He said as many as 7,000 new students are enrolled in the East Baton Rouge public school system, more than 460 have enrolled in the smaller Baker school district in suburban Baton Rouge and the schools in Zachary in the rural part of East Baton Rouge Parish have 205 more students.

One big problem is that Baton Rouge was left unprepared and out of the planning loop to care for the evacuees, Holden said.

"The state's shelter plan was not followed and created problems for Baton Rouge," he said. The plan, he said, calls for the state to send evacuees to northern and central Louisiana shelters first, but Baton Rouge was hit with 15,000 evacuees as the New Orleans area emptied.

"There should be clear lines of authority of who is in charge," Holden said. "Many stranded New Orleans citizens called the East Baton Rouge Emergency Operations Center for rescue from rooftops and . . . from dying victims" because telephone lines and cellular towers were down or jammed in the New Orleans area, he said.

He said a task force from East Baton Rouge rescued about 1,000 storm victims. Staying at the Baton Rouge emergency preparedness office, he said "one could hear the voices of desperation of people from Chalmette calling for help because they could not get through to local officials."

Holden said the Federal Emergency Management Agency designated Baton Rouge as a staging area without making provisions for added staffing or financial aid.

"There must be better communications among all levels of government," he said. "We still do not have a designated FEMA contact.

"We need better preplanning between the state and local governments. We have some problems we have to address. We can't wait for another storm to occur. The system is out of control."

Hurricanes take bite out of pecan crop

By The Associated Press

MONROE — Cooks looking for pecans this holiday season might come up short thanks to hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

After Rita whipped through the region, Ricky Pierce of Double P Farm in Monroe walked outside and looked at the thousands of pecans resting uselessly on the ground.

"It's very frustrating because you have no control over it," Pierce said.

Pierce's pecan orchard represents 65 acres of the state's 26,000 acres of pecan orchards damaged by the storms. Damage estimates ranged from 5 percent to 90 percent of the crop lost for the year with an average of about 40 percent lost in northeastern Louisiana alone, said LSU AgCenter horticulturist Charles Graham of the Pecan Research Station in Shreveport. That equates to a statewide loss of more than 53 percent of all pecans, or 4.77 million pounds, at a value between $4.8 million and $6.2 million, Graham said.

Pierce estimates he lost about 60 percent of his crop.

"I didn't make nothing last year — didn't even break even," Pierce said. "With the hurricanes the following year, that just makes me that much more in the hole."

Even "hobby crops" suffered in Monroe.

The Baptist Children's Home lost about 25 percent of the pecans on its 1,400 trees, maintenance director Dale Stone said.

Although only a few trees at each orchard in the region were lost, many were damaged and might take up to two years to recuperate. That could make for below-average crop production in the next couple years as well, although many southern and central Louisiana orchards fared far worse, said Louisiana Pecan Growers Association President Bob Williams of Williams Pecans in Newellton.

La.'s Medicaid faces more need, less money

Hurricanes mangle budget, tax base

By Melinda Deslatte
Associated Press writer

BATON ROUGE — Louisiana may add as many as 60,000 more people to its Medicaid rolls during the next six months because of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, but the health care program for the poor appears headed for the chopping block even without the new enrollees.

The hurricanes have wreaked havoc on the state's budget, cutting out a large segment of Louisiana's tax base as businesses have shuttered and evacuees have scattered. The hole in this year's $18.7 billion budget is estimated to start at $1 billion and grow from there.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco's administration, which will have a heavy hand in determining budget cuts to deal with any state shortfalls, hasn't indicated how much of a hit the Medicaid program would be expected to take.

But if the state Department of Health and Hospitals gets cuts proportionate to those it has historically received during budget slashing, about $250 million in state dollars would be cut from the Medicaid program, according to Fred Cerise, secretary of the health department. Another $580 million in federal matching cash would then be lost, he said.

The Medicaid budget would have to be cut as much as 40 percent to deal with that loss in revenue, combined with other projected losses in the program and considering the lateness of the fiscal year that began July 1, Cerise told lawmakers Monday.

"We just don't have the ability to absorb this," he said.

Medicaid provides health care coverage for low-income people, primarily children, their parents, pregnant women, the disabled and the poor in need of long-term care. States put up a share of the costs of the program, and the federal government provides matching dollars. More than 990,000 people were enrolled in Louisiana's Medicaid program before the hurricanes.

To add to the state's financial problems, Louisiana is supposed to pick up the state costs of care for its evacuees who relied on Medicaid programs in other states where they fled the storms. And Louisiana can't control who gets Medicaid services in the other states and won't be able to cut those services.

The health department is turning to Washington for help, and Cerise said federal health officials acknowledge Louisiana has a problem. The solution that the health department is seeking, however, requires congressional intervention.

A bill stalled in the U.S. Senate would provide for federal payment of the state's portion of Medicaid costs for evacuees in other states, would require the federal government to pick up the total tab of any new Medicaid patients added in Louisiana and would give the state some money to help pay for currently enrolled Medicaid recipients in areas hit by the hurricanes.

The cost of the legislation, which includes other measures, is estimated at $9 billion. The White House is fighting the bill, saying it is unnecessary because other health care money is available for storm victims.

While state officials wait to see if Louisiana will get any federal relief, they have reduced some spending — including halving the upfront annual payment to small, rural hospitals that provide care to the uninsured.

For the past two or three years, the health department has paid the rural hospitals for an entire year of that expected care in October, only a few months into the fiscal year, according to Charles Castille, undersecretary of the department.

Cerise, citing the uncertainty of the budget, said that this time, the rural hospitals are getting only 50 percent in October. He said he hopes to pay the remaining half to the hospitals at some point in this fiscal year.

Admiral proposes military disaster unit

Troops would aid National Guard

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A senior U.S. commander is proposing that the military create an active-duty force specifically trained and equipped to help the National Guard respond to major natural disasters like hurricanes.

The proposal by Adm. Timothy Keating, commander of U.S. Northern Command, has not yet been presented to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, according to Rumsfeld's chief spokesman, Lawrence Di Rita.

"It's one of the ideas that's out there," Di Rita said.

Keating's proposal was first reported Tuesday by The New York Times, which said that command of such a response mission would remain with the National Guard, which answers to state governors.

President Bush has said he wants Congress to consider whether to enact laws that would authorize the active-duty military to take a bigger role — possibly the lead role, in some cases — in responding to disasters that are so severe that state and local authorities are overwhelmed and unable to provide sufficient rescue and relief.

"What Admiral Keating rightly wants to do" is consider whether, in light of the lessons learned from hurricanes Katrina and Rita, there may be a "different way to organize to have some component that was dedicated to this mission," Di Rita said.

The main Army response to Katrina was to send about 3,500 soldiers from the 82nd Airborne Division at Fort Bragg, N.C., along with soldiers from the 1st Cavalry Division at Fort Hood, Texas.

About 2,000 Marines also were sent.

The Navy sent several ships and the Air Force provided transport planes and helicopters.

State is scrambling for federal loans

But officials fear hard-hit parishes won't get relief

By Laura Maggi and Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — The state has begun the process of applying for recently approved federal loans to keep local governments running, but some state officials Tuesday said they have concerns about how effective the program will be for parishes that are struggling to stay afloat after Hurricane Katrina.

Federal Emergency Management Agency accountants have been given information about St. Bernard Parish government's finances and have begun figuring out how much it will be eligible for, said Col. Jeff Smith, the deputy director of the state Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness. But Smith was skeptical about how quickly money will be available and how many strings will be attached.

"We strongly object to the way this was done," Smith said. "But we are working through it."

Jerry Luke LeBlanc, Gov. Kathleen Blanco's commissioner of administration, said the administration will try to make the program work but is seeking other ways to find the money for local governments. He said that according to FEMA rules, the loans will take about 20 to 25 days to distribute, meaning that Congress will be back in session before local governments get the money.

Repayment problems

The $750 million loan program was approved by Congress and signed by President Bush last Friday after disagreement within the Louisiana delegation about provisions that will require the local municipalities to repay any loan money they receive, a change from similar loan programs from earlier disasters. Blanco criticized this provision, calling the legislation's passage "bittersweet" because of the repayment requirement.

Instead of the loan program, Blanco had asked President Bush to waive certain requirements of the federal disaster regulations in order to let FEMA help local governments with day-to-day payroll shortfalls. Under current rules, the emergency agency can cover only overtime pay for government employees.

U.S. Sen. David Vitter, R-La., pushed the bill through the process and concluded that Republican conservatives would block passage unless language was included to bar forgiveness of the debts.

For state officials who have just begun looking at the program, some of the issues will be resolved when FEMA finishes developing regulations for the loans and lays out its specific requirements. A FEMA spokeswoman Tuesday said the agency is "working around the clock" on the rules and hopes to have them finished "as soon as possible."

Collateral or co-signing

State Legislative Auditor Steve Theriot said parishes that seek the loans will either need to pledge collateral — such as local assets — or get the state to co-sign on the loan. For a parish that has been wiped out, such as St. Bernard, there won't be any assets to pledge, he said.

This idea of co-signing loans has some state officials worried. "So the state is going to have to step in, but are we stepping in to back a financial transaction that may not work?" LeBlanc said. "That's a serious issue."

LeBlanc said that, according to FEMA, local authorities who get the loans will immediately have to start making payments to a so-called "sinking fund," which is cash to help secure the loan. The rule makes the loan almost pointless, he said.

"If the whole point is to access cash, for the local governments that have no cash and have no tax base, you're borrowing the money just to place it into a sinking fund," LeBlanc said.

Vitter said he has asked that the regulations not include any collateral requirements, but that he doesn't see a problem with the state co-signing for the loans.

"I just think the state is going to have to be involved in that helpful way," Vitter said. "I just want to express my deep frustration about folks in Baton Rouge who apparently are completely focused on why this can't work instead of figuring out how to make it work so we can get these communities through these very crucial next several months."

'Only plan on the table'

State Treasurer John Kennedy said he thinks the Blanco administration should try to work with Washington to get money for local governments as soon as possible.

"My general view of the proposal is that it is not perfect, but it is the only plan on the table," said Kennedy, who is the head of the Louisiana Bond Commission, which would need to approve any loans to local governments. "I think we ought to try to make this work."

Theriot said governments will be able to borrow only up to 25 percent of their general fund revenue. "Some of these locals are going to have a shortfall for a number of years. This is only a one-time fix," Theriot said.

Vitter said he thinks the program will be enough to keep pared-down local governments operating for the next couple months. He said he thinks he eventually can get Congress to agree to forgive the loans, but that lawmakers need to see that the state government is helping to tackle these important problems.

The city of New Orleans plans to use the loan money for municipal operations, said Sally Forman, a spokeswoman for Mayor Ray Nagin, who recently announced he is laying off half of the city's 6,000-person work force.

"At this point we're taking what we can get," Forman said.

Forman said city officials are examining the regulations tied to the loans and that she was unaware of whether any problems in getting the loans had been encountered.

Sheriffs' group concerned

Hal Turner, executive director of the Louisiana Sheriffs' Association, said his group has concerns about whether local sheriff departments would be eligible for the loans. Unlike sheriffs in most other states, sheriffs in Louisiana operate as government entities separate from parish authorities.

Whenever an issue arises over federal financing for local governments, sheriffs in Louisiana have no assurance that they will get some of the financing unless the parishes are willing to share or the legislation allows money to go directly to the sheriffs, Turner said.

For the new loan program, members of Congress have offered different opinions to the sheriff association, and so the association has asked its attorneys and the federal Homeland Security Department to try to get a clear answer.

Katrina is latest blow to struggling Mississippi town

Founded by ex-slaves, village is tight-knit

By Elizabeth Mehren
Los Angeles Times

GULFPORT, MISS. — The Reconstruction-era neighborhood of Turkey Creek already was in danger of disappearing when Hurricane Katrina came to call.

A Wal-Mart and an enormous car dealership had moved close by, taking over land that once held deep woods. A low-income apartment complex popped up, and part of Turkey Creek's old burial ground was paved for a parking lot. The community's lush wetlands were fast filling up — and the nearby airport was looking to expand, which potentially would eat up still more of Turkey Creek's open space.

"It was like an apple that had been eaten," said Derrick Evans, a seventh-generation descendant of the community's founding family. "All that was left was the core. But at least we still had the seeds."

Like the rest of coastal Mississippi, Turkey Creek was reeling four weeks after Katrina. But residents of this venerable settlement also were looking forward — reasoning that the hurricane might bring recognition to one of southern Mississippi's few historic areas to survive the storm.

"Katrina has focused interest and attention on a part of the country that nobody really knows about," Evans, 38, said. "The Mississippi Gulf Coast is a heretofore unobserved, unappreciated treasure. And Turkey Creek is one of the most interesting cultural enclaves you will find here."

SPENCER WEINER/LOS ANGELES TIMES

Derrick Evans, a descendant of the founding family, leans on a placard that Hurricane Katrina tossed off the posts in front of a destroyed home.

Small paradise

The community took root in 1866, when a newly emancipated black man named Samuel Evans encountered a small paradise about eight miles from the Gulf of Mexico. There was a roaring creek with a canopy of trees that made it feel like the Amazon. There were alligators, large squirrels and an abundance of wild turkeys.

Evans bought 80 acres, and soon his friend Jefferson White bought 80 more. The Evans and White homesteads formed the foundation for a community that prospered while segregation kept it separate from surrounding Gulfport.

Turkey Creek had stores and industry. For generations, most of the men made charcoal or worked in a lumber treatment plant that manufactured railroad ties and telephone poles. The village had its own post office and church, and the first black school on the Gulf Coast.

At its peak, about 1,000 people lived in Turkey Creek. Many bungalows were built in the early 20th century and passed down for generations.

Nearly all of the one-story, wood-frame homes were flooded by Katrina, and about half were badly damaged.

