday after the storm, the Campos motored down the MR-GO to check on their business and homes in Shell Beach. It was a short voyage, but one they will never forget.

"The (MR-GO) levee was gone, and that's what probably flooded St. Bernard and Poydras," Kenny reasoned. "The channel was twice as wide as it was before the storm.

"When we made that turn from the channel into the bayou (Ycloskey), we couldn't believe our eyes – because there was nothing to see. The steel beams and the roof on the hoist were still standing, but there was nothing else left. It was total devastation."

Blackie's home, which had withstood everything nature had thrown its way since 1956, the marina store, the boat sheds, and almost every home on nearby Proctor's Landing and Beauregard Estates were gone. Only slabs remained.

"My house was built strong, with the idea of hurricanes hitting," Ken Sr. said. "The pilings were driven deep, and they were anchored in the slab, and then bolted to the frame of the house. Everything was bolted and anchored down. And there's nothing left.

"I don't mean it was torn down. I mean it's nowhere to be found. I don't know what hit us, but it had to be a hell of a lot of water, and an incredible amount of wind."

Blackie looked at the scene through eyes that have watched nature play violent games with his native marshes for 87 years, and was still shocked.

"I knew it would be bad, especially after the flooding at Kenny's house, but I've never seen anything like this," he said. "You put all the other storms together, and they don't equal this.

"I don't know where my house is, or even its roof. Nothing's left. It's almost like we were never there." By the end of the week, the family had effected a rescue thanks to friends in Covington, and cousin David Snyder, a native who had relocated to Baton Rouge more than 15 years ago. Like hundreds of thousands of other evacuees, their immediate concern was getting work, and their vast extended fishing family was ready to help.

"We got offers to work, places to stay – people have just been unreal," said Ken. "We're OK for now." But the future is in question. The infrastructure of the fishing business – roads, fuel, ice and customers – is in shambles.

"Sure, we'd like to rebuild the business, but even if we could do that next week – they could open the roads, fix the bridges, get power and fuel – where would our customers come from?" Kenny pointed out. "I can't see us staying out forever, but for right now I don't see how any of that's going to get done very soon."

Ken agreed but said his clan is struggling with the same emotions all Katrina evacuees are saddled with. He and Kenny will look for work and places to live with their families as close to home as possible, and make the best of it.

Blackie and his wife of 65 years will remain for now with his cousin in a Baton Rouge subdivision called Camelot. He knows it's too far from the marsh to live up to that name.

Officials urge caution for outdoors people

'Dramatically changed' landscape can be dangerous, DWF says

By Bob Marshall
Outdoors editor

As hurricane evacuees return to their homes in southeast Louisiana this week, trying to resume a normal life, state fish and wildlife officials caution there will be nothing normal about hunting, fishing and outdoors sports in the region.

Deer and rabbit seasons have been canceled until further notice in St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes as Department of Wildlife and Fisheries biologists attempt to assess Hurricane Katrina's impact on those species.

Alhtough other seasons will follow their announced schedules, getting to fish and game could prove very challenging and dangerous, agency officials said. "Technically, teal season is open, and so are the WMAs (wildlife management areas) in those coastal parishes, but people have to realize they're going back to a dramatically changed landscape," said Dave Moreland, DWF Wildlife Division administrator.

"Nothing looks like the same. There are obstacles that can prove dangerous. And there are no services out there for the sportsman. Be careful."

Moreland said the deer and rabbit seasons were closed after aerial surveys by the agency revealed serious damage to wildlife habitat in both parishes. His agency typically closes hunting season if storm damage leaves wildlife more vulnerable to hunting.

"It will remain closed until we can get on the ground and make more detailed studies of the species impacted," Moreland said. "Those are the only two species and the only two parishes currently affected by the closure.

"Everything else is open."

Though the other seasons are open, many of the roads and bridges sportsmen would use to access launching spots in those areas still are not fully open. Even if they were, the marinas that served sportsmen in the lower half of both parishes were wiped away by Katrina.

"There are no launches, no fuel, no ice, nothing," said Moreland.

Even if determined sportsmen launched at distant marinas and tried to motor to places like Pass a Loutre Wildlife Refuge at the mouth of the Mississippi River, or Biloxi Wildlife Management Area in lower St. Bernard Parish, their trip would be extremely hazardous. Katrina's floodwaters have left many bayous and canals clogged with grass clumps, turned some lagoons into solid marsh, and created new lakes where marsh once was.

Finally, even if they could reach their objective, there's little guarantee hunters would find any game. "The mouth of the river is just brown, and all the duck food that was there is probably gone with the storm," Moreland said. "If ducks arrive, they'll probably leave pretty quick, because they won't have anything to eat."

Similar difficulties await land-based sportsmen. For instance, DWF biologists estimate the storm knocked down nearly 50 percent of the timber on the popular Pearl River Wildlife Management Area. The agency had crews on the property last week attempting to clear access roads, but the interior of the area remains a maze of newly downed trees.

"A hunter won't recognize his old trails, that's for sure," Moreland said.

"If you're going to hunt, make sure you're prepared for this new landscape. Go early, be careful."

One last meal in the Old New Orleans

Clancy's was packed that Saturday night before the storm as city-dwellers savored the flavor of the city they love

By Brett Anderson
Restaurant writer

Five years ago this month, my girlfriend and I flew to New Orleans so I could interview for a job that, like everything, changed irreversibly Aug. 29. As part of the interview process, I was asked to write sample reviews of two New Orleans restaurants. One of them was Clancy's.

I had two meals at the restaurant in three days, the second of them a Saturday evening dinner, after which we took a cab to see Los Hombres Calientes at Tipitina's. It was that night that convinced me I wanted this job, that this was my kind of town, and it was at Tips where I ran into Keith Spera, a future colleague and great friend who, the Saturday before Katrina hit, just eight hours before I fled my house, picked me up in his convertible. His top was down. It was a beautiful night.

We were headed to Clancy's.

For me, getting to the restaurant is part of its draw. I live downtown, in the Faubourg Marigny. Clancy's is an Uptown institution. The distance between the two coordinates is, by my measure, as far as you can travel from my house without crossing the parish line or settling for less. And the drive can't be beat. We traced the edge of the French Quarter and then sped through the Garden District via St. Charles Avenue, where gnarled oak trees obscured our view of a bright moon. The table we thought we'd have to wait for was ready when we arrived at Clancy's.

I didn't expect many restaurants to be open on the Last Saturday Night in Old New Orleans. The fearful, mobilizing citizenry had rendered westbound traffic insane all day, and the restaurants I was currently reviewing - the ones I called first - were all closed.

That Clancy's was packed in spite of it all – "Can you say that again?" the host asked when I called about a table, struggling to hear over the crowd noise - says volumes about why it was an ideal setting for what we were calling our "last supper" - a glib joke in retrospect, but one that, mixed with a pre-prandial round of cocktails, helped dull the edge of the moment. It felt good to set our elbows on pressed white linens and stare into a room of people in the same predicament, drunk on rye whiskey, wine and lump crabmeat.

Keith and I were perusing the menu when our friend Cynthia walked through the door to join us. The dishes are printed in a font that matches the cursive "Clancy's" sign hanging outside the converted po-boy shop: Fried Oysters with Brie. Rabbit Sausage en Croute. Shrimp Remoulade. Smoked Soft Shell Crab with Crabmeat. Lamb Chops Webster. When the tuxedoed waiter informed us of the evening's appetizer special, I mentioned it could be a long time before anyone on earth utters the phrase "andouille-crusted duck livers in Creole mustard sauce" again.

"Our crabmeat salad tonight has a horseradish-sour cream-mayonnaise dressing," the waiter continued. "It's topped with Louisiana caviar. And there's a splash of vodka in there, too."

"Sold!" I howled, before also claiming the Panee Veal Annunciation: Two tender, pan-fried cutlets covered in béarnaise and crabmeat, a house specialty.

GINGER BARBIER, 48, NURSE

HOME: Aurora Gardens, Algiers
HAVEN: Her mother's home in Alexandria

MY STORM STORY

Hurricane Katrina: In their own words

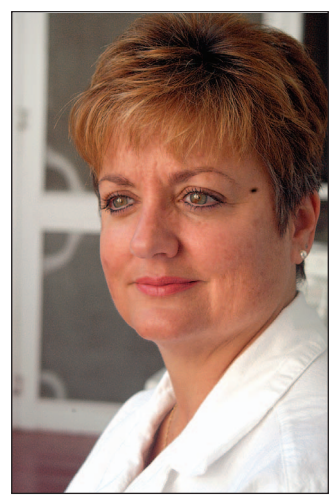
"My mother had colon resection surgery at Ochsner the Friday before the hurricane, and spent the night in ICU. Saturday we boarded the house and went to the hospital to be with her.



"The hospital lost electricity sometime between midnight and 6 a.m. Monday. The sky was a weird orange. My mother said it was like looking into the eyes of the devil. The hospital was full, because people dump their family members they can't take care of in hospitals when something like this happens.

"We were hot. People were scared. People were crying. People were sick. These were surgical patients. Some had brain surgery. Some had back surgery. Some had bowel surgery. Some were in beds. Some were in chairs. The space in the hall between the beds and the chairs and the pumps and wires was about hip wide.

"And then the fire alarm went off. There were fires we knew of on the 11th, eighth and fourth floors. The windows in the rooms were breaking. Water was coming in. It was scary.

"The whole staff was exhausted, and they were worried about their families. They were crying. The patients and families were crying. It was finally sinking in that no one was coming to help us. We kept asking, 'Where are the helicopters?'

"Thursday about 5 a.m., my mother's fever had shot up. She was in a total delirium. She's only 68, but this was a serious surgery. She was screaming that she was dying. I called my brother in Alexandria – that's where I grew up and she lives – and I said, 'We're getting out.'

"The staff didn't want me to leave without signing papers. I told them to get some Dilaudid and an anti-nausea medicine into her. I drew a box in the air and said, 'Box. Think outside the box.' I finally got her in my SUV, and on the Huey P. Long Bridge. I think I drove like 100 miles per hour and on the shoulder of the road.

"The hardest part was leaving all those people there. I cried the whole first hour in the car. We felt like these people were friends and family. I never did learn what happened to them. My mother is still in the hospital in Alexandria.

"There have been times I didn't want to do patient care. But to watch these nurses working, I was very proud to be a nurse. It's a very noble profession."

Finding peace in the country

Small towns offer shelter from the storm

BIG BEND, LA. – Like a lot of lost souls displaced by Katrina, I've lost track of days and time.

"Today's Tuesday, isn't it?" I ask my wife. "It's Wednesday," she replies. Wednesday, Tuesday, Monday – no big deal – it's a day.

"What time is it?" I ask. I don't wear a watch, never have. "It's 5:30," she says. "It can't be – I just asked you and you said it was 2:30," I say.

And then I remember that I fixed a broken window where the entire insect world was coming to pay a visit. Then I got in a pitched battle with some wasps (I'm highly allergic to them) but prevailed thanks to "Mata El Nido Entero!" (Kills the Entire Nest!) Raid Wasp & Hornet Killer. This stuff is like a super powerful anti-aircraft weapon in spray form, I think to myself, noting that I've never handled an anti-aircraft weapon. But it sure knocked them out of the sky.

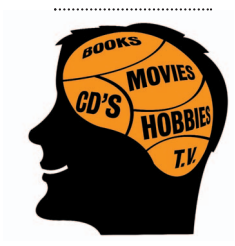
And then, pleased with my military action for the day, I headed up the road to get some grub.

I have come to recognize every house along Hwy. 451 going from Big Bend towards Moreauville and La. 1, which takes you north to Marksville and then on to Alexandria. The homes are spread out. Your neighbor could be a half mile away, maybe more. You might be able to see him with binoculars.

We even take walks in the morning on Hwy. 451. Sounds dangerous, but there's no other place to walk. No sidewalk, no parks, the grass is too long on the levee and there are no paved jogging paths as there are in New Orleans and Jefferson Parish. So you walk in the lane where cars are coming toward you and step off the road when they get close. The drivers are used to me, so I don't get that "Who's the crazy guy walking down the highway with a headset on?" Now they just wave. They know I'm a fish out of water – an evacuee.

Nobody else is doing this – walking on the highway, 2.5 miles up and 2.5 miles back - but me and my wife. They all get their exercise in the fields, all day long. The last thing they need to do is take a walk for exercise.

I was talking to Carl, an employee of the Harvest Fresh supermarket in Marksville, and like all the folks up here, Carl is as nice as they come, walking me around the store, smiling, telling me where the bread is, where the mayo is, and asking me if I'm doing OK. I tell Carl I never could understand why anyone would want to live in a small town, but in the last few weeks I've figured it out.



The pace is slow and concern for your fellow man is high on

Trivial pursuits to take your mind off you-know-what

IN times of disaster, experts recommend getting back to the familar tasks as soon as possible. Here are three to-do's that may bring comfort.

— By David Cuthbert, theater critic

OBVIOUSLY, NOW IS THE TIME TO REARRANGE YOUR BOOKSHELVES. Begin your task with a firm plan to arrange your library alpahebtically, by author or subject. Inevitably, you will find a book you just have to open, sample and then read and happily, you will forget all about your original task.

NOW IS THE PERFECT TIME TO SPEND THAT ALL-ELUSIVE QUALITY time with your children or grandchildren. Whether it's quiet time or vigorous physical activity outdoors, simply hand them over to your husband and tell him not to show their faces for the next two hours while you treat yourself to a nice soak, nap or romance novel.

SIT DOWN AND MAKE A LIST OF TASKS YOU HAVE NEVER HAD TIME TO DO. With each new task, you accomplish reward yourself with a liberal helping of your favorite spiritous libation . With any luck, you will fall into a sodden slumber before too many tasks have been accomplished.

A meal before the storm

CLANCY'S, from C-7

Cynthia ordered the proscuitto-wrapped shrimp over stone-ground grits and the smoked softshell. Keith had a taste for drum, and the waiter, who Keith, a native of eastern New Orleans, has known for years, recommended it pan-sautéed with meuniere sauce. "It's not on the menu, but I'll get it for you," the waiter assured him. When the massive drum filet arrived under a mound of crabmeat, I blurted an answer to a question that's no doubt crossed a lot of CNN-watchers' minds recently. "This is why we live here," I said.

There are other reasons, of course, and to the list I've added things I saw when I returned to New Orleans after Katrina trashed it. In a week of reporting alongside colleagues infinitely better suited to the task than I, I stepped over dead bodies. I rode through flooded streets on the back of a military truck designed to haul rockets. I scribbled quotes from countless soldiers and cops and survivors. I met a guy who, having just been rescued by boat from his flooded Gentilly home, openly questioned the wisdom of his decision to leave. He had plenty of Sterno, spices, water, smoked turkey. He'd just cooked up a batch of red beans.

Most of all I felt that resting on the precipice of existence was not just a magical city but my home. Returning to a death-stricken New Orleans was heart-breaking, but abandoning it for a more comfortable place, even my birthplace, would have been even harder to bear.

Coming to this realization helped me understand that there are reasons beyond stubbornness, ignorance or lack of means that compel people to ride out storms - and then, even more astonishingly, endure the nightmare that follows. They stay because they love New Orleans, love it with an intensity you would a human being. They'll be damned if they're going to turn their back on it, particularly now.

I'm lucky to live here, even today, but that doesn't mean I wouldn't give anything to turn back the clock. We finished our meal at Clancy's with a slice of lemon icebox pie. "You have to," our waiter said.

See 'our town' at the Armani opening

NELL NOLAN

Social scene

HOUSTON — "When you go through the Galleria doors, you'll see a great-looking bunch of guys in black. They've got to be the Armani models," said my husband Robert as he entered our car - I was picking him up from work - and I alighted. As it turned out, they were the wait staff.

The trademark black for Italian designer Giorgio Armani served as the base color for the white wording of the invitation: "Giorgio Armani invites you to celebrate our opening (in the Galleria of Houston) and the kick-off to the grand gala ball at the Museum of Fine Arts, Houston." Cocktails and hip hobnobbing were the format, as was shopping with a capital S. Fifteen percent of purchases during a two-week period would benefit the gala ball, which is scheduled for Oct. 7 at the museum. Chairing it are Mrs. Harry H. Cullen Jr. and Mrs. Peter Kurth Jameson. Both were mingling at the Armani outing.

City Kitchen did the catering and taped music-of-the moment played, adding a decibel or two as the crowd increased. Seven-foot-tall models mingled in the crowd, punctuating their peregrinations by climbing up on translucent "glass" cubes for poses. To-diet-for clothes and neat hairdos were the LOOK.

Now for the Big Easy connections!

As I mixed with the sartorial swells, and savored a white-cranberry martini and a ratatouille hors d'oeuvre, I approached two gorgeous gals to ask them if they knew Margaret (Mrs. Thomas R. IV) Reckling. Through my Houston-resident sister, Nancy (Mrs. John S.) Parsley, Margaret was a contact. She's also connected to Orleanian Kay Reckling (Mrs. R. Roy) Fausset. Judy in the Rink at Prytania Street and Washington Avenue is the Fausset's shop.

When I mentioned my name to the comely duo, one of them gave me a big hug. "Nell," she said, "I'm Ria and Dick Seba's daughter." Yeah! The Crescent City connection was starting. She identified herself as Cindy Cook and her friend as Michelle Stewart. A week before the horrible hurricane, Ria and a gang of New Orleans' artsy movers and shakers gathered for lunch to fete birthday girl Yvonne Coe. There were about 12 hostesses.

Moments later, erstwhile Orleanian George Lancaster, who, years ago, spearheaded Canal Place and made just about every social round, arrived at the Armani ado with our town's Lisa Tudor. (Some of her news was getting her twins enrolled in a Houston school.) "Are you getting tons of e-mail from (displaced) friends?" asked George, who definitely was. Then he turned to Lisa with "Let's shop!"

George's photo appears in the current issue of Houston's Papercity, which features style, fashion and the socially seen. The Armani venue in partnership with the magazine hosted the party.

Familiar faces in new places also rendered E.J. "Jodie" and Maryann Hoffer, who've partied in New Orleans with Sheila Davlin and Mickey Easterling. They said that Sheila's still in Paris, where she spent the summer, and that she'll probably head to California to stay with her movie-making son, Josh, for a while. Jodie and Maryann caught me up on former Orleanians Bonnie and Bill Eubanks, who are still giving generously to our town's cultural causes. They're off to central Europe.

As a sub-layer to all the Armani levity, there was the sentiment expressed by almost everybody I talked to concerning the destruction and aftermath of Katrina. Numerous people told me that they had already made donations or were hosting families. Others asked what they could do.

"My thoughts and my prayers are with you and New Orleans" said John Bies, Giorgio Armani Area operating manager.

Losing track of time

LIND, from C-7

the list. People aren't uptight like they are in the city. There is no rat race, no road rage, no gridlock, no traffic report – hell, there's no traffic. People always have time for you. Nobody blows you off. Nobody is rude. Nobody's in a hurry. Everybody says hello or waves.

The mindset and attitude is infectious. Sure, I want to get home eventually, but for the first time since Aug. 29, I feel relaxed. And if I had to guess, despite all that's happened, all the stress and uncertainty, all the anguish of being a long way from home, away from my son, my daughter and my buddies, I'd guess my blood pressure is down. And it's usually up, as my doctor would tell you.

I tell Carl, who came from a tiny Louisiana community, that I've lost track of time.

He laughs. And then he shares with me some great country wisdom that was given to him: "Time don't mean nuthin' to a hog."

I tell this to my wife and for the first time in a while, she laughs out loud – really loud. I make a note: We've got to get back and visit with Carl some more.

Aug. 29 seems so long ago now that I can't even remember what I was working on or writing about. All I know is that it wasn't very important, even though I'm sure I thought it was. Someday I'll remember.

But right now I'm remembering something I saw framed over a sink in Elizabeth, La., where we spent one night with some other nomadic types from New Orleans on yet another farm that featured horses, lots of old friendly country dogs, peacocks and – if you can believe it – a llama. I was so impressed with what I read inside that frame that I took the time to jot it down:

"As children bring their broken toys
With tears for us to mend
I brought my broken dreams to God
Because he was my friend."

"But then instead of leaving him
In peace to work alone
I hung around and tried to help
With ways that were my own."

"At last I snatched them back and cried,
'How can you be so slow?'
'My child,' he said, 'What could I do?
You never would let go.'"

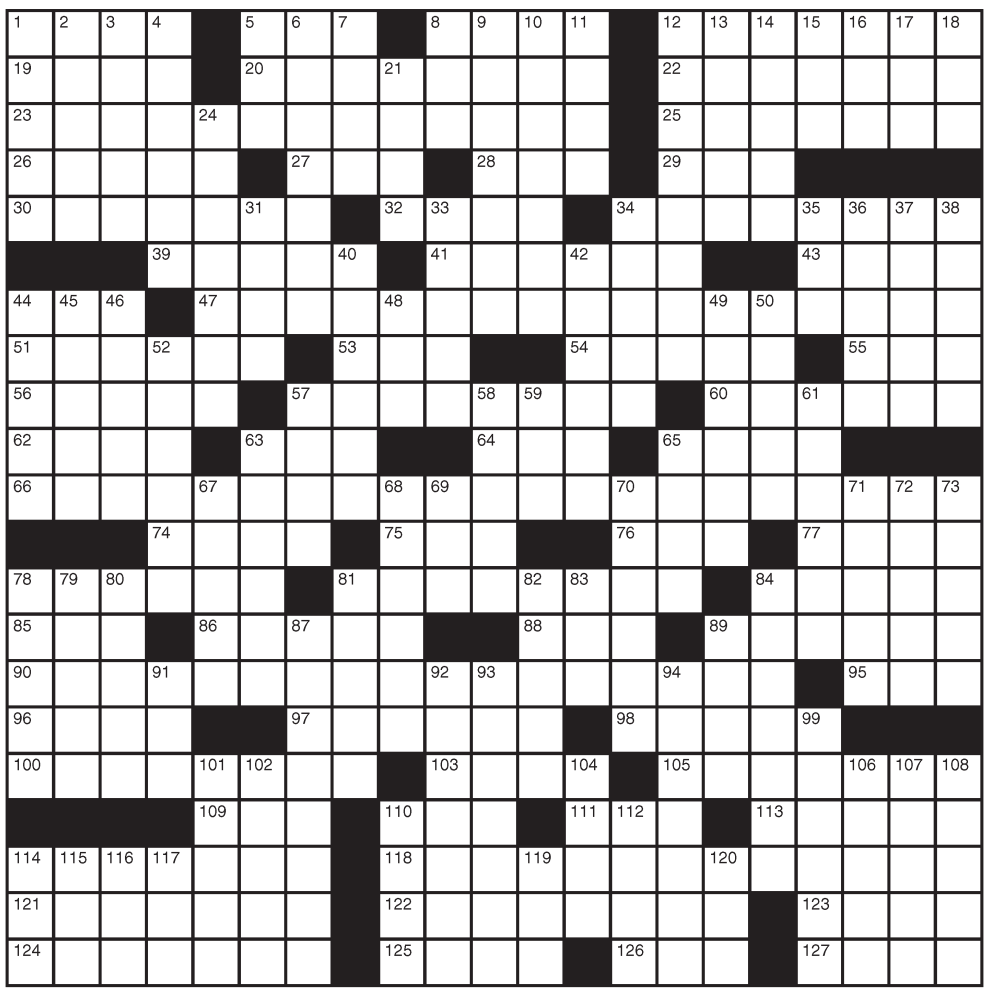
The credit at the bottom said "Author Unknown," probably the most prolific writer in history. But the wisdom was sound. Right now, there are a lot of broken dreams. And a lot of healing and mending that needs to take place. And it's going to take a long, long time to fix things. So being patient will not only be a virtue, it will be a necessity.



