Who benefits from drowned Jeff Parish?

I am 67 years old and have lived in Kenner for 35 years. I rode out Hurricane Katrina here. I might add that this is not my first hurricane. I rode out Betsy in New Orleans and Camille on the Gulf Coast, along with several others right here in Kenner. But this hurricane presented a problem that I have never witnessed anywhere before: drainage pumps not running before, during or for days after the storm.

During all the other hurricanes I have had the bad fortune to be a part of, pumping continued through the storm or until power to operate them was lost. During Betsy, one pumping station continued operation until it was demolished. Not so with this storm. Pumping was stopped before the storm had even arrived.

The worst of the storm passed in less than eight hours, but the pumps were not turned on for three days. By this time Kenner was drowned by rain water. There were no levee breaks here.

Then after the water was pumped down and the streets were dry, residents were kept from trying to dry out their flooded homes. People were kept out of town for weeks, while everything they had worked for and owned rotted. Let's see, the bigger the disaster, the more bucks the parish and city get from the feds. Hmm. I wonder who controls those federal dollars?

It's now weeks since the storm in which wind damage was minimal, but flood damage was maximal and compounded by asinine decisions by Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard and Kenner Mayor Phil Capitano. I hope the parish president and the mayor are proud of themselves.

Keep those photos coming

As a former resident of New Orleans, it is my routine to check nola.com several times daily to get an idea about life after Katrina. I have viewed all of the photo galleries in attempts to get visual pieces of information about my hometown.

I still have many friends who call the Big Easy home; my father lives there as well. I wish there were more photos of the people who are returning to the area, to St. Charles Parish, West Jefferson, etc. I hear tales from my friends of shopping with armed military, standing in long lines to get into stores, neighborhoods that have become hotels for displaced natives, etc. Photos of people would be vital and interesting to me.

On another note, I was anguished by one of the photos in a recent gallery. A man had his Social Security number marked on his arm. Was it necessary to publish this on the Web? Leave it to some lowlife to steal his number and create a new identity.

Thanks again for your invaluable service. I am amazed how The Times-Picayune has continued to run from Day One. Please keep the photos coming.

Did barges shatter floodwalls?

Re: "Why did the floodwalls fail?", Sept. 27. While The Times-Picayune's reporting has been generally outstanding, I am wondering why the role of the pontoon construction barges that were moored alongside the Old Hammond Highway bridge before Hurricane Katrina hit one month ago weren't mentioned as a potential cause of the breaches in the 17th Street Canal floodwall.

Ironically, these barges were in the canal to help hurricane-proof the bridge crossing the canal at Bucktown. Your paper did raise the possibility of their role in a Sept. 8 report ("Barge may have caused breach in floodwall") but nothing has been mentioned about them since. Their possible role in causing the massive flooding needs to be investigated – as well as why they weren't removed as part of preparations for Hurricane Katrina's landfall.

Thanks to animal lovers everywhere

In the past 3 1/2 weeks, all of our lives have been touched by the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina. The Louisiana SPCA lost its shelter on Japonica Street during the flood that devastated the Lower 9th Ward community of New Orleans. In the following days and weeks, our lives were also touched dramatically by another wave: a wave of love and support.

Volunteers around the world poured into the streets of New Orleans to help in our animal rescue efforts. Animal lovers all across the country opened their hearts and wallets to help rebuild our shelter for the animals we love and work to protect.

The wonderful people of Chicago are among those who have touched us with their compassion. The Chicago Veterinary Medical Association, Steve Dale of Pet Central and WGN radio reached out to us with the recently held Mardi Growl Benefit. We throw beads of thanks for their outpouring of generosity. It's people like this that keep us sustained in an otherwise dismal landscape of loss. They are our heroes.

Such generosity serves as a testament to the companion animals who teach us every day the true meaning of unconditional love. These acts of kindness honor all the animals so deeply affected by the impact of Hurricane Katrina. Thank you.

Levees before bombs

Please pray for Louisiana and that New Orleans may be truly renewed in hope and grace, not as a museum or worse, a mausoleum – and not as Disneyland or Las Vegas, but as a living city with room for all to live in dignity.

The culture of New Orleans is too strong for the rains and wind of Hurricane Katrina to destroy. Now is the time to insist on levees in Louisiana before bombs in Baghdad. Now is the time to demand that decent homes be built at fair wages by those displaced by this storm, rather than settling for McJobs importing doublewides for the profit of Halliburton.

OUR OPINIONS

The bad old days

The presidency of the Orleans Levee Board is an unpaid position, or at least it was until just before Hurricane Katrina struck. In August, board President Jim Huey concluded that he was entitled to $1,000 a month for his work at the agency, retroactive to when he took the post in 1996. He came to this decision after consulting with two of the board's contract lawyers, one of whom was his wife's cousin, but without seeking approval from the other board members or the agency's staff attorney. The payment worked out to about $96,000.

This move was appalling but hardly surprising, because the levee district has never been an icon of governmental probity. That ought to sadden all of us. When the agency responsible for keeping the water out is known more for various hijinks, it's a sign that New Orleanians need to demand better from our public bodies.

The board was already in bad financial shape when Hurricane Katrina broke through the levees and shut down Lakefront Airport, a casino boat and other tenant businesses that provide the board with much of its revenue. When questioned about his own $96,000 payment, Mr. Huey said he has put an enormous amount of time and effort into his position. And he expressed disbelief that, amid the crisis enveloping the area, this newspaper would concern itself with what he deemed a "minimal" issue.

He even said he would probably resign once the payment became public.

Go right ahead, Mr. Huey.

And if the board president doesn't make good on his "threat," Gov. Kathleen Blanco should remove him.

The way levee district officials spent their time and taxpayers' money in the months and years before the hurricane is clearly a matter of grave public concern. Instead of focusing on the levee district's actual mission, members got caught up in petty politicking and a host of foolish projects, including a floating hotel, a fiber-optic network and an artificial island. For his part, Mr. Huey once ordered a private investigation of a meddlesome radio host. And he has worked hard to convert his own unpaid position into a salaried one, even though the board had a substantial paid staff.

Given all these circumstances, is it any coincidence that the levee board finds itself in such a parlous state now?

Until Katrina struck, there wasn't much clamor among New Orleanians for a levee system capable of handling a Category 5 hurricane. Perhaps people assumed that if the Orleans Levee Board, whose members are appointed by the governor, had time to talk about building islands in the lake, the levees surrounding the city were more or less secure.

Obviously, they weren't. It's high time to examine whether the present fragmented set-up – a plethora of levee districts stacked with political appointees of uneven quality – is really the best way to protect the metro area from future storms. At this point any approach that might work better, such as a unified levee system under federal supervision, ought to be on the table.

For years, New Orleanians have footed the bill for numerous redundancies and inefficiencies built into the structure of government: multiple police departments, seven tax assessors instead of one, elections for virtually every public position beyond dogcatcher. Perhaps New Orleans could afford such nuisances at the height of the oil boom, but now the city is fighting for its life. It cannot keep tending to a vast class of political hangers-on.

In these circumstances, Mr. Huey's exasperation over being questioned is doubly disturbing. He acts as though the tragedy befalling the metro area somehow excuses public officials from ever having to explain themselves. In fact, the need for accountability is greater than ever.

In the old New Orleans, $100,000 was a lot of money to waste. And under the harsh new sun of the post-Katrina era, such abuses are unforgivable.

Is there a doctor in the house?

Doctors were among the heroes in the days following Hurricane Katrina, caring for patients under nearly impossible conditions. Without their dedication and professionalism, many more people would have died in those days after the storm.

But this metro area doesn't need doctors only during a disaster. The medical sector is extremely important to the health of the city's economy as well as the health of its inhabitants. That's why it's crucial to get displaced doctors back.

A study by University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill indicates that close to 6,000 doctors have left the Gulf Coast following Katrina – the biggest displacement of physicians in this country's history. That number reflects doctors involved in direct patient care, not administrative duties or research.

What the study doesn't reflect is how many of those doctors are gone for good, but like anyone else whose future is uncertain following Katrina, doctors are considering their options. Even those who never left are wondering what will happen if their patients don't return.

"Physicians are no different than you or me," said Dr. Mark Peters, chief executive and president of East Jefferson General Hospital, in an interview with The Associated Press. "They have a mortgage payment. They have tuition payments."

The loss of doctors would hurt hospitals, which will have to pay more to recruit new doctors than to try to retain old ones. To that end, Dr. Peters said he wants the federal government to relax rules that prohibit hospitals from offering doctors office space rent-free.

That is worth exploring, at least on a short-term basis, to help hospitals that are trying to remain viable and doctors who want to stay and help in the healing of this region.

Returning home is going to be a challenge for everyone. People who are under stress, making repairs to their homes, businesses and lives, are going to need help staying healthy. If they have to find a new doctor, that's one more hurdle to climb and one more loss to absorb.

We need our doctors back, and finding ways to help them return and stay ought to be a high priority for state and local officials who are engineering southern Louisiana's comeback.

Talking to each other would be nice start

STEPHANIE GRACE

The New Orleans City Council's marathon meeting Tuesday covered lots of ground, but the council's general sentiment could be summed up in just one emblematic resolution: Sewerage & Water Board Executive Director Marcia St. Martin, the council unanimously declared, needs to "immediately conduct a press conference and immediately provide information regarding the status and timetable of its restoration efforts in each section of the city."

In other words, just tell us what's going on – and don't skimp on the details.

Throughout the busy day, which opened with meetings of the utility and budget committees before the full council session, communication – specifically, the lack of it – was the recurrent theme.

And the main target of criticism wasn't St. Martin, the steward of the city's decimated water, sewer and drainage systems, and thus a very busy woman indeed. It was Mayor Ray Nagin and his staff, who, truth be told, weren't exactly experts on the subject of communication before Hurricane Katrina struck.

In the month since the hurricane, city government clearly hasn't gotten to the point of even compiling a contact list, let alone setting up a central clearinghouse for information. When Intergovernmental Affairs Director Kenya Smith said during the budget meeting that he'd been sending, via e-mail, summaries of daily briefings to council members, several announced they didn't have working Internet access. When Smith offered to fax instead, some said they didn't have fax machines. Finally, Chief Administrative Officer Brenda Hatfield came up with the idea of gathering preferred contact information from each of the seven council offices.

Throughout the early part of the day, council members didn't hold back their fury at being out of the loop over whether their constituents can come back to their homes, and which services will be available when they do. That applied not just to water suitable for bathing and drinking, but to electricity, gas, phone service and cable TV, as well as the knowledge that residents won't be turned away by military, National Guard or police.

"I'm getting 100 calls a day from my constituents who want to know when they can come back," Councilman Jay Batt told Smith outside the meeting. "I'm going to forward every one of them to you and the mayor unless you all tell me something."

Councilwoman Renee Gill Pratt told Hatfield that in the weeks since the hurricane, she has had to constantly plead ignorance.

"What's the plan for re-entry? I don't know. What's the plan for repopulation? I don't know," said Pratt, adding that she first heard the city would organize the process by ZIP codes "on the news."

Even the Nagin allies who've had more contact with the mayor's team than Batt and Pratt voiced frustration, if in milder terms.

As the day went on, there were signs of progress.

The council's irritation at Safety and Permits Director Mike Centineo, who didn't attend the utility briefing, later turned to pleasure – not just because Centineo came to the afternoon session to explain how the city would let people know the status of their electrical service, but because council members finally got their hands on a working phone number for him.

Even Nagin showed up to make nice, despite an earlier radio interview insinuating that those council members he hasn't spoken to regularly haven't been around. Over and over, members said in exaggerated tones that they were happy to see the mayor, and Batt even left the podium to pose for an arm-in-arm joint photo.

The fact is that Nagin has never paid much heed to politicians whose demands for information sometimes reeked of ego or opportunism, rather than actual need. What's different now is that their mutual constituents really are desperate to know.

If he and the council can put aside all that negative history and figure out a way to regularly talk to one another, and to everyone else, it might help convince people that they're ready to take on the much, much more demanding challenges that lie ahead. It would be nice a start, anyway.

Former Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown appears before a House select committee to defend his response to Hurricane Katrina.

Administration is dancing in the dark

MAUREEN DOWD

I can't wait to see what's next.

Dick Cheney carpooling downtown with Brownie? Rummy Rollerblading down the bike path to the Pentagon? Condi huddling by a Watergate fireplace in a gray cardigan?

Maybe our new conservation president will downgrade from Air Force One to a solar-powered Piper Cub as he continues to stalk the Gulf Coast towns and oil rigs like Banquo's ghost.

The once disciplined and swaggering Bush administration has descended into slapstick, more comical even than having Clarence Thomas et al. sit in judgment as Anna Nicole Smith attempts to get more of the moolah of her late oil tycoon husband.

We've got the clownish Brownie still on FEMA's payroll, giving advice on cleaning up the mess he made. (Let's hope the White House is paying him only long enough to buy his good will, not to take any of his bad advice.)

We've got two oilmen in the White House whose administration was built on urging us to consume and buy as much oil and energy as possible. Now they're suddenly urging us to conserve. (Since Cheney considers conservation a "personal virtue," at least he'll get some virtue.)

The president called on Americans to drive less, and told White House staff members to turn off their computers at night, turn down the air-conditioning, form carpools and take the bus.

At the same time, he set a fine example by wasting gazillions of gallons of fuel with all the planes and Secret Service vans and press motorcades and police escorts that follow him around every time he goes on one of his inane photo-ops from the Colorado bunker to what's left of the Mississippi Delta and the bayou. He did his part by knocking off a few cars from his motorcade on his seventh trip to the Gulf Tuesday — but if residents had hoped he'd bring them some water, they went thirsty.

"Even so," as The New York Times' Elisabeth Bumiller wrote, "security dictated that Bush's still-impressive caravan pick him up at the base of Air Force One in Lake Charles — and drop him off just yards away for a meeting with local officials at an airport terminal."

Noting that the Bush administration has proposed new fuel economy standards that critics say could make huge SUVs and pickups even more popular, Reuters published some arithmetic about the president's notorious fuel inefficiency.

Air Force One costs $83,200 to fill up and more than $6,000 per hour to fly. Then there's the cost of helicopters and a 2006 Cadillac DTS limo that gets less than 22 miles per gallon.

Karen Hughes, the Bush nanny who knows nothing about the Muslim world and yet is charged with selling the U.S. to it, wasted even more fuel this week flying to Saudi Arabia to tell women in black abayas how much she likes driving even though they can't.

She knows so little about the Middle East that she looked taken aback when some Saudi women told her that just because they could not vote or drive did not mean that they felt they were treated unfairly.

One thing Saudi women like even less than not having certain rights is to have hypocritical Americans patronize them.

The moment when America should have used its influence to help Saudi women came on Nov. 6, 1990, as U.S. forces gathered in the kingdom to go to war in Iraq the first time. Inspired by the U.S. troops, including female soldiers, 47 women from the Saudi intelligentsia took the wheels from their brothers and husbands and drove a short way until the police stopped them.

They were branded "whores" and "harlots" by Saudi clerics, had their passports revoked and were ostracized from society for a dozen years. Even their husbands suffered.

The experience made them more angry at the U.S. than at their own rulers. They feel that the Bushes play up the repression of women in the Middle East when it suits their desire to bang the war drums, but do not care what happens to women once the ideological agenda has been achieved.

They feel the administration and the American media have emphasized the repression of Saudi women post-9/11 as a way to demonize Saudi Arabia and paint Saudi men as bullies and terrorists.

When Hughes goes to Saudi Arabia to introduce herself as "a mom" and to talk about Americans as people of faith, guzzling fuel all the way in a country getting flush selling us oil, I think we can consider it taxpayer money well spent.

W. doesn't really need to worry about turning down the lights in the White House. The place is already totally in the dark.

DAVID BRODER

A way to work together

However hapless he appeared at the congressional hearing Tuesday on Hurricane Katrina, former Federal Emergency Management Agency head Michael Brown was right about one thing.

The failure to respond to that disaster exposed one of the few real structural weaknesses in our Constitution: a mechanism to coordinate the work of local, state and national governments.

The federal system of divided power and responsibility is one of the glories of our founding fathers' work, a scheme that has helped preserve individual liberty and the flexibility needed to run a continent-sized nation.

But when a task requires those separate governments to work together, there is no ready forum in which they can meet.

This is a problem that urgently requires presidential attention. Before the United States spends $60 billion, or $200 billion, or whatever the final bill for storm recovery may be, there needs to be a coordinated federal response, not a dictated Washington plan.

President Bush wisely has rejected calls to appoint a Washington czar to issue orders to Gulf Coast officials. But he has yet to enlist the ideas of the people who could make this a new model of federal-state-local cooperation. Instead of repeating his flying photo-ops to the region, he ought to be on the phone inviting people to a summit on how to fill this gap in our constitutional structure.

Who to invite? Because the president is more comfortable with fellow Republicans, I'd start with someone he knows well, a member of his own Cabinet: Secretary of Health and Human Services Mike Leavitt. As governor of Utah and chairman of the National Governors Association, Leavitt was probably the most creative thinker on federalism issues among a talented cohort of state executives.

Next, another man he knows well, former Secretary of State Colin Powell. Before he entered government, Powell founded America's Promise, the largest consortium of faith-based and secular nonprofit and private organizations working on urban and human service problems. Those groups have a vital role to play in rebuilding New Orleans and the Gulf Coast.

Then, Sen. George Voinovich of Ohio, unique in his background as mayor of Cleveland, Cuyahoga County commissioner, state legislator and governor. When I talked to Voinovich this week, he said the president should be in touch with all the organizations representing local and state governments. Like the others, he's yet to hear from the White House.

As it happens, the president could reach all those groups through another Republican, Rep. Michael Turner of Ohio, the head of the House speaker's urban working group. Turner, the former mayor of Dayton, and his colleagues have enlisted a strong advisory panel, including National Urban League President and former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial, and have established liaison on a bipartisan basis with all the major organizations, public and private, with a stake in housing and economic development.

But Turner, like the others, has heard nothing yet from the White House. Last Friday, a presidential aide made a conference call to 220 groups, briefing them for an hour and answering questions about the response to Katrina and the preparations for Rita. But participants said there was little opportunity, or appetite, for them to offer ideas.

If the president were smart, he'd invite Jack Kemp, who is on Turner's advisory panel, and two other dynamic former housing and urban development secretaries, Carla Hills and Henry Cisneros, to brainstorm with him.

He should include Dick Moe, the head of the National Trust for Historical Preservation, who could remind him of the contributions that the craftsmen of New Orleans – plasterers, ironworkers and the rest – can make to refurbishing their city.

If Bush wanted to make this effort really bipartisan, he could also usefully tap the minds of Harry McPherson, the wise old man of Lyndon Johnson's domestic staff, and his new law partner Dick Gephardt, who before he came to Congress was an energetic and imaginative alderman in New Orleans' sister city on the Mississippi, St. Louis.

Bush definitely should call former Gov. William Winter of Mississippi, now head of the University of Mississippi's Institute for Racial Reconciliation. If Bush is serious about tackling the problems of race and poverty, a repository of knowledge awaits him there, and Winter is eager to help.

And, finally, he should call William Gray III, the Philadelphia preacher and former congressman who for years headed the United Negro College Fund – the group whose slogan, famously mangled by Dan Quayle, could well be paraphrased as advice to this president: These minds are a terrible thing to waste.

CHRIS ROSE

Ellen Montgomery's house near Audubon Park was almost invisible from the street before Hurricane Katrina shattered the massive cedar tree in her front yard and left a tangled, camouflaged mess that now obliterates the view of just about everything.

If anything, that helped her hide from the National Guard during the tense days — now ancient weeks ago — when word came that they were forcing those who had remained in New Orleans to leave.

"If I was out walking in the neighborhood and I heard the Hummers coming, I would duck down behind a porch or some broken shutters," she said. "I felt like a Confederate spy in enemy territory."

Montgomery was a holdout. A straggler. The resistance.

She stayed behind without power or running water or even a generator. The simple reason: "My babies," she says. Thirty-four cats. (It was 33 for several weeks, until one that had gone missing returned home last Saturday night, "to say hello," Montgomery says.)

She knows what you're thinking. It used to bug her but not anymore.

"Years ago, I said to my vet: 'But I don't WANT to be a cat lady!'" Montgomery recalls. "And he says to me: 'But you ARE a cat lady.' So there you are."

And so, for 30 days, what has she done?

"Well," she pauses. "I sleep late. Let's see . . . and then I feed the cats. I read 'The Journal of Beatrix Potter.' It's a lovely book. And then I have my cup of coffee. And that usually lasts a couple of hours. And then I paint and — I don't know. The days just fly by.

"I'm in another world here. I don't feel the heat. I don't feel anything. I am very able to exist on my own. I just paint and that's what keeps me from going bonkers. That's my therapy."

Montgomery has been painting since 1977, when she read the book of Vincent Van Gogh's correspondence, "Letters to Theo."

"I'M living with my brother in Louisville, with my two golden retrievers, Samson and Mercedes (like the Bible and the car) and his cat, Whiskers (I'm afraid there's a failure of creativity there).

"I haven't met any other evacuees in Louisville. I'm kind of a celebrity here. People are very anxious to hear my story and then to be helpful if they can. People try to give you stuff and not let you pay. It's a little overwhelming. I don't always know how to react.

"I'm spending a good deal of my time working with the senior leadership of the LPO trying to keep the organization together, trying to craft a short-term and mid-term plan for survival. There's no lack of energy or will to get it going. The LPO will return to New Orleans absolutely as soon as possible.

"We've got to be realistic here. We will be dependent on the re-emergence of a healthy New Orleans civic and economic life. As New Orleans goes, so goes the LPO. But I want to send a message that we're doing everything we can to keep this organization together.

"I'll be going to Nashville soon for the LPO benefit concert on October 4. The concert will be broadcast on NPR, so people can call their local NPR station and find out when it will be on. I think we have 100 percent of our musicians showing up in Nashville. That's because of the good will of American Airlines. We've got people coast to coast —Seattle, Boston, Florida — and they're flying everybody in.

"We're doing Shostakovich's fifth symphony. It's a good choice because it has three principal emotional components: The first is conflict and struggle; the second is reflection and, I think, sadness; and the final element is triumph. Listeners will hear this on a gut level; this is not difficult music to understand.

"I hadn't thought of it this way until now and I don't know if this was deliberate or not, but it strikes me as extraordinarily appropriate. One can certainly say that this is exactly what we're all going through. So far, collectively, we've experienced the first two aspects. For God's sake, we've lost our city here. The third, hopefully, is in the near future."

Cat lady rode out the storms

got down and did that and have been doing it ever since."

Indeed. She sits on the floor in the front room of her house — it would be a stretch to call it a "studio" — and she fills canvas after canvas, board after board, paper after paper. If you stood still in front of her for long enough, she'd probably paint you.

Her home is filled with thousands of paintings she has made over the past three decades. She admittedly has sold few works, so mostly they line her walls, floor-to-ceiling in every room, and then they fill stacks and piles randomly assigned through her cluttered 1890s cottage.

And, having recently run out of canvases to work on, she is now working a medium that only a hurricane could provide: She has gathered scores of slate roofing tiles that were scattered off the roofs of her neighbors' homes into the street, and now she paints them.

"They're so beautiful," she says. "I couldn't bear the thought of the National Guardsmen or some contractors trampling over them, so I collected them. I won't have enough time in my life to paint them all."

Over the years, she has painted various abstracts and florals and faces and landscapes, but now her work is fairly dark and muddied and swirly, work clearly influenced by the monstrous forces that have visited upon her life this past month.

Funny thing is, in the beginning, she didn't really know what had happened.

Montgomery has been living the consummate, isolated cat lady existence for years and she was only vaguely aware that a storm was even coming.

The shattered cedar tree and the loss of power, water and phone — and the disappearance of all her neighbors — told her it was something big.

"I went to church that Sunday morning before the storm and a sign on the door said, 'Services canceled,' so I bought a paper and that was the last news I heard," she says.

"There were four or five days where I had absolutely no idea what had happened. But I was safe, the cats were safe, so I thought: why be scared? I firmly believe in God and prayer. I knew I would just ride it out. I am probably more prepared than anyone else in the world to spend time alone."

'I am very able to exist on my own,' Ellen Montgomery says.

It wasn't until several days later, when a neighbor returning to retrieve some items loaned her a radio — and stocked her with food and water before leaving again — that the magnitude of the event settled upon her.

"I try to listen to the news a couple of hours a day and it's unimaginable, really," she says. But she has seen no images of it all; has not seen that more than half the city was underwater and has not seen the human misery that filled the Superdome and Convention Center, sights that are now burned into the American consciousness.

"At first, actually, it was kind of nice around here," she says. "The birds came back and the squirrels would come deliver me the news. It's all been so peaceful, really. But it's nice to have the thought of people coming back. I suppose there'll be lots of chainsaws and hammers and all that, so I might miss the silence. But, the truth is, I'm just about out of candles."

WONDROUS 'ANGELS'

After the phenomenal success of his 1994 bestseller "Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil," many New Orleanians hoped John Berendt would take the Crescent City as a topic for his next book. But Berendt found his muse in Venice, that city that has lured writers from Henry James to Ezra Pound into its fabled landscape of canals and bridges and water and sinking architecture. "The City of Falling Angels" (The Penguin Press, $25.95), which takes its title from a cautionary note found in a church under restoration, is the wondrous result.

The framing event is the 1996 fire at the Venice Opera House, which made headlines around the world. Interspersed with tales of the search for the culprits and the restoration of the historic building, Berendt weaves a tale of Venetian eccentricities and rivalries, touching on Carnival (the costumes in Venice are really fabulous, and on occasion, memorably licentious), the literary legacy there (particularly fascinating are the chapters about Ezra Pound and the rivaling constituencies of the Ezra Pound Foundation), still other rivalries between restoration organizations, the legacy of Peggy Guggenheim, a man who makes his fortune by creating rat poison customized for the taste buds of rats in different countries, a feuding family of glassblowers, expatriates, and a renegade poet of heartbreak and loneliness.

New Orleans readers will feel very at home in this fragile, beloved, mystical landscape, which so resembles ours in the mysterious fascination it exerts for the artist. The lore of great families, of great houses, the stark demand of present realities against the long shadow of history and tradition, the passion that place can inspire in the heart — they are all here.

"Venetians never tell the truth," a friend tells Berendt as he sets out on his literary journey. But there is a kind of truth in all these stories, and Berendt proves himself, once again, to be a modern Scheherezade, seducing us, making us long for more. In one memorable moment, Count Giovanni Volpi, a member of the Venetian aristocracy, mocks the restorationists even as he allows them to use his palazzo for a ball. "The 'dying Venice' is all a big myth," he tells Berendt. "That's what I mean about Save Venice. Forget it. Venice will save itself. Go save Paris!" To which we could only add, "or New Orleans."

'This is what local television was meant to be'

WALKER, from C-1

Baton Rouge PBS affiliate WLPB-TV and even, at the height of the post-Katrina chaos, from the transmitter structure itself.

"It was an office turned into a studio area," news anchor Mike Hoss said. "A white wall and two chairs."

And, behind the anchors, a Channel 4 logo borrowed from one of the station's vehicles.

As Katrina approached, Hoss, his family already evacuated to Jackson, Miss., did a nine-hour anchoring stint from Aug. 27 into the next day, the Saturday and Sunday before the storm hit.

WWL's news workers were still stationed on Rampart at that time, but Breland began to split her team in two as landfall approached.

Hoss was in the group that stayed in the French Quarter. A second team shifted to LSU, and took over the broadcast late Sunday night while Hoss and the other stay-behinds rode out Katrina's attack in the Hyatt Regency New Orleans ballroom.

Hoss said that when he and meteorologist Carl Arredondo went outside for a look at about 3 a.m. Monday, phoning in a report to the Baton Rouge anchors, "It was raining hard and blowing hard."

Hoss said he went out for another look at 6 a.m. and heard shattering glass, destruction he wouldn't fully comprehend until he took a vehicle out into the diminishing storm later in the day.

"That's when we got the shot of the Hyatt with no glass in it," he said.

On that first rolling reporting trip outside, Hoss also discovered that the Rampart Street studios hadn't taken any water and appeared usable.

Hearing that news, the Hyatt group "bugged out" for the studio, and newscasts were being broadcast from there by mid-afternoon.

Communications were poor, but Monday concluded with a sense that the city of New Orleans had "dodged a bullet," Hoss said. "We were in such a vacuum in our little world right there, it didn't look too bad."

Hoss awoke Tuesday to the bark of an assignment editor saying, "Get everybody up. The water's rising."

"I said, 'What are you talking about? The water's rising?'"

Reporter Dave McNamara had tried to drive to City Hall from the French Quarter but was turned back by flooding.

The afternoon before, Hoss had made the same drive on dry streets.

Levees had been breeched. The bowl-shaped city was filling with water.

A group of about 50 evacuated to the transmitter, the rest to Baton Rouge.

Running on generator power, the transmitter gave many staffers the first opportunity to contact family and friends since Katrina's onslaught.

Text messaging seemed to work hand-held BlackBerry devices, generally an annoying electronic tether in a daily business setting, have never been so greatly appreciated — but normal telephone communication had been impossible in the city.

From the transmitter, e-mails were funneled out and back via the Dallas headquarters of WWL's parent, Belo Corp.

Constructed when WWL began the transition to digital TV, the 4,400-square-foot transmitter structure can run for more than two weeks on generator power without a fuel refill.

"When we know we are headed into a long run time, we move into a fuel-conservation mode, kind of like driving 55 mph on the highway instead of 75," said Rick Barber, WWL's director of technology. "We begin to turn off non-critical equipment to conserve."

The transmitter team stayed in place, with reporters moving out then returning with stories, for a day and a night and into Wednesday, Aug. 31.

The group was provisioned for a long stay. Security guards had been moved in to protect them and their equipment.

But reports from the field — rampant looting, gun battles in the city's streets, Oakwood Mall torched by arsonists — prompted Bud Brown, WWL's general manager for just a few weeks prior to Katrina, to evacuate the group again, this time to Baton Rouge.

There, Brown quickly arranged for a staff-reunion gathering at the Baton Rouge restaurant Chimes.

"It was an emotional feeling I'll never forget," said Hoss, who's kept a daily personal Katrina journal. "I think about that today when there are low times and bad times. It was hugs. It was, 'You're OK. We're OK.'

"The other people at the restaurant must have been wondering, 'What is going on?'

"We hadn't seen each other, you'd think, for six months, but it had only been three days. We knew what they had been through in Baton Rouge and they knew what we'd been through in New Orleans and at the transmitter.

"I told the GM, 'You will never have a station more united than you have at this point right here.'"

• • • • • •

WWL eventually settled its base of operations at WLPB, where last week hallways were crammed with computer shipping boxes and studios were crammed with people working at the computers that came inside them.

For the WWL staff, living conditions in Baton Rouge have been expedient at best.

"We've been living six to seven people to an apartment," Breland said. "Not one person complained, but it was like going back to college days."

Meanwhile, the work has literally been shirtsleeve tele-journalism.

"It was basically rudimentary television, passing on information as we got it," Hoss said. "This is what local television was meant to be. We have been the messengers of information. It hasn't been pretty. It hasn't been stylish. It's been, 'Here's what we know. Here's what your neighborhood looks like.'

"The reporters did an amazing job."

The homes of many WWL staffers, including Breland's, were totaled by Katrina.

Covering that storm and its aftermath, then Rita, have been obvious preoccupations, but the impact of the storms on the lives of WWL's staffers, and on the life of their city, occasionally overrides the adrenaline.

Hoss said it didn't hit him until he was driving to Baton Rouge from the transmitter.

"We didn't talk about it until we got out of the area," he said. "Then the enormity of it really started to set in.

"My worst moment was pre-storm, the Sunday before the storm. I wasn't on the air, but there was a big meeting and everybody was standing around talking about 'the plan.'

"I was like, 'Wow. This is the big one. It's not veering.' There was a sense of, 'Oh, my God. What's going to happen to my life? What's going to happen to my city?' "

Said Brown: "Everybody has had their moment. I've never hugged so many people in my life."

If you could hug a transmitter, WWL's would get a few, too.

While WWL's multimillion-dollar broadcast engine was under construction, Barber sent daily digital photo updates to all of WWL's staffers.

"Many have said, 'Rick, I never understood why I was getting those, or why you were building the place the way you did. But now I understand, and thank you,' " Barber said via e-mail. "Almost everyone that did stay here that night or two has thanked me for the construction of the site.

"They felt safe here."

ANCHOR'S AWAY

Angela Hill was up an Alaskan creek without a paddle when the big story blew in

While her WWL-Channel 4 colleagues were covering the biggest bad-news story in modern New Orleans history not involving the Saints, Angela Hill was lost at sea.

Hill departed on an Alaskan cruise when Hurricane Katrina appeared to be headed for the Florida panhandle. The trip was a reprise of a favorite vacation Hill had taken with her husband 10 years ago.

"Alaska is the last frontier," she said. "It's nothing but glorious beauty."

Memories of her latest trip won't be so beautiful.

As Katrina did its damage, Hill, the station's venerable evening news anchor, was "trapped" on the boat with no practical way to get off and get back into action, said WWL News Director Sandy Breland.

Not by seaplane, not by dogsled, not by snowshoe.

Trapped, albeit in a setting with round-the-clock bingo.

"It was painful, I'm telling you," Hill said. "That is the word.

"We stayed stuck on CNN, then we'd stick our head out the window to look at a glacier. That's how I would make my way through the day.

"We found five other people from our area, and as the days went on we became more and more emotional at dinner. We couldn't make it through.

"I would look at them and lose it."

As agonized as Hill was observing the plight of her New Orleans neighbors via satellite-delivered cable news, she was equally tormented to be missing the story as reported by her WWL colleagues. She finally made it to WWL's makeshift Baton Rouge newsroom a week after the story broke.

"Helpless," she said. "Horrible. This is our city. These are our friends.

"You know what you're in this business for, knowing what this team of people does on a regular basis, much less when they go into major-story mode.

"I was sick."

McGee played with his home on mind

Tulane lineman's native Beaumont hit by Rita

By Benjamin Hochman

"How's everything at home?" Mahoney asked Chris McGee, a native of Beaumont, Texas.

McGee looked up and calmly said, "I'll be fine, Coach."

"He's always been a tough person," Mahoney said. "And I believe mentally, as well."

McGee knew Hurricane Rita was heading toward Beaumont on Saturday. But he woke up early and didn't see much footage. He had a game to play.

"That's the best thing about football," McGee said. "For three hours, that's the only thing that matters."

Looking back on Sept. 24, McGee now can discuss the damage to his hometown, smacked around by the hurricane.

"Some parts look like what you see in New Orleans," McGee said. "(My dad's) home is fine, but there is a lot of damage."

McGee's sister, Cassandra, also has a home in Beaumont. She left Friday for Dallas, where Tulane would play Southern Methodist at 1 p.m. McGee's mother, Carolyn, moved to Dallas from Beaumont earlier this year. Numerous family members united in the haven of Ford Stadium.

But McGee's dad was trapped on the highway.

Willie Spears was in his Suburban on Saturday, gridlocked near Irving, Texas. Spears survived, but missed Tulane's 31-10 victory. He ultimately turned around and headed south to Beaumont.

"I was glad to hear from him," said McGee, who didn't talk to his dad until Sunday because Spears' cell phone lost power. "Mostly, my family was

A stone figure of a jockey painted in the colors of Peace Rules, winner of the New Orleans Handicap in 2004, sits undamaged along the track apron at the Fair Grounds.

But the statue isn't where it was before Hurricane Katrina hit.

An impression made in the ground by the base shows that Katrina moved the statue several feet closer to the track. She also turned it 180 degrees.

On the backstretch, brought to life every fall and winter by horses, fish lie dead.

The paddock, the Fair Grounds' focal point, where horses are saddled while fans eye them before placing bets, is strewn with red metal and white insulation from the roof.

Two months before Thanksgiving, the traditional opening day of racing in New Orleans, the Fair Grounds is an eerie place. It's mostly quiet, except for the purr of a generator used by National Guard troops based at the track.

The Fair Grounds won't be home to racing for at least a year. Churchill Downs Inc., which owns the track, has canceled the 2005-06 season, though Louisiana horsemen and Churchill Downs have reached a preliminary agreement to shift 37 New Orleans racing days to Louisiana Downs in Bossier City.

Because of Katrina, Churchill has major reconstruction to do at the Fair Grounds. The company already had begun making renovations in the barn area ñ work promised in the track's bankruptcy settlement. Also, work had begun on an extension of the main Fair Grounds building to create an area for slot machines.

Saints disappointing in hurricane's wake

JOHN DESHAZIER

We've been changed in so many ways that there isn't room to log all the transformation.

Stretched, twisted, moved, shifted, pulled and pushed until, in hundreds of thousands of cases, we barely resemble the creatures who occupied our skin before experiencing the most destructive natural disaster in American history.

Not so, however, when it comes to the on-field product presented by the Saints.

Sadly, the team that all of America wants desperately to hug and console has been embraceable only because of the ordeal it is going through, not at all because of what it's doing on the field. There, the Saints so far have been disappointingly familiar for the first three weeks of the NFL season, having mastered the art of the slow start, littered with bonehead play and inexplicable penalties.

Sadly, the olive branch that has been extended by fans, who probably would be satisfied with

ANGELS CLINCH WEST: With several players having quiet offensive seasons, the Los Angeles Angels depended on their reliable defense and deep pitching staff to get them back to the playoffs. The Angels became the first American League team to clinch a postseason berth Tuesday night with their second consecutive victory over the second-place Oakland Athletics. "One thing that kept us afloat and kept our sanity was the way we were pitching and playing defense," Scioscia said. "We were able to stay positive and optimistic because it wasn't going to take a lot of offense." The Angels are in the playoffs in consecutive years for the first time in franchise history. They entered play Wednesday having won 10 of their past 11. "The expectations are high here in this room with these guys," Scioscia said. The Los Angeles Angels are the first American League team to clinch a division title. The Angels beat Oakland 4-3 Tuesday night to win the American League West.

OTHER RACES: Entering play Wednesday, the Boston Red Sox and New York Yankees were tied atop the AL East, and the Chicago White Sox led the Cleveland Indians by two games in the AL Central. The Indians, Red Sox and Yankees were all tied for the wild card spot. In the National League, San Diego leads San Francisco by four games in the West. Atlanta and St. Louis have clinched division titles, and Houston leads Philadelphia by 2✪ games in the wild card race.

WHITE SOX WIN FLIP: The White Sox won coin flips Wednesday and would host the Boston Red Sox or New York Yankees if Chicago finishes with the same record as the AL East second-place team and a playoff is needed to determine the wild-card winner.

AROUND THE MAJORS: Seattle Mariners right fielder Ichiro Suzuki sued a Taiwanese advertising company for unauthorized use of his image. The company, Chuanghsin, used pictures of Suzuki in advertisements on buses, in department stores and in a magazine, Suzuki's representative said. . . . The San Diego Padres and baseball officials planned to announce today that the semifinals and finals of the World Baseball Classic will be played at Petco Park in March. The World Baseball Classic will be the first international tournament to feature major league players.

BASKETBALL

BLATCHE OUT FOR CAMP: Washington Wizards rookie Andray Blatche will miss training camp while he recovers from gunshot wounds from an attempted carjacking. Blatche walked under his own power as he visited with teammates at the MCI Center on Wednesday, three days after the shooting and one day after being released from the hospital. He was shot Sunday morning while riding in a car near his home in Alexandria, Va. The bullet hit him in the right forearm and on the left side of his chest.

AROUND THE NBA: The Memphis Grizzlies signed rookie free agent Kennedy Winston on Wednesday. Winston, a 6-foot-6, 230-pound guard, averaged 16.2 points, 5.3 rebounds and 2.2 assists in 82 games at Alabama.

OTHER SPORTS

TENNIS: Top-seeded Kim Clijsters defeated Klara Koukalova 6-3 6-0 to reach the quarterfinals of the Fortis Championships in Luxembourg. "Itís always tough to adjust to the conditions after playing outdoors the whole summer, but I got used to the court pretty quickly today," Clijsters said. Clijsters, a four-time champion in this event, is 23-1 in Luxembourg. . . . Top-seeded Mariano Puerta, Thomas Johansson and Radek Stepanek advanced to the second round of the Vietnam Open in Ho Chi Minh City.

BOXING: American Lamon Brewster stopped German challenger Luan Krasniqi in the ninth round of a bruising defense of the WBO heavyweight title in Luxembourg. Brewster was struggling until he landed a hard left in the eighth round that sent Krasniqi (28-2-1) to the canvas stiff-legged. Brewster then landed a right that sent Krasniqi sprawling into the ropes with 12 seconds left in the ninth round. Brewster (33-2, 29 knockouts) was staggered by lefts and was behind on the cards in the third defense of his belt until two successive lefts turned the bout around. "It was just my willpower, my determination. I had to wait a long time," Brewster said.

McCain to Fehr: Patience is at end

Senate considering a two-year ban for first offense

Major League Baseball players' union chief Donald Fehr, middle,told senators at a Senate hearing on Wednesday a new drug-testing agreement could be reached by next month.

WASHINGTON — One by one, Hank Aaron and other members of the Hall of Fame told Congress they back Major League Baseball commissioner Bud Selig's bid for tougher steroid penalties.

Then, one by one, lawmakers told players' union chief Donald Fehr that he needs to act soon - a stance punctuated by Sen. John McCain's admonishment, "Don't you get it?"

Commissioners and union leaders from the NFL, NBA and NHL also testified Wednesday at a Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee hearing on legislation that would standardize steroid policies in professional sports. But the focus was squarely on baseball, and more precisely on Fehr, who told senators he thinks a new drug-testing agreement could be reached next month.

"I particularly single out baseball. And in baseball, I particularly single out the players," said Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., "because they have negotiated reluctantly, if at all."

Lawmakers investigating steroid use by athletes have concentrated on baseball since March 17, when Mark McGwire, Rafael Palmeiro, Selig and Fehr testified before the House Government Reform Committee. Palmeiro emphatically told Congress he never used steroids; he was suspended Aug. 1 after failing a drug test.

"We're at the end of the line," said McCain, R-Ariz. "How many more Rafael Palmeiros is there going to be?"

Five weeks after that March hearing, Selig proposed increasing the ban for a positive test from 10 days to 50 games for a first violation, from 30 days to 100 games for a second, and from 60 days to a lifetime ban for a third.

Fehr this week outlined an approach that would increase the first penalty to 20 games and wouldn't mandate a lifetime ban. He stressed Wednesday the need for case-by-case examination of players who fail drug tests.

"Don't you get it that this is an issue that's greater than the issue of collective bargaining? Don't you understand that this is an issue of such transcendent importance that you should have acted months ago?" McCain asked Fehr. "The patience of this body . . . is at an end."

Pressed to say when there will be a new steroids agreement, Fehr said: "Can I give you a precise date? No. Do I expect to know within the reasonably near future whether that will be done? Yes. Would I expect it to be by the end of the World Series? I would certainly hope so."

The World Series is scheduled to begin Oct. 22 and end no later than Oct. 30. Asked whether that's a workable deadline, Selig said, "I don't see that we have a choice."

Selig received more criticism in past congressional appearances. But now he's advised by former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer and has received praise for proposing changes to baseball's drug policy. On Wednesday, he brought along former stars Ryne Sandberg, Phil Niekro, Robin Roberts, Lou Brock and Aaron.

"I want to applaud the commissioner, and I also just want to make sure that whatever we do, we make sure that we clean up baseball," said Aaron, whose lifetime record of 755 homers is being approached by Barry Bonds of the San Francisco Giants.

Asked by McCain what should be done about records tainted by steroid use, Aaron said: "That's going to be left up to the commissioner and the rules committee. They would probably have to go back and look at some of those things that happened."

Later, Sen. George Allen, R-Va., made a not-so-veiled reference to Bonds, who has denied using steroids: "As far as Hank Aaron is concerned, if a certain player breaks his home run record, it's not a question of an asterisk. . . . There probably ought to be an 'RX' next to it."

The Senate is considering two bills that call for a two-year suspension for a first positive drug test and a lifetime ban for a second. McCain sponsored the Clean Sports Act; Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., a member of baseball's Hall of Fame, sponsored the Professional Sports and Integrity Act. There are three similar House measures.

NBA, NFL and NHL officials raised some complaints about the bills, saying a "one size fits all" proposal isn't fair; U.S. law couldn't be applied to Canadian teams; and the two-year ban for a first offense is too harsh.

McCain and Bunning said they'd prefer not to legislate but warned that Congress is prepared to do so.

"For whatever reason, you just can't get it done, and you can't get your act together," Bunning said. "I and millions of fans think that's pathetic."

Eagles quarterback Donovan McNabb likely will need surgery after the season for his abdominal strain, but he is cleared to play as long as he can handle the pain.

McNabb to play through the pain

Eagles QB is battling abdominal strain

From wire reports

The Eagles' Donovan McNabb tossed touchdown passes on a broken ankle and played an NFC title game with an agonizing rib injury.

Now McNabb is taking his biggest health risk yet: playing with a severe abdominal strain that likely will need surgery and definitely will leave the five-time Pro Bowl quarterback in discomfort and pain all season.

"Fortunately for me, I haven't got to the point where you just can't go," said McNabb, who practiced Wednesday. "Once that happens, then I think the best way of handling this is not being out there. But I don't think that would ever happen."

Trainer Rick Burkholder said rest will not fix the problem and McNabb can play if he can handle the pain.

"We're hoping it's something we'll be able to manage," Burkholder said. "The plan with Donovan is to allow him to participate, continue to rehabilitate him and we're going to take it on a day-by-day, game-by-game situation."

McNabb is expected to start Sunday against Kansas City and is willing to play through his various injuries. McNabb also is playing with soreness in his chest and a shin contusion.

"I'm ready to go," he said. "I don't have any concerns right now. ... It's just something you have to deal with and realize some days you'll feel great and some days you won't."

PATRIOTS SIGN ZEREOUE: New England signed running back Amos Zereoue as their injuries continued to mount with the announcement that Kevin Faulk would miss Sunday's game with a foot injury. Zereoue, a six-year veteran who spent last season with Oakland, became a free agent after the season. He spent his first five seasons with Pittsburgh.

Faulk, who played at LSU, caught a pass on the final drive that led to the winning field goal last Sunday in New England's 23-20 win at Pittsburgh. He and offensive tackle Matt Light, who hurt his right leg, were listed Wednesday as being out of the Patriots' next game against San Diego.

Safety Rodney Harrison was lost for the season when he tore ligaments in his left knee against the Steelers.

Earlier Wednesday, the Patriots signed safety Michael Stone and offensive lineman Gene Mruczkowski. They also released wide receiver Andre Davis, who was inactive for the first three games, and made two practice squad moves by adding guard Ryan Krug and releasing linebacker Jared Newberry.

The 5-foot-8-inch Zereoue has rushed for 2,123 yards and 10 touchdowns since being drafted by Pittsburgh in the third round in 1999. He has 136 catches for 1,106 yards and a touchdown. His best season came in 2002 when he had 762 yards rushing and 42 catches for 341 yards while starting five games. With Oakland last season, he rushed for 425 yards and three touchdown with 39 receptions for 284 yards.

DAVEY TO JOIN CARDINALS: Free-agent quarterback Rohan Davey has agreed to terms with Arizona, providing insurance in case Kurt Warner's groin strain proves more serious than expected.

Davey's agent, Joel Segal, said the 6-foot-2, 245-pounder from LSU was in Arizona and would have a physical before signing a one-year contract.

Cardinals spokesman Mark Dalton said the team would need to make a roster move to sign Davey, but such a move would not involve putting Warner on the injured list, a season-ending designation.

In Warner's absence, fourth-year pro Josh McCown was promoted to the first unit to prepare for Sunday's game against San Francisco in Mexico City. John Navarre, who started one game last year as a rookie, is his backup. Davey, released by New England on Aug. 29, is in his fourth season.

49ERS RE-SIGN PAIR: Receiver Jason McAddley and cornerback Willie Middlebrooks re-signed with San Francisco, which waived both players before the regular season.

McAddley and Middlebrooks were among the 49ers' final cuts, but receiver Rashaun Woods and tight end Eric Johnson went on injured reserve in the past week, opening two roster spots.

SEAU'S INJURY NOT SERIOUS: Miami Dolphins linebacker Junior Seau's calf injury has been diagnosed as a strain, and he might be able to play in the team's next game Oct. 9 at Buffalo.

An MRI determined the injury suffered in Sunday's win over Carolina wasn't serious, Coach Nick Saban said.

Safety Tebucky Jones, who played with the Saints last season, is nursing a strained hamstring, and his status is also day to day, Saban said. Running back Ronnie Brown has recovered from a strained hamstring and practiced Wednesday.

Saints think blackout to be lifted

SAN ANTONIO — More than 12,000 tickets remain for the Saints' Alamodome opener on Sunday against the Buffalo Bills.

But the team is confident that some local San Antonio businesses will agree to guarantee the remaining tickets in order to avoid a local television blackout. The NFL mandates that teams must sell out their games 48 hours in advance of kickoff in order to avoid a blackout.

Saints owner/executive Rita Benson LeBlanc stressed that tickets will still be available for purchase to both the general public and potential sponsors.

But she and Christian Archer, special assistant to San Antonio mayor Phil Hardberger, said they were confident that one or more local businesses would agree to pick up the tab if the game is not sold out.

They did not identify the businesses by name but expected an announcement on Thursday. The practice of guarantees is common in the NFL. The Saints have often worked out similar agreements with the local Fox television affiliate and with Harrah's Casino, among other New Orleans business.

"It's small-market teams. It's what you have to do to make sure your game is on television," said Benson LeBlanc, who also said that she believed the San Antonio area would have sold out the game sooner if not for the short time window and some logistical problems during the past week, including the arrival of Hurricane Rita.

Benson LeBlanc was in Austin on Wednesday as part of the team's efforts to drum up support in San Antonio's neighbor 75 miles to the north.

She joined Austin mayor Will Wynn in a press conference to announce that the Saints, in conjunction with KB Home, would be donating tickets to city employees, volunteers and evacuees in Austin and San Antonio. The Saints and KB Home purchased and donated a combined 8,000 tickets.

ETC.: Former Saints quarterback Kliff Kingsbury signed on with the New York Jets as their third quarterback. The Jets plucked Kingsbury from the Denver Broncos' practice squad.

INJURY REPORT: Eleven players are listed on Wednesday's weekly injury report submitted to the league office, including safety Jay Bellamy who is expected to undergo season-ending surgery next week to repair a torn rotator cuff, according to Coach Jim Haslett. Besides Bellamy, cornerback Fakhir Brown (knee), guard Jermane Mayberry (shoulder), running back Aaron Stecker (ankle) and wide receiver Joe Horn (hamstring) did not practice Wednesday. They are listed as questionable. Wide receiver Az-Zahir Hakim (hamstring), guard Montrae Holland (knee), safety Dwight Smith (toe), defensive end Darren Howard (ankle), cornerback Mike McKenzie (neck) and defensive tackle Bryan Young (foot) also are questionable.

PERSONNEL UPDATE: Haslett said there is a chance cornerback Fred Booker (LSU) could be promoted to the active roster from the practice squad if the team places Bellamy on injured reserve by Sunday.

WORTH REPEATING: "Devery (Henderson) is doing a great job. He has really surprised me the last couple of weeks. He's getting better and better. You can feel it. He's gaining confidence in what he's doing." — Haslett on the team's second-round draft pick in 2004 from LSU. Henderson has six catches for 137 yards, including a long of 66 yards against Minnesota.

Losman has been inconsistent so far

SAINTS, from C-5

Bledsoe, who had thrown for nearly 40,000 yards with New England and Buffalo, and handed the ball to Losman, who had thrown for 32 yards during an abbreviated rookie season.

No pressure there.

Losman, 24, is the first quarterback to be drafted by the Bills in the first round since Jim Kelly in 1983.

All Kelly did was lead the Bills to four consecutive Super Bowls on his way to the Pro Football Hall of Fame.

No pressure there, either.

"I think he's got everything you need to succeed in this league," Kelly said. "I think the only thing he really lacks is experience. The Bills made the right decision letting Drew go when they did. That's given J.P. an entire offseason to get his reps and start establishing himself as a leader to his teammates.

"Most of the pieces already are there for J.P. They have a hellacious defense that can give him the ball in good field position and can cover up his mistakes. In Willis (McGahee), he has an excellent running back he can really count on to carry the load. And he has some excellent wide receivers in Eric Moulds and Lee Evans."

The winning formula worked to perfection in Game 1, a 22-7 victory against the Houston Texans, a game in which Losman led the Bills on five consecutive scoring drives.

But the Bills struggled in subsequent losses to Tampa Bay (19-3) and Atlanta (24-16), meaning Losman will bring a team on a mission into Sunday's game against the Saints (1-2) at the Alamodome.

"We started off on a high note, and we've just kind of gotten into a funk here," said Losman, who missed all but five games last season after his leg was broken in training camp. "There are still lots of games, and we got to come out of it."

AP PHOTO

With a steady running game and speedy receivers, J.P. Losman has weapons around him to succeed in the Bills' offense.

Since completing 60.7 percent of his passes in the season-opening win against Houston, Losman has had trouble finding his target. He is 21-of-51 (41.1 percent) for 188 yards, no touchdowns and one interception.

Despite the inconsistencies, Saints players see a talented quarterback who also can run.

"He ain't no Donovan McNabb, or Michael Vick, or Daunte Culpepper," Saints defensive end Charles Grant said. "Once he sees people in his face, he wants to get the ball out of his hands. So we got to keep that pressure on him. We got to come at him full force with the blitzes and schemes that we have."

"He's not a real running threat," Saints cornerback Fakhir Brown said. "They like to roll him out and let him throw it. His best ball is a deep ball, like throwing a fade. I think we can put pressure on him because he's not a really good drop-back passer. He can get the ball to the slot receiver pretty good, but when he throws to the outside, they got to roll him out."

Saints coach Jim Haslett said the Bills have designed several running plays for Losman, much like Mularkey did for Kordell Stewart when Mularkey was offensive coordinator/quarterbacks coach with the Pittsburgh Steelers.

"They're trying to protect J.P. a little bit because he's a young kid and hasn't played very much," Haslett said. "Mike's doing a nice job with him and not putting him in a tough position. They rely on their running game and play great defense. So J.P. is kind of feeling his way along."

One NFL defensive assistant compared Losman to former Bills quarterback Rob Johnson, describing him as "very athletic with a big arm and can make big plays but is a little skittish in the pocket."

Losman, 6 feet 2, 217 pounds, has never lacked confidence. That was never more evident than at Tulane, where he finished in the school's career top 10 in 18 categories, including third in touchdown passes (60), completions (570) and passing efficiency (129.81).

Although twice named team captain, he apparently lacked the necessary leadership skills to take the Green Wave to success, according to former teammate Mewelde Moore, now a running back with the Minnesota Vikings.

"We could have been a great team our senior year and reaped the benefits," Moore said. "But he kind of took a big turn, and he just kind of tanked it. I didn't like that."

Losman took the high road Wednesday when informed of Moore's comments in Sunday's editions of the Minneapolis Star-Tribune.

"Did he really say that?" Losman said. "I didn't ever hear that. It might have come out wrong or something like that. I don't think he would have said something like that."

True or not, all eyes are on Losman in Buffalo as he intimated during the preseason.

"I have so many older men counting on me to do my job and make sure I lead them to victory," Losman said.

"I'm just starting to feel pressure, all this anxiety and suspense, like I don't know what's going to happen with my life right now.

"I should know more after week three or four. I'm going to look back and either go, 'This football thing is going to happen for me,' Or I'm going to look back and say, 'Man, this is going to be really tough.' "

Losman appears to have reached that fork in the road.

Saints' feel-good story now sour

DeSHAZIER, from C-5

anything approaching a professional effort during this Katrina-shadowed season, has lost a great deal of leaves the past two games. The Saints were undressed by the Giants and Vikings, neither of whom suddenly morphed into the Patriots, but looked against the Saints as if they had.

In three games, the Saints have two losses, 12 turnovers and 36 penalties.

With numbers like that (ridiculous numbers that have nothing to do with displacement and hurricane stress) the miracle is that the Saints aren't winless.

True, the team won't be able to play a single home game in its home city or facility the entire season, literally having to live out of a suitcase.

But that doesn't provide license for them to play as if lost, to execute as if brain waves are displaced.

One mistake-filled game, such as what the Saints offered up against the Giants, is forgivable under ordinary circumstances, definitely absolvable under the current ones. Two in a row make you wonder if it's the extension of a trend for a team that has several similar chapters in its history.

The team doesn't want to be viewed as a charity case. But it cannot play this way - aimless, clueless, sloppy - and expect to be seen as more.

If it's going to live under the "no excuses" mantra, then it would be nice for it to play like it wants to be taken seriously. Because, comparatively speaking, everyone knows the Saints are making out pretty well in San Antonio, the team's accommodations a few light years better than a shelter, its grub evolutions better than MREs.

Whatever issues the Saints have with regard to concentration, or the obvious lack thereof, stem from something other than oppressive conditions and growling tummies. And whatever is the origin, it should have been rooted out and disposed of, instead of allowed to grow potent enough to infect a pro team on consecutive Sundays.

Obviously, there's plenty of time to right the wrongs.

And, fortunately, the Saints aren't alone among teams needing to dig themselves out. Consecutive victories against the next two opponents, beatable Buffalo and declining Green Bay, and suddenly the Saints are a winning team.

But talking and doing aren't the same thing. The two don't even resemble each other.

Very few things resemble what they used to.

Few, that is, except the Saints. And in this case, the resemblance hasn't been a very good thing at all.

"We remain committed to it (Fair Grounds). Itís just, whatís that business going to look like? How is it going to evolve in the next couple of years? We just have to be patient."

ANDY SKEHAN, Fair Grounds chief operating officer

Track's damage worse than originally thought

FAIR GROUNDS, from C-5

But after the hurricane, the big question is, what's going to happen to the Fair Grounds?

Has the hurricane changed Churchill's plans for the Fair Grounds? Has Katrina created an opportunity for Churchill to build a better Fair Grounds, or has the storm created motivation for the company to bow out of racing in New Orleans?

For the long haul, Churchill remains committed to racing in New Orleans, Andy Skehan, the company's chief operating officer, said Tuesday.

"There's so many reasons that it's just a strategic location for us," Skehan said. "It remains strategic. We just have to be patient."

But for now, Churchill can't give a timetable for reopening the Fair Grounds, Skehan said. "It's just a lot of things we don't know right now," he said.

Insurance adjusters were at the Fair Grounds last week, but Skehan said he hadn't heard an estimate of the amount of the damage. "It was more extensive than we originally thought," he said.

The Fair Grounds has 11 off-track betting parlors, including one at the track. The St. Bernard parlor was destroyed, but most of the others "are in pretty good shape," Skehan said. "They're in better shape than we anticipated."

Churchill has $200 million in insurance, with a $500,000 deductible, on the Fair Grounds.

A tour of the track Monday with Fair Grounds director of security Dave Martin and his assistant, Jimmy Schanbien, showed extensive damage to some parts of the facility and little damage to others.

"What amazed us is all those windows in the front stayed (unbroken)," Martin said of the large windows through which spectators in the grandstand and clubhouse watch the races.

Schanbien, who was among a small group of Fair Grounds employees and firemen who rode out the storm at the track, said of those windows: "They looked like sails. They were bulging."

Katrina destroyed the roof of the main building. Schanbien said pieces flew onto Fortin Street.

When Hurricane Rita hit last weekend, strips of the roof that were hanging after Katrina struck were blown into windows facing the paddock. "Rita took out more glass than Katrina did," Schanbien said.

A fake owl, mounted on the roof to frighten away pigeons during the filming of a movie, remains there.

Pieces of the roof and broken light fixtures litter the clubhouse. "All the suites have skylights now," Schanbien joked as he looked up from a suite.

Katrina blew stucco off both sides of the grandstand-clubhouse building, ripped most of a protective metal covering off the tote board and scattered sections of the green safety rail around the track.

Most of the light standards weathered the storm, but one was blown down near the half-mile pole.

On the backstretch, some barns appeared unscathed, but others received water or wind damage.

When Churchill bought the Fair Grounds in the fall of 2004, the company committed to make $4 million in backstretch improvements, many focusing on living conditions of backstretch workers, within two years. The commitment to such improvements remains, though thanks to Katrina, the time frame likely needs adjusting, Skehan said.

Doors were blown out of some barns. On others, roofs were destroyed.

Marks on the sides of barns showed how high water rose. A mark on the Belfort Street guard shack showed water reached chest-high, perhaps four feet. A tree was leaning on a barn near that shack.

Schanbien, who went to the backstretch the day after Katrina hit, said water on the backstretch was flowing from Lakeview. "You could see it coming from that way," he said.

When the water receded, many fish died in the barn area.

Water also covered the turf course and main track, Schanbien said.

The turf is green from the finish line to about midway on the backstretch of the course. A small green section is on the final turn entering the stretch. The rest of the course is brown, with a few green blades of grass poking through on the backstretch.

Churchill bought the Fair Grounds out of bankruptcy for $47 million in the fall of 2004. Churchill officials have said that the company would be investing about $90 million in the Fair Grounds. The total includes the purchase price and the cost of renovations and improvements, which would include the slots facility. Katrina has added rebuilding to the equation.

The first priority is to "buttoning everything up" to make sure there's no more damage to the property until a game plan on how to proceed is formulated, Skehan said.

The second priority is "get in a position where we're confident what will happen with the rebuilding of the city," he said.

Churchill will work with all levels of government while rebuilding the Fair Grounds, Skehan said. "So much of what we do is going to be predicated on what the city and state and federal governments do," he said.

Government officials have contacted Churchill about "wish lists" for the Fair Grounds, Skehan said.

"How do we build a better city and look at this as an opportunity instead of a tragedy? That process is taking place right now. What we're sort of waiting to see is how is that process going to evolve?

"We remain committed to it (Fair Grounds). It's just, what's that business going to look like? How is it going to evolve in the next couple of years?"

How New Orleans re-populates is important to the Fair Grounds, which would need people to work there and to play there.

†"It appears most of the tourist sector is relatively intact," Skehan said. "That's a very good thing. You hope there's enough housing areas that you'll be able to staff all those activities.

"The Fair Grounds is not really a tourist business. The race meet is mainly locals. It's just a matter of how quickly do we move? We don't want to hold a party that nobody comes to."

Without racing at the Fair Grounds, workers at the track theoretically could move quickly, because they would be unimpeded by people and horses.

A problem with that theory might be "availability of contractors," Skehan said. "Should they be rebuilding housing before they're rebuilding racetracks?"

Another of Churchill's concerns is how quickly neighborhoods bounce back from the storm. "The encouraging thing is so much of the city is intact," Skehan said.

But the neighborhood east of the track in Gentilly, which flooded, "may be a different story," he said. "What impact does that have, if any? We don't feel we have enough information right now. If we did, then resources are a question."

Churchill eventually will need to decide how quickly to rebuild the Fair Grounds, Skehan said.

†"Do we move aggressively? Do we take our time? Our intent and commitment is there. We just need to do it in a way to minimize our risk. We don't want to invest tens of millions of dollars, then be idle for a few years."

On the other hand, he said, Churchill doesn't want the Fair Ground idle if businesses around it are thriving.

Could the track be ready for racing on Thanksgiving Day in 2006?

"If some very clear decisions are made Ö EPA says everything's great Ö then racing next year should be eminently doable," Skehan said. "Are we going to be a high enough priority to get people over there to fix everything? I hope the conditions will be present to have us up and operating by Thanksgiving of next year."

Delta Downs damage complicates situation

Commission to meet Friday to consider shift of 37 FG days

By Bob Fortus
Staff writer

The Louisiana State Racing Commission will meet Friday at Evangeline Downs to consider possible changes in racing dates and locations, including the proposed shift of 37 Fair Grounds racing days to Louisiana Downs in Bossier City.

On Sept. 13, Churchill Downs officials and Louisiana horsemen reached a preliminary agreement on the shift of Fair Grounds days. The transferred Fair Grounds season would begin Nov. 19 and run through Jan. 22. Hurricane Katrina wiped out an 83-day Fair Grounds season that was to run from Nov. 24 through March 26.

But the commission can't approve the shift without approving other changes in the Louisiana racing schedule. Hurricane Rita, which damaged Delta Downs in Vinton, has complicated the situation.

With Louisiana Downs adding thoroughbred dates, that track would have to move its quarter-horse season, scheduled from Oct. 28 to Nov. 27, to another track. When the agreement between Churchill and the horsemen was announced, Sean Alfortish, president of the Louisiana Horsemen's Benevolent and Protective Association, said that Evangeline Downs would add Louisiana Downs' quarter-horse days. If that happens, Evangeline, which will begin its own fall quarter-horse season Saturday, would be running quarter horses into December.

As of Wednesday, Evangeline hadn't agreed to take Louisiana Downs' quarter-horse season, said David Yount, Evangeline's director of racing operations. "It's still on the table," he said.

Because of Rita, racing people are concerned that Delta Downs won't be able to hold its thoroughbred season, scheduled from Oct. 21 to March 25.

Delta Downs received wind and water damage from the storm, according to a press release from Boyd Gaming, which owns the track.

"Most apparent is roof damage that allowed water to enter the buildings," the release says. "The building structures appear to have suffered little to no damage except for the horse barns."

Boyd spokesperson Rob Stillwell said Wednesday: "We're working with contractors right now to determine the extent of the damage."

Concerning the possibility that Delta would be able to run a thoroughbred season, Stillwell said: "We're hopeful, but exactly when that might be, we can't say."

Louisiana horsemen met Wednesday at Evangeline Downs. Alfortish said he updated them about the Delta situation. A question that came up in the meeting was whether the Delta Downs thoroughbred season could be moved to Evangeline Downs, Alfortish said.

He said he wouldn't comment on that until getting "concrete information" from Delta Downs on its intentions for the thoroughbred season.

Racing commission executive director Charlie Gardiner said the commission hasn't heard anything from Delta Downs on its intentions. "The Delta damage is the X-factor now," Gardiner said. "It might complicate things."

Young said: "No one has been in contact with Delta."

Yount also said that it would be impossible for Evangeline Downs to run both Louisiana Downs' quarter-horse season and Delta Downs' thoroughbred season.

On Thursday, representatives from all parties - the racing commission, tracks and horsemen - will meet in an effort to solve the scheduling problems.

"I have a feeling that a lot of things will be decided at that time," Yount said. "Evangeline Downs wants to do what's best for the racing industry in the state of Louisiana."

Racing commission chairman Bob Wright said he hopes a solution is reached: "That's so much better than some outside influence (the commission) deciding to do what they have to do. I'm hopeful they can get together."

Meanwhile, Louisiana Downs and Churchill officials are laying the groundwork for the Fair Grounds season.

"All the details are being worked out with attorneys representing both companies and accountants representing both companies," Fair Grounds president Randy Soth said Wednesday.

Also, the LHBPA is finding stalls for horses that were going to stabled at Delta Downs.

The LHBPA is paying the stall rent for about 800 horses, at $4.50 per day, per horse, Alfortish said.

Cooper leads ESJ past Destrehan

By Lori Lyons

Having only played three volleyball matches, East St. John wasn't near ready to begin District 7-I play Tuesday. But the Wildcats were readier than Destrehan, which was playing its second match of the season.

East St. John opened district play with a 25-21, 19-25, 25-7, 25-22 victory against Destrehan in Reserve.

Ashlee Cooper, a 6-foot-5 senior who has committed to Baylor, led the East St. John attack with 15 kills, three blocks and eight digs. Darielle Sanders had five kills and seven digs, Diana Lainez had four aces and Ashley Given had four aces and four kills.

"I think we really got into it as a team," Cooper said. "I think we all really clicked. And a lot of people contributed. Everybody had input."

"It was extra incentive because it's Destrehan and because it's district," said East St. John coach Sandi Stein. "I was nervous going in because I didn't feel like we had enough competition to prepare for them."

But Destrehan has had even less prep time. St. Charles Parish schools opened four days later than St. John the Baptist Parish schools. Even then, Destrehan's gym was still being used to house relief and law enforcement agency workers. Now, the gym is unsuitable for play because of a water leak which caused part of the floor to buckle. Destrehan was able to play only one match, a victory against Thibodaux, before Tuesday.

"The bright side is, it's the end of September and we're undefeated," said Destrehan coach Calvin Ike before Tuesday's loss.

Ike is still tinkering with his lineup, which now includes senior Robynette Hargrave, who transferred in from Xavier Prep.

"She has talent," Ike said. "I put a new rotation in to try and utilize some of the new people we have. But we were just out of it."

Ariel Hunt led Destrehan with four kills. Sabrina Clement had 11 digs.

After splitting the first two games, which were close, East St. John got an advantage in game three. A flurry of return errors by Destrehan helped East St. John take a 25-7 victory. East St. John then carried the momentum into the final game.

East St. John will play at St. Charles Catholic in a non-district match Thursday at 4 p.m. Destrehan travels to Hahnville for a District 7-I match at 4 p.m. Thursday.

HAHNVILLE DEF. LUTCHER 3-0: The Tigers took a 25-11, 25-16, 25-21 victory in a non-district match Tuesday. Megan Waters led with 12 kills and Ashante Pryer had 11. Trashan Glenn had five aces.

ST. JOSEPH'S DEF. FONTAINEBLEAU 3-0: Abbie Legendre and Meredith Downing combined for 14 kills to lead St. Joseph's to a 25-9, 25-13, 25-17 victory against Fontainebleau in Baton Rouge on Tuesday.

St. Joseph's (10-1) got seven kills, four aces, four blocks and three digs from Legendre, a sophomore. Downing had seven kills and seven digs.

Alise Doubt had eight digs for Fontainebleau (2-1) and Tricia Greenwalt led the Bulldogs with four kills. Shannon King had five blocks and Blakeney McRaney and Sara Fradella had one ace apiece for Fontainebleau.

Bayou Classic switch put on hold for now

SU, Grambling boards to meet on matter

By Jimmy Smith
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Officials at Southern University said Wednesday that no announcement would be forthcoming about the possible switch of this year's Bayou Classic game from New Orleans to Houston's Reliant Stadium.

Southern athletic director Greg LeFleur referred questions about the potential site switch to sports information director Kevin Manns, who said approval for the move had not yet been acquired from the boards of Southern and Grambling State.

"The two boards still have to get together," Manns said at Southern's weekly media luncheon. "This is not just Southern University and Grambling making the decision. Grambling is part of the University of Louisiana system, and we are run by the Southern board.

"We hope to have an announcement in the next couple of days. But I haven't been given any information from my superiors. We hope to get some word in the next few days."

It's likely, apparently, this will be a one-year shift because the Superdome is unusable for the foreseeable future.

The city of Shreveport also bid on the game, but officials say Houston would be a better venue because it has a bigger stadium and more hotel rooms.

On another matter, LeFleur said the Southern athletic department is attempting to schedule a game for the Jaguars' open date on Oct. 29 to make up for last Saturday's cancellation of the scheduled home game against Albany State. The game was canceled because of Hurricane Rita.

He urged Southern ticketholders to be patient and said he hoped to have something worked out by Friday.

Green Wave gets 'home' game

Ruston to host TU-UTEP game

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

RUSTON — Tulane's Oct. 14 home game will actually be at the Green Wave's home.

The football team, based in Ruston this semester, will host UTEP at Louisiana Tech's Joe Aillet Stadium that Friday at 7 p.m.

The game, originally scheduled for the Louisiana Superdome, will be aired on ESPN.

"(Louisiana Tech) has offered the opportunity for our student-athletes to attend classes, live in the dorms and to continue this season from their campus," said Rick Dickson, Tulane's athletic director. "Now, they have stepped forward and have given our team the chance to play a game on-campus, saving our team the wear and tear of another weekend on the road."

The decision is a delightful one for the football team, which has traveled to every game thus far — and heads to Baton Rouge on Saturday and Lafayette on Oct. 8.

Dickson initially considered playing the UTEP game in Mobile, Ala. Ladd-Peebles Stadium in Mobile is a strong candidate for the next available Tulane home — Oct. 29 against Marshall. A decision is expected on Monday.

UTEP offered its home stadium to Tulane, and said the school could collect all the ticket money. Tulane seriously considered the option, but the football team did not want to play a home game at an opponent's stadium.

Tulane is working with ESPN to bring supplemental lighting to Joe Alliet Stadium for the UTEP game, The stadium's lighting is not conducive for televised games.

The Green Wave program will receive all ticket proceeds on Oct. 14. A limited number of $30 premium sideline seats will be sold, while the majority of the stadium seats will be sold for $10. Tickets will be sold via Ticketmaster at www.Ticketmaster.com, by calling 800-488-5252 or at Ticketmaster outlets in Louisiana and Mississippi.

NCAA rejects North Dakota appeal of nickname

Hawkeyes want foes seeing pink

From wire reports

The North Dakota Fighting Sioux will remain on the list of college nicknames the NCAA doesn't want used in postseason play.

The university's appeal was rejected by an NCAA review committee because it did not have the support of the three federally recognized Sioux tribes of North Dakota, the association said Wednesday.

"Although the University of North Dakota maintained that its logo and nickname are used with consummate respect, the position of the namesake tribes and those affected by the hostile or abusive environment that the nickname and logo create take precedence," NCAA vice president Bernard Franklin said.

North Dakota President Charles Kupchella said he would appeal the decision to the NCAA's executive committee and, if that fails, seek legal action against the NCAA.

North Dakota was among 18 schools barred last month from using Native American mascots, logos and nicknames in postseason tournaments. Florida State, Central Michigan and Utah were later exempted because of their support by local tribes.

"It is not at all obvious to us why the NCAA finds the nicknames Chippewas, Seminoles and Utes worthy of exceptions, but somehow Sioux is deemed hostile and abusive," Kupchella said. "We must press our case, because to let the charge of hostile and abusive stand would have a chilling effect to prospective faculty, staff, and most importantly, prospective American Indian students we are here to serve."

In North Dakota, however, the Standing Rock Sioux tribe and the Sisseton-Wahpeton Sioux tribe opposed the Fighting Sioux nickname and imagery, and the Spirit Lake tribe did not respond to an NCAA request to clarify its position, Franklin said.

North Dakota will be allowed to host the Men's Division I ice hockey regional in March because of its prior contract but will be barred from hosting future NCAA events.

"This decision was made because it is not reasonable to cover up or remove all of the Native American imagery in the arena," Franklin said.

AP PHOTO

The use of pink paint in Iowa's visiting locker room has caused a bit of a commotion around Iowa City.

Kupchella said the university has "no choice but to pursue an appeal."

"Even those here opposed to the use of the nickname on campus recognize that UND offers perhaps the best opportunity for many American Indian students to get an education," he said. "I would also note that the schools exempted thus far have been exempted on the basis of a 'special relationship' with American Indian tribes, yet our proportionate number of American Indian students and the number of substantive programs in support of American Indian students exceeds that of all of the exempted schools combined."

SEEING PINK: The use of pink paint in Iowa's visiting locker room has caused a bit of a commotion around Iowa City.

First, some background. Soft pink hues were added to the visiting locker room at Iowa's Kinnick Stadium by former coach Hayden Fry in the late 1970s. Fry believed the color had a calming effect on people.

As part of a new $88 million remodeling job at the stadium, designers retained that color motif, splashing pink across the walls, carpet, showers, sinks, metal lockers and even the urinals.

Last week, an Iowa law school professor received death threats after criticizing the university for using pink paint. The professor, now joined by others across campus, says using pink demeans women and perpetuates negative stereotypes of women and homosexuality.

Football coach Kirk Ferentz wanted nothing to do with the controversy.

"I mean this with all due respect, but it's not really on my laundry list right now," said Ferentz, whose Hawkeyes fell to 2-2 after losing to Ohio State last weekend. "I've got other things that have moved in front of it."

BULLISH SCHEDULE: For South Florida coach Jim Leavitt, the afterglow of the Bulls' 45-14 upset of Louisville lasted about as long as it took him to get from the field to the podium for the postgame news conference.

"I stood with some of our police officers and said let's pause here for a moment," Leavitt said. "Because that's all we get."

This week the Bulls get ninth-ranked Miami in the Orange Bowl. So much for good vibes.

"I don't sleep at night after games and I get back and look at film and really started watching Miami," Leavitt said. "I just turned off the film, looked down on the floor and thought `My gosh, they're good.'"

It's the first meeting between the perennially powerful Hurricanes and the Bulls, who have already played two teams from Florida this season (Florida A&M and Central Florida), winning both games.

mad at him for waiting so long to leave."

At the time of the first snap at Southern Methodist, television footage was showing reporters in rain jackets, blitzed by rain and whipping winds.

McGee, who has started 36 consecutive games for the Green Wave, was on the field when the game began Saturday. But, after the first play against SMU, McGee remained on the ground. He had rolled his ankle, the same one he hurt in the season opener.

"I've never missed a game, and I wanted to go out there," McGee said about watching the next snap from the sideline. "If I can help the team, and I'm a little hurt, then I want to do that. ... After a while, the pain went away. I think it's mental. After a while, you get used to it."

McGee played at 60 percent, Wave coach Chris Scelfo said. But he played and played hard, bullying Mustang defensive ends as Tulane's offense marched toward the end zone.

"He's one of those guys who says, "I'm a survivor,' " Mahoney said. "No matter what's thrown at him, he's going to work through it. And that's the way he's always been."

McGee spent time with his family after the game, the first victory of the season. Hugs, these days, are tighter.

The news from Beaumont came slowly to McGee. His sister's home was safe, but numerous trees were down. His buddies were safe. But the town took a beating.

"New Orleans is home for college," said McGee, who is unsure how his Uptown apartment handled Hurricane Katrina. "But Beaumont is were I grew up. Beaumont's home. O My dad is back there now, and he said it looked pretty bad.

"But I think (the hurricanes) taught me and everyone on our team about character."

McGee is questionable for Tulane's next game, Saturday in Baton Rouge against Southeastern Louisiana.

"We'll see," he said about playing the Lions. "But I never want to miss a game."

Vanderbilt senior QB Jay Cutler, the school's all-time leader in touchdown passes, is a big reason why the Commodores are 4-0 and closing in on a bowl bid.

Vanderbilt enters foreign territory

Longtime doormat taking SEC by surprise

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Vanderbilt is a perfect four and 0, and we're not talking about grade-point average.

The longtime SEC football doormat and academically prestigious school is making positive sports headlines with its first 4-0 start since 1984.

The Commodores need a victory against nearby Middle Tennessee State for a 5-0 record going into the Oct. 8 game with LSU. Vanderbilt last started 5-0 in 1943, when the school played only five games because of World War II.

Had hurricanes not ravaged Louisiana, the Commodores would be the feel-good story of the season in the SEC. Let's count the ways:

▶ The two SEC victories against Arkansas and Ole Miss this season equal the number of SEC victories recorded by Vandy over the past four seasons combined.

▶ The 'Dores have received votes in the USA Today, AP and Harris Interactive polls, getting 47 points in the latter for a No. 32 ranking among BCS schools.

▶ Fifth-year senior quarterback Jay Cutler leads the SEC in per-game averages for passing yards (282.2) and total offense (322.8 yards). He is the school's all-time leader in touchdown passes (44) and total offense.

▶ Cutler has been has been mentioned in prestigious publications such as Sports Illustrated and the New York Times.

▶ This season, Vandy players have been selected SEC Offensive (Cutler) and Defensive (Moses Osemwegie) Player of the Week.

▶ The school's largest crowd of the season, 38,446, watched the 37-13 victory against Richmond, 1,300 short of a sellout.

"It still amazes me," Osemwegie told The Tennessean. "I have to pinch myself sometimes."

That's because Vandy has long set the standard for inept football. In the previous 22 years, Vandy is 23-143-1 in SEC games. Included in that span was a 23-game conference losing streak and seven seasons without a league victory.

The last time Vanderbilt had a winning record was 1982, when the Commodores went 8-4, including victories against Florida and Tennessee. The school also made it's last bowl appearance that season, a 36-28 Hall of Fame bowl loss to Air Force.

Now, Vandy is two victories away from a winning record and bowl eligibility. But Coach Bobby Johnson said, even though Middle Tennessee State is from the weaker Sun Belt Conference, "We're not good enough to take anybody lightly."

Indeed, Vandy has lost its last two meetings with MTSU, in 2001 and 2002.

ALABAMA: The Tide is ranked No. 15, its highest ranking since ending the 2002 season at No. 11. But Alabama, which plays No. 5 Florida on Saturday, is 0-5 against top five teams at Bryant-Denny Stadium.

AUBURN: Tigers running back Kenny Irons will face his former team when Auburn plays South Carolina. Irons, who leads Auburn with 292 yards rushing on 43 carries, signed with the Gamecocks and played as a freshman. But he played less as a sophomore when Demetrius Summers came in as a highly touted freshman. Irons was not alone in leaving the school. Nineteen members of the 2002 South Carolina recruiting class are no longer there.

FLORIDA: Chris Leak is only eight attempts short of breaking Danny Wuerffel's school record of 121 consecutive throws without an interception. He has thrown 114 passes this season. Despite playing only one half at Kentucky, Leak leads the SEC with nine touchdown passes.

SOUTH CAROLINA: The Gamecocks' 45-20 victory against Troy was a run-of-mill nonconference win, but with a remarkable footnote. Tim Frisby, a 40-year-old Army veteran and walk-on, caught a short pass in the fading moments. Frisby, affectionately called "Pops" by teammates, caught a 9-yard pass with 3:16 remaining, pumped his fist and waved to his wife and two of his six kids in the stands. "It's something I always wanted to do and I did it," he said. "This is a start. Hopefully, I'll get more this season."

Frisby served in the 82nd Airborne Division in Iraq during Desert Storm and in Kosovo.

OLE MISS: The Rebels' offense has scored five touchdowns and committed seven turnovers through three games.

TENNESSEE: Rick Clausen cashed in on his big performance in Tiger Stadium by earning SEC Player of the Week honors. Clausen came off the bench to spark the Vols in their shocking comeback over LSU by completing 21 of 32 passes for 196 yards and one touchdown.

Improved Connor looks to atone

Last season's LSU game painful memory

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — For Mississippi State quarterback Omarr Conner, the physical pain from last year's loss to LSU was nothing compared to the mental anguish of watching it on film.

"I made a lot of crazy plays," Conner said of Mississippi State's 51-0 loss at Tiger Stadium. "I was impatient and trying to make stuff happen that wasn't there."

At the end, neither was Conner. He left the game with a knee injury suffered on the first possession of the second half and didn't return. That was after being sacked twice, hit several other times and repeatedly harassed by the LSU defense. He completed just four of 12 passes for 44 yards and threw three interceptions.

It's much easier now for Conner, a junior from Macon, Miss., to see the game as a learning experience, and he'd like to show LSU how much he has improved when the Tigers visit Davis-Wade Stadium for Saturday's 1:30 p.m. game.

Last season gave Conner a running start in guiding the West Coast offense favored by second-year coach Sylvester Croom and offensive coordinator Woody McCorvey. A shotgun quarterback throughout high school, Conner had to make the adjustment last season to the three- and five-step drop-back passing format and throwing on rhythm. It didn't help that Conner played wide receiver as a freshman, costing him valuable development time, but he's improved.

Conner has completed 59 of 101 passes (58.4) percent for 662 yards and seven touchdowns and thrown only three interceptions. Those numbers might be even better if Conner could get off to a better start. Against Tulane he was two for eight for 14 yards and an interception in the first half before going 11 of 18 with two touchdowns in the second. Against Georgia, he was three for 13 for 42 yards in the first half and 13 of 19 for 163 in the second, with one touchdown.

"He's a lot better than last year, a lot better three-step and five-step drop-back passer," Croom said. "He's got a lot better command of the offense, he knows where people are and his mechanics are a lot better. He's playing with a lot of courage and has stepped up and shown some leadership. Right now he's way ahead of where he was last year.

For proof, Croom pointed out that against Georgia, Conner on one play checked down to his fourth receiver and completed a pass to Jerious Norwood, something he could never have done last season.

Conner credits his coaches' perseverance and the support of his teammates in helping him along.

"The guys look at me as a leader now," he said. "You feel totally different when your guys are believing in you. I've learned a lot since last year and I try to learn a little more every day from Coach Croom and Coach McCorvey.

"I've got to try and stay more consistent in the first half. Early in the game I'm too pumped up. It takes me some time to settle down."

AP PHOTO

Mississippi State quarterback Omarr Connor is making strides in his second year running the Bulldogs' West Coast offense.

Given the performance of the Bulldogs offensive line, Conner still has to fight the urge to run with the ball instead of staying in pocket on passing plays. In SEC games against Auburn and Georgia, he has been sacked nine times. And he still fumbles a snap now and then while getting used to being under center. But overall he said he finally has a feel for his position.

"I feel a lot more in control, a lot more like a quarterback," he said.

BAD MEMORIES: Croom said last year's game wasn't just bad for Conner. It was one of the lowest of low points in his first year. LSU limited Mississippi State to 130 net yards and seven first downs. The Tigers also lost four fumbles and the Bulldogs still couldn't score.

"Basically, we should have just walked out there and conceded and come on home," Croom said. "Because it was that bad, we had no confidence, nobody played with any enthusiasm; we basically conceded the game before we got there. I was thoroughly disappointed that our guys didn't compete."

Mississippi State went on to finish the season with a 3-8 record, but upset Florida in Starkville.

FAMILY TIES: Croom told reporters Tuesday he discovered he is distantly related to LSU quarterback JaMarcus Russell. Croom said Russell's father called him about it last summer and they discovered they knew a lot of the same people.

"It's on my grandmother's side," said Croom, who was born and raised in Tuscaloosa. Russell is from Mobile, Ala.

Greensboro trying to retain spot on PGA Tour

Tournament could be victim of reduced schedule

From wire reports

GREENSOBORO, N.C. - The PGA Tour is in Greensboro again, continuing a storied history that dates to Sam Snead's victory in the inaugural tournament in 1938. And Roy Williams' memory of this event goes back nearly as far.

"I can remember sitting in Spanish class, wondering why Arnold Palmer tried to hit it out of a creek on the 15th hole to make a double bogey and lose the tournament," said the University of North Carolina basketball coach, who played in the pro-am on Wednesday. "That's how far back I go."

Now, the question is whether the tour's reorganized schedule in 2007 has room for the Chrysler Classic of Greensboro. Nothing is finalized, but the tour is moving toward a season that would end in the middle of September with the Tour Championship, preceded by three tournaments that would be part of a points-chase toward a $10 million prize for the winner.

The tournament in Greensboro currently is part of the Fall Finish, a group of 11 events beginning Labor Day weekend that completes the 47-week season.

"The Fall Finish, it is important to all of us, there's no doubt about it," Sergio Garcia said. "There's some really good events in the fall. I try to give it the best shot I can."

Garcia is the top player from the World Golf Ranking here this week, with Adam Scott the only other from the top 10. For Garcia, he has a tough time fitting tournaments in the United States into his itinerary, which includes many stops in Europe.

This is the first time he's played in Greensboro.

"I like to play a bit more in Europe, because I have some nice events around my country that I enjoy playing, that I can get some friends to come and watch me, things like that," the Spaniard said. "But I still try to come and play two, three, four events in the fall."

Until 2003, this event was played in the spring, and for a time occupied the spot on the schedule just before the Masters. Now, it competes against football, both college and the NFL, and the playoff-style Chase for the championship in NASCAR.

This weekend, three of the state's Atlantic Coast Conference schools have home games, and the Champions Tour also has its annual event in Cary, N.C., a suburb of Raleigh about 90 miles east of Greensboro.

"The PGA Tour schedule was set for 2002 through 2006," said Tim Crosby, director of tournament business affairs for the tour. "They were obviously aware of when we were playing when the Champions Tour decided to schedule their tournament in Cary."

Ideally, the tour would like to keep tournaments such as this one on the schedule, where they possibly would be broadcast by The Golf Channel for a much smaller sponsorship fee than Chrysler already pays. But would a title sponsor support an event that likely would be without Tiger Woods, Phil Mickelson or other top stars? And one shown on a niche cable network during the middle of football season.

Mark Brazil hopes so. He has been the tournament director in Greensboro for four years, and he believes the tournament is stronger than ever. Davis Love III, who withdrew Tuesday because of a sore neck and shoulder, renovated Forest Oaks two years ago, and most of the field raves about the changes.

Garcia mentioned the reputation the course has in the locker room as one of the reasons he's here.

"This is a great old event that is about to get much better," Brazil said. "I think the tour is starting to realize what we have to offer, and that we are very serious and committed to being a serious player on the PGA Tour schedule."

While Woods has never played here, the tournament does hold an attraction to the majority of the tour members, who try to earn as much money as possible down the stretch to secure a spot in the top 125 to secure their status for the next season.

John Maginnes is running out of time. He is 256th on the money list, thanks to 14 missed cuts in 15 starts, and he wonders where someone in his position fits in the new schedule.

"From a player's standpoint, particularly the guys who aren't in the top 20 or top 30 in the world, they're nervous because they're worried that money is going to be taken out of their pockets," Maginnes said. "We have no idea what's going to happen."

One option for helping Greensboro would be making each exempt player enter every tournament at least once in a five-year span. For obvious reasons, that doesn't sit well with many of the stars of the tour.

"It's a very difficult thing to do, because for me, there's obligations I have in Europe, too," Garcia said. "It puts a lot of pressure on the player to try to get away from those to be able to play a different tournament here in the U.S.

"Probably not the best thing to do for the players."

For now, all Brazil can do is wait for the tour to decide on its plan for the future. He thinks he and other tournament officials have done all they can.

"I don't know where this thing stands," Brazil said. "I would think the PGA Tour is making some progress, but some slow progress. It's going to take some time. I'm sure they're doing the right things."

Champ Car cancels Korean event

Officials concede setback but remain optimistic about future

From wire reports

The Champ Car World Series called off its Grand Prix of Ansan, scheduled for Oct. 16 in South Korea, a blow for a series struggling to regain its place in the top echelon of racing.

But series executive vice president Joe Chrnelich said Wednesday that dropping the race, even two weeks before the race, is not a big setback for the American-based open-wheel series.

"At first blush it would appear to be a step backward, but what it really demonstrates is that we are going to do whatever it takes to ensure that every Champ Car race is a world-class event," he said. "It sends a message to our future promoter prospects that we will not settle for anything less than their best effort, which long term will make Champ Car even stronger."

A year ago, another race scheduled for Seoul, South Korea, also was called off two weeks before it was to be run. That race was organized by a different promoter, and Chrnelich said there is no comparison between the two canceled races.

"The situations are very, very different," he said. "It was a different location and a different set of dynamics. I can tell you in hindsight, it was much less far along than where we are this year."

The open-wheel series now will finish its 2005 season with races Oct. 23 in Queensland, Australia, and Nov. 6 in Mexico City. Chrnelich said the Ansan race will be held as part of the 2006 season.

Sebastien Bourdais, the reigning series champion and this year's points leader, said the loss of the race shouldn't make much difference to the competitors.

Champ Car, which in January 2004 bought the assets of the bankrupt CART organization, managed to get through that first season without losing any ground. This year, it has been doing well, adding successful street races in Edmonton, Alberta, and San Jose, Calif., generally improving attendance and TV ratings throughout the season and perking up the interest of some big-time sponsors.

Chrnelich insisted that putting off the inaugural race in Korea for yet another year is not a serious blow to Champ Car's resurgence.

Cleanup could take at least a year

More than half La. debris in N.O.

By James Varney and Jan Moller
Staff writers

It is not, officials handling the task frankly concede, the sexiest task in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. But someone's got to clean up.

And it will take a year. At least.

"Trash hauling may not sound that exciting, but it's very, very important," Coast Guard Vice Admiral Thad Allen, who heads the federal relief effort in those areas of Louisiana and Mississippi nearly annihilated by both Katrina and Hurricane Rita.

The scope of the cleanup is staggering, a job five times the size of that faced by the Miami area after Hurricane Andrew in 1992. The mess is so huge that local, state and federal agencies faced with it provided varying estimates of the amounts involved and a likely timetable. Allen estimated the hard-hit areas in the two states are cluttered with 40 million cubic yards of debris, two-thirds of it in Louisiana. So far, only 4 million cubic yards have been removed, with just 1 million of that total in Louisiana.

The target date to complete the job in Louisiana, officials said, is October 2006.

But state environmental officials said Thursday that it could take up to two years to clean up what they said were 22 million tons of debris Katrina left behind in southeast Louisiana. More than half of that total – 12 million tons – is in Orleans Parish, said Chuck Brown, assistant administrator for the state Department of Environmental Quality.

By comparison, state officials expect the total amount of debris left behind by Hurricane Rita to be a comparably modest 500,000 tons – or about 4 percent of the total amount in New Orleans alone.

Making a forceful first appearance as acting New Orleans police chief and attempting to deflect growing criticism of the New Orleans Police Department's behavior after Hurricane Katrina, acting Superintendent Warren Riley announced Thursday he has suspended four officers without pay and put more than a dozen others under investigation.

The investigations stem from a handful of events during which the officers were accused of looting, or failed to combat looting, Riley said. He declined to name the locations at which the officers' alleged activity or inaction occurred, except for the Sewell Cadillac Chevrolet dealership in the Central Business District.

BATON ROUGE — Gov. Kathleen Blanco brought a group of business, education and community leaders to the state Capitol on Thursday to seek their help as the state tries to recover from Hurricane Katrina.

The meeting came the day before New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin was to announce the composition of his commission on rebuilding the city, and some key figures that Nagin wanted on his team were drafted instead by the governor.

Blanco asked her new advisory group to assist her in bringing small and large businesses back to life in the storm-damaged areas, and she outlined a legislative package that she pitched Wednesday on Capitol Hill. After a meeting with the media, she met with the group behind closed doors.

Nagin is scheduled to announce his panel and his initiative to rebuild the city at a news conference today at 2:30 p.m. at the Sheraton Hotel. He is expected to name a core leadership team of about 14 people that will network with a large number of subcommittees with as many as 200 people.

The mayor has emphasized that the group will be balanced racially as well as by talent pool and areas of expertise.

The core group is expected to include Joe Canizaro, head of First Bank & Trust and one of the city's most prominent real estate

Roberts sworn in as chief justice

He becomes youngest in position since 1801

Jesse J. Holland
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON - John Roberts was sworn in as the 17th chief justice of the United States on Thursday, taking his oath at a White House ceremony attended by President Bush and other justices of the Supreme Court.

Bush said it was "a very meaningful event in the life of our nation," almost 19 years to the day since former Chief Justice William Rehnquist took his oath in the same room at the White House, the East Room.

The 50-year-old Roberts was sworn in a little more than three hours after he was confirmed by the Senate on a vote of 78-22. The oath was delivered by Justice John Paul Stevens, the court's senior member and acting chief justice since Rehnquist's death early this month.

"The Senate has confirmed a man with an astute mind and kind heart," Bush said. "All Americans can be confident that the 17th chief justice of the United States will be prudent in exercising judicial power, firm in defending judicial independence and above all a faithful guardian of the Constitution."

Roberts spoke briefly, saying the bipartisan vote for his nomination was "confirmation of what is for me a bedrock principle: that judging is different from politics."

He said he would try to "pass on to my children's generation a charter of self-government as strong and as vibrant as the one that Chief Justice Rehnquist passed on to us."

"What Daniel Webster termed the miracle of our Constitution is not something that happens in every generation, but every generation in its turn must accept the responsibility of supporting and defending the Constitution and bearing true faith and allegiance to it," Roberts said.

AP PHOTO

Supreme Court Chief Justice John Roberts takes the oath of office Thursday, administered by Justice John Paul Stevens as Roberts' wife, Jane Roberts, holds the Bible. Roberts was sworn in a little more than three hours after being confirmed by the Senate, 78-22.

"My vote today was cast on John Roberts' superior qualifications, his appreciation for the role of a justice and his expressed commitment to the rule of law and the Constitution," said Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., one of 22 Democrats who supported his nomination. "While his record of legal argument and opinion is not one that I would fully agree with, on balance, I believe that he is an appropriate choice to succeed Chief Justice Rehnquist."

Landrieu said she hopes that President Bush will look for a nominee to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor who shares her qualities of fairness.

"Throughout 24 years of service, Justice O'Connor has demonstrated her commitment to law over politics," Landrieu said. "I implore the president to look to her as the model for his next nominee."

"In today's vote we got back to the proper traditions of the Senate in terms of advice and consent with the proper sort of criteria and considerations," said Sen. David Vitter, R-La. who called Roberts a "highly qualified" nominee.

He expressed hope that a similar process will occur when Bush nominates a replacement for O'Connor.

The audience included Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and White House counsel Harriet Miers, both of whom have been mentioned as candidates for the Supreme Court seat of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Bush is expected to announce that nomination within days.

Roberts also took a separate oath during a private White House ceremony attended by the other justices and the chief justice's family.

A formal Supreme court ceremony was scheduled for Monday morning, before the opening of the term.

Roberts is the first new Supreme Court justice since 1994. Before becoming a federal judge, he was one of the nation's best appellate lawyers, arguing 39 cases — many in front of the same eight justices he will now lead as chief justice.

He won 25 of those cases.

Bush joined Roberts, former Sen. Fred Thompson and White House staff in the Roosevelt Room to watch the vote.

Under Roberts, justices this year will tackle issues such as assisted suicide, campaign finance law and abortion, with questions about religion, same-sex marriage, the government's war on terrorism and human cloning looming in the future.

Roberts has the potential of leading the Supreme Court for decades. Not since John Marshall, confirmed in 1801 at 45, has there been a younger chief justice.

Blessed - "ADJECTIVE: highly favored or fortunate; characterized by happiness and good fortune."

Prior to Hurricane Katrina, "blessed" was an often used word. Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.

Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. This is a very limited opportunity, and availability is restricted.

We have employment opportunities available in the Sales Department, including management availabilities.

We are committed to rebuilding Jefferson Parish and Southeast Louisiana. We need your support. Together, we will prevail and have a better place to live and work than before Hurricane Katrina.

As you read this, Ray Brandt Toyota, its employees and families, and the residents of Southeast Louisiana all have something in common; we are truly "blessed".

First FEMA trailer town to open Monday

Baker will be home for 580 families

By Laura Maggi
Capital Bureau

BATON ROUGE – The first of the state's trailer park communities for victims of Hurricane Katrina should be ready for families by Monday, state and federal officials said this week.

The complex of 580 small travel trailers will be set up in Baker, just north of Baton Rouge, said James McIntyre, a spokesman with the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The state will decide who should be moved to the trailers, which can hold up to five people, he said. A spokeswoman for the Department of Social Services indicated on Thursday that the first priority will be shelter residents, although she could not say exactly where they would be coming from.

There are 47,870 people in 345 shelters statewide, including 5,889 people in East Baton Rouge Parish.

While there are 108 families currently living in FEMA-supplied trailers across the state, this would be the first large community for Hurricane Katrina evacuees.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco's administration has been pushing for more of these communities to be set up across the state, with officials saying it is important to get people out of shelters and into more private living spaces. But the idea of placing large groups of people displaced by the storm into the complexes has been criticized by some housing experts, who say it would make more sense to get them into an apartment or house in established communities, even if out of state.

The state's first trailer community for Hurricane Katrina victims, in Baker, should be ready for families on Monday. It will include 580 small travel trailers.

In the past week, FEMA has established a rent program that will give each displaced family a lump sum of $2,358 to cover rent for three months. And people who can't move back to the New Orleans area because their homes were damaged could qualify for rental assistance for as long as 18 months.

State officials have said that they plan to make available a number of services to trailer communities to help assure that people can start to get their lives back together by getting a job or going to school.

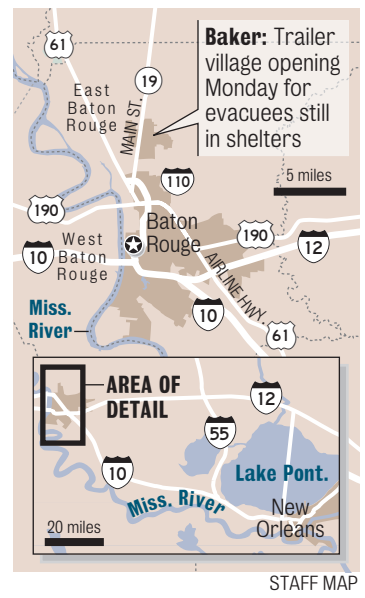
But rental assistance doesn't help when there is a scarcity of housing, as is the case in many communities.



Instead, the state is looking to solutions such as trailer communities to keep people in Louisiana while the infrastructure is rebuilt in New Orleans. Smaller sites are being established in the southeast part of the state, providing 393 travel trailers and mobile homes for evacuees, McIntyre said.

The travel trailers are relatively small at 22 feet wide by 30 feet long. In comparison, 274 mobile homes being installed in places like New Iberia and Pearl River are more spacious, having two or three bedrooms as well as communal spaces.

State officials have said that they plan to make available a number of services to trailer communities to help assure that people can start to get their lives back together by getting a job or going to school.

FEMA has also been in the process of signing contracts with hotels in New Orleans to provide up to 10,000 rooms, many of which would likely house workers needed to help with rebuilding of the city.

But McIntyre said that they have not yet signed those contracts because they are waiting to hear from city and state officials about who they want to be housed in those hotel rooms.

Investigators seeking reasons for levee breaches

By John McQuaid and Bob Marshall

As the Army Corps of Engineers begins an investigation into the causes of concrete floodwall breaches that swamped large portions of New Orleans during Hurricane Katrina, the stakes could not be higher.

If the failures are ultimately traced to flaws in design or construction, it would mean that a significant portion of Katrina's flooding could be blamed on human error. That could in turn spark a rush to hold individuals, institutions, and companies accountable; to file multibillion-dollar lawsuits from affected residents and businesses; and to make political recriminations.

Some Corps critics already are questioning whether the Corps – with its reputation and billions of dollars in financing on the line – has a conflict of interest in investigating itself.

"It will have no credibility. If I were the Corps of Engineers I wouldn't want the job. You would want to have the best and most independent analysis of something like this," said Steve Ellis, vice president for programs at Taxpayers for Common Sense, an advocacy group that has often criticized the Corps' big projects as wasteful.

Ivor van Heerden, the deputy director of the LSU Hurricane Center who is studying the levee breaches with other LSU scientists, says the Corps already has compromised some evidence with its temporary fixes and should not conduct a completely internal investigation. "That would be the worst thing they could do," he said.

Hurricane Katrina's storm surge overwhelmed hurricane levees to the east of the city and in the Industrial Canal. But further west along the south shore of Lake Pontchartrain, the floodwaters were lower. It's not clear whether the surge topped floodwalls in the 17th Street and London Avenue areas. If the walls were not topped but failed anyway, engineers say that could point to a problem in the design, construction or maintenance of the structures.

The only way to conclusively determine what happened is to conduct a forensic investigation, which involves collecting evidence and documents and making a detailed analysis of what led to the failures. The Corps has announced it's doing that, but has offered no details. Corps officials did not respond Thursday to requests for more information on the probe.

The investigation has been slow to start. Corps officials have been dealing with more urgent problems, such as pumping water out of the city and repairing the breaches. Some of those activities could pose problems for the investigation, LSU researchers say.

If levee walls were not topped but failed anyway, engineers say that could point to a problem in the design, construction or maintenance of the structures.

Temporary berms built by the Corps at the sites of levee breaks have covered, and may have destroyed, evidence crucial to the investigation, Van Heerden said.

"Some of the critical evidence to finding out what went wrong so we can make sure this doesn't happen again – evidence we saw on our first inspections – is under that berm, or it may already have been taken away," van Heerden said after inspecting the levee breaks this week. He said he has inspected the breaks 10 times since Katrina, including five trips on foot.

Engineers say such an investigation of the levee failures probably will try to reconstruct the history of the affected floodwalls from the choice of design through the construction process and the rise of Katrina's storm surge. That will entail examining documents, and the deployment of engineering experts in soil compaction, steel and concrete construction and fluid dynamics.

"It's a terribly interesting, difficult forensic enterprise," said Gerald Galloway, a professor of engineering at the University of Maryland and former Corps brigadier general. "They will need to look at all the remainder of the walls that were there, doing a complete analysis of everything that could have been a factor or compounding this ... They will build some hypotheses and test them. It's a question of patience."

Galloway, who chaired a commission that investigated the causes of the 1993 Midwest floods, said such an investigation might take six to eight months.

But critics say if the evidence points to human error, it may be difficult for the Corps to point the finger at itself or contractors it employed. The Corps and its contractors can be sued under the Federal Tort Claims Act, said Mark Dombroff, a Washington lawyer and former chief of the torts branch of the Justice Department who defended the Corps in court actions.

The Corps also has often been criticized by a number of impartial government studies for tweaking the numbers in economic impact studies to facilitate its projects.

"They found the corps manipulated data, used outdated engineering and economic tools, and one colonel ordered a subordinate to change a number he didn't like," said Scott Faber, a lawyer with the group Environmental Defense, who monitors the Corps. "There is no doubt in my mind that the Corps will not find itself at all responsible for the failure of the levees. It is ludicrous for the administration or Congress to expect the agency to review its own conduct."

The Corps may not be completely alone.

Already, a number of investigations are under way, but it's not clear how detailed some will be. A House select committee on the Katrina disasters intends to investigate the breaches, a spokesman said. The Senate Homeland Security Committee will dispatch investigators to the city next week to examine the levee breaches and other issues. The American Society of Civil Engineers is assembling a team of forensic experts to inspect the affected sites.

Faber said that congressional committees – whose members may have Corps projects in their districts – may also be reluctant to make the agency look bad.

"This investigation should include the Corps, but it also must be totally independent to ensure there is accountability but also public acceptance for whatever it discovers and recommends," van Heerden said.

Schools are blue despite winning academic honor

4 win recognition for excellence

By Mark Waller
East Jefferson bureau

In normal times, news of a school winning a Blue Ribbon award from the U.S. Department of Education would set off a celebration. Everyone would wear blue, eat blue snowballs and decorate the halls with blue streamers.

Instead, when the federal government announced last week that St. Clement of Rome in Metairie was one of four New Orleans area schools to receive the 2005 honor, Principal Susan Perry was the only person around, and the scene was far from normal.

Perry visited the deserted campus Friday to see if Hurricane Rita's wind and rain added more damage to Hurricane Katrina's fallout. Water from the first storm had rendered unusable the Catholic school's kindergarten-through-third-grade building and a pre-kindergarten building.

"I happened to be at the school and the phone rang, and it was the Department of Education," she said Thursday. "Here I am alone at St. Clement, and I can't even tell anybody."

Christian Brothers School, Edna Karr School and Stuart Hall School, all in New Orleans and, like St. Clement, all closed since Katrina, also won the honor.

In total, 295 U.S. schools won the award this year.

The Blue Ribbon program recognizes schools for showing strong improvement in the achievement of disadvantaged students, scoring in the top 10 percent on state tests regardless of students' backgrounds in public schools or scoring in the top 10 percent on national tests in private schools.

"Our hearts and thoughts go out to the students and educators at these schools," Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said in a statement commending the storm-disrupted winners.open Monday, using its library, music room and other spaces for displaced classes.

It was unclear Thursday when Edna Karr, a public magnet school in Algiers, would reopen, but Orleans Parish school officials have said some Algiers schools could return in November.

Christian Brothers, a Catholic school run by a religious order at a campus in City Park, will operate beginning next week at Archbishop Rummel High School in Metairie, said the Rev. William Maestri, superintendent of Archdiocese of New Orleans schools.

He said it is still unknown when Christian Brothers and Stuart Hall, an archdiocese-affiliated school on Carrollton Avenue, will reopen at their home addresses. Maestri said he didn't know the status of the Christian Brothers campus. Some floodwater invaded Stuart Hall, but the school does not appear to have structural damage, he said.

Also at Rummel next week, the archdiocese will launch a transitional, afternoon school for students displaced from any Catholic school. Archbishop Chapelle High School in Metairie had planned a second shift of displaced students, too, but instead it will absorb the students into its regular student body, maintaining its all-girls status for now, Maestri said.

When the Blue Ribbon-winning schools finally come back, Maestri said, they will celebrate their accomplishment.

Without the hurricanes, the celebration likely would have been livelier at St. Clement a week ago, when Perry visited the campus after sending administrators home for the day because of Rita.

"We'd probably be putting signs and blue ribbons all over the place," she said. "We probably would have worn blue for the day. Maybe we would've had blue food."

After St. Clement reopens Monday, Perry said, it will be able to celebrate — with a little help.

Perry said she received an electronic mail from a principal of a Catholic school in North Carolina offering to send 500 blue ribbons.

"I cried, and I e-mailed her back," Perry said.

B.R. to N.O. commuter train proposed

Plan aims to help get residents back to work

By Matt Scallan
Staff writer

A group of rail and mass transit organizations hopes to begin twice-daily rail service between Baton Rouge and New Orleans.

The proposal, which involves asking the Federal Emergency Management Agency to subsidize the service to the tune of at least $25 million over three years, is intended to allow New Orleans residents who have relocated to Baton Rouge to get back to work, as well as ease gridlock on Interstate 10, said Cleo Allen, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Transportation and Development.

"We believe that this is a way to help the people from New Orleans who moved to Baton Rouge get back to work while the housing situation works itself out," Allen said.

An estimated 200,000 New Orleans area residents have moved to the Baton Rouge area since Aug. 29, when Hurricane Katrina caused massive damage to tens of thousands of homes. Many people lost their cars in the storm, as well.

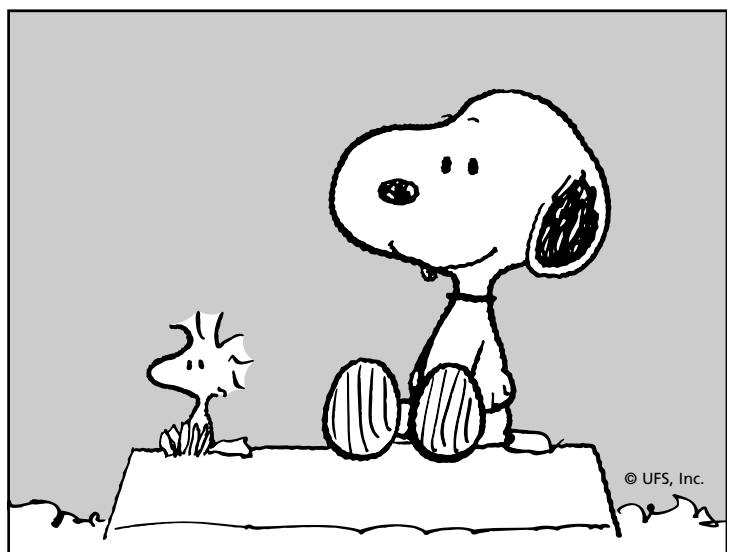
The initial plan involves running two commuter trains per day between the cities, starting at the Kansas City Southern rail depot near Memorial Stadium in Baton Rouge and running to the Union Passenger Terminal in downtown New Orleans, Allen said.

Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita damaged some of the track that runs across the LaBranche Wetlands in St. Charles Parish, but railroad officials say repairs should be finished soon.

The group making the proposal includes Regional Transit Authority of New Orleans; Amtrak; the Capital Area Transit System, which operates the bus system in Baton Rouge; the KCS railroad; and the Department of Transportation and Development. RTA spokeswoman Rosiland Blanco Cook said the agency is "very interested" in the concept and has been holding discussions with all parties.

Dwight Brashear, director of Capital Area Transit, said the idea is "a great opportunity to provide a needed service."

Ridership has risen 30 percent on the Baton Rouge bus system since Katrina.



Allen said the trains could be scheduled around scheduled freight runs on existing tracks. The RTA and Capital Area Transit would reroute buses to bring passengers to the terminals.

"This is something that we could put into place very quickly," she said.

Each train would have a capacity of 600 passengers.

Amtrak spokesman Marc Magliari said the railroad has been involved in discussions about the idea and is interested in helping the area.

Allen said stops in Gonzales and Reserve are being considered.

Energy bill has some hurdles

More coasts could open to oil drilling

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON – Energy legislation that would give Louisiana and other coastal states a 50 percent share of federal off-shore oil and gas royalty payments could pass the House as early as next week, but several controversial provisions could doom the bill's chances in the Senate.

The legislative package, prompted by rising gasoline prices and spot shortages caused by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, would open the Florida and California coasts to oil drilling, although the two states would have to approve exploration before it could begin. The bill also would authorize development of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska, a proposal that continues to garner intense opposition from environmentalists.

Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, said the revenue-sharing provisions could ensure Louisiana has the resources to stem the continued destruction of the state's coastline and wetlands – which the Louisiana congressional delegation cite as a significant factors in the level of devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina. Barrier islands and wetlands absorb some of the force of storms as they come ashore.

The revenue-sharing provision would generate more than a $1 billion a year for the state, far more generous than an earlier energy bill that would produce $135 million annually for the state from 2007 through 2010. Bush signed that bill into law last summer.

The new energy legislation, which has been put on the fast track by House GOP leaders, would ease environmental regulations, including provisions that require refineries and coal-fired power plants to install new anti-pollution equipment when they expand or upgrade operations.

In addition, the bill gives the federal government more say over the location of refineries and pipelines, limiting the regulatory authority of states and local governments. It would also roll back some Clean Air Act standards that require communities with high ozone levels to use specially formulated gasoline that causes less pollution.

The bill cleared two House committees this week.

"There can be only one explanation for this rush to markup and then to the floor, and it is the desire of the Republican leadership of the House to use the hardships and devastation of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita to push various parts of their agenda," Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., said. "But poorly thought out and poorly vetted efforts to pass industrial and ideological wish lists are not the way to respond to the actual energy issues raised by Katrina."

Supporters said the recent hurricanes show how vulnerable the United States is for relying primarily on one region for its domestic oil and gas resources. Jindal said he senses the recent spike in gasoline prices, along with spot shortages attributed to Katrina and Rita, has made members of Congress more receptive to expanded drilling options.

Jindal said he would hope that opponents of expanded drilling in the Senate would not filibuster the bill, given that states retain their ability to veto any new gas and oil exploration off their shores.

Rep. Jim Gibbons, R-Nev., said that the first energy bill, adopted in July, was a good first step but that the oil and gas distribution problems associated with Hurricanes Katrina and Rita demonstrate more changes are needed.

"The recent hurricanes in the Gulf Coast underscore just how precious our limited refining and production efforts are," Gibbons said. "It is time to act responsibility and allow our nation to meet its energy needs."

Bush gets better marks for Rita response

Polls show jump over post-Katrina numbers

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – Different storm, different results for President Bush.

A poll released Thursday found the president is getting much better marks from the public for his handling of the response to Hurricane Rita than he did for Katrina late last month.

Katrina swept through Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana in late August. The Bush administration and state and local officials have been criticized for a sluggish response.

Seventy percent of respondents said they approve of Bush's response to Rita, while 22 percent disapprove, a CNN-USA Today-Gallup poll found. Only 40 percent said they approve of his handling of Katrina, while 54 percent said they disapprove.

Bush's overall job approval, which has hovered at about 40 percent in various polls taken in the middle of September, rose slightly, from 40 percent to 45 percent, in the CNN-USA Today-Gallup poll and from 41 percent to 45 percent in a Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll also released Thursday.

The Gallup poll of 1,007 adults was conducted Sept. 26 to 28, and the Fox News poll of 900 registered voters was conducted Sept. 27 and 28. Both polls have a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

REELING FROM RITA

Rita's floodwaters remain formidable Thursday in lower Lafitte, even to this lone dog.

Inundated by Hurricane Rita last week, the low-lying town of Lafitte, on Bayou Barataria, remains submerged in some areas, but is emerging in others. Though the waters linger, residents are working to save their belongings — and gather the remainders of their swamped lives.

Staff photos by Michael DeMocker

Ronald Christian, 12, paddles his pirogue through floodwaters as his dog, Gigi, serves as a lookout.

Shrimper Norman Bouisse manages to salvage some family photographs Thursday from his home in lower Lafitte, which Hurricane Rita flooded with more than four feet of water. He will be living on his shrimp boat for the foreseeable future, but says, 'I still got my life.'

Many lower Lafitte residents were removing belongings from their flooded homes Thursday.

Floodwaters push up a casket Thursday on Cemetery Street. Rita's water and wind disturbed or displaced many of lower Lafitte's dead.

Many voices should be heard in rebuilding, coalition agrees

Hope is for better jobs, schools, homes

By Susan Finch
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Ordinary New Orleanians, not just politicians and planners, should have a voice in shaping the future of their hurricane-ravaged city, members of a budding coalition of New Orleans social service, civic, political and other organizations agreed here Thursday.

"We can't continue to have a city which is run by patronage and special interests," Keith Hardy, president of the Preservation Resource Center neighborhood council, told the Rebuild Louisiana/New Orleans session. Too often, Hardy said, city leaders "go around the law and make provisos."

What's important, one after another speaker argued, is to focus on rebuilding the city in ways that offer returning New Orleanians better jobs, schools and neighborhoods than they had before the storm.

Baton Rouge resident Kurt Hellmann, who formerly worked with the National Association of Manufacturers, was one of the few, if not the only, non-New Orleans residents at the meeting.

Expanding the city's job market, he said, will make residents less vulnerable the next time hurricanes threatens: "Number one, they'll have jobs, and number two, they'll have cars (in which) they can get their families out of the city," he said.

Several speakers advised that residents be asked what they want and need. "What about the public housing residents?" one man asked. "Is their housing going to be knocked down? We should be in New Orleans talking about rebuilding."

A Lower Ninth Ward woman who said several relatives suffered greatly in Katrina called for concentrating the rebuilding effort on "the people who needed the jobs pre-Katrina, the people who needed the homes pre-Katrina."

Ron McClain, president of the Family Service of Greater New Orleans, said he wonders what kind of reception will be accorded returning New Orleanians who, unable to afford living in the city, settle in neighboring parishes.

"We can't continue to have a city which is run by patronage and special interests."
KEITH HARDY
President of the Preservation Resource Center neighborhood council

That some New Orleans evacuees who fled the city on foot after Katrina were stopped just outside the city by armed police makes those concerns real, he said.

Meteorologists plead for more research money

Increase in storms prompts call for action

By John Pain
Associated Press writer

MIAMI — Hurricanes are barreling across the Atlantic Ocean with greater frequency, a trend expected to continue for at least the next decade. But some meteorologists worry that federal spending on storm research is not keeping up.

The federal Hurricane Research Division has a staff of about 30 scientists, down from about 50 in the 1980s. It has an annual budget of $5.1 million, a nearly 60 percent increase since 1998. But some researchers say they need more money _ perhaps a budget of $10 million _ to hire more staff and modernize equipment.

"We aren't talking about a whole lot of money," said Hugh Willoughby, a researcher at the division from 1975 to 1996 and its director from 1996 to 2002.

The division's work helps meteorologists at the National Hurricane Center forecast a storm's track and intensity. The research division is part of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, which decides how much money it gets from NOAA's budget.

NOAA's budget director, Steve Gallagher, denied that the research division is under funded. He said financing is reviewed every year but that the agency will take a harder look at research spending because of Hurricane Katrina.

He also pointed out that the federal government is not alone in doing hurricane research. Universities and private companies also are making important advances.

NOAA's budget grew to an estimated $3.83 billion this year from $3.44 billion in 2004. The agency's budget is supposed to drop to an estimated $3.78 billion next year, but Gallagher said the research division should not see any cuts.

An increase in the research division budget would allow the hiring of more workers to analyze the mountains of data gathered by aircraft that fly through hurricanes and to improve computer models that predict hurricane movement and strength, said Michael Black, a meteorologist and union steward at the division who has pushed for extra money.

A bigger budget also would provide money to replace aging radar and hurricane hunter planes, some of which were built in the 1970s and '80s, he said.

Cost to repair state's ports, roads, bridges could soar

Rita added to damage in state

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Repairs to the state's highways, ports and bridges will cost significantly more than the $31.7 billion previously estimated, state Department of Transportation and Development officials said Thursday.

Department Communications Director Mark Lambert said agency officials do not have a new figure but said there has been more damage found in the New Orleans area from Hurricane Katrina, and damage from Hurricane Rita has not been factored in because crews still are assessing the impact.

"We know the figures will go up" from original Katrina assessments, Lambert said. "We are not certain how high up they will go. We know we also suffered a significant amount of damage from Hurricane Rita."

Lambert said there has been damage to roads and bridges as far north as Vernon Parish on the Louisiana-Texas border as a result of Rita. He added that Rita also washed out half of the roadway along sections of Louisiana 82 from Pecan Island to the Texas border.

Since the documents were submitted to congressional leaders last week estimating the $31.7 billion in damages, Lambert said, crews have taken more detailed looks at roads, bridges and other infrastructure in the New Orleans area and discovered "some damages we were not aware of" — such as possible deeper roadbed damage caused by floodwaters along southeast Louisiana highways that went undetected originally.

When the request was drafted, Department Secretary Johnny Bradberry estimated the state needed $20.2 billion to improve flood protection; $7 billion to replace roads and bridges and repair ports and airports; and $4.5 billion to improve evacuation routes in the future.

Based on the $31.7 billion figure, these are the preliminary estimates of the costs of some of the major items DOTD is asking to finance with federal dollars:

▶ $2.8 billion for levee repairs and debris cleanup including shoring up weak spots in the levee systems in the New Orleans area.

▶ $20 billion to "complete and improve coastal Louisiana levee systems" to withstand a Category 5 hurricane from Morgan City to Slidell.

▶ $200 million to repair and improve the pumping capacity of the New Orleans area to include "waterproofing the equipment and providing backup power" since many of the pumps were under water or failed during the most recent two hurricanes.

▶ $1.5 billion for repairs to interstates and roads financed by the federal government, including replacement of the I-10 twin span linking St. Tammany and Orleans parishes, estimated to cost at least $500 million. The present four-lane span is being temporarily repaired, but the agency is seeking money to build a new six-lane span.

▶ $775 million for repairs to rural roads and bridges not normally funded by the federal government.

▶ $80 million for damages to the Port of New Orleans, the Greater Lafourche Port, the Port of St. Bernard, the Plaquemines Parish Port and the Port of South Louisiana.

▶ $275 million to repair the airports of the state, including $127 million for New Orleans' Louis Armstrong International Airport and $32 million to expand the Baton Rouge Metro Airport to handle increased traffic.

▶ $450 million for repairs to the rail service to New Orleans and for the New Orleans Public Belt Railroad equipment and tracks damaged by the hurricanes.