Of the 70 homes and about 300 people in Turkey Creek, just a few of the families are white. Nearly everyone in the neighborhood is related.

"We have always been a living community, since 1866," said Martha Snelling, 56, a descendant of Jefferson White. "We have the same families living here who have been here since the beginning."

Snelling worked with the University of Southern Mississippi to develop an oral history of Turkey Creek. The tapes were destroyed when Katrina flooded the university building where they were stored, Snelling said.

Ignored by big city

Gulfport largely ignored the small black settlement nestled within its 70 square miles. The neighborhood had to provide its own drinking water. The city — present population 72,000 — did not pave Turkey Creek's roads or put curbs on its sidewalks.

Starting about 15 years ago, Derrick Evans said, the city began to target the area around Turkey Creek for development.

Two years ago, Evans returned to Turkey Creek from Boston, where he had been teaching civil rights history at Boston College. He formed Turkey Creek Community Initiatives, a nonprofit group that wants to protect the neighborhood by turning it into an urban greenway.

In 2001, the Mississippi Heritage Trust named the neighborhood one of the state's 10 most endangered historic places. The next year, an early Turkey Creek homes joined the National Register of Historic Places.

Neither designation is enough to stop development, said Trisha Miller, a staff attorney with the Washington, D.C.-based Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, which is advising Turkey Creek as it seeks historical status.

Storm damage to many Turkey Creek homes is so extensive that, "The city might not say they are up to code, but they could be preserved as historic," she said.

Representatives from the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the National Trust for Historic Preservation recently visited Turkey Creek to assess the damage.

"We're on the case," said National Trust President Richard Moe. "It was enormously important in the first place to preserve a community like this, but I think it is even more important given the tremendous losses in this region due to Katrina."

Important news about COX service

We appreciate your patience as we continue repairing the cable system to get service back up to all serviceable homes in the area.

No other cable system has ever been exposed to such severe conditions. While we have made significant progress in reconnecting thousands of homes and businesses, your location may still not have service.

Here are some reasons why you may not have service even though the network in your area is restored:

- A utility pole or line is down
- The cable is down between the pole or pedestal and your premises
- Your line has been severed by neighbors digging in their yards or cutting down trees
- Electricity has not been restored at a key point in the network
- Pedestals have been destroyed as storm debris was picked up

We have over 1000 employees and construction contractors working across the entire metro-area to restore service to customers as quickly as possible. These crews are going street by street, working to replace or repair the network.

Again, we thank you for your continued business and your patience as we rebuild Greater New Orleans together.

THE NEWS IN BRIEF

Taliban suspected in attack on Afghans

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — Suspected Taliban rebels ambushed a police convoy traveling on a mountain road in southern Afghanistan, killing 19 officers in the deadliest attack ever on the fledgling police force, officials said Tuesday. Five other officers were missing and feared dead or kidnapped after the attack late Monday on a convoy of 150 police officers as they drove on a dirt road along the side of a mountain in Helmand province, Interior Ministry spokesman Yusuf Stanikzai said. Dozens of insurgents opened fire on the convoy, sparking a gunbattle that lasted until early Tuesday, when the militants fled into the mountains, he said. Among the 19 dead was Helmand's deputy police chief, Stanikzai said. Four police officers were wounded, and four police vehicles were destroyed, he said. Security forces rushed 200 extra police officers to the area and were searching houses and mountain caves, but no militants had been caught or killed, the spokesman said. Another Interior Ministry official, Dad Mohammed Rasa, said the attack was "the deadliest ever on the police" department, which was set up soon after U.S.-led forces ousted the Taliban from power for harboring terrorist leader Osama bin Laden in 2001. The attack came amid a major surge in violence by Taliban-led rebels that has left about 1,400 people dead in the past six months and raised fears about the country's fragile democracy. Violence also continued in other areas.

Guns from '04 attack are traced to Yemen

SAN'A, YEMEN — Two AK-47 assault rifles used in a deadly attack on the U.S. consulate in Saudi Arabia have been traced to Yemen's Defense Ministry, according to Western and Yemeni officials, raising new fears that the country isn't doing enough to fight terrorism. The revelation comes five years after al-Qaida-linked militants bombed the USS Cole destroyer on Oct. 12, 2000, at the port in San'a, the capital, killing 17 sailors. In other developments, Yemeni militants are believed to be among foreigners fighting U.S.-led coalition forces in Iraq, U.S. and Iraqi officials have said. Some Yemenis have even carried out suicide bombings in Iraq after their release from prison in Yemen under a government program, say Yemeni officials cited in local newspapers. Under the "dialogue" program, Islamic fundamentalists are let go in exchange for renouncing violence. Despite the setbacks, the United States continues to boost its security relationship with Yemen. Last week, it delivered more boats and equipment to the country's coast guard ahead of today's fifth anniversary of the USS Cole attack. Though U.S. officials publicly praise Yemen for curbing extremist groups, Western and Yemeni diplomats privately say it must do more to lock down its porous, 1,120-mile border with Saudi Arabia and prevent weapons and militant smuggling. Yemen is awash with weapons, and strong ties exist between its military and tribal groups, which make up the backbone of President Ali Abdullah Saleh's power base. The Yemeni government sometimes gives weapons to tribes to curry favor, and it is believed the AK-47 rifles in question were likely smuggled into a black market and bought by militants.

Hail, rain hamper efforts to help quake survivors

Death toll in Pakistan may exceed 35,000

By Sadaqat Jan
Associated Press writer

MUZAFFARABAD, PAKISTAN — Heavy rain and hail forced the cancellation of some relief flights to earthquake-stricken regions Tuesday and survivors scuffled over the badly needed food — the first large-scale aid to make it overland to the devastated city of Muzaffarabad. Officials estimated the death toll would surpass 35,000.

In the latest of a series of remarkable rescues, emergency workers in the northern town of Balakot pulled a teenage boy from the rubble, 78 hours after Saturday's quake.

"He's alive!" rescuers shouted as people gave food and water to the boy and kissed him on the head.

Two survivors, a 55-year-old woman and her 75-year-old mother, were pulled from the rubble of a 10-story apartment building in Islamabad, 80 hours after they were buried. They did not appear to have suffered serious injuries.

A French search team on Monday rescued at least five children buried in a collapsed school in the northern town of Balakot, said Eric Supara, an official at the French Embassy in Islamabad.

Bob McKerrow, coordinator of relief efforts for the International Federation of the Red Cross, told CNN that "you can still keep some hope" for survivors trapped for five to seven days, although he cautioned that the cold and wet weather would become a factor.

In Indian-controlled Kashmir, rescue workers Tuesday found the bodies of 60 road workers in a bus that was buried in a landslide during the quake, the army said. The bodies were cremated on funeral pyres beside the highway they were working on, officials said.

Earlier in the day, U.S. military helicopters, diverted from neighboring Afghanistan, helped ferry wounded from the wrecked city of Muzaffarabad, the capital of Pakistani-ruled Kashmir. International rescue teams joined the search for finding survivors. Teams of Britons, Germans and Turks used high-tech cameras to scan under piles of concrete, steel and wood.

Thousands of civilian volunteers, some carrying picks and shovels on the shoulders, walked north toward quake-hit towns.

The worst-hit region was Kashmir, a divided Himalayan territory of about 10 million people claimed by both India and Pakistan. Islamic rebels opposed to Indian rule of its part of the largely Muslim region have fought a 15-year insurgency that has claimed more than 66,000 lives. India and Pakistan have fought two wars over Kashmir.

Bad weather compounded the misery in the region, with heavy rain and hail forcing some helicopters loaded with food and medicine to cancel or delay their flights.

That official toll in Pakistan remained at about 20,000 people, but a senior army official close to the rescue operations said government officials were estimating that between 35,000 and 40,000 died. The official asked not to be identified because he wasn't authorized to disclose the estimate to journalists.

Indian army spokesman J.S. Juneja said his country's death toll had risen to 1,460 with the discovery of the road workers buried in the landslide.

The U.S. Agency for International Development reported 33,180 dead in Pakistan, 865 dead in India and four dead in Afghanistan. citing its own, preliminary statistics.

The U.N. World Food Program said the first deliveries of food for 240,000 people would reach victims late Tuesday. Simon Pluess, a spokesman for the agency, said the program was prepared to feed 1 million people for a month.

U.N. officials also warned of a possible measles epidemic and the spread of waterborne diseases such as cholera and diarrhea, as the water and sanitation system is heavily damaged.

"Measles could potentially become a serious problem," said Fadela Chaib, spokeswoman for the World Health Organization. Measles is endemic in the region.

Guatemala suspends hunt for flood victims

As food runs low, nation relies on aid

By Mark Stevenson
Associated Press writer

SANTIAGO ATITLAN, GUATEMALA — Authorities abandoned efforts Tuesday to recover bodies from a deadly landslide and turned to international agencies to help feed, clothe and treat the tens of thousands of residents who lost everything in a week of deadly rain and floods.

President Oscar Berger and 1992 Nobel Peace Prize winner Rigoberta Menchu arrived by helicopter in the hard-hit town of Santiago Atitlan to the cheers of hundreds of people who swarmed the town square, a stone courtyard fronting a 17th century church.

"We came to share the pain of all the people who lost loved ones," Berger said after hugging the town's mayor. "We are very worried about Santiago Atitlan, (but) I have the impression that we have never been as united."

Also Tuesday, Guatemalan officials raised the number of missing people to 577 from 384, while the death toll remained at 652. Another 133 people have died in El Salvador, Mexico, Costa Rica, Nicaragua and Honduras because of the heavy rain, partly spawned by Hurricane Stan.

Officials concerned about the possible outbreak of disease set up a perimeter around the site of a half-mile-wide and 15- to 20-foot-deep mudslide that buried the nearby community of Panabaj, about 85 miles west of Guatemala City.

Santiago Atitlan Mayor Diego Esquina said corpses were decomposing rapidly and the hillside under which they lay was still highly unstable, making further rescue efforts too risky. Residents had been digging for possible survivors with their hands and whatever tools they could find.