And so will be trusting in whomever you pray to.

I've decided to do that. Every day, from now on.

Tulane running back Matt Forte tries to find a seam in Mississippi State's defense Saturday. The Green Wave's season opener was moved to Shreveport due to the effects of Hurricane Katrina.

Hoping to shake off the effects of the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Tulane comes up short against Mississippi State in its season opener.

By Fred Robinson
Staff writer

SHREVEPORT — The Tulane Green Wave, playing its first game of the season after being forced to relocate in north Louisiana because of Hurricane Katrina, battled back from a 14-point deficit before a critical mistake aided Mississippi State in its 21-14 victory over Tulane at Independence

Bowl Stadium.

"If I weren't a competitor I wouldn't be disappointed, and the team wouldn't either. But in reality, I'm very proud of the way we got off that bus and ran out of the tunnel and played as hard as we could for 60 minutes," Tulane coach Chris Scelfo said.

The Green Wave, which was penalized 10 times for 75 yards and lost two of three fumbles, didn't run out of chances until there was no time left on the clock. The game ended with Wave quarterback Lester Ricard heaving a Hail Mary pass into the Bulldogs' end zone. The ball was tipped by a Mississippi State player and dropped to the turf incomplete near the back of the end zone.

"Fighting back is great, but not winning hurts," Ricard said. "This team is filled with character. Right now, there's no happiness around here."

After a scoreless first half, Mississippi State (2-1) scored on its first and third series of the third quarter. But as quickly as the Green Wave fell into a hole, it dug itself out and tied the score on an 18-yard run by senior running back Jovon Jackson with 9:35 showing.

But the hope that Scelfo had been telling his players was going to be a huge part of its 2005 season began slipping away with just less than eight minutes left. The defense forced the Bulldogs to punt on fourth-and-11. But kick returner Izzy Route lost the ball. It was recovered by Mississippi State's Lance Long at Tulane's 17 with 7:57 to play.

Tulane fans made the trek to Independence Stadium in Shreveport to support their team. These Wave backers show their support for TU tight ends coach and recruiting coordinator Brad Smiley.

On the Bulldogs' next play, running back Jerious Norwood, who was held to 15 rushing yards in the first half by Tulane's defense, broke loose for the deciding touchdown.

Tulane's offense, which stumbled through the first half, had two more opportunities following the Bulldogs' final score. On the first possession, punter Chris Beckman completed a 27-yard pass to Preston Brown on fourth-and-11 from its 19. It was the longest pass completed by the Green Wave.

However, the big play went unrewarded. Four plays later, the Wave was again facing a fourth down, and this time it punted.

On its final possession, time proved to be the biggest enemy. It converted a fourth-and-9, reaching the Bulldogs' 39 with only eight seconds to play. But at that point, the Wave's options were now down one play.

The loss to Mississippi State, in many ways, was much like the loss to the Bulldogs last season. The offense didn't perform up to its capabilities in the first half, and a critical turnover in the second half gave Mississippi State all the momentum it needed in taking a 28-7 win.

Although Mississippi State scored the winning touchdown Saturday one play after recovering the fourth-quarter fumble, Scelfo would not allow the loss to be pinned on that mistake. Instead, he blamed his decision for trying an onside kick after the Wave closed to 14-7 as a major mistake.

"I thought the second half we played our football game," Scelfo said. "I thought there was one big play in the game; the decision to go for the onside kick was bad by me from the standpoint that it probably turned the field around. That was the worst play of the game."

Scelfo said there were other aspects of the game that played a part in Tulane's loss. The team's conditioning wasn't what he was hoping it would be, and the players were maybe a little bit too high at the start of the game. Eight of the Wave's 10 penalties came in the first half.

"Our emotion was way too high early in the game," Scelfo said. "I think a lot of it had to do with the emotions of what we've been going through."

Wave to play SLU in Tiger Stadium

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

SHREVEPORT — Tulane's Oct. 1 game against Southeastern Louisiana will be played in Baton Rouge at LSU's Tiger Stadium.

In the past two days, Tulane athletic director Rick Dickson worked out a plan with LSU athletic director Skip Bertman and his associates for the Green Wave to play Southeastern Louisiana at 2:30 p.m. Otherwise, Dickson was planning to play the game in Shreveport, or in Hattiesburg, Miss.

"What we're trying to accomplish in all of this is, when possible, we'd like to play in-state, around our fans," Dickson said. "And we look at where the opponents are and see which site makes sense, because there is also a financial aspect in all of this."

LSU's football team is on the road against Mississippi State on Oct. 1. The SLU game was originally Tulane's homecoming, scheduled for City Park's Tad Gormley Stadium.

"In a very short time frame, it came up to be a very suitable solution," Dickson said. "We're excited about coming back to south Louisiana, and playing in front of a lot of New Orleanians."

Tulane will cover the cost of event management, such as ushers and ticket-takers, and Tulane will get the money from ticket sales.

Dickson's next task is scheduling the next home game, an Oct. 8 game against Houston. He said he should have a better idea of the location by Wednesday. Independence Stadium in Shreveport and Ladd-Peebles Stadium in Mobile, Ala., are possibilities.

Tulane plays next Saturday at Southern Methodist in Dallas.

FIRST IMPRESSION: Tulane junior Preston Brown started at wide receiver for the first time, and promptly caught his first pass, a 20-yard grab with 10:10 left in the first quarter. Brown became quarterback Lester Ricard's go-to receiver in the first half, catching five passes for 52 yards, including one in which he broke a tackle and picked up a first down. He finished with nine receptions for 117 yards, both game-highs.

"I wanted to make every opportunity count," Brown said.

His biggest catch was with 6:13 remaining in the fourth quarter, when Chris Beckman faked a punt and passed to Brown down the sideline for 27 yards. And pass interference was called on the cornerback defending Brown. The catch was the longest of the game for either team.

NEW-LOOK LINE: Although the left side of Tulane's offensive line looked the same as the past two seasons, the right side included guard Michael Parenton, starting for the first time. Right tackle Derek Rogers started instead of Troy Kropog, who battled Rogers through much of camp. Rogers started twice in 2004 and twice in 2003. Kropog played often Saturday, and he was at right tackle during Tulane's final drive.

EXTRA POINTS: Cornerback Bruce Youmans started for the first time since 2003, when he started five games. Receiver Damarcus Davis extended his starting streak to eight games. He missed 2003 with an injury, then cracked the lineup in 2004 in the fifth game. ... Kenneth Guidroz made the field on the second play, the sophomore's first career action as a receiver. Freshman receivers Brian King and Cary Koch also played for the first time. Guidroz and King each caught three passes, and Koch caught one. ... After seven quarters without a score, Mississippi State scored its first touchdown with 12:17 left in the third. The score was a three-yard pass to running back Jerious Norwood, the senior's first career touchdown reception. ... Attendance at Independence Stadium was announced as 16,421. ... Tulane president Scott Cowen attended. Tulane men's basketball coach Dave Dickerson and three assistants drove in from Texas A&M, where the team is based this semester.

Wave's thoughts elsewhere before focusing on Bulldogs

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

SHREVEPORT — Twenty minutes before kickoff in the season opener Saturday, the locker room doors opened, and there sat the Tulane football players, New Orleans resting on their shoulder pads.

A few players uneasily cracked jokes. Others lost themselves in headphones, while rap music blared so loud that passersby deciphered the lyrics. Receiver Bubba Terranova, whose parents' home in Slidell was hit hard by Hurricane Katrina, stared at his hands.

These players were all evacuees of the hurricane. Victims, too. After scrambling to Jackson, Miss., they traveled to Dallas, then Ruston and finally to an antiquated locker room at Shreveport's Independence Stadium.

Kenneth Guidroz smiled nervously. Two weeks after fearing his father dead, he prepared for his first college game at receiver. Brandon Spincer's home was damaged heavily by Katrina. So was his parents' home. The senior bowed his head in prayer.

Assistant coach Bill D'Ottavio strutted past the players, shattering the silence: "Cut it loose, let's have some fun out here." The coach, like the others, wore his gray practice shirt and green mesh practice shorts. His game clothes, presumably, were under water.

The game helmets were back home, too, so the Green Wave wore practice helmets, green without decals. Defensive end William Fairburn had some issues with his helmet, so he wore one donated by a nearby high school. The green was a shade brighter.

Assistant coach Greg Davis Jr. suddenly told the players to converge on the main doors. The captains, every Tulane senior, pushed toward the front. Each player got on one knee. Coach Chris Scelfo emerged.

"Defense, you got to fly to the football," he said. "We've got to give everything we've got, every time we're out there. "Defense, we have got to get people to the football. We have to create turnovers. Don't ask for them – I want you to create them. And you know how to create them – by peppering them, peppering them. I want to stop the run. And secondary, do not go to sleep on your guy, until the quarterback crosses the line."

Senior Anthony Cannon's eyes locked on the coach. Cannon's apartment in New Orleans was flooded. The defensive leader hid in the locker room, fixated on football.

"Offense," Scelfo continued. "No penalties, no turnovers, stay ahead of the chains. Pretty simple. Pretty simple. All we've got to do is get first downs. Keep your composure, keep your poise."

Quarterback Lester Ricard leaned against a locker. He was one of the few players standing. His uncle stayed in the Ninth Ward during Katrina, risking death and making his nephew cry in fright. His uncle was now safe. Ricard, the offensive leader, was attentive at the words "composure" and "poise."

"Let me tell you what," Scelfo said. "Tulane's motto since the school started is: 'Not for thy self, but for others. Not for thy self, but for others.' I'm going to tell you what – I don't want you thinking about nobody but the others in this room for the next three hours."

Scelfo, whose roof was badly damaged by the hurricane, paused.

His voice became fierce: "I want your heart, mind and soul for three hours. Everybody got it?"

Eighty-eight men said, "Yes sir."

"I want your heart, mind and soul! And I guaran-dang-tee you – the best team will win. The best team will win. Because the best team is in this locker room. And I'll be darned if we're going to feel sorry for ourselves, are we?"

Eighty-eight men said, "No sir."

"ARE WE?"

"No sir."

"We're going to go out there and do what?"

"Win!"

The players erupted from their stances and charged into the tunnel at Independence Stadium, their cheers echoing.

Tulane lost Saturday night. But these days, a loss is all relative.

BATON ROUGE — Snap, punt, cover.

Prairie View botched every phase of punting Saturday night, and Southern took advantage.

With special teams providing the spark, the Jaguars took command. They pulled away behind the passing of quarterback J.C. Lewis to win their home opener 38-0 before 15,994 at A.W. Mumford Stadium.

But the game was tight until the Panthers' punting problems helped propel the Jaguars.

"The game is about field position, and we were able to capitalize," said Lewis, who completed 18 of 29 passes for 282 yards and three touchdowns. "We started getting confidence."

Both teams missed opportunities in the first half. The score was scoreless in the half when Eric Hernandez, the All-SWAC punter last year, was ready to kick from deep in Panthers territory. The snap bounced, and Hernandez had no chance to kick.

Hurried, he threw an incomplete pass toward wide receiver Sheron Harmon, and the Jaguars took over at the 15. Breck Ackley's field goal on fourth-and-seven with 1:32 left provided the only points of the half.

After the Panthers were stopped on their second possession in the second half, Hernandez kicked a 35-yard, line-drive punt, the kind that's easy to return and tough to cover. James Vernon returned the ball 42 yards to the Prairie View 18. On the next play, Lewis passed to Antonio Overstreet for a touchdown and a 10-0 lead.

Prairie View failed to move on its next possession, and Hernandez lined up to punt. Junior Joseph blocked the punt and recovered the ball at the Panthers' 15.

Carrying on three consecutive plays, Larry Nichols scored from the 5-yard line. The Jaguars led 17-0 with 7:05 left in the third quarter, and the rout was on.

"This year, what we try to do is work hard on special teams," Joseph said. "We realized that special teams are a big part of this game. My teammate that was next to me (Dio Bernard) did his job. That opened it up for me."

Southern dominated the rest of the game.

Even a three-yard punt to the Southern 45 by Southern's Colby Miller – after he bobbled a snap – didn't hurt the Jaguars. Prairie View moved to the 29, but Chris Gibson was sacked for a nine-yard loss. Southern cornerback Michael Williams ended the threat by intercepting Gibson's pass and returning the ball 18 yards to the Southern 30.

The Jaguars scored in seven plays, the big plays being Lewis' 35-yard pass to Vernon, and a 21-yard pass from Lewis to Emile Bryant that put the ball at the 1. Nichols scored from there for a 24-0 lead.

Lewis passed 51 yards to Gerard Bryant to make the score 31-0 with 19 seconds left in the third quarter. Lewis and Vernon combined on a 20-yard pass with 10:32 left in the fourth to cap the scoring.

In the first half, the Jaguars moved from their 30 to the Prairie View 32 on the game's first drive. On fourth-and-two, it appeared there was early movement along the line of scrimmage, but neither team was called for a penalty. Lewis was stopped for no gain, and Southern lost the ball on downs.

The Panthers then moved to the Southern 33. But they lost five yards on a fumble that they recovered, then lost seven more on a reverse sniffed out by linebacker David Brooks. Southern took over on its 20 after Hernandez's punt went into the end zone.

On third-and-18 from the 12, Lewis completed a 31-yard pass to Overstreet. Three plays later, Lewis scrambled and found Joseph for 26 yards to the Prairie View 25. A 15-yard run by Steel Adams put the ball on the 10. But the drive fizzled, and Ackley missed a 29-yard field goal attempt wide left.

Southern (1-1), which allowed 451 yards in an opening loss to Mississippi Valley, held Prairie View (1-1) to 209. Williams was involved in 12 tackles, including seven solos. Brooks, defensive end Joe Sykes, defensive back Joemaine Spears, and linebacker Maurice Runnels also were prominent defenders.

Southern won big in the punt-return game, with six returns for 126 yards. The Panthers returned two for 12. Also, a 44-yard Prairie View return was wiped out by a penalty.

"We have to win the special-teams game," Southern coach Pete Richardson said.

Richardson said the big plays in the punting game changed his team.

"They started to play relaxed, starting running to the ball," he said.

FOUR CITIES INTERESTED: Shreveport, Houston, Orlando, Fla., and Birmingham, Ala., are submitting bids to play host to the Bayou Classic, and a decision is expected soon, Southern director of athletics Greg LaFleur said Saturday.

"We had cities approach us," LaFleur said. "They just called and said they had interest in the game."

The Bayou Classic, which matches Southern and Grambling State, was scheduled for Nov. 26 at the Superdome but must be moved out of New Orleans because of Hurricane Katrina. When New Orleans again can play host to the game, it will return to the city, LaFleur said.

"We'll definitely go back to New Orleans," he said. "New Orleans is the Bayou Classic."

SLU falls behind, can't catch Northern Colorado

STATE

Georgia reserves too much for ULM

From staff, wire reports

It wasn't quite the Southeastern Louisiana defense Northern Colorado was expecting, but the end result was just what the Bears wanted.

"They changed the defense up on us," Northern Colorado coach Kay Dalton said. "The film we saw of them had no strong safety, and the one we saw had one, which bottled up our running game."

Instead, Northern Colorado relied more on its passing attack, and Nick Hager threw for 175 yards and two touchdowns to lead the Bears to a 35-19 victory Saturday over the Lions.

Hager was 16-for-22 and threw an interception for Northern Colorado (2-1).

"I have so many weapons," Hager said. "So when a team takes away the running game I have confidence in all my receivers."

Andy Birkel caught eight passes for 98 yards and two touchdowns.

The passing game eventually opened the running game. Andre Wilson ran for 113 yards and three scores as the Bears avenged a 26-13 loss last year to Southeastern Louisiana (1-1).

Trey Willie was 34-for-53 for 286 yards and three interceptions, and Jerald Watson had 13 carries for 58 yards and two touchdowns, plus six catches for 47 yards and another touchdown, for Southeastern Louisiana.

"We had our own way with them for a half," said cornerback Greg Gebhardt, who intercepted two passes. "We did it by avoiding the big play."

Northern Colorado led 21-0 at the half. Greg Gebhardt intercepted a deflected pass at the Lions 32, and nine plays later, Wilson's 1-yard dive with 10:27 left put the Bears ahead 7-0.

SLU had two chances to score in the first quarter. After the Lions benefited from a 29-yard punt, Willie threw an incomplete pass on a fourth-and-2 from the Bears 29.

After Derrick Mincey's interception gave SLU the ball at the Bears 31, Mario Gilbert fumbled at the Northern Colorado 34. From there Hager led a 66-yard drive culminated by a 16-yard touchdown pass to Birkel that made the score 14-0.

Two series after a Willie pass was intercepted in the end zone by Gebhardt, Aaron Henderson returned a punt 75 yards to the SLU 19. Hagar passed 19 yards to Birkel for the touchdown.

"You can't spot a team a 21-0 lead and win the game," Southeastern Louisiana coach Dennis Roland said. "Our team did show me something in the second half by not quitting. They came out in the second half thinking it could win."

SLU cut the lead to 21-7 early in the third quarter when Willie passed 11 yards to Watson for a touchdown. The Lions drove 90 yards and scored on a 17-yard run by Watson that cut the lead to 21-13 with 9:12 left.

The Bears answered with a 53-yard drive that ended with Wilson's nine-yard touchdown run with 6:04 left.

Watson scored on a one-yard run with 2:14 left, but the pass on the two-point conversion failed.

Wilson added an eight-yard touchdown run in the final minute.

No. 7 GEORGIA 44 vs. LOUISIANA-MONROE 7: Louisiana-Monroe got Georgia's attention with some trickery to open the second half - an onside kick that led to a touchdown and made the game close.

But led by a bunch of backups, the Bulldogs recovered quickly and showed they have the depth to overcome future challenges.

The second-teamers delivered front-line performances and the Bulldogs rolled past the Indians in Athens, Ga.

Filling in for injured tailback Thomas Brown, Danny Ware rushed for 109 yards. Martrez Milner caught three passes for 79 yards and a touchdown while starting at tight end for Leonard Pope, who was held out for disciplinary reasons.

Also, Danny Verdun Wheeler moved into the starting lineup for injured linebacker Jarvis Jackson, and led the team with 11 tackles. The Bulldogs also were without starting receiver Sean Bailey, but Georgia still rolled to 543 total yards with their most balanced attack of the season.

Still, the first reaction from Georgia coach Mark Richt was one of relief.

"I'm glad that's over with," Richt said after his team committed 11 penalties for 99 yards and lost two fumbles.

Bailey suffered a shoulder injury late in the practice week.

Richt said Pope "had broken a rule I wasn't too pleased about," but gave no other details.

Richt said Brown, Pope, Jackson and Bailey are expected back for next Saturday's game at Mississippi State.

The Bulldogs led 17-0 at the half but had a scare when Louisiana-Monroe recovered an onside kick and went on a 53-yard touchdown drive.

"It was kind of shocking at the time," Georgia quarterback D.J. Shockley said. "We had just talked at halftime about making sure we put points on the board, and then the game was one play away from being close."

As Shockley led the way, Georgia (3-0) answered with 17 third-quarter points and coasted to 10 points in the final quarter.

KANSAS 34 vs. LOUISIANA TECH 14: Brian Luke threw three touchdown passes and Kansas scored twice off interceptions in a 66-second span in the fourth quarter to beat the Bulldogs.

Wearing red uniforms for the first time in 58 years, the Jayhawks snapped out of a funk and a 7-7 halftime tie to go to 3-0 for the first time since 1997.

Luke, a senior who began the season No. 2 behind Adam Barmann, was 19-for-31 for 236 yards after passing for only 60 yards in the first half. Mark Simmons caught six passes for 106 yards and figured prominently in two scoring drives.

Louisiana Tech (0-2), which gave up 475 yards in a 41-3 loss to No. 6 Florida in its opener, held Kansas to 73 yards in the first half. But Matt Kubik and Donald Allen each threw two interceptions.

The Jayhawks were leading 14-7 beginning the fourth period, and Brandon Perkins tipped Kubik's pass and Theo Baines intercepted on the Bulldogs 14. A personal foul moved Kansas to the 7, then Luke threw to Brian Murph in the back of the end zone.

About a minute later, Charles Gordon broke up Kubik's pass to Seneca Chambers, the ball popped into the air and Aqib Talik made a diving interception on the 30.

Luke threw to Simmons for 29 yards to the 1, and Jon Cornish took it in on the next play for a 28-7 lead.

The Bulldogs responded with a nine-play, 80-yard drive capped by Kubik's 15-yard touchdown pass to Freddie King.

Scott Webb had field goals in the final minutes of 47 and 24 yards for the Jayhawks, who played their first three games at home but will not play at home again until Oct. 29.

NICHOLLS STATE 54 vs. CHEYNEY STATE 0: Dwayne Jones rushed for 138 yards and two touchdowns to lead the Colonels. Of Nicholls State's 421 total yards, 395 came on the ground.

Zach Morgan rushed for 56 yards and two touchdowns and quarterback Vincent Montgomery chipped in 24 yards and two more touchdowns for the Colonels (1-1).

Nicholls State's defense held Division II Cheyney (2-2) to a minus-5 yards total offense. Quarterback Lamar Hyson was just 3-of-10 for seven yards.

Cheyney is 0-5 against Division I-AA competition.

The Wolves reached Colonels' territory only twice, both off Colonel turnovers. Cheyney's deepest drive brought them to the Colonels 18 after a turnover, but the Wolves

Defense, special teams lift Florida

New coach's offense struggles, but Gators overcome Vols

By Mark Long
AP sports writer

GAINESVILLE, FLA. — Maybe Urban Meyer's defense and special teams should have been getting all the hype.

No. 6 Florida held fifth-ranked Tennessee scoreless in the second half, took advantage of three special teams errors and won 16-7 Saturday night to give Meyer a resounding victory in his Southeastern Conference debut.

The Gators had lost three of the past four against the Volunteers, including two in a row at Florida Field. They ended that streak and got an early edge in the Eastern Division race.

Since the SEC adopted its 12-team, two-division format in 1992, the winner of the Tennessee-Florida game has won the East and advanced to the championship game nine times.

For the Gators to get there, they probably will need to get more production from their offense. Meyer's spread offense was the biggest story line entering the game: could it work against one of the nation's top defenses?

Florida quarterback Chris Leak is tackled by Tennessee's Xavier Mitchell in the third quarter Saturday. Leak and the Gators won 16-7.

The answer Saturday night was not very well, but Florida was able overcome its offensive shortcomings.

The Gators (3-0, 1-0) did prove to have a strong defense, a unit that had several late collapses the past three seasons. But special teams turned out to be the deciding factor.

Florida got three second-half field goals from Chris Hetland, who was benched after missing an extra point attempt last week against Louisiana Tech. Each of his kicks followed a special teams blunder by Tennessee (1-1, 0-1).

Jonathan Hefney fumbled a punt after Florida's opening possession of the third quarter. Florida's James Smith hit Hefney after the drop, preventing him from picking up the ball, and Tremaine McCollum recovered it.

The Gators had the ball at the 28, but Chris Leak was sacked on the first play and they had to settle for a field goal and a 10-7 lead.

Tennessee made an even bigger miscue on the ensuing possession. The Vols tried a fake punt on fourth-and-9 from their 32. Punter Britton Colquitt's pass was nearly picked off by Tony Joiner, and the Gators got great field position again. But Leak was sacked for the fifth time, and Florida settled for another field goal to go up 13-7 with about five minutes to play in the third.

The Vols got the ball back, but their next drive ended with an 8-yard punt. Florida got close to the end zone, but ended up with a 20-yard field goal.

That was plenty of cushion for the defense, which played without end Ray McDonald for much of the game. He injured his right knee early in the second quarter and did not return. Even without him, the Gators got good pressure on quarterback Erik Ainge and stuffed running back Gerald Riggs in the second half.