▶ $25 million for a three-year program to operate two 600-passenger trains between New Orleans and Baton Rouge to "provide transportation daily for displaced evacuees to commute to their jobs from the greater Baton Rouge area while their homes are rebuilt in the greater New Orleans area."

▶ $770 million to repair public transit infrastructure, facilities and equipment.

▶ $1.7 billion to repair damages to the "federal navigation system" including repairs to locks, removing sunken vessels and fixing navigation aids.

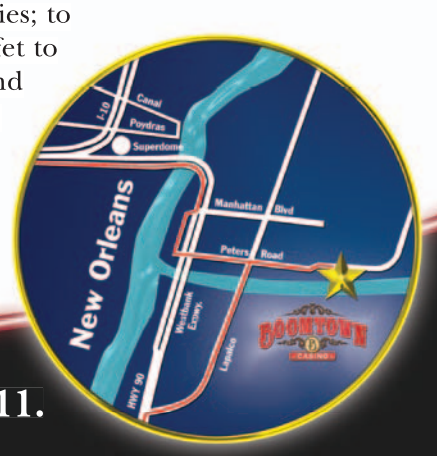
▶ $120 million to replace the Leeville Bridge on Louisiana 1 and $15 million to replace the Caminada Bay Bridge near Grand Isle.

▶ $176 million for Baton Rouge traffic control to handle the sudden population explosion of at least 50,000 New Orleans area residents in the area.

▶ $650 million for widening of the I-10 and I-12 in Baton Rouge to handle increased traffic and for future evacuations.

▶ $550 million to build I-10 and I-610 at a higher level to avert flooding.

▶ $400 million to widen I-10 from I-310 to La. 22 as an evacuation route, and widening of the 11-mile bridge over the Bonnet Carre Spillway.



▶ $50 million to replace the Belle Chasse Tunnel in Plaquemines Parish with a "midlevel bridge." The tunnel flooded during the hurricanes.

▶ $1.575 billion for an elevated U.S. 90 – the future corridor of I-49 south – from the Westbank Expressway to Raceland.

▶ $475 million for improvements to highways on the north shore, including $75 million to widen I-12 from Louisiana 447 to I-55; $150 million to widen I-12 from I-55 to Louisiana 21; $150 million to widen I-12 from Louisiana 21 to the I-10/I-59 intersection; and $100 million to widen U.S. 190 from the Lake Pontchartrain Causeway to U.S. Highway 11.

Second Jefferson staffer subpoenaed

Nigerian deal focus of probe

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — The chief of staff for Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, has been called to testify before the federal grand jury conducting a criminal probe involving the eight-term congressman.

Nicole Venable is the second Jefferson congressional staffer to be subpoenaed by the grand jury meeting in northern Virginia. Angelle Kwemo, a legislative aide hired this summer in Jefferson's Washington office, was subpoenaed to testify two weeks ago.

According to those familiar with the yearlong probe, federal investigators are focusing on a telecommunications deal Jefferson was attempting to broker in Nigeria for a U.S. firm, iGate Corp. The FBI raided Jefferson's home Aug. 4 and, according to published reports, removed a substantial amount of cash.

Authorities also searched the Maryland home of Nigerian Vice President Atiku Abubakar, seeking information related to Jefferson's business dealings.

Jefferson has said he is cooperating with the investigation. The Nigerian press has reported that the FBI took correspondence between Jefferson and Nigerian officials, a calendar and other documents when it raided the Maryland house owned by Abubakar's wife.

At a news conference last week, FBI Director Robert Mueller declined to discuss the Jefferson case. But he said that damage to the first two floors of the agency's building in New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina had not harmed evidence in any ongoing investigations.

"I would say Katrina has not substantially impacted our ability to conduct any investigation," Mueller said.

HUD grants being used to rebuild Mississippi

Housing top need in Pascagoula

By The Associated Press

PASCAGOULA, MISS. — The cities of Pascagoula and Moss Point will use annual grants from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development to address infrastructure, housing and public safety projects in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

The Community Development Block Grants are administered annually through HUD. Both cities will use those grants and other funding sources to help rebuild their communities.

Federal assessment teams visited both cities this week to get an idea of how the agency's money will be spent over the next fiscal year.

"They're being kind enough to come down and see for themselves the destruction Katrina brought to the Pascagoula-Moss Point area," Pascagoula Community Development Director Betty Bensey said.

In addition to preapproved funding, both cities will get additional funding from the federal government, officials said.

Bensey said the nearly $1 million in Pascagoula could be applied to creating new neighborhoods and help qualified residents go from temporary housing to permanent homeownership.

Building a new senior center to replace one that was heavily flooded will also be on Pascagoula's wish list, in addition to some smaller projects, Bensey said.

Moss Point Mayor Xavier Bishop said the nearly $750,000 the city will receive will go toward building a new fire station and road and infrastructure projects, all of which were in the works before Katrina. Addressing housing will also be a priority, he said.

"The need for housing has changed dramatically since the storm. We still don't have our arms around the magnitude of that problem. We're gonna take a step back ... and see what all our needs are," Bishop said.

Bus company no stranger to complaints

Disrepair, gas smell had been reported

By Matt Curry
Associated Press writer

DALLAS – The company whose bus caught fire last week, killing 23 nursing-home patients fleeing Hurricane Rita, was the subject of complaints by three people in 2002 who said its vehicles reeked of fuel and were in disrepair, according to Texas records.

The complaints against Global Tours and Charters, now Global Limo Inc., preceded a state investigation that found several violations, including a failure to keep records of vehicle inspections and maintenance.

The state told the company to comply with regulations but did not impose any penalties against it, according to records released Wednesday by the Texas Department of Public Safety. A month after the 2002 review, Global owner James Maples told the state Transportation Department he had made the necessary changes.

On Sept. 23, a group of 37 nursing home residents was being moved from the Houston area because of Rita's approach when their Global bus caught fire while struck in traffic near Dallas. A series of explosions, believed to be the results of medical oxygen canisters igniting, fueled the flames and trapped most of the occupants.

Investigators have said the fire could have been caused by mechanical problems, possibly involving the brakes.

The bus had been pressed into service to carry residents of the Brighton Gardens nursing home out of Rita's path. It had gone out of service in July after its registration expired but was allowed back on the road because of a waiver signed by Gov. Rick Perry to aid relief efforts.

The National Transportation Safety Board is investigating the cause of the tragedy. Since the explosion, the Transportation Department has issued an advisory to the bus industry about the safe transport of oxygen containers.

No one answered the phone at the bus company's offices Thursday morning. Mark Cooper, an attorney for Global, did not immediately return calls.

One of the 2002 complaints was written by Donald Spotts of Weslaco, Texas, and sent to the Texas attorney general and other state officials. Spotts wrote that there was a "very strong odor of diesel fumes" on a Global bus that was carrying 48 senior citizens from Weslaco to Corpus Christi, Texas. Many of the passengers were coughing and wheezing both ways on the 320-mile round trip, he wrote.

In another complaint, a man named Ross Gunning claimed that one of Global's buses was "swaying all over the road." Another complainant identified as Sara Martinez wrote that most of the company's buses had oil and air leaks.

A 2002 state inspection found several violations, including failure to implement an alcohol or drug testing program, failure to retain inspection and maintenance records for the proper period of time and failure to retain evidence of a brake inspector's qualifications.

According to federal records, drivers for Global Limo were ordered to stop driving five times in the past three years, mostly for infractions regarding bus logs. In 2004, the company was rated as "satisfactory," with no evidence of major safety problems in recent years, records show.

The driver of the bus that caught fire before Rita, Juan Robles Gutierrez, 37, was arrested Tuesday and jailed on immigration charges, the Houston Chronicle reported Thursday. Gutierrez is from Mexico.

remained empty and unattended. Formerly busy commercial corridors remained desolate strands of debris boarded with plywood. In the short term, New Orleans' consumer economy will be based mostly in East Jefferson or on the West Bank.

While utility crews worked feverishly to get the electricity on in the neighborhoods being reopened, a number of areas are likely to be without power. Water on the east bank of New Orleans remains undrinkable, and some residents might discover their water service has been turned off because of damaged pipes.

Residents who live in the reopened zip codes can enter the city at 8 a.m. Residents will need a driver's license or utility bill to prove they live in one of the specified ZIP codes, while business owners must show a business license or card. No special credentials are required.

"This is somewhat of an honor system. We are asking people to stay in those ZIP codes and be conscious of the fact that other areas of the city are not ready for re-entry," said Sally Forman, a spokesperson for Mayor Ray Nagin.

Nagin toured the city Thursday on the eve of its reopening, saying that Algiers businesses are bouncing back and he expects the same on the east bank "once we can get a few businesses open."

Some residents will no doubt arrive with plans to stay, while others want to take a look at their homes before deciding.

"We're probably going to stay in Metairie until we can get the house cleaned up," said Uptown resident John Mullen, who stopped in the CVS at Prytania and Upperline streets with his wife, Lori, and their three children.

The Mullens had evacuated to Little Rock, Ark., and Lori Mullen said she was considering taking her children back there.

As one CVS employee said moments before the family walked in, "you can't bring your kids back to this." Residents were "traveling back and forth," he said, "but they can't live here."

The drugstore was using generator power to open from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. "We anticipate people coming in," the manager said. "But if there's no power and the water's not safe, people won't stay."

The Walgreens on Tchoupitoulas Street Uptown is open and was crowded with customers.

Grocery stores, many of which had looting damage, were struggling to replace inventories, clean up and dispose of spoilage. Some stores expect to reopen within the next week, while workers at others, such as the Whole Foods Market on Magazine Street Uptown, said they could be closed up to another month. Marla Hubble, store director of the Winn-Dixie at the Riverside Market, said she hoped to open by Thursday, barring any further disasters.

The Winn-Dixie at Toledano Street and Claiborne Avenue was closed, its doors broken and its interior dark. The parking lot outside was ghostly, and a hearse was parked on the neutral ground out front.

Workers were busy cleaning Uptown institution Langenstein's at Pitt and Arabella streets, but co-owner Michael Lanaux said the grocery store won't be open for another 10 to 14 days. "I think a lot of businesses will see things get back to normal close to the Christmas holidays," he said.

Until that time, Lanaux said, business owners should be happy to get half of their previous customer base back.

Sav-A-Center on Royal Street in the French Quarter is expected to open Saturday morning, said Glen Dickson, the company's regional vice president of operations. The chain hopes to open the Sav-A-Center on Tchoupitoulas Street by Thursday and perhaps as early as Wednesday night, Dickson said. Oct. 8 is the targeted opening day for the A&P Sav-A-Center on Magazine Street, he said.

Dickson said all of his stores in Orleans Parish are facing staffing shortages and in the process of hiring part-time and full-time employees. He said the Uptown stores on Tchoupitoulas and Magazine streets suffered extensive looting and had to replace 250 to 300 shopping carts that were stolen.

At 6000 Magazine Street, Clement Hardware opened Thursday at 10:30 a.m. Owner Leon Clement said the store had been looted, “but all they took was batteries.” His shelves were stocked, but he ordered brooms, mops and buckets. “I know what people need,” he said.

Across the street, Uptown Shell owner Mark McAdams said he has gas, power and a plan to open today. The Tchoup Shop gas station wasn’t so lucky. Manager Jerry Butler said he needed power to open. “They told us three days ago, three days ago,” he said.

The Lee Circle Shell station at 919 St. Charles Ave. was selling only “Plus” fuel on Thursday, at $3.11 per gallon.

Hibernia vice president Kyle Waters waved from the open door of the bank branch on St. Charles Avenue, which was open from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. The branch’s ATM is working, and Waters said the branch is offering basic banking services, including small-business loans.

“I just made a payment on my loans,” said Metairie resident Wayne Zeringue, who visited the branch with his wife.

Other banks referred customers to Metairie branches.

At 4924 Poydras St., David Bergeron was waiting for a shipment so he could open his Creole Creamery. The store had been clean for more than a week, his power had just been restored, and he was waiting for product.

“When word gets out that people can get ice cream, that will be a good day,” he said.

On the West Bank, lunch business boomed at Dry Dock Café in Algiers Point, where owner Maureen Pignona said she hoped an influx of residents, coupled with the dearth of other open shops, would bring more customers to her restaurant. “Yeah, I think it will be great for business,” she said.

The crowd was upbeat despite waits of up to a half-hour. Jim Ballard, 75, with beer in hand, was grateful that the establishment reopened about two weeks ago.

developers; Barbara Major, executive director of the St. Thomas Health Clinic; Dan Packer, head of the local power company Entergy New Orleans; Alden McDonald, chief executive of Liberty Bank; Donald “Boysie” Bollinger, head of Bollinger Shipyards; Scott Cowen, Tulane University president; and Jimmy Reiss, a New Orleans businessman who is the chief of the city’s Regional Transit Authority.

Canizaro and Major helped lead a broad-based community effort that combined the Committee for a Better New Orleans with the Metropolitan Area Committee. The groups produced a Blueprint for a Better New Orleans in 2001 and asked the mayoral candidates at the time to adopt its strategy.

Nagin has implemented some of its recommendations, and his new initiative for a post-Katrina recovery was based in part by the methods used to create the blueprint report, according to people familiar with the mayor’s plan.

Canizaro and Bollinger are both Republicans with strong ties to the White House. Canizaro said he has not talked with President Bush since the storm hit Aug. 29 but has had conversations with White House staff and hopes his connections will be useful to the community. The federal government will be providing the lion’s share of money to rebuild the city.

The governor’s group includes Xavier University Chancellor Norman Francis and University of New Orleans Chancellor Tim Ryan, both of whom served as top leaders of the Committee for a Better New Orleans with the Metropolitan Area Committee program. Francis said he was asked by Nagin to join his team but had to decline because he had already been asked by the governor and did not have enough time for both initiatives.

Francis also is occupied getting Xavier back up and running by January.

The group attending the governor’s meeting included Audubon Nature Institute chief Ron Forman; Whitney Bank chief executive King Milling; state Sen. Walter Boasso, R-Arabi; and north Louisiana businessman James Davison.

IMPORTANT NEWS ABOUT COX SERVICE

Hurricane Katrina caused unprecedented damage to Cox Communications’ network and system. Cox realized significant damage in all areas of all parishes, but damage was highest in areas where the flooding and destruction were the worst. Large areas of our Orleans and St. Bernard systems realized extensive damage that will potentially take significant time to rebuild.

We have made significant progress and services are almost fully restored in those western areas that were least affected. If you live in St. Charles or Jefferson Parish and are not yet receiving Cox services, it may be due to several factors: a downed utility pole, a downed cable line between your pole or pedestal and your home, or a lack of electricity at a key point in the system. We currently have hundreds of crews working across the entire metro-area to restore service as quickly as possible. These crews are going street to street to repair these individual lines and problems.

Cox has been committed to the New Orleans area for over 25 years and is committed to the next 25 years and beyond. We will rebuild our system better than before.

We thank you for your patience and look forward to providing you service as we rebuild Greater New Orleans together.

Jeff stores may be closest

RETURN, from A-14

"I helped them myself get back in action a couple of weeks ago," Ballard said. "This place is like family."

At the nearby Tout de Suite coffee shop and restaurant, Algiers resident Bruce Elliott said the business, which reopened Sept. 21, was a safe haven and a piece of home.

"We are a close community, and we look out for each other," he said. "It's been amazing, but I'm not really surprised," Elliott said.

Owner Jill Marshall was skeptical about business prospects for her small shop, but predicted a sales surge for the supermarkets and big-box stores on the West Bank.

Uptown residents heading west on Jefferson Highway in search of goods will have to drive four miles before they reach an open supermarket, passing a Winn-Dixie set to open Saturday and a Wal-Mart that doesn't expect to open at least until Oct. 10.

Huge bundles of flattened cardboard in front of the doorway sent potential Wal-Mart shoppers away with the spray-painted message: "STORE CLOSED."

"We have absolutely nothing fresh or cold or frozen at all," supervisor Jason Bain said as he pressure-washed carts in the parking lot.

Workers at other open stores just inside the Jefferson Parish line from New Orleans said they expect a whirlwind of shoppers from the Uptown and Carrollton neighborhoods on top of the Jefferson Parish crowds they've already witnessed.

"With Winn-Dixie closed and Wal-Mart closed, we're it over here, so we've been really, really busy," said Sheila Fortier, manager of Rite Aid at 4115 Jefferson Highway, where beer, milk and ice have been flying out the door.

Residents looking to escape the drudgery for a little while can kick up their heels at Cooter Brown's, the Uptown landmark at the corner of St. Charles and Carrollton avenues. Owner Larry Berestitzky said the store received little damage from the two storms and that he hopes to open the bar today with a limited menu in the kitchen.

Berestitzky said the bar is fully stocked and its extensive satellite television system is operable. He plans to have a full slate of football this weekend, including the LSU-Mississippi State game and Saints-Bills game.

"We're ready to go," Berestitzky said. "There might not be a lot of people around but there's thousands of military, law enforcement and relief workers that need a place to go. Tell everyone to come on in."

TIPS FOR GOING HOME

City cautions returning residents about health, safety risks

URBAN HAZARDS

▶ You are entering at your own risk. New Orleans remains a hazardous site and ongoing health and safety issues are being assessed. The city of New Orleans is still undergoing testing and recommends that you take great caution before entering the city and your premises, whether business or residential.

▶ Police and fire services are limited. For police, fire and other emergencies call (504) 552-4830.

▶ Traffic lights are out throughout the city. Observe a citywide speed limit of 35 mph, even if the posted limit is faster, and treat all intersections as four-way stops Some roads may be blocked. Proceed with extreme caution, especially around downed power lines. Report any down power lines directly to ENTERGY, (800) 368-3749 (800-ENTERGY).

▶ You are not permitted to go beyond your designated ZIP code area; travel within your ZIP code area only when absolutely necessary.

▶ The sewerage system has been compromised. Except for Algiers, do not drink, bathe in or wash your hands in tap water. Use bottled water for all personal needs until further notice. You may flush toilets.

▶ Standing water and soil may be seriously contaminated. If you come in contact with standing water and material or supplies compromised by floodwater, wash with soap and clean water as soon as possible. Limit your exposure to airborne mold and use gloves, masks and other protective materials.

▶ Apply mosquito repellent and sunscreen. The use of waterless, alcohol-based hand sanitizing rubs is also recommended.

▶ Food and water will not be available. Bring sufficient food, water, gas and any medical supplies required to sustain you and your family, keeping in mind the curfew and store inventories may limit access to supplies. Gas stations are not fully operational. Fuel is limited.

▶ To avoid carbon monoxide poisoning, do not use gasoline or diesel generators, equipment or grills indoors. Opening doors and windows or using fans will not prevent carbon monoxide build-up. Do not connect electrical power generators to the electrical panel of your home or business.

▶ You are at your own risk to determine whether your home or business is structurally sound enough to enter. Use extra care when navigating upper floors and attic space.

WEATHERING THE STORM CLEANUP

Debris and refuse removal

▶ Exercise caution. Steel-toed boots, work gloves and goggles or safety glasses are recommended when working around debris.

▶ Open all windows when entering a building. If you smell natural gas or hear the sound of escaping gas, leave the premises and contact Entergy immediately at (800) 368-3749 or (800) 968-8243.

▶ Avoid creating any source of ignition. If you start to feel sick, dizzy or weak, get to fresh air right away.

▶ To speed up trash and debris collection, separate debris into curbside piles using the following categories:

- Household garbage (dispose of as usual)
- Tree debris and clean wood
- Carpet, drywall, insulation, flooring and furniture
- Roofing materials
- Appliances, including refrigerators, emptied of contents; stoves; and air conditioners

▶ A program to handle household hazardous waste – including pesticides, paint, solvents, automotive fluids and cleaning products – will be available. In the meantime, store such items in a safe place.

Standing water, mold and bacteria

▶ Contaminated flood water contains micro-organisms that penetrate deep into porous material and that can be released into the air or water. Remove standing water as quickly as possible.

▶ Limit contact with flood water, including breathing water vapor or mist coming from pumps and dehumidifiers.

▶ To reduce the risk of mold and bacteria, remove wet materials, wood, paper and clothing, and discard those that cannot be thoroughly cleaned or dried.

▶ Illness can result if flood water comes in contact with an open wound. Clean wounds thoroughly with soap and drinkable water and apply antibiotic ointment. Wash hands and body with soap and warm, drinkable water.

▶ Avoid putting your hands in your mouth or on objects that could go in your mouth, such as cigarettes or water bottles.

▶ If you know you are immuno-compromised or have underlying respiratory problems, such as asthma or allergies, consider not returning until further environmental and health assessments are complete.

'Deserters' may have been working in other precincts

year with Nagin's backing, has never made a secret of his thirst to run a law enforcement agency in the city.

His confidence Thursday was despite police department scandals that have begun to accrue since Hurricane Katrina struck. In addition to growing allegations of looting, tribunals are in the works for 249 officers who were allegedly not on active duty during the storm or immediately after it. Compass came under fire this week for hyping reports of crime and violence among desperate survivors stranded throughout New Orleans after the storm, reports that were believable at the time but were subsequently shown to be overblown.

Riley on Thursday emphasized that not all of the officers who left their posts were deserters. The NOPD orders before the storm required officers who lost their vehicles or were otherwise unable to report to their normal posts to instead get to the nearest district. Consequently, Riley said, some of the 249 officers who failed to make their slated roll calls may have been working in other areas.

In addition, Riley noted that some cops missed roll calls after the storm because they, like thousands of other residents, were trapped. Those officers should not be branded quitters or cowards either, Riley said.

"To ensure fairness to every member, I have assembled a committee to review each matter on a case-by-case basis," he said.

At the same time, Riley confirmed that officers patrolled the city after the storm in Cadillacs, a case that is being reviewed by the Louisiana attorney general. Most of those cases were legitimate, officers using radical tactics during chaotic times, he said. Nevertheless, there are reports that some of the officers may have taken cars without authorization and those will be investigated.

"There were some officers who did use Cadillacs, they actually patrolled the city in Cadillacs," Riley said. "It was done with the greatest intent."

Those investigations are separate from those of the dozen cops who Riley said were "either in a place where looting occurred or involved in looting."

Neither the assigned district nor the identity of those officers - or the four suspended and another reassigned - were released.

The NOPD was amassing video and other evidence, Riley said, rather than rushing ahead on "innuendos and rumors."

The chief smiled when asked whether the layers of scandal reflected a department that had lost its grip.

"This department is not dysfunctional," he said. "The more than 2,000 men and women of this agency stand united in not letting a very small segment of members tarnish the great reputation of their department."

has provided daily updates on power restoration since the storm.

BellSouth and Cox compete intensely for customers under normal circumstances. Since Hurricane Katrina moved through the region, disrupting service and decimating the local customer base, that rivalry has only increased.

Internet service, while not as important as water and electricity, is an important means of communicating. People depend on Web pages, e-mail and instant messaging to connect with customers, bank, pay bills, conduct research and shop. With phone service shaky throughout the area, consumers have been relying even more on Internet-based communication, New Orleans Councilwoman Jackie Clarkson said.

"This is a horrible barrier. What else do they have?" Clarkson said of her constituents.

And as businesses reopen, they too will find that not having a reliable Internet connection is a hardship. They may be unable to run credit card transactions or update customer databases, said Gabriel Venturi, a telecommunications industry consultant and director of strategic accounts for Global Internetworking Inc., a telecommunications company in McClain, Va.

"You are going to see many signs saying 'cash only,'" Venturi said.

Resolving the problem could take a while. Even as BellSouth and Cox repair local fiber-optic cables, overhead wires and network routers, their high-speed digital pipelines have continued to break because of the swarms of storm repair crews digging underground and moving equipment under overhead lines.

The problem is so bad that some BellSouth workers have been patrolling network lines not for storm damage but for other repair crews that might cut a line accidentally, said Bill Smith, chief technology officer for BellSouth in Atlanta.

"That's one of our biggest concerns right now. We're trying to make sure we don't get additional damage from the crews working in the area," he said.

Another problem is that local and state regulators have little authority over the region's broadband networks.

The backbone of BellSouth's Internet service, a web of underground high-capacity fiber-optic cables, weathered the storm fairly well, and the company's central Internet hub in a bunkerlike building on Poydras Street never went down, Smith said. But flooded communications switches and broken copper wires that carry Internet and phone signals to neighborhoods and buildings caused many of the company's customers in the region to lose services, he said.

Snapped wires are the biggest problem facing Cox, whose network primarily runs along utility poles in the air, said Olin Kropog, vice president of sales for the company in metropolitan New Orleans.

"Downed trees caused a lot of outages. What we are doing is literally walking house to house and business to business" looking for damaged lines, he said. "It's going to take a long time to do that."

There are pockets where services have been restored or never failed.

In the Central Business District, French Quarter and Lower Garden District, most phone and DSL services from BellSouth remained on during and after the storm, Smith said. Both services should be restored in the coming days in other unflooded areas of Uptown between St. Charles Avenue and the Mississippi River, he said.

Cox, meanwhile, has restored most services in St. Charles Parish and parts of Kenner, Kropog said.

Some cable modem service has been restored in parishes north of Lake Pontchartrain by Charter Communications, said Anita Lamont, spokeswoman for the cable television company based in St. Louis.

A longer-term issue is whether companies will fully rebuild networks in areas that sustained the most destruction, such as eastern New Orleans, the Lower 9th Ward and St. Bernard Parish.

Cox, for its part, plans to restore its local network "bigger and better than before," said Cox New Orleans spokesman Steve Sawyer. "Our commitment is to rebuild."

But don't bet on that panning out, said Venturi, the telecommunications consultant.

"Do you spend millions of dollars fixing infrastructure that might be underutilized?" Venturi said. "They all are talking about it, but until they do it you won't know. There could be huge losses if New Orleans is a smaller size.

The problems facing BellSouth and Cox are unprecedented, he said. "There hasn't been a situation like Katrina affecting a telecommunications network."

DEBRIS, from A-1

Converting tons into cubic yards isn't easy because one is a weight measure; the other describes area. Different categories of debris will vary greatly by weight.

The City of New Orleans has its own estimate: 50 million cubic yards of debris in the New Orleans area alone, including trees, demolition materials, appliances and household hazardous waste. So far, the city says, 22,000 cubic yards of material have been removed.

Even a cursory glance at the landscape in New Orleans, St. Bernard Parish or eastern St. Tammany Parish shows how daunting the task will be. In many areas back roads remain impassable, and in some neighborhoods bags of rotting food and other foul-smelling materials are piled indiscriminately. Cars are smashed, waterlogged, and left everywhere. Businesses are without windows, with glass shards scattered about parking lots and sidewalks.

Given their military backgrounds, Allen and Brig. Gen. Robert Crear, who heads the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers effort here, don't talk like glorified garbage men when discussing their work. Instead, they speak of "debris management plans for the life cycle of the debris," and, "their mission."

The cost of that mission stands at about $500 million, Crear said. That money will be divided between four main contractors and scores of smaller subcontractors, most with roots in the local communities, he said.

"Our mission is to pick it up, segregate it, reduce it, and get it to the final disposition site," Crear said.

At first, Crear said his crews will focus on "vegetative debris," – the branches and trunks that coat the ground. Those materials will likely be chipped and possibly incinerated. Non-organic trash, such as ruined refrigerators and appliances, will likely be taken to landfills, Crear said.

The first priority will be to clear emergency facilities, then roadways. Curbside trash will be the last priority, Crear said.

On public property, the Corps' contractors can do what needs to be done, but they must get a "right of entry agreement" squared away with parish officials before doing the same thing. Such an agreement has been signed with Orleans Parish, Allen said.

Although clean-up crews have made progress in the last month clearing roads of tree limbs and other obstructions, they have not yet begun the delicate and time-consuming task of clearing debris from private property that was destroyed by wind or floodwaters, Brown said.

"At this point we've got so much to do that we don't need to deal with private property," Brown said. He said the agency has sought an opinion from state Attorney General Charles Foti on what can be done to remove debris from private property, but that parish officials will also have a say in the matter.

"We are very sensitive that every (damaged) structure there belongs to somebody," Brown said.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has contracted with four private companies to spearhead the clean-up effort. They, in turn, will pass much of the work to about 23,000 different subcontractors, Brown said.

In addition to the wood debris, state officials predicted that 140,000 to 160,000 homes and businesses containing 1 million pieces of "white goods" such as refrigerators, stoves and freezers will require disposal. An estimated 350,000 cars and 60,000 boats will need to be demolished and disposed of as a result of Katrina.

Much of that material will be recycled. "We have got to find end-uses for everything – ash, concrete, everything," Brown said.

"It's almost unimaginable the magnitude of the different things we're going to deal with," said DEQ Secretary Mike McDaniel.

Brown said the New Orleans area presents a unique problem to debris removers because of its Formosan termite infestation. Because officials don't want the problem to spread to parishes where it doesn't exist, wood that's removed from the area will have to be processed there before going elsewhere.

"You really can't take that particular waste stream out of the affected parish," Brown said.

In New Orleans, the cleanup teams will follow the geography that Mayor Ray Nagin does while opening up neighborhoods to returning residents, Crear said.

On the West Bank, debris has been pushed to the side on all streets. On the East Bank, work is progressing on major streets, such as Carrollton, Louisiana, Jefferson and Napoleon. Canal Street, the French Quarter and the Convention Center have been cleaned. Street sweeping, the city said, is under way in the French Quarter and Central Business District.

Also, waste is being hauled away from areas that include Uptown, Carrollton, City Hall, the Superdome, parts of the CBD and parts of eastern New Orleans – the Michoud area, near Joe Brown Park, Dwyer Road and Mayo Road.

Not every parish has chosen let FEMA take the lead on trash pickup. St. Bernard, St. Tammany and Washington parishes have chosen to undertake the job themselves and then get the cost reimbursed by FEMA, Crear said. It wasn't clear Thursday why those parishes had opted out of the federal cleanup plan or what the estimated costs would be.

When Rita hit, FEMA shelters sat unused

Many rode out storm in tents

By The Associated Press

GULFPORT, MISS. – While some storm-weary Mississippi Gulf Coast residents braced against Hurricane Rita's rain and wind in tents pitched in front of uninhabitable homes last weekend, more than 1,400 trailers intended for use as temporary shelters sat unused throughout south Mississippi.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency brought the trailers down to provide shelter for people with no place to live. At a trailer distribution center in western Harrison County, 350 to 400 trailers sat on the lot Saturday, providing no shelter from the Gulf Coast's most recent hurricane.

Though about 500 new trailers are being delivered to Mississippi and Louisiana every day, FEMA has not been able to house homeless people at the same rate as the shelters arrive.

Figures released by FEMA and the American Red Cross show a staggering need for shelter by residents in both states. James McIntyre, a FEMA spokesman in Louisiana, said that Hurricane Katrina alone displaced about 300,000 households in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Of that number, 200,000 will need FEMA housing assistance.

"You can't drop 30,000 trailers on the Gulf Coast and just let people take them," said FEMA's Mississippi spokesman, Gene Romano. "There is a process here. We've got over 1,900 trailers placed. The people in those trailers are pretty pleased."

The extent of Katrina's damage exceeds any inflicted on the U.S. to date. There were more than 200,000 housing units in Mississippi's six coastal counties, according to 2004 Census Bureau estimates. The latest American Red Cross assessment estimates that 103,000 homes, more than 50 percent, on the Mississippi Gulf Coast were either destroyed or received major damage.

So far, FEMA has either placed or is ready to distribute 3,335 temporary units in Mississippi. That leaves a deficit of more than 99,000 units statewide. The response plan does not require bringing 100,000 travel trailers to the state. Instead, FEMA plans to use several different housing options for displaced residents, including cruise ships, rental reimbursement and tent cities.

Dallas Trammell was still waiting to hear from FEMA officials Thursday. The Pearlington resident makes $724 a month on government disability and could not afford to insure her home.

"It's been 13 days since I called them," she said as she stood in front of the brightly colored dome tent pitched in front of her rotting former home. "I'm supposed to have a trailer coming, and I got a place cleared off to put it. It's got all the connections, but for some reason, they still have a hold on it."

Others with more means have decided to take matters into their own hands.

"FEMA told us it would be 60 to 90 days, so we went and got our own trailer," said Geneva Bordelon, a Pearlington resident.

The wait has to do with having a clear, level spot to put the trailer, and water, sewage and electrical connections ready to attach to it. When the trailer is going on a homeowner's land, inspectors must first go out to make sure everything is ready.

The west Harrison County distribution center sends between 80 and 100 trailers out every day. Emergency services personnel and people living in shelters get higher priority for the trailers and manufactured homes.

McIntyre, the FEMA spokesman in Louisiana, said 4,245 temporary housing units are ready for occupancy in the area affected by Katrina, while 7,829 are in the area and waiting to be placed.

In Mississippi, almost 1,500 units are at a staging point in Purvis waiting to be deployed, and more than 1,900 have already been placed.

The waiting list for housing continues to grow. As of Saturday, the west Harrison County distribution center had 6,000 to 7,000 trailer applications. It had moved 600 to 700 trailers, or 10 percent of the backlog. Distribution center personnel said that at that rate, it could take two months to set up trailers for everyone who had requested them.

Accounting sought on $236 million ship deal

Greece had offered 2 vessels for free

By Hope Yen
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON – Two senators on Thursday asked federal officials to explain their decision to sign a $236 million deal with Carnival Cruise Lines for Hurricane Katrina housing, saying Greece was ready to provide two ships for free.

In a letter, Sens. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., and Barack Obama, D-Ill., asked Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to explain why Federal Emergency Management Agency officials chose Carnival and turned down the Greek offer.

The six-month deal with Carnival for three full-service cruise ships _ which now sit mostly empty in the Gulf Coast _ has been criticized by lawmakers of both parties as a prime example of wasted spending in Hurricane Katrina-related contracts.

"Even if the Carnival contract were a good one — and it almost certainly is not — it is inexplicable why FEMA would fail to implement the Greek government's offer of free cruise ships," the senators wrote.

Greece on Sept. 4 offered to donate two cruise ships to the United States as part of humanitarian aid for Katrina evacuees, according to the European Union.

Butch Kinerney, a spokesman for FEMA, said the agency signed an initial deal with Carnival by Sept. 3 — before the Greek offer. He said he did not know when FEMA officials subsequently became aware of it.

Once FEMA officials did find out, they chose to move forward with the Carnival deal because it was not known how quickly Greece could provide the ships, Kinerney said.

John Hart, a spokesman for Coburn, said the senators want to know exactly when FEMA became aware of Greece's offer and why the agency hasn't tried to back out of the Carnival deal, particularly since the ships are hardly being used.

"We're selling what we've got, but it is frustrating not getting stuff in here."
GREG SIBLEY, R.J. Marchand's hardware store

Tools getting hard to come by

Hardware retailer runs short on stock

By Dana Hedgpeth
The Washington Post

Greg Sibley rummaged through a cardboard box in the hardware store he runs with his father in Metairie, looking for 2,000 metal screws.

"All's I got is 375," he finally told the customer looking for screws to replace a blown-off grocery store roof.

"And when I'll get more I don't know," Sibley said. "I'm at the mercy of getting freight in."

Such is life at Sibley's store, R.J. Marchand's, three weeks after Hurricane Katrina ripped through. With traffic snarls making it a two- to three-hour trip in and out of the city, gas in short supply and few goods to sell, small businesses are having a hard time rebuilding and reopening.

"I'm happy to be up and running," said Sibley, 42, who operates the store with his father, Frank. "We're selling what we've got, but it is frustrating not getting stuff in here."

When The Washington Post first chronicled Katrina's impact on Sibley's business two weeks ago, the storm had shut down the store, costing it $15,000 to $18,000 in daily sales. The store also suffered water damage, and looters later broke in and took $30,000 worth of goods. The owners still are trying to determine how much inventory is gone.

Since reopening on Sept. 12, the store has been waiting for goods such as drills, saws, routers and Shop Vacs that were supposed to arrive before Katrina.

AP PHOTO

Greg Sibley is trying to operate R.J. Marchand's hardware store in Metairie while lacking both supplies and workers. 'When I get more, I don't know,' Sibley said.

"What supplies were on their way to us they sent back to the warehouses and put back because they couldn't get it through to us," Sibley said.

Usually, up to three delivery trucks each day reach R.J. Marchand's, where customers include home builders, steel manufacturers and general contractors. In the last month, only three trucks have arrived. All Sibley's suppliers — as close as Tennessee and Georgia, and as far away as Illinois and California — seem to be having problems getting materials to Marchand's.

For example, the store still is waiting on a $40,000 order of drill presses from a manufacturer in Jackson, Tenn. The presses, which will go on a Navy boat in a nearby shipyard, were supposed to be delivered the week Katrina struck, but Sibley was unable to track them down until the trucking company contacted him Tuesday.

"They asked us when are we coming to pick it up," Sibley said. "I asked where was it and they told me it's at a port in Dallas. I said, 'Well, I'm waiting for it here in Metairie, outside of New Orleans.' " Sibley said he's waiting on roughly $100,000 worth of material. Where is it all? "I don't know," he said.

Just as R.J. Marchand's was reopening after Katrina, Hurricane Rita hit, but caused only minor tree damage and blew around debris left on the roads from the first storm, local business owners said.

Sibley still lacks four employees out of a staff of 19 who haven't come back because their houses are flooded or lack electricity and were further delayed by Rita.

"If they can't get to their house, they're not coming back (to work) yet," Sibley said. "I've got people all over the place, in Houston and in Baton Rouge. I'm short-handed."

Drivers haven't returned to work, so R.J. Marchand's is having a hard time delivering equipment to construction jobs in New Orleans. In any case, much of the city is blocked off as cleanup crews work.

The three employees who handle billing, supplies and payroll returned a week ago. One is commuting 70 miles every day from a Motel 6 in Baton Route because her house in Chalmette, east of New Orleans, was filled to the ceiling with water.

"It feels good to come back to work because you feel productive," said a teary-eyed Ginger Trapani, who orders supplies for the store.

The store is beginning to do business again, selling out of small drills, hand saws, crowbars and utility knives. Other hot items have been knee-high plastic boots, gloves, face masks and $2 white paper suits to protect from the fat, black flies buzzing around. Blue tarps haven't been selling — the Federal Emergency Management Agency has been giving them away.

Customer David Roussel bought a few blades and plastic gloves to tear out drywall in about 20 homes. "I'm in the hole for $70,000 worth of labor and materials, and I'm unsure when and how much I'll get back," said Roussel, who has been building houses in the area for 25 years. "I have no clue of what to charge people because the insurance adjusters haven't been able to get around to everyone.

"I got my neck stuck out pretty far right now," Roussel said.

Storms force railroads to take detours

Tracks, bridges heavily damaged

By Matt Scallan
Staff writer

Nearly a third of the nation's east-west rail freight normally crosses the Mississippi River on the Huey P. Long Bridge, but damage to railroad tracks by Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita has forced a major route change.

"It's going to take awhile for it to come back," said Jim Bridger, the chief executive of the New Orleans Public Belt Railroad, which owns the bridge.

The primary alternate crossings are in Memphis and St. Louis, Bridger said.

Though a 100-mile section of track owned by the CSX railroad, which is based in Jacksonville, Fla., was heavily damaged in Katrina, other rail lines, such as those owned by Kansas City Southern and the Illinois Central Gulf railroads, are operating.

Workers clear debris Wednesday from the tracks of the New Orleans Public Belt Railroad near the Industrial Canal. Hurricane Katrina caused as much as $8 million in damage to the railroad's tracks.

The Public Belt Railroad also was hurt by the storm. About 10 miles of track between Poland Avenue and Gentilly are damaged. Repairs will take four to six weeks and cost as much as $8 million.

Still, the temporary loss of CSX's coast-hugging rail route is the main reason that the flow of rail cars through New Orleans is stifled. Before the storms, about 17,000 cars a month crossed the Huey, Bridger said. Traffic is down to about a third of that.

"We're not really going to be back until the CSX tracks are repaired," Bridger said.

CSX spokeswoman Meg Scheu said six bridges and 39 miles of track between New Orleans and Pascagoula, Miss., were damaged and will cost an estimated $250 million and six months to repair.

Work has begun to repair the railroad's Gentilly yard, and to move the locomotives and cars out of the area so they can be used elsewhere in the system, she said.

Another major rail route into the city is owned by the Canadian National Railway. The segment that runs across the LaBranche Wetlands in St. Charles Parish was damaged first by Katrina, then by Rita.

Waves from the storms washed out the road bed beneath the tracks where they cross the wetlands, but repairs should be complete "in a matter of days," said Jim Kvedaras, a spokesman for Canadian National.

"We had some washouts during the two storms, but had no bridge damage. We consider ourselves very fortunate," he said.

Energy production creeps up

Experts dispute output level

By Mary Judice
Business writer

Energy companies operating in the Gulf of Mexico started bringing more oil and gas wells into production Thursday, and refiners in the Houston area began to restart their plants after hurricanes Katrina and Rita roared through the Gulf, roughing up refineries and offshore platforms.

On Thursday, 98.6 percent of the oil produced in federal waters of the Gulf of Mexico, or 1.5 million barrels, remained shut down, the Minerals Management Service reported. That was a slight improvement from the previous day, when 100 percent was shut down.

Operators also reported that 80 percent of the natural gas normally produced was also shut in, or eight billion cubic feet per day, due to storm related damage. That was a very slight improvement from the day before.

MMS, a federal agency, gathers data from companies that operate in the Gulf. A total of 76 companies reported, which represents the majority. MMS spokesman Gary Strasburg said there may be a few small companies that do not report, but the data represents MMS's best guess.

However, analysts in contact with oil companies said there was some production that apparently was not reported.

Gene Gillespie, research director for the energy investment firm of Howard Weil in Houston, said that since Monday, such operators as Pioneer Resources, Kerr-McGee Corp. and Nexin have brought oil fields back into production, which represents more than the production the government reported Thursday.

The government report also showed that companies were returning workers to platforms in the Gulf. The number of platforms evacuated stood at 491 Thursday, down from 593 the day before.

Gillespie said the production would rise slowly until major platforms were brought into operation. The production figures will rise sharply, he said, when such platforms as Shell's deep water Augur are brought back on stream. The company expects to be producing in a week.

Meanwhile, oil refiners began the complex process of bringing their plants back into operation. The American Petroleum Institute reported that close to 23 percent of the nation's refineries were still down after plants in Corpus Christi and San Antonio, both in Texas, had returned to full operation.

Citgo, which operates a 324,000 barrel-a-day refinery in Lake Charles, said it would partially restart the plant on Monday.

ROBERT WOOLEY
Louisiana insurance commissioner

Wait for adjusters can drag on

Manpower shortage, accessing damage among problems

By Jaquetta White
Business writer

Returning New Orleans residents face longer waits than the usual one to three days to meet with an insurance adjuster. But just how long is uncertain.

"It is likely that it is going to take a little bit longer than what you usually expect to see your adjuster," said Bill Mellander, a spokesman for Allstate Insurance Co.'s national catastrophe team. "That is the reality of working in this post-catastrophe environment."

There are two reasons for the delay. First, there just aren't enough adjusters to go around. And those on the ground can't get access to many of the most damaged areas.

"Certainly, the biggest problem that we're facing right now, at least in the South and the southeastern parts of the United States, is a manpower shortage," said Johnny Michalek, a regional vice president for the National Association of Independent Insurance Adjusters and president of the Houston-based independent adjusting firm Gulf Coast Claims Service.

Michalek said the shortage stems from last year, when four hurricanes struck Florida, and from Hurricane Ophelia, which banged along the Carolinas earlier this month.

"That in itself sort of taxed the industry in terms of manpower — at least for adjusters in our region," Michalek said. "And just when it seemed that the industry had a handle on the situation in Florida, these other events crept up with (Hurricane) Katrina, certainly, and then with Hurricane Rita."

About 10,000 primary adjusters from companies represented by the Property Casualty Insurers Association of America have been deployed to the areas ravaged by Katrina and Rita. That's half the number that were deployed to Florida last year, said John Eager, director of claims for the association. The association represents such companies as Allstate, Geico and Progressive, which together write 41 percent of insurance policies in the country.

But with adjusters still working cases in Florida, the shortage now is more acute.

"We really can't put a calendar on it," Mellander said. "What I can say is that if you are a customer and you feel that it has been too long and you haven't seen or spoken to your adjuster yet, call them. Ask the adjuster where they are physically located, how many people are in front of you. An adjuster should be able to give you a fairly accurate timetable."

Mellander, however, downplayed the idea that a workforce shortage is causing the delays. Instead, he said, the problem is with access to the affected areas.

"Allstate, as has been the case with other insurers, has been experiencing challenges with getting people back into the areas of the danger zone," Mellander said. "We as adjusters are dealing with and living in the same environment as many of our customers."

Some have to set up shop two or three hours away from the ravaged areas, so they simply can't service as many customers, he said.

Insurance Commissioner Robert Wooley agreed.

"There's no shortage of adjusters," he said. "What there is a shortage of is a place for them to stay. It's a logistical problem."

Allstate began inserting its "disaster specialists," which include adjusters, into the Gulf Coast region 48 to 72 hours before Hurricane Katrina made landfall, Mellander said. The number of specialists on the ground now numbers 4,000, he said.

"From Allstate's perspective, we haven't had issues with staffing," Mellander said. "Right now, from our perspective, we have what we need. When you talk about the appropriate staffing, what it is not possible to do is provide one adjuster for each customer."

Tom Crawford, who heads Atlanta-based Crawford and Co., the world's largest independent adjuster, estimates an adjuster's case load is about 10 percent higher with this catastrophe than usual. But there was no way to increase staff numbers ahead of time, he said.

"The interesting thing about this event is, you would never be able to handle an event of this size," Crawford said. "You could not prepare for an event of this size and remain a profitable company."

Crawford's company usually deploys 100 to 150 adjusters for a "normal" Category 3 hurricane, he said. It now has about 320 adjusters and plans to increase that to about 400 soon. The number easily could grow to last year's Florida level: about 500 adjusters.

The company has hired some contract workers for the job.

Crawford has increased the number of three-week training classes it offers to would-be adjusters and plans to allow the beginners to hit the ground running instead of being phased in slowly.

"There is great need for adjusters on the ground," Crawford said. "And I don't think the industry can be prepared for what this type of need requires."

Likewise, Harold Anderson, president of the Culver City, Calif.-based Adjuster Academy, which typically does not train property adjusters, said he is considering offering those classes now — perhaps to displaced New Orleanians looking for work. The idea is in the very early stages and would need funding from insurance companies interested in hiring the people who complete the program. He's hopeful the idea will find takers.

"The reconstruction program is going to be very elongated," Anderson said. "If it would take two to three weeks to train folks, it would be a worthwhile investment for the companies."

Don't botch this chance to rebuild, group warns

N.O. revival gaining national attention

By Greg Thomas
Real estate writer

The American Institute of Architects is warning New Orleanians against relying on a series of temporary fixes to rebuild the city. Those emergency measures could become permanent, and without proper planning and cooperation, the city's unique culture and architecture very well many not be preserved.

"New Orleans is a city unlike any other in the country. In the world, I guess," said Norman Koonce, executive vice president and chief executive officer of the AIA in Washington, D.C.

Koonce and a host of national and local AIA members met with Lt. Gov Mitch Landrieu earlier this month to offer their assistance in planning the city's revival. Landrieu has appointed AIA national president Douglas Steidl of Akron, Ohio, to head an advisory board that will govern the post-Katrina rebuilding effort. The board will be part of Landrieu's Louisina Rebirth Initiative Plan for post-Katrina rebuilding.

Jim Dinegar, AIA's chief operating officer, said the group has also volunteered to bring teams of planners and architects from across the nation to New Orleans. The teams, given the name Regional/Design Urban Assistant Teams, will make detailed restoration proposals for various neighborhoods, according to New Orleans architect Steve Dumez of Eskew+Dumez+Ripple Associates. Dumez is immediate past president of the Louisiana AIA chapter and a past president of the New Orleans chapter.

Pres Kabacoff, Chief Executive Officer of HRI Properties Inc., said AIA's involvement is critical, but that time is of the essence.

"Planning is essential,'' Kabacof said, who has relocated his operations temporarily to Houma. "But we need far more than architects. We need planners, financial people, and we must be cautious and not let it take an extraordinary amount of time. We need to send a message out that the city is going to be rebuilt and be rebuilt in a better way then it was before…And they need to include a lot of social organizations, not just government."

Kabacoff thinks other national organizations, such as the Urban Land Institute and the Brookings Institute, should be consulted. But so far, government groups haven't officially brought AIA or any other national urban planning organization on board.

That's because agencies such as the lieutenant governor's office and the Louisiana Economic Development department are being overwhelmed with "pro bono" offers from organizations across the nation and are reeling from the nation's most devastating natural disaster to strike an American city. Scott Shalett, Landrieu's chief of staff, said the lieutenant governor told AIA officials not to wait for an official go-ahead from specific government agencies.

"What (Landrieu) intended to convey was that as experts and stakeholders in the architecture (and culture) of the city and its rebuilding they should be part of the strategic thinking. If they have a vision they should go take it and put it into a plan," Shalett said. "Everybody needs to come and be part of what we're doing," Shalett said.

Lana Sonnier, press secretary for the Louisiana Department of Economic Development, said that AIA's involvement fits what Secretary Michael Olivier "has talked about repeatedly… the opportunity to plan the region for smart growth using sustainable growth principles, such as residential areas with health care facilities, good schools, feature attractions…so (rebuilding) is not just suburban sprawl. This is an opportunity for smart planning with smart growth," Sonnier said.

Both Landrieu and the AIA are concerned about restoring the city while at the same time addressing the socio-economic injustices that have segregated portions of the city, according to the New Orleans AIA Chapter President Angela O'Byrne.

O'Byrne said that one local community already demonstrates how a diverse and functional neighborhood can look and work. "It's Algiers. It's diverse, functional" with a blend of African-American middle class, de-centralized poor, affluent and blue collar whites, families living and working together.

Another major concern is the construction of vast blocks of temporary housing — trailers, normally — which in past disasters have remained full for years after the events without proper social services, Dumez said.

As AIA Chief Executive Officer Koonce puts it, the fear is that with the billions of federal dollars expected to pour into New Orleans, the rebuilding will be improperly done, and perhaps millions misspent. "If we don't have time to do it right now, then when will we ever have time to do it over?"

Same old mind-set threatens New Orleans

Who has Mayor Ray Nagin been listening to? Who is helping him shape his vision of what a rebuilt New Orleans should be?

If I could answer those questions, I could make a fairly accurate prediction about what vision will emerge.

We do know this: Nagin is a very conservative man. Which is not to say that his instincts are more closely in synch with the Democratic or Republican party. Rather, it is to say that in his three-plus years in office, little about the way he has conducted city business has been surprising.

In his major bond issue, he asked to fund the same sorts of projects his predecessors had funded. He chants the same "economic development" mantra that every other mainstream politician in America chants.

Almost without exception he has favored demolition over rehabilitation, developers over communities and management over labor. His conservatism also has been reflected in the men and women he has appointed to the various offices and boards under his control.

'Warts and all'

One example is damningly illustrative of the point.

When it came time to appoint someone to chair the Regional Transit Authority, the agency in charge of transporting our poorest citizens to school, work and home, Nagin chose James Reiss, a man so rich and out of synch with the city that he imported a security force from Israel to protect his neighborhood during the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Thanks to an unflattering article in the Sept. 8 edition of the Wall Street Journal, Reiss has become a symbol of everything that's been wrong with the Nagin administration's approach to dealing with poor New Orleanians.

Yet in that same article, Reiss said he was on his way to Dallas to meet with the mayor and others to plot the future of our city. The danger of Nagin's conservatism was brought home to me during a recent interview with Bob Yaro, who runs the New York-based Regional Plan Association.

After the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Yaro worked on the rebuilding effort. He also taught a course at the University of Pennsylvania on how cities rebuild after catastrophes.

"One of the things we learned was that in almost every case, cities tend to rebuild what they had before, warts and all," Yaro said. "If things weren't working beforehand, they still rebuild them the way they were before."

Citizens are key

In his information session at the state Capitol last week, Nagin promised to discuss the design of a new New Orleans in a series of meetings in the various cities where our people have gathered in the aftermath of Katrina. But unless the voices and ideas of our dispersed citizens guide the rebuilding, these discussions will be little more than a hollow gesture.

If Nagin clings to his conservatism, and rounds up the usual suspects to shape his vision, we can be assured of this: Our rebuilt city will be nothing more than a pale, flawed reflection of many of the problems that have put us in this current mess.

Jeff says Waste Management not managing waste

Parish suspends pay of trash hauling firm

By Kate Moran
East Jefferson bureau

If the Jefferson Parish Council was disgruntled with the services of its garbage hauler before Hurricane Katrina, the storm has served to inflate that dissatisfaction many times over.

The Parish Council disciplined Waste Management this week for its lethargic pace in resuming service after the hurricane. It suspended the company's September pay, relieved residents of their garbage fees for this month and notified the firm's bond company that the hauler was at risk of defaulting on its contract.

Waste Management collected garbage twice a week before the storm, but it is now visiting houses only once per week. Council members said they have been bombarded with calls from residents grousing about the odor of garbage and the debris that gives entire streets the look of a landfill. Some complaints have come in about power outages, but the lion's share has concerned the trash.

Deano Bonano, the parish administrator who oversees garbage collection, said Waste Management took about two weeks to resume collection after the storm. The company told the parish its employees had fled the hurricane and could not return to the area quickly enough to do pickup immediately.

In the days just after the hurricane, Bonano said, "we had parish employees driving Waste Management trucks so we could try to get some of this garbage out. We commandeered some of the trucks to get garbage away from where we had our employees housed."

Tim Hawkins, the market area vice president for Waste Management, said the company could not call the trucks into service right away because

The Wall Street Journal and Chronicle of Higher Education already had made a splash out of Tulane University's post-Katrina predicament.

Camera people for Good Morning America and CNBC joined an Associated Press reporter Thursday afternoon as Tulane President Scott Cowen led his first media tour of the water-damaged campus, riding the kind of national exposure that only disaster can provide.

Stepping over bulging yellow pipes that force dry air into moist buildings and ducking under a clothesline holding military fatigues, socks and men's underwear, the crisply dressed Cowen told visiting journalists how he helped break into buildings to forage for food and hot-wired a golf cart as he and a handful of other Tulane workers escaped the campus after Hurricane Katrina.

Cowen said it wasn't his first brush with hard conditions. "I did serve in the Army infantry in the 1960s," he said.

After weeks of running Tulane from temporary offices in Houston, Cowen is presiding over a rapid cleanup at the 13,000-student university, the only Louisiana research institution ranked among the nation's top 50. Tapping extraordinary media exposure, he is using Several thousand hurricane victims throughout the Gulf South began lining up early Thursday at sites in St. Tammany Parish for the second day of on-ground financial aid distributed by the American Red Cross.

Thanks in part to the juncture of three interstates just north of the city, the longest line of cars and the longest waits were in Slidell as word spread that debit cards worth up to $1,565 were available.

Parishes hope to get insurance firms moving

Delays on claims may soon be over

Manuel Torres
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

Thousands of residents in St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes have been unable to get the ball rolling on their insurance claims because adjusters have had little or no access to evaluate damage since Katrina devastated the area. But that may be about to change.

Officials in the two parishes and state Commissioner of Insurance Robert Wooley said they have set up insurance-adjusting compounds in each parish and that insurance companies are expected to begin setting up shop there as early as this weekend, creating a first stop for residents returning to the flood-stricken areas.

Chef Austin Leslie is dead at 71

N.O. chef brought 'Creole soul food' to prominence

By Brett Anderson
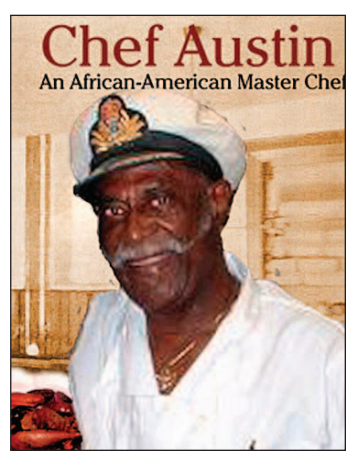
Restaurant critic

Chef Austin Leslie, the internationally recognized face of "Creole soul food" whose cooking laid bare the debt New Orleans cuisine owes the African-American kitchen, died early Thursday morning in Atlanta, where he and his wife evacuated after Hurricane Katrina.



Leslie suffered a heart attack, family spokeswoman Julie Sardia said. He was 71.

Leslie stayed in New Orleans during Hurricane Katrina and lived in the attic of his home for two days after the water rose, Sardia said. He was rescued by neighbors and taken to the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, where he remained for four days. He was then evacuated to Arkansas where he called his family. He went to Dallas and then, finally, Atlanta.

In a city known for its elegant, white tablecloth Creole restaurants heavily influenced by the fine dining traditions of Europe, Leslie rose to national prominence with his homier style of cooking beginning in the 1970s, when he took over Chez Helene, his family's restaurant on North Robertson Street.

"He was considered by many to be the black analogue to Paul Prudhomme," said John T. Edge, who devoted a streets were impassible and downed power lines threatened the safety of employees. The company did not resume curbside pickup until two weeks after the storm, but Hawkins said it operated 13 sites around the parish where residents could deposit their own debris.

"We were up and running quickly. Within a couple of days after being able to return, we were assisting the parish in this cleanup," Hawkins said. "I would maintain that the response of the parish is unfair. Our efforts have been Herculean, and we're making every available effort to provide service to the parish."

Kenner also put Waste Management on notice this week, saying the company had picked up trash sporadically or not at all since the hurricane. Kenner officials said they were forced to turn to a New Orleans company for help.

Waste Management is not responsible for clearing away storm debris, including downed branches and ruined furniture. That task falls to the Army Corp of Engineers, which awarded three contracts worth $500 million each to contractors who can remove the detritus.

But Jefferson Parish Council members are complaining that the presence of regular, bagged garbage that Waste Management has failed to cart away exacerbates the condition of neighborhoods already awash in storm debris.

Trash collection sites have been set up for Jefferson Parish residents at the intersection of Lapalco and Ames boulevards in Marrero and at David Drive between Airline Drive and West Metairie Avenue in Metairie.

"You have people who have seen millions of bags of garden-variety trash that came out of their refrigerators," Councilman Byron Lee said. "It has been a bad situation. Waste was a bit in slow mobilizing their people down here. You compound the fact that there was no garbage pickup before the storm with the food and debris, carpet, and spoiled food, and you have a toxic stew on your hands."

After Wednesday's council meeting, Councilwoman Jennifer Sneed said she said she went to the hardware store to buy three more cans to hold the refuse mounting on her curb.

"Someone's entire life is in a pile of rubble on the front yard," said Sneed, who lives in Metairie. Her husband owns River Birch, which runs two West Bank landfills and has expressed an interest in working with the parish. "Beds, yearbooks and wedding photos are waiting to be picked up."

Council members said they expected more from Waste Management, which is based in Houston and has branches throughout the United States and Canada. If the utility companies could truck in workers and house them in tent camps, they asked, why couldn't Waste Management do the same?

"They're claiming the majority of employees are displaced. Waste Management is a large enough company that if they really valued the ability to do work in Jefferson Parish, they would have been able to maintain service here. They had the ability to bring trailers in," Councilman Chris Roberts said. "To me, Waste Management has absolutely zero planning for these types of disasters."

The contract the parish signed with its garbage hauler does not require an emergency plan, but parish officials said it would have been prudent for the company to have one in place because hurricanes pose a threat along the Gulf Coast.

Hawkins said the company had an emergency plan that worked.

"Our goal is to protect our employees, our equipment and our assets," Hawkins said. "We complied with all the requests of the leaders of the area in evacuating. This storm was of such magnitude that we're facing the exact same issues that every other business is facing."

Representatives from Waste Management met Thursday with parish officials, but they did not resolve their disagreements. They had been at loggerheads before the storm over the hauler's alleged failure to collect recycling, and the parish threatened in August to levy a $1 million fine – slightly more than the average monthly payment of $985,000.

Bonano said the fine had been deducted from the company's payment, but Hawkins said the issue had not been resolved.

Lynn Brown, a spokeswoman for Waste Management, said the company has set up mobile recruiting stations in the New Orleans area to hire more workers to help with garbage removal. The company also dispatched workers from other parts of the country and will bring in additional trucks to eliminate the garbage more quickly.

"On an ordinary day, they use 35 trucks to pick up garbage in Jefferson Parish," Bonano said. "Our volume is three times what it normally is. They need to bring in 60 trucks to get caught up."

Bonano said the parish asked the Federal Emergency Management Agency for money to help with garbage removal because the parish was having problems with its hauler. The government contractor handling storm debris, Ceres Environmental, is trying to identify available trucks. Bonano said he expects more to arrive by today.

The federal Environmental Protection Agency will pick up refrigerators, air conditioners and other appliances containing hazardous materials. A pickup schedule has not been determined.

Residents can drop off their own debris at the intersection of Lapalco and Ames boulevards in Marrero and at David Drive between Airline Drive and West Metairie Avenue in Metairie.

'Trailer city' may spring up at site of old Wal-Mart store

The centers will give the companies a location to set up temporary office space and housing for adjusters so residents can make contact with their insurance representatives and make progress on their claims. Wooley said they are also working to get adjusters to evaluate entire areas at a time, instead of the usual home-by-home evaluations. That would speed up the settling of claims in areas where entire neighborhoods are likely to be deemed a total loss.

"This is an unusual circumstance, so we're trying to work on a different solution," Wooley said.

St. Bernard Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez agreed. "Once they're out there, they're going to see everything is destroyed. This is not your regular hurricane damage," he said.

The St. Bernard center will be located in the parking lot of the new Wal-Mart store along West Judge Perez Drive in Chalmette, parish spokesman Steve Canizaro said. The location of the Plaquemines center was not available Thursday.

Officials in both parishes have been pushing for the centers as a way to accelerate their recovery. The program marks the first time the state is setting up centralized insurance locations as a way to launch a neighborhood-by-neighborhood evaluation process. Wooley said he did not know how many companies will set up shop at the centers and use a fast-track assessment process. But he said Allstate and State Farm, which combined insure more than half of Louisiana's homes, have expressed interest and may be among the first to set up at the centers.

He said his office is also working with insurance trade groups to get them to set up offices in the two parishes for other insurance companies. If the program works in St. Bernard and Plaquemines, it could then be launched in Orleans Parish, officials said.

Wooley said that under the proposed fast-track process for evaluating losses, a schedule would be set up for adjusters to review damage in areas extending from a few blocks to entire subdivisions. Usually, adjusters meet with homeowners when they assess damage on an individual home. But Wooley said owners would not be required to be present if the entire neighborhood is being evaluated, though his office would announce the schedules so homeowners can be there when adjusters review their property.

Rodriguez said that in areas deemed a total loss and set for demolition, homeowners would be given a period of time to recover items from the house before the bulldozers are let loose.

Meanwhile, St. Bernard officials on Thursday said the Federal Emergency Management Agency is close to inking leasing contracts for the first temporary "trailer cities" inside the parish. Officials said they hope the sites would be the first effort to repopulate an area in which an estimated 70 percent of homes are now unlivable.

Parish Council member Craig Taffaro said FEMA has identified the parking lot of the old Wal-Mart store on Judge Perez Drive in Chalmette as one of the potential sites, saying the agency is negotiating a lease with the company. Rodriguez said FEMA is also working on leases for sites at the St. Claude Plantation in Meraux and in the community of St. Bernard in the eastern part of the parish, among other locations.

Once the agency secures the sites, the infrastructure to fill them with travel trailers could be installed in as little as a month, Rodriguez said. He said the parish is seeking 5,000 trailers initially, with hundreds of them set up in centralized sites, but many others distributed to homeowners who could park them in their driveways while their homes are being rebuilt.

off Old Spanish Trail near Interstate 10, at 1 a.m. for the three-checkpoint procedure to get their cards.

By 7 a.m., police began turning back the hundreds of vehicles still in line.

"That's all they (the Red Cross volunteers) can handle," Slidell police Capt. Rob Callahan said. "We don't want people just sitting there for nothing."

During Wednesday's grueling but generally orderly delays, police began turning away cars at about 1:15 p.m. Red Cross spokeswoman Sarah Shogren said an estimated 1,000 storm victims were served.

Based on the first day's experience, agency officials estimated they could handle no more than 1,200 people from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. and asked Slidell police to stop vehicles from driving any further once that number was reached.

That's what police did Thursday, using a new traffic routing system that Callahan said worked better than the plan Wednesday in which cars attempted to get onto Old Spanish Trail by any route imaginable.

Taking advantage of the fact that the I-10 twin spans across Lake Pontchartrain are closed for major hurricane-related repairs, police Thursday diverted westbound traffic on I-10 to the Oak Harbor Boulevard exit.

From there, vehicles were turned around and double-stacked eastbound on the interstate until they were flagged into two lanes on the Old Spanish Trail (Louisiana 433) exit.

Some vehicles also drove along Eden Isles Boulevard to the Oak Harbor exit and then headed westbound to Old Spanish Trail, the only way to reach the Caruso Boulevard entrance to the old mall.

Once 1,200 vehicles had been counted, that was the end of the line for Thursday. "For the most part, it's working as well as it possibly can the way things are now," Callahan said. "We're very pleased with it."

Authorities and Red Cross officials reminded motorists seeking the cards worth up to $1,565 - mostly in $300 a person amounts - that the centers in Slidell are serving thousands of storm victims from five states, not just St. Tammany Parish.

They also noted the centers will remain open seven days a week for at least two weeks - and maybe longer - until everyone possible from the designated declared disaster area ZIP codes can be helped.

Callahan said there were no major incidents, no "road rage" and only a handful of mostly minor fender-bender accidents. He urged everyone not to try to come at once but to wait a few days, when the lines may begin to thin out.

Also, officials said, the Red Cross hopes to open a much larger distribution site as soon as it can in hurricane-battered Jefferson Parish to take some of the load off the north shore.

The car-less, stand-in-line scene in Mandeville, at Paul Spitzfaden Community Center on East Causeway Approach, was more serene and the waits were much shorter Thursday.

By late afternoon, several people leaving the center with cards in hand said the wait averaged about an hour compared to the two and a half to three hours the day before at the DonahueFavret Contractors building next door.

Police set up barricades to create a more orderly system for those who began showing up before 9 a.m. and the center was scheduled to close at 5 p.m. It reopens today from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

"This is not such a bad wait," Lafrenchie Stonom said as she filled out the form needed to receive her money card.

A volunteer walked along offering cold water and granola bars to those in line.

National Guard units helped local police handle traffic control. Mandeville police Lt. Ron Ruple said the lines were orderly all day. No incidents were reported, but City Councilman Jerry Coogan said he saw several elderly women in tears as the sun beat down during the wait to get inside.

'You couldn't fry a chicken better than Austin'

chapter of his book "Fried Chicken: An American Story" to Leslie. "When you were looking for a way to portray what New Orleans cooking was, those two were the guys."

Leslie was born in New Orleans on July 2, 1934. His career extends back a half-century, when as a teenager he took a job delivering fried chicken by bicycle for Portia's Fountain on Rampart Street. His career took off in 1975 when he bought Chez Helene from his aunt, Helen Pollack.

The restaurant was notable for its lack of pretentiousness – Leslie famously served oysters Rockefeller on bent tin platters – and for the chef's soulfully delicious cooking.

"It was just good old Creole food, good old-time New Orleans food," said Leah Chase, a longtime friend and colleague. "And he was good, damn good. You couldn't fry a chicken better than Austin. You couldn't stuff a pepper better than Austin Leslie."

With his broad smile, bushy mutton chops and omnipresent captain's hat, Leslie's persona proved as irresistible as his fried chicken livers and cornbread, which tasted as if it was made predominantly of butter.

Chez Helene's popularity was such that it became an inspiration for a 1987 network television show, "Frank's Place." It featured a chef decked out in Leslie's signature garb.

"Austin always had that dumb old hat on," Chase said. "I always wished he'd get a new one, but he kept the old one. I don't know if it was a good luck charm or what."

Leslie was a celebrity chef who didn't enjoy the material fruits of celebrity chefdom. Branches of Chez Helene opened in Chicago and the French Quarter, but the success didn't last. Leslie closed the last Chez Helene in 1994, five years after declaring bankruptcy.

"Seems like everyone wanted to use my name to sell this, my face to sell that," Leslie told Edge. "I made the mistake of listening."

After working for a while in Europe, Leslie returned to New Orleans in 1996. He was working at the Bottom Line on North Claiborne Avenue when he answered a newspaper ad placed by Jacques-Imo's owner Jack Leonardi. Leslie took the job – a fry cook – and helped open Jacques-Imo's in the Riverbend, which became wildly popular. It was at Jacques-Imo's where Leslie turned a new generation on to his cooking, particularly his unforgettable fried chicken: cooked to a crisp, caramel brown, Leslie finished the chicken with a paste of raw garlic and parsley. Sliced pickles completed the picture.

"I would have never really done the Creole-soul thing and the fried chicken if it hadn't been for Austin," Leonardi said last fall. "He also just taught me a lot about things, not just running a restaurant. He had such a big menu at Chez Helene. It was like a Chinese restaurant menu. He taught me how you could do that, how to incorporate sauces and stuffings in all sorts of different ways."

"I didn't move away from Jack because of money. I moved away from Jacques-Imo's because I wanted to get away from frying," Leslie said last fall. "I'm going to die. But I'm not going to die over that fryer."

Pampy's owner Stan "Pampy" Barre said Leslie was eager to get back to work, despite the fact that Pampy's was destroyed by floodwater and looters.

"Austin called me two days ago, and we had an extensive conversation," Barre said on Thursday. "He wanted to go back to work. He wanted to get back in the kitchen."

Chase called Leslie's death "another huge loss for New Orleans. You think you lose big when you lose your house, but here we lose a person, a person that could help us uplift everything."

Leslie is survived by his wife, Victoria S. Leslie; his daughter, Tracy Leslie Quinn; two stepdaughters, Tanya Rainey and Shannon Rainey; and two stepsons, Felix Rainey, and Gerald and Gary Emell.

Funeral arrangements are pending.

237 arrested on looting charges

Authorities expect uptick in white-collar crime

By Martha Carr
Staff writer

Nearly a month after the airwaves were flooded with footage of desperate residents pillaging homes and stores, federal authorities say 237 people have been arrested in Orleans and Jefferson parishes on looting charges, and another 230 have been booked with other crimes.

The numbers were released this week as New Orleans began reopening to residents and shopkeepers in the least ravaged parts of town. Jefferson Parish, responsible for most of the looting arrests, has been open for business for on the east bank since Sept. 18. The West Bank opened shortly after the storm.

According to statistics provided by the FBI and U.S. Attorney's Office, the vast majority of looters – 199 – were arrested in the week after the Sept. 4 opening of a temporary jail at Union Passenger Terminal on Loyola Avenue.

That's because arrests were virtually impossible in the immediate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, when 80 percent of the city was engulfed by floodwaters, anarchy had taken hold, and most jail facilities were rendered useless, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

"In the early days, you didn't have the National Guard, the NOPD was stretched thin, and federal resources had not been brought to bear, not to mention that so much of the focus of law enforcement was search-and-rescue missions," said Letten, whose office compiled the statistics. "Civil order had to be established before traditional law enforcement could take hold."

It took five days after Hurricane Katrina for authorities to establish the temporary jail, where they continue to process offenders before shipping them out of town to other holding facilities, Letten said.

While looting arrests have dropped dramatically in recent weeks, the region is not crime-free, FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani said. For example, authorities picked up seven armed looting suspects Tuesday night at one location. That same night, authorities arrested three people in a carjacking.

"I think overall, the city is much safer than it was before the storm," he said. "That's not to say we won't have some unique challenges as the criminal element tries to return."

Both Letten and Bernazzani said they anticipate an upswing in white collar fraud and corruption as millions of dollars in federal aid starts streaming into the area. Both offices are temporarily headquartered in Baton Rouge.

Slidell to allow temporary homes

Trailers, RVs OK for up to a year

By Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

Despite concerns that some areas of Slidell could become "trailer-park cities," the City Council agreed Wednesday night to allow hurricane victims to live in temporary housing on their property while their homes are being repaired or rebuilt.

The vote was 6-0, with three members absent, as the council met in the emergency operations center on Bayou Lane. The center is serving as government headquarters because City Hall in Olde Towne was flooded.

The ordinance permits travel trailers, recreational vehicles and temporary housing provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency on private residential property for as long as a year.

That time period may be extended by council resolutions as need and circumstances dictate. About 4,000 of the estimated 10,000 homes in Slidell had flood or tree damage caused by Hurricane Katrina.

The waivers for trailers and campers aren't open-ended. They will expire once the Department of Building Safety and Permits determines the permanent dwellings are "habitable."

The temporary housing must have appropriate hookups to city water and sewerage. The council is expected soon to approve additional requirements for permitting.

Planning Director Martin Bruno had reservations about expansion of what was introduced earlier this month as a six-month law for temporary housing on private residential property.

Bruno said he feared longer periods would "open the door that we closed about three years ago" with the ban of mobile homes in the city. The city could "wind up in court trying to get these things off the lots," he said. "It's going to become an enforcement nightmare."

With the exception of those grandfathered in before the law was changed, mobile homes are banned under Slidell's zoning code. The new law suspends that section of the code.

Mayor Ben Morris had similar concerns, although he said he's certain that 90 percent of people affected will work to get their homes back in livable condition as soon as possible.

As for the other 10 percent, he said, "I don't want to see someone move in a trailer and live there for three years and then just say they didn't get around to it (repairing their houses). I just don't want somebody squatting."

Tulane concerned about retaining staff, students

the Uptown campus as a symbol of New Orleans' determination to rebound, noting its plans to resume classes Jan. 17 and its hopes to lose no more than a tiny slice of its students.

"It's not only important for Tulane to come back, it's important for the city of New Orleans to come back," Cowen said as he strolled across a quadrangle near St. Charles Avenue that was dotted with piles of brush and buzzing with lawn mowers. "We don't want to be an oasis in an otherwise desolate land."

Tulane looked nothing like the limb-strewn place that Cowen left after the storm. Loose bricks that broke off one corner of a historic building and showered the lawn during Katrina were in a neat pile. Blown-out windows on Gibson Hall, the administration building, had been replaced. Sheetrock walls inside the bottom floor of Goldring/Woldenberg Hall, home to the business school, were torn out, awaiting new moisture tests. The campus was crawling with disaster recovery workers, giving it a lively, hopeful image in stark contrast to the vacant, waterlogged look it carried a couple of weeks earlier, even after waters receded on the lake side of Freret Street.

Damage estimates haven't yet been calculated at Tulane, but with an $810 million endowment, insurance and enviable reputation in academic research, Tulane officials are bullish about the future. But they are concerned about holding on to professors and students dispersed by the storm.

"The long-term effect that everybody's worried about is retention of students and retention of faculty," said spokeswoman Debbie Grant.

With 6,000 staff members, including about 2,000 faculty members, Tulane is critical to recovery in the city's economy, and national media attention will help the badly suffering wider community, Tulane officials said.

Tulane is laying off some of its staff members in stages, but so far school officials say job losses will be modest.

"We're the single largest private employer (in Orleans Parish)," Cowen said. "What does it say if the single largest employer doesn't get up?"

Orleans schools want to hear from parents

System hopes to open on West Bank in Nov.

From staff reports

Orleans Parish public schools are asking parents whether they plan to send their children to school and employees whether they plan to return to work so they can plan for a partial reopening of West Bank schools in November.

Parents and employees should contact the district as soon as possible, officials said, at www.alvarezandmarsalnops.com or (877) 771-5800.

The information gathered will be used to determine how many schools will be reopened. Registration details and a start date have not been announced.

Officials from the district and Alvarez & Marsal, the turnaround firm hired this year to right the district's finances, met with New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin on Thursday to outline plans for opening as many as eight Algiers schools in November.

"The mayor was very supportive," said Sajan George, the district's chief operating officer and an Alvarez & Marsal employee. "He said Algiers is fine and encouraged and supported us in opening schools. We said we'd target November, and he's OK with that."

Each West Bank school is subject to inspection by the Environmental Protection Agency, George said.

It is possible several undamaged schools on the east bank can reopen later in the school year, but Nagin "cautioned us against opening any schools other than on the West Bank," George said.

Nagin has discouraged parents from bringing their children back to the east bank, citing possible health risks.

Any student who returns to New Orleans, however, will be allowed to attend school on the West Bank, regardless of where they live in the city, George said.

Students who start school in November can still have an entire academic year in New Orleans, George said, adding that the school term likely will be extended through June.

Kenner signs new garbage contract

Companies will split pickup duties

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

Spurred by complaints that household garbage has been picked up sporadically – and sometimes not at all – since Hurricane Katrina, Kenner contracted with a New Orleans company Thursday to speed collection.

Kenner Mayor Phil Capitano also fired off a warning letter to Waste Management of Louisiana, the city's garbage contractor, warning it to shape up or face losing Kenner business.

"It was bad all over," Capitano said, after he signed a contract with Ramelli Janitorial Service Inc. "They have missed areas all over."

Capitano said two weeks ago Waste Management came up with its own plan to pick up garbage at least once a week, rather than the normal twice-a-week schedule, but he said the company didn't stick to it.

"They were not able to meet the plan," Capitano said.

But a Waste Management representative responded that all residents should have had their Waste Management cans emptied at least three times, once per week, since the storm. If that didn't happen on a street it could have been because utility crews were working on it, there was too much debris or because it was unsafe, said Tim Hawkins, a vice president. He also pointed out that Waste Management is handling much more trash than usual.

"It's between two to three times greater than a normal week," Hawkins said.

Under Kenner's new garbage pick-up arrangement, Waste Management will continue to pick up garbage in half the city and Ramelli will pick up the other half, Capitano said.

Ramelli started cruising Kenner streets Thursday with four trucks and expects to supplement that with another four trucks by next week, President Robert C. Ramelli said. Kenner residents can expect twice-a-week garbage pickup to be back to normal within two weeks, Capitano said.

The contract obliges the city to pay Ramelli $145 per ton to pick up and dispose of garbage. Residents pay a per-unit fee to Waste Management for pickup.

Capitano said he expects the money for Ramelli to be reimbursed by FEMA because of the sheer volume of garbage. Also, he said, Kenner will try to recoup some of the money with fines against Waste Management.

Capitano also pointed out that Ramelli and Waste Management only pick up garbage. Another company is contracted to pick up debris.

Residents from all over the city complained about slow garbage pickup in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

"They've been pretty slow," said Kansas Avenue resident Eddie Madrid. "I've been here since last Sunday, and everything's still out here."

An animal rescue center has been operating out the Belle Chasse Council on Aging building at 3712 Main St. About 52 animals have been returned to their owners.

Animal shelter seeks donations

From staff reports

A Belle Chasse emergency animal shelter that has rescued 300 dogs and cats and is working to save horses and cattle in the southern end of Plaquemines Parish is seeking donations.

Belle Chasse veterinarian Stephen Hebert is working with volunteers, parish workers and National Guard troops to care for the animals. About 52 have been returned to their owners.

Donations of vaccines, heartworm test kits and preventative medicine, food and sturdy fencing are needed, Hebert said. Most of the supplies and equipment being used have been donated by veterinarians and supply companies, he said.

Herbert can be reached at (504) 231-1854, or contact the shelter, located at the Belle Chasse Council on Aging, 3712 Main St., at (504) 392-7154.

As floodwaters from Hurricane Rita recede in areas south of Jesuit Bend, Hebert said he expects more animals to be rescued.

National Guard troops are assisting by delivering hay and tubs of fresh water by airboat to stranded livestock.

HURRICANE AFTERMATH

Jefferson Parish students will get less sleep

School bell to ring an hour earlier

By Rob Nelson
West Bank bureau

Attention students returning to Jefferson Parish public schools: Get ready to change your alarm clocks.

In its last emergency meeting before the reopening of schools on Monday, the School Board approved a revised calendar Thursday that adds one hour to the daily schedule, beginning Oct. 10. The additional hour will make up for lost instructional time since Hurricane Katrina shuttered the system more than a month ago.

Once the extended schedule begins, all schools will begin an hour earlier, with high schools facing the earliest start time, at 6:15 a.m., officials said. The extended schedule will last until the end of the school year.

Parents should note, however, that for the first week of class, Oct. 3-7, the length of the school day will remain as it was in August to give students and teachers time to get into new routines, officials said.

A committee of parents, teachers, administrators and business leaders who crafted the revised calendar chose extending the school day instead of chipping away at holidays.

Students new to the parish or those who have relocated to Jefferson will receive their schedules when they register. Students returning to the school they attended before the storm should contact the school to confirm the start time.

The calendar also includes the following changes:

uThere will be four marking periods, each averaging about 38 days. Exams scheduled for the end of the nine-week marking period have been canceled, and report cards will be tabulated using test grades, homework and class participation. The days initially scheduled for those exams will become full days instead of half-days.

uApril 18, the last day of spring vacation, is now a full day of school. All other holidays, graduation dates and the end of school year remain the same.

uAll remaining days of school will be full days, except for two half-days for parent conferences. For a full calendar, go to www.jppss.k12.la.us.

While some School Board members complained that they had no input into the calendar and would have preferred more than one version on which to vote, Superintendent Diane Roussel said the calendar had to be created relatively quickly before Monday's reopening.

"These kids need as much school as they can get," board member Libby Moran said.

The school calendar likely will be adjusted because state education officials have not yet decided how much of the missed time students must make up. Jefferson will have lost 24 school days.

In other business, the School Board approved seeking a $50 million line of credit with its bank to be used if necessary. The loan, which would have to be repaid by June, must be approved by the state bond commission.

Katrina has rattled the system's finances, taking away sales taxes that bring in about $12 million monthly. Overall, those taxes represent 41 percent of the system's revenue. In addition, with enrollment largely unclear, the amount of state financing remains a daunting uncertainty.

The district also is in talks with its insurance adjusters and the Federal Emergency Management Agency about recouping some of its expenses. That money would have to be used solely for capital projects, Chief Financial Officer Raylyn Stevens said, adding that the $50 million loan could be used for items such as payroll and benefits.

Currently, she said, the system's reserves are almost dry, but the district is still meeting all financial obligations. Several School Board members complained that they have not seen any of the federal relief money.

"It's unbelievable to me, 30 days later and not one penny," board member Mark Morgan said. "It's disgusting to me."

The School Board also approved a move seeking a construction management company to help oversee damage assessment and renovation work. Roussel said the task is simply too much for the system's facilities department to handle by itself.

Most Jefferson schools will open Monday, but five remain out of commission: John Martyn, Lincoln Elementary, Terrytown Elementary, Alexander Elementary and Woodmere Elementary, as well as Thomas Jefferson Senior High School, a magnet school that was slated to open in 2006.

Two other schools, Grand Isle School and Lafitte Elementary, remain shaky for the Monday opening. Floodwaters from Hurricane Rita devoured the small village of Lafitte, and Grand Isle took a beating in the dual storms. Except for Lafitte and Grand Isle, students at the schools damaged by Katrina have been shifted into other schools, where they will share the building and run on a different schedule than the existing school.

Michael Harb of Mandeville walks down Lakeshore Drive on Sept. 24 in the high water from Hurricane Rita.

Mandeville knocked flat

The one-two punch this hurricane season has highlighted the fact that for some time, Old Mandeville has been stalled at a crossroads.

Each year several tropical events assault the city, causing flooding and property damage.

Each year this taxes the bank accounts and tries the patience of homeowners and business investors alike. But we count the costs, make our claims, clean up debris and move on.

But this year came Katrina, the big one we hoped never to see. Even with a protection levee and floodgates, we would have lost our beautiful canopy of trees and suffered heavy flooding. However, far fewer homes and businesses would have been battered with catastrophic losses. With levee protection and floodgates Rita would have been far less intimidating: just a breezy day with rain, a respite from September's withering heat.

We must think creatively and consider a levee and floodgates. This hard reality stares us in the face up and down these now-tragic streets in this once-lovely old town.

Can we allow this historic old city to become a town on stilts and the beautiful lakefront a condo row as our historic buildings become too expensive to insure and regularly repair?

In the aftermath of all calamities, opportunities abound. Do we have the foresight to seize ours?

9/11, Katrina don't compare

Is anyone else sick of hearing about former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and what a great leader he is and how he should be sent to Louisiana to lead us out of the Katrina debacle?

OK, he was a great cheerleader after 9/11 in New York, but may I remind everyone that Giuliani was able to go home to a comfortable chair and sip on martinis every night after the crisis? That he was able to depend on functional police and fire departments whose members had comfortable precinct houses and personal homes to retreat to?

He was also able to pick up a phone and communicate with city and federal leaders without hearing the constant "beep-beep-beep" of a communication system in complete disarray.

To compare Giuliani's success in leadership to the failure of any local official, including New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and Gov. Kathleen Blanco, is to have an unrealistic understanding of what happened in New Orleans.

Pump operators needed in Jefferson

Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard and emergency management chief Walter Maestri created an emergency plan that included evacuating the only parish employees capable of operating our pumping stations to a "bunker" 60 miles away among countless north shore pines.

On the afternoon of the storm, Mr. Broussard told the media that he was on his way to round up a few parish mechanics "to see if they could figure this thing out." Although I am confident these individuals gave a heroic effort in their attempt to save our homes, they simply were not trained to operate these stations. Evidence of this is the fact that it was not until Tuesday (the day after Katrina) at 8 p.m. that the Kenner/St. Charles pumping station began to operate — far too late to save countless homes, especially in East Jefferson.

I agree with Broussard when he says he wouldn't risk the lives of the pumping station operators, but does that require shipping them to the north shore? Couldn't they have gone to a building in the parish, such as one of the public hospitals? If buildings such as East and West Jefferson hospitals perish in any storm, we'll be worrying about more things than the pumping stations. Those are just two locations that I could think of after five minutes of contemplation. Broussard and Maestri had years to develop a plan that sent these vital individuals nearly out of the state.

When asked what was responsible for the flooding, Broussard said it was Katrina. But Katrina left rainfall amounts easily within the capabilities of our pumps, provided they were operating. Mr. Broussard's plan is responsible for the majority of this parish's devastation.

If it is our parish leaders' job to protect the property and lives of its parishioners, Mr. Broussard and Mr. Maestri have let us down.

Dredge the lake to rebuild wetlands

I am a native of New Orleans, and although I have lived in Baton Rouge for nearly 20 years, I always refer to New Orleans as my home because I love it dearly.

I'm no expert on environmental engineering, but since "experts" have failed to protect New Orleans, I might as well offer a suggestion for rebuilding the wetlands and raising the city:

We should dredge Lake Pontchartrain and use the soil to recover the wetlands and barrier islands and also to raise the levees and flood-prone areas of the city that will probably have to be bulldozed now. Since the lake has shown a surprising ability to recover from man's mistreatment, such as decades of shell dredging, the environmental damage would not be permanent.

Again, I'm no expert. But it does seem like a cheap, simple way to accomplish on our own what our national leaders seem unwilling to do.

Also, as a subscriber to The Times-Picayune, I want to say thank you so very much for continuing to publish. I was profoundly happy when I found a copy of the paper delivered to my doorstep not long after the Katrina catastrophe. That first issue was small and to the point and has since undergone its own rebuilding. I have no doubt that the city I love will come back as well.

An ex-communicator

In the column "Talking to each other would be a nice start," Stephanie Grace cites a lack of communication between New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and the New Orleans City Council as an impediment to progress in the city. I have noticed a common change that takes place when people become politicians. They seem to lose their common sense and logic.

Ray Nagin was general manager of Cox Communications before he was elected mayor. When he became Mayor Nagin, he forgot the value of and need for communication.

How does that happen to people?

OUR OPINIONS

Casting stones

Good-hearted people from across the world are grieving for those of us in Louisiana and along the Gulf Coast who have lost so much in the past month.

Any other reaction is hard to fathom given the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina.

Yet there are those who are trying to blame the victims of this terrible force of nature. What sort of person would do that? Who could be so callous?

State Sen. Hank Erwin of Montevallo, Ala., for one. "New Orleans and the Mississippi Gulf Coast have always been known for gambling, sin and wickedness," he wrote in a weekly column he distributes to media outlets. "It is the kind of behavior that ultimately brings the judgment of God."

The innocent, he said, unfortunately were caught up with the guilty. But they would have survived if they had only heeded the warnings of "godly evangelists and preachers," he said.

It is bad enough that an elected official two states away would say something so ignorant. Sadly, though, the Kenner priest who gave the invocation at the New Orleans City Council meeting Tuesday offered similar sentiments.

As Monsignor Robert Guste of Our Lady of Perpetual Help parish in Kenner talked about the sins of the metro area — from gambling to Mardi Gras to the Southern Decadence festival — people in the audience groaned.

There is a talent in knowing your audience. But the truth is, these comments by Sen. Erwin and Father Guste have no proper place in a time of such tragedy and loss.

Each man talks as if he is that most difficult of all creatures to find: one who is without transgression.

William Willimon, bishop of the North Alabama Conference of the United Methodist Church, had something to say about that: "I expect there is as much sin, of possibly a different order, in Montevallo as on the Gulf Coast.

"If God punished all of us for our sin, who could stand?" he asked.

Amen to that.

Build them better

Homesick New Orleanians can think of many things they want to have back exactly as they were before Hurricane Katrina flooded the metro area: their favorite restaurant; the canopy of live oaks on St. Charles Avenue, Mardi Gras, their homes. One thing that surely isn't on the list, though, is the area's levee system.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has appointed a task force to restore the levees to their pre-Katrina state by June 1, 2006 — the start of hurricane season. But Katrina victims aren't likely to find that terribly reassuring, and state and local officials who are trying to rebuild from this disaster should loudly insist that the Corps work swiftly toward building a better system than the one that clearly was not good enough.

Engineers and other experts will determine exactly why the levees failed to hold back Lake Pontchartrain, and that information will be factored into repair work. But no matter what conclusions are drawn from their analysis, the fact remains that the levees were designed to protect New Orleans from a slow-moving Category 3 storm. Katrina was a Category 4 storm, and in the long run, we can't be satisfied with a levee system that isn't equal to what we just experienced.

That's the message New Orleans City Council members delivered at a meeting Tuesday. "Pre-Katrina is not going to work for us," said Councilwoman Cynthia Hedge Morrell. "We need to go one step above." The ultimate goal for the Corps and the metro area should be a levee system that keeps storm surge out of Lake Pontchartrain and away from populated areas.

New Orleanians who lost loved ones, homes, workplaces, schools, places of worship and their peace of mind to Katrina's waters need to feel safe again if they are to come back to rebuild this place. The levee system of the past isn't going to give them that comfort level. Attracting new investment and business to a place that now seems far riskier will be next to impossible if all the Corps can offer is protection from a lesser storm.

Lt. Gen. Carl Strock of the Corps told Congress Wednesday that it will take 24 to 30 months to design and plan a more advanced levee system and another five years to build a levee that can withstand a Category 5 storm. If so, the sooner the Corps gets started, the better.

New Orleans has been lucky for many, many years. Four decades passed between Hurricane Betsy and Hurricane Katrina. But that doesn't mean we're going to get another 40 years of breathing room. We are in a far more active weather cycle, experts say, and it's bringing stronger storms and more of them. This year is not an anomaly: 2004 and 2003 were very active, very destructive seasons, too.

Just two weeks ago, President Bush stood in Jackson Square and talked boldly about the future of New Orleans. "We will not just rebuild," he said, "we will rebuild higher and better."

The metro New Orleans area takes the president at his word, and higher and better is exactly what we want to see for our new flood protection system. If we fail to build that system better, all other efforts being poured into rebuilding New Orleans could very well be washed away by another Katrina.

You may not know what you think you know

CAL THOMAS

What do you "know" about the recent hurricanes that struck the Gulf Coast, and how did you come by the information?

If your knowledge was acquired from watching the broadcast and cable networks, as it was for most people, you "know" only what their reporters and anchors told you. What they told you initially was that as many as 10,000 people probably died in New Orleans after the city was hit by Hurricane Katrina. They also reported on roving gangs who looted and terrorized survivors. And they claimed people were being raped in a darkened Superdome due to lack of security.

You also "know" that emergency relief efforts were either nonexistent or ineffective and that it was the federal government that was largely responsible because it is incompetent and its white leaders don't like poor black people.

President Bush's approval ratings are at a record low due, in part, to the public's disapproval of how the media characterized his performance in the aftermath of Katrina and the largely unrebutted assault by some Democrats who engaged in political opportunism.

Cable TV reporters and anchors made their own kind of news by screaming for help and accusing the government of not sending any. Some newspapers lauded them for becoming involved in their stories and for demonstrating a moral conscience.

Weeks after these "facts" have been deeply implanted in the public consciousness, we are now learning that much of what we "know" is incorrect.

On Monday, The Times-Picayune reported the body count numbers had been inflated. The paper also described the reported sniper attacks on civilians and fire and rescue personnel as some of the "scores of examples of myths about the (Super)dome and the Convention Center treated as fact by evacuees, the media and even some of New Orleans' top officials."

Ten bodies were recovered from the Superdome and four from the Convention Center, according to the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals, and among the 841 storm-related deaths recorded up to that point, just four were identified as gunshot victims. National Guard spokesman Major Ed Bush was inside the Superdome and told the Los Angeles Times, "What I saw in the Superdome was just tremendous amounts of people helping people." He noted that most of those stories never made it into the newspapers or on TV.

It is dangerous in chaotic situations for journalists to accept as truth accounts of distressed "witnesses" who repeat rumors as if they have actually seen what they describe.

The mayor of New Orleans, Ray Nagin, didn't help when he told Oprah Winfrey's vast TV audience about people "in that frickin' Superdome for five days watching dead bodies, watching hooligans killing people, raping people." Police Chief Eddie Compass told Oprah about "little babies getting raped" at the Superdome. Not true, but it made a riveting story and the public rewarded cable networks with high ratings.

A Los Angeles Times story Tuesday on the media's failure to report truthfully and accurately noted that journalists blame the breakdown of telephone service for the inaccuracies and says that race may also have been a factor.

Bad telephone service is not a sufficient excuse for putting anything and everything on the air without fact-checking. Waiting until you can get it right is always preferable to whatever ratings advantage one gets from allowing the journalistic equivalent of polluted water to pour into the public mind. The media should have acted as a levee in keeping out the bad stuff, but in too many cases it failed to do so.

Journalists like stories about the black poor because it allows them to beat up on a supposedly "uncaring" Republican administration, though they mostly seem to ignore such people when a Democrat is in the White House.

Few white reporters want to question or imply anything negative when it comes from a poor black person for fear they might be tarred with the "racist" label. It didn't help that some of New Orleans' top officials confirmed many of the accounts of lawlessness. But did they "know" these things, or were they repeating rumors? Did journalists bother to ask them, or was the story too good to be hurt by facts?

The Los Angeles Times story noted, "The media inaccuracies had consequences in the disaster zone." They also had unwarranted consequences on the president's approval ratings and may have caused Congress to throw too much money at the recovery effort without sufficient accountability.

Eddie Compass makes his way around Giants Stadium prior to the start of the Saints-Giants game Sept. 20. Compass, who was at the game for the coin toss, resigned Tuesday as superintendent of the New Orleans Police Department.

Compass is out, but No.1 fan still adores him

JAMES GILL

No matter what, there is one person who will always believe Eddie Compass is just the most wonderful guy in the world.

When Compass announced his resignation as police chief, his No. 1 fan was on hand to remind us that we were losing a paragon.

That fan is always on hand, being none other than Compass himself, who observed, "In the life of every leader the time comes to reflect on his life, and I'm very, very thankful God gave me the wisdom and discernment to make tough decisions."

The toughest decision that ever faces Compass is which of his many alleged virtues to brag about first. God failed to give him the wisdom and discernment to hold his vainglorious tongue.

His predecessor, Richard Pennington, was a phlegmatic soul who left it to others to praise the huge improvements he wrought. Nobody praises the police department these days, but Compass is too much in love with himself to require any support.

"When you look at my résumé, I stack up against anybody in the country," Compass claimed a couple of years ago. He characterized himself as "a free spirit, a wild bronco." You got the wrong equine, chief. Everyone else is thinking jackass.

While Compass was preening himself on his résumé, and his heroic status as a force of nature, a lot of other wild men got busy, pushing the city's murder rate, greatly moderated under Pennington, back to the top of the league. Compass, however, remained proof against self-doubt.

Katrina couldn't shake his confidence either, and he was soon heaping bouquets on himself again. "I'm still standing. I'm the ultimate warrior. I'm going to be the last person to leave the battlefield," he declared a couple of weeks ago, while most of his officers quietly went about their duties in the most appalling conditions.

Not all of them, however; 249 were insufficiently inspired by their great leader to show up for duty. Some of those who did were caught by TV cameras looting.

Compass himself was hard to find in the beginning, but finally emerged from Mayor Ray Nagin's quarters in the Hyatt Hotel to hog the television cameras blubbering and peddling misinformation. He was under great strain, but it was still a little embarrassing to see a wild bronco sobbing its little heart out.

His performances made him popular with TV interviewers, but what the city needed was a police chief who could stay on an even keel. Compass has criticized Pennington for his distant manner, but, in times of crisis, we'll take the cold fish over the hysterical rumormonger every time.

In the end our ultimate warrior left the battlefield so suddenly that he did not even give a heads-up to the officers he left behind. Since Compass had just held a powwow with Nagin, it seemed obvious that he had been given the heave-ho. Only three weeks ago he said he wanted to be police chief so long as Nagin would have him.

Nagin said Compass left of his own accord, although he also said that this was a sad day for the city and Compass was a hero, so maybe he was giving himself a little license. Several police officers said Compass told them he had been forced out. They added that he was weeping at the time, so their accounts had the ring of truth.

Nagin continues to deny firing Compass, but this would have been a most unpropitious time for Compass to capitulate. It would have been out of character too, if, as Compass' supporters aver, he cares deeply for the welfare of the city.

Whatever his concerns for the city, there is no doubt that Compass cares deeply about the kind of figure he cuts. It is impossible to believe that he would up and depart of his own accord in the middle of a crisis, if only because he would not care to be remembered as a blowhard and a quitter.

Of course, being asked to resign is not exactly a feather in the cap either. We can only hope that Compass' self-esteem is not seriously damaged.

Wake up and smell home

Robert Muir had gone through a lot by the time he made it to the Astrodome. He'd been on a rooftop in his community of St. Bernard. He'd been on a confiscated school bus that was pulled over by deputies in or around Baton Rouge. He'd lost his trailer home and his dentures, and he'd been separated from a man named Leslie Creek who asked Muir to hold his wallet before going off to help an elderly man struggling with a boat.

But Muir didn't complain about all that. What he did complain about were the days he went without coffee.

How could anybody expect him to endure that silently?

Generally speaking, the New Orleans area is a carefree place. We don't take ourselves all that seriously. But there are some things we'll fight you over if you don't do them right. They include gumbo, jazz, parades and, yes, coffee.

Some outsiders might think Muir a malcontent — many of us have probably come across that way since our displacement — but he deserves credit for turning aggravation into accomplishment. He set out from the Astrodome in search of his beloved Community Coffee. When he found some at the Fiesta Mart, he refused to keep such a treasure to himself.

He bought a small coffee maker and started serving it up to fellow evacuees. Gratis.

"I wasn't about to buy it just for myself," he said from a phone in Corpus Christi. Muir paid out of his pocket for the coffee and the equipment he used to make it. He was able to do that because he still had an active bank account from an earlier stint in Texas. So unlike others who had been brought to the sports arena on buses, he had access to his money.

It's also obvious that he had a generosity of spirit. It took him about $40 a day when he first started brewing with the residential machine, but the long line of people thirsty for a taste of home compelled him to buy larger and spend more. He bought a commercial machine that could output coffee at three times the rate of the old machine. Soon, he was serving 525 cups a day and spending more than $82 a day to do so.

He told me about one of his first "customers." She told him that the smell of coffee had awakened her. "Smells delicious." She sipped. "Oh, my God. Community Coffee."

When he talked about it Wednesday, Muir sounded like he was still beaming over the woman's reaction. "It was beautiful, you know?"

He was also boasting.

"When I first started, we weren't getting any coffee at all." But then the "Red Cross started serving coffee in the morning. People weren't getting their coffee. They were coming for mine. That made me feel even better."

He refused money.

"Twice, somebody put a tip jar up," he said, but he got rid of it. "I wasn't doing it for money, you know what I mean?"

He did it "because we all had one thing behind our name: survivor. We was all family."

Muir's lasting regret is that he hasn't been able to find Creek, the man whose wallet he accepted in St. Bernard. They had planned to meet in Houston, but Muir never found him in or around the Astrodome. Muir's not in Houston anymore, but he said he left Creek's wallet behind at "property holding" at the arena.

He left Houston because of Hurricane Rita's threat. As the storm drew closer to the Texas coast, large numbers of Louisiana evacuees left Houston heading north. Muir headed south to Corpus Christi, where he had lived before.

He claims the poor quality of the coffee in Arkansas factored into his decision. According to Muir, that state's brew is so weak you can pour it in a clear glass and read a newspaper through it. Why, it's worse than California's coffee. After contemplating the severity of that insult, he rethought the comparison. Arkansas coffee isn't worse, but "It's about as bad."

And for a 66-year-old with strong ties to New Orleans, that's just not acceptable.

He's adamant. "I'm too old to drink coffee like tea."

SAN ANTONIO — No one is more disappointed and frustrated by Sunday's performance against the Minnesota Vikings than Saints wide receiver Joe Horn.

One catch for 11 yards, this coming six days after grabbing seven passes for 143 yards and one touchdown in primetime against the New York Giants.

Only twice before, in five-plus seasons with New Orleans, has Horn caught as few as one pass in a game (against Minnesota in 2001 and Tennessee in '03.

"I gotta give credit to Minnesota," Horn said Thursday sitting in front of his locker at the Alamodome. "Regardless if I had eight balls or two balls thrown to me, they found a way to stop me. Yeah, they blitzed us and I saw double teams, so what? We saw it in 2000, 2001, 2002, 2003 and last year and we found ways to beat it."

Horn paused to check an incoming text message on his cell phone, and smiled.

SAN ANTONIO — The Saints fell 10,800 tickets short of their goal of selling out their Alamodome debut against the Buffalo Bills by Thursday at noon.

The deadline became a moot point Thursday when the NFL announced that local television blackout rules would not apply to the three Saints games played in San Antonio this year.

Nevertheless, there was a mixture of disappointment and pride after a whirlwind two weeks of marketing and sales efforts reached the initial deadline.

"I was hopeful it would be a sellout," San Antonio mayor Phil Hardberger said Thursday afternoon.

It was a night to remember, even though the victory didn't count.

A New Orleans public school, Kennedy High, defeated private school and Catholic League member, Brother Martin, in the Tad Gormley Jamboree. The victory — public over private — was a rare event in New Orleans, even though it came in a contest that, in reality, was no more than a glorified scrimmage.

But don't tell that to seniors Melvin Lee and Courtney Smith, cousins and starters for Kennedy in the game. That night, Lee, Kennedy's quarterback, and Smith, a wide receiver, felt like rulers of the local prep football scene.

Two days later, they were chased from their homes and school by Hurricane Katrina.

The cousins, who say they're as close as

Miles on very short leash with LSU fans

No sooner had Tennessee running back Gerald Riggs bulled into the end zone with the winning points Monday night in Tiger Stadium, there was a new Web site: firelsucoaches.com.

Welcome to the Wonderful World of Les Miles.

In the wee hours of Tuesday, fans were busy flooding the LSU message boards.

12:51 a.m.: "I never thought I'd be afraid of Vandy."

1:13 a.m.: "What's the date of the Independence Bowl?"

2:17 a.m.: "There are some positive things about Miles. He can coach his baby to sing the fight song."

7:51 a.m.: "I think I just saw one of our DBs running around my neighborhood. He said he was in a soft zone, playing 15 yards off the ball."

On and on it went.

Was this the shortest honeymoon in NCAA history, shorter than the one Ron Zook had in Gainesville, Fla.?

BATON ROUGE — LSU players used a number of buzzwords to try to explain the team's defensive troubles in Monday night's 30-27 overtime loss to Tennessee.

Missed keys, poor alignments, breakdowns. A favorite explanation was communication, or lack thereof.

But senior defensive tackle Kyle Williams had his own terminology. Williams was fuming after the game, calling the loss during which the Tigers blew a 21-0 halftime lead, "a freaking joke." On Wednesday, there was some leftover emotion with the added perspective of having graded the game tape.

"We had an opportunity to put a good football team away," he said. "We couldn't get anything going, on either side of the ball in the second half. We got

Reed says Hornets can be quite a story

By Jimmy Smith
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — While conceding there are many more important issues to deal with as the Crescent City and the Gulf Coast recovers from Hurricane Katrina, Willis Reed says he believes Hornets fans will continue to embrace the team, despite its likely yearlong absence from New Orleans.

And Reed, the team's vice president of basketball operations, said the team might pick up a few fans from other parts of the world, as well.

"This is a story," Reed, a native of Bernice, La., said Thursday as he and former NBA players Artis Gilmore, Bob Love and Dan Roundfield toured three evacuation centers in the area, bringing supplies and good cheer to those still displaced.

"The Hornets will be a story behind the story. You can talk about Chris Paul or J.R. Smith or P.J. Brown or Byron Scott and the team, or Mr. (George) Shinn. But the fact that we were part of a tragic situation, the most devastating natural disaster ever to happen to America in our lifetime, for sure, it will make a lot of people have some sympathy for us.

"There are a lot of people who know about the Hornets now that probably never knew about them before. Or people who never knew about the state of Louisiana. Or New Orleans and Metairie, and Kenner and the 9th Ward."

Last week, the NBA announced that the Hornets, whose home at New Orleans Arena was damaged by Katrina's floodwaters, would play 35 home games at the Ford Center in Oklahoma City and six at the Pete Maravich Assembly Center at LSU.

There's a slim possibility that three games scheduled in Baton Rouge toward the end of the season could be played back in the Arena, if it, and the rest of the city, are prepared to host NBA teams.

But Gilmore said where the Hornets play this season is insignificant.

"The overall situation here is very difficult," Gilmore said. "First of all, the concern is for the people of New Orleans. The Hornets are concerned. But the priorities are to the people just trying to reestablish themselves as citizens of the community.

"And I think those thoughts are certainly in focus. That's something that will take time. This is a very uncomfortable situation for the Hornets and even for the Saints, who are already out of the city. But when the Hornets come back, I'm sure the fans will be back, too."

Reed, who was in the New York Knicks' front office at the time of the 9/11 terrorists attacks, said the scope of the tragedy in New Orleans is far greater.

"Our fans are getting their lives back in order, trying to do things with their homes. This has just been a major catastrophe," Reed said. "When 9/11 occurred, there was a loss of a lot of lives and very devastating. But it was in a little area, and the rest of the world went on. But you look at how much water consumed so many people's property, personal items, things they'll never see again.

"We want to come back. Anything we can do to help lift the spirits of the fans and the people in Louisiana and the Mississippi Gulf Coast, we'll try to do it."

Ready or not, Bullocks to get first start

Saints rookie to move in for injured Bellamy at safety against Bills

By Mike Triplett and Brian Allee-Walsh
Staff writers

SAN ANTONIO — Before suffering a season-ending shoulder injury last Sunday, Saints safety Jay Bellamy had started 122 consecutive games in the NFL.

This Sunday, Saints rookie Josh Bullocks will start his streak at one.

Bullocks, a second-round draft pick from Nebraska, will replace Bellamy in the starting lineup. What the 6-foot-1, 207-pounder lacks in experience, the Saints are hoping he can make up for in pure natural ability.

"It's a very exciting opportunity. It's just sad it had to turn out the way it did. But I've got to be prepared," said Bullocks, who spouted off the old football cliche' about being ready at all times because you never know when your turn will come.

It didn't take long for that to ring true for Bullocks, who left Nebraska after his junior season with 13 career interceptions — second in school history.

Bullocks dazzled the coaches early this past offseason and seemed to possibly be pushing Bellamy for his starting job. But Bullocks took a step back in training camp, a little overloaded with the dizzying amounts of installations.

"Training camp was just a lot of stuff thrown at you," Bullocks said. "Learning the system as you go on, there's going to be little kinks and adjustments. It's a lot more detail in training camp.

"Once training camp really got going for me, like midway, that's when things really started to click for me."

Bullocks said the biggest difference between college and the NFL is that, in college, you had time limitations set by the NCAA for things like film study and school work. Now, football is a full-time job.

It's "all you do."

The other major difference for Bullocks is that he is not playing alongside his twin brother, Daniel, a senior safety with the Cornhuskers. The two of them had never been apart in their football careers.

Bullocks will line up at free safety Sunday against the Buffalo Bills, with veteran Dwight Smith moving over to Bellamy's strong safety spot.

Smith, a first-year Saint who signed in free agency, said he doesn't expect to play the role of supervisor on the field.

"No, I'm looking for him to help me out," Smith said. "We've both played the same amount of games here in New Orleans. That rookie stuff, all that went out the door in training camp.

"He looks good to me. He's well on pace to be a great player in this league. Sometimes you get pushed into that role a little earlier than you thought. But in this league, you're always one play away."

Horn ready to shed mistakes

SAINTS, from C-1

"Now where was I? Oh yeah, you can make all the excuses you want," he said. "Hey, I lined up in the wrong spot a couple of times. Those were mental mistakes on my part. And we got down by 24 points, but I'm a receiver and I want the rock. Deuce (McAllister) wants it, Donte' (Stallworth) wants it, we all want it. One frickin' ball, so yeah I'm pissed."

Horn did not practice Thursday for a second consecutive day because of an injured left hamstring and remains questionable for Sunday's "home" opener against the Buffalo Bills at the Alamodome.

But Horn is not expected to miss the game. The four-time Pro Bowler has proven to be an iron man since signing with the Saints a free agent in 2000, playing in all but one regular-season game of a possible 93.

"He usually shows up,'' Saints coach Jim Haslett said.

Horn said he anticipated the Bills and future opponents would employ a similar defensive strategy against him and Stallworth, who had no catches against the Vikings after catching eight for 141 yards against the Giants.

"Teams blitz Michael Vick a lot, so I'd be stupid to think that teams wouldn't treat Aaron (Brooks) the same, especially when they see how much success Minnesota had," Horn said. "Of course, we're trying to put a plug in that. We want to invite teams to blitz us so we can beat it."

The Vikings were successful getting to Saints quarterback Aaron Brooks with a variety of blitzes and playing cover 2 in the secondary.

"They rolled up their coverage to Joe and tried to take him out of the game and they stopped our running game," Haslett said. "We didn't make enough attempts to get the ball to Joe or Donte'. The week before they had 18 catches for almost 300 yards. Last week they had one catch, so obviously we didn't do a good enough job. We got to get Joe the ball early and get him in the swing of things."

"Maybe it was the defensive scheme,'' Horn said. "They seemed to know what down I was getting the ball on. They blitzed a lot on third down. Aaron got pressure that we didn't think he'd get. So if Aaron was supposed to get me the ball or Donte' the ball or whoever, he would have to be real quick with his decision making. It was a great defensive game plan, and remember they were playing with a lead."

Horn said he feels no different than other elite NFL receivers when it comes to his role in a game plan each week.

"I want the ball 20 times a game," he said. "I want the ball like T.O. and the rest of those guys. But I also know that our offense is built on the running game and we catch balls off play action. Against Minnesota, we didn't play our parts. But I'm always frustrated when I don't get the ball. That doesn't change."

Horn said he was particularly frustrated for Saints fans everywhere who have been displaced by Hurricane Katrina, and he encouraged them to keep the faith during these difficult times.

"I don't have to tell Saints fans to stay with us because they are going to love us regardless," he said. "But wherever they are, I want them to know we care about them and we'll never forget what happened. We'll carry them on our back each game. But just because we lose a game doesn't mean we don't love them or that we don't care about their situations. I want them to know that wherever they are.

"It's our responsibility as men and players to carry their burden. This is a job but it's still a game and it's supposed to be fun. We're doing stuff we'd do even if we weren't getting paid for it, so why not carry their burden? Katrina has put things in perspective."

Although the Saints' have been forced to move their base of operations to San Antonio and Katrina wreaked havoc with their schedule, Horn said there is no excuse for the way the team has played the past two weeks.

After all, this is the same team that upset the Carolina Panthers on the road in the season opener.

"I think the team that played against Carolina is going to show up Sunday against Buffalo," Horn said. "That team came out with an attitude and spunk. We all want to win around here. If I felt like guys have slacked off or acted like they don't want to play, I'd tell you that. I may get scolded for it and Has might fine me but I'm going to say what I feel. This football team is preparing the right way. We're 1-2 but we got a lot of football left to play. Don't count us out yet. Be sure of that.

TV rules won't apply in San Antonio

SAN ANTONIO, from C-1

"But I was not really disappointed, because I thought that was a very difficult thing to do. There was very little advertisement of this. It's something that we had a very short lead time in. It wasn't as if the people of San Antonio had known all year, like they would if you had a team here, that these games were going to be here.

"Just the marketing and selling of those tickets in a very short time, I actually think they did a pretty good job."

Several local businesses had discussed guaranteeing the remaining tickets in order to avoid the television blackout. But that became unnecessary with the league's announcement.

The remaining tickets are still available, and the game might sell out by Sunday's noon kickoff. Also, the Saints' Oct. 16 game against the more-marketable Atlanta Falcons is fewer than 5,000 tickets away from being sold out.

But expectations were high that the Bills game would sell out more quickly when more than 50,000 tickets were sold the day they went on sale two weeks ago for the three dates in San Antonio this season.

That number rose to 100,000 by the end of the first week before ticket sales slowed. Early technical difficulties and last week's arrival of Hurricane Rita certainly didn't help.

Miles can't escape comparisons to Saban

FINNEY, from C-1

game, you become the first LSU coach to blow a three-touchdown lead in Tiger Stadium.

If you went to Washington, D.C., and hired one of those spinmasters' to help the Les Miles cause, what would you be hearing?

Probably:

Didn't Nick Saban start out 2-2 in his first season?

Didn't he lose to Alabama-Birmingham, not to be confused with Alabama-Tuscaloosa?

Didn't Saban, in his third season, get drilled by Auburn, 31-7, on the road, and by Alabama, 31-0, in Tiger Stadium?

That same year, didn't his defense allow Arkansas to drive the length of the field in the final seconds to win, 21-20, and knock the Tigers out of the SEC title game?

Didn't Saban, in his final season, get drummed by Georgia, 45-16?

And, in his last game, didn't a defensive breakdown on the final play hand Iowa a 30-25 victory?

Sure, sure, sure.

But here's the rest of the story.

The team Nick Saban inherited from Gerry DiNardo in 2000 was not nearly as talent-wealthy as the one Les Miles inherited from Saban.

Yes, Saban did not have his team ready to play UAB in 2000 (when Josh Booty threw an interception that wasn't in the playbook).

Yes, Saban had poor preparation, and inspiration, for Auburn and for Bama in '02. Yes, he was roundly outcoached in the '04 loss to Georgia. And, yes, in the area Saban personally coached, the secondary, Corey Webster blew coverage big time in the loss to Arkansas, and Ronnie Prude did the same against Iowa.

Stuff happens.

But let's get something crystal clear.

When it came to winning BIG games, Saban was the best hire LSU has made since the championship seasons of Paul Dietzel, going back to the late '50s into the early '60s.

For comparison's sake, Saban was a more effective package as a coach than Bill Arnsparger because Saban, unlike Arnsparger, not only loved recruiting but enjoyed enormous success. Saban rebuilt the LSU program like no one had since Dietzel.

So what about Les Miles?

Say this: Les has miles and miles to go to approach what Saban achieved in the most highly competitive conference going.

You were reminded, once Monday night's 21-0 lead turned into a 30-27 defeat, it was not a first, that last year Miles' Oklahoma State Cowboys turned a 35-0 lead against Texas into a 56-35 loss.

There was a difference in the two turnarounds, however. Texas had far superior personnel, and when the 'Horns got rolling, they rolled. Personnel-wise, LSU and Tennessee are even. What happened in the second half on Monday is simple: Miles was outcoached.

After limiting the Vols to 17 rushing yards in the first half, after pressuring the quarterback, his defense had no answer to get the Vols off the field.

Meanwhile, LSU's offense was 1-for-7 in converting third downs.

"We lost our poise,'' explained Miles. You could translate that this way: "We did a lousy job adjusting to what they were doing."

Coaching is more than Xs-and-Os. It's also knowing your personnel. With only one game to work on, Monday night proved Miles is still learning.

Obviously, other than the head coach, no one is under the gun more than defensive coordinator Bo Pelini.

Unlike Saban, Miles' expertise is offense, making Pelini the key hire in a revamped staff. It came as no surprise, after Tennessee receivers ran free because of broken coverage, Pelini was being compared to Lou Tepper, the defensive coordinator whose schemes helped pave the way to Gerry DiNardo's departure.

Saban was ruthless in hiring assistants. And cutting them loose. He knew the buck stopped at his desk. He knew, even though he called a timeout in the '02 Arkansas game and told Corey Webster, "Stay back, keep the receiver in front of you," when Webster failed to do this, it was Saban's fault, not the player's.

Which takes you to the final seconds of halftime on Monday when the Tigers were knocking on the door, but without timeouts. Did the head coach tell his quarterback, JaMarcus Russell, "If you can't throw or run for a cinch touchdown, throw an incompletion so we can kick a field goal?"

Whatever happened, what Russell did - he was stopped on the five trying to run it in - put the burden on the head coach, not the quarterback. In this case, a heavy burden, a precious three points.

If, as they say, adversity builds character, we'll soon learn how Miles handles a short honeymoon, how he handles his staff, mostly how he handles players who'll be hearing, over and over how Saban would never have blown a 21-point lead, especially in Tiger Stadium.

"First Katrina, then Rita, now this," moaned one message. "Does somebody up there hate us?"

We'll see.

complacent."

Complacency is a little harder to spot than an open receiver or a missed tackle, of which there were plenty, but all played a part. During halftime, the Tennessee offense went from a team that couldn't seem to throw or catch to one that chipped its way downfield with suddenly startling efficiency behind quarterback Rick Clausen.

Many critics want to blame new defensive coordinator Bo Pelini's scheme, especially after watching former LSU coach Nick Saban's complex sets dominate for the past few years. Pelini was not available for comment, but the players agree the Tigers simply aren't bringing it from the practice field to the games.

"Our scheme is sound. It just has to be executed the way it's supposed to be," Williams said. "They coach us to correct (breakdowns) in Arizona, and it was corrected, and we got back there and were playing not to lose. We were not attacking and getting after the guys to win, and it seems like everything broke down again.

"Whatever hand you're dealt, you have to learn to play it. What we did last year blitzing all the time, that's not going to be played all the time. You have to learn to play what you're taught to play and what your game plan is, no matter who the coaching staff is or who you're playing. These coaches know what they are doing, and they know how to beat football teams. They've all been to places where they've won a lot of games. And, because we're not handling our business in whatever phase, it looks bad defensively."

Said senior cornerback Ronnie Prude: "We still have confidence in what we're doing. If it's played right, the defense is going to be great."

So what happened?

First of all, the Tigers faced two Tennessee offenses Monday night.

In the first half, LSU shut down Tennessee's running game. And, when a rattled Vols quarterback Erik Ainge wasn't missing open receivers, they were dropping passes. That contributed a great deal to the Tigers' big halftime lead.

Clausen calmed things down and patiently worked the Vols down the field in the second half. On Tennessee's first touchdown drive, he completed six of seven passes, none of them longer than nine yards. He used the same type of short passing game that netted Arizona State 461 yards passing in the Tigers' first game.

At the same time, LSU was struggling with personnel.

Eleven defensive backs played, which put some on the field who were lacking in game experience. LSU coach Les Miles said he went into the game planning to play a lot of players. But, because so many players were having problems cramps, they had to continue shuttling players and using a variety of combinations.

"We got some cramps late in the game, especially in those skilled kids that were running all the time," Miles said. "They (Tennessee) had the ball 10 more minutes than we did in the second half. The defense was on the field a long time, and we wanted to give those guys some fresh legs when possible."

With so many new and inexperienced faces, there were bound to be breakdowns. On one play, Tennessee missed on an 87-yard touchdown only because wide-open Brett Smith had to make a diving catch of a Clausen pass. In the fourth quarter, Cory Anderson was running down the sideline all alone but dropped a sure touchdown pass.

"It's not that they shouldn't have been playing, but there were some people who get a lot of mental reps in practice instead of (actually) getting in practice and knowing the reps," said safety Jessie Daniels. "I have no doubt they knew what to do but it was a first time situation for them and they probably were nervous. They knew what to do, but, at the time, they didn't (do it) because they were so nervous. We can't blame (the loss) on that."

Miles said the lack of routine because of the hurricanes has slowed the team's overall development. Playing games 16 days apart made for ragged play Monday night, a game Miles said looked like a "rusty first game."

Miles also said he saw improvement in the secondary between the two games, despite the breakdowns. He said he doesn't anticipate using as many defensive backs Saturday at Mississippi State and said he has a better idea of which ones can play.

If there is a blessing in the shorter week, the players get a chance to make amends quicker and retain some of the lessons learned in defeat.

"We're very anxious to prove to everybody we've regained our confidence in the team we are," said Daniels. "If we keep playing like we're playing ,with less mistakes, we're going to win a lot of games."

Horror story? UNO hoping to play some games on campus

Health & P.E. Center a strong possibility as site for basketball

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

It could be back to the future for UNO basketball.

The school's Human Performance Center, formerly the Health & P.E. Center and better known as The Chamber of Horrors during the early days of the program, is the likely home for the Privateers until hurricane-damaged Lakefront Arena can be repaired.

"The HPC wasn't damaged at all," UNO athletic director Jim Miller said Thursday. "And we were already renovating it before Katrina.

"It would be mostly a matter of installing the new floor, which had already been delivered. We're not counting out Lakefront Arena yet, but this is an exciting option for us."

The HPC was the original home of UNO basketball from 1969-83. The Privateers were 131-37 at home during those 14 seasons. It can seat about 2,000.

UNO men's coach Monte Towe applauded the idea of playing at the HPC.

"That's wonderful news," he said. "A lot of our tradition is right there in that building, and I think we could create a great atmosphere.