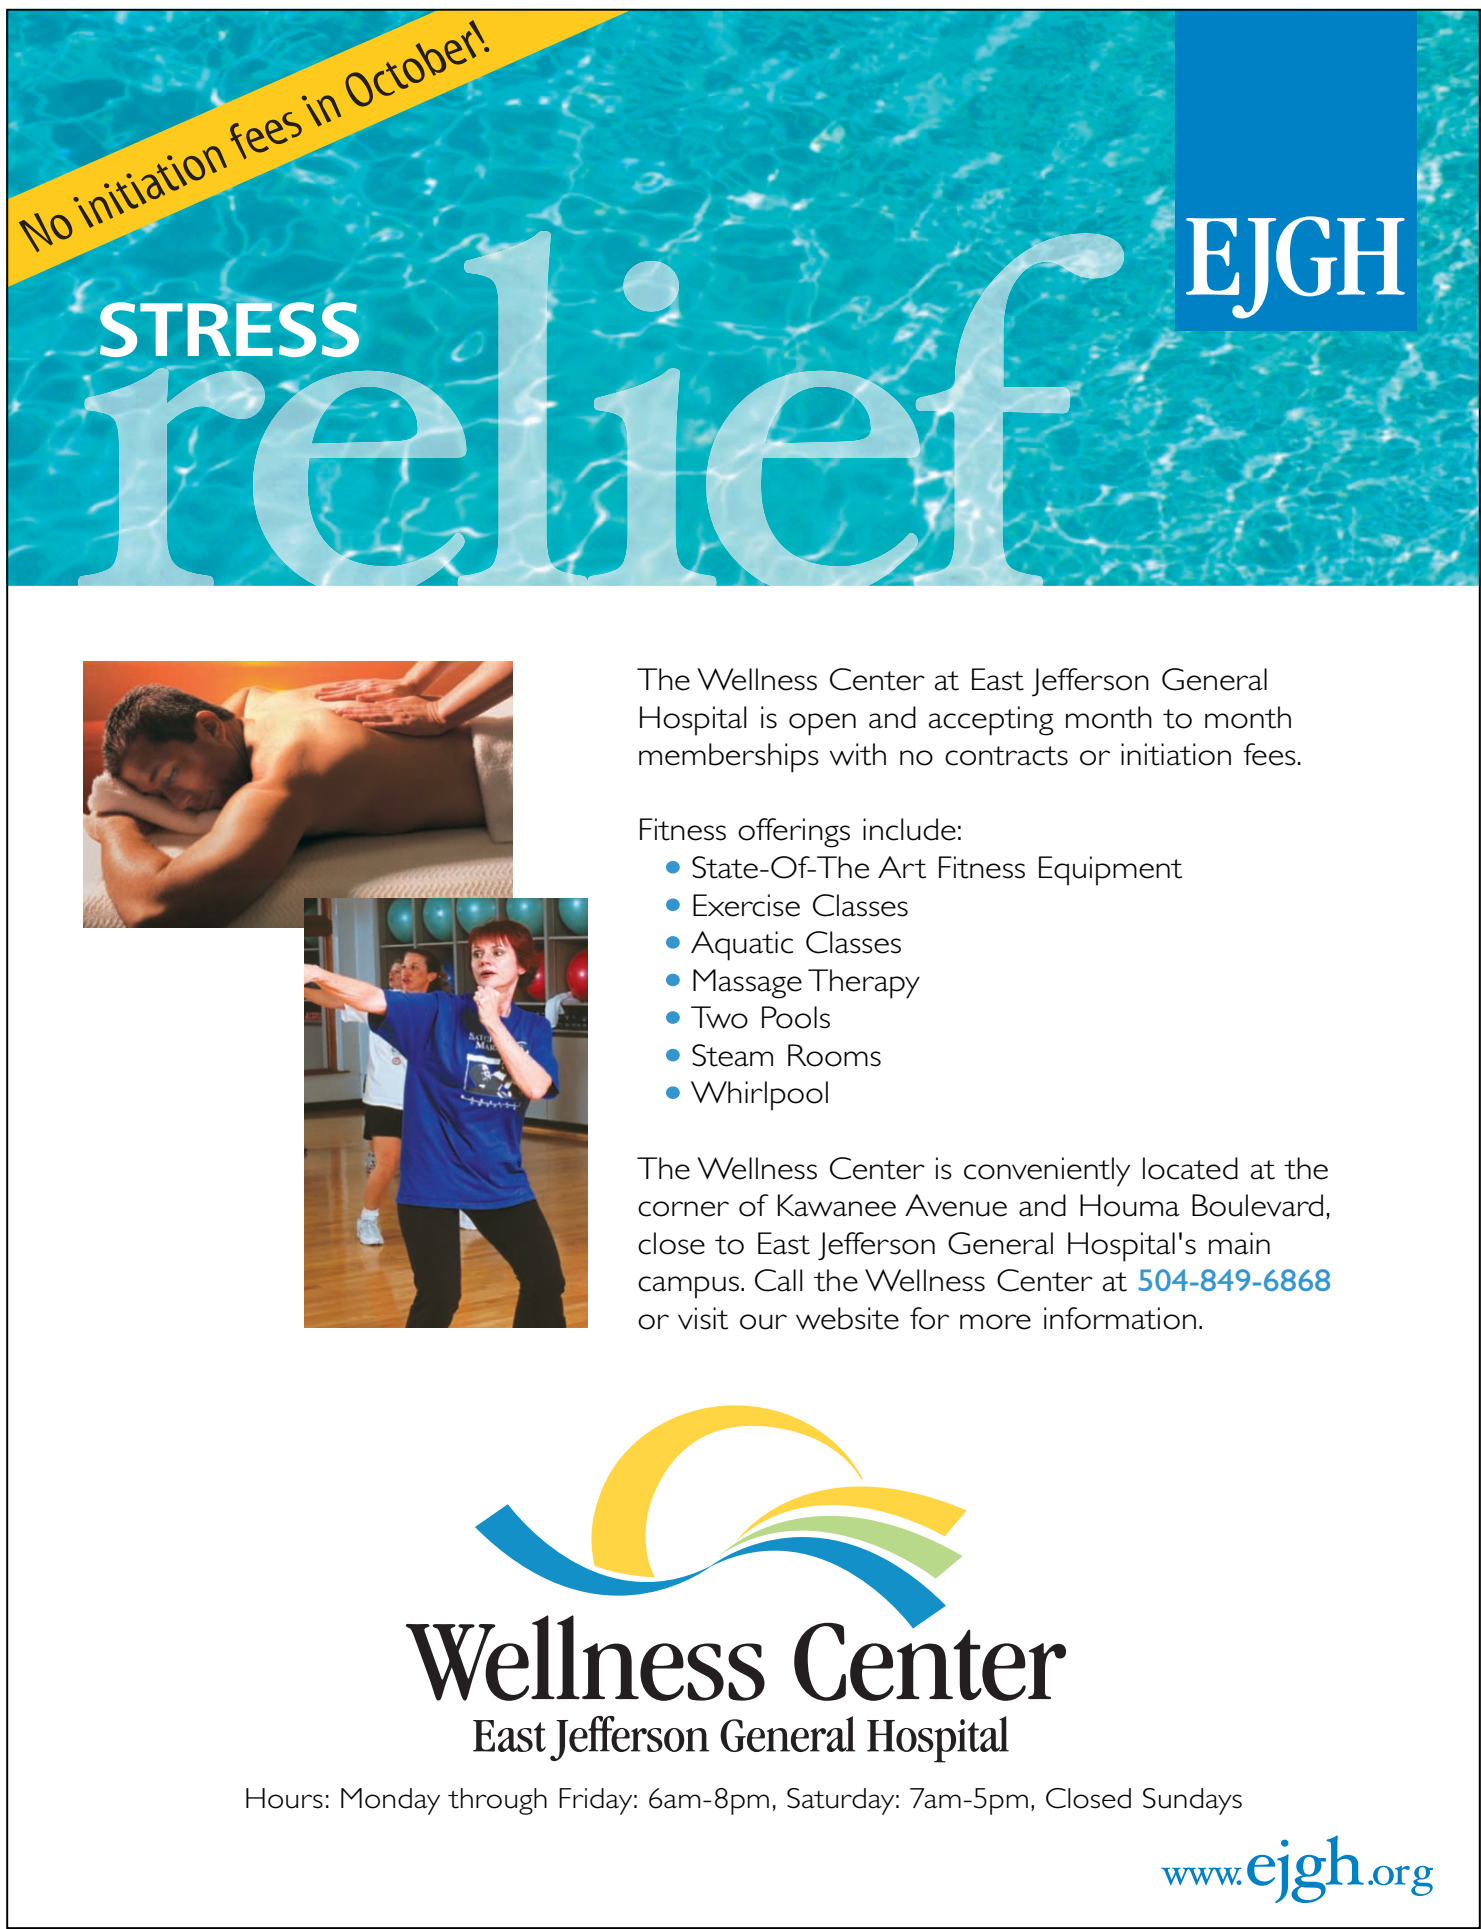
Berger later declared the area a high-risk zone.

More than 107,000 Guatemalans were staying in shelters after their homes were damaged or destroyed. Some outlying communities remained blocked from outside help, Guatemalan Agriculture Minister Alvaro Aguilar said.

Aguilar said the government had stored up about two months' worth of food for emergencies but used an entire month's supply just last week. He estimated that the country will need at least 22,000 tons of food during the next three months.

The government Monday night issued an urgent call to the United Nations, seeking $21.5 million in aid because its own emergency response funds would not be enough to cope with the crisis.

Several countries already have offered assistance to Guatemala, including flood-stricken Mexico. Sweden has donated $5 million, and Spain, France and Taiwan have sent aid shipments.



The United States has delivered 5,000 hygiene kits, 5,000 blankets, 15,000 gallons of drinking water and 11,000 gallons of fuel to victims in Guatemala, officials said. U.S. helicopters shuttled food and water to isolated villages, and a medical unit from the Arkansas National Guard also was preparing to go to the region.

The United States also was offering aid to El Salvador, Costa Rica and Mexico.

"There are so few of these kinds of problems that any one (country) can handle alone," Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said Tuesday while en route to meetings in Florida with security leaders from seven Central American countries. "It looks like it's a terrible natural disaster. It's heartbreaking."

Nurse practitioner Barbara Fallon, doing relief work in Guatemala with a Missouri group, Pueblo to Pueblo, said storm victims were lacking all the basics.

"They need water, food and clothes, and a way to maintain hygiene," she said.

Bomb kills 30, wounds 45 more

In all, 44 people slain 4 days before election

By Sinan Salaheddin
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Insurgents determined to wreck Iraq's constitutional referendum killed more than 40 people and wounded dozens in a series of attacks Tuesday, including a suicide car bomb that ripped apart a crowded market in a town near the Syrian border, police said.

U.S. and Iraqi officials have repeatedly warned that the insurgents would step up their attacks to undermine Saturday's referendum, a crucial step in Iraq's democratic transition.

In the deadliest attack in nearly two weeks, a suicide car bomb exploded about 11 a.m. in a crowded open market in the northwestern town of Tal Afar, killing 30 Iraqis and wounding 45, said Brig. Najim Abdullah, Tal Afar's police chief. U.S and Iraqi forces routed insurgents in a major offensive there last month.

He said all the victims appeared to be civilians because no Iraqi or U.S. forces were in the center of Tal Afar, which is 260 miles northwest of Baghdad.

Insurgents also used two suicide car bombs, three roadside bombs and four drive-by shootings in the capital Tuesday to kill a total of 14 Iraqis; 29 were wounded, police said.

The worst attack involved a suicide car bomb that exploded about noon at an Iraqi army checkpoint in a busy area of western Baghdad, killing eight Iraqi soldiers and one civilian and wounding 12 soldiers, said police Capt. Qassim Hussein.

The violence came four days before Iraq's key vote on the draft constitution, which Kurds and the majority Shiites largely support and the Sunni Arab minority rejects. Sunnis are campaigning to defeat the charter at the polls, although officials from all sides have been trying up to the last minute to decide on changes to the constitution to swing Sunni support.

Many Sunnis fear the document would create nearly autonomous Kurdish and Shiite mini-states in the north and south, where Iraq's oil wealth is located, and leave most Sunnis isolated in central and western Iraq under a weak central government in Baghdad. Whether the constitution passes or fails, Iraq is due to hold elections for a new parliament on Dec. 15.

Militants are demanding that Iraqis boycott the referendum and have killed at least 384 people in the past 16 days in a series of attacks.

In another development, a top election official said Tuesday that Iraqi law will allow Saddam Hussein and thousands of other detainees who have not been brought to trial to vote in the referendum.

However, Abdul Hussein Hindawi, one of the eight highest-ranking officials on the Independent Electoral Commission in Iraq, also said the organization was still awaiting a full list from the Interior Ministry and the U.S.-led coalition of the detainees who should be allowed to receive copies of the draft constitution and to vote at Abu Ghraib prison and several other U.S. detention centers.

Negotiators strike a deal on Iraqi constitution

By Sinan Salaheddin
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Iraqi negotiators reached a breakthrough deal on the constitution Tuesday, and at least one Sunni Arab party said it now would urge its followers to approve the charter in this weekend's referendum.

Under the deal, the two sides agreed that a commission would be set up to consider amendments to the charter that then would be put to a vote in parliament and submitted to a new referendum next year.

The agreement would allow the Sunnis to try to amend the constitution to reduce the autonomous powers that Shiites and Kurds would have under the federal system created by the charter, negotiators said.

It boosts the chances for a constitution that Shiite and Kurdish leaders support. The United States hopes to see the constitution approved in Saturday's vote to avert months more of political turmoil, delaying plans to start a withdrawal of U.S. forces.

U.S. officials have pushed the three days of negotiations between Shiite and Kurdish leaders in the government and Sunni Arab officials, which concluded with marathon talks at the house of President Jalal Talabani late Tuesday.

A top Sunni negotiator, Ayad al-Samarraie of the Iraqi Islamic Party, said the measure would allow it to "stop the campaign rejecting the constitution and we will call on Sunni Arabs to vote yes." It was unclear if parliament would take a formal vote on the new deal.

THE NEWS IN BRIEF

Bushes defend high court pick

WASHINGTON — President Bush and his wife, Laura, offered a double-barreled defense of Supreme Court nominee Harriet Miers on Tuesday while the White House worked to dampen opposition from the right and win confirmation for the president's pick. "Harriet Miers is going to be confirmed and people will get to see why I put her on the bench," Bush said in a television interview on NBC's "Today" show. The Bushes were in Louisiana at a Habitat for Humanity housing work site.

GOP leader dismisses criticism from Dean

WATERBURY, CONN. — The Republican Party chairman defended the GOP's outreach to black voters Tuesday, days after Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean questioned how he could make such an appeal in view of the Bush administration's tepid response to Hurricane Katrina. Ken Mehlman told the Waterbury, Conn., chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People that the "party of Lincoln and the African-American people have an incredible history together."

Frist accrued HCA stock outside his blind trusts

Brother's managing of assets raises doubt

By Larry Margasak and Jonathan M. Katz
Associated Press writers

WASHINGTON — Outside the blind trusts he created to avoid a conflict of interest, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist earned tens of thousands of dollars from stock in a family-founded hospital chain largely controlled by his brother, documents show.

The Tennessee Republican, whose sale this summer of HCA Inc. stock is under federal investigation, has long maintained he could own HCA shares and still vote on health care legislation without a conflict because he had placed the stock in blind trusts approved by the Senate.

However, ethics experts say a partnership arrangement shown in documents obtained by The Associated Press raises serious doubts about whether the senator truly avoided a conflict.

In that case, the HCA stock was accumulated by a family investment partnership started by the senator's late parents and later overseen by his brother, Thomas Frist. The brother served as president of the partnership's management company and as a top officer of HCA. The senator holds no position with the company.

The senator's share of the partnership was placed in a Tennessee blind trust between 1998 and 2002 that was separate from those governed by Senate ethics rules. Frist reported Bowling Avenue Partners, made up mostly of nonpublic HCA stock, earned him $265,495 in dividends and other income over the four years.

Edmond Ianni, a former Wilmington, Del., bank executive who established blind trusts for corporate executives, questioned why the senator's brother was able to manage assets "when the whole purpose of a blind trust is to ensure lack of not only conflict of interest — but appearance of conflict of interest?"

Kathleen Clark, a government ethics expert at the Washington University in St. Louis School of Law, said she doesn't believe the Senate trusts or the Tennessee trust insulated Frist from a conflict because the senator or his brother were advised of transactions and could influence decisions.

"What I find most appalling is the Senate calls it a qualified blind trust when it's not blind," Clark said. "Since the Senate says it's OK, the Senate has made it a political question. It's up to the voter. But there's no doubt it's a conflict of interest."

Frist's interest in Bowling Avenue Partners and the Tennessee blind trust were listed on the annual disclosure reports he filed with the Senate. Thomas Frist's ability to influence HCA stock decisions in the partnership was detailed in separate trust and partnership documents obtained by the AP.

Those documents show Thomas Frist was listed as the "general partner" and "registered agent" of Bowling Avenue Partners. He also was listed as president of the partnership's management company.

Thomas Frist founded HCA, the nation's largest for-profit hospital chain, with his and the senator's father. He is the company's chairman emeritus.

Frist advisers confirmed the senator's brother could influence investment decisions in the Bowling Avenue partnership and said the partnership was placed in a Tennessee trust because Senate ethics rules didn't allow the nonpublic HCA shares to be included in Senate-approved trusts.