Spartans continue dominance of Irish

From wire reports

SOUTH BEND, IND. — Not even Charlie Weis could stop Michigan State's mastery over Notre Dame in South Bend.

The Spartans overcame a 21-point comeback by the 10th-ranked Fighting Irish and pulled out their fifth consecutive win at Notre Dame Stadium with a 44-41 overtime victory on Saturday.

Jason Teague ran 19 yards with an option pitch for the game-winning touchdown, handing Weis his first loss as Irish coach after starting the season 2-0 on the road.

"I told them you don't get any medals for trying," Weis said. "I'm never content when you end up losing."

Drew Stanton led the Spartans offensively, throwing for three touchdowns and running for another. Michigan State amassed 488 yards total offense against the Irish. Stanton was 16-of-27 for 327 yards.

"We wanted to show that this program is back in the right direction," Stanton said. "There's no better way to do that than a rivalry game at Notre Dame."

The Spartans (3-0) have made a habit of beating the Irish on their home turf, joining Purdue (1954-62) as the only opponent to win five straight at Notre Dame Stadium. Irish fans, many of them wearing the yellow of the school's new spirit shirt, booed as the Spartans celebrated the victory at midfield.

"It's good coming into a hostile environment and winning a game like this," said Matt Trannon, who had five catches for a career-high 136 yards and two touchdowns.

Michigan State's 12 wins at Notre Dame are the most by an Irish opponent.

Teague, who had been suspended a week earlier for Michigan State's victory over Hawaii, said he had a hard time breathing at his teammates piled on him in the end zone.

"This is the best time of my life," he said.

Teague credited Stanton for pitching the ball at the right time and his teammates for clearing his path to the end zone.

"I couldn't have done it without these guys," he said, pointing to his teammates.

The Fighting Irish (2-1) rallied from 21 points down in the third quarter to tie the score, but had to settle for a 44-yard field goal by D.J. Fitzpatrick on their OT possession.

"When you come back like that, you've got a lot of emotion and you feel pretty good about yourself," Notre Dame quarterback Brady Quinn said. "And then when you can't come through with the victory, I think there's the ability to be a big letdown."

Quinn passed for a school-record five touchdowns and a career-high 487 yards, the second highest total in Notre Dame history. But it wasn't enough.

Clemson gathers no Moss in loss to Hurricanes

Oklahoma's struggles continue; Longhorns roll past Rice

From wire reports

Tyrone Moss' 25-yard touchdown run in the third overtime lifted Miami to a 36-30 triple-overtime victory over Clemson and helped the visiting Hurricanes avoid their first 0-2 start in 27 years.

Moss bounced out to the right side for his scoring run and safety Kenny Phillips intercepted Charlie Whitehurst when the Tigers (2-1, 1-1 Atlantic Coast Conference) got their chance in the third extra period.

Moss finished with 139 yards rushing and three touchdowns, two in overtime. His one-yard touchdown in the fourth quarter put Miami up 20-10. His three-yard scoring run gave the Hurricanes (1-1, 1-1) a brief 27-20 lead in the first overtime.

No. 4 VIRGINIA TECH 45 vs. OHIO 0: Marcus Vick and Virginia Tech started fast, stalled some and then got it going again with a couple of kick-starts from the defense.

Vick threw two scoring passes and ran for a third as the Hokies turned three turnovers into touchdowns in their second consecutive victory.

The Hokies (3-0), who blanked Duke 45-0 last Saturday, also twice turned the Bobcats away after they drove to the Hokies 19. The first time, Brooks Rossman missed a field-goal attempt and the second time, Tech's Roland Minor made an interception.

UCLA 41 vs. No. 21 OKLAHOMA 24: Drew Olson threw for 314 yards and three touchdowns, UCLA held Adrian Peterson to 58 yards rushing, and the Bruins beat the struggling Sooner.

After playing in the past two BCS national championship games, Oklahoma is 1-2 for the first time since 1997 and its offense fumbled six times.

UCLA recovered three of the fumbles and turned them into 17 points.

The Bruins (3-0) pulled away from a 20-17 lead with two Olson touchdown passes and Maurice Drew's scoring run in the fourth quarter and beat the Sooners for the first time.

Redshirt freshman Rhett Bomar completed 20-of-29 for 241 yards and ran for a 16-yard score for Oklahoma, but fumbled four times.

No. 2 TEXAS 51 vs. RICE 10: Freshman Jamaal Charles ran for 189 yards and three touchdowns in his first career start to lead Texas to another win over Rice.

Charles had a pair of 25-yard scoring runs in the first quarter and added another four-yard touchdown in the second as Texas (3-0) built a 42-0 lead by halftime.

Texas has won 38 of the past 39 meetings in a rivalry that dates to 1914.

No. 8 FLORIDA STATE 28 at No. 17 BOSTON COLLEGE 17: A.J. Nicholson intercepted two passes, scoring on a 19-yard return on the first play of the game, and Greg Carr caught two touchdown passes to help Florida State spoil the Eagles' Atlantic Coast Conference debut.

Nicholson's interceptions sparked the Seminoles (3-0, 2-0) to a 14-0 lead in the first five minutes before BC scored 17 unanswered points to take the lead. The Eagles (2-1) nursed the lead _ thanks to a great play by Mathias Kiwanuka - until quarterback Quinton Porter left with an ankle injury and Florida State took advantage.

Drew Weatherford was 20-for-38 for 243 yards and two touchdowns for Florida State. Porter was 20-for-31 with one touchdown and two interceptions before leaving late in the third quarter, and Matthew Ryan was 7-for-11 for 89 yards, most of it on the last drive.

No. 11 LOUISVILLE 63 vs. OREGON STATE 27: Brian Brohm threw for 368 yards and five touchdowns and Louisville topped 50 points for the ninth time under coach Bobby Petrino.

Mario Urrutia caught seven passes for 175 yards with two touchdowns for Louisville (2-0), which tied an Oregon State record for points by an opponent.

Louisville linebacker Brandon Johnson blocked a punt and returned an interception for a score and defensive end Elvis Dumervil set an NCAA record with his ninth sack in consecutive games.

No. 14 MICHIGAN 55 vs. EASTERN MICHIGAN 0: Max Martin ran for two touchdowns, then Chad Henne threw two touchdown passes to Jason Avant as Michigan tied a school record with 28 points in the first quarter.

A week after losing to Notre Dame, the Wolverines (2-1) recorded their most lopsided win since beating Indiana 58-0 in 2000. They led 54-0 early in the fourth quarter after scoring on nine of 10 possessions.

No. 16 GEORGIA TECH 28 vs. CONNECTICUT 13: Redshirt freshman Taylor Bennett, playing for Reggie Ball, threw a touchdown on his first college pass.

Ball, coming off a career-best 320 yards passing the previous week, began feeling ill Friday and was taken to the hospital Saturday morning, school officials said. He was undergoing tests and scheduled to be kept overnight.

No. 19 TEXAS TECH 80 vs. SAM HOUSTON STATE 21: Cody Hodges threw for 356 yards and four touchdowns in the first half to lead Texas Tech to its highest scoring game in 52 years.

The fifth-year senior who led the nation in total offense coming into the game, added 80 yards passing and another touchdown throw in the third quarter to put Tech up 56-7 before backup quarterback Graham Harrell took over.

Hodges finished 26-for-37 for 436 yards.

No. 22 IOWA 45 vs. N. IOWA 21: Drew Tate returned from a concussion to throw two touchdown passes and Albert Young ran for two more scores, leading 22 Iowa to a victory.

In tying a school record with its 20th straight win at home, Iowa (2-1) got some of its confidence back after a 23-3 loss at Iowa State.

Tate showed no problems from the concussion that knocked him out of the Iowa State game, completing 15 of 18 passes for 247 yards and no interceptions.

No. 25 VIRGINIA 27 at SYRACUSE 24: Connor Hughes kicked a 19-yard field goal as time expired, and Virginia escaped the raucous Carrier Dome with a victory over Syracuse.

Marques Hagans, who gained 110 yards rushing and was 16-for-26 for 145 yards passing, shook off three interceptions to lead the Cavaliers (2-0).

OREGON 37 vs. NO. 23 FRESNO STATE 34: Kellen Clemens threw for 332 yards and four touchdowns for Oregon.

The loss snapped a seven-game winning streak for the Bulldogs (1-1), who also had won their past three against Pac-10 teams.

The Ducks (3-0) saw their new spread offense come together against a ranked opponent a week before No. 1 USC comes to Autzen Stadium for the conference opener.

Hahnville rallies past East St. John

METRO PREP

By Lori Lyons
Staff writer

It was a non-district game played between two district opponents, and it was played during the daytime instead of at night. But it still was a typical Hahnville-East St. John game – with the same result.

Hahnville receiver Laron Byrd caught a 51-yard touchdown pass from Tigers quarterback Early James as time expired to give Hahnville a 28-27 victory over East St. John in Boutte on Saturday.

James' Hail Mary pass was tipped by Tigers receiver Brian Singleton into the waiting hands of Byrd, who landed in the end zone.

It was the sixth consecutive victory for Hahnville over East St. John, although all of those were district games. Saturday's game was arranged because both teams were scheduled to play Orleans Parish opponents.

The game had to be played during the day because of damage to Hahnville's stadium lights.

"It was typical Hahnville-East St. John football," said Hahnville coach Lou Valdin, who said he didn't see the catch or know who caught it. "I couldn't tell you. I know he was wearing a purple jersey. We just sent four receivers right up the pipe.

"We've got two basketball players out there. I figured one of them could jump up and catch it."

Byrd, a sophomore, was carried out of the end zone by teammates as the rest of the team rushed onto the field. At the other end, East St. John's players were sitting, squatting, some lying on the field, stunned by the turn of events.

After officials marked off a 15-yard penalty against Hahnville for celebrating, James took a knee on the extra point try to end the game.

"The last play of the game, it was just up to everybody," said Byrd, who had one other catch for three yards in the game. "We just went out and executed. Number 14 (Singleton) tipped it, and I had it in my vision. It was the best play of my life."

James completed 12 passes for 195 yards and two touchdowns and ran for a touchdown.

"I had (Singleton) in mind," he said. "The play was just to throw the ball in the end zone, so that's what I did."

East St. John hadn't been so close to victory against Hahnville in a while. The Wildcats had scored 27 points in the first half, and quarterback Johnnie Theil had completed all three of his passes 152 yards and two touchdowns. Running back John Owen, who transferred to East St. John from Brother Martin after the storm, had two carries for 81 yards, including a 78-yard touchdown run. But in the second half, East St. John gained only one first down.

Victory seemed within reach when the Wildcats, who were leading 27-20, stopped a Hahnville drive deep in East St. John territory. East St. John's Lacardio Joseph intercepted a pass by James at the goal line but landed on his back at the 1. On the next play, Hahnville's Carnell James sacked James in the end zone for a safety, cutting East St. John's lead to 27-22.

After the kick and an illegal block penalty, Hahnville started its next drive at its 29 with 2:35 to play. James drove the Tigers to the East St. John 30, but a fumbled pitch to running back Terrance Isaac was recovered by East St. John's Kalen Collins. The Wildcats took over with 1:19 to play.

Hahnville's defense held the Wildcats to six yards on three plays, and East St. John punted.

The Tigers had only 16 seconds with which to work. On first down, James connected with Singleton on a 12-yard pass to the Hahnville 49, after which James grounded the ball to stop the clock. Then came the miraculous play.

"It was a typical Hahnville-East St. John game," said Wildcats coach Larry Dauterive, whose team was playing its first game since the River Parishes Jamboree on Aug. 26. "And, as usual, we come out on the losing end. It definitely was a first game for us. But I don't want to use that as an excuse. They did a great job of adjusting. I can't take anything away from them. We did the same thing we had been doing (in the second half), they just stopped us."

ST. JAMES 42, SOUTH LAFOURCHE 6: Luther Ambrose ran for two touchdowns, Jason Zenon ran for two, Tremaine Dapremont ran for one and quarterback Antonio Phillips passed for another, as the Wildcats amassed 441 yards. St. James (2-0) never punted and held the Tarpons (0-1) to 12 yards.

PATTERSON 40, WEST ST. JOHN 18: Running back William Griffin rushed for 395 yards, and the Rams (0-2) gave up more than 400 yards rushing.

fumbled two plays later.

"After all these players have been through in the last couple of weeks, it was great to be in front of a home crowd and capture a win," Nicholls State coach Jay Thomas said. "I thought we made too many mistakes on both sides of the ball. However, the good part of that is we got to look at a lot of players."

The Colonels led 21-0 at halftime after a six-yard touchdown run by Vincent Montgomery, and a 44-yard run by Morgan. Montgomery started the scoring in the second half on a nine-yard run with 11:52 remaining in the third quarter. He finished with 56 yards on three carries.

Freshman Dwayne Jones scored four seconds into the fourth quarter on a 10-yard run, and he closed the scoring on a 49-yard run with 1:20 remaining. Jones finished with 138 yards on 16 carries.

SOUTHERN MISS 48 vs. McNEESE STATE 20: Larry Thomas ran for 115 yards and two touchdowns and Southern Mississippi scored four times off turnovers in its home opener.

The Golden Eagles had trouble running the ball in a 30-21 loss to Alabama last week and coach Jeff Bower wanted to find someone to provide the ground game with a boost. Bower may have found his man in Thomas, a redshirt sophomore making his second career start.

"We wanted to get the running game going and be more balanced," Bower said. "That was the bottom line, and we got some good things going running the ball."

Dustin Almond and Antwon Courrington connected on two scoring passes in the second meeting between the teams and the first since the 1980 Independence Bowl.

Southern Miss (1-1) led 24-13 at the half after Thomas' two-yard touchdown run in the second quarter and Darren McCaleb's 40-yard field goal.

McNeese State (1-1) scored on an eight-yard run by Steve Whitehead and field goals from Blake Bercegay of 29 and 51 yards in the first half.

But the Golden Eagles dashed any Cowboys comeback with a pair of touchdowns in the first five minutes of the third quarter. Eubanks returned a kick 70 yards to set up an eight-yard Almond-to-Courrington touchdown toss. A botched punt attempt on the Cowboys' initial possession of the second half set Southern Miss up at the McNeese State four-yard line. Two plays later, Thomas plunged in from 4 yards out to make the score 38-13.

WASHINGTON STATE 48 vs. GRAMBLING STATE 7: Jerome Harrison had his sixth consecutive 100-yard rushing game, running for 104 in the first half, and Washington State improved to 3-0 for the first time since 2001.

Alex Brink threw three touchdown passes, but the Cougars were inconsistent on offense. Washington State, which gained 534 total yards last week at Nevada, gained 446 yards Saturday in their first game against a I-AA team since beating Montana State in 2002.

Harrison finished with 113 yards, and three touchdowns. He surpassed 100 yards in Washington State's last three games of 2004 and the first two this season, and the Cougars are 5-1 during that stretch.

Washington State's defense was stout against the run, holding Grambling (1-1) to 12 yards rushing.

On Washington State's first offensive play, Brink fumbled and Joshua Bester recovered for Grambling at the Cougars 18. Grambling drove to the Cougars' 3, but stalled. Shawn Millson missed a 26-yard field goal attempt wide left.

Washington State responded, taking the ensuing drive 80 yards in 2:08. Harrison scored on a one-yard run.

On the Tigers next play, Terrion Rogers was hit by Mkristo Bruce and fumbled at the Grambling 8. The Cougars' Eric Frampton recovered the fumble, and two plays later Harrison scored again from the 1.

Brink threw an 18-yard touchdown to Jason Hill in the second quarter, one play after Grambling punter Tim Manuel dropped the snap. Brink added a seven-yard TD pass to tight end Troy Bienemann midway through the third quarter, to put the Cougars up 34-0, and Brink and Hill connected on a 56-yard score early in the fourth quarter.

Hill finished with 10 catches for 143 yards, and Brink was 19-of-29 for 262 yards.

Grambling opened with a 44-0 win over Alabama A&M last week, and the Cougars were Grambling's first Division I-A foe since a 29-0 loss to San Jose State in 2003.

HARDIN-SIMMONS 51 vs. LOUISIANA COLLEGE 13: Jordy Bernhard came off the bench to throw for 270 yards and three touchdowns, and three Hardin-Simmons running backs surpassed 100 yards rushing in a 51-13 win over Louisiana College.

Brad Clark ran for 112 yards a touchdown, Thurston Ashley had 107 yards and two touchdowns and Quinton Jones finished with 105 yards and one touchdown. They helped Hardin-Simmons (2-0, 1-0 American Southwest) set a school record with 385 rushing yards.

Louisiana College (0-2, 0-1) committed seven turnovers, including five interceptions. Wesley Cooper threw four and was 23-of-47 for 258 yards and two touchdowns.

Officials rethink Uptown return plan

Reopening may be too soon for parts of area, some worry

By Michelle Krupa and Bruce Hamilton

New Orleans officials said Algiers residents will be allowed to return home today, but said they will reassess a preliminary plan for reopening parts of Uptown later this week.

Mayor Ray Nagin and Coast Guard Vice Admiral Thad Allen, federal head of New Orleans' hurricane recovery effort, are meeting this afternoon with other state and local officials.

Mayor Ray Nagin
His original timeline called ambitious

Col. Terry Ebbert, the city's director of homeland security, said a decision about whether to allow residents in the 70115 and 70118 ZIP codes to return Wednesday and Friday will depend on conclusions reached at that meeting.

"We will reassess how we have done in reopening so far and the status of our water, sewerage, electricity and hospitals" across parts of the city left relatively unscathed by Hurricane Katrina, Ebbert said, adding that the projected direction of Tropical Storm Rita, presently in the Atlantic Ocean, also would be a factor in determining whether to reopen Uptown.

Allen on Saturday questioned Nagin's proposed timeline, calling it "extremely ambitious" and "extremely problematic." Tap water remains unfit for drinking and bathing in most parts of the city, and Rita posed another potential threat, he said.

In an interview Saturday with the Associate Press, Allen called on the mayor to be "mindful of the risks" and said he would share his concerns when they meet.

City officials continued to recommend that residents visit the city during daytime hours only and not stay overnight, Ebbert said. An 8 p.m. to 6 a.m. curfew remains in effect, he said.

The city's initial phase of reentry, which allowed business owners in the two Uptown postal codes to return, "went very, very well," Ebbert said, with an estimated 10,000 to 15,000 people passing military and police checkpoints to get back to their shops and restaurants.

No serious incidents were reported to health or police authorities, he said.

911 operators confront grim task, ghastly calls

By Brian Thevenot

As she took that first call from a woman trapped in her 9th Ward attic, 911 operator Lechia Allen ached with the grim realization that the next call would be the same. And the next. And the next. She couldn't do a thing for any of them.

Working in the downtown 911 center at Broad and Gravier streets, next to the Falstaff antenna, Allen knew police wouldn't respond to calls while the winds of Hurricane Katrina roared. She knew the rescue operation wouldn't start for hours and, in many cases, days. Laboring under the heavy weight of helplessness, all Allen and her 120 fellow operators could do was listen to the terrifying tales of rising waters, raging fires and parents holding their children toward the skies, above the floodwaters.

"They heard people taking their last breaths. They heard people holding children up in the peak of the attics, and dropping children in the water and watching them drown," said New Orleans Police Capt. Steve Gordon, chief of the 911 center.

Some of the nearly all-female staff working with Allen, 44, took calls from the same neighborhoods where they knew their families had stayed to ride out the storm, she said. Some lost loved ones. Others haven't been found.

"Seek higher ground" – that was all that Allen could tell them, in the calmest voice she could muster."I'm already on my roof," so many of them would respond.

As he strides through the rubble that once was downtown New Orleans, the sturdy man with the aviator sunglasses, the black beret and three shiny silver stars is the focus of all eyes.

Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, the commanding general of Joint Task Force Katrina, is on the scene — and everybody knows it.

Police officers, relief workers and medical personnel flock to him to shake his hand or pose for pictures. One by one, U.S. senators fight their way through the crowd to congratulate him for his efforts.

His aide, Lt. Col. Richard Steele, constantly fields e-mails on his Blackberry for interview requests. Vanity Fair magazine, Larry King, "Meet the Press" and "Face the Nation" are jockeying for his time.

When Eric Mijangos and J.D. Madden approached the modest one-story cottage on Painters Street in their Coast Guard flatboat, they were anticipating the same response they got from all the other houses that day: silence.

Instead, they heard a faint but firm voice yell out, "Hey, over here."

The two California firefighters sloshed through knee-high water, and with two swings of Mijangos' sledgehammer, they were through the front door and face-to-face with a miracle wearing jeans and a T-shirt: 76-year-old Gerald Martin.

Though hosts are gracious, evacuees long for Louisiana

Few show interest in putting down roots

By Michael Perlstein
Staff writer

MILWAUKEE — There was no mistaking Hernell Reed as anything but a stranger in a strange land, sipping a 16-ounce Milwaukee's Best on a bench behind the livestock barn and next to the Sheboygan Brat Haus concession stand.

His head covered with a doo-rag, the 47-year-old grass-cutter from Pigeon Town said he was one of the first New Orleans evacuees to arrive at this well-appointed Wisconsin shelter inside sprawling State Fair Park. For a couple of days, he was one of the few African-Americans, period, in this largely white section of this breadbasket city of cheese and bratwurst.

Then several planeloads of other flooded-out New Orleanians began arriving, nearly all of them from the city's hard-scrabble neighborhoods, dispersed nearly 1,000 miles from home as evacuation centers closer to New Orleans began filling to capacity. Now Reed is in the company of about 600 other displaced storm victims – 203 families altogether – spending their days and nights at the Tommy G. Thompson Youth Center.

"I wanted to stick it out, but the soldiers ordered me to leave," Reed said. "Don't get me wrong, the people here have been treating us right – top class, beautiful – but I want to go home. I really haven't been able to sleep right since I got here."

Reed's longing for home, or at least some place closer to home, is magnified by the fact that most of his family left before the storm and ended up in Charlotte, N.C., or with his sister outside of Houston.

"Heck, I was never in an airplane before this," he said.

More than 110,000 New Orleans area residents are staying at 675 shelters in 25 states, about 79,000 in Louisiana and Texas. But as the closest evacuation centers filled up in the first days after Katrina, the remaining exiles seemed to be scattered in a pattern of concentric circles emanating from the disaster zone, with the later – and less willing – evacuees landing in cities as far away as Denver, Seattle and Washington, D.C.

Some polls of New Orleanians being housed in Houston and Atlanta have shown that as many as 50 percent would rather carve out new lives in their stopover cities than return to their battered hometown. At the farthest reaches of the New Orleans diaspora, however, it's a different story.

Lucien Lancaster, a French Quarter hotel handyman from Central City, said he pleaded with relief workers to send him to Houston, where his girlfriend was sent. And that's exactly where he thought he was going until 20 minutes into his flight when the pilot announced they were going to Milwaukee.

"When they said that, I wanted to jump out of the airplane," Lancaster said. "The people here are nice and all, but I've never been here before. I don't know anybody."

Accounts from other faraway shelters, while largely anecdotal, seem to capture the same desire of New Orleanians to return home, or at least as close as possible.

In Milwaukee, American Red Cross spokesperson Kathy Fargo conceded that very few of the in-house evacuees had sought long-term work through the shelter's job placement center. Among the 300 displaced Louisianans staying with family members in the Milwaukee area, there has been a trickle of interest, she said.

Even so, the cultural divide is obvious, Fargo said.

"I had one woman come up to me, 'Excuse me, ma'am. When are we going to see the snow?' "

The Red Cross and Salvation Army volunteers running the Milwaukee shelter have done a lot to make the storm-chased transplants feel at home. They've arranged Sunday meals at the homes of local families. They treated 175 people to front-row seats at a Milwaukee Brewers game. They brought in a clown to entertain the children.