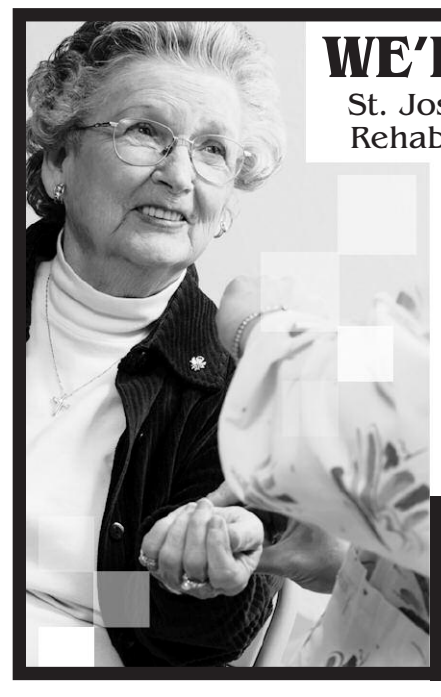
"The important thing is that we're back playing in New Orleans."

Both the men's and women's basketball teams have been relocated to the University of Texas at Tyler and will play their early non-conference games home games there.

Playing at either the HPC or Lakefront Arena is dependent on classes at UNO's main campus resuming for the spring semester in January.

School officials have said that is their intention but no definitive word has been given.

Miller said the Pontchartrain Center and Alario Center had been considered for the basketball teams if neither on-campus arena can be repaired, but the Pontchartrain Center did not have enough available dates, and the Alario Center is being used as a staging area for National Guard troops.



After a New Year's Eve game against Tulane, UNO's next home game would be Jan. 12 against Troy. The UNO women would play their first on-campus game Jan. 5 against North Texas.

One problem with returning to play at UNO could be the lack of available housing. Privateer Place, the primary residence for the teams, was heavily damaged during Katrina, but Miller said his information is that enough of the units could be repaired for the players and coaching staff to live there.

"It won't be perfect," he said. "But if things are put on a priority basis, we can accomplish want we want to do.

"Everybody wants answers on when we can do this or that. But it's impossible to put a deadline on things because there are changes daily."

Miller also said that, while Privateer Park suffered damage to the press box, fences and light poles, he believed repairs could be made in time for baseball season, which begins in late February.

Storms produce matchup of Cats

By Lori Lyons
Staff writer

Normal.

In the wake of recent events that have turned many of our lives upside down, everyone is trying to get back there. In the River Parishes, at least, life is about as close to normal as it can be — except for the traffic. Most of our homes were only a little dented.

We have power, we have water, we even have cable.

And we have football.

For River Parishes football fans, the silver lining to the destruction hurricanes Katrina and Rita have wrought is the new and improved football schedule.

Local fans have been rewarded for their perseverance with a couple of extra all-River matchups like Hahnville vs. Lutcher and a double dose of Hahnville vs. East St. John.

This week's lineup is no exception. This week we get to see the undefeated St. James Wildcats take on the undefeated Destrehan Wildcats. We get to see undefeated St. Charles take on defending Class 2A state champion West St. John, which, unbelievably, is looking for its first win. And we get to see John Curtis start its season against its former quarterback Johnnie Thiel, who is now playing for East St. John.

Fans with good memories might recall a time when Destrehan and St. James played in the same district or even a time when both teams ran the wing-T. The last time these teams met was in 1996. St. James won 13-7.

Tonight they will meet in a Katrina-arranged pickup game. Both were scheduled to play Orleans Parish opponents. Destrehan is the fourth-ranked team in Class 5A. St. James is the No. 1 team in Class 3A.

Destrehan's multiple attack has defeated former district foes Thibodaux, Terrebonne and South Lafourche this season, allowing them a collective 21 points. St. James's wing-T has already rolled over 5A opponents Terrebonne and South Lafourche, plus 2A opponent Varnado. The Wildcats have outscored those opponents 117-19. This game has all the makings of a River Parishes classic, pulled out by one team in the end. The bigger, stronger Destrehan Wildcats should prevail.

Destrehan 27, St. James 24.

THE OTHER PICKS

East St. John 35, Curtis 20: Curtis may be last year's Class 4A champion, but size-wise, it's a 2A team. And with more than a dozen football players missing the Patriots' first game of the season, they have holes. That doesn't bode well for any team going against the high-powered Wildcats.

St. Charles 34, West St. John 20: Granted, St. Charles isn't exactly playing the toughest schedule, but the Comets are pounding their opponents. The Rams struggled mightily against Riverside last week.

Riverside 30, St. John 17: The way he reverses field, Riverside running back Jarid Caesar ought to be given an extra 10 yards on every long run. He was unstoppable against West St. John last week. He'll likely be again in this one.

Lutcher 20, Catholic-New Iberia 12: Lutcher coach Tim Detiller fought as hard to find an opponent as his team did last week against Hahnville.

Hahnville 27, Patterson 24: Hahnville's offense needs to play better than it did against Lutcher. But the Tigers have a new weapon in Rummel transfer Robbie Broach.

Thiel eager to show Patriots why he left

By Lori Lyons
Staff writer

For Johnnie Thiel, choosing his most memorable game is difficult.

Last December, Thiel's sophomore season ended with his team winning the Class 4A state championship in the Superdome. Thiel, then the quarterback of the John Curtis Patriots, was chosen Most Outstanding Player after rushing for 77 yards on nine carries with one touchdown.

It was a game Thiel said he will never forget.

"That will always be special to me," he said.

But this season, Thiel is the quarterback of the East St. John Wildcats. And Sunday he completed nine of 12 passes for 225 yards and three touchdowns and ran for two more scores as East St. John defeated East Ascension 49-7. He said that might have been a little bit sweeter.

Thiel, a junior, decided in January to transfer from Curtis to East St. John.

"I felt like I wanted to come to a place where I could stand out more," said Thiel, who had attended Curtis since he was a third-grader. "At Curtis, we only threw the ball two or three times per game. I wanted to throw the ball more. (Curtis coach J.T. Curtis) just didn't want to change his style."

Tonight, Thiel is hoping he will get to show his former coach and teammates what he can do when East St. John hosts the Patriots at 7 p.m. at Joe Keller Stadium in Reserve. It is the third game and the final tune-up before District 5-5A play begins for East St. John, which missed seven days of school because of Hurricane Katrina. For Curtis, which resumed classes on Monday, it is the season-opener.

"I'm ready," Thiel said.

That's how Thiel said he felt last January when he decided to walk away from Curtis to transfer to the school that is walking distance from his house. He knew that Ryan Perrilloux, East St. John's quarterback last year, was graduating. Theil felt he had the arm to step into Perrilloux's spot. All he had to do was beat out heir apparent Ricky Dixon, Perrilloux's backup last season, who also is a stand-out wide receiver.

"I talked to Coach (Larry) Dauterive, and he told me, if I can produce, he would leave Ricky at receiver," Thiel said.

That's just how it worked out. Dixon, who ran for 333 yards and seven touchdowns last season, remained at receiver, and Thiel took over at quarterback.

Dauterive said Thiel's January transfer was fortuitous for both of them.

"It was very prudent that he did come when he did," Dauterive said. "He had to learn our offense, and it isn't very easy to learn. And Ricky is a better receiver. That's what he's going to go to college as."

Dauterive said he had some doubts about a quarterback coming from Curtis' veer offense to East St. John's wide-open passing attack. But Thiel is proving his worth. Against Hahnville, he completed his first three passes, a 70-yarder to Stanley Jackson, a 32-yarder to Joshuelle Tuesno and a 30-yarder to Louis Lee. But he was 0-for-3 in the second half. Against East Ascension, he was 9-of-9 for 225 yards and three touchdowns in the first half. After going 0-for-3 in the second half, he was replaced by Dixon, who Dauterive said, "needed some reps."

"He's learning to pass," Dauterive said of Thiel. "He's real fun to coach. He's very shifty. He needs to work on his pitches on the option - which you wouldn't expect with him coming from Curtis. When you think about Curtis, you think option."

J.T. Curtis said he has no hard feelings toward Thiel.

"That's a decision he and his parents made," Curtis said. "Obviously, he did what he felt he needed to do. I hope he has a nice career. He's done a nice job so far. When I saw him play (for East St. John), he played real well."

Family concerns weigh heavy

brothers, were split apart. Lee wound up in Temecula Valley, Calif., located north of San Diego. Smith is in Prattville, Ala., about 10 minutes north of Montgomery.

Both are enrolled in school and playing football but carry the burden of concern about their homes and family.

Smith doesn't know the whereabouts of his 7-year-old brother, Jonte, who fled Katrina with his father. Smith has yet to hear from them.

Smith and Lee say two things keep the anxiety they feel from overwhelming them — phone calls to each other and football.

Every night at 10 p.m. CST, they talk by phone. Lee and Smith talk about their families. They talk about what's going on back home. They talk about their new schools and teams. They talk about when they'll be reunited and play together again.

That, they say, will happen.

But the reunion will not happen any time soon. Since floodwaters decimated Kennedy and many other Orleans Parish schools, football season is canceled for this year.

A new position in a new place

Melvin Lee doesn't want to make a fuss about it, but, judging by the tone of his voice, playing running back and defensive back isn't something he wanted, thought or dreamed he would be doing in his senior season.

Lee was Kennedy's quarterback for three years. But the move to California necessitated a move in position.

Lee, 6-foot-1 and 200 pounds, found the quarterback position occupied at Temecula Valley High School, his new school. But the need to play outweighed the need to be a quarterback. So, he accepted being a back-up running back and defensive back at his new school.

"This has been a big adjustment for me," he said.

But Lee said if he can survive Katrina, certainly, he can survive this.

Two days after the jamboree victory, as Katrina approached, Lee evacuated with a friend to Missouri City, Texas. He stayed there for about 10 days before he decided he wanted to go to high school again. He called his aunt, who lives in Temecula Valley, Calif. She enrolled him in school, told the counselors he wanted to play football and had him introduced to Temecula Valley coach Bud Kane.

It's taken Lee a while to get adjusted to playing running back and defensive back, but he thinks things will get better with time. He rushed for 36 yards on 10 carries and had four solo tackles and one assisted tackle on 10 defensive plays in Temecula Valley's 21-11 victory against Yucaipa last Friday.

"Eventually, he's going to be a starter for us at cornerback," Kane said. "He's a very good athlete."

Lee said he likes his new school and his new classmates. He's also made the adjustment from the party atmosphere of New Orleans to the laid-back ways of Southern California.

But Lee said he will always long for what could have been at Kennedy this season, not only in terms of football but the entire school year, his senior year.

"To me, there ain't nothing like Kennedy," he said. "There ain't nothing like my old school."

A new game in a strange place

Courtney Smith just wants to play in a high school football game again, but he has to wait. Prattville High School, which lost in the Class 6A state finals to Hoover last season, has a bye this week and won't play again until Oct. 7, against Montgomery Carver.

Smith fits in well with his new team, his new school and his new coaches, he said. But this is an adjustment he wished he didn't have to make.

Katrina brought chaos to Smith's life, his family and his senior season.

One day before the storm hit, Smith and his little sister, Boncilla, left the rest of his family, which stayed in town to ride out the storm. Smith and his sister rode in his white 1994 Pontiac Grand Prix and followed friend, Lantz Mathers to Mathers' relatives' house outside of Baton Rouge.

Smith and his sister stayed there for two days, then left and joined his cousin and her family in Houston. Two weeks later, he and his former Kennedy teammate, Brandon Norton, moved to Prattville to stay with some of the former Kennedy football coaches.

Smith began the search for the rest of his family right after he arrived in Prattville. Last week, he posted a notice on the Internet and got a call from his mother and father, who were placed with other New Orleans evacuees in Arkansas. It was his first contact with his parents since Katrina.

Now, Smith's primary concern is Jonte.

"I don't want to think about Jonte not being alive," Smith said. "He's alright somewhere. I miss my little brother."

Playing at Prattville has taken a back seat to what's going on in Smith's life, but he couldn't wait to get back to the refuge of the football field.

Smith has had to adjust on the football field, too. Kennedy operated out of a spread offense, but Smith has found Pratville's wide-open, four-receiver offense more complicated, and it has taken him a while to learn the plays.

But Prattville coach Bill Clark said he's been impressed with Smith since he started practicing with the team. He's eager to see how the 6-foot-4, 220-pound receiver plays in a game.

"Courtney has done a good job of fitting in, and he has good hands," Clark said.

Smith said he likes Prattville, and having Norton and other Kennedy coaches around makes things easier for him, but he misses his old school.

He misses Lee and the chemistry the two developed on the field.

While he and Lee realize they won't be together for their senior seasons, they do look to the future.

Their new coaches think Lee and Smith could play in college. So do the players. In fact, they're planning on it. It's something they talk about almost every night during their phone calls.

"Courtney and I planned on doing it big this year, and I can't wait until next year," Lee said.

Just a pipe dream? Maybe not.

After all, no one thought Kennedy could defeat Brother Martin.

TODAY'S GAMES

ST. JAMES (3-0) at DESTREHAN (3-0)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: St. James defeated Varnado 42-6. Destrehan defeated South Lafourche 38-7.
Last year: Did not play.
Notes: Non-district game. The last time these teams played was in 1996. St. James won 13-7. Destrehan is ranked No. 4 in Class 5A. St. James is the No. 1 team in Class 2A. Destrehan quarterback Jai Eugene passed for two touchdowns and ran for two last week. St. James gained 454 yards with four running backs rushing for 40 yards or more.

JOHN CURTIS (0-0) at EAST ST. JOHN (1-1)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: East St. John defeated East Ascension 49-7. Curtis did not play.
Last year: Did not play.
Notes: Non-district game. East St. John is ranked No. 7 in Class 5A. Curtis is unranked since the Patriots have not played a game. The Patriots had their first day of practice Sept. 19. Coach J.T. Curtis said his team is missing about 15 players, including several starters. East St. John quarterback Johnnie Thiel, who transferred from Curtis at mid-term last year, was 9-of-12 for 225 yards and three touchdowns last week. He also ran for two touchdowns.

RIVERSIDE (3-0) at ST. JOHN (2-1)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Riverside defeated West St. John 51-20. St. John's game against Hanson was canceled.
Last year: Did not play.
Notes: Non-district game. Riverside is ranked eighth in Class 2A. St. John is ranked ninth in Class 1A. St. John rushed for 224 yards in a 42-13 victory against Dunham on Sept. 15 and forced seven turnovers. Riverside gained 440 yards last week. Running back Jarid Caesar rushed for 257 and four touchdowns.

WEST ST. JOHN (0-3) at ST. CHARLES (3-0)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: West St. John lost to Riverside 51-20. St. Charles defeated Pine 49-6.
Last year: Did not play.
Notes: Non-district game. These teams last met in 2003. West St. John won 37-27. St. Charles receiver Casey Robottom returned two kickoffs for touchdowns and caught two touchdown passes last week. The Comets intercepted three passes. West St. John alternated quarterbacks Olajuwon Hall, who was five-of-10 for 105 yards and two touchdowns, and Blaine Gautier, who was six-of-12 for 107 yards with no touchdowns. Both threw interceptions.

COVINGTON (0-0) at PONCHATOULA (0-1)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Neither team played.
Last year: Covington won 34-0.
Notes: District 4-5A game. Ponchatoula lost to South Terrebonne 38-0 in the only game it played. Though the Lions missed the first four weeks of the season, the time off helped two of its stars heal. Patrick Henry had a groin injury and off-season shoulder surgery and is now healed, Lions coaches said. Blake Ramsey, a defensive lineman, also had some nagging injuries and is 100 percent. But the squad was still getting in condition after last week's first full week of training since Hurricane Katrana. "We're out of shape," Covington coach Darryl Graham said.

NORTHSHORE (0-0) at FONTAINEBLEAU (0-0)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Neither team played.
Last year: Fontainebleau won 39-0.
Notes: District 4-5A game. Fontainebleau got back two players who had transferred to Nevillein the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. All-Metro left tackle Cameron Zipp and defensive tackle Chris Johnson returned after playing a few weeks at Neville. The team is still missing players who were displaced by the storm. But most of the starters are back.

HAMMOND (1-0) at ST. PAUL'S (0-0)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Neither team played.
Last year: Hammond won 12-7.
Notes: District 4-5A game. Hammond looked impressive Sept. 16 in a 14-0 victory against Franklinton. These teams are probably the most prepared of the district. Both teams have been in session for a few weeks and had normal practice routines - unlike St. Tammany public schools, which do not resume classes until Monday. The key will be how Hammond fares against the Wolves defensive line, which includes Division I recruits David Boyce and Scott Ward.

MANDEVILLE (0-0) at SLIDELL (0-0)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Neither team played.
Last year: Slidell won 26-2.
Notes: District 4-5A game. The Mandeville defense is inexperienced and will have to grapple with preseason All-Metro quarterback Stephen Liuzza and sophomore running back Ryan Tott. But Slidell coach Wayne Grubb said his line is thin because some players have yet to return.

NORTHLAKE CHRISTIAN (0-0) vs. ST. THOMAS AQUINAS (0-3)
Time/place: 7 p.m. at SLU's Strawberry Stadium.
Last week: Northlake Christian did not play. St. Thomas Aquinas lost to Dunham on Monday 19-13.
Last year: Did not play.
Notes: Non-district game. Wolverines coach Mark Robert liked the prospect of playing the Falcons before the hurricanes, and St. Thomas Aquinas picked up several transfers from New Orleans-area Catholic schools. But now the Falcons look a lot tougher and have played the past two opponents close. The Wolverines, on the other hand, have yet to play their first varsity game.

ALBANY (0-1) at PEARL RIVER (0-1)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Albany did not play. Pearl River lost to Loranger 42-6.
Last year: Pearl River beat Albany 33-14.
Notables: Albany has 18 returning starters, including quarterback Brennan Sessons. Seven defensive starters return to the Rebels, but Pearl River allowed 366 yards in its first outing.

POPE JOHN PAUL II (0-1) at LIVE OAK (2-1)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: PJP II lost to Live Oak 14-9.
Last year: Live Oak defeated PJP II 12-9.
Notables: The Jaguars and Eagles go at it again a week after playing the first time. Live Oak fullback Darren LeBlanc and PJP II tailback Chad Hindman each rushed for 86 yards last week.

CATHOLIC-NEW IBERIA (2-1) at LUTCHER (1-2)
Time: 7:30 p.m.
Last week: Lutcher lost to Hahnville 35-21. Catholic did not play.
Last year: Did not play.
Notes: Non-district game. Arrangements for tonight's game were not confirmed until Wednesday morning. These teams last played in the 2001 playoffs. Lutcher won 46-16. Catholic's loss was to Notre Dame, 14-13, two weeks ago.

SATURDAY'S GAMES

SALMEN (0-0) at WEST JEFFERSON (0-0)
Time: 2 p.m.
Last week: Neither team played.
Last year: Did not play.
Notes: Non-district game. Neither has played since the jamborees of the weekend of Aug. 26-28. West Jefferson quarterback Ryan Jackson has returned and will start. West Jefferson had about 30 players for practice this week.

PATTERSON (3-0) at HAHNVILLE (3-0)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Patterson defeated Assumption 46-12. Hahnville defeated Lutcher 35-21.
Last year: Did not play.
Notes: Non-district game. Patterson is ranked ninth in Class 3A. Hahnville is ranked No. 3 in Class 5A. Patterson quarterback Corey Hilliard completed eight of 11 passes for 205 yards and four touchdowns last week. Running back William Griffin ran 16 times for 138 yards and one touchdown. Hahnville running back Terrance Isaac was held to 64 yards on 19 carries last week.

HIGGINS (0-0) vs. EHRET (0-0)
Time/place: 7 p.m. at Hoss Memtsas Stadium.
Last week: Neither team played.
Last year: Ehret won 14-6.
Notes: Both teams returned to practice this week following a four-week layoff. The game originally was scheduled for the second week of the regular season. Ehret expects 20 to 25 players, including quarterback Chris Mitchell and receiver Jywin Caesar. Higgins expects approximately 30 players, including quarterback Aldaro Russell and running back Corey McCann. Standout tailback Joshua Brumfield has not returned.

What: A gallery reception — where normally there would be dozens — to ring in the opening of the visual arts season.
Where: Barrister's Gallery, 1724 Oretha Castle Haley Blvd.
When: Saturday, 11 a.m. to dusk

This weekend marks the first Saturday in October. Under ordinary circumstances that would mean artists, gallery owners and thousands of art lovers descending upon Art For Art's Sake, the opening of the visual art season, celebrated with dozens of simultaneous gallery receptions on Julia, Magazine, Royal streets and other scattered locations.

But hurricane Katrina blew out the party lights.

It remains to be seen to what extent the storm hurts the New Orleans commercial art community, where many galleries were thriving enterprises offering art to regional collectors and tourists. But just as many galleries are labors of love, with little financial cushion to carry them through tough times. Though most galleries did not flood, they may eventually go under due to the economics of a recovering city.

In the shadowy, humid interior of Barrister's Gallery on Oretha Castle Haley Boulevard, owner Andy Antippas insisted that in his corner of the art world, Art for Art's Sake will go on, despite a lack of electricity, despite a drastically reduced population, despite everything.

He realized, of course, that his daylight opening reception, from 11 a.m. until dusk, was a symbolic gesture.

"Everybody's got to understand how important it is to do this," he said. "We really don't expect anyone to come, but we're keeping the gears moving. Reopening the Winn Dixie, the Wal-Mart and the Home Depot is all fine, but that's not what New Orleans is all about. The artists need the galleries. They need to be reminded of what they do, what they are, that their lives have not been swallowed up."

Antippas and his fiancee Trisha Moss, who'd escaped the hurricane in Galveston and returned to New Orleans two weeks ago, planned to alter the times on the already-printed exhibit invitations, which they would then distribute by hand to gathering

MY STORM STORY

Hurricane Katrina: In their own words

ELAINE BROWN, 48, COUNTRY CLUB BEVERAGE MANAGER

Home: An apartment in Pontchartrain Gardens, Slidell Haven: A friend's home in Slidell

"When we woke up, there was maybe an inch of water on the ground, and I thought, 'This will be OK, we can deal with this.' We put everything we could up high, and then I went upstairs to ride it out.

"The next thing I know, as fast as I'm telling you this story, water just came in everywhere. It was the big surge, I guess. The water was ripping the sliding glass doors out of their cases, just rolling in, a strong current through the front door. Carl had left his truck right by the front door of the apartment, and he said, 'Let's go now!' We grabbed our bag and tried to get in the truck and the truck started floating away. The water was up to his waist, and he's 6-4.

"He told me to run across the street to where my car was. By that time water was literally raging down the street and I got pulled under in the current. Then he jumped out of the truck, which was floating down the street, and he grabbed me and we stayed out in the middle of Westchester Street, hanging on the sign for Our Lady of Lourdes church. We stayed there for a while then got swept to the gas station across the street.

"By that time I was hysterical. The water was over my head. We kind of strategically swam from point to point, grabbed hold of a post, then a school sign, and made it to the apartment, where we swam up our steps. We have 13 steps and the water was up to the very top steps.

"When we got back upstairs we didn't realize all our provisions were floating away.

It was like a river out front, just raging away. The wind wasn't really an issue the way the water was. The Walgreen's behind us apparently had windows ripped out. Here came some Milky Way bars floating by. Carl went to get his fishing pole and caught the Milky Way bars out the window. We ate them and some cheese crackers for a day and a half.

"(Tuesday afternoon), here came my sister and her friend trudging through water trying to find us. We left with them and stayed the night at their house in Slidell. Carl, my personal chef, made me the best meal I think I've ever had."

TO VISIT HARDEST-HIT HOMES, BRING SUPPLIES AND COURAGE TO SPARE

Soon, many whose homes were the most devastated by Katrina, people whose property and worldly possessions stayed under water for two weeks or more, will be allowed back in to recover what they might from their ravaged houses — to "look and leave," as officials are so gently putting it.

As a credentialed journalist, I have had access to the city since the storm passed, which has given me the opportunity to check my home in Lakeview on three occasions. The first was in a canoe, and I was not able to get into my home — but I was able to climb easily from the boat onto my roof. The second was unexpected, only hours after the streets had been finally pumped of standing water, and I was utterly unprepared, physically and emotionally, to deal with what I found. The third was a recovery effort, and that time I was ready.

Many whose homes were completely inundated have asked me what to take, and what to expect. Here's my personal rundown:

THIS MOLD HOUSE

More tips for mending your broken home

WHAT TO PACK

BRING WHAT YOU NEED WITH YOU, because obviously you won't be able to find it in town. You need boots, several pairs of gloves, both rubber and leather, a good-quality mask and clothing that you don't mind getting ruined. You might want to bring a change of clothes for your return trip, sealed in plastic. Also consider goggles and a sweatband to keep the sweat out of your eyes.

BRING BASIC TOOLS, including a hammer, a couple of screwdrivers, and probably a pry bar or crowbar to get in, and to open windows. Water will have swelled doors and windows, and you may have to break into your own home to gain entry, if the National Guard didn't do it for you. Bring more than one flashlight. The first thing that happened to the flashlight I had was that the bulb burned out. You can't run down to the hardware store and get another one.

BRING PLENTY OF DRINKING WATER, more than you think, because you'll sweat a lot, and you also might need to use bottled water to rinse something. Bring food as well, preferably food you can eat from a wrapper without touching it with your hands. The work you will do in your house is physical, dangerous and slow. Don't underestimate how much energy you'll expend.

BRING ROLLS OF PLASTIC GARBAGE BAGS for your recovered stuff, because it's going to be wet and will smell like nothing you've smelled before.

WHAT TO EXPECT

TRY TO PREPARE YOURSELF for the level of destruction. It is probably worse than you have imagined. Furniture will be toppled, destroyed, or in a different room — and in many cases, all three. Many pieces of wood furniture simply come apart in the flood waters. Wood glue dissolves. Furniture with veneer over particleboard collapses. Cupboards may have pulled away from walls. Refrigerators are almost universally upended. Very few pieces of furniture will be upright and where you left them. It will look more like a tornado hit it than a flood — if you don't count the sludge and the smell.

TAKE IT SLOW. Getting around your flooded home is hazardous. I was extremely cautious, yet I fell twice in the muck, and had a heavy oak sideboard fall on my foot when it shifted in the debris. The floors will be covered with ice-slick sludge. They are likely to be buckled and uneven. Furniture will block doorways, and may even block entry into rooms. Check your footing, and move slowly.

MAKE A WRITTEN LIST OF THINGS YOU WANT TO RECOVER before you go in, and take it with you, because your brain is likely to go to mush at the sight and smell of your once-prized home. Don't expect anything to be where you left it. Expect to have to look around a little bit to find specific items. Take a friend, both for help and for safety. If you fall, and nobody is there, you can't call 911.

TRY TO SAVE YOUR GRIEVING UNTIL AFTER YOU'RE GONE. You will be able to recover some things from the flood zone, particularly things that don't absorb water — prized dishes, crystal, silver, DVDs and CDs among them — but it takes fortitude and determination. Be mission-driven: Take your pictures, find your stuff, get out safely.

LEAVE SOME WINDOWS OPEN A CRACK to air things out when you leave, in case you have to go in again for something you forgot or couldn't carry.

GIVE YOURSELF SOME TIME AFTERWARD TO REGROUP, and to grieve. No matter how much you've tried to prepare yourself, seeing it in person is a grueling experience, physically and emotionally, and it will stay with you. I'm familiar with the traditional stages of grief: denial, anger, bargaining, depression and acceptance. After three trips to my house, I think I've reached the acceptance phase, and I'm ready to see it all hauled away so I can build anew. Of course, that could just be the denial talking.

One man's show

Artist creates curbside exhibit from the ruins of his home

By Doug MacCash
Art critic

A dozen black mannequin heads atop wooden stakes stood on the grassy median in the 4100 block of St. Claude Avenue on Monday, like a scene from "Apocalypse Now" rendered in Styrofoam.

Nearby rested a sheet metal coffin filled with floodwater amid wooden crosses, a mirror marked with the words "9th Ward RIP" and piles of moldering rugs, furniture, paintings and other works of once-submerged art.

Everything was webbed with orange caution tape, draped with carnival beads and touched with spray-painted graffiti. Although in many ways the detritus blended in with the endless roadside debris in the 9th Ward, this debris was different: It was an art display, perhaps the first of post-Katrina era New Orleans.

Hand-made flyers distributed in the French Quarter announced the "Toxic Art" display in the 4100 block of St. Claude Avenue, with a reception scheduled for Monday afternoon.

The National Guard checkpoint at St. Claude and Elysian Fields no doubt contributed to the low attendance at that outdoor opening, but artist Jeffrey Holmes felt the exhibit was a worthy endeavor nonetheless.

"In New Orleans, there's always something beautiful in the desperation and the trash," he said. "That's where the culture comes from.

"Even if only five people show up," he said, "we should still do it."

More than five attendees showed up in the exhibit's first intensely hot, humid hour: a friend from the neighborhood, an insurance adjuster, three nurses from San Francisco, three of the army of journalists still swarming the city, and a man on a bicycle. Some helped themselves to the iced beers and bottles of liquor in a small blue cooler.

Holmes, a slight, raw-boned man of 40, with gothic-style tattoos coursing up his forearms, explained that the exhibit was made of the furniture and artwork that was submerged in the flood that followed the hurricane.

"Everything's toxic because it's been in the water," he said. "The art has to be thrown away. It's my collection and my wife's collection. I wanted to see it one more time."

In the 1950s, artists such as Robert Rauschenberg and Jasper Johns turned away from conventional paint-on-canvas art. Instead, they created artwork assembled from discarded junk. To them, it seemed more real than illusionist paintings and sculpture. Holmes' "Toxic Art," made from the remnants of his shattered and soaked life, is realer still. If Holmes' were to receive a review, that would be it.

Jeffrey Holmes is reflected in his piece 'Toxic Art,' which he created outside of his home in the 4100 block of St. Claude Avenue, using items he and his wife lost during the flood in the 9th Ward that followed

However, not all reviews of this impromptu art exhibit have been glowing.

At approximately 4 a.m. Tuesday morning, Holmes said he woke to the sound of vehicles in the street below his second-floor home. A National Guardsman exited a Humvee and removed the mannequin heads from the sticks in his outdoor exhibit. When he asked what the soldiers were doing, he was told that some of the guardsmen found the installation offensive, believing that the black foam head had negative racial overtones.

Holmes argued that he meant no such thing and that it was his right to freely express himself anyway. After further quarreling, the guardsmen departed, replaced in a few minutes by New Orleans police officers who called Holmes to the street and arrested him for drunkenness and disturbing the peace.

He was released from the makeshift jail at the Union Passenger Terminal later in the morning. The show is still there, but Holmes let the mannequin heads stay on the ground where the guardsmen had tossed them.

Galleries hang on spots in the French Quarter.

"Maybe we can get a Black Hawk to drop some from the sky," he said.

The two-part exhibit features symbol-laden paintings by artist/spiritualist Sallie Ann Glassman and a group show of works by self-declared mentally-ill artists such as Gus Fink, Kenny Champagne and William A. Kelly. The luridness of much of Glassman's work and the inspired eccentricity of the other artists' works seems somehow to fit Antippas' ghostly opening reception gambit.

Asked if he expects the art community to bounce back from the catastrophe, Antippas hovered between pessimism and hope.

"I don't know about the future economy," he said. "I can only hope that new construction will need new art. I expect to see everybody (artists and art dealers) back because everybody who runs a gallery is doing it because they love it."

Gallery owner Jonathan Ferrara may love the art trade, but he's a realist. In a phone conversation from his storm-scoured Uptown home, he said he didn't expect his Carondelet Street gallery to reopen anytime soon. Instead he plans to rent the undamaged show space to a construction company, while promoting his stable of New Orleans artists in national art fairs.

"First and foremost," Ferrara said, "it's a time for reality. Those of us who own our (gallery) spaces have to pay the mortgage. Locally, I don't think there's anybody to walk off the street and buy art . . . unless construction workers are going to buy art.

"I don't think there will be a New Orleans art scene for a year, but there will be more of a market for New Orleans artwork outside of the city. Like it or not, but Katrina has provided an awareness factor we need to capitalize on it."

Though the new Gallerie Bienvenu, which opened only one month before the storm, was untouched by Katrina, gallery owner Cathy Bienvenu, standing in the Julia Street twilight pointed out that the condition of the city did not bode well for the future of the art scene.

"How can I open up my gallery? What am I going to do? From what I've seen of the 9th Ward and St. Bernard Parish, it looks like Armageddon.

"Of course, I'm speculating about the gallery. I just opened and I wanted to do it first-class. I don't know if a lot of people know what went into it. There were so many promising things, so much coming on board for the art community.

'Lola's Great Soul,' by artist and spiritualist Sallie Ann Glassman, is part of the exhibit at Barrister's.

Your balloon is this big and now it's all taken down."

Gallery owners Jean Bragg and Jim Blanchard said they would set up a table in front of their neighboring galleries at the corner of Camp and Julia Streets and open a bottle of champagne on Art For Art's Sake evening, even if they were the only ones to drink it.

Blanchard pointed out that other businesses, such as restaurants, require a much longer chain of support — food suppliers, waiters, cooks, etc. — to be in business.

"We're lucky," he said, "we can just open our door."

Bragg agreed, though she tempered Blanchard's optimism.

"We're not really open to the public," she said. "There is no public."

Arthur Roger, owner of the oldest, highest profile contemporary art gallery, had no plans to celebrate Art For Art's Sake. In fact he'd forgotten about it entirely.

"There have been sort of collective moods and experiences among people from New Orleans," he said. "One of those is not knowing what day it is."

The well-known gallery is crowded with art rescued from the gallery's flooded mid-city warehouse, some speckled with mold. Roger had rented the adjacent storefront as a new storage site and expected to open the gallery on Saturday. He's confident that Arthur Roger Gallery will survive, owing to the very successful sales year he'd had in 2005 and his large out-of-town clientele. He scheduled the first show, the "Come Back Exhibition," for Nov. 15.

Though the French Quarter seems to be rebounding faster than any other neighborhood, none of the galleries appeared to be occupied earlier this week. A sign in the world-renowned Rodrigue Gallery included a new painting by George Rodrigue titled "We Will Rise Again," featuring the blue dog backed by an American flag, submerged in flood water.

"Its eyes, normally yellow," the message read, "are red with a broken heart."

Greenie in a Tiger's den

LIND, from C-5

plied these waters. The city bustled.

Today, at another hub — the confluence of Front Street and the Subway sandwich shop — is located an establishment of the sort I have not patronized since Katrina. That would be an emporium of drink. Even evacuees need an attitude adjustment hour, and this one evacuee had waited far too long.

So off I headed to Fritz's Sports Bar in downtown Cottonport.

Nearly a month had passed since I heard a jukebox or inhaled secondhand smoke. Hard to fathom. There are times in New Orleans when I may go a few days without venturing into my home-away-from-home on Maple Street, which inevitably prompts a phone call from Bruno's owner David Melius complaining that his business is failing without my presence.

Now, I could tell you that I searched every corner of this 50-mile bayou loop to find a tavern frequented by locals, and I could tell you that I drove back road after back road looking for a Budweiser neon sign illuminating a window. Or that I followed a trail of dead soldiers (aka empty beer cans) to its source.

But I won't. Fritz's Sports Bar is the only bar in the Cottonport Yellow Pages.

So there wasn't much choice but for this devoted, life-long Tulane fan who bleeds green and blue to find himself standing in front of a bar that was painted purple-and-gold inside and out.

There were two entrances. The sign on the first door read, "Fritz's Sports Bar." The sign on the second door read, "Death Valley." I chose Door No. 1

Not to worry. Shazam! Presto change-o! For cold beer and good company, I can swallow my Greenie pride and talk Bayou Bengalese with the best of them, I told myself.

My wife and I had dined earlier at Bernard's Cajun Sea-Fry, also in Cottonport. My wife's new hairdresser in Marksville, Lisa, had told her it doesn't look like much, but you can't beat the food. I guess not — all-you-can-eat fried catfish done the right way, in cornmeal and black iron skillets, fried crawfish balls, creamy cole slaw, crisp French fries, crawfish etouffee and a roll — all for $7.95.

We swapped New Orleans evacuation stories with some nouveau evacuees from Beaumont, Texas, who dodged Rita's bullet, filling them in on what it's been like to be gone from home for a month with four pairs of underwear and how we've handled socializing in our new country club, Wal-Mart.

Filled to the gills, we drove to nearby Fritz's Sports Bar, which is owned not by someone named Fritz but by Brady Berthelot. We found a couple of stools in front of a TV that was showing the Saints-Vikings debacle. Luckily, it was the second half, the jukebox was turned up loud, and Rodney Crowell was singing, "Stars on the Water."

I'm assuming those stars would be us.

I overheard a conversation and the name Ray Wylie Hubbard was mentioned. Only hard-core country fans mention that name. Ray Wylie Hubbard wrote "Up Against the Wall, Redneck Mother," popularized by Jerry Jeff Walker, and just hearing the title of that song made me feel better, much better, despite all the purple and gold.

Shortly, the engaging owner of this fine watering hole spots us for strangers. Not a tough call — we were the only ones not wearing jeans. He ventures over to say hello.

"How you like my tiger?" he asks.

On the purple wall behind me had been painted - quite impressively, I must admit — an enormous charging Bengal tiger with "LSU 2003 National Champions" painted overhead.

"It's pretty cool," I tell him.

On the other wall is a work-in-progress. A gold Tiger football helmet, equally as large, is having the letters LSU painted on by a woman wearing tight jeans and a visible pink thong — visible because she is stretching her body to paint the letters. My wife notices what I am staring at and I give her that age-old husbands' line:

"When I quit looking, you better start worrying," I tell her.

We find out that Brady Berthelot sold cars for 30 years and had an Isuzu car dealership that was a huge moneymaker. He retired from the auto rat race and in five months he was totally bored. So, he bought himself a bar.

"It's great, don'tcha think?" he said. "Tomorrow night we're showing the LSU-Tennessee game and NO Monday night pro football. Well, we might put it on a little screen. Y'all gotta come back — we got free food and everything."

We watch the Saints game come to its dismal conclusion. I hear someone at the bar repeat a line I've already heard. "The people in Baton Rouge been sufferin' a lot. They got the evacuees, there's gridlock, they got hit by Rita and now they got the Saints for four games. What did they do to deserve that?"

We take one more look around the vastness of purple and gold on this two-sided bar. I think about all my Tiger buddies who would kill to be here. And I figure we're going to get out of Fritz's without blowing our cover, without revealing our dirty little secret, without getting harassed.

And then my wife blurts out to Brady: "Where's the Tulane side?"

Local hospitals in critical condition

Hurricane Katrina closed half of the hospitals in the seven-parish area, including all of those based in New Orleans, and some may not reopen.

Several hospitals — most notably the Charity and University hospital campuses operated by a branch of LSU — will have to undergo intense structural studies before anyone can even talk about reopening them, said John J. "Jack" Finn, president of the Metropolitan Hospital Council of New Orleans.

Of the approximately 4,000 employees both campuses had before Katrina, about 2,500 haven't checked in since the storm, spokesman Marvin McGraw said, adding that he does not know whether Charity will reopen.

"It would take pretty close to a miracle for a hospital with a badly damaged electrical and mechanical system" to reopen, Finn said. "I can't imagine anyone spending $50 million to $100 million to put it in the condition that it was in before."

The potential loss of Charity, compounded by the diminished capacity of private health-care providers, is a double whammy for the area.

"What we have in New Orleans is the loss of the huge public hospital and the capacity that was relied on for the city's and the state's large uninsured population for their care," said Diane Rowland, executive director at the Kaiser Family Foundation. "Plus we have a loss of private-hospital capacity.

"There's no way I can imagine how other hospitals with reduced capacity and far more limited outpatient capacity can absorb what Charity was doing."

Charity, the 66-year-old state-owned colossus on Tulane Avenue, is the principal teaching hospital for Louisiana's doctors, and it

Experts want dirt on floodwall failure

Soft, soggy soil a challenge to work with

By John McQuaid and Bob Marshall

As engineers analyze why some New Orleans canal floodwalls broke during Hurricane Katrina, a central focus will be Louisiana's notoriously soft, wet Mississippi Delta soil.

The floodwalls are hard structures embedded in soft material. As Katrina's storm surge filled up the 17th Street and London Avenue canals, it put high pressure on the walls and soil. If the surrounding soil is already unstable or the structure is not properly lodged in it – it can move and bring the wall down.

"The Mississippi gumbo is awfully challenging. It's soft. It's got organisms in it, they generate gas. It's a very screwball material," said Robert Bea, a geotechnical engineer at the University of California at Berkeley who is part of a team sponsored by the National Science Foundation that will survey the levee breaks next week along with teams from the American Association of Civil Engineers and the Army Corps of Engineers.

Bea said he intends to take soil samples and test them in his lab to see what kind of stresses they can take while wet and dry, in hopes of finding some clues about what happened.

The Corps and outside engineers say it's too early to tell what went wrong, and that walls probably failed for different reasons in different places. In eastern areas of the city, where the Industrial Canal is located, floodwalls were clearly overwhelmed by high water beyond their design specs. Engineers are focusing much of their attention on the 17th Street and London Avenue drainage canals, where storm surge was lower

Nagin introduces his own rebuilding team for city

Move comes day after governor unveils her version

By Frank Donze and James Varney

With much of New Orleans still in shambles and a national debate growing about the cost of rebuilding the city, Mayor Ray Nagin on Friday introduced a panel of movers and shakers who he hopes will be the architects of a new and better Crescent City.

The 17-member group faces the gargantuan and unprecedented task of returning parts of the city nearly annihilated by Hurricane Katrina to their pre-storm condition, while simultaneously addressing chronic problems such as New Orleans' deplorable public school system.

Nagin's team includes attorneys, academics, business people and church figures, many of them lifelong residents. As he unveiled the group, Nagin acknowledged that New Orleans' reconstruction has come under increased scrutiny in Washington, where lawmakers are questioning the amount of money being discussed for recovery, and Louisiana's storied reputation for political corruption.

"I know there is this great debate about whether New Orleans should be rebuilt," he said.

His team was picked with that in mind, the mayor noted, praising the members as "authentic" and with "high integrity." His administration's own track record should also set some minds at ease, he suggested.

"Google me," he said. "We've been about anti-corruption,

FEMA not giving $2,000 checks to victims anymore

Deadline passes, other aid offered

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON – The federal government has stopped giving out the $2,000 checks for emergency assistance to victims of Hurricane Katrina, saying the program is no longer necessary, prompting complaints from those who missed the application deadline or got snarled in red tape.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency announced Thursday that the stop-gap assistance was ending after $1.2 billion in cash assistance had been sent to 579,721 Louisiana residents displaced by the Aug. 29 hurricane and subsequent flooding.

"It was a program that was offered for a limited period of time until other forms of assistance were available to address long-term needs of disaster victims," FEMA spokeswoman Barbara Ellis said.

In its place, FEMA is offering victims of Katrina and Hurricane Rita financial assistance for up to three months of rent.

Reps. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, and Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, said that while thousands of hurricane evacuees need rental assistance, many people eligible for the $2,000 emergency assistance grants still have not received them because of bureaucratic foul-ups and difficulties getting through to the agency.

"For FEMA to cut off funds now is unacceptable," Jefferson said. "These monies are used for food, diapers, medicines and other essential items. ... Every day my office fields complaints from constituents who applied for assistance and still have yet to receive any FEMA funds."

The congressmen, whose districts were hit hard by Katrina and then Rita a week ago, questioned whether all of the checks FEMA sent out actually arrived in the hands of evacuees who applied for them. Jefferson's aides said some checks arrived at emergency shelters after evacuees had been relocated.

"It's important to call back and update the information," FEMA's Ellis said.

When asked about complaints about getting through to FEMA on the agency's toll-free line, Ellis acknowledged it's been a problem. She advised people to call during off-peak hours.

"They need to keep calling back," she said.

Jefferson and Melancon said that a month after Katrina made landfall, they are still being deluged with requests from people seeking help in getting so-called expedited assistance grants. One such complaint came from Stanley Fajkowski of New Orleans. He applied over the Internet on Sept. 6.

The form he filled out asked about the condition of his home on Claiborne Avenue. He assumed that like much of New Orleans, it was under water, but since he hadn't seen it, he checked the box, "I don't know."

FEMA soon sent him a letter rejecting his application.

Fajkowski, 70, estimates he subsequently called the toll-free FEMA number "200 times" over the next 20 days. Sometimes he was put on hold and then abruptly told he was being disconnected because of the volume of calls.

He finally got through the other day only to be told that he could appeal in writing. As for getting the $2,000, the deadline had passed, he was told.

"This is a nightmare," Fajkowski said when reached by telephone in suburban Atlanta, where he is staying with relatives. "I guess I should have just lied on the application."

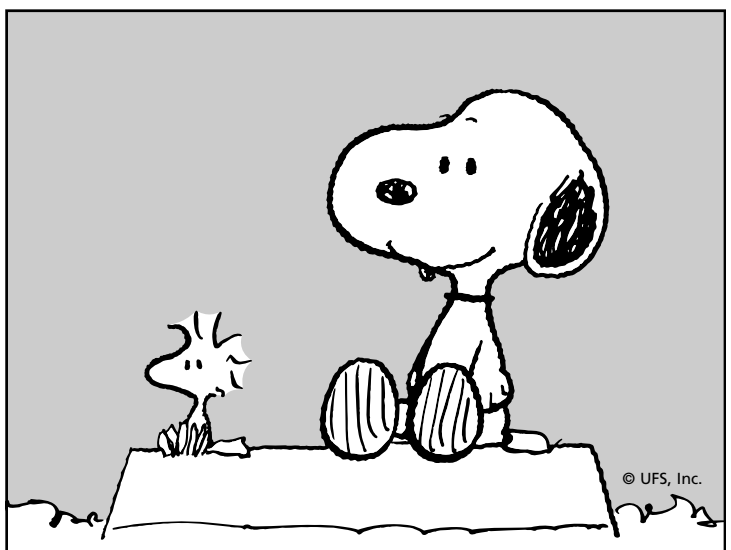
FEMA spokesman Butch Kinerney said that Fajkowski's "I don't know" could have disqualified from the expedited assistance. The problem, he said, is that the computer program wasn't prepared to cope with a disaster like Katrina that dislodged people for such a long period of time.

"In most situations, people usually do return within a few days to check their damage," Kinerney said in an e-mail. "In the case of Katrina, where neighborhoods are still off-limits, many can't."

He said the computer glitch is being fixed.

Dale Benoit of Belle Chasse also quickly filled out a FEMA application when he heard $2,000 was available to hurricane evacuees. He and his wife fled to Minden, where he received a copy of his application back from FEMA. It said that his application had expired Feb. 28, 2003.

Benoit went to his local FEMA office and was told that despite the baffling notation, he was eligible for assistance. When no check showed up, he said he called the toll-free number six to eight times only to be abruptly disconnected as Fajkowski had been.



He said he finally got through last Sunday and was assured the money would be put directly in his bank account. As of Friday afternoon, he said, it hadn't been.

"When we really needed this assistance to get us through the crunch after evacuating, we got nothing because of FEMA bureaucracy," Benoit said.

CLARIFICATIONS AND CORRECTIONS

Church no longer serving meals: A story in some editions Thursday stated incorrectly that First Baptist Church of Mandeville was providing meals in conjunction with the Red Cross. That service had ended by the time of publication.

St. Clement opening clarified: The story in Friday's edition about the 2005 Blue Ribbon schools recognized by the U.S. Department of Education contained a garbled sentence. It should have said that St. Clement of Rome Catholic School in Metairie plans to reopen Monday, using its library, music room and other spaces for classes displaced by Hurricane Katrina.

Rescued pets to move from Gonzales

They will be sent to other shelters

By Sandra Barbier
Staff writer

The state's biggest emergency animal shelter at the Lamar-Dixon Expo Center in Gonzales planned Friday to stop accepting rescued animals at 8 p.m., and to transfer all the animals remaining at the center to shelters in other states by Oct. 15.

"We're getting back to normal," said state veterinarian Maxwell Lea of the Louisiana Department of Agriculture.

"We are winding down to normal with the hurricane response," as are animal control agencies in the state, he said. In particular, he said, the Louisiana Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals was planning to reopen a shelter in New Orleans.

The LSPCA has been among the principal agencies rescuing trapped animals and picking up strays in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Maloney said the group has leased a warehouse on the West Bank of the city at 701 Thayer St. in Algiers, which it will open as a shelter on Friday.

A truck full of dogs arrives at the Lamar-Dixon Expo Center, where the animals were being cared for by volunteers. They soon will be sent to shelters in other states.

The shelter was made possible with donations of $275,000 from the ASPCA of New York, and $75,000 from United Animal Nation, she said.

Until the facility opens in Algiers, rescue workers are feeding and watering stray animals on the streets, she said.

"Because (New Orleans) residents can come back today, hopefully, for many animals in homes, their owners will get them," she said Friday.

Animal rescue workers will focus on finding animals in zip codes where residents won't be allowed to return until Wednesday, she said.

Every day animals "are in worse shape," she said. "I'm still amazed a month after this we are still finding animals alive."

Maloney said about 62 percent of the animals taken to Lamar-Dixon were pit bull dogs, and about 95 percent of the animals were not neutered.

She cautioned returning homeowners not to approach dogs, some of which have formed packs, but to put out food and water. The LSPCA will begin picking up strays on Friday, she said.

Lea said emergency shelters in Lafayette, Monroe, Shreveport and Lake Charles are following the same shutdown schedule as the Lamar-Dixon center. The John M. Parker Coliseum on the campus of Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge also will close Oct. 15. The coliseum has been used to house the pets of evacuees.

Owners were asked to pick up their animals by 8 p.m. Friday, LSU School of Veterinary Medicine spokeswoman Ginger Guttner said Friday. After that, plans were to begin transferring animals to shelters in other states, with the provision that any Louisiana animal adopted from those shelters would have to be returned to their original owner before Dec. 31, Guttner said.

Owners can search for their pets at www.petfinder.com, a Web site that has been a clearinghouse for photos and descriptions of found and rescued pets.

Reporter agrees to discuss Plame leak

Cheney aide ID'd as confidential source

By Pete Yost
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON — Out of jail after 85 days, New York Times reporter Judith Miller testified before a grand jury Friday, setting the stage for prosecutors to decide whether to charge anyone in the Bush administration in the leak of a CIA operative's name.

Miller, who had been in jail for refusing to testify, was the final holdout witness whose testimony Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald said he needed before concluding the probe into who leaked the identity of Valerie Plame.

Miller said she got assurances from her source and from Fitzgerald that enabled her to testify.

Judith Miller
New York Times reporter spent 85 days behind bars for keeping silent

Before she agreed to talk to the grand jury, Miller's source — Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, Lewis "Scooter" Libby — gave her assurances she could reveal the contents of their conversations.

Fitzgerald has characterized Miller's testimony as key to completing his investigation into the White House role in the disclosure of Plame's identity. The grand jury expires Oct. 28.

Fitzgerald exited the courthouse without commenting.

Until a few months ago, the White House maintained that Libby and presidential aide Karl Rove were not involved in leaking the identity of Plame, whose husband had publicly suggested in July 2003 that the Bush administration twisted intelligence in the run-up to the war in Iraq.

When former Ambassador Joseph Wilson made his allegation, the White House was already on the defensive as it sought fruitlessly to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. The president's claims of such weapons had been the main justification for going to war.

Hundreds return home as wildfire controlled

A California Department of Forestry firefighter sets a back fire Friday to combat a blaze in Simi Valley, Calif.

Blaze triggers health warnings

By Jeff Wilson
Associated Press Writer

LOS ANGELES — Hundreds of people were allowed to return home Friday as firefighters gained ground against a 20,000-acre wildfire that cast such a smoky haze over the city that drivers turned on their headlights in the middle of the day.

The blaze on the Los Angeles-Ventura county line was 20 percent contained, and was expected to be 35 percent surrounded by day's end, said Los Angeles County Deputy Fire Chief Mike Bryant.

"We're really happy with the weather today. This is a good opportunity for us," Bryant said. "It is a very, very important day for us in fighting this fire."

Firefighters were aided by fading desert winds that let more humid ocean air move back inland. But the shift also pushed smoke over parts of Los Angeles and neighboring valleys, triggering health warnings.

At one point on Thursday afternoon, motorists drove through the San Fernando Valley with their headlights on. On Friday, health officials urged residents to restrict outdoor activities and advised people with heart and lung diseases to take precautions.

Downtown Los Angeles bank employee Jolie Gorchov, 40, said the bad air was giving her headaches. "I don't close my windows because it doesn't make a difference," she said. "The air is so thick and smoky you can taste it."

Evacuation orders were lifted in all areas. By Friday afternoon, 40 people remained in one of the two evacuation centers that still were open.

Despite the fire's furious pace over the previous two days, the flames destroyed only two single-family homes, three outbuildings, one storage building and one detached garage, authorities said.

Some 3,000 firefighters from agencies throughout the state were on the lines, aided by six fire-retardant bombers and 11 water-dropping helicopters.

The fire erupted Wednesday afternoon in the Chatsworth area of northwest Los Angeles and was rapidly spread by strong winds.

Elsewhere, 1,200 people were evacuated from mountain communities 70 miles east of Los Angeles because of a 450-acre blaze in the San Bernardino National Forest. Containment was estimated at 10 percent. A small fire slumbering in hills above suburban Burbank also awakened, sending up a towering plume at midday.

Prey may be scarce for state's hunters this year

Habitat damage alters seasons

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – Roughly 60 to 65 percent of the state's coastal and inland wildlife management areas and refuges were damaged by Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita, but the cost of the damages is not yet known, Department of Wildlife and Fisheries officials said Friday.

Parke Moore, a wildlife biologist and assistant secretary of the agency's Office of Wildlife, said that about 610,000 acres of state-run refuges and wildlife management areas were impacted by Hurricane Rita, including damage to the sprawling Rockefeller Wildlife Refuge in southwest Louisiana.

Moore said another 400,000 acres were damaged by Hurricane Katrina a month ago. The state has about 1.5 million acres under its wildlife jurisdiction, he said.

The storms also have altered the hunting seasons in several areas of the state.

"Many of the buildings, equipment and infrastructure in these areas have been damaged or destroyed," Moore said. "While the department has not yet been able to survey the habitat damage in many of these areas, it is apparent that significant damage to levees and water control structures has occurred."

Deer and rabbit hunting is closed as of today in Jefferson, Lafourche and Terrebonne parishes south of the Intracoastal waterway.

Moore said that during Rita, the storm surge approached 20 feet in coastal areas of southwest Louisiana, affecting rabbit and white-tailed-deer habitat and the species themselves.

"The impact of the storm surge, flooding and prolonged exposure to saltwater . . . has not yet been evaluated but it is expected to be significant," Moore said. "We will have substantial mortality to wildlife."

As a result of the hurricanes' damages, he said, deer- and rabbit-hunting season scheduled to open today in much of Cameron, Vermilion, Jefferson Davis and Calcasieu parishes will be "closed for several months," department Secretary Dwight Landreneau said.

The only hunting areas open in that area are north of Louisiana 14 in Cameron Parish, parts of Vermilion and Jefferson Davis parishes south of Louisiana 14 and parts of Calcasieu south of Louisiana 14 and Interstate 10.

Department spokesman Bo Boehringer said the opening of deer, rabbit and squirrel seasons will be delayed a week — until Oct. 8 — in Ascension, Livingston, St. John the Baptist and St. James parishes.

Landreneau said water "is slowing receding in this area" and hunting should be able to begin in those areas in a week.

Deer and rabbit hunting is closed as of today in Jefferson, Lafourche and Terrebonne parishes south of the Intracoastal waterway, Landreneau said.

"These areas should be reopened for hunting shortly, as soon as the water levels return to normal and the stress to these (wildlife) populations due to flooding is removed," he said.

Statewide, the alligator season, which was to open in early September was pushed back to mid-September and will now close Oct. 13.

Boehringer said hunters should check the precise locations that are opened and closed by accessing the agency's Web site at www.wlf.louisiana.gov and clicking on the "What's New" section for information on changes in the 2005-06 hunting season. He said the section will be updated on a regular basis as areas open for hunting.

Most seafood from lake is safe to eat, state says

But industry to lose more than $1 billion

By John Pope
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Crabs, shrimp and other seafood from Lake Pontchartrain should be safe for eating as long as they are properly prepared, and exhaustive tests will be conducted on the water and the creatures living in it to ensure they maintain that standard, health and environmental officials said Friday.

"There is no toxic soup," said Chris Piehler, a senior environmental scientist with the state Department of Environmental Quality, at a news conference. "We find no evidence that people should not consume seafood from Lake Pontchartrain, given that they are properly handled."

In addition to proper cooking, State Health Officer Jimmy Guidry said seafood lovers have another factor working on their behalf: the diluting power of the lake itself.

Even though high bacterial counts were found in the lake after Hurricane Katrina roared through, the potential menace of those toxins was virtually eliminated because they became weaker in the water, he said. "It's not near the toxicity that people are talking about."

To limit the number of pollutants in the lake, Guidry said sewage was diverted to the Mississippi River until New Orleans' sewage-treatment system is back.

Guidry said he wasn't certain of the environmental impact of that decision, but he said the silt-filled Mississippi River is never pristine when it reaches New Orleans.

"I don't like the idea of raw sewage in the Mississippi," he said. "But rather than have raw sewage in the city, it's the only alternative we have."

In addition to water testing, Piehler said tissue from shrimp, fish and crabs will be sampled throughout the lake to ensure they are not contaminated.

Because of the back-to-back assaults of Katrina and Rita, Louisiana's seafood industry could lose slightly more than $1 billion this year, said Harry Blanchet of the state Department of Wildlife and Fisheries.

The storms hit not only fishers but also the land-based businesses supporting them, such as boat businesses and dry docks.

Recovery will take years, "but it will recover," said Jon Bell, a seafood expert in LSU AgCenter's Department of Food Sciences.

Although speakers at the Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness were enthusiastic about the prospect of consuming fish, shrimp and crabs, they were less sanguine about oysters.

Oyster beds are closed, and Guidry said testing will be required before oysters can be safe in any form, raw or cooked.

No one would speculate on how long that process would take.

As Louisianians struggle to restore their lives, including the enjoyment of native seafood, Guidry said inspectors from the state Department of Health and Hospitals are working with restaurants to ensure they meet strict food-preparation criteria before reopening.

Every establishment that passes inspection will receive a certificate that must be posted for customers to see.

"If they don't see a certificate, I wouldn't eat there," Guidry said.

Tulane promises prospective students it won't disappear

Admissions officials face some reluctance

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

BETHESDA, MD. — In one sense, it's the same pitch that Tulane University admissions counselors make every year: Tulane is one of America's elite private universities, a school that's neither so large as to be impersonal or too small as to limit academic choices, and it offers the extra benefit of being smack in the middle of one of America's most exciting cities.

Still, as Tulane representative Jeff Schiffman talked to a group of Walt Whitman High School seniors Friday, he acknowledged that some might well have doubts about applying to a university that was forced to cancel the fall semester due to damage caused by Hurricane Katrina.

Schiffman promised that the campus will be spruced up and ready for classes next fall, and that the vibrant New Orleans culture that makes Tulane "such a great place to go to school isn't going to disappear." One student asked whether "there will be Mardi Gras." Most certainly, Schiffman replied.

Still, he told students not to take his word for it.

"Unfortunately, you can't visit the campus this fall, but come visit during the spring semester," Schiffman said. "We'll be open up again on Jan. 17, and you can see for yourself."

Not only will they get a great education, he said, but they can attend Tulane at a time of incredible excitement, with a university committed to playing a major role in New Orleans' redevelopment. Architectural students already are working up new design schemes for devastated sections of New Orleans 9th Ward, Schiffman said, while engineering students are looking into new design possibilities for levees that failed and flooded the city.

For some of the Whitman students gathered in the school's guidance office, post-Katrina Tulane isn't an easy sell.

"My parents think it's not going to be as safe. Because of the water there might be more diseases," said Abby Wald, 17, a Whitman senior. "And since a lot of the city was ruined, will it be rebuilt by the time I go there? So it made me less interested in the school."

But Mariel Yohe, 17, said she was reassured by Schiffman's optimism about the future of both Tulane and New Orleans.

"I was a little worried because of all you read in the newspaper, but you don't really know about a place until you see it," Yohe said. "After hearing from the admissions guy, I feel more confident."

Abraham Einhorn, also 17, said he worries about how long it will take New Orleans to return to any semblance of its former vibrancy. But he said he still has a good feeling for the place.

"I think just like in New York after 9/11, there will be more of a connection to the place by the people who live there," Einhorn said. "I think that the people who come back will really be the ones who want to be there. But you wonder about all the lost historical buildings. I suspect in some ways after the rebuilding it will be better, but in some ways it will be worse. But I'm definitely going to consider Tulane."

Richard Whiteside, Tulane's dean of admissions, said applications for next fall's freshman class are running about 50 percent ahead of last year, although he conceded that part of the reason is attributed to the earlier distribution of brochures and admissions forms. Tulane has about 6,500 full-time undergraduates and a total student body of about 13,000.

Whiteside said he isn't sensing much reluctance about becoming part of Tulane's class of 2010 as he meets with high school students and their parents.

"I'd say the first five or six minutes go something like this: a lot of mutual support and concern for what happened, but that all ends pretty quickly," Whiteside said in a phone interview from Tulane's temporary administration offices in Houston. "And then it's all about admissions-related questions, like potential majors, financial aid and what student life is like. It's the same questions we get every year."

2 million gallons of spilled oil awaits cleanup

Plaquemines has 40,000 barrels to go

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — About 55,000 barrels of oil have yet to be cleaned up from the estimated 190,000 that were spilled in the New Orleans area during Hurricane Katrina, U.S. Coast Guard officials said Friday.

Coast Guard Capt. Frank Paskewich, federal on-scene coordinator for clean-up efforts, said that equates to about 8 million gallons spilled and about 2.26 million gallons to be cleaned up.

He said that 65,000 barrels "have been recovered and another roughly 70,000 barrels have either been dispersed or have evaporated.

Most of the remaining spilled oil — about 40,000 of the 55,000 barrels — is at the two Bass Enterprises Production tank farms in Plaquemines Parish, one at Cox Bay the other at Pointe-a-la-Hache.

The spilled oil is contained within berms, dead-end canals or containment booms now in place, said Bass spokesman Joe Householder. "It is not going into the (Mississippi) river. "

The company has had more than 80 workers cleaning up the site, and they will be joined by about 60 more over the weekend, Householder said.

"We know where it is," he said. "We just have to get to it. . . .They are working around the clock."

Paskewich said he did not know when the Katrina-caused spills would be cleaned up.

He said the environmental damage should be minimal since "the vast majority of the oil spills were all contained."

Paskewich said Hurricane Rita did not cause any new spills. In addition to the two major spills, oil spilled at Murphy Oil Co. in Chalmette, where an estimated 35,140 barrels released. Of those, 17,429 barrels have been recovered, 13,706 dispersed or evaporated, and 4,005 barrels remaining to be cleaned up.

Paskewich said, there has been "an aggressive response to the Murphy Oil spill" with at least 150 to 200 workers cleaning it up or containing it.

Celebrities help raise money for Katrina victims

By Kathy Hanrahan

JACKSON, MISS. — A very famous "Mississippi Girl" is helping Magnolia State residents put their lives back together more than a month after Hurricane Katrina.

Faith Hill is slated to perform at the gala fund-raising concert "Mississippi Rising" today in Oxford. Hill has been active in raising attention for victims of the storm.

The Star native's Web site is filled with messages urging fans to give money toward hurricane relief.

The three-hour, nationally televised benefit will raise money for the Mississippi Hurricane Recovery Fund, which was started by Gov. Haley Barbour, and a similar fund in Louisiana administered by Foundations for Recovery.

The concert is being organized by two Mississippi natives: Sam Haskell, former worldwide head of television for The William Morris Agency in Hollywood, and Lanny Griffith, a longtime friend of the governor and chief executive officer of the Washington lobbying firm Barbour Griffith & Rogers.

Famous Mississipians scheduled to appear on the broadcast include Sela Ward from Meridian, Lance Bass of Clinton, and Delta resident Morgan Freeman.

Some paychecks stop for New Orleans workers

Companies can't pay without customers

By Rebecca Mowbray and Jaquetta White
Business writers

Some New Orleans-area service-sector companies whose revenue stream is tied to a consuming public that has been largely absent for the past month began laying off workers Friday.

After Hurricane Katrina, many employers committed to paying their employees for 30 days. Friday marked the end of that period as well as the last day of the month, making it a natural time to cut ties.

The Belle of Orleans riverboat casino, for example, which was heavily damaged by the hurricane, fired its 692 employees. We paid them for 30 days, and that's where we're at now," said Gonzalo Hernandez, general manager of the privately owned casino formerly known as Bally's.

Tulane University, the metropolitan area's largest private employer, on Friday terminated all part-time faculty, part-time staff who did not get benefits, and part-time staff who were hired after May 1 that had been eligible to receive benefits. As of Nov. 1, only staff employees who have been requested to return to work will continue to be paid; others will need to use accrued vacation or sick leave until the university re-opens in January.

On a brighter note, Tulane on Friday extended pay through the end of October for research faculty, clinical faculty at the School of Medicine, medical residents and Veterans Affairs professors who work part-time at Tulane.

Sept. 30 was also a significant date for 500 full-time employees at the Fair Grounds Race Course and its betting and video poker operations. "We have said we would be paying everyone through the end of September, which is today," spokeswoman Julie Koenig-Loignon said Friday. Fair Grounds employees will need to start using their vacation and sick days as of today. But Churchill Downs Inc., the owner of the track, may have an update on that policy soon. "We are revisiting that decision on a week-by-week basis," she said.

Port of New Orleans employees who do not show up to work Monday will have to use their annual leave in order to continue being paid. Of the 318 port workers, 119 have reported to work. Thirty-three more are expected this week, according to the port's Web site.

At least one port tenant, International Shipholding Inc., has said that it will continue to pay all of its 122 New Orleans employees. They have been moved to temporary offices in Houston, Mandeville and Baton Rouge until the company can move back to New Orleans, said Erik L. Johnsen, the company's vice president.

Friday was the final payday for employees at Whole Foods Market locations in New Orleans and Metairie who had not relocated to another store. The company paid workers for two pay periods after the storm, whether they worked or not, and offered to pay relocation costs for those who chose to move to another city with a Whole Foods store.

Other companies weren't able to hang onto their employees that long. Two other grocers paid workers for only one week after the storm.

Winn-Dixie paid employees through Sept. 7 and then placed them on unpaid leave of absence, unless they found work at another Winn-Dixie store, said the company's spokesman, Dennis Wortham.

Likewise, the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Co., which owns the Sav-a-Center stores, paid employees for one week after Hurricane Katrina but continues to pay full benefits, company spokesman Glenn Dickson said.

About 775 of Sav-a-Center's 2,100 employees have been transferred to another store, he said.

The Ernest N. Morial Convention Center's 360 full-time employees stopped receiving paychecks Sept. 11 unless they were working. The Convention Center's 250 part-time employees are paid only for the hours they work. Sabrina Written, a spokeswoman for the Convention Center, said that some people in sales, human resources, finance, telecommunications, safety and operations have been working, but it's hard to know how many people that includes.

Harrah's New Orleans Casino, which has about 1,900 full-time employees, has committed to paying its workers for 90 days and has waived the payroll deductions for insurance. The Treasure Chest, which hopes to re-open soon, is paying its employees through the end of October. The Boomtown re-opened Friday.

Archdiocese plans to lay off workers

Katrina has ravaged the church's finances

By John Pope
Staff writer

Under financial strain from the burden of caring for victims of Katrina and Rita, the Archdiocese of New Orleans is grappling with the painful prospect of laying off an unspecified number of its 9,000 lay employees to avoid running a deficit.

"We certainly want to keep as many employees as we can," the Rev. William Maestri, the archdiocesan spokesman, said Friday. "However, we realize the ravages of Katrina and Rita have put a great strain on the archdiocese to provide for the victims of the storms and support its employees."

No decision has been made on the number of employees to be let go, the areas from which these workers will come or when the decision will be made, he said, explaining that this process has been in the works for only three weeks.

"We want to do this as quickly as possible . . . with all deliberate speed, to be fair to our employees," Maestri said.

Under its hurricane policy, the archdiocese paid all employees through today, he said, and benefits run through Oct. 31. Workers who are laid off can continue to pay for health insurance for another year.

Maestri said all lay employees must report to their supervisors or call 1 (888) 366-5024 by Monday.

If a job is available, the caller will be told when and where to report, and wages will resume on the first day of work. If no work is to be had, the worker will be terminated with two weeks' severance pay and then become eligible for unemployment compensation.

"We want to do this as quickly as possible . . . with all deliberate speed, to be fair to our employees."
THE REV. WILLIAM MAESTRI archdiocese spokesman

Employees also will be terminated, with two weeks' pay, if they turn down jobs offered when they call, Maestri said.

If they don't call by Monday, they will be dropped with no severance pay.

"The layoffs will be painful," Maestri said.

But being laid off may not be the end of the line, because some archdiocesan departments with robust budgets may be able to hire workers from agencies that can't afford them, Maestri said, adding that an increase in donations to the archdiocese might mean that more employees could be kept on the payroll.

In a statement to employees spelling out these options, the archdiocese described itself as "both a victim of the storm as well as an integral source of support."

"We must, however, regrettably, discontinue the employment of many of our faithful workers," the statement said. "We pledge to keep as many as possible. We hope to rehire many in the future."

Last search teams pull out on high note

Urban squads elated after saving 6,500

By Jeff Duncan
Staff writer

Huddled around the convoy of 10 red-and-white rescue trucks and vans, they traded hugs, handshakes and stories that by now have been seared into their minds.

The 35 members of the Fairfax, Va., Fire and Rescue team were preparing for the two-day journey home, their tireless work in New Orleans finally completed. For many, the weekend will mark the first time they will see their families since before Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast just over a month ago.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency completed its role in Joint Task Force Katrina's search for survivors and bodies in the New Orleans area on Wednesday. On Friday, the Fairfax team and another from Pennsylvania, the final two urban search-and-rescue teams, left their base of operations at the New Orleans Saints' training facility in Metairie and headed home.

"These people are on a high right now," said Dave Webb, who commanded the urban search and rescue operation for FEMA. "They've contributed, and they know that they have had an impact on people's lives. That's why they're in this business."

Working in collaboration with the National Guard, Coast Guard and local law enforcement agencies, FEMA's urban search-and-rescue teams rescued more than 6,500 people in New Orleans during their 33-day operation.

Eighteen of FEMA's 28 task force units were deployed to the Gulf Coast. As many as a dozen specialized teams worked in New Orleans at one time, said Mark Stone, a FEMA spokesman. Those teams were deployed in two sizes: one with 35 members and others, carrying heavier equipment for bigger buildings, with 70 to 80 members.

Search missions were performed in three phases.

The first phase immediately after the storm involved hasty searches. Most were performed in boats by Wildlife and Fisheries and Coast Guard officials while many parts of the city were still underwater. Rescuers visited each home but did not enter unless they discovered a survivor.

Urban search-and-rescue teams get ready to hit to the road Friday from their base at the New Orleans Saints' training facility in Metairie. 'In magnitude and complexity, it's certainly the largest hurricane we've ever worked,' said Dave Webb, who commanded the teams who searched 22,313 homes in New Orleans.

During the second phase, rescuers went to homes again and searched more thoroughly, looking in windows and calling out for help.

The final phase began about two weeks ago and involved revisiting dwellings that had been inaccessible because of high water.

"We haven't dealt with water before, and we don't carry boats with us," Webb said. "We are trained for structural collapse. Historically, that's involved heavy concrete structures. That was one of the many things about this experience."

'A unique mission'

During the recovery process, rescuers encountered scores of dead bodies. Webb and Stone deferred to state and local officials for official counts but acknowledged that FEMA teams encountered "hundreds" of bodies.

"I think that was expected," Stone said.

They individually searched 22,313 homes, a task unprecedented in size and scope for the crews, many of whom responded to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, D.C., and last year's tsunami that devastated much of Southeast Asia.

"In magnitude and complexity, it's certainly the largest hurricane we've ever worked," Webb said. "This was a catastrophic event for the Gulf Coast."

There were countless stories of heroism among the scores of daily missions.

▶The rescues of 72-year-old John Lyons and 76-year-old Gerald Martin, who had been stranded in their homes for 20 and 18 days, respectively.

▶The recovery of two Torah scrolls in the Congregation Beth Israel synagogue in Lakeview.

▶The rescue and return to health of a rare cockatiel in Mid-City.

▶The painstaking work of Capt. Roger Lowe and Spc. Mike Adams of the National Guard to compile a working database from the 22,000 911 calls that were redirected to Baton Rouge after the New Orleans system failed in the days after the storm hit.

"The collaboration of the unified command was amazing," said Maj. Mike Kitchens of the 35th Infantry Division, Kansas Army National Guard, who assisted the search and recovery missions with troops and 17 five-ton high-water armored vehicles. "This was a unique mission for the Guard. In Iraq and Kuwait, we were helping America. But it changes the dynamics when you are here and trying to help Americans."

Kinks in organization

That's not to say there weren't problems along the way.

FEMA initially deployed 11 of its 18 units to Mississippi but quickly changed gears and sent more rescuers, including the Fairfax County team, to Louisiana after the floodwaters rose.

While there was successful collaboration between the federal and local search and rescue teams, officials admitted that state and volunteer search parties also worked the area and overlapped efforts.

"There was a lot of duplication of effort on the searches," Webb said. "We know we searched many places three and four times. It's not the most efficient way to do it, but the overlaps were not necessarily harmful. We feel we did the best we could to rescue everybody we humanly possibly could."

The biggest problem initially was communication. Once a working system was installed after the first week, the operation and cooperation improved dramatically.

"In any operation of this magnitude there are going to be hiccups along the way," Kitchen said. "But in my opinion, this was a very well-run operation."

Added Stone: "During the first couple of days, the only one in charge here was Katrina. That's just how it is with a disaster of this size."

As Webb watched the rescue trucks roll away from the facility, he admitted to the remote possibility that more people could be discovered in homes as the city's residents return. But he's confident the local search-and-rescue units can handle the task. FEMA will continue to assist from Baton Rouge, but its presence in New Orleans is done.

"Miracles happen," Webb said. "I can tell you that we've met the expectations of the local government. We've done the best we could to cover all the ground where victims could be viable. Every home that met the agreed upon criteria was searched. We feel good about what we accomplished here."

"Ultimately government is going to have to retrench itself and shrink somewhat."

JERRY LUKE LeBLANC, commissioner of administration

Loss to state could top $1 billion

Hurricane expenses draining the budget

By Jan Moller
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – The state's general fund will take a hit of at least $1 billion this year as sales taxes, personal income taxes and other revenue plunge far below projections before Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita slammed the area, state economists told lawmakers Friday.

"For us this is very dramatic, and it's going to be very prolonged," Greg Albrecht, chief economist for the Legislative Fiscal Office, told a joint House-Senate panel in the first public presentation on the storms' potential impact on state coffers.

The overall budget shortfall is likely to be far larger than $1 billion, as money in the general fund is used to attract federal financing for programs such as Medicaid. The total state budget is $18.7 billion, an amount that includes not just the general fund but federal dollars and money that the state generates from penalties, fees, mineral royalties and other sources.

Commissioner of Administration Jerry Luke LeBlanc, Gov. Kathleen Blanco's chief budget officer, said that means budget cuts will have to be made in the coming weeks and months.

"Ultimately government is going to have to retrench itself and shrink somewhat," LeBlanc said. He did not say what spending might get chopped.

Sen. Francis Heitmeier, D-Algiers, who chairs the Joint Legislative Committee on the Budget, said there are no plans to make up the difference by raising taxes when the Legislature meets for a special session sometime later in October. "It's important to point out that there are no plans for a tax measure," Heitmeier said.

Katrina and Rita "severely affected" about one-third of the state's population, which makes up 37 percent of Louisiana's employment base and 38 percent of the personal income, Albrecht said.

Albrecht said Katrina-related job losses are expected to result in about 250,000 to 325,000 new unemployment claims for the fourth quarter, a figure that doesn't include self-employed people who lost jobs because of the storm and those who were already unemployed before Katrina hit.

While many of those jobs will return – or be replaced by new jobs as the New Orleans area rebuilds – Albrecht said as many as 125,000 jobs could permanently vanish as people displaced by the storm take up residence in other states. That, in turn, means that the state tax base could suffer for years to come. "Population is your economy; we need people back," Albrecht said.

The fate of the state budget depends in large part on the federal government. The Federal Emergency Management Agency is currently paying 100 percent of storm-related costs for state and local governments in Louisiana under a 60-day waiver, and the state has asked President Bush to extend that waiver until Aug. 29, 2006, the one-year anniversary of Katrina.

The state also is asking the federal government for another waiver that would allow FEMA to subsidize the day-to-day operating cost of state and local government. While FEMA's public assistance program lets state and local governments get reimbursed for disaster-related costs such as debris removal and overtime pay for emergency responders, it does not cover normal operating costs.

"It seems to me … that we're not going to be able to make any decisions going forward until we get a decision from the federal government for the waiving of the Stafford Act (which governs the federal response to disasters)," Sen. Jay Dardenne, R-Baton Rouge, said.

U.S. Sens. Mary Landrieu, D-La., and David Vitter, R-La., have introduced a $250 billion relief bill. Congress is almost certain to cut much of that proposed spending before sending the bill to President Bush, yet it could provide some relief to cash-strapped state and local agencies.

Katrina is expected to be the most expensive disaster in U.S. history, with damages estimated at $180 billion. That's nearly six times as much as Hurricane Andrew in 1992, the second most expensive hurricane, which cost $32 billion. And it's more than twice the $87.4 billion in losses experienced in New York and suburban Washington, D.C., in the Sept. 11 terror attacks.

The state began tightening its fiscal belt two weeks ago, when Blanco issued an executive order barring state agencies from hiring new workers and spending money on "nonessential items" such as travel and furniture. Far more stringent spending controls are on the way, LeBlanc said. "That executive order is just a drop in the bucket of what we will have to face moving forward," he said.

The state could make up part of the shortfall by using its $390 million rainy-day fund, one-third of which can be tapped by a two-thirds vote of the Legislature, which is expected to have two special sessions before its regular meeting in March.

Also working in the state's favor is the rising price of oil and natural gas, which could bring in higher than expected severance and royalty taxes. The 2005-06 budget was built on projections that the average price of oil would be $40 a barrel, and that natural gas would sell for $5.75 per cubic feet. The latest expectations are that oil will sell for an average of $61 per barrel, and gas will average $9.70 per cubic feet.

Even though Katrina and Rita combined to temporarily shut down nearly all oil and gas production in the Gulf of Mexico, economists said the higher 1weigh the lost production and result in a net gain for the state treasury.

"We will get some gain there, maybe, but it's not going to be the solution to our problem," said Jim Richardson, a professor of economics at Louisiana State University who sits on a forecasting panel that determines how much money the state will have available in the budget.

Miss. airports to receive federal funds

By The Associated Press

GULFPORT, MISS. — Two airports on the Mississippi Gulf Coast will receive almost $2.4 million in federal funds, including money to help with hurricane repairs, U.S. Sen. Trent Lott said Wednesday.

Lott, R-Miss., said $1.4 million was approved for Stennis International Airport in Hancock County. He said almost $1 million would be used at Gulfport-Biloxi International Airport for the continuation of a terminal apron expansion under way at the airport before Katrina.

"Getting airports in this region fully functional is very important, especially in a hard-hit area like Hancock County and Bay St. Louis," Lott said in a statement. "Stennis Space Center and Stennis Airport are a huge part of the Gulf Coast's economy, and this funding will help repair critical airport systems."

He said the federal funds for Stennis will help acquire aircraft rescue firefighting vehicles, install or replace navigational equipment, rehabilitate the ARFF building, and rehabilitate both runway and taxiway lighting.

The tidal surge from Katrina flooded the airport, causing extensive damage.

Firefighters honored for rescues

They insist they're just doing their jobs

By Paul Purpura
Staff writer

Looking back to what he and 32 fellow New Orleans firefighters did a month ago after Hurricane Katrina, Ladder 13 operator Mike Windsay talks as though it was just another week of service to the city, albeit a hectic one.

He made no big deal of how, even as Katrina's winds died down to 70 mph, a Category 1 storm, he and other firefighters ventured out of their safe haven into eastern New Orleans neighborhoods on a "windshield survey" to assess the damage left behind.

It was no big thing how during that survey they discovered 150 people in need of help and learned there were many, many more. How they devised a grid system to allow for an orderly search. How they used their own boats and Jet Skis and those they "commandeered" to create a flotilla of 10 vessels, keeping their tanks filled by siphoning gas from their own vehicles and even police cruisers.

And how, during five consecutive days of dawn-to-dusk searches, they helped save about 1,000 people from their flooded homes and roofs, even if it meant they had to wade through the sewage-filled, murky water.

"We still went out and did what we had to do," said Windsay, 32, a native of eastern New Orleans.

But on Friday, the New Orleans Fire Department recognized Windsay and 32 colleagues with commendations awarded by top brass in a ceremony at Our Lady of Holy Cross College in Algiers.

New Orleans firefighter Lisa Ruffin, one of the 'BellSouth Group,' hugs New Orleans Fire Superintendent Charles Parent during an awards ceremony Friday. During five days of dawn-to-dusk searches, the group helped save about 1,000 people from their flooded homes and roofs.

They're informally called the "BellSouth Group," named for the telecommunications company's three-story building in eastern New Orleans that they occupied before, during and after the storm because it was on high ground.

"It's recognition for a job above and beyond the call of duty," said District Chief Richard Hampton, who since Katrina has headed the New Orleans Unified Incident Fire Command. "You can ask any one of these guys and they'll say, 'I did nothing.' "

It was the first of many such ceremonies the NOFD expects to hold in coming weeks, for 700 of the department's members who saved "thousands" of New Orleanians, NOFD Superintendent Charles Parent said.

"They never quit, never for one minute (abandoned) their duties," Parent said. "They've inspired me personally."

"You guys are awesome, and we will never forget you," Mayor Ray Nagin said.

Like many of its members whose families are scattered and whose homes have been destroyed, the fire department has suffered bruises. Ten of its 22 engine houses were destroyed and on any given day, about 20 percent of its trucks were taken out of service for maintenance because of the wear and tear, Parent said. The fire department even was forced to move its headquarters to Our Lady of Holy Cross College because Algiers survived high and dry, Parent said.

Slowly, Parent said, the department is getting back on its feet. But it hasn't done it alone, thanks to more than 1,600 firefighters from Illinois, New York and Maryland who have joined ranks with New Orleans, he said. The U.S. Forestry Service also sent personnel from the Pacific Northwest to help the NOFD with logistics and support, Parent said.

On Friday, some firefighters returned to New York and Illinois after a two-week rotation in New Orleans.

"What we've done here for the past four weeks is more than mutual aid," said Assistant Chief Bob Sweeney of the Fire Department of New York. "It's brother and sister helping brother and sister."

Nagin offered them the city's thanks. "We owe you a serious debt, and we thank you for supporting us in our time of serious need," he said. "You can count on us if you ever need us."

As Katrina passed, Hampton said, the New Orleans Fire Department, like other municipal agencies, lost communications. "Everybody became independent fire departments," Hampton said. "They did exactly what they were supposed to do."

Capt. Tom Howley of Ladder 13 on Read Boulevard said they rescued people from an area bounded by Interstate 10 and Chef Menteur Highway and Bullard and Crowder boulevards. He and Windsay ventured out into flooded streets on his two Jet Skis, because they could reach areas that larger boats could not.

They'd shut off their boat motors so they could listen. They'd then hear the knocks and screams of people in attics. They would bring the people to any high point they could find, such as highway overpasses, where helicopters would whisk them away, Howley said.

In the end, Windsay said, the command structure became less formal, as "the idea at that point was survival."

"It was an experience that brought a lot of us together," Windsay said.

Red Cross opens centers in B.R., Denham Springs

3,000 wait hours for financial aid

By Leslie Williams
Staff writer

The Red Cross opened two Baton Rouge area financial aid distribution centers Friday and, like in other places where the agency is handing out debit cards, the openings were greeted with huge crowds and long waits.

At the center in Baton Rouge, the Bellemont Great Hall, roughly 3,000 people waited in line, some for four to five hours.

"I got here at 8:45 a.m.," a sweating Marie Broussard of Algiers, who evacuated from New Orleans with the Little Sisters of the Poor, said Friday afternoon.

Broussard, a nurse in training who worked at a nursing home operated by the order of nuns, was all smiles as she waited for what Red Cross officials described as a Discover credit card for goods and services.

"I'm going to use the money to buy sheets, towels and pots to cook in," said Broussard, who plans to move out of a room provided for free at St. Clare Manor Nursing Home in Baton Rouge and into an apartment. She said Katrina flooded her home on the first floor and mold was creeping everywhere on the second floor.

Broussard – who was studying nursing at Delgado Community College in New Orleans, but has since enrolled at Southern University – said she was "very appreciative of the Red Cross."

The Red Cross also set up a service delivery site in Denham Springs. Nearly 3,000 people stood in line there as well, said Mary Dooley, a spokeswoman for the nonprofit organization.

The Bellemont Great Hall, 7370 Airline Highway, and a location in Denham Springs, the North Park Recreation Center at 30372 Eden Church Road, were opened Friday for the first time and will remain open "for weeks," said Dooley, generally operating from 8 a.m. until 3 p.m., seven days a week. The Denham Springs location, though, will not open today because it was already booked for a wedding.

Samuel Gable, who waited in line for more than four hours, said he was uncertain how much he would receive from the Red Cross, but he had to come because he needs money to buy clothes and food. Gable, a resident of eastern New Orleans who had worked for Lockheed Martin, said when he evacuated for Katrina he left with little clothing, thinking he would return in a few days.

Originally, he fled to Dallas, but later moved into a home in Baton Rouge provided by a friend of a friend.

Dooley said anyone from ZIP Codes in areas battered by hurricanes Katrina or Rita qualify for credit cards worth $360 for an individual up to $1,565 for a family of five or more. Residents will have to provide identification showing they reside in the affected areas.

But those who come to the distribution points should be prepared for long waits, Red Cross officials said.

"This has affected hundreds of thousands of people," said Kendall Hebert, a spokeswoman for the Baton Rouge Red Cross. "We want people to expect long lines."

Indeed, Red Cross financial aid centers opened this week in St. Tammany Parish, the first in the metro area to hand out the debit cards, created giant traffic jams.

Hebert said if lines grow too large at the Baton Rouge-area centers, some people might have to be asked to return another day.

The damage caused to homes and businesses by Hurricane Katrina in the New Orleans area was widespread and severe, but in a city well-known for its live oaks, trees also faced the fury of the storm. Residents returning to their homes are finding plenty of work to do outside, as well as inside.

New Orleans faces health-care crisis

provides an array of services that poor people would have a difficult time getting elsewhere, Rowland said. Charity also operates the area's only Level One trauma center, a member of an elite group of hospitals that are equipped to handle the most serious emergencies.

Dr. Vincent Berkley, chief medical officer for Indian Health Service, the federal health program for American Indians and Alaska natives, is leading a U.S. Public Hospital Administration team overseeing the restoration of health care in New Orleans. The goal is to rebuild the area's hospital capacity in an integrated and incremental manner, with hospitals sharing information about the services they are prepared to offer.

In the meantime, disaster medical assistance teams that work with doctors, nurses and pharmacy services to provide urgent medical care to communities without hospitals have been set up. And the emergency medical service systems in Orleans and Jefferson parishes are working together to transport patients to hospitals that can accommodate them.

A dozen hospitals in the New Orleans area continue to operate, including Ochsner Clinic Foundation in Jefferson, East Jefferson General Hospital in Metairie and West Jefferson General Hospital in Marrero. Kenner Regional Medical Center and Touro Infirmary are operating emergency rooms. And this week Kenner Regional was cleared to reopen some inpatient beds, a spokesman for the hospital's owner said.

Tulane-Lakeside Hospital in Metairie reopened Friday. Although Lakeside specializes in women's health care, the hospital will offer additional services to help meet the community's immediate needs, said Jeff Prescott, spokesman for HCA Inc., the hospital's parent company.

Children's Hospital has a projected opening date of Oct. 10, depending on the return of city services.

All acute-care hospitals in St. Tammany Parish remain open, including North Shore Regional Medical Center in Slidell, as well as River Parishes Hospital in LaPlace and St. Charles Parish Hospital in Luling.

As the hospitals work to reopen, hospital administrators must balance the community's need for medical care with their own fiscal health.

"Nurses are being hired away because many of them have no homes here and no schools where they can send their children. The human resources side is not attractive," Finn said.

Already 5,944 doctors were displaced in the 10 parishes in Louisiana and Mississippi flooded by Katrina. That figure doesn't include doctors working as administrators or researchers, only those caring for patients. Of those, 4,486 were in Orleans, Jefferson and St. Bernard parishes, according to Thomas Ricketts, a University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill professor who conducted a study on displaced doctors. The study is based on data from the American Medical Association, information on areas that flooded and the locations where doctors practiced.

More than half the displaced doctors were specialists, including 1,292 primary care doctors and 272 obstetricians and gynecologists. Half of the 1,300 medical students at Louisiana State University and Tulane moved to other programs, mostly in Baton Rouge and East Texas.

The problem is that many doctors won't come back. For physicians, once they get busy practicing elsewhere, the reasons for not coming back build, Ricketts said.

This week Tenet Healthcare notified the approximately 2,400 employees of Memorial and Lindy Boggs medical centers that they would be laid off at the end of October because it's clear those hospitals will be closed for at least six months, a company spokesman said. Both lost power and flooded when levees broke after Hurricane Katrina. Workers there are being given the opportunity to apply for work at Tenet's 67 other hospitals in 13 states, Steve Campanini said.

Both Methodist Hospital and Chalmette Medical Center took on water, and the parent company for those hospitals, UHS Inc., has started surveying the damage. UHS has 2,800 employees spread among the five New Orleans area hospitals it operates and they are still being paid.

UHS has not decided how long that will continue, spokesman Nick Ragone said, but the company will continue health insurance benefits for workers at Chalmette and Methodist through the end of the year, he said.

Ragone said UHS is offering jobs to employees at its 85 hospitals around the country and some have taken advantage of the offer.

about doing things in a manner consistent with how other areas of the country do things."

Nagin also said each commission member has agreed to sign an "ethics statement" pledging they will not "profiteer from the rebuilding process."

Whether the final aid package that comes from Washington is $100 billion or $250 billion, Nagin vowed to see the funds spent in a transparent manner that would breed confidence in the recovery effort and the city's future. What's more, much of the money would be earmarked for projects to ensure that a similar disaster never happens again, he said.

At questions about the country's commitment to rebuilding the city in light of its precarious situation, however, the mayor displayed a flash of impatience. Nagin wondered why metropolitan areas with their own looming confrontations with nature are not subject to the same debate.

"I don't see it about Florida," he said. "There's not one about California, which sits right on a fault line. Let's figure out what we have to do to make this a safer community."

In an e-mail to the White House, Nagin said he had asked for four specific things:

▶ To have the city's levees immediately restored to withstand a Category 3 hurricane and "quickly thereafter" upgraded to a more comprehensive system of levees and floodwalls that could, in theory, withstand a direct hit from a Category 5 storm.

▶ Whatever dollars are appropriate to rebuild a levee protection system equipped to withstand a Category 5 hurricane.

▶ An "expedited and fortified" light rail system to run from downtown to the airport and then from the airport to Baton Rouge. Beyond its immediate benefits to the economy, Nagin said the system would serve as an evacuation tool.

▶ A complex package of tax breaks and incentives for individuals and businesses working or headquartered in New Orleans.

When asked what kind of response he got from the White House, Nagin smiled but did not provide specifics.

"They basically said they were looking at it," he replied. "You know, the president looked me in the eye and said we would rebuild the city into a shining example for the nation and so far he's been a man of his word."

Nagin added: "New Orleans is not asking for hand out. We're asking for a hand up."

The mayor said he has given the commission an ambitious timetable, asking it to deliver a "fully vetted plan" by year's end.

He said the commission "will not work in isolation," with up to two dozen subcommittees - on subjects such as levees, education and economic development — whose membership will number in the hundreds.

While he provided few details, Nagin said the commission plans to set up teleconferences to solicit input from evacuees scattered across the nation.

The commission will be co-chaired by two native New Orleanians: community activist Barbara Major, executive director of the St.Thomas Health Clinic, and Mel Lagarde, chief executive officer of HCA Delta Division, a major health care provider.

"I am honored to have been asked to be a part of this commission," Major said. "I don't know if I'm more scared than honored. But fear is a good thing because it brings about caution."

Major said she is committed to rebuilding a New Orleans "with the inclusiveness that it never had before in terms of equity and access. That everybody has a right to return to New Orleans. Not to the old New Orleans but to a better New Orleans where there is decent housing and quality schools and health care for all."

Lagarde said signing up for the commission "is an opportunity I've waited for really ever since the storm hit. We've talked enough about the devastation and the issues that face this city as a result of the storm."

While it will be a daunting task, he said New Orleans has an unprecedented chance "to come together and begin looking at things completely new, with a completely different set of issues and paradigms."

Nagin said he is not concerned that other committees being assembled by Gov. Kathleen Blanco and the New Orleans City Council will conflict with his commission, noting that the governor's panel has a statewide mission and that Council President Oliver Thomas has a seat on his committee.

Blanco, who showed up unannounced and got a bear hug from a surprised Nagin, agreed with the mayor's assessment.

She said she wants every Louisiana community hit by Katrina to set up similar committees of local community leaders and pledged her full support for the effort.

"We will be your right arm," Blanco told Nagin. "We'll work as a big team. We're going to work hard as your partner and we're going to make this happen."

Blessed - "ADJECTIVE: highly favored or fortunate; characterized by happiness and good fortune."
Prior to Hurricane Katrina, "blessed" was an often used word. Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.
Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. This is a very limited opportunity, and availability is restricted.
We have employment opportunities available in the Sales Department, including management availabilities.
Sales Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 5pm
Service Hours: Mon - Fri 7:30am - 6pm • Sat 7:30-4
We are committed to rebuilding Jefferson Parish and Southeast Louisiana. We need your support. Together, we will prevail and have a better place to live and work than before Hurricane Katrina.
As you read this, Ray Brandt Toyota, its employees and families, and the residents of Southeast Louisiana all have something in common; we are truly "blessed".

Driving pilings weakens soil

and may not have overflowed the walls – pointing to a possible flaw in design, construction or maintenance.

The issue also came up in a document about a contract dispute over the 17th Street Canal floodwall. In the 1998 document, reported by NBC News this week, contractor Pittman Construction said weak soil in the area had caused the wall to tilt slightly when concrete was poured. It also claimed that driving sheet piling into the ground had temporarily weakened the soil even more.

But it's not clear what, if anything, that means in terms of the floodwall failures. Corps engineers disputed Pittman's allegations. An administrative law judge agreed with the Corps, saying that the walls had tilted because the concrete molds were held in place by an unusual, unstable bracing system, and that Pittman had failed to back its contention that the soil conditions posed unexpected problems in the construction process.

One reason the complaints about soil strength were dismissed is that virtually the entire New Orleans levee system is constructed on weak soil. The judge cited another contractor's success in dealing with similar conditions in the nearby Orleans Avenue Canal.

Mississippi Delta soil is soft, squishy and unstable, composed of thin, alternating layers of soil, sand and silt laid down by the river over hundreds of years, supplemented in spots by garbage, trees and other materials.

Ivor van Heerden, assistant director of the Louisiana State University Hurricane Center, who has degrees in geology and marine sciences, said the land under the canal once was a hardwood swamp, and could pose many problems for engineers designing a floodwall.

"The outflow at the break is filled with old cypress stump and cypress logs, because that was what this area used to be, that was the geology of it," he said. "You probably have cypress stumps and logs under the surface here every 5 meters or so. You can imagine driving a sheet piling into one of those, and the metal could bend or split. That could cause leakage later on."

Building stable, reliable levees and floodwalls – or anything – on such a base is a challenge. That's why such soil is usually mechanically compacted. It's not clear what kind of compaction was done on the canal wall bases.

"Any time that you design something that is a combination of earth and soil material and concrete, you have to think about various modes of failure. You look at global stability – sliding, overturning, breaking, flotation," said Leon Schieber, a levee and floodwall engineer at the firm Black & Veatch in Overland Park, Kansas. "The reason you do compaction on the soil is to address those kinds of failures."

So the teams of engineers will look at design, construction and maintenance documents to see what was done to the soil along the walls. They will take soil core samples and test them. They will get them wet and see how that changes the soil's strength.

Engineers also will look for clues as to what happened during Katrina. As storm surge rose, engineers say, that would have pushed water under the bottom of the floodwalls' sheet pile bases.

"Water is pushing against the concrete and trying to push it toward the dry side. But the water also infiltrates and saturates the soil. In the soil, it can create an upward pressure under the structure," Schieber said.

The pressure also could have moved soil underneath the wall, and either could have caused it to destabilize enough to collapse under the pressure of the water in the canal.

Designers can lessen the upward pressure by putting the structure deeper into the earth; that way the water has farther to travel and the pressure is lessened. But some observations by LSU scientists indicate the sheet piling might have been unusually short – just a few feet long.

Driving sheet piling "has several functions," Bea said. "The first is to prevent water intrusion below the base of the wall below the ground level. The other important function is to support the wall both laterally and vertically. We have all kinds of photographic evidence that says those walls did not get the support they needed, and over they went."

Another issue raised by Pittman Construction is whether driving the sheet piling into the soil itself weakened it – a contention rejected by the administrative law judge. Engineers were also skeptical.

"Soil can be weakened when you drive something into it — we call it liquefaction," said Dobroslav Znidarcic, a professor of geotechnical engineering at the University of Colorado at Boulder. "You disturb the soil, and if the soil is relatively soft, you develop high water pressures inside the soil. But then over time the water pressure decreases and the strength increases."

According to the document, the walls were slightly titled and left that way. Znidarcic said that did not necessarily mean they were any less stable, however.

Bea said that more generally, a dispute between a contractor and the Corps could be a sign of trouble that could provide clues to possible design flaws. "When the contractor says, 'I've got trouble,' that's usually an early warning sign," he said.

Counselors to help with finding work

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Labor Department will dispatch counselors to help survivors of hurricanes Katrina and Rita find work.

About 150 counselors will be sent to relocation centers in several states to work one-on-one with evacuees, Labor Secretary Elaine Chao announced Friday. The department also will dispatch specially trained counselors to help the disabled find employment in hurricane-hit states.

The department also is speeding up enrollment for 4,000 young people who survived the hurricanes to take part in its Job Corps program, which provides education and vocational training to economically disadvantaged people 16 through 24.

Speaking to a small group of reporters, Chao declined to estimate the impact of the hurricanes on national payrolls. "We're going to have some uncertainty in the numbers," for a while, she said.

Many economists are predicting the economy will show a loss of around 170,000 jobs for September, lifting the unemployment rate – now at a four-year low of 4.9 percent – to above 5 percent. The employment report for September will be released next week.

Jeff arrests 275 in Katrina looting

Deputy wounds man during foot chase

By Michelle Hunter
East Jefferson bureau

The Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office has arrested 275 people on looting charges since Aug. 27, including one man shot by a deputy after he fired at the officer, Sheriff Harry Lee said in his most expansive accounting to date of Katrina-related crime.

The deputy wounded Larry Falkins, 19, of Westwego during a foot chase in Kenner on Sept. 1, an arrest report said. Falkins had been identified as the man who had broken into a nearby pawnshop.

Falkins allegedly fired a gun at the deputy and missed. The deputy returned fire and hit Falkins in the arm. Falkins managed to get away, but authorities later caught up with him at Kenner Regional Medical Center, after he turned up for treatment. Falkins was treated, released and later booked with looting, attempted first-degree murder and aggravated assault on an officer. Lee's figures exceed those reported by the FBI for looting arrests in New Or-

Franklin pushing for 2006 opening

Charter school idea being floated

Staff and parents at Benjamin Franklin High School, a college-prep New Orleans public school that routinely tops the charts in state achievement scores, are mounting a grassroots effort to get the school open in January.

They are making it clear, meanwhile, that they will fight any effort to alter Franklin's magnet-school status.

Some parents are pushing the idea of converting Franklin into a charter school, thereby insulating it from school system directives, but no formal proposal has been drafted, said parent group leader Duris Holmes and Orleans Parish School Board member Lourdes Moran, who has two children at the school.

Interim Superintendent Ora Watson said district officials aren't contemplating Franklin's immediate future because they are too busy reopening west

No guidelines exist for determining when to tear down and when to repair

It's become conventional wisdom: A house that flooded severely and stayed that way for long will have to be torn down. But whoever came to that conclusion forgot to convince Tania Hahn.

Hahn's two-story home on Central Park Place near New Orleans' City Park sat in at least 5 feet of floodwater for weeks after the 17th Street Canal breach. On Friday, like thousands of houses that insurers and elected officials have said must be demolished, its façade still carried the telltale high-water mark attesting to its days spent marinating in the chemical-ridden liquid.

But inside, a three-man crew worked on the ground floor, gutting every inch of drywall, removing appliances and tearing out the floor, until only the skeleton of the 1940s-era home remained.

"It's definitely salvageable because it didn't float off the blocks," Hahn said, sounding a note of optimism shared by other brave rehabilitators, an uncounted group scattered across the city. "I've heard that the older houses had better construction," she said, while acknowledging that her insurance company doesn't share her view. "I had the go-ahead (from them) to demolish."

Hahn chose to renovate because her second floor was untouched. "I'd put it back together if it was a one-story house," she said. "I love this city. I heard people saying that you should just bulldoze the neighborhood. But who could imagine this country without the city of New Orleans?"

Ace Environmental employees tear out Sheetrock from a home on Marcia Avenue. According to Vieux Carre Commission Deputy Director Dan Brown, every home in New Orleans damaged by flooding will be inspected before any recommendations for demolition are made.

A week ago, contractor Chad Melancon might have shared Hahn's upbeat assessment, but no longer. He had seen only minor flooding damage in the Metairie and Kenner homes where he had ripped out

Some buses resume service

Runs will be done before curfew

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

Regional Transit Authority buses will resume limited service in New Orleans and Kenner on Sunday for the first time since Hurricane Katrina blasted the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29.

The buses, often used by low-wage workers at businesses in New Orleans and Jefferson parishes, are likely to aid stores and restaurants that have reopened in recent weeks but gone begging for employees. Jefferson Transit put its buses back on the street Wednesday on four East Jefferson and six West Jefferson routes.

The RTA's St. Charles Avenue, General Meyer and Algiers Local bus lines will begin running the routes they ran before Katrina, RTA spokeswoman Rosalind Blanco Cook said.

"Buses will run every 30 minutes with supervisors monitoring and adjusting the schedules as needed," Cook said.

The New Orleans buses will run shortened schedules, from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m., seven days a week, because of the New Orleans curfew. The last bus each day will start its run before 6 p.m., and at times before 5 p.m., so the route will be finished before the curfew begins.

In Kenner Sunday, RTA will begin Kenner Loop's regular schedule. Kenner resident Nella Brainis is eager to see it.

"I'm taking cabs, and for a few days I couldn't even get a cab," she said, adding that the bus service is important for employees without transportation. "These folks can't afford a cab, most of them. How are you going to get restaurant workers?"

Although many of RTA's buses flooded in Katrina, the agency has enough to begin the limited service, Cook said.

And staffing isn't a problem, she said. Many bus drivers stayed at RTA's Canal Street office during the storm and evacuated on the Tuesday after the hurricane for shelter in Baton Rouge, Cook said.

"There's no problem with getting personnel," she said.

Entergy officials hope to light up the night in St. Bernard Parish

Utility begins work on lines

By Manuel Torres
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

St. Bernard Parish District Attorney John Rowley has gotten used to the dark. Ever since Katrina knocked off power in the entire parish Aug. 29, Rowley has lived in the parish courthouse in Chalmette, watching the glow of lights blanket neighboring parishes at night but waiting for the time he can turn on a switch in the historic building he now occupies.

"At night you can see the lights across the (Mississippi) River," he said recently, pointing toward Algiers.

His wait is almost over, Entergy officials said Friday, as they detailed efforts to restore the two transmission lines that feed the parish, which were heavily damaged by the storm. They said some small pockets in St. Bernard, including a few government buildings, public utilities, and proposed sites for federally funded temporary housing, are expected to have power again as early as next week.

But company officials said in most neighborhoods where the storm caused enough damage to warrant the demolition of entire blocks, power will only be restored once reconstruction plans are laid out and residents begin returning.

The ongoing repairs come after parish officials in recent weeks have criticized Entergy for "abandoning" St. Bernard while restoring power in other areas. Company officials have said the extent of the damage in St. Bernard, which was more severe than in most other areas, has delayed power restoration.

"We took a licking," said Glenn Jallans, the company supervisor in charge of the St. Bernard network. "As bad as you see the parish, that's how bad we were hit."

The damage was evident as leans and Jefferson Parish combined.

In the days just before and well after Katrina ripped the New Orleans region on Aug. 29, Jefferson deputies recovered many pickup-truckloads of merchandise stolen from Wal-Marts, Walgreens drug stores, Radio Shacks, grocery stores and businesses in Oakwood Center, which looters sacked and set afire. Among the booty: DVD players, DVDs, CD players, even electric toothbrushes — "Something that everybody needs during a hurricane when there's no electricity," said Capt. Kerry Najolia, deputy commander of the Sheriff's Office SWAT team. Among those booked with looting the Harvey Wal-Mart was Menekia Humphry, 29, of Harvey, who, with her 13-year-old daughter in tow, wheeled out a shopping cart of stolen goods including several Playstation 2 video games, an arrest report said. Also booked with looting that same store were two Sheriff's Office correctional officers who are accused of taking electronic equipment.

Quite a bit of stolen loot was found in vehicles that also had been stolen, Lee said. So far, 24 vehicles have been reported stolen from East Jefferson car dealerships, and at least 110 from dealerships in West Jefferson, he said. Deputies have not yet heard from another four West Jefferson dealers.

Even now, some Jefferson car dealers are getting calls that vehicles stolen from their lots have been found all over the United States, including several at the Astrodome in Houston, a major evacuation site for New Orleans area residents, Lee said.

Deputies also arrested more than eight people who bailed out of stolen U.S. Postal Service trucks parked near the West Bank Expressway and Westwood Drive in Marrero, arrest reports said. Inside the trucks, deputies found stolen goods, some with the security tags still attached, as well as lottery tickets, the reports said.

Looters also made their way into several grocery stores. But some thieves bypassed the food aisles and went to the pharmacy.

Shawn Berrigan, 33, of Metairie was arrested on charges of lifting several bottles of prescription drugs from a Sav-A-Center pharmacy, an arrest report said. Deputies found a black garbage bag containing narcotics such as hydrocodone and alprazolam.

He was booked Wednesday with eight counts of drug possession with the intent to distribute, looting and pharmacy burglary, the report said.

School's top floors escape unscathed

bank schools.

"There's been no discussion of any of the schools outside of Algiers and the west bank," she said.

One to two feet of floodwater caused extensive first-floor damage at Franklin, located at the edge of the University of New Orleans campus on Leon C. Simon Boulevard. The gym floor was ruined and the water had an undetermined impact on administrative offices, the library and the cafeteria, Principal Carol Christen said this week as she helped retrieve sopping files. The school's courtyard has been strewn with splintered tree branches, and there were reports of ruined textbooks.

But Christen said Franklin's upper two floors — housing all classroom and permanent record files — were unscathed. She and a few teachers didn't hesitate to talk up the future for a school that, once located in a tattered old building in Carrollton, has been an academic powerhouse for decades.

Pulling Franklin's dispersed student body back together, or as much of it as possible, is key to New Orleans' revival after Hurricane Katrina, they argue.

Before the storm hit, 935 students attended grades 9 through 12.

"We want our school back — clean or dirty. We want it back," said Colleen Fiegel, a biology teacher and technology coordinator.

There is a fierce desire to return among Franklin students who are scattered from New York to California, attending schools that can't quite compare with the demanding New Orleans school, said Holmes, president of the Ben Franklin High School Association.

A business lawyer, Holmes is now working in Lafayette and his children are attending school in suburban Atlanta.

"Even parents who have said they won't be back this year want to come back next year," he said. "There's a strong sense of wanting to keep the community together."

Contributions previously raised for lockers and video surveillance equipment at Franklin will be diverted to recovery expenses that aren't covered by the school system, Holmes said. A few distant schools, in Florida, California and Georgia, are interested in "adopting" Franklin to help with immediate needs, he said.

Holmes is hopeful that Franklin can enroll roughly 500 of Franklin's students in January, roughly the size of the student body back in the 1980s. The rebuilding drive will draw heavily from Uptown and Algiers areas that were spared flooding during Katrina, and school supporters hope students already registered at Franklin, but temporarily living in other parishes, can attend without residency challenges.

The school district's rush to turn a few relatively undamaged schools left dry after the hurricane into general-purpose schools worries some parents who fear that Franklin, which applies rigid admissions standards, could see a similar move as an emergency step. That would end Franklin's unusual role, they say.

"You can't have a Franklin with open enrollment," Holmes said.

Part of the interest in the charter-school idea stems from concern that if the school system rehires teachers based simply on seniority, Franklin may become home to many teachers who aren't qualified to teach advanced-placement and other gifted-student classes, he said.

Christen was reluctant to discuss the charter-school and open-enrollment issues, saying she hasn't had a chance to discuss Franklin's options in detail with district officials.

But as she toted a breathing mask and sweated profusely at the school Thursday, the educator added: "The goal here is to open up this school as this school."

Christen and Holmes said a lease with UNO that allowed Franklin to be built on the university campus provides that UNO can reclaim the property, including the school building, if Franklin's role as a college-prep magnet school is dissolved. For that reason, Moran said she doesn't expect a strong push for Franklin to become an open-enrollment high school.

Moran said she has heard of the informal push for charter-school independence but doesn't yet have an opinion on the idea.

"It all depends on what the School Board has in mind for Ben Franklin," said Moran, whose children are now attending a private school in Vermont.

Moran doesn't want Franklin's role changed, and hopes to discuss the matter informally with School Board colleagues during an Oct. 7 meeting at Eisenhower Elementary School in Algiers.

The discussion of converting Franklin into an independent charter school follows a recent bid by supporters of Lusher elementary and middle schools, also magnet schools with admissions criteria, to win School Board approval for charter school status.

State education officials so far aren't publicly discussing Franklin's future. Louisiana Department of Education spokeswoman Meg Casper said "we try to stay out of local issues" and that the matter falls in the School Board's domain.

Board of Elementary and Secondary Education member Leslie Jacobs said, "My guess is everything under the sun is being discussed," but referred questions to Christen.

Ben Franklin High students, staff members and others can track developments or report their plans through the Web site for parents, bfhsa.org or through the e-mail network: groups.yahoo.com/group/bhsa.

Entergy crews move part of a large utility pole into place in the marshes of Bayou Bienvenue on Friday. They are rebuilding a 115,000-volt transmission line and have to replace 24 transmission towers supporting the lines that were damaged by surge from Hurricane Katrina.

Company says extent of damage slowed repairs

POWER, from B-1

crews on Friday worked in the marshes around Bayou Bienvenue off Paris Road, rebuilding from the ground up a 115,000-volt transmission line extending from the Michoud facility in eastern New Orleans to Chalmette.

Twenty-four towers that supported the line went down as Katrina's surge, estimated at more than 23 feet, lifted a yacht and tangled it on the lines, which fed substations in Chalmette and Arabi.

Circles rippled in the water as a helicopter crane capable of lifting 20,000 pounds picked up a 30-foot long metal cylinder to be used as the foundation for one of the new towers and gently deposited it in the marsh. Crews drilled it into the earth and filled it with sand and cement. The chopper then brought the remaining parts of the tower to be assembled on site. The entire transmission line, Jallans said, is on schedule to be restored by the middle of next week.

He said the company has as many as 300 workers in the parish restoring hundreds of miles of distribution lines. In the last three days alone, he said, they had replaced 100 damaged poles.

"I've been in this company for 33 years," he said, "and I've never seen it this bad."

Once the power is back, Jallans said the juice will go first to a list of facilities the parish has tagged as high priorities. They include the courthouse, the jail and the government administrative building in Chalmette, sewage and water treatment plants, the parish's two refineries and at least four sites where the Federal Emergency Management Agency is to set up temporary housing and offices for public functions or returning residents.

Neighborhood distribution lines, Jallans and Entergy spokesman Chanel Lagarde said, will be restored on an as-needed basis, since it remains unclear which areas of the parish will be demolished and which ones will be repaired. There's no point in making a large investment now, they said, in neighborhoods where it could be months or possibly years before homes go up.

"As people return, we'll restore power," Lagarde said.

Parish Councilwoman Judi Hoffmeister said the approach is logical. But she said a few areas, such as the Old Arabi area that suffered relatively minor flooding, will be ready for residents in a much shorter time.

"The priority will be those areas where people can return first and areas where schools may be set up," she said.

Thousands of buildings likely to be razed

SOAKED, from B-1

moldy drywall and buckled wood floors, the first steps in renovating buildings left damaged but structurally intact by Katrina and Rita.

But standing in a one-story Lakeview home, where a thick layer of muck covered everything and the reddish water mark reached 7 feet from the floor, Melancon said Monday that the devastation eclipsed even his worst nightmares.

"Ten times worse," he said, noting that sixpenny nails joining wall studs probably had begun to rust in brackish floodwater, compromising the entire house. "It's got to go."

On this block of General Diaz Street near Harrison Avenue, and for miles in every direction, residents of entire neighborhoods that were flooded for days trickled back to ruined homes this week with a similar reaction: Knock it all down.

But before bulldozers and front-end loaders can push into devastated areas, state and local officials may have to retool building codes, with some already moving to expedite the condemnation process so structures sodden with oily water can be deemed unsalvageable and razed.

The process, however, cannot begin until hoards of inspectors arrive in the New Orleans area to provide the government's assessment of the properties after private claims adjusters have finished their work. And regarding structures facing condemnation, officials in some parishes said they need to set up a way for residents – and the growing cadre of concerned historic preservationists – to authorize demolitions or fight the wrecking ball.

The load of unsalvageable property in southeast Louisiana is expected to be massive. Local leaders have estimated that tens of thousands of structures may have to be demolished and in New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish and thousands more in other low-lying areas across southeastern parts of the state.

In Louisiana alone, the tally of construction and demolition debris left by Katrina could top 35 million cubic yards – or enough to fill eight Louisiana Superdomes – if every building that sat in fetid floodwaters for longer than a few days has to be leveled, according to the Army Corps of Engineers, which oversees disaster debris removal.

No definitive standard exists, however, to determine which buildings must be razed. Inspectors likely will consider the type of construction, length of time that the structure was submerged and what was in the water, said Michael Carliner, an economist with the National Association of Home Builders.

Ron Roberson, who lives in the 3200 block of Nashville Avenue, found mold growing in his home.

"There's no rule of thumb," he said. "But most of the structures in New Orleans are on the wrong side of the scale. Most of them are older wood construction, they were submerged for long periods, and the water wasn't very clean."

He added that "this is not a simple demolition," saying that about 350,000 buildings likely will have to be demolished across the four states hit by Katrina and Rita; the previous record was 28,000 torn down because of Hurricane Andrew in 1992.

Indeed, in New Orleans, few plans have been made for which neighborhoods might be recommended for clearing. Vieux Carre Commission Deputy Director Dan Brown said last week that every flood-damaged building in the city, whether or not it is located in a historic district, will be inspected by one of 100 assessment teams. Photographs of each building will be posted on the Internet, he said.

"It will be a methodical, open process," Brown said.

But members of the City Council said this week, as some parts of New Orleans reopened to residents for the first time in a month, that they did not know if norms have been established for judging homes or if the city's current building codes would be sufficient to manage the myriad forms of damaged property.

"We have an obligation to establish a standard," said Councilwoman Cynthia Morrell, whose district was partially deluged by water that poured through a breach in the London Avenue Canal. "I would think neighborhood by neighborhood, they would have to have input," though resident participation probably would not extend "down to the house level."

Morrell also said she wanted officials to consider other options, such as a "bacterial wash" of flooded homes, before condemning large areas; spraying bleach on homes also has been suggested. "You can't go in and tell people you're going to tear down your whole neighborhood," Morrell said. "We've got to have options."

City Councilman Jay Batt, who represents the devastated Lakeview area, said the city's demolition norms probably will depend on recommendations by the Federal Emergency Management Agency and whether rules are revamped for how residents in flooded areas can rebuild their homes and still retain coverage under the government-backed national flood insurance program.

"I don't think it's going to be wholesale demolitions," he said, "but a lot of the wood structures probably will have to come down."

Though FEMA is expected to aid in demolition, possibly by hiring contractors to disassemble homes, a spokesman said the agency will not decide which structures stay and which ones go.

"There is a rumor out there that FEMA has condemned all homes in the (Lakeview) area of New Orleans," Kim Pease said. "That's not true. FEMA does not condemn homes. We don't have bulldozers. That's up to the state and local jurisdictions."

In St. Bernard, where officials estimate that buildings in 80 percent of the parish will have to be razed, officials have begun rewriting laws to circumvent a mandated 90-day waiting period from condemnation to demolition and are working to establish an appeals process for residents who want to rebuild structurally compromised homes, said Larry Ingargiola, the parish director of homeland security and emergency preparedness.

"The guidelines are going to be: Can you rebuild this house? Can you bring it back to the way it was?" he said. "But we also want the homeowners to have a choice in what's going to happen to their property. These people have been screwed enough by Mother Nature. We don't want to come in and say, 'Hey, we're taking everything.' "

The parish, in conjunction with FEMA, also has accelerated a public bid process to hire inspectors to canvass the parish and determine which homes should be deemed unsafe or unhealthy because of contamination by spilled oil or other chemicals. They should start working by next week, Ingargiola said.

In Jefferson Parish, where the storms left an estimated 2,000 homes beyond repair, the Parish Council voted Wednesday to let its members appoint 14 engineers and architects as temporary building code inspectors. Officials said they aimed to prevent residents' reconstruction plans from stalling if the regular staff of code officers and inspectors cannot handle the spate of building requests sure to arise in the coming year.

Expediting the inspection process, Ingargiola said, is the crucial first step to rebuilding. But rushing the job likely would incite an uproar from groups such as the National Trust for Historic Preservation, which already has asked Congress to enact a three-part plan to govern the handling of damaged homes.

It includes tax credits and grants for property owners who choose to rehabilitate hurricane-ravaged homes and commercial buildings.

The organization, working with local groups, has requested permission to survey homes in devastated areas and made recommendations about which ones could be saved, said Jeannie McPherson, a spokeswoman for the preservation trust.

"New Orleans is New Orleans. It's unlike any other place in the whole world, so it's important to preserve that area," she said. "People want to come back to a place that's familiar to them, a place that they know and recognize. If they move forward with the wholesale demolition, they will not be coming back to the same place."

Any concerns about a hurried demolition probably are unwarranted, however, said Phil Hoffman, president of the Home Builders of Greater New Orleans. Given the magnitude of destruction, just starting the process may be months away because of a sheer lack of manpower.

"I don't see anything happening, I'm guessing, at least until Thanksgiving," he said. "I don't think they can even bring in enough people to do all those demolitions until then."

Jeff Sheriff's Office gets back to normal

More than 100 workers are gone after storm

By Michelle Hunter
East Jefferson bureau

Despite losing 104 employees, more than half of them fired for not reporting for Hurricane Katrina duty, Jefferson Parish Sheriff Harry Lee said this week that the office is back to business as usual.

Lee said 61 people were terminated and 43 resigned in the aftermath of Katrina leaving the Gulf Coast staggering Aug. 29. Most of the losses came at the Gretna jail, where 53 employees were fired and 14 quit. But other departments took a hit, too, including the 911 center, the 1st and 4th patrol districts on the east bank and the traffic division.

"Some didn't show up at all," Lee said. "Some felt that their family commitment was more important than reporting to work. I can respect that decision. But they took an oath to serve the people of Jefferson Parish."

The sheriff is handling personnel matters on case-by-case basis. Lee isn't restricted by the same civil service rules as the New Orleans Police Department; he can hire and fire at will.

New Orleans police reported 249 officers AWOL by Tuesday, out of almost 1,700 on the force. The Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office employed about 1,625 people before Katrina.

All nonessential Sheriff's Office employees have been called back to work, and most deputies have resumed their regular duties, Lee said.

But starting Monday, he is temporarily forming two mobile forces of deputies similar to department's disbanded street crimes unit to patrol high-crime areas on the east and west banks. Lee said the move was not prompted by any spike in crime but as a precaution for residents returning to the area.

Since Aug. 27, deputies have made 755 arrests, including 275 for looting. Authorities made several arrests for curfew violations, as well as drug violations and a handful of drunk-driving cases, according to arrest reports.

There was only one homicide reported in that period, in River Ridge in the days just before the storm, Lee said. No other information on the killing was available Friday.

The Sheriff's Office managed to keep most of its 1,400-plus fleet of vehicles intact during the storm. Lee had deputies park their vehicles above ground level in covered parking garages.

Nonetheless, 21 cars were destroyed by flooding, and nine will need new engines, Lee said. A single tree toppled by winds damaged five vehicles at the east bank motor pool at 3300 Metairie Road in Metairie.

And the Sheriff's Office lost a 42-foot patrol boat when it was hit by a barge and pushed into a boat launch in Westwego, Lee said.

Lee's own office, on the top floor of the Sheriff's Office headquarters in Harvey, also took a beating. High winds ripped away the roof, soaking most of the fifth floor.

A similar fate befell the roof at the department's new Pat F. Taylor Memorial Firing Range, also in Harvey. Repairs are under way.

Lee has set up a temporary office at the training academy, next door to the firing range.

Harahan to borrow for cleanup costs

Budget will be short about $1.2 million

Matt Scallan
East Jefferson bureau

Harahan will borrow $3 million to pay cleanup costs stemming from Hurricane Katrina.

The City Council, meeting Thursday, also voted to move $140,000 from its capital budget to its payroll accounts to pay overtime for city workers. The city is likely to see a $1.2 million shortfall in revenue this year unless it receives substantial federal aid, Mayor Paul Johnston said.

The shortfall doesn't include many storm-related costs and damage.

Johnston said the bill for debris removal is $600,000 so far. The gymnasium at Harahan Playground has suffered about $300,000 in damage, including damage to its air-conditioning systems. The city has requested $1.6 million in grants from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and has been approved for $453,000, Johnston said. The city will decide later whether to become part of a joint bond offering by Jefferson Parish, or seek a loan directly from a bank.