"His interests in the family partnership were not held by his Senate blind trusts because Senate rules did not permit it. Senator Frist did not control the assets in this partnership, and he annually disclosed his interests to the public as required," Frist spokesman Bob Stevenson said.

Thomas Frist did not return repeated phone calls to his office at HCA seeking comment.

High court to examine wetlands protection

Roberts gets his first say on property rights

By Gina Holland
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court set the stage Tuesday for what could be a landmark ruling on government authority to regulate wetlands and control pollution, giving new Chief Justice John Roberts his first chance to limit federal regulation of property rights.

The justices agreed to take up claims that regulators have gone too far by restricting development of property that is miles away from any river or waterway.

With more than 100 million acres of wetlands in the United States, a total area the size of California, the stakes are high, the justices were told.

The outcome could have implications for government authority in regulating construction in obviously environmentally sensitive areas, such as parts of Louisiana and Mississippi decimated by Hurricane Katrina, and even land that is not adjacent to water.

The Army Corps of Engineers regulates work on wetlands, which are home to many plants and animals.

"They define wetlands so broadly that even dry desert areas of Arizona are being called wetlands," said Paul Kamenar, a lawyer with the Washington Legal Foundation, one of the conservative groups that called on the court to intervene.

The Bush administration had urged the court to stay on the sidelines.

Environmental cases have been divisive at the court. In 2002, justices deadlocked 4-4 in a case that asked whether farmers should have more freedom to work in wetlands. In 2001, the court split 5-4 in a ruling that limited the scope of government protection of wetlands, but the decision did not go as far as environmentalists feared.

Environmentalists have been worried about how Roberts will vote in such cases.

As an appeals court judge, he suggested in 2003 that federal power is limited. He had urged the appeals court to reconsider its decision restricting a San Diego area construction project because it encroached on the habitat of the rare arroyo Southwestern toad.

The 1972 clean water law involved in the Supreme Court cases draws much of its regulatory authority from the part of the Constitution that gives Congress power to regulate commerce between the states. The same legal reasoning underpins federal environmental and civil rights protections, so the outcome of these cases could affect more than land regulations.

Bush administration Supreme Court lawyer Paul Clement said the government has long-standing power to protect waterways, even if that means limits on pollution on nearby land.

Austin Leslie was ready to rebuild

The last time I talked to Austin Leslie, he was ready to get back to work.

The celebrated chef didn't evacuate during Hurricane Katrina. He was rescued from his attic, taken to the Convention Center, then to Arkansas and finally to join family members in Atlanta.

I called him because various food writers and well-wishers from the Southern Foodways Alliance had been calling me, asking whether I knew how he had fared after Hurricane Katrina.

He had cooked for that organization on two occasions. His signature fried chicken stole the show at an informal chicken fry-off in Oxford, Miss., last fall.

This past summer when the organization visited New Orleans, he prepared another trademark dish: black beans and rum.

"It's a new beginning for me. I'm 71 years old, but I've done it before," he said of his personal rebuilding effort after Katrina. "I'm going to use all the tools I have in my head."

No stranger to new starts

Over the years, Austin Leslie crafted several new beginnings for himself.

First he took over his aunt's restaurant, Chez Helene, and turned that neighborhood classic into the inspiration for "Frank's Place," a network television show.

Even at the height of his fame, Leslie made a point of sharing the spotlight.

"Austin was a great chef, and a better friend to me and my husband," said Myrtle Baquet, who, along with her husband, Eddie, owned another of the city's famed eateries, Eddie's.

"If you talked to him long, he talked about the fact that Willie Mae Seaton and Leah Chase never got their due," said Rudy Lombard, whose 1978 book, "Creole Feast," featured Leslie.

Chase and Seaton are renown for their fried chicken, too, but Leslie apparently felt the stage was big enough for everyone.

On the heels of Chez Helene's success, he opened other restaurants, but by the early 1990s, the would-be empire collapsed. Soon, Leslie was cooking Creole food in Scandinavia.

"You never heard about the hard times with him. He was always upbeat. He was always an inspiration," Lombard recalled.

Returning to his hometown, Leslie and his trademark fried chicken again found receptive audiences, first at Jacques-Imo's, then at Pampy's.

Inspiring legacy

When Leslie died in Atlanta this month, the news hit especially hard. Austin Leslie embodied that old era when many of this city's emblematic secrets were held closely by New Orleanians and the few outsiders hip enough to be in the know.

Now our people and our traditions are scattered widely. The Number 9 — the fried chicken, potato salad and stuffed bell pepper plate that was the most popular item on the Chez Helene menu — is but a memory.

It's a new beginning for all of us. But I cling to the belief that the inspiration of ancestors such as Austin Leslie, and all the various tools in our collective heads, will see us through.

Jeff put 'doomsday plan' to use

But packed shelter threw wrench in plan

By Michelle Krupa
West Bank bureau

Moments after learning that Hurricane Katrina had set its sights on Jefferson Parish, government leaders set in motion the final phase of their pre-disaster program, described in a 1⅓-page outline menacingly dubbed "the doomsday plan."

Created after Hurricane Georges bypassed the area in 1998, the scenario calls for Jefferson to keep a skeleton crew at its emergency center in Marrero during the approach of a Category 4 or 5 hurricane and to send hundreds of workers 110 miles north to Washington Parish, far from the inundation plain south of Interstate 12 but close enough to return after the storm, parish records show.

The doomsday plan, part of a massive disaster strategy, has come to fruition only a few times, with eleventh-hour jogs by hurricanes Ivan and Dennis recently foiling the need for it, said Tim Whitmer, the top aide to Parish President Aaron Broussard. "In the past, we've had the bullets in the chamber, but we haven't had to pull the trigger," Whitmer said.

But as officials got news from the National Hurricane Center on Aug. 28 that Katrina would bear down on Jefferson the following day, Emergency Management Director Walter Maestri initiated "doomsday," he recalled, putting some 1,100 parish workers and 700 public vehicles on the road to Mount Hermon.

For many, however, the anticipated point-to-point journey became a wild goose chase and Police walk down Bourbon Street on Monday as the midnight curfew nears. New Orleans Police Department spokesman Capt. Marlon Defillo said the curfew is necessary because the city still lacks basic services.

At bars in French Quarter, midnight is unhappy hour

Authorities begin to enforce curfew

Silence swept across Bourbon Street on Tuesday shortly after midnight as a blue line of police officers advanced down the street, shut down bars and ushered people out.

The first night after the city announced a curfew crackdown in the Quarter, businesses and patrons decried it as a strain on profits and a confusing signal from a city trying to restore its crippled economy.

Earl Bernhardt, owner of Tropical Isle and five other French Quarter establishments, said Monday night's curfew sweep was "disastrous" to his bottom line. He said he opened his tourist-oriented watering holes — including Bourbon Street fixtures such as Funky Pirate and Papa Joe's — on Oct. 1 and previously was able to keep them open as long as there was a critical mass of customers. He said a nearly packed house of patrons was swept out of Tropical Isle on Monday as the clock struck midnight.

"A Category 5 hurricane didn't close this place. It would be a shame to see a 12 o'clock curfew close this place."

"The mayor asked us to get the French Quarter rolling and show the city we're open for business, then they turn around and do this to us. If you're going to restrict us like that, we might as well put the plywood back up," Bernhardt said.

He said bars had been doing most their business from 11:30 p.m. to 1:30 a.m. as cleanup crews and insurance adjusters finished off their days.

City Councilwoman Jackie Clarkson asked acting Police Superintendent Warren Riley on Tuesday to push back the curfew in the Quarter to 2 a.m., saying the curfew is keeping a lid on the city's slowly emerging recovery.

"I don't think midnight to 2 a.m. makes a difference in how the police can perform in the French Quarter, but it makes a huge difference in the amount of income this city can have," Clarkson said.

Brad Bohannan, one of Bernhardt's managing partners, said the newly imposed curfew news came just as he was able to persuade most of his employees to return from evacuation points around the country.

"Just when we get most of our workers, now we're worried about being able to employ them." Bohannan said.

Police spokesman Capt. Marlon Defillo said the enforcement of the curfew in the French Quarter is necessary because "the city is fragmented in terms of hospital services, power, water and

Jesse Jackson's bus caravan is short on evacuees

Non-Louisianians arrive to seek jobs

By Tara Young
Staff writer

It was supposed to be a bus caravan of about 200 New Orleanians coming back home in search of a new start, a new job and a better future.

But when the Rev. Jesse Jackson's five-bus caravan arrived at a Piccadilly Cafeteria parking lot in Kenner on Tuesday, many of the job seekers who got off the chartered buses had never set foot in Louisiana before.

It was unclear how many New Orleanians had opted to return to New Orleans in the caravan. Officials with Jackson's Rainbow/PUSH Coalition could not say how many arrived on the buses or how many were from New Orleans. Most of the job seekers said they hailed from Mobile and Memphis. Organizers, however, said that no matter what the hometowns of the riders were, the trip was a positive first step that would encourage Louisiana residents to return and look for jobs.

For weeks, Jackson has publicly spoken about the need to return New Orleans-area residents to their hometown so that they could help rebuild their communities. On Tuesday, he declined to explain why so many of those brought to Louisiana were not residents. Details such as where they would be working and living also had yet to be re-

Mid-City, Lakeview floodwater tests are promising

Contaminant levels close to normal rain

By Mark Schleifstein
Staff writer

A new study of Hurricane Katrina floodwater samples taken in the Lakeview and Mid-City neighborhoods of New Orleans during the two weeks after the storm concludes that the water contained chemical and biological contaminants in levels very similar to water from a typical rainstorm.

"I think the chemical data are good news," said John Pardue, environmental engineer and director of the Louisiana Water Resources Research Institute at Louisiana State University, and lead author of the study. "It could have been much worse if we had been on the eastern edge of the storm."

But Pardue warned that the stormwater and the drying muck it left behind were still dangerous because so many people — evacuees, emergency responders and returning homeowners — have come into contact with it.

"You're talking about two years of stormwater in a couple days of time and the fact that people were exposed to it is troubling," he said.

St. Bernard court is resurrected at parish prison site

Clerk's office accepts legal filings, mold

By Karen Turni Bazile
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

Court is again in session in St. Bernard Parish, at least on a limited basis.

In a small room in the parish prison in Chalmette, a few attorneys, court officials and sheriff's deputies stood as prisoners were marched in before 34th Judicial District Judge Robert Buckley. On Tuesday, Buckley held the first Magistrate Court hearings since Hurricane Katrina hit on Aug. 29, setting bonds on about a dozen people arrested in the past few days for offenses ranging from public intoxication to looting.

At the Parish Courthouse nearby, Clerk of Court Lena Torres accepted the first filings since the storm in a mostly bare clerk's office, with mold visible on some walls and floors sticky from glue residue where carpet had been torn out.

Deputy Clerk of Court Lena Nunez said the clerk's office accepted four new civil suits, two filings for extensions of time in ongoing cases, and a request for a certified copy of a marriage license. Under an order approved by the district's judges, the clerk's office will be open on weekdays from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Senior Judge Kirk Vaughn said all courthouse officials worked hard to make Tuesday's reopening possible.

"All of our efforts have been pushing to get (the public) back into the building. We thought it was important and symbolic to be here," said Vaughn, who actually never left, sleeping on an air mattress that snugly fits in the tiny waiting room of his second-floor chambers. His office also has been the sleeping quarters of two first-floor judges, bailiffs and a host of others since the storm.

"There was talk of opening a modular courthouse (in nearby trailers), but we thought it was important to be here," Vaughn said. "We're here to stay. We've got a lot of hope for our community to come back."

The courthouse sits on St. Bernard Highway, high land by any standard in the parish, and is raised several feet. Nonetheless, it still took on about 3 feet of water in most of the offices, and as much as 7 feet of water in the clerk of court's mortgage and conveyance, civil suits and criminal records rooms.

Spc. Jacqueline Carriaga, left, and Sgt. Valerie Henderson of the Idaho Army National Guard remove rifles from the St. Bernard Parish Courthouse in Chalmette on Tuesday. The weapons were taken out so cleaning can start.

Nunez said she has sent many of the water-damaged records to a Texas company to be freeze-dried so they can be salvaged to whatever extent possible.

Torres said clerk officials from several Louisiana parishes descended on the Chalmette operation to help St. Bernard deputy clerks salvage the massive number of damaged records.

Earlier Tuesday, Chief Judge Manny Fernandez issued a seven-page order outlining what the court can and cannot do under its limited operating schedule.

Under Fernandez's order, the courts may decide, for the most part, matters that are unopposed, since there is no practical way to serve litigants or to hold jury trials. Judges can sign orders and judgments for litigation filed before Aug. 27 or for property issues, testament and estate issues.

The order issued Tuesday limits the courts' activities through Oct. 25, the date Gov. Kathleen Blanco set for legal deadlines. However, Vaughn said he's not sure what will happen at that point because it's not clear when the courthouse will be able to open for regular business.

Although the order said the court was not taking any new suits while the courthouse is in limited operation, Nunez said she felt compelled to take the four new civil suits because attorneys said not accepting the suits could jeopardize their proceedings.

Nunez said one was a custody hearing and that the other three had prescription dates, some while the courthouse was closed.

"I'm not sure who has the authority," Nunez said. "I didn't want anyone to sue the clerk's office for not accepting a suit."

Nunez said the order basically says the court is open for emergency matters.

"In the case of an emergency, who decides what's an emergency?" Nunez said. "I know what the order says, ... but people are raising questions about the authority of the ruling. If I did wrong, I did wrong."

solved. Everyone will have a place to stay and a job, Jackson said.