Another perk of the Milwaukee shelter, Fargo said: It has welcomed pets with open arms. The animals, more than 25 of them, are split between the "Sheep and Goats" barn and the "Poultry and Rabbits" pen.

But Michelle Perique, speaking for her extended family of 17 Periques staying at the shelter, seemed to express the prevailing sentiments about staying in Milwaukee vs. returning home.

"It's a nice town and all, but I don't think I could live here. I'm hungry for some red beans and rice real bad."

Volunteer relief groups fill medical gaps on coast

By Vicki Smith
Associated Press writer

GULFPORT, MISS. — Ricardo Scott holds his breath and looks away as a nurse wearing a handwritten ID tag _ "Doe, RN" _ jabs a needle into his index finger, testing his blood sugar.

She gives the cable company worker from Atlanta a stern look as the hot morning sun filters through the tent roof. She asks what he had for breakfast and nods about the croissant with ham and egg.

"And to drink?" she inquires. "Sprite," he replies.

Scott, 32, is a diabetic with high blood pressure and a heart condition, so the nurse scolds him gently about consuming so much sugar and tells him to come back tomorrow to this nameless clinic in a Surplus Warehouse parking lot.

Since Hurricane Katrina shuttered hospitals and doctors' offices across the Gulf Coast three weeks ago, health care volunteers have poured into Mississippi, where thousands were uprooted and at least 219 died.

The Federal Emergency Medical Agency was overwhelmed when more than 33,000 doctors and relief workers from across the country tried to register with the agency to help with recovery efforts from Louisiana to Florida.

"It really didn't work," said Jim McIlwane, who directs a newly formed Information and Quality Healthcare coalition in Mississippi that is coordinating assignments for doctor and nurse volunteers coming to the state.

"At first it seemed rather chaotic as it was with everything else _ some physicians just came and set up," he said. "I don't know of any problems that developed but it is a little more sophisticated now."

About 200 doctors and an equal number of nurses have come from out of state to Mississippi, joining more than 300 Mississippi physicians volunteering to help colleagues whose offices were destroyed by the storm.

Gov. Haley Barbour's state of emergency order grants temporary licensure to out-of-state health care professionals in good standing in their home state during the Katrina recovery.

"The medical volunteers have come in to fill a critical need and their support has been immeasurable," said Pete Smith, the governor's spokesman.

At the nameless clinic in Gulfport, doctors, nurses and paramedics from at least 10 states deliver free, routine health care to some 600 people a day, while free meals are dished up at a church next door.

Their initiative was started independently by a medical team with the Indiana Department of Homeland Security, supported by donations from across the nation and now led by the Virginia-based Volunteers of America.

It's become so successful the Red Cross and hospitals in Biloxi and Gulfport refer patients with less serious needs here.

Steve Garrison, a nurse-paramedic from South Bend, Ind., manages daily operations while a doctor oversees a medical staff that has grown to include dozens of people who came on their own to the devastated region with nothing more than a desire to help.

Temporary housing planned for 1 million

FEMA to create miniature towns

By Allen Powell II
River Parishes bureau

Trailers that are part of the FEMA's massive temporary housing effort head toward the Belle Chasse Naval Air Station-Joint Reserve Base on Friday.

STAFF PHOTO BY SEAN GARDNER

Officials have announced an aggressive plan to find federally funded temporary housing for the more than 1 million Louisiana residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina —including more than 100,000 still in shelters — that could create new miniature towns throughout the state.

The plan, which would be financed completely by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, would include about 200,000 manufactured homes and camping trailers, thousands of prefabricated apartment complexes and single-family homes and several cruise ships, said Jerry Jones, the director of facility planning and control for the state Department of Administration.

Louisiana officials have estimated that more than 250,000 homes in the New Orleans area are now uninhabitable, said Mark Smith, a spokesman for the state Department of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness, Any individual whose house is no longer inhabitable and has not found any other suitable housing is eligible for FEMA housing.

Some of the FEMA housing units would go in hurricane-affected parishes, but many will be placed in unaffected parishes. There have not been any estimates on the possible cost of the housing plan, and some people may have to stay in the homes for two or three years, Jones said. State and federal officials have already begun moving employees of certain essential industries and companies into temporary housing to help jumpstart the economy. In addition, the state has obtained waivers from the federal government to eliminate all income-restrictions on any existing apartment complexes and single-family homes so that anyone can move into them.

Work has already begun on a temporary community of camping trailers in Baker, near Baton Rouge. Smith said that FEMA contractors have already begun installing the infrastructure — sewerage and roads— necessary for about 600 trailers.

Jones said the state has given FEMA a list of all state-owned land that could be used for housing and is working with local parishes to create a list of parish-owned land. Several dozen commercial properties are also under consideration. Once each site's location, existing infrastructure and availability are evaluated, Jones said residents would be moved in based on a priority system.

First priority would go to those individuals still in shelters, individuals with special needs or small children, and first responders. There are about 46,000 individuals still in Louisiana shelters alone, and hundreds of others are still in special-needs shelters. In addition, about 2,000 first responders are being housed in cruise ships in New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish.

However, Lisa Woodruff White, the deputy secretary of Louisiana's Department of Social Services, said that the number of people in shelters across the country has decreased rapidly from its highest point of 230,000 a short time ago.

"We're keenly interested in getting our people back home," Jones said. "We want all the other states to know that those are our people and we want them back."

Kim Hunter Reed, the director of policy and planning for Gov. Kathleen Blanco, said the state is working to not only get all of its residents back to Louisiana, but to also get them in temporary housing near their previous homes. Reed said the goal is to create small semi-self-contained communities where FEMA will provide all of the necessary services, including transportation, job placement and some infrastructure.

Jones noted that the state plans to place people from the same communities and shelters together, so that they can retain their sense of community.

"We realize this must be done as expediently as possible," Reed said. "We want to ensure that these transitional communities are enriched communities."

Jones noted that some local officials have expressed concern about the possible impact on their areas' infrastructure and law enforcement from the large influx of residents. He said that FEMA understands that it may have to provide new roads, sewerage systems and policing forces to these communities. He attributed some of the alleged lag in the agency's response time to the uniqueness of Louisiana's plight, and said the agency is now fully aware of its responsibility.

"Everything a community needs, FEMA will have to provide," Jones said. "You can't just abandon our people."

David Passey, a FEMA spokesman, said the agency understands that Katrina will require several atypical actions by the federal government.

In most disasters, FEMA would have partnered with private insurance companies to provide residents with money to find their own housing. But Louisiana's existing housing shortage was only exacerbated by Katrina's destruction, which means that FEMA is in the position of having to create new communities for people. Passey said the enormity of the task, and people's natural impatience, may be driving the perception of the agency's slow response.

Dome might be salvageable, official says

2nd inspection shows damage not as bad as originally thought

By Jeff Duncan
Staff writer

Cancel the wrecking ball. The Superdome might be salvageable after all.

A second inspection over the weekend revealed the damage to the 30-year-old stadium isn't as bad as first thought, said Doug Thornton, regional vice president of SMG, the company that manages the Superdome.

Thornton initially feared the landmark facility might need to be completely gutted because of damage from Hurricane Katrina and the thousands of storm victims who sought shelter there.

"I'm a little more encouraged after walking through it a second time," Thornton said. "I'm a little more optimistic."

The bad news is the adjacent New Orleans Arena, which also is managed by SMG, appears to be in worse shape than originally thought. Thornton said the building suffered extensive water damage on its south side, where floodwaters rose as high as four feet.

The four locker rooms on the ground floor still have standing water in them, as much as six inches in spots. The Harrah's Courtside Club and the hardwood basketball court are completely destroyed, he said.

"That building is a little worse than I first thought," Thornton said. "I'm a little discouraged by what we saw there."

Thornton and a team of about a dozen contractors and consultants toured the two buildings Friday and Saturday to begin initial damage assessments. He and a group of environmental contractors previously inspected the facilities Sept. 9.

J&J Maintenance Inc. the Austin, Texas-based company hired by FEMA, cleaned and removed massive amounts of debris and refuse inside the Dome and its outside concourses. The building now is almost completely free of debris and standing water.

"If you were to walk through it now you would say it's not that bad and could possibly be repaired," Thornton said. "The thing you don't know is how many of those electrical panels and transformers have been damaged beyond repair and have to be completely replaced; the same thing for the plumbing. And we still don't know what we're going to find when we start tearing down that Sheetrock."

Friday marked the first time anyone had inspected the building's roof, and, as expected, the results weren't good. Thornton estimated that more than 60 percent of the roof's sheet-metal decking and rubber exterior layer has been destroyed.

If the building is salvaged, Thornton said, the roof will need to be replaced. That alone could cost $6 million to $8 million, he estimated.

Meanwhile, consultants are trying to find a way to temporarily patch the roof until a final assessment is made. A polyurethane sealant likely will be sprayed over the roof's 9.7-acre surface to prevent more leaks while damage estimates are made.

Thornton hopes to select a sealant this week so workers can start the two- to three-day sealing job the following week.

"We've got to be cost-effective here," Thornton said. "You've got to be really careful, otherwise you're going to be spending a million or $2 million just to patch the roof."

On the bright side, he said, the concrete floors and steel superstructure appear sound. He's also optimistic that most of the 70,000-plus vinyl seats in the building can be salvaged. Most of the seats became covered in mold while sitting in the wet, still air — but Thornton thinks environmental cleanup crews can treat the damage.

The storm damage is confined mostly to carpets, dry wall, ceiling tiles, electrical panels, escalators and ventilators. He said the luxury suites, SMG offices, meetings rooms, press box and audio room were vandalized as well.

"That was very disheartening to see," he said. "The water damage to the interior carpet and walls wasn't as bad as the interior damage by the people.

"I don't understand why they did it. It wasn't like they were looking for food."

Thornton said someone appeared to have broken the windows to the audio room with a fire extinguisher, then used the device to spray — and subsequently ruin — the amps and other equipment.

"I don't get that," Thornton said. "What was that all about?"

Thornton said damage assessments will continue for the next two weeks. An environmental cleanup team is expected to s and removing hazardous waste this week.

Thornton is confident most if not all of the cleanup and reconstruction costs will be paid for by insurance and FEMA. He hopes to have a final damage assessment made in eight weeks.

He said it's way too early to estimate the final bill, but he thinks damage totals could eventually run between $100 million and $150 million.

"You get the feeling that if you could take this thing down to the bare walls and replace some of the mechanical, electrical and plumbing (systems), you could be back in business," Thornton said. "I don't know how long that would take, but structurally the building seems to be in pretty good shape."

Doug Thornton, regional vice president of SMG, the company that manages the Superdome, said damage totals to the building could eventually reach $150 million.

WHAT MIGHT BE SAVED

Officials say the concrete floors and steel superstructure of the Superdome appear sound. There is also hope that most of the 70,000-plus vinyl seats in the building can be salvaged, though they became covered in mold n the wet, still air. Environmental cleanup crews may be able to treat the damage.

WHAT WAS DAMAGED

The storm damage is confined mostly to carpets, dry wall, ceiling tiles, electrical panels, escalators and ventilators. Luxury suites, SMG offices, meeting rooms, the press box and the audio room were vandalized as well. Damage assessments will continue for the next two weeks.

Government's shortcomings exposed

System not tailored to respond quickly

By David Wood and Chuck McCutcheon
Newhouse News Service

WASHINGTON — The muddled federal response to Hurricane Katrina has exposed a simple truth well known among government insiders: For reasons that run deep and probably can't be fixed, Washington has difficulty making long-range plans, coordinating its actions and tackling the tough political decisions required for swift disaster response and other critical responsibilities.

Katrina's immediate aftermath saw heroic service by individuals and stellar work by agencies such as the Coast Guard and U.S. Postal Service — the latter of which acted on early storm warnings and saved thousands of tons of mail by diverting it from the hurricane's path.

But overall, as President Bush finally acknowledged this week, Katrina "exposed serious problems in our response capability."

How could this happen?

Safeguarding its citizens is government's highest calling, and certainly no one in government service is actively working against that responsibility. Then why have the repeated warnings of experts and blue-ribbon commissions gone unheeded? Why, four years after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, revealed precisely these deficiencies, have we not come to grip with them?

The answers go to the very heart of American democracy.

"You've got to redesign the system," said Newt Gingrich, former conservative Republican speaker of the House and fiery government reformer.

Spread out, short-sighted

Washington veterans cite these key factors:

— Power and authority, as the founding fathers intended, are scattered across Congress, the White House, executive agencies and on through state and local governments. That complicates coherent planning, allocation of money and accountability.

— Two- or four-year election cycles keep attention spans short and focused on the next campaign. Money is appropriated year to year, with results demanded immediately.

— The executive and congressional bureaucracies stifle initiative and smother creativity, a problem some say has grown worse with the proliferation of congressional committees and subcommittees and the consolidation of independent agencies into the vast Department of Homeland Security.

— The rising demands of bitterly fought election campaigns tend to stifle political courage and spur partisan squabbling.

"Katrina laid all this bare — that Americans don't feel safe, and that's the No. 1 essential mission of government independent of party," said Gordon Adams, director of security policy studies at the Elliott School of International Affairs at George Washington University.

"It is a scary time," said Joan Claybrook, a longtime Washington player who headed the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration in the Carter administration and is now president of Public Citizen, a government reform group.

"Every generation has seen challenges, but today we see the speed and destructive power of international and domestic threats. There is little time to adjust," she said. "We don't have the luxury of time anymore."

Infighting persists

Chief among the federal government's structural problems is its division of responsibility, said Paul Light, professor of public service at New York University and author of many books on government reform.

"It's built into the Constitution that we have a federal system where states and localities have a lot of responsibility," he said. "Part of this is embedded in the system that we don't want a strong federal presence. ... The founders were clear in wanting to protect citizens from the national government."

Hence the initial and continuing confusion over who is in charge of the response to Katrina, the awkward breach between active-duty military commanders and the National Guard, the quarreling between Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco and Washington.

Despite the lessons of the recent past, "the bureaucratic infighting and turf protection seem undiminished," said Richard Ben-Veniste, a member of the Sept. 11 commission that aired the government's shortcomings related to the 2001 terrorist attacks.

"The word is 'caution,'" Paul McHale, assistant defense secretary for homeland defense, said in an interview last spring, in explaining how the Pentagon responds to emergencies. "We have to look at a mission and decide if a civilian capability is available and appropriate."

Caution is proper, he said — not from fear that the military "will impose its values on an unwilling society at the point of a bayonet," but out of concern that people will come to depend too much on the military. Even in a disaster, he said, "the military role should be limited."

Focus on the here and now

A second structural problem is embedded in the calendar.

"If it's beyond the next election cycle, we'll worry about it next year after we get ourselves elected," said Winslow Wheeler, recently retired chief defense analyst for the Senate Budget Committee.

Work within the executive branch is similarly compressed, first by a four-year clock of presidential elections, then by the sheer number of crises.

Adams, senior budget director for national security in the Clinton administration, described his White House work this way: "I am standing with a paddle in the middle of a big room. All around the edge of the room, people are throwing balls at me. My job is deciding which balls to hit back. In the White House, that's long-range planning."

In that kind of pressure cooker, "you become risk-averse," said Wheeler, author of "The Wastrels of Defense: How Congress Sabotages U.S. Security."

"If you are outside the conventional wisdom, you are vulnerable," he said. "Both parties have purged themselves of big thinkers and a diversity of views."

So bad is the bureaucratic undertow, Gingrich said, that if you dropped a couple of whiz-bang business executives into the federal government, "in 60 days they'd become slower and less competent."

And without clear political vision, the work of Congress and the executive branch can dissolve into parochial sniping and pork-barrel politics.

"Retail politics seem to trump leadership," a frustrated Ben-Veniste pronounced after almost three years of investigating the government's failures in the Sept. 11 attacks. "Time and time again you see the political will is just lacking to make the kind of sacrifices that are needed."

No one saying 'no'

Nowhere is this clearer than in the federal money distributed in the name of homeland security, including terrorism and disaster preparedness, a process that seems to ignore the most urgent needs.

Under congressional direction, for example, the Department of Homeland Security last year handed out grants to states for "counterterrorism" activities. South Dakota received $26.13 per capita, while New York — arguably a greater terrorist target — was given $5.37. Wyoming was given $37.13 per capita, while New Jersey got $6.37, according to DHS figures.

"No one in government is making hard choices," said David Williams, vice president of Citizens Against Government Waste, a nonprofit reform group in Washington. "It's about handing money out. There's very little of somebody saying, 'No.'"

And that, of course, includes the public. It's an old adage, but true: We get the government we demand.

"What is required here," Ben-Veniste said, "is a level of outrage from the citizenry to require that those in positions of leadership lead the country in a way that transcends those retail political concerns."

Not so fast, Adams said: "We are the nation of quick fix. Americans as a culture are into the short-term mentality: Fix me now.

"The difficulty with an outraged citizenry is impatience, and it's very hard for an outraged, impatient citizenry to focus on the long term," he said.

"But that's what we've got to do now."

Tensions mount in Kenner between Capitano, Congemi

By Matt Scallan
Kenner bureau

In another sign of normalcy returning to Kenner, a political storm has erupted between Mayor Phil Capitano and Police Chief Nick Congemi over how the mayor's administration and the elected chief's department responded to Hurricane Katrina.

Capitano says police failed to work with City Hall and sometimes blocked his administration's rescue and relief efforts, while running an independent operation out of police headquarters. Congemi says the Police Department simply implemented its own long-standing emergency response plan, whereas City Hall had none, and that Capitano is now trying to shift blame for his own shortcoming.

The finger-pointing underscores political differences that date from the 1990s and that climaxed March 9, 2004, when Capitano defeated Congemi in a special mayoral election to complete the term of the chief's brother, Louis, who had resigned. It also sets the stage for the spring election season, when Congemi seems likely to challenge Capitano for a four-year term.

During the chaos before, during and after Katrina, Capitano said, the administration and Police Department rarely communicated with each other and sometimes were at cross purposes.

"The chief gave us little or no cooperation before or after the storm," Capitano said. "He would not return phone calls and in some cases, the department hampered our relief efforts."

Congemi called the allegation ludicrous. "We had a plan for the storm, and they did not," Congemi said. "Now that their failures are becoming apparent, they are trying to shift the blame to the men and women of this department who risked their lives for this community."

Congemi said he met with Capitano's staff twice in the two weeks after the storm when they requested his presence, attended numerous meetings at the Jefferson Parish Emergency Operations Center where Capitano was present and that his staff took daily calls from Capitano's chief of staff, Phil Ramon.

"Why are they waiting until now to bring this up?" he asked.

But City Hall staffers say they got little information from the Police Department, which ran a parallel but separate relief operation from its headquarters at 500 Veterans Memorial Blvd., about three miles from City Hall.

Asked if his department's emergency plan includes coordination with City Hall, Congemi said his department coordinates "with anyone who comes in the door."

"We give the administration a general idea of what we're doing," said Capt. Steve Caraway. "But do we tell them how many police officers we have on the streets and where they are? No."

Capitano administration officials point to several clashes between their employees and police:

— On Aug. 30, two police officers ordered a city truck on its way to get supplies for a shelter to stop in high water, and one of the officers began to draw his gun when the driver put the vehicle in gear to keep it from flooding, said Clerk of Court Keith Conley, who was in the vehicle.

"They wanted to know where we were going, even though we were in a city truck and had city IDs. I've never seen anything like it," said Conley, an attorney and 21-year veteran of the Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office.

Congemi said he had not heard of the event. He said Conley should have filed a complaint with the Police Department's internal affairs division if he had concerns about the matter.

"I saw him the other night at a meeting and we had a pleasant conversation. He didn't say anything about it to me," Congemi said.

— Sept. 9, Kenner police officers working a checkpoint at the city limits delayed a truck carrying parts to repair the municipal sewer system for two hours because it arrived after the 6 p.m. curfew set by Parish President Aaron Broussard, said Joanne Massoney, Kenner project manager for Veolia Water, the contractor that runs the sewer system.

Massoney said she drove to the checkpoint from City Hall with permits to enter the city, but the officers still had to be persuaded to let the truck through.

"Then, they didn't want to let me back in even though I had just come from City Hall," she said. Congemi said the officers were following the curfew orders of Parish President Aaron Broussard, whose position gives him enhanced authority during officially declared emergencies such as Katrina. Caraway said officers staffing the checkpoints had instructions to let such trucks through.

— Fire Chief Mike Zito said that on Sept. 7, a police officer in an unmarked police car pulled over the Fire Department's chief medical officer. "He wanted to know where he was going and why he had his lights on," Zito said. Firefighter Iggy Rosales was carrying doses of tetanus shots to a shelter, Zito said. "The police officer said that he knew from 911 that there was no emergency in progress, and he was right. There wasn't one," he said.

— Ramon, Capitano's chief of staff, said Congemi refused to provide security for the City Hall complex in the first days after the storm, when there were reports of looting and sniper fire.

"We had some National Guardsmen here, but they were unarmed," Ramon said.

The tension between Capitano and Congemi is becoming even more evident three weeks after Katrina passed. On Friday, the police chief and Cedric Floyd, Capitano's chief administrative officer, got into a shouting match in front of a Cable News Network news crew over the fate of residents of the storm-damaged Redwood Apartments, which caters to working poor Hispanic Americans.

As Floyd made a food delivery to the complex, Congemi accused him of trying to force them to leave Kenner. Congemi said Kenner needs to build housing for them.

"The truth is that you all don't want these people here, and you're trying to run them off. That's what this is really about," Congemi said, according to a transcript of the exchange that ran on CNN that night. Congemi carried the precinct that includes the 1,800-resident Redwood complex in the 2004 election.

"Chief, guess what? I'm a minority. And you discriminate. You discriminate," said Floyd, who is African-American.

"You're a rich minority. A rich minority," Congemi replied. "You run off your mouth about how much you care about these people, and you don't give them anything."

WITHDRAWAL OF A REQUEST FOR PUBLIC COMMENT ON A PROPOSED INITIAL PART 70 AIR OPERATING PERMIT

"Due to Hurricane Katrina and the resultant lack of opportunity for the general public to make comments on this proposed initial part 70 air operating permit, LDEQ is withdrawing its request for comments at this time. When conditions warrant, we will again solicit public comments through our regular public notice procedures."

The LDEQ, Office of Environmental Services, is withdrawing the request for public comment on the proposed initial Part 70 air operating permit for Entergy Louisiana, Inc., 1617 River Road, Westwego, LA 70094 for the Ninemile Point Electric Generating Plant. The facility is located at 1617 River Road, Westwego, Jefferson Parish.

The Ninemile Point Electric Generating Plant had proposed to obtain an initial Part 70 air operaing permit for this existing electric generating facility. The Ninemile Point Electric Generating Plant (Agency Interest Number AI2841, Permit Number 1340-00006-V0, and Activity Tracking Number PER19960001) had been operating under Permit Number 529C, issued December 12, 1975 and Permit Number 1340-00006-IV0, issued October 23, 1996. The Ninemile Point Electric Generating Plant is a fossil fueled electric generating facility made up of five steam generating units.

Inquiries or requests for additional information regarding this permit action should be directed to Dustin Duhon, LDEQ, Permits Division, P.O. Box 4313, Baton Rouge, LA 70821-4313, phone (225) 219-3080. Additional information about the public noticing process may be obtained from Ms. Soumaya Ghosn in writing at LDEQ, P.O. # ‘Radio Slidell’ to offer recovery information

AM, FM stations plan simulcast

By Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

By Monday, Slidell hopes to be broadcasting up-to-date information on Hurricane Katrina recovery operations, rebuilding, business reopenings, loan and assistance aid, and interviews with city and other officials.

“Radio Slidell” will be simulcast on WPOR-FM 94.7 and WSLA-AM 1560, city public affairs director Kelli Gustafson and Slidell area Chamber of Commerce director Jamene Dahmer said Friday.