Hugh Martin, the city's bond counsel, said the city might be able to save money by seeking the loan on its own.

In other action, the council set the property tax rate for 2005 at 15.81 mills per $1,000 of assessed property valuation. The increase from last year's levy of 14.72 mills comes mainly because of the passage of an additional tax for fire protection. Voters renewed the tax, raising it from 3.95 mills to the 5 mills that voters approved in 1995.

The council also voted to waive regulatory fees for storm-related repairs through Dec. 31. Property owners will still have to obtain building permits before work can begin.

The council also voted unanimously to rezone a residential lot at 77 Oak Ave. from R-2 townhouse, to C-2 commercial, and merged the property with a parcel at Oak Avenue and Jefferson Highway.

Residents opposed the idea, saying it will increase traffic through the neighborhood. City Councilman Louis Butler echoed the sentiments of other council members, who said additional professional office space is needed in the city.

"We need to broaden our base from a residential community," he said.

Kenner waives fee for trash pickup

By Kenner bureau

Kenner Mayor Phil Capitano on Friday waived September garbage collection fees for residents and businesses.

Capitano issued the executive order eliminating fees a day after he authorized a New Orleans company to help Waste Management pick up trash.

He said Thursday that Waste Management was too slow in picking up garbage, and that some Kenner residents haven't gotten their Waste Management cans emptied at all since Hurricane Katrina hit.

The city is paying Ramelli Janitorial Service Inc. $145 a ton to pick up garbage in half the city, while Waste Management is expected to pick up the rest. Capitano said he hopes those costs will be reimbursed by FEMA or by fining Waste Management.

Monthly garbage pickup fees in Kenner are $11.10 for residential customers, $7.43 for residents older than 65 and $15 for businesses.

A Waste Management official responded to Capitano by saying that starting the second week after the storm, the company began picking up garbage once a week.

But, he said, they were thwarted at times by unsafe streets.

Jeff shifts focus toward housing

By Rob Nelson
and Michelle Krupa
West Bank bureau

Her Point-a-la-Hache house swallowed by Hurricane Katrina, Dolores Tinson, who fled to Kenner, then to Texas and then recently came to Avondale to stay with relatives, arrived Friday in Gretna on a mission.

"I need a place to live," said the 69-year-old retired teacher, standing with her sister at a disaster recovery center set up this week by the Federal Emergency Management Agency at the Westside Shopping Center. "We're from Plaquemines Parish. Everything is gone."

Tinson's plight, similar to thousands of other across the region, is emerging as the chief concern in Jefferson Parish, where a slow crawl back to a pre-Katrina lifestyle has pushed officials to shift their attention from immediate relief to housing the displaced.

Several food and water distribution stations manned by the military closed Friday, while parish leaders and FEMA have started to focus on how they will house residents of some 30,000 homes that were left uninhabitable by Katrina and Rita, including 2,000 structures so ravaged they likely will be condemned, Walter Maestri, Jefferson's emergency management director, said.

"FEMA has made a decision, and we basically agree, that community enterprises are returning to Jefferson Parish, and therefore there isn't a need for distribution of water, food and ice," Maestri said, noting that more grocery stores and restaurants have opened in recent days. "Jefferson is now officially designated as a recovery site. We're closer to normal than the other impacted areas in the metro area."

Parish and FEMA officials have gone to work nailing down the logistics of hauling thousands of mobile homes to Jefferson, possibly to locate them in driveways of damaged houses while contractors tear out the moldy sheetrock and replace buckled wood floors inside, Maestri said.

Though most food centers manned by National Guard and other military personnel were expected to close Friday, sites run by the Red Cross and the Salvation Army were expected to stay open, Maestri said.

Terrence Eusebio, 22, said he still would miss the temporary FEMA food station set up in a grocery store parking lot on Lafayette Street in Gretna.

Close to his parents' house, which had become a breeding ground for mold after the roof over two rooms collapsed during Katrina, Eusebio said he had grown accustomed to the fast-moving line of vehicles waiting for food, ice and water.

"We're going to miss this," he said of the center, run by the Indiana Army National Guard's 1st Battalion, 150th Field Artillery Regiment. "They marked up the prices at the stores on food and water. And it's nice they're helping like this."

Meanwhile, the recovery center, which opened Wednesday, already has helped about 1,500 residents, many of whom are forced to wait for hours in lines before getting direct help. The center, one of 23 FEMA is operating statewide, offers storm victims a chance to speak with agency workers or the U.S. Small Business Administration about disaster relief.

Diane Pham, 9, of Harvey clutches two meals ready to eat as her mother Trang gathers up relief information for a table at the FEMA recovery center at the Westside Shopping Center in Gretna.

Crisis counselors, Medicaid officials and flood insurance experts also are on-hand, and the state runs an office next door where residents can get food stamps.

Residents also can order blue tarps for their damaged roofs. No money is doled out at the center, but residents can get face time with FEMA to establish or update their accounts, said Earl Armstrong, an agency spokesman.

The agency has signed a lease to run the center until the end of the year, but the number of residents seeking help also will determine how long that facility is open, Armstrong said.

"I'm here to begin the process," said Russell Brown, whose Harvey home, near the Harvey Canal, suffered roof and water damage. "I need some assistance and some repairs on my home."

Brown sat patiently in one of several rows of folding chairs waiting for a chance to speak with one of eight FEMA workers talking to residents from behind their laptops.

Terry Schule and her husband were further back in line, perched in chairs outside the building for nearly two hours. They applied to FEMA weeks ago about damage to their Westwego home, but have gotten no response and came to see about the holdup, Schule said.

As his wife slid down a few chairs as the center allowed more people inside, Charles Schule said he hopes the couple's patience pays off.

"Depending on the results, I'll let you know whether the wait was worth it," he said half-jokingly.

The center, at 15 West Bank Expressway in Gretna, is open from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. every day.

St. Charles seeks trash removal report

Entergy, Cox Cable also on agenda

By Jenny Hurwitz
River Parishes bureau

In an attempt to keep on top of residual Katrina-related garbage problems, the St. Charles Parish Council has requested reports from waste removal contractors working in the parish, to be delivered at Monday's council meeting.

Representatives from Waste Management, the parish's trash contractor and CERES Environmental Services, which was hired specifically for debris removal, will update the council on the status of the parish's waste pick-up at the meeting, scheduled for 6 p.m. at the parish courthouse in Hahnville.

Spokesmen from Entergy and Cox Cable also will be on hand to offer updates.

While power has been restored throughout the parish, some people still are without phone service, and trash removal remains spotty, said Council Chairman Desmond Hilaire, who spent part of Thursday riding around with Waste Management officials, pinpointing areas that required attention.

"There are still areas (in my district) that have only had trash pick-up once or twice since the storm," he said.

The council will continue to ask for formal reports from Waste Management and others, until it feels the garbage situation is under control, Hilaire said.

Storm debris, including branches, planks and other construction refuse, continues to mount along roadways throughout neighborhoods. Debris probably will pose continuing problems as people finish clearing out their homes and start to fix them, parish spokesman Steve Sirmon said.

Other items on Monday's agenda include a resolution, which would grant businesses a 60-day extension to remit sales tax returns. Those returns were due starting Sept. 1.

St. John holds off decision on trailers

Permitting, zoning to be addressed

By Jenny Hurwitz
River Parishes bureau

The St. John the Baptist Parish Council chose to hold off on making any final decision regarding temporary housing for Hurricane Katrina evacuees, deferring instead to the parish administration to come up with a plan to streamline the permitting and zoning process to allow for emergency mobile home placements.

At Thursday's informal council discussion held in LaPlace, council members ultimately decided that the best course of action would involve amending Parish President Nickie Monica's executive order regarding mobile home placements and rezoning or creating a separate ordinance.

Under current law, it could take from six to eight weeks to receive mobile home permitting, Parish Attorney Jeff Perriloux said. Parish officials are hoping to shorten that period, enabling the parish to grant permitting within two to three weeks, he said.

Perriloux stressed that this amendment would allow only for temporary placement of mobile homes, not permanent placement and that time limits would be in effect.

Perriloux said he and Planning and Zoning Director Adrienne Labat would hash out the details of a possible amendment. Natalie Robottom, St. John Parish's chief administrator, said Friday the legal team still was working on the changes and a draft could be completed by Monday.

On Sept. 23, Monica issued an executive order that relaxed the restrictions on using travel trailers to house industrial, commercial and construction workers in an effort to jump-start St. John's economy and help other parishes rebuild. In addition, the executive order allowed the placement of travel trailers on any residential lot on a non-rental basis with the receipt of a special permit from the parish.

The travel trailer permits will be valid for three months with an option for an additional year. The housing units are required to have their own sewage containment and disposal capabilities. The permits will only be issued through Oct. 7, according to the executive order.

However, that executive order did not allow for mobile homes to be placed on property unless residents went through the parish's formal permitting process with the Planning and Zoning Board. In addition, mobile homes are allowed only in specially zoned areas of the parish unless there is a zoning variance.

At Tuesday's regular council meeting, council members requested the special hearing to discuss the placement of trailers and a plan for expediting the process.

On Thursday, most council members reiterated the need to do something for the displaced residents, particularly those currently living in the parish.

"It's about time we get together and sit down with our attorney to figure out ways and means to place displaced people," Councilman Richard "Dale" Wolfe said. "We need to get down and take care of human beings that need help."

Others questioned whether the parish could absorb the strain of the population boom.

Councilman Ronnie Smith asked whether the Federal Emergency Management Agency would compensate the parish adequately, supplying enough extra law enforcement and firefighters to serve the larger population. And Councilman Allen St. Pierre expressed concern over the parish's infrastructure, including the overburdened sewerage system. He also mentioned the newfound inconveniences facing parish residents, who now must contend with increased traffic, as well as longer lines at gas stations and at retail outfits, resulting from a larger population.

Officials estimated that St. John's population has increased by approximately 15,000 residents. But Councilman Sean Roussel argued that the post-Katrina crowds are in the parish to stay, so it makes more sense to try and find them housing and offer them some relief, he said.

Some put off by Katrina T-shirts

Highway stands are popping up

By Jay Reeves
Associated Press writer

GULFPORT, MISS. — Some proclaim the wearer a "Certified Hurricane Veteran." Others state, "I survived the big one — Hurricane Katrina."

The T-shirts popping up for sale at stands along a highway once smack in Katrina's path offer travelers a chance to get souvenirs of the catastrophe, but some are just getting offended.

"It's disgusting," said Mary Ann Martino, whose home was badly damaged yet is providing shelter for a dozen friends who are even worse off. "People are making money off what we've been through."

Small businesses have sprung up in towns near the coast along U.S. Highway 49, selling souvenirs of the storm that killed more than 1,000 people and displaced as many as 1 million in Mississippi and Louisiana.

The reaction to the vendors has been mixed.

Wayne and Melissa Rogers stopped at a stand Wednesday and paid $45 for three shirts, including one for their 2-year-old son, Zavier.

"We're going to save it for him," said Mrs. Rogers, 21, of Gulfport. "We have a trunk of stuff we've saved since he was born, things he can remember."

Katrina souvenirs are all over: eBay has "My Heart's in New Orleans" T-shirts for $18 including shipping, and rubber wristbands emblazoned with "Katrina Relief" start at $2.50 each. Some sellers say they will contribute to hurricane relief.

T-shirts have been sold after other hurricanes. One from Florida, which was pounded by four hurricanes last year, had a drawing of a house and the words: "1. Charley, 2. Frances, 3. Ivan, 4. Sale."

Still, selling T-shirts amid the Gulf Coast devastation rubs some people the wrong way.

Looking at a T-shirt stand from a nearby convenience store, Clarence Breaux wasn't biting. He survived Katrina by putting on a life preserver inside his home near the beach in Biloxi and doesn't need a reminder of the horror of that day.

"That's the last thing I want," said Breaux. "I'm lucky to have the shirt I've got on."

In B.R., Morial calls for unified rebuilding effort

At the same time, he pushes for investigation

By Susan Finch
Staff writer

Joining hands with New Orleans City Councilwoman Cynthia Willard-Lewis and former city housing chief Vincent Sylvain, former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial, center, bows his head in prayer at a gathering of the Urban League in Baton Rouge. As the Crescent City is rebuilt, Morial said the right of people to return and to vote in New Orleans needs to be preserved: 'People need to be allowed to go home.'

BATON ROUGE — Accompanied by family and political allies from his two terms as New Orleans mayor, Marc Morial popped up Friday afternoon to call for a unified effort to help New Orleans recover from Hurricane Katrina.

In an appearance at Baton Rouge Community College, Morial, now head of the National Urban League, said the levee breaks and the inadequacies of the relief effort were deplorable and need to be examined.

The Urban League is calling for an independent commission to figure out what happens so that it doesn't happen again, Morial said.

"Why? Because hurricane season happens every year," he added, repeating a view he expressed last month before a U.S. Senate committee.

Morial said he and others across the nation grieved when they watched New Orleanians suffering after the hurricane. He said he was especially distressed to see that happening in the New Orleans convention center that "bears the name of my father; the sight of so many people without food, medicine — it didn't need to be that way."

The focus now must be on rebuilding, Morial said.

Morial, who was term-limited out of office in 2002 and has been notably absent from New Orleans since federal prosecutors began indicting some of his former political aides and allies, asserted that his visit to Baton Rouge wasn't about politics. He characterized it as a fact-finding mission and a chance to visit with friends and family.

"People have died, people have lost everything," he said. "It's inappropriate to even discuss politics.

"This is about life, it's about survival, it's about accountability," Morial said, adding that there is a huge wellspring of good will and concern for the New Orleans area all over the world. He called Katrina "biblical, an epic event."

While the pictures on television focused on the suffering of the poor and minorities, "Katrina was an equal-opportunity destroyer," Morial said. "The storm "destroyed rich and poor. It destroyed black and white. While the pictures on TV were the truth, they weren't the whole truth," Morial said.

Morial said rebuilding the city is going to be "a long-term deal" and that for that reason, people need to move from shelters to transitional housing. He said the Urban League and other organizations assisting in the recovery must insist on "a right to return."

"People need to be allowed to go home," he said. The right of people to vote in New Orleans needs to be preserved, he said.

"Nobody has a right to say that any neighborhood should be written off," Morial said. "The people need to make that decision themselves."

He said talk about building "a new New Orleans" can easily be misconstrued.

"A new New Orleans should not be some gated and tony community. That is not the New Orleans that crated jazz and great culture," he said.

Long-lost friends from Germany reunited at Gulf Coast funeral

Woman recognized pal in obituary

By The Associated Press

BILOXI, MISS. — Lilo Harris was unaware that her best friend from early years in Germany lived only a few miles down U.S. 90.

Harris and Emma Anita Seals grew up together in Germany and lost contact after World War II.

The two were reunited at Seals' funeral Wednesday in Biloxi.

"I feel like 50 years have been wasted," Harris said in low voice when she saw the blue casket. "We were only 20 miles apart."

Harris said she had read Seals' obituary, learned she lived on the Mississippi Gulf Coast and was a victim of Hurricane Katrina's storm surge at her Pass Christian home.

"I knew when I read the obituary that it was Emma," Harris said. "When I read about 'cursing like a sailor' I knew it was her. She was a little devil when we were kids."

Seals and Harris grew up in Wiesbaden, Germany. Both married American soldiers and lost touch when both came to America. Seals lived in Pass Christian and Harris' home is in Gulfport.

On Wednesday, at the Biloxi National Cemetery, Harris was one of about 25 people saying goodbye to the 81-year-old Seals, who was remembered by her friends and family as warm and outspoken and was known as Omar, German for grandmother.

Among mourners was a Pass Christian police dispatcher who had befriended Seals.

Theresa Harris, who is not related to Lilo Harris, said she tried to get Emma to leave her home before the Aug. 29 storm.

"I'm gonna miss her," Theresa Harris said. "We tried to get her to leave, but she didn't want to leave 'her' animals. She fed the wild and neighborhood animals every day."

The obituary Lilo Harris read was written by Natalie Krymski, who grew up across the street from Seals and her late, retired Air Force husband, Jimmy.

"I moved here when I was 7," said Krymski, now a 26-year-old homemaker from Orange Grove. "I remember she was a mystery to everyone with her long black hair. Kids on the bus would say a witch lived there, so that got my curiosity. She had a Chihuahua dog, and I decided that was the way to meet her."

The dog did the trick, and they became friends for life, Krymski said.

Council wants own rebuilding panel

With governor's, mayor's committees, that makes three

By Frank Donze
Staff writer

Not to be outdone by Mayor Ray Nagin or Gov. Kathleen Blanco, the New Orleans City Council has empanelled its own blue-ribbon commission to devise a strategy for rebuilding the storm-ravaged city.

The 11-seat panel, approved but not named at Tuesday's council meeting, will include seven members appointed by the council, plus the state's two U.S. senators and the two U.S. House members whose districts include parts of New Orleans.

Excluding members of the mayor's administration from the panel reflects a certain amount of irritation with Nagin. Some council members have accused him of leaving them out of the loop following Hurricane Katrina's devastating assault.

Weeks ago, Nagin announced plans to name his Commission for the Future of New Orleans, and on Friday he rolled out the names of the members he has tapped.

On Thursday, Gov. Kathleen Blanco announced formation of a group of business, education and community leaders to assist her in restarting small and large businesses in devastated areas of the state. Blanco has drafted some of the people Nagin had approached to be on his team.

The City Council's action on Tuesday, at its second meeting since the storm, took the form of a unanimous resolution creating the Advisory Committee on Hurricane Recovery.

The resolution calls for the committee to ascertain and recommend how the council might best use its authority "to facilitate the city's post-hurricane recovery efforts for the greater good of the city."

Nagin said he knows little about the council's committee or whether it will be duplicative of the other two panels.

"I've heard they were thinking about doing that," he said. "But I'm not sure what they're doing or why they're doing it."

Nagin said he has told council members and state legislators from New Orleans that they will have a role on his commission, though he has not offered specifics.

Told that the council has outlined a mission for its appointees that appears to cover every aspect of the recovery, Nagin said, "Really! I don't know if that's a legislative function, but we'll take a look at it."

The council's resolution charges the panel with determining the council's legal options regarding "zoning, land use, permits, franchises, taxes and regulation of utility and communications companies."

The panel also is to recommend how the council might best coordinate with state and federal agencies in reconstruction efforts, financing, bonds issuance and the development of policies for rebuilding, repair and renovation.

In addition, the committee is to advise the council on a strategy for transitional housing, where to situate major commercial and industrial corridors, business incentives, ways to improve housing stock, telecommunications, utilities and transportation infrastructure, and a re-evaluation of criteria for historic property preservation.

The council pledged to supply the committee with staffing and research resources.

Though the council has not announced the names of committee members, it has placed the initiative on a fast track that calls for a first meeting by mid-October and a preliminary set of recommendations due a week later.

The resolution ends with an upbeat message to New Orleanians:

"The council is committed to doing everything within its power and authority to facilitate the restoration and reconstruction of New Orleans in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. The city has suffered among the worst natural disasters in the history of the United States. Its citizens are dispersed, and many of their homes are damaged or destroyed. Yet, their spirit and love for our unique city are unwavering and will prevail. Through the efforts of all its citizens, including those who graciously accept appointment to the advisory committee, New Orleans will be rebuilt and will once again be the city that we are so proud to call our home."

TP medical writer wins state award

From staff reports

John Pope, The Times-Picayune's medical-health reporter, has won the Louisiana State Medical Society's annual Award of Excellence in print journalism for articles he wrote on yellow fever.

He was honored for stories published July 17 that marked the centennial of the 1905 yellow-fever epidemic in New Orleans, the last outbreak of the illness in the United States, and showed how local researchers continue to battle disease-carrying mosquitoes.

Pope, who also won the competition in 1990 and 1998, will receive the award and $500. So will Dorothy Kendrick of Louisiana Public Broadcasting, who won in the broadcast division for a story on obese children who lost weight.

Prizes generally are presented at a luncheon during the medical society's annual meeting, but the disruption caused by Hurricane Katrina forced cancellation of this year's session, which had been scheduled for this weekend in Baton Rouge.

Local businesses pledge loyalty to N.O.

Many that are back need to hire workers

By Keith Darce
Business writer

Hoping to jump-start the region's economic recovery, executives from more than 100 local businesses, including a number of major government contractors, promised Friday to return their companies' operations to pre-Hurricane Katrina levels.

"We are committed to staying here. I have bayou blood running in my veins," said David Guidry, president of Guico Machine Works Inc., an oil field machine parts manufacturer in Harvey.

Many of the companies were the first to reopen in the wake of the storm, largely because their businesses aren't dependent on a local buying population. Many also need to fill jobs, in some cases, hundreds of jobs. The announcement Friday came even as some service-sector employers, hit hard in the wake of Katrina because the local customer base they rely on evacuated, began laying off employees.

About 2,700 people have gone back to work at Northrop Grumman Corp.'s big Navy shipyard in Avondale, and the plant needs another 2,500 to get back on track with warship delivery schedules, said George Yount, vice president of operations at the yard.

Offshore work boat builder and operator Edison Chouest Offshore will need 400 more workers over the next 10 months at a new $60 million shipyard being built by the company in Houma, said Senior Vice President Laney Chouest.

"Help wanted" signs along Veterans Memorial Boulevard were almost as plentiful Friday as "business open" signs.

But despite all of the good intentions, many businesses in the New Orleans area are struggling to reopen or even stay alive.

Many evacuated workers have been hard to track down, and some have resettled in other communities. The ones who have come back are having a hard time finding places to live. Many businesses, especially the small mom-and-pop shops that lack deep financial pockets shops, are running out of cash. And some companies might have to wait months to discover whether their customer base will return to the area.

Still, the group of executives that gathered Friday at the Hilton New Orleans Airport in Kenner to sign the Statement of Commitment voiced determination to restore their businesses.

"We are growing. We are ready to hire. We want people to come back to Louisiana," said Raymond Ranger, vice president of Jani King New Orleans, a commercial cleaning franchise business. Already, Jani King has cleaned schools, hospitals and New Orleans Sewerage & Water Board pumping stations.

The group was assembled by U.S. Sen. David Vitter, R-La., who called the one-page statement a "real and meaningful" start to rebuilding the region's comatose economy.

The statement included promises to continue using Louisiana suppliers and vendors, and to try to expand local operations or relocate to Louisiana business from outside the state.

Vitter and several of the executives said finding places to house returning workers has quickly become the biggest barrier to restarting business.

Much of the region's housing stock has been destroyed or damaged to the point of being uninhabitable, and parts of New Orleans that sustained less damage remain closed to residents.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency promised nearly three weeks ago to begin building temporary trailer communities for as many as 200,000 people displaced by the storm, but none have opened yet in the metropolitan area.

Some companies are finding ways to create their own housing for workers.

Northrop is housing about 100 workers on an empty vessel docked at the west Jefferson Parish shipyard, Yount said.

Jani King is looking at renting unused nursing homes or college dormitories in the area, Ranger said. "They have amenities to bring in food service and health care. We do have options, but we still need federal help to bring people back," he said.

Perhaps the most vulnerable businesses are small shops that can't survive long without a flow of revenue from customers, said economist Tim Ryan, chancellor of University of New Orleans.

Low-interest disaster relief loans are available to many of those businesses from the federal SmallBusiness Administration, but the money might not arrive in time, Vitter said Friday afternoon during a radio interview.

"Between now and 60 days, you will have a significant number of small businesses go under or declare bankruptcy unless something is done," he said.

Don't forget small businesses

The tragedy of the devastation rendered by the dual assault of hurricanes Katrina and Rita is well-documented but still somewhat incomprehensible. The toll on human life and spirit is bad enough and the property loss simply adds insult to injury. As a native son, I have every bit of faith in the toughness of our people. Those of us who can do so will roll up our sleeves and get to work while attempting, as best we can, to help those who are displaced or dispirited.

As a small-business owner, I am back to fulfill an obligation to a community that has helped to support my efforts and dreams. At the same time, however, I and many other business owners are somewhat alarmed that the smell of huge amounts of capital flowing into this area is going to attract huge, well-connected businesses from elsewhere that swoop in and decimate the small businesses that are the backbone of our local economy.

None of us can take a double hit like this. I would implore local governments to be vigilant in making sure that all of us small, local businesses have at least a fair stake in the redevelopment of our community and lifestyle.

We are all here for the long haul, treating our customers as individuals and recycling our revenue back into the local economy. We are not working for stockholders or funneling money to out-of-state home offices. I would hope that in a fraternal and close-knit area like ours, our dedication and involvement will be valued and considered by the powers that be.

Gretna unfairly accused

Four weeks ago, Hurricane Katrina devastated the city of Gretna, leaving no building undamaged. It was a city without electricity, running water or sewerage. Gretna was far from a safe haven.

Of the city's 17,500 residents, 4,000 to 5,000 remained during the storm. A diverse population of white, African-American, Hispanic and Asian citizens, much like that of New Orleans, was left with the few provisions they had been warned to stock beforehand. Our efforts to have FEMA supply food, water and ice were not successful for a full five days after the storm.

On Monday, with storm winds still blowing, looters in our city were arrested and, according to our disaster response plan, the Gretna Police Department sealed our city limits.

Tuesday was the first clear-weather day that presented the nation with pictures of flooding, looting, arson and reports of rape in New Orleans. In Gretna, buses of RTA drivers and their families were dropped off in our city without any notice. Hours later, after Gretna provided water and access to portable toilets, the RTA brought in its own buses and evacuated to Baton Rouge. This was not a signal of what was to come.

Late Wednesday, a flow of people from New Orleans began to cross the Crescent City Connection on foot. With a crowd massing, Gretna police officers commandeered Westside Transit buses and began transporting busloads of people to safety at Interstate 10 and Causeway Boulevard, the FEMA-approved evacuation point. Approximately 6,000 evacuees were transported by Gretna police over 12 to 14 hours without a death or injury reported — a fact overlooked by the national media.

Oakwood Mall was looted and burned on Wednesday. By mid-morning on Thursday, with overwhelming numbers of evacuees at the foot of the West Bank Expressway, a joint decision was made by the Gretna Police Department, the Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office and the Crescent City Connection Bridge Police that the bridge had to be closed for the safety of all.

Although our investigation of the bridge incident is not complete, initial reports revealed that a warning shot was fired when the crowd became unruly and the safety of an officer was threatened. What the crowd and police officers said that night we may never know. The decision to close the bridge was made because there was no safety for the evacuees on the west bank — no buses, no food, no shelter, nothing.

Gretna has been unfairly charged with racism. The city did not have the capacity to support its own residents, much less thousands more. What was the New Orleans plan? Is it racism not to have a plan?

It's disappointing to hear that the national and local media are accusing a good community of racism, when the charge is simply untrue.

Ask ordinary folks how to rebuild

In order to rebuild our city, our elected officials are in the process of creating a group that will decide what will constitute the new New Orleans. I have a suggestion: Ask the real people of the city to join that blue-ribbon committee.

I know dozens of intelligent people with common sense and an ability to think of others first. Let's not limit this auspicious group to business leaders and politicians.

We need people who want to see a different New Orleans rise from the floodwaters.

OUR OPINIONS

Lines of communication

Residents and business owners who are returning to the New Orleans area understand that their patience will be sorely tried in the weeks ahead. They're going to have to wait for electricity, for water and sewer service, and for telephone and cable service and the Internet connections those two utilities provide.

But waiting patiently is easier when providers don't keep customers in the dark about their progress. Entergy, for example, has been providing daily updates on power restoration since Hurricane Katrina.

By contrast, BellSouth Corp. and Cox Communications won't even say how many customers are without service.

Such reticence is unacceptable. People need to know if they are wired again or when they might reasonably expect to see that happen. Telephone and Internet service aren't as basic to survival as potable water and electricity, but a working landline could be crucial to homeowners who want to know if they can call 911 in case of a chainsaw accident and to residents who are trying to stay in contact with their insurance adjuster as well as their families. When they return might well hinge on that capacity.

Telephone and Internet connection are also vital to businesses that are trying to reopen. Without those networks, retailers will have trouble making credit card transactions, forcing them to do business on a cash-only basis. Communication lapses will hamper internal operations for companies and businesses, as well as efforts to contact suppliers, bankers and most of all, customers.

Restoring service for these companies is complicated by the fact that other repair crews might accidentally cut fiber optic cable, overhead wires and network routers. Those mishaps will be a frustration for the providers and their customers who might get service back only to lose it again. Keeping the public informed under those conditions will be complicated, but it's not impossible.

Fierce competition between BellSouth and Cox, which both provide high-speed Internet service, might be the real reason the companies are reluctant to say how many of their customers are without service or when they might be restored. But giving people frequent updates is an important part of customer service, too. New Orleanians would be happier if BellSouth and Cox competed to see which company can be the most forthright with the public.

BellSouth and Cox, like every other company doing business in the metro area, have a vested interest in seeing their customer base return. But these two companies also play a key role in making the return happen. Working hard to get us wired is the most important job, but letting us know how it's going is a close second.

A break on LEAP

Louisiana schools have a great deal to cope with this year. Students from Orleans and St. Bernard parishes are enrolling elsewhere for now. Public school students in St. Tammany and Jefferson parishes will have missed a month when classes resume next week. And even schools that are far from the epicenter of Hurricane Katrina are dealing with floods of new children.

Add to that the fact that many students, teachers, administrators and support staff have suffered trauma and losses. That's bound to be distracting, and it will make the job of getting children back into the school groove more daunting.

For those reasons, it's hard to argue with giving students a reprieve on the LEAP test for a year — but only for a year.

The state Board of Elementary and Secondary Education decided this week that though fourth- and eighth-grade students will take the test, they won't have to pass it in order to be promoted next fall. High school seniors, however, will still be required to pass the Graduate Exit Exam to get their diplomas. That's a reasonable response to the dual disasters that have hit Louisiana.

High-stakes testing is a critical part of school reform in this state, though, and Katrina and Rita must not be used as an excuse to abandon that effort. Schools should make every effort to prepare children for the LEAP test in the spring and strive to make this school year a productive one. Children who fail the math or language portions of the test should be offered the same opportunities for remediation that they would normally receive, such as summer school.

Some flexibility is wise for now, but it shouldn't extend past this school year. Louisiana's school accountability program, of which high-stakes testing is a key element, has produced significant academic gains in our state. Just a few weeks before Katrina hit, the state released school-by-school LEAP scores for 2005. Many metro area schools made significant gains in achievement, with Orleans Parish making greater gains than the state as a whole. Still, there were deep problems in some schools. Ninety schools in the metro area were labeled as failing by the state, and a whopping 73 were in New Orleans.

Those students are now scattered across the state and beyond. They will need continued attention to be able to thrive academically, and the state's accountability and testing program will be vital to that.

Education reform must not become another casualty of a dreadful hurricane season.

Declaring war on natural disasters

JAMES P. PINKERTON

It's a war — a total war. Finally, we have figured out the right way to think about natural disasters.

One can't solve a problem until one figures out what the problem is. While it's taken a tragically long time, the nation is finally moving toward an overall strategy for dealing with natural disasters, including hurricanes such as Katrina and Rita.

For most of human history, natural disasters were seen as acts of God. And so it seemed presumptuous, even sacrilegious, to seek to forestall such calamity. When Ben Franklin invented the lightning rod in 1752, many preachers objected to the idea of using it, especially atop churches, where a profane "rod of iron" seemed to be in arrogant competition with the cross. It took a century for lightning rods to become universal in the United States.

Even in our century, the feeling persists that God is directly involved in disasters. More than a few Christians noted that Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans just before a scheduled "Southern Decadence" festival.

Yet by the 20th century, most people saw natural disasters as just that — natural disasters. Even so, such catastrophes were seen as local problems, not national problems. When the great flood of 1927 came roaring down the Mississippi River, displacing hundreds of thousands, President Calvin Coolidge refused to visit the afflicted area. He even refused an offer from NBC Radio to broadcast a national appeal for charitable relief.

Yet Coolidge did appoint a disaster coordinator, thus establishing a new principle. Henceforth, it was understood that none of us were islands; at least at a minimal level, we were all in this together.

And so over time, the conscience of the nation has deepened our commitment to disaster assistance. Which, in turn, has forced us all to think anew about how best to respond in two crucial areas.

First, the American tradition of decentralized local and state control is being re-evaluated. On issues such as economic development and welfare reform, many mayors and governors have proved more inventive and effective than anyone in Washington, D.C. But Katrina demonstrated that some issues demand centralization.

Yes, the misfortunes of Katrina were substantially the fault of Louisiana officials. But residents of the Pelican State are still Americans. So if the national government has to step in, so be it. Yet if Uncle Sam has to assume responsibility for disaster remediation, he must also, of course, assume responsibility for disaster prevention. If local authorities can't be trusted to build levees and design evacuation plans, national authorities should be given that task.

The second area for new thinking is the role of the military. The U.S. Department of Defense should be given clear orders: Its mission is to defend the U.S.

But what about the Posse Comitatus Act? That Latinate law sounds fancy and important, like something out of the Magna Carta or the Bill of Rights. But it dates only to 1878, and its enactment was anything but admirable. Back then, Southern whites were using Ku Klux Klan-type violence to impose a brutal post-slavery Jim Crow regime in Dixie. The only obstacle they faced was federal troops left over from the Civil War. So Southern congressmen pushed through a law ordering the troops out. Is that a principle worth venerating and defending?

Problems with Posse Comitatus emerged long before these latest hurricanes. On 9/11, the military was so inhibited by the spirit of Posse Comitatus that its jets and anti-aircraft missiles sat passively as an airliner crashed into the Pentagon, nearly an hour after the first attack on the World Trade Center.

Since then, of course, the rules have changed. And now they need to change further, so that our $400-billion-a-year military can help save more lives on the home front.

When the nation is under attack by natural or unnatural forces, it must be defended, by all possible means — period. That's the new reality, and that reality should guide our strategic thinking about all future disasters.

Feds have done enough damage

The special House committee investigating the government's response to the Hurricane Katrina catastrophe — known to some as the Committee to Keep the Heat Off Bush — gave a good thrashing on Tuesday to Michael Brown, the terminally hapless former head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

At the moment, nothing is safer politically in the United States than pounding the heck out of Brownie. But pummeling a scapegoat, even one as mouthwateringly tempting as the spectacularly clueless Brown, will not get us closer to understanding the monumental breakdown of government that contributed mightily to one of the greatest tragedies in American history.

For that we need a highly respected and truly independent commission that is willing to root out all the facts, no matter how embarrassing to the people in power, and lay out a reasonable plan for the future. The Bush administration wants no part of that.

On this issue, the American people should take a stand. Government at all levels failed the city of New Orleans and other parts of the Gulf Coast, and many died as a result. This was a widely predicted tragedy, and still it was allowed to happen. The mayor of New Orleans, Democrat Ray Nagin, should have known better than anyone else in the country that a large portion of his city's population would be unable to evacuate on their own because they didn't have money, or they didn't have cars, or they didn't have a place to go, or they were just too ill to move. He failed in his obligation to them.

We need a highly respected and truly independent commission that is willing to root out all the facts, no matter how embarrassing to the people in power.

Make no mistake: Government officials have blood on their hands. Men, women and children — some of them handicapped, some of them elderly or already desperately ill — were condemned to horrible suffering and, in many cases, agonizing deaths. Human beings were left to drown in their flooded homes, in hospitals, in nursing homes and in the street. The American people deserve to know why.

Even as the tragedy was unfolding, carried live on television screens across the United States and around the world, President Bush declined to intervene in a timely and effective way. Had he acted promptly, he no doubt could have saved some lives. But he didn't. His inaction seemed both inexplicable and unforgivable, and would certainly be a main focus of an independent investigation.

The New York Times reported Wednesday that even the Louisiana National Guard was unprepared to carry out its Hurricane Katrina mission. Hampered from the start by a shortage of troops and crucial equipment because of the deployment of Guard members in Iraq, commanders saw the situation go from bad to disastrous when floodwaters overwhelmed their Jackson Barracks headquarters, which is in a low-lying section of New Orleans, downriver from the French Quarter.

Despite clear warnings that the hurricane might be disastrous, the Guard's commanders did not consider moving their vulnerable headquarters. When the flooding hit, chaos ensued. Commanders became preoccupied with salvaging what they could and rescuing soldiers who could not swim. Operations were then moved by boat and helicopter to the Superdome.

Televised hearings on matters of great national interest can bring out the worst in congressional committee members. They tend to behave like actors at a casting call. It's all about them.

This is a matter too grave and too complex to be investigated by the perpetually partisan, hey-look-at-me crowd on Capitol Hill. (The special House committee is primarily a Republican show. The Democrats, with a couple of exceptions, are boycotting it.)

President Bush, whose poor judgment gave us Brown as the head of FEMA, wants nothing more than a whitewash of his administration's role in the debacle. Back on Sept. 6, with criticism coming at him from all directions, he said, "What I intend to do is lead a — to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong."

We already know what went right: very little. What is needed now are the findings and the learned counsel of a bipartisan group of distinguished, sincere and dedicated individuals who are capable of keeping the best interests of the people of the United States in mind.

Terrorism remains an enormous threat — the No. 1 threat — to the United States. The tragically inept response to Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath (and the enormous difficulties encountered in the evacuation ahead of Hurricane Rita) tells us the nation is far from prepared to successfully meet that threat.

Man, his best friend reunited after storm

Volunteers make a dream come true

By Paul Schwartzman
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — The last time he had seen Sassy, his 11-year-old Lhasa apso, Craig Peel was fleeing flood-ravaged New Orleans, a journey that included a plane ride to Washington, where he took up shelter at the D.C. Armory.

For nearly a month, Peel, 76, has yearned for the dog he left with a friend in his old neighborhood. He told anyone and everyone he met at the armory that Sassy was his only relative.

Thursday, thanks to the enterprise of a volunteer at the armory and a team of animal rescue workers that traveled to the Gulf Coast, Peel got his wish.

After a 1,500-mile trip from New Orleans, a Washington Animal Rescue League van delivered Sassy and 17 other canine and feline evacuees to the league's Northeast headquarters Thursday afternoon, where Peel was reunited with the dog.

Except for fleas and a cataract, Sassy was her usual sprightly self, licking her owner's face and nestling in his lap. ``Got my baby back,'' Peel said, smiling as he hobbled behind her, leaning on a walker.

In the blur of the recent past, Peel cannot recall when he left New Orleans. He was in the city during Hurricane Katrina, remaining with Sassy in his apartment in a senior citizens complex near the French Quarter.

In the days after the storm, he said, he survived on a few gallons of water and canned food. He said he always made sure to take Sassy for her daily walks, even though it meant that he had to trudge up and down five flights of stairs in the dark because there was no electricity to power the elevator.

On several occasions, he said, he encountered police officers and members of the National Guard, who encouraged him to evacuate. He resisted, fearing it would mean giving up his dog.

Then he ran into a longtime friend from the neighborhood, Ginger Lucci, who said she was not leaving New Orleans and offered to board Sassy along with her three dogs. Running out of food and water, Peel agreed to leave Sassy behind.

``He was so sad when he dropped her off,'' said Lucci, 55, speaking Thursday by telephone from her French Quarter home, where she has remained since the hurricane.

An ambulance took Peel to the New Orleans Convention Center, and he was later transported to the airport and flown to Washington. A few days after arriving at the armory, he stationed himself in his wheelchair outside the entrance, holding up a sign that read ``America's Most Wanted: Sassy Peel.''

Peel said he plans to stay at the armory for the next couple of days, perhaps longer, while Sassy stays in a temporary shelter. After that, Peel is not sure where he will go, except it won't be New Orleans, his home for 43 years.

It's a painful truth, one that he said is ameliorated by another: He has his Sassy back. ``Where she belongs,'' he said, following as she nosed around her new world.

Gulf Coast city won its casino bet

JACKSON, MISS. — The city of Biloxi, home to a dozen floating casinos smashed by Hurricane Katrina, took a gamble that paid off.

Two months before the storm struck Aug. 29, the coastal town of 50,000 secured an insurance policy against a catastrophic event like a hurricane disrupting its stream of gambling revenue.

At Mayor A.J. Holloway's suggestion, Biloxi spent $92,000 on a "business interruption" policy that pays out $10 million.

"He is going to be looked on as a genius for that," city spokesman Vincent Creel said.

Casino proceeds account for about a third of Biloxi's budget. The $10 million policy will cover about six months of lost revenue.

After Katrina's wrath, Biloxi needs the insurance money just to keep afloat.

"Right now, money is going out three times faster than on a normal day because we have so many people working so many hours and we have absolutely nothing coming in," Creel said.

It's 1927 all over again

Avoyelles Parish woman has lived through both of Louisiana's great floods

BIG BEND — When Bernadine "Bird" Laborde watched the images of the floodwaters caused by Hurricane Katrina racing through New Orleans, only one thing came to mind: The Great Flood of 1927 in Avoyelles Parish.

The 91-year-old matriarch of the Laborde family survived the monumental event that wiped out lives, livestock, homes, railroads, steamboats and everything in sight.

It was the most destructive flood in this country's history. The swollen Mississippi River broke through its levee system in 145 places, affecting six states and inundating 27,000 square miles to depths up to 30 feet. The federal budget at that time was a little over $3 billion. The flood caused an estimated $1 billion in property damage. Louisiana took the biggest hit.

Laborde survived only because her family lived in Mansura and not Big Bend, as she does today, on Bayou des Glaises.

"Everything below Mansura was flooded," she said. "The bayou country was absolutely one big lake. My father (Edward A. Coco, a cotton and corn planter) took me here after it happened. The railroad track looked like a corkscrew. You could only see rooftops like you did in New Orleans. I do not recall a lot of deaths. A lot of people got out. We had a lot of refugees in Mansura — we had a tent city."

Marksville, Mansura and Bunkie were high ground. The youngest of five children, she said she did not understand all the ramifications of the flood. "It was an exciting time, I remember that. Herbert Hoover (the Secretary of Commerce who would become president) came to Mansura. But I don't think I was old enough to grasp the situation. A 13-year-old then was not as sophisticated as a 13-year-old is today."

Remember before the storm? When you were a couple?

Now, post-Katrina, you are a commune.

Whether you are an evacuee or an unscathed homeowner who has taken evacuees in, chances are your nuclear family has become multiple families living under one roof.

Where she once had the luxury of complaining that he never put the toilet seat down, now she's not sure who to blame, but she feels like shouting at someone.

He used to look forward to the give-and-take of married life; now, not only is there no privacy for a marital tiff, there's no place to, uh, make up (wink-wink, nudge-nudge).

Add to that the stress of being displaced, the burden of recovery and the process of grief and you have to wonder: How can a couple displaced by Katrina get back to coupledom?

The answer, mental health experts say, is simply to use your best coping skills. And if you don't have any, learn some.

"Most coping problems arise because people are still attached to the way things used to be, and they are struggling to preserve some notion of how things are supposed to be," says Dr. Mark Epstein, a Manhattan psychiatrist and author of "Going to Pieces Without Falling Apart."

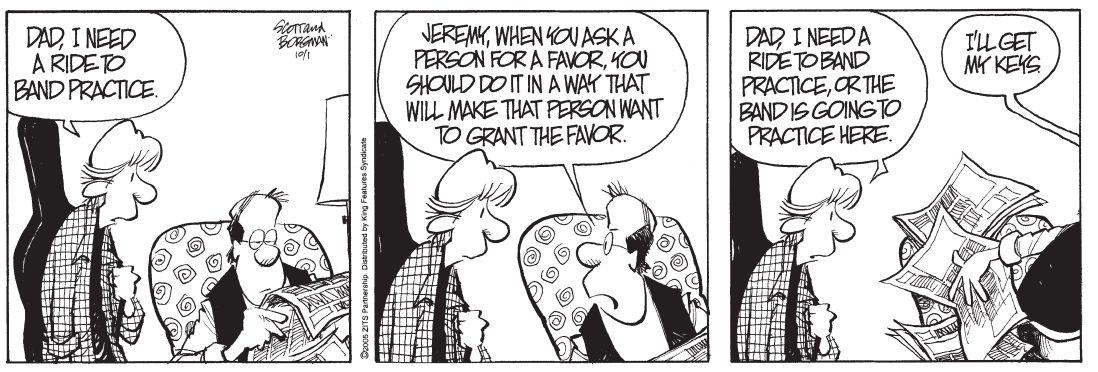
Before Katrina, she was the sole resident of the neutral ground at Canal and Broad streets.

Thousands of commuters passed the homeless woman every day. She tended to her overburdened shopping carts and dozed in a lawn chair, bundled in winter clothes no matter the season.

Her intersection is much lonelier now, unused except for the occasional relief and recovery vehicle.

But she is back.

On Thursday afternoon, long before any Orleans Parish resident was officially sanctioned to return, she sat on the bus bench beneath the stilled Whitney Bank clock. Reading from a Bible and preaching a profanity laced sermon to no one.



The traumatic events of the past three weeks had reduced her possessions to a black leather satchel, a blue child's backpack labeled "Turbo," and a sodden cardboard box. But otherwise, she was unperturbed.

The temperature hovered in the low 90s, yet her uniform remained the same: Heavy navy parka,

More tips for mending your broken home

Moisture is the enemy

After the flood waters recede, it's essential to dry, dry and dry some more. Here are five tips from the American Red Cross:

The first step to drying your home — to halt rot and mildew — is lowering the humidity. If the humidity is lower outside than indoors, open all the doors and windows. If the sun is out, it should be drier outside. At night, however, when temperatures drop, an open home is generally warmer and will draw moisture inside, so as the sun goes down close windows and doors.

If you have electricity, or a generator, run fans, dehumidifiers and window air conditioners. Do not use central air conditioning or heating if the ducts were under water until the ducts have been cleaned, because the air may spread contaminants from sediment left in the duct work.

Empty and open closets and cabinet doors and remove drawers from furniture to allow air circulation. Do not, however, force drawers or cabinets open. They might be stuck due to swelling. You will probably be able to open them when they dry. If possible, remove the backs of cabinets or furniture to let air circulate inside.

Here's another new word for your post-Katrina vocabulary: desiccants. Desiccants are materials that absorb moisture. Certain kinds are available at hardware, grocery and drug stores, such as cat litter made of clay, and chemical dehumidifier packs used for drying boats and damp closets.

Also effective are calcium chloride pellets, made for melting icy roads or walkways. These pellets can irritate the skin and should not be used near computers or delicate equipment. Hang the pellets in a porous bag such as a pillow case or nylon stocking, and put a bucket underneath to catch dripping water. Close the area to be dried.

Contractors specializing in drying flooded buildings with large fans and dehumidifiers are available, but be careful about those who might inflate prices after disasters, and those who request payment in advance.

STRESS, from C-1

couples' lives post-Katrina, says local social worker and psychotherapist Vicki Grieshaber, are "sudden change in everyday routine, the lack of privacy and an increase in negative feelings," such as grief, fear, uncertainty and anger.

Susan Deily-Swearingen has been wrestling with these issues since she and her husband of 10 years had to evacuate their home and take up residence in her mother's house in Pensacola. The couple and their three children now reside in the same house where Deily-Swearingen grew up.

"We're trying to decide what is best for the children and what is best for us personally as we carry on with the goals for our lives and make sure everyone's needs are met," says the full-time mother and part-time actor.

Her husband is a pianist at Howl at the Moon on Bourbon Street. The two are dealing with many issues other parents face living in temporary environments — "kids not sleeping, deciding who gets up early and who makes breakfast," she says. That, and their daily lives as a couple.

"These are the kind of mundane things you would arrange at home," she says, "but it's more difficult because this is not home."

Communicating your needs

Jerry Wilson, a delivery truck driver who lived in Metairie until he was displaced to a family home in McComb, Miss., and his wife do not have children, but they are no longer just a couple. They are living under the same roof with Wilson's mother-in-law, his brother-in-law and his wife, and his sister-in-law — not to mention three dogs and three cats.

He and his wife, married 25 years, were living the life of a carefree couple until Katrina. Now his wife's job is gone, and he does not know the future of his.

"Basically, we don't know what's coming around the bend," says Wilson, summing up the dilemma of many married Katrina evacuees.

Uncertainty and losses present a challenge for any couple. But as displaced spouses try to deal with the aftermath of a life turned upside down, they need to clarify their differences, says Taylor Aultman, a licensed social worker who says couples have to come to grips with the fact that they may not have the same "grief/stress style."

"Some withdraw, while others may lean," says Aultman, who says recognizing and respecting those differences are key in communicating emotions and needs during this time. It is vital, he says, that each person is clear about what he or she needs. And it is fair to recognize that one's spouse may not necessarily be the one to lend the empathetic ear.

"It could be another family member or friend who helps you grieve," he says. "But it's best when couples can provide this for each other."

"My husband and I have a strong relationship. We let off a lot of stress at each other," says Deily-Swearingen. "Our tempers are slightly shorter now, but we are sensitive to the fact that it's the situation, not the person."

Managing group dynamics

When families combine, Aultman says, the new group will go through a series of stages until the pecking order is established. It's important to maintain couple boundaries, he said.

"Once someone is back in the original family, they can revert to old roles, particularly under stress," Aultman says. "Everything isn't up for family discussion."

If it is understood that the living situation is temporary, Aultman said, many couples "will get closer during this kind of thing. It's foxhole bonding. When you experience something together, you support one another."

Mark Reynaud, a licensed professional counselor and marriage and family therapist from East Baton Rouge, can see the couple dilemma both personally and professionally. He had to put his practice into practice, so to speak, when he and his wife offered her sister and her landlord their home as a haven.

Katrina had also added to the professional demands of his career as a therapist and his wife's career as a nurse. The first time everyone sat down to dinner together, Reynaud implemented some guidelines to welcome guests, but to keep their life as a couple and as parents as normal as possible.

"Stay as long as you want, and consider this your home while you are here," he told his new housemates. "As in any household, we need some structure. We want to help, and we need help, too."

With Reynaud and his wife working overtime, the Katrina guests took over helping out with getting the children fed, washing clothes and usual household tasks. And the family talked about boundaries, such as a time for "lights out" or when televisions or conversations should not take place in certain rooms next to those where children were sleeping or doing homework.

"This was a win-win for everyone," he said. "We needed help around the house, and the people coming in didn't feel they were imposing. We are giving what we can give, and they are giving what they can give."

What happened to sex?

Creating a structure to address post-Katrina lifestyle may create a smoother-running household, but the issue of privacy is still one many couples feel.

"Lack of privacy means no intimacy," Greishaber said. "Some individuals may feel neglected or sexually frustrated. And the feeling of loss can impact sexual hormones. It's important to know this is normal."

"When you're in survival mode," Aultman adds, "there are other ways to show affection — a hug or a pat or whatever re-establishes you as a couple."

Experts say to seize any window of opportunity, such as taking a walk or running errands together, to recapture time alone.

And even though everyone may be glued to the television during 24-hour-a-day storm reports, Greishaber says couples should make a conscious effort to turn off external stimuli and turn toward each other.

"It's not what we are feeling that's important, it's how we relate to that emotion that matters,' "Epstein says he learned from his Buddhist teacher, Joseph Goldstein.' " Life in a commune, with relatives, on the floor, disrupted, is not going to be the same as life before. We will all have all kinds of feelings about that. Those feelings, especially the most negative ones, do not have to be indulged. They can be permitted, tolerated, made room for - but they do not have to drive us into more destruction.

"Kindness toward others will get most people through most things."

thick black sweatpants, scarf wrapped around a wool cap.

The streets themselves have been cleared of debris, but all around is devastation. Flooded and looted cars. Ruined shops. Bundles of dead brown branches stacked on the neutral ground, where her favorite tree still stands.

A gritty gray-brown crust cakes the sidewalk, the street and the "Mayor's Clean Team" logo on a trash bin. The air is ripe with a stench like rotting fish on a stagnant beach. You get used to it. She has.

A Humvee pulls up to the bus stop, pauses, then continues across Canal Street past the dead traffic lights. A military medical unit decamps under the nearby Chevron station's canopy. She ignores them, and they her.

Her voice is alternately angry and matronly. "That's why I voted for Dukakis," she says, apropos of nothing. "Sorry he didn't win, Boo."

Finally she notices the stranger with the notepad nearby.

"What do YOU want?"

Her visitor replies with a joke. "I'm just waiting for the bus."

She laughs. "Man, don't clown with me! You gonna be standing there a long time!"

Water marks are stacked like rock strata along the Whitney's boarded windows, columns and retaining wall, a chronicle of the inundation of her intersection. Had she remained on the bus bench at the height of the flooding, the water would have topped her head.

She declines to disclose where, or how, she survived the disaster.

"Katricia didn't want me," she says, renaming the storm to suit her own purposes. "Katricia wanted them out there. They tried to escape. Nowhere to run, nowhere to hide."

All those people will soon return, her visitor suggests, as the recovery begins. She disagrees, vehemently.

"What you see is what you get! You see me, the only one sitting here! They ain't comin' back. Once you gone, you gone! Don't you make no predictions."

An 18-wheeler hauls a load of downed trees along Broad, stirring up a cloud of gray dust. She wipes her face with her scarf, then rants at a helicopter clattering overhead.

A passing New Orleans police officer in a black SUV stops short. The officer barrels out of the truck. She waves him off.

"Don't want no food! Don't want no water!"

The cop leaves. She has apparently accepted rations from others — empty water bottles and torn MRE wrappers fill a box beside her bench.

She soon realizes that her visitor, the only other soul on Broad Street, has turned to leave.

"You got tired of waiting for the bus, huh?"

She falls silent and returns to her Bible, pouring over Paul's second letter to the Thessalonians. First chapter, seventh verse: "He will provide relief to you who are sorely tried."

The woman at the corner of Canal and Broad endured before the storm, and she endures after the storm.

Because Katricia did not want her.

Katrina reminds her of 1927

and present here is measured in relation to the Great Flood of 1927.

"It's a generation away now, so it's died down a little as far as people alive who actually remember it," said Randy DeCuir, editor and publisher of "The Weekly News" and "The Avoyelles Journal," both located in Marksville. "But it's still a benchmark.

"My uncles, I'd be out in the fields with them and they'd say, 'There's the tree, see the mark from the '27 flood,' " he said.

DeCuir and his first cousin Carlos Mayeux Jr. are the authors of "The Great Flood of 1927 in Avoyelles Parish: 75th Anniversary Pictorial History," published in 2002. It is fraught with black-and-white photos eerily similar to the flooding scenes from the New Orleans area, minus the cattle and chickens floating away.

On May 11 and 12 in 1927, the levee gave way around Cottonport. There were torrential rains. On Friday the 13th, the first serious breech occurred north of Moreauville. The next day it broke at Bordelonville and Big Bend. The population of the 26-mile Bayou des Glaises loop was cut off. Church bells rang to warn that the levees were giving way. Boats from Mansura and Marksville helped evacuate people to higher ground. But the area was destroyed and devastated as the river remained at flood stage for more than a month, inspiring Randy Newman to record "Louisiana 1927" decades later.

Katrina, to many folks here, is history repeating itself. Mistakes were made then, just like now. Residents didn't heed warnings — they vowed to stay and fight rather than evacuate.

"Authorities and the public were just so sure that the technology which had brought the automobile and radio and sent Lindbergh over the Atlantic could certainly tame the Mississippi," DeCuir said.

It was the same faulty mentality that created a false sense of security about the vulnerability of New Orleans and the Louisiana coastline to a major hurricane, he said.

"You always think that the worst case scenario isn't going to happen. It's always a little less than the worst case — only it wasn't this time," he said. "It just makes the world so much smaller. The '27 flood would never happen again, ever. After '27, I thought we were smart enough for it not to happen again."

Katrina has proven him wrong.

What was not on television or radio in 1927 was captured graphically in print. The Bunkie Record reported: "All along the main highway nothing but desolation could be witnessed. The livestock was seen on the right and the left caught in the current and unable to escape. Heroic efforts were being made by the farmers to save their cattle but it was apparent they would have to give up.

"The main thing was to save lives, for if the water continued to rise at the rate it had risen that day — six inches to the hour — it was easy to see that some would be lost."

New Orleans was spared because as the floodwaters headed its way, 30 tons of dynamite were set off to "crevasse" — French for "breech" — the levee at Caernavon, La., 13 miles below Canal Street, sending 250,000 cubic feet of water per seconds through the marshland below the city, flooding all of St. Bernard Parish and destroying the marsh.

This would prove to be an unnecessary move because major levee breaks way upstream prevented flooding in New Orleans.

DeCuir said what is interesting is that there are incredible New Orleans connections to Avoyelles Parish and many people here are descendants of French families that settled in New Orleans. Some, he said, were ship captains and worked on vessels. Some eventually left the New Orleans area and moved up to Natchez, Pointe Coupee and New Roads. And ironically, a flood in 1780 in Pointe Coupee caused many of these same people to flee to the higher ground of Avoyelles Parish, not knowing all the ground was not high enough to fend off a rising river.

So the bayou land people of Avoyelles escaped up to the high ground that had drawn their ancestors here in 1780. Families generations removed survived two floods, 1780 and 1927, and in some cases a third, Katrina, because of relatives who may have gone back to New Orleans.

DeCuir believes one in five families in the Marksville and Bayou des Glaises area has a New Orleans connection.

"There are 40 to 50 names synonymous with this area," he said, French names familiar to Orleanians — Bordelon, Lemoine, Gremillion, Laborde, Couvillon¸ Dupuy,¸ Lacour, Plauche, Dufour, Tassin, Gauthier, Coco and Michel.

And now the state's two great floods, in 1927 and 2005, will forever be linked.

"The '27 flood has never been forgotten," Bird Laborde said. "It is still talked about here — just like New Orleans will be doing with Katrina for years."

Tigers facing best-worst situation

The best thing for LSU could be getting back on the football field today.

The worst thing for LSU could be getting back on the football field today.

So far, we have no idea what to expect of the Tigers, except that they're capable of yielding gobs of points and yards weekly, of mounting a stunning and monumental comeback on the road and of being on the wrong side of a disheartening, historic collapse at home.

Which means they could thump Mississippi State today, or they could find a way to toss the game away.

All that appears to be apparent from the first two games is that there will be few, if any "gimmes" on LSU's schedule, that the Tigers may be equal parts hero and villain.

Granted, Arizona State and Tennessee, the first two opponents, aren't Arizona Tech and Tennessee-Martin. Each was, and remains, nationally ranked. Both will play in bowl games, perhaps in a BCS bowl.

But the Tigers' stirring victory over the Sun Devils, a home

STARKVILLE, MISS. — No need to read between the lines.

LSU sophomore quarterback JaMarcus Russell's license to steer the Tigers' offense isn't issued on a weekly, renewable basis. It's permanent, coaches and teammates tried to stress in an abbreviated week, and it can't be revoked by the Court of Public Opinion.

"He's the person we're going to follow," center Rudy Niswanger said sternly.

Though not primarily responsible for last Monday's Collapse on the Bayou, Russell hasn't been spared in the constant verbal onslaught from Tigerland.

BATON ROUGE — Tulane defensive coordinator Eric Schumann's philosophy is simple: If you can't stop the run, you won't stop the opposing team.

During the past two seasons, Tulane's defense against the run was its major weakness. Youth and inexperience during that span made it an easy target.

But after two seasons of passive defenses, a transformation has taken place.

TULANE vs. SLU

Radio: 1210-AM, 104.7-FM

Tulane's defense is ranked No. 1 in the nation after holding Mississippi State and Southern Methodist to 352 yards. Tulane is first against the pass and 21st against the run.

Impressed? Not Schumann. At least not yet.

"I need to see this every game," Schumann said.

The Green Wave defense will have another chance to impress their coach Saturday when Tulane plays host to Southeastern Louisiana at 2:30 p.m. in Tiger Stadium.

Although coaches still look at the defensive line as youthful (there isn't one senior), the sophomores and juniors have more experience than many second- and third-year players.

"I think the kids have grown up," Schumann said. "Any time the defensive line has that kind of playing experience, it's got to help. The last two years we played without experience. One year we were hit with all the injuries, and, the next year we had to play another set of freshmen."

With its top eight linemen starting a combined 64 games going into the season, a lot was expected of the defensive front.

"When we rotate groups, there isn't a major fall off in play. The next group has gotten in there and you don't notice a difference," Schumann said. "We'll see how the season goes, but we knocked people back instead of getting knocked back. So I'm encouraged by the defensive front's play."

Last season, the Green Wave allowed nearly 200 yards per game on the ground. So far, Tulane is allowing just 75 yards a game.

"Coach Zo (defensive line coach Lorenzo Constantini) worked us a lot, and we have more depth on the defensive line than we had last year," said sophomore Alvin Johnson, who was academically ineligible last season. "We set goals for ourselves, and the main goal was to stop the run."

The Green Wave has also put lots of pressure on the quarterback. Against Mississippi State, it held the Bulldogs to

Saints to utilize slew of LBs

Starters, second group to share time equally

SAN ANTONIO — Saints coach Jim Haslett never thought he'd see the day when he had to platoon entire sets of linebackers during the regular season.

But apparently that day has come.

After months of evaluation, Haslett and Saints defensive coordinator Rick Venturi have concluded that six linebackers deserve playing time with the first unit.

In other words, strongside linebacker Sedrick Hodge, middle linebacker Courtney Watson and weakside linebacker Colby Bockwoldt, although listed at the top of the team's depth chart at their positions, haven't necessarily distanced themselves from backups James Allen, Ron McKinnon and T.J. Slaughter.

Consequently, the Saints will send waves of linebackers after Buffalo Bills quarterback J.P. Losman and running back Willis McGahee on Sunday at the Alamodome in an effort to snap a two-game losing streak.

"I don't like to platoon anybody, but I think all six linebackers warrant playing time,'' Haslett said. "So, if that's the way it is, that's the way it is."

"I don't think our linebackers have been a real big problem for us," Venturi said. "When we've given up big plays, most of the time, they haven't been involved in them.

"But we are playing them all, and it has been unusual to do that in the regular season. We've never done it before. I don't know if it's a great idea or not, but we feel at this point in time that it keeps everybody's head in the game and it keeps them in the week of practice. I'm fine with it at this point."

SLIDE RULE

Local coaches are questioning whether some schools have taken advantage of the LHSAA's decision to grant displaced athletes immediate eligibility

By Mike Strom
Staff writer

On Sept. 1, three days after the devastating strike of Hurricane Katrina and the opening day for the high school football season, the Louisiana High School Athletic Association executive committee passed emergency legislation granting immediate eligibility to displaced students from storm-affected parishes.

This rule in effect made these students "free agents" in terms of eligibility and gave them the ability to enroll in and compete for in any school they chose.

What has transpired since has resulted in more accusations of abuse than LHSAA commissioner Tommy Henry cares to count. None, however, have been filed in writing.

"There are a lot of things being questioned, but nothing official," Henry said. "You hear this and you hear that, but we haven't received any formal complaints about illegal recruiting. The chief complaints I've received are from schools that say my school is open (again) and I want my kids back."

East St. John and Fontainebleau high schools are two examples of the situation Henry hears about, complaints that are expected to multiply in the wake of last weekend's strike of Hurricane Rita on southwest Louisiana.

Road to Shreveport

East St. John tackle Jamar Thompson now plays for Evangel Christian, despite the fact East St. John re-opened nearly three weeks ago on Sept. 12. A 6-foot-6, 320-pound senior and college prospect, Thompson played his first game for Evangel just five days after Katrina's Aug. 29 strike and two days after the LHSAA's displaced student ruling.

The story East St. John coach Larry Dauterive tells of Thompson's path to Evangel is interesting. Thompson and his family evacuated to a shelter in Mansfield. At the shelter, a church deacon advised Thompson and his family about Evangel, a private Christian school and perennial football power in Shreveport, about 45 miles north of Mansfield. The deacon even guided the Thompsons to Evangel, where Thompson subsequently enrolled.

The day after Thompson's first game with Evangel, a 35-7 loss to Springdale, Ark., on Sept. 3, Thompson returned to the River Parishes dressed in an Evangel shirt and visited with Dauterive, and told his coach that he was returning. The two even kidded about how strange Jamar looked in Evangel red instead of the black and gold of East St. John.

Dauterive said he had no subsequent contact with the Thompson family until Jamar's father returned his son's East St. John uniform on Sept. 21 and informed the coach Fontainebleau High School offensive lineman Cameron Zipp, who evacuated to Rayville because of Hurricane Katrina, said he chose to enroll and play at Neville because he believed Fontainebleau's season was over and Neville has a winning tradition. He has returned to Fontainebleau since the school re-opened.

INSIDE THE GAME

LSU (1-1, 0-1) vs. Mississippi State (2-2, 0-2)

THE VITALS

Kickoff: 1:30 p.m. Davis-Wade Stadium, Starkville, Miss.
Coaches: LSU, Les Miles (29-22, 1-1, fifth season overall, first at LSU); Mississippi State, Sylvester Croom (5-10, second season, both at Miss. St.)
TV/Radio: Tiger Vision/WWL 870-AM.
Injuries: Miles said offensive lineman Brett Helms (unspecified injury) will miss a week to 10 days and lineman Peter Dyakowski (foot) about two weeks. Offensive lineman Nate Livings injured an ankle against Arizona State and aggravated the injury Monday, but should be ready Saturday, as should defensive back Jessie Daniels and defensive end Claude Wroten. Mississippi State's only injured player is defensive back Demario Bobo, who is questionable (knee).

KEEP AN EYE ON LSU WR/KR SKYLER GREEN: Green caught only two passes for 10 yards and touched the ball only once in the second half of the loss to Tennessee. The lone second half play was a 27-yard punt return. It's important for Green, a senior and leader, to get involved early and give a lift to the sagging offense. Green has shown he's recovered from an ankle injury that plagued him last season. He has returned five punts for 90 yards and leads the SEC in that category. But the LSU game plan has to get Green the ball in space and let him create.

GAME PLAN

First, LSU must patch an injured offensive line, which could be without three players, and try to rediscover its offense. The Tigers gained only 44 yards in the second half vs. Tennessee. LSU may try to avoid playing physical, since many players will still be sore after having four days between games. Mississippi State's defense is allowing only 2.7 yards per rush. The Tigers may find success with its talented wide receivers. On defense, LSU will see more of the short passing game of the past two games. The Bulldogs use the West Coast offense with its short drops, quick passes and crossing routes, but the Tigers also have to be mindful of speedy running back Jerious Norwood, who is averaging five yards per carry. Quarterback Omarr Conner is completing 58.4 of his passes and is a dangerous runner. Bulldogs tight end Eric Butler could present a matchup problem.

KEY MATCHUP

LSU'S DEFENSIVE LINE VS. MISSISSIPPI STATE'S OFFENSIVE LINE: As poorly as the defense played against Tennessee, the Tigers front line completely shut down the Vols running game in the first half. Kyle Williams and Claude Wroten were disruptive and the level of play didn't suffer much when backups Tyson Jackson and Glenn Dorsey went in. Mississippi State's offensive line has been inconsistent, despite the statistics produced by Norwood and Conner. In two SEC games, it has allowed nine sacks, and LSU is coming off a four-sack game against Tennessee. Croom said he would like to play a little more physical this week. "We have got to get into the rhythm of running the football," he said. "We are going to start doing it the hard way by knocking some people off the football. We are not going to try and finesse people."

BY THE NUMBERS: 39 - LSU's streak of consecutive games with at least one sack; 2 - fumbled snaps by LSU quarterback JaMarcus Russell; 41 - consecutive starts by LSU tackle Andrew Whitworth; 7 - career interceptions by LSU safety Laron Landry. 8 - consecutive field goals by LSU; 98 - previous meetings between the schools in football, LSU's longest series; 12 - LSU victories against Mississippi State in the last 13 years; 16 - consecutive losses to SEC West teams by Mississippi State.

ODDS AND ENDS

Colt David, who kicks extra points for LSU, made his first career field goal against Tennessee in overtime, a 31-yarder. . . . Saturday will be the first time LSU has played two games in a week since 1973, when the Tigers played Mississippi State on Nov. 17 and Alabama on Nov. 22, Thanksgiving night. . . . Mississippi State coach Sylvester Croom and LSU defensive coordinator Bo Pelini were assistants on the same Green Bay Packers coaching staff in 2001 and 2002. . . . A victory by the Bulldogs would give Mississippi State its first 3-2 start since 2000. . . . Norwood is 431 yards from becoming Mississippi State's all-time leading rusher. He has 2,390 yards, fifth behind leader Walter Packer (1973-76) with 2,820.

FROM THE COACH'S MOUTH: "It's not the start of a normal season in any way. This football team has quality men, and I don't think the coaching staff and players are ready to start finger-pointing. Let's get it fixed, hang in there and get better." — LSU coach Les Miles.

Addai making most of limited chances

Leading rusher has only 32 carries

By William Kalec
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Joseph Addai waits . . . waits . . . waits. There it is, a brief bit of silence that he instinctively seizes, using the dead air to correct a wardrobe oversight.

It totally slipped the senior's mind. Before any Tiger speaks in front of the cameras, he is required to wear these pricey, conformist polos, each sporting school embroidery. There's no escaping this policy, since the rack covers a spectrum of sizes, from Skyler Green to Herman Johnson.

On Wednesday, Addai grabbed a shirt but forgot to put it on. Midway through an answer, Addai's upper body noticeably snapped — uh-oh, the shirt —- causing the mellow-spoken running back to turn auctioneer. With the fashion police hovering, Addai finished his statement atop speed, then wrestled that familiar purple shirt over his head.

"I don't know why we've got to put this shirt on," he mumbled as his arms searched for the sleeves.

Looking for some post-Tennessee upheaval? There it is. Yep, that's it.

True, it's not exactly the degree of dissention some expected after local weather forecasts predicted the sky to fall about 11 p.m. Monday night.

And although completely tongue-in-cheek, Addai - extra-cautious since it seems (statistically, at least) he's on the verge of becoming Les Miles' featured back — wishes he could have taken a mulligan on that shirt comment.

He proceeded to wisely pitter-patter around potentially spicy inquires, choosing not to jeopardize his current standing.

"I don't know," Addai said when probed as to whether he can get comfortable when he's frequently substituted in and out on the field. "The air was feeling kind of different, so we did have players that were tired or cramping, so I think I got in a good rhythm in the first half. In the second half, I don't think I . . ."

Addai put on the verbal brakes, choosing to keep his feet on the field, rather than putting them in his mouth.

Miles' decision to switch tailbacks at nearly every change of possession is quite similar Nick Saban's 2004 by-committee approach.

Through two games this season, Addai has received the majority of hand-offs and has rewarded the coach's generosity with 193 yards (96.5 per game, second in the SEC) on 32 carries.

At that rate, should LSU reach the SEC Championship and be invited to a bowl, Addai will have carried 208 times, 50 fewer than Oklahoma State's Vernand Morency compiled in 12 games last year under the same coach.

In the first half against Tennessee, Addai averaged better than seven yards per rush, and was the featured back for both LSU scoring drives. Most remember Addai's dash to the outside from 19 yards, putting LSU on top 7-0, but forget his second-quarter 21-yard run set the stage for the JaMarcus Russell-to-Craig Davis flea-flicker on the next play.

So why didn't Addai get 25 or 30 carries, particularly with LSU up big and the clock in its favor?

"I don't know," Addai said. "Whatever the coaches give, I'm going to take advantage of it — if it's five carries, if it's 20 carries. Whatever they give me."

Despite Addai's early effectiveness, Miles waited until LSU's third drive of the third quarter — beginning with 3:28 left — to return to his leading rusher. Well rested, Addai ripped off consecutive first-down runs, sparking another march that ended in points (a Chris Jackson field goal).

Asked if the revolving-door system disallowed any of the backs from getting into a consistent flow, Addai spruced up his sampling of responses, saying, "Really, I don't know."

Russell is learning on the run

LSU, from C-5

The talk might finally subside today at 1:30 p.m., when approximately 40,000 cowbell-ringing fans welcome No. 4 LSU (1-1) to Mississippi State (2-2).

For a team that spent September underneath a national media microscope following Hurricane Katrina's aftermath, playing in pay-per-view anonymity might be the ideal scenario for a return to routine - especially for Russell, whose ESPN vitals graphic included "Housed musician Fats Domino."

In sixteen days, Russell went from untouchable savior who uplifted a hurricane-ravaged state with a single, miracle flick of his blessed right wrist to nothing more than a shaky.500 quarterback heavily criticized for picking a terrible time to throw his first interception of 2005 — midway through a 17-point, 4th quarter teeter.

The adequate but unspectacular performance against Tennessee (14 of 28, 158 yards) already has fans hollering for Matt Flynn and true freshman Ryan Perrilloux, even though all indications from inside the program suggest Russell has little left to prove.

"If he just goes out there, relaxes and plays ball, you know, we count on him to make some big plays," Coach Les Miles said. "If he just goes out there and plays like he's capable, that's all we ask."

In fact, if any interior squabbles and dissention exists, it went unspoken this week. Indifference was as juicy as it got.

"We feel like any quarterback that goes under center can get the job done," running back Joseph Addai said. "All three — Matt Flynn and Ryan Perrilloux — work real hard, so we're confident in everybody. ...I feel like it doesn't really matter who starts. We all got confidence in whoever gets under center."

"You can see it in his eyes," wide receiver Dwayne Bowe said about Russell's confidence. "When he lines up and says, 'Let's move down the field, we're not going to get stopped.' I can see it in his eyes."

Class obligations prevented Russell from speaking for himself this week and unintentionally reminded a rabid fan base that this still is a 20-year-old playing in exchange for room-and-board. His late heroics against Arizona State covered up many green mistakes and possibly inflated expectations for a quarterback without a surplus of experience.

"Like a lot of guys have said, this is only JaMarcus' seventh, really, game playing," Skyler Green said. "He still has some learning to do, still has some maturing to do, and he's doing it. He's learning on the run. Hats off to JaMarcus. It's a tough offense to learn."

Russell's issues with ball security have been not only cause for concern but fuel for naysayers touting a switch. In both games this season, Russell has lost a fumble with LSU driving inside the opponents' 30-yard-line. Very blunt and stone-faced about the subject, Miles simply said, "We'd only hope he'd get it fixed."

"He's still a young quarterback and I think he played great," Niswanger said. "Did he have a perfect game? No. But I don't any of us did. I don't think anyone in the history of football has ever had a perfect game. I think people need to relax a little bit."

Of course, that'll never happen. Catastrophe Theory — a Nick Saban-coined term — has saturated the city following the Tennessee gaff. When asked about the phrase, Miles was unsure what it referred to and pleaded for the media not to divulge the definition.

"I've been through these before," Miles said. "I understand what it takes. I understand how hard it is. So it's my job to corral the guys and get it pointed North and South."

Bo Pelini's defensive tendency to lean on soft zone coverage continues to be a subject of substantial local angst, particularly since LSU is facing its first dual-threat quarterback in Mississippi State's Omarr Connor. Oklahoma — Pelini's previous employer — allowed the teams of dual threats Reggie McNeal of Texas A&M, Omar Jacobs of Bowling Green and Donovan Woods of Oklahoma State to average 31.3 points per game versus the Sooners in 2004.

Sylvester Croom also hinted nothing Pelini shows should be foreign, considering the two served as assistant coaches on Mike Sherman's staff wi1th the Green Bay Packers from 2001-2002.

"He is not going to play any tricks during the game," Croom said. "He pretty much knows my philosophy, and I know his. So really, it is going to come down to the players executing and playing good football."

LSU's fate rests with outcome vs. MSU

DESHAZIER, from C-5

game pushed to the road because of Katrina, should have been a springboard against Tennessee. It appeared to be, with LSU taking leads of 21-0 and 24-7.

But the 30-27, overtime loss provided lots of room to doubt and shout.

"We had an opportunity to put a good football team away," defensive tackle Kyle Williams lamented. "We got complacent."

That's why today's game could be the best thing to happen for first-year Coach Les Miles, whose team needs a lot more than Listerine to wash the taste of Monday from its mouth. On the heels of the largest home collapse in the history of Tiger Stadium, the Tigers need to play, and play well, in the worst way.

They need to show they can stop a team for an entire block of 60 minutes. Prove they can handle and rebound from defeat since they failed to prosper after victory, even after a two-week break gave them ample time to come down and prepare for the next game.

Otherwise, the venom that flows from Monday becomes only more potent for the man who had the misfortune of following The Man, St. Nick.

Mississippi State would seem to be a favorable tonic, considering the Bulldogs (2-2) still are a notch below LSU in talent, still are attempting to recover from NCAA penalties levied in light of violations committed in past years.

The Bulldogs might not be 51 points worse than LSU, like last year, but they also aren't yet on LSU's level. Sylvester Croom inherited a mess; Miles, a mansion.

But, when you watch a team snap like LSU did Monday night, growing more passive as the hours passed, you wonder what kind of lows it might be capable of if it can't ride the emotion of a home-opening crowd to victory against an opponent that, for 2 1/2 to three quarters, looked awful.

If the Tigers can play Tennessee back into the game, seemingly forgetting to do all the things that generated a 21-point lead, then they're capable of playing down to Mississippi State, or of allowing Mississippi State to play up.

What'd they learn from Monday?

There's no way to tell until later today, when they are tested by the Bulldogs, who have played twice as many games (four) as an LSU team that Miles insists needs game action.

Will the Tigers fall or stand? Will they bite or be bitten? Will the groans and shouts cease — for a couple of days, at least — or swell to a level that Miles will be searching for earplugs?

The best thing for LSU could be getting back on the football field today.

The worst, too.

Area golfers slowly get back in the swing

Some courses are operating, others to reopen soon

By Richard Meek
Staff writer

Area golf courses are creeping back to normal, with some already open and others set to reopen in the near future in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

Ormond Country Club, which is now available to the public; Belle Terre Country Club, which is semi-private; and Royal Golf Club have opened. Chateau Country Club is scheduled to open today but will only be available to those displaced from other area country clubs.

Audubon Golf Club announced Friday it will open Nov. 5.

Ormond, which has been open since Sept. 10, is offering a $225 special for 10 rounds of golf that includes cart and green fees.

"We have so many people that have been displaced, and so many people that have lost everything that we wanted to offer something to them," head pro Tom Rogers said.

Rogers said Ormond sustained minimal damage and the only remnants of Katrina are a "few brushpiles" scattered around the course.

Belle Terre survived Katrina but was not as fortunate during Hurricane Rita this past weekend. A persistent southeast wind pushed water onto the front nine, forcing its closure. For the past week only the back nine was available for play, said head pro Ryan McEzoy.

However, McEzoy said the front nine is expected to open today.

"The course is in great shape," he said. "We had some tree damage but that's all been taken care of. We haven't had a lot of play but we expect it to pick up."

Royal only has the front nine open but head pro and general manager Cliff Lairgast said he hopes to reopen the full 18 next week. The course is only open from 8 a.m.-2 p.m. with no tee times. Rather, Lairgast said, golfers are able to play on a "first-come, first-served" policy.

When open, Audubon, which has been serving as a staging area for the National Guard and firefighters from around the country and the landing area for military helicopters, will be the only golf course available in Orleans Parish.

Audubon head pro Stan Stopa said the course might offer "Hurricane Katrina" discounted fees but those have not been determined. He added the course will accept tee times beginning Nov. 1, depending on the availability of the phone service at the clubhouse.

Chateau owner Al Swanner said the course is "open and will be happy to accept club members."

THE WORLD IN SPORTS

FACILITY FIXES BEGIN: Officials are taking the first steps toward restoring the Superdome and New Orleans Arena, which sheltered thousands of refugees when Hurricane Katrina smashed through the city. Workers began using pumps and hot air to dry out the Arena this week and decontaminating it while a team of engineers, architects and others began evaluating the damage done to the Superdome and the steps needed to repair it.

"The more time goes by, the more certain we are that both buildings can be repaired," Superdome general manager Glenn Menard said Friday. "We just don't know how long it will take or how much it will cost."

The Arena, home to the NBA Hornets, was turned into a makeshift medical facility in the days after the storm. The Superdome, home to the NFL's Saints, Tulane football and the Sugar Bowl, lost part of its roof, and the interior was damaged by the thousands who crowded there for a week before all could be evacuated. The locker rooms and storage areas on the ground floor of the Arena had standing water, Menard said.

Ellerbe Becket, a design firm that has studied the Superdome in connection with upgrading it for the New Orleans Saints, sent in an eight-person team of architects, engineers and construction professionals evaluate the Dome.

"We had mapped out the Dome and had stored the information in our computer drafting systems here," said Stuart Smith, spokesman for Ellerbe Becket. "We have the floor plan already in tow. The team that studied the Dome will have a head start in this situation."

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL

PINIELLA, RAYS PART: Lou Piniella will not return as manager of the Tampa Bay Devil Rays next season, a decision that was expected after he questioned ownership's commitment to winning. Piniella has one season remaining on a $13 million, four-year contract he signed in October 2002. The buyout was finalized two weeks ago and calls for Piniella to receive $2.2 million of the $4.4 million he was due next season.

NFL

MARTZ HOSPITALIZED: St, Louis Rams coach Mike Martz was hospitalized with a sinus infection, but the team expects him to be able to coach Sunday when St. Louis plays at the New York Giants. Martz drove himself to the hospital, spokesman Artis Twyman said. He was expected to be released by Saturday, in time to fly with the team to New York.

SMITH ARRESTED: Timmy Smith, who set a Super Bowl rushing record when he played for the Washington Redskins in 1988, has been arrested and charged with trying to sell cocaine to an undercover drug agent. Smith, 41, of Denver and his brother, Chris, of suburban Lakewood, were both charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute more than 500 grams of cocaine, U.S. attorney's spokesman Jeff Dorschner said Friday.

MORE SPORTS

NBA: David Harrison of the Indiana Pacers was sentenced to a year of probation after pleading no contest to a misdemeanor assault charge stemming from the Pacers-Detroit Pistons brawl in Detroit. He also must perform community service, undergo anger management counseling and pay a $250 fine.
Golf: Michelle Wie will stick to her routine by going to school Wednesday, with one notable exception. She will be the only junior at Punahou School who already is a millionaire. Six days before she turns 16, Wie will turn professional with two endorsement deals that will make her the richest female golfer. Sources said Wie will sign two major endorsements, with Nike and Sony. One source said the Nike contract would pay her about $4 million to $5 million a year.

INSIDE THE GAME

Tulane (1-1) vs. Southeastern Louisiana (1-1)

THE VITALS

Kickoff: 2:30 p.m. at Tiger Stadium in Baton Rouge.
Coaches: Tulane's Chris Scelfo (32-41, seventh season); SLU's Dennis Roland (1-1, first season).
TV/Radio: CSTV All-Access Package/no radio in New Orleans; north shore WJSH-FM (104.7) and Baton Rouge WSKR-AM (1210).

KEEP AN EYE ON TULANE QUARTERBACK LESTER RICARD: Just like Ricard originally planned, he'll play at Tiger Stadium. The former LSU quarterback transferred to Tulane in 2003, and now he will start in Death Valley - Tulane's home on Saturday against SLU. Ricard is key in Tulane's offense. He improved from the first game to the second game, showing confidence last week at Southern Methodist. But, despite the brilliant passes, like the one to Damarcus Davis in the end zone, there were the mental mistakes. Ricard threw an interception in the end zone, and he had a delay-of-game penalty while in the red zone.

SLU'S RUNNING BACKS: The pass-oriented offense does have a pair of youngsters behind quarterback Trey Willie. SLU needs one of them to be efficient if it wants to keep Tulane's defense honest. Mario Gilbert, a sophomore, has 106 yards on 21 carries. Jerald Watson, a sophomore transfer from Auburn, has 92 yards on 23 attempts, and he occasionally lines up at the slot receiver.

GAME PLAN

Offensively, Tulane will feed off its offensive line's intensity. The Wave line, featuring three seniors, will try to smother SLU's 4-3 setup, which has four sacks in two games. Tulane's defense simply will continue to do what it has been doing. The Wave is No. 1 in the nation, allowing 176 yards per game. But, as Coach Chris Scelfo admitted, Tulane has not played "an offensive juggernaut."

Though SLU isn't at that status, either, the Lions will give Tulane some headaches. They run a lot of sets out of the shotgun. They rotate fresh legs at running back, and they still have the inkling to go deep, like the SLU teams under former coach Hal Mumme. Tulane will rotate its eight defensive linemen and attack the Lions' offensive line, which features two sophomore guards.

SLU will try to unleash record-breaking receiver Felton Huggins. In 2004, he had a school-record 84 catches. This year, he has nine in two games - and no scores. On the Wave secondary, Huggins told The Times-Picayune this week: "Nothing has impressed me, not to sound cocky or anything. They haven't played a passing team yet, so I haven't really seen much (from the secondary) yet."

KEY MATCHUP

TULANE RUNNING BACK MATT FORTE VS. SLU'S FRONT SEVEN: Though Forte ran for only 21 more yards in the second game than the first, his performance last week showed his explosiveness. Against Southern Methodist, Forte ran for 87 yards, including an 18-yard run and two 12-yard touchdowns. But Forte struggled in short-yardage situations. On his five carries when Tulane was five yards or less from a first down, only once did he get the first. The Lions have allowed 149 rushing yards per game in its first two games.

BY THE NUMBERS: 9 — Catches made by Tulane receiver Preston Brown in the opener against Mississippi State; 105 — Rushing yards SLU quarterback Trey Willie has on 27 carries; 14 — Points scored by the Lions in the first half in two games.

ODDS AND ENDS: Against SMU, Tulane's defensive line dominated, clogging holes and thus stealing tackles from standout linebacker Anthony Cannon. The senior made just five tackles. He had 12 the week before and six 10-tackle games last year. ... Tulane's Friday night accommodations? Air mattresses in the clubhouse at English Turn Golf & Country Club. "At this point, there are no surprises," defensive end Michael Purcell said. "As long as the field is 100 yards, I think we should be OK."

FROM THE COACH'S MOUTH: "The (defense) set a bar after the Mississippi State game and now they've got to live up to it. We've got to see that they live up to it - and if they don't live up to it, I'm going to be very disappointed."
— Tulane coach Chris Scelfo.

108 passing yards. Against SMU, the Green Wave had nine sacks and held the Mustangs to 64 yards passing.

"We give a most valuable player award after every game, and I wanted the entire defensive line to get it (after the Mississippi State game)," linebacker Antonio Mason said. "That was the best defensive line play I seen since the 2002 season. They played as well as the '02 linemen. They kept people off of us."

Sophomore Frank Morton said the improvement is due to experience and strength. The experience is allowing the line to play without thinking much about the assignment, and the increased strength keeps it from being pushed off the line of scrimmage.

"It all reflects working out in the weight room and getting stronger in the upper body," Morton said. "We were a little weaker and our opponents were able to push us around (last season). Now we're able to throw the blows, push them back and create a new line of scrimmage."

Four Tulane players suspended for fight

Altercation involved members of fraternity at Louisiana Tech

By Fred Robinson and Benjamin Hochman
Staff writers

RUSTON — Four members of Tulane's football team have been suspended stemming from a fight with members of a fraternity at Louisiana Tech last weekend.

The names of the Tulane players suspended are being withheld by both Tulane and Louisiana Tech, and the length of the suspensions is also not being released, according to a Tulane athletic department official.

None of the players involved is a starter, and all appear to be players who did not make the travel squad for the Green Wave's game last Saturday afternoon against Southern Methodist in Dallas.

Tulane coach Chris Scelfo referred all inquiries to Athletic Director Rick Dickson, who is handling the investigation from Tulane's end. Dickson could not be reached for comment Friday afternoon. Louisiana Tech athletic director Jim Oakes said no Bulldogs players were involved in the incident.

No arrests were made as a result of the altercation, although two members of the Kappa Alpha fraternity were injured last Saturday, according to a Ruston police report.

Tulane's football team is staying on Louisiana Tech's campus and attending school there since being displaced by Hurricane Katrina last month.

According to the Ruston police reports, the department received a 911 call at approximately 10:25 p.m. Saturday about a possible fight at 214 Westwood Drive, where the Kappa Alpha fraternity house is located.

The police reported that several members of the fraternity told them there was a fight involving members to the Green Wave's football team and the fraternity.

But Saturday night's fight wasn't the first altercation between the fraternity and the Tulane football team. The previous night at least one Tulane player appeared at the frat house where the fraternity was holding a "Bid Night" party and was told he had to leave. Tempers flared and the Tulane player left angry, according to reports.

On Saturday night, the player returned with a group of football players, who wound up injuring two Kappa Alpha fraternity members.

Ruston police said no arrests have been made because the fraternity members who were injured did not file charges.

"We told the victims what we need to do to press charges, the steps they need to take," said Sgt. Curtis Hawkins of the Ruston Police Department. "And so far, we haven't heard from them."

The investigation is ongoing between the police and officials from both schools.

Bayou Classic officially set for Houston

Game finally OK'd to take place at Reliant Stadium

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

Add the Bayou Classic to the list of events relocating from New Orleans to Houston.

The annual game between Grambling State and Southern University will be played Nov. 26 at Reliant Stadium because of damage from Hurricane Katrina that has made the Superdome unusable, officials from both schools announced Friday.

"Houston had the best proposal," said Angelia Weaver, chairman of Grambling State's Bayou Classic committee. "But what really sold us was that Houston was one of the first cities to reach out to the people of New Orleans and the rest of our state.

"They've really shown themselves to be a friend of Louisiana. If we had to move the event outside the state, that made it a lot easier to swallow."

Shreveport was the other finalist for the Thanksgiving Weekend event, but the 20,000-seat differential between that city's Independent Stadium and Houston's Reliant Stadium and the lack of adequate hotel rooms in Shreveport were determining factors.

Other cities which put in bids included Detroit; Los Angeles; Orlando, Fla.; Jackson, Miss.; Birmingham, Ala.; and Jacksonville, Fla. Baton Rouge also was considered, but the lack of hotel rooms and the LSU-Arkansas game on Nov. 25 ruled that out.

"We tried our best to make it work in Louisiana," said Ralph Slaughter, chairman of Southern's Bayou Classic committee. "But Baton Rouge just wasn't workable, and the limitation on rooms in Shreveport was too much to overcome.

"Once we realized that, we had to look at some other proposals. Houston was the best alternative, although we had some other good opportunities."

Slaughter said the coaches preferred to play the game in a domed stadium. Because of the many fan events connected with the game, the indoor environment worked out for the best.

Those events include a battle of the bands, Greek step show, coaches' luncheon, fan festival and job fair, which this year will be open to the public and not just students of the two universities as it has been in the past.

Because of the events held in connection to the game, the Bayou Classic has always drawn thousands more than the 70,000 who actually attend the game.

Slaughter said he did not expect those numbers to decline by much this year, although the large number of people relocated by Katrina could have an effect.

"You probably will have a great number of people from the New Orleans area who are in Houston now that will still be there in November," he said. "But this is still going to be a great event.

"Reliant Park has enough venues to allow us to do everything we've done before. We might be able to add a few events."

Slaughter and Weaver added that both schools view playing the game in Houston as a one-year necessity and that the Bayou Classic will return to New Orleans as soon as possible.

The Bayou Classic has been played in New Orleans since its inception in 1974.

Ticket and hotel information about the game can found at statefarmbayouclassic.com.

Transfer of Fair Grounds season given approval

By Bob Fortus
Staff writer

OPELOUSAS — The Fair Grounds on Friday received unanimous approval from the State Racing Commission to run a 37-day season at Louisiana Downs in Bossier City to make up for the cancellation of the racing season in New Orleans.

The transferred Fair Grounds season, with purses averaging about $270,000 per day, will begin Nov. 19 and run through Jan. 22. Hurricane Katrina wiped out an 83-day Fair Grounds season scheduled for Nov. 24-March 26.

"An agreement with Louisiana Downs is days away from being finalized," Fair Grounds president Randy Soth told the commission in a meeting at Evangeline Downs.

Commission attorney Kim Chatelain said to them: "For all intents and purposes, Fair Grounds is taking over Louisiana Downs. It will be a Fair Grounds meet at Louisiana Downs."

By law, a Louisiana racetrack must run 80 days in 20 consecutive weeks to remain eligible for a racing license and to conduct off-track betting. The commission voted to waive that eligibility requirement for the Fair Grounds.

Also, David Waguespack, an attorney representing Churchill Downs Inc., which owns the Fair Grounds, said that the agreement between the company and Louisiana Downs will include a condition "that there will be no impact on our gaming license."

The Fair Grounds is licensed for slot machines but hasn't begun operating them. Leonce Gautreaux, a representative of the state attorney general's office, said the attorney general will meet with the commission "to make sure that everything's legal and gaming licenses won't be affected."

"It is an issue we want to resolve."

Hornets get second-round pick for Dickau

By John Reid
Staff writer

More than two months after negotiations initially started, the Hornets traded point guard Dan Dickau to the Boston Celtics on Friday in exchange for a second-round pick in next year's draft.

The two franchises initially agreed in principle to the deal in early August, but Hornets general manager Allan Bristow has been working out compensation from the Celtics.

Dickau was an unrestricted free agent whom Coach Byron Scott had plans of possibly resigning when last season ended. Those plans changed, however, in June when the Hornets selected top draft pick Chris Paul, who is expected to be the team's starting point guard this season. Also, backup point guard Speedy Claxton, obtained in a February trade with Golden State for Baron Davis, has a season remaining on his contract.

"After we drafted Chris Paul, it became obvious that Dan would look to sign elsewhere in order to have a chance to compete for a starting point guard job," Hornets coach Byron Scott said in a statement. "Making this trade gives Dan that chance, which he earned by what he did for us last season, and it also prevents us from losing him without compensation. We wish him the best of luck in Boston."

Dickau was one of the Hornets' most popular players last season after he was obtained in a trade from the Dallas Mavericks in exchange for veteran Darrell Armstrong. Dickau averaged 13.2 points and 5.2 in 67 games for the Hornets.

During his first three seasons, Dickau was traded five times and did not get his first start until last season with the Hornets. He started 46 games last season.

The second-round pick the Hornets will receive originally belonged to the Miami Heat, but the Celtics acquired the pick in August as part of the largest trade in NBA history, which included the Hornets acquiring Rasual Butler from the Heat and Kirk Snyder from the Utah Jazz in exchange for the draft rights to Roberto Duenas.

Although second-round draft pick Brandon Bass signed with the Hornets nearly a month ago, they officially announced the signing Friday. Bass played at LSU and was the 33rd overall pick in last June's draft.

The Hornets begin training camp Tuesday at Southern Nazarene University in Bethany, Okla.

Linebackers bracing for McGahee

SAINTS, from C-5

tures Hodge (nine tackles), Watson (17) and Bockwoldt (18). Depending on down and distance and flow of the game, Haslett and Venturi will go to their bullpen and insert Allen (five), McKinnon (seven) and Slaughter (three).

There is a method to their madness.

"McKinnon has always gone in and given us a jumpstart," Venturi said. "Slaughter is new to us, and he's learning the system and getting better all the time. And James Allen was a starter for us last year and he looks healthier this week than he has been this year.

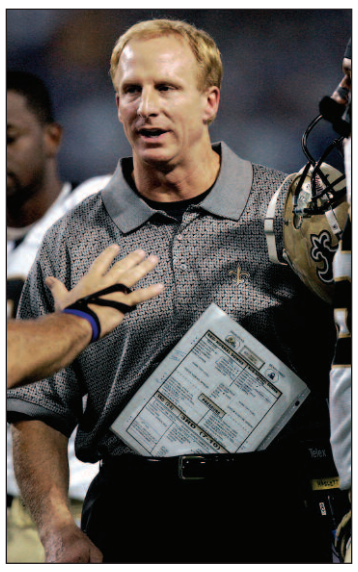
"So it's a bit of a patchwork quilt at times, but all these guys are competing, and we're trying to find roles for people."

Haslett said he likes the idea of alternating an entire linebacking corps rather than swapping out individuals.

"I don't want to change out one guy for another, because then people might think that Courtney or Colby or Sedrick aren't playing well," Haslett said. "But those other guys warrant playing time because they do bring a spark. They got a little something to them. In fact, there is some sentiment to start those guys, but we'll keep it the way it is for the time being."

The Saints' linebacker-by-committee approach hasn't necessarily worked through three games, not based on the rushing output of the Carolina Panthers (141), New York Giants (92) and Minnesota Vikings (147).

The Saints are tied for 23rd in the league against the run, yielding 126.7 yards per game.



McGahee, the 23rd overall pick in the 2003 draft, poses the next challenge. He ranks seventh among NFL rushers with 291 yards, including a career-high 140 yards on 27 carries in a 24-16 loss to the Atlanta Falcons last week.

McGahee missed the entire '03 season while recovering from major reconstructive knee surgery. Last year, he rushed for 1,128 yards and eclipsed 100 yards seven times.

"He's their centerpiece," Saints defensive tackle Brian Young said.

"He's got his sea legs back," Venturi said.

"McGahee is an up-and-coming star in the NFL," Hodge said. "We've played against some elite runners already (Stephen Davis, Tiki Barber, Mewelde Moore). But that's the game we play in the NFL. You go against great players every week, and we're going against another great player this week."

AP PHOTO

Coach Jim Haslett said he doesn't like to platoon players but that six linebackers have shown they all deserve to play.

Allen said he's up to the challenge and believes his teammates are as well.

"This will be a great test for our linebackers, and I think we're all prepared to make it a tough day for him," Allen said. "We can't let him get any more confidence than he already has. The ball isn't bouncing our way right now, but, once it does, I think things will start turning around for us."

NOTES: Wide receiver Joe Horn (left hamstring) participated in individual drills but not in team sessions. Haslett said Horn would be a game-time decision. "One thing about Joe is he doesn't need a lot of practice because he's been in the same system for eight years," Haslett said. "So it's not like he doesn't know what's going on. If he's healthy, he'll play. And, if he's not, he won't play." ... Haslett said cornerback Fred Booker (LSU) will be promoted from the practice squad to the 53-man roster in time for Sunday's game. Booker will replace safety Jay Bellamy, who will undergo surgery next week to repair a torn rotator cuff and be placed on injured reserve. ... Cornerback Fakhir Brown (knee) and running back Aaron Stecker (ankle) will not play Sunday. Defensive end Charles Grant (toe) returned to practice Friday and will start. ... Approximately 8,800 tickets remained for Sunday's game as of Friday, Saints officials said.

It comes at an unexpected venue - LSU's Tiger Stadium, where Southeastern will take on Tulane, marking the first time in 21 seasons as a head coach at seven schools that one of Dennis Sr.'s teams has gone against a Division I-A opponent.

It comes during a stellar senior season for Dennis Jr., an offensive tackle at Georgia. He was the SEC Offensive Lineman of the Week for his play in the Bulldogs' victory against South Carolina, the same night that Dennis Sr.'s team opened it season by beating Alcorn State.

It comes six days after Dennis Jr. became engaged to recent Georgia grad Kristy Sorsensen. She'll be at the game today, too.

And, most important, it comes five days after Dennis Sr. learned that he is cancer-free after having been diagnosed with non-Hodgkin's lymphoma last spring.

Talk about your best week ever!

"That was about the best news I've ever gotten," said Dennis Jr., whose Georgia team has an open date Saturday. "The timing couldn't have worked out any better."

The Rolands, father and son, have always been close. But they became even closer when Dennis Jr. was in high school in Bolivar, Mo., and, for more than two years, drove daily with his father to the weight room at Southwest Baptist University, where he was then the coach, for 6 a.m. lifting sessions.

Dennis Jr. went from a 6-foot-5, 185-pounder whose future looked to be in basketball to a 6-8, 265-pounder who chose the football Bulldogs over Georgia Tech and Northwestern in 2001.

Dennis Jr. is now listed at 6-9, 320, and his draft stock has increased dramatically.

"Dennis' progress has been unbelievable," said Georgia coach Mark Richt. "He came in here as a project and struggled mightily.

"But he's grown into quite a man, on and off the field. You have to give his father a lot of credit for that."

But, as bright as his future appears, Dennis Jr. would have been willing to put football on hold had his father's condition deteriorated. It was something Dennis Jr. kept to himself.

"I didn't ever say anything to him about it because he had enough on his mind as it was," Dennis Jr. said. "But, if it had been really bad, I would have left the team to be able to spend more time with him."

Doing so would have paralleled what Dennis Sr. had done last year, leaving his post as assistant head coach at Southeastern to take a high school job in Georgia to be near his father, David, who was terminal with Parkinson's disease and age-onset diabetes.

David Roland died in December, and, less than a month later, Hal Mumme left Southeastern for New Mexico State, opening the door for Dennis Sr. to become head coach of the Lions.

For someone who had labored in football's trenches - taking coaching jobs at places like Olivet Nazarene, Middle Georgia Junior College, Southwest Baptist and Belhaven - Division I-AA SLU was a career peak.

Then came the cancer, which apparently has been eliminated thanks to aggressive chemotherapy. Through it all, Dennis Sr. hardly missed any work, although, in a concession to the weakening effects of the chemo, he frequently coached from a golf cart.

"Dad has always been strong for everybody," Dennis Jr. said. "From the beginning, he said he was glad it was him and not someone else he knew.

"He fought through this because he loves his family and he loves football. He's the best coach I've ever seen."

Loopholes seem exposed

LHSAA, from C-5

Thompson would be staying at Evangel. Dauterive said he already was aware of Thompson's plan to remain in Shreveport based on conversations Thompson had with his former teammates.

"They're treating me like a king," was what Thompson told guard Josh Millet, a friend and teammate, Dauterive said. Millet confirmed Thompson's assertion.

"All I told (the dad) was that I hope you found what you were looking for," Dauterive said. "I wish him well. (Jamar) feels like the grass is greener over there, so more power to him."

Dauterive said Thompson no longer is welcomed back, and he questions the validity of the move given the Thompson home and his family's local business basically were not damaged by Katrina. The Thompsons are living in the Shreveport area, Dauterive said.

"You know life is about making decisions," Dauterive said. "(Thompson) decided to abandon his life-long friends for the new friends he found. He defected, is what he did. I don't dislike the kid. I just dislike the fact that he abandoned his teammates."

Dauterive also is upset he was not contacted by Evangel coach Dennis Dunn, and questions Thompson's recruitment to Evangel.

"If a deacon in a church found a guy who was 5-foot-5 and 125 pounds, you think he'd be at Evangel?" Dauterive said. "He'd be at Mansfield or he'd be back here at East St. John. Why didn't he go to Mansfield? Why did he go to Evangel? Evangel's just got a way of finding people."

Dunn acknowledged he likely erred by not contacting Dauterive, as he did with John Curtis coach J.T. Curtis, whose standout running back Joe McKnight also was playing for the Eagles. McKnight returned to the metro area Wednesday night to return to Curtis.

Dunn, however, defended his program in regards to Thompson. The church deacon referred to by Thompson, Dunn said, informed all of the families in the shelter that Evangel was taking in displaced students for free.

"It wasn't just Jamar," said Dunn, whose team is off to a 1-3 start, its lone victory being last week's forfeit from Cotton Valley.

"We've taken in about 100 kids, and very few of them are athletes. We haven't charged one dime of tuition to any of them. If Jamar walked in today and said, 'Coach, I'm going home,' I'd give him a big hug and wish him well. I think Jamar is staying here for personal reasons well beyond football, although I don't want to speak for him or his family."

Jamar Thompson and his family could not be reached for comment.

"There are always going to be people saying that schools try to exploit these kids, and that's ridiculous," Dunn said. "We're 30 days removed from that story, and football is the farthest thing from their minds. These kids have very unstable family lives right now, so football is way down on their list of priorities, and understandably so.

"All we want to do is create an avenue for them to get back to their normal lives. We welcome them to stay with us if they want to. But we're not urging these kids to stay if they need to be back with their families and be back with their teams. We just want to become a family for them and surround them with as much love as we can. We're not expecting them to provide us with an avenue to success."

"What makes this look orchestrated is it involves a high-profile school," said LHSAA president Bill Duplechain, principal at Port Barre. "I'm sure you could have 10 Philadelphia lawyers look into it and not find anything (wrong). There are loopholes in these things. There are things that are going to fall through the cracks. If this kid goes to Mansfield, nobody probably ever hears about this.

"In hindsight," Duplechain added, "I still think it was a good policy. With people fleeing and going from one state to another, it's actually miraculous that they have some (school) sites up and running. These kids should not be penalized for something they had no control over, this devastating storm."

'Looting' accusation

The Fontainebleau situation involved four players enrolling at Neville High School in Monroe, according to an ESPN report. The first was senior lineman Cameron Zipp, whose family had evacuated to stay with relatives in Rayville, a town 23 miles east of Monroe.

Believing that Fontainebleau's season was over, Zipp told ESPN he chose Neville because of a winning tradition that included three consecutive trips to the state semifinals. Fontainebleau had reached the Class 5A semifinals in 2004, Zipp's junior year.

A 6-2, 285-pound offensive line prospect, Zipp then began corresponding with three fellow Bulldogs seniors via cellular telephone text messaging and urged his friends to enroll at Neville. Defensive lineman Chris Johnson, linebacker Santiago Cordova and cornerback Ashton Autin joined Zipp at Neville and began playing for the Tigers while living with Zipp and his relatives in Rayville.

When Fontainebleau coach Larry Favre learned of the situation, he attempted to contact his players to inform them the St. Tammany Parish school was re-opening and the Bulldogs' season would resume. Favre urged them to return and attended a Neville game at Amite, where he spoke with his players following the game.

ESPN also reported Favre accused Neville coach Mickey McCarty of "looting" his players. Favre confirmed the accusation, but declined further comment, pending permission to speak from St. Tammany Parish Public Schools officials. McCarty could not be reached for comment.

Zipp and Johnson have returned to Fontainebleau, Favre also confirmed, but Cordova and Autin have opted to remain at Neville. Cordova and Autin continue to live with Zipp's relatives in Rayville, according to a Monroe News Star report.

Neither Zipp, Johnson, Cordova nor Autin could be reached for comment.

'Erring on the side of kids'

Both the East St. John and Fontainebleau examples illustrate the apparent catch in the LHSAA's emergency legislation, which does not require displaced athletes to return to their original school regardless of the conditions of their home or school. Once enrolled at their new school, the players are entitled to remain there and compete, with no strings attached, for the remainder of their high school career.

"I think the LHSAA erred," Dauterive said. "This rule was made in haste. They should have done some research on this. And I'm not telling you anything that I haven't told Tommy (Henry)."

When drawing up the rule, Henry and other LHSAA officials were operating under information from various government agencies stating that the Metro area would be uninhabitable for eight to 10 weeks.

"We did say that a displaced child could go to a school and stay there as long as they wanted to," said LHSAA vice president Kim Gaspard., principal at Airline High School in Shreveport. "Did we think people were going to take advantage of the rule? At the time we were concerned with the future of these kids, whose lives have been forever changed."

The LHSAA also was receiving subtle pressure from Texas for some kind of ruling on the displaced students, who suddenly were streaming into its school systems. Approximately 35,000 Louisiana high school students now attend school in Texas, Gaspard said.

"Your football season only lasts 10 games, and with all of the talk of the problems that people were facing and with no end in sight, we could not foresee what was going to happen," Duplechain said. "We had to make a decision, and although it may have been a little premature, it took a little of the edge off of what these kids were going through."

Henry points out that 1,178 student athletes have been cleared to play other schools as a result of the rule.

"That means that 1,178 kids would not have gotten to play," Henry said. "In the case of Hurricane Katrina, the feedback I received following the storm was very strong that we should take immediate action. I have no regrets. If we erred, we wanted to err on the side of kids."

The LHSAA has taken heed from the Katrina experience, however. In the wake of Rita's assault on southwest Louisiana, LHSAA officials are taking a more cautious approach. The executive committee decided via conference call Friday to decide each student's situation on an individual basis.

"People will find ways to circumvent rules and regulations," Duplechain said. "They will find ways to use rules and regulations to their advantage. When making rules, you have to have a rule to cover the entire population. Some people will try to win at all and any cost, and I don't think that we'll ever change that.

"But the real intent of the rule was to allow displaced students a chance to play. I'm just glad that there are student athletes, who have nothing, who have gotten the chance to do something."

Arizona State hope to play spoiler again

USC visits Tempe with 25-game winning streak

By Bob Baum
AP sports writer

On Sept. 21, 1996, Arizona State stunned two-time defending national champion Nebraska 19-0 at Sun Devil Stadium, ending the No. 1-ranked Cornhuskers' 26-game winning streak.

On Saturday, two-time defending champ Southern Cal comes to town after winning 25 in a row. Maybe a second big upset in a decade isn't too much to ask.

That year senior quarterback Jake Plummer led the upset on national television en route to an undefeated regular season and a Rose Bowl berth. Sam Keller now directs the Arizona State offense that has produced statistics that rival, and in some cases exceed, those of the powerhouse Trojans.

A shootout would seem a strong possibility, though the 14th-ranked Sun Devils (3-1) are 17-point underdogs.

"Their offense is phenomenal, and if they're going to score, and that means we've got to score, we can do that," Keller said. "I see it being a shootout. Heck, our defense might play lights out and stuff them, and they might stuff us. It might be a 13-10 game, but I'd rather see a shootout. If you're talking to me, I think it should be a shootout just because I like shootouts."

The Trojans' offense, led by Matt Leinart, Reggie Bush and LenDale White, is averaging 616 yards and 59 points per game. Arizona State is averaging 592 and 47.

It is the second Pac-10 road test in a row for Pete Carroll's team. The top-ranked Trojans (3-0) trailed at Oregon 13-10 at halftime last weekend, and won 45-13.

"It wasn't a blowout until late in the third quarter, maybe the fourth quarter," Leinart said. "It was good for us. We know that every game is not easy."

Carroll called the Oregon game "a reality check."

"Each week we're going to face great threats from the schools in our conference. They all know us well," he said. "Last year we had a tremendously difficult time getting through the conference. There were five games that were challenging."

Last year's Arizona State game was no challenge, though. The Sun Devils took a 5-0 record to Los Angeles, fell behind 42-7 by the half and lost 45-7.

"It's a bitter taste because that wasn't us, that wasn't ASU football at all," said Keller, who watched that game from the sideline as Andrew Walter's backup. "Our team, this year, is all about competing one play at a time, and we did that against LSU (a 35-31 home loss). We're not worried about how we look. We just go out there and grind it out because we have tough guys."

When teams can move the ball this well, rarely a word is mentioned about their defenses. But Arizona State has had two Pac-10 defensive players of the week - linebackers Dale Robinson and Jamar Williams. The Sun Devils had a 6-0 advantage in turnovers in last week's 42-24 victory at Oregon State.

"We have some very talented players on our defense," said Arizona State safety Zach Catanese, the team's second-leading tackler. "I think a lot of times they're overlooked. Our offense is great, our defense is kind of back there in the background. But we kind of like it like that. We would rather be the underdog and come out and show people what we're really about."

Southern Cal's defense had its best performance of the season at Oregon, shutting out the Ducks after the Trojans fell behind early 13-0.

"We're the question of the year," linebacker Oscar Lua said. "We did a marvelous job of proving we shouldn't be the question."

The last time the Trojans played at Sun Devil Stadium, two years ago, they were coming off a triple-overtime loss at California. Leinart was knocked out of the game early with an ankle and leg injury, but returned to direct a 27-0 second-half comeback that gave the Trojans a 37-17 victory.

The Trojans have not lost since.

Comets capitalize on Rams mistakes

St. Charles remains unbeaten

By Billy Turner
Staff writer

St. Charles remained unbeaten Friday night by beating West St. John 29-12 at home.

The Comets took advantage of five West St. John mistakes (four fumbles and an interception) and the running of 5-foot-7, 185-pound senior Christopher Jones, who gained 116 yards on 20 carries.

West St. John, which won the state Class 2A title last season, fell to 0-4.

St. Charles (4-0) opens Class 10-2A play next week by hosting Donaldsonville. West St. John opens 9-1A play at White Castle.

"We've got a lot of room for improvement," St. Charles coach Frank Monica said. "We've got to be a smarter football team. But you always have to be pleased when you beat a good football team like West St. John."

With both teams playing on a short week of practice, the first half was marred by mistakes by both teams. Both played Monday. Five days later they were going at each other.

On the opening drive, the Comets drove from their 41 to the Rams 22 before throwing an interception. West St. John fumbled on the next series, but St. Charles came back with a huge mistake moments later.

After recovering the West St. John fumble at the Rams' 10, St. Charles stumbled. On a second-and-goal from the Rams' 5, a pass by Sutton was intercepted by Blake Comminie, who returned the ball 88 yards for the game's first score. The Rams led 6-0 with 5:17 left when their two-point conversion try failed.

The Comets took the lead for good when they drove 59 yards on the next series. Fletcher scored from the four. Preston Landry kicked the go-ahead extra point for a 7-6 lead with 1:57 left in the quarter.

St. Charles added to that with Landry's two-yard run in the second quarter. Thirty seconds later, senior lineman Ross Roubion fell on a West St. John fumble in the end zone, and with a two-point conversion, the Comets let 22-6.

"We didn't give ourselves a chance to win," West St. John coach Laury Dupont said. "Penalties and quarterback sacks and fumbles - you can't win like that."

The Rams' drove late, scoring on Olajuwan Hall's 15-yard pass to Devonne Lumar with 36 seconds left in the first half. But the two-point conversion failed and St. Charles led 22-12 at the half.

The Comets took advantage of another fumble in the third quarter. Ben Beneditto recovered at the Rams' 31, and Christopher Jones scored eight plays later. Landry's kick made the score 29-12 with 2:45 left in the quarter.

"It was important to take back the momentum," Monica said. "We knew we had to turn it since they had scored right at the end of the half, and we did. The defense gave us that, and that was big."

The game was scoreless in the final quarter.

East St. John holds off Curtis

Jabouri's kicks of 56, 20 yards seal victory

Friday was the third game for the East St. John Wildcats, and it showed.

The Wildcats (2-1) performed with precision and poise early, building a 10-0 lead in the first quarter against John Curtis. What the offense built, kicker Radi Jabouri sealed with fourth-quarter field goals of 56 and 20 yards, as East St. John prevailed 16-6 at home.

Wildcats' quarterback Johnnie Thiel, a Curtis transfer, hit three of three passes for 53 yards and rushed for 29 yards on the opening drive of 80 yards. Thiel scored from eight yards for a 7-0 lead.

Curtis (0-1) punted following three snaps.

Thiel then hit Louis Lee, who made a diving catch for a 48-yard gain at the Curtis five-yard line. East St. John lost 11 yards on its next three play,s but Jabouri made a 33-yard field goal for a 10-0 advantage with 4:12 left in the quarter.

"I thought the first drive set the tone for the game," East St. John coach Larry Dauterive said.

Curtis bounced back with its lone score on the next possession. On his first carry of the season, Joe McKnight broke two tackles at the line of scrimmage and raced 70 yards for a touchdown with 2:46 left. The extra-point attempt was missed, leaving East St. John ahead 10-6 after one period.

The second quarter featured a flurry of turnovers. Curtis fumbled on its first two possessions, miscues that were sandwiched around an interception by McKnight.

After the second fumble recovery, East St. John had possession at the Curtis 41-yard line. The Wildcats reached the Patriots' 17, but a 34-yard field goal attempt by Jabouri was blocked by John Ruttley.

"We had a lot of opportunies and we made a lot of mistakes," Dauterive said of the second quarter threats.

There were more miscues early in the fourth period. A Thiel was picked off at the Curtis 11-yard line by Kelby Wuertz. But East St. John's Isiah Francis picked off a Kyle Collura pass four plays later.

East St. John drove from its 24-yard line to the Curtis 39-yard line, where Jabouri made a 56-yard field goal for a 13-6 lead at 4:45.

One play later, East St. John's Kerry Clofer recovered a fumble that led to the clincher by Jabouri from 20 yards with 2:47 to play.

Thiel completed 14 of 21 passes for 231 yards. By contrast, the Patriots passed for 10 yards but rushed for 232. But that movement was offset by three lost fumbles.

"Obviously you're disappointed when you lose, but considering the circumstances (of Hurricane Katrina), this was a typical first game with all the errors," said Curtis coach J.T. Curtis. "This was a very high intensity game because we have never played them before in the regular season. It is just going to take time for us to jell. But we will."

St. John holds off Riverside

Four turnovers by Rebels help Eagles win 27-20

By Jim Derry
Staff writer

PLAQUEMINE — It seemed early on Friday night that the winner between Riverside and St. John would be the team that made the game's final big play.

Chalk one up for the Eagles.

Chris Delrie's diving 21-yard touchdown catch in the back of the end zone from Baco Romero preserved St. John's 27-20 non-district victory at Plaquemine High Stadium. It was the only pass of the game from either side that gained yardage.

In the first half, Rebels quarterback A.J. Delaneuville kept his team in it with touchdown runs of 55 and 65 yards. His 140 yards on the ground in the first half was almost twice as much as St. John's total output, but the Eagles (3-1) led 14-12 at the break.

They scored their first touchdown on a 92-yard kickoff return by Chase Blanchard to take a 7-6 lead. He followed that with a one-yard score eight minutes later that was set up by Rodarrick Jones' 37-yard interception return.

"We get a stop early on and get a touchdown, and I cringe every time I put my kickoff team on the field," Riverside coach Mickey Roussel said. "I said, 'Guys, we've got them right where we want them right now, you kick the ball deep, and don't let them break a big one deep.' Guess what? They break one, and all the momentum that we had, we lose."

But the Rebels regained that momentum on the first play of the second half. Jarrid Caesar broke free through the right side and ran 88 yards for a touchdown that gave Riverside (3-1) a 20-14 lead.

Neither offense did much for most of the third quarter, as there were punts on the next four drives. That's when St. John used another big play to get in position to regain the lead.

Romero, who gained 75 yards on 18 carries, faked the pitch on an option and ran 27 yards to the Riverside 22, and two plays later he scored to put the Eagles ahead for good.

Turnovers plagued the Rebels all night, as they gave up two fumbles and two interceptions. St. John turned the ball over once.

"Turnovers will kill you, and so will not doing the little things right," Roussel said. "Bad snaps on the shotgun? Hey, we didn't do that the first three games, and we had three tonight (they lost one). ... Field position in the third quarter was all them."

After Delrie's score with 7:44 remaining, the Rebels had two more chances to drive down the field and tie or win the game. But a bad snap cost them 20 yards and forced a punt on the first drive, and Delaneuville threw a second interception to Jones, which allowed St. John to run out the clock.

Destrehan tops St. James in hectic finish

Eugene recovers from earlier miscues

By Lori Lyons
Staff writer

Destrehan quarterback Jai Eugene needed a little redemption Friday night.

With the game on the line, he got it.

With 1:18 remaining and St. James leading 25-20, Destrehan had a fourth-and 16 at the St. James 47-yard line. Destrehan also had a quarterback in Eugene who had thrown five interceptions on the night, the last four occurring on the previous possessions.

But this time, Eugene floated a short pass to Joshua Martin who was waiting at the 25-yard line and Martin did the rest. Martin broke away from a pair of St. James defenders, then he sprinted into the end zone. Eugene then connected with Edwin Reed for a two-point conversion that put Destrehan ahead 28-25.

St. James then got the ball with one minute remaining. In five plays, St. James drove to the Destrehan 42-yard line. But, with six seconds to play, Terry Dumas' Hail Mary pass was intercepted by Jerico Nelson to seal the victory for Destrehan.

It was a remarkable comeback for Class 5A Destrehan (4-0) against the No. 1 team in Class 2A. The Destrehan running game struggled for 87 yards on 20 carries. Reed had a punt return and a kickoff return for touchdowns nullified by penalties, and Eugene completed only 13 of 34 passes.

St. James, meanwhile, rushed for 255 yards, even with its two starting rushers hurt and another out for the second half. Luther Ambrose rushed 14 times for 177 yards and one touchdown. Jason Zenon ran for 83 yards on seven carries, all in the first half. And quarterback Antonio Phillips threw for 134 yards and two touchdowns and ran for another. Craig Duronslet had two of the five interceptions St. James nabbed.

But Destrehan had Eugene and coach Steve Robicheaux said he was putting his faith in him.

"He's the guy," Robicheaux said. "We know sooner or later he's going to get the job done. But a lot of guys made some great plays."

St. James led for most of the game, starting early. On their second possession, the visiting Wildcats took four plays and 27 seconds to drive 65 yards. After a 41-yard run by Zenon and a nine-yard pass from Phillips to Jordan Landry, Ambrose scored from the 10. Jerome Lewis' extra point made it 7-0.

After holding Destrehan to three and out, St. James scored again when Phillips connected with Wayne Mitchell on a 43-yard pass. The extra-point attempt was blocked, leaving St. James with a 13-0 lead.

On the ensuing kickoff, Destrehan ran a reverse to Reed, who scampered 97 yards for an apparent touchdown, but Destrehan was flagged for an illegal block in the back. Destrehan did not score until its next possession, with 8:50 remaining in the half, when Reed caught a pass from Eugene, cut inside and broke a tackle at the four-yard line for a 52-yard touchdown. Travis Brignac kicked the PAT to cut St. James' lead to six points.

But St. James extended the lead on its next possession, an 11-play, 95-yard drive capped by a six-yard pass from Phillips to Nick Narcisse. The two-point conversion failed, leaving St. James with a 19-7 lead.

Destrehan was driving late in the first half and got down to the St. James seven, but, with four seconds remaining, Ambrose intercepted a Eugene pass at the goal line and returned it to the Destrehan 20.

Destrehan opened the second half with two quick touchdowns. Eugene ran for a 29-yard score 13 seconds into the third quarter. Later he threw a 24-yard touchdown pass to Martin with 8:35 remaining in the quarter. Brignac's PAT kick put Destrehan ahead for the first time, 20-19.

Rebuilt Dome pitched as super shelter

But federal money the key, official says

By Jeff Duncan
Staff writer

If the Superdome is going to be used as a hurricane evacuation shelter in the future, federal officials should pay the extra costs needed to upgrade the facility to make it "hurricane-proof" and more suitable as a refuge, said the chairman of the state agency that oversees the building.

▶ The San Antonio Saints? Some think Texas city has ulterior motives, A-29

Tim Coulon, chairman of the Louisiana Stadium & Expedition District, hopes state officials can persuade the Federal Emergency Management Agency and insurance adjusters to pay for enhancements such as enlarged concourses and new restrooms that will make the Dome more suitable for future evacuations.

The building suffered millions of dollars in damage from Hurricane Katrina and the 25,000 evacuees who sought shelter there for days after the storm passed.