State Sen. Cleo Fields, D-Baton Rouge, who has advocated bringing Louisiana's displaced residents back to defunct military bases and state parks, said it will take time because many are apprehensive about returning. "I think this is the first step," said Fields, who has been working with Jackson. "I do think there are fears. Hopefully this ... will encourage them to see that there is a job and a home to come back for."

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, who welcomed the group Tuesday, said although jobs are plentiful, his biggest concern is housing returning residents.

"Housing is the biggest struggle we have," Nagin said. "We are on the hunt right now for every available piece of land. We have identified enough space for 3,500 trailers."

Nagin said he was encouraged by the arrival of Tuesday's group.

Wearing T-shirts with the slogan "Time to Heal — A Time to Rebuild," many said they took the offer to come to New Orleans in the hope of rebuilding their own lives. Bad fortune that did not include Hurricane Katrina had displaced them, they said.

James Stewart, 44, a Memphis, Tenn., resident, said he had been homeless for four months and thanked God for the chance to start over in a new city. "My situation in Memphis had deteriorated," Stewart said. "I've never helped rebuild a city before. So I figured I'd give it a try."

The caravan began Monday in Chicago and wound its way through the cities of St. Louis, Memphis, and Mobile, Ala.

When they arrived in Kenner, Piccadilly welcomed them with a hot meal and job applications. Burger King, McDonald's, UPS and two firms looking for workers to remove debris and restore buildings in New Orleans also were present.

Travis Houston, an Uptown resident returning on a bus, didn't seem to mind that the majority of the 200 people with him weren't Louisiana residents.

As far as Houston was concerned, there were enough jobs for everyone.

"One person can change their community. One community can change a city. One city can change a nation, and one nation can change the world," Houston said. "You have got to start somewhere. Even if there are only 60 or 80 people from New Orleans, he (Jackson) got them back."

"This group can be a test case," Nagin said. "There's tremendous opportunities ... The day of minimum wages in and around the city are absolutely over."

That's why Woodrow and Shantell Arnold of New Orleans chose to come back with the Jackson group Tuesday.

After spending six weeks looking for housing in Jackson, Miss., the couple decided to try their luck here.

"I'll flip a burger," said Shantell Arnold, after hearing that Burger King is offering a $6,000 signing bonus.

Arnold said she was willing to do almost anything if it means bringing her six children back to New Orleans to rebuild their lives.

"We are not trying to wait until the first of the year to return," she said.

Kelly Naquin helped finish stocking the refurbished ladies' department at Dillard's at The Esplanade in Kenner Tuesday. The store, along with the fully repaired and expanded Dillard's at North Shore Square in Slidell, is scheduled to reopen today.

Work in progress

Dillard's is scheduled to reopen today at the Esplanade in Kenner and at North Shore Square in Slidell.

District Manager Linda Sholtis reminds readers that Dillard's operates two locations at each mall — one for men's merchandise and another for women's clothing, accessories, shoes, etc. The men's Dillard's at North Shore Square opened not long after Katrina.

Dillard's at Lakeside, which suffered serious roof leakage, is not quite on the reopening timetable, says Sholtis. Similarly, there is no word on the reopening of Dillard's at Oakwood or The Plaza, both seriously damaged.

"What our shoppers in Kenner and Slidell will see is a work in progress," she says. "All of the areas may not be open, but what we have assembled is all new merchandise. Nothing that was in the stores before the storm is here now."

A facelift in the ladies departments at both stores will also greet customers. In addition, when the updated lingerie departments in the two stores are complete, "the areas will be nothing short of fantastic."

Plus: The size of the women's shoe department has more than doubled in Slidell, says Sholtis.

Hours for now: 10 to 6 daily in Kenner, 10 to 9 daily in Slidell, noon to 6 Sundays at both stores.

Power of hope

More than $2.6 million has been donated to the Power of Hope Fund, which was created by Entergy with an additional, initial corporate donation of $1 million immediately after Katrina hit.

"Donations have been from all over the country," says Patty Riddlebarger, Entergy's director of corporate social responsibility, "but the bulk has come from people in our service areas of Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas and Arkansas."

The fund is designed to help individuals and families "make the transition from temporary living situations to a permanent move back into the community."

A first deadline for applications for assistance has ended, says Riddlebarger, "and we had received more than 2,000 applications as of late Friday." An announcement of grants from The Power of Hope Fund will be made by the end of the month.

To apply for the next round of assistance to "rebuild and recover" or to make a tax-deductible donation, visit www.powerofhope.com. Contributions may also be sent to the fund, managed by the Foundation for the Mid South, at 134 E. Amite St., Jackson, MS 39201.

More detailed tests suggested

TESTS, from B-1

The biological material contained in the sludge and muck should be avoided, if possible, and any cuts or wounds should be treated immediately to avoid infections and disease, he said.

Levels of copper and zinc 10 times higher than federal acute exposure standards could have an immediate toxic effect on commercial and sport fish in Lake Pontchartrain, Pardue said Tuesday.

Because the metals were in water containing little oxygen, Pardue said, it's likely that fish avoided the contaminated water as it was first released into the lake, which would explain why there were few reports of fish kills in the days after Katrina hit.

Levels of cadmium and lead might accumulate in larger sportfish over a longer period of time, he said, and he recommended state officials consider long-term monitoring for those metals in fish, similar to monitoring done for mercury.

Pardue warned that high levels of the toxic metals remain in the sludge deposited in homes and yards as the water went down, and will continue to be carried into the lake by rainstorms.

Pardue's study was published in Tuesday's online edition of Environmental Science & Technology, a journal published by the American Chemical Society.

"What concerns me about the EPA testing is that they only looked for things on their list. They're not thinking outside the box."

JOHN PARDUE
environmental engineer and director of the Louisiana Water Resources Research Institute at Louisiana State University

It is the first floodwater study to go through a peer review process, in which the sampling methods and results were checked for accuracy by independent scientists.

All the metals were found in higher concentrations in samples taken along Tulane Avenue and Gravier Street, Pardue said.

That could be because samples were collected in that area a week later than in Lakeview, giving the water time to leach metals from cars, trucks and metal buildings in the area, and because there are a variety of automobile repair and refinishing shops in the area.

Pardue said capping of the contaminated soil in yards with spillway sand could reduce the chance of future contamination.

Pardue's testing also searched for several chemicals that were not being sampled for by the federal Environmental Protection Agency in similar testing during the time floodwaters covered the city.

"What concerns me about the EPA testing is that they only looked for things on their list," Pardue said, referring to a set list of chemicals that the agency tests for in flooding situations.

"They're not thinking outside the box," he said. "They're not measuring the chemicals that would be associated with home construction."

Pardue said floodwaters contained small amounts of those chemicals, including one used in aerosol paints and another used in caulking compounds and sealants.

Although not enough to be immediately toxic, Pardue said the chemicals could be found in the sludge and sediment left behind by floodwaters.

Like the earlier EPA tests, Pardue also didn't find large amounts of several cancer-causing chemicals associated with gasoline, including benzene, because they evaporate quickly.

He said the largest concentrations of benzene were found near gas stations.

But only one sample in Lakeview, at 19 parts per billion, exceeded EPA drinking water standards.

The study, authored by Pardue, several other scientists at LSU, and officials with CK Associate and EHS Technical Solutions, both of Baton Rouge, was limited to New Orleans, where there are no large chemical plants or refineries with major chemical storage.

In addition, the study said, gasoline was in short supply in the city on the day Katrina hit, thanks to brisk sales to evacuees.

The samples were taken before significant pumping of floodwater into the lake.

The report recommends more detailed research on the effects of the floodwaters, including the actual amount of human exposure, and ecological risk assessment of the contaminants.

Yom Kippur to unite Jewish community

Temples open doors to familiar, new faces

By Bruce Nolan
Staff writer

When Rabbi Robert Loewy gets up before his Metairie congregation to begin Yom Kippur services Thursday morning, this is what he'll see: hundreds of people in plain metal chairs on a concrete floor; the temple's walls gutted to expose studs and wiring; the entire contents of a major synagogue complex heaped indecorously on tables jammed against walls — the salvaged jumble of a flooded temple snatched from above the water line.

"It looks like a garage sale's going on," he said.

"And it'll look beautiful to me."

Beautiful because his people at once-flooded Congregation Gates of Prayer — those not still stuck in Houston or Baton Rouge — will be assembled to pray together on the holiest day of the year, the day beginning this evening that more than any other day tells them they are Jewish.

And beautiful as a sign that the world is returning to normal.

For 10,000 to 12,000 Jewish New Orleanians, the High Holy Days follow just five weeks after Hurricane Katrina drowned New Orleans and pummeled the suburbs in the worst disaster in the city's 287-year history.

The storm killed more than 1,000 people; scattered hundreds of thousands to distant states; flooded tens of thousands of homes and staggered the region's economy.

Nothing is normal.

In the suburbs of Jefferson and St. Tammany parishes, debris from tens of thousands of flooded households lines the curbs in ragged piles. In New Orleans the piles tend to be fewer and smaller. There are fewer people to rebuild; vast neighborhoods have barely begun even the most rudimentary reclamation.

Yet community is everything.

Driving down St. Charles Avenue recently, biomedical consultant Cliff Kern noticed an exterior light on outside Temple Sinai.

"That meant the power was back on."

He entered and saw the eternal light glowing red near the tabernacle.

"That was a seminal moment for me, for the life of the congregation. It meant we were back," he said.

In a bank in the vastness of Houston a few weeks earlier, Kern had chanced upon a fellow-member of Temple Sinai, displaced by the storm, like him.

They hugged.

At a Metairie restaurant a few days ago Loewy chanced upon a member of his congregation he hadn't been able to find in weeks.

They hugged.

"These holidays are the same — and they're not the same," said Kern, who will attend Kol Nidre services tonight at 6 at Temple Sinai. "It'll be real good to be able to get home. We'll be together again and that's really important. And I hope we'll have people from the greater community there too. That's important."

But it also will be difficult.

No Jewish congregation is intact; each service tonight and Thursday will contain the unfamiliar faces of relief workers, soldiers, visiting state troopers and others helping New Orleans recovering from Katrina.

A quarter of the Northshore Jewish Congregation is still displaced, said Rabbi Jeff Kurtz-Lendner.

On Rosh Hashanah last week he looked out over familiar faces from his own congregation, plus the strangers who had come to aid them.

"Some came to help, and some needed help, and now with this service we're helping those who came to help us," Kurtz-Lendner told his congregation.

"But for the next hour we're not going to be helper and helpee. We're just going to be a Jewish community. We're going to reclaim history and not let the hurricane disrupt it.

"We're just going to be Jews together in prayer in the synagogue, as always.

Traditionally, the High Holy Days, the first of each Jewish year, are those in which Jews are called on to reflect on their lives and to consider their relationship to God and their community.

"We're all going through this crisis together," said Kurtz-Lendner. "So now is the time to make sure our lives are on the right path. Are we looking selfishly, or are we looking inwardly? Are we looking at what we want, or how we can make other people's lives better?

We have to ask both: What the community can do for you. And what you can do for the community."

posed communication and shelter problems that left hundreds of Jefferson's most essential personnel wandering around in the dark, without food, water or working telephones, in the hours before Katrina's deadly force fell on south Louisiana.

Maestri said this week that "doomsday" worked "very well" during Katrina, adding that problems did not derive from improper planning by Jefferson leaders. Other top officials, however, have said that trouble with the plan and with returning employees quickly to the parish has moved them to consider whether workers should head west, possibly to Gonzales, if another hurricane takes Katrina's path.

Arriving in Washington Parish as night fell on Aug. 28, many evacuees discovered their destination, Mount Hermon School, already filled to capacity. In convoys of utility vehicles, fire trucks, public buses and private automobiles, hundreds of workers wound through dark, piney woods, searching for other schools that could provide promised shelter from the imminent storm.

Maestri said Tuesday that putting Jefferson workers on the open road as Gulf Coast breezes strengthened to gale winds was not part of the parish's plan. Mount Hermon School, which is stocked with food and cots to host many as 1,500 parish workers at all times, allowed Katrina refugees from nearby neighborhoods into the building, essentially evicting Jefferson Parish personnel before they arrived, Maestri said.

"I don't want to criticize the Washington Parish officials for using their schools to shelter some of their own folks," he said. If they had followed the original plan agreed upon by both parishes, however, "we wouldn't have had all of this caravanning all over the place."

But Dennie Fowler, superintendent of Washington Parish schools, said his employees did not open Mount Hermon School to neighbors. Overcrowding happened because hundreds more Jefferson Parish employees than expected, plus their spouses and children, showed up, he said.

By the time Fowler turned in for the night, about 560 Jefferson residents had hunkered down at the campus, he said. "Then I got a phone call at my home that there were 770 additional people coming into Mount Hermon, and there's not room, and that's when I got on the phone and called (four other) principals and asked them to open their schools."

"I didn't expect quite that many, but that was fine," Fowler added. "We just had to hustle around at night; the electricity was already off."

The American Red Cross could not be reached for comment.

Pat Borne, an aide in Jefferson's public information office, nearly had reached Mount Hermon School about 8 p.m. only to learn by cell phone that the building was packed. On a bus with about 15 of her colleagues, Borne was diverted 15 miles to Franklinton Junior High, a site not prepared for evacuees.

After raiding vending machines for food, Borne said they realized their "doomsday" assignment — to convene at Mount Hermon School and organize to get back to work — could not be carried out with employees spread over five schools as telephone service and electricity blinked off.

"Not all of us were in one location, so where was the command post?" she recalled. The junior high crew waited as Katrina made landfall Aug. 29, then got ready to head back to Marrero.

"It was at that point that I realized that I was an evacuee and I was in somebody else's hands," Borne said. "It was like, 'Is this really happening? What's our next step? When are we going back?' A few of us tried to gather together and tried to make some decisions, because we were kind of on our own out there."