The regional WPOR, owned by Northshore Broadcasting in Hammond, has been closed for some time, Dahmer said, although the company recently bought a new tower that suffered only minor damage and will be used.

WSLA on Coast Boulevard was shut down by the storm.

The hours of operation for Radio Slidell, a joint effort of the city, chamber and others, will be flexible for a while, depending on the conditions of the stations, but will soon go around the clock, officials said.

Gustafson and assistant Kim Bergeron are scheduled to be the announcers in a format similar to the “official voice” of Access St. Tammany radio. The city also hopes to provide more detailed information on its Web site, www.slidell.la.us.

St. Tammany Parish government has had a similar operation on WASO-AM 730 for the past two weeks.

City officials had hoped to get Radio Slidell on the air this weekend, but officials said the WSLA building would have to be cleaned up and the equipment checked out.

A Marine Corps sound engineer temporarily stationed in Slidell during the storm aftermath and others will help get the station broadcasting facilities ready for a Monday sign-on, Gustafson said.

Dahmer said business news also will be offered. The chamber’s West Hall Avenue office has been relocated to Whitney National Bank at 1338 Gause Blvd. The chamber’s phone number is the same, 643-5678.

Alleged evacuee charged with fraud

He told FEMA, Red Cross that he lost his home

By Wayne Parry
Associated Press writer

NEWARK, N.J. – His story was as heart-rending as it was amazing: fleeing Hurricane Katrina before his Gulf Coast trailer and all his possessions were washed away, hitchhiking to the nearest Greyhound bus terminal and riding for days to New Jersey, where a kindhearted homeless woman, moved by his inability to locate his long-lost sister, directed him to an emergency shelter.

Almost none of it was true, authorities say.

Donald Adair, 42, who spent hours spinning his tale of woe to an Associated Press reporter last week, was arrested Saturday, accused of scamming the Red Cross and the Federal Emergency Management Agency out of thousands of dollars in aid meant for hurricane victims.

He was charged with theft by deception, theft of services, falsifying a public record and filing a false financial report.

Adair was being held at the county jail on $25,000 bail, and has admitted making up his tale of being a hurricane victim, Feldman said.

An Associated Press reporter met Adair at an emergency shelter in Newark on Sept. 9, where Adair said he was a Hurricane Katrina evacuee who had arrived in Newark the day before in search of his sister.

Adair told a Red Cross volunteer his identification had been lost in his hurried flight from the storm. He told an AP reporter, and later repeated to the Red Cross, that he had lived in Mississippi for about 10 years. When the Red Cross worker asked for his ZIP code in Mississippi, he said he didn’t remember it.

BUILDINGS CAN BE REPLACED. LIVES CANNOT.

Don’t endanger your life by disregarding safety as you return home. Hurricane Katrina left Entergy’s gas and electric systems in the New Orleans area severely damaged. As we work to repair the gas system and restore electrical power, we ask that you make safety your top priority. Full power and gas restoration will be a long and difficult process. And with your help and patience we can rebuild what was destroyed. The storm is over. But the danger is not. Below is a list of guidelines and safety precautions to keep in mind when assessing your damage.

Stay away from downed power lines and areas of debris. Energized power lines may not be visible among the rubble. Report downed lines immediately to Entergy at 1-800-ENTERGY (1-800-368-3749). If a power line falls on your vehicle while driving, continue to drive away from the line.

Generator safety. Use generators in accordance with the manufacturer’s instructions. Never run a generator indoors. Carbon Monoxide from the exhaust can kill. Electricity and water don’t mix. Keep the generator dry and do not use in rain or wet conditions. To protect from moisture, operate it on a dry surface under an open, canopy-like structure. Dry your hands if wet before touching the generator. Never connect a generator directly to a building’s wiring without a licensed electrician. It can create a lethal safety hazard for you, your neighbors, and Entergy’s linemen working to restore power.

Use extreme caution. Look for electrical system damage once power is restored. If you see sparks, broken or frayed wires, or the smell of hot insulation is noticeable, turn off the electricity at either the main fuse box or circuit breaker. Call an electrician for advice when necessary. Don’t step in water to get to the fuse box or circuit breaker.

IF YOUR NATURAL GAS IS TURNED OFF, FOR SAFETY’S SAKE, LEAVE IT OFF

If you have pipe damage, you’ll need a licensed plumber

To help ensure your personal safety and the safety of your property, Entergy has likely turned your natural gas service off. Please do not attempt to turn it on yourself. This could cause a safety hazard for you and your property.

If your home was flooded or sustained structural damage, you should contact a licensed plumber to inspect gas piping and make repairs.

Please do the following:

1) Have repairs made by a licensed plumber
2) Have repairs certified by a city inspector
3) Call Entergy at 1-800-ENTERGY (1-800-368-3749) when the repairs are completed

We will arrange to have gas service turned on at your home as soon as you have had a certified plumber and city inspector confirm that gas service is safe to turn on. Someone must be present for your gas to be turned on.

If you smell gas at your home or any in other building, you should leave the area immediately and go to a safe area and call us at 1-800-ENTERGY (1-800-368-3749) to report the location of the suspected leak.

General follows orders from younger daughter

Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, the commanding general of Joint Task Force Katrina, talks with Gov. Kathleen Blanco on Sept. 7 in the back of a truck as it rumbles through the Central Business District. Honore has a personal stake in the recovery effort: He is from Louisiana, and one of his daughters lives in Kenner.

HONORE, from A-1

Honore didn't sign up for this. When President Bush assigned him to command Joint Task Force Katrina, Honore knew it would be the most difficult operation of his life. He commands more than 20,000 active-duty troops from all military branches devoted to the storm recovery operation in the three-state region. He didn't anticipate that in doing so, he'd become a national celebrity.

The 36-year military veteran from Lakeland, La., has become Hurricane Katrina's reluctant superstar.

"The general is getting tired of all of these profiles," Steele said. "He's a humble guy. He didn't want to become a celebrity from all this. He wants the focus to be on the mission and not on himself."

Good luck.

The Honore legend began from the moment his boots hit Canal Street and national TV cameras captured him dressing down soldiers for carrying their firearms with the barrels pointed too high.

Then, with the floodwaters rising and his city in disarray, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin cemented Honore's hero status during an emotional interview with WWL-AM radio in the chaotic days after the storm. A few breaths after he ripped President Bush and the federal government for their slow response, Nagin went out of his way to praise Honore, admiringly dubbing the general "one John Wayne dude."

"He came off the doggone chopper, and he started cussing and people started moving," Nagin said. "And he's getting some stuff done. They ought to give that guy — if they don't want to give it to me — give him full authority to get the job done, and we can save some people."

Honore became an overnight sensation.

In the aftermath of the storm, he has emerged as the white knight for those affected by Katrina, a salty-mouthed, cigar-chomping guardian angel in camouflage. His take-charge attitude and no-nonsense style have endeared him to storm victims who were frustrated by the dithering and finger-pointing of administration officials.

"We're very fortunate to have someone of his experience and ability here," New Orleans Police Superintendent Eddie Compass said. "He's a good man and very much has control of the Army. He and I have worked together very, very well."

Time Magazine said Honore has built a strong case for its prestigious Person of the Year award, and it's almost certain President Bush will reward him with a fourth star for his tireless work in the flooded streets of New Orleans and the debris-strewn Mississippi and Alabama coasts.

"He deserves it," said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, who, under Honore's direction, commands the 7,000 active-duty troops in the 82nd Airborne Division. "He's a great leader. He knows the area, understands the people and doesn't take 'no' for an answer."

A quick study, Honore has learned to refine his message to the media. Many of his pet phrases are now well known to the hundreds of reporters who have covered the Katrina story daily since Aug. 29. Among them:
▶ "The storm had a vote."
▶ "Don't confuse a plan with execution. A plan is like good intentions. You don't win with good intentions."
▶ "You're looking at a calendar, and I'm looking at my watch."
▶ "Normally, we go in and break things. Here we're trying to fix things."

Honore has compared Katrina to a military opponent, saying the hurricane made "a classic military maneuver" by surprising its victims and overwhelming them with shock and force.

"This was an evil storm," Honore said. "We've got a disaster of biblical proportions here."

He's also fond of comparing the mission to a football game.

"By definition, you're going to lose the first quarter in a disaster," he said in a now well-worn analogy. "What does a coach do when his team is losing 25-0 after the first quarter? Does he call the quarterback over and tell him how stupid he is because he didn't play right, or does he get out the white board and start making adjustments?

"Now we can stay talking about the first quarter. All of you are talking about the first quarter. But there's still three quarters left to this thing. The next three quarters can be as tragic as the first quarter if we don't handle this right."

Lately, Honore has grown increasingly weary of dealing with the horde of reporters in the area. During a briefing with city officials at City Hall last week, he spent most of his time checking his watch and working his cell phone. After 15 minutes and one question, he shook Compass' hand and bolted.

"I can't swing a stick and not a hit a reporter," Honore said. "I didn't know there were so many of them."

Honore tangled with two reporters Friday during an impromptu news conference at the staging area at Harrah's New Orleans Casino.

When grilled about the breakdowns in security for the thousands of evacuees at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, he showed reporters why his troops have nicknamed him "The Ragin' Cajun."

"OK, reporter," he growled. "How many people did you take out? How many people did you give water to?"

Another reporter asked Honore why it took so long for the evacuation buses to arrive and noted that he was able to drive himself into the city.

"Where were we going to find the buses at, mister?," he shouted. He added: "You see, you're confusing what you can do with money in your pocket and the corporate sponsorship of some news company with taking care of 20,000 people with no water in an unsafe environment. You're confusing what you can do with how you try to take care of that many people in that amount of time. Don't confuse that, OK?"

Honore is uniquely qualified for his recent mission. He was commander of the 2nd Infantry Division in Korea and commander of the Standing Joint Force Headquarters for Homeland Security, part of the U.S. Northern Command. He saw action in Iraq and Kuwait during 1991's Operation Desert Storm, and he holds a master's degree in human resources management.

As a Louisiana native and commanding general of the 1st Army at Fort Gillem, Ga., Honore was familiar with the disaster zone. Honore spent two summers with relatives in New Orleans' 9th Ward. As a child, he spent two weeks at Charity Hospital after being hit in the head with a baseball bat.

Honore said his primary goal is to save lives and help the city's recovery efforts. He empathizes with many of the evacuees, especially the ones who suffered in the hellish conditions at the Convention Center and Superdome.

"By-and-large, these were people that were frustrated — I would be, too," Honore said. "I get frustrated at the cash register counter when the paper runs out."

Although gruff and intense with his troops, Honore has displayed uncommon compassion with many of the elderly, infirm and poor people affected by the storm.

"These were mostly poor people who didn't have much other than their homes," Honore said. "We didn't pull anybody off those rooftops that said, 'Damn, I left my Lexus!' "

Of the poor, he said: "When it's hot, they're hotter. When it's cold, they're colder. When the wind blows, they go over farther. And when a plague hits, they die faster."

Honore can identify with Louisiana's underprivileged. He was one of them once.

The son of a Creole farmer, Honore was the youngest boy in a family of 12 children. He was raised on a farm in Lakeland, a rural community northwest of Baton Rouge in Pointe Coupee Parish. The family raised sugar cane, corn, squash and cotton. They also had pigs, cows and chickens.

He graduated from Southern University in 1971 and entered the Army as a second lieutenant through the ROTC program. He rose steadily through the ranks.

"When he shoots from the hip, it's always based on experience, and his experience is where the rubber meets the road," said Army Gen. Dennis Reimer, who served as Army chief of staff from 1995 to 1999, in an interview with the Washington Post.

Said Caldwell: "They call him 'Ragin Cajun' for a reason. When he gets on a tirade, it's something to watch. Some people deal with that better than others, but I love him to death."

Honore, who turned 58 Thursday, and his wife, Beverly, have four children. Oldest son Michael, 29, is an Army sergeant who recently served in Baghdad, Iraq. Their youngest child, Stephen, is 15.

His oldest daughter, Stephanie, lives in Florida, where she recently gave birth to Honore's first grandson. His other daughter, Kimberly, lives in Kenner. She evacuated to Stephanie's home in St. Petersburg when Hurricane Katrina hit. But, like many evacuees, she left behind her pets.

She e-mailed her father daily to rescue her cat, Gumbo, and hamster, Hammie. After 10 days in the city, Honore finally accomplished the search-and-rescue mission.

"I've got 80 helicopters in the air and we're trying to evacuate 20,000 people from the Convention Center, and she's e-mailing me every day about her cat," Honore said.

A man of duty, the general followed orders. He made the trek to Jefferson Parish.

"The good news is they were OK," Honore said. "The cat was living large in that place."

Operators fall apart once off the phone

911, from A-1

After that first call, the one that still sticks in Allen's head, they all blended together.

"It was a lot of hollering and screaming and, 'Help me, please don't let me die,' and 'The water's coming up' and 'We're all going to die' … 'I have a baby' … 'Where do you go? What do you do? What time are you coming?'" Allen said after working another 12-hour shift one day last week.

Such moments are captured in wrenching clarity in a sampling of 911 tapes released by the New Orleans Police Department.

In one, an operator identified only as "operator 16" calmly and politely advises just-as-polite resident from "1623 Rampart, between Tupelo and Gordon" that help would not arrive anytime soon.

"I'm stuck in the attic, me and my sister and them, and my mama, and we got water in the whole house," the caller says.

"How many people are in this location with you?"

"One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine people."

"OK, ma'am, we're going to try to get somebody out there to 1623, OK.?"

"OK, thank you."

"You're welcome."

Another woman called from eastern New Orleans, reporting a spreading fire across the street.

"I'm calling to report a fire, at 6131 Bundy Road."

"What type?"

"There's a whole apartment complex on fire ... "

"Do you know how long … ," the operator interrupts.

"No, ma'am."

" Do you know if anybody's inside the house?"

"I know there's people over there, that's what I'm trying to say … "

"… OK, we'll get somebody out there."

"Ok. Thanks."

Another woman called from 1428 Gallier St. in the 9th Ward.

"How many inside the location with you, ma'am?" the operator asks.

"I got a handicapped girl and I got a baby that's on a pump machine ... we're in the bed ... But the water is coming up."

"He's an infant?"

"Yeah, the baby's 8 months …"

"OK, what you need to do – we're trying our best – but you need to get to higher ground, until we're able to get to you."

As Hurricane Katrina sent water rushing into the 9th Ward and eastern New Orleans the day of the storm, Allen listened for a full hour to the callers before taking a break. Many of the operators around her couldn't take it for more than 15 minutes before breaking into sobs and handing the chair over to a revolving cast of replacements. When they recovered their composure, they stepped back in line to relieve those who just had relieved them.

In between such stunted shifts, the women gathered in the hallways, weeping and hugging, watching for which of their colleagues would be the next to break down.

"It's a given that they handle life-and-death emergency calls," said Joe Narcisse, second in command at the call center. "But they don't handle calls where somebody's going to die call after call after call. It was a kind of doomsday, sum-of-all-fears atmosphere."

Yet the women processed the calls like they always do, knowing that for so many of the people they had tried to soothe, it wouldn't matter. At times they couldn't get clear answers even on the most basic information from distressed callers.

In one call that drove home the deadly power of the storm, Narcisse said, an operator asked for an address the caller couldn't possibly give.

"His house had floated down the street," Narcisse said.

Even as they continued to get frantic calls from east of the Industrial Canal, nearest the storm, the passing of the storm gave way to a brief sense of relief, an end in sight.

Then the floodwall at the 17th Street Canal burst, sending water raging into the city all night and generating a whole new round of frantic calls. The new wave of destruction swamped Allen's house in Gentilly.

As the city continued to flood late Aug. 29 and into Aug. 30, the difference between day and night blurred as the operators continued to struggle through short shifts, replacing one another as each reached the limit of horrors.

Meanwhile, the water crept closer to the call center, already damaged by wind. Gordon roamed the center that night, trying to determine whether to move the operation to a safer room.

By daybreak, the water came in around the operators' ankles, then to their knees. Gordon had little choice: The operators loaded onto boats that would take them to the Broad Street overpass, where they would bake in the heat for several hours before spending several uncomfortable days at downtown hotels.

Even as the water had come into their building, the operators' phones never stopped working. They were ringing as the boats pulled away.

Now, more than two weeks after the storm, almost all of the operators have left town, in many cases joining their evacuated families out of state. Only about 15 operators, including Allen, remained in the city and working this week. State Police operators have stepped in to fill the gap, 911 officials said.

Allen has yet to take a day off. She hasn't seen her house, her boyfriend or her two sons, who all evacuated. She doesn't know when she'll be able to see them, and her cell phone rarely works. She's also waiting for calls from FEMA and her insurance company.

But she said she plans to keep her $9-an-hour job, and to stay in New Orleans.

"I'm not leaving New Orleans," she said. "If I have to rebuild, I'll rebuild."

Money for evacuation plan misspent, officials say

Congress gave FEMA $500,000 in 1997

By Rita Beamish
Associated Press writer

As far back as eight years ago, Congress ordered the Federal Emergency Management Agency to develop a plan for evacuating New Orleans during a massive hurricane, but the money instead went to studying the Causeway that spans Lake Pontchartrain, officials say.

The outcome provides one more example of the government's failure to prepare for a massive but foreseeable catastrophe, said the lawmaker who helped secure the money for FEMA to develop the evacuation plan.

"They never used it for the intended purpose," said former Rep. Billy Tauzin, R-La. "The whole intent was to give them resources so they could plan an evacuation of New Orleans that anticipated that a very large number of people would never leave."

In Hurricane Katrina's aftermath, attention has focused on the inability of local and federal officials to evacuate or prepare for the large number of poor people, many of them minorities who had no access to transportation and remained behind.

That possibility was one of the concerns that led Congress in 1997 to set aside $500,000 for FEMA to create "a comprehensive analysis and plan of all evacuation alternatives for the New Orleans metropolitan area."

Frustrated two years later that nothing materialized, Congress strengthened its directive. This time it ordered "an evacuation plan for a Category 3 or greater storm, a levee break, flood or other natural disaster for the New Orleans area."

The $500,000 that Congress appropriated for the evacuation plan went to a commission that studied future options for the 24-mile bridge over Lake Pontchartrain, FEMA spokesman Butch Kinerney said.

The hefty report produced by the Greater New Orleans Expressway Commission "primarily was not about evacuation," said Robert Lambert, the general manager for the bridge expressway. "In general it was an overview of all the things we need to do" for the Causeway through 2016.

Lambert said he could not trace how or if FEMA money came to the commission. Nor could Shelby LaSalle, a Causeway consulting engineer who worked on the plan.

LaSalle said it would be "ludicrous" to consider his report an evacuation plan, although it had a transportation evacuation section, dated Dec. 19, 1997. That part was tacked on mainly to promote the Causeway for future designation as an official evacuation route, LaSalle said.

"We didn't do anything for FEMA," he added.

Asked why the congressional mandate was never fulfilled, Barry Scanlon, senior vice president in the consulting firm of former FEMA Director James Lee Witt, said he believes the agency did what it needed when it gave the money to the state.

"FEMA received an earmark which it processed through to the state as instructed by Congress," Scanlon said. Witt is now a private consultant to Gov. Kathleen Blanco on the Katrina aftermath.

Tauzin said he, too, could never find out where the money went. "They gave it to the Causeway commission? That's wacky," he said.

At the time eight years ago, the Louisiana delegation had plenty of political muscle to get the money. Then-Rep. Bob Livingston, R-La., was chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, which controls the government's purse strings.

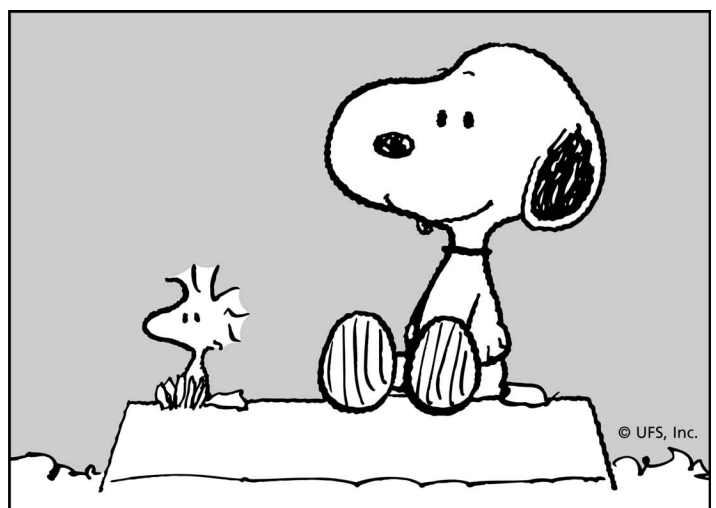
Livingston, now a lobbyist, said he could not explain what happened either, although he knew of other predictive hurricane studies over the years.

"Do I wish the study had been made? Sure, but now that's by the boards. We're doing the best we can right now to repair and rebuild," he said.

FEMA typically contracts its studies to private or government entities. Kinerney, the agency spokesman, said it appeared the money went through the Louisiana government. State emergency and transportation officials said they do not recall it.

After nothing came of its first directive, FEMA addressed the need for an evacuation plan "off and on" over the years, Kinerney said. Last year, the agency undertook the massive "Hurricane Pam" project that was supposed to create a comprehensive emergency plan for New Orleans.

That work was unfinished when Katrina struck, though its first phase involved an elaborate hurricane simulation that was eerily predictive of Katrina's disaster.



Asked about any earlier FEMA-funded plan, Mark Smith, spokesman for the state Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness, said, "To the best of our knowledge we can find no information on this."

Congress' 1999 language directed that FEMA consult with that state agency as well as the Louisiana Department of Transportation and Development.

FEMA's parent agency, the Homeland Security Department, did provide $75,000 to print 1 million evacuation maps that were distributed this year for the state's updated transportation evacuation blueprint, state transportation spokesman Mark Lambert said.

That plan used phased evacuation orders and reverse-flow traffic patterns to avoid the highway snarls New Orleans saw during Hurricane Ivan in 2004.

But that plan was designed for traffic management, not to provide transportation or contingencies for the infirm, elderly and poor who could not get out on their own, officials said.

Federal Katrina money funnels to Louisiana

Many more requests expected throughout state

By Allen Powell II
River Parishes bureau

Louisiana parishes, cities and various departments of state government already have been approved for more than $700 million in federal public assistance for expenses responding to Hurricane Katrina, and officials expect that amount to grow exponentially in the years to come.

Mark Smith, a spokesman for the state Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness, said Sunday that the Federal Emergency Management Agency has received reimbursement requests from dozens of parishes and municipalities across the state, and expects all 64 parishes to make requests in the future. He said the amount of public assistance sought will be several billion dollars.

Eight parishes, municipalities and state departments have already received about $218 million in reimbursements, and the remaining approved money should be distributed soon, Smith said. He said the federal government has streamlined the reimbursement process, and federal money typically is distributed a week after local governments submit their requests. Smith said federal officials understand that many local governments do not have the ability to collect taxes, which would severely limit their ability to provide essential services without federal help.

"Everything's been expedited to the max," Smith said.

Smith said the money is used by local and state governments to pay for any Katrina-related expenses that were accrued after the state was declared a disaster area. Those expenses can range from repairs on existing infrastructure to road clearing and public service restoration costs. In addition, overtime pay for local employees and law enforcement officers will be covered by FEMA, Smith said.