"It would be foolish on our part not to look at the building with the need to modify it as a shelter," Coulon said. "Obviously, if we don't consider the use of the Dome as a shelter then we shouldn't use it at all. Won't we be criticized five years from now

When floodwaters laid waste to Dennis Terry's Lakeview townhouse, his first few steps were obvious ones: Recover anything worth saving. Call the insurance company. Call the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Wait for a check to arrive, hopefully one that reflects the home's true value.

Now, though, Terry faces a labyrinth of more complex decisions. So do tens of thousands of owners of uninhabitable homes across a swath of New Orleans and its environs.

Terry's biggest questions: Can he rebuild? Should he? And if he does, will he have to build a home that is less vulnerable to flooding than the one that was lost in Hurricane Katrina's brutal aftermath?

3,000 city workers may lose jobs

Drastic cuts are considered

By Frank Donze

Crippled financially by the evaporation of virtually all tax revenue, Mayor Ray Nagin's administration has set in motion an unprecedented layoff process that could eliminate as many as 3,000 "non-essential" municipal employees — about 40 percent of the City Hall work force — as early as mid-October.

The only agencies likely to be largely spared by the proposed action are those with a direct impact on public safety, including the police and fire departments, the emergency medical unit that runs ambulance services and the Sewerage & Water Board, as well as electrical and health inspectors needed to get commerce up and running.

It is unclear how the sanitation department, a critical component in the city's recovery from Hurricane Katrina's destruction that is operated by a private contractor, would be affected.

The job termination order was signed Thursday by Chief Administrative Officer Brenda Hatfield and sent to the city's Civil Service Commission, the agency that oversees the hiring and firing of city workers.

Reached Saturday for comment, Nagin said the layoffs are not a certainty at this time as his administration continues to look "at all of our options."

But he added that he and his staff "are positioning ourselves to move timely in preparing for this type of event as the federal, state and banking financial support is not materializing as we had hoped."

Nagin, who replied by e-mail, did not address how many city jobs are in jeopardy. But a city official familiar with discussions, which have been going on for weeks,

For five straight nights in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, Coast Guard helicopter pilot Lt. Patrick Dill could see the small beacons pointed skyward from the darkened, flooded landscape that was New Orleans.

"They were everywhere, shining flashlights," Dill said. "There were just thousands."

But as the days and nights and the rescues wore on, the beacons began to disappear. "Are we actually making a difference, or are their batteries dying?" Dill, a displaced Uptown resident, recalls pilots asking themselves.

Interstate 10 road work to continue

Workers with Boh Bros. Construction demolish part of the Pontchartrain Expressway overpass before they replace it with new concrete. The overpass job was originally scheduled to take six to eight weeks and cost $650,000 to $850,000.

Some $70 million of major road work was pending when Hurricane Katrina blasted southeast Louisiana a month ago. Now the state highway department wants those jobs moving again to help rebuild the region's economy as well as improve its transportation system.

Repairs already have resumed on pre-Katrina damage to the Pontchartrain Expressway overpass at Interstate 10 in New Orleans near the Metairie line. In the weeks ahead, the state hopes to get a contractor started nearby on the widening of a major hurricane evacuation route: I-10 between the I-610 split and Causeway Boulevard in Metairie.

"We won't be blocking any routes, but I am trying to get these jobs moving," said Brian Buckel, chief project engineer for the Louisiana Department of Transportation and Development in New Orleans. "From an economic standpoint, these companies need to get their people back to work, plus we need to improve the infrastructure so that when people come back, there's something to come back to."

Buckel said last week it was too soon to say when Boh Bros. Construction Co. can return to the I-10 widening job.

The $69 million contract calls for adding new lanes in each direction, a flyover ramp from Bonnabel Boulevard to westbound I-10, sound barriers and drainage improvements. Just two weeks before Katrina struck, Boh Bros. had begun mobilizing an army of people, equipment and supplies for the job, and construction was expected to begin today.

Despite the eagerness of the state and its contractors to return to work, the fallout from Katrina and, more recently, Hurricane Rita, still holds much sway over when storm-toppled construction schedules can be righted.

"Can you get the supplies, the equipment, and the people to do the work?" Buckel asks. "That's what every contractor is up against."

In the case of repairs to the pock-marked Pontchartrain Expressway overpass, four full spans and two partial spans must be replaced on a bridge that usually carries 20,000 vehicles per day. Boh Bros. began the job Aug. 22, snarling traffic for a time. Katrina arrived a week later.

Buckel said Boh Bros. resumed work there last week, even though no concrete plant was available to provide materials for finishing the job. The company will break up the old spans while awaiting new concrete.

"We wanted to get started on that while there wasn't much I-10 traffic," Buckel said.

Area concrete plants, which have been unable to get raw materials since Katrina and Rita disrupted the market, are just now beginning to reopen, Buckel said.

The overpass job was originally scheduled to take six to eight weeks and cost $650,000 to $850,000. Buckel said he doesn't yet know how the hurricane delays will affect those numbers.

Jefferson schools to reopen, with longer days, on Monday

Damaged campuses' students relocated

By Rob Nelson
Staff Writer

With shaky finances, a reworked calendar and uncertain enrollment, the Jefferson Parish public school system gets back to business Monday, resuming classes for thousands of students, many from other districts still in tatters in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

The system set the Oct. 3 reopening date weeks ago, convinced that a quick rebound would help lure residents back to Jefferson and shore up coveted state financing linked to student enrollment.

Highlighting the commitment of administrators and teachers, Superintendent Diane Roussel, whose Monday schedule is already packed with national and local media interviews, praised the system Saturday, likening the reopening to "a phoenix rising from the ashes."

Considering the uncertainty and chaos following the storm, Roussel said, the district's turnaround is a credit to employees who "took on the cause."

"This is an incredible date to be able to go back to school," she said. "We had teachers cutting grass. We had psychologists painting walls. It's been an incredible endeavor."

More than a month after Katrina rattled the state and scattered Louisiana residents across the nation, most of Jefferson's 84 schools are ready to safely welcome back students.

Only Terrytown Elementary, Woodmere Elementary, Lincoln Elementary, A.C. Alexander Elementary and John Martyn School remain too damaged to open. Officials have provided no timetable for when those schools will be functional.

The system has shifted students at those five schools into other schools, where they will share the building and run on different class schedules.

There is also concern about whether Lafitte Elementary and Grand Isle School can reopen Monday. Hurricane Rita, which came a few weeks after Katrina, flooded the small fishing village of Lafitte, and, like Katrina, battered Grand Isle. Students there have not yet been shifted to other schools.

Roussel said all principals have returned to the district and estimated that 60 percent to 70 percent of teachers are also back to work. The number of students expected to return varies greatly by neighborhoods, depending on the extent of damage to homes as well parents' resources to return to the parish, she said.

There could be a significant increase in enrollment in January, because some parents might wait until the end of the fall semester before returning, Roussel said.

Whatever number of students head back to Jefferson, they will definitely be waking up earlier.

The School Board adopted a calendar Thursday that adds one hour of class time to each remaining day of the school year, beginning Oct. 10. All schools will begin an hour earlier, with high schools facing the earliest start time at 6:15 a.m.

The move will help the system recoup 24 days of lost instructional time and meet state requirements for the number of academic minutes students must have. It's still unclear whether the state will require the system to make up all missed time, which could force a second calendar revision, officials said.

Regardless of what time students arrive, officials will keep a watchful eye on enrollment figures, a key factor in determining state financing. Before Katrina, Jefferson served about 50,000 students, but officials are unsure what that number might look like come Monday.

However, they expect an influx of students from Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes, all of which were decimated by Katrina. School systems in those parishes are either only partially open or completely out of commission.

Rolling out a welcome mat to children from across the region, officials spent the past week registering students new to the parish or those who have relocated within Jefferson Parish. More than 2,000 signed up.

"It's about taking in as many students as we can," Roussel said. "We became teachers to help kids."

The system's coffers have also taken a pounding, particularly sales taxes that bring in $12 million monthly and represent 41 percent of the system's revenue.

The system's reserves, at a healthy $24 million before the storm, are close to empty, and the board approved Thursday establishing a $50 million line of credit with its bank in case the finances grow more desperate.

The district is also still fighting for money from its insurance adjusters and the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Board members recently complained they have not seen any federal relief dollars.

If secured, some of that money, officials said, would go toward temporary housing for displaced teachers.

Describing her attitude about the reopening as "relieved and encouraged," Roussel said the most pressing concern is to make students feel welcome and secure. Counselors and psychologists will be on hand Monday, she said.

Return to N.O. begins not with bang, but whimper

Residents surprised by slow response

By Bruce Hamilton
Staff writer

The repopulation of New Orleans has not begun with a blitz.

Although Mayor Ray Nagin officially opened large sections of the city Friday, allowing residents and business owners in eight ZIP codes to return, many residential areas of the city remained all but deserted Saturday afternoon.

There was isolated activity in some Uptown and the French Quarter neighborhoods, but people were not flocking back to their homes. Some residents said they were surprised by the slow return.

"There's no one down here. I'm pretty much the only one," Gregg White said outside his Esplanade Ridge home at 828-830 N. Rampart St." It's eerie to see how quiet it is."

White, a salon owner, said he returned Thursday, but speculated that many of his neighbors couldn't afford to get back quickly. "It's so expensive," he said, referring to the cost of air travel.

A few blocks away in Treme, Anthony Gibson said he hadn't seen many of his neighbors since before Hurricane Katrina hit Aug. 29. Gibson said he never left the city, remaining in his upper apartment at 1323 St. Philip St.

"Since the mayor has asked people to come back, I haven't seen a big amount of people," he said.

"I'm glad they haven't" come back, said innkeeper Jess Beaty outside 5 Continents Bed and Breakfast at 1731 Esplanade Ave. "The city is not ready."

Residents could be seen packing up moving vans and car trunks, and traffic along St. Charles Avenue was dominated by 18-wheelers and contractors' trucks. Many people said they were only retrieving items and did not plan to stay; they encountered sparse traffic entering New Orleans.

Edward Mink said he returned Friday night, and "once you got closer into the city, it got darker and I could count the cars. I saw about a dozen." He and his wife, Saba, took some items from 231½ St. Charles, and they were leaving for Plano, Texas, where they have relocated.

In Mid-City, Pete McHugh was dropping off supplies at a friend's house on North Lopez Street. He had just returned to the city after five weeks in Dallas, and as he crossed the Crescent City Connection, he encountered no traffic, he said, and no checkpoints.

"It's not the mad rush," said insurance adjuster Josh Stacey, who was visiting from Mobile, Ala.

In CC's Coffee House at Magazine Street and Jefferson Avenue, manager Angela Alessandrina said customers were coming in steadily, but she didn't know whether they were staying in the city.

"It's going to take a while for people to get back into town, but the cleanup is under way," she said.

The Bywater was sparsely populated Saturday, where Stephen Polier had just returned to Sugar Park Tavern, his pizza restaurant and bar at Dauphine and France streets. "We're just taking out the biohazards," he said, nodding toward the kitchen where he and his girlfriend were cleaning out spoiled food.

Across the street, a small group gathered outside Jimmy's Grocery. Ray Khalaileh spent Saturday cleaning out his poboy and grocery store, where his son Sharif sat on an overturned shelf on the sidewalk.

Khalaileh has three rental properties in the area. "One tenant keeps calling me, calling me. 'I want to come back,' she says. I tell her there's no electricity, you can't live here."

He said his store had no power and Entergy workers told him his gas would be turned off. "You can't. I need to cook for my customers," Khalaileh shouted.

After the truck drove away, the Israeli immigrant said, "We're definitely going to reopen. I just hope my customers return. I tell my son, 'We have wars where we come from. But I never seen nothing like this.' "

Resident visualize the future of N.O.

Kappa Horn shook her hips to "New Orleans Funk" as she presided over a grill full of hamburgers — the only menu item of the day at her nearly reopened Magazine Street breakfast joint.

Going to . . . get back!
Going to . . . get back!

"This the best album in the world," she told hungry and thrilled-to-be-home customers, as official resettlement of New Orleans' east bank began late last week.

Horn had just returned to open Slim Goody's after a depressing stay in Baton Rouge. But there were moments of pure beauty, too. Greasy spatula in hand, she told of watching the Dirty Dozen Brass Band play in Baton Rouge.

They kicked into "Do Whatcha Wanna," the brass-band standard that bumps like a New Orleans anthem to anyone who has wiggled and giggled with friends and strangers in the city's world-famous music halls.

The room exploded, just like at home.

Then, Horn said, "somebody whispered in my ear, 'Well, You can't kill that.'"

No indeed. New Orleans will not die. For true.

But that begs a question that many New Orleanians are already beginning to grapple with: When the city gets back on its feet, what sort of place will it be?

The question already is provoking spirited discussion among returnees, if only as a diversion from more immediate anxieties, such as where to live and how to make a living.

Many said their thoughts alternate between visions of New Orleans' grand opportunity to wash away its severe problems and concern that its legendary character could get watered down in the process. Issues of race, class, politics and the fragile social fabric of neighborhoods weigh on their minds even as they begin to piece back together their damaged homes and businesses.

At Slim Goody's, chills ran up the spine of Matthew Ratcliff, 33, as "Big Chief" came on the juke box. He worked as a cook at Cobalt restaurant before the storm. They're paying him for another three months. After that, who knows? But he's looking for another job ñ anything ñ in the meantime.

"I've just been so stir-crazy," he said. "Even if it's minimum wage, it'll keep me from drinking all the time. Try staying in Little Rock, Ark., for a month. That'll make you nuts."

A few minutes later, Horn explained to customers that she had to reduce the menu to hamburgers only because she has no one for food prep. Ratcliff asked if she'd take him on.

"Show up at 8," she said.

Just like that, one man's economy switched back on.

"Perfect. I can walk to work," Ratcliff said.

Asked the question many are asking — how will the city look in the next three to five years? — Ratcliff said he thought a corps of die-hards, many without children, would form a base of rebuilders in a somewhat smaller city.

"It's a transient city anyway, but the hard-cores are going to be back. All my friends are coming back. People with families and kids may not. I think the 25-to-40 crowd is going to make up the bulk of population," said Ratcliff, who is single. "These people are realizing they're spoiled on New Orleans. It took me three or four weeks out of town to realize I couldn't live anywhere else."

Race, class issues

A Napoleon Avenue couple, both doctors, inspected their spacious home near the corner of Saratoga Street.

"We think the city's going to be great," said Dawn Galliano, as she worked with her husband Dante, inspecting the moderate looting and water damage.

Asked why, she hesitated. "I don't want to say," she said.

Dante put the matter diplomatically, but his message was clear: fewer poor people.

"I think there's going to be so much business development in the lower economic areas, in the project areas," he said.

Near Napoleon Avenue and Magazine Street, Walter Marschner of Jefferson Parish Appraisal Service made a stop at one of the many homes he has inspected for damage. He speculated that the city would lose both rich and poor people, but ultimately come out more of a middle-class town ñ a good thing, he said.

Blessed - "ADJECTIVE: highly favored or fortunate; characterized by happiness and good fortune."

Prior to Hurricane Katrina, "blessed" was an often used word. Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.

Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. This is a very limited opportunity, and availability is restricted.

We have employment opportunities available in the Sales Department, including management availabilities.

Sales Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 5pm
Service Hours: Mon - Fri 7:30am - 6pm • Sat 7:30-4

We are committed to rebuilding Jefferson Parish and Southeast Louisiana. We need your support. Together, we will prevail and have a better place to live and work than before Hurricane Katrina.

As you read this, Ray Brandt Toyota, its employees and families, and the residents of Southeast Louisiana all have something in common; we are truly "blessed".

FUTURE, from A-4

"What I'm hearing is that a lot of people aren't coming back," he said. "We have a lot of people at the bottom of the barrel, attending New Orleans public schools, on welfare. They have nothing going for them. A lot of these people have been transported to Dallas and Houston and Shreveport and all over. What they're finding there is that you can buy a 1,000-square-foot house (in Shreveport) for $40,000, that there are better schools, and that people are welcoming them in."

Marschner said he thinks poor New Orleanians who have been dispersed to other places may help both themselves and the city.

"This may sound mean and rotten, but if we can get rid of 100,000 of the lower class that are takers and not givers to the community, we'll be much better off," said Marschner, who is white. "That might sound racist, but I don't mean it that way."

To some, such comments do indeed sound racist.

Stan "Pampy" Barre, the African-American restaurateur and indicted political operative, expressed outrage at published comments from Regional Transit Authority Chairman James Reiss. Reiss, who is white, told the Wall Street Journal that New Orleans needs to tackle its problems of crime and poverty.

"Those who want to see this city rebuilt want to see it done in a completely different way: demographically, geographically and politically," Reiss told the newspaper. "The way we've been living is not going to happen again, or we're out."

Barre invited Reiss, who declined to comment further, to make good on his pledge to leave.

Barre interprets Reiss' comment to mean that he "doesn't want to redevelop those areas of the city that have a heavily black population. But that's what makes New Orleans (what it is)," Barre said.

He brushed off the notion that poor, black New Orleanians would be better off living elsewhere simply because they have not historically prospered here.

"That may be true in some instances," he said. "But what black people are going to miss about New Orleans, they're going to miss their mommas living right down the street, red beans and rice on Monday, Mardi Gras and JazzFest.

"There's a lot of people that want to come back, but that's going to be impossible unless they have a good plan and they don't price them out of the (housing) market," Barre said. "I wish I had the answers."

Even a New Orleans fixture such as Barre can't yet set up a new restaurant to replace Pampy's, the popular 7th Ward meeting ground for the city's movers and shakers. In the meantime, he's considering opening a place in Baton Rouge.

Opinions on the desired demographic and landscape of a new New Orleans do not break neatly along lines of race. Nor do the prospects for repopulating the many areas of the city inundated by floodwaters. Along with speculation on how many impoverished African-Americans might return to neighborhoods such as the Lower 9th Ward comes speculation about the degree to which affluent and mostly white areas such as Lakeview will lure its residents back. An even bigger question mark hangs over the mostly white and working-class parish of St. Bernard, which was clobbered by flooding and storm surge and will be among the most difficult and expensive to protect from further storms.

Ratcliff, who is white, was as incensed as Barre by the notion that the storm was a blessing because it might run poor blacks permanently out of town, a sentiment he said he heard frequently in Arkansas.

"That really pisses me off," he said. "Those are the same poor blacks that I rode the bus with last winter on my way to work, the people I talked about the Saints with . . . They're part of our culture: the second-lines and the Mardi Gras Indians. You can't just eliminate parts of society. Like me, some of my biggest flaws make up who I am."

Hope Manasek, a 41-year-old white woman, fretted that New Orleans would soon become a "Disneyland for Houstonians." Losing a large percentage of poor New Orleanians would ruin the town, she said.

"I've always seen New Orleans as a poor black town ñ a completely free place, not like the rest of America, a place with totally different values, food, music, attitude, a place where people came to escape their empty lives," she said, sipping a beer at Molly's at the Market in the French Quarter, which quickly reopened after the storm. "No matter how weird you are in your hometown, nobody looks twice at you here."

Molly's proprietor Jim Monaghan Jr., an outspoken French Quarter resident in the model of his father who started the bar, attacked the assertion that poverty ñ regardless of race ñis integral to the city's culture and heritage.

"I don't know what there is about poverty that's funky and flavorful ñ the city's still going to have a soul," he said.

Looking for change

Amid the wide array of opinions on the city's probable future, those returning this week seemed to agree on a few key points, particularly that homes should be rebuilt to replicate the architecture that makes the city famous and livable. If shotgun houses are bulldozed in the Lower 9th Ward, shotgun houses should be built in their place, they said, provided the deluged low-lying area doesn't simply become a spillway or part of an improved flood-protection system, as some have recommended.

More importantly, those interviewed said, the city's political fiefdoms must go.

"The thing I thought of most in the last few weeks is how angry I am" at the city's inability to prepare for or respond to the storm, said Cheron Brylski, a veteran political operative and public relations specialist. "This really showed how inept our government structure is. . . . The political landscape is going to change significantly. You're going to see some new faces."

But putting in new leaders will be fruitless unless residents force change in the political culture, the cronyism and the patronage, Brylski said.

"Local neighborhood leaders have been ignored for so long," Brylski said. "People at some point just stopped participating. We've seen dropping voter turnout."

Brylski said she doesn't believe the national articles she's read speculating that New Orleans will become an "Uptown, white-only" enclave. The city's diversity will survive, she said, because people of all classes and races know instinctively that New Orleans won't be New Orleans without it.

The owners of Praline Connection, the popular Creole restaurant on Frenchmen Street in the Faubourg Marigny, aren't so sure. As Curtis Moore and Cecil Kaigler, both African-Americans, worked to repair their commissary near the restaurant Friday, they also fumed at government leaders for their failure to put New Orleanians ñ particularly poor black New Orleanians ñ first in line for clean-up and repair jobs.

"You need the people back ñ and they need to be working. We've got Hondurans and Mexicans down here working while New Orleanians are just sitting out of town in shelters," said Curtis Moore. "I think the city can come back strong, but only if all the money that's coming down here is applied fairly and justly. If it just makes the rich richer, it's not going to work."

Moore's vision of the new New Orleans disturbs him. "It'll be a majority white town. Most black people are renting, and their landlords are white. If the prices go sky high, they're not going to be able to afford to come back. We'll have less black people, and that's sad. . . . New Orleans will definitely lose some of the flavor and culture. It won't be the gumbo town; it'll be more like the white bean."

Monaghan said he plans to turn the Quarter and the Marigny into a base for political agitation. He launched his effort Friday with a town hall meeting called, "What is the future of the French Quarter?"

Monaghan said he had teamed up with Harry Anderson, the magician and former star of television's "Night Court," who recently opened up a magic club on Decatur Street. They hope to mobilize residents to demand change at City Hall.

"We want to light a fire under people's asses," he said. "We're looking for a friendlier City Hall ñ no more snarling people over there who won't even answer a simple question, no more nasty meter maids and bus drivers. . . . This is our city."

REBUILDING, from A-1

"Getting a real answer on anything is very difficult at this point," Terry said. People want the rebuilding process to get going, he said, but "we don't even know when it's going to start."

State Rep. Peppi Bruneau, whose Lakeview home was destroyed, said he's just as stymied as his neighbors by the lack of information. Like them, he wants to know whether the land will be elevated, whether new houses will have to be built on piers, and whether the levee system will be sufficient to prevent another wipe-out.

"You're now finding out how little information we have been able to get out of city government," Bruneau said. "Ask one of the councilmen and you're going to get the same answer. You're not getting any information from the mayor's office. I know he's inundated; I'm not blaming him. But these are executive decisions."

To some extent, the questions posed by Terry and others in his predicament can't yet be answered. Local officials are just beginning to grapple with the challenges posed by rebuilding the most devastated parts of the city, ranging from Lakeview to the Lower 9th Ward to St. Bernard Parish.

They must decide whether it's wiser to rebuild in flood-prone areas or whether it makes more sense to turn some areas into green space. In areas in which rebuilding is certain, they'll have to decide what kind of flood protection they want.

Will planners write new building codes, similar to those in coastal areas of Florida, that require homes to be more hurricane proof? Will they bring in tons of dirt aimed at raising the elevations of certain neighborhoods, or require building materials that are less prone to flood damage, such as concrete?

No matter what local officials decide, most homeowners whose properties sustained heavy flood damage will be forced to meet current building requirements for the first time. Thousands of homes will have to be raised or torn down and rebuilt at higher elevations in order to meet zoning codes that were first created in the early 1970s – well after most properties in the area were erected.

Federal officials say the magnitude of the rebuilding process may actually work in the city's behalf.

"One of the concerns we always have after is a flood is people rush in to rebuild," FEMA spokesman Ed Pasterick said. "And in a lot of cases, the community doesn't grab hold of the process like they should. But if you have a larger event, you are much more conscious of limiting the damage next time. That is certainly going to happen in New Orleans."

New regulations

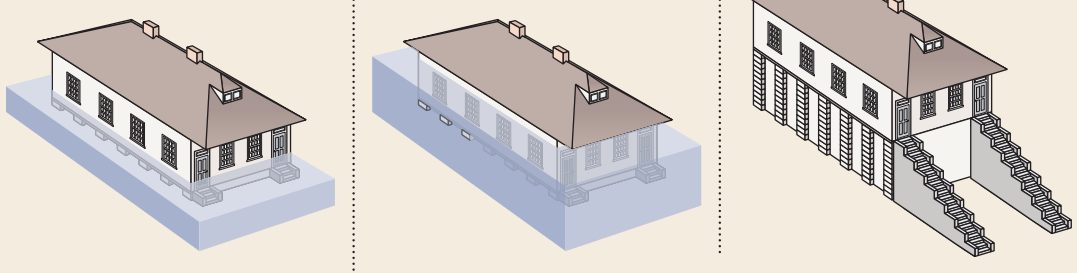
Like communities all across the United States, New Orleans passed laws in the 1970s requiring new homes to be at or above the level designated on the federal flood maps. But the older homes that dominate the cityscape were exempted from the new requirements.

Katrina has changed all that.

Any house that sustained damage estimated at 50 percent or more of its value will have to be brought into compliance with the rules or face much higher premiums, FEMA spokesman Ed Pasterick said. It will be up to local building inspectors, who may receive advice from the feds, to make those calls.



A homeowner who rebuilds in violation of the floodplain maps might pay more than $2,000 a year for a policy that used to cost $350, officials said. Local communities that fail to enforce the rules can also face sanctions from FEMA.

Huge numbers of homeowners will be forced to come into compliance with the stricter elevation standards. Of 256,000 homes covered by federal flood insurance in the seven-parish metropolitan area, more than 155,000 stand at elevations that are too low to protect them from a 100-year-flood, according to data supplied by FEMA's National Flood Insurance Program.

HIGH SOCIETY

If the cost to repair your flood-damaged home is less than 50 percent of the property's market value, you can repair or rebuild it at the current elevation.

If the cost to repair your flood-damaged home is 50 percent or more of the property's market value, you must either raise it or tear it down and rebuild at the elevation level currently required for new construction in your neighborhood. Depending on the neighborhood, this can be as much as 10 feet higher than your current elevation.

STAFF GRAPHIC BY EMMETT MAYER III

While no one knows exactly how many properties were flooded in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, about 140,000 flood claims had been filed in Louisiana even before Rita, Pasterick said, mostly in and around New Orleans.

And that number doesn't account for the thousands of homes that lack flood insurance. Overall, federal officials estimate that only about 41 percent of the homes in the metropolitan area carry flood protection, despite the area's propensity to flood.

According to Phil Huffman of the Homebuilders Association of Greater New Orleans, Katrina damaged a total of 360,000 homes in the New Orleans area, of which half may need to be totally rebuilt. How much money homeowners will receive is an open question: The maximum flood payout under federal rules is $250,000, a cause of consternation for owners of houses that would cost more than that to replace.

U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal said he expects a consensus will form by next week on a legislative initiative to assist homeowners whose losses are greater than the coverage provided by their flood insurance or their private insurer. With so much wealth lost so suddenly, Jindal is concerned that the extensive home damage will result in a raft of bankruptcies. There might be a way for insurers along with the federal and state governments to share the responsibility, he said.

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Charles Foti is looking into a lawsuit against insurance companies to force them to cover flood damages, much as Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood did two weeks after Katrina. But Foti is hoping a solution can be found that would avert a costly and time-consuming lawsuit, his spokeswoman said.

Though many homeowners now feel they're getting the short end of the stick, Pasterick said many have actually paid unrealistically cheap flood premiums for years because their properties were grandfathered. Most local communities didn't impose elevation requirements on new home construction until the early 1970s.

Damaged, but not destroyed

Those whose homes were damaged but not destroyed by floodwaters will have other options, although houses that incurred substantial damage will have to be raised above the flood plain.

Take the case of David Cressy, Mandeville's city attorney. Cressy's 140-year-old home on the lakefront was inundated with 5 feet of water from Katrina's storm surge, making it uninhabitable. Many of Cressy's neighbors with homes on 10-foot stilts fared much better.

"They lost some stuff, but not their house,'' Cressy said. "That's what convinced me that I've got to raise mine."

Doing so will be expensive: Cressy will have to raise his floor levels by 11 feet. So far, the cheapest estimate he's gotten is $50,000, and that didn't include a foundation, which he hopes to add.

"It's probably going to cost me $100,000," Cressy said. "But I'm going to do it. I'm not going through this again. This is crazy."

Cressy won't have to pay the entire tab. Wayne Berggren, Mandeville's flood plain manager, said Cressy's is among 30 to 40 homes in Mandeville that qualify for a little-known benefit called "increased cost of compliance coverage" through their federal flood insurance policies.

Under the program, a property owner is eligible for up to $30,000 in grants if the cost to repair the home is 50 percent or more of the building's "pre-damage market value."

The money is not subject to the overall cap of $26,200 that covers other FEMA grants. However it is subject to the $250,000 maximum payout for structural damage under federal flood insurance. Most homes have less coverage.

In the New Orleans area, the government will probably wind up handing out more than $1 billion in such grants, based on The Times-Picayune's analysis of flood-policy data.

'Beyond repair' subjective

The projection that up to half of the 360,000 homes damaged in the New Orleans area will have to be totally rebuilt raises the specter of wholesale demolitions, a specter that concerns New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin.

"Most of the experts are telling us that any house that was in flood waters for a couple of weeks where the water was above their (electrical) outlets, is probably a property that is going to be very difficult to renovate," New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said. "All I know is that in some areas, houses will be demolished in significant numbers."

But not without the owner being fully in the loop. "There's this myth out there that we will start these demolitions en masse before people get a chance to assess and weigh in. We won't do that," Nagin said.

Preservationists fear a rush to judgment, with homes, including some in historic areas, getting torn down without much review.

"We get concerned when we read that there seems to be an assumption that the slate will be wiped clean in many areas," said Stephanie Bruno, director of the Preservation Resource Center's Operation Comeback. "That sounds like the kind of approach they're taking. Our approach would be more of a case-by-case basis."

Bruno said many homes that are heavily damaged can be fixed.

"The term 'beyond repair' is very subjective," she said. "Even buildings that are structurally compromised can be repaired if there's a will to do that."

Meg Lousteau of the Louisiana Landmarks Society echoed Bruno's comments after touring parts of the city. "From what I saw, except for buildings that had actually collapsed, I haven't seen a single building that needs to be torn down," she said.

Even structures that are choked with mold can be fixed, Lousteau said. "Mold can be dealt with without tearing down the whole structure, especially in older houses," she said. "I just hope people can get past the grossness of what they see when they first walk into their homes. It's going to be overwhelming and painful, but the truth is, the damage is superficial in a lot of cases. You can rip out the Sheetrock and the wiring."

Lousteau said she also worries that insurance adjusters may recommend demolition because of a belief that starting fresh will be cheaper.

Both Lousteau and Bruno were especially concerned about the future of the Holy Cross neighborhood, the section of the Lower 9th Ward that lies between the Mississippi River and St. Claude Avenue, which is designated as a historic district locally and nationally. While the area flooded badly, it drained quickly, they said, and most of the homes there are salvageable.

Bruno said the PRC will be offering its services to people looking to rebuild, or sell.

"We see ourselves helping to publicize tax breaks, loans and grants to help people see what's out there," she said. "And if they want to take their insurance check and move to Pennsylvania, helping them find a way of disposing of property and getting it into the hands of someone who does want to renovate."

Advisory panels

As thousands of individual homeowners try to figure out their next move, a free-spirited debate about how to rebuild the city and its environs on a big-picture level has already begun to develop.

Federal officials, ranging from FEMA leaders to U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso Jackson, have emphasized that most key decisions will be up to local officials.

Nagin on Friday named the 17 members of a blue-ribbon panel that will serve in an advisory role on rebuilding efforts. The City Council, not to be outdone, is establishing a similar body. And Gov. Kathleen Blanco has set up her own rebuilding team.

Jackson, of HUD, said he has encouraged the mayor to hold a "charette" led by architects, engineers and urban planners to brainstorm ideas for how to rebuild the city the right way.

In addition, a five-member panel appointed by the American Planning Association and contracted by FEMA will provide input. They include city planners from Fort Worth, Texas; Pittsburgh; Tampa, Fla.; and Chicago. Grover E. Mouton III, who teaches urban design at Tulane University, is the group's sole New Orleanian.

Yolanda Rodriguez, director of the City Planning Commission, said she expects her agency will take a lead role in making decisions using the recommendations turned in by the various groups.

One of FEMA's roles will be to help the community "understand that maybe some of the decisions that were made in the past are ones they don't want to make again," Pasterick said. "After every storm everybody revisits the wisdom of how things were built before. Maybe you're not going to rebuild in certain areas, or maybe there are some areas you won't want to develop again and turn into park land. But those are all local decisions."

Even so, the feds will have a major role to play, because nearly all of the billions in aid pouring into the area comes from the federal government. Of particular importance will be the decisions on how levees and floodwalls are rebuilt. So far, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has pledged only to restore levees to their pre-Katrina size, designed to handle a Category 3 hurricane. But local officials are lobbying for floodwalls to withstand a Category 5 storm.

St. Bernard Parish is looking for similar help. Joey DiFatta, president of the St. Bernard Parish Council, said the parish has asked the Corps to raise levees there to 25 feet - 8 feet higher than they were when Katrina hit.

State Sen. Walter Boasso, R-Chalmette, said homeowners don't have the two keys they need to decide whether to start over in St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes.

"To talk about revitalization is useless until you know: Are our levees going to be properly done and secured? Are we going to be able to buy insurance that's affordable?" Boasso said. "This is the mixed message that we have to get straightened out. We're in limbo, because it all boils down to levees and insurance."

Gut-wrenching decisions

Experts and residents have already weighed in. Some said the massive task of rebuilding entire New Orleans neighborhoods would likely become the largest case study of its kind, with countless opportunities for triumphs and failures.

"This is the biggest planning challenge any of us is likely to have occur during our professional careers," said Rob Olshansky, a professor of urban planning at University of Illinois and an expert on rebuilding cities after natural disasters. "It's all there."

Some gut-wrenching decisions lie ahead.

"We have to look at the fact we have marshland and reclaimed lake bottoms that we built on, that we filled in," said City Councilwoman Cynthia Hedge Morrell, who represents Gentilly and parts of the Lakefront. "And we've got to evaluate how safe that's going to be. Maybe we shouldn't have built there?

"We have to face up to the fact that we're a coastal city. And we need to take a hard look at what they do in other places. We sit smack dab between Lake Pontchartrain and the Mississippi River and we build out homes on slabs. How stupid are we?"

Hedge Morrell noted, in comments echoed by fellow council members, that other communities ruined by hurricanes, such as Homestead, Fla., rebuilt intelligently.

"They knew it was wind damage that really hurt Homestead so they came up with a plan so houses built now, they have to tie the roofs into a cement wall," she said. "In our case, we have to look at what is actually the (elevation) level we need to rebuild on."

The city needs to give people clear instructions to keep them safe, Hedge Morrell said.

"We're going to tell you what the height has to be in terms of filling in," she said. "We're going to tell you what type of materials you have to use, because evidently the structures we had let people build in that area on slabs couldn't handle what happened."

Kristina Ford, director of the city planning commission from 1992 to 2000 and now a professor of environmental studies at Bowdoin College, said decision-makers should consider radical ideas for resurrecting demolished areas, including ones that were unthinkable before Katrina.

For example, she said residents from the Lower 9th Ward perhaps could be relocated to one of the city's higher ridges. Their old neighborhood could be used in a way that doesn't put lives at risk, as headquarters for the public works department or as a place to store buses and other rolling stock that can be moved to higher ground ahead of a storm.

Once leaders decide whether to relocate or fill in parts of the city, Ford doesn't doubt that smart developers will surface with design proposals to replicate the "jumble" of styles present in most city neighborhoods.

"I see houses that are maintained to different degrees, I see gardens that are maintained to different degrees," Ford said of her mind's-eye view of New Orleans. "One of the things that I would look for would be a design that very quickly would reveal individual enthusiasm of individual residents. ... Anything monolithic can, if it's designed well, look less monolithic."

Bruneau said nobody in Lakeview would sit by while developers built "condo world." While he wouldn't support mandatory style codes, Bruneau believes that individual owners would each rebuild their own piece of the hodgepodge of bungalows, ranch houses, "McMansions" and townhouses that filled the neighborhood.

"How do we rebuild a city that is so complicated, and interestingly so?" Ford said. "There will be an impulse to do this completely rationally, then we'll end up with something that has none of New Orleans' quality. One of the charms of New Orleans was the irrationality."

Rebuilding takes time

While Katrina's swath of devastation is unprecedented in modern American history, the experiences of other communities after disasters could be instructive – for instance, the flood that swamped Tulsa, Okla., in 1984.

After the flood, which killed 14 people and inundated 6,800 homes and businesses, the city earned a 40 percent discount on flood insurance for its residents by taking aggressive action to limit future damage.

After completing more than $100 million in flood mitigation projects, Tulsa became the first – and only – city to earn a Class 2 rating under the government's Community Rating System. The measures included the acquisition of more than 1,000 flood-prone properties and the preservation of more than a quarter of the city's flood plain as green space.

By contrast, New Orleans is a Class 8 community, which entitles its residents to a 10 percent discount on flood insurance. The highest ratings in Louisiana are in Jefferson and East Baton Rouge parishes, which have a "7" rating, earning residents there a 15 percent discount.

A disaster more comparable to Katrina was the earthquake that leveled Kobe, Japan, in 1994, destroying 150,000 homes and damaging another 450,000. Olshansky, who just completed a yearlong study of it and other post-disaster rebuilding projects, said officials there used all sorts of programs to jumpstart public and private developments in a 10-year reconstruction. One key was to build temporary housing close to the city for the 310,000 people in emergency shelters — something New Orleans hasn't yet pulled off.

"If you want to rebuild New Orleans, you've got to get those people back there," he said.

Olshansky said New Orleans could benefit from hiring professional planners to advocate for each neighborhood, as Kobe did to ensure that displaced residents would return to a neighborhood that fit their needs.

New Orleanians should also prepare for the depression Kobe residents encountered well into reconstructing their city, Olshansky said.

"For a couple of years it seems hopeless and it seems like it's never going to end," he said. "The project just seems overwhelming, but they got through it, and other places got through it. ... A year from now, things are going to look really bad and, 'It's a year later,' and 'Oh my God, we haven't gotten anything done.' It's going to take a long time."

Leverne and Elwood Fleming of eastern New Orleans know they'll have to be in for a long haul if they want to get back to their old life on Trapier Avenue, where they worked, lived and socialized.

"I would like to see them do something to rebuild the east; I just don't know what kind of timeline they have," Leverne Fleming said after seeing their ruined home covered in mildew and mud. "I don't know how long we can wait this out, because sooner or later we're going to have to make a decision."

Terry faces the same frustrating wait as he and his family hold off on rebuilding their Lakeview townhouse while the future of the city is debated. He said he hopes the process doesn't stretch on so long that his family has to make a permanent home hundreds of miles from Lakeview.

"I've thought about living elsewhere to a degree, I have, but would I want to?" Terry said. "My wife and I discuss it, our way of life. I want it back. I love Natchitoches to death, but it's not home."

MAYOR DISCUSSES HOW TO REBUILD

Late last week, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin talked about the challenges and risks he sees ahead as New Orleans recovers from Hurricane Katrina.

HOW DOES THE CITY GO ABOUT REBUILDING ITS HOUSING STOCK?

Nagin: The first thing we need to do is let people go in and see their homes and at least help us to decide the next steps. The second thing we need to do is find out from the Corps of Engineers what they are going to do with the levee system. It's my understanding they're going to build it back up to withstand at least a Category 3 by June of next year, and then from there they're probably going to a Category 5. Once that's complete or on a simultaneous track, we're going to try and figure out what do we need to build, how do we need to build: Should houses be two stories, three stories, garages on the bottom – we just haven't gotten that far.

SO SOME AREAS MIGHT LOOK STARKLY DIFFERENT?

Nagin: I think they will. Most of the experts are telling us that any house that was in floodwaters for a couple of weeks, with water above their (electrical) outlets, is probably a property that is going to be very difficult to renovate.

WILL SLAB HOUSES BE OUT OF THE QUESTION?

Nagin: I don't know. A lot of it is going to depend on the levee system. There are new designs for homes – I've done a little research. You can build concrete homes that are not as susceptible to being totally demolished after a storm like that. We're going to look at all those options.

BUILDING HOUSES WELL ABOVE THE GROUND IS A POSSIBILITY?

Nagin: It is definitely a possibility. The issue is can it be wind-resistant or not. In some cities – Charlotte or one of those – for high-rise apartments they build the first six floors strictly as garages, and then everything else is above it.

WHAT ABOUT INDIVIDUAL RESIDENCES?

Nagin: Residences are going to be a little tougher. I'm almost certain we're going to go to a standard of multilevel residences to make sure there is enough safety in case the floodwaters rise again. But that's where we're going to get the Urban Land Institute, the American Association of Architects, the Brookings Institute, all those folks to help us figure this out.

IS IT TOO SOON TO SAY SOME AREAS WILL NOT BE RESETTLED?

Nagin: All I know is that in some areas, houses will be demolished in significant numbers. Then we will figure out what we need to rebuild and how we do it. That's why I want to get this commission going so we can get some structure around how we do this.

THIS MAY BE ONE OF THEIR MOST IMPORTANT TASKS?

Nagin: It is, it is. It's all about neighborhood design and making this one of the most livable cities in the world – while maintaining the uniqueness of New Orleans.

Incentives may cause, not alleviate, woes

Federal aid could give evacuees false sense of security

By Jim Barnett
Newhouse News Service

Tuan Nguyen takes a break from cleaning out his brother's hardware store Saturday in Biloxi, Miss., more than a month after Hurricane Katrina heavily damaged it.

WASHINGTON — Americans depend on government to protect them from disasters. But after the toll taken by hurricanes Katrina and Rita, some policymakers ask whether government hasn't instead enticed people into living, working and playing in dangerous places.

The problem isn't limited to hurricane-battered coastal areas, they say. Across the nation, people build homes and businesses near forests, riverbanks and other high-risk locales, largely because federal agencies provide infrastructure and financial help.

While in the 1800s government gave settlers land to encourage development, modern-day incentives include wildfire-prevention, flood-control and beach-improvement projects. Financial bonuses such as subsidized flood insurance and tax deductions also lure people into harm's way.

"In a sense, we are giving people a false sense of security that we can protect them," said Mike Dombeck, chief of the U.S. Forest Service during the Clinton administration. "The reality is that these natural forces are much bigger than we are."

The unintended result is a landscape of disasters waiting to happen: million-dollar bungalows on hurricane-battered Atlantic beachfronts, malls and suburbs in Midwestern floodplains and resort homes built at the edge of tinder-dry forests throughout the West.

With the federal contribution to recovery from Katrina estimated at $100 billion or more, some in Congress are calling for new scrutiny of federal policies that can feed a cycle of development, devastation and reconstruction.

"It's amazing how it has suddenly dawned on people that we can't keep doing things the same way," said Rep. Earl Blumenauer, D-Ore. "I have found that this has moved up on the radar screen for a wide range of people."

Indeed, New Orleans residents knew long before Katrina hit that they lived in a risky place. But they also had put their faith in probabilities: A storm big enough to breach the lowest levees protecting the city would occur only once in 200 years, the Army Corps of Engineers had calculated.

Odds deceiving

If anything, Katrina proved that odds can be deceiving, Don Sweeney, a retired corps economist, said. Many people fail to realize that a once-in-200-year storm is as likely to happen in the first year as in the 200th, he said.

Nevertheless, Sweeney and other critics said, growing numbers of people and businesses choose to play the odds — and do so with the tacit encouragement of federal, state and local governments.

A glaring example is cropping up in the St. Louis suburb of Chesterfield, Sweeney said. After floods in 1993, the corps began upgrading surrounding levees. The town followed with new water and sewer lines, which in turn allowed for construction of a strip mall.

Another flood will come, he said. The only question is when.

"It's a hard thing for people to wrap their minds around what these probability numbers mean," said Sweeney, now a professor at the University of Missouri St. Louis. "If you wait long enough, you are certain to have a disaster."

The National Flood Insurance Program has been a perennial target for criticism because until last year, it allowed owners to file unlimited numbers of claims for recurring damage on the same property. Many rebuild bigger and better than before.

"It has made it safe to build in high-risk areas, and it has increased the intensification of building at the coast," said Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense, an advocacy group in Washington.

An analysis of flood-insurance coverage by Newhouse News Service supports Ellis' claim. The average amount of coverage per policy nearly doubled in constant dollars between 1978 and 2002, with coastal states such as North Carolina and Florida leading the way, the analysis found.

Many incentives

Meanwhile, other incentives have encouraged people to build homes and businesses where they chance wildfires and droughts. Consider:

▶The 2003 Healthy Forests Restoration Act authorizes $760 million a year to thin fire-prone forests, with at least half going to protect residential areas. But without strict local planning ordinances, the spending will encourage further suburban sprawl, critics said.

"It's an ever-expanding circle," said Roger Kennedy, a former director of the National Park Service who is writing a book about government subsidies and their effect on development. "Until we focus on making the existing settlements safe and cease subsidizing extension into danger, we will not be saving people's lives."

▶Crop subsidies pose an indirect threat to growing communities in arid regions because they encourage farmers to irrigate with water pumped from underground aquifers, Don Wilhite, a climatologist at the University of Nebraska, said. The result is a lower water table that jeopardizes all users.

"All of a sudden, streams become intermittent, reservoirs don't fill," Wilhite said. "People are starting to figure this out."

▶Income tax laws also encourage risky development, said Ellis of the taxpayer group. Homeowners can deduct mortgage interest on second homes, often built near coastlines, forests, mountains and other vulnerable places.

While the threat of hurricanes is well known to beachgoers, mountain dwellers may face a hidden threat of mudslides because few alluvial fan floodplains have been mapped by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Congress previously has taken steps to limit federal subsidies to risky development. But change hasn't come easily.

The 1982 Coastal Barrier Resources Act designated undeveloped areas on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts to be "ineligible for direct or indirect federal financial assistance that might support development," according to the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

The impact can be seen on barrier islands where rows of houses and condominiums end abruptly, Ellis said. But since passage, individual congressmen have sought out loopholes in the law or used it to justify further federal aid to populated coastal areas.

Last year, Blumenauer won passage of a law to limit federal liability for properties that have been flooded repeatedly. But the measure took five years to work its way through Congress, and was scaled back after Rep. Billy Tauzin, R-La., called it "an assault on the culture of South Louisiana."

Blumenauer said pressure to develop coastlines and other risky areas will mount as the U.S. population grows and becomes more affluent. But he says he is optimistic that Congress will learn from past mistakes as it pays for recovery from Katrina and Rita.

"There's chance to do this thing right," Blumenauer said. "I think people get it."

French musicians, schools eligible for special aid

Some to be given money to tour France

From staff reports

Jazz artists, Cajun musicians and schools that emphasize French language and culture will be eligible for assistance from a special Katrina relief fund, the French ambassador to the United States announced Saturday during a visit to New Orleans.

Jean-David Levitte said the Louisiana Foundation would receive an initial donation of $50,000 that could be released directly to French schools in New Orleans and Cajun parishes with French-speaking populations.

Eligible New Orleans schools include the International School of Louisiana, Audubon Montessori School and Ecole Bilingue.

The assistance also targets jazz and Cajun musicians displaced by Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita.

Levitte said a panel in Paris will draft a list of Louisiana musicians who will be given transportation and living expenses to tour France from November through January. The benefit concerts would be scheduled to wrap up in time for the musicians to return for Mardi Gras in February.

"This city is based on the economy of tourists," Levitte said from a bench behind the Old Ursuline Convent in the French Quarter. "The musicians now are out of work. If we don't do something, in six months' time they will be gone for good."

Levitte said private French companies have sent an estimated $14.2 million in assistance to Katrina victims.

Call police only for emergency

St. Tammany is swamped with calls

St. Tammany bureau

Don't call us unless it's an emergency.

That's the plea from the St. Tammany Parish Sheriff's Office because dispatchers are being deluged by residents calling for all types of disaster-related information that law enforcement does not have.

As recovery efforts from hurricanes Katrina and Rita have intensified in recent days, emergency dispatchers are being overwhelmed by non-law enforcement calls, Sheriff's Office spokesman James Hartman said Friday.

"We don't have details on how to apply for FEMA assistance or how to contact the Red Cross or the Army Corps of Engineers or any other public or private relief agencies," Hartman said.

Non-emergency calls to the Sheriff's Office dispatchers have increased so significantly that it endangers response time to genuine emergencies or crime incidents.

Officials for police departments in Mandeville, Covington and Slidell said they, too, are receiving large numbers of calls for information on their non-emergency lines and they're often for information that police don't know.

"We are urging our citizens to limit calls to just those that involve law enforcement response," Hartman said. "We want to be able to respond quickly to an emergency but if our lines are continuing to be clogged with non-law enforcement requests for information, we are risking a slower response."

Bombings kill at least 22 in Indonesia

President had warned of terror attacks

By Wahjoe Boediwardhana
Associated Press writer

BALI, INDONESIA — At least two bombs exploded almost simultaneously Saturday in tourist areas of the Indonesian resort island of Bali, killing at least 22 people and wounding about 50 others, officials said. The blasts came a month after Indonesia's president warned of possible terrorist attacks.

The wounded included at least two Americans.

The blasts at two packed seafood restaurants in Jimbaran beach and a bustling outdoor shopping center in downtown Kuta were the work of terrorists, Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono said. He also warned that more attacks were possible.

"We will hunt down the perpetrators and bring them to justice," he said after being briefed by top security officials. He also urged people to be alert.

The attacks occurred nearly three years to the day after bombings in Kuta that killed 202 people, mostly foreigners. Those attacks, and subsequent deadly bombings in 2003 and 2004, were blamed on the terrorist group Jemaah Islamiyah, which as been linked to al-Qaida.

Western and Indonesian intelligence agencies have consistently warned that the group was plotting more attacks. Last month, Yudhoyono said he was especially worried the extremist network was about to carry out more attacks.

"I received information at the time that terrorists were planning an action in Jakarta and that explosives were ready," he said late Saturday.

Vice President Yusuf Kalla told the British Broadcasting Corp. it was too soon to identify the bombers. He said Yudhoyono would visit the area today.

Putu Putra Wisada, spokesman at the Sangla Hospital in the capital, Denpasar, said 11 dead were taken to the hospital and 38 other people were admitted with injuries: 28 Indonesians, eight Australians and two Americans.

Officials at the Graha Asih Hospital close to Jimbaran Bay said at least 11 bodies were in its morgue, and doctors were treating about a dozen people.

"It's a horrible scene," said a receptionist, Komang.

Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer told the Australian Broadcasting Corp. early today that at least one Australian was killed. Metro TV said a Japanese national also was killed.

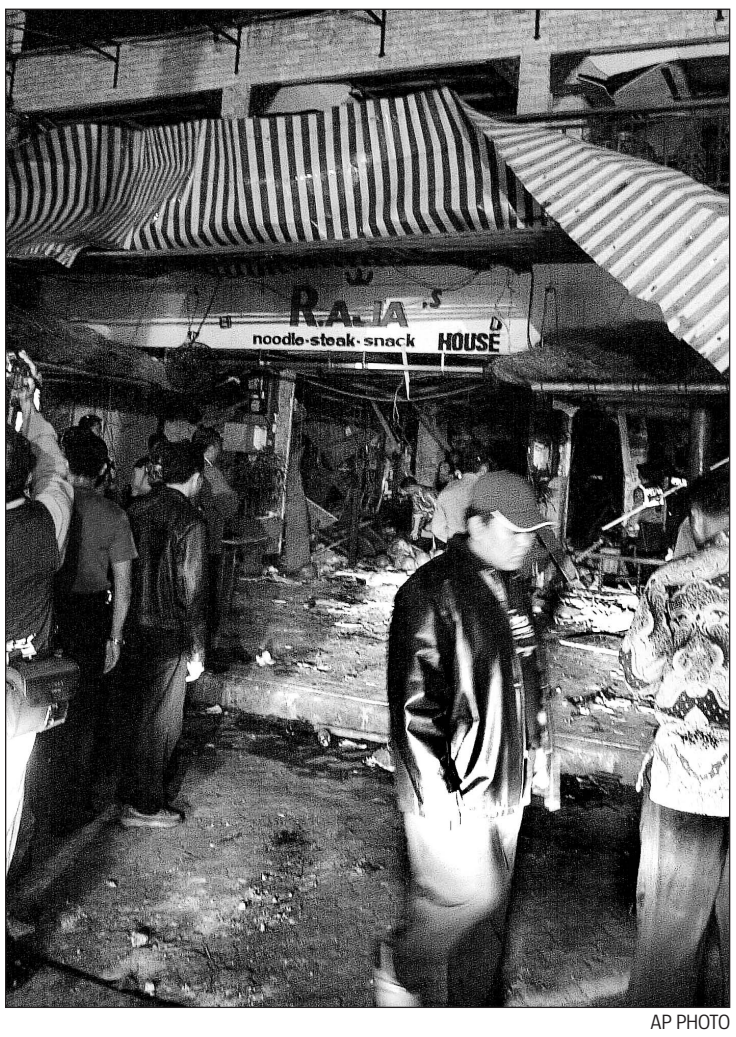
The bombs went off at about 7:30 p.m. at three restaurants packed with foreign and Indonesian diners.

I Wayan Kresna said he witnessed the first bomb at a seafood restaurant on Jimbaran beach. He counted at least two dead and said many others were brought to a hospital.

"I helped lift up the bodies," he told the private El Shinta radio station. "There was blood everywhere."

Baradita Katoppo, an Indonesian tourist from Jakarta, said another bomb went off in the Nyoman Cafe, where he was eating dinner with friends.

"I could see other people sustained injuries," he said. "There was blood on their faces and their bodies. It was very chaotic and confusing. We didn't know what to do."



About 18 miles away in Kuta, an explosion hit the three-story Raja noodle and steakhouse in a bustling outdoor shopping center. Smoke poured from the badly damaged building.

The bomb apparently went off on the restaurant's second floor, and an Associated Press reporter saw at least three bodies and five wounded people there. There was no crater outside the building, indicating the blast was not caused by a car bomb.

The area includes a KFC fast-food restaurant, clothing stores and a tourist information center.

The exact number of blasts was not clear. Some witnesses said they heard at least two explosions at each location.

Since the Oct. 12, 2002, Bali blasts, Jemaah Islamiyah has been tied to at least two other bombings in Indonesia, both in the capital, Jakarta. Those blasts, one at the J.W. Marriott hotel in 2003 and the other outside the Australian Embassy in 2004, killed at least 23 people.

AP PHOTO

At least 22 people were killed and about 50 wounded when two bombs exploded simultaneously Saturday in tourist areas of the Indonesian resort island of Bali. The blasts at two packed seafood restaurants and an outdoor shopping center in downtown Kuta 'were clearly the work of terrorists,' Maj. Gen. Police Ansyaad Mbai, a top Indonesian anti-terrorism official, said.

U.S. soldier, Afghan killed in rebel attack

American death toll 198 in Afghanistan

By The Associated Press

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — A U.S. soldier and an Afghan soldier have been killed in an attack in southern Afghanistan, the U.S. military said Saturday.

The small-arms and rocket-propelled grenade attack on Friday also wounded another U.S. soldier and two Afghan National Army troops during combat operations north of the city of Kandahar, the military said.

The three wounded soldiers were taken to a nearby forward operating base for treatment, according to a statement from the main U.S. base at Bagram, north of the capital Kabul.

The American's death brought to 198 the number of U.S. service members killed in and around Afghanistan since the 2001 campaign that drove the hard-line Taliban from power.

Violence blamed on Taliban insurgents has escalated this year, with more than 1,300 people killed during the past seven months, including hundreds of rebels. Most of the fighting has been in volatile southern and eastern Afghanistan, where U.S.-led coalition forces operate.

Lakeview residents feel shut out by city

Few officials show up at a rally near 17th St. Canal

By Meghan Gordon
Staff writer

As they stood in a Metairie parking lot no more than a block from the 17th Street Canal, hundreds of displaced Lakeview residents vented their frustration Saturday that they were still shut out of their neighborhood and felt shut out of plans for its future.

Cherie Melancon France, 28, a stay-at-home mother, organized the gathering dubbed "Back to the Breach" after weeks of messaging fellow Lakeview evacuees on the Internet. She said they wanted to demand access to their likely ruined homes and to hear from city officials involved in preliminary rebuilding discussions.

Since France set the meeting, Mayor Ray Nagin announced that Lakeview residents could make look-and-leave trips to their homes Wednesday to Friday.

Arthur France, 32, opened the grassroots gathering by cautioning the estimated 400-person crowd outside Heritage Plaza that he and his wife didn't call the meeting to touch off a storming of the checkpoint on Veterans Memorial Boulevard. But he said he hoped their presence would make city officials reconsider their plans to turn his neighbors away for several more days.

Only a few moments into the half-hour event, the audience of evacuees – many on edge from weeks of bouncing from city to city – were quick to point out the meeting's glitches. They shouted that they couldn't hear the karaoke machine speaker from the back row, that the generator off to one side was too loud, and that they didn't see Councilman Jay Batt among the short list of speakers.

State Sen. Edwin Murray, the only public official to speak, asked the crowd to realize that he and other officials who represent Lakeview were working tirelessly and were in constant communication. He elicited applause when he said Lakeview residents should have been allowed back in already, especially considering St. Bernard Parish residents were allowed to drive through Orleans and Jefferson parishes on the way to their oil- and mud-soaked streets.

"I wish I had more to tell you," Murray said. "Just continue the work that you're doing."

Amanda Zirkenbach, Batt's aide, received a hostile response when she announced she was standing in for the councilman after Batt had a prior family commitment.

The crowd booed.

"OK …," she said, taken aback. "To tell you all the truth, he hasn't seen his wife and kids in three weeks, so that's where he is."

"Please," a woman shouted in frustration.

Zirkenbach rattled off the city's latest briefing on the status of Lakeview services, including that the first debris phase was complete, that no traffic signals were operating and no temporary stop signs had been erected. She said the city would announce another set of entry dates Wednesday.

Some in the audience grumbled afterward about the poor showing of public officials.

Nagin e-mailed the group last week to say he wouldn't attend the meeting, first saying that any gathering in Lakeview was unsafe. When organizers made clear that the meeting would be on the Metairie side of the 17th Street Canal, he wrote: "I am not interested in meeting in Metairie with New Orleans residents. If you want me there, find a location in New Orleans."

Elaine Eckols, 58, left the meeting miffed that she has to wait four more days to see her house on Gen. Diaz Street, and even then can't spend much time rescuing keepsakes from the muck and mold.

"What can we pull out in three days?" Eckols asked.

But Clinton Lee, 59, whose house at 6200 Bellair Drive is likely ruined, shrugged his shoulders and said he didn't expect to learn the answers to all of his questions Saturday.

"It was a pep rally, but I'll take it," Lee said. "At least it's something."

Thank You

We at Christwood, a continuing care retirement community, would like to express our deep appreciation to those who selflessly gave of themselves to help us during the ordeal of hurricane Katrina. The spirit of our community and our neighbors proved what the French Proverb says, "Adversity is the touchstone of friendship."

Our tireless staff was here 24 hours a day performing not only their own jobs but helping out wherever they were needed. Generous residents and family members pitched in, assisting with everything from serving breakfast to washing dishes, acting as greeters, vacuuming, sweeping the patios and much more.

As one Christwood resident was overheard saying, "I've never seen such dedication. We felt so safe."

Life Care Services LLC, our management company, not only brought in needed personnel from other communities, but also acted as our lifeline by providing diesel for our generators.

We were also touched by the help we received from those outside our community. Local drugstores made sure we had the supplies we needed, ordinary citizens offered assistance with equipment and the local Sheriff's Department provided a real sense of security. We even had a ham radio operator who came to Christwood and volunteered to be our link to the outside world.

We are keenly mindful of the suffering of our neighbors as the result of the recent storms, which increases our gratitude for being spared. At a time when our outlook could have been dark, our hearts were lightened by the overwhelming generosity and hopeful spirit of those around us. Thank you all for your assistance and friendship.

I awoke this morning with devout thanksgiving for my friends…

Cars drive through street flooding in downtown Cabo San Lucas Saturday as the outer bands of Hurricane Otis approached the western coast of Mexico. Hundreds of families evacuated their homes in anticipation of its arrival today on the Baja California peninsula.

Mexican west coast bracing for Otis

Landfall of minimal storm expected today

By Jorge Barrera
Associated Press writer

CABO SAN LUCAS, MEXICO – Hurricane Otis's outer bands lashed the coast of western Mexico on Saturday as the storm crawled toward the Baja California peninsula, forcing hundreds of families to evacuate their homes and flooding roads in the resort city of Cabo San Lucas.

The Category 1 hurricane weakened but still had winds up to 85 mph as it headed northward off the coast of Baja. Forecasters expected Otis to skirt past Cabo San Lucas, and move ashore along a sparsely populated stretch of desert far north of there as early as this evening, according to the U.S. National Hurricane Center.

Narciso Agundez, governor of Baja California Sur state, ordered emergency personnel to the community of Comondu, as well as tourist-friendly Lorteo and Mulege, closer to where the center of Otis was likely to hit land. He asked soldiers to help evacuate the islands of Magdalena and Margarita, off the coast of Comondu.

Periods of strong winds and heavy rains were mixed with mostly sunny skies over Cabo San Lucas.

Calm prevailed in the hotel zones, but Mayor Luis Armando Diaz led voluntary evacuations from the city's poor outskirts, where many homes are little more than wood and metal shacks.

About 700 families had evacuated to shelters in Cabo San Lucas and that more than 200 families evacuated in San Jose del Cabo, a nearby tourist destination to the northeast. There were also small-scale evacuations in Miraflores and Santiago, slightly further north.

Mexico declared a state of emergency to help cope with heavy rains in five communities, including Cabo San Lucas.

A hurricane warning was in effect for much of the peninsula's Pacific Coast, from Agua Blanca north to Puerto San Andresito and officials issued a tropical storm watch further northward.

Extended forecasts showed the storm weakening as it moved across the sparsely populated Baja California peninsula, then bringing rains to parts of western Texas and southern Arizona by early next week.

Otis was the 15th Pacific storm of the season. Unlike powerful Atlantic storms such as Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, Pacific hurricanes tend to do less damage because they make landfall less frequently.

Like their Atlantic counterparts, Pacific storms are given names that correspond to the alphabet.

Also Saturday, the season's 20th tropical depression was drifting toward Mexico in the western Caribbean, prompting the government to issue tropical storm warnings for the Yucatan Peninsula.

The depression was centered 95 miles east of Tulum and about 95 miles southeast of Cozumel, according to the U.S. hurricane center. It was moving west at 6 mph.

The system had sustained winds of 30 mph, but could become a named tropical storm before making its expected landfall on the eastern Yucatan late Saturday or today, according to the center.

Killings of 14 dogs in St. Bernard investigated

Animals were left at schools by owners

By Manuel Torres
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

The St. Bernard Parish Sheriff's Office and state authorities are investigating the killings of 14 dogs found with shotgun and handgun wounds in two schools that flooded during Hurricane Katrina, officials said. The dogs, mostly pit bulls, were left in the schools by their owners, who evacuated during the storm.

Ten dogs were found shot this week at the old parish courthouse in the community of St. Bernard, according to parish spokesman Steve Cannizaro. The building had until recently been part of P.G.T. Beauregard Middle School. The remaining four dogs were found at Sebastien Roy Middle School in eastern St. Bernard Parish, Cannizaro said.

Frank Asevado, owner of the dogs shot at Sebastien Roy, told CNN that he suspects law enforcement authorities shot the dogs, a claim he reiterated through a posting by his sister to an Internet Web log.

Asevado, who confirmed the Web log message, declined to comment for this story. The message indicated that as Katrina pummeled the parish Aug. 29 he left six pit bulls in the school, including a pregnant female named Cheyenne. When he returned this week he found Cheyenne alive with three puppies she had given birth to. But a male and three female dogs had been shot. His sixth dog was found dead in a locker, the message said.

Officials with the state's Department of Wildlife and Fisheries are investigating and so is the St. Bernard Sheriff's Office, said its spokesman, Col. Richard Baumy. He said sheriff's investigators do not yet know who shot the dogs.

"As far as the information we have now, our deputies did not shoot the dogs," Baumy said.

Baumy said it's possible that other law enforcement personnel, National Guard units, or even some civilians could have shot the animals. He said the shell casings found at the schools are not the types used exclusively by law enforcement agencies.

Still, news of the findings has prompted a wave of protests from animal rights groups. Julie Morris, senior vice president of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, called the incident "cold-blooded murder" and said her group will push for an investigation by the state Attorney General's Office.

"There's certainly enough to carry out an investigation (from) outside of St. Bernard Parish," Morris said.

She said her group had received reports of previous incidents of animals being shot in St. Bernard, although until now it had not decided to push for a probe.

Last month, a photographer with the Dallas Morning News videotaped a St. Bernard sheriff's deputy shooting a dog from the back of a moving vehicle, prompting a flood of e-mails to parish officials.

St. Bernard Parish Sheriff Jack Stephens said then that deputies had shot some dogs that were vicious.

But the newspaper's photographer, David Leeson, said the dog in the video was friendly, and he had intended to feed it just before it was shot. Leeson, however, also said that there were aggressive dogs in many neighborhoods and that the animals also nearly attacked him.

WAR IN IRAQ

Troops, helicopters hit Iraqi border village

2 U.S. soldiers killed in explosions

By Mohammed Barakat
Associated Press writer

QAIM, IRAQ — About 1,000 U.S. troops, backed by attack helicopters and warplanes, swept into a village near the Syrian border Saturday in an offensive aimed at rooting out al-Qaida militants and stemming violence before a crucial election on a new constitution.

U.S. aircraft firing missiles struck houses and cars, sending palls of smoke into the sky as the forces moved into Sadah, according to residents contacted by The Associated Press. In the evening, Marines and insurgents clashed in the streets, they said.

The U.S. military said al-Qaida in Iraq, the country's most fearsome militant group behind a wave of suicide bombings, had taken control of Sadah and that foreign fighters were using it as a way station as they enter from Syria to join the insurgency.

The assault was the fourth large U.S. offensive in the border area since May. But the militants who run rampant in large parts of western Iraq have proven difficult to put down, moving back to towns after the assaults are over and the bulk of troops withdraw.

Al-Qaida and other Sunni-led insurgents have stepped up their campaign of violence, killing at least 205 people this week in an attempt to wreck the Oct. 15 referendum on the constitution, a vital step in Iraq's political process.

Iraq's Sunni Arab minority, which ruled under Saddam Hussein but lost power after his ouster, opposes the draft charter, fearing it will split Iraq and consecrate Shiite and Kurdish domination.

Al-Qaida in Iraq has declared "all-out war" on Shiites, and since a Shiite-majority government took power in Iraq on April 28, suicide bombers have killed at least 1,345 people, according to an Associated Press count.

U.S. toll near 2,000

Two U.S. soldiers were killed by explosions while on patrols Saturday, one in Baghdad and another in Beiji, 155 miles north of the capital, the military said. Fifteen U.S. service members have been killed this week, and at least 1,935 have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003.

In Baghdad, insurgents kidnapped the brother of Interior Minister Bayan Jabr Solagh, the Shiite official who heads police forces, and the son of another top ministry official was kidnapped north of the capital, ministry spokesman Maj. Felah al-Mohammedawi said.

U.S. troops sealed off Sadah, 180 miles northwest of Baghdad, and U.S. and Iraqi officials released no information on casualties on the first day of the assault.

Troops went house to house, blasting open doors in a hunt for insurgents, but so far no weapons caches or significant militant figures had been found, said a correspondent for CNN embedded with the troops. Helicopters fired on three vehicles as the force moved in, including two that were carrying suicide bombers and a third that was being loaded with weapons, CNN reported.

Sadah is an isolated village of about 2,000 people on the banks of the Euphrates River, with one main road and about 200 houses scattered in a rural area about eight miles from the Syrian border, near the town of Qaim in Iraq's western province of Anbar.

The offensive, named Operation Iron Fist, was launched by a force of Marines, soldiers and sailors, aiming to root out al-Qaida militants who have turned Sadah into a "terrorist sanctuary" and to stop infiltration by foreign fighters, the military said in a statement.

Marines carried out two major operations around Qaim in May, killing 125 insurgents in the first campaign, Operation Matador, and about 50 in the second, Operation Spear in mid-June in the town of Karabilah. Nine Marines were killed in those actions.

Iraqi recruits killed

In September, thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops fought through the city of Tal Afar, farther northwest along the border in Nineveh province, killing more than 150 insurgents and capturing more than 300, according to Iraqi military figures.

Two weeks after that offensive, a female suicide bomber infiltrated the city and set off a blast that killed six Iraqi army recruits on Wednesday, illustrating the difficulty of completely suppressing militants.

The Tal Afar assault included a large force of Iraqi troops alongside the Americans, but like the previous operations around Qaim, Iron Fist appeared to include only a minimal Iraqi presence; the U.S. military did not mention any at all, and police in Qaim said only a few Iraqis were participating.

President Bush said he was encouraged by the increasing size and capability of the Iraqi security forces, touting progress on a key measure for when U.S. troops can come home.

"They have made important gains in recent weeks and months; they are adapting our strategy to meet the needs on the ground; and they're helping us to bring victory in the war on terror," Bush said Saturday in his weekly radio address.

In other violence Saturday, a roadside bomb hit a patrol of Danish troops as they crossed a bridge in the southern city of Basra, killing one Dane ó the first Danish fatality from hostile fire in Iraq ó and wounding at least two others.

The U.S. military released about 500 Iraqi detainees from the notorious Abu Ghraib prison on the outskirts of Baghdad on Saturday, the second and final part of a release of 1,000 this week in honor of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan. The move also aimed at persuading Sunnis to vote in the upcoming referendum.

The alliance at the center of Iraq's government also was showing strains, with Kurdish leaders accusing Shiite parties that dominate the Cabinet of monopolizing power and ignoring past promises ó particularly to start resettlement of Kurds in the northern city of Kirkuk.

Kurds warned they would consider withdrawing from the government, causing it to collapse, if their demands weren't met, a step that would deepen political turmoil ahead of the referendum.

Pulling in for gas, high in the sky

Refueling tank keeps jets flying over Iraq

By Jim Krane
Associated Press writer

ABOARD A U.S. REFUELING PLANE OVER IRAQ — Lt. Col. Steve Nordhaus' F-16 was running low on fuel over Baghdad, so he pulled up to the gas station _ Spark-02, a refueling tanker circling 25,000 feet above the desert.

As Nordhaus and his wingman approached, a computer warning on the KC-135 tanker boomed "traffic, traffic!" Airman 1st Class Phil Inmon hustled into his pod in the tanker's tail and peered through the window, ready to guide the refueling boom into the fighter jet's nozzle.

It was Aug. 31, just another day's work for the Air Force fleet that keeps U.S. warplanes gassed up and running in the Iraq war.

The radio crackled again: "He's nine miles away, boom," said Spark-02's co-pilot, Capt. Nathan Dodd, 27, of Lafayette.

Inmon lowered the boom and craned his neck to catch a glimpse of the approaching F-16.

"Traffic, traffic!" the computer blared.

"Still no visual," Inmon said.

"He's at six o'clock, four miles away," Dodd said. "Boom, do you have him?"

"I've still got no visual," Inmon said, craning his neck to peer below the tanker's tail.

"He's about one mile now," Dodd said a few moments later.

"He must be coming in high. I don't see him," Inmon said.

Just then, the pointed nose of Nordhaus' gray F-16 crept into view, so close that individual stars on a folded American flag were in plain view on top of the control panel.

"I got him now," Inmon yelled, and switched to Nordhaus' radio frequency.

"I got you loud and clear," Nordhaus said, creeping ever closer to the tanker's dangling boom, as Inmon radioed the shrinking distance in feet: "40...30...20...10."

The boom smacked against the F-16's already scratched fuselage and locked onto the fuel tank coupling behind the cockpit. The two jets were now flying coupled to each other.

"Spark Zero-Two has contact," Inmon said, pushing a trigger to start the fuel flowing. "We're stable."

As the two jets flew in tandem high above the Iraqi desert, Inmon asked Nordhaus how his day was going.

"We're hanging out over Baghdad today," Nordhaus said. "If anything happens, we're ready to jump on it."

In a minute, the tank was full. "Offload is complete," Inmon said, uncoupling the boom and retracting it.

"Thanks for the gas," Nordhaus said, his F-16 rolling over and nosing down toward the desert. "We'll see you all next time."

Turkish official says EU must keep its promises

Full membership for Turkey urged

"If the European Union decides not to keep its word, if its own leaders decide to forget their signatures beneath the decisions they've made before the ink has even dried ... if they decide to ignore all this and impose new conditions that Turkey will never accept ... then of course in that case this kind of partnership can never be."

Foreign Minister ABDULLAH GUL

By Benjamin Harvey
Associated Press writer

ISTANBUL, TURKEY — Turkey's foreign minister urged European leaders Saturday to keep their promises and open talks next week on his country joining the European Union, and warned again Ankara will accept no new conditions to those discussions.

EU foreign ministers meet Sunday to discuss Austria's insistence that Turkey be offered something less than full membership in the EU, calling into question whether the bloc will open accession talks with the mostly Muslim nation on Monday. Austria has claimed to be speaking in the name of the majority of Europeans in saying it does not want Turkey as a full member.

The EU had agreed in December 2004 to open accession talks on Monday.

"If the European Union decides not to keep its word, if its own leaders decide to forget their signatures beneath the decisions they've made before the ink has even dried ... if they decide to ignore all this and impose new conditions that Turkey will never accept ... then of course in that case this kind of partnership can never be," Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul said.

Gul emphasized, however, that the Turkish government remained committed to the EU.

"Believing it will be a victory for both Turkey and the EU, we want to finish this and we want to begin the negotiations," he said. "I hope Turkey's honest conduct and approach will find a response in the same manner."

Justice Minister Cemil Cicek also urged the EU to keep its promises.

"Human rights and freedoms are very important modern values," he said. "But keeping one's word is also a modern value. That's why we're expecting Europe to keep its word."

Ertugul Ozkok, columnist for Hurriyet newspaper, urged Turks to remain firm in their convictions and quoted Turgut Ozal, the prime minister who first applied for full membership in the EU in 1987.

"This is a long and hard road. There will be those who will try hard to turn us from this road, they'll play with our pride. But we must not be turned away," Ozal had said.

A poll by A&G Research of 1,834 people in 19 provinces showed the majority of Turkish people remain supportive of the EU bid, with 57.4 percent agreeing with the statement, "Turkey must join" the EU. The poll, which was taken Sept. 24-29, had a margin of error of 2 percentage points.

Parliament Speaker Bulent Arinc said Turkey was taking note of Europe's actions, and that the country would continue to progress on its own terms if Europe decided not to deal with Turkey.

"We are taking as a warning the political maneuvers of those working to obstruct our membership, which shock and amaze every reasonable man," Arinc said. "We didn't destroy our honor so much that we would sacrifice everything to be a member of the EU. We have enough strength to build our own future and a free and prosperous nation for our children."

Bishops tackle shortage of priests

Allowing marriage may be considered

By Nicole Winfield
Associated Press writer

VATICAN CITY — Bishops from around the world begin tackling major issues facing the Roman Catholic Church at the Vatican on Sunday, including whether Holy Communion should be given to Catholic politicians who back abortion rights and to divorcees who remarry without getting an annulment.

The priest shortage and whether celibacy contributes to it, as well as dwindling Mass attendance, also are expected to be discussed at the three-week Synod of Bishops, during which bishops will offer recommendations to Pope Benedict XVI on running the church.

The Vatican said Saturday that 256 bishops from 118 countries would participate — the most ever. In addition, 10 representatives from non-Catholic Christian churches will attend, although they do not have voting rights.

Benedict formally opens the synod with a Sunday Mass, and in many ways the meeting is as much about him as it is about the bishops, since it is the pontiff's first major Vatican undertaking since being elected April 19.

Many participants have pointed to the changes Benedict made in organizing the synod as evidence he wants it to be a more collegial exchange of ideas than a meeting with a preordained outcome. Bishops will speak for six minutes rather than eight, allowing for an hour of open discussion at the end of each day.

"That in itself, while subtle, is a real emphasis," said Pittsburgh Bishop Donald Wuerl, one of the American delegates attending the Oct. 2-23 meeting.

Officially, the synod will discuss the Eucharist, or the sacrament of Holy Communion, which Catholics believe is the body and blood of Christ. But a range of issues falls under that.

In the draft document outlining the synod agenda, the Vatican singled out divorcees who remarry without getting an annulment and Catholic politicians who support abortion rights in criticizing those who continue to receive Holy Communion while in a state of "mortal sin."

"It has been very unbelievable to me that steps have not been taken prior to this time to address the problem that has led to parishes closing and clustering."

SISTER CHRISTINE SCHENK, of the FutureChurch group

The Rev. Anthony Figueiredo, a special assistant to the pope during the synod, said he expected debate on both topics but little change in church policy.

"I think what we will be seeing is a very clear affirmation of fidelity to the church's teaching," he said.

The document also noted declining Mass attendance — in some countries, only 5 percent of the faithful attend — as well as the priest shortage. It cited statistics showing there was one priest for every 1,797 Catholics in 1978 compared with one priest for every 2,677 Catholics in 2003.

Because of the shortage, several participants said they expected the church's celibacy requirement to be discussed, since many believe that more men would join the priesthood if they were allowed to marry.

"They're certainly not going to talk about ordination of women, but I think there might be some discussion of the celibacy law," said the Rev. Francis Moloney, an Australian theologian at the synod.

A survey by two U.S. church reform groups of more than 15,000 priests in 55 American dioceses said 67 percent believed that mandatory celibacy should be discussed. Sister Christine Schenk of the FutureChurch group said she planned to deliver the survey results and petitions from parishioners to church officials during the synod.

"It has been very unbelievable to me that steps have not been taken prior to this time to address the problem that has led to parishes closing and clustering," she said.

Benedict invited four Chinese bishops to attend the synod as part of his effort to unify China's divided church. But as of Saturday, the bishops had not submitted the necessary paperwork to attend, Vatican officials said — an indication the Beijing government would not let them come.

Nevertheless, Monsignor Nikola Eterovic, the general secretary of the synod, remained hopeful.

"We remain open to receiving them, even until the last day," he said.

During previous recent synods, one topic of "sideline" discussions has always been the papal succession. With Benedict now in office, that perennial issue may be replaced by an upcoming Vatican document expected to reaffirm the church's belief that homosexual men should not be ordained.

"The bishops might talk about it personally, but it's not a focal point in the discussion about the Eucharist," said Bishop William Skylstad, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Cleaning up

The LSU AgCenter can help.

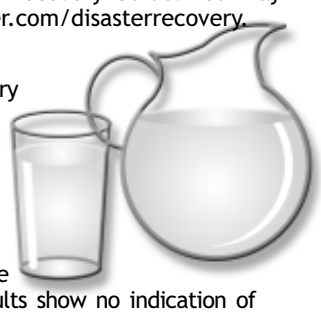
LSU AgCenter Research & Extension



As hurricane recovery efforts continue in South Louisiana, the LSU AgCenter can provide reliable, research-based information on home and garden damage, food and water safety, avoiding hazardous molds, personal finances, stress management and other topics. Through our unique network of faculty in parish offices around the state, we can answer many of your clean up questions. You can find more detailed information by visiting our Web site at www.lsuagcenter.com/disasterrecovery or contacting us for a free Storm Recovery Guide.

Food and Water Safety

Water

For instructions on purifying water, contact your local LSU AgCenter office or call for our free Storm Recovery Guide. You may also visit our Web site at www.lsuagcenter.com/disasterrecovery.

Water Well Purification

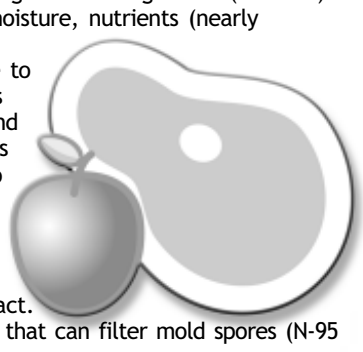
After a flood, it is important to take every precaution to ensure the safety of your well water. First, it is necessary to inspect and clean the well and pump before using them. You may want to have your water well driller or contractor check out the well before using it.



Have the water sampled and tested. The water IS NOT safe for drinking until lab results show no indication of total coliform bacteria. You can discuss the final lab results with the lab or local parish health unit. It is important to remember that disinfection will not remove chemicals which may have contaminated your well during a flood. For more information, contact your local LSU AgCenter office or visit our Web site at www.lsuagcenter.com/disasterrecovery

Foods and Food Preparation Items

- Do not eat food that may have come into contact with floodwater.
- Discard all food that came in contact with floodwaters including canned goods. It is impossible to know if the containers were damaged and the seals compromised.
- Discard wooden cutting boards, wooden spoons, plastic utensils, baby bottle nipples and pacifers. There is no way to safely clean them if they have come in contact with contaminated flood waters.
- Thoroughly wash metal pans, ceramic dishes and utensils with hot soapy water and sanitize by boiling them in clean water or by immersing them for 15 minutes in a solution of 1 teaspoon of chlorine bleach per quart of water.
- Clean and sanitize all kitchen surfaces, especially those that may have been contaminated by floodwaters.
- Wash and sanitize dishes, utensils and appliances before using them.

Avoiding Mold Hazards

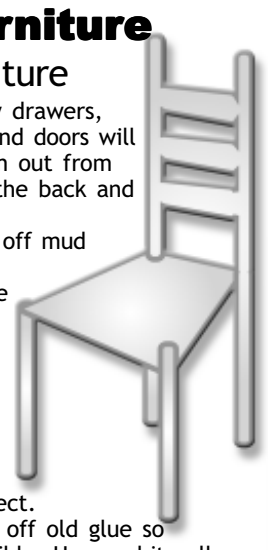
A flood-damaged building requires special attention to avoid or correct a mold population explosion. Molds produce spores that float and spread easily through the air, forming new mold growths (colonies) when they find the right conditions – moisture, nutrients (nearly anything organic) and a place to grow.

Mold problems can result in damage to materials and health. The longer mold is allowed to grow, the greater the risk and the harder it is to remedy. So as soon as the floodwaters recede and it is safe to return, don't delay cleanup and dry out.

People are mainly exposed to mold by breathing spores or fragments, and can also be exposed through skin contact. Wearing gloves and a mask or respirator that can filter mold spores (N-95 or better) is recommended.

Although there is wide variation in how people are affected by mold, long-term or high exposure is unhealthy for anyone. Exposure to mold can trigger allergic reactions and asthma attacks, may suppress the immune system or have other effects. Some types of mold can produce mycotoxins in certain conditions, which can be present in live and dead spores and fragments in the air. "Black mold" is a misleading term since many types are black.



Mold testing is not usually needed and is rarely useful. Some insurance companies and legal services may require sampling as a form of documentation. Professional mold remediation contractors may test before and after cleanup to provide evidence of the cleanup's effectiveness.

To clean up mold, follow these steps and refer to the EPA guidelines: A Brief Guide To Mold, Moisture, and Your Home or Mold Remediation In Schools and Commercial Buildings available online at www.epa.gov/iaq)

- Isolate Work Area and Ventilate to Outdoors: Disturbing mold colonies can cause a massive release of spores, so seal off the contaminated area from the rest of the house. If power is on, use a fan to exhaust air to the outdoors.
- Remove And Discard Moldy Materials: Porous moldy or sewage-contaminated materials should be removed, bagged and thrown away — including gypsum wallboard, insulation, plaster, carpet/carpet pad, ceiling tiles, processed wood products and paper. To minimize the spread of spores, cover moldy material with plastic to contain spores before removing and discard it.
- Clean Surfaces: Surface mold on non-porous materials such as hard plastic, concrete, glass, metal and solid wood can usually be cleaned. Cleaning must remove, not just kill, the mold because dead spores can still cause health problems. After cleaning, choose to use a disinfectant to kill any mold missed by the cleaning. In the case of sewage contamination, disinfection must be performed. Contact your local health department for appropriate advice. On color-fast, non-metal surfaces, you may disinfect with a solution of 1/4 to 1/2 cup bleach per gallon of water. Do not use in the air system. Milder, less corrosive disinfectants include alcohols, disinfecting cleaners and hydrogen peroxide. Always handle with caution, never mix bleach with ammonia and test on a small area before treatment.
- Speed Dry: Dry all wet materials as quickly as possible. Use air conditioning or heat with fans and dehumidifiers, if possible. New mold colonies can form in as little as three days if materials stay wet. Wood and other materials that may look dry can still be wet enough to support regrowth.
- Remain on Mold Alert: Continue looking for signs of moisture or new mold growth. If mold returns, repeat cleaning and consider using speed drying equipment and moisture meters. Regrowth may signal that the material was not dry enough or should be removed. Rebuilding and refurnishing should wait until all affected materials have dried completely.

Salvaging/Cleaning Furniture

Submerged or wet wooden furniture

Take furniture outdoors, and remove as many drawers, slides and removable parts as possible. Drawers and doors will probably be stuck tight. Do not try to force them out from the front. With a screwdriver or chisel, remove the back and push out the drawer from behind.

After you have removed movable parts, clean off mud and dirt, using a hose if necessary.

Take all furniture indoors and store it where it will dry slowly. Furniture left in the sunlight to dry will warp and twist out of shape.

When furniture is dry, reglue it if necessary. You will need equipment and clamps to reglue some pieces. Before you start, decide whether you have the time, equipment and ability to do the work. Consult an experienced carpenter if necessary. Many books are available on the subject.

To reglue loose joints or rungs, cut or scrape off old glue so the area will be as clean and free of glue as possible. Use a white all-purpose glue, following directions on container. Hold parts together with rubber rope tourniquets or C-clamps. To prevent damage from ropes or clamps, pad these areas with cloth.

Damp furniture - removing white spots

White spots or a cloudy film may develop on damp furniture that has not been submerged.

If the entire surface is affected, rub with a damp cloth dipped in (a) turpentine or camphorated oil or (b) in a solution of 1/2 cup household ammonia and 1/2 cup water. Wipe dry at once and polish with wax or furniture polish.

If color is not restored, dip 3/0 steel wool in oil (boiled linseed, olive, mineral or lemon). Rub lightly with the wood grain. Wipe with a soft cloth and re-wax.

For deep spots, use a drop or two of ammonia on a damp cloth. Rub at once with a dry cloth. Polish. Rubbing cigarette ashes, powered pumice or a piece of walnut into spots may also help remove them. Be sure to wear rubber gloves when using these solutions.

Cleaning Tips

- Always wear rubber gloves when using cleaning solutions or working with flood-damaged or moldy furniture. Clean furniture outdoors.
- If mildew has developed, vacuum (preferably with an HEPA filter) surface or brush off with a broom.
- Read fiber content labels of upholstery. Test a hidden area using a solution of lukewarm soapy water (1 tablespoon soap to 1 quart water), or dilute denatured alcohol (1/2 alcohol and 1/2 water) or bleach solution (1 tablespoon bleach to a pint of water) to see if color is removed or fabric shrinks. Allow to dry, then decide if the fabric can be cleaned. Sponge fabric to remove dirt, and use bleach or alcohol solution to remove mildew. Fabric may be removed from frame to clean, depending on the damage.
- Remove tacks, nails, braid, other fasteners.
- Although wet synthetic foam padding can be restored, the risk of contamination and costs usually make replacement a better option. Wet cotton or other organic padding should always be replaced.
- Wipe down wooden frames with a wood cleaner or alcohol solution to remove mold or mildew. Wipe dry and allow to air dry in an open shady place (never dry furniture in direct sunlight).
- Dry springs and other metal parts. If rust has formed, you may need to replace or clean. Use steel wool and coat with paint. A light oil could be wiped on metal parts to help prevent later rusting. Many major manufacturers keep records of fabric or metal parts which can be ordered from the dealer for replacement.
- Be sure all parts are dry before reassembling.
- A reliable furniture repair shop will give estimates on cost of redoing furniture. Also, consider replacement cost and value of each piece. If insurance allows part value on flood-damaged furniture, it may be financially worthwhile to apply the money to new articles, rather than pay for extensive repairs.

Cleaning Carpets and Floors

Cleaning water-soaked carpets and floors is difficult in itself, but in the aftermath of a storm or flood, contamination by mud, silt, sewage and mildew can compound the problem.

It's best to replace carpets and get professional cleaners to work on floors, but this may not be possible. Begin cleanup as soon as possible.

- Pull up all saturated carpets and rugs, and take them outdoors.
- If you wish to salvage valuable rugs and water was not contaminated, hose muddy carpets down. Work a low-sudsing, disinfectant carpet cleaning product deep into soiled spots with a broom.
- If only small areas of carpet got wet from leaks, pull up and prop the wet carpet to dry. Cut away wet padding.
- To discourage mildew and odors, rinse the backing with a solution of 2 tablespoons bleach to 1 gallon water. Don't use this solution on wool carpets. Also disinfect the slab or subfloor.
- Discard and replace foam pads.
- Sections of subfloors that separate must be replaced to avoid buckling. When floor coverings are removed, allow subfloors to dry thoroughly. It may take several months. Disinfect wet surfaces.
- In wood floors, remove a board every few feet to reduce buckling caused by swelling. Ask a carpenter for tips on removing tongue-and-groove boards.
- Clean and dry floor thoroughly before attempting repairs. Using a dehumidifier will speed the drying process.
- In vinyl floors with wood subflooring, the floor covering should be removed so the subflooring can be replaced. With concrete floors, removal isn't necessary except to hasten drying of the slab.
- Loose tiles may be replaced if the floor has not been soaked. If water has seeped under sheet flooring, remove the entire sheet.
- While cleaning, wash exposed skin frequently in purified water. Wear rubber gloves.

Agency says more financing needed

COAST GUARD, from A-1

saved 33,500 people in Katrina's aftermath across the Gulf Coast. Of that, about 19,000 came from flooded New Orleans area neighborhoods, including 6,500 who were plucked from rooftops or highway overpasses by Coast Guard helicopters, the agency said.

At one point, there were more helicopters involved with Katrina's aftermath than there are in Iraq and Kuwait, the National Guard said.

"As far as I know, it certainly is" the biggest search-and-rescue mission in the Coast Guard's history, said Bob Browning of the Coast Guard Historian's Office in Washington D.C. "It's certainly by far the largest one done by air" for the Coast Guard.

That compares to the June 1944 D-Day invasion, when 60 Coast Guard boats rescued 1,438 men off the coast of Normandy, Browning said.

The massive undertaking raised the Coast Guard's profile and earned the agency praise, a rarity after Katrina since agencies such as the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Red Cross have been widely criticized for their slow response to the storm.

"Basically, the Coast Guard was one of the only success stories coming out of Katrina," said Alane Kochems, a national security policy analyst for the Heritage Foundation, a Washington D.C. conservative think tank.

But the life-saving operations were only part of the task for the Coast Guard, which also is responsible for conducting maritime homeland security patrols, ensuring commercial waterways are navigable and being the federal government's on-scene coordinator for environmental disasters.

"When Katrina hit, all these missions occurred at once in almost biblical proportions," said Capt. Frank Paskewich, commander of Coast Guard Sector New Orleans.

About 1,000 boats and barges were grounded, sunk or tossed over levees by Katrina's surge and winds, Paskewich said. Navigational aids in the Mississippi River and in other waterways were "virtually destroyed," leading to the closure of the Port of New Orleans for four days as well as the entryways to some of the nation's busiest ports, he said. Facilities in St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes damaged by Katrina spilled almost 7 million gallons of oil, he said.

Katrina, Paskewich said, presented a huge challenge for this small, "nimble" maritime agency in the Department of Homeland Security whose active duty and reserve forces and its civilian complement total 55,000 people, small enough to fit in New York's Yankee Stadium with room to spare.

Rescue crews patrol in early September near Franklin Avenue and Interstate 10 in New Orleans. In addition to rescues, the Coast Guard is responsible for maritime homeland security patrols and ensuring that commercial waterways are navigable.

The Coast Guard's response, Kochems said, should illustrate to Congress the agency's need for money to modernize its fleet of boats, ships and aircraft in a "chronically underfunded" modernization program called the Integrated Deepwater System, conceived a decade ago.

"If these capabilities were on hand, with modern helicopters, sensors and patrol craft, the Coast Guard's search-and-rescue operations might have been much more effective," Kochems and fellow analyst, James Jay Carafano, wrote recently in a piece titled, "Coast Guard's Finest Hour Ignored by Congress."

About 3,000 Coast Guard personnel from across the nation responded to the Gulf Coast region, even as the agency saw its stations in Grand Isle, Venice and Gulfport, Miss., sustain heavy damage.

But the agency wasn't alone in the quest. New Orleans police and firefighters, the Louisiana Department of Wildlife and Fisheries, the National Guard and, later, the active duty military were in the streets and air. The first helicopters involved, however, belonged to the Louisiana National Guard's New Orleans-based 1st Battalion, 244th Aviation Regiment and the Coast Guard, officials have said.

Mix and matching easily

The Coast Guard's reaction to Katrina centered around the agency's hurricane response plan, said Capt. Kevin Marshall, chief of staff for the 8th Coast Guard District.

"We practice it, we brief it to all new members when they show up," Marshall said, adding that the plan is revised annually. "It doesn't matter where the hurricane comes in. We're ready."

Two days before the storm, the 8th District's New Orleans headquarters was moved to St. Louis, and another command center was set up in Alexandria. Coast Guard family members were evacuated, and personnel, aircraft and boats were relocated outside the area where Katrina was expected to hit. As the disaster unfolded, officers called in more Coast Guard helicopters and small-boat crews from as far as the Great Lakes region.

Another factor, Marshall said, is that training is universal, allowing helicopter and boat crews to quickly form even though the Coast Guardsmen never met before. "We mixed and matched so many crews to make this happen that we never could have done it unless we had a standard training program," he said.

For aircrews trained to hoist people from boats at sea, the aviators were forced to improvise when plucking people from rooftops, said Petty Officer 2nd Class Eddie Jimenez, a HH-65 Dolphin crew chief based in Belle Chasse. "We train for that, just not that way," he said.

Marshall said members of the agency's volunteer auxiliary helped guide small boat crews who were unfamiliar with New Orleans' streets in their quest to find survivors.

And behind-the-scenes personnel kept the operations rolling. Commanding officers filled helicopters with fuel, and when the fuel pumps failed because of the storm, an electrician's mate second class, Ronnie Gordon, took the initiative to repair the pumps so that aircraft could continue flying, said Belle Chasse-based HH-65 Dolphin pilot Lt. Chris Huberty.

Coast Guard personnel also credit the autonomy they have to carry out their missions. As soon as it was safe to fly, commanders sent aircrews out with simple orders: "These are the areas that need help. You know what to do," Huberty said.

"We told them to handle the mission,'' Marshall said. "They're the ones pulling those babies out of the water."

Efficient in the skies

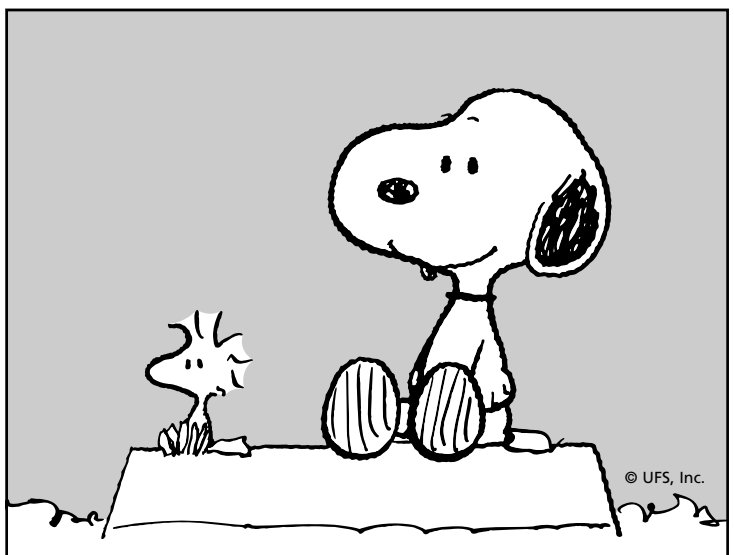
The aircrews say no flight was wasted. Helicopters hauled food and water when flying into the city from Belle Chasse or Zephyr Field, used as a refueling and supply hub, and carried people out to safety when leaving the city, Jimenez said.

"We weren't just burning gas," he said.



Dill said while flying over the B.W. Cooper public housing development, where much of his efforts were concentrated, someone threw a beer bottle at a rescue swimmer who had been lowered to a roof to offer help. Avoiding the hostility, Dill said, "We move on, find a family that wants to get out of there."

Yet in the same complex, Dill said, a burly man controlled the crowd and decided that older residents would be rescued first and coordinated the distribution of the water that the Coast Guardsmen delivered to them.

"I think the storm brought out the best in people and the worst of people," Dill said.

Only 2 homes destroyed in wildfires in California

Quick response, weather are credited

By Michael R. Blood
Associated Press writer

LOS ANGELES — A wildfire that torched more than 23,000 acres on the edge of the city left a surprising legacy: it destroyed just two homes, a remarkably small number given the size and ferocity of the blaze.

A break in dry, windy weather and a speedy, pinpoint response by thousands of firefighters combined to spare scores of homes that stood in the path of the flames, officials said.

"It's thinking ahead of where you think the fire is going to be: looking at weather reports, wind speed, humidity, past burn patterns," said Battalion Chief Lou Roupoli of the Los Angeles Fire Department.

"It's like fighting a war," Roupoli added. "Everybody has a piece of the puzzle. Everybody has a chain of command they report to."

Coming just weeks after the chaotic response to Hurricane Katrina, the textbook effort in Los Angeles County prompted this reaction from Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger: "Spectacular."

"We have the best fire department ... the best firefighters, the best fire chiefs, the best coordination, great communication," the governor said.

The fire began Wednesday afternoon in the Chatsworth area of northwest Los Angeles, then spread quickly in high winds.

By Saturday afternoon, firefighting equipment was heading elsewhere, the blaze mostly put down.

There were six injuries, none serious. Neighborhoods that had been evacuated were reopened to residents.

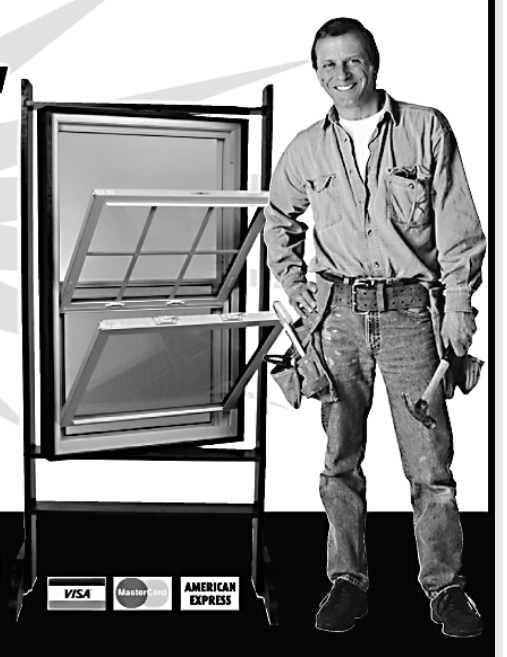
"There is very little, if any, active fire out there," said Kurt Schaefer, a spokesman for the Los Angeles County Fire Department. "We are getting the upper hand."

Beyond skilled firefighting, there were two other factors.

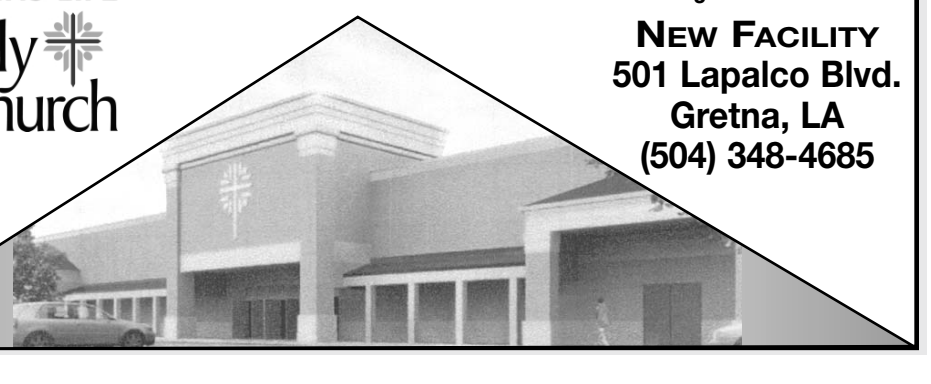
The dry, desert winds that fanned the fire were pushed out Thursday by a stream of moist ocean air. And residents had planned ahead by cutting brush around their homes to create safety buffers.

"Brush clearance creates the defensible space that's needed, at least 100 feet surrounding the house," said Los Angeles County Fire Department Capt. Michael Brown, referring to a state law that requires homes in high fire-risk areas to cut surrounding brush. "Areas that did burn were not cleared."

Moreover, firefighters have learned from the past, including the 2003 San Diego fires, when a bungled response was blamed for the loss of hundreds of homes.



This time, helicopters were used even at night to drop water. Firefighters from various agencies — the fire burned along the Los Angeles and Ventura county lines — coordinated on how best to deploy personnel and equipment.



"We've been able to put those things we've learned in the past in place and save many more structures," Brown said.

Meanwhile, firefighters battled another wildfire Saturday in Burbank that blackened about 1,100 acres. About 70 homes in the rugged area 10 miles north of downtown Los Angeles were evacuated as a precaution.

Hundreds of emergency personnel were fighting a third fire about 70 miles east of Los Angeles in and around the San Bernardino National Forest. The blaze had charred 1,000 acres, said Robin Prince, spokeswoman for the national forest.

About 1,200 people were evacuated from several small communities in the area Friday, including Mountain Home Village, Angelus Oaks and Forest Falls.

U.S. millionaire hurtles into space

Scientist pays $20 million for ride from Russians

By Mike Eckel
Associated Press writer

BAIKONUR, KAZAKHSTAN — U.S. millionaire scientist Gregory Olsen and an American-Russian crew hurtled toward the international space station Saturday on a Soyuz craft in a journey his family said was motivated by a devotion to science.

Relatives and friends of Olsen, astronaut William McArthur and cosmonaut Valery Tokarev gasped as the Russian craft lifted off in a burst of flame from the Baikonur cosmodrome and soared into the bright autumn sky over the steppes of Kazakhstan.

As the announcement came that the spacecraft had entered its initial designated orbit nine minutes after the launch, the crowd burst into applause.

The crew reported that all was well aboard the Soyuz TMA-7 capsule, which will rendezvous on Monday with the station floating 250 miles above the Earth.

"Life is good," said Cynthia McArthur, whose husband is a three-time veteran of U.S. space shuttle flights.

However, Russian space officials injected a sour note, warning that they could not guarantee McArthur's return next spring at the end of his and Tokarev's six-month mission unless NASA pays for the flight.

Since the 2003 Columbia disaster grounded the U.S. shuttle fleet, the United States has depended on Russian Soyuz and Progress craft to ferry its astronauts and supplies to the orbiting space station. Discovery visited the station in July, but problems with the foam insulation on its external fuel tank cast doubt on when the shuttle will fly again.

AP PHOTO

Scientist Gregory Olsen gives the thumbs up before a pressure test before his launch Saturday from the Baikonur Cosmodome as part of an American-Russian crew headed for the International Space Station. He was accompanied by astronaut William McArthur and Russian cosmonaut Valery Tokarev.

U.S. law currently bars NASA from making such payments to Russia.

The Soyuz make twice-yearly missions to the station to deliver new crews and bring back astronauts.

McArthur and Tokarev are replacing Russian Sergei Krikalev and American John Phillips, who will return to Earth on Oct. 11, along with Olsen, a 60-year-old founder of an infrared-camera maker based in Princeton, N.J. He reportedly paid $20 million for a seat on the Expedition 12 flight.

Olsen's daughter, Krista Dibsie, 31, videotaped the launch. "There goes Dad," she said quietly, tears rolling down her cheeks. "Love ya, Dad."

"Now I'm nervous for him," she said. "I wasn't before but now he's up there and, gosh, he's out of this world. I know that's a corny thing to say, but I can't believe it."

Her father, who holds advanced degrees in physics and materials science, has defended his presence in the capsule as a necessary step in the evolution of space travel.

"I would hope that my flight would help, if just to make space flight more routine," Olsen said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press on the eve of the flight.

At Russian Mission Control in Korolyov, outside Moscow, Olsen's sister, Amy McCarroll, said her brother was motivated by a devotion to science.

"He is a scientist first of all, and that's his main reason for going up there ... to help mankind, to see what comes from his experiments," she said.

The cash-strapped Russian agency has turned to space tourism to generate money.

Olsen said he preferred the term "space flight participant" to "space tourist."

"'Tourism' implies that anyone can just write a check and go up there. That's not what happened," he told AP.

NASA Administrator Michael Griffin, who met with his Russian counterpart, Anatoly Perminov, in Baikonur for talks on the future of joint space missions, warned that Moscow's demands for payment could end U.S participation.

Russia has made it clear that it expects the United States to make payment or some sort of capital investment in exchange for future U.S. participation on Russian flights.

But a law passed in 2000 penalizes countries that sell unconventional weapons and missile technology to Iran, and Russia is helping Iran build an $800 million atomic power plant despite concerns Tehran will build nuclear weapons.

The U.S. Senate has agreed to amend the measure and lift the ban on NASA purchases of Soyuz seats until 2012. The House has yet to act on it.

LAYOFFS, from A-1

said that without a significant infusion of cash, the number of layoffs could approach 3,000.

Serving notice

Because the City Hall layoff process would be guided to some degree by seniority, the review procedure could take weeks to complete.

During past fiscal crises, City Hall layoff orders have been halted or mitigated after city officials were able to locate money. The current dilemma, however, is so severe that city officials say massive layoffs are inevitable.

The document signed by Hatfield, obtained Saturday by The Times-Picayune, addresses both classified jobs protected by Civil Service rules and unclassified, or appointive, posts controlled by the mayor. It provides "written notice" for the layoffs to "take effect on Oct. 14 or as soon thereafter as practical."

Hatfield asks Civil Service Director Lisa Hudson to "please proceed in the appropriate and necessary manner required by law."

With all but a fraction of New Orleans' population still scattered across the nation five weeks after Katrina left the city's infrastructure in tatters, Nagin said Thursday that the city essentially "is broke."

The city delivered paychecks to its entire work force Friday. But city officials familiar with the layoff discussions said that may be the last time the full payroll is met for the foreseeable future as officials search for alternative sources of revenue.

The Nagin administration is negotiating with lenders and the Federal Emergency Management Agency to provide money for salaries. But the FEMA talks have been complicated by rules that limit federal reimbursement to overtime payments for public safety personnel.

Finance Director Reggie Zeno has said the city asked FEMA to waive its rules and provide full salaries for all employees that the administration determines are needed to keep the city running.

Mass retirements expected

A "joint statement" prepared this week by the administration and the Civil Service Commission also obtained Saturday by the newspaper lays out the rationale for the layoff procedure.

The statement says "the state of emergency declared by" Gov. Kathleen Blanco and Nagin in the wake of Hurricane Katrina "is of continuing force and effect" and "directly affects the continued employment of classified and unclassified employees."

"Due to loss of revenue," it says, the mayor has asked city department heads to "immediately provide names of employees essential and critical to the city's recovery."

The document says those employees have already been notified.

"Considering the loss of local revenue," the statement continues, the city and the commission "deem circumstances warrant that all employees, whether classified or unclassified as of September 25, 2005, are on emergency leave without pay," a designation that triggers the layoff procedure.

"We anticipate this process to be completed within two weeks," the statement said.

While Civil Service rules dictate that employees placed on leave without pay are entitled to receive compensation for all unused sick and vacation pay, city officials who requested anonymity said Saturday it is unlikely those benefits will be received any time soon.

Many municipal employees have speculated that the city's dire financial straits may prompt scores of veteran City Hall bureaucrats to retire.

"If that happens," a city worker with more than two decades of experience said, "the institutional knowledge we stand to lose is staggering."

City employees that have a direct impact on public safety – including those with the water board, the police and fire departments, and the emergency medical unit that runs ambulance services – are expected to be spared in the city's anticipated round of upcoming layoffs.

Demos to add contests in the name of diversity

Primary may add a Southern state

By Will Lester
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — Democrats trying to change their party's presidential primary for 2008 agreed Saturday to allow at least two other states to join Iowa and New Hampshire in voting during the opening days of the nominating campaign.

That expansion, debated before a commission considering changes in the primary calendar, is intended to provide more racial and geographic diversity to an opening process now dominated by Iowa and New Hampshire. Those states, representing about 1.5 percent of the country's population, have residents who are mostly white.

The additional states, expected to be named later, are likely to include a smaller state from the South and a smaller state from the Southwest or West.

Democrats agreed that it is critical that the early part of the voting be dominated by the personal, door-to-door politics that allows candidates to compete without a huge amount of money.

However, Democratic consultant Steve Murphy warned that it is critical they make no changes that help Republicans. Murphy and Iowa Democratic activist Jerry Crawford said Democrats should avoid stepping on the leadoff roles of Iowa and New Hampshire because they could anger voters in those states and make GOP victories there very likely in the general election.

"The Republicans are licking their chops today, hoping we stumble and give them the first good news they have had in months," said Crawford, a commission member.

"I do not think we should make the assumption that Iowa and New Hampshire should always be in the group" of states leading off the voting.

SEN. CARL LEVIN
D-Michigan

While Democrats agreed on expanding the early voting, sharp differences emerged on bigger questions such as slowing the pace of the primary calendar from early February on and whether Iowa and New Hampshire should have a permanent place at the front of the process.

"I do not think we should make the assumption that Iowa and New Hampshire should always be in the group" of states leading off the voting, said Sen. Carl Levin, the Michigan lawmaker whose complaints about the current calendar prompted the formation of the commission.

Longtime Democratic activist Harold Ickes of Washington questioned whether those changes will help the party's chances because the current calendar moves too quickly. Ickes noted that Democrats worked for a faster selection process of a Democratic nominee in 2004. By March the party had all but nominated Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry.

"We wanted to shut down the system and get our candidate out early," Ickes said. "If ever there was a foundering ship that was it. The longer we went on, the lower we went down in the polls. If we'd had a year we'd have been down around zero."

Commission members from Iowa and New Hampshire differed with Levin's argument that their states don't deserve to lead off the process.

"The more states we put into that period, the more it will contribute to frontloading," former New Hampshire Gov. Jeanne Shaheen said. "You can't separate the two."

The commission, led by Rep. David Price of North Carolina and former Labor Secretary Alexis Herman, planned to make its recommendations in December.

Murder charge filed in case of abandoned child

Authorities search for mom's remains

By Nahal Toosi
Associated Press writer

NEW YORK — A Queens man was charged Saturday with murdering his live-in girlfriend, a week after the woman's 4-year-old daughter was found walking down a city street alone in the middle of the night, police said.

Cesar Ascarrunz, 32, was arrested on murder charges two days after he was picked up by investigators, police said. Authorities were still searching Saturday for 26-year-old Monica Lozada's remains.

More than a dozen tips came in to police after child welfare officials took the unusual step of putting the child, Valerie Lozada, on television Thursday, in the hopes it would produce more information. In the appearance, Valerie described her mother as looking "like a princess."

Lozada was last seen at the apartment she shared with Ascarrunz on Sept. 24, at 11:45 p.m., authorities said. A little more than an hour later, Valerie was found on a Queens street, shivering and barefoot. She told residents that her father dropped her off and drove away, but showed no signs of abuse. She remained in foster care Saturday.

Authorities used records from the child's day care center to figure out her mother's identity, and declared her a missing person on Friday.

Ascarrunz also was charged with reckless endangerment, endangering the welfare of a child, child abandonment and evidence tampering, said Queens District Attorney Richard Brown. If convicted on the murder charge, he faces 25 years to life in prison.

Edgardo Rivera and Pablo Santiago, right, are among the couples waiting outside the city clerk's office in Hartford, Conn., to obtain a civil union license. The licenses were available for the first time on Saturday.

Same-sex union licenses are issued

Connecticut couples get new legal rights

By Cara Rubinsky
Associated Press writer

HARTFORD, CONN. — After receiving their civil union license Saturday, Lidia Agramonte and Maria Gomez had all the same rights as a married couple in Connecticut. But they couldn't find words to describe their union.

"The hardest thing is, what do you call yourself: civilized?" said Agramonte, 47, a social worker from New Britain. "There are no words for it yet."

The women were the first in line at Hartford City Hall as a new law allowing same-sex civil unions took effect. City halls in Hartford, Stamford, New Haven and a half-dozen small towns held special weekend hours to issue certificates to couples who said they waited for years to be legally recognized.

Connecticut became the first state to legalize civil unions without being forced by the courts after lawmakers passed a law endorsing the unions in April. Massachusetts allows gay marriages and Vermont recognizes civil unions because of lawsuits.

"This is a historic day. We're beyond ecstatic," said Randy Sharp, 46, of Plainville, who obtained a license with his partner, Jeff Blanchette, 44. They planned an afternoon ceremony followed by a reception for about 50 people at a friend's house.

The law affords all the legal rights of marriage ó such as spousal health care benefits ó to same-sex couples, but defines marriage as between a man and a woman. Heterosexual couples cannot get civil unions. The license application is identical to one for marriage, except "bride" and "groom" are replaced with "party 1" and "party 2."

The 2000 U.S. census found about 7,400 same-sex couples in Connecticut, but no one was tracking how many applied for licenses Saturday. The day passed with few reports of protests, except for a rally at the Capitol sponsored by the Family Institute of Connecticut. It drew about 50 people.

"Oct. 1 is a tragic day because it's the first day a law goes into effect that states a legislative belief that children don't need both a mom and a dad," said Peter Wolfgang, the director of public policy for the institute.

Race of juries challenged in Boston case

Judge trying to get more black jurors

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press writer

BOSTON — For years, defense attorneys have complained that seating a jury in federal court in Boston usually yields one of two panels: all-white or almost all-white.

After several failed challenges to the system, a judge hearing the federal death penalty case of two black men has issued a ruling that could change things.

Judge Nancy Gertner ordered court administrators to send additional summonses to certain zip codes when mailings are returned as undeliverable. In her ruling last month, Gertner said targeting certain zip codes may increase the likelihood that black jurors will be in the pool for the trial of Darryl Green and Branden Morris, who are charged in the 2001 gang killing of Terrell Gethers.

Without such a change, Gertner said, an all-white or largely white jury probably will decide not only their guilt or innocence, but whether they live or die.

"Such an outcome should be profoundly troubling, to say the least," Gertner wrote.

Her decision has created a stir in Boston's legal community, and U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan appealed Gertner's ruling to the 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which is scheduled to hear the case Monday.

More than a dozen defense attorneys and civil rights groups have co-signed legal briefs praising Gertner's decision. She also won support from William Young, chief judge of the U.S. District Court in Boston, who took the unusual step of filing his own brief.

But prosecutors argue that Gertner's ruling disrupts the goal of selecting the jury pool at random.

Sullivan said Gertner lacks authority to change the jury selection plan. Only the district court as a whole can enact such changes, he said, to avoid the potential for inconsistency.

"Any suggestion that the (office) is opposing the court's order because it supports or wishes to continue any under-representation of any segment of the population is misleading and false," he said in a statement.

In her ruling, Gertner agreed with defense attorneys that resident lists used to summon potential jurors are more likely to be inaccurate in areas with the highest percentage of black residents. Resident lists are compiled through town census forms.

She said poorer communities have few financial resources to update their resident lists or follow up on summonses that cannot be delivered.

The situation was ironic, Gertner said, because Massachusetts pioneered the use of resident lists instead of voter rolls for jury selection in an attempt to maximize minority participation.

Other methods to find potential jurors include tax rolls or driver's license records, said Iloilo Marguerite Jones, executive director of the American Jury Institute/Fully Informed Jury Association, a nonprofit group based in Helena, Mont.

Jones said each method has the potential for under-representing some groups. But Jones praised Gertner's ruling, which specifies that when a jury summons is returned as undeliverable, the jury administrator should send a second notice. If that notice goes unanswered, a new summons should be sent to another person in the same zip code.

"I think what this judge has done is to try to find a level of remediation that is both logical and fair," Jones said.

Morris' attorney, Patricia Garin, called Gertner's remedy "a first step," but said it won't make juries truly representative of the community.

"But it's going to be a step in the right direction," Garin said. "It's going to make it somewhat more likely that we might see in our case, and defendants in other cases, may see people of color on their juries."

Slayings terrify migrant workers

By Russ Bynum
Associated Press writer

TIFTON, GA. — Pedro Bemol stayed awake most of the night, swapping lookout shifts in the dark with the five other Mexican immigrants who share a ragged mobile home with no electricity and a front door that won't close because of a broken latch.

"Right now, we're afraid to go to sleep — all of us are restless," the 36-year-old said Saturday outside his home, two doors down from the trailer where robbers killed two of his neighbors. "We don't know if they'll come in and get us in the night, break in while we're asleep."

The slayings of five Mexican immigrants and wounding of six others during a string of mobile home robberies early Friday has terrified Hispanics who come to this rural south Georgia community to work in the fields of cotton and peanut farms.

Investigators suspect at least two men committed the attacks at four mobile home parks — three in Tift County and one in neighboring Colquitt County — and targeted Hispanics not out of hatred, but because they're easy prey.

"They're ready-made victims," said Vernon Keenan, director of the Georgia Bureau of Investigation. "They're reluctant to go to the police. They speak very little English. What little cash they have, they keep on their persons or in their homes."

At least two of the men killed were shot. Others were beaten with aluminum baseball bats, a weapon used in all four attacks, Keenan said.

A relative said all but one of the dead belonged to the same family. Keenan said investigators have only determined two were related, a father and son killed in the same residence.

Investigators were following several leads after police released sketches of two attackers based on descriptions from surviving victims, but no arrests had been made. Keenan said crimes against Hispanics are becoming more common in southern Georgia.

"There's been a series of these in surrounding counties for four or five months, but never of this level of violence," Keenan said.

Authorities were still withholding the names of the dead. Police were working with the Mexican consulate in Atlanta to notify victims' families in Mexico, said Georgia Bureau of Investigation spokesman John Bankhead.

Chefs itching to feed the masses

RESTAURANTS, from A-1

"Come back tomorrow," Tenney Flynn told one group of potential customers – and then another – seeking lunch at his ZydeQue Cajun Barbeque on Iberville Street in the French Quarter Thursday. "We'll be open tomorrow. I promise."

Flynn kept his word on Friday, opening a restaurant that, from the vantage of one of its stools, looks just as it did before the storm, a cross between barbecue joint grit and French Quarter neon, unharmed by flood water or hurricane winds.

The situation is different behind the curtain, where Flynn and partner Gary Wollerman, who also own the still-shuttered GW Fins, overcome post-Katrina challenges: refrigeration that took days to clean and sanitize; no gas to power stoves; a water supply that, for the purposes of a restaurant, is essentially useless.

Yet one could say Flynn, who is living in Folsom in a trailer with no power, is lucky. Thanks to a jerry-rigged smoker, ZydeQue is offering much of its regular menu, including spare ribs, debris gumbo, and brisket and cochon du lait sandwiches.

"We'll do pretty much everything but the fried items," Flynn said. "I was just boiling potatoes for the potato salad in jug water. We're trying to be as sanitary as possible."

Red Fish Grill also opened Friday and, like ZydeQue, is serving food using disposable dishes and utensils. The normally seafood-centric restaurant's menu features just a handful of entrees: grilled chicken, hamburgers and, of course, redfish. "You'll notice the common theme is the grill," owner Ralph Brennan said. "That way we'll only have to wash a limited number of pots."

A scaled-down menu is the key for many restaurateurs.

Scott Boswell, the ambitious chef-owner of Stella!, has been grilling hamburgers and sausage sandwiches outside his French Quarter restaurant. Similar fare is available not far away at the Royal Street Grocery and Deli. On Thursday night, Dr. Brobson Lutz, a Galatoire's regular and the city's former health director, sat at one of the grocery's bare tables, singing the praises of the crawfish sausage poboys. Around the same time, Mayor Ray Nagin was serving himself from the Sheraton Hotel's dinner buffet.

Tom Wolfe, chef-owner of three New Orleans restaurants, is concentrating on reopening Peristyle, his French Quarter flagship. At the moment, he has no other choice: Wolfe's of New Orleans, his restaurant in Lakeview, was "completely submerged," while Wolfe's in the Warehouse, on Convention Center Boulevard, was looted, he said.

Two weeks ago, he was cleaning Peristyle and envisioning its rebirth as a pastry/coffee shop during the day and a more-or-less regular restaurant in the evening. "As soon as the lights come on, and as soon as we can get resources coming in the back door, we'll open," he said at the time. Hurricane Rita altered his plans. Early last week, Wolfe was talking about cooking on the sidewalk with a propane stove.

"I just need to get back cooking," he said.

The dining action may be concentrated in New Orleans' more populated downtown, but signs of life exist elsewhere.

Uptown, Slim Goodies Diner emerged from Katrina as New Orleans' go-to lunch destination. Cooter Brown's opened Friday in the Riverbend. "I've got shrimp, I've got catfish, I've got burgers, meat pies," said Art Depodesta, who owns the restaurant connected to the popular saloon. The bar will be open for alcohol and football viewing – "We've got cable, satellite, wi-fi," Depodesta said - but not raw oysters.

In Harahan, Chef Paul Prudhomme transformed his Magic Seasoning Blends headquarters into a giant commissary. Two weeks ago, in the makeshift tent kitchen erected in a rear parking lot, chicken in Creole tomato sauce sizzled in wide pans. The chicken would feed rescue personnel, a daily task at the compound, but the chef was already looking to reopen K-Paul's Louisiana Kitchen, his famous French Quarter restaurant. Early this week, he plans to do just that.

K-Paul's menu will be smaller and less expensive. "I'm looking at $12 to $18, and you get a full meal," Prudhomme said. "You do three or four main courses, maybe a salad, a dessert with it."

"People keep asking, 'When are you going to reopen the restaurant?' " Prudomme said as he oversaw cooks tending batches of butter beans and etouffee. "The answer is, 'As soon as I can.'"

Before Hurricane Rita reflooded parts of the area, La Cote Brasserie, the restaurant in the Renaissance Arts Hotel, was nearly ready for business. The power was on, the refrigerators stocked, and three tanker trucks filled with water for drinking and dishwashing were parked out back. Chuck Subra returned to New Orleans this weekend, following a protracted Rita evacuation that involved numerous flight cancellations and a trip through his native New Iberia to help family members board up homes.