At Mount Hermon School, the same idea percolated among other parish workers, including Mike Quigley, an executive assistant to Broussard. "It's a foregone conclusion that we had to go back," Quigley said. "You've got intelligent people there who knew you had to get back. Common sense told us we had to go back."

But walking outside, that team realized that tall pine trees had toppled around the school, creating an impenetrable maze for the parish's heavy trucks. Block by block, they shifted the debris, cutting a path toward colleagues at the other schools, then south to Jefferson Parish.

Looking back, Quigley said leaving Jefferson Parish before Katrina was the right move, noting that officials would have faced stiff criticism if hundreds of public vehicles had flooded or employees had been injured in the storm.

He added, however, that a single evacuation site might not be best for all Jefferson employees, a consideration top parish officials also have admitted. "I guess in some ways, it's good to be flexible," Quigley said. "In hindsight, if you had multiple sites planned to allow you to have some flexibility, that would be the best-case scenario."

Meanwhile, Borne said that even amid the confusion in Washington Parish, most of her colleagues remained calm. In retrospect, though, she said traversing a foreign parish by night as a killer hurricane headed toward shore was not wise planning.

"Everybody was pretty subdued," she said. "I was just going with the flow, not realizing, you know, what danger I was in."

Clarkson wants curfew moved back

garbage pickup. All we're asking is for businesses to work with the city until we can get fully operational."

Defillo also said the Quarter crackdown puts that neighborhood in compliance with the curfew that has been imposed more stringently in the rest of the city.

"It's not fair to the businesses that operate in Uptown and in the 2nd and 6th police districts. In fairness to every business in the city, it's not fair to make exceptions," Defillo said.

Clarkson, however, said she is asking for just that. "I think the French Quarter has to be exempted from that thinking," she said. "It is the hallmark of our tourism industry. We need the French Quarter to take this lead to make this statement that we're open for business."

Officers arrested seven people for violating curfew, Defillo said. He said the offense is a misdemeanor, but he did not know what punishment it carries upon conviction.

Most shops and bars in the Quarter closed before midnight Monday, but their owners lamented the loss of sales typically made later. "They're trying to control what's going on in the French Quarter, and I can respect that," said Al Rushing, co-owner of Cigar Factory. "But they're kind of contradicting themselves.

"Now you're depriving us when we're trying to get back on our feet," he said. "They're kind of handcuffing us to make money."

The Hustler Club, which typically stays open until 4 a.m. or even 6 a.m., depending on patronage, planned to issue last call at 11 p.m. "This is very much going to affect our business," manager Ben Loper said. Gesturing inside the doors at a room full of customers, he said, "It's killing us."

Since electricity was restored in the Quarter two weeks ago, many of its establishments have been drawing crowds of emergency personnel, military troops and support workers.

The business-as-usual atmosphere proceeded unchecked until Saturday night, when a television camera recorded New Orleans police officers punching a 64-year-old teacher. Three officers involved in the incident have pleaded innocent to battery; the teacher has denied police claims that he was intoxicated.

Among business owners, the enforcement of curfew two days later was widely seen as a reaction to that incident. But in announcing the curfew, local Homeland Security Director Terry Ebbert said the city "is just not ready for that level of activity," referring to round-the-clock business operations.

"There have been a lot of problems," said Mike Rushing, a Cigar Factory employee. "A lot of people are not giving the police nearly as much authority as they should."

Others said street carousing has been typical. "It's no different from any other normal night six months ago. It's nothing out of the norm," Hustler's Loper said.

"Why should we be punished for that?" said Dustin Alfortish, a bartender at Johnny White's Sports Bar. "A Category 5 hurricane didn't close this place. It would be a shame to see a 12 o'clock curfew close this place."

"We don't object to what they're trying to do. But we're not bothering anybody," said J.D. Landrum, the bar's owner. "I (have) got bills to pay. We don't want to get into any politics." Landrum said closing the bar is impossible because he has no keys.

Monday at 11:30 p.m., patrons at Molly's on the Market said they hadn't heard about the curfew. "They'll never take me alive," Keith Hurtt joked.

But as midnight approached, bars began to empty and close their doors. Outside Bourbon Pub at about 11:50 p.m., New Orleans residents Marie DeGrado and Brandi Cheek anxiously waited for their ride home. "This is the first time I've been in a bar and it actually closed," DeGrado said. "We know we have to get out."

A police cruiser crept down Bourbon from Canal Street, its lights flashing, broadcasting a warning from a loudspeaker: "Midnight to 6 a.m. curfew is in effect," it said. "If you are not inside your hotel, you will go to jail."

About a dozen officers trailed the cruiser on foot, followed by another wave of cops. As the phalanx approached, revelers shouted, "Five-oh!" and scooted deeper into the Quarter. Inside Johnny White's, customers closed the door and the bartender hushed them.

But officers entered anyway, announced the curfew and politely urged everyone to leave. "I'm just doing what the mayor told me," one officer said. The small crowd of about 12 dispersed.

Tuesday at about 12:20 a.m., as Debbie Davis and Betty Titman walked toward their hotel, they joked that they had never been turned out of a bar — by police. Absorbing the stillness on Bourbon, they said it reminded them of Ash Wednesday.

Titman's cell phone rang. "I was just kicked out of a bar for curfew," she told the caller. "But you know what? I'm going to remember this one."

Davis smiled at the scene. "It's kind of nice, actually," she said. "I like the quiet."

Archbishop treated for cancer

By Bruce Nolan
Staff writer

Retired Archbishop Francis Schulte has prostate cancer, but after undergoing radiation treatment in Philadelphia is well enough to travel abroad, the archdiocese of New Orleans said Tuesday.

"My understanding is that he has undergone the standard radiation treatment. He asks for the prayers of the archdiocese and the larger community," the Rev. William Maestri said.

Schulte, 77, is well enough to be in Austria on business, Maestri said. Schulte serves on the board of governors of the International Theological Institute for Studies on Marriage and the Family in Gaming, Austria.

Schulte apparently sought medical care in his native Philadelphia weeks ago because medical care in New Orleans was disrupted by Hurricane Katrina, Maestri said.

Maestri had no information how early Schulte's cancer was detected or whether it had spread to other parts of the body.

Prostate cancer becomes increasingly common among older men. Often it is slow-growing, so much so that, depending on its stage at discovery and the patient's age, there is debate in the medical community whether to treat it or simply monitor it closely.

The American Cancer Society reports that the five-year survival rate for all men with prostate cancer is 99 percent, and 92 percent of all men diagnosed survive at least 10 years.

Schulte succeeded Archbishop Philip Hannan in 1989. He served 13 years, followed by current Archbishop Alfred Hughes.

Experts to give ideas for N.O.

Urban Land Institute to work with city

By Martha Carr
Staff writer

They talk about it as they wait in Red Cross lines, shuffle around shelters, and gather for nightly meals in the homes of generous relatives. When New Orleans rebuilds, they say, the city must seek input from the country's brightest urban planners, so things are done right this time.

Well, it appears that just might happen.

One of the country's preeminent think tanks on land use and real estate development has agreed to work for free advising Mayor Ray Nagin's 17-member Bring Back New Orleans commission as it tackles the monumental task of creating a master plan for the city's redevelopment by year's end.

The nonprofit Urban Land Institute, based in Washington, D.C., is planning to send a team of up to 15 experts to the city in mid-November to develop strategies for everything from designing new neighborhoods to enhancing the city's business centers. All recommendations will be based on cutting-edge practices being deployed by successful developers and city planners around the world, said Rachelle Levitt, ULI's executive vice president for policy and practice.

Best of all, it will be the opinion of outside experts who have no financial stake in the outcome.

"The beauty of this process is that this group of people is very passionate about coming here," Levitt said. "They have no ax to grind, no political reason to be here. They are all screened for conflicts of interest. Their thinking will be objective and unbiased."

While the advisory team has yet to be chosen, it will be composed of high-level developers, architects, academics, financiers, planners and environmentalists interested in preserving the city's unique culture and neighborhoods, Levitt said. All will be members of the Urban Land Institute.

Founded in 1936, ULI has more than 25,000 members worldwide and conducts up to 30 advisory service programs each year. In most cases, communities pay for the research and advice, and the process can take months.

But devising a plan for New Orleans in the wake of Hurricane Katrina will be a much different task.

The timeline is much tighter, since the mayor's commission will need the input before it finalizes a master plan by the end of the year. The task also requires much more labor than normal, Levitt said. ULI's entire 20-person policy staff is working full time to compile research on the city's history, as well as to devise ways to survey as many stakeholders as possible so that team members understand the politics and preferences of the populace. Much of that work would normally be done by the city.

"Unfortunately, the city is overwhelmed with taking care of immediate needs, so we are taking on some of that responsibility," Levitt said.

While not all of the Urban Land Institute's jobs deal with redevelopment after a crisis, some do. Most recently, ULI was hired to develop a retail plan for the World Trade Center site after Sept. 11. It also crafted a downtown redevelopment strategy for Grand Forks, Minn., after the devastating 1997 floods, Levitt said.

But this crisis — by far the worst natural disaster the country has ever seen — has generated unprecedented interest from the group's members, Levitt said.

The nonprofit was introduced to the mayor's commission by developer Joe Canizaro, who sits on the panel and is also a member of ULI.

Harahan takes million-dollar hit from storm

Nearly every public building damaged

By Matt Scallan
East Jefferson bureau

Hurricane Katrina caused about $1 million in damage to city property in Harahan, Mayor Paul Johnston said.

Virtually every public building in the city suffered some kind of injury, with the largest loss being Harahan Playground's gymnasium, where the roof was devastated and the storm re-arranged several recently purchased air-conditioning units. Water leaking through the roof damaged the gym's wood floor and stage.

"It's a big mess in there," said Johnston, who estimated the toll at about $600,000.

The playground's concessions stands, batting cage and other equipment also was damaged. City Hall, the fire station and the fence around the sewage treatment plant also suffered damage.

"The fence was leaning after (Tropical Storm) Cindy. I'm just glad we didn't have a chance to fix it before Katrina," Johnston said.

The playground's main ball field might not be in such good shape either, because several tons of ground-up trees are sitting in the middle of it.

Still, Harahan has made good progress cleaning up debris in front of people's homes, and garbage collection is beginning to catch up with what people are putting at curbside, Johnston said.

"We have some more to do, but we're pretty close to normal," he said. "About 80 percent of our residents and 80 percent of our businesses are open."

The major hurdles include finding the money to pay city workers after the next payroll and borrowing $3 million to tide City Hall over as it seeks reimbursement for its storm-related expenses. Johnston estimates that the cleanup of debris alone will cost the city some $800,000.

Harahan needs approval of the state Bond Commission to borrow money. The commission is scheduled to consider the matter on Oct. 20, Johnston said. The city is negotiating with a private lender to borrow the money.

FEMA pulled Jeff's plug

Antenna unhooked days after Katrina

By Sheila Grissett
East Jefferson bureau

As if the kick by the deadliest storm in Louisiana history didn't create crisis enough, Jefferson Parish officials say the Federal Emergency Management Agency knocked out their radio communications with field workers for several critical hours on Aug. 31, two days after Hurricane Katrina made landfall.

Telecommunications Director JoAnn Becnel said Tuesday that a contractor investigating the failure discovered that radio cables and equipment leading to an antenna atop the Galleria office building in Metairie had been disconnected and replaced with cables and equipment belonging to FEMA. The contractor called Becnel from the Galleria's roof.

"I told him to unplug theirs and plug ours back in," Becnel said.

FEMA spokesman Kim Pease said his agency had no knowledge of the report but is investigating whether the agency's Mobile Emergency Reponse System personnel were involved.

"They're the first on the ground. They come in with a truck fully loaded, and all they have to do is find power," Pease said. "They've already left the area, but I am contacting the person who was in charge."

The disruption lasted no more than four hours, but officials with Parish President Aaron Broussard's administration said it complicated a desperate situation. The radio failure stymied attempts by Jefferson's emergency managers, in the Emergency Operations Center in Marrero, to direct personnel on the ground at a time when much of East Jefferson was flooding, people were being rescued from rising water and thousands of displaced residents were seeking food and shelter. The storm already had knocked out conventional phone service.

Greg Buisson, a political consultant to Broussard, said that when radio communications abruptly failed that day, contract engineers were sent to check the system's two antennae, one atop the Marreo emergency center and the other atop the Galleria. The antennae communicate with each other via microwaves. When one is down, the system is skewed.

Buisson said FEMA could have added its own antenna to the Galleria tower without fiddling with Jefferson's equipment.

"If you want to add more, you have to go through a small construction process that takes several hours," he said. "If you don't want to go through that, you just pull out the amplifier that's there and put yours in."

Becnel said the antenna is one of several located on the Galleria roof and is accessed through a door marked for Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office equipment. She said technicians have assured her that Jefferson's cables were "clearly marked" as property of the parish, just as FEMA cables were marked as the property of that agency.

"I don't know how or why they picked ours," she said.

Teachers fear losing health coverage

After November, insurance uncertain

By Sandra Barbier
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

Just after Hurricane Katrina, St. Bernard Parish teachers Michael and Sherry Chimento thought the worst was over. They lost their home in Chalmette and a small vacation house in Bay St. Louis, Miss. Soon after, they lost their jobs when the School Board ran out of money to pay salaries last month.

But while the Chimentos were living with a relative near Dallas last month, their world came crashing down around them again. Their youngest child, Drew, 10, was diagnosed with leukemia.

Statistics give Drew a 90 percent chance of beating the disease, but even with the best results, the Chimentos are looking at three more years of treatments at a cost of about $100,000 a year. And their health insurance, like that of the St. Bernard Parish public school district's other 1,100 employees, could expire at the end of November.

"It's an unbelievable burden to have to worry about health costs," Michael Chimento said.