Officials did not have a breakdown of the various financial requests, but did provide this list of allocated funds as of Sept. 18:

- New Orleans: $102,837,450
- Louisiana Office of Homeland Security: $70,386,000
- St. Bernard Parish: $31,601,040
- Plaquemines Parish: $4,354,000
- Lafourche Parish: $6,669,000
- Louisiana Department of Transportation: $1,180,075
- Louisiana Department of Public Safety: $348,030
- St. Tammany Parish: $323,609

'It's amazing what one survivor can do to boost everybody's spirits'

SURVIVOR, from A-1

Martin's rescue Friday afternoon, a full 18 days after Katrina inundated his Gentilly neighborhood, came after a three-day stretch in which the only search-and-rescue discoveries were grim ones.

And while it's taboo around "Camp Zephyr" – the Airline Drive baseball stadium turned FEMA staging area – to suggest that Martin will be the last survivor plucked from a flooded house, it grows increasingly likely with each passing hour.

But the way Mijangos and Madden see it, if Martin can survive 18 days with only a jug of water, most of the time spent in a broiling attic, there could be others.

"It's a mental challenge, but we try to keep hope," Madden said. "There's always a chance to find someone who's been able to survive on whatever's in their house."

In Martin's case, a few gulps of water a day from a one-and-a-half gallon jug did the trick. That, and "a huge will to live," Madden said. "He said we were the first people he had seen or heard. No food, nothing. He was a fighter."

Martin's daughter, Gail Ratleff of Baton Rouge, said there is no doubt that several other factors played a role in her father's survival: his devotion to his 14 children, his marriage of more than 50 years and his strong Catholic faith.

"We went to pick him up Sunday to evacuate him, but he wasn't there," Ratleff said. "Turns out he was at Mass, but we had no idea. We just figured he left on his own. He's a strong man. You have to be strong to survive the Korean War and raising 14 kids."

Martin told Mijangos and Madden that when he returned from church, he settled in to take a short catnap, but awoke after a lengthy sleep to the sight of water pouring into his house.

"He said he grabbed his water jug and went up to the attic," Madden said.

A few days before Martin was discovered, rescue boats checked his block, near Vienna Street by the University of New Orleans, but a cluster of huge tree limbs surrounding his house apparently kept rescuers from getting close enough to get his attention.

When the rescuers, both from the San Francisco Bay area, first laid eyes on Martin, he was sitting in a chair in his kitchen, water still covering the floor. They said they climbed over and around splintered and waterlogged pieces of furniture to reach him. When they did, they found him very dehydrated, but alert and in good spirits.

"I introduced myself as Eric, and he introduced himself, calm as could be," Mijangos said.

Martin couldn't tell Mijangos and Madden precisely when he descended from his sauna-like sanctuary in the attic, but it hadn't been more than a day or two.

"He said he came down when the water subsided, so it couldn't have been long," Mijangos said. "He said he was feeling great except that he was really thirsty."

When the rescue team escorted Martin into their boat, the retired City Park maintenance worker had to double-clutch his pants around his waist to keep them from falling off.

"He was a big man who lost a lot of weight," Mijangos said. "Those pants were just coming right off him."

California firefighters J.D. Madden, left, of Santa Clara and Eric Mijangos of Newark rescued Gerald Martin from his home, where he'd lived since the storm.

STAFF PHOTO BY CHUCK COOK

He took only one item with him from the house, Madden said: his bone-dry plastic water jug. "He wasn't letting go of that for anything, even though there wasn't a drop of water in it."

As the rescuers – members of California Task Force 3 – handed Martin over to a waiting helicopter for medical evacuation, his parting words left them in stitches. "Can we stop by the Taco Bell?" they quoted him as saying.

While Martin was flying to Ochsner Foundation Hospital, word of his rescue was broadcast at the Emergency Operations Center at the Hyatt Hotel as well as Camp Zephyr.

"This was something that was crackling over the airwaves immediately," FEMA Search and Rescue spokesman Louie Fernandez said. "If happiness could have been a cloud of red smoke, we wouldn't have been able to see our hands in front of our face. Amid all the death and destruction, it's amazing what one survivor can do to boost everybody's spirits."

Once Martin arrived at Ochsner, the staff immediately notified his family.

Ratleff said her first words were, "Thank you, Jesus. After that I couldn't speak."

Ratleff said the clan had spent three increasingly nervous weeks using every way possible to locate Martin, calling or visiting evacuation centers from Houston to Georgia, posting urgent messages on the Internet and, about a week ago, checking with the official Hurricane Katrina morgue in St. Gabriel.

"The good news is that he wasn't there," Ratleff said. "Personally, I knew he would survive. Of course, you have your doubts at times, but deep down in my subconscious I just knew he was alive. I just didn't expect that he'd still be in that house. Not in my wildest dreams did I expect that."

When Ratleff spoke to her father on the phone for the first time in nearly three weeks, she asked how he was doing. She said he responded in his usual upbeat way, "I'm great. I'm alllll right."

Still in a state of joyous disbelief, Ratleff said the reality that her father was still alive sunk in when he let out one of his trademark hearty laughs and started asking about his children and grandchildren.

"That's the kind of man he is, always putting his family ahead of himself," she said. "But it was the laugh that did it. That's when I said, 'That's my dad.' "

Some Uptown residents already have returned

people obviously drained to see the amount of damage, especially the small businesses in areas that had a lot of flooding," he said.

With Rita's path still uncertain as the city works to recover from Katrina, Ebbert said that the new storm will play a part in near-term planning. The city presently is populated with government and relief workers, journalists and some residents.

"They obviously had vehicles to get in here," he said. "We will continue to institute a mandatory evacuation. (Rita) may be a factor that will affect our decision about reopening portions of Uptown New Orleans."

Nagin could not be reached for comment on Sunday. Ebbert said the mayor spent the day visiting New Orleanians staying in emergency shelters.

But some Uptown residents, heedless of Nagin's plan to allow them to start returning Wednesday, already are inhabiting their houses on what they said will be a permanent basis.

Some returned Sept. 12, when business owners were granted a day of access to check on their concerns, and they brought enough supplies to sustain them until the power comes back on and the neighborhoods revitalize.

Others never left. For them, the repatriation is in full swing.

"We're here to stay," said David Barrett of 918 Joseph St., an Amtrak employee who returned Tuesday to help a "skeleton crew" of about 20 workers restore service for the company's two main lines to Chicago and New York. "We have good music, good wine and good food," he said.

Barrett, a 16-year resident, evacuated to Memphis, Tenn., the day after Katrina struck. He returned with gas, food, water and camping gear. A 1969 Quincy Jones recording flowed from his light-blue shotgun, drowning out the purr of his generator.

He was looking forward to offering a barbecue feast to the military troops in his neighborhood, with two shoulders, two slabs of ribs and two briskets, courtesy of Tim's Barbecue in Memphis.

"We've got pretty much everything but electricity," he said.

Tom Bimmerle evacuated to Orlando, Fla., on the afternoon before the hurricane. He returned to his basement apartment at 1035 Jena St. on Saturday. A mechanic at Crescent City Automotive, about three blocks away, he was watching football on television and enjoying the cool air from his wall unit.

"For right now, I'm just kind of staying in," he said.

Bimmerle said he expected to find any supplies he needs in Jefferson Parish.

But he, too, was skeptical of the mayor's plan, saying he believes federal officials will override it. "It doesn't sound like it's in Nagin's hands anymore," he said. "As far as 180,000 people coming in, the city isn't ready for that. I think the mayor knows that. A lot of people are not going to rush back."

Bimmerle spent about a week in Baton Rouge, then decided to

"jump-start" the city's recovery and prepare to reopen his shop in mid-October. "I was bouncing around from place to place, feeling like a gypsy," he said.

Gheri Branch and Burgin Sund came back to 355 Lowerline to rescue their pets, and their neighbors'. They evacuated to Columbus, Miss., and returned Sept. 12. "We got in with the business people, and we've been here since then," Branch said. "We came back because we knew our cats didn't have enough food and water."

In the past week, the couple has rescued about 13 animals from the Mid-City area, helping friends and picking up pets whose owners were forced to leave them behind. "We felt like we had to do something," Sund said.

He also was worried about living without air conditioning.

"I told him, people did it for hundreds of years. We'll just sit on the porch and fan ourselves," Branch said.

The couple is using their generator for about 10 hours at night, to sleep in the relative comfort of air conditioning. "It's bearable," Sund said.

Landmark elections in Afghanistan hailed as success

Taliban fighters fail to disrupt vote

By Daniel Cooney
Associated Press writer

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — Some filed into schools to cast their ballots amid lessons still scrawled on blackboards. Others stepped over piles of shoes to vote in mosques. In remote areas, tents served as polling stations.

Across Afghanistan, millions of people lined up at polling stations in defiance of a Taliban boycott call and militant attacks to vote for a new parliament Sunday.

It was the last formal step in starting a democracy aimed at ending decades of rule by the gun.

"Today is a magnificent day for Afghanistan," said Ali Safar, 62, standing in line to vote in Kabul. "We want dignity, we want stability and peace."

Officials hailed the polls as a major success, although initial estimates suggested voter turnout was lower than hoped for because of security fears and frustrations over the inclusion of several warlords on the ballot. Results were not expected for more than a week.

Many people looked to a big vote to marginalize renegade loyalists of the ousted Taliban regime by demonstrating public support for an elected government built up under the protection of 20,000 soldiers in the American-led coalition and 11,000 NATO peacekeepers.

Washington and other governments have poured in billions of dollars trying to foster a civic system that encourages Afghanistan's fractious ethnic groups to work together peacefully and ensure the nation is never again a staging post for al-Qaida and other terrorist groups.

"After 30 years of wars, interventions, occupations and misery, today Afghanistan is moving forward, making an economy, making political institutions," President Hamid Karzai said as he cast his ballot nearly a year after his own victory in an election that defied Taliban threats.

Fifteen people, including a French commando in the U.S.-led coalition, were killed in a spate of violence during the day. But there was no spectacular attack as threatened by Taliban militants, whose stepped-up insurgency the past six months caused more than 1,200 deaths.

Heavy security kept most violence away from polling stations. Election officials reported three people wounded and no one killed in attacks near polls and said only 16 of the 6,270 voting stations did not open because of security threats.

Vote counting begins Tuesday, and with donkeys and camels being used to collect ballots in some remote areas, preliminary election results are not expected until early October.

Even then, it likely will take time to figure out who has the power in the new Wolesi Jirga, a parliament with 249 seats, 68 of which are set aside for women. Most of the 2,775 candidates ran as independents, and Karzai was careful not to publicly favor anyone, fearing renewed tensions if any political blocs become too powerful.

Challenger gaining in German election

But Schroeder still could retain power

By David Rising
Associated Press writer

BERLIN — Vote counts and exit polls showed conservative challenger Angela Merkel's party leading in German parliamentary elections Sunday but falling short of the majority she needed to form a center-right coalition as the nation's first female chancellor.

Gerhard Schroeder, written off as a lame duck a few weeks ago, finished stronger than expected and refused to concede defeat, saying he could still theoretically remain in power if talks with other parties were successful.

An exit poll by the Forsa agency showed Schroeder's party winning more seats in parliament even though Merkel's Christian Democrats received more votes overall.

"I feel myself confirmed in ensuring on behalf of our country that there is in the next four years a stable government under my leadership," he said to cheering supporters at his Social Democrat party headquarters while flashing the thumbs-up signal and holding his arms aloft in a gesture of triumph.

But Merkel claimed her party received a mandate from voters to form a new coalition government to carry out her plan to mend frayed ties with the United States.

"What is important now is to form a stable government for the people in Germany, and we ... quite clearly have the mandate to do that," she said.

Both Schroeder and Merkel said they would talk to all parties except the new Left Party, a combination of ex-communists and renegade Social Democrats.

The national election authority said Merkel's party and their Bavarian sister party, the Christian Social Union, had 36.5 percent of the vote from 241 of 299 districts counted. Schroeder's Social Democrats had 34 percent and their coalition partner, the Greens, 7.9 percent.

The pro-business Free Democrats had 9.8 percent and the Left Party 7.9 percent.

Sunday's vote centered on different visions of Germany's role in the world and how to fix its sputtering economy. Schroeder touted the country's role as a European leader and counterbalance to America, while Merkel pledged to reform the economy and strengthen relations with Washington.

Kurdish lawmaker assassinated in Iraq

Roadside bomb kills U.S. soldier

By Slobodan Lekic
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Insurgents assassinated a Kurdish member of parliament, and police found 20 bodies shot to death and dumped in the Tigris River north of Baghdad, where there was no major violence Sunday for the first time in five days.

In a violent insurgent-infested region near the Syrian border, the U.S. military said a soldier was killed in a roadside bombing while on patrol near al-Asad Air Base The dead soldier was assigned to the 56th Brigade Combat Team.

The death raised to at least 1,899 members of the U.S. military who have been died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Faris Nasir Hussein, a member of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan party, was killed along with his brother and their driver in an ambush 50 miles north of Baghdad. A second Kurdish lawmaker, Haidar Shanoun, was wounded in the attack near the town of Dujail.

Police and party officials said the men were murdered Saturday night as they drove to the capital for Sunday's session of the legislature, which signed off on minor amendments to Iraq's draft constitution and delivered it to the United Nations for printing. The U.N. will distribute 5 million copies in advance of the Oct. 15 referendum.

Lawmakers sat for a minute of silence to honor their dead comrade.

"The terrorists have launched a war of aggression against all Iraqis, (but) we are up to it," said Deputy Speaker Hussain al-Shahristani.

24 bodies found

Authorities reported finding two dozen more bodies Sunday, men shot to death in the apparent ongoing tit-for-tat killings between Sunni and Shiite death squads.

Four of the dead were found handcuffed and shot in east Baghdad. Twenty more were dragged from the Tigris River near Balad, a city 50 miles north of the capital, police reported.

In Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, 200 militiamen with automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades set fire to tires as they barricaded main streets, demanding the provincial governor order the immediate release of Sheikh Ahmed Fartosi.

The sheikh, a senior figure among followers of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia, was arrested by British and Iraqi forces on Friday. He was accused of launching raids against security forces in the city, police said.

A coalition military statement on Sunday said Fartosi and two other detained militants were "suspects in terror attacks against coalition forces, resulting in the deaths of nine members of coalition forces in the past two months in Basra."

After a tense standoff lasting several hours, the militiamen withdrew when an al-Sadr representative arrived from Najaf to negotiate with police and British forces who control the region.

British forces to stay

Sheikh Mudhafar al-Shawki emerged from the meeting Sunday night and ordered the militiamen stay off the streets until he could report to al-Sadr. Neither side would give details of the talks.

Last year, the Mahdi Army fought U.S. forces in the Shiite holy cities of Najaf and Karbala. The fighting ended after al-Sadr accepted a peace agreement negotiated by the Shiite clerical hierarchy.

Britain, which has about 9,000 forces in the Basra region of southern Iraq, will keep its troops in the country as long as they are required and could send more, British Defense Secretary John Reid said on Sunday.

"Our troops will be there until such times as the conditions are met — those conditions being the Iraqis themselves having such democratic control and such security forces that they can take the lead," Reid told ITV television, adding that more British forces could be deployed if necessary.

In the troubled and ethnically mixed northern city of Kirkuk, a roadside bomb killed five Iraqi soldiers and wounded two others, police said.

Insurgents attacked a fuel train headed for Baghdad's major power station early Sunday, but there were no casualties in the bombing which was one of only a few incidents of violence reported in the Iraqi capital Sunday.

Residents of Keys flee as system heads for Gulf

Storm could become 'Rita' by late today

By John Pain
Associated Press writer

MIAMI — Tourists were told Sunday to evacuate the lower Florida Keys as a new tropical depression strengthened over the Bahamas and moved toward the vulnerable, low-lying island chain.

A hurricane watch was posted for the entire Florida Keys.

"It does look like that there is the potential for it to become a hurricane, near or just before it reaches the Florida Keys," said Daniel Brown, a meteorologist at the National Hurricane Center.

The watch means hurricane conditions with sustained winds of at least 74 mph are possible by late today, according to the Miami-based Hurricane Center.

Long-term forecasts show the system heading generally toward the west in the Gulf of Mexico toward Texas or Mexico later in the week, but such forecasts are subject to large errors. That means areas ravaged by Hurricane Katrina could potentially be in the storm's path.

"Once it reaches the Gulf, really everybody should pay attention at that point," Brown said.

If its sustained wind speed climbs to 39 mph, the depression would be named Tropical Storm Rita, the 17th named storm of the Atlantic hurricane season. That would make this season the fourth-busiest since record keeping began in 1851. Twenty-one tropical storms formed in 1933, 19 developed in 1995 and 1887 and 18 formed in 1969, according to the Hurricane Center.

Emergency management officials in Monroe County, Fla., told visitors to leave islands extending from the Dry Tortugas west of Key West to the Seven Mile Bridge near Marathon. The islands are connected to each other and the mainland by a single highway.

Hundreds of motorcyclists were in the Keys for an annual event, but most were leaving Sunday, senior emergency management director Billy Wagner said.

County officials also urged residents of mobile homes to prepare for possible evacuation.

Michael Knowles, general manager of the Hampton Inn Resort in Key West, told his guests to leave Sunday but said he wasn't too worried about the latest weather system because it wasn't as strong as Katrina.

"These are like rehearsal drills for us," Knowles said. "I'm originally from the Bahamas, so this is like my 25th hurricane."

Residents of South Florida and central and western Cuba should also closely monitor the system's progress, Brown said.

Elsewhere, the 18th depression of the Atlantic hurricane season formed late Saturday east of the Turks and Caicos Islands.

Sunday afternoon, the depression had top sustained winds of about 35 mph. It was centered about 385 miles east-southeast of Nassau, Bahamas, and 600 miles east-southeast of Miami.

Floating refrigerator becomes Kodak moment

Amid the destruction in one Lakeview home, a photographic oasis awaits one crestfallen homeowner

DAVID MEEKS

My life for the past three weeks has been about cherishing any little victory. There weren't many to find in my visit Saturday to what used to be my home on Memphis Street in Lakeview.

Only a few victories, but they mean so much to me now.

Amid a devastated house, furniture and appliances toppled about as if a bomb exploded, all my possessions painted with a toxic sludge that, once it gets on you, sticks like glue, I found my refrigerator lying face up on the kitchen floor.

Every photo on it, keepsakes of special memories pinned by magnets, was perfect. My daughter and me on her fifth-grade trip to Washington D.C., her eighth-grade graduation photo, a shot of a good friend's newborn twins, me with two buddies at the last live music show at the old Mermaid Lounge. There's the summer vacation in the Smokies, there's Mom with her dog.

A sentimental oasis surrounded by disaster.

Somehow, when the water rose, the refrigerator floated on its back and never turned over. It just eased back down and was sitting there, the front of it untouched, like nothing ever happened.

On the first floor, nothing else will be salvaged. The stench is unbelievable and the muck includes ingredients so powerful that once your feet step through the crusty top and into the moist slime underneath, your eyes start burning within 30 seconds.

If you're going back to get what you can from your flooded house, I can offer only this advice: Prepare yourself emotionally and be careful. This stuff is slippery and dangerous, and you might have to throw away whatever it touches.

In my 1,800-square-foot home, only about 300 square feet are in the camelback upstairs. Having seen so many hurricanes approach New Orleans and miss, I still feared the worst with Katrina. So, in a decision I always will be thankful for, I moved all our family photos upstairs, including some framed ones I hadn't yet hung on freshly-painted walls.

Yet somehow, in my haste to evacuate, I missed the ones on the refrigerator.

I also left some stuff hanging on the walls, under the belief that a photo mounted 5 feet above the floor couldn't possibly be at risk. But getting stuff off the floor wasn't good enough at my house, which filled up with 6 feet of water and stayed that way for more than two weeks.

Now, whatever was upstairs is all we have left.

This wasn't my first visit home since the storm. I'd already done my crying while sitting in a kayak, overwhelmed by the sight of our charming Lakeview cottage inundated with water almost to the gutters. I'd already been inside, having kicked in a window to swim in water over my head to rescue Carson, our golden retriever-Australian shepherd mix trapped for days on the second floor. I'd already bumped into floating appliances, sofas and an iMac.

Everything else in the Meeks household on Memphis Street in the Lakeview neighborhood of New Orleans was destroyed, covered in the toxic sludge that swam in with Hurricane Katrina's floodwaters. But on the front of the displaced refrigerator, which apparently had floated as the waters rose, were a series of pristine photos, held in place with magnets, and smiling brightly amid the destruction.

I knew it would be a mess once the water drained out. I don't think I quite realized what I do now: We'll never reside another day in this house. A place where people used to laugh and watch movies and hold Sunday cookouts is now an eerie, distorted environmental hazard.

Every piece of vegetation in the yard is dead. Huge trees are dead.

Look down the street. It's all dead, like a city that no longer exists.

Everyone in our neighborhood, and in so many others, faces that same emotionally wrenching walk into the place they used to live, to save what they can, what they wish they would've saved before the storm.

Someday I know, I hope, it will be better than now. But the scenes inside these homes make that day seem a long ways off, almost like it never will come.

The water is gone. But what is left of Lakeview is enough to make a grown man weep.

After being submerged in floodwaters for nearly three weeks, the area – now a virtual dead zone – was finally dry enough Sunday for residents to re-enter their homes and try to salvage whatever was left of their lives.

But for many, the sight was almost too much to bear.

The neighborhood's formerly lush foliage and tree-lined boulevards are covered in an ashen film. The streets, where children once rode bikes and parents once pushed baby strollers, are covered with thick, black sludge.

The air, once fragrant with the smell of gardenia and ligustrum, reeks of sewage and dead fish.

For Mark and Mary Ripple, returning to their home in the 6600 block of Louis XIV Street was a lesson in humility, they said.

The upstairs was virtually untouched.

"My Pottery Barn magazine is still sitting by the toilet," said Mary Ripple, a teacher at St. Dominic School who on Sunday was covered in a mixture of sweat and sludge. "That bathroom is what our life was."

But downstairs, the Ripple's home, like most in the neighborhoods that stretch from Lake Pontchartrain to City Park Avenue, stewed in 7 feet of polluted floodwaters for almost three weeks after Hurricane Katrina caused a floodwall on the 17th Street Canal to fail, pouring water into the city.

With the water finally pumped out, the Ripples found everything on the first floor covered in thick black mud. Their furniture was scattered, as if their home had been a doll house toppled by an angry child. Mold was already blanketing the drywall.

"Some things you can't control," Mark Ripple said, frantically pulling out soggy insulation and tossing it out the window. "All we can do is get this crud out of here."

Virtually nothing on the first floor was salvageable. But two things did survive: a sign the Ripples bought for their two kids, proclaiming "Thou Shalt Not Whine," and a placard that reads "Smell the Roses."

"Ironic, huh," said Mark Ripple, an architect. "So we've decided we are not going to complain."

His wife retorted: "Well, we might complain a little bit."

For the handful of Lakeview residents who made their way back home Sunday by working around military checkpoints or using permits issued to business owners, the scene was equally as shocking.

In recent years, the Lakeview area had undergone massive gentrification, with young homeowners renovating older homes or tearing down cottages to build bigger, more expensive homes. Property values were among the highest in the city.

Life was good, said Patsy Jarreau, who packed up a truck and headed back to her Cape Cod cottage Sunday — only to find it in ruins. Now, all that is left is heartbreak.

"This is devastating," Jarreau said, standing in the bed of the truck with muck covering her face, arms and legs. "This house was so beautiful."

Refusing to leave all her waterlogged belongings behind, the clinical sciences professor loaded up some damp antique chairs and paintings, the backs of which were already covered in mold. Her friend Louann Lawrence wept after dropping a box of glasses she tried to save from Jarreau's cabinets. Her house, on Marshall Foch, was next to be visited.

"It's all right," Jarreau said, trying to comfort her. "It's just stuff."

While broken glasses brought some to tears, others wept at the sheer barrenness of everything.