La Cote, noted for its gumbo and trout in butter, opened for business Saturday, mainly serving Federal Emergency Management Agency workers and insurance company representatives staying at the hotel. But Subra said neighborhood residents in need of a good meal were welcome, too.

The restaurant is open, said Subra, whose menu features gumbo, trout in butter and red beans on Monday, "but not really open."

Yet the days of serving seared foie gras and post-prandial cognacs may not be far off.

Thursday afternoon, Steven McHugh, sous chef at Restaurant August, diced herbs in the restaurant's second-floor kitchen. A hose from a water truck parked outside ran through a broken window up to where the chef was cooking for a group of 30 local politicos and CNN employees. They had booked August's private dining room for a multi-course meal: house salad followed by porcini risotto with truffle foam followed by a combination entrée, bordelaise-draped rib eye and chicken in apricot vinaigrette with creamy polenta. "For dessert I have a chocolate-orange panna cotta with a gold leaf," McHugh said.

McHugh said he and John Besh, the restaurant's chef-owner, are trying to have August open for regular service by Wednesday.

Meanwhile, a few blocks away at Herbsaint, chef-owner Donald Link huddled with a small crew drinking cold Carta Blanca longnecks amid tables set before Katrina blew through. Their task: writing the "No Potable Menu" that Link hopes to debut this Friday.

"We thought at first we'd just do chicken sandwiches and hamburgers, but after eating that for a few days, I was like: 'No way,' " Link said. The handwritten menu on the yellow legal pad in front of him included gumbo made with chicken and freshly harvested shellfish, handmade fettuccine with roasted garlic and morel mushrooms, shrimp remoulade, and pork belly with braised white beans.

Serving steak frites will depend on whether Link can track down his organic beef guy. "I don't want to do hangar steaks unless I can get good hangar steaks," he said.

Soon after opening, Link sees the menu expanding with the addition of duck confit, a daily seafood special, maybe some whole roasted crabs. And he's optimistic there will be plenty of business to go around.

"We've had like five people in really nice cars come by in the last couple of hours, looking for some good food," he said. "Our phone rang for the first time today, too. That was pretty exciting."

On menu for local restaurants: HEALTH INSPECTION

Teams make rounds of local eateries

By Bruce Hamilton
Staff writer

As hungry patrons clamored for food at Slim Goodies diner Friday just before noon, three officers in camouflage uniforms came in and halted lunch before it began.

The jukebox stopped playing music, and about 15 people sat with soda cans, waiting for their burgers.

"It's the Department of Health, so we have to wait," waitress Wanda Hendersen told customers.

"Somebody get up and play some tunes for me," she said. "I can't stand the silence."

In the kitchen, where owner Kappa Horn has spent a lot of time at the grill in the past two weeks, three officers with the U.S. Public Health Service Commissioned Corps, a branch of the Health and Human Services Department, inspected the diner.

Capt. Pfister, who declined to give his first name, said seven teams from the health service and the Food and Drug Administration are checking local restaurants. Last week they inspected schools.

Pfister said the officers were checking cooking and food-storage temperatures, and ensuring that restaurants aren't serving nonpotable water. "We don't expect everything to be 100 percent," he said.

About 20 minutes after the officers arrived at Slim Goodies, Horn emerged from the kitchen and beef was sizzling on the grill. Johnny Cash's "I Walk the Line" played on the jukebox, and the sanitarians sat in the courtyard to write up a report.

As restaurants and retail food establishments reopen in the New Orleans area, the state Department of Health is requiring each to be inspected.

When they are cleared for reopening, an official placard will be posted in a window or conspicuous location.

"Some of them may just not realize there is a procedure to follow," said Kristen Meyer, Health Department public information officer. "We have to make sure that we are not putting people at risk for food-borne illness."

Meyer said teams from the U.S. Public Health Service, the FDA and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention are helping the state in its effort.

As of Friday, she said, 741 food establishments had been cleared to operate in Jefferson Parish and 30 were cleared for operation in Algiers, but none had been OK'd on the east bank.

San Antonio Mayor Phil Hardberger and Saints owner Tom Benson announce the Saints will play three games in the Alamodome this year, after the team was chased from the Superdome by Hurricane Katrina. While never publicly stating an interest in relocating his team to San Antonio, Benson has done little to quell that speculation.

THE SAN ANTONIO SAINTS?

NFL says no, but city could make a play for franchise

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — After more than a decade of flirtations and frustrations, San Antonio will finally host its first regular-season National Football League game this afternoon when the Saints play the Buffalo Bills in the Alamodome.

What remains to be seen is whether this is the start of something big, or just one more big tease for a city that built the 65,000-seat indoor stadium in 1993 with the specific intent of trying to lure an NFL franchise.

This is the first of three games the Saints will play in the Alamodome this season after being chased from the Superdome in the devastating wake of Hurricane Katrina.

Under different circumstances, the Alamo City might be lauded for stepping up to the plate and providing a respectable home for a desperate team. But a series of factors – namely Saints owner Tom Benson's contentious negotiations on a long-term lease agreement in Louisiana before the hurricane hit – have turned this into an uncomfortably cozy relationship in many eyes.

NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue, for one, has been emphatic in his stance that the league has no interest in moving any team to San Antonio, labeling the city a "small market" in an interview with The Times-Picayune two weeks ago. Tagliabue said the only market the NFL has interest in is Los Angeles.

The commissioner has long opposed San Antonio's viability. When the city applied for an expansion franchise in the early 1990s, it didn't even make the short list.

And since then, San Antonio has served as little more than a bargaining chip for NFL owners hoping to land sweeter deals back home.

Tagliabue's latest comments dampened the spirits of even the most enthusiastic city leaders, who felt this unique situation would provide them with a golden opportunity to change the commissioner's mind – and perhaps offer a permanent home to the Saints as early as next season.

"(Tagliabue's comments) didn't surprise me. I think I'm a little bit more realistic than some of the other fellas are. I've been through it," said Bexar County Judge Nelson Wolff, the area's most influential local politician, who was mayor when the Alamodome was constructed.

"Tom has an interest in us — apparently he does — and of course, he used to live here," Wolff said of Benson, who has longstanding personal and professional ties to San Antonio. "But the attitude I have, and I think (current mayor Phil Hardberger's) attitude is similar to mine, you say, 'Let's do a good job, let's do the best we can for the three games, let the cards fall where they fall.'

"If New Orleans rebuilds and they go back to New Orleans, that's great. And that's probably the right thing to do, quite frankly. But if something happens to New Orleans, they don't rebuild (the Superdome) or whatever happens, then maybe they do at some point look seriously at us.

"But I'm not holding my breath, and I'm not going to break my back on a deal that doesn't look very viable at this point."

Benson has never publicly stated an interest in relocating his team here. But he also has done very little to quell that speculation.

In fact, Benson has been very quiet, allowing hope to grow in San Antonio and allowing fear to spread throughout his fractured fan base.

Benson has repeatedly declined interview requests, making only occasional statements thanking the people of San Antonio and supporting the people back in New Orleans.

Only once was the Saints owner available in a brief news conference setting three weeks ago. And when asked directly about his long-term plans, he responded, "We intend to present a first-class team. First class all the way to the Super Bowl."

Tough negotiator

Even if he has no intention of leaving New Orleans, Benson remains a tough negotiator who knows that a long-term deal eventually will be back on the table in Louisiana — even if that day does not come for several months.

Before Katrina's destructive efforts on the Superdome, Benson was already insisting on a new stadium in New Orleans and questioning the area's economic ability to provide one.

As part of the Saints' current lease agreement, which runs through 2010, Benson has a one-time window following this season to opt out by paying the state $81 million.

There might be other legal options to break the lease without penalty because of the Saints' inability to play in New Orleans — although there are protections in the contract against forces of nature, which could lead to complicated court proceedings.

There have been no indications to this point that Benson would pursue such legal options.

There also have been indications that neither Benson nor the Saints have discussed any kind of long-term arrangements with San Antonio officials.

Although some sources have suggested Benson is interested in the market, several principals involved in discussions between the Saints and San Antonio during the past month have insisted that nothing has been discussed beyond this season, even casually.

"We really are looking day to day, evaluating our immediate needs and responding to them, just focusing on this season," said Rita Benson LeBlanc, a Saints owner and heir apparent to her grandfather. "And as it shakes out, then we'll begin earnest talks (about the future)."

The Saints' director of community affairs, Paul Corliss, who has been at the forefront of the team's business dealings with San Antonio leaders, said the idea of San Antonio even being considered as a long-term possibility "has not been discussed in any meeting I've been in. And I would estimate I've been in at least 100 meetings."

Corliss did admit, however, that San Antonio's appetite for the NFL has certainly affected the city's response to the Saints games this year.

"I think San Antonio over the years, it's been documented that they have tried to be an NFL market. So I think certainly they wanted to show themselves worthy of being able to support an NFL team," Corliss said, before adding: "I don't think based on our conversations that they've tried to take this team away from New Orleans."

Seen as a player?

There was a certain air of surprise and disappointment when today's game was still nearly 10,000 tickets shy of a sellout by week's end. Expectations were much higher earlier in the month.

When the Saints first moved their base of operations to San Antonio in the week following Hurricane Katrina, more than 200 of the city's highest-ranking corporate officials attended a breakfast meeting with Benson and other team executives.

The meeting was hastily arranged by the city's Chamber of Commerce to elicit support for bringing the Saints' home games to the city, and only about 50 officials were expected to attend.

"In less than 24 hours, we had 200 leaders in the business community ready to sign up," said Jim Greenwood, vice president of governmental affairs for Valero Energy Corp., the biggest refiner in North America and the highest-ranking of four Fortune 500 companies in San Antonio's growing business center.

There has been major support for the Saints in the way of sponsorship and promotion from large local corporations such as Valero, SBC Communications, Clear Channel Communications and HEB Grocery, as well as national corporations like Toyota and Washington Mutual, which have a strong presence in the area.

At that breakfast meeting, Henry Cisneros, a former San Antonio Mayor known as the "father of the Alamodome" and a longtime leader in the city's efforts to land an NFL team, made a stirring emotional speech calling for everyone to seize the opportunity to make its mark on the NFL.

One city leader compared Cisneros' speech to the movie "Braveheart."

But such excitement was also roundly criticized, with the city being accused of trying to loot the Saints franchise.

San Antonio businessman Red McCombs, former owner of the Minnesota Vikings and San Antonio Spurs, was specifically targeted for having told the San Antonio Express-News, "Every effort needs to be made to tie the Saints up for this season — including having people stand in front of the dome, singing, 'When the Saints Come Marching In.'"

McCombs, who has spent years trying to bring the NFL to San Antonio — losing out as the applicant on the city's expansion franchise before he purchased the Vikings — toned down those comments earlier this week.

"This is a good opportunity for us. I'm sorry it comes at New Orleans' misfortune," McCombs said. "But the other thing is I feel the Saints are fortunate that we were here."

McCombs joined a chorus of city leaders this week who insisted that this opportunity is about changing the NFL's perception rather than specifically luring the Saints.

"There's certainly that possibility there, and obviously a lot of people in San Antonio have thought about it," Mayor Hardberger said of the idea that the Saints might consider relocating after this season. "But there's really never been any true negotiations on that. I think Tom Benson wants to try to win as many games as he can this year. And we wanted to make our statement to the whole world that we are an aggressive, growing city with a good market.

SAN ANTONIO, from A-29

"I think we will show that, not just to the Saints, but to the whole NFL. Because there's more than one football team in the NFL, and I think that all of these football teams are always looking to see what better market they might have and so forth. And we want San Antonio to be known as a player."

Cisneros, in particular, stressed that the current situation has made it even less likely for any discussions to take place between San Antonio and the Saints, because the city would be seen as "kicking New Orleans while it's down."

"The truth of the matter is, whatever the possibilities between New Orleans and San Antonio, that may have been once upon a time, but that's all pre-Katrina," said Cisneros, who developed strong attachments to the city of New Orleans while working as the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development under President Clinton. "With the effect the Saints can have on the people of New Orleans and Louisiana, I think they will make every effort to keep them there."

Mayor Hardberger admitted there is "certainly that possibility there" that the Saints might consider relocating after this season.

"And obviously a lot of people in San Antonio have thought about it," he said. "But there's really never been any true negotiations on that. I think Tom Benson wants to try to win as many games as he can this year. And we wanted to make our statement to the whole world that we are an aggressive, growing city with a good market.

"I think we will show that, not just to the Saints, but to the whole NFL. San Antonio built its Alamodome in 1993 in hopes of attracting an NFL team. The 65,000-seat indoor stadium is said to now fall short of NFL expectations for a stadium.

To market, to market

Leading sports economists Marc Ganis and Andrew Zimbalist share the opinion that San Antonio, when combined with the growing city of Austin 75 miles to the north, is a viable NFL market.

But they also agree that the league has made two things clear:

It is not interested in expanding beyond 32 teams. And the next city to land an NFL team will be Los Angeles, the second-largest television market in the country, which has been without an NFL team since the Raiders and Rams both left after the 1994 season.

"Until the L.A. market is settled, I don't think there's any other market out there that stands a chance," said Zimbalist, a professor of economics at Smith College.

San Antonio is the eighth-largest city in the United States in population, but the total metropolitan area — a more accurate number when it comes to measuring a fan base — ranks only 30th with 1,592,383 people, according to the 2000 census. New Orleans, before Katrina, ranked 35th at 1,337,726.

San Antonio's television market, the ultimate NFL measuring stick, ranks 37th, ahead of only four current NFL teams — New Orleans, 43rd; Buffalo, 49th; Jacksonville, 52nd; and Green Bay-Appleton, 69th.

Austin's television market ranks 53rd, and combined, the two areas would rank 18th among all NFL markets.

Ganis, president of the Chicago-based consulting firm Sportscorp Ltd., has long believed that the San Antonio-Austin market is the best in the country without an NFL team — citing the corporate base, demographics, a population historically interested in football and the success of the NBA's Spurs.

But Ganis also knows the league does not share his opinion.

When the NFL put together an analysis of select non-NFL cities in 2003, including San Antonio, Birmingham, Portland, Orlando, Sacramento and Salt Lake City, and ranked them in different categories, the San Antonio market ranked fourth or fifth in five of the seven categories.

Another major roadblock that stands in San Antonio's way is that the NFL already has franchises in Dallas and Houston.

The 4-year-old Texans are just 200 miles away from San Antonio. And the Cowboys have a dedicated fan following in San Antonio, where the local Fox television affiliate has decided to air Cowboys games instead of Saints games when they are played at the same time this season.

Relocation of an NFL franchise must be approved by 24 of the league's 32 owners.

The common belief is that Cowboys owner Jerry Jones and Texans owner Bob McNair would block any team's attempt to move into the San Antonio market. But McCombs has insisted that both owners would be supportive if Benson wanted to bring his team here.

Both owners declined interview requests through team spokesmen.

"I don't see them as an obstacle. I see them as a plus," McCombs said, though he added

Dome could be super shelter

DOME, from A-1

if we don't take into consideration the use of the building for some anticipated mass evacuation?"

The seven-member LSED is waiting on a report from architects and contractors to determine the cost of damages before deciding the Superdome's future.

Doug Thornton, the regional vice president of SMG, the company that manages the Dome, said he hopes to receive the report by mid-November. He has previously estimated the cost of damages to be about $150 million.

Coulon said he has no idea whether FEMA would be willing to cover any further enhancements, or even if the Superdome is eligible, but he plans to explore the possibility at future meetings of the LSED.

"I think it's quite credible," Coulon said. "We consider that to be a legitimate expansion of the building."

The Superdome has been declared a refuge of last resort and used as a shelter three times in its 30-year history.

More than 14,000 people sought shelter there from Hurricane Georges in 1998. The evacuees stole furniture and damaged property that resulted in thousands of dollars in losses. About a thousand special-needs patients were housed there for Hurricane Ivan in 2004.

"There isn't a mayor in the future that, faced with the same set of circumstances, wouldn't open up the largest building in the city as an evacuation shelter," Coulon said. "But if you're not going to enhance it, then you can't use the building."

Coulon said the Superdome's insurance is part of a $500 million state policy that includes several state facilities. The state must pay a $25 million deductible. Insurance is expected to pay the rest. However, with so many state buildings damaged from Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita, Coulon said, state officials are going to need FEMA to cover the extra costs.

"That $475 million of insurance is going to be eaten up quickly," Coulon said. "The rest hopefully will be covered by FEMA."

The future of the Superdome has been a lynchpin in negotiations on a long-term contract between state and New Orleans Saints officials for the past year. Saints owner Tom Benson wants a new stadium. State officials have offered a pair of proposals to renovate the Superdome.

Coulon said the Saints are but one of several important factors that state officials must take into consideration when weighing the future of the Dome.

"We can't be pressured into a situation where the Saints are the only concern that we have," Coulon said. "If you have to identify the five most important things to rebuilding the region, would an NFL team be one of them? Considering the magnitude of the problem that everybody across the state faces, they just aren't that important. The Saints can't dictate what we do with the Dome."

Thornton said he continues to receive positive reports from contractors who are cleaning and decontaminating the building. J&J Maintenance of Austin, Texas, reportedly removed 3,000 tons of debris from the building. Also, the electrical and plumbing systems are in better shape than expected. He said he's also confident the building's steel, aluminum and concrete structure is sound.

Dome officials hope to receive bids for the application of a temporary polyurethane roof next week. The roof, which will consist of a hardened foam spray that will make the building weatherproof, is expected to cost around $1 million. Eventually, Thornton said, a new permanent roof will be needed. That addition is expected to cost around $8 million.

"I'm optimistic the Dome is repairable," Thornton said. "We don't know the extent of the damage yet, but I'm hopeful the repairs can be done in a matter of months rather than years. It's critical that we get the building repaired to its pre-storm condition. It's vital to the economy of the city. But it also would serve as a symbol to the rest of the world that New Orleans is back."

Coulon, however, is more cautious.

"I'm very concerned about repairing a sick building," Coulon said. "You cannot see what's behind the walls, the mold and the spores that are in there. All of those things are going to be dealt with over the next 30 to 60 days in doing the assessment. Then we'll see where we go."

San Antonio Saints?

SAN ANTONIO, from A-30

that he has not spoken to either owner about the subject. McCombs also shrugged off Tagliabue's comments. "I know that can change. And he doesn't always prevail. You've got to get 23 votes, and Mr. Tagliabue doesn't vote."

Remember the Alamodome

Of course, all of this speculation could be a moot point if the largest issue of all enters the picture — money.

Sure, the Alamodome may suffice for the short term. But just as Benson wanted a new stadium in New Orleans, any potential NFL owner would surely insist on an upgrade over the Alamodome, which has just 34 suites and, by all accounts, falls short of NFL standards.

After having preliminary relocation talks with the Arizona Cardinals in 1999, the city of San Antonio commissioned a study in 2000 to determine what it would cost to bring the Alamodome up to NFL standards.

The study estimated about $200 million for the minimum number of suites and club seating, in addition to more parking and a new training facility.

"We've got some idea what it would take to upgrade the dome. But would that make (a potential NFL team) happy? If they're not happy with that, then do you have someone who wants to write a $500 million check?" Wolff said. "I don't know who the hell would build a new stadium. It won't be me.

"We built the arena for the Spurs (the SBC Center in 2002). We have a capacity in our bonds maybe to do something down the line. But the issue then would be, if you build a new one, what do you do with the one you've got?"

Wolff said that the city and county used up just about every last bit of their sales taxes and hotel-motel taxes, which are approaching a state-mandated cap, to fund the SBC Center.

The Spurs have been a tremendous success, thanks in large part to their winning three NBA titles in the past seven years. But selling out the 54 suites in the arena has not been an easy task, and corporate dollars might become even more stretched with two professional teams in town.

Still, the community leaders, beginning with the recently elected Hardberger, will continue to explore all their options. And many of them stick to the credo, "Where there's a will, there's a way."

"Look, the reason why the Saints are in San Antonio is because the taxpayers in the city built the Alamodome. We built the Alamodome 20 years ago with just the hope of bringing an NFL team to town," said Christian Archer, special assistant to the mayor and his point man on the NFL issue. "I think the city of San Antonio is prepared. We've been prepared for 20 years."

WASHINGTON — There is a deja vu quality to the nation's post-Katrina interest in race and poverty. It brings to mind the call-to-conscience of the Kerner Commission, named by President Johnson in the wake of the urban riots of the 1960s, and its warning of an America "moving toward two societies, one black, one white, separate and unequal."

But of course, America is not black and white anymore, thanks to another legacy of that era: the Hart-Cellar Immigration Act, which Johnson signed into law Oct. 3, 1965. Infused with the civil rights spirit of the day, Hart-Cellar eliminated national origin quotas designed to keep the United States a mostly Northern European nation, ushering in an era of mass immigration, mostly from Latin America and Asia. It would transform America's racial and ethnic makeup more than any legislation in history. Forty years later, whites are a diminished majority in a far more diverse nation, but still comprise more than two-thirds of its population and a commanding share of its wealth and power.

Black people, meanwhile, have lost their standing as the dominant minority group, effectively ceding their singular claim on the national conscience, their grievances undermined by the competing demands and relative success of many immigrants of color.

"People are becoming aware that you can't talk about black and white anymore," said Gerald Jaynes, professor of economics and African-American studies at Yale University. In 1989, Jaynes co-edited "A Common Destiny," in its time the definitive study of blacks in American society. By 2000, he was editing another volume, "Immigration and Race."

Largest U.S. minority

In 1960, blacks accounted for 69 percent of the U.S. minority population.

By 2004, according to Census Bureau estimates, blacks were only 39 percent of the minority population. Hispanics became the largest minority in 2001.

"What we have is not a black and white situation. It's black and brown, and white and Asian, and black and Asian, and on it goes," said Earl Ofari Hutchinson, a black writer and commentator who presides over the weekly Los Angeles Urban Roundtable.

In Los Angeles, as in California, blacks are now the third-largest minority, behind both Latinos and Asians, their ranks of elected officials thinning year by year. Watts, the definitive black ghetto when it exploded in riots in August 1965, long ago became mostly Latino.

"This is a new world," said Nicolas Vaca, a Bay Area lawyer and sociologist, author of last year's "The Presumed Alliance: The Unspoken Conflict Between Latinos and Blacks and What It Means for America."

In his book, Vaca describes the demographic wave overtaking black America as "the Latino tsunami" that will forever alter the arithmetic of minority politics. The new axioms of power, he writes, are that Latinos outnumber blacks, that they will compete for jobs and resources, that Latinos have their own history of oppression, and, most pointedly, that "because Latinos are not responsible for the plight of African-Americans, they come to the table with a clear conscience."

Changing landscape

From the Civil War to the civil rights movement, black appeals to conscience and white guilt have proved indispensable to progress. But, as time passes and America's complexion changes, those appeals lose traction.

When John Hope Franklin, the eminent historian of the black experience, was named chairman of President Clinton's advisory board on race in 1997, he insisted that the board first focus on the fundamental question of black-white relations. Countered Angela Oh, a liberal young Korean-American lawyer from Los Angeles, who served on the board: "We can't undo this part of our heritage. But what we can affect is where we are headed. I want to talk about multiculturalism, because I think that's where we are headed."

When Philadelphia earlier this year became the first city to require that every high school student take a year-long course in African and African-American history, Chester Finn Jr., a conservative education reformer who served in the Reagan Education Department, assailed the development in the name of immigrant children.

"Why are they and their heritages being discriminated against?" Finn wrote in the June 16 newsletter of the Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, of which he is president. "One imagines families of Mexican, Trinidadian, Irish, Korean and Bangladeshi backgrounds asking why the school system is 'privileging' its African-American students' heritage and neglecting their own."

These are perilous times for African-Americans, argues Stephen Steinberg, a scholar of race at Queens College and author of "The Ethnic Myth" and "Turning Back: The Retreat From Racial Justice in American Thought and Policy." Steinberg addressed immigration's impact on black people in the summer issue of the left journal New Politics.

"The extension of race beyond the binary of black and white, the admission of permutations in the middle, has deflected attention away from the unique and unresolved problems of race qua African-Americans," he wrote.

Black people are caught coming and going. The success of many immigrants of color is used as proof that black people's misery is their own doing, not, as the Kerner Commission asserted, the consequence of white racism. But Steinberg said even many on the left turn a blind eye to the racism he sees as intrinsic in employer preferences for immigrant labor, in the network hiring and ethnic niches in the economy that limit opportunities for black people.

Accused American may have left Afghanistan

Shooting victim's family demands trial

By Matthew Pennington
Associated Press writer

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — Afghan human rights activists warned Saturday that allegations that an American security contractor killed his Afghan interpreter could hurt the image of the United States in Afghanistan — even as the U.S. military suffers its deadliest year yet fighting Taliban rebels.

Underscoring the danger, militants firing rocket-propelled grenades killed a U.S. soldier and wounded another during combat operations Friday near the southern city of Kandahar, the military said. The death brought to 198 the number of U.S. service members killed in or around Afghanistan since the ouster of the unpopular Taliban regime in late 2001.

Relatives of the slain interpreter, 37-year-old Noor Ahmad, threatened to set themselves on fire unless his American supervisor is tried for his death, which occurred at a compound of U.S. Protection and Investigations in western Farah province. U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor told The Associated Press that it was "our understanding that this American citizen is no longer in Afghanistan."

The case has raised questions about the reach of Afghanistan's fledgling legal system and law enforcers.

Foreigners working on civilian projects are generally subject to Afghan law, but the legal status of security contractors appears unclear. U.S. military personnel in Afghanistan come under American military jurisdiction.

The Farah police chief said Thursday that his investigators were barred from entering the security company's compound after the shooting.

Ahmad Fahim Hakim, the deputy chairman of the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission, urged a thorough and transparent probe into the shooting.

"We are very concerned about this kind of incident," he said. "It also blurs the friendly image that the Americans developed in Afghanistan in the early days. That is gradually vanishing."

There are conflicting reports about what triggered the shooting.

Relatives claim the American opened fire during a late-night party because of a personal grievance against the Afghan. But a local militia commander who heard the shooting and later saw Ahmad's body claimed the interpreter was to blame.

The company provides security for foreign contract workers in Afghanistan.

Company officials have repeatedly declined to comment.

Fazel Ahmad, 45, a brother of the dead man, said that if the American was allowed to flee it would be a mockery of Afghan democracy.

"My brother who died has seven children. Who will take care of them? This guy should be brought to justice and there should be an open trial, because he is a foreigner and he has killed a poor Afghan man," Fazel Ahmad told The AP in Herat.

CAPT. CHRISTOPHER TOLAND, platoon commander

For last Marine from the squad, doubts about the war in Iraq

Blast kills 11 men who were his second family

By Antonio Castaneda
Associated Press writer

Marine Lance Cpl. Edward Schroeder, left, and Lance Cpl. Christopher Dyer, right, patrol with fellow Marines in the city of Kubaysah, Iraq. Schroeder and Dyer were later killed by a roadside bomb along with nine members of their squad.

HADITHA DAM, IRAQ — Cpl. David Kreuter had a new baby boy he'd seen only in photos. Lance Cpl. Michael Cifuentes was counting the days to his wedding. Lance Cpl. Nicholas Bloem had just celebrated his 20th birthday.

Travis Williams remembers them all — all 11 men in his Marine squad — all now dead. Two months ago they shared a cramped room stacked with bunk beds at this base in northwest Iraq, where the Euphrates River rushes by. Now the room has been stripped of several beds, brutal testament that Lance Cpl. Williams' closest friends are gone.

For the 12 young Marines who landed in Iraq early this year, the war was a series of hectic, constant raids into more than a dozen lawless towns in Iraq's most hostile province, Anbar. The pace and the danger bound them together into what they called a second family, even as some began to question whether their raids were making any progress.

Now, all of the Marines assigned to the 1st Squad, 3rd Platoon, Lima Company, 3rd Battalion, 25th Regiment, based in Columbus, Ohio, are gone — except Williams. They died in a roadside bomb set by insurgents on Aug. 3 that killed a total of 14 Marines. Most of the squad were in their early 20s; the youngest was 19.

"They were like a family. They were the tightest squad I've ever seen," said Capt. Christopher Toland of Austin, Texas, the squad's platoon commander. Even though many did not know each other before they got to Iraq, "They truly loved each other."

All that is left are photos and snippets of video, saved on dusty laptops, that run for a few dozen seconds. As they pack up to return home by early October, the Marines from Lima Company — including the squad's replacements — sometimes huddle around Williams' laptop in a room at the dam, straining to watch the few remaining moments of their young friends' lives. Some photos and videos carry the squad's adopted motto, "Family is Forever."

In one video, Lance Cpl. Christopher Dyer, who graduated with honors last year from a Cincinnati-area high school, strums his guitar and does a mock-heartfelt rendition of "Puff the Magic Dragon" as his friends laugh around him.

In a photo, Kreuter rides a bicycle through a neighborhood, swerving under the weight of body armor and weapons, as Marines and Iraqis watch and chuckle.

Each video ends abruptly, leaving behind a blank screen. Some are switched off as soon as they start — some images just hurt too much to see right now.

Just another sweep

The August operation began like most of the squad's missions, with a rush into another lawless Iraqi city to hunt insurgents and do house-to-house searches, sometimes for 12 hours in temperatures near 120 degrees.

On Aug. 1, six Marine snipers had been ambushed and killed in Haditha, one of a string of cities that line the Euphrates, filled with waving palm trees. Two days later, Marines in armored vehicles, including the 1st Squad, rumbled into the area to look for the culprits.

Like other cities in this region, Haditha has no Iraqi troops, and its police force was destroyed earlier in the year by a wave of insurgent attacks. Marines patrol roads on the perimeter and occasionally raid homes in the city, which slopes along a quiet river valley. Commanders say insurgents have challenged local tribes for control and claim Iraq's most wanted terrorist, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, once had a home here.

Since their arrival in February, the Marines had spent nearly all their time on such sweeps or preparing for them, sometimes hurrying back to their base to grab fresh clothes, then heading off again to cities that hadn't seen American or Iraqi troops in months.

The intense pace of the operations, and the enormous area their regimental combat team had to cover — an expanse the size of West Virginia — caught some off guard.

The combat was certainly not what the 21-year-old Williams had expected.

"I didn't ever think we'd get engaged," said the soft-spoken, stocky Marine from Helena, Mont. "I just had the basic view of the American public — it can't be that bad out there."

In some sweeps, residents warmly greeted the Marines. But in others, such as operations in Haditha and Obeidi near the Syrian border, the squad members met gunfire and explosions. In the Obeidi operation in early May, another squad from Lima Company suffered six deaths. Williams himself perhaps saved lives, once spotting a gunman hidden in a mosque courtyard, said Toland, the platoon commander.

The night before the Aug. 3 operation, an uneasy Toland couldn't sleep. Instead he spent his last night with his squad members talking and joking, trying to suppress worries the mission was too predictable for an enemy that knew how to watch and learn.

"I had concerns that the operation was hastily planned and executed, with significant risks and little return," Toland said.

The road had been checked by engineers and other units, Marine commanders say. But insurgents had been clever, hiding the massive bomb under the road's asphalt.

Several Humvees first drove over the bomb, but the triggerman in the distance apparently waited for a vehicle with more troops. Then, as the clanking sound of their armored vehicles neared, a massive blast erupted, caused by explosives weighing hundreds of pounds. It threw a 26-ton Amphibious Assault Vehicle into the air, leaving it burning upside-down.

'They were the tightest squad I've ever seen'

MARINES, from A-34

The blast was so large that Toland and his radioman, Williams, traveling two vehicles ahead and not injured, thought their vehicle had been hit by a bomb. They scrambled out to inspect the damage, but instead found the blazing carnage several yards down the road.

A total of 14 Marines and one Iraqi interpreter were killed.

No help from witnesses

There was no time for grieving, not at first. There was only sudden devastation, then intense anger as the Marines pulled the remains of their friends from the vehicle.

Then there was frustration, as they fanned out to find the triggerman. Instead, they found only Iraqis either too sympathetic to the insurgency, or too afraid, to talk.

Although the bomb had been planted in clear view of their homes, residents claimed they had seen nothing of the men who had spent hours digging a large hole several feet deep and concealing the bomb.

It was a familiar and frustrating problem.

"They are totally complacent with what's going on here," said Maj. Steve Lawson of Columbus, Ohio, who commands Lima Company. "The average citizen in Haditha either wants a handout, or wants us to die or go away."

In a war where intelligence is the most valued asset, the Marines say few local people will divulge "actionable" information that could be used to locate insurgents.

Some Iraqis apparently fear reprisal attacks from militants. Many just want to stay out of the crossfire. Others hate the Americans enough to protect the insurgents: Marines say lookouts in cities would often launch flares as their vehicles approached.

In this region ruled by Sunni tribal loyalties, few voted for the new central Iraqi government, and many suspect the U.S. military is punishing them and empowering their longtime rivals, the Shiites of the south and the Kurds of the north.

"From a squad leader's perspective, the intelligence never helped me accomplish my mission," said Sgt. Don Owens, a squad leader in Lima Company from Cincinnati, who fought alongside the 1st Squad throughout their tour.

"Their intelligence is better than ours," Owens said.

Without his family

The first night after the attack, Williams couldn't sleep. He stayed near his radio, listening to the heavy sobbing of fellow Marines that punctured the night around him.

He thought of his best friend, Lance Cpl. Aaron Reed, a 21-year-old with a goofy demeanor and a perpetual smile, now dead.

A world without his second family had begun. The young men Williams had planned to meet up with again, back in the States, had vanished in a matter of minutes. He was alone.

Yet from a military standpoint, it was important to press on to show the enemy that even their best hits couldn't stop the world's most powerful military. The Marines were ordered away from the blast site, to hunt insurgents, just one hour after the explosion.

They stayed out for another week, searching through dozens of homes in the nearby city of Parwana and struggling to piece together intelligence about who had planted the bomb.

"I pushed them back out the door to finish the mission," said Lawson. "They did it, but they were crying as they pushed on."

As word spread back in the United States that 14 men had been killed, the Marines on the ongoing mission couldn't even, at first, contact their families to let them know they had survived.

Militants are killed

Marine commanders say the large-scale raids in western Anbar province have kept the insurgency off-balance, killing hundreds of militants and leaving a dwindling number of insurgent bases in the area.

They say the sweeps are critical to beat back the insurgent presence in larger cities such as Ramadi and Baghdad, where suicide bombings have been rampant.

But, among some Marines and even officers, there are doubts whether progress has been made.

The insurgents lurk nearby, capable of launching mortars and suicide car bombs and quietly re-entering cities soon after the Marines return to their bases on the outskirts.

"We've been here almost seven months and we don't control" the cities, said Gunnery Sgt. Ralph Perrine, an operations chief in the battalion from Brunswick, Ohio. "It's no secret."

Even commanders acknowledge that with the limited number of U.S. and Iraqi troops in the region, the mission is focused on "disrupting and interdicting" the insurgency — that is, keeping them on the run — and not controlling the cities.

"It's maintenance work," said Col. Stephen Davis, commander of all Marine operations in western Anbar. "Because this out here is where the fight is, while the success is happening downtown while the constitution is being written and while the referendum is getting worked out ... If I could bring every insurgent in the world out here and fight them all day long, we've done our job."

For Williams, the calculation is much more visceral and personal.

"Personally, I don't think the sweeps help too much," he said quietly on a recent day, sitting in a room at the dam, crowded with Marines resting from a late mission the night before.

"You find some stuff and most of the bad guys get away ... For as much energy as we put in them, I don't think the output is worth it," he said.

Williams, a Marine for three years, has decided not to re-enlist.

Instead, in these last days in Iraq, he thinks of home and fishing in the clear streams of Montana. He hopes to open a fishing and hunting gear shop once he returns and complete his bachelor's degree in wildlife biology. He looks forward to seeing his mother, his only surviving parent, and traveling to her native Thailand this fall.

He said his "best memory" will be the day he leaves Iraq. His only good memories, he said, are of his friends:

Of Dyer, 19, an avid rap music fan who would bop his head to Tupac Shakur. He played the viola in his high school orchestra and had planned to enroll in a finance honors program at Ohio State University.

Of Reed, his best friend. He was president of his high school class from Chillicothe, Ohio, and left behind a brother serving in Afghanistan.

Of Cifuentes, 25, from Oxford, Ohio. He was enrolled in graduate school in mathematics education and had been working as a substitute teacher when he was deployed.

"I think the most frustrating thing is there's no sense of accomplishment," Williams said. "You're biding your time and waiting. But then you lose your friends, and it's not even for their own country's freedom."

Miller case puzzles journalists

Reporter jailed 85 days before revealing source

By David B. Caruso
Associated Press writer

NEW YORK — New York Times reporter Judith Miller's decision to escape jail by testifying about her conversations with a confidential source surprised some of her supporters and left journalists wondering what her choice will mean for press freedoms.

Miller spent 85 days in jail for initially refusing to tell a grand jury whom she spoke with about Valerie Plame, a covert CIA official whose identity was leaked to several reporters in 2003.

But on Thursday she was abruptly released from prison, and a day later gave a grand jury the testimony long sought by Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald.

The reason for the abrupt change: Miller said that her source, identified by the Times as Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby, called her in prison and urged her to break her silence.

"This was the first time where he was saying, do it. I want you to testify," said Miller's attorney, Floyd Abrams.

News of her release from jail was greeted with joy by some of the organizations that had supported her, but also some dismay.

"Miller's release is obviously good news in itself," said the press freedom group Reporters Without Borders, "but she recovered her freedom in exchange for naming her source, albeit with the source's agreement, which means that the principle of the confidentiality of sources, one of the pillars of journalism, has been flouted."

AP PHOTO

Testimony Friday before a grand jury by New York Times reporter Judith Miller about conversations with a confidential source is of concern to journalists, who wonder what her decision will mean for press freedoms. Miller spent 85 days in jail for refusing to tell a grand jury whom she spoke with about Valerie Plame, a covert CIA official.

Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, praised Miller for her conduct in the case, but predicted its outcome would embolden other prosecutors to investigate press leaks, jailing reporters if necessary.

"This is very dangerous territory," she said.

In deciding to testify, Miller followed a path set by Time Magazine reporter Matt Cooper, who also was threatened with jail for refusing to say who told him about Plame's identity.

Shortly before he was to report to prison, Cooper said he received permission to break his silence from his confidential source: presidential adviser Karl Rove.

The idea of confronting a source who was initially promised confidentiality and asking for permission to go public discomfited Myron Farber, a New York Times reporter who was jailed for 40 days in 1978 for refusing to turn over notes reveal sources in a murder case. He said such requests might be seen as coercive.

"It may be inoffensive in this case," he said, given Libby's position of power and savvy in dealing with the press. "But smaller people might tremble more when the reporter calls back and says, 'can you release me?'

He quickly added that he had no cause to criticize Miller, whom he said he supported completely.

"I'm in no position, or you, to tell someone who is not a criminal, who has been locked up, 'You stick it out,' " he said.

Bob Steele, a journalism faculty member at the Poynter Institute, said going back to a source to seek a waiver is probably ethical, but should be avoided if possible.

He said reporters should ideally talk to their informants about how they might respond to a future subpoena before confidentiality is granted in the first place.

"Then, going back to the source (if a problem comes up later) doesn't come out of left field," he said.

Iran issues oil sales warning, paper says

Possible sanctions prompts statement

By Tarek Al-Issawi
Associated Press writer

DUBAI, UNITED ARAB EMIRATES — Iran's president threatened to curtail oil sales if the country is referred to the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions on its nuclear program, a newspaper reported Saturday.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad insisted in an interview with the Khaleej Times that Iran's nuclear program was peaceful. But he warned the country would protect its right to a nuclear fuel supply.

"If Iran's case is sent to the Security Council, we will respond by many ways, for example by holding back on oil sales," the president told the Dubai-based newspaper.

Iran pumps about 4 million barrels daily, making it the second-largest producer in the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries after Saudi Arabia. Crude oil exports normally account for about 80 percent of Iran's hard currency income, and an oil official last month projected revenues from oil exports this year at $43 billion.

The United States does not purchase Iranian oil, but it would be affected by a substantial Iranian curtailment of oil supplies as that would raise the price of oil on the world market.

Ahmadinejad's remarks came after a resolution passed by the International Atomic Energy Agency last month put Iran on the verge of referral unless Tehran eases suspicions about its nuclear activities. Iran insists its nuclear program is for energy purposes, while the United States suspects Iran is trying to build nuclear weapons.

Since the U.N. nuclear agency's resolution, other Iranian officials have threatened to resume uranium enrichment and block U.N. inspections of its nuclear facilities unless the U.N. nuclear agency stepped back from its action.

Iran has also threatened to use trade to punish countries that voted for the resolution, and last week the parliament began debating a bill to force the government to scale back cooperation with the IAEA.

The president criticized the resolution and foreign countries, however, for trying to impose their will on Iran.

"I said I'll do every thing in order to uphold our national interest," Ahmadinejad said of his campaign promises ahead of the June presidential election. "One of these things is that we will have access to the nuclear supply process."

"We don't want to be at war with the world," he said.

Volcano kills two in El Salvador

By Edgar Romero
Associated Press writer

PALO CAMPANA, EL SALVADOR — A volcano in western El Salvador erupted on Saturday, sending a column of ash 50,000 feet into the air and killing two farmers buried by chunks of earth and boiling water that tumbled down the slopes.

Authorities ordered the evacuation of three communities in the shadow of the Ilamatepec volcano, which towers near Santa Ana, the country's second largest city, 40 miles from San Salvador, the capital.

"The volcano has entered an eruptive phase that consists of ashes and gases," Interior Secretary Rene Figueroa said.

It was unclear how many people had been ordered to leave their homes. Figueroa said as many as 10,000 residents live close to the volcano, but that most areas were not evacuated.

Emergency response officials said two farmers died and two other residents of the coffee-growing town of Palo Campana were missing.

The ground was smoldering when soldiers arrived to assist in the evacuations. Falling ash had destroyed coffee crops and damaged trees in surrounding forests.

Small bodies of water were steaming and bubbling from the heat and ash covered the ground as far as the eye could see. Problems with landslides worsened as afternoon rains pelted the area.

"We have had an eruption of moderate magnitude," President Tony Saca said during a visit to the country's national emergency response headquarters. But he added that "there was no lava."

Kenyan rains suspend moving of elephants

By Tom Maliti
Associated Press writer

NAIROBI, KENYA — Rangers suspended efforts to relocate 400 elephants because the upcoming rainy season will make it difficult to transport them, Kenya's Wildlife Service spokeswoman said Saturday.

The service has been moving the elephants from a small reserve with too many of the animals to another park 220 miles away. Rangers have so far moved 150 elephants from Shimba Hills National Reserve to Tsavo East National Park, spokeswoman Connie Maina said.

Ahead of the rainy season, "we want to concentrate more on monitoring the elephants we have (transported) to ensure they remain within the boundaries of the park and check whether they are comfortable," Maina told The Associated Press.

Efforts suspended Wednesday are expected to resume in January.

Rangers began Kenya's biggest elephant relocation on Aug. 25. It is expected to cost $3.2 million, and is being entirely financed by the government.

Shimba Hills has 600 elephants, three times what it can comfortably handle, resulting in the animals moving into populated areas, destroying crops and injuring people. Encounters between elephants and humans have been increasing as Kenya's population grows, prompting more people move to empty lands close to national parks.

Tsavo East has 10,397 elephants, down from a peak of 25,268 in 1972.

Dominicans re-examine attitude toward firearms

Children have been hit by stray bullets

By Peter Prengaman
Associated Press writer

BANI, DOMINICAN REPUBLIC — Tania Diaz sits on the floor of her family's one-bedroom shack, lowering her head to hide her eyes.

The tall, thin 5-year-old was struck by a stray bullet that left her blind —in a series of random incidents of gun violence that has forced this Caribbean nation to reconsider its casual attitude toward firearms.

President Leonel Fernandez has called for a debate on the issue in a country where men walk around with pistols strapped to their belts and women regularly carry revolvers in their purses.

The obstacles are many: overcoming a cultural acceptance of gun possession, tracking down an unknown number of firearms smuggled in from neighboring Haiti and rooting out corrupt police officers who facilitate the illegal arms trade.

"Here you need to have your gun out so the criminals see it and retreat," said Jose Dia, a 33-year-old businessman who recently bought a 9 mm pistol in the capital of Santo Domingo.

Fernandez recently invited two children injured by stray bullets to appear on his weekly television to emphasize the need for gun control.

Dominican law has long required gun owners to conceal their weapons from public view. But the law is rarely enforced. Thousands of private security guards tote shotguns outside stores, gas stations, banks and private homes.

Revelers also fire into the air during national celebrations, shootouts at nightclubs are common and domestic disputes frequently end in gunshot deaths.

Last month, an argument during a meeting of regional politicians outside Santo Domingo ended in a shootout, leaving four dead and a dozen injured.

The statistics on guns are staggering in a country of 8.8 million.

▶At least 25 children have been killed or injured by stray bullets since January, say law enforcement officials and doctors at hospitals.

▶1,719 homicides in the first eight months of the year, compared with 1,513 during the same period in 2004. Police estimate guns are used in 75 percent of homicides.

▶190,000 registered firearms, including pistols, shotguns, rifles and automatic weapons used by the military, Secretary of Interior and Police Frank Almeyda said.

▶Hundreds of thousands of illegal guns, the majority smuggled in from Haiti, which shares an ill-patrolled 225-mile border with the Dominican Republic.

As a first step toward gun control, the government announced two weeks ago that people who renew or apply for new permits will not be allowed to carry their weapons unless they get special authorization.

Earlier this year, a team of 300 police officers and soldiers began searching vehicles at checkpoints and stopping people carrying guns on the streets to ask for permits.

The team confiscates about 1,000 illegally possessed guns a month, Almeyda said. But efforts are hindered by rampant police corruption, he conceded.

"When a police officer tells me his gun has been stolen, I order an immediate investigation because he probably sold it," Almeyda told The Associated Press.

Gun rights advocates say permit laws are strict enough. Applicants must take a drug test, undergo a criminal background check and get a psychological evaluation. They also must train at a shooting gallery for a day.

"There is already a lot of control over gun sales," Eduardo de la Rocha, a firearms importer in Santo Domingo, said. "And it's more dangerous to have a gun hidden than in the open."

Others warn that new laws on permits would be as ineffective as the old ones unless the government improves enforcement.

"In a country where visas and passports are falsified, obtaining a (permit) will be a child's game," a recent editorial in El Caribe newspaper said.

Gun violence has become a way of life in the poor neighborhoods of Bani, where Tania's family lives about 50 miles west of Santo Domingo.

In April, a stray bullet struck Tania's right temple and exited her left eye, severing her optic nerves and leaving her blind.

"At night, there are always a lot of shots. Sometimes they land on the roof," her mother, Amancia Diaz said. "We never go out. We are afraid."

Her daughter, once a leader in playing among her three younger sisters, still plays on some days, her mother said. "But often she sits on the floor, crying and kicking her feet, refusing to get up."

Commmunity has faith in shrine

The sign on Sacred Heart Church in Lacombe tells the story: "No Mass at Shrine until further notice."

Our Lady of Lourdes Shrine off Fish Hatchery Road is once again in need of repairs.

"We're out of business for now," said the Rev. William O'-Donnell, pastor of Sacred Heart.

After winds from Hurricane Ivan sent a huge pine crashing through the chapel's old roof last September, Sacred Heart Church embarked on a $90,000 renovation of the beloved 81-year-old shrine.

The first Mass was held in the refurbished chapel July 27; the last one a few days before Hurricane Katrina leveled countless trees near the rustic, mustard-colored building and punched another one through the brand-new reinforced standing-seam roof.

"The roof is the modern version of the metal roofs you find in southeastern Louisiana," Father Bill said.

"It does a great job if you can keep trees off it."

A devastating scene

When June McGee stepped inside the chapel after Katrina, it was like seeing a favorite old friend who had suddenly taken ill.

"It was heart-breaking when I opened the door that first day. It was a mess. There was glass everywhere," she said.

There was a gaping hole in the roof, Sheetrock lay in pieces on the floor, and a branch from the offending tree had broken one of the new skylights in the chapel.

"It was so pretty after we fixed it up," she said. "I wish you could have seen it."

The shrine was built in 1923 by the Rev. Francis Balay, a French Benedictine monk who was a missionary in St. Tammany Parish. He placed it on a hillside with a stream nearby that reminded him of the shrine in Lourdes, France, where pilgrims went to bathe in the healing water.

"You know what really bothers me? Our gurgling brook is no longer gurgling," June said.

Planning to reopen

Father Bill has no idea how long it will be before the shrine can be fixed up again.

"The insurance company has taken pictures, but the whole area is so overwhelmed I don't know when they'll be back," he said.

He managed to cover the hole in the roof temporarily so rain can't get in, although his first design had a slight flaw.

"The Visqueen took off and went flying with my two-by-fours attached. My expertise is not in roof fixing," he said.

With many churches severely damaged or destroyed by Katrina, Father Bill isn't complaining about the relatively minor damage at the shrine. But he knows how much it means to people such as June, who has worshipped there at weekday Masses for years.

"Everybody in the community loves our little shrine, and we're not going to give up on it," June said.

She knows that one day the roof will be repaired, the fallen trees that clog the brook will be removed, and the doors will open again. And she will kneel and say a prayer of thanks for the lovely little chapel in the woods.

Grim work faces teams at St. Gabriel

By Lynne Jensen
Staff writer

Surrounded by nearly 900 corpses one month after Hurricane Katrina, Nick Nichols is caught in a hellish reality that he predicted but can't comprehend.

"New Orleans was nothing but a caldron brewing because there was no plan in place," said Nichols, public health emergency response coordinator for the state's Department of Health and Hospitals' Region One, which includes Orleans, Jefferson, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes.

Nick Nichols, a retired Naval officer, said three tours of duty in Vietnam did not prepare him for what he has seen before and after Katrina.

Nichols, 53, whose house in Metairie flooded after Katrina, spends most of his time at the morgue set up at St. Gabriel for storm casualties. It includes "a mixture of all genders and ages," he said.

"To our knowledge, we haven't received anyone who is a victim of (Hurricane) Rita," Nichols said, referring to the powerful storm that hit southwest Louisiana almost four weeks after Katrina.

Of the climbing number of bodies brought to the morgue in refrigerated trucks, 300 had been identified and 32 claimed, Nichols said Wednesday.

About 200 doctors, morticians, nurses and volunteers are living in tents at St. Gabriel "making sure the dead are being treated with respect," Nichols said.

"I have observed bodies laid out in a dignified way, 11 on each side of the truck," he said.

White-haired and dressed in jeans and a cowboy hat, Nichols said a person designated as a "tracker" is assigned to each body and remains with it throughout an examination process.

Bodies are placed on a gurney while a team of people, including an FBI official, examines them for identifying factors, such as wallets, scars and tattoos, he said.

The bodies are decontaminated and X-rayed for signs, such as bullets, that would necessitate an autopsy, he said.

If needed to determine an identity, DNA and fingerprints are taken, he said.

The bodies are being kept in a huge refrigeration unit, he said, and a database has been created to match family members searching for loved ones

Rita pushed Harvey Canal to the brink

Officials hope project shores up flood protection

By Joe Darby
West Bank bureau

It nearly happened seven years ago during Tropical Storm Frances, and it almost happened again Sept. 24 when Hurricane Rita's winds pushed a roiling wall of water from the Gulf of Mexico up the Harvey Canal, threatening to spill over makeshift levees and inundate parts of Harvey, Gretna and Algiers.

Jefferson Parish officials were so concerned that they had staged 21 buses at a Manhattan Boulevard parking lot to evacuate residents who did not have transportation, said Walter Maestri, parish director of emergency operations. Firetrucks were on standby to go from neighborhood to neighborhood, alerting residents of the danger. A shelter was set up at Louis Armstrong International Airport, and motorists would have been directed to take the elevated West Bank Expressway to the Huey P. Long Bridge out of harm's way, Maestri said.

Meanwhile, crews spent 12 hours plugging seepages in the levees alongside the canal. With the surge lapping at the banks, the Army Corps of Engineers opened the locks at the Mississippi River at 3 p.m., providing only minor relief, because the river's water level wasn't much lower than that of the swollen canal.

"I saw waves so high you could have surfed on them," said Harry "Chip" Cahill III, president of the West Jefferson Levee District. "If they'd kept up like that much longer, it could have been bad."

Rita had her way with low-lying Lafitte, Crown Point and Barataria, which took on enough water that hundreds of residents who ignored mandatory evacuation orders had to be rescued by the Coast Guard and Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office deputies.

The drama that played out last weekend after the West Bank had dodged Hurricane Katrina was another reminder

'Wherever the people are, the church will be there, too'

CHURCH, from B-1

back to his wife and two neighbors.

The four converged and embraced in the middle of mud-caked Missouri Street, sweaty and dirty from foraging in the greasy sludge that coated the floors of their homes, the streets, the entire suburban reach of ruined Chalmette and St. Bernard.

As usual, the tears came quickly.

"Oh Father, will we have a church again? Will there be a parish?" one of the women asked, her voice quivering.

"We'll see. A lot's going to depend on the government and where they let us rebuild," Lomax said. "But you can be sure of this: Wherever the people are, the church will be there, too. It's just not clear where that's going to be yet."

So it goes around metropolitan New Orleans, in southeast Louisiana and in Texas, where in muddy streets and in make-do shelters, in borrowed hotel meeting rooms and even on the Internet, New Orleans pastors have confronted the most basic physical, spiritual and emotional needs of families who have lost all they own.

"In the last couple of weeks I've done literally everything, from social work and mental health counseling to psychological and spiritual warfare," said the Rev. Charles Southall of First Emanuel Baptist Church.

Southall is now displaced in Baton Rouge, tending to a few hundred of his scattered New Orleans flock made homeless and destitute, like him.

Like them, he lost everything he owns. He delivered his first sermon after the storm in a borrowed pulpit, wearing a suit and shoes donated by his hosts.

He is still locating members of his church, scattered before the storm from "sea to shining sea."

He works with some; worries about the rest. Restful sleep has eluded him for the month since Hurricane Katrina struck, he said.

"The need has grown so exponentially since the storm. It's so intense. I get two or three hours of sleep at a time and then I'm up. There's so much hurt; so much pain."

Yet in the midst of pain is a powerful recompense.

Although physically and mentally exhausted and suffering their own material losses, many pastors say they have never felt more needed than in the past month, consoling, explaining, encouraging – or helping their people solve the practical problems of housing, food and income.

What's needed now

The Rev. Walter Austin, a Catholic priest and Louisiana National Guard chaplain, worked with nearly 30,000 evacuees in the squalid indignities of the Superdome for five days after the storm.

He walked among the crowds in his military camouflage, a chaplain's cross on his black beret and a Bible in his hand.

He introduced himself and showed them how to prepare their military-issued rations. He chatted with them; got to understand the social landscape as they bonded into family and neighborhood groups for support and encouragement.

He preached morning Scripture services from atop a generator cart outside the stadium. He spoke from the book of Job, the tormented soul beloved by God. He promised them they were not abandoned.

Often, he said, they asked him to pray with them. "Prayer was such an instrumental part of their lives," he said. "And what they prayed for was not for God to get them out of this, but to comfort them and get them through it."

When, after five days, they began file, exhausted and bedraggled, onto evacuation buses, many left the line to grasp Austin's hand in thanks.

"Some had urine stains on their clothing. Do you understand what they went through?" he said. "But they were coming over to us to say goodbye and to thank us. And it was spontaneous, heartfelt.

"My being there meant something to them, and that was a real joy."

Said Southall, the displaced pastor of a remnant flock-in-exile, "They need to see the fearless leader.

"They need to see some human sign that God has not abandoned them when they need him most."

Southall is more than a theologian and counselor. In a time of overwhelming need he has become a housing broker, relief expert and red-tape cutter. Politically active before the storm, Southall has dozens of contacts in public life – people to be called upon to help secure a permit or speed up an application for relief.

"You can't preach and teach until you've met their needs," he said.

Lots of tears

Lomax has been back to his wrecked St. Mark's four times, each time encountering parishioners.

Officials estimate that every one of the 27,000 homes in St. Bernard will have to be bulldozed.

Boats sit on roofs. Cars are upended on their noses, their rear wheels snagged on rooflines. The homes' interiors are a dark, unrecognizable chaos of overturned furniture, foul muck and, sometimes, poisonous snakes.

"It's always the same. They burst into tears. They came back for something – anything – but they can't find even the pictures of the kids. There's a thousand ways of saying the same thing."

On Thursday Lomax returned again to retrieve a few personal items – a checkbook, car payment book, pictures of his late father for his 91-year-old mother, who lost everything in Lakeview.

Then he drove slowly up and down the streets lined with what used to be homes.

Sometimes he encountered a couple standing empty-handed in front of a house. Sometimes he knew them; sometimes not.

He'd stop and chat for a moment. "I'm sorry," he said. "God bless you."

"A priest is available to his people, but the biggest challenge for us today is finding our people," he said.

"We're working out of our cars, our homes, our PDAs," said the Rev. David Crosby, referring to personal electronic devices that store names and telephone numbers.

Crosby spends two to three hours a day on the Internet, reaching out to members of his First Baptist Church of New Orleans as they slowly populate a Web site, logging in with their location, contact information and stories.

Great challenges

In the month since evacuating before Katrina, Crosby said he's slept in 11 bedrooms in four Southern states. He has held prayer services for strangers in motel meeting rooms, in evacuation shelters and borrowed churches.

He encourages his scattered flock electronically.

"I'm sending out mass e-mails on a regular basis, to give them hope and strength for the journey," he said.

"I tell them we're anchored in Christ, not our possessions, and that he will remain faithful to us. He will not abandon us."

Never have they been more challenged, they say.

"Their homes are gone; their businesses swamped. They wonder what the future holds," Crosby said.

And often, tragedy compounds itself.

The mother of one of Crosby's church members was among 24 elderly nursing home patients who perished in a fiery bus crash outside Dallas in the evacuation before Hurricane Rita.

Crosby was scheduled to perform the funeral Saturday.

In Algiers this week, the Rev. Paul Hart set aside preparations to repair St. Andrew the Apostle Parish long enough to bury Tom Stallings, a beloved parishioner who apparently died of a heart attack working in his attic. He was 45, a death that left a shattered family.

But pastors like Southall, Crosby and Hart see these as moments of professional challenge – crucial moments when their skills and words are never more needed.

"I know that God has called me to be the seventh pastor of a 120-year-old church – to be here at this time, on this day," Southall said.

"In a way it's almost an exciting time," Hart said. "Because it's what ministry is all about – leadership, rebuilding minds and hearts, not just buildings.

"I'm depressed. My body's hurting. I'm worried about my collections and my building project," he said.

"But when I'm doing a homily and I look out and I see people out there from Chalmette or wherever, in tears, I like to think I'm giving them something to hold onto."

Motives behind deaths are unknown

AIRLINE, from B-1

in Chattanooga, Tenn., where he and other relatives had evacuated to escape hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

"It's been like one long nightmare," Don Airline's mother, Sheila, said Thursday as she sat on the couch of her sister Delisa Bland's Kenner home, tending to the last-minute details of her son's funeral.

"I've been here before," she said.

Wanda Airline's body was found in the 8300 block of Milan Street on July 7. She had been stabbed so many times that the woman who overheard her soft cries for help and saw her emerge staggering from some brush, said it looked as if blood was gushing from her back. A trail of her blood led back about 30 yards to the spot where the attack began.

The Airlines, who had been shocked by Wanda's violent death, took another hit when they later learned that the person booked with second-degree murder in her death, Erica Hutchinson, was a family friend. No one knows what prompted the killing.

Bland has worked hard to try to forgive her former friend and let go of her grief, especially after seeing her sister in a dream on Sept. 6, what would have been Wanda Airline's 34th birthday.

"I was just starting to get my breath," Bland said, "and then ..."

Like families across Louisiana, the Airlines had been scattered by Hurricane Katrina. Sheila Airline and another son, Mohammed, 19, spent the storm in a hotel in Natchez, Miss. Bland and her family went to Woodville, Miss.

Other family members went to Lake Charles and Alexandria.

Don Airline had gone to Houston. The last time Sheila Airline spoke to him was the Sunday before the storm hit. "I told him I love him and to be careful," she said.

After the storm, he couldn't reach her through his cell phone, and communicated by leaving messages with another relative. Sheila Airline learned that her son had evacuated Houston and was heading to Chattanooga to escape Hurricane Rita. The next word she received about her son was from a Chattanooga police detective, R. Kenneth Freeman.

Chattanooga Police found Don Airline's body in the grass on a remote stretch of road on Sept. 17, Freeman said. He had been shot five times in the head.

Police since have arrested a Chattanooga man, Edward Jones, 24, and booked him with first-degree murder.

The murder made a splash when it was reported in several media outlets that Don Airline had been killed during a robbery and that his Red Cross debit card, handed out to people who evacuated for the hurricanes, had been stolen. Sheila Airline said she read in some media reports that neither the Red Cross debit card nor his wallet have been recovered.

But investigators can not confirm the robbery nor a missing Red Cross card. Don Airline had $49 on him when he was found, Freeman said.

Authorities also are investigating whether Don Airline fell in with a bad crowd in Chattanooga and whether that might have led to his death.

"There's 59 different stories about what happened," Sheila Airline said. "I don't know."

Hurricane Rita postponed Don Airline's funeral one week. He was laid to rest Friday, and Sheila Airline said that although many friends and family are still evacuated, a large crowd was on hand to pay its respects. Sadly, many friends will soon be leaving again to set up homes elsewhere, she said.

The family still is figuring out how to weather this latest storm. They are repeatedly peppered by the same questions: "How are you doing? How are you going to cope?"

"By God," Bland said, as if the answer should be obvious. "We put it all in his hands."

Covington woman gets a very special delivery

Habitat for Humanity home is on the way

By Karen Baker
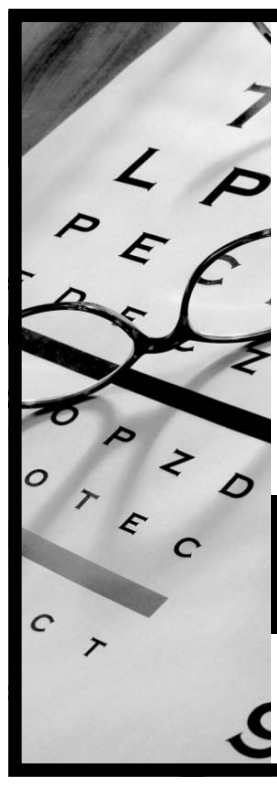
St. Tammany bureau

Hurricane Katrina dealt a blow to the home of Jackulin Collins of Covington, but help is on the way.

Collins was in New York on Sept. 26 to appear on the "Today" show, where she received the keys to her new Habitat for Humanity home.

The house is one of several whose parts are being assembled in New York, Los Angeles and Jackson, Miss., this week as part of "Make a Difference Today," a joint project of Habitat for Humanity International, the "Today" show and Warner Music Group.

Volunteers have been working in the three cities since Monday, framing houses for families displaced by Katrina. The frames will be disassembled into panels and placed in containers to be shipped to areas affected by the hurricane.



Covington will be the first stop, and Collins will be among one of the first in the country to have a very special delivery, said Ann Borne, executive director of Habitat for Humanity St. Tammany West.

"They will bring them to us in Hope Village," said Borne, referring to an area near Pine View Middle School that was already prepared for Habitat construction. "It is our first subdivision. We already had 15 lots cleared and all ready. Isn't that God at work?"

Borne said the trucks are scheduled to arrive Friday and building will start Oct. 10.

The national effort was launched to help the Gulf Coast rebuild "one nail at a time," said Jonathan Reckford, Habitat's chief executive officer, and it serves as the kickoff project for Habitat's long-term rebuilding effort, dubbed "Operation Home Delivery."

For Collins and other homeowners-to-be, the special delivery can't come soon enough.

Flooded seminary sends students into cyberspace

School's Internet use gets more intense

By Bruce Nolan
Staff writer

A few days after Hurricane Katrina roared by last month, officials at New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary emerged and took stock of the damage: every faculty residence flooded; 40 percent of on-campus student housing flooded; $20 million in damage; and faculty and students dispersed across the Southeast.

Yet education is continuing at the Southern Baptist institution, no matter that the bricks-and-mortar seminary sits quiet and empty on Gentilly Boulevard.

Today the institution's faculty teaches 3,900 students in cyberspace, and in more traditional settings at 17 satellite centers scattered across five Southeastern states from Louisiana to Florida.

"Our goal is to have every student on track toward graduation or finishing the semester," said Provost Steve Lemke, the institution's chief academic officer.

Shortly after the storm the seminary's leadership set itself two tasks: to care for its damaged students and to find a way forward through the academic year.

Most of the students on the Gentilly campus are graduate students, usually young men with small families managing a shift from a secular occupation to the pulpit. Many are financially stressed.

In short order, Southern Baptist donors, churches and agencies helped move 400 New Orleans-based students into free housing in other states.

Then an academic committee convened and asked itself a blunt question, Lemke said. "The faculty's dispersed; the students are dispersed. Is there any way of salvaging this semester?"

The answer turned out to be yes. The seminary retooled itself by seizing on two pre-Katrina strengths.

For years, the seminary has exported its accredited instruction to distant students through a thick network of so-called extension centers, or satellite campuses, in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida and Georgia. Indeed, only half the seminary's enrollment is based at the New Orleans campus.

In addition, the school's faculty – and by necessity, its students — were digitally literate. They were comfortable with innovative distance-teaching techniques far removed from standalone classroom lectures, Lemke said.

More than half the faculty made some use of the Internet in their courses before Katrina.

Even before the storm, widely separated students could participate in classes through "threaded discussion" blogs, where they could carry on interactive classroom discussions shaped, challenged and critiqued by a professor-moderator as if everyone were gathered in the room.

Many students could download video lectures, search documents and other source material, examine linked Web sites, take tests and receive grades online. Now the shift is wholesale.

"Now we're taking what we had and putting it on steroids," Lemke said.

As a result, the school has cut itself free from its damaged campus. For the fall semester, education has transferred from Gentilly to cyberspace.

And much of what can't be done there is going on in more traditional ways, such as highly compressed weekend courses at major extension centers, like the one in Decatur, Ga., where President Chuck Kelley and the seminary's administration have transferred their offices.

It's an environment in which students must be more self-reliant and more responsible for their learning.

"It's more like the Oxford model of education, where a student takes on a project, goes off and does it and comes back to report on it," Lemke said.

Lemke and others are under no illusions that this kind of education is altogether perfect. Some courses are less well-suited for this than others, he said.

And the seminary hopes to migrate back toward more traditional methods for the spring semester. But that will be offered after something remarkable: a seminary graduation for the Katrina class, scheduled for Dec. 17 in Birmingham, Ala.

Body found behind St. Rita's in Bernard

From staff reports

St. Bernard Parish authorities on Saturday found a body behind St. Rita's Nursing Home, where 34 people died during Hurricane Katrina, parish officials said.

The body was recovered in a wooded area behind the nursing home after authorities received a report of its location, parish spokesman Steve Cannizaro said. They could not immediately determine if it was a man or a woman.

Cannizaro said it was unclear whether the body, which was in advanced state of decomposition, was a patient from the nursing home or a nearby resident who floated to the site. Rescuers believe the person may not be tied to the home, however, because all the bodies of patients who died there were recovered inside the facility.

The 34 deaths recorded at the home was one of the highest storm-related fatality counts at any single location. The home's owners have been charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide for not evacuating the patients before the storm.

The body, combined with two others found Saturday in Violet, raised the parish's death count from Katrina to 110, Cannizaro said.

Floodgate work began in March

CANAL, from B-1

that the Harvey Canal remains the weakest link in the chain of the area's hurricane protection system. Not only did Rita heighten the sense of urgency for local officials in the wake of Katrina, it proved a greater threat than Frances in 1998, until now the benchmark for how close the West Bank came to a worst-case scenario.

"If we had gotten a lot of rain here, it could have been a different story," Cahill said.

The lessons learned from Frances put the $340 million West Bank Hurricane Protection Project on the fast track, with crews beginning work this year on massive floodgates south of Lapalco Boulevard designed to shut off a southerly surge.

With only about two months left in the hurricane season, officials hope that the project won't be needed this year and will be finished in time for hurricane season 2006.

Slow going

Officials have long known the huge waterway makes the West Bank vulnerable, but attempts to shore up its system of levees, pumps and gates have been delayed because of a lack of federal and state money.

"I think it could have moved faster and we could be about three years ahead of where we are now," West Jefferson Levee District Executive Director Gerald Spohrer said.

Also standing in the way of the work was levee district officials' inability to force businesses along the canal to maintain levees on their properties. An agreement reached by the old Plaquemines-Jefferson Drainage District in the 1940s gave those companies that responsibility, Spohrer said.

The Corps of Engineers tried to build levees in the 1960s as part of the Harvey Canal-Bayou Barataria Hurricane Protection Project. But a lawsuit stymied the effort, and before litigation was settled, only levee construction on the west side of the canal had been completed, Spohrer said. Businesses on the east side of the canal still had the responsibility of keeping up levees. Some companies did a better job than others, he said.

Even with the creation of the West Jefferson Levee District in 1980, "government had very little power" to see to that levees were maintained, Spohrer said.

By 1988, government officials agreed that a floodgate south of Lapalco would negate the need for higher levees on the east side north of Lapalco. Industries had always complained that higher levees would greatly reduce the canal's commercial use.

Ten years later, Tropical Storm Frances spurred lawmakers to pour money into the project.

In March, Boh Bros. Construction Co. began work on the floodgates.

But Spohrer said more remains to be done to the Harvey Canal to protect against storms.

Levee construction is scheduled to begin before year's end or in early 2006 on the east side of the canal south of Lapalco Boulevard, and all work should be completed in three years, Spohrer said.

Weak spots exist

Still, Rita put the West Bank on notice.

Frances threatened the canal with high tides for three days, but Rita hammered the area with high tides plus southeasterly and southerly winds, making it more of a threat, Maestri said.

Lower lying subdivisions, such as Stonebridge, Woodland West and Maplewood, are the most vulnerable, Spohrer said. Older areas closer to the Mississippi River are on higher ground and are less likely to receive water, he said.

"The concern with Frances was confined to one spot, at Goldin Industries," Maestri said. "This time we were concerned with a possible overtopping all along the eastern side of the canal."

Seepages and spillages occurred, mostly around Evans Industries Inc. and Goldin, both on Peters Road, Spohrer said.

A second weak spot was detected at the old pumping station on Bayou Segnette in Westwego, Spohrer said. Sheet pilings there were unstable, and crews worked to shore them up, he said.

Maestri, Cahill and Spohrer said they believe a small overtopping of the canal would not have resulted in catastrophic flooding.

"Drainage canals had been pumped down to the mud," Cahill said.

And the pumping stations were ready and at full capacity. "So our hope was that it wouldn't have been catastrophic," Maestri said.

'By noon we were overwhelmed'

MORGUE, from B-1

with the bodies in the morgue. Families do not come to the morgue; they arrange for the bodies of loved ones to be picked up by a funeral home.

A lack of "up-and-running" funeral homes in Orleans and St. Bernard parishes is postponing burials, Nichols said. "A lot of people are arranging for cremation," he said. The state has cut the waiting period from 10 days to five days, he said.

"These are not bodies that look like they are going to a funeral home," Nichols said.

When not working at the morgue, Nichols joins hundreds of storm- response workers from around the country at a temporary post at the Jimmy Swaggart Ministries Headquarters on Bluebonnet Boulevard in Baton Rouge. Like most of the men and women there, Nichols has not had a day off since Katrina hit, and Rita has kept the workers from returning to their homes, many of which are in storm-torn areas.

Spelled out in brass letters on the headquarters' walkway are words from the book of Revelation: "And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

Nichols, a retired Naval officer, said three tours of duty in Vietnam did not prepare him for what he has seen before and after Katrina.

"People were pulling up to the Superdome, putting out a wheelchair with Aunt Martha in it and driving off," he said. "We had nursing homes and group homes showing up with two to 32 people. We triaged as best we could and got out as many as we could."

Within 24 hours of the outset of Katrina, 2,400 people had been triaged, Nichols said, recalling that number was 27 for Hurricane Ivan last year and 37 for Tropical Storm Isidore in 2002.

"I had always told people we have no idea how many special-needs people there are" in New Orleans, Nichols said. "No one had ever taken the time to do a poll."

The morning before Katrina hit, the Dome was opened to special-needs people, but thousands of others showed up seeking shelter, Nichols said: "By noon we were overwhelmed."

When in battle, Nichols said, there is a saying that "10 minutes into combat, communication goes to hell. But in this case, there was never any communication. So we were left to our own devices."

IMPORTANT NEWS ABOUT COX SERVICE

Hurricane Katrina caused unprecedented damage to Cox Communications' network and system. Cox realized significant damage in all areas of all parishes, but damage was highest in areas where the flooding and destruction were the worst. Large areas of our Orleans and St. Bernard systems realized extensive damage that will potentially take significant time to rebuild.

We have made significant progress and services are almost fully restored in those western areas that were least affected. If you live in St. Charles or Jefferson Parish and are not yet receiving Cox services, it may be due to several factors: a downed utility pole, a downed cable line between your pole or pedestal and your home, or a lack of electricity at a key point in the system. We currently have hundreds of crews working across the entire metro-area to restore service as quickly as possible. These crews are going street to street to repair these individual lines and problems.

Cox has been committed to the New Orleans area for over 25 years and is committed to the next 25 years and beyond. We will rebuild our system better than before.

We thank you for your patience and look forward to providing you service as we rebuild Greater New Orleans together.

Bloggers help maintain Web of information

First-hand accounts describe aftermath

By Bruce Hamilton
Staff writer

When Hurricane Katrina ruptured the Gulf Coast region's communications network, displaced residents and separated families and friends, a cadre of Web warriors helped keep people connected.

Internet sites that began as personal journals became widely read touchstones of community. Their posts tell the storm's story in immediate, intimate detail and often personal terms.

The influence of so-called bloggers is double-edged, according Stephen Banning, a media professor at LSU's Manship School of Mass Communication.

"It's good and bad," Manning said. "It's good in the sense that it allowed people to get information out."

But some of that information was taken as fact when it wasn't.

"There's no way to test for the credibility of the citizen journalist," Manning said.

A range of online outlets published bulletins from New Orleans, from an established technology firm to a solo writer standing on his parents' roof, aiming a cellular telephone at the sky and praying for a signal.

Local bloggers, which is shorthand for Web log writers, included a wine and cheese store owner, a former medical sales representative and a CEO holed up in the Poydras Center.

Tyler Gilbert, 36, a former medical sales representative, started Gulfsails.blogspot.com about two weeks before Katrina hit to promote sailing and racing. But as the storm approached, he boarded up his parents' River Ridge home, bought a generator and taught himself to post via cell phone text message.

Gilbert quickly became a hurricane correspondent, documenting the storm's onslaught and destruction in round-the-clock bulletins, some as brief as "Major debris. Matchstick power lines" and "Unknown people in neighborhood on foot. Neighbors arming selves. No imminent threat."

When he lost power, Gilbert climbed out onto the garage roof and aimed his phone toward Elmwood, where he thought a cellular tower at a Jefferson Parish command post would receive his signal.

A typically abbreviated post from Aug. 29 at 1:52 a.m. said: "Had a scare, check. Oddnoises.then alarms in distance. lights toward elmwood, prsh bldg, lg plot-gov set up base. Helos pass that direction."

Responding to friends' inquiries, he conducted surveys of the neighborhood by bicycle and published abbreviated "house roll-call" updates on damage.

When his readers complained that television coverage of the city was limited to areas such as French Quarter, Gilbert took his Jeep on forays into various New Orleans neighborhoods and posted photographs. "People said they were incredibly frustrated by the national media," he said.

Gilbert documented his return in a canoe, with his father, to his grandparents' ruined Lakeview home on Catina Street. He went along on an exhaustive pet rescue with a crew, then wrote about the experience.

He punctuated his posts with cheerful, wry humor and homage to the "defiant, self-deprecating, shoot the bird at the devil" spirit of New Orleans. He ranted against Saints owner Tom Benson and NPR commentator Andrei Codrescu.

Until a reporter contacted him by text message two weeks after Katrina struck, Gilbert had no idea his blog was getting as many as 10,000 hits a day.

"I was blown away," he said. "I didn't realize how much people would be thankful for it."

Eventually, readers brought him beer, gas and MREs. But for Gilbert, the Web site was just a way to cope.

"The blog itself helped me stay sane," he said.

Jon Smith, 34, had a similar insight about his blog, Corknola.blogspot.com: "It was very therapeutic for me the first week to do it," he said.

Smith, the proprietor of Cork & Bottle Fine Wines at 3700 Orleans Ave., evacuated to Baton Rouge on the Saturday before the storm hit. "I wanted to reach out," he said. "I was almost spinning my wheels."

Smith began posting on his store's Web site, then transferred the posts to the blog and alerted customers using a list of e-mail addresses. He dedicated the blog to Mid-City, whose residents he said were hungry for updates about their tight-knit community.

"It's almost like a city within a city," he said. "It's a lot of people like me who had nothing but questions and no answers."

Smith posted questions from residents about their homes and relatives, links to online resources and on topics such as re-entering the city. He cleaned out his store's "rancid" refrigerator case of gourmet cheeses and posted the comic results, along with pictures.

"I can not impress on you all exactly how uniquely rancid this thing smelled," he wrote. "And it leaked. The rich bleus on the bottom shelf liquefied and leaked out. Without a doubt the worst smell I have ever smelled."

Smith posted readers' pleas for help, notices for fund-raisers, letters from friends and reports on his neighborhood. He too was surprised by the response. "I received so many e-mails from people saying thank you," he said.

One night at La Caretta, a Mexican restaurant in Baton Rouge, a reader approached, hugged him and said, "I was at the end of my rope not knowing," he said.

The blog has been very rewarding, Smith said: "It's grown beyond itself."

Core staff members of tech firm Intercosmos Media Group watched the hurricane's wrath unfold from the 10th floor of a downtown high-rise. They had stores of food, a 750-kilowatt generator and a surviving sense of humor.

Their blog, The Interdictor at mgno.com, grew out of the urge to share front-line observations with the outside world, according to CEO Sigmund Solares, a Thibodaux native and Loyola University graduate.

"We wanted to put out as much information as possible," he said. "We wanted people to see what was going on from what we could see."

His company, which has 800 servers and a 6,800-square-foot data center, was uniquely positioned to do so. The firm solicited outside help and used its tech savvy to post live video.

"From there, it spread really fast," Solares said. The site attracted as many as 400,000 unique visitors per day at its peak, he said. But interest has waned in the weeks following the storm, and he plans to turn the blog's focus to the rebuilding of the city.

Gilbert said he is considering his blog's demise. He's exhausted and may take a vacation, he said, and he's not sure how interested readers will be in posts about reconstruction. "The attention span of the American public is not that long," he said.

Hurricane evacuees have new home, new life

Couple weds after fleeing Katrina

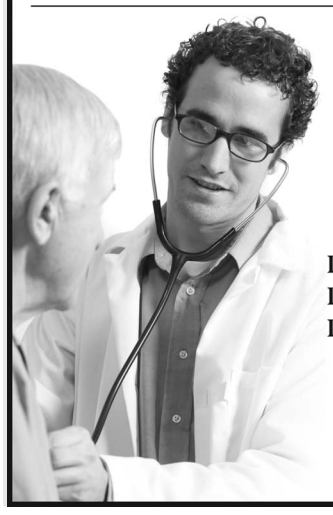
CASPER, WYO. — New home, new job, new life — new wife.

Robert Baquet and Stephanie Bordelon were married Sunday, just days after their Ville Platte, La., home was destroyed by Hurricane Rita.

Baquet moved to Casper after Hurricane Katrina, hoping the job prospects were better in Wyoming than they were in Louisiana. As soon as he arrived, he decided he'd found a new home.

And a good thing he did — while Katrina missed Ville Platte, Rita hit the town hard.

His first words to Bordelon when she got off the plane: "We're getting married."



"I was a little stunned," she said. "But everyone here has been so great to us."

Linda Henderson, owner of the Sage & Sand Motel, gave them a space for the wedding, and the hotel's maids pooled their tips to help buy Bordelon a wedding dress.

"I've never been anywhere with people who have been so nice," Baquet said. "I want to stay here forever."

Mississippi families fear government bulldozers

Many camping out to protect belongings

By Jay Reeves
Associated Press writer

LAKESHORE, MISS. — Fear of Hurricane Katrina sent thousands fleeing their homes a month ago. Now, many are afraid to leave again and are camping out, despite temperatures in the 90s and swarms of biting flies, next to the shattered remains of their houses.

They're worried that if they're not around, bulldozers will clear away the rubble before they can pick it over.

Federal officials supervising the cleanup say the worries are unwarranted since crews are clearing only public land and road shoulders, where many homeowners have deposited debris they've cleaned up on their own. They say local officials will decide later whether to extend the work to private property.

"Our mission right now is just to clear the right of way," said Rusty Retherford, a supervisor with the Army Corps of Engineers.

But not everyone trusts the assurances. "Do Not Bulldoze" warnings are spray painted on homes and boats everywhere.

Some people are searching the debris for anything they can save, like family mementoes and kitchenware, while others are waiting for an insurance adjuster to come first or need help from a relative or a friend to start sorting their possessions from the trash.

At hard-hit Waveland, two families piled into tents on a corner lot for days after the storm to make sure dozers didn't destroy anything that could be salvaged from the wreckage of their homes. They were particularly concerned about protecting an in-ground swimming pool that wasn't damaged by the hurricane.

In the Lakeshore community, Bea Everett, 61, and Virgie Ryals, 69, are living in campers where their homes used to be to protect the few remaining contents.

"Over there, we had to stop them," said Everett, pointing to workers across a road. "They had already taken some stuff, and my daughter's car was under a tree."

A 'do not bulldoze' sign is posted on a damaged home in Biloxi, Miss.

David Holman, who is running a cleanup crew hired by the agency, was twice confronted by angry people after their homes were bulldozed to remove them from streets.

"Their stuff may have been OK, but they cut the trailers in half," he said. "There ain't nothing anybody can do about it."

Ronald Shiyou's wife was upset when a bulldozer destroyed the remainder of their brick home to get it off a street in Bay St. Louis, but he was more understanding.

"It was holding up progress. They had to get it out of there," he said. "My wife wanted to go in and get some pictures, but 80 percent of them were destroyed anyway."

Once contractors clear a street or roadside in Mississippi or Louisiana, rumbling trucks haul the remains to one of dozens of temporary holding sites. There, debris is sorted: Trees go to one pile and building debris to another, hazardous waste is dumped in lined containers and appliances are set aside for possible reclamation.

"We recycle what we can," said Retherford.

The corps estimates it will take from eight months to 1 1/2 years to remove all the debris from public property, even though workers are clearing away storm refuse at the rate of about 200,000 cubic yards a day, or enough to fill two football fields.

Everett hopes insurance company representatives and cleanup crews get to her storm-tossed home soon so she can move on. She'd like to get a trailer from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, but not until the dozers are done.

"Everybody keeps telling us to leave, but when you're afraid you can't," she said.

Miss. natives make music for victims

By Kathy Hanrahan
Associated Press writer

OXFORD, MISS. — During the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, former boy-band singer Lance Bass agonized over not being able to reach family members in his hometown of Laurel, Miss.

Bass, a one-time singer with 'N Sync, said three days passed before he learned that his relatives were unhurt but had lost their homes in the disaster.

"It is very devastating, especially having to watch it on television, when you have family members that are being bombarded by the thing," Bass told The Associated Press.

Bass was among musical artists who gathered Saturday at the University of Mississippi for a nationally televised concert called "Mississippi Rising" to raise money for victims of the hurricane.

"It's nice to have a voice and to be able to use it in events like this," Bass said. He was to be joined by Mississippi native Faith Hill, who planned to perform her hit "Mississippi Girl."

Hill has been active in fundraising efforts for hurricane victims. Her appearance at a Gulfport shelter singing "Amazing Grace" aired on "The Oprah Winfrey Show," and her Web site is filled with messages urging fans to give money to hurricane relief.

The three-hour benefit will be shown live on MSNBC and aired on commercial television stations throughout Mississippi and Louisiana, and on Mississippi Public Television.

Donations will go to the Mississippi Hurricane Recovery Fund, which was started by Gov. Haley Barbour, and to a similar fund in Louisiana administered by Foundations for Recovery.

The concert was organized by two Mississippi natives: Sam Haskell, former worldwide head of television for the William Morris Agency in Hollywood, and Lanny Griffith, a longtime friend of the governor who is chief executive officer of the Washington lobbying firm Barbour Griffith & Rogers. Before becoming governor, Barbour was chairman and CEO of the firm.

Other celebrities set to appear included Mississippi native Sela Ward, actor Morgan Freeman of Delta, Miss., and country singer Steve Azar of Greenville, Miss. Also scheduled to appear were actor Ray Romano; his TV mom, Doris Roberts; actors Jason Alexander and Samuel L. Jackson; and singer Macy Gray.

Send in the Navy

We are using the Army to bring aid to victims when we should be using the Navy.

The Army arrives in a miles-long convoy on Interstate 10. The Navy would arrive in the river at the foot of Canal Street hours after the eye of the storm passed. Since all hurricanes strike our coasts, the Navy could outfit five or six vessels, steam just behind the storm and be ready to dock when the storm passes.

The Navy could arrange for the first vessel to carry doctors, nurses and medical supplies, and the second vessel food, water and ice. The third might have quarters to temporarily house residents; the fourth could handle garbage and the fifth could be a jail. Obviously, these could be changed or combined. One might even carry amphibious vehicles and begin to rescue people in low-lying areas immediately.

The Navy could dock these vessels at a point that they could reach any hurricane that would threaten the East Coast or the Gulf Coast. They would be activated only during the hurricane season.

I do not like the idea of creating another government agency, but I think the Navy could do a better job than the Army.

Schools plan to reopen, better than before

As the people of New Orleans work to recover and rebuild their lives in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, we would like to offer a beacon of hope: The New Orleans Public Schools will be reopened. The system will be stronger and the future for the children of this community will be brighter than ever before. When we are successful, we will re-establish a revenue base so that funds start flowing back into the system. We will be able to rehire our employees.

We will have the ability to make payments. We will restore hope that displaced citizens will have something great to return home to. And we will create a public school system the children of New Orleans deserve.

We are working closely with State Superintendent Cecil Picard and federal, state and local officials and have begun executing a school reopening plan. Here is what our process involves:

We have already begun the process of going school to school with FEMA officials, architects, engineers and other specialists to survey damage. We are addressing the district's financial situation, which was dire even before the storm.

We have echoed the call of Superintendent Picard to the federal government for financial assistance for our employees. We have been talking to other school districts around the country as well as to private foundations that can provide support in our efforts to build a world-class school system for the children of New Orleans.

Once the assessment of schools is complete, we will begin in phases, moving quickly to open schools that sustained the least damage.

The safety and well-being of the children is most important and we will work with public health and environmental experts to make sure that any schools we open are safe and there are no unseen hazards.

We are currently assessing our technology services and plan to restore our communications infrastructure. We also will work with vendors to make sure the schools have the furniture, supplies and materials they need.

We will work with the unions on a plan to bring back employees and we will coordinate the re-staffing of each school.

Finally, we will develop a transportation service plan to ensure that students have a means to get to school.

If we could open schools tomorrow, we would. But we know this will be a process. While our resolve is to act as quickly as humanly possible, we will never sacrifice safety or security or risk putting even one child in harm's way for the sake of expediency.

We can't rebuild on dirt-poor wages

The face of New Orleans in the days after Hurricane Katrina was that of a community of poor, black Americans. While the population of New Orleans is majority African-American, the reason for these citizens' poverty is not the color of their skin but the below-average wages that many businesses pay them.

Now that we have a chance to provide a large number of good-paying jobs in the rebuilding of New Orleans, the Bush administration has decided to reward favored contractors by suspending the 74-year-old Davis-Bacon Act. This law requires contractors to pay predetermined wage rates to workers on federal projects. With the suspension of this act, contractors could pay as little as $5.15 per hour to workers who desperately need a good-paying job to rebuild their lives.

Paying the prevailing wage does not increase the cost of a project. But suspending the prevailing wage law does increase the profits to contractors who can't lose money on a no-bid contract.

Prevailing wage rates are calculated by the Department of Labor, which does wage surveys in the area where the work is to be performed. The prevailing wage is an average of this survey. It is neither union scale nor non-union scale; it is an average of both. If President Bush truly wants to help Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas and Alabama rebuild, he should not suspend Davis-Bacon and he should eliminate those sweetheart no-bid contracts.

Cops might have stuck around

With the residency rule still in force, it is ironic that some of the New Orleans Police Department personnel could have been living in nearby parishes with their personal residences safe from harm or nearly so. Those police would have been available for work. This rule has come to bite the city on a delicate part of its anatomy.

OUR OPINIONS

The return

Hurricane Katrina struck the metro area more than a month ago, and by this point displaced and benumbed New Orleanians know more than they ever wanted to about the rigors of life as evacuees. While large parts of the metro area already are back in business, the east bank of Orleans Parish has been largely off-limits to residents. This dislocation has given cleanup crews room to operate, but the longer it goes on the worse the consequences for New Orleans' reconstruction effort.

For this reason, it's encouraging to see thousands of people heading to the east bank. Granted, Mayor Nagin's plan to allow people back into the city ZIP code by ZIP code is far from perfect; even in areas that officially opened to business owners and residents late last week, water and sewerage services are limited at best.

The downside is obvious, but so is the underlying logic of the plan: The quickest way to make New Orleans vibrant again is for people to live in their own homes and begin spending money in the city. The ZIP codes that experienced the worst flooding won't open until later this week, and residents will only be allowed to inspect their homes. But that alone should come as some comfort.

Even before the mayor began opening up the city, many New Orleanians managed to get to their homes — and started fighting back against moisture and mold. For residents who've stayed out of the city, the wait has been maddening. Until they see the damage for themselves, salvage mementoes and meet with insurance adjusters, people who suspect they've lost their homes can't move on with their lives.

That sentiment — the need to get back in — was palpable at a City Council meeting held Tuesday at Louis Armstrong International Airport. While state and federal officials have been cool to the mayor's efforts to reopen the city, council members criticized him for not moving quickly enough. Some complaints were self-serving; council members also fretted about not getting a sufficiently prominent role in the city's recovery efforts, even though managing emergencies is the responsibility of the executive branch.

Still, there's no doubt that council members are hearing from constituents, and the message has been clear: Tell us more about what's going on. Let us see our homes. Let us live there, if we can.

The mayor's first attempt, a couple of weeks back, at bringing people back into the city was confusing and ill-organized. He failed to distinguish adequately between re-entry and repopulation — between letting people come back to see their homes and inviting them back for good. That process was ultimately scuttled by the approach of Hurricane Rita, amid complaints from the White House on down that the mayor was moving too quickly.

This time, there's more specific information available about conditions in the city. Returning residents need to understand that, even in areas with power, the risks and inconveniences will be significant. Food, water and gasoline will likely be in short supply in the city for some time. Still, letting citizens come back could in theory accelerate repairs to essential services; under the watchful eyes of returning residents, the Sewerage & Water Board and the utility companies serving New Orleans will be under more pressure to fix broken pipes.

Some officials, no doubt, fear a repeat of the civil disorder that overtook the east bank in the first few days following the hurricane. Such concerns are hardly trivial. After all, ZIP codes are separated by imaginary lines, not by secure fences. State and local law enforcement agencies, along with the military units now operating in the city, need to keep tight control of neighborhoods that aren't yet open.

There are plenty of other legitimate arguments against allowing residents to return to New Orleans. But keeping residents away creates its own burdens. When people wake up every morning on somebody else's floor, it's difficult to contemplate the future with a clear head.

On Thursday, even before residents were officially allowed back, there were glimmers of life Uptown and in the French Quarter. The power was on, and the stores, restaurants and bars that were open for business had plenty of eager customers, all of whom had to know that life still wouldn't return to normal for some time. Still, it was good to be home.

Transportation on track

Living in Baton Rouge and working in New Orleans will further complicate life for displaced New Orleanians — from the hours they'll spend on traffic-clogged highways to the expense they'll face buying gas for the 160-mile round trip.

Given the choice, many might jump at the chance to take a commuter train that would run between the two cities. Launching such a service is a smart, innovative idea.

The Regional Transit Authority of New Orleans and the Capital Area Transit System, which operates bus service in Baton Rouge, are getting together with the state Department of Transportation and Development, Amtrak and the Kansas City Southern railroad to propose a line that would run twice a day.

They're asking the Federal Emergency Management Agency to provide $25 million to subsidize the rail service over a three-year period. It's hard to know how difficult it will be to sell FEMA on this plan, but with such an investment involved, organizers will have to demonstrate not only a need for the service but interest on the part of riders.

Showing the need shouldn't be difficult. An estimated 200,000 New Orleans area residents are now living in Baton Rouge and many of them have property, businesses or jobs that will demand their regular presence in New Orleans. A spokeswoman for the state transportation department said that the idea is to help people get back to work while they sort out their housing. State highway officials also think that commuter rail service would reduce traffic on Interstate 10.

Local, state and federal officials should be looking for ways to help displaced residents contribute to rebuilding the New Orleans area. Improving transportation between New Orleans and Baton Rouge is one key way to do that.

Katrina robbed us of so many precious things

JARVIS DEBERRY

The Thursday after Hurricane Katrina I was preparing to come to work at The Times-Picayune's new location in Baton Rouge. I was pocketing those things I always pick up before walking out the door: wallet, cell phone, keys.

That's when I stopped. "Keys? What do I have to unlock?"

I laughed the way all of must have laughed when we've caught ourselves doing things the way we would have done them before the storm. I put the keys in my camera bag, zipped it up and got used to walking around without them.

Four Thursdays later I was still in Baton Rouge, but on this day I knew I'd be going to New Orleans to check on my house. As I was getting ready to leave I realized with a start that I didn't have my keys. How pathetic would that be, I thought — me enduring Baton Rouge's hellish traffic, driving the 80 miles to New Orleans, only to realize that the keys I needed were back in the capital city?

I needn't have worried. The lock on every exterior door had rusted. The keys were as useless on Sept. 29 as they had been on Sept. 1.

To get inside, I had to do what soldiers had done Sept. 10 when they used neon yellow spray paint to mark my house: I had to climb in through a side window.

The room I landed in looked diseased. Like the black spots that appear on a rotting banana or an onion that's been left too long in the fridge, the mold running up the walls suggested an advanced state of decay. The house is still in the process of dying.

I know that others have gone back to their homes because they want to see whether that one cherished item survived the wind and the water: the framed photo of a deceased relative, a necklace from a spouse, a prized vase or crystal bowl. I thought I had removed from my house everything that was irreplaceable — I hadn't, but I'd told myself I had — so I was there out of a sense of obligation. I was going to have to face the destruction eventually. Why not now?

I headed first for my bedroom. I wonder if that's what everybody who returns will do. The rooms where we sleep define us, and they often house our most precious valuables. Why not start there?

Jarvis DeBerry's house on Crescent Drive took on an estimated 8 feet of water.

I couldn't get in. I turned the knob, pushed the door with my hand, pushed it with my shoulder and karate-kicked it repeatedly. It never budged.

By contrast, the door to the office across the hall gave way with modest effort. When I say "gave way," understand that I do mean "gave way." After a couple of pushes, my right arm went right through the door. At that point, I pushed the whole door down.

In his famous piece Areopagitica, John Milton wrote, "[A]s good almost kill a man as kill a good book." I remember debating that statement in my high school English class. Some classmates thought that Milton's position was too over the top to be considered. But I can say now that seeing most of my books in one sodden heap on the floor killed me. All the bookcases had fallen over. The desk had collapsed. The certificates on the wall were destroyed even as they remained attached to the walls.

I didn't stay long. I didn't see the need. I grabbed some books from the top shelf of a built-in case, but that was all. When I saw what looked like white cotton candy growing atop the blades of my ceiling fans I took it as evidence that the organisms that feast on death and decay had moved in permanently and that I was intruding on them.

Thousands of New Orleanians are chomping at the bit to get back to the city. Their eagerness says to me that they believe something good awaits them there. Many of them will have happier stories than mine. But many of them will have stories as bad. Many will stories that are worse.

I remembered Thursday night that behind my bedroom door were two quilts my grandmother had made for me. I felt bad for having told friends that I had removed everything that was irreplaceable. I hadn't. I'm guessing that many folks are going to return to their destroyed structures and realize that they hadn't either.

It takes the feds to mess up this badly

JAMES GILL

It was smart of Gov. Kathleen Blanco, testifying on Capitol Hill last week, to decline an opportunity to respond to Michael Brown's earlier acerbities.

Brown's sense of irony must be sadly undeveloped. Having set new standards for official incompetence as head of FEMA, he proceeded to denounce Louisiana government for a "dysfunctional" response to Katrina. All that Blanco had to do was watch him twist in the wind and refuse to be distracted from the task of extracting as much federal moolah as possible for the rebuilding effort.

For Brown, each day brings a fresh embarrassment. No sooner had a congressional committee poured scorn on his attempts to avoid responsibility than a damning internal FEMA report, prepared weeks before Katrina, came to light.

The report found "operational inefficiencies" that "hindered the delivery of essential disaster response and recovery services."

This appears to have hurt Brown's feelings. He rejected the report and complained that it failed to "acknowledge the highly performing, well managed and staffed systems supporting FEMA incident response and recovery." He resented that the report's "overall tone" was "negative."

It may be that the crowds stranded at the Superdome and the Convention Center also failed to notice the benefits of those "high performing, well managed and staffed systems."

Maybe, if asked for comment, they would have used even more negative language than the inspector general whose findings so offended Brown.

Brown's claim that he erred principally in failing to anticipate the shortcomings of others attracted plenty of derision from the congressional committee, and no doubt history will remember him as a spectacular bungler.

Perhaps Blanco and Nagin will come in for their share of condemnation too, although it is obvious that a screw-up of this magnitude is beyond the capacity of local officials. The full weight of the federal government is required to get so much wrong.

AP PHOTO

Former Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown defends his response to Hurricane Katrina on Capitol Hill Sept. 27.

Brown blamed Louisiana officials for delaying the evacuation call, although he got that wrong too. Blanco ordered everyone out Aug. 27, and not, as Brown alleged on Capitol Hill, a day later.

Blanco was able to exercise wise restraint when she arrived in Washington, having already pointed out Brown's error and adding, "Such falsehoods and misleading statements, made under oath before Congress, are shocking." Nagin said that it was "too early to get into name-blame and all that stuff" but that "a FEMA director in Washington trying to deflect attention is unbelievable to me."

In fact, the evacuation order came in time for most residents to leave the New Orleans area. There cannot have been many who wanted to get out, and had the means to do so, but ran out of time.

Those who were left were either foolhardy or broke, New Orleans having an ample supply of citizens in both categories. Those who refuse to evacuate must be left to take their chances; the real scandal, however, is not that evacuation plans are implemented late but that they exclude so many.

Evacuations are always a trial for families who are forced to sit all day in their automobiles, even after contraflow, and it may be that there is room for more efficiencies. But large numbers of citizens might wish they had an opportunity to sit in a traffic jam on the way to safety on account of it sure beats drowning.

Some way must be found to make a decent provision for the poor. It was our failure to do so that made the glacial and confused federal response so deadly. But Brown made himself such a goat that nobody down here need explain anything right now.

Next time remains a heck of a question

The question now is what the feds will do next time

Watching Michael Brown squirm under pointed questioning and worse before a congressional panel last week, my mind went back to that old job interview trick: When someone asks your biggest weakness, just tell them that you simply work too hard and care too much.

That seemed to be the ousted Federal Emergency Management Agency's director's strategy too, during what amounted to a six-hour exit interview before a mostly Republican but hardly sympathetic audience. Asked, basically, to explain how his disaster-response agency could have screwed up so badly after Hurricane Katrina, Brown responded that his major failing was being surrounded by incompetents.

"I very strongly personally regret that I was unable to persuade Gov. Blanco and Mayor Nagin to sit down, get over their differences and work together," Brown said.

And then there was this gem: "My biggest mistake was not recognizing, by Saturday, that Louisiana was dysfunctional."

Now, far be it from me to argue that ain't so. But pointing out local and state failings doesn't exactly absolve the federal government of its responsibility.

While "no disaster is perfect," Brown said (seriously), he started off defending his agency's efforts to coordinate a response, which is its primary function.

"I want this committee to know that FEMA pushed forward with everything that it had, every team, every asset that we had, in order to help what we saw as being a potentially catastrophic disaster," he said.

Yet, as the day wore on, it became crystal clear that everything FEMA had wasn't much.

Brown's criticism of the local and state communication efforts ran head-on into questions, most pointed by New Orleans Democrat William Jefferson, about FEMA's own Hurricane Pam simulation, which assumed that communication networks would be rendered inoperable by a Category 3 or worse storm anyway.

Brown contrasted the ground situation in Louisiana, unfavorably, with Alabama and Mississippi. That prompted a blistering response from Mississippi Gulf Coast Democrat Gene Taylor.

"So I guess what you are telling me is that in the face of an unprecedented storm, that in flooded areas that have not flooded since the Europeans landed in south Mississippi, that it was indeed part of FEMA's plan that the cities of Bay St. Louis, Waveland, Hancock County, many other communities, are expected to loot the local grocery store because help is, quote/unquote, on the way," Taylor said.

Outside the hearing room, the news cycle didn't treat Brown any more kindly.

Brown's testimony came the same day that recordings from Jefferson Parish's emergency czar Walter Maestri, an experienced pro who's been predicting and girding for the Big One for as long as I can remember, were made public.

A computer system used to funnel requests failed and requests from both the state and Jefferson Parish "went nowhere," Maestri said. Almost two weeks after, he was blasting FEMA for putting the parish's sewer system in jeopardy.

"Whatever happened to the FEMA gen packs we talked about, these pallets of generators that are supposedly pre-positioned across the country and can be flown in at a moment's notice?" Maestri demanded. "Now when we are on our knees, nothing's available."

If the failure was news to Maestri, it wouldn't have been to acting Homeland Security Department Inspector General Richard Skinner, who had homed in on a longstanding problem.

His audit of FEMA's information systems during the busy 2004 hurricane season found that the agency couldn't track and coordinate delivery of water and ice in Florida and that roughly 200,000 storm victims had to wait for temporary housing aid because of backlogged computers.

Well into the marathon hearing, with his bluster exhausted, Brown finally came around and acknowledged deep problems as well. In addition to Nagin and Blanco, he admitted, perhaps the Bush administration had some issues too.

"As we've gone through these changes with the focus on terrorism resources have just been moved, used to other things, different priorities have come in place," Brown said. "And I've got to tell you, it has been a personal struggle over the past two or three years to keep that place together because of this resource problem."

OK, now we're getting somewhere.

Though it's great sport to pick on Brown — and he does make it so easy — the real discussion that has to happen in Katrina's aftermath concerns what role the feds should play during future disasters, and what resources it needs.

It's a heck of a question, as President Bush might say — one that will be around long after the memory of Michael Brown's bizarre behavior has faded away.

General manager Allan Bristow resigned Saturday as the Hornets general manager, citing health concerns.

Director of player personnel Jeff Bower, who has been with the franchise for 10 years and has served in a number of capacities including assistant coach in 2003-04, was promoted to general manager.

"The stress and strain of the last month took a serious toll on various health problems that I was already facing before the hurricane," Bristow said in a statement. "After consulting with my physician, it became clear that stepping down was the only decision that made sense for me and my family."

Bristow was instrumental in guiding the basketball operations department during its transition period after Hurricane Katrina forced the team to temporarily relocate to Oklahoma City for this season after damages occurred at New Orleans Arena and New Orleans was devastated by flood waters.

He was promoted to general manager in June 2004 after serving the 2003-04 season as assistant general manager under vice president of basketball Bob Bass, who resigned at the end of the season when the Hornets were eliminated in the first round by the Miami Heat.

"Our first concern is Allan's health, but we have the utmost confidence that having Jeff in place will enable us

BATON ROUGE — After showing character in its first game and improvement in game two, Tulane took a step backward Saturday.

In what was originally set as its homecoming game, the Green Wave, in a lackluster performance at Tiger State, did only what it needed in defeating Southeastern Louisiana 28-21.

It wasn't until Southeastern tied the score early in the fourth quarter did Tulane come up with some scoring to put the Lions away. The Wave pulled away with a 97-yard kickoff return by Izzy Route and a 74-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Lester Ricard to Bubba Terranova.

Southeastern scored on the final play from scrimmage to close to within a touchdown of the Wave (2-1).

The Lions tied the score twice, the second time at 14 on a two-yard touchdown pass from Trey Willie to running back Blake Alfortish with 13:13 remaining. The tie was broken 14 seconds later when Route returned the ensuing kickoff 97 yards for a touchdown. It was the first time Tulane returned a kickoff for a score since the 2003 season.

While the Wave's special teams put it back in front, the Lions special teams responded and blocked the extra point attempt to keep themselves within striking distance, 20-14. But after Southeastern was stopped on fourth down at the Wave's 30-yard line, Tulane ended the suspense with a 74-yard scoring pass from Ricard to a wide-open Terranova.

The defense provided the Wave another opportunity with four minutes remaining when it recovered a fumble at SLU's 16. Tulane's offense, which was inconsistent for most of the game, did not take advantage of the Lions' final mistake.

STARKVILLE, MISS. — Well Tigerland, you won't have Les Miles to kick around, anymore — not until possibly next Saturday, at least, anyway.

An easy bull's-eye for public scrutiny this week, the first-year LSU coach silently responded to the swell of criticism and began the healing process after the Tennessee meltdown Monday with a satisfying 37-7 road victory against SEC West rival Mississippi State.

Unlike its matchup against the Volunteers, LSU dominated the second half, inflating a 10-point halftime edge with three third-quarter touchdowns that sent most of Wade Davis Stadium back to its tailgating.

JaMarcus Russell abused Mississippi State's willingness to leave receivers uncovered on short, underneath routes, completing a career-best 21 of 24 passes for 211 yards until backup Matt Flynn gave the sophomore the rest of the afternoon at the start of the fourth quarter.

Russell was afforded a few opportunities to

Bills' Bobby April has seen devastation before

SAN ANTONIO — Bobby April is in town to coach the Buffalo Bills' special teams against the Saints on Sunday.

And he's carried some Katrina memories with him.

Here's a native of Chalmette, who's now working a short drive from Niagara Falls, and he's telling you how devastating, how frustrating it was to sit there, a thousand miles away, and "watch the place you grew up in disappear under water."

"I spent the last month looking at special teams film, mornings and afternoons," April said. "Go home at night and I'm watching horror film, watching all the misery, looking at all those people having their lives changed forever."

Bobby April counts his blessings.

"My mother lives in Metairie, near Dorignac's, and she came out all right," he said. "It was tougher on my wife, Charlene, who has seven brothers and sisters living in an area that really took a hit, Little Woods, Arabi, all the way to Delacroix. SAN ANTONIO — Coach Jim Haslett isn't certain how the Saints will play in today's historic "home-away-from-home" NFL game against the Buffalo Bills at the Alamodome.

He's even more uncertain about the nearly 60,000 fans who'll be sitting in judgment.

Most will be strangers in a strange land, a mixed bag of uprooted Who Dats, regional diehards, Texas football purists, adventure seekers and the curious.

"I don't know what to expect, I really don't," Haslett said. "I hope it's electrifying. I hope the fans are in it and they cheer a lot and they're loud when Buffalo's offense is out there, so they can't hear the signals. We're hoping for a great environment, and I think they're going to like what they see."

Haslett hasn't liked what he's seen the past few weeks against the New York Giants and Minnesota Vikings, demoralizing losses littered by penalties and turnovers. Those games were a sharp contrast to a relatively clean road win against the Carolina Panthers in Week 1.

Saints officials are hoping the players have settled down after experiencing their first routine week of the season, although

Z's expect to be ready for opening day

From staff, wire reports

The New Orleans Zephyrs announced that they will remain in New Orleans and play baseball on opening day - April 6, 2006 — despite the catastrophe of Hurricane Katrina.

Zephyr Field was damaged by the storm, but team officials said the building can be repaired by opening day.

"There is a lot to do, but we are lucky to have time on our side," General Manager Mike Schline said. "Opening day is over six months away, and we are determined to open our gates, play baseball and launch fireworks on opening day for the people of this city that have been through so much."

Zephyrs owner Don Beaver agreed, seeing baseball in New Orleans and opening day as a landmark for the city.

"The Zephyrs will remain in New Orleans, and I expect the relationship between the team and the people of the city to be greater than ever in years to come," Beaver said. "The Zephyrs represent family values and affordable fun, and there is no greater time to provide that for New Orleans than now."

Zephyr Field is being used as a headquarters for FEMA and the National Guard. Stadium Operations Director Jon Peterson has spent the past week at Zephyr Field. "It is strange to see all of this at the ballpark, but at the same time it feels good knowing that our stadium and the Zephyrs are providing a positive outlet for the city."

Opening day is April 6, 2006 against the Round Rock Express. The promotion will be "2005 Fan Appreciation Day."

"We never got to do it on August 28 (last season), so we will do it April 6 and let our fans know we appreciate all their support and are glad to have them back," Schline said.

WORLD OF SPORTS

AUTO RACING

KINSER WINS FOOD WORLD 300: Kraig Kinser overcame an early mistake Saturday and won the Food World 300 in only his second start in the ARCA stock car series. The 20-year-old son of 19-time World of Outlaws sprint car champion Steve Kinser, started from the pole and led all but two of the first 51 laps before he was sent to the rear of the lead lap for crossing the blend line coming out of his first pit stop. That dropped him back to 17th. The youngster, who led 83 of 113 laps at Talladega Superspeedway, charged back, regaining the top spot on lap 80 and staying out front to the end. He beat Hendrick Motorsports development driver Kyle Krisiloff to the finish line by 0.169-seconds, about two car-lengths. Krisiloff's teammate Bobby Gerhart, running in his 200th ARCA event, and rookie Erin Crocker, one of only two women in the field and a development driver for Evernham Motorsports, were close behind the top two. Frank Kimmel, who already had wrapped up his seventh series championship and sixth in a row, finished fifth in the season finale. Kinser, a regular in the World of Outlaws, left the track shortly after his victory celebration to fly to Williams Grove, Pa., where he was scheduled to race his sprint car Saturday night. He made his stock car debut in August at Michigan with the team that is a joint venture between NASCAR's MB2 Motorsports and Andy Hillenburg Racing, starting second and finishing eighth. Kinser was even more impressive Saturday.

MARTIN SAYS HE HAS NO EDGE: Mark Martin is the only Chase for the championship driver with a victory at Talladega Superspeedway. Does that give him any advantage over his rivals in today's race? Absolutely not. "I am going to go out there and do the best I can. That's all," Martin said Saturday. "I can control the effort - our effort, my effort. I can't even come close to controlling the outcome of it. If we take our hit tomorrow, then that's what it is." Talladega is the wild card of NASCAR's 10-race title hunt, the one place where anything can happen and the points standings can shuffle dramatically. It's the only track in the Chase that requires carburetor restrictor plates, which sap horsepower and keep cars under 200 mph. The plates prevent cars from breaking away, creating huge packs of side-by-side racing. One bump or bobble can trigger a huge accident, collecting cars at random. It happened to Jeremy Mayfield last year, when he was taken out in a four-car accident and finished 38th. It ended Mayfield's shot at winning the Nextel Cup title. "These restrictor-plate races are really intense," said Carl Edwards, eighth in the Chase. "This place, you can't be too careful. You can't try too hard to watch out ahead. If there's a wreck, you can't stop too quick. You really have to be planning on what you're going do to stop that car as soon as you see some smoke."

CREW CHIEF SUSPENDED: Crew chief Todd Berrier was suspended for today's race at Talladega Superspeedway after Kevin Harvick's car failed inspection. Harvick qualified second for the race, but his Chevrolet was disqualified after NASCAR found three violations in the trunk area. Car owner Richard Childress was called into the NASCAR office Saturday morning and told that Berrier had been ordered from the track. It's not clear how long the suspension will last. Berrier sat out four races at the beginning of this season when he was caught rigging Harvick's fuel tank. He also was fined $25,000 and the team was docked points.

HENDRICK TO PAY OVERTIME: Hendrick Motorsports will pay more than $350,000 in back overtime wages to employees after an investigation found the racing company violated federal labor laws. The company, which designs, builds and races cars in NASCAR acknowledged it failed to pay 214 salaried production workers $351,783 in overtime between July 2003 and July 2005. The U.S. Labor Department said it determined Hendrick violated the Fair Labor Standards Act. "We certainly wanted to make sure our employees received any compensation to which they were entitled, so we were glad to make the appropriate payments," Hendrick spokesman Jesse Essex told The Associated Press on Saturday in an e-mail. "We've updated our internal policies and do not anticipate any ongoing issues."

GOLF

FERRIE LEADS DUNHILL: Kenneth Ferrie of England shot a 5-under-par 67 on The Old Course to open a five-stroke lead in the third round of the Dunhill Links Championship in St. Andrews, Scotland. He was at 13-under 203 and followed at 208 by Scotland's Colin Montgomerie (73), Sweden's Henrik Stenson (65) and Argentina's Ricardo Gonzalez (71). Ferrie was in position for a 65 on The Old Course, which would have tied the record score Montgomerie matched Friday, but three-putted the last two greens.

WEN–THE LEADS CROWNE PLAZA OPEN: Taiwan's Lu Wen-teh shot a blemish-free round of six-under-par 66 to join overnight leader Digvijay Singh of India atop the leaderboard heading into the final day of the Crowne Plaza Open in Beijing, China.

Cubs closer Ryan Dempster has converted 33 of his 35 save opportunities this season

Starting in 17th place after unspectacular earlier rounds of 75 and 71, Lu went on the attack, reeling off six birdies against no bogeys to catapult up the board. Australia's Marcus Both (71), India's Shiv Kapur (68), and Prayad Marksaeng of Thailand (70) were one stroke back at 212, followed by Taiwan's Chen Yuan-chi (66), Australian Alistair Presnell (70), and Prom Meesawat of Thailand (71).

CUBS' DEMPSTER GETS EXTENSION: Chicago Cubs closer Ryan Dempster agreed to a $15.5 million, three-year contract extension through the 2008 season. Going into Saturday's game in Houston, Dempster had 33 saves in 35 chances and was 4-0 with a 1.85 ERA in 57 relief appearances. He had converted 19 consecutive save opportunities, tying a team record during a single season, and his 21 1-3 consecutive scoreless innings were the longest streak by a Cubs reliever since 1989. Dempster had worked primarily as a starter for Florida and Cincinnati before surgery on his right elbow in 2003. He signed with the Cubs as a free agent last year, and was 1-1 with two saves and a 3.92 ERA in 23 late-season games. Dempster was a third-round draft pick by Texas in 1995, then traded the next year to the Florida organization. He started 121 games for the Marlins from 1998-02 before being traded to Cincinnati, where he started 35 games over two seasons before surgery in August 2003.

TENNIS

CLIJSTERS IN FORTIS FINAL: Top-seeded Kim Clijsters beat fourth-seeded Nathalie Dechy of France 6-3, 6-1 and will play for the title of the Fortis Championships in Luxembourg against Anna-Lena Groenefeld of Germany. Clijsters, who won the U.S. Open last month, has won 25 of her past 26 matches. The third-ranked Belgian is chasing her fifth title in Luxembourg. In the other semifinal, Groenefeld defeated seventh-seeded Dinara Safina of Russia 6-4, 5-7, 6-4.

JANKOVIC, VAIDISOVA IN FINAL: Top-seeded Jelena Jankovic of Serbia-Montenegro regrouped after losing the second set to defeat third-seeded Tatiana Golovin of France 6-4, 5-7, 6-4 and advance to the final of the Korean Open in Seoul, South Korea. Jankovic will play for the championship today against Nicole Vaidisova. The second-seeded Czech eliminated Colombia's Catalina Castano 7-5, 6-4 in the other semifinal. Vaidisova reached the fourth round of last month's U.S. Open and made the third round of Wimbledon.

Bower takes over as general manager

BRISTOW, from C-1

to move on without missing a beat," said team president Paul Mott. "His experience has made him knowledgeable about every facet of basketball operations, and I look forward to having him use that insight to put the best possible team on the floor."

From 1991-96, Bristow was the head coach of the Hornets, finishing with a 207-203 record.

Before becoming Hornets coach, Bristow served one season as vice president of basketball operations in 1990-91.

Most of Bristow's duties as general manager included handling the day-to-day basketball operations and overseeing player personnel decision. In June, he spearheaded the team's draft operations, landing point guard Chris Paul as the top pick in the first round.

"I'm glad that I was able to put everything in place in Oklahoma City from an operations standpoint before stepping down, but I regret that I won't get to see the finished product of the work that I put in during the offseason," said Bristow. "I wish Jeff Bower, Coach Scott and his staff, the players and the rest of the organization the best of luck as they begin the season."

Bower was the Hornets general manager from 2001-03, working under Bass.

"We expect to do great things this season, both on and off the court," said Bower. "I'm proud that I will be a part of both the excitement that is being generated in Oklahoma City and the rebuilding effort that we will help to see through in Louisiana."

Before joining the Hornets, Bower spent three years as an assistant coach at Penn State from 1983-1986 before moving to Marist College in Poughkeepsie, N.Y. After serving as an assistant coach from 1986-90, he was promoted to associate head coach, a position he held for five years.

16 months not long enough for decision

JOHN DESHAZIER

Less than 16 months.

That's how long it took for Allan Bristow to ascend to the title of general manager of the Hornets and to be muscled out of his position and onto the street.

Officially, health concerns are cited for the departure of the 54-year-old. Unofficially, word is that he was pushed, rather than jumped. That the once favored son of Hornets owner George Shinn now is less favored than other, newer hires, that he was on the wrong end of a power struggle that really was no struggle at all, since none of the power rested in his hands anymore.

And today, as much as any time during their brief history in New Orleans, the Hornets carry the appearance of a team that lacks direction.

Less than a week before training camp is scheduled to begin, Bristow resigns? Now, after an entire summer to reflect, he decides that he isn't healthy enough to carry out his duties, though doing so earlier would've given the franchise a chance to attract a top-notch replacement?

I don't think he'd do that, and Hornets fans shouldn't, either. Not if he's the selfless, franchise-first person that he was made out to be. Not if, like his predecessor Bob Bass, he owned Shinn's blind trust because of that willingness to do what was right for the team.

More, this seems to be an extension of the goings on since Paul Mott was hired as team president and Tim McDougall was brought in as chief marketing officer. That, or it's quite a coincidence that in rapid procession since Mott came from the NBA office and McDougall moved over from the Houston Rockets, a personable and professional vice president of public and media relations (Harold Kaufman) and a general manager have been relieved of their duties under mysterious circumstances, and word is that the turnover in the sales department has reached triple digits.

That's unsettling, to say the least, heavy-handed at most. And while iron fists sometimes are preferable to gloved hands, it remains worth noting that there are several ways to accomplish the same goal, that a presentation of diverse ideas by diverse people almost always is a good thing.

How much Shinn is inputting into the recent decisions is anyone's guess. But you don't get the feeling that he would have run Kaufman, who'd been with the franchise since its inception in 1988, or that he could have run Bristow, his handpicked successor to Bass, with whom he entrusted the keys to the franchise.

You wonder if it was his plan to promote Director of Player Personnel Jeff Bower, who has worn many hats in 10 seasons with the club, including general manager for the 2002-03 season, rather than Willis Reed, the vice president of basketball operations and a Hall of Famer, who ran the New Jersey Nets franchise as general manager/vice president of basketball operations from 1988-96.

Because if Reed's primary role is to spark season-ticket sales by glad handing, appearing at camps and the like, then he is a commodity that is being underused ñ unless, that is, the belief is that Bower can and will command as much respect from the players and staff as Reed.

Now, maybe all this stuff comes out perfectly clean in the wash. Maybe the organization will run smoother and more efficiently than ever, either because employees are terrified to step outside the designated box and the constructors of the box are right, or because better people simply were hired to fill the positions that were made vacant.

Maybe.

But there is something to be said for continuity and cohesiveness, of which the Hornets currently appear to have little. There's something to be said when the loyal and faithful are given the back of the hand across the cheek rather than an extended palm.

Bristow, in less than 16 months, was extended the palm and then given the backhand. That's a positive only if the owner(s) of the backhand know better what's right for the basketball team.

And there's no proof of that.

Hornets add Miller to coaching staff

By John Reid
Staff writer

Hornets coach Byron Scott announced Saturday that David Miller will join his staff as an assistant coach.

Miller is a former college assistant at Southern California, who has been involved in coaching for 18 years. The Hornets did not indicate what Miller's specific duties would be, but Scott said in his statement that Miller will have an integral role in trying to help his team improve from last season's 18-64 record, worst in franchise history.

Darrell Walker, Jim Cleamons and Kenny Gattison, assistants on Scott's staff last season, are returning.

Last season, Scott's assistants had a variety of duties from working closely with young players to helping him put forth the necessary defensive game plans against specific teams and players.

"He brings over 18 years of coaching to our team, so I am anxious for him to impart that knowledge to our players," Scott said.

Miller was on Henry Bibby's staff at USC when the Trojans made an Elite Eight appearance in the 2001 NCAA Tournament before losing to Duke, 78-69. Miller was an assistant at USC from 1996-2001.

He previously coached at Utah State (1993-96), Lamar (1993), West Point (1991-92), Arizona State (1990) and Texas (1987-89).

STAYING INFORMED: NBA deputy commissioner Russ Granik said Friday the league will stay in contact with Doug Thornton, the regional vice president for SMG, throughout the season to get updated reports on the cleanup and repair of New Orleans Arena, which incurred damages from Hurricane Katrina.

There remains a slight chance that three games, originally designated to played in Baton Rouge, could be switched to the Arena in March.

"We're going to monitor just to (see) how things are progressing, how the building is doing," Granik said.

Hornets owner George Shinn also plans to stay updated on the recovery efforts in New Orleans while his team's operates this season from Oklahoma City with a 35-game home schedule.

"I believe it's going to come back," Shinn said. "I feel its going to come back bigger and stronger. We're here (Oklahoma City) for this year. New Orleans has a lot do to get back and when they come back, we're coming back. I want the people there to have hope. In a lot of ways that's all some of them have, and I'm not going to take that away from them."