The Chimentos' plea illustrates how the losses from the storm continue to mount for thousands of workers from the New Orleans area. After watching their homes, possessions and paychecks disappear, many are now grappling with the possible loss of their health insurance, one of the most expensive benefits many employers provide.

"Our employees tell us (health insurance) is the No. 1 concern until we are able to recall them to work or they can find alternate employment," said Doris Voitier, superintendent of St. Bernard's school system.

It's a crisis affecting every teacher in the system, the most devastated in southeast Louisiana. Employees were placed on disaster-related leave without pay on Sept. 30, and Voitier advised them to seek jobs elsewhere. She said last month that employees were guaranteed health insurance only through Oct. 31. But this week officials extended the term through Nov. 30 after the school district received money from the state's Minimum Foundation Program, the main source of state financing for schools.

Whether money from that program or some other money will continue to be paid to the school district is unclear.

School officials hope to reopen a temporary school in January for children of returning families and recovery workers, but they have warned that the return to normal will be painfully slow. The parish is not collecting any sales taxes, and Voitier said property values could be lowered so drastically because of the devastation that residents would not have to pay property taxes.

St. Bernard Parish school employees get their health insurance through the Office of State Group Benefits, and the district pays a premium of $1 million a month. Officials are hoping the state will funnel enough money to the district to continue health benefits and to keep a small operating staff, "so we can plan, recover, and be ready for when students move back in," Voitier said.

She said she is pleading with nearly every state and federal official and elected representative she can find.

"I'm getting ready to talk to the Louisiana School Boards Association . . . to plead our case . . . to convince our Legislature that this is a definite need for our employees," she said.

A decision could come next month, when the Legislature convenes a special session to discuss possible changes in the state's distribution of Minimum Foundation Program money, among other Katrina-related issues.

Currently, the cash is distributed on a per-pupil allowance based on a school district's enrollment as of Oct. 1, 2004. That formula, however, could change to take money from parishes that have lost schools and students and give it to systems that have enrolled the displaced students.

Voitier said that she understands other districts need an increase in state money, but that parishes affected by the hurricane need help.

"If funding (for St. Bernard schools) ceases, or is dramatically reduced in November, I have no revenues from any source," Voitier said.

If the system gets more money, Voitier said health benefits would be given first to employees who have not found other jobs and to retired employees, at least for the current school year.

St. Bernard Parish school social workers John Campbell and his wife, Ginny Campbell, who both lost their jobs last month, await news about their insurance.

Campbell, 58, who has health problems including diabetes, said he might be able to get an extension of his current coverage under the federal COBRA plan, but only for 18 months and at a much higher premium.

"It would be over $500 a month just for me," he said.

He said he can't get insurance on his own otherwise. "I have a daughter who is in the insurance business. She's told me, 'Dad, you're uninsurable.' "

Michael Chimento said news of the one-month extension of his family's insurance was wonderful, but it leaves them uncertain of the future.

"It's almost like it makes you live on the edge," he said.

DOUBLE TROUBLE

A fire damaged town houses at 4825 and 4827 Zenith St. in Metairie on Tuesday morning. One firefighter was treated at East Jefferson General Hospital and released, Fire Department spokesman George Rigamer said. No one was home at the time of the fire. The homes sustained fire and water damage, Rigamer said. The cause of the fire is under investigation.

SIGNS OF CONFLICT

Kenner, East Jeff take opposite views of illegal advertising

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

Code enforcement officials in Kenner and Jefferson Parish are taking opposite tacks on the illegal advertising signs that have spread like kudzu since Hurricane Katrina: Kenner is taking them down, while parish officials might leave them up for the rest of the year.

Kenner officials began this week to remove the signs, located on seemingly every street corner advertising everything from restaurants and job openings to cleaning services and roof repair.

"The guy from out of town that peppered the neutral ground with signs — we can't allow that," said Phil Ramon, chief of staff to Mayor Phil Capitano. "We have to try and enforce the existing code."

Ramon authorized the Code Enforcement Department on Monday to begin picking up signs because they impede drivers' views and hamper public workers trying to maintain public property. The decision makes Kenner the only area in East Jefferson where these signs are not allowed, officials said.

Kenner made an exception in the weeks after Hurricane Katrina, but code enforcement workers now are out picking up the signs. Ramon said City Hall will let businesses post signs in front of their own buildings."

"We're just not allowing the carte blanche that has been allowed to take place," Ramon said.

In unincorporated areas of the east bank, however, parish officials have not removed any signs. And the Parish Council today is expected to consider a measure to allow the signs to remain in place the rest of the year.

Parish Council Chairman Tom Capella said he thinks finding someone to fix homes, or workers to staff a business, trumps the problem of having a sign on the neutral ground. Councilman John Young said relaxing the ban on these signs is important to jump-start Jefferson businesses.

"In an unprecedented situation, you need to think out of the box," Young said.

Jefferson Code Enforcement Director Louis Savoye said the policy of Parish President Aaron Broussard's administration since soon after Katrina struck Aug. 29 has been to allow the signs because they promote businesses. Parish workers are supposed to remove them to cut grass on public property, then replace them, Savoye said.

"As of right now, the instructions are that they are to stay out to support business," Savoye said.

The parish's view makes more sense to Carlos Liriano, owner of Dreams, a Kenner check-cashing and communications business, who said his signs were removed. He said he thinks Kenner also should give businesses more of a break.

"We need to let our people know we are in business," Liriano said. "I'm really disappointed in the city officials."

He said he asked Kenner code enforcement workers about the signs on Friday, before he spent $200 on the new advertising. They told him the signs could remain up for the rest of the month, he said.

Ramon said there was never a policy to allow the signs through October.

City Councilwoman Jeannie Black said code enforcement is correct to pick up the signs as a way of improving Kenner's appearance.

"It's gotten out of hand," she said. "I've gotten some complaints from people in my district who said it looks awful."

Bridgette Moritz, store manager at Humbug, disagreed.

"They look a lot nicer than the trash that's piled up everywhere, and they're helping businesses get back on their feet," said Moritz, whose store sells dancewear, costumes and formal wear. She said she had a number of signs removed.

Signs are not being removed in East Jefferson's only other municipality. "Under normal circumstances I don't like them, but I'm leaving them alone for now," Harahan Mayor Paul Johnston said.

Jeff courts in slow motion

Lawyers, defendants are in short supply

By Paul Purpura
West Bank bureau

Absent were the crowded elevators and the long lines at security checkpoints. No courtroom drama played out and, in a few cases, attorneys appeared before judges to set new court dates for criminal and civil trials.

"Not that much happening over here today, I'll tell you that," public defender Joseph Montgomery said.

Nonetheless, the 24th Judicial District Court in Gretna reopened for business Tuesday, more than six weeks after the judiciary closed down because of Hurricane Katrina.

Chief Judge Robert Pitre was to the point in describing the road ahead: "It's going to be tough."

The 1,100 inmates at the nearby Jefferson Parish Correctional Center evacuated before the storm to state-run facilities across Louisiana and might not be returned until next month, Pitre said.

The complication is health care. The Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office, which relied on the now-closed Charity Hospital in New Orleans, has no way to provide medical care for inmates, Pitre said. The Sheriff's Office also lost 68 correctional deputies, he said.

Also, jury trials have been postponed until January, because much of the parish's pool of potential jurors evacuated. While most criminal defendants plead guilty, judges can still hold bench trials if defendants waive their right to a jury trial, Pitre said.

"The thing that's going to set us back most is the criminal cases," he said.

Attorneys are displaced, too, including law firms that reopened outside the New Orleans area. Court staff are trying to reach them to set new hearing dates, Pitre said.

Meanwhile, the parish's indigent defense system is operating on budgetary fumes because its main income, court costs, has evaporated, said Richard Thompson, Jefferson's chief indigent defender who lost two of 40 public defenders.

"We haven't taken in a dime since Sept. 1," Thompson said. "We're living off our fund balance, which is quickly dwindling. No court costs, no money."

Aside from an annual Louisiana Indigent Defense Assistance Board grant of $180,000, enough to cover a month of salaries for his staff, Thompson's office relies on revenue generated by court costs, about $2 million a year.

First and Second Parish Courts, which handle traffic citations and minor criminal and civil matters, reopened last week. But since the storm, traffic-ticket writing understandably hasn't been a priority of law enforcement agencies, Thompson said.

Katrina also forced four judges and their staffs to move to new offices after fierce winds ripped open the roof on the Salvador A. Liberto Building.

Judge Martha Sassone and her staff spent Tuesday sifting through the bagged and boxed records that were salvaged from her chambers in the Liberto Building. Tropical Storm Cindy came ashore July 5 and opened the roof above her chambers. Katrina undid the repairs, she said. Records that were not in file cases, equipment, furniture and personal items, including artwork, were ruined, she said

"It will probably take us the rest of the week to get organized," Sassone said in her new office at the parish courthouse.

Judges Greg Guidry, Kernan "Skip" Hand and Hans Liljeberg, and their staffs, also in the Liberto Building, moved to the courthouse.

"It's definitely going to be a day-by-day experience for us," Sassone said.

Calvin Melerine washes mud from his home on Delabert Street in Chalmette on Tuesday. Melerine said he has spent seven days digging mud out of his home with the help of three workers. 'I saved it in Betsy, I think I can do it again, but it's a lot more,' Melerine said. "I want to come back. The majority of the neighbors are not coming back,' he added.

Gov. Blanco not sold on casino plan

From staff reports

Gov. Kathleen Blanco weighed in Tuesday on New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's proposal to let big downtown hotels offer casino gambling as a way to generate tax revenue and stimulate the city's tourism economy.

"I know Mayor Nagin is working hard to restart the New Orleans economy, and I am certainly working closely with him to do so," Blanco said. "I urge caution, however, in looking to the expansion of gambling as a quick fix to our economic problems in the city. I have never believed that gambling should be the base on which to build our economy."

Blanco said one of her solutions to revive the New Orleans area is to seek federal tax credits for individuals and businesses to create an environment that attracts people and companies.

Blanco also praised the Orleans Parish School Board for its move last week to allow more public charter schools.

Attack on Bourbon Street just business as usual

It was pitiful to see the abuse inflicted upon a 64-year-old African-American male by at least three white New Orleans police officers. However, the expression "business as usual" comes to mind.

In pre-Katrina days, innocent African-Americans were beaten by officers of the New Orleans Police Department; post-Katrina days apparently entail the same.

There is no doubt in my mind that all of these officers have been under extreme stress since Hurricane Katrina. However, so have we all. Handling pressure well is an intrinsic element of being a mature police officer. Did anyone ever think that perhaps the victim was under stress?

Anyone who has lived in New Orleans for any length of time knows the NOPD's history of abuse and corruption. I have been living in New Orleans for 40 years, and I am quite aware of it. Spokesman Marlon Defillo stated that under normal circumstances it takes unusually offensive behavior to trigger an arrest on Bourbon Street. This is so far from the truth that it is sickening.

In May 2004, my brother (who happens to be an African-American) went to a Walgreens in the French Quarter. He was attacked and beaten by two white New Orleans police officers, for no reason. Were these cops stressed out then?

Mr. Defillo further stated that it was not normal for a police officer to react violently with a member of the news media. Well, is it OK to act that way with a citizen? Perhaps this is normal behavior for some cops; it's just that this time, they got caught on tape.

If Mayor Ray Nagin wants residents of Orleans Parish to come back, he needs to address the issue of police brutality and to convince the citizens that it will not be business as usual.

Employer helps pick up the pieces

Six painful weeks have passed since Hurricane Katrina took away our homes, our neighbors and friends. Now it is time to put our lives back together, to pick up what is left and to never forgot the tremendous outpouring of generosity and kindness. It is with pleasure that I apprise you of the care that URS Corp. showed its 600 metro New Orleans employees, starting within a few days after Hurricane Katrina.

Almost immediately after Katrina hit the Gulf Coast area, URS set up an emergency hotline to locate all its employees in the area. When the company learned that one of its employees was missing a loved one, the company hired a private investigator to find him. After two long weeks, a family was reunited.

URS made arrangements to relocate us to other offices so that we could continue to work and get paid. The company also arranged to find employees temporary housing, food and transportation at reduced costs. It arranged for credit cards and phone cards for employees who needed them.

As an employee of URS, I congratulate the company. URS's generosity has helped hundreds of employees and their families cope with the loss of their homes and city.

City Park in New Orleans was devastated by high winds in Hurricane Katrina.

Close City Park, rent to FEMA

City Park Director Robert Becker stated that City Park could be "totally abandoned" due to the damage from Hurricane Katrina and the lack of funding for cleanup and repairs.

Perhaps closing the park would provide the shakeup that is needed for the city of New Orleans to realize what a treasure it has, or had.

Many residents are unaware that City Park receives no public money from the city of New Orleans, amazing as that seems considering that the park is such a vital part of the city. Could the next step be that all park space north of I-610 and the space in and around Tad Gormley Stadium be used by FEMA to park trailers for displaced homeowners from the areas bordering the park?

Not a bad idea, considering that FEMA rental fees could provide a good source of park funding.

If few homes are livable in the communities surrounding the park, then who is there to use the park? City Park could be a savior for its neighborhoods.

It would be a tough decision, but one that could save the park and wake up the city administration.

Mutual attraction is best

The key to New Orleans' future is in determining the "magnets" we will use to attract business and families back to the region. Tourism and the port, our long-standing magnets, are fine, but inadequate for securing an economic future for the city. So what "magnets" do we choose?

How about one of the many fledgling industries that were gaining a tentative foothold in the area before the storm?

There were the technology park near UNO, biomedical research on the lakefront and at our teaching hospitals, the burgeoning movie industry and the expansion of museums, both historical and cultural.

What magnet do we not choose?

More casinos.

They attract, all right, but what they attract are a tackier image for the city and lower-paying jobs.

It's true: If you build "it," they will come. But what will the "it" be?