The Harrison Avenue shopping area, usually bustling with people buying groceries at Lakeview Fine Foods or picking up their children at St. Dominic School, was desolate, waterlines ringing the buildings. Brightly colored jungle gym equipment was strewn over the fence at Mt. Carmel Academy. Restaurants along West End were missing stairs, roofs, awnings and windows. Sailboats were piled one on top of the other at the lakefront marina. Cars, parked on neutral grounds, were covered with a yellowish brown film.

Doug Thornton and his wife, Donna, also returned Sunday to their home in the Lakewood South subdivision to retrieve what they could. They said they were awed at the sheer power of the floodwaters.

"It's unbelievable." said Thornton, the regional vice president of SMG, the company that manages the Superdome. "All these big oak trees are just uprooted, everything is brown and the waterline is up to 7 feet on the house. It's like somebody dropped a nuclear weapon and just killed everything. There's not any sign of life. There's no greenery. It's bizarre. It's the weirdest thing I've ever seen in my life."

Back at the Ripple house, the couple furiously ripped out drywall while their daughter Sarah picked through her room, salvaging what she could. Determined to hold onto hope that she will return to Mt. Carmel Academy for the second semester of her senior year, Sarah hung her soaked uniform to dry from the kitchen chandelier. After enough digging, she also found her nametag.

"I can still close my eyes and see everything in my room perfectly," she said.

Mark Ripple said the family has been most distressed about Sarah having to start her senior year at St. Joseph's Academy in Baton Rouge. Then he began to cry, as he told of how on Sarah wore her Mt. Carmel sweater on her first day at St. Joseph's, despite the 95 degree heat.

"We had dinner with friends recently and we all tried to name 10 things that were positive that could come out of this," he said, choking up. "The thing on everybody's list was that you'll never take the simple things for granted again."

Rebuilding should lift up the poor

David Kallick worried aloud that his phone call, or at least his subject matter, might be premature.

Kallick is a senior fellow at the Fiscal Policy Institute. The New York think tank coordinated a coalition of progressive groups that helped shape the direction of the rebuilding effort following the Sept. 11 attacks.

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans is largely empty of its people. Many of our homes remain under water. Our dead are unburied. So Kallick, a sensitive man, wanted to proceed with caution. He had some suggestions about what we should do, even at this early stage, to ensure that the interests of our poorest citizens are taken into account as we rebuild.

Other people have not been so delicate.

Last Thursday President Bush suspended the Davis-Bacon Act, the law requiring employers to pay locally prevailing wages to construction workers on federally financed projects. The declaration applies to parts of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida.

Snouts in the trough

Since Katrina, nothing has been laid so bare as the fact that, in many instances, the poorest among us were fatally ill-equipped to save their own lives. Yet if these people managed to survive the hurricane and obtain jobs in the rebuilding effort, they may well find that their president is opposed to using their tax dollars to pay them decent wages.

Hundreds of millions of dollars in no-bid contracts have already been let. Companies that have received them seem guaranteed to reap big profits.

In "An Open Letter From Civic Groups in New York on 9/11 and Katrina," the Fiscal Policy Institute, in conjunction with Good Jobs NY and Good Jobs First, urge community groups to move quickly to help shape the debate over the rebuilding of our city.

"In New York, many of us hesitated in criticizing program design because we didn't want to seem ungrateful or (in the post-Sept. 11 world) divisive. As it turned out, however, when we got into debates later on, the early design of the programs wound up limiting the possible range of our response," the letter states.

Pricing out the poor

Ultimately, the financial assistance and focus of the Sept. 11 rebuilding effort focused on ensuring that falling real estate values were propped up. This was a boon to those rich enough to own property in the area, but little was done to ensure affordable housing and living wages for the area's moderate-income residents. As a result, Kallick said, that area of Manhattan is wealthier than ever. But income levels in the community were raised primarily by pricing out poor residents.

We could soon face the same problem in New Orleans.

I hope that our political leaders have learned more from this disaster than our president has.

But, if their past action is any indication, their contempt for our poorest citizens will remain unabated.

City's scattered faithful returning to worship

Back to normal means back to church

By Bruce Nolan
Staff writer

It was shortly after 10:30 a.m. when the Rev. Argile Smith, dressed informally this remarkable Sunday in slacks and shirt sleeves, rose before a remnant of his scattered Southern Baptist congregation and summoned them to prayer.

The white steeple still stood atop First Baptist Church of Belle Chasse, but a patchwork of blue tarps covered the bald spots on the roof. They marked the places where Hurricane Katrina stripped off the shingles one day short of three weeks ago.

In the lot next door, three dozen Oklahoma Baptist relief workers prepared to cook 10,000 boxed meals for the Red Cross to deliver to stricken New Orleanians across the Mississippi River.

Everywhere around the church, trees were snapped, billboards crumpled, roofs scalped of shingles.

Inside, Judy Winfrey, who

SAVING HISTORY

Centuries-old records imperiled by floodwaters

By John Pope

When Hurricane Katrina slammed into New Orleans, a group of highly trained professionals knew exactly what to do: Find and preserve Louis Armstrong's trumpet, John James Audubon's bird prints, a drum from the Battle of New Orleans and city records dating back to 1769.

To a large extent, they succeeded. These and other irreplaceable ingredients of the city's history, along with Napoleon Bonaparte's death mask, early Carnival costumes and the paintings of acclaimed primitive artist Clementine Hunter, have been moved to warehouses in the Baton Rouge area, said Emily Sneed, press secretary to Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, whose office is responsible for the state museum network.

She declined to be more specific about where they are, citing security concerns.

Those artifacts came through the storm undamaged, but others remain in doubt. Professionals are working to salvage about 6,000 bound volumes of more than two centuries of property transactions in Orleans Parish — about 10 percent of all the books in the Notarial Archives — that were under 3 feet of water in the basement of the Civil District Court building on Loyola Avenue.

Greg Lambousy, director of collections for the Louisiana State Museum, on Wednesday shows off Louis Armstrong's cornet, which was moved to the Baton Rouge area ahead of Hurricane Katrina's landfall. Many one-of-a-kind artifacts were evacuated before the storm hit.

Concern mounted because archivists weren't allowed inside for more than a week after the storm, prompting Shelly Henley, immediate past president of the Society of Southwest Archivists, to sound the alarm in a letter to editors of several newspapers.

Without professional help, the documents "will soon be unrecoverable," she wrote. "New Orleans, a city so rich in history, may soon become a city with no history."

All the documents are backed up on microfilm in Baton Rouge, but saving the actual records is crucial, said Stephen Bruno, custodian of notarial records.

"When you talk about losing land records, you can't establish who the owner of a property is," he said. "These records are critical to any kind of

East Jefferson bureau

The Joseph S. Yenni Building, Jefferson Parish government's east bank headquarters, rises 10 stories above Elmwood in an area that often floods at ground level with rainwater pooling on nearby Clearview Parkway.

But when Hurricane Katrina hit, the Yenni Building flooded from the top down when the Category 4 hurricane ripped away the rooftop housing for its elevator mechanics and cooling tower and hurled their tin siding into the parking lot and around several trees. The resulting hole in the roof let rain pour into the building's core around the elevators, soaking the seventh through 10th stories. The floors below received less water damage, mostly on the northeast side of the building.

"It was like something out of a movie," said parish Deputy Chief Administrative Assistant Deano Bonano. "The lights were flashing. There was water running down the walls from the ceiling. It was unreal."

The Yenni Building still resembled a movie set Friday — this time a work of science

Minister offers help and hope

Hy McEnery

By Gordon Russell

The old woman didn't want to leave her dead husband behind on the porch of their Uptown shotgun. But she desperately needed dialysis, and knew she would be joining her husband among the deceased if she didn't get it.

Hy McEnery knew what he had to do to help her: Perform a funeral for her husband – Alcede Jackson – and wrap him up as well as he could. That, he hoped, would afford the grieving widow enough peace to be able to leave.

It worked. An ordained Baptist minister, McEnery, 54, launched into a 15-minute ceremony honoring a man he'd never met, a man whose long-exposed corpse, with a makeshift sign for a headstone, had emerged as one of the icons of the city's suffering.

He could sense Violet Jackson's change in attitude. A few minutes later, she and two real-estate commerce in the city."

His office has hired Munters, a Swedish firm, to restore the documents. The job could cost as much as $500,000, but, Bruno said, "there's no price tag on this. They're too priceless."

Plan of action sought

The close call made Angele Davis, Louisiana's secretary of culture, recreation and tourism, realize that a plan must be developed to protect the city's past. "We've got a task force going now," she said. "We have to come up with a plan to protect them."

Members will include representatives of the Historic New Orleans Collection and the New Orleans Museum of Art.

Buildings containing both institutions' holdings were unscathed, even though the art museum was surrounded by floodwater.

However, the storm reduced a piece in the museum's sculpture garden to a mass of twisted metal.

Davis' purview includes the Louisiana State Museum system. Part of the roof was torn off the Old U.S. Mint on Esplanade Avenue and Decatur Street, but damage was minimal to the Presbytere and Cabildo, two iconic structures that flank St. Louis Cathedral overlooking Jackson Square.

Another historical storehouse that escaped damage was the basement of New Orleans' main library at Tulane and Loyola avenues, which houses the city archives.

Papers there date back to 1769, and they include the papers of all New Orleans' mayors, some court records, photographs, slave records, maps and City Council minutes, said Tania Tetlow, chairwoman of the New Orleans Library Board.

"The historical importance of the survival of these archives cannot be overestimated," said Loyola history professor Michael Ross, who described them as "one of the nation's great historical treasures."

The archives were secure, Tetlow said, because the library was built in the late 1950s, when officials were preoccupied with making buildings strong enough to withstand a nuclear attack.

Preserving archives

The major focus of historical restoration has been the Notarial Archives. Munters employees assessed the damage last week, pumped out water and retrieved the books.

Damaged books were sent to a company warehouse, where workers hope to minimize damage by freeze-drying pages and vacuuming the ice off.

The other records were put in air-conditioned trucks to be delivered to a temporary storage site, said Bruno, adding that he does not sure where they will go.

Older property records, some dating to 1734, are in the Notarial Archives Research Center in the Amoco Building on Poydras Street. Although floodwater didn't damage them, the lack of air conditioning is affecting older documents, he said, and they may be moved where air conditioning is available.

Among other repositories in the New Orleans area are several at Tulane University's Uptown campus, including the William Ransom Hogan Jazz Archive; the Special Collections department, the city's oldest historical research library; and the Amistad Research Center, which specializes in African-American history.

Although curators were optimistic because floodwaters did not get into those buildings, they were eager to pump in air conditioning to thwart the dangerous effects of mold and humidity.

And Susan Tucker, a curator at the Newcomb College archives, said she was concerned about the status of her holdings and Amistad's, which share space in an off-campus building that she had not heard about.

Spiritual help offered to rescuers

HERO, from B-1

relatives were ensconced in McEnery's church van, en route to Louis Armstrong International Airport, where he hoped she'd get the medical help she needed. He found a doctor, who said he'd take care of her, and McEnery sped back to his neighborhood.

It was just another post-Katrina day for McEnery, a self-described survivalist, Mississippi National Guardsman and Christian who has spent the past three weeks offering rides, handing out food and water, performing search-and-rescue missions, ministering to the needy and providing shelter for other aid workers in his home, which doubles as a bed-and-breakfast.

All of this while awaiting deployment to Iraq, where he's due to spend the next seven months.

McEnery emphasized that he is not unique. He sees himself as one of hundreds of regular citizens who have been doing what they can to help people in desperate straits.

The charity comes naturally to him. In normal times, McEnery runs what he describes as "an inner-city ministry" that aims to help kids out of the grinding cycle of poverty, teen pregnancy and welfare by preaching the Gospel and providing hot meals and tutoring. The church, known as Child Evangelism Fellowship, has about 100 members, he said.

Before the hurricane, McEnery was in constant contact with members of the group, trying to persuade them to leave. While most rode out the storm, they left their homes when the city flooded — some for the misery of the Superdome and Convention Center.

Hy McEnery, a self-described survivalist, National Guardsman and Christian, has spent the past three weeks in New Orleans offering rides, handing out food and water, performing search-and-rescue missions, ministering to the needy and providing shelter for other aid workers in his home.

As despair grew, McEnery took to the streets in his church van, picking up "the sick and the infirm" and taking them to Ochsner Clinic Foundation or to the airport. The able-bodied he dropped off at the Convention Center.

It was scary at times for freelancers like McEnery. The crowds lining Interstate 10 and the area around the Convention Center were becoming unhinged, and his 12-passenger van was an inviting target.

He doesn't blame people, though.

"You take the finest group of suburbanites in America, with great wealth and education, and you put them in a situation without food or water for 24 hours," he said. "I don't care who you are – you're going to get nasty. Desperate people are dangerous people."

He worried about authorities getting the wrong idea about him, too.

"They're saying 'Shoot the looters,'" he said. "I'm thinking, I'm going to get shot driving around in my van."

Late in the first week, McEnery and a friend from Dallas began taking boat rides from the staging ground near Napoleon and St. Charles avenues to look for people trapped in the water, mostly in parts of Uptown. He estimated that he helped bring about 200 people to safety.

He saw few authorities helping in the rescues, he said, although he conceded that official efforts may have been focused in harder-hit areas.

In general, McEnery and the ragtag groups who were involved in the rescues – including a team from a halfway house run by Volunteers of America – were deeply unimpressed with the official response.

"While they (government officials) were posturing, the little people of New Orleans were dying by the hundreds, and possibly thousands," he said. "And if it's not thousands, it's because of all the volunteers. The state was not proactive or reactive – it was inactive."

Late in the second week after the storm, the rescue effort waned, and McEnery decided to push himself in a different direction. He asked a cop he knew whether the police department needed anything.

Just one thing, the cop said: Spiritual help.

So for the past week, McEnery has been visiting police and fire stations, offering sermons, prayers and counseling to anyone who wants it.

McEnery, a National Guard sergeant who serves as a chaplain's assistant, is due to report for Iraq duty on Sept. 22. He completed a tour in Afghanistan last year. He's hoping the military, which already gave him one 10-day reprieve because of Katrina, will give him a bit more time.

"I love my country, and I love the military," he said. "I count it a great honor to serve my country. But in some ways I'm not looking forward to it (Iraq), because of what happened here."

Churches can only pray sheep return to fold

CHURCH, from B-1

rode out the storm in Harvey as her roof disintegrated overhead, bent over the keyboard this second Sunday after Katrina and launched into "The Name of the Lord."

Arrayed before Smith stood perhaps one-third of the usual congregation of 250. They were among the first to return to the high ground of upper Plaquemines Parish, whose lower third lay in ruins downriver.

These are make-do, informal times. Many in the congregation were in jeans and clean T-shirts. They hugged and greeted each other and swapped evacuation and storm stories.

Most had fled the Belle Chasse area before Katrina. On their return, most found that their homes had been spared from flooding and were more or less dry. They were damaged but fixable.

"I'm just so happy to see these people again. It gets you kind of choked up when you greet," said Lorraine Hess, a church member for 36 years. Most congregants seemed safe and well, she said.

"Most of these people are not complainers anyway," added her husband, Bill.

They were a rare group, blessed for having a relatively undamaged church on high, accessible ground in a community just beyond the city and open to receive its returning residents.

Although the New Orleans area has gushed a torrent of prayer since Katrina struck on Aug. 29, the worship of its organized faith communities remains largely disrupted.

Masses and Sunday services have begun to return in St. Tammany, the River Parishes, and to some extent in Jefferson Parish. But closer to the city, they are almost nonexistent.

The largest churches in New Orleans – Pentecostal giants Greater St. Stephen Full Gospel Baptist Church, Beacon Light International Cathedral and Life Center Cathedral – are flooded, wrecked or inaccessible. Their congregations are scattered like those of much smaller churches.

The city's iconic St. Louis Cathedral appears relatively undamaged in the high-and-dry French Quarter, but the area remains sealed by civil authorities. No public Mass was celebrated there Sunday.

The city's Christ Church Episcopal Cathedral on St. Charles Avenue is similarly dry, but also in an area still under lockdown.

So services close to the city, like the one in Belle Chasse, were rare.

But an early return does not necessarily translate into a secure future, either for First Baptist Belle Chase or hundreds of others similarly situated congregations.

Four weeks ago, this church was stocked with dozens of families with children, Smith said.

They fled New Orleans on a few hours notice. They landed – they thought temporarily – with friends and siblings in distant cities. Now circumstance has forced them to put down roots in unfamiliar places and enroll their children in new schools on short notice.

Nobody yet knows how many of First Baptist's missing faces will show up next week – or ever, Smith said.

Still, the first words out of Smith's mouth on Sunday were these: "How we have missed the opportunity to worship together, and how grateful we are to be back at it."

If this was the moment for asking the big theological question – Why did this happen? – Smith opted not to seize it. Instead, he took as his message a passage from the New Testament's book of Hebrews, 10:24-26, urging his flock to do good deeds among one another, worship together, and encourage each other.

"On this side of the storm, I don't have to tell you what love looks like," he said. "It looks like doing good works, where you look after your neighbor as well as yourself."

But some, it was clear, had begun to grapple with the meaning of Katrina.

And since these were the self-selected faithful, they stood on the bedrock of Christian belief.

Take Hess, for instance.

At 74, she is no stranger to adversity. A few hours before coming to worship Sunday, she telephoned a 24-year-old Marine grandson to say goodbye, literally hours before his deployment to Iraq.

"God is in control," she said firmly.

Then paraphrasing the book of Mathew, she said, "There will be storms and rumors of storms. God is always in control. If only we put our faith in him, he will pull us through."

more Jefferson Parish residents, and inside their house found mold flourishing and puddles of water still standing after a flood that apparently reached almost a foot deep.

"I just dreaded seeing what it would look like," said Rose Landry, 70, who said she cried after opening the door. "I just kind of walked around and looked and went back outside and thought, 'Where do I start?' "

Now that Parish President Aaron Broussard has abandoned a phased reentry plan and let all Jefferson residents return to their homes, more and more dust mask-clad residents are hauling out ruined carpet and furniture, and scattered gasoline stations, hardware stores, restaurants and snowball stands are opening to serve the reawakening parish.

The Landrys said they will stay in their son's house, across Lakeshore Drive from their own, where less water invaded, while they try to clean up, dry out and salvage their own cherished belongings. Then they will return to their evacuation homes, with relatives in St. Tammany Parish and Mississippi, until they can begin the project of restoring or rebuilding the first and only house they've ever owned.

Ernest Landry, 76, sat under the carport carefully removing metal etchings of female figures in flowing gowns from their moldy frames. His daughter-in-law, Sharon Landry, dragged Rose Landry's shoes out of the house in plastic bags. Ernest Landry said he has had the artwork for years and thinks the pieces will be all right.

"I think it's beautiful," he said of as he picked at the soggy backing of an etching. It was in a closet above the waterline but not immune to the steamy conditions of the past three weeks. "I'm going to have them reframed and everything."

Rose Landry said she hopes the house gets condemned so they can rebuild completely. Both she and her husband said they are committed to staying in the neighborhood where the Lake Pontchartrain levee is visible just down the street.

"If I live to be a million, I'll never move again," Ernest Landry said. "I've been here too long."

Across Metairie in Bucktown, Banghe Xing shook his head at the two-bedroom apartment where he used to live with his wife and child. Katrina's winds inflicted severe damage on the area around Live Oak and Carrollton streets, including blowing the roof off Xing's apartment building.

"Jefferson Parish is open to residents, but to me (there's) no way I can live here," he said, pointing to his apartment, where three rooms are open to the sky. His family is staying in a Baton Rouge shelter for now.

"The blue roof probably cannot help this building," he said, referring to a campaign to cover damaged roofs with blue tarps.

Xing is looking for a place to rent in Jefferson Parish so he can move back and resume his job as a software engineer. A few blocks away on Lake Avenue, some businesses cleaned up and a couple even prepared to open.

Mardi Gras beads and a toy car are among the items found curbside in Metairie, mixed in with other debris that is being thrown out from a house damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

Chad Nunez, owner of Daiquiris and Creams, had power and water and hoped to open his doors for Monday night's New Orleans Saints game, as long as authorities would allow it after curfew. Across the street, Sidney Patrick Sr., who runs Captain Sid's Seafood, said he needs probably six weeks to clean up enough to sell seafood again.

"It just takes time to do everything," he said, amid the rotten smell of $50,000 of ruined shrimp, crawfish and other fish. "We were hard hit."

At Breaux Mart in River Ridge, workers also had to dispose of mass amounts of food.

"We just about threw away the whole store and restocked it," assistant manager Willie Mendez said. But he said the store has enjoyed brisk business as residents arrive and begin restocking their home refrigerators, Mendez said.

On Woodvine Avenue, in a part of Old Metairie that saw as much as four feet of water, Chuck Iglesias had several fans set up on his buckled wood floors as he tried to dry his house, salvage dolls belonging to his 7-year-old daughter and save curtains for his wife. Mounds of furniture and sagging belongings lined the front walkway to the house. Iglesias, an architect with an office on Metairie Road, said Katrina will create a lot of business for him. Maybe too much business.

"It will be overwhelming," he said. "Taking care of your client is going to be overwhelming."

Because the water rose and receded slowly in Old Metairie, Iglesias said, he thinks most of the stately houses probably avoided structural damage and can be restored. In places caught in a current from a levee breach, however, the damage will be insurmountable, he said.

After Katrina, Iglesias lived with his wife and daughter for two weeks at a hotel in Lafayette and drove and pirogued in to check on his house. He's staying with friends in Kenner while he works at the house but plans to return to his family, now in Houston where his daughter has enrolled in a new school, until the contractors can come.

"I'll be back," Iglesias said. "Oh yeah, we'll come back. My wife's family's been in New Orleans for 150 years."

"I'm an optimist," he said. "It's going to be just fine."

Building's repair costs could total more than $1 million

fiction. Large ducts of clear plastic tubing were hanging from the ceiling, pumping fresh air throughout the building. Cables lined the hallways, and cleanup crews clad in protective breathing masks, goggles and yellow rubber gloves tromped about.

No one dares hazard a public guess as to the total repair costs; the cooling tower alone would cost $350,000. Just the cleanup, parish officials say, will total more than $1 million.

But they hope to reopen the lower floors by October and the upper floors by the end of the year.

The smell inside has improved since all the soggy, musty carpeting and ceiling tiles were removed, said Anthony Francis, director of general services for parish President Aaron Broussard's administration.

On the top floor Thursday, a team of workers armed with bottles of disinfectant and cloths moved through Broussard's suite and the offices of his administrative staff. They attacked every surface. The crews meticulously wiped down the medals, badges and buttons framed on Broussard's office walls. They even sanitized the New Orleans Saints football sitting on his conference table.

Eventually, they'll work their way through the entire building. Everything must be disinfected, Francis said. Water contaminated by the biocides in the cooling system and other chemicals seeped through the building. And two days of heat provided some incubation time for mold spores, he said.

Officials hope to reopen the upper floors in December, but aesthetic repairs such as carpeting and ceiling tiles will have to wait, Francis said.

"A lot of people use the analogy, 'It looked like it was hit by a bomb,'" he said. "I say no, it was hit by a hurricane. I've never seen a bomb go off, but I've seen what a hurricane can do."

Aside from the water damage, the storm knocked out five windows on the first floor, ripped out the East Jefferson Consolidated Fire

Department's communications tower and disabled the elevators and the building's fire alarm system, Francis said.

Once the initial cleanup has been completed, crews will move in for remediation, removing any wallboard and other materials that could contain mold, Francis said. When air quality inside is acceptable, repairs will begin.

On a positive note, Francis said, services housed on the first through third floors, including the Water Department and the Inspection and Code Enforcement Department, could be open as early as October. Those floors escaped the heavy water damage seen on the higher levels.

"People are going to need permits," Francis said. "Those are the people that are going to be rebuilding Jefferson Parish."