Southern Cal rallies for another victory

White, Bush carry Trojans to 26th consecutive win

From wire reports

The strength and speed of LenDale White and Reggie Bush lifted No. 1 Southern Cal out of trouble again Saturday.

White rushed for 197 yards in 19 attempts, Bush gained 158 in 17 carries, and the Trojans rallied from 18 points down at the half to beat No. 14 Arizona State 38-28, breaking a Pac-10 and school record with their 26th victory in a row.

Southern Cal (4-0, 2-0 Pac-10) abandoned the big-play passing game in favor of the run, and the Sun Devils (3-2, 1-1) couldn't stop it.

Bush had touchdown runs of 24 and 34 yards, the second one giving the Trojans the lead for good 31-28 with 3:44 to go.

No. 2 TEXAS 51, MISSOURI 20: Vince Young ran for 108 yards and a touchdown and threw for two scores, and the Longhorns converted three turnovers by Missouri quarterback Brad Smith into touchdowns in Columbia, Mo.

The Longhorns (4-0, 1-0 Big 12) have won 11 straight road games and 11 straight games overall.

No. 3 VIRGINIA TECH 34, WEST VIRGINIA 17: Marcus Vick threw for two first-half touchdowns and rushed for a career-high 74 yards and a score, leading the Hokies.

Facing the Mountaineers for the first time, Vick guided four scoring drives of 50 yards or longer, including Virginia Tech's first two possessions of the second half halftime.

No. 6 FLORIDA STATE 38, SYRACUSE 14: Drew Weatherford passed for 234 yards and three touchdowns, including a 71-yard swing pass to Lorenzo Booker, as the Seminoles won in Tallahassee, Fla.

Weatherford also scored a touchdown as the Seminoles rolled up a 24-0 lead.

MICHIGAN 34, No. 11 MICHIGAN STATE 31, OT: Mike Hart returned from an injury to run for 218 yards and a touchdown, and Garrett Rivas made up for a missed field-goal attempt in the final minute of regulation by kicking a 35-yarder in overtime.

The Wolverines (3-2, 1-1 Big Ten) avoided their worst start since 1967.

Drew Stanton was 20-of-30 for 282 yards with a touchdown for the Spartans (4-1, 1-1) who lost their fourth straight game in the rivalry. Michigan State's John Goss missed a 37-yard field goal attempt in overtime.

No. 17 WISCONSIN 41, INDIANA 24: Brandon Williams caught two touchdown passes and returned a punt 63 yards for a score in Wisconsin's win over previously unbeaten Indiana.

The Badgers (5-0, 2-0 Big Ten) won for the 10th straight time at Camp Randall Stadium, their longest home winning streak since winning 25 straight from 1900 to 1903.

PENN STATE 44, No. 18 MINNESOTA 14: The Nittany Lions rushed for 363 yards, including 114 by Tony Hunt and 112 by Michael Robinson, in upsetting the Gophers in State College, Pa.

MARYLAND 45, No. 19 VIRGINIA 33: Lance Ball ran for 163 yards and scored two fourth-quarter touchdowns, and Maryland gained 570 yards in offense to hand the Cavaliers their first defeat.

No. 21 BOSTON COLLEGE 38, BALL STATE 0: Backup quarterback Matthew Ryan ran for a pair of first-half scores and threw a touchdown pass in the fourth quarter, leading the Eagles (4-1) over suspension-riddled Ball State.

No. 24 LOUISVILLE 61, FLORIDA ATLANTIC 10: Michael Bush ran for a career-high 204 yards and No. 24 Louisville spoiled Howard Schnellenberger's homecoming with the worst loss in the Owls' five-year history.

Schnellenberger, 71, was born in Louisville and coached the Cardinals from 1985 to 1994. Bush was the first Cardinal to top 200 yards rushing since Anthony Shelman had 220 in Schnellenberger's last game as Louisville's coach.

Tennessee sharp despite short week

Alabama cruises past No. 5 Florida

From wire reports

The Tennessee Volunteers cut out the drama, and won on short rest.

Gerald Riggs ran for a touchdown and Jonathan Wade returned an interception for a score to give No. 10 Tennessee a first-quarter lead, and the Vols held on to beat Mississippi 27-10 on Saturday in Knoxville, Tenn.

The Rebels (1-3, 0-2 SEC) were hoping to catch Tennessee either tired or too excited after Monday night's dramatic comeback at LSU, but Mississippi couldn't muster enough momentum to rebound from back-to-back losses to Vanderbilt and Wyoming.

The Vols (3-1, 2-1) host No. 7 Georgia next week.

NO. 15 ALABAMA 31, NO. 5 FLORIDA 3: With Brodie Croyle throwing two long touchdown passes and the defense producing a goal line stand and a bunch more big plays, No. 15 Alabama finally looked like a Southeastern Conference contender again.

Croyle threw for three touchdowns, including an 88-yarder to Tyrone Prothro and a 65-yarder to Keith Brown, to lead the Crimson Tide in Tuscaloosa, Ala.

The Tide (5-0, 3-0) handed the Gators (4-1, 2-1) their first loss under coach Urban Meyer.

Tulane receiver Bubba Terranova, snags a 27-yard pass over SLU's Romaliz Mayo for a first down in the first half of Saturday's game.

Tulane responded with score tied

TULANE, from C-1

The Green Wave opened the game with a 12-play, 66-yard drive that consumed more than five minutes and gave it a 7-0 lead. But the sharpness Tulane displayed on its opening series quickly disappeared. The Wave finished with 173 yards in the first half, but wasn't able to add to its lead.

Ricard completed all eight of his passes on the first series, but only nine of his final 24 attempts in the first half.

As Tulane's offense was failing to mount scoring drives, its defense kept the Lions without a first down until their fourth series. But even when the Lions created a couple of breaks (they blocked two punts and had an interception in the first half), they still couldn't capitalize on them.

Following the second blocked punt, Southeastern place-kicker Jim Hall missed a 42-yard field-goal attempt on the final play of the half, leaving the Wave with a 7-0 lead.

TU awaits invitation from Mobile

Ladd-Peebles potential site for home games

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Tulane football is awaiting an offer from Mobile, Ala., to play the Oct. 29 game at Ladd-Peebles Stadium. Representatives from the city, stadium and the GMAC Bowl will decide Tuesday whether or not to offer the stadium to the homeless Green Wave, Tulane athletic director Rick Dickson said. If the offer is made, "it's quite likely" Tulane will play its game against Marshall there, Dickson said.

Mobile also offered the facility for Tulane's Oct. 14 game against UTEP.

Tulane has a standing offer from Shreveport to play any home game at Independence Stadium, where Tulane played its season opener against Mississippi State.

Tulane's next home game, Oct. 8 against Houston, will be in Lafayette. And the following home game, Oct. 14, will be in Ruston where Tulane is staying and attending classes at Louisiana Tech.

SACK ATTACK: Tulane defensive end Billy Harrison compiled three sacks against Southeastern Louisiana. Harrison entered the game with only one tackle in the first two games. In 2004, Tulane linebacker Anthony Cannon finished the season with four sacks - a team-high.

HOMETOWN HERO: Baton Rouge native Cary Koch scored his first Tulane touchdown in the third quarter, giving Tulane a 14-7 lead. The freshman receiver caught a Lester Ricard pass and darted about 5 yards into the end zone, totaling an 18-yard catch. Last season, the 6-foot-1, 185-pound Koch was the all-state team offensive MVP for the 1A Dunham School.

FOURTH-DOWN LUCK: Tulane converted a fourth down during its first drive of the game, making the Wave 6-for-6 on fourth downs for the season. On a fourth-and-one, running back Matt Forte' ran for three yards. Tulane scored a touchdown three plays later. But the magic wore off in the third quarter, when Tulane failed to convert a fourth-and-two, ending the streak.

INJURED WAVE: Left tackle Chris McGee and safety Sean Lucas were hampered with injuries and played sparingly. McGee, a senior, started with his left ankle injury, but missed some possessions in the first half, giving way to freshman Troy Kropog. McGee played the majority of the second half.

In the first half, Lucas played some on special teams, but didn't return punts (Izzy Route filled in) or play safety (Darren Sapp). But in the second quarter, notably the tight fourth quarter, Lucas was at his usual spot at safety.

EXTRA POINTS: For the third-straight game, Tulane shut out its opponent in the first half. ... Sophomore cornerback Josh Lumar made his first start of the year, as did Sapp, a senior safety. ...Tulane didn't allow an SLU first down until the Lions' first possession of the second quarter. ... In the third quarter, the referees utilized the new instant replay for the first time in a Tulane game. The call? A Damarcus Davis catch was ruled incomplete - and the call stood after the replay. ... Tulane blocked a field goal in the third quarter, the Wave's first since 2000. ... In a pass-heavy first half, Tulane ran for only 25 yards on 12 carries. ... Tulane defensive tackle Craig Morton was ejected in the fourth quarter, after an incident on SLU's extra point. ... The attendance at Tiger Stadium was 16,826.

Hobbled line paves the way

Coach Les Miles silenced the critics — at least for one week — by pummeling Mississippi State 37-7.

LSU grounds out 180 yards rushing

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

STARKVILLE. ,MISS. — Even with only four days between games and a banged up offensive line, LSU's line showed some prowess.

The Tigers ran right at the Mississippi State Bulldogs, especially in the second half, to take control of a 37-7 victory.

Mississippi State came in allowing opponents 2.7 yards per carry, but LSU ran 38 times for 180 yards, 4.6 yards per carry. Joseph Addai led LSU with 86 yards on 17 carries and the Tigers had 50 yards rushing on an 80-yard touchdown drive to start the second half.

Guards Brett Helms and Peter Dyakowski (foot) did not dress because of injuries, and center Rudy Niswanger missed most of the game with an injury sustained in the first quarter.

Lineup changes

Wide receiver Craig Davis (foot) and cornerback Mario Stephenson (death in family) did not make the trip for LSU. Skyler Green starter at the X receiver spot in place of Davis, and Will Arnold replaced Helms at left guard. Also, Keith Zinger started at tight end when LSU started the game in a one-tight end set. David Jones, normally the starter, entered on the next play when LSU went to a two-tight end set.

Lineup change II

Niswanger limped off the field on LSU's second possession and was replaced by redshirt freshman Ryan Miller. The change cost the Tigers, who were flagged for delay of game the next play on third-and-two from the Mississippi State seven-yard line. LSU had to settle for a field goal. Niswanger returned for the next two series, but Miller played the rest of the game.

Two for one

LSU linebacker Ken Hollis knocked out two players on one play; unfortunately one was his teammate. Hollis crashed into LSU safety Jessie Daniels and Mississippi State running back Jerious Norwood at the end of a 19-yard screen pass. The impact knocked Daniels' chinstrap high into the air and he left the game for one play. Norwood suffered a mild concussion and did not return.

Consistency

For the second consecutive game LSU defensive tackle Claude Wroten jumped offside on the Tigers first defensive play. But the Tigers got through the rest of the game without getting another offside penalty and showed much improvement with penalties overall, getting flagged six times for 55 yards. LSU was penalized 11 times in each of the first two games, for 111 yards vs. Arizona State and 71 yards against Tennessee.

Dominant

LSU continued its mastery of Mississippi State, winning for the 13th time in 14 tries. The only Bulldogs victory during that span was 17-16, in 1999 at Starkville. LSU has won the last three meetings at Starkville by a combined score of 120-13.

Still going

Colt David's 30-yard field goal extended LSU's streak of consecutive field goals to nine. However, he hit the right upright with his third extra-point attempt after making 10 consecutive this season.

Hallmarks

LSU quarterback JaMarcus Russell had a career high 20 completions, topping his previous high of 16 against Arizona State earlier this season. Senior wide receiver Bennie Brazell tied his career high with two receptions, and had 21 yards.

Firsts

Freshman running back Steven Korte got his first carries for LSU, rushing six times for 16 yards. Quarterback Matt Flynn got his first completion of the season, hitting David Jones for 19 yards. Wide receiver Xavier Carter made a splash with a 36-yard touchdown on his first-career rushing attempt on an end-around showcase his downfield ability, most noticeably two touchdowns — 14- and 45-yard connections — to junior Dwayne Bowe, the latter putting LSU ahead 30-7 in the third quarter.

Mississippi State took a 7-0 when Bulldogs quarterback Omarr Conner's scrambling allowed Joey Sanders to wiggle free and get behind LSUís secondary for a 66-yard touchdown.

But beyond that particular breakdown, LSU's defense dared Conner to challenge it through the air, determined to eliminate Bulldogs tailback Jerious Norwood as a viable option. Mississippi State's leading rusher this season left the game in the second quarter because of a mild concussion and finished with nine yards.

LSU (2-1, 1-1 SEC) took advantage of premium field possession created by punter Chris Jackson, and responded to Mississippi State's initial score with drives of 17 and 42 yards, resulting in a Colt David field goal and a reverse to track standout Xavier Carter for his second career touchdown.

Ahead 17-7, cornerback Ronnie Prude came up with an interception in the end zone. Much like the Bulldogs' previous touchdown, Conner avoided the rush and lofted a safe pass, but in this instance, he put too much air under the ball, allowing Prude to swipe it from receiver Keon Humphries.

For the third straight game, Joseph Addai had 16 carries, rushing for 79 yards and a touchdown, his fourth of the season.

Mississippi State fell to 2-3, 0-3.

Despite the lopsided score, Miles did not play freshman Ryan Perrilloux, leaving open the option to redshirt the prized jewel of his inaugural recruiting class.

INSIDE THE SAINTS

BILLS vs. SAINTS

Kickoff: Noon CDT at the Alamodome, San Antonio.

Coaches: Saints Jim Haslett (43-40 sixth season, all with Saints); Bills coach Mike Mularkey (10-9, second season, both with Bills)

TV: CBS

Radio: 870-AM

KEEP AN EYE ON MCGAHEE AND LOSMAN: The Bills have one of the most dynamic up-and-coming tailbacks in the NFL in second-year starter Willis McGahee, who has run for more than 100 yards nine times in the past 14 games – more than any back in the NFL. But Buffalo's quarterback, former Tulane standout J.P. Losman, is far more unproven, having thrown just five career passes before being selected the starter this season. Clearly the challenge for the Saints will be the same as any team that faces the Bills this season – shut down McGahee, take an early lead and force Losman to get the job done. But putting the clamps on McGahee is a lot easier said than done.

THE REPLACEMENTS: The Saints and Bills were two of the teams swept up in the NFL's injury epidemic last weekend. The Saints lost veteran safety Jay Bellamy to a season-ending torn rotator cuff, and Buffalo lost veteran linebacker Takeo Spikes to a torn Achilles tendon. Bellamy was a stable presence in a secondary that is already playing without starting cornerback Fakhir Brown. His replacement, rookie Josh Bullocks, has talent and speed, but some hesitation and mental mistakes will surely creep up in his first career start. Spikes was the Bills' best open-field tackler, so a dropoff will be noticeable with third-year backup Angelo Crowell on the field.

GAME PLAN

Every week the Saints' plan is to establish the run, stick with the run and eventually wear a team into the ground with the run. But that plan has been tossed out the window in each of the past two games when the Saints trailed by at least 14 points in the first quarter against both the Giants and the Vikings. Penalties and turnovers destroyed any chance the Saints had of following a script. This week, expect them to at least break their two-game string of fumbling away the opening kickoff. ... The Saints are especially intent on establishing the run game this week against a Bills defense that ranks first in the NFL against the pass (106.3 yards per game allowed) and 32nd against the run (174.0 yards per game allowed). The usually steady Bills defense has clearly missed defensive tackle Pat Williams, who went to Minnesota in free agency. And Spikes' injury can't help. ... If the Saints are forced to throw, they could be in trouble. The Bills are an aggressive blitzing team, and Saints quarterback Aaron Brooks was not able to overcome Minnesota's heavy use of corner and safety blitzes last week.

KEY MATCHUP

BILLS OT GREG JERMAN VS. SAINTS DEFENSIVE ENDS: Jerman is expected to make his third career start in place of injured right tackle Mike Williams, the team's best blocker. The Saints would love to exploit this weakness by sending a combination of pass-rushing threats Darren Howard, Charles Grant, Will Smith and Tony Bryant at Jerman. Of course, those pass-rush situations will only come around if the Saints can shut down McGahee on first and second downs.

BY THE NUMBERS: Saints receivers Joe Horn and Donte' Stallworth combined to catch 17 passes for 284 yards two weeks ago against the New York Giants. Last week, they had just one catch between them – an 11-yarder by Horn. ... The Saints rank worst in the NFL in both turnovers (12, tied with Minnesota) and penalties (36, tied with Oakland). ... The Saints' defense, meanwhile, has not forced any turnovers in the past two games, both losses. The team's only takeaway came on special teams in New York. ... This will be only the third meeting between the Saints and Bills since 1992. New Orleans won 24-6 at Buffalo in 2001, and the Bills won 45-33 in the Superdome in 1998. ... Saints coach Jim Haslett spent eight of his nine NFL seasons as a linebacker with the Bills, who drafted him in the second round in 1979 out of Indiana University of Pennsylvania.

FROM THE COACH'S MOUTH: "I thought we already had a home opener." – Haslett's sarcastic response when asked what he expected from the team's home opener today. The Saints' first official home game this year was played on the road at the New York Giants.

— compiled by Mike Triplett

Brass hit right note with McGahee

By Brian Allee-Walsh
NFL columnist

SAN ANTONIO - Entering today's historic game at the Alamodome, no running back in the NFL has rushed for more 100-yard games since Game 5 of the 2004 season than Willis McGahee of the Buffalo Bills.

Nine in 14 games to be exact, including a career-high 140 yards last week against the Atlanta Falcons.

Not Corey Dillon (eight), Edgerrin James (seven), Shaun Alexander (seven), Tiki Barber (five), Rudi Johnson (five), Curtis Martin (five) or Deuce McAllister (four).

This is the same Willis McGahee who entered the 2003 NFL draft under a cloud of uncertainty after tearing up his left knee while playing for the University of Miami (Fla.) in the national championship game against Ohio State.

Although Travis Henry seemed entrenched as the Bills' primary ball carrier, Bills' president/general manager Tom Donahoe sent wide receiver Peerless Price to Atlanta for the Falcons' first-round pick at No. 23.

With that pick, the Bills selected McGahee, gimpy leg, unlimited potential and all.

I can still hear the critics questioning the move when the Bills seemed to have bigger roster holes to fill. I can still see McGahee's agent, Drew Rosenhaus, on ESPN reveling in the moment and boldly predicting great things for his client.

Thirty months later, Bills owner Ralph Wilson, Donahoe and the team's assistant general manager Tom Modrak look like geniuses every time McGahee is handed the ball.

"Tom Donahoe is an excellent personnel guy," Saints coach Jim Haslett said. "He's not going to make too many mistakes. I think over time it showed it was a smart move and the organization made a good decision."

Former Saints general manager Randy Mueller, now in a similar capacity with the Miami Dolphins, orchestrated a similar shrewd personnel move in 2001 when he selected McAllister in the 23rd slot of the first round against the wishes of some inside the organization.

At the time, Ricky Williams was the Saints' bell cow.

But not for long.

In March 2002, Mueller dealt Williams to the Dolphins for first- and conditional third-round draft picks.

That third-round pick later was upgraded to a No. 1 pick in 2003 based on Williams' performance.

Donahoe pulled the plug on Henry in July, trading the disgruntled backup to the Tennessee Titans for a third-round pick. Henry is presently serving a four-game suspension for violating the NFL's substance abuse policy.

"It's working out," Donahoe said modestly. "I'm just happy for Willis, especially when you see what he had to go through.

"We were pretty confident when we made the pick. Then after watching him work, we knew it was just a matter of time. We just had to be patient."

Their patience seems to have paid off. In fact, neither Donahoe nor Modrak believe McGahee is 100 percent yet, a scary thought considering his recent performance. That bodes well for the Bills, who are 8-1 in games when McGahee eclipses the 100-yard rushing mark.

The Saints have proved vulnerable against the run to date, yielding 126.7 yards per game, 26th in the NFL.

"There's no telling how far Willis can go," Modrak said. "I think there's room we don't know about."

As in room for improvement.

"He's got his sea legs back," Saints defensive coordinator Rick Venturi said of McGahee. "It's critical that he doesn't bleed us to death."

Saints becoming more comfortable

SAINTS, from C-1

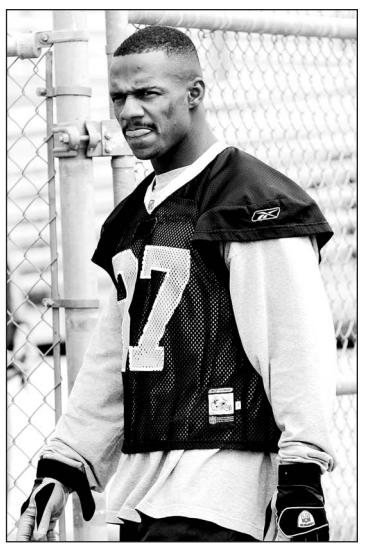
nothing is routine when it comes to life and football in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

Three "home" games at the Alamodome, four "home" games at Tiger Stadium and more sky miles than a team could ever imagine.

"There will never be normalcy,'' Saints wide receiver Joe Horn said. "It will never be normal because of what happened."



"I wouldn't use the word normalcy as much as this week is going to be more convenient for us," Saints tight end Ernie Conwell said. "The normalcy issue is we've never played in this stadium before. We've never come here on a game day. We didn't get the numbers and hash marks on the field until a couple days ago. We have to double up in our locker room and give the other half to Buffalo. So this is going to be a brand new environment for all of us."

For the first time this season, Haslett spent Monday and Tuesday watching opponent's game tape. In recent weeks, he was required to complete necessary administrative and logistical chores on those days for a team and franchise in exile.

Last week, during the 33-16 loss to the Vikings at the Metrodome in Minneapolis, Saints defensive coordinator Rick Venturi turned to Haslett for input.

"Rick asked me if I wanted anything on third down?'' Haslett recalled. "And I said I didn't know what they were doing on third down. That's bad to say, but that's the truth. I've had a chance to look at the opponent this week. It's been kind of tiring but refreshing at the same time. I don't call the defenses, but at least I know what the heck is going on."

By next week, most players, coaches and team officials should be settled into their living accommodations for the remainder of the season. It remains unclear how long FEMA will be housed at the team's training facility in Metairie, meaning owner Tom Benson and his entire football operations could be here into next spring or longer.

AP PHOTO

No matter how comfortable the Saints become in their temporary home in San Antonio, it will never be the same as in New Orleans. 'There will never be normalcy,' Horn said. 'It will never be normal because of what happened.'

"We've still got four coaches living inside the Alamodome,'' Haslett said. "But you can sense through the players and the coaches that things are settling down and getting back to normal - at least for the next couple of weeks, and then we go on the road again. Hopefully this week will have a settling effect and it will pay off Sunday."

After today's game, the Saints travel to Green Bay, play Atlanta in Baton Rouge, travel to St. Louis, play Miami and Chicago in Baton Rouge, and travel east to play the two-time defending Super Bowl champion New England Patriots and New York Jets.

The calendar then flips to December.

"All this isn't bothering me as far as what is going on," Saints defensive tackle Brian Young said. "I adjust pretty well. I grew up a military kid and being all over the place."

"It's all about, do you want your job?" Saints running back Deuce McAllister said. "If you do, then you'll get it done. If you take pride in what you do, you'll get it done. It's all about being a pro."

Like Haslett, Conwell said he didn't know what to expect inside the Alamodome.

"How many people are going to show up?" Conwell said. "Are they going to be excited? I wish we could have had a better record coming into this game for the people of San Antonio and New Orleans.

"But a lot of guys have been thinking about this. This is Texas; so they know football whether there have been a lot of NFL games here or not. They know high school football. So they're going to know how to cheer. We anticipate they'll be educated fans who are going to be quiet when our offense is out there and loud when our defense is out there, and full of energy."

Said McAllister: "Hopefully they'll be our fans, but that has yet to be determined. I guess they'll cheer for us if we're playing well, but if they don't you can't really blame them because in a way we're kind of borrowing or renting these fans. But hopefully they will be our fans."

Veteran Saints left tackle Wayne Gandy said he doesn't expect the crowd to be overwhelmingly partisan for the Saints, although a winning performance might win them over for future games.

"It's a home game only in the sense that we don't have to bus or fly anywhere,'' Gandy said. "However this season turns out, I'm quite sure that if somebody writes a book about Katrina, they would have to devote a chapter to the New Orleans Saints who had an entire season in disarray."

Buffalo expects a dogfight with Saints

FINNEY, from C-1

storm, Charlene felt she had to go down there and see if she could help. She got back to Buffalo a few days ago. She couldn't get near to where they lived, but she had a close enough look to tell me, 'you have to see it to believe it.'"

Bobby April is no stranger to hurricanes. He was 12, living in Chalmette, when the eye of Betsy came calling in 1965.

"We were very lucky,'' he said.

"Our house was on cinder blocks and we only got water up to our porch. In most places, it was water up to the rooftops. I remember seeing people in pirogues, paddling away. I remember the rats, the animals. When you're a seventh-grader, you don't forget things like that."

So life goes on.

As someone who spent four years on Mike Ditka's staff in charge of the Saints' special teams, April has an idea of what Jim Haslett is going through without a place to call home.

"It has to be tough because it changes the routine, the lifestyle the players are accustomed to," April said. "Families are scattered, kids are in different schools. It's a big adjustment."

With that said, the Saints will be playing closer to home Sunday than they have since the opening kickoff, facing another 1-2 team.

A week ago against the Vikings, the Saints' defense, among other things, had trouble handling ex-Tulane Greenie Mewelde Moore (who rushed for 101 yards) on the ground.

This time it will be a matter of handling ex-Greenie J.P. Losman in the air.

"J.P. has a great upside,'' April said.

"He's got three things going for him, his athleticism, his work ethic, and his thirst for competition. Some of our fans are disappointed in our record. But, even if we were 0-3, our mind-set would still be the same. We've got a plan and we're sticking to it."

The plan involves building with young talent and a quarterback taken the first round in 2004.

Last year, with veteran quarterback Drew Bledsoe running things, the Bills won six of their last seven to finish 9-7 and make the playoffs. Still, the decision was made to turn Bledsoe loose and go with Losman.

At the moment, critics are busy making comparisons. With Dallas, Bledsoe has a 103.7 quarterback rating, with an offense ranked No. 3 in the league.

He's completing 64 percent of his passes, with six touchdowns and only two interceptions.

Meanwhile, Losman owns a quarterback rating of 61.1, and the Bills offense is ranked 31st, next to last in the NFL.

The good news is Losman, who's completing only 49 percent of his passes, has thrown only one pick.

Perhaps the bad news for the Bills last week, aside from losing Pro Bowl linebacker Takeo Spikes in a 24-16 loss to Atlanta, was having veteran receiver Eric Moulds criticize the offensive plan.

"When you're playing against cornerbacks who are not starters,'' Moulds said, "you have to take shots down field and make some plays."

Will J.P. Losman try to do just that against a Saints defense burned by Daunte Culpepper?

We shall see.

As for Bobby April, he's hoping his special teams will hold up their end.

A year ago, they produced big time.

April was voted special teams coach of the year after the Bills had five returns for touchdowns and another on a blocked punt.

What is April expecting Sunday?

"A dogfight. Look at the records. No one has played four games and you only have four teams without a loss, two in each conference. I don't care who's playing who. There are no gimmes."

'Our customer base has dried up'

Fishing guides fear Worse after storm Destroys tourism

By Bob Marshall
Outdoors editor

Two months ago Theophile Bourgeois was the cover boy for a Times-Picayune feature on the explosive growth in Louisiana's coastal fishing guide business. In five years his Lafitte-based Bourgeois Charters had opened two lodges, acquired a fleet of boats and a staff of regular captains to serve an ever-growing list of clients.

Life was good for Bourgeois — and he wasn't living large alone. The number of guides in coastal Louisiana had soared from 60 to 615 in just 10 years, with much of that growth in the marshes surrounding New Orleans.

But two months and two hurricanes later, Bourgeois and many of his colleagues are wondering if they'll still be guiding in six months. From Venice to Lafitte, Shell Beach to Grand Isle, the storms left many of their homes, marinas and lodges damaged or destroyed, boats wrecked and crews dispersed by the evacuation.

Worse, this group of small businessmen who liked to boast of their independence in the past, now are faced with the reality that their recoveries are tied in large measure to New Orleans — a wrecked metropolis with an uncertain future.

"New Orleans is what made our business go, and until the city comes back, we don't know if we can come back," Bourgeois said last week in the midst of repairing hurricane damage to his lodges that exceeded six figures.

"For most of our clients, we were just lagniappe at the end of a New Orleans trip. After a business meeting, they'd come fishing. Or while the wives and daughters were doing the French Quarter thing, the guys would come fishing. But now all that's gone. Our customer base has dried up.

"So now we're in a race to see if the city can get the tourists back before the mortgage companies get the lodges, the boats, our homes."

The race couldn't have come at a worse time. Most charter services, especially the inshore guides, rely on income from the busy spring-summer-fall seasons to hold them over through the normally slow January through April period. September bookings were lost in Katrina's aftermath, while October and November are in jeopardy, guides say, due to media reports of post-storm pollution.

"I got two calls last week from two big parties canceling because they were afraid they couldn't eat anything they caught," Bourgeois said. "The media is putting our reports that make it seem like all we got down here is polluted water and dead fish.

"People believe what they read and hear. They think New Orleans is still filled with snipers, and if they survive that, they'll die from eating the fish. It's crazy."

But accurate reports on the damage to the fishing infrastructure — including hotels, roads and marinas — are causing legitimate concerns among out-of-town anglers, guides say.

"If we can assure our customers they'll have a comfortable place to stay, have good food to eat and good fishing, we can get some of them back in the next month," said Barry Brechtel, owner of Big Fish Charters and the Breton Sound Marina in Hopedale, which was demolished by Katrina.

"But the problem is we don't have control over some of that. If someone wants to fish, I can take care of that. But the other stuff — the hotel, the food, the water — that's out of our hands."

Much of their future is in the hands of insurance adjusters. Many guides suffered losses into six figures. Mike Frenette, who built his Venice-based Teaser Charters into one of the nation's best-known Louisiana outfitters in 26 years of hard work, "lost everything" when Katrina destroyed Venice Marina.

"Normally when a hurricane got into the Gulf we'd go down and haul all the tackle and some of the boats up here," he said from his Marrero home. "But this time I was in Lake Charles fishing a tournament. By the time they said ëevacuate' we couldn't get down there because of the contra-flow. Everything we had in Venice is gone."

The list includes the Teaser Clubhouse, a floating lodge; three inshore fishing boats; an air boat; a four-wheeler, several duck boats and fishing and hunting tackle Frenette estimated would cost $60,000 to replace.

And as if that wasn't enough, Katrina also tore a hole in the roof of his home.

"One day we were on top of the mountain, the next we couldn't even see the mountain," Frenette said. "But we're not going to just give up.

"I've had calls from clients all over the country. They've been great. They're saying, 'Let us know when you're up and running and we'll be down.'

"We'll be back, but it's going to be a long hard road, and financially very tough. In this business, if you aren't fishing, you're losing money."

Mark Brockhoeft, whose Myrtle Grove-based Big Red Guide Service is arguably the best-known fly fishing outfitter in the area, said news of New Orleans' demise and fears of pollution have wiped out as many as 60 bookings thus far.

"Before Katrina I was booked solid from the second half of September through November and the better part of December, now all that's in doubt," Brockhoeft said. "But the large part of that was people coming to New Orleans for conventions, then doing a little fishing. Now the conventions have been canceled or moved — and the only calls I've been getting are cancellations.

"I keep thinking if I can hold on for two months, the hotels will reopen, people will come back, and I'll have business again. But I can't gamble on that. You can't make a living in this business on a couple trips a week. If you're not doing 20, 25 trips a month, you're not going to pay your bills.

"So now I'm looking at reassign everything, consider all the options."

One of those options is a temporary move. Barrett Brown, one of Brockhoeft's colleagues, already has taken a job at an Orvis Shop in Houston. Golf pro Blaine McAllister, one of Brockhoeft's regular clients, has offered to help Brockhoeft get started in the Florida panhandle.

"Nothing's certain right now," he said. "I'm like everyone else, just trying to see how things work out.

"It's hard to believe, but a month ago things were humming along, and most of the boys in this business almost felt like they had too much work.

"Now everything is in doubt."

Louisiana politicians show they still don't get it

By Bob Marshall
Outdoors columnist

It didn't take long for the nation to heap scorn on Louisiana after our political establishment handed Congress a $200 billion pork-laden wish list for post-Katrina rebuilding. It was embarrassing, shameful, even degrading.

But worst of all, their action leaves the message that the people who would lead Louisiana still don't get it — they still don't understand what this fight is all about.

With hundreds of thousands of their citizens still living as evacuees and with the world's attention finally focused on two of the primary causes of that agony — coastal erosion and inadequate levees — our political leaders didn't go to Congress as pragmatic re-builders, but as brazen panhandlers.

Sure, their bill included about $30 billion to repair our coast and raise our levees. The problem is they didn't stop there.

They added tens of billions of obvious pork that has nothing to do with coastal restoration or flood protection or remediation hurricane damage, and a lot more to do with lining the pockets of special interests. They tacked on items like a deep-water shipping channel for New Iberia, work at the ports of Fourchon and New Orleans, millions for seafood promotion and even sugar cane research. And they want a special "Pelican Commission" with a blank check to spend the money - as well as waivers on environmental regulations and congressional oversight.

Of course it was the wrong audience for that ploy; you should never try to panhandle panhandlers. The move even sparked a rare moment of political unity, evoking denunciations from Fox News to the Washington Post, all of whom had plenty of fun with headlines like "Louisiana's looters."

The more serious problem is the damage will not stop there. We may have wasted our last best chance for fast action to address our vanishing coastal ecosystem.

In 20 years of covering the issue I've always told people my greatest fear was that the nation would not wake up to our plight until a category 4 or 5 storm left five feet of water on Canal Street. Well, it finally happened. And the world definitely noticed.

Every newspaper from New York to Sydney did reports on the causes of our perilous existence, as well as the cures that have been proposed and long ignored by our own country. Sympathy generated genuine interest and political momentum. Even President Bush — who earlier this year said our $14 billion plan for coastal restoration was worth only $2 billion — was singing a different tune.

Last week our political leaders turned much of that compassion to ridicule.

Mark Davis, executive director of the Coalition to Restore Coastal Louisiana, could not think of a worse beginning for the Katrina comeback effort. Attempts to explain away the big request as a "starting point" in negotiations with Congress, Davis said, show just how out of touch some of these planners are.

"At a point in history when we need the nation to trust us, we've given them reasons to step back and view everything we propose with skepticism," he said. "What in the world does a deep water port in New Iberia or Fourchon have to do with flood protection or restoring the coast? They want to build some of the very types of projects that have helped put us in this situation in the first place.

"So now we're in a position to have to explain, even further, every thing. It won't speed this along."

Ivor van Heerden, a director of the LSU Hurricane Center who was asked to be on the Pelican Commission, said he was "appalled" that there were "so many lobbyists on the thing and that I was the only scientist."

He saw the bill as a lost opportunity.

"To me we had an excellent opportunity to create something really innovative, something that would capture the nation's imagination that would have really gotten everybody behind us," he said. "But from the reaction to this Pelican Commission, it looks like the total opposite has happened and that, in fact, we've turned a lot of people against us."

Our delegation's focus now should be on repairing the damage. They should be working the halls of Congress — and the world's media — with the Coast 2050 Plan, explaining the important role our wetlands play in hurricane protection, fisheries and the unique culture of this area. They should be explaining that we need money for wetlands restoration and flood levees first — and that we can talk about funding for the cochon du lait later.

Most of all, they should be trying to show the world — and us — that they finally get it.

State's fishery on fast track to normalcy, officials say

By Andrew Canulette
Staff writer

It's impossible to ignore the ruin brought upon the Gulf Coast by the double whammy of hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

But at a press conference held in Baton Rouge on Friday, officials with the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality and other state agencies had some positive news for locals who are looking for a silver lining in a very dark cloud.

After nearly a month of testing floodwater samples near Lake Pontchartrain, pump outs from the lake and the ambient waters in its estuaries, there is no cause for alarm concerning the consumption of fish and some other types of seafood pulled from those areas.

"We've done a tremendous amount of water quality testing in Lake Pontchartrain and we've found nothing to support the myth of a toxic soup," said Chris Piehler prior to the briefing.

Piehler is the senior environmental scientist with the LDEQ.

"There are some bacteria issues, which happens when you have water commingling with sewerage," Piehler said. "But that happens every time it rains, not just when you have a hurricane."

Piehler said he hopes the studies will squelch the fears of numerous recreational and commercial anglers who began expressing their concerns over the safety of eating fish caught in local waters well before Katrina made landfall Aug. 29. State agencies began testing the Lake Pontchartrain area four days after the storm launched its Category 4 assault on the Gulf Coast and were looking for a variety of pathogens including volatile organisms, pesticides and heavy metals. DEQ plans to test the Lake Borgne, Breton Sound and Barataria Bay areas as well and expects to have similar findings as it did in Lake Pontchartrain, which Piehler said should be encouraging to the fishing communities throughout southeast Louisiana.

"(This toxic soup) is a myth," he said. "There is no chemical contamination concern."

Piehler and others, however, have received reports of localized fish kills along the Louisiana coast. But the kills, which occur in oxygen-depleted waters, have not been of the magnitude one would expect after two major tropical systems, said Harry Blanchet, an LDWF biologist.

"They are still occurring in the western part of the state (where Rita made landfall)," Blanchet said.

Piehler said fish that die in fish kills should not be eaten and all local seafood should be cooked to alleviate bacterial concerns. The harvesting of oysters is currently off limits across Louisiana, another standard practice after a major storm passes through, Blanchet said.

While the state's fishery appears to be on a fast track to normalcy, many of the state's wildlife management areas remain closed and hunting seasons have been disrupted further because of Rita's impact on the coast.

On Thursday, the LDWF announced that deer and rabbit hunting seasons in Cameron, Vermilion, Jefferson Davis and Calcasieu parishes in the southwestern corner of the state are closed south of Louisiana 14. Those areas will remain closed until biologists can conduct more detailed surveys of habitat.

Deer, rabbit and squirrel seasons are closed in the portions of Ascension, Livingston, St. John and St. James parishes north and west of U.S. 51 from U.S. 61 to Frenier Road, north of Frenier Road to Lake Pontchartrain, west of Lake Pontchartrain to Pass Manchac, south of Pass Manchac to Lake Maurepas, south of Lake Maurepas to the Blind River, south of Blind River to the Amite River Diversion Canal, south of that canal to Louisiana 22, south of Louisiana 22 to Louisiana 70 in Sorrento, east of Louisiana 70 to Louisiana 3125, north of Louisiana 3125 to Louisiana 641, north and west of Louisiana 641 to U.S. 61 and north of U.S. 61 to U.S. 51.

Floodwaters have been slow to recede in those areas, though the LDWF expects the area to reopen on Oct. 8.

Comets capitalize on Rams mistakes

St. Charles remains unbeaten

By Billy Turner
Staff writer

St. Charles remained unbeaten Friday night by beating West St. John 29-12 at home.

The Comets took advantage of five West St. John mistakes (four fumbles and an interception) and the running of 5-foot-7, 185-pound senior Christopher Jones, who gained 116 yards on 20 carries.

West St. John, which won the state Class 2A title last season, fell to 0-4.

St. Charles (4-0) opens Class 10-2A play next week by hosting Donaldsonville. West St. John opens 9-1A play at White Castle.

"We've got a lot of room for improvement," St. Charles coach Frank Monica said. "We've got to be a smarter football team. But you always have to be pleased when you beat a good football team like West St. John."

With both teams playing on a short week of practice, the first half was marred by mistakes by both teams. Both played Monday. Five days later they were going at each other.

On the opening drive, the Comets drove from their 41 to the Rams 22 before throwing an interception. West St. John fumbled on the next series, but St. Charles came back with a huge mistake moments later.

After recovering the West St. John fumble at the Rams' 10, St. Charles stumbled. On a second-and-goal from the Rams' 5, a pass by Sutton was intercepted by Blake Comminie, who returned the ball 88 yards for the game's first score. The Rams led 6-0 with 5:17 left when their two-point conversion try failed.

The Comets took the lead for good when they drove 59 yards on the next series. Fletcher scored from the four. Preston Landry kicked the go-ahead extra point for a 7-6 lead with 1:57 left in the quarter.

St. Charles added to that with Landry's two-yard run in the second quarter. Thirty seconds later, senior lineman Ross Roubion fell on a West St. John fumble in the end zone, and with a two-point conversion, the Comets let 22-6.

"We didn't give ourselves a chance to win," West St. John coach Laury Dupont said. "Penalties and quarterback sacks and fumbles - you can't win like that."

The Rams' drove late, scoring on Olajuwan Hall's 15-yard pass to Devonne Lumar with 36 seconds left in the first half. But the two-point conversion failed and St. Charles led 22-12 at the half.

The Comets took advantage of another fumble in the third quarter. Ben Beneditto recovered at the Rams' 31, and Christopher Jones scored eight plays later. Landry's kick made the score 29-12 with 2:45 left in the quarter.

"It was important to take back the momentum," Monica said. "We knew we had to turn it since they had scored right at the end of the half, and we did. The defense gave us that, and that was big."

The game was scoreless in the final quarter.

East St. John holds off Curtis

By Bill Bumgarner

Friday was the third game for the East St. John Wildcats, and it showed.

The Wildcats (2-1) performed with precision and poise early, building a 10-0 lead in the first quarter against John Curtis. What the offense built, kicker Radi Jabouri sealed with fourth-quarter field goals of 56 and 20 yards, as East St. John prevailed 16-6 at home.

Wildcats' quarterback Johnnie Thiel, a Curtis transfer, hit three of three passes for 53 yards and rushed for 29 yards on the opening drive of 80 yards. Thiel scored from eight yards for a 7-0 lead.

Curtis (0-1) punted following three snaps.

Thiel then hit Louis Lee, who made a diving catch for a 48-yard gain at the Curtis five-yard line. East St. John lost 11 yards on its next three play,s but Jabouri made a 33-yard field goal for a 10-0 advantage with 4:12 left in the quarter.

"I thought the first drive set the tone for the game," East St. John coach Larry Dauterive said.

Curtis bounced back with its lone score on the next possession. On his first carry of the season, Joe McKnight broke two tackles at the line of scrimmage and raced 70 yards for a touchdown with 2:46 left. The extra-point attempt was missed, leaving East St. John ahead 10-6 after one period.

The second quarter featured a flurry of turnovers. Curtis fumbled on its first two possessions, miscues that were sandwiched around an interception by McKnight.

After the second fumble recovery, East St. John had possession at the Curtis 41-yard line. The Wildcats reached the Patriots' 17, but a 34-yard field goal attempt by Jabouri was blocked by John Ruttley.

"We had a lot of opportunies and we made a lot of mistakes," Dauterive said of the second quarter threats.

There were more miscues early in the fourth period. A Thiel was picked off at the Curtis 11-yard line by Kelby Wuertz. But East St. John's Isiah Francis picked off a Kyle Collura pass four plays later.

East St. John drove from its 24-yard line to the Curtis 39-yard line, where Jabouri made a 56-yard field goal for a 13-6 lead at 4:45.

One play later, East St. John's Kerry Clofer recovered a fumble that led to the clincher by Jabouri from 20 yards with 2:47 to play.

St. John holds off Riverside

Four turnovers by Rebels help Eagles win 27-20

By Jim Derry

PLAQUEMINE — It seemed early on Friday night that the winner between Riverside and St. John would be the team that made the game's final big play.

Chalk one up for the Eagles.

Chris Delrie's diving 21-yard touchdown catch in the back of the end zone from Baco Romero preserved St. John's 27-20 non-district victory at Plaquemine High Stadium. It was the only pass of the game from either side that gained yardage.

In the first half, Rebels quarterback A.J. Delaneuville kept his team in it with touchdown runs of 55 and 65 yards. His 140 yards on the ground in the first half was almost twice as much as St. John's total output, but the Eagles (3-1) led 14-12 at the break.

They scored their first touchdown on a 92-yard kickoff return by Chase Blanchard to take a 7-6 lead. He followed that with a one-yard score eight minutes later that was set up by Rodarrick Jones' 37-yard interception return.

"We get a stop early on and get a touchdown, and I cringe every time I put my kickoff team on the field," Riverside coach Mickey Roussel said. "I said, 'Guys, we've got them right where we want them right now, you kick the ball deep, and don't let them break a big one deep.' Guess what? They break one, and all the momentum that we had, we lose."

But the Rebels regained that momentum on the first play of the second half. Jarrid Caesar broke free through the right side and ran 88 yards for a touchdown that gave Riverside (3-1) a 20-14 lead.

Neither offense did much for most of the third quarter, as there were punts on the next four drives. That's when St. John used another big play to get in position to regain the lead.

Romero, who gained 75 yards on 18 carries, faked the pitch on an option and ran 27 yards to the Riverside 22, and two plays later he scored to put the Eagles ahead for good.

Turnovers plagued the Rebels all night, as they gave up two fumbles and two interceptions. St. John turned the ball over once.

"Turnovers will kill you, and so will not doing the little things right," Roussel said. "Bad snaps on the shotgun? Hey, we didn't do that the first three games, and we had three tonight (they lost one). ... Field position in the third quarter was all them."

After Delrie's score with 7:44 remaining, the Rebels had two more chances to drive down the field and tie or win the game. But a bad snap cost them 20 yards and forced a punt on the first drive, and Delaneuville threw a second interception to Jones, which allowed St. John to run out the clock.

Bucs go on the offensive

From staff reports

The first game of the West Bank high school football season was played

Saturday at sun-drenched Hoss Memtsas Stadium, and West Jefferson recorded a 34-3 non-district victory against Salmen.

For the 73 players in uniform, their coaches and fans, it represented much, much more.

For 140 minutes, a small sliver of normalcy was returned to their lives as those in the metro area try to recover from the devastating effects of two hurricane strikes in one month's time.

So what did it mean to the participants?

"That's a tough question to answer right now," Salmen coach Jerry

Leonard said as he fought back tears. "We didn't know if we were going to be able to get back out on the football field. But a lot of people helped us out. We're starting from scratch. We lost everything (in Hurricane Katrina's Aug. 29 strike). We've just got to do everything we can to get back to our winning ways. That's why this is so emotional for us."

Salmen's players and coaches have been back since Sept. 19, but the new equipment and uniforms made necessary by the seven-plus feet of water that engulfed their Slidell school didn't arrive until Thursday.

West Jefferson returned to practice Monday, but the Buccaneers did have the luxury of salvaging their equipment and uniforms. Though ragged at first, the Buccaneers settled down and rushed for 291 yards, totaled 356 overall and scored five touchdowns in their lone tune-up for the opening of District 5-5A play next week.

West Jefferson halfback Edward Robinson carried eight times for 123 yards with touchdowns covering 40 and 18 yards, and running mate Tevin Conway carried six times for 100 yards with a 58-yard score. Ryan Jackson completed four of 12 passes for 65 yards with a 26-yard touchdown to wide receiver Lionel Stewart for West Jeff's first touchdown.

"There is no place like home," said West Jeff co-captain Anthony

Sparks, who caught two passes for 29 yards. "This is a great victory for us. We have come through a lot of adversity and this should get us back on track for district coming up. Hopefully, we'll get the rest of our players back and then get focused on Assumption."

POPE JOHN PAUL II 24, LIVE OAK 6: Only five days after falling in their season opener to Live Oak, the Jaguars avenged the loss at Live Oak on Friday.

Second half touchdown runs by Chad Hindman and Richard Guillot keyed the Jaguars (1-1) victory. Hindman's touchdown runs of 3 and 1 yard in the third quarter gave the Jaguars the lead after Live Oak led 6-3 at the half.

Guillot capped the scoring with a 56-yard touchdown in the fourth quarter.

Live Oak is 2-2.

ST. PAUL'S 35, HAMMOND 12: The Wolves rushed for 318 yards, led by 65 yards and three touchdowns by running back Taylor Brett, in defeating Hammond in a District 4-5A game at St. Paul's in Covington.

Brett, a 6-foot-2, 220-pound junior, was one of three St. Paul's running backs who rushed for more than 50 yards. Caleb Bajon, a 6-0, 220 senior, rushed for 91 yards. Jared Morise, a 5-8, 160 junior, rushed for 104.

Hammond (1-1, 0-1) took a 6-0 lead in the first quarter when running back Matt Betts ran 62 yards for a touchdown.

St. Paul's (1-0, 1-0) then scored 21 straight points in the second quarter to take a 21-6 lead. Morise had a 16-yard touchdown run to make the score 7-6 with 10:37 remaining in the half. Brett ran up the middle for a 6-yard touchdown that made the score 14-6 with 6:37 left. Brett ran 1 yard for a touchdown 10 seconds later, which came after St. Paul's recovered a fumbled kickoff.

Pierce W. Huff

ST. THOMAS AQUINAS 35, NORTHLAKE CHRISTIAN 0: St. Thomas Aquinas took advantage of seven Northlake turnovers to key its first victory Friday at Southeastern Louisiana University's Strawberry Stadium in Hammond.

It was the debut of Northlake's varsity program.

St. Thomas Aquinas' Quentin Ruffin caught a touchdown pass and ran for another to lead the Falcons (1-3).

The Falcons scored three touchdowns in the second quarter, two set up by Northlake turnovers. St. Thomas Aquinas led 28-0 at the half.

THURSDAY'S GAME

OUACHITA 27, HOLY CROSS 7: Lions running back Keldrick Johnson rushed for 121 yards, his fifth straight 100-yard game, and the Ouachita defense held the Tigers to 103 yards on offense to key Thursday's victory in Monroe.

Quarterback Josh Strong was 12-of-22 passing for 185 yards.

Ouachita (5-0), ranked fourth in Class 4A, scored two touchdowns thanks to defense and special teams.

The defense limited Holy Cross (0-1) to 40 yards rushing on 32 carries.

Ouachita's defense was led by Chris Drummer, who blocked a punt and recorded three sacks.

Destrehan tops St. James in hectic finish

Eugene recovers from earlier miscues

By Lori Lyons
Staff writer

Destrehan quarterback Jai Eugene needed a little redemption Friday night.

With the game on the line, he got it.

With 1:18 remaining and St. James leading 25-20, Destrehan had a fourth-and 16 at the St. James 47-yard line. Destrehan also had a quarterback in Eugene who had thrown five interceptions on the night, the last four occurring on the previous possessions.

But this time, Eugene floated a short pass to Joshua Martin who was waiting at the 25-yard line and Martin did the rest. Martin broke away from a pair of St. James defenders, then he sprinted into the end zone. Eugene then connected with Edwin Reed for a two-point conversion that put Destrehan ahead 28-25.

St. James then got the ball with one minute remaining. In five plays, St. James drove to the Destrehan 42-yard line. But, with six seconds to play, Terry Dumas' Hail Mary pass was intercepted by Jerico Nelson to seal the victory for Destrehan.

It was a remarkable comeback for Class 5A Destrehan (4-0) against the No. 1 team in Class 2A. The Destrehan running game struggled for 87 yards on 20 carries. Reed had a punt return and a kickoff return for touchdowns nullified by penalties, and Eugene completed only 13 of 34 passes.

St. James, meanwhile, rushed for 255 yards, even with its two starting rushers hurt and another out for the second half. Luther Ambrose rushed 14 times for 177 yards and one touchdown. Jason Zenon ran for 83 yards on seven carries, all in the first half. And quarterback Antonio Phillips threw for 134 yards and two touchdowns and ran for another. Craig Duronslet had two of the five interceptions St. James nabbed.

But Destrehan had Eugene and coach Steve Robicheaux said he was putting his faith in him.

"He's the guy," Robicheaux said. "We know sooner or later he's going to get the job done. But a lot of guys made some great plays."

St. James led for most of the game, starting early. On their second possession, the visiting Wildcats took four plays and 27 seconds to drive 65 yards. After a 41-yard run by Zenon and a nine-yard pass from Phillips to Jordan Landry, Ambrose scored from the 10. Jerome Lewis' extra point made it 7-0.

After holding Destrehan to three and out, St. James scored again when Phillips connected with Wayne Mitchell on a 43-yard pass. The extra-point attempt was blocked, leaving St. James with a 13-0 lead.

On the ensuing kickoff, Destrehan ran a reverse to Reed, who scampered 97 yards for an apparent touchdown, but Destrehan was flagged for an illegal block in the back. Destrehan did not score until its next possession, with 8:50 remaining in the half, when Reed caught a pass from Eugene, cut inside and broke a tackle at the four-yard line for a 52-yard touchdown. Travis Brignac kicked the PAT to cut St. James' lead to six points.

But St. James extended the lead on its next possession, an 11-play, 95-yard drive capped by a six-yard pass from Phillips to Nick Narcisse. The two-point conversion failed, leaving St. James with a 19-7 lead.

Destrehan was driving late in the first half and got down to the St. James seven, but, with four seconds remaining, Ambrose intercepted a Eugene pass at the goal line and returned it to the Destrehan 20.

Destrehan opened the second half with two quick touchdowns. Eugene ran for a 29-yard score 13 seconds into the third quarter. Later he threw a 24-yard touchdown pass to Martin with 8:35 remaining in the quarter. Brignac's PAT kick put Destrehan ahead for the first time, 20-19.

Two men cried together, one attempting to console the other's heartbreak. Both priests. Both pastors. The Rev. Gregg Riley of Grace Episcopal Church in Monroe, who had offered spiritual refuge to fellow priest George Walker Jr. of St. Paul's Episcopal Church in Lakeview, was with him as Walker learned about the massive flooding in the area of his church and home. He was unable to contact many of his parishioners. Most lived near the church. Many are elderly. They said a prayer.

Then the call came: Riley, a supervisory chaplain in the Louisiana National Guard, was told to report for duty. Throughout the country, in Tennessee, Ohio, Oregon, even Alaska, other Guard chaplains were getting the same call.

Two weeks after Hurricane Katrina came ashore on Aug. 29, 57 chaplains, one for every 500 soldiers, were in Louisiana counseling soldiers and evacuees and providing spiritual advice and religious services.

"To me, the neighborhood is my life. That's where my memories are. My childhood. And then we never moved out of it. Lakeview.

"We almost didn't leave because we had never had water. Camille, Betsy, since I was a little child we had hurricanes, but we never had any water — maybe halfway up the lawn. But the children kept calling us: 'Y'all better go!' That's why, when (my husband Jerry and I) left, we took very little with us. I took two pairs of earrings.

"I said, 'We took each other and that's the main thing.'

"When you get down to Harrison, it's like a city within a big city. It's like a little village almost. You go to the store, you know everybody. You're telling people hello at the post office. The grocery. The coffee shop. The restaurants down on Harrison. The cleaners. The drugstore. The church. Three churches are right there.

"But you knew everyone. And all my friends that I met when the children were in school, we've been meeting for 30 years since the children got out of school, once a month at the Yacht Club, which burned.

"A friend of mine said five of her kids lived in Lakeview and I said two of mine did and she said, 'We taught them to love Lakeview and to stay here and they all got flooded.'

"Most of the children, the young people today that are tearing down small houses and building bigger houses than mine, are children who were raised in Lakeview. Whole families have lost their houses.

"When we drove down Harrison Avenue yesterday it was like a bomb has hit it. I think that's what dad and I had felt that we had really lost. You lost that part of your life. There's no place to call home. That's where we are at this point in our lives.

"I told the kids when it first happened, Grandmother Collins, my mother — we called her 'Great' — she used to say, 'Your memories, they're in your heart.' And I believe that. We passed by Great's house yesterday."

CHRIS ROSE

A beautiful fall day

The sky is blue, the birds are chirping, my head is throbbing

It's not hard to identify the point at which, during my second tour of press duty here, it was time to get out.

That would be when, in the course of accompanying a photographer to shoot pictures for a feature I was writing, I stood up, blacked out, pitched face-forward into a tree and lay in the grass drifting in and out of consciousness for the next couple of hours.

It was during those "in" points of my in-and-out consciousness, looking up into a profoundly beautiful blue New Orleans sky, that I thought: Maybe I need to eat more. Maybe I need a break. I wonder what my kids are doing today? I wonder if there any job openings in the Midwest?

There I was, a body lying face up in the grass on the side of the road for several hours in a once-major metropolitan city, a sizeable gash across my forehead, one that — as I study it in a mirror — actually seems to be in the shape of the letter K, which seems a fitting lifetime reminder of what has happened here.

A little more authentic than a tattoo, no?

I was also thinking: Isn't anyone going to come get me?

Several notions come to mind:

First of all, even before Katrina (Pre-K, let's call it), a man passed out on the side of the road in New Orleans was not a uniquely alarming sight. But that's usually a vision reserved for the tourist areas, not under the shady streets of Uptown where my meltdown occurred.

Secondly — and I don't mean to be too macabre here — but in the days since

Katrina, a body lying anywhere on the street around here has not been a completely unusual circumstance.

You may ask: Why didn't the photographer get me out of there? But he was the only shooter we seemed to have in the city that day and the police chief was about to resign and he had to go get the picture and so I waved him off: "Go ahead," I said. "I'll be fine."

The story is important, I was thinking. Go get the story.

That was about 3:30 in the afternoon. I heard birds singing and every now and then, I could hear the woman we had come to photograph — a Katrina holdout and survivor — cooing to her cats in the distance.

It was not altogether unpleasant, the parts where I was awake. I had some shade. But it occurred to me that this environment is no place for the over-emotional and faint of heart.

If you cry when you watch "Terms of Endearment," then you don't need to be here. Problem is, I even cry at the end of "When Harry Met Sally," so this whole experience is Stress City.

Though people are trickling back into town and businesses are starting to light up, it's still an impossible vista, this whole damn city, where Lakeview looks like a nuclear wasteland with automobile trunks, doors and windows imploded from being underwater and so many

Cruise lines and riverboats that were scheduled to dock in New Orleans have relocated, but vow to return in 2006 or beyond

Pulling anchor

The Carnival Conquest now docks in Galveston, and although a company spokesman said it plans to resume seven-day cruises from New Orleans, 'We're just not certain about the timing or the ship.'

By Millie Ball
Travel editor

The Conquest, the Norwegian Sun, Grandeur of the Seas and the Sensation: All are enticing names for cruise ships that promised, and almost always delivered, memorable vacations to thousands of passengers via regular sailings from New Orleans to the Caribbean.

That all went kaput with Katrina. But the cruise lines operating the ships promise to reinstate cruising back into New Orleans when the city is ready to play again. And one ship already has a return date.

It's Carnival Cruise Lines' Sensation, a 2,052-passenger ship that's been making four- and five-night voyages year-round from New Orleans to Mexico since last fall. The Sensation is scheduled to resume the short cruises - complete with umbrella drinks and steel bands playing "Hot, Hot, Hot" — in October 2006, Carnival spokesman Jennifer de la Cruz said.

Actually, the Sensation still is in town, but its occupants are having a very different experience; the ship is under contract to FEMA to house officials and their families who are working in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Carnival's Conquest, a 2,974-passenger ship that was brand new and Carnival's largest when she proudly sailed into New Orleans in December 2002, has a new home port: Galveston, Texas. Her itinerary is the same as it was from here: the Western Caribbean ports of Grand Cayman; Montego Bay, Jamaica; and Cozumel, Mexico.

Guests who live in our area and were affected by the storm can contact Carnival about receiving refunds for the modified cruises; those who rebook before Dec. 31 will receive a $100 onboard credit per person.

As for when — or if — the French Impressionist-themed Conquest, which is almost three football fields long, will return, de la Cruz said, "We have every intention of resuming seven-day cruises from New Orleans and returning to the capacity levels we were at prior to Katrina." Specifics are vague.

De la Cruz said most short cruises draw a large drive-in crowd, while the week-long cruises lure people who fly in from all over the United States and Canada. So, without saying it bluntly, the return of the week-long cruise ships such as Conquest really depends on when New Orleans is ready to attract such visitors.

"We're just not certain about the timing or the ship," de la Cruz said.

While many New Orleanians feel as if the Conquest is "our" ship, two sister ships - the Valor and the Glory — are similar in design and newer. Another twin to the Conquest, at least in size and basic architecture, if not dÈcor, is the Carnival Freedom, scheduled to be christened in 2007. So, while nobody's saying anything, there's a clear possibility one of the other newer ones may be based here eventually.

Norwegian Cruise Line's 1,936-passenger, four-year-old Norwegian Sun, which was set to sail from New Orleans Oct. 16 through next spring, will now go to Houston instead and sail to Cozumel, Belize and Roatan, Honduras, said NCL spokesman Susan Robison.

In January, the ship will move to the Bahamas and make alternating week-long Eastern and Western Caribbean cruises. Previously booked guests who choose not to sail on one of the Houston cruises have until Sept. 30 to cancel without penalties; those who sail out of Houston or Miami will receive $50 per person (maximum of $100 per cabin) onboard credit.

The Norwegian Sun, built in 2001, was the first ship designed for NCL's "Freestyle cruising," which allows passengers to eat in any restaurant they want every night; it has 10 restaurants and cafes. The Sun was to replace the 13-year-old, 1,748-passenger Norwegian Dream that began sailing from New Orleans for six months each year in November 2003.

The most elegant of the cruise ships sailing out of New Orleans was Grandeur of the Seas, owned by Royal Caribbean International. For several years, the ship with a multi-story atrium and corridors lined with framed drawings for sets of plays and operas, arrived in late fall and left in early spring. This year, the 1,950-passenger ship was set to arrive Dec. 3 and sail through May 2006. It is being moved to Tampa for the season.

Passengers already booked have been advised to contact their travel agents or the cruise line, which promises "to ensure they experience as little inconvenience as possible."

"We truly regret we are unable to sail from New Orleans ... but we know that New Orleans will eventually reclaim its place as a world-class tourism destination," RCL President Adam Goldstein said. "We look forward to returning to the port of New Orleans as soon as circumstances permit us to do so."

His comment was echoed by other cruise line officials. In an official statement, Bob Dickinson, Carnival's president and CEO, called New Orleans "a city that is extremely near and dear to us" and pledged to return.

Riverboat companies also have been affected by the storm.

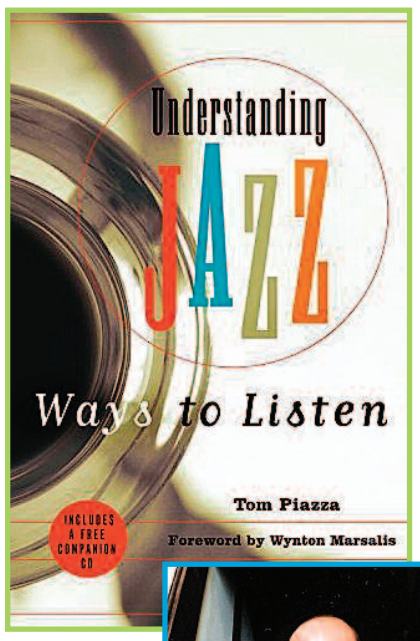
Delta Queen Steamboat Company, which was headquartered in New Orleans, has canceled all of its sailings on the American Queen, which uses New Orleans as its home port, at least until next spring.

The Delta Queen and Mississippi Queen steamboats now are on fall foliage cruises on the Upper Mississippi, Ohio, Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers, and in November, when they normally would head back home to New Orleans, will instead sail from Memphis.

But because of winter weather on the other rivers and the impossibility of operating out of New Orleans now, the company has canceled Delta Queen cruises from Nov. 28 to at least March 3, 2006, and Mississippi Queen sailings from Dec. 5 to March 4, said public relations manager Lucette Brehm. The Web site, www.deltaqueen.com, states passengers will get refunds, or those who prefer to sail in 2006 can pay 2005 rates (with advance booking discounts) and receive a $100 per person onboard credit. (Call 800-543-1949).

Delta Queen President Bruce Nierenberg told the editor of Cruise Week newsletter last week that he has offered use of the boats to the government for relief efforts, hoping FEMA would use them for housing as the agency is doing with Carnival's Ecstasy and Sensation, both docked in New Orleans, and the Holiday, which is now in Mobile serving the same purpose. A FEMA spokesperson has said there are no more ongoing negotiations with cruise lines, but Nierenberg said his wish is that the Delta Queen boats will "eventually be involved with the effort."

Meanwhile, DQ has moved its main office to Buffalo, N.Y., where its parent company, Delaware North Corp., is located; other operations have relocated to Memphis.



As for the possibility of returning the boats to New Orleans next year, Nierenberg told Cruise Week he doesn't think the city will be an "attractive destination" until at least mid-2006. But, he added, "the people of New Orleans have a lot of pride, and if the officials working in this regard give them the resources, they could surprise us all."

New Orleans and all that jazz

New book-and-CD package celebrates a city and its music

'Understanding Jazz' author Tom Piazza's next book will explain to the rest of the world 'Why New Orleans Matters.'

By Susan Larson
Book editor

Novelist and music writer Tom Piazza ("My Cold War," "The Guide to Classic Recorded Jazz") has the distinction of being the only New Orleans writer to have won a Grammy — for his album notes to "Martin Scorsese Presents the Blues: A Musical Journey." He shares his extensive musical knowledge in the instructive and entertaining "Understanding Jazz: Ways to Listen" (Random House, $27.95, produced by Jazz at Lincoln Center), with a foreword by Wynton Marsalis.

Piazza takes six basic concepts — "Foreground and Background," "Blues," "Forms," "Improvisation," "Swing, Rhythm, Time, Space," and "Telling a Story" — and carefully explicates them, using examples from the accompanying seven-song CD, which includes work by King Oliver's Creole Jazz Band, Count Basie and Lester Young, Duke Ellington with Dizzy Gillespie, Sonny Rollins, Stan Getz, the Miles Davis Quintet, and Dizzy Gillespie, Sonny Rollis and Sonny Stitt.

Following Piazza's careful guidance, one learns to truly listen and appreciate basic structure as well as nuance. Like the great art teacher who finally makes students see anew, Piazza gives all music lovers a gift, "membership in the It club of jazz listeners," as Marsalis puts it in his foreword.

But the most wonderful, memorable description appears in the chapter on storytelling, where, describing the work of Buddy Tate and Buck Clayton, these words seem particularly applicable to post-Katrina listeners:

"Clayton's choruses had a bittersweet element that had to do with the fact of limitation and finitude itself. Whatever else that solo was about, it was also, in a way, his personal statement about the context — the song's form, the always beginning and ending and beginning again of the short blues choruses, the transient quality of sound and time itself. Things last only a short time, he seemed to be saying, but there is always a beginning again. There was nothing sentimental or maudlin in that recognition, and neither was there any bogus triumphalism. Buck and Buddy were looking things straight in the eye."

And at this time, when all New Orleanians are having to look things straight in the eye, this book makes for fine reading, celebrating, as it does, the music our city gave to the world.

Historian Douglas Brinkley has inked a deal to write about 'The Great Deluge' for William Morrow.

Post-Katrina book deals are starting to line up

Piazza is working on a new book - "Why New Orleans Matters" — for HarperCollins. Times-Picayune City Editor Jed Horne has signed to write an as yet untitled book for Random House. And historian Douglas Brinkley will write the tentatively titled "The Great Deluge" for William Morrow.

Festivals plan for return

Those who organize literary events are pausing to regroup, recharge and carry on. Rosemary James has said that this year's Words and Music, scheduled for November, will be back next year. She's going in to Faulkner House to retrieve papers and assess the damage to the literary landmark.

"I want to be in the house on Faulkner's birthday," James said, from her exile in Charleston, "to let the ornery, demanding old bastard know that somebody in New Orleans still loves him and remembered his birthday."

Patricia Brady, president of the Tennessee Williams/New Orleans Literary Festival, said form Hammond, "If we have to shine flashlights at the stage, the Tennessee Williams/New Orleans Literary Festival will take place as scheduled March 29-April 2 in the French Quarter. Writers who love New Orleans and the Festival have rushed to our support, including Pulitzer Prize winner Michael Chabon, Dorothy Allison, Elizabeth Berg, Ayelet Waldman, Rick Bragg, John Barry, Bev Marshall and Douglas Brinkley. Paul Willis, the executive director, is running the Festival in Exile from Kewanee, Ill. So like New Orleans itself, the festival is still alive."

John Barry, Douglas Brinkley and Josh Clark have signed on for a "Big Flood" panel discussion.

Bookselling and publishing updates

Joseph Billingsley of Pelican Publishing is optimistic about the company's future. "The building was relatively unaffected," he said. "If we can get the staff back, I think we can be back to some semblance of normalcy, hopefully soon enough to preserve some national Christmas sales, though of course the loss of the local market is a huge blow to us."

Rob Schauffler of local wholesaler Forest Sales, said from Colorado, "Forest Sales was flooded. I don't yet know how high the water rose, but with the high temperatures, all our inventory and office is a total loss. We still don't know what records and documents can be saved."

The company has leased a small warehouse and office space in LaPlace, and is receiving books there. "I am working closely with Barnes & Noble to supply their Louisiana stores outside of New Orleans," Schauffler said. "They are doing all they can to assist us with orders as we slowly recover. We are looking at least a year to get back fifty to sixty percent of our business."

The city's independent booksellers will take a major hit from the lack of fall business; most are scattered across the country, waiting to get back in and assess the damage.

"It's going to be an interesting year," Garden District Book Shop's Britton Trice said from his refuge in Wisconsin, an understatement if ever there was one.

The finishing touches are being made to a 580-trailer park for displaced hurricane victims in a Baker cow pasture outside of Baton Rouge.

Evacuees on edge about life in trailers

Security, isolation of FEMA park has some worried

By Jenny Hurwitz
Staff writer

For Angela Tillman, the idea of living in a temporary trailer park unleashes a litany of concerns.

She wonders how she will get around the proposed site in Baker without a car. She doubts there will be shopping centers or grocery stores within walking distance of the mini-city. And she worries about the security provided for the hundreds of displaced residents who will live there.

But when FEMA representatives came to her last week with the promise of temporary housing in a trailer, she reflected on her flooded 9th Ward home and her current home, at the River Center shelter in Baton Rouge, and realized she had no choice.

"I don't have another place to go," she said.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency is at the brink of completing its first large trailer city: 580 travel trailers in a 65-acre cow pasture in Baker, outside Baton Rouge. FEMA officials expect to put finishing touches on the park early this week and hope to start moving residents in by midweek.

Evacuees living in Baton Rouge, including those at the River Center, most likely will populate the mini-city, said FEMA spokesman James McIntyre. So far, FEMA has identified 400 eligible families and is considering others, although he could not say whether the families had been contacted or when they would be notified.

But confusion about move-in dates and other details about the site continues to frustrate people living at the shelter, deterring them from signing up to move into trailers.

People who move to FEMA-supplied temporary housing will not be eligible for the $2,358 cash advance toward three months'

Lack of clean water puts pressure on Orleans officials

One month after Hurricane Katrina smashed southeast Louisiana, crews struggling to restore drinking water on the east bank of New Orleans still are digging through mountains of muck-covered vehicles, a forest of fallen trees and homes flooded off their foundations — just to find and fix the broken pipes that have rendered the water system impotent.

It will be at several weeks, at best, before the water is certified safe to drink, and possibly longer, officials speculate.

Yet New Orleans' neighbors in rapidly repopulating Jefferson Parish have been drinking clean water for the past three weeks, and using it to cook dinner, make ice for cocktails, bathe the kids and wash away Katrina's filth from their homes and businesses.

It's a tale of two water systems and the very different cards they were dealt by the mighty storm.

When Katrina roared ashore Aug. 29, Jefferson Parish was operating water treatment plants bolstered by $7 million worth of recent improvements to their electrical systems and backed by a stable of new generators that enabled the parish to keep producing water through the teeth of the storm. Had it not been for toppled trees, which ripped open buried water pipes when their roots were wrenched from the ground in more than 300 spots, Water Director Randy Schuler thinks

Sugar cane farmers facing a bleak season

If plants didn't drown, they were blown over

Except for 21 months spent in the Army during the 1960s, sugar cane farmer Raphael "Pookie" Rodriguez Jr., 65, has spent more than four decades of his life in the community of Ashton, growing a sometimes fickle crop that can break any man without a good work ethic and a healthy sense of humor.

Therefore, it should be no surprise that he can laugh easily as he points to the 5-foot-high watermark on the wall of his tool shed. Rodriguez, who seems to call everyone "cousin," says he has had a good life, free from prolonged bouts of worry. But when he sees 4 feet of water still sitting over part of his 1,500 acres of cane six days after Hurricane Rita huffed ashore, Rodriguez can't avoid pondering his future.

Nor can he avoid wondering what's in store for farmers like him across St. Mary, Iberia and Vermilion Parishes, an area among the state's 24-parish cane-producing area particularly hard-hit by Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita.

"I've made it all my life, had some tough times and some good times, but I don't know how to make these (ends) meet," Rodriguez said. "I thought in the spring I had one of the better crops around here and then overnight it took a different change."

Industry experts estimate that the sugar cane industry in the state will sustain about $200 million in losses after the hurricanes. They were anticipating $160 million in losses from Katrina alone. Then Rita swamped the fields only weeks later.

The loss includes crop damage, equipment loss and lost

Rescuing the economy next on state's agenda

Tax incentives part of Blanco's strategy

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Gov. Kathleen Blanco was supposed to be visiting the picturesque Yangjae district of Seoul, South Korea, last week at the end of a four-nation Asian tour, sipping green tea with auto-manufacturing executives and trying to convince Kia Motor Co. to choose a site off Interstate 20 near Monroe for a new car plant.

Instead, because two hurricanes devastated southern Louisiana and uprooted more than a million people and 71,000 businesses, she canceled the trip and appeared before a congressional committee Wednesday in Washington, D.C., pleading for a massive economic rescue.

Sloughing off the heavy yoke of crisis management she wore in the storms' immediate aftermath, the sleep-deprived governor was rolling out an economic-development agenda for a Louisiana drastically different than the one she could have described to the Koreans.

Her core goal is still jobs, but now it is aimed more at bringing them back than at generating new ones, and it depends almost entirely on federal aid. Storm damage estimates of $180 billion are 20 times the size of the Louisiana government's entire revenue base, excluding federal sources.

"These storms knocked us down, but they didn't knock us out," Blanco told the Senate Committee on Finance. "And with your help and support, we will come back stronger and more prosperous than before."

For a governor accustomed to mapping out policy with long-range task forces and a carefully constructed consensus, the demands for immediate decision-making and the staggering challenges wrought by Hurricane Katrina are testing Blanco's strengths as a leader in ways that neither she, nor anyone else, could have imagined.

The former schoolteacher and housewife has been handed a historic moment and a unique political position, for she must set the course for state government and also stamp her imprimatur on federal legislation that will shape Louisiana's future for decades. And she must rally the support of a demoralized private sector, which she calls critical to the rebuilding effort.

Blanco and her administration have begun to articulate a plan and have identified what they see as the most urgent business. The first steps are crucial, but they are plagued with "chicken or egg" dilemmas, said Andy Kopplin, the governor's chief of staff who last week assumed the role of Blanco's point man for hurricane recovery.

Businesses can't return to New Orleans without workers, and workers can't return without jobs. Workers must have housing, and new housing needs workers to build it. Communities need basic public services, but those services require a community of taxpayers to finance public employment. Which comes first?

The solution is to send a strong signal immediately to the private sector that it is possible to operate businesses safely and efficiently in the New Orleans area, Kopplin said.

"That signal is urgently needed," Kopplin said, and it has to come from Congress and the President in the form of a rebuilding package set in several pieces of legislation. That's why Blanco flew to Washington and met privately with House and Senate leaders Wednesday.

Foremost, the package must include a federal commitment to rebuild a more robust levee system, Kopplin said. Although that job might take years to finish, Congress must act swiftly to give the private sector confidence that it will happen as soon as possible, he said. Otherwise, in the next few weeks many New Orleans businesses will decide not to return.

The signal also entails financial inducements to companies who dare to keep doing business in New Orleans, including various tax credits, grants and low-cost loans, according to a Blanco administration strategy document obtained by the newspaper. The Empire State Development Corp., a New York public agency that generated programs to bring businesses back to lower Manhattan after the 2001 terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, has closely advised Louisiana's economic development officials on Blanco's rebuilding plan.

Another part of the signal would be an immediate federal bailout of local governments whose tax base was diminished by depopulation. Under the Stafford Act, which guides the spending practices of the Federal Emergency Management Agency after a catastrophe, federal dollars are readily available to reimburse law enforcement, firefighters and other local government workers for overtime pay, but not for base pay.

Blanco has appealed directly to President Bush to override the provisions of the law so that federal money for base salaries can flow to the parishes and towns in Louisiana experiencing cash-flow problems. She has the support of state associations of sheriffs, police juries and municipalities. Members of the state's congressional delegation also support the idea, while also pressing for non-FEMA sources of money for the salaries.

Without basic public services — above all for sewerage and water, a 911 emergency system and garbage collection — businesses will not return, Kopplin said.

Tax holiday

Business people had their say with the governor on Thursday, when Blanco brought about 30 leaders from corporate and community circles statewide to a densely packed meeting room on the fourth floor of the state Capitol. Their ranks included King Milling, chief executive of Whitney National Bank and a former Rex, and Ken Carter, a former assessor in Orleans Parish and an influential member of the city's African-American political elite.

People both in and out of Blanco's political circle participated, among them her brother Errol Babineaux of Acadian Ambulance and James Davison, a Ruston businessman and strong supporter of Republican candidates for office.

As individuals offered ideas during the private meeting, their comments were typed on a large video screen for all to see. Bill Herrington, a senior vice president of Hibernia National Bank who has temporarily relocated to Houston, seized on a piece of Blanco's plan that he said would be the single most important "signal" that government can send to the private sector.

Called an "individual tax holiday," the incentive would grant a 50 percent federal tax cut on earned income and rental income for five years for people working in the Katrina impact area. The tax break would lure people — certainly the wealthy — to the area, and it could be passed by Congress as an immediate and tangible initiative without requiring a bureaucracy to make it work, Herrington said.

Rocky political road

Such notions posted on an electronic screen in Baton Rouge have a rocky political road to travel before arriving as new legislation on the president's desk in Washington.

The state's legislative kickoff was Sept. 22, when Democratic U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu and her Republican colleague, U.S. Sen. David Vitter, jointly presented a 440-page proposal called the Louisiana Katrina Reconstruction Act, a sweeping list of projects totaling $250 billion that quickly drew editorial criticism and skepticism on Capitol Hill, especially in the House.

Kopplin said the governor's office "contributed significantly" to the senators' package.

The proposal directly addresses Hurricane Katrina's not only the most immediate military and infrastructure costs but also programs well outside the area of the storm's impact. For example, it requests several hundred million dollars for services to combat substance abuse and suicide, and $25 million for a sugar-cane research laboratory in Houma, where Katrina had little impact.

Both Vitter and Landrieu said last week that most federal lawmakers understand that the package is simply a blueprint or list of options, a starting point for dozens of bills and not the draft of a single bill.

"It's not a focus but a foundation," Landrieu said. "We've gotten criticism from people who don't understand how critical the situation is in south Louisiana and don't understand how important south Louisiana is to the rest of the nation."

Various committees will have to consider its components, and the real work is now being done in meetings with committee chairs to identify the top priorities, Vitter said.

To help finance the programs, the state's entire congressional delegation and the governor have been unified in their proposal to give Louisiana a larger share of the $5 billion in mineral revenues that the federal government collects for Gulf of Mexico offshore oil and gas operations.

Pelican Commission

The senators are advocating radical ways to cut federal red tape. They want to create a nine-member Pelican Commission, a highly empowered panel appointed mainly by the president to short-cut the Army Corps of Engineers and the legislative process to quickly build a better levee system around New Orleans. The commission, with a majority of members from Louisiana, would call the shots without having to seek further financial authorization from Congress, according to the senators' legislative proposal.

The corps' system for improving levees moves "at a snail's pace," Vitter said. Without a dramatic change, "we'll have two more Katrinas before a spade is even put in the ground," Vitter said.

But Pelican stands for Protecting Essential Louisiana Infrastructure, Citizens and Nature, and the draft includes commission oversight of $40 billion in projects — some on the Corps of Engineers' drawing board for many years — ranging from coastal restoration to deeper access canals for the Port of Iberia.

The commission proposals appeared to be driven by special interests and pork barrel projects rather than objective expertise, according to Ivor van Heerden, a Louisiana scientist who was asked to advise a working group on levees and coastal management for the senators' legislative package. The advisory group was led by John Barry, author of "Rising Tide," a highly acclaimed book about the 1927 Mississippi River flood.

"This was a bill put together by lobbyists without any involvement from scientists from Louisiana who know the situation," said van Heerden, deputy director of Louisiana State University's Hurricane Center. He said his suggestions were drowned out by the preponderance of lobbyists on the working group.

"The bottom line I got out of this is that unless you were a lobbyist, they did not want you to participate," van Heerden said.

Vitter said the senators consulted with a slew of environmental experts and that his door has been wide open to everyone, not just lobbyists.

Clock is ticking

Kopplin said the Pelican Commission was a proposal by the senators, and that in the long run Blanco is less interested in the mechanism than the results.

"The eye on the prize is that we get the resources we need so folks have the confidence that they can come back, and there's a long-term commitment of the federal government to be the state's partner in protecting our cities and towns from hurricanes and restoring the coast," Kopplin said.

Although Blanco has no vote in Congress, her support and ideas are key to that legislative process, Kopplin said.

Blanco and members of the congressional delegation say time is quickly running out. Landrieu warned that Congress has a short attention span. If the main legislative issues for Katrina recovery are left to languish until January, it will be very hard to get Washington to focus on Louisiana, she said.

By then, New Orleans may have lost the battle for the hearts and minds of the business community, said Herrington. Although Hibernia is committed to remaining in New Orleans and helping rebuild, many business owners and individuals working for his and other companies cannot wait too much longer for the state and federal governments to set a course of action.

"We're all going to have to make some permanent decisions here pretty soon, my friend. Pretty soon," he said.

A month after Hurricane Katrina sent floodwaters within a few feet of their roof, Donald and Colleen Bordelon air their belongings in the front yard of their Arabi home. 'That's my whole life right there,' said Donald Bordelon, who stayed in the home through Hurricane Betsy as well as Katrina. 'Ain't nothing but a big pile of trash, but it's all I've got.'

FOR DIEHARDS, NO PLACE LIKE HOME

Couple rides out Hurricane Katrina atop their Arabi roof

By Paul Rioux
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

Exhausted after a month of living in the post-Katrina wasteland that is St. Bernard Parish, Donald Bordelon slumped into a mud-caked rocking chair Thursday on the porch of his Arabi home, where a massive mound of moldy furniture and other storm debris filled the front yard and spilled into the street.

"That's my whole life right there," said Bordelon, 48, wearing a pair of denim overalls and a white sweat-soaked T-shirt. "Ain't nothing but a big pile of trash, but it's all I've got."

After riding out the storm on the second floor of the Schnell Drive home, Bordelon and his wife, Colleen, lived on the roof for eight days surrounded by up to 12 feet of water, with a blue tarp providing scant protection from the scorching sun.

As soon as the floodwaters receded, the Bordelons, who had survived on military MREs and warm bottled water, climbed down and began hauling their ruined belongings outside, one guck-covered wheelbarrow load at a time. They have since reclaimed their upstairs bedroom, where two small generator-powered fans provide a modicum of relief after long days toiling in the 90 degree heat.

"Everyone thinks we're crazy for staying here, but we're just trying to save our home," said Donald Bordelon, noting that the Red Cross sent a psychiatrist to check on them two weeks after the storm. "Where am I going to go? I don't want to move to Oklahoma or Florida. I really love it here. I love St. Bernard."

While many St. Bernard residents are unsure whether they will ever move back to the parish, Bordelon and a handful of others never left. Defying mandatory evacuation orders both before and after Katrina struck, the holdouts face a daily struggle to meet basic needs in the devastated parish, where most homes have no running water and all are without electricity.

After initially trying to persuade the survivalists to leave, authorities have accepted their stubborn presence as inevitable.

"People respond to tragedies like this in different ways. Everybody is doing their own thing," said Parish Council Chairman Joey DiFatta. "If they want to live in the squalor of what's left of their homes, that is their right."

But Bordelon points out that "squalor" is a relative term in St. Bernard, where the storm swamped virtually every one of the 27,600 homes, most of which will have to be torn down.

While neighbors began returning this week to houses filled with several inches of sludge, a gagging stench and an obstacle course of overturned furniture, the couple's house looks like something out of Better Homes and Gardens by comparison.

They spent a week clearing everything out and mopping the floors as best they could without running water. Then they sprayed every surface with bleach to keep the mold at bay.

A waterlogged king-sized mattress was so heavy that they had to cut it into three pieces to move it. Glassware coated in a film of dried muck fills a pirogue in the driveway next to a flatboat loaded with pots and pans and rusted kitchen utensils. A large pile of shoes, boots and sandals sits nearby.

As her husband started cleaning out the garage Thursday afternoon, Colleen Bordelon hung filthy clothes, sheets and blankets to dry on a rope in the front yard to prevent them from mildewing.

"I hope no one minds that I'm airing our dirty laundry in public," she said with a laugh.

With no water pressure, the couple uses bottled water to flush their toilets and to bathe.

"If you keep your thumb over the opening so that just a little trickles out, you can take a shower with three 12-ounce bottles," Donald Bordelon said. "But it takes six bottles if you want to wash your hair."

Now that the parish is open for residents to return and salvage what they can, friends and relatives drop off food, ice and gasoline for the generator. But the conditions remain primitive, and Donald Bordelon said he's coping with help from an occasional six-pack of Budweiser compliments of his brother, Jigger, who visits every couple of days.

"I was born and raised here, and I'd like to live the rest of my life here," Bordelon said. "I want to rebuild one more time, but if it floods again, I'll probably leave."

Another post-Katrina survivalist, Vic Lala, 79, has turned his front yard on Pirate Drive in Chalmette into a used-car lot.

White paint on the windows of a flooded 1969 Chevrolet C-10 pickup discloses that the vehicle "needs work," a monumental understatement that isn't fully appreciated until Lala pops the hood to reveal the rusted-out engine. But he's quick to point out that he slashed his prehurricane asking price in half to $1,000. Plus, he'll throw in a 1982 Ford F-150 pickup that the storm deposited on a low brick wall surrounding a flowerbed near the sidewalk.

A retired gas station owner who was a part-time maintenance worker at the Eastover Country Club in New Orleans, Lala said he never considered evacuating.

"I didn't want to go to no damn shelter with people moaning and groaning, kids making noise and having to wait in line to use the lavatory," he said. "I got everything I need to survive right here."

A moment later, though, he added, "I can always use more ice. You got any?"

Lala declined to show a visitor the living conditions on the second floor of his brick home.

"It's too personal," he said. "I'm just an old man trying to keep the smell down the best I can and keep it clean the best I can."

But he admits that he's starting to suffer, especially from the relentless swarms of flies. "I got fly swatters hanging all around," he said. "I kill the heck out of those suckers, but they keep coming back."

Lala insisted he's staying put until an insurance adjuster comes to settle his claim.

"Then I'm going to make my move," he said. "I'll get me a small camper and drive away, and you won't catch me looking back."

The Bordelons received a long-awaited visit Thursday afternoon from their insurance adjuster, who told them their efforts to salvage the house were for naught.

"He said it's a total loss, but that's a load of bull," Donald Bordelon said. "We just need to strip the walls to the studs, pressure wash everything and then get out the bleach. A little bleach will clean anything."

He said they plan to continue living in the house while they rebuild it, just like his parents did when they repaired the same home after Hurricane Betsy in 1965.

Each night, Bordelon fires up a generator on top of the carport and plugs in an extension cord connected to red, white and blue tube lighting wrapped around a utility pole in front of his house. The patriotic glow is the only light in the Arabi night sky.

Bordelon put the display up after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in New York and Washington D.C. Now it serves as a memorial to St. Bernard's own Sept. 11.

An American flag tied to the pole was torn to shreds by Katrina's 140 mph gusts. About a week after the storm had passed, Bordelon lowered the tattered and badly faded flag to half-mast, a poignant tribute to the ruined parish. He later found a brand new mildew-free flag tucked away in a dresser, and he tied it to the pole above the old one.

Bordelon views the brightly colored banner as a symbol of hope and renewal that suggests he made the right decision by staying.

"I didn't even know that I had that flag," he said. "It just shows that I have everything I need right here at home."

Corrupt La. past has some fearful

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

STAFF PHOTO BY CHUCK COOK

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, with Gov. Kathleen Blanco, announces his Bring New Orleans Back plans. There is some wariness around the country about giving Louisiana, with its history of political shenanigans, a large amount of federal money for rebuilding.

WASHINGTON — On the FOX News Channel last week conservative talk show host Sean Hannity told Sen. David Vitter that he was "shocked and outraged" that "you politicians in Louisiana" are exploiting the Hurricane Katrina tragedy by "trying to get every tax dollar for every pork barrel project."

On C-SPAN, a caller from Buffalo, N.Y., said he feared the hurricane relief money being funneled to Louisiana through the Federal Emergency Management Agency would be wasted by "corrupt and incompetent" government officials in Louisiana and New Orleans.

An editorial in The Oregonian, the newspaper in Portland, said Louisiana officials "seem all too eager to capitalize on public sympathy" with a "rich gumbo" of spending proposals, some unrelated to the hurricane. "Louisiana's history of corruption," the editorial said, "paired with FEMA's organizational troubles and the Bush administration's habit of awarding no-bid contracts should put taxpayers on alert."

While the Bush administration and many members of Congress say they have a strong commitment to providing a generous redevelopment package for Louisiana and Mississippi, there is growing cynicism about the amounts of money being tossed about, including a $250 billion aid request package introduced last week by Louisiana's two senators, Republican Vitter and Democrat Mary Landrieu.

Already wary of fast-track government spending programs unleashed in a state with a history of government shenanigans, watchdog groups were quick to pounce on the Landrieu-Vitter bill as a vehicle for pork-barrel spending that went way beyond the immediate needs for humanitarian aid and hurricane defense.

Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, said despite increased grumbling on and off Capitol Hill, Louisiana should do quite well with federal aid. "The devastation is so great and the stories of the victims have united Americans in sympathy," he said.

But he warns that "there is a palpable fear that many millions, if not billions (of dollars), will be wasted through graft and corruption." While Sabato said he understands the decision by Landrieu and Vitter to "strike while the iron is hot" with a far-reaching and expensive proposal, in retrospect their effort "looks greedy."

In his appearance on the Fox News Channel, Vitter responded to criticism of his and Landrieu's Hurricane Katrina Disaster Relief and Economic Recovery Act by calling on Hannity and his liberal co-host Alan Colmes, to visit Louisiana and see the devastation first hand.

"We're talking about an entire major American metropolitan area that has been completely dislocated, completely evacuated," Vitter said. "Last time that happened in American history was the Civil War."

Landrieu said the legislation is intended to provide a broad outline of Louisiana's needs and that she and Vitter realize not all of it will sail through Congress and that some provisions no doubt will be revised or rejected.

"We recognize that it's a very high number," Landrieu said of the $250 billion bill. "But I guess part of introducing this package and doing it unified in our delegation is to say this is an unprecedented natural disaster, a national tragedy. And it's going to take an unprecedented response."

Vitter said he has received a generally favorable response in meetings with Senate committee leaders about individual priority items.

Still, advocates for restoring Louisiana's coastline worry that the Senate bill offered by Landrieu and Vitter will generate opposition because it is so broad and covers items not related to the coast or protecting the state from future hurricanes, such as upgrading the ports in New Iberia and Fourchon.

"How can we expect the nation to believe us that we need these projects to save the coastal wetlands that are vital to ourselves and to the nation, when we ask for a blank check and no oversight over $200 billion packed with projects that have nothing to do with either floor protection of the city of New Orleans or restoring the coast?" asked Mark Davis, executive director of the Coalition to Restore Coastal Louisiana.

Ivor van Heerden, an associate professor of civil and environmental engineering at Louisiana State University, said he was upset that lobbyists were involved in writing the bill, rather than experts who could offer new innovative solutions for hurricane protection and coastal restoration. Vitter said he and other delegation members relied on a wide range of experts, including former House Appropriations Committee Chairman Bob Livingston, R-Metaire, who is now a lobbyist but has great "insights" into the legislative process.

Some members of Congress will insist on the appointment of a chief financial officer to ensure that hurricane relief spending isn't wasted. Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., one of the Senate's most conservative members, this week joined with liberal Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., to complain about the awarding of a six-month $192 million contract to Carnival Cruise lines that they say costs the government four times as much to house a Katrina evacuee as a vacation passenger.

"Hurricane Katrina is the most expensive natural disaster this country has ever faced and the rebuilding will certainly be the largest and costliest of its kind," the senators said in a statement. "This entrusts FEMA with massive responsibility, and so it's only right we protect both taxpayers and citizens of the Gulf Coast with strict accountability and oversight about how the money is spent and whether it is most efficiently directed to help rebuild lives."

Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, said he would like to see a well-respected manager, such as former Secretary of State Colin Powell or former General Electric CEO Jack Welch, oversee the redevelopment effort. Vitter said he already has submitted possible candidates to the White House.

Jindal said Louisiana House members have decided to pursue individual bills to rebuild New Orleans, including its businesses and job base, rather than the kind of single giant bill proposed by Landrieu and Vitter. But he said the delegation is unified across party lines to build support for the kind of redevelopment help southern Louisiana so desperately needs.

Norm Ornstein, the congressional and political expert at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, said the American public doesn't have much patience for stories about wasted spending or corruption. He suggested the state's two senator's move away from advocating their expensive, all-encompassing bill.

"Any spate of news stories from now on about corruption in contracts, etc., will hurt – people will resist a major taxpayers' commitment if they think much of it will be wasted or lining the pockets of miscreants," Ornstein said. "That perception, unfortunately, has been reinforced by the delegation request, which editorials have called 'Louisiana looting.' The delegation needs to change its tone and strategy when it comes to getting aid. The other danger is that over time, as other disasters occur, aid becomes zero sum."

Orleanians espouse big-picture ideas

By Brian Thevenot
Staff writer

Harry Anderson, the magician and former television star who has recently opened three businesses in the French Quarter, yelled into a sporadically operable microphone at Molly's at the Market on Decatur Street on Friday night, addressing a typical Quarter crowd of tattoo enthusiasts, well-heeled entrepreneurs, street artists and self-proclaimed professional drunks.

Moderating over a unique town meeting, Anderson threw out bold and at times bizarre ideas for reinventing the Quarter and New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina. Would the crowd support casinos in the Quarter?

"No," came the response.

"Is now the time to legalize prostitution?" asked Anderson, who has said his mother was once a prostitute, which led him on a nomadic road that perhaps predictably ended in New Orleans. Before the storm he performed a magic show at his new club, Oswald's, at Decatur Street and Esplanade Avenue.

"Yes," the crowd yelled back, amid giddy laughter and raised glasses, endorsing a new version of the city's famed Storyville prostitution district.

Anderson wasn't kidding.

"That's not a joke — it's a question," he said. "You have to understand — there is no tax base. There is no tax base."

Anderson put together the rousing town hall forum with Molly's proprietor Jim Monaghan Jr., hoping to light a fire under the crowd of die-hards in the Quarter and the Faubourg Marigny to take action to both preserve and reinvent the neighborhood and the city they love.

The perspectives that emerged in occasionally slurred and profanity-laced speeches, however, seemed to at once celebrate and rebuke the instincts that have become the hallmark of one of the world's most famous neighborhoods: parochialism, politics-as-entertainment, and, most of all, the butt-on-barstool culture of complaint.

The message rang loud and clear: Don't just sit and gripe, waiting for public officials and corporations to rebuild: Take responsibility and action to steer the city's fate.

"Don't be a drunk," said Carrie Eicher, an obviously drunk patron. "Take care of the city."

Anderson corrected her: "No — be a drunk and take care of the city," he barked into the scratchy sound system, prompting another round of raised glasses and applause. "Don't kid yourself into thinking this will be done by someone else."

Public officials — from the mayor to the president — took a beating from some at the microphone in the crowded bar, which quickly reopened after the storm. But Anderson and others told the crowd frankly to take a long look in the mirror.

"We have met the enemy, and he is us," Anderson said. "We can all do better. We weren't in the positions to push the major buttons … (during and after the storm), but we can all do better."

Anderson came to the meeting looking for just that kind of attitude. With three properties in the Quarter, his chosen semi-retirement home, he feared he may have to abandon ship rather than bear the heavy burden of entrepreneurship in a city with a devastated economy.

"I don't know if I want to carry this burden — it's still a mystery to me — but I know what I don't want to do, which is just to sit around" and curse public officials, Anderson said in an interview after the forum. "I came here to find out whether … we are going to control our own fate."

"This is a start," he said, pleased with the spirit shown during the forum.

The meeting also featured calls for an end to the neighborhood parochialism that for generations has defined New Orleans, and nowhere more fiercely than the Quarter.

"A lot of people in the national media have been talking about New Orleans will become a boutique city," said Jeanre Chandler, a French Quarter native.

"No!" the crowd yelled back.

The way to avoid that fate, Chandler said, is for the city's neighborhoods and suburbs to band together to rebuild a unified metropolitan area.

"A lot of neighborhoods have turned their backs on one another. People from Lakeview, Chalmette and the 9th Ward didn't care about one another. … We need to be a city again."

Clark Theriot, a Magazine Street business owner, joined the chorus. "We're shot in the leg right now, people in the 9th Ward, Uptown — everywhere. We need to band together right now. If we all want to get snooty with one another again in a year, fine."

Along with the unity should come a new openness and a temporary relaxing of the fierce protection of aesthetics in the Quarter, said Mike Howells, a French Quarter tarot card reader and property owner. He advocated setting up trailers for rebuilders to live and work in and near the Quarter. He recommended an empty lot near Rampart Street and Esplanade Avenue as one good option.

"We need to get temporary housing in the center of the city so people have access to work," he said.

Some cane farmers may be leaving their fields

productivity. In addition, one of the state's two sugar refineries is located in Chalmette, which suffered massive flooding, and could be closed indefinitely.

Before Rita, Louisiana's congressional delegation filed legislation that seeks $165 million to help sugar farmers recover from damage inflicted by Katrina.

While damage from the hurricanes is being felt in fields from Cameron to St. Charles parish, farmers in St. Mary, Vermilion and Iberia parishes were especially hard-hit by Rita, as their crops bore the brunt of a 6- to 10-foot storm surge from Vermilion Bay and Cote Blanche Bay that overtopped levees and saturated the ripe cane with a cocktail of saltwater and chemical run-off. In Vermilion and Iberia parishes the storm surge flattened the cane; in St. Mary Parish, it formed small ponds in the fields, thanks to an overtopped levee system that first allowed water into the fields and then in some cases prevented it from receding.

The harvest, which typically begins by Oct. 1 at the latest, could be pushed back several days as farmers wait for the mud in the fields to harden enough to support the heavy tractors and combine harvesters.

No doubt sugar cane is a more resilient crop than, say, cotton or rice, and can still produce despite such serious abuse. But the questions remain how much this year's crop will produce.

Herman Waguespack Jr., an agronomist with the American Sugar Cane League, said that his organization is still working to generate its own loss estimates for the two storms, but knows the losses are "substantial." He also expects the storms to drive more farmers out of the business, speeding the trend in recent years of declining numbers of cane farmers.

Farmer Joel Luke looks at damaged sugar cane plants.

"We know there are going to be some people who just are going out of business," Waguespack said.

Raphael Rodriguez's nephew, Gregory Rodriguez, who farms 1,800 acres nearby, said he has thought about getting out of the business himself lately. Gregory Rodriguez said farmers had to contend with Hurricane Lili in 2002, which reduced their yield, followed by heavy rains and dry spells late in the past couple of seasons.

Rodriguez said it typically costs about $700 to $1,000 to plant and harvest an acre of cane. A downturn in the sugar yielded by that acreage can mean the difference between making a profit and losing money, he said.

Also, farmers say, Katrina and Rita could cripple farmers for years to come if saltwater and wind caused serious damage to delicate new plantings in land that was not to be harvested this season. Waguespack said many of those new plantings were of a new higher-sugar-yielding variety of cane, and the damage will only exacerbate future losses.

"It makes you think. You can only take a loss so many years, then you have to look at the future," said Rodriguez, 37, who is married with two children. "We've had a hard rain come in here and put down four to five inches and then we get it out. But this (water) has just stayed here."

Strangely, Rodriguez hardly seemed frustrated with the water last week as he drove along the levees lining his and his uncle's levees. Stopping by one of the four breaches they created to let water escape from their fields until pumps could be used, Rodriguez said he was just thankful for the roughly three miles of swamp that border his property and slowed the storm surge.

"As much as you want to get the water off your cane there's nothing you can do," said Rodriguez, who gave up a career as a commercial pilot to "gamble" with cane because he hated being inside all day. "It's Mother Nature and I have no control over it."

Joel Luke, 62, who farms about 2,300 acres of cane about 10 miles from East Cote Blanche Bay, has worked tirelessly in recent days to drain acres of water off of his cane. After days of manning pumps and studying elevation maps, Luke has finally gotten the water moving with a series of large levee breaches along the perimeter of his land. He blames the Army Corp of Engineers for taking too long to complete a levee-raising project in the area.

"Reality, I guess, hasn't really set in. All I can see is water and concentrate on getting it off," Luke said. "The levee systems are a wonderful thing when they are completed … but if they're not completed we're in a vulnerable situation."

Rita's storm surge topped older, shorter levees, flooding his fields, Luke said. But then the water became trapped by the newer, taller levees nearby, soaking the cane with a mixture of saltwater, oil and unknown chemicals from plants and storage tanks near the cane fields. Individual farmers were left to start up pumps along the levee, or create breaches, he said.

While much of Luke's cane still had green leaves visible on its stalks, some of his neighbors' cane was almost completely brown, a bad sign for sugar content. Luke noted that the cane could also suffer from low sugar yield because it was blown flat by the storm surge. Besides the difficulty this will cause for harvesting machines, the cane may also begin to attempt to create new growth near its bent base, instead of ripening and increasing sugar yield.

Now, Luke, like other farmers, will try to work a miracle in his fields.

"I've got bills to pay and whatever (cane) is out there I have to get to meet my obligations."

State will give all-clear following tests

WATER, from A-1

Jefferson would never have lost the water pressure that must be maintained to keep contaminants out of the system.

Even with those massive breaks, an army of parish employees, hired hands and volunteer waterworks crews from other areas had the lines repaired and the pressure restored in quick order. That work, twinned with water sampling that assured quality, persuaded the state Office of Public Health to lift the "boil orders" it had issued to Jefferson Parish on the day Katrina struck.

Those orders required that water be boiled or chemically disinfected before use in drinking, cooking or bathing. The state canceled the order Sept. 8 in West Jefferson and four days later in East Jefferson, which suffered far more breaks.

"We repaired about 385 leaks from Katrina, where normally in a year's time we have a contractor who does about 360 jobs for us," Schuler said.

Some floodwater did enter parts of Kenner, Metairie and Old Jefferson, hampering repairs, but it came and went fairly quickly in most spots.

STAFF GRAPHIC

Orleans hit hard

Yet just across the parish line, the floodwater stood longer after Katrina knocked down the assets of New Orleans Sewerage and Water Board, a century-old agency that provides water, sewerage and drainage services to the city.

When the 17th Street Canal broke on the parish line, it broke to the east, sending most of its water into New Orleans. One of its victims was the backup power plant at Claiborne Avenue waterworks. That plant usually provides juice to keep the S&WB's multiple systems operating even when commercial power provider Entergy fails, as it did during the storm.

During the height of Katrina's fury on Aug. 29, workers had managed to extinguish an electrical fire and keep the plant running.

"In spite of the fire, we were still on board-generated power for water, drainage — the whole thing — until the flood that Wednesday," said Marvin Russell, the S&WB's water purification superintendent.

But they couldn't beat a flood.

"When the water came, we had to shut the plant down or risk burning it up," he said. "And yes, it was catastrophic."

In fact, officials say, it was the first time in the board's long history that it experienced an almost complete failure of all systems. When the power plant failed, it took the purification equipment and the east bank's water pressure with it, exposing the system to contaminants that included sewage leaking from another equally wounded system of pipes.

When the floodwater subsided enough for repairs to be made, and employees got the power and purification plants back on line, they loaded the water system with higher-than-normal doses of chlorine and other chemicals to fight contamination and began pumping millions of gallons of water.

That hasn't been enough to wash away the state's boil order, however. Officials advise returning residents to turn on their hot and cold water taps for 10 to 15 minutes to flush water through their pipes, then turn off the water so as not to reduce pressure in the system. Even then they must boil or treat water if they plan to use it.

"The plant has been producing good water for weeks, after a few days of bad water, but the damage now is in our distribution system," said Russell, a microbiologist. "But all the massive leaks in the system have caused us to have to reduce pressure at the plant and to close valves, where it's possible, to certain hard-hit areas.

"We are making good water, but because of the leaks we can't deliver it with the certainty that it's good … by the time it comes out of your tap."

Envision a garden hose riddled with gaping holes and shovel cuts. Now imagine trying to wash your car with that hose, which is leaking water at each break and unable to build up enough pressure to knock the dust off the hood.

"If we're pumping more water through our system … because

While New Orleans still labors to make drinking water on its east bank safe to drink, surrounding parishes, for the most part, have completed the job. The big exception is St. Bernard Parish, which Hurricane Katrina flooded wall to wall.

St. Bernard officials have reactivated their water treatment plant, and Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez estimated that as many as one third of customers has some service. But if pressure is enough to flush toilets, the water coming from the tap remains unsafe to drink.

Hundreds of fire hydrants and thousands of underground pipes still are cracked and leaking. Crews are repairing breaks to build pressure and reduce contamination, but Emergency Preparedness Director Larry Ingergiola said it will be "a long time" before St. Bernard has drinkable water.

St. Tammany Parish is served by 280 "community" water systems that require state permits, parish Environmental Services Director Greg Gorden said. They include municipal systems; private and public systems that serve communities, subdivisions and commercial developments; and individual systems for some restaurants and other businesses in unincorporated areas.

Of the 280 systems, 235 have passed state health tests to deliver drinkable water, Gorden said. Of the remaining 45, 31 are for businesses that are closed due to Katrina's damage, he said. Health tests are pending for the rest, he said.

Gorden said St. Tammany hasn't experienced any major problem with its water systems because most of the supply comes from deep aquifers and artesian wells with a natural flow, which helps maintain water pressure and prevent contamination.

"There also hasn't been a whole lot of underground inundation of lines and a loss of pressure," he said, which allows bacteria to infiltrate the lines and contaminate the water.

Most other parts of the New Orleans region get their water from the Mississippi River.

Jefferson Parish restored safe drinking water to the West Bank on Sept. 8 and the east bank on Sept. 12.

Water systems in St. John the Baptist Parish and on the east bank on St. Charles Parish also were briefly compromised by Katrina. But St. John's water was certified safe to drink on Sept. 5. And St. Charles' east bank is no longer under orders to boil water before using it, either.

WATER, from A-7

of massive leaks … than we can produce at our plant, then we would have to shut the plant down again, and we're not going to do that," Russell said.

He said he doesn't know how many pipes Katrina broke in New Orleans.

And yet there was some good news last week as Mayor Ray Nagin's plan to repopulate New Orleans drew thousands of residents back to a city where, except for Algiers on the West Bank, they are told not to use water straight from the tap.

By midweek, Russell said, 19 crews of private contractors, in addition to S&WB employees and volunteers from waterworks in Lafayette and Little Rock, Ark., were hunting down and fixing leaks in areas where hurricane's damage is the greatest. So many leaks were repaired on Wednesday and Thursday that the plant dropped from a daily production of 144 million of gallons of water at lower-than-optimal pressure to pumping 100 million gallons a day by Friday morning at normal pressure -- the gold standard of water systems. The drop in volume suggests a reduction in water that is wasted leaking out of pipe breaks.

"We're not sure at this point what the optimal number should be, not knowing how many people will be back in the city or when," Russell said. "But even getting to 50 million gallons a day at good pressure would make us happy."

S&WB officials don't know how long it will take to restore potable, or drinkable, water. Search-and-repair crews are fighting especially great odds in a city where entire neighborhoods are devastated.

"These crews not only have to identify leaks, then they have to clear debris before they can repair them," Russell said.

"In many cases, we have houses, trees and cars on top of leaks, and all that has to be removed before they can make repairs. "Mains are broken and running water. Fire hydrants are broken and running water.

There also are promising results from the hundreds of water samples that S&WB technicians have been taking in less-damaged neighborhoods.

"In those areas, we've seen no pattern of contamination or bacteriological problems," Russell said.

Although some samples have turned up unacceptable levels of fecal coliform, a group of bacteria that could indicate the presence of human or animal fecal matter, Russell said there were no findings of widespread contamination.

"That is very, very encouraging," he said. "But remember, these samples weren't from the hardest-hit areas. Teams of technicians are just starting to test in those sections of the city now that the floodwater is gone."

One of the board's greatest early challenges had been even to reach the sites of greatest damage, something that couldn't happen until the water subsided.

"Now that it has, we have a really focused system for identifying and repairing the leaks," he said. "We meet every day."

The French Quarter and some other sections of the city report good water pressure, and field sampling there indicates no widespread bacteria or infectious disease in the water. Still, Russell said, the system isn't set up to restore potable water one section and a time.

"The state won't allow us to certify sections of the city because we have a looped network of pipes out there," he said. "If we have excessive leaking in Lakeview, for example, we have to assume that the water is comingling with the dirt, and we have to assume that there is the possibility that some of that dirty water could make its way back into the (system), particularly if we lost power at the plant."

To understand how a looped system operates, Russell compares the biggest pipes to veins and arteries, and the smaller, connecting pipes to capillaries.

Under normal circumstances, a good system lets operators maintain drinkable water in some sections of the city, even with reduced pressure, despite a broken main or other problem in another section. But when pipe damage is this extensive, he said, weak pressure in one area and strong pressure in another might create a backflow in the capillaries, pushing dirty water back into the overall system.

So what does the state require to lift its boil order? Not all the leaks must be repaired. But Russell said they must be "controlled."

In other words, once a good pressure is restored and consistent, any leaks that remain — and there are always leaks in pipes that rest in the shifting mud of southeast Louisiana -- must be ones that, when considered globally, don't threaten water quality.

The state also expects a stable power source, which means both Entergy and the board's back-up plant must be in shape to produce. And proof must exist that chemicals can be reliably delivered to clean the water before it is pumped to homes and businesses.

Russell said all these factors mix together to produce plant capacity, the ability to provide clean water in an uninterrupted matter.

And finally comes the positive results required from certified sampling. At this point, the S&WB has done only "investigatory sampling" that provides a semi-official daily snapshot.

"We're hoping in two to three weeks to have the (leaks) under control in most sections of the city, and then we'll have to assure ourselves and the state that we have … plant capacity."

Russell said some areas of New Orleans, including the devastated Lower 9th Ward and portions of eastern New Orleans, have been "positively valved off", which means they've been temporarily removed from the loop.

"We certainly aren't abandoning them. We'll focus on those next," he said, explaining that the boundary of the Industrial Canal made it possible to eliminate those hard-hit areas and impossible to exclude others in the short-term march to provide drinkable water.

Spokeswoman Kristen Meyer of the state Department of Health and Hospitals, which includes the Office of Public Health, said officials there are pleased with daily monitoring that shows "water quality is getting better."

"The levels are dropping every day, but the results indicate that there's still an unacceptable level of bacteria," she said.

There is great pressure to restore drinking water in New Orleans.

A captain of industry addressing the City Council last week identified the availability of clean drinking water as the primary concern of businesses anxious to return to New Orleans.

"I hear back and forth about the water," said International Shipholding Co. executive Erik Johnsen. "District by district, we have to learn what is the condition of the water. Otherwise, people are not coming back."

The council has ordered S&WB officials to present a detailed briefing on the state of water. And during a pointed exchange before Mayor Ray Nagin and members of the state legislative delegation, the state Health and Hospitals chief was told to find a way to make drinking water happen sooner rather than later.

Russell knows what everyone wants to hear, and he wishes he could say it.

"But I'm just the water man," he says. "I cannot tell the public with assurance to drink the water … and under our state guidelines, I cannot tell our populace that it's 100 percent safe to bathe in the water or wash their dishes."

He said he can only offer assurances that S&WB employees are working hard to do what must be done.

"The water board people who rode out the storm, many of them losing their own homes, are still here," he said. "They're still working and still getting it done."

Blessed - "ADJECTIVE: highly favored or fortunate; characterized by happiness and good fortune."

Prior to Hurricane Katrina, "blessed" was an often used word. Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.

Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. This is a very limited opportunity, and availability is restricted.

We have employment opportunities available in the Sales Department, including management availabilities.

Jews struggle to mark High Holy Days

Rescued scrolls play part in celebration

By Rachel Zoll
AP religion writer

Bad luck keeps following Stephen Richer.

Last year at the start of Rosh Hashana, a hurricane evacuation sent him and a cantor at his tiny Biloxi, Miss., synagogue on an odyssey across the state to find a congregation where they could mark the Jewish New Year.

This year, as the High Holy Days begin tonight, Richer will once again be searching for a spiritual home. His Conservative synagogue, Congregation Beth Israel, is one of many across the Gulf Coast that have been shuttered by extensive damage from Hurricane Katrina.

"I'm very happy to have this year over," Richer said. "We've had a lot of tragedy."

The 10-day period of repentance and renewal, among the most important in the Jewish calendar, arrives as Jewish evacuees are scattered throughout the country, their homes destroyed, their jobs gone and their future unclear.

Victims say the generosity of religious leaders in cities where they've sought refuge has helped ease discomfort about celebrating the holidays in an alien environment. Orthodox Jews have found housing for evacuees near congregations so they can observe the Jewish prohibition against driving on the High Holy Days. One Florida rabbi packed his Cessna with kosher meat and cheese, Sabbath candles and challah and flew the supplies to Biloxi, where members of Beth Israel may hold services at a military base. Other Jewish groups have sent prayer books, while Baptist, Roman Catholic and Unitarian churches have offered space for services.

Still, many displaced Jews say the pain of having lost everything will only be compounded by observing sacred rituals among strangers.

"I think the word is bittersweet," said Ruth Kullman, president of Touro Synagogue in New Orleans, a Reform congregation that was damaged and will not reopen for the holiday period, which ends with Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement.

Kullman, her husband and her 93-year-old mother-in-law fled to Memphis where Kullman's sister lives. "We're all so grateful to be here and together. We're just sad that we can't be celebrating the way we always had," she said.

Jewish leaders don't know when — if ever — their communities will reunite.

About 10,000 Jews lived in the New Orleans area and Eric Stillman, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Greater New Orleans, has been trying to track them. Working out of the Jewish Federation of Greater Houston, he has contacted about 1,400 of the 3,600 families who were in his organization's database. Synagogue leaders have started their own online lists, but many families still have not been reached.

As Katrina battered the region, anxiety spread among Jewish leaders about the Torah scrolls inside the buildings. The scrolls, which Jews believe contain the word of God, are the holiest objects in Judaism.

About a week following the storm, a caravan of Jewish volunteers, accompanied by armed officers from outside New Orleans, went into the city to retrieve the scrolls. Some members of the mission had to swim through floodwater to reach their buildings, but all the Torahs were retrieved intact.

Stillman drove about a dozen of the Torahs to Houston, where they will be used in worship during the next 10 days. Rabbis and cantors from New Orleans-area congregations will be leading some of the services in college auditoriums, churches and other sites around the region.

Betty Zivitz, executive director of Congregation Temple Sinai, a New Orleans Reform synagogue of 850 families, said she was "trying to make as normal a holiday as possible."

Zivitz and her husband spent weeks moving from Jackson, Miss., to Memphis to Mobile, Ala., before returning to their damaged but inhabitable home in Metairie. She has been meeting with insurance adjusters about repairs to the synagogue, where the basement was filled with 2 feet of water and rain damaged the upper floors and ceilings.

Zivitz and her family plan to drive to Baton Rouge for the holiday, where her rabbi and cantor are leading services.

Stan swipes Mexico, Otis' winds die down

Yucatan peninsula to get 15 inches of rain

By Jorge Barrera
Associated Press writer

LA PAZ, MEXICO — Hurricane Otis weakened to a tropical storm Sunday and headed north toward an unpopulated stretch of the Baja California Peninsula, while a tropical depression strengthened to a tropical storm just before hitting land in southern Mexico.

Tropical Storm Stan formed before dawn Sunday and then plowed into land about 40 miles southwest of Tulum, on the Yucatan Peninsula. It carried maximum sustained winds of 45 mph, the National Hurricane Center in Miami said.

The storm was expected to dump up to 15 inches of rain in some areas of the Yucatan Peninsula and Belize before weakening to a tropical depression. No major damages or injuries were immediately reported, and the storm was expected to move mostly south of the popular resort of Cancun.

Along the Pacific coast, the Mexican government issued a tropical storm warning for the southern tip of the Baja California peninsula as Otis continued to sideswipe the narrow stretch of land. No injuries have been reported.

The slow-moving storm was inching along the coastline at 3 mph and was expected to hit a deserted stretch of coastline late Sunday or early Monday. It carried maximum sustained winds of 70 mph and was expected to weaken over the next 24 hours, the National Hurricane Center said.

Preparing for the storm, Baja California state officials had asked soldiers to help evacuate the islands of Magdalena and Margarita, off the coast of Comondu.

More than 1,000 people evacuated by Saturday as rains from the storm's outer bands led to flooding in the poor outskirts of Cabo San Lucas, where many homes are little more than wooden shacks. Officials went door-to-door as part of a voluntary evacuation plan.

The resort's hotels in Cabo San Lucas escaped major flooding.

Otis was the 15th Pacific storm of the season. Unlike powerful Atlantic storms such as Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita, Pacific hurricanes tend to do less damage because they make landfall less frequently.

Like their counterparts in the Atlantic, Pacific storms are given names that correspond to the alphabet.

Construction quality key to weathering storm

Devil's in details when building home

By Jay Reeves
Associated Press writer

GULFPORT, MISS. — A few more nails and extra bolts could have made a big difference for some homes that were destroyed by Hurricane Katrina.

An initial engineering review found that most of the wood-frame houses that survived the storm's 130 mph gusts held up because of little things: plenty of nails, metal straps attaching rafters to frames and bolts anchoring frames and porches to concrete.

The review was completed by a five-person team organized by the University of Alabama. University researchers, building code specialists, engineers and wood industry experts spent three days inspecting 30 locations in southern Mississippi and eastern Louisiana. The goal was to explain why some homes survived, and others were uninhabitable.

"The lesson to be learned is attention to detail," said John van de Lindt, a Colorado State University professor who was part of the team. "If the (building) code was followed, things seemed to do really well."

The research group determined that new homes fared better than older ones, but porches were a problem area.

The group also found evidence of spotty quality between builders. But rather than purposely skirting building codes, builders apparently didn't understand all the requirements of constructing hurricane-proof homes, the team believes.

Dave Johnson, a building inspector in Harrison County, said code inspectors ensure there are only "very minor differences" in construction from one contractor to the next.

The report is being completed and could be circulated within the industry within weeks, van de Lindt said.

Residency rule divides newly united council

Waiver is touted to raise ranks of police force

By Frank Donze
Staff writer

With all seven members present for the first time since Hurricane Katrina struck, the New Orleans City Council offered plenty of evidence last week that they intend to work together to plot what will be a complex and costly recovery strategy.

But as an emotional, 10-hour meeting wound down last Tuesday after nightfall, the spirit of cooperation suddenly shattered along a familiar fault line: vehement disagreement over whether to suspend the city's residency requirement for police officers.

With the police force wracked by desertions and fatigue among those who stayed the course during the harrowing post-storm chaos, Councilman Jay Batt, author of an ordinance to temporarily waive the domicile rule, put his colleagues on notice that he intends to call for a vote in two weeks.

At the end of a long agenda that dealt with such critical issues as the restoration of electricity and water services, Batt appeared to have caught some members off guard by raising so volatile an issue so late in the day. A majority countered quickly, letting Batt, the council's lone Republican, know that his initiative is doomed if he attempts to move it forward now.

The city is facing an "emergency crisis situation," Batt replied. He said the council needs to act on his measure because New Orleans has "a lot less police than before" Katrina.

"And a lot less population," Councilwoman Renee Gill Pratt snapped back.

His voice rising, Batt said: "That's true, but it's important that we protect our property and what citizens we have left!" If he is wrong in his belief that lifting the residency rule will bolster the ranks of the Police Department, Batt said the council could repeal the waiver after a year. "We need this now more than ever."

Not so, argued a visibly upset Councilwoman Cynthia Hedge-Morrell, the mother of a police officer who was profiled by national media outlets for his bravery during Katrina's lawless aftermath.

Morrell told Batt that it is "totally inappropriate" to address the residency question until the NOPD has an opportunity to determine how many officers who live outside of Orleans Parish were among the deserters.

Shouting now, Batt said there was nothing inappropriate about his proposal. "I'm talking about public safety!" he said.

Morrell said the only change in the law that she could support would be a residency waiver for those police officers with suburban addresses who stayed on the job after Katrina passed.

"We need to know who came and who didn't," she said.

Clearly frustrated by the tenor of the debate, Council President Oliver Thomas tried to table the discussion, after remarking that some New Orleans neighborhoods are now home to more police officers and military personnel than citizens.

"Timing is everything," said Thomas, who had been poised before Katrina to join Batt in supporting a debate over the hot-button issue. "And this is a bad time. Things are sensitive right now. Emotions are heightened right now."

Councilwoman Jacquelyn Brechtel Clarkson, a longtime domicile-rule opponent, was the only member to speak sympathetically of Batt's proposal.

Pratt echoed Thomas' sentiment that the timing of the residency debate was premature. She said as federal money pours into the city's rebuilding effort, outsiders, including potential police recruits, "will want to come New Orleans because they know we'll have a bigger and better city."

And mindful of reports that some members of suburban law enforcement agencies turned away New Orleans evacuees at gunpoint as they tried to flee the bedlam at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, Pratt said "there are some people I don't want to come into our city."

Even as it became evident that he lacked the necessary support, Batt pressed on.

"You think everyone from New Orleans is perfect?" he shouted at Pratt. "I don't want those people either," he said in reference to the gun-wielding officers. "I just want those houses protected."

At one point, a weary Thomas summed up the feelings of the handful of council staffers and onlookers still in the meeting room at Louis Armstrong International Airport. "We did a lot of good work today," Thomas said. "But a great meeting just deteriorated to some junk."

For years, clear-headed arguments have been posed for and against the city's residency law. Proponents of the rule say that cops who live in the city are more apt to be attuned to the behavior of city residents, and that police officers strengthen the tax base and increase public safety by their mere presence.

Detractors counter that New Orleans desperately needs more police officers and can hardly afford to be so choosy. Allowing cops to live in the suburbs will triple the size of the pool of potential applicants, they say, and perhaps allow the city to reach its elusive goal of 2,000 officers.

The strongest endorsement of the plan had come from soon-to-depart Police Superintendent Eddie Compass, who resigned under pressure earlier that same day.

Despite the force of opinions on both sides, the residency debate has tended to devolve into a referendum on race, with white politicians and activists leading the charge to dismantle the rule and their African-American counterparts advocating the residency requirement.

That dynamic was evident Tuesday, with Batt and Clarkson, two of the council's three white members, supporting some sort of waiver, and Thomas, Morrell and Pratt, the three African-American members on hand, opposing. Councilwoman Cynthia Willard-Lewis, who is African-American, left the meeting before Batt raised the residency issue.

Eddie Sapir, the council's third white member, has taken no firm position on the issue. But on Tuesday, he sought to put the onus onto Mayor Ray Nagin, insisting that the mayor has the authority to issue an executive order to suspend the residency law if he chooses.

Nagin administration officials in attendance did not comment on Sapir's assertion. Nagin has previously said that he would sign a suspension of the domicile law if the council passed it, but has never gone so far as to ask for an up-or-down vote.

Asked later about Sapir's suggestion that he can use his emergency powers to waive the residency law unilaterally, Nagin offered a bemused smile.

"Oh OK, so in other words if we can't do it, let Mikey do it," Nagin said, making reference to a 1970s-era TV commercial for breakfast cereal in which a young boy who was used as a guinea pig by his older brothers.

As to whether he would consider taking such action, Nagin was noncommittal, saying he hasn't studied the legality of such a move.

"I don't know, it depends upon how the re-entry works and how well we protect the city going forward," Nagin said, adding that he'll be monitoring the issue.

"Right now, there's probably more pressure (to waive the rule) based on the fact that we have city workers all over the place, including council members' staff who are living in Baton Rouge, Houston and elsewhere," Nagin said.

But the mayor's real focus was police.

"This is a different environment than pre-Katrina," he said. "The manpower is definitely down. We've got 200-plus officers that are going to go through some type of review process" – a reference to the NOPD tribunal that has been set up to handle suspected deserters after Katrina struck.

"I'll tell you one thing I'm not going to do," Nagin said. "I'm not going to let this city go back to the crime levels we had before. We're going to do whatever it takes."

Many unknowns keeping New Orleanians away

The anticipated onslaught of New Orleanians returning to their east bank homes never materialized this weekend, and many cited concerns over the quality of water service.

The rehabilitation of Algiers, however, seemed to be progressing more quickly among the city neighborhoods spared Hurricane Katrina flooding. Water service there has passed health inspections and is deemed save to drink.

In Algiers, Dionysia French cleaned out debris around her looted home on Shirley Drive. French, a cable company worker who evacuated to Jackson, Miss., said she came back because "my job wants me back to work."

French said she is not worried about the quality of Algiers' water.

"Supposedly it's OK because, if I'm not mistaken, we're on a different pumping system," the 41-year-old woman said.

But city officials have advised residents not to drink or bathe in water from east bank taps, because of contamination seeping though damaged water lines.

Della Viator, an administrator for a New Orleans architectural firm now living temporarily in New Iberia, is concerned about the water and cites it as one of "too many unknowns" that are delaying her return to her Annunciation Street home Uptown.

"I've washed my hands; it's like a burning sensation a little bit," said Viator, 49. "We don't have kids, but I know people that do that say the water quality is a big concern."

Water board officials say Algiers' water supply is clean and safe because it is on a different treatment system and wasn't subject to the destruction that ruptured major water supply lines on the east bank.

On the east bank, water officials are working to make repairs in the dry areas, where lines were damaged by uprooted trees, shifted houses and toppled utility poles, according to Marcia St. Martin, executive director of the water board.

Even without flooding, such events caused "major defects in the distribution system," St. Martin said. While the water is drinkable as it leaves the treatment plant - and has been since last week - it is dirty at the tap because of the damaged lines, St. Martin said.

The condition of New Orleans' water supply was a lively topic of conversation among residents and business executives as Mayor Ray Nagin's plan for repopulating the city took effect this weekend, starting with Algiers, Uptown, the French Quarter and portions of Mid-City. A steady trickle of residents returned to the city Sunday, in some cases to check the condition of properties and leave, in others to move in for good.

Residents could be seen in the yards of many streets in Algiers, hauling debris to the street and bagging downed limbs. Several said they're moving back in, and that they saw the beginnings of stepped-up activity across the Algiers district, with busy traffic on Gen. De Gaulle Drive and a smattering of store openings.

"We've been here since Tuesday — for good," said Chrissa Hailey, 39, an Orleans Parish public school teacher who has been placed on indefinite leave. There has been a lot more traffic in the past two days, she said.

'People don't know what to expect. They don't know if they can stay here'

RETURN, from A-13

Street yard in Algiers Point was Kitty White, a social worker for the city school system, who lost her Lakeview home in Katrina flooding and is temporarily living with Hailey until she can find her own apartment in Algiers.

The unflooded west bank neighborhoods are sure to see more new residents who lost homes, she said.

"You get a place to live, then you start looking for a job," White said. "It's like a puzzle that's shattered; you start to put the pieces back together."

Several people filtering into Uptown neighborhoods on the east bank also said they are eager to move back in, but that they sense great uncertainty over issues related to crime and jobs, as well as water quality.

"People don't know what to expect. They don't know if they can stay here," said Susan Fitzgerald, 42, a sign company owner who now has a leased place on Washington Avenue as well as one in Ascension Parish.

"I'm going to end up being a resident of both places. There's nothing I can do about it ... I guess it's going to be maybe six months before a lot of people are back here (Uptown) living full-time."

A lawyer who rents the other side of Fitzgerald's double, Caroline Wallace, said she has been back in New Orleans for three days after evacuating to Lake Charles, and isn't eager to leave again.

"We have power and running water and gas and everything — just not drinking water," said Wallace, 30. "It's really good to be back in your own house for the first time in weeks."

Residents could start filing in by midweek

rent, and that has deterred some from signing up for the trailers.

Some residents said they have yet to hear whether they will be placed or when.

"I heard end of the month, 15th of the month, but I hope it's before that because I'm ready to go," said Theresa Barthelemy of Plaquemines Parish.

Others wonder whether the mobile home cities will provide the lifestyle they are accustomed to.

After a look at large color photographs of the trailers hung inside the shelter by FEMA officials, Jacqulyn Hyams of New Orleans decided that the trailers were too small for her and her six children. McIntyre said the trailers range from 22 to 30 feet long and could sleep a family of up to five. But Hyams said the crowded conditions would make life intolerable.

"My children aren't used to being boxed in," she said.

Others at the shelter questioned FEMA's decision to establish a trailer city in such a remote area without clarifying transportation options beforehand.

"They got us way back up in the woods," said Gloria Richardson. "What are you going to do in the woods? You need a car, you need buses, and the way buses run here, it's awful."

McIntyre said security and transportation would be addressed before residents move in. Security companies will be hired by FEMA or local enforcement agencies, which might receive extra government financing to hire more people or extend hours, he said. Baker's local government was responsible for setting up transportation to hospitals, schools, employment and retail, he said.

James Everett welcomed the idea of trailer living, or any alternative to the River Center.

"I don't like the living conditions, the people, and I definitely don't like the food," he said of the shelter. "Me myself, I don't like trailers either, but you've got to take what you can get for the time being."

Now as common as beads hanging from St. Charles Avenue oaks after a Mardi Gras parade, tree limbs, appliances and piles of drywall line streets wherever Hurricane Katrina struck. New Orleans City Hall estimates that there's 50 million cubic yards of debris in the New Orleans area alone. # Al-Qaida links suspected in Bali suicide bombings

26 die, 101 hurt in 3 explosions

By Irwan Firdaus
Associated Press writer

BALI, INDONESIA — Indonesia said Sunday it suspected two fugitives linked to al-Qaida masterminded the suicide bombings of crowded restaurants in tourist areas of Bali that killed at least 26 people and injured more than 100.

The nation's president, meanwhile, warned that more terrorist attacks are possible.

"The terrorists are still looking for soft targets," President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono said at a press conference after touring the devastated areas on the Indonesian island.

He also said Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, will do everything it can to prevent another strike.

The wounded included six Americans.

Maj. Gen. Ansyaad Mbai, a top Indonesian anti-terror official, identified the two suspected masterminds of Saturday's bombings as Malaysians alleged to be key members of the al-Qaida-linked Jemaah Islamiyah terror group.

They also are accused of orchestrating the 2002 Bali nightclub bombings, as well as two other attacks in the Indonesian capital in 2003 and 2004. The nightclub bombings, which also struck venues crowded with tourists on a Saturday night, killed 202 people, most of them foreigners.

Saturday's attacks occurred almost three years to the day after the nightclub bombings.

In the latest attacks, three suicide bombers wearing explosive vests set off near-simultaneous explosions that devastated three crowded restaurants Saturday night.

"The modus operandi of Saturday's attacks is the same as the earlier ones," said Mbai, who identified the two suspected masterminds as Azahari bin Husin and Noordin Mohamed Top.

He said the two were not believed to be among the three suicide attackers. The assailants' remains were found at the bombing scenes but have not yet been identified, he said.

"I have seen them. All that is left is their head and feet," he told The Associated Press. "By the evidence we can conclude the bombers were carrying the explosives around their waists."

Video footage of one blast showed groups of tourists, many of them apparently Westerners, seated at candlelit tables talking and sipping drinks in the seconds before the explosion. The footage, obtained by Associated Press Television News, then shows a bright flash accompanied by a loud bang and gusts of black smoke.

It was not immediately clear whether the three suicide bombers were included in the death toll, which increased to 26 on Sunday, said Sanglah Hospital spokesman Putu Putra Wisada. At least one child was killed, a witness said.

One Australian and a Japanese citizen were among those killed, along with 12 Indonesians. Hospital officials were trying to identify the other victims.

The 101 wounded included 49 Indonesians, 17 Australians, six Americans, six Koreans, four Japanese, officials said.

Dozens of people, most of them Indonesian, waited in tears outside the morgue in Sanglah Hospital, near the island's capital Denpasar, for news of friends and relatives missing since the attacks.

At Bali's international airport, long lines of travelers formed at checkout counters as a steady stream of taxis dropped off departing visitors.

"We were up all night trying to change our ticket," said Veli-Matti Enqvist, 51, who had been scheduled to leave Bali with his wife on Wednesday.

AP PHOTO

Australian national Mary Ann Purkiss, second from left, who was injured in a bomb blast in Bali Saturday, is helped to a plane at Nguhrah Rai International Airport which will return her home. Suicide bombers carried out three attacks which killed 26 and injured 101.

The couple was walking on the beach when they heard the blasts.

"We finally found something," he said. "We're going."

After the 2002 bombings, there was an immediate and massive evacuation of tourists, devastating the island's main industry.

The latest bombings struck two seafood cafes in the Jimbaran beach resort and a three-story noodle and steakhouse in downtown Kuta. Kuta is the bustling tourist center of Bali where the two nightclubs were bombed three years ago.

The bombers struck at about 8 p.m. The head waiter at the Menega Cafe said the bomb went off at his beachside restaurant between the tables of two large dinner parties, who were sitting in the sand. Most of the 120 diners at the restaurant were Indonesian, he said.

"Everyone started screaming "Allah! Allah! Help!" said Wayan Subagia, 23, who suffered leg injuries. "One woman rushed to pick up her child, but the little girl was already dead."

Minutes later, he heard another blast at the Nyoman seafood restaurant about 50 yards away.

At almost the same time about 18 miles away in Kuta, a bomb exploded at the three-story Raja restaurant in a bustling outdoor shopping center. The area includes a KFC fast-food restaurant, clothing stores and a tourist information center.

Smoke poured from the badly damaged building.

The bomb apparently went off on the restaurant's second floor, and an Associated Press reporter saw at least three bodies and five wounded people there.

The latest attacks came a month after Yudhoyono warned of possible terrorist attacks.

"I received information at the time that terrorists were planning an action in Jakarta and that explosives were ready," he said Saturday.

Western and Indonesian intelligence agencies have warned repeatedly that Jemaah Islamiyah was plotting more attacks in the nation.

The White House condemned the "attack aimed at innocent people taking their evening meal."

U.S. offensive appears to widen in western Iraq

Village called sanctuary for al-Qaida militants

By Mohammed Barakat
Associated Press writer

QAIM, IRAQ — Hundreds of U.S. troops combed through a village near the Syrian border Sunday, breaking into houses and fighting sporadic gun battles with gunmen on the second day of a new offensive against al-Qaida insurgents. At least eight militants were killed, the military said.

Many residents fled Sadah village into Syria before the offensive began, witnesses said, and the 1,000 U.S. troops involved appeared to be widening the sweep into two nearby towns.

In Karabila, troops with loudspeakers warned residents to stay inside their homes for their own safety Sunday, witnesses said. In Rumana, a town on the other side of the Euphrates River, helicopters fired on several houses, sending plumes of black smoke into the air, the witnesses said, speaking on condition of anonymity out of concern for their security.

A U.S. military spokeswoman in Baghdad said she could not immediately confirm that the offensive had expanded from Sadah to Karabila and Rumana.

No American casualties were reported in the offensive, which is aimed at rooting out al-Qaida militants the military believes have been using Sadah as a "sanctuary," closing insurgent supply routes and stemming violence ahead of Iraq's crucial vote on a new constitution on Oct. 15.

However, al-Qaida in Iraq claimed to have captured two U.S. Marines participating in the offensive and threatened in a Web statement issued Sunday to kill them within 24 hours. The authenticity of the statement could not be verified.

Also, a senior military commander said Sunday that he was not backing off his assessment that U.S. forces in Iraq could be reduced early next year, even though an Army general has said the number of battle-ready battalions of Iraqi soldiers has fallen by two-thirds.

Appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," Gen. John Abizaid did not offer a reason for the decrease in top-level Iraqi troops from three battalions to one. But he said more Iraqis are in the field at various levels of training and are participating in security operations than before.

Roberts to start with matter of life and death

New chief justice this week to weigh Oregon suicide law

By David G. Savage
Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court opens its term this week with a new chief justice and facing a series of major cases on the "right to die," abortion, free speech and the death penalty.

Chief Justice John Roberts will be sworn in this morning during a court ceremony and then take the center seat as the justices hear the first round of oral arguments.

His first case might not prove memorable to him or to the law. It concerns whether slaughterhouse workers are entitled to be paid for the time it takes for them to don protective clothing at the start of each work shift.

On Wednesday, however, the court will hear the Bush administration's challenge to the nation's only "right to die" law, a case that might give an early clue as to what kind of conservative John Roberts is.

Oregon voters twice have approved the Death With Dignity Act, a measure that permits dying people to obtain lethal medication from their doctor. Since 1998 when the law took effect, 208 people have used medication to end their lives. Most of them were dying of cancer.

But shortly after President Bush won the presidency, his attorney general, John Ashcroft, decreed that Oregon doctors who prescribe lethal medication are violating the federal drug-control laws. He threatened them with a loss of their license to prescribe drugs.

As a legal matter, the case, now known as Gonzales vs. Oregon, pits the state's traditional power to regulate the practice of medicine against the federal government's authority to regulate drugs.

It also poses a test of different styles of conservatism. Libertarian and so-called "small government" conservatives probably would side with Oregon, because it allows dying people to decide for themselves whether to end their lives. Conservative advocates of federalism also have been inclined to defer to the states, not Washington, D.C., to make the law.

The case has similarities to the case testing California's medical marijuana law, a dispute that split the court's conservatives in June. Justices Clarence Thomas and Sandra Day O'Connor as well as Rehnquist sided with California and the patients who used marijuana to relieve their pain. They said this was an issue for the state and its voters to decide.

But Justices Antonin Scalia and Anthony Kennedy joined the majority in saying federal authorities had the power to ban all use of marijuana.

In late November, the court will revisit the abortion issue. A New Hampshire case does not ask the court to overrule Roe vs. Wade and the right to abortion, but it might make it much harder for doctors to challenge a state's regulation of abortion.

New Hampshire, like 34 other states, passed a law that requires doctors to notify a parent of a minor girl before performing an abortion. Unlike most such laws, however, this statute did not make an exception for medical emergencies that threaten the health of the young woman.

A federal judge and the U.S. court of appeals in Boston blocked the law from taking effect. The state's attorney general, Kelly Ayotte, and Bush administration lawyers urge the court to put the law into effect as written. They say doctors whose patients need emergency abortions may go to a judge and ask for a waiver of the parental notice rule.

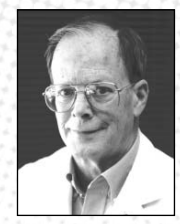
Abortion rights advocates say doctors who face medical emergencies should go first to a hospital, not to a courthouse. The court will hear the case of Ayotte vs. Planned Parenthood on Nov. 30.

Two important free-speech cases will be heard in the fall. One concerns the rights of public employees, the other whether colleges may restrict military recruiters on campus.

At one time, the Supreme Court said public employees did not have a free-speech right to challenge their employer. But the court changed direction in 1968 when it ruled that a school teacher could not be fired for writing a letter to a newspaper editorial page complaining about how the school board was spending the taxpayers' money. The justices said public employees had a right to speak out on matters of public concern.

The law remains unclear, however, on whether whistle-blowers have a right to speak out with impunity regarding what they have seen or heard on the job.

On Oct. 12, the court will hear a case to clarify the law. Richard Ceballos was a deputy district attorney for Los Angeles County five years ago when he alleged that another prosecutor had lied about evidence to obtain a search warrant. He persisted in raising his complaint with his superiors and alleges he was reprimanded.



He sued several of his superiors, including then-District Attorney Gil Garcetti. At first, a federal judge dismissed his claim, but the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals revived it. Judge Stephen Reinhardt wrote that the First Amendment should protect government whistle-blowers who disclose wrongdoing.

Bush administration lawyers have intervened in the case to urge the court to restrict the free-speech rights of public employees. A ruling on this issue could affect the rights of millions of public employees, including school teachers, college professors and police officers.

In December, the court will consider whether colleges and universities that receive federal money must give military recruiters equal access to their students. Congress in the Solomon Amendment threatened colleges with a cut-off of federal money if they discriminated against military recruiters.

But a group of law schools and professors challenged this rule as violating their free-speech rights. They said their schools routinely reject recruiters for employers who refuse to hire gay men and lesbians, and the Pentagon has such an anti-gay policy.

West Jefferson Medical Center

Doctors...Healing. Caring. Leading.

It takes a community to recover from a catastrophe like Hurricane Katrina. We thank our medical community, our doctors at West Jefferson Medical Center. We are stronger now than ever. We share a proud history and look forward to a bright future...for the West Bank, the region, the entire Gulf South, and America.

Thank you to the physicians who worked tirelessly at West Jefferson during Katrina and through her aftermath. We were able to offer critical medical and surgical care to patients and storm victims under the most severe conditions because of you. We understand that you made personal sacrifices to be here with us. We appreciate your humanity, your dedication and commitment to our patients, your love and skill for the art and practice of Medicine. Thank you for being here with us despite your personal concerns.

Although many of you were dispersed afar, we appreciate the many members of the Medical Staff who have been able to return to West Jefferson Medical Center and our community. Many doctors' offices are now open; others plan to open soon. We are thankful that your staffs are also here and reflect the same love of community and devotion to the region. Today, West Jefferson is fully operational.

As we all know, having access to medical and surgical care is critical; this recent crisis served as a palpable reminder lest we forget. Together, we reaffirm our commitment to the community to provide quality care to our patients as we all begin the arduous healing process. And together, we welcome back more returning doctors each and every day and wish physicians, as well as their staffs and hospital staff on the way back to our community, a safe journey home.

LOLIS ERIC ELIE

Up close and personal in 9th Ward

I learned Ninth Ward geography incrementally.

When I was in grade school, my sister's best friend, Gaytra Lathan, lived on Andry Street. Whenever I went along on the ride from our house in Carrollton to hers across the Industrial Canal, it seemed to me that we were traveling a great distance.

When I was in high school, I used to play gigs with a saxophone player who lived on Forstall Street.

When I met Herlin Riley, the drummer with the Lincoln Center Jazz Orchestra, I learned the way to his house on Tennessee Street.

Geography lesson

The streets are all within a few blocks of each other, but having met these people and traveled to their homes at such different periods in my life, I hadn't pieced the map together in my mind.

I saw all three streets on Saturday as I traveled that neighborhood on a Florida Swamp Buggy, a huge all-terrain vehicle with towering tires and an ability to negotiate the murky, stinking water still in the Ninth Ward.

Ed Mendel, a Key Largo native, told me that he custom-made the vehicle.

He traveled here because he wanted to pay back all those Louisiana residents who helped Floridians after Hurricane Andrew.

Driving on North Derbigny Street, I got my first real look at Hurricane Katrina's devastation.

I understand now why soldiers and veteran foreign correspondents have said that our city looks worse than a war zone.

You don't grasp that from looking at the damage in places like Treme, Bywater, Central City or even Lakeview.

In many parts of the city, there are foundations with no houses on them, roofs with no houses beneath them and cars parked at elevations and angles and on top of things in such a way that they could not have been driven to their current locations.

In other parts of the city, such sights occur every few blocks, if that frequently. In the Ninth Ward, such sights occur on almost every block.

And it seemed that every inch of it is covered by a thick, mysterious sludge containing all manner of nasty chemicals.

Rebuilding a must

I have no doubt that the technology exists to build more stable, less flood-prone homes in this community. A priority also must be placed on eliminating the toxic soup, to make certain it doesn't pose a greater long-term risk to residents than the storms themselves.

Saturday morning, hours before the swamp buggy tour, I was talking with Bob French, the jazz drummer.

During Hurricane Betsy, he lived in the Ninth Ward and lost everything. But he remains adamant that the Ninth Ward must be rebuilt if New Orleans is ever again to be spiritually whole.

Uptown resident Corrine Fox wipes away tears during Sunday's Mass in St. Louis Cathedral. 'The cathedral serves as a symbol that transcends any one faith and speaks to our community as a whole,' archdiocesan spokesman the Rev. William Maestri said.

Archbishop Alfred Hughes leads Mass on Sunday in St. Louis Cathedral — the first in the cathedral since Hurricane Katrina decimated New Orleans more than a month ago. Hughes said he believes the post-storm city will be 'more attentive to its soul.'

St. Louis Cathedral's 1st post-Katrina Mass attracts the masses

People from every walk of life, dressed in their Sunday best or in blue jeans, packed every pew in the historic St. Louis Cathedral on Sunday morning to take part in the first Mass celebrated there since Hurricane Katrina ravaged New Orleans a month ago.

Wearing shorts, a T-shirt and a Jazzfest cap, Sheila Tilford took a seat in the last pew after getting permission to bring in her small dog, Chase, who sat silently on her lap.

"We evacuated together," Tilford said. "He's part of me. And we are part of the beginning of the city coming back."

That was the message that Archbishop Alfred Hughes delivered from the pulpit.

"The church in New Orleans is alive,"

Division may hamper rebuilding opportunity

By Steve Ritea
Staff writer

After decades of bitter debate and agonizing political battles over how to improve one of the nation's worst public school systems, New Orleans lost more than 80 percent of its schools to floodwaters and many of its students and staff to evacuation in the few days following Hurricane Katrina.

Now, although many of the district's financial obligations remain and much of its leadership is still in place, everyone agrees the district has an unprecedented opportunity to rebuild itself in a positive way.

College not planning on laying off staff

By Coleman Warner
Staff writer

Before Katrina changed everything, Louisiana's oldest and largest community college, Delgado, was on yet another growth roll, wondering how it would come up with enough classrooms and parking spaces. Now the college is hoping it loses no more than a 7,000 students, about 40 percent of its enrollment, this spring.

But as Delgado prepares to downsize while it contends with major damage at the sprawling City Park campus and at a Slidell satellite, it has no immediate plans to lay off any of its 1,200 full-time faculty and staff members or 495 part-time instructors, Chancellor Alex

Storm chasers create tent city

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

He calls himself a storm chaser.

Like many of the dozens of people now camping out at Muss Bertolino Playground in Kenner, Cy Jay Guiles follows severe weather in search of work rebuilding shattered communities.

"I'm in construction, so I've chased storms before," said Guiles, of Fort Worth, Texas. But Katrina is different from the tornado alley stretching from Kansas to Texas and the hurricane strike zone of Florida. "I've never seen destruction like this," he said.

These days, Guiles is living in a colorful tent city on Bertolino's baseball and soccer fields, which Katrina transformed into a temporary home to people from all over the country. They sleep there at night and work during the day for the federal government, tarping homes as part of "Operation Blue Roof." The men who have staked their tents at the playground say Katrina is an opportunity to make good money, if you don't mind roughing it.

"We basically camp out for a while," said Dennis Baca, who installs body shop equipment back home in Mansfield, Texas. "It's actually really good pay, but the standard of living is a little weird."

The pay varies depending on the subcontractor, but the men said they could make about $200 or 250 a day if they cover 10,000 square feet of roof.

"If you work more, you get more," Guiles said. "We'll work seven days a week as long as we've got daylight."

Guiles estimated one day last week that 400 people have set up tents, campers and trailers in the playground, along with their grills, lawn chairs, folding tables and packs of playing cards. Workers said they stayed in hotels after past disasters, but they understand the post-Katrina accommodations.

Charity dietitian forges on at dark, forgotten hospital

Food, water, hope were running low

By Trymaine D. Lee
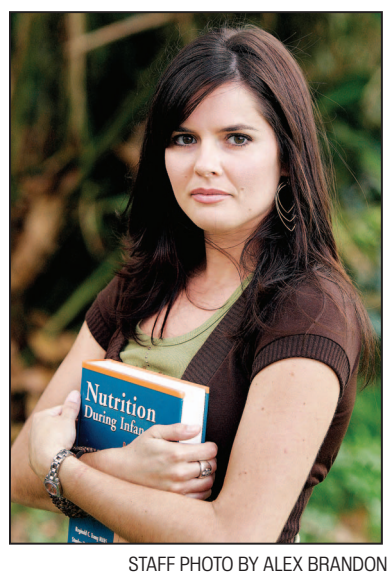
Staff writer

Charity Hospital dietitian Ashley Rogers laid her hands on the dying old woman and told her that everything was going to be all right.

The woman, naked under a white sheet to keep cool, must've known Rogers had lied when a priest leaned close to her wrinkled, pale face and gave her last rites.

"The lie" was all Rogers said she had left to feed many of her patients, who were trapped inside Charity Hospital for six days after Hurricane Katrina left the facility crippled.

Rogers said the woman seemed to weep without tears, a veil of fear draping her face as the cleric spoke softly into her ear.



A tube that snaked from her throat lay alongside her, unattached to the ventilator that once sustained her life.

The memory of the moment is seared into Rogers' mind as she recalled how she and a staff of dietitians from University and Charity hospitals struggled to keep patients alive with little food or hope.

Rogers said "the lie" was all she had to comfort the sick, scared and dying.

"They'd ask if they were going to be OK," Rogers said. "I said yes, but I didn't know if any of us were going to make

MASS, from B-1

Hughes said as he welcomed those who filled even the side aisles of the cathedral.

Hughes said the Mass signaled a historic moment for the church and for the city.

“The structure which harbors the soul of our city has come back to life,” he said.

As residents, politicians, the military and others who have worked to save New Orleans listened and prayed during the Mass, reporters and photographers from across the country captured tears of sadness, clasped hands and smiles of hope.

“The people of New Orleans are a people of faith, and we can begin to explore the possibilities,” Hughes said, hoping that the storm will stir change in the form of “a simple way of life, … less consumer driven.”

Hughes said he believes the community will be “more attentive to its soul” and its people will share “respect for all human life.”

That too is the hope of Sister Lilianne Flavin, an administrator at Hope House, who recently returned to her Uptown community after weeks in an evacuation center in Gonzales.

Before Mass, she recalled a conversation she had with Don Everard, executive director of Hope House, two weeks before Katrina, in which they discussed the poor and needy in New Orleans.

“We were saying that something has to happen,” Flavin said, calling the hurricane a “cleansing force” that could lead to positive change “if we take it seriously.”

Happy to be home in the Lower Garden District, where the former St. Thomas public housing development once stood, Flavin smiled at the fact that her home did not flood.

“We were on the better side of town for the first time in our lives,” Flavin said.

Don Marshall, executive director of the New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival and Foundation, said he came to the Mass because he “felt a need to be part of a community again.”

Marshall said he is living in the French Quarter, but it is difficult to communicate with anyone since most businesses and other gathering spots are closed.

“I’ve been wondering where everyone’s been,” he said.

Marshall predicts the city will become a “better New Orleans” filled with “people who committed to creating an integrated city, finally.”

Conversation with fellow New Orleanians outside of the cathedral was music to the ears of New Orleans singer Wanda Rouzan, who lost most of her possessions to floodwaters that washed through her Gentilly home.

Along with a few of her awards and photos, “my nephew pulled out my rosary beads and my cross,” Rouzan said.

She’s staying in Florida for now, but Rouzan said she will return home to do “whatever I need to do for my queen city. … The archbishop said it so clearly: If God is there, we will rebuild her right.”

Rouzan and her sisters Laura Rouzan and Barbara Randolph attended the Mass after traveling to Baton Rouge for an aunt’s funeral. She died two days after the storm at Lafon Nursing Home in eastern New Orleans, Rouzan said.

Attending the Mass was a must, she said.

“We are the funk of New Orleans, the soul,” she said. “When I walked up to the cathedral, my heart was beating so fast. How can I leave? That’s absurd.”

Sunday’s Mass served as “a significant moment in the life of our archdiocese and the city of New Orleans,” archdiocesan spokesman the Rev. William Maestri said.

“The cathedral serves as a symbol that transcends any one faith and speaks to our community as a whole. Today sends a sign of hope to our city, state and nation.”

Archbishop Alfred Hughes follows in procession before the start of Mass on Sunday. During the service, Hughes spoke of the city returning to ‘a simple way of life, … less consumer-driven.’

Local, state officials wrestling for control

SCHOOL, from B-1

of its 116 schools in November represents a critical first step, officials say, that will have a lasting impression on the nation and, perhaps more important, on countless parents who for years have shunned the district, either paying to put their children in private schools or moving to suburban school districts.

But on the School Board, still notorious for its power struggles just a year after a slate of mostly self-proclaimed reformers took over, the floodwaters have not washed away politics and personal agendas. Frustration and gridlock have reached new heights; threatening to devolve the troubled district to a new low at what many say should be its finest hour.

"There is a real historic opportunity to take what has obviously been just a terrible thing and create something good out of it," said Kevin Hall, chief operating officer of the nonprofit Broad Foundation, one of several education organizations that have offered money and staff to New Orleans. "If the business-as-usual, adult-centered agenda rules the day, it would be a real tragedy for the students in New Orleans. People around the nation who are poised to help bring resources to the table might turn their attention to other places."

The fault line among school board members had been exposed earlier this year, when its members were bitterly divided over whether to hire financial turnaround firm Alvarez & Marsal to right the district's finances. Board President Torin Sanders even refused to sign a board-approved agreement with the firm until he was granted certain concessions by state education Superintendent Cecil Picard, who had heavily pushed Alvarez & Marsal's involvement.

Now, Sanders says, "what they were hired for is not what is needed," suggesting the New York-based firm was hired for a "restructuring," not a "rebuilding."

In the wake of the disaster, Picard and Sanders are more at odds than ever, setting the stage for intense and swift action as local and state officials wrestle for control of the district before any schools open.

"What makes anyone think, after this natural disaster, when the population is scattered, that New Orleans can rebuild without Alvarez & Marsal's expertise?" Picard said. "They need it more than ever before. They are a turnaround company and now they've really got to focus on crisis management and rebuilding in addition to the turnaround. Their work has tripled for the same amount of money their contract calls for."

Picard suggested radical changes could be on the immediate horizon.

"We have a serious problem on our hands," Picard said, noting a commitment he made to state and federal officials, along with Louisiana's congressional delegation, to get the system on the right path. The power struggle on the School Board has to be resolved – and fast, he said – "before we talk about rebuilding."

Asked how it will be resolved, Picard responded: "I have some ideas, and we're working on it."

State's role

Some suggest a complete – albeit temporary – takeover of the board's powers, as has happened in other cities during times of great unrest, could be in the works.

"One of the questions is: Is the board structure really the most effective structure for the system in times of crisis?" asked Hall.

Linda Johnson, a member of the state Board of Elementary and Secondary Education, suggested a similar scenario.

"Can we get where we need to be faster if the state were more involved?" she asked. "And the answer to that may be yes."

Johnson cautioned that the board is "an elected body" and "I want them to exist," but noted that the system is also very much "in crisis."

But Leslie Jacobs, her colleague on BESE, said it may be easier said than done.

"As much as there's been discussion, there is not a constitutional means to take over the New Orleans School Board," she said. "But this is an extraordinary time, and I think we need to explore any and all measures that could be available to us."

Battle lines drawn

Board Vice President Lourdes Moran said she wouldn't fight a takeover.

"If that's what he feels is necessary, then I'll support that plan," she said.

If that happens, Sanders is prepared for the fight of his life.

He began girding for battle only weeks after the storm, when the board met Sept. 15 in Baton Rouge. After half an hour of glad-handing and talk of unity in the face of tragedy, the battle lines were drawn, with board member Phyllis Landrieu attempting to call a vote on hiring former U.S. Secretary of Education Rodney Paige as the district's acting chief academic officer and replace interim Superintendent Ora Watson with Bill Roberti, who heads the financial turnaround effort for Alvarez & Marsal.

Although the motion lacked the necessary five votes – state law requires two-thirds approval to add items to the agenda – the vote was cast down racial lines with Sanders and the other two African-American board members, Heidi Lovett Daniels and Cynthia Cade, opposed.

After the meeting, Sanders said the effort to replace Watson, who is African-American, with Roberti, who is white, was "clearly" racially motivated.

Moran said she was outraged by the allegation.

"I wish my colleagues on that board, in particular my board president, would get off this racist platform," she said. "I've had just about enough of it."

"We vote on a president in January, and I guarantee you there will be a change," added board member Jimmy Fahrenholtz. "Back in law school they used to tell us, 'If you don't have the facts, argue the law; and if you don't have the law, argue the facts; and if you don't have either one, you play the race card.' This has nothing to do with race."

Sanders said it's essential to protect local control of the system and denied suggestions that his charge of racism is part of any political strategy.

"As far as playing the race card, I don't believe race is a card. I believe it's a whole deck," he said. "I think the events of Katrina have given a lot of credence to that in regard to race and poverty."

Daniels and Cade did not return calls seeking comment.

Showing commitment

Fahrenholtz and Moran say a defining moment for the Alvarez & Marsal team came two days after the storm when Roberti and two of his colleagues at the firm, Sajan George and Rajeev Jain, headed into the city to retrieve computer tapes containing all of the district's payroll and financial data.

George described the scene as "spooky" as the three headed down Gen. DeGaulle Drive on the West Bank at dusk after using Roberti's military ID – he served as a colonel in the Army Reserve – to get into the city.

After attempting to break down a door to the building's data room with a table, George described how they trudged back through the water in the lobby and recruited several soldiers to knock the door in with a sledgehammer so they could retrieve the tapes.

Two weeks later, employees were being invited to pick up their paychecks at Western Union locations nationwide.

Those efforts validate Alvarez & Marsal's commitment to the district, Moran said, noting how a contractor went in to retrieve vital information during a dangerous hours while Watson and other district employees "were evacuated."

"For Torin to come back in and say their services might no longer be needed is absolutely ludicrous," she said.

Sanders said he's not averse to working with Alvarez & Marsal, but their pre-Katrina contract should not apply.

"What they were hired for is not what is needed right now," he said. "The existing contract, as we know it, doesn't really mean much, because the nature of that work is not really valid."

Although everyone agrees Katrina is offering the district a fresh start in many respects, many disagree with Sanders' contention that the system is starting over with a clean slate.

"A natural disaster does not wipe away the financial challenge facing the school system," Picard said. "Nothing has changed when it comes to Alvarez & Marsal's contract to rehabilitate the finances of the system."

"We still have lots of accountability issues. The storm did not wipe away the debt," Moran added. "The only clean slate that exists is we have dilapidated buildings on the east bank that will be rebuilt. All the politicizing, all the mistrust and all the rhetoric remains."

Window of opportunity

George said starting anew can mean a lot more than rebuilding schools. Depending on how much the district takes advantage of the opportunity, the district is being offered a clean slate "in terms of deciding how do I want to do payroll, transportation, food service" and, on the academic side, he said, determining "what kind of training do we want for our principals," for example.

The district is currently negotiating with the teachers' union, George said, to determine who will be hired back to staff the first set of schools that open in Algiers, where floodwaters did not damage schools. Although the district has yet to determine how many schools will open and how many teachers will be needed – parents and employees are being asked to tell the district whether they plan to return by calling (877) 771-5800 – it is unclear to what extent officials will be allowed to handpick staff for schools.

However the reopening is structured – whether it's one school or all eight in Algiers – the first impression the district leaves with residents between now and the reopening of the first schools will be a lasting one.

"I would say the window is probably now and over the next few months," said Hall, of the Broad Foundation. "Families are going to be making choices about whether to move back to New Orleans, and I've got to believe they're thinking about the school system."

"You only have one chance to make a first impression," Jacobs said, "and a lot of people who are going to be coming back to New Orleans, who may have sent their kids to a nonpublic school, may be considering public schools for the first time. The No. 1 question now is how can we open schools well so we get off to a good footing."

A set of bleachers at the Muss Bertolino baseball field is surrounded by a temporary tent community, which is expected to grow as more workers head to the New Orleans area.

Workers come to N.O. from across the nation

ROOFS, from B-1

Being able to report to disaster work requires a flexible schedule. On short notice, workers leave home and family and sometimes a lower-paying job for months at a time.

"We got this together to help employ the people who were laid off," said former Ohio steelworker David Haught, who said his previous job evaporated because of foreign competition.

Oscar Espino of Dallas spoke quickly and vigorously nodded his head when asked whether he missed his wife.

"He said it was pretty hard to leave his family," one of Espino's fellow tarpers translated for him. "But you have to pay bills."

Many of the workers in the Bertolino tent city didn't know how long they would be in the New Orleans area. Answers ranged from a month to a year or longer.

Once all the roofs in the area have been secured with tarps, some said they will leave. But others said they will stay on to reshingle roofs and rebuild homes.

"The work's here now," said Guiles, who normally works as a bounty hunter. "We'll be here until the money runs out, until we run out of work."

Evacuated school psychologist works to balance emotions

Children's experiences often mirror her own

By Samira Jafari
Associated Press writer

MONTGOMERY, ALA. — The only sign of life was her 6-year-old daughter's pet fish, Dori.

Kathleen McKinney-Franks could have dwelled on the piles of ruined photographs, furniture and knickknacks filled with memories drowned by Hurricane Katrina in her New Orleans home.

Instead, she marveled at the strength of the little fish that rode out the storm and endured two weeks without food.

Her job as the new school psychologist for Pickens County schools has forced her to stay optimistic and sensitive to feats small and large. As both a hurricane victim and a chief counselor, she spends each day keeping her own emotions in check while organizing counseling services for young evacuees who lost their homes, pets and — in the worst cases — family members to Katrina. And that's on top of her regular student load.

"I'm sure they would be able to connect with me much more quickly because we have a shared background," said McKinney-Franks, a former school psychologist in New Orleans, in a telephone interview after wrapping up her first week on the job.

Nearly 5,700 student evacuees have enrolled in Alabama's public schools and individual school systems, including Pickens. The systems are looking to school psychologists, counselors and social workers to help the displaced youngsters make the transition into their new settings.

More than 50 displaced teachers and school employees have made inquiries about jobs at Alabama's public schools, though the state Department of Education does not have a figure on the number hired, said Rebecca Leigh White, state schools spokeswoman.

Displaced teachers may apply for emergency certification to work at the public schools for as long as a year, while other jobs, including school psychologists, require a background check and a licensing by a professional board.

Like many displaced employees, McKinney-Franks isn't sure where her next hometown will be, though she knows she won't be able to return to her New Orleans home for at least six months.

'I stayed because I am a caregiver'

HERO, from B-1

it out alive. I said yes to give them hope."

Rogers knew that some of those patients pleading for help would die before someone came to save them.

So she laid hands on those begging for hope, and prayed for those who'd lost it in the stifling heat and chaos that gripped the hospital.

The electricity was out and the generators failed after a few hours. There was no air conditioning, lights or running water.

"None of it seemed real," she said.

"It was like a dream; worse, a nightmare."

Food was running low and had to be rationed after three days; dry cereal for breakfast, a half-cup of cold ravioli for lunch, and pork and beans for dinner. Each was given a gallon of water a day.

There were no working elevators, so Rogers and the dietary staff carried loads of food up and down 14 flights of stairs to feed their patients.

The toilets overflowed the first night, unable to handle the waste of 1,300 staff members and 230 patients. The dark stairwells became a place where some relieved themselves, although Rogers said each staff member was given a five-gallon bucket for a toilet.

The stench of feces and unshowered bodies wafted through the hospital.

Rogers said while food drops were being made at other hospitals throughout the week, none were made to Charity.

Tulane University Hospital was being evacuated by Thursday, she said, and doctors there offered food dropped at that facility to Charity. So doctors and nurses, who themselves were near dehydration and hungry, commandeered boats to retrieve it.

"They are the real heroes," Rogers said. "The doctors and some of the nurses had to give themselves IVs while they worked on patients just to stay hydrated. They didn't even take the time to take care of themselves."

The 26-year-old Westwego native had been on the job only six months, and it took everything she had to keep her wobbly spirit from breaking.

At night she prayed under a blanket of darkness that cloaked every open space in the hospital.

She found the strength to continue in God, she said.

She pushed on by focusing on her patients, on their needs rather than hers.

And she savored the quick phone calls she was able to make to Jeffrey, her husband, who'd evacuated to Arkansas with his parents. A land-line phone in one of the offices worked. Since her department heads wouldn't let him stay with her, the daily calls were all they had.

He became a good liar, she said, almost as good as she'd become in the face of such seeming hopelessness.

Jeffrey told her that everything was going to be OK, that she was safe.

But he had no real way of knowing, and was hearing otherwise from national news accounts.

He tried not to believe the now-debunked rumors of rape and murder that had been spread across the nation. He tried to believe that his wife of five years was fine.

He knew, like she did, that his words were all she had left to hold onto. So he perfected "the lie."

After five days in crisis mode, Charity Hospital was evacuated. Staff and patients lined up on the emergency room loading dock and boarded school buses headed out of the city.

Rogers didn't know where she was going, but anywhere was better than New Orleans, she said.

The bus she boarded was headed for the airport in Kenner.

They parked on Airline Highway and a National Guardsman stepped on board, M-16 in hand.

"Anybody get off this bus or even move will be shot," Rogers recalled the soldier yelling.

The group of hospital employees was shocked, and told him they worked for the hospital. He apologized.

Somehow the buses evacuating hospital staff got mixed in with buses from the Superdome. The group was transferred from the school bus to a Greyhound headed for Baton Rouge, where a family friend picked her up.

After all she has been through, remaining in the hospital during the crisis, Rogers has been fired from her job.

Rogers' job probation was for 18 months, she said. Hospital officials said she was ineligible for transfer, that she would receive a paycheck through Sept. 30 and will be terminated as of Thursday.

"I'm just so angry," Rogers said. "I put my life at risk for the hospital and its patients and basically got the shaft. I stayed because I am a caregiver and I wanted to give care to those who needed it. That's what I did. Even with this outcome I wouldn't take it back."

Winnsboro woman may be victim of West Nile

MONROE – A Winnsboro woman has died from what a family member says was West Nile virus.

If confirmed by state officials, this will be Northeast Louisiana's first West Nile virus death this year.

Aaron Hopper Scott, 52, died Wednesday at Saint Francis Medical Center. Her sister says Scott was in the hospital for 12 days with both West Nile and Guillain-Barr Syndrome.

Like West Nile, GBS also attacks the central nervous system.

Statewide six people have died from West Nile and 99 have been diagnosed with the virus.

Web-based courses will be stressed

DELGADO, from B-1

Johnson said.

"Our commitment now is to continue to keep everybody on the payroll, and really keep our faculty intact," Johnson said Saturday after a tour of Delgado facilities, long viewed as essential to New Orleans job training. "We have asked our faculty to register, call in, let us know not only of their whereabouts but their availability for work. We've made every effort to engage faculty in meaningful work."

Some idle faculty members will be assigned to teach online courses, while others will serve as student advisers, he said.

Johnson's pledge contrasts with harsh realities playing out at some local higher education institutions badly wounded by Katrina, including Tulane University and the University of New Orleans, that are beginning to trim their staffs. The chancellor isn't ruling out a later round of layoffs, but hopes that Delgado's rush to offer online courses and health sciences classes at a few satellite locations will jump-start a large-scale return to traditional Delgado offerings in the spring.

Internet-based courses in various academic fields are being offered by Delgado at no charge in conjunction with an online program sponsored by the New York-based Sloan Foundation and the Southern Regional Education Board. Details on offerings should be available in coming days through the Delgado Web site, www.dcc.edu.

Roughly 7,000 Delgado students should be taking courses before January including 4,000 designated "visiting" students at public institutions in the region, such as Baton Rouge Community College, Southern Louisiana University and Southern University at Baton Rouge, Johnson said. He hopes 9,000 to 10,000 will be taking courses directly from Delgado in the spring, down from 17,400 before the storm.

Preparing facilities for returning students is a daunting task. Johnson said damage estimates aren't firm, but that up to 8 feet of water overtook the Slidell branch and at least 60 percent of the City Park campus had serious flooding, 6 to 8 feet deep at the back side of the campus facing Lakeview. A partially-built center for science and mathematics on the City Park site, serving Orleans Parish public school students, collapsed during the storm, and some other buildings, including the landmark Building No. 1 facing City Park Avenue, had limited wind damage.

Delgado is preparing to lease a 10,000-square-foot social services building on Gen. DeGaulle Drive in Algiers to provide more teaching space while it tackles major repair projects in coming months, Johnson said.

The college's information technology infrastructure, critical to student records and payroll, was badly damaged but now is largely restored, Johnson said.

Despite Johnson's effort to preserve their jobs, many Delgado instructors living in Lakeview, Gentilly and other New Orleans neighborhoods lost homes to flooding and will face a challenge getting to work, said Shelley Tyler, an English as a second language instructor who lives on the West Bank. Some faculty members plan to commute in from apartments in Baton Rouge or Picayune, Miss., she said.

"I think most faculty, if they could come back, they would want to come back," she said. "Everybody's kind of disconnected right now."

The Delgado Community College Foundation has contributed $9,000 to a relief fund for displaced students and is collecting donations for students and building repairs.

Details on the initiatives are to be provided through the college's Web site.

Serving as a base for National Guard units since the storm, the City Park campus also is serving as an informal staging area for companies hauling debris out of damaged neighborhoods.

Johnson said he doesn't know who authorized the haulers' use of campus property but doesn't mind if it helps with the city's recovery.

Two St. Bernard families who had not seen or heard from each other since Hurricane Katrina destroyed their homes a month ago were reunited by chance Saturday at a free food and rummage 'sale' at St. Peter School in Covington. Jeanine Mason of Meraux, left, was shopping for her family when she spotted her cousin, Leslie Kelt of Meraux, second from left. Nathalie Satter of Chalmette, right, Kelt's mother, hugs Joseph Mason, 8, Jeanine Mason's son. 'I was speechless,' Mason said. 'The last I knew, Leslie was in Ohio, and she thought I was in Thibodaux.' The families had migrated to Covington, where they are staying with friends and family.

Elections matter

Unfortunately, what many people will remember about this dire time in our history is not what our heroes did, but what our elected officials did not do. There was a failure of leadership not only in the days before the storm, but for weeks after. The congressional hearings will, no doubt, find stupidity and incompetence at all levels of government.

We need look no further than ourselves to find the blame for these failures. We elected these people to office. We are the ones who, for the last 30 years, have failed to elect true leaders who would have made this a safer place.

If we learn just one thing from this catastrophe, it should be that elections do have consequences. Hopefully we will remember that the next time we pull the lever behind the curtain.

Give the poor a better life

New Orleans has always been a place of poverty and degradation for its poor, who are primarily African-American. To bring the poor back to New Orleans would be almost criminal. The good ole boys and their mentality of business as usual would all be there as well. For the poor, this would mean lack of opportunity, poor education and living with fear and violence. The poor still would not be able to trust government, the police or other social institutions. The drug culture would once again rule the streets and ghetto-like neighborhoods. As a deacon and minister in Hollygrove, I know of what I speak.

My suggestion is for the local, state and federal governments to allow families to gather together and give them a choice of cities to live where meaningful jobs are available, job training can be had and schools are ready to accept their children. Many towns and cities would be able to accommodate extended families.

I am asking everyone to prevail on the government, especially the federal government, not to send the poor back to their ruined city.

I am begging you to give these people a fresh start, a new beginning of hope. Give them a place where there is more respect, better schools and less fear, violence and murder. Give them a place where they can experience the freedom and advantages that most white folks in New Orleans take for granted.

Details wrong, but reaction right

Despite recent clarifications, there was apparently plenty of killing, raping and mayhem all over the city. In particular I remember the article about the worker who stayed in the National D-Day Museum. In the article, he describes how he saw gun-wielding thugs rape a girl. This may not have happened in the Superdome or Convention Center, but you can't blame the mayor or police chief for getting worked up about the lawlessness that surrounded them. Maybe they didn't get the details quite right but there was certainly plenty to be horrified and overwhelmed by.

Unfortunately, since we haven't had access to national TV news (no cable), it is difficult to see how the rest of the country sees us. I've heard it has been pretty bad. Last night a reporter from MSNBC was interviewed by a local news station. The reporter said they had taped a group of New Orleans police officers looting a Wal-Mart. He made it sound as if the officers flaunted it in front of the cameras.

I wanted to ask him, "Were they getting water, food and supplies for their police station/fortress? Were they trying to find supplies for stranded people?"

Heck, I wouldn't have minded if they went to my house and took all the food. At least now it wouldn't be covered in mold.

Kindness did not rule the shelters

Although Monday's front-page story focused on how many of the purported atrocities in the Superdome and Convention Center never actually happened, a picture of my 85-year-old grandfather on that page provides all the proof I need that there was at least one despicable act.

In that picture, he is shown sitting with his suitcase, waiting for a bus after having been evacuated from an assisted living center in eastern New Orleans. The picture was taken before he was taken to the Convention Center, where he was severely beaten and had all of his belongings in the suitcase stolen from him.

After being rescued from the Convention Center, he spent three days in the hospital in Baton Rouge and remains physically and emotionally scarred from the experience. A previously healthy and spry senior, he has much more to overcome than heat, hunger and dehydration.

Family found on forum

Greetings from Mesa, Ariz. I have family all over Louisiana, but especially in Buras. After the storm hit, I found very little information on any of the Buras-area news outlets I normally use. Frustration and anger were beginning to get the better of me. I accidentally stumbled onto nola.com and all its local forums a few days later, and posted information on my family members.

Within a few hours, I received two phone calls and several e-mails from others who saw my post and provided me with leads that eventually led directly to my lost relatives. Had The Times-Picayune's affiliated Web site not put those forums online, I would never have found them. How you did it while dealing with the aftermath of Katrina, I have no idea. Thank you so much.

I now make it a practice to tell everyone which paper has the most information and actually cares about its customers.

Independence is a virtue

Weeks after Hurricane Katrina steamed past southeast Louisiana, the levee breaches along the London Avenue Canal in New Orleans were still fearsome to behold. Concrete panels that were supposed to hold back the storm surge during a hurricane instead were bowed out and bent over. Homes nestled against the levee looked as though a river had flowed through them, and piles of sediment had collected in what was left of their back yards.

But while the destruction caused by the failure of the London Avenue Canal, 17th Street Canal and Industrial Canal floodwalls is evident in the surrounding neighborhoods – and across a vast area in Orleans, St. Bernard and Jefferson parishes – the precise cause of these breaches can be established only through a detailed forensic investigation.

The Army Corps of Engineers has already announced that it is conducting such an investigation. But the agency responsible for designing and building flood-protection levees should not lead the inquiry into what went wrong.

An unbiased investigation could conclude that Katrina was simply too strong a storm – that the storm surge it produced exceeded the design standards of the floodwalls. In fact, some evidence suggests that a huge storm surge was indeed responsible for the failure of the Industrial Canal floodwalls. If a Category 4 hurricane overwhelms a levee system that was explicitly designed for only a Category 3 storm, there's not much else the corps or its contractors could have done; fault would instead lie with the public officials who declined to support a stronger system.

But independent engineers say the floodwalls at the London Avenue and 17th Street canals were designed to handle stresses worse than Katrina's. If so, the failures could be the result of design, construction or maintenance flaws. And the corps' initial theory about those breaches – that water topped the floodwalls and scoured away the back side of the earthen berm supporting it – could start to look like a knee-jerk, defensive reaction.

The corps has plenty of critics who are suspicious of virtually every move the agency makes, and over the years the agency has given them ammunition. Impartial government reports have accused agency officials of fiddling with numbers in their economic-impact studies to make proposed corps projects look more beneficial and more worthy of government money.

But the truth is, few organizations find it easy to point the finger at themselves after something goes wrong, and internal pressures often frustrate the search for answers. In his book "The Wisdom of Crowds," the writer James Surowiecki examines the final mission of the space shuttle Columbia, and he argues persuasively that bureaucratic power politics within NASA hampered the agency's response to evidence that heat-resistant tiles had been damaged on liftoff. High-ranking officials at the space agency concluded early on that nothing could be done about such a problem, Mr. Surowiecki maintains, and they discounted opinions to the contrary.

Putting independent experts in charge of an investigation, by contrast, makes it less likely to succumb to bureaucratic groupthink and rear-covering. For that reason, it's encouraging that experts from the National Science Foundation and the American Society of Civil Engineers will be examining the breaches.

There's been considerable public debate about whether the congressional investigation into the poky federal response to Katrina represents a real effort to find answers – or is merely an attempt by Republican leaders to shield the Bush administration from further criticism. But whatever happens with that political sideshow in Washington, an independent investigation of the levee failures is more crucial to the New Orleans area's safety in the near term.

The fate of our entire community is at stake. Institutional politics within the corps should not affect the outcome of the post-Katrina inquiry, and the only way to guarantee that is to let someone else take the lead.

Camping in the driveway

Before Katrina tore up southeast Louisiana, city planners and elected officials worried about things like zoning and aesthetics, and those concerns shouldn't be completely erased by the disaster that has hit this region.

But the wind and flood damage caused by the Aug. 29 storm does mean that local governments need to reorder their priorities. Slidell City Council members showed that they understand that when they voted 6-0 to allow residents to live in temporary housing on their own property while they repair their homes.

The vote provides an exemption to a municipal ordinance that bans such housing in the city limits. While the City Council initially considered a six-month exemption, the action taken last week allows temporary housing – campers, recreational vehicles and trailer homes – for a year. The time can be extended, too, if the council deems it necessary.

With 4,000 of Slidell's 10,000 houses damaged by wind or flood water, that's a pragmatic response to what many Slidellians – including Police Chief Freddy Drennan – are already doing. The waiver expires as soon as city inspectors decide that the damaged house is habitable.

Planning Director Martin Bruno was reluctant to extend the exemption beyond six months. He warned that the city could be opening the door to the return of mobile homes, which were banned three years ago, and predicted that there would be enforcement problems when the time runs out.

But those concerns pale compared to what could happen if Slidell makes it hard for people to live on their property while it is undergoing repairs. A year from now, the city could find itself depleted of residents and stuck with dilapidated and abandoned housing.

Slidell might have to deal with a few violators a year or more down the road, but it's a safe bet that most people aren,t going to want to camp in their driveways a minute longer than necessary.

WHY LOUISIANA MATTERS

MARY LANDRIEU

The Washington Post's Sept. 27 editorial "Louisiana's Looters" displayed a profound ignorance of the regional and national miscalculation of this national disaster. It's not just that people's homes are underwater; that happens with every hurricane. It's not just that roofs have blown off; those are the usual visuals of a storm of this nature. It's that an entire region vital to our national energy supply, security and commerce has been devastated.

South Louisiana is the anchor of America's Energy Coast, securing more than three-quarters of U.S. offshore oil and gas production ñ a greater share of our nation's energy supply than even the kingdom of Saudi Arabia accounts for. The ports of south Louisiana, including New Orleans, are America's gateway to the world, handling more than 20 percent of U.S. imports and exports each day, including more than 70 percent of all grains as they move from farms across the nation to markets overseas. And 40 percent of the seafood consumed by Americans each year comes through coastal Louisiana.

But The Post dismissed the federal government's role in the rebuilding of these and other devastated sectors of our economy. It described an effort to rebuild the regional economy as extraneous, comparing it to a sports venue miles from Ground Zero in New York. The people of Louisiana do not share this simplistic view. Nor would an Iowa farmer unable to bring his grain to market, or a Virginia mother who can't keep up with rising gas costs for the family car, or a Chicago seafood restaurateur trying to expand his business even as supplies are constrained.

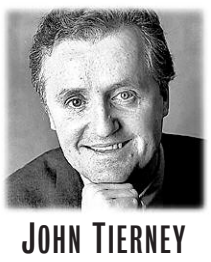
It is important to note that we will not rebuild New Orleans out of our own sense of need or nostalgia. We will renew and restore New Orleans and the region because its existence is dictated by the needs of U.S. commerce. The question is not whether Americans can afford to raise up Louisiana's economy; it is whether America can afford not to. The answer is clear: We must rebuild stronger, better and smarter than before.

Just as the Netherlands did after the devastating flood of 1953, we will build the world's strongest levee system. But rebuilding this region will take more than just higher levees. We must also build a better education system in the region, while figuring out a way to maintain the education of 200,000 displaced children and 73,000 displaced college students around the country.

We must build a better health care system in New Orleans and throughout south Louisiana, and we must figure out how to extend health care coverage to a million survivors whose employers are either gone, teetering on the verge of bankruptcy or dropping their coverage. We must provide the infrastructure and appropriate incentives for businesses and industry that are positioned to accept the risk of reopening their doors amid their unprecedented losses and the destruction around them.

Finally, The Post's editorial accuses our delegation of disregarding the "root causes" of the Hurricane Katrina disaster. But even a cursory amount of journalistic effort would reveal years of requests to stem the repeated cuts to our flood and hurricane protection programs, most recently in a letter to the president in November, as well as efforts to restore America's Wetland, our primary hurricane protection.

A search of Post archives would demonstrate decades of unity on the part of our congressional delegation in seeking restoration of Louisiana's eroding coast, as the continued erosion increases the vulnerability of our coastal populations.



Despite this legacy of federal neglect, The Post criticizes proposals to give Louisiana greater control of the rebuilding effort. Let us be clear: Louisiana will be rebuilt by Louisianians. New Orleans will be rebuilt by New Orleanians. And the rest of southern Louisiana will be rebuilt under the leadership of the people who call it home.

Certainly The Post, long a champion of home rule, should appreciate this enduring spirit.

Instead of the soft path, try hard cash

JOHN TIERNEY

President Bush has been getting grief for telling people to cut back on driving while he gas-guzzles his way across the country. But he's merely expressing Washington's bipartisan consensus: Energy conservation is a wonderful idea — for other people.

In the past, Republicans weren't quite as devoted to conservation as Democrats, especially ones like John Kerry. During last year's campaign, he called for massive cutbacks in energy use as he traveled among his five houses on a Gulfstream that was less fuel-efficient per passenger than Air Force One.

But Republicans shuttling between just two homes have generally at least paid lip service to energy conservation, because they know most voters like it in principle. The problem is that these voters, for some odd reason, cling to the notion that their personal travels are just as essential as politicians'.

So both parties refuse to consider the best way to save energy: charging more for gasoline. It's taboo to raise the gas tax, or even to raise prices during a shortage.

The gas stations that increased prices after Hurricane Katrina were having precisely the effect that Bush wanted when he tried to discourage driving. But he lumped them together with street criminals, saying there should be "zero tolerance of people breaking the law during an emergency such as this, whether it be looting, or price-gouging at the gasoline pump."

To assuage voters, politicians hide the price tag when they try to impose conservation. They've forced cars and appliances to become more energy-efficient, which makes them more expensive, but no one blames Congress for the higher sticker prices.

The rationale for these policies is that consumers will save money in the long run by using less energy – they're just not savvy enough to realize it when they're shopping for a new car or refrigerator. But even if you doubt consumers' judgment, it doesn't follow that regulators are any savvier when they dictate what should be sold.

The efficiency standards for appliances, far from paying for themselves, will cost consumers roughly $50 billion through 2050, according to Ronald Sutherland, an economist at George Mason University. And those costs are borne disproportionately by low-income and middle-income households.

Besides being costly, conservation rules can produce unintended consequences. The fuel-efficiency standards for cars led to that environmentalist nightmare, the SUV, which became popular because of a loophole in the rules.

Consumers who wanted a big car had to buy one pretending to be a truck because carmakers were forced to downsize their fleets. As cars became lighter, they also became more dangerous, resulting in an additional 2,000 deaths per year, according to the National Research Council.

During the 1970s and 1980s, regulators in California and other states forced utilities to subsidize alternative energy sources and technologies that reduced electricity consumption. That was the energy "soft path," as its advocates described it in rhapsodies like the ones I heard at Robert Redford's place in Sundance in 1989.

At Redford's conference, devoted to "healing the planet," utility and coal executives listened to lectures from the soft-path advocates explaining why the energy soft path would more than pay for itself. The executives listened politely, but one of them summed up their reaction with the punch line from the old story about a failed dog-food marketing campaign. "The dogs ain't eatin' it," he said.

The utility executives didn't think these conservation measures made economic sense — and they turned out to be right, as evidenced by subsequent research and the soaring electricity prices in California to cover the soft-path boondoggles forced on the utilities. Those mistakes haven't deterred today's energy conservationists from coming up with more money-saving schemes for society, but there's usually a good reason the dog ain't eatin' it already.

Individuals don't always make the best choices about energy use — you can make a case that we drive too much because the price of gasoline doesn't reflect all the social costs. But if a new gas tax covered those costs, then we'd have all the incentive we need to conserve energy. While a gas tax may sound politically hopeless, it's worth considering ways to induce both parties to go for it.

A tax would make people figure out on their own how to burn less gasoline. Washington wouldn't need to lecture them on conservation or dictate what kind of cars they can buy. Freed from supervisory duties, some politicians might even think about conserving energy themselves.

Katrina brings opportunity to rebuild U.S. health care

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, we have an opportunity to construct something far more important than higher levees: a national health care system that looks less like a tightrope and more like a safety net.

A dozen years after Bill Clinton's health reform efforts were destroyed by the insurance industry's duplicity, it's worth trying again. The health care system is steadily becoming more gummed up in ways that are impossible to hide.

One of the bumper stickers attacking the Clinton plan read: "If You Like the Post Office, You'll Love National Health Insurance." That wouldn't work today: The Postal Service runs a system that is manifestly more rational and efficient than our health care system. For starters, imagine a postal system that refused to deliver letters to or from 45 million Americans – except on rare occasions, by ambulance.

"This is one of those fleeting opportunities where a catastrophe creates an opportunity to rebuild something better than before," says Dr. Irwin Redlener, president of the Children's Health Fund and associate dean of the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University.

In a sign of the growing disenchantment with our health system, 13,000 doctors have joined Physicians for a National Health Program, which lobbies for a single-payer government-financed health program.

There are four main problems with the existing system. First, it leaves out 45 million uninsured Americans, and their number is rising. Second, it is by far the most expensive in the world, costing 15 percent of our national income, yet our outcomes are awful: U.S. life expectancy is worse than Costa Rica's. Third, our business competitiveness is undermined when, for example, medical expenses add $1,500 to the sticker of each General Motors car. Fourth, our system is catastrophically inefficient: According to a study in The New England Journal of Medicine, health administrative costs are $1,059 per capita in the United States, and just $307 in Canada.

A single-payer system would be most efficient but probably is not politically feasible at the moment. The smart new book "The Health Care Mess" suggests a variety of more gradual approaches that would face less opposition.

Whatever the mechanism, all children should be covered. It's a disgrace that we use public money to save the lives of nonagenarians but not those of 9-year-olds. And kids are a bargain: per capita medical spending is $1,525 for children younger than 5, and $9,000 per person aged 65 to 74.

A second principle is that we should put less emphasis on curative medicine and more on public health and prevention: everything from preparing for avian flu to encouraging exercise. Sure, we can buy more "left ventricular assist devices," which cost $210,000 per patient installed, or buy Erbitux for colon cancer, at $17,000 per month of treatment. But as a wise new book, "Prescription for a Healthy Nation," argues, you get more bang for the buck when you promote healthier lifestyles: fighting obesity, cigarette smoking and the like.

Raising cigarette taxes saved far more American lives, for example, than an army of neurologists ever could. In the same spirit, I'd like to see a French fry tax. And imagine the health gains if we banned potato chips and soda from schools.

Reforming the health system won't be easy. In the real world, poor kids don't see doctors not only because they're uninsured, but also because Mom doesn't have a car, can't easily get time off from work, or doesn't speak English. Those are hard nuts to crack – but one reason to think that we can do better is that much of the world does better.

I've been thinking of health care partly because of something that happened when I was on vacation in August. My kids and I were stacking firewood for my parents on the Yamhill, Ore., farm where I grew up, when suddenly the 7-foot stack collapsed – on top of my youngest. She was knocked down and pinned, her face bleeding, under a pile of logs.

I had insurance, and a car to get to the emergency room – and in the end the logs (stained with blood) turned out to be in worse shape than my daughter. She's just fine. But that instant was heart-stopping in its terror – and the system routinely does fail such children in need. Isn't it worth fighting one more time for reforms, so that we Americans can get health care every bit as good as Canada's?

Saints respond to warm welcome

SAN ANTONIO — Inside the Alamodome, someone was holding a poster with Louisiana's outline that said: "There's No Place Like Home."

Well, let the record show San Antonio's warmth, its flat-out enthusiasm for the sport, was a welcome change for a Saints football team, at least for now, that has said goodbye to its Big Easy roots.

While the Richter-scale level of†58,688 did not match the Superdome in its vintage days, it registered solidly, with the players, with the coaches, with the owner.

"These fans were really into it," Tom Benson said. "I don't think you can read anything more than they were responding to what these guys have been through, a terrible tragedy. And they were throwing their feelings†out on the field."

Obviously, Jim Haslett's team was listening.

When was the last time the Saints shut out a team for the last 55 minutes?

When was the last time the Saints controlled the ball for almost 36 minutes?

When was the last time they came out of a game with only four penalties — for a meager 46 yards?

The Buffalo Bills they defeated 19-7 were not a team of the quality of the Carolina Panthers. But the way the Saints handled early adversity, surrendering an early score, then muffing some passes, the way they managed to come with a big play, here and there, helped make it a quality victory for a 2-2 ballclub.

"The fans were cool," said Deuce McAllister, who rushed for 83 of his 130 yards in the fourth quarter as the Saints applied a final fingerprint to a feel-good Sunday.

Two large fingerprints were supplied by two members of the defense, first by Fred Thomas, then by Dwight Smith.

Listening to Thomas tell you about Terrance McGee's 82-yard kickoff return that ended the first half was a thrill in itself.

John Carney had kicked a 40-yard field goal to put the Saints ahead 13-7 with 10 seconds remaining.

Enthusiastic crowd in San Antonio sees Saints dominate Bills

By Mike Triplett

SAN ANTONIO — An historic event took place at the Alamodome on Sunday, the first regular-season NFL game played in San Antonio, a moment years in the making.

The Saints were happy enough to take part, but mostly they are just hoping Sunday's 19-7 victory over the hapless Buffalo Bills was the watershed moment in their 2005 season.

The Saints waited three long weeks for their second win this season, a convincing performance with no turnovers and only four penalties, and evened their record at 2-2.

A .500 mark usually isn't much to celebrate. But after all that this team has been through in the past month, catching up is an achievement worth appreciating.

"It was important to us because we got back to even; we got back to 2-2. And it was important because of the way we played, more than anything," Saints coach Jim Haslett said. "We played the type of football that we'd like to play.

"We'd rather be 4-0 or 3-1, but you take these games in four-game segments. You know the teams we have to beat, we play coming up, (NFC West rivals) Tampa Bay and Atlanta in a few weeks. But in the meantime, we have to stay in the hunt; we have to stay close so we have the opportunity to get back in this thing."

The Saints said the past week felt like a normal routine for the first time they could remember after a whirlwind tour took them from New Orleans to Oakland, San Antonio, Charlotte, New York and Minnesota.

The team has not boarded a plane in seven days now, the longest streak of the season. Members of the team and the organization have been driving their own cars and sleeping in their own beds, albeit rented beds in rented apartments.

But at least it's something.

And at least now the Saints get a chance to start fresh, putting behind

A little more than a month before the start of training camp, everything seemed to be in order for the Hornets.

They had a successful draft, landing coveted point guard Chris Paul. In an average free-agency class, they got a bargain in European sharpshooter Arvydas Macijauskas. Then they traded basically nothing for Rasual Butler, their likely starting small forward. And in a bit of off-court lagniappe, the Hornets achieved their highest season-ticket sales figures in New Orleans.

Then Hurricane Katrina hit.

Instead of eagerly anticipating the regular season, the Hornets were in a crisis, initially unsure where they would play their home games. What they knew for certain was that it would take months to repair the flood-damaged New Orleans Arena and it was unlikely they would play in New Orleans this season.

But new team president Paul Mott and General Manager Allan Bristow worked through the situation, signing a lucrative deal to base the team in Oklahoma City for 35 games and playing the other six home games in Baton Rouge. The chaos, it seemed, had passed. Then on Saturday, just two days before the team's media day, Bristow resigned, citing health concerns.

It was the latest in a series of volatile events surrounding the franchise since it moved to New Orleans before the 2002-03 season. Newly promoted Jeff Bower is the team's third general manager. Byron Scott is the team's third head coach. And there have been lawsuits, conflicts involving local politicians, as well as a power struggle involving owners George Shinn and Ray Wooldridge, which hampered the progress of the franchise during its first 2½ seasons in New Orleans.

JARRETT WINS AT TALLADEGA: Dale Jarrett ended a 98-race drought by winning at Talladega (Ala.) Superspeedway on Sunday, and Ryan Newman moved to the top of the Nextel Cup standings. Jarrett used a three-wide pass to challenge Tony Stewart for the lead on the final lap and moved ahead on the backstretch in the UAW-Ford 500 for his first victory since 2003. Stewart finished second and Newman was third, moving him on top of the Chase for the Championship after the third of 10 races. Newman holds a one-point advantage over Stewart after a race that shuffled the Chase standings. Jimmie Johnson, who started the day as the points leader, was involved in two accidents and dropped to fourth in the standings, 98 points back. At least five Chase drivers suffered accident-related damage, and Johnson wrecked 20 laps into the race. A second eight-car accident started when Chase driver Ryan Newman hit Casey Mears. That accident damaged the cars of Chase drivers Rusty Wallace and Greg Biffle. Both were able to get back on the track to run for points.

GOLF

MONTGOMERIE WINS DUNHILL: Colin Montgomerie birdied the last hole to win the Dunhill Links Championship by a stroke at St. Andrews, Scotland, rallying from a five-shot deficit for his first victory in his home country since 1999. Montgomerie closed with a 1-under-par 71 on the Old Course for a 279 total. Kenneth Ferrie led after three rounds but a 77 left him at 280. Four others were a stroke back: Padraig Harrington, Henrik Stenson, Robert Karlsson and Anders Hanson. This was Montgomerie's first victory since the Singapore Masters early last year. His previous victory in Scotland came at the Loch Lomond Invitational, now the Scottish Open. It was his 29th title on the European tour.

MORE GOLF: At Rancho Palos Verdes, Calif., British Open champion Jeong Jang shot a 5-under 66 to join Hee-Won Han and Karine Icher as the second-round leaders by two shots in the fog-delayed LPGA Office Depot Championship. The conclusion of the 54-hole event is scheduled for today. . . . Jeff Gove won the Oregon Classic in Eugene, Ore., when steady rain forced tournament officials to cancel the fourth round of the Nationwide Tour event.

BASKETBALL

BROWN WANTED TO ATTACK TEAMMATE: With Kwame Brown now out of Washington, he's sharing why he was suspended for the playoffs. According to ESPN.com, Brown told The Washington Post that he wasn't ill after Game 3 of the Wizards' series with the Bulls, as the team reported, but was so upset with guard Gilbert Arenas, he feared he would have attacked Arenas. "The thing is, the whole thing stems from Gilbert telling them not to put me in the game. I didn't come to practice because I was going to be a distraction. I was going to slap the (expletive) out of him," Brown told the paper. "I'll admit it, what I did was wrong - not showing up was wrong - but I ain't saying what I would've done if I showed up would've been right. Being that I didn't show up, I didn't put my hands on nobody. How a teammate, a supposed friend, would go to a coach and tell him don't put me in a game, I would've done something seriously wrong to him." Arenas has denied telling the team not to play Brown.

AROUND THE NBA: The Milwaukee Bucks signed forward Josh Davis to a free-agent contract, General Manager Larry Harris said. Davis played 42 games with the Philadelphia 76ers last season, averaging 2.8 points and 1.9 rebounds.

BOXING

JONES PONDERS FUTURE: Roy Jones Jr., a former champion in four weight classes, failed in his bid to regain the IBO light heavyweight crown from Antonio Tarver on Saturday night, losing a unanimous 12-round decision that raised more questions about whether it's time for him to retire. Jones said he's not sure. "I'm a true champion," he said. "Being the champion I am, I may come back." The loss was his second to Tarver in 16 months. Jones has dropped three straight fights, two by knockouts, after winning 49 of his first 50 pro bouts.

TENNIS

FEDERER WINS THAILAND OPEN: Roger Federer won the Thailand Open title for the second straight year, defeating Andy Murray 6-3, 7-5 in Bangkok. Federer, ranked No. 1, has won 24 consecutive ATP finals, including seven this season. "I had to work hard to get to this point," Federer said. "There are tough challengers, but not this week. I'm amazed with myself, and hopefully I'll keep doing this in the future."

MORE TENNIS: Igor Andreev rebounded from a first-set wipeout to defeat Filippo Volandri 0-6, 6-1, 6-3 in the Palermo International final in Palermo, Sicily, for his second ATP title. . . . Jonas Bjorkman defeated third-seeded Radek Stepanek 6-3, 7-6 (4) to win the inaugural Vietnam Open in Ho Chi Minh City, Vietnam, for his first ATP title since 2002. . . . Nicole Vaidisova rallied past top-seeded Jelena Jankovic 7-5, 6-3 to win the Korea Open in Seoul, South Korea. . . . Yan Zi won her first WTA singles title, winning the Guangzhou International when Nuria Llagostera Vives stopped in the second set because of a strained left hamstring. Yan, unseeded and ranked No. 163, won the first set 6-4 and was ahead 4-0 in the second when her sixth-seeded opponent quit at Guangzhou, China.

HORSE RACING: The Daddy beat A.P. Arrow by a neck Saturday in the $750,000 Grade II Super Derby at Louisiana Downs in Bossier City, La., in a race marred by the death of Royal Saint, who collapsed in midstretch. The Daddy, in his fourth career start, was briefly headed by Kilates Kiss on the second turn. He regained the lead and had just enough to hold off A.P. Arrow on the outside in the 1¼-mile race for 3-year-olds. Ridden by 17-year-old apprentice Pablo Morales, The Daddy's third victory earned him a ticket to the Breeders' Cup on Oct. 29 at Belmont Park, owner Greg Norman said. . . . Funfair beat Artie Schiller by a head in Sunday's $350,000 Kelso Breeders' Cup Handicap for horses 3 and older at Belmont Park. Ridden by Edgar Prado, Funfair covered one mile in 1:32.95 over firm turf and paid $29.20. Sensation defeated Swap Fliparoo by 5½ lengths in the co-featured $106,600 Astarita Stakes for 2-year-old fillies. Sensation covered 6½ furlongs in 1:16.90 to earn $63,960 for Castletop Farm and Cobra Stable.

ROAD RACING: A 10-mile race that had attracted about 20,000 runners grew by a mile when a suspicious package under a bridge prompted organizers to change their route. The Army's annual "Ten-Miler" road race from Arlington, Va., to Washington and back became an unofficial "fun run" when a Washington police harbor unit found the package under the 14th Street Bridge, a part of the route. Before runners reached the bridge, race organizers decided to turn them back, said a spokeswoman for the Military District of Washington. Police later said it was harmless.

COLLEGES

TULANE FALLS IN VOLLEYBALL, SOCCER: Tulane libero Kelli Dickson had 24 digs and three Green Wave players had 10 or more kills, but Tulane fell to Houston in four games in a volleyball match in College Station, Texas. Tulane fell to 1-4 and 0-2 in CUSA play. Houston is 6-8 and 1-1. . . . Despite one goal apiece from Jill Sharp and Jackie Obert, the Tulane women's soccer team (0-5, 0-2) fell 3-2 to UAB (5-5-1) in Birmingham.

Astros, Red Sox gain wild-card berths

Yankees to begin playoffs on the road

From wire reports

Roy Oswalt became the first pitcher since 2001-02 with consecutive 20-win seasons, and the Houston Astros clinched the NL wild card on the final day of the regular season — just like they did last year.

With their 6-4 victory over the Cubs on Sunday, the Astros, 15-30 after a loss to the Cubs on May 24, became the first team since the 1914 Boston Braves to make the playoffs after being as many as 15 games under .500 in the same season.

Houston (89-73) will play Atlanta in a rematch of last year's NL division series, won by the Astros in five games. The Braves were 5-1 against Houston this season, including a four-game sweep in Atlanta, where Game 1 is Wednesday.

By winning their regular season finale, the Astros avoided a tie with Philadelphia for the wild card. The Phillies (88-74) won 9-3 at Washington on Sunday to finish a game behind Houston.

BOSTON BONANZA: The Boston Red Sox joined the New York Yankees in the playoffs and made their rivals' road just a little tougher.

Reigning World Series MVP Manny Ramirez hit a three-run homer and also threw out Derek Jeter from the outfield on Sunday, and Curt Schilling shut the Yankees down long enough for the Red Sox to defeat them 10-1 and clinch the AL wild-card berth.

Boston opens the playoffs Tuesday at Chicago. New York's loss meant it will start the postseason Tuesday at Anaheim rather than at home against the Angels.

The Cleveland Indians lost 3-1 to the Chicago White Sox, assuring Boston of the AL's last playoff spot. Boston and New York each finished the year 95-67, and the Yankees won the division title because they beat the Red Sox 10-9 in the season series. The Angels also finished 95-67 and earned the home-field advantage against New York because they won the season series 6-4.

Choi starts strong, wins in Greensboro

By Keith Parsons
AP Sports Writer

GREENSBORO, N.C. — K.J. Choi had the look of a champion from the start.

"You can tell when someone is in the zone by his eyes," said Choi's caddie, Andy Prodger. "And you could see it in his eyes."

Four consecutive birdies to open the final round helped Choi win the Chrysler Classic of Greensboro on Sunday. He cruised to a two-shot victory over Shigeki Maruyama to snap a three-year losing streak.

"I really focused on my game," Choi said through an interpreter. "In Korea, in all the times, every since the last one, anytime I'm in the last group, I won it except once."

It was Choi's first PGA Tour victory since 2002, when he won two tournaments, including the HP Classic of New Orleans. He finished with a 6-under 66 for a 22-under 266 total, one stroke short of Jesper Parnevik's tournament record from 1999.

Maruyama shot a 67. First-round leader Charles Warren, who tied the Forest Oaks Country Club record of 62 before faltering the past two days, rebounded with a 65 to tie Brandt Jobe (67) and Jason Bohn (70) for third.

"K.J. got off to the kind of start that everybody wanted," said Bohn, who locked up a spot in next week's $7.5 million American Express Championship. "After that, I was just firing at a lot of pins coming in, and that led to some bogeys. But I was trying to win."

Hornets are facing off-court issues

HORNETS, from C-1

Shinn bought out Wooldridge earlier this year.

"The Charlotte/New Orleans/Oklahoma City Hornets have certainly emerged as one of the sports industry's all-time most interesting franchises," said David M. Carter, the principal owner of The Sports Business Group, a Redondo Beach, Calif.-based company that provides marketing and consulting services for the sports industry. "Their inability to gain traction with and within the cities in which they have played, coupled with volatile ownership and unforeseen circumstances, has made it very difficult to establish a committed fan base.

"The only other franchise that comes to mind in terms of seemingly persistent turmoil is the Oakland/Los Angeles/Oakland Raiders. The lawsuits, the multiple relocations, and the non-traditional fan base all contributes to the team's brand ñ sometimes for the better, often for the worse."

In Charlotte, the Hornets led the league in attendance for eight consecutive seasons before the downward spiral began in 1997 when Shinn's trial for sexual assault appeared on Court TV for two consecutive weeks, becoming an irrecoverable public relations disaster for him and the franchise.

When he brought NBA basketball to Charlotte in 1988, the city threw a parade in his honor. During the 2001-02 season, Shinn's reputation in Charlotte became so bad that he rarely made public appearances, skipping nearly all of the Hornetsë games that were played at Charlotte Coliseum.

"I know he went through a lot in Charlotte," said Steve Martin, former Hornets vice president of broadcast operations who now does the radio broadcasts for the Charlotte Bobcats. "I mean he was really under assault in Charlotte. It was an interesting transformation because when he brought the franchise to Charlotte a lot of people were mentioning him as a possible candidate for governor, and then it gets to the end and he can't even walk down the street."

The Hornets never got their fan base back in Charlotte, and couldn't work out a deal with city officials to get a downtown arena built that would ensure the franchise of much-needed revenue streams like luxury suites and club seats that Charlotte Coliseum lacked.

During the season before the Hornets relocated to New Orleans, they averaged a league-worst 11,286 per game.

Once they left Charlotte, Shinn and Wooldridge expected immediate success in New Orleans. Initially, they did, as both were welcomed warmly by the New Orleans community. But at the end of the season, they turned off some of their fan base when popular coach Paul Silas was fired after failing to advance the Hornets past the first round of the playoffs against the Philadelphia 76ers after he led the team to 47 victories in the regular season.

Before the start of the 2003-04 season, the Hornets hired Tim Floyd, mainly because of his successful stint as coach at UNO. But most of his players didn't respect his authority or his NBA coaching record, which was 49-190 in 3½ seasons with the Chicago Bulls.

Under Floyd, the Hornets finished 41-41 and were eliminated in a decisive seventh game by the Miami Heat on the road.

The day after the season ended, longtime general manager Bob Bass resigned and Floyd was eventually fired before Scott was hired as the franchise's third coach in three seasons.

Last season, the Hornets finished with the worst record in franchise history at 18-64 and had to dump franchise player Baron Davis at the trading deadline for a backup point guard. Off the court, they experienced a high percentage of turnover in the front office. In May, eight former employees filed a lawsuit alleging that the team had a practice of requiring people to work overtime without getting paid, which is a violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The case remains pending in U.S. Federal District Court.

"As tough as the ups and downs have been for the Hornets, they never had trouble making payroll," said Marc Ganis, president of Sportscorp, a Chicago-based consulted firm. "There have been some professional sports franchises with some serious problems, the Hornets are at least financially solvent."

Shinn has gone full circle, pushing ahead with eagerness and showing little regard for all of his franchise's past problems. He's like he was in 2002 when the Hornets had to achieve benchmarks to get their New Orleans relocation bid approved by the league's Board of Governors.

To help drum up support for his team in Oklahoma City, he's gone to rotary clubs and anywhere else where a crowd is gathered to convert them into Hornets fans.

"I've been through a lot, and I just feel like the bottom line to get through certain things is having faith," Shinn said by telephone last week. "I came to Oklahoma City trying to be positive, knowing I got a big wall to conquer because of these salaries that I've got to pay whether we play or not. I've got employees who are depending on me, so I just can't sit still. I've got to sell what I believe in and that's the Hornets. I'm going to be speaking and preaching and we're going to make the best of it."

Chargers pummel depleted Patriots

Defending champions lose rare home game

By Dave Goldberg
AP sports writer

FOXBORO, MASS. — The New England Patriots couldn't plug the holes left by injuries – not against Drew Brees and San Diego's explosive offense.

The Chargers handed the Patriots their first loss at Gillette Stadium in 22 games Sunday, beating them 41-17 as Brees threw for two touchdowns, LaDainian Tomlinson ran for two and Antonio Gates had six catches for 108 yards.

The loss was the first in Foxboro for the Patriots since Dec. 22, 2002, when they were beaten by the New York Jets. That was the only season in the past four in which they failed to win the Super Bowl.

The last time the Patriots started a season 2-2 was 2003, though they went on to win the title that year anyway.

Though the score was tied at 17 at the half, Brees took advantage of a secondary that was without two of its top three cornerbacks and safety Rodney Harrison, lost for the year with a knee injury. Harrison's absence was clearly felt on one play in the third quarter when backup running back Michael Turner ran right through Harrison's replacement, Guss Scott, on the way to an 18-yard gain.

That drive ended with a 28-yard touchdown pass to Reche Caldwell that gave San Diego (2-2) a 31-17 lead. Brees also threw an 11-yard touchdown pass to Keenan McCardell in the second quarter.

Gates also leaped over Scott to take in a 38-yard pass from Brees at the New England 1 on the first series of the second half. That set up a 1-yard touchdown run by former LSU standout Kevin Faulk, which broke the 17-17 tie.

Tomlinson finished with 134 yards on 25 carries and overall, San Diego rushed for 183 yards against a defense that also is without last year's starting inside linebackers, Tedy Bruschi and Ted Johnson.

That first half included a rarity – a missed field goal attempt by New England's Adam Vinatieri, who was wide right from 37 yards on the Patriots' first possession.

One of the San Diego scores, the pass from Brees to McCardell, came after a drive that covered 101 yards because of penalties against the Chargers. The other came on an 8-yard touchdown run by Tomlinson, extending his NFL record to 16 consecutive games with a rushing touchdown.

New England scored on Corey Dillon's 1-yard run and a 30-yard pass from Tom Brady to Tim Dwight, who was released by San Diego in March. Vinatieri's 24-yard field goal with 21 seconds left in the half tied the score.

The final score came on an interception by Donnie Edwards of a pass by third-string quarterback Matt Cassell that was lateraled to Clinton Hart. Hart ran 40 yards for the touchdown.

Buccaneers turn back Lions to stay unbeaten

Rookie Williams ailing, but Tampa Bay still rolls

By Fred Goodall
AP sports writer

TAMPA, FLA. — Carnell "Cadillac" Williams has been such a big part of Tampa Bay's success that the rest of the Buccaneers offense has gone mostly unnoticed in the team's first 4-0 start since 1997.

With the rookie slowed by a sore hamstring Sunday, Joey Galloway and Michael Pittman took up the slack, and the Bucs' defense stopped a drive deep in its territory to hang on for a 17-13 victory against the Detroit Lions.

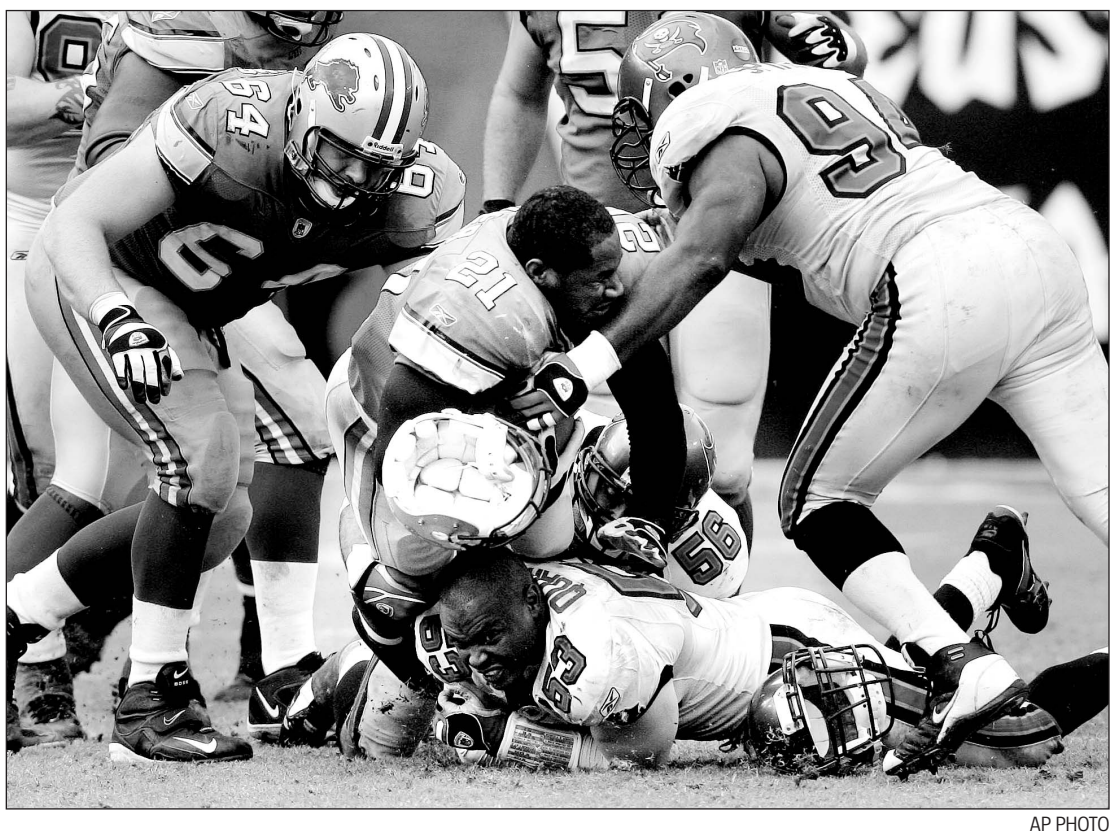
Galloway scored on an 80-yard reception, and Brian Griese threw a 41-yard touchdown pass to Pittman, Williams' backup.

The Lions had trouble moving the ball all day, but Joey Harrington led a drive from Detroit's 7 to the Tampa Bay 11 in the last five minutes.

Harrington found Marcus Pollard in the right corner of the end zone, but the tight end's sliding catch was reversed by instant replay. Harrington found Mike Williams on the opposite side of the end zone on the next play, but the rookie came down out of bounds. Harrington overthrew Charles Rogers on the last play of the game.

Williams, the first player in NFL history to begin his career with three consecutive 100-yard rushing games, was held to 13 yards on 11 carries. He left late in the third quarter and did not return. He also has been slowed by a sprained foot.

But in slowing down the league's leading rusher, the Lions left themselves vulnerable to Galloway and Pittman.



Griese threw for 302 yards and made up for three turnovers that set up all of Detroit's points with his touchdown throws to Pittman and Galloway, who had seven receptions for a career-high 166 yards.

Detroit turned Griese's first-quarter fumble into a 44-yard Jason Hanson field goal, and linebacker Teddy Lehman returned an interception 17 yards to the Bucs' 8. That set up Kevin Jones's 8-yard touchdown run that put the Lions ahead 10-3.

Pittman's touchdown made it 10-10 at the half, and Griese hit Galloway on a slant pattern early in the third quarter to put the Bucs ahead for good. Terrence Holt returned Detroit's third interception of Griese 51 yards to the Tampa Bay 23, setting up a 23-yard field goal that trimmed the Lions' deficit to 17-13 midway through the fourth.

Harrington was 15-of-27 for 137 yards and no interceptions.

Griese finished 22-of-39 and was sacked three times.

Vick injured, but Falcons wallop Vikings

Atlanta quarterback has sprained right knee

By Paul Newberry
AP sports writer

ATLANTA — Michael Vick played about 22 minutes Sunday, more than enough for the Atlanta Falcons to beat the Minnesota Vikings.

Vick left midway through the second quarter after spraining his right knee, and he watched the rest of the game from the sideline as backup Matt Schaub and the Falcons' defense finished off a 30-10 rout of the Vikings (1-3).

Baton Rouge native Warrick Dunn rushed for 126 yards, including his 50th career touchdown on a 37-yard run, to lead a 274-yard rushing performance by the Falcons. Vick ran for 58 yards and threw a touchdown pass before getting hurt.

The Falcons' defense made things miserable for Daunte Culpepper, who was sacked nine times, intercepted twice and lost a fumble.

The Minnesota quarterback has been sacked 16 times the past two weeks and looked especially gun-shy on his fumble. Rod Coleman brushed Culpepper's hip as he drew back to throw, the ball fell out of the quarterback's hand, and Patrick Kerney recovered.

Coleman, Brady Smith and Demorrio Williams had two sacks apiece for the Falcons (3-1), who had their most sacks since a franchise-record 10 against the Saints in 1997.

Vick guided the Falcons to a 14-0 lead on their first two possessions. He threw a 5-yard touchdown pass to Alge Crumpler, setting it up with runs of 23 and 24 yards. Then, Vick directed a 14-play drive capped by T.J. Duckett's 1-yard plunge.

On the first play of Atlanta's next possession, Vick rolled right to throw and was hit hard by Minnesota's Erasmus James after throwing an incomplete pass. James fell on top of the quarterback as they tumbled to the turf. Vick grabbed at his shin and remained down for several minutes. Vick climbed to his feet and walked slowly off the field to a standing ovation. The team said he had a strained medial collateral ligament and wouldn't return.

Schaub took over and led the Falcons to a 24-0 halftime lead. Dunn scored his first touchdown of the season from 37 yards, wriggling into the end zone on his back.

Then Schaub led a hurried drive to the first of three field goals by Todd Peterson. The backup quarterback broke runs of 21 and 23 yards to set up Peterson's 38-yard kick with one second left in the half.

Schaub didn't do much the rest of the way, going 5-of-14 for 39 yards.

Vick's status for next week's game against defending Super Bowl champion New England wasn't known, but the injury didn't appear too serious.

The Atlanta offense, with and without Vick, had its way against the injury-depleted Vikings, who played without Darren Sharper, Kenechi Udeze, Brian Williams and Lance Johnstone.

The Vikings scored with 2 1/2 minutes remaining when Culpepper teamed with Troy Williamson on a 16-yard touchdown pass.

Bengals overcome injuries, Texans to remain unbeaten

Eagles get past Chiefs; Redskins prevail in OT

From wire reports

The Cincinnati Bengals improved to 4-0 for the first time since 1988 – the last they made the Super Bowl – with a 16-10 victory Sunday over the Houston Texans.

"Everybody was going with some type of injury," said the Bengals' Willie Anderson, a Pro Bowl right tackle who threw his back out before the kickoff and hurt his nose during the game. "That's the type of character this team has now."

The Bengals had 14 penalties for 117 yards – one of them wiped out T.J. Houshmandzadeh's touchdown catch – and lost both of their veteran centers to knee injuries in the second quarter. They absorbed the penalties, shuffled the line and gritted it out.

"We had some dumb mistakes," quarterback Carson Palmer said. "We're not always perfect."

Houshmandzadeh caught eight passes for 105 yards, steadying an offense that had to grind it out for the first time this season.

With 3:14 left, Houston quarterback David Carr was hit by Justin Smith while his arm was cocked, and the ball slipped out of his hand as he started throwing. John Thornton fell on the ball, and referee Larry Nemmers upheld the call on review, costing the Texans their final timeout.

"We all thought it was going to be overturned," Texans right tackle Todd Wade said. "That's why we stayed on the field. Apparently, they saw it otherwise."

Graham kicked a field goal from 46 yards for the final points. Six plays later, Carr was sacked at midfield as time ran out.

Palmer went 25-of-34 for 276 yards and a touchdown.

EAGLES 37 at CHIEFS 30: Donovan McNabb completed 33 of 48 passes for 369 yards and three touchdowns as Philadelphia (3-1) held off Kansas City (2-2).

Terrell Owens caught 11 for 170 yards and a touchdown for the Eagles.

Trent Green was 19-of-30 for 221 yards, two touchdowns and two interceptions for the Chiefs, who closed to the final margin with 1:24 left on Green's 15-yard touchdown pass to Dante Hall.

REDSKINS 20 vs. SEAHAWKS 17, OT: Rookie Nick Novak kicked a 39-yard field goal 5:31 into overtime to give Washington its first 3-0 start since 1991, the season the Redskins won their last Super Bowl.

The Seahawks (2-2) tied the game on Darrell Jackson's 6-yard catch with 1:23 remaining. They got the ball back on Kelly Herndon's interception on a pass deflected off the fingertips of Clinton Portis, the only turnover of the game. Three plays later, Josh Brown hit an upright from 47 yards.

Novak was playing because of an injury to John Hall. Novak's first NFL attempt Sunday was blocked. He had to kick the winner twice because the Redskins were called for delay of game on the first try.

BRONCOS 20 at JAGUARS 7: Jake Plummer threw two touchdown passes to backup offensive lineman Dwayne Carswell, and Mike Anderson and Tatum Bell combined for 175 yards rushing for Denver.

The Broncos (3-1) won their third straight despite a short week that followed a Monday night victory against Kansas City.

Fred Taylor carried eight times for 14 yards, and the Jaguars (2-2) finished with a franchise-low 12 yards rushing.

RAVENS 13 vs. JETS 3: Jamal Lewis scored on a 1-yard run, Matt Stover kicked two field goals, and Baltimore (1-2) sacked Brooks Bollinger five times.

The Ravens held Curtis Martin to 30 yards on 13 carries and harassed Bollinger for much of the game. Playing in his second NFL game and first as a starter, Bollinger went 14-for-28 for 149 yards in place of injured starter Chad Pennington, out for the season with a torn right rotator cuff. Backup Jay Fiedler also is out with an injury, and the Jets (1-3) made only six first downs and had 90 yards in offense through the first 56 minutes.

Lewis ran for 81 yards on 29 carries, and Anthony Wright was 15-for-21 for 144 yards for the Ravens.

RAIDERS 19 vs. COWBOYS 13: Sebastian Janikowski kicked four field goals to boost Oakland (1-3) past Dallas (2-2).

LaMont Jordan rushed 26 times for 126 yards and a touchdown for the Raiders. Drew Bledsoe was 11-of-26 for 212 yards, a touchdown and an interception for Dallas.

Deuce McAllister rushed for 130 yards on 27 carries, including 83 on 10 carries in the Saints' final two possessions. Offensive lineman Wayne Gandy said of McAllister: 'When we can get late in a game like that, up six, up seven or up eight, and really get to use what he can do, it's a great advantage to have.'

them those spectacular back-to-back losses at New York and Minnesota.

"Coaches try to break the season down into four quarters," safety Dwight Smith said. "We put ourselves into a hole, but we tied it up at the end of the first quarter. Hopefully from here, we can turn the season into 12 games, and at worst come out 8-4.

"We've got 12 games left, three quarters left. And we don't want any more 2-2s."

Sunday's game started out in similar fashion to those previous two losses — the Saints trailed 7-0 after a 10-play, 75-yard touchdown drive on the Bills' opening possession.

Saints defensive coordinator Rick Venturi admitted he was upset but not exactly worried, because he sensed the energy and the attitude were there, and the early mistakes were correctable ones.

"I didn't feel like it was last week, when we were kind of sleepwalking," Venturi said.

Sure enough, the Bills didn't score another point.

In fact, after that opening drive, Buffalo gained just 133 yards, and finished with 208 total.

Struggling second-year quarterback J.P. Losman, a former Tulane standout, lost his grip on the starting job when he was pulled in favor of Kelly Holcomb in the second half. Combined, the Bills' passing game accounted for just 67 yards, with no touchdowns and one interception.

Once the Saints took a 10-7 lead in the second quarter on quarterback Aaron Brooks' four-yard run, then added to it with three more John Carney field goals, the Saints' defense was able to apply pressure on the Bills.

The Saints did an excellent job of putting the clamps on dangerous Bills tailback Willis McGahee. Saints defensive ends Darren Howard, Charles Grant and Will Smith sacked Losman and Holcomb a combined four times.

"That's what we want to do, put teams in situations like that, so we can have a chance to mess up the quarterback," Grant said. "I think if we can do that, we'll be a great football team. We keep that up, we'll be a top-10, top-five defense."

The biggest defensive play of the game came early in the fourth quarter, when the Bills still trailed only 13-7 and elected to go for it on fourth-and-inches near midfield.

Dwight Smith rushed in and wrapped up McGahee for a two-yard loss.

"Dwight's a playmaker. He's that kind of guy. That's why he's here," Venturi said. "He's really going to make an impact and be a team leader here. I'm so proud of him, because as you know, I desperately wanted him."

The Saints' offense was not exactly explosive. But by leading throughout much of the game, the Saints were also able to stay committed to their running game.

Tailback Deuce McAllister carried the ball 27 times for 130 yards — 83 coming on two fourth-quarter drives that sealed the game.

The Saints finished with a 12-minute advantage in time of possession.

"We have one of the top three or four guys in the league, in my opinion," Saints left tackle Wayne Gandy said of McAllister. "And when we can get late in a game like that, up six, up seven or up eight, and really get to use what he can do, it's a great advantage to have."

The momentum was in the Saints' favor all afternoon in the first semblance of a home game they have had all season.

A crowd of 58,688 was in the Alamodome stands. The game was more than 6,000 tickets shy of a sellout, but those that did show up were vocal and enthusiastic, raising the decibel level significantly in pivotal moments for the Bills' offense.

Gandy said the game was "100 times better than what we've been doing." And Grant gave the fans from San Antonio, Louisiana and scattered points in between an "A-plus, A-plus, A-plus."

"It was great. The atmosphere was wonderful, man," Grant said. "I hope we have it like that in every home game we play here."

Saints rise to occasion in new surroundings

FINNEY, from C-1

His next kick was to McGee, and there McGee went, sideline to sideline, ever forward, looking for the end zone.

"I kept backpedaling," Thomas said. "And he kept on coming. I don't know how many blockers he had in front of him. It looked like he was inside an egg shell."

Well, finally, by the time McGee reached the Saints' 10, Thomas was blocked and, as he hit the ground, "I reached up and pulled him down with my right hand."

If McGee hadn't run so far, maybe more than 100 yards, Thomas figured, "he'd run right through my hand."

It was a hand that deprived the Bills of a 14-13 halftime lead, representing a huge change in momentum.

Smith stepped up early in the fourth quarter, with the Saints still holding a six-point lead, with the Bills on the move, facing fourth-and-inches at the Saints' 48.

Not surprisingly, they went for the 10 inches, figuring Willis McGahee was good as gold in that spot.

"The coaches made the call and I'm blitzing," Smith said. "It was like basketball. The coach calls a back screen and you're supposed to make a layup. I came on a blitz and I made the tackle. If I don't, it's like missing a layup."

Smith's "layup" was a matter of knifing in and nailing McGahee in his tracks.

How big a play? "Biggest of the game," Haslett said.

There were more, of course.

There was Aaron Brooks running the ball, three times for first downs, once four yards for a touchdown. With injured Joe Horn missing only his second Saints game in five years, there was also Brooks finding Donte' Stallworth eight times for 129 yards, three times on 20-plus-yard strikes, enough to keep the chains moving, setting up one touchdown and three field goals.

After playing closer to home than they've played all season, the Saints will go north next week to face a Green Bay team that has gotten off to a stumbling, fumbling start.

Neither the weather, nor the crowd, will be as warm as it was Sunday.

Haslett called Sunday's crowd, a "mixture of New Orleans and San Antonio people," refreshing.

In the NFL, it's always "refreshing" to win.

Listen to Dwight Smith.

"I look at this as the end of the first quarter of a four-quarter season," he said. "We're 2-2. We'd like to be 8-4 after the third quarter. And then? We'll see."

SAN ANTONIO — As a winded Buffalo Bills kick returner Terrence McGee stumbled toward the end zone Sunday, only Saints cornerback Fred Thomas stood between him and an improbable touchdown.

"They had three players out there in front of him, and I was just backing up trying to bide time until my teammates could catch up," Thomas said. "Out of the corner of my eye I saw that I was on the 10, so I knew I had to make a move.

"The (blocker) I cut down fell on top of me, so I just took a shot. Luckily I grabbed (McGee's) foot and pulled him down. He tried to jump over us and I grabbed his foot. He'd probably already run about 200 yards. If he had been fresh, my hand probably wouldn't have bothered him. When I say I barely got his foot, I barely got his foot."

Thomas' touchdown-saving tackle preserved a 13-7 lead at halftime, and the Saints went on to snap a two-game losing streak with a 19-7 victory in the first NFL regular-season game at the Alamodome.

In a game of few highlights, Thomas' gem proved to be the biggest play of the game, according to teammates.

"That would have been absolutely deflating for us if they would have actually scored on that play," Saints cornerback Mike McKenzie said. "That was a tremendous play for us."

"That was real big," Saints center LeCharles Bentley said. "Fred was fighting and being tenacious. Those are the types of plays we need to be making all year. You can say woulda, coulda, shoulda all you want, but the most important thing is we made the play."

"My gosh, it was huge," Saints tight end Ernie Conwell said. "Does it get any bigger than that? You can speculate on what it might have done for them. If they end up scoring and go into the second half with the lead, they've got all kinds of momentum.

"But thanks to Freddy they didn't score, so how disheartening was that? Everybody is on their sideline jumping up and down celebrating because they thought they had a touchdown, and then all of sudden they go, 'No-ooo!' That's why it took everybody so long to get off the field, because everybody was in such disbelief. They thought he had to score; he couldn't be down."

McGee caught John Carney's squib kick on a dead run at the Bills' 15 and headed toward the Saints' sideline. It appeared that the Saints' coverage team had McGee penned around midfield, but he slid past a few tacklers and stayed on his feet.

He cut across the field and picked up additional blockers, and had only Thomas to beat.

"I was trying to make something happen," McGee said. "It could have been the points we needed. We needed a touchdown and a big play. I just came up short and didn't get it in the end zone."

"You can't put in the paper what I was thinking," Thomas said. "It was just luck, because there were so many Bills out there. It wasn't exciting for me. It was scary."

Stallworth rebounds from slow start, catches eight passes

SAN ANTONIO — With the Saints' four-time Pro Bowl wide receiver Joe Horn sitting out Sunday's game with an injured hamstring, Donte' Stallworth knew he had to step up and meet the challenge.

And he did, catching a game-high eight passes for 129 yards in the Saints' 19-7 victory against the Buffalo Bills at the Alamodome.

"I started off slow," Stallworth said. "I should have got a first down on that little slant route in the first quarter but I didn't realize I was that close to the sticks. And then I dropped a comeback on our sideline. I'm just glad Shep (offensive coordinator Mike Sheppard) and Haz (Coach Jim Haslett) kept coming to me.

"They had faith in me and what I can do. I just wanted to show everybody what I can do. This is my fourth year and I still haven't proven my worth. I'm just trying to keep getting better and better. As long as Joe's (Horn) out, I'm going to have to continue playing better and better every game."

Although Saints officials didn't officially scratch Horn from the lineup until Sunday morning, Haslett said he knew earlier in the week that Horn wouldn't play.

"Donte' had a little bit of a rough start but after that, he made play after play after play," Saints wide receivers coach Jimmy Robinson said. "It just so happened that Donte' got the lion's share of the opportunities and he stepped up."

Saints left tackle Wayne Gandy applauded the crowd of 58,688 at the Alamodome with helping keep Stallworth's head in the game.

"If we're on the road and Donte' drops a couple of balls he might go in the tank," Gandy said. "He dropped a couple balls, then made a few good catches and the fans responded and then he was back up. That's the advantage of being home."

LOSMAN YANKED: Bills coach Mike Mularkey went to replaced starting quarterback J.P. Losman with backup Kelly Holcomb in the fourth quarter. After leading his team to a touchdown on its first possession, Losman struggled. He completed seven of 15 passes for 75 yards and one interception. "No, I'm not happy," Losman said. "You're never happy when you get pulled. Obviously, you take it personal, but it's tough." Mularkey said Losman would remain his starter for the time being. "I think everyone understands that," Mularkey said. "I was just trying to get a change of pace."

PERSONNEL UPDATE: Horn was among the Saints' seven inactives Sunday, only the second regular-season game he has missed since joining the team in 2000. Montrae Holland started at right guard for Jermane Mayberry (shoulder), wide receiver Devery Henderson made his first NFL start in place of Horn (hamstring), Jason Craft started at right cornerback for Fakhir Brown (knee) and rookie free safety Josh Bullocks replaced Jay Bellamy, who will undergo season-ending shoulder surgery this week.

HALFTIME SKIRMISH: Saints safety Dwight Smith called Bills wide receiver Eric Moulds a "coward" for spitting on one of the Saints players as the teams walked to their dressing rooms at halftime. Moulds' actions led to a brief skirmish. "One of your brothers gets spat on, we're going to react," Smith said. "I just believe it was a cowardly act."

SAINTS' REPORT CARD

OFFENSE

Nothing spectacular: Only 211 yards through three quarters and 333 for the game. But when you cut down on the penalties and turnovers on offense, good things happen. The Saints would take an efficient performance like this any Sunday. They had to be stubborn with their running game before the offensive line and Deuce McAllister finally wore down the Bills' defense in the fourth quarter. McAllister carried 10 times for 83 yards on the final two drives. Quarterback Aaron Brooks was stable, making some big third-down throws when he had to and never turning over the ball. Brooks was a weapon running the ball with seven carries for 33 yards. Receiver Donte' Stallworth stepped up big in the absence of injured Joe Horn, catching eight passes for 129 yards after a bad drop in the first quarter.

DEFENSE

The Bills' first offensive play was scary — a 25-yard run by tailback Willis McGahee — and Buffalo took a 7-0 lead on its opening drive. But the Saints went into shut-down mode after that. They put the clamps on McGahee, put the pressure on quarterbacks J.P. Losman and Kelly Holcomb with four sacks, and they made a game-changing play with Jason Craft's interception in the second quarter. It was the first takeaway by the Saints' defense since Week 1, and it led to a Saints' touchdown. Craft returned the interception 39 yards to the Buffalo 23-yard line.

GRADE: A

SPECIAL TEAMS

The coverage units were shaky, allowing an 82-yard kickoff return and a 44-yarder. Cornerback Fred Thomas saved a touchdown on that 82-yard return at the end of the first half, making a last-ditch tackle after a half-dozen tackle attempts had been missed. Punter Mitch Berger had his usual efficient day, and place-kicker John Carney made four out of his five field-goal attempts. But the most important factor of all — the Saints did not fumble any kickoff returns for the first time in three weeks.

GRADE: C

COACHING

The biggest credit to the coaching staff goes to its patience on offense. Even though the Saints seemed to be in control the entire day, they were stuck on a 13-7 lead into the fourth quarter. But instead of forcing the issue and turning over the ball, the Saints stuck with the running game, which paid big dividends on the final two drives. The defense adjusted well after allowing the opening touchdown, and McGahee — the Bills' biggest threat — was held in check.

Mannings each throw 4 TD passes

Younger QB has nine in four games

From wire reports

Eli Manning is giving his big brother a challenge for family bragging rights.

Eli, the New York Giants' second-year quarterback, had his second straight outstanding performance Sunday, throwing for 296 yards and a career-high four touchdowns in a 44-24 win over the visiting St. Louis Rams.

That matched the day of older brother Peyton, who threw for four touchdowns in Indianapolis' 31-10 win over Tennessee. Through the first four games of the season, the younger Manning has a 9-6 lead in touchdown passes over his brother, who has been to the Pro Bowl five times in eight seasons and is a two-time league MVP. Both Mannings are alumni of Newman School.

Peyton Manning threw two TD passes Sunday to Marvin Harrison, the last of which tied the NFL record for most TDs between a quarterback and receiver.

Harrison caught nine passes for 109 yards, and Edgerrin James also ran for 90 yards in helping the Colts improve to 4-0 with their highest point total this season.

"Last week people were kind of making a big deal," Manning said of scoring 47 points in the Colts' first three games. "I overthrew it a couple times. The real mind-set is to finish drives into the end zone, and we did that today. And that really was the difference."

Manning tied Ron Jaworski with his 116th consecutive start, which ranks second among quarterbacks behind Green Bay's Brett Favre. He and Harrison tied Steve Young and Jerry Rice for most touchdowns between a quarterback and receiver with 85 career TDs on a 24-yard pass with 13:09 left in the game.

Manning was 4-of-4 for 64 yards on the opening possession and capped the drive with a 25-yard pass to Ehret alumnus Reggie Wayne.

Steve McNair was 28-of-37 for 220 yards for the Titans (1-3).

Eli Manning was 19-for-35 and threw two TD passes to Plaxico Burress ñ who had a career-high 10 catches ñ and one each to Amani Toomer and Jeremy Shockey. Manning passed for 352 yards last week in a 41-23 loss against the San Diego Chargers.

Marc Bulger finished 40-of-62 for 442 yards and two touchdowns for the Rams (2-2).

On the Giants' opening drive, Eli Manning connected with Burress on a 31-yard slant pattern. The 6-foot-5 wide receiver leaped high to catch the ball, then ran untouched into the end zone.

Manning found Burress again in the second quarter with a 17-yard touchdown pass, and also threw a 1-yard scoring pass to Toomer on a fade pattern.

With the Rams trailing 27-27, running back Steven botched a third-down handoff to Shaun McDonald on a reverse at the Giants' 6-yard line, and Fred Robbins recovered for New York.

Manning drove New York to the St. Louis 31 and feathered a pass just out of the reach of Rams safety Adam Archuleta and into the hands of Shockey. Shockey tumbled into the end zone to push the Giants' lead back to 17.

SAINTS' NEXT FOE: SUNDAY AT GREEN BAY

Panthers like new kid on the block

Struggling Packers' offense missing guard Wahle

By Arnie Stapleton
AP Sports Writer

The Green Bay Packers had no idea they'd miss Mike Wahle, a guard of all things, so badly.

Wahle's departure to Carolina as a free agent appears a major reason the Packers are not the fine-tuned offensive engine they've been in recent years. Tonight, the Packers will see Wahle opening holes for the Panthers' runners instead of theirs.

Wahle accepted an $11.5 million bonus to join the Panthers via free agency after spending seven seasons protecting Packers quarterback Brett Favre and opening running lanes for Green Bay's efficient ground game.

Without Wahle and fellow guard Marco Rivera, who signed with Dallas, the Packers' high-octane offense is running on fumes.

Favre, who lost top target Javon Walker to a season-ending knee injury in the opener and Pro Bowl tight end Bubba Franks with a knee injury in the second game of the season, has thrown seven interceptions, a byproduct of playing with the lead for just six of 180 minutes so far.

And Ahman Green, who has been to the Pro Bowl the past four seasons, has rushed for 58, 54 and 58 yards and has yet to score a touchdown.

For the past several seasons, Wahle was used extensively as a pulling guard to spring Green through gaping holes and to set up Favre's resourceful rollouts.

"Personally, I miss him," Packers center Mike Flanagan said. "He's a good guy. Anytime you have a friend go somewhere else, that's hard. You want the best people around you that you can have. Professionally, he's one of the best in the business. So, we miss him there, too. But this is a business."

The Packers averaged 4.3 yards per carry and 119 yards per game last year and five yards per carry and 160 yards per game in 2003. This year, they're averaging 3.3 yards a carry and 79 per game, and the team's longest run is a 20-yard scramble by Favre.

Trouble is, the Packers' offense has been predicated on the run for some time.

"It's no secret really what we do," Favre said. "The majority of our passing game I think is also the run game: play-action, keep passes, movement passes, things like that. Very rarely do we just drop straight back and throw (like) the old West Coast offense. It starts with the run game."

And the Packers sorely miss Wahle's play in that area.

"We miss his experience, size and tenacity," Green said. "You can't replace Mike Wahle; just do the best you can do with whoever it is that comes in to replace him."

The Packers plugged in oft-injured Adrian Klemm at left guard and rookie Will Whitticker at right guard, but they didn't settle on their starters until the waning days of training camp, robbing Flanagan and tackles Chad Clifton and Mark Tauscher of time to build chemistry along the line.

Their lost senior year

Friendships are fractured. College plans are complicated. Athletic seasons are totally screwed up. Ask any member of the CLASS OF 2006 about Hurricane Katrina, and here's what they'll tell you: It blows.

By Barri Bronston

It wasn't supposed to be this way, feeling like freshmen in their senior year.

It wasn't supposed to be a year of awkwardness, misery and homesickness. That was supposed to be NEXT year — their first year at college.

The fourth year of high school was supposed to be the coolest, most memorable year of their lives, a time to be with childhood friends one last time before heading off in different directions, a chance to be the Big Kids on Campus before starting over at the bottom of the heap.

But the storm that changed everything rewrote the yearbook for this, the Class of 2006, derailing best-laid academic and athletic plans, unraveling tight-knit circles of friends, scattering classmates to new schools and satellite campuses across the state and the country and, in some cases, erasing senior years altogether by sending gifted students into early college admissions programs.

With any luck, some may be back in their old schools by January, maybe sooner. But for now, they're just trying to make the best of a defining moment — and utterly destructive milestone — in their lives.

Heidi Heumann had looked forward to her senior year at Metairie Park Country Day since she was in kindergarten. As a senior, she looked forward to being assigned a kindergarten buddy, taking part in special cheers at the football games and donning an elegant white dress for the school's graduation ceremony in the front circle.

But after Katrina struck, she and her family evacuated to Oxford, Miss., where her brother attends Old Miss. She was able to sign up for a dual enrollment program that allows high school seniors to earn high school and college credit from Ole Miss. Her counselor and principal at Country Day gave her their blessing.

"My first reaction to not being able to have a senior year was just complete sadness," she said. "Senior year is the year everyone waits for and looks forward to. I have a very close group of friends and we were expecting to have

When Besim Imsirovic left New Orleans early on the Saturday morning before Katrina, he left in style: in a caravan of 10 White Fleet taxis.

"It was fun, really fun," he says. "We drove 10 in a row. We all have radios in our cabs, so we called each other. We can make group calls with our radios so we talk to each other. We are laughing. Like a three-day vacation."

And then the fun stopped.

After a few days in Memphis, glued to CNN and shaken by the ruinous turn of events, the group of 10 cabbies, all of them former Bosnians, dispersed. Some went to Baltimore, some to Pittsburgh, some to Atlanta. One went back to Bosnia. Imsirovic went to St. Louis.

"I don't know why I came to St. Louis," he says. "Everybody went somewhere. We heard things about Bosnian community in St. Louis. So I thought, OK, St. Louis."

Imsirovic sits in the oppressively plain lobby of a Days' Inn motel near the St. Louis airport, where scores of hurricane evacuees have gathered. He is thin and limber at 36, with a look of grief on his face and harrowed eyes that are soft and deep and dark and sometimes teary. Born and bred in Sarajevo, he left shortly after the war there and came to New Orleans nine years ago.

After several weeks in St. Louis, Imsirovic has discovered something about himself: Today he is more a New Orleanian than he is a Bosnian.

"I have not been in touch with the Bosnian community as much as I thought I would be," he says, struggling to tame his unruly accent. "I think because they are not from New Orleans. All I can think about now is New Orleans. I want to be with people from New Orleans. It's easier to understand each other."

'All I can think about now is New Orleans,' says displaced cabbie Besim Imsirovic.

Imsirovic is surprised somewhat by the depth of his feelings for his adopted hometown.

"I went to a few Bosnian restaurants, had a few meals and that's about it.

"They couldn't understand my feelings about this city. You know, there is no place on earth like New Orleans. It's hard to describe, even in my language. There's some feeling you have in New Orleans that you don't have anywhere else. You feel free in New Orleans. If you spend some time there, you will never leave."

He misses the landmarks of the city, he says, the comforts of his Metairie condo, the traditions of his daily life.

"A few days ago a therapist came

On the first of 10 straight days he spent covering Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath, CBS's John Roberts was struck by how alone the city seemed.

"The first thing that sticks in my mind — and I've been covering hurricanes since 1989 — was how the emergency response fell so completely flat," he said. "It was stunning to me, the huge breakdown I saw."

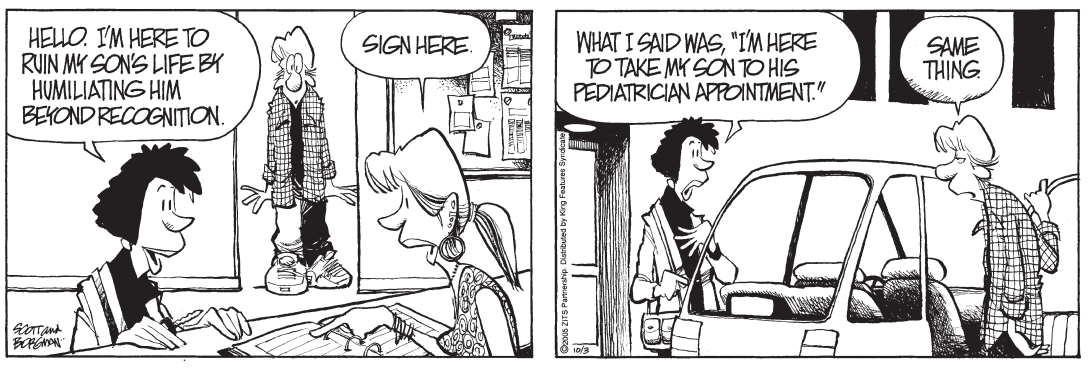
Interviewed by phone after he'd rotated out of New Orleans, Roberts said he'd taken several indelible memories with him.

Many were recorded on or near Interstate 10, a bridge over troubled water, indeed.

Early on, he and his crew slept in their vehicles on I-10.

"It wasn't like sleeping in a hole in the dirt, as we were doing during the (Iraq) war," he said. "At least in the desert it got cool at night.

"Any hardships we suffered paled in comparison to the poor people whose lives were completely destroyed by the hurricane."



Past reporting trips to Somalia, he said, produce the only comparable images.

"Every time we drove up and down I-10 . . . we kept saying to each