It's time for visionary ideas

The letter from Wayne Troyer is right on. We have been given an opportunity to re-create our city and make it truly great. I am observing the situation from Biloxi as fate put me here for the storm. We are doing well. But I have had time to consider New Orleans, the city I love more than any other. This is no time to think small; think outside the box. Way outside.

Let the company that was brought in to audit the schools rebuild the system from the ground up. Let the floodwaters be the baptismal font of a system that works. Create vo-tech schools that will truly give our citizens opportunities to earn a good living.

Create the neighborhoods Mr. Troyer spoke of with green spaces, schools, day-care centers and community centers. This task is much bigger than anything our governor can handle. It should be her job to phone the president and say we are giving up our reputation of bickering and small-mindedness and corruption to create a great state. For example, think Nevada and Delaware: no income taxes. People move to those sorts of states in droves.

Think efficiency: It takes 15 minutes to get a permit to open a business in Hong Kong, and it is one of the world's greatest and richest cities. Call every Fortune 500 company and tell them we will make it easy for them to set up shop here. And of course we want foreign companies to join us. Let's let the Europeans bring in the technology to create a wireless city. I mention Hong Kong because, like New Orleans, it treasures its history, but it has built a city for the 22nd century around its historic district. We can do that.

Next, much has been noted of the poor in this awful situation, and rightly so. However, the monied classes of the city are homeless as well. If quick incentives are not laid out for them, they will take their brains, businesses and money to the states in which they are now living. Make them offers they can't refuse such as long-term tax incentives and easy access to money to start over.

Think about Singapore. Corrupt judges that keep the criminal element in business have to be gotten rid of quickly. In Singapore, penalties for crimes are so harsh that crime does not exist. Make criminals unwelcome here.

Think about the Audubon Institute. It is world-class in every way. Unleash their creativity to create family-oriented and environmentally friendly spaces for the city.

Finally, think about Mickey Mouse. If Disney could create a world in a Florida swamp, we can create the prototype city of tomorrow on the country's greatest river. Don't be ashamed to call the Disney engineers and ask for their help and input. Think of how they recycle garbage, use water, and connect everything by monorail.

Think big. Think brilliantly. Most importantly, say this: Corruption, cronyism and small-minded inter-parish bickering are gone with the winds. The new New Orleans will be America's great city of tomorrow. That is the spirit of Louisiana.

In North Carolina, longing for home

Hello. We are New Orleanians displaced by Hurricane Katrina.We aren't the ones you see on cots at the Astrodome. We aren't the ones you saw paddling to safety among the rooftops of a flooded city. Most of us didn't endure the despair of the Convention Center. We left the city before it became Hell on Earth but we only made it as far as purgatory.

We are now widely dispersed, some in greater concentrations than others. While we may seem to be getting on, we are emotional wrecks, living with a paper-thin skin afforded by these attempts at what the eggheads call normalcy. Nothing is normal. Can you envision January? To us now, it seems like next week and next century, all at the same time.

Interacting with others not from the Gulf South is like being single at a family reunion: Everyone asks you the same questions over and over; it is not the questions that torture you, but the painful realization that you really just don't have any answers.

Some of us have houses in a place that used to be our home: houses we cannot visit, cannot repair, cannot imagine. But many simply aren't that fortunate. They can only remember a place that used to be home.

The days and weeks go by, and our new locations become part of some daily routine, or another. We know our new grocery stores now. We know where to get a beer at a place that isn't showing CNN all the time. We know how to text-message our friends, wherever they may be, and perhaps one day we can talk cell phone to cell phone like we used to. And even as we grow more familiar with our new locations, we yearn more for that which we lost, so precious in its uniqueness. And we realize that the only way we will ever feel at home, is by being at home.

Home is gone for us now. Maybe it will be back by January. But saying it might be back by Mardi Gras seems more concrete to us now than any traditional unit of time.

Some of us may never return home, but not one will tell you they're from somewhere else ever. Others will continue to feel the gravity that New Orleans has always had. It's a place where home was, is and will always be, no matter where we are currently making our groceries.

Venice of the South?

By now there have been several suggestions regarding the rebuilding of New Orleans. A while back, The Times-Picayune ran a feature of what New Orleans would look like in the future, with Venice-like canals. I believe the future is now.

Our planners really need to research a canal system through the city that allows for the inevitable rise and fall of the Mississippi River and Lake Pontchartrain. I do not believe the current system of levees and drainage ditches will give any New Orleans resident peace of mind again. I envision a canal district on par with Venice, Italy, surrounded by structures — housing, hotels, retail, etc. — designed to co-exist with the water.

We fought the battle with the water and lost. It's time to figure out a way to live with it.

A sad day

What a sad day for the state of Louisiana! To watch New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco act in an emergency situation was like watching the Three Stooges less one. They were all griping that the other person did not do anything.

It was something less than funny for the poor souls who needed leadership at a time of major crisis. The bigger shame is that this will probably be our leadership for the next several years. The only saving grace is that the entire country and even the world got to see what poor leadership does in a crisis situation.

Maybe this will help people choose better at voting time. Let's hope so.

OUR OPINIONS

Rebuild with character

The new New Orleans deserves neighborhoods that look like the ones Hurricane Katrina flooded. Without the federal government, the city could not rebuild. But that help should include a promise to rebuild this architecturally unique place in a way that's authentic.

Once the rebuilding is done, New Orleans must look like New Orleans.

At no point in its nearly 300-year history has New Orleans been mistakable for other cities. One could never have parachuted into New Orleans and confused it with Little Rock, Ark., Des Moines, Iowa, or Cape Girardeau, Mo. No, if you were in New Orleans, you knew it. If you couldn't tell where you were from the sounds of jazz, the taste of the etouffe or the sight of Carnival parades, then you could look at the carefully crafted houses and know for sure.

There are bound to be some people who will say New Orleanians are asking for too much and that we ought to be satisfied with whatever we get, as long as it's safe and functional. They will be wrong. Although it's true we are concerned about how the future New Orleans will look, we are even more concerned about how it will feel. It will not feel like home unless it feels strangely foreign to everybody else.

There are organizations in the city, the Preservation Resource Center chief among them, that exist to protect the architectural integrity of New Orleans' neighborhoods. The preservationists who work for those organizations have consistently raised their voices to prevent homes in Holy Cross from being made to look like homes in Gentilly, and to prevent homes in the Irish Channel from looking like those in Broadmoor.

That should give outsiders a clue to the kind of city New Orleans was and is. Two houses on opposite sides of town can look drastically different but equally well-crafted. There's an internal diversity in the housing stock. As we go forward, it's important that such diversity remains intact.

That's why the city's preservationists need to be consulted as New Orleans rebuilds. Officials at the PRC have demonstrated time and again that making houses that are architecturally interesting doesn't mean only the rich can afford them. Preservationists have built and renovated homes in low- to moderate-income neighborhoods for the people who live there. Their efforts should now be duplicated on a large scale for the benefit of the people who called those destroyed neighborhoods home.

Grandma's choice

No one with a heart or a sense of decency would quibble with Barbara Roberts' decision to stay with an 18-month-old granddaughter, whose parents were stranded in New Orleans by Hurricane Katrina, rather than report for work.

But that decision cost Ms. Roberts her job with Positronic Industries in Missouri. The 54-year-old assembly line worker had no more vacation time or unpaid leave time left. When she made the decision to stay with her granddaughter in Columbia, Mo., instead of returning home to Mount Vernon, Mo., and her job, she didn't even know for sure her daughter and son-in-law had survived. For that choice, she was terminated.

Companies should want employees who understand the concept of personal responsibility and are able to make the right decision under difficult circumstances. If Ms. Roberts had been an emergency worker whose absence endangered the lives of others, her choice would not have been an ethical one. But the plant where Ms. Roberts worked makes electrical connectors. The only person put in jeopardy by her decision was Ms. Roberts herself.

Her dilemma is not likely to be unique. The ripples from Katrina are going to reach into the lives of many people who were not immediately affected by the storm. Residents of other states have family, friends and co-workers who will call on them for all kinds of assistance, whether it's a place to stay, a lead on a job or some time to help clear the wreckage. If companies and firms in other parts of the country aren't willing to be flexible with their employees, many more people may face the same tough decision Ms. Roberts faced.

A disaster of this magnitude is going to require sacrifices far beyond the Gulf Coast. Fortunately, many businesses will be generous to the victims of Katrina and those who come to their aid. Perhaps one of them will hire a grandmother in Missouri who needs a job.

Whose victory, exactly?

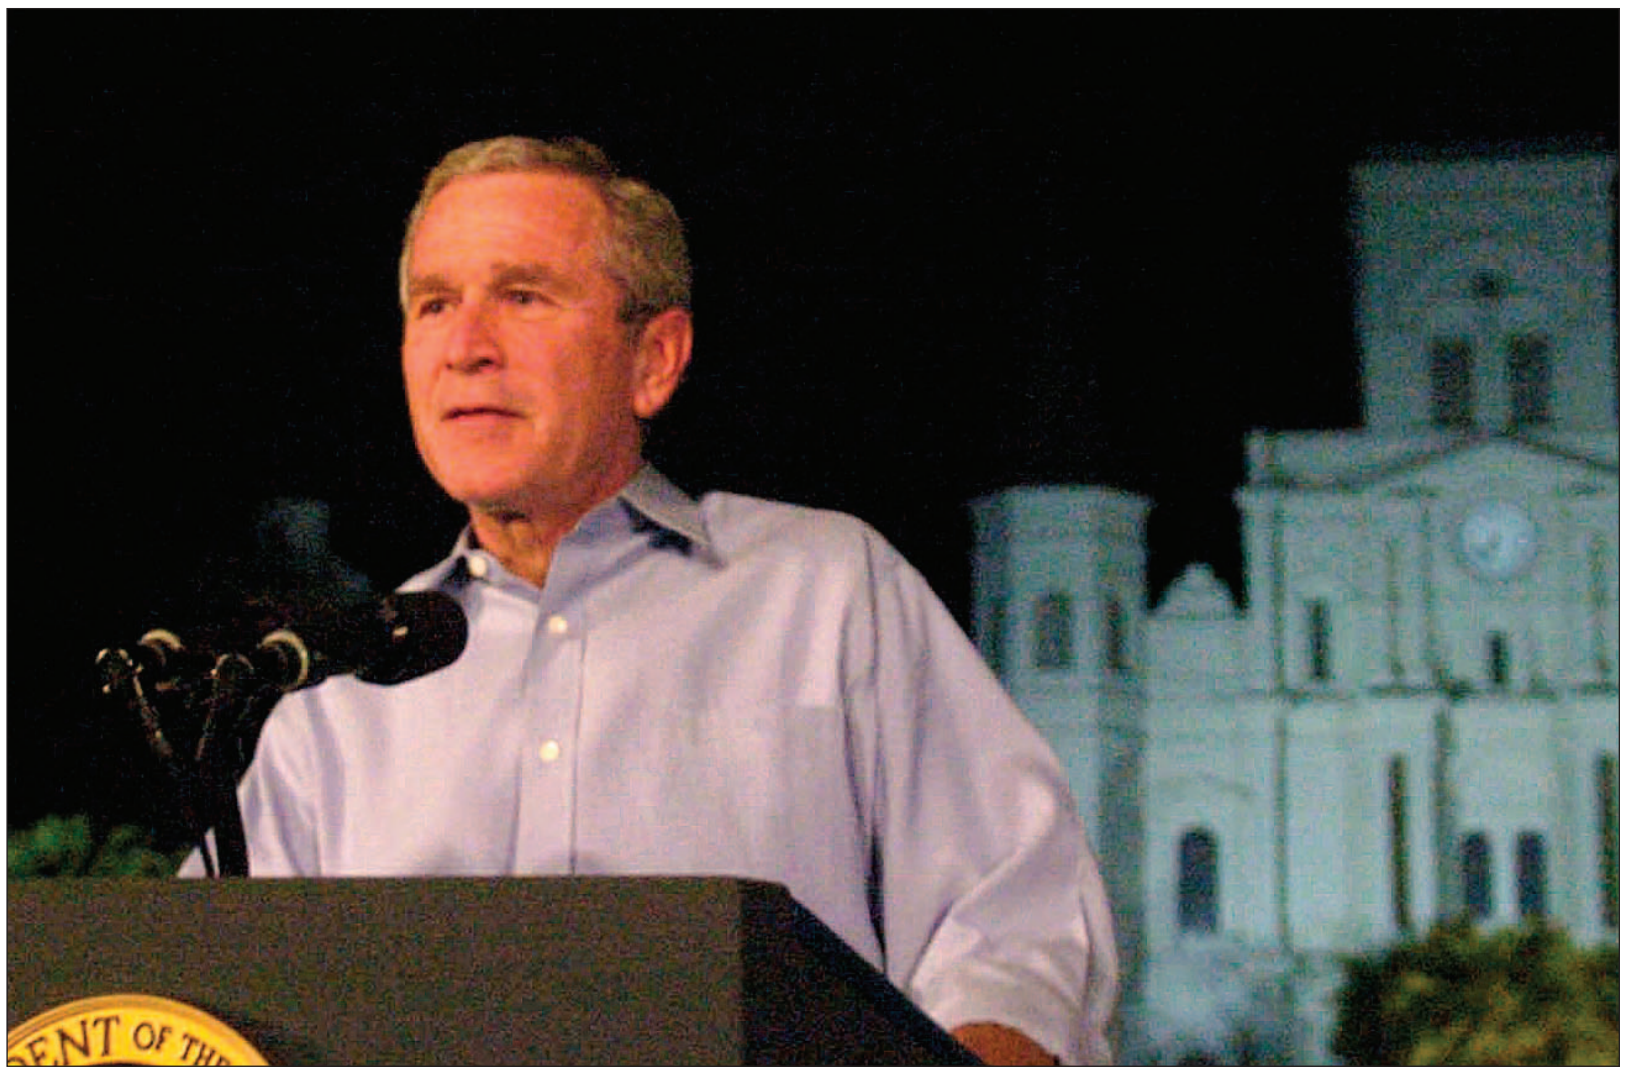
Last week my son's elementary school raised several thousand dollars for hurricane victims by washing cars. My other son's preschool announced without fuss that a boy from New Orleans would be joining the class. My employer is organizing help for the company's Gulf Coast employees, my local bookstore is collecting money for the Red Cross and my favorite radio station raised $54,000 last weekend. Every church or synagogue attended by anyone I know is, of course, raising money, housing evacuees or delivering clothes to victims.

To put it differently, nearly every institution with which I come into daily contact — my library, my grocery store, my search engine — has already donated time or money to the victims of Hurricane Katrina, and I don't think this makes me or my community unique. A Zogby poll conducted last week found that 68 percent of Americans had donated money to hurricane relief. An ABC News/Washington Post poll published Tuesday found that 60 percent had already donated, and a further 28 percent intend to. Those percentages mean that donors must represent a huge range of political views, economic classes, even aesthetic preferences. Among the fund-raisers listed in last weekend's Post were a jazz concert, a tea dance, a 'Christian music' concert and a rehearsal of Verdi's 'The Sicilian Vespers.' No wonder the Red Cross has already collected more than half a billion dollars; no wonder it was impossible to get on to the Salvation Army's Web site at peak times last week.



But those percentages also mean that it is important not to draw hasty conclusions about the ultimate political impact of this tragedy. More specifically, it's important to ignore the hasty conclusions that have already been drawn, both here and abroad, about the victory of 'big government' and the death of a certain kind of American individualism. The German chancellor — once again using American politics in his election campaign — has already called the disaster an argument for 'strong government.' Polly Toynbee, a columnist for Britain's Guardian, declared that Katrina revealed 'a hollowed superpower ... a country that is not a country at all, but atomised, segmented individuals living parallel lives as far apart as possible.' A Los Angeles Times article, headlined 'A Comeback for Big Government,' more objectively quoted lots of experts agreeing that in the wake of the hurricane, the administration will 'put aside its interest in small government.'

But while it is true that the government's relief effort looks set to dwarf anything it has tried before, consider what the actual experience of the disaster has already been — not theoretically, not on paper, but in practice. Listen, for example, to volunteers who prepared 92 boats to help evacuate people from the rooftops of New Orleans. They were ultimately kept out by Federal Emergency Management Agency bureaucrats because, among other things, they didn't have life preservers. Or listen to the volunteers who organized 100 doctors to treat 400 sick people at a converted Baton Rouge warehouse — until they, too, were told by the government to shut down, reopen and then shut down again. Or to the hundreds of firefighters who, according to The New York Times, responded to a nationwide call for help and were then 'held by the federal agency in Atlanta for days of training on community relations and sexual harassment,' while women were raped and lives were lost in New Orleans. Compare their frustration to the joy experienced by 8-year-olds across the country, washing cars for the Red Cross.

By the same token, consider the effectiveness of the relief strategies so far. With great fanfare, the federal government announced it would distribute debit cards to Katrina victims. The result was chaos, anger and expectations of fraud. Quietly, the Red Cross has been paying evacuees' hotel bills. The result is that 57,000 people have time to plan what to do next. Massive government efforts to get people into massive shelters have led to dissatisfaction, delays, long lines and frustration. But private initiatives — ranging across the political spectrum from MoveOn.org's Hurricanehousing.org, which is advertising space in thousands of private homes, to First Baptist Church in Athens, Texas, which has just installed six new showers — are helping people find better housing faster. Over the longer term, it's also pretty safe to bet that people who relocate thanks to a church, find a job thanks to a charitable Web site, and get by thanks to their extended families are going to do a lot better, economically and psychologically, than the people who hang around waiting to be helped by a government jobs program and a government trauma counselor.

I'm not saying anything radical here: I'm not calling for the abolition of FEMA, and I certainly think there's a role for government in disaster and evacuation planning. But it is true that the worst failures of the past two weeks have been big government failures. The biggest successes, by contrast, have come out of this country's incredibly vibrant, amazingly diverse and fantastically generous civil society. Sooner or later, it will be impossible not to draw political lessons from that paradox.

President Bush addresses the nation Thursday from Jackson Square, in front of St. Louis Cathedral.

Bush turns N.O. into Disney World

MAUREEN DOWD

The president, as he fondly recalled the other day, used to get well-lit in New Orleans. Not any more.

On Thursday night, Bush wanted to appear casually in charge as he waged his own Battle of New Orleans in Jackson Square. Instead, he looked as if he'd been dropped off by his folks in front of an eerie, blue-hued castle at Disney World. (Must be Sleeping Beauty's Castle, given the somnambulant pace of W.'s response to Katrina.)

All Andrew Jackson's horses, and all the Boy King's men could not put Humpty Dumpty together again. His gladiatorial walk across the darkened greensward, past a St. Louis Cathedral bathed in moonglow from White House klieg lights, just seemed to intensify the sense of an isolated, out-of-touch president clinging to hollow symbols as his disastrous disaster agency continues to flail.

In a ruined city still largely without power, stinking with piles of garbage and still 40 percent submerged; where people are foraging in the miasma and muck for food, corpses and the sentimental detritus of their lives; and where unbearably sad stories continue to spill out about hordes of evacuees who lost their homes and patients who died in hospitals without either electricity or rescuers — isn't it rather tasteless, not to mention a waste of energy, to haul in White House generators just to give the president a burnished skin tone and a prettified background?

The slick White House TV production team was trying to salvage W.'s "High Noon" snap with some snazzy Hollywood-style lighting — the same Reaganesque stagecraft they had provided when W. made a prime-time television address from Ellis Island on the first anniversary of the 9/11 attacks. On that occasion, Scott Sforza, a former ABC producer, and Bob DeServi, a former NBC cameraman and a lighting expert, rented three barges of giant Musco lights, the kind used for "Monday Night Football" and Rolling Stones concerts, floated them across New York Harbor and illuminated the Statue of Liberty as a backdrop for Bush.

Before the presidential address, DeServi was surveying his handiwork in Jackson Square, crowing to reporters about his cathedral: "Oh, it's heated up. It's going to print loud."

As Elisabeth Bumiller, the White House reporter for The New York Times, noted in a pool report, the image wizards had put up a large swath of military camouflage netting, held in place by bags of rocks and strung on poles, to hide the president from the deserted and desolate streets of the French Quarter ghost town.

The president is still looking for a tiny spot of unreality in New Orleans — and in Iraq, where a violent rampage has spiked the three-day death tally to over 200.

The Oedipal loop-de-loop of W. and Poppy grows ever loopier.

With Karl Rove's help, Junior designed his presidency as a reverse of his father's. W. would succeed by studying Dad's failures and doing the opposite. But in a bizarre twist of filial fate, the son has stumbled so badly in areas where he tried to one-up Dad that he has ended up giving Dad a leg up in the history books.

As Mark Twain said: "When I was a boy of 14, my father was so ignorant I could hardly stand to have the old man around. But when I got to be 21, I was astonished at how much the old man had learned in seven years."

Of course, it's taken Junior only five years to learn how smart his old man was.

His father made the "mistake" of not conquering and occupying Iraq because he had the silly idea that Iraqis would resent it. His father made the "mistake" of raising taxes, not cutting them, and overly obsessing about the federal deficit. And his father made the "mistake" of hewing to the center, making his base mad and losing his bid for reelection.

Bush pere did make a real mistake in responding slowly to Hurricane Andrew in 1992, but that blunder has been dwarfed by what the slothful son hath wrought. Because of his fatal tardiness, W now has to literally promise the moon to fix New Orleans and the rest of the Gulf Coast, driving up the federal deficit and embarking on the biggest spending bonanza and government public works program since FDR.

In his address from the French Quarter, the president sounded like such a spendthrift bleeding heart that he is terrifying the right more than his father ever did.

Read my lips: By the time all this is over, people will be saying that Poppy was the true conservative in the family.

A lab for compassionate conservatism

DAVID BROOKS

On Oct. 5, 1999, George W. Bush went to the Manhattan Institute and delivered the most important domestic policy speech of his life. In what was mostly a talk about education, he made it quite clear he was no liberal. But he also broke with mainstream conservatism as it then existed.

He distanced himself from the cultural pessimists, the dour conservatives who were arguing that America was sliding toward decadence. Then he bluntly repudiated the small-government conservatism that marked the Gingrich/Armey era.

It's not enough to cut the size of government, Bush said, or simply get government out of the way. Instead, Republicans have to come up with a positive vision of "focused and effective and energetic government."

With that, Bush set off on a journey to define what he called "compassionate conservatism" and what others call big government conservatism.

It's been a bumpy ride. Over the past five years, Bush has overseen the fastest increase in domestic spending of any president in recent history. Moreover, he's never resolved the contradiction between his compassionate spending policy and his small-government tax policy.

But gradually and fitfully, Bush has muddled his way toward something important, a positive use of government that is neither big government liberalism nor anti-government libertarianism. He's been willing to spend heaps of federal dollars, but he wants that spending to go to programs that enhance individual initiative and personal responsibility.

On Thursday, President Bush went to New Orleans and gave the second-most important domestic policy speech of his life. Politically it was a masterpiece, proof that if the president levels with the American people and admits mistakes, it pays off.

But in policy terms, the speech pushed the journey toward Bushian conservatism into high gear. The Gulf Coast will be a laboratory for the Bushian vision of energetic but not domineering government.

Bush proposed an Urban Homestead Act, which will draw enterprising people to the area, giving them an opportunity to own property so long as they're willing to work with private agencies to put up their own homes. He proposed individual job training accounts, so much of the rebuilding work can be done by former residents. Children who have left flooded areas will find themselves in a proto-school-choice program, with education dollars strapped to each individual child.

This is an effort to transform the Gulf region, which had become a disaster zone of urban liberalism. All around the South, cities are booming, but New Orleans never did. All around the country, crime was dropping, but in New Orleans it was rising. Immigrants were flowing across the land in search of opportunity, but as Joel Kotkin has observed, few were interested in New Orleans.