Don't citizens' lives count?

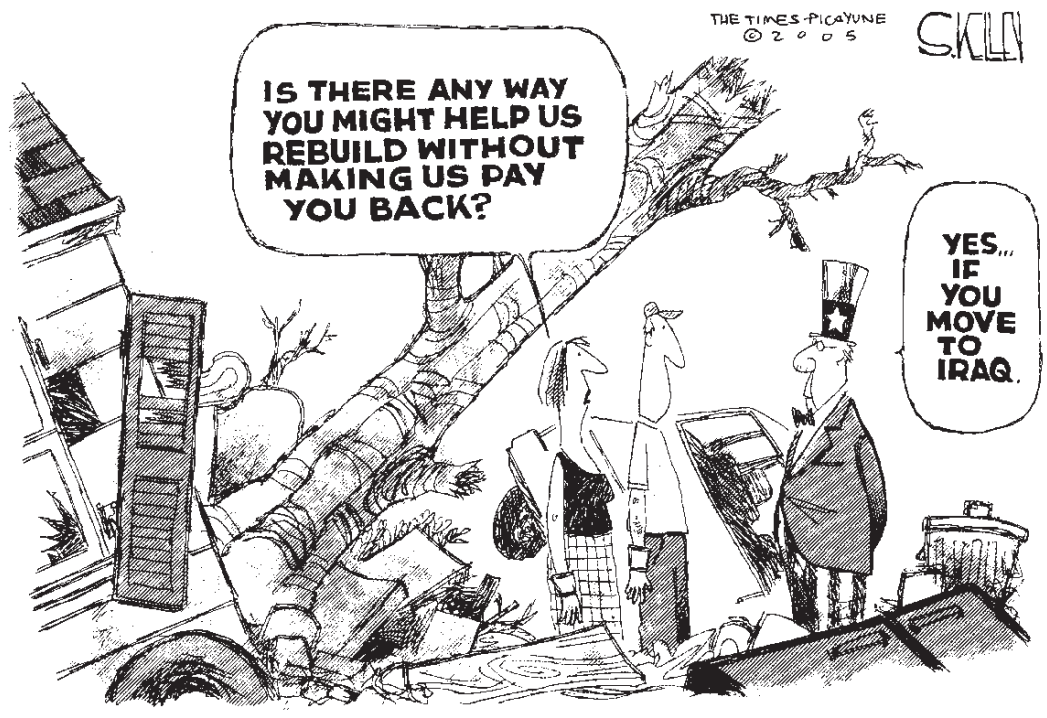
I understand Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard's decision to evacuate personnel for safety reasons, but not once did he broadcast the fact that it was to be done.

My father has had several episodes of deep leg thrombosis; my mother is in diapers with advanced Alzheimer's. Both are unable to travel long distances by car. We stayed in a three-story building on Causeway Boulevard and Interstate 10 watching the helicopter drop. We survived, albeit with no power. Once the water receded we left in the one car that would start.



How dare Parish President Broussard think that the lives of key personnel are worth more than ours!

OUR OPINIONS

The pump debacle

Lots of people in Jefferson Parish are furious over Parish President Aaron Broussard's decision to evacuate more than 200 pump station workers as Hurricane Katrina loomed in the Gulf of Mexico. And while Mr. Broussard has vehemently defended that move ever since, residents have ample reason to be upset.

Mr. Broussard's administration suggests that the evacuation probably didn't exacerbate any flooding in the parish. The parish president himself has said that protecting workers' lives is more important than avoiding damage to property.

But this is a false choice, because moving parish employees out of harm's way may well have increased the risk to Jefferson residents who remained behind.

Even in the face of a hurricane as strong as Katrina, a great many residents will stay in their homes — because they don't have cars, because they're too ill to travel, because they're just plain stubborn. Any move by parish government that increases the chances of flooding also increases the risk to those citizens' safety.

Much of East Jefferson, like much of the rest of greater New Orleans, was built on drained swampland. An elaborate network of drainage canals and pump stations is crucial to keeping water off the streets. But for 36 hours on Aug. 28 and 29, Jefferson pump stations sat vacant, after parish officials sent a total of 1,100 workers and 700 vehicles to Mount Hermon, near the Mississippi line. East Jefferson residents whose homes took on water are right to wonder whether that decision contributed to the damage.

Mr. Broussard's concern for public employees' welfare is understandable. Existing pump stations currently aren't safe places for workers to ride out strong hurricanes. And the parish president maintains that forcing pump workers, who receive relatively low pay, to stay on the job would be a "death sentence."

But in the future, the obvious remedy is to find more adequate shelters in — or at least near — the parish and to offer greater pay to workers who accept the risk of staying on duty during hurricanes.

Sending pumping station workers to a site 100 miles away surely hampered Jefferson's ability to respond to conditions created by Hurricane Katrina. Local governments in low-lying areas need to acknowledge that, to most residents, the property damage caused by flooding is no minor matter — and that pumping water out can be a life-and-death matter for those who do not evacuate.

Raze the old, raise the new

A bulldozer wouldn't be anyone's first choice for post-Katrina recovery, but St. Bernard residents and property owners who face that possibility will at least find out what their options are soon.

Architects, civil engineers and building officials from California who have volunteered their services will be going through St. Bernard Parish this week to inspect every building and determine how much structural damage each suffered.

This team won't decide the fate of individual property; owners will have the ultimate say over whether they restore a home or business or raze it. But for some, demolition may be the only feasible alternative. Parish officials estimate that will be true for about half of St. Bernard's 26,700 homes. The Federal Emergency Management Agency will pay the demolition cost for any structure that sustained 50 percent damage or more.

The loss of a home is terribly painful. But parish officials are wise to get answers for people as quickly as possible. People can't start rebuilding until they know whether they'll be facing extensive repair work — or starting from scratch.

Property owners will face a lot of decisions in the weeks and months to come that will affect St. Bernard's future, but so will government officials. It's good to hear people like Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez talking about the opportunity to correct past mistakes stemming from unplanned growth in the past.

"We are going to rebuild bigger and better, and we are going to have more green space," he said.

Parish officials should commit to that goal. If they do, St. Bernard residents will have more reason than ever to come home.

Unprepared for pandemic

Louisianians will hardly be surprised to learn that our nation is unprepared for a flu pandemic. After all, the country was woefully unprepared for Katrina, and hurricanes are a more predictable risk.

When the next influenza pandemic occurs — and experts say it will — the worldwide death toll could be in the millions. It's troubling to hear Michael Leavitt, secretary of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, admit that the United States isn't ready.

Researchers have been saying for some time that a strain of bird flu ravaging Asia has the potential to mutate, becoming transmissible from human to human. Developing a response plan that includes faster ways to manufacture flu vaccine and sufficient stockpiles of antiviral drugs is critical, and President Bush did meet last week with major drug manufacturers to talk about the need to mass-produce vaccine quickly.

But in the same breath, the administration is downplaying the risk. Mr. Leavitt said that scientists and physicians have told him the probability of a pandemic is relatively low. He must not be talking to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, which maintains that an influenza epidemic is certain to happen and may be imminent.

Downplaying the risk isn't the way to get people to take a threat seriously. Even though Mr. Leavitt called for better preparation, he undercut the sense of urgency. That's not smart. If Mr. Leavitt wants to talk about probability, maybe he should consider what happened here. The probability of a major hurricane hitting the New Orleans area in any one year was no doubt pretty low, too.

Thinking outside the board on schools

JOHN MAGINNIS

A surprise proposal made by the mayor of New Orleans last week roused controversy and opposition but nonetheless represented an innovative, bold concept that could spur on the city's recovery and lead to a brighter future for the whole community, even the state.

It was not Mayor Ray Nagin's call for downtown casinos housed in the city's largest hotels. That idea makes even less sense than when former Gov. Edwin Edwards first offered it in 1986. Not only will expanded land-based gaming not pass the Legislature, but, if it did, the state would still keep most of the money — despite the mayor's call for a 50-50 split with the city. And too much of that money would still be lost by locals, who can afford the vice even less now.

Such a change would require voiding the exclusivity contract with Harrah's New Orleans casino and its $60 million guaranteed tax payments (which it still pays at the rate of $164,000 a day despite being shut down for more than six weeks now). While New Orleans would get a jump on the comeback of destroyed casinos on the Mississippi Gulf Coast, it won't be long before they are replaced with bigger and glitzier gambling palaces onshore that will recapture their old market in short order.

No, more promising was the other bold idea the mayor espoused: to set up a citywide system of charter schools that would be free of the control of the divided School Board and dysfunctional bureaucracy and that would bring in millions of dollars in aid from foundations, universities and the federal government.

A network of well-run, well-financed schools with motivated faculties could attract families back to the city the way the old mismanaged, bankrupt system attracted FBI agents. Also, nothing would improve the overall performance of basic education statewide more than to make over what was the largest and poorest-performing district.

Actually, the mayor did not conceive the plan so much as he jumped on the bandwagon that was already moving at that very hour when a split School Board approved the charter-school model for reopening the 13 schools on the city's west bank. Supportive board members envision using more charter schools to re-start schools in the rest of the city.

Behind the scenes, planning for the charter-school proposal had been going on for weeks among west bank officials, the state Department of Education, the Board of Elementary and Secondary Education and the governor's office, according to a source familiar with the discussions.

Community representatives gradually will replace current School Board members on the new system's governing body, which would still follow state laws and accountability standards but would have more flexibility in curriculum and hiring. The operational plan, including contracting out food service and transportation, will follow one drawn up by the out-of-state turnaround firm managing the school system's finances.

Major new players would be education foundations, universities and corporations nationwide that are poised to pour millions into reinventing New Orleans schools, but only if they are out from under the control of the School Board, which, in a recent meeting, showed itself to be as quarrelsome and divided after the hurricane as before it. Also available will be a $20.9 million federal grant to expand charter schools.

Charter schools have been sprouting up around the city and the state. But it took, tragically, Katrina to wipe the dirtiest slate clean and to leave little alternative but to rebuild the system around a smaller enrollment and in a new environment.

Dissenters of the plan, including the School Board president, argued that charter schools have too spotty an academic track record to risk a wholesale conversion. Yet the best results have been achieved by national outfits like Knowledge Is Power Program, which already has set up an academy for displaced New Orleans students in Houston. All told, charter schools are less of a gamble than more casinos.

These are not the circumstances under which anyone wanted to reform education in New Orleans, but the unforgiving storm does provide the opportunity to make at least one vital aspect of community life better than it was before.

His conscience is clear, but name is mud

AP PHOTO

A car sits on a flooded street in Metairie Sept. 5 after Hurricane Katrina left large parts of Jefferson Parish under water.

One of the reasons the late Jefferson Parish President Joe Yenni's name lives on is that he is credited with significantly reducing the flood risk.

After the deluge of 1978 left water in 25,000 houses, Yenni led the charge to issue $80 million in bonds to build pumping stations and revet canals. Subsequent downpours proved less of an inconvenience, and now the parish office building and a Kenner street bear the name of Joe Yenni.

That may not be the only reason he is commemorated — he always had a reputation as an honest politician in a parish where that had begun to seem a contradiction in terms — but, if the burghers believe you'll keep them dry, winning an election is a breeze.

Right now it seems highly unlikely that posterity will ever take a stroll along Aaron Broussard Boulevard or enter the portals of the Aaron Broussard building. Broussard is not the first parish president whose name became mud, but he is the first to be blamed for depositing it in his constituents' homes.

Whether the fury directed at Broussard is justified makes no never mind. So many voters believe the Katrina floodwaters could have been stemmed had Broussard not yanked the pumping station operators from their posts that the question on many lips is not whether Broussard can get re-elected but whether he'll quit before his term is up.

His detractors, moreover, are not just householders with piles of Sheetrock and sodden furniture on their front lawns. The East Jefferson Levee Board and the city of Kenner think Broussard goofed and both have offered to operate the pumps if the parish is going to bail out when they are most needed.

Broussard is mounting a spirited defense, but one aspect of his so-called "doomsday plan" was so surpassingly idiotic that political spin is powerless. The pumping station workers were trucked to Mount Hermon, which is more than 100 miles to the north and where the ravages of Katrina predictably left them incommunicado. Every station in the parish sat idle as the waters rose after the storm.

Broussard suggests that the answer might be to send the pump workers westward next time. Does he believe his constituents will be reassured if key workers are only, say, 50 miles away the next time the floods come? If he has a yen to return to private life, this is just the kind of proposal that will make it happen.

He wouldn't get far in an election campaign promising to keep the stations running so long as the sun is shining and the birds are singing.

The Broussard administration maintains the absence of pump workers did not exacerbate the flooding, although its objectivity is open to question and it is obvious that neither Kenner, the Levee Board nor aggrieved homeowners believe it.

Broussard, whose post-Katrina television interviews did not suggest a taste of understatement, said leaving the pump workers in place would have amounted to "a death sentence." The Kenner and Levee Board employees who are prepared to do the job next time evidently figure there is a way to do the job and survive. Police and other emergency workers beavered away during the storm, and even politicians, Broussard included, stayed around.

Hazard is part of the job for many public employees in times of crisis.

Pump workers, Broussard points out, earn only laborers' wages. Well, let us by all means pay them enough to reflect the hardships and dangers, but a "doomsday plan" that leaves us pumpless in a storm is surely well named.

Protecting employees' lives, Broussard reasons, is more important than protecting property, and nobody will disagree. However, keeping the floodwaters down can save lives too, and maybe the options are not as simple as he suggests.

If they were that simple, perhaps he did the right thing. If he can persuade the voters that he did, they should put his name up in lights.

The left should know where cronies dwell

JOHN TIERNEY

The left has a lock on journalism and law schools.

Journalists and legal scholars have been decrying "cronyism" and calling for "mainstream" values when picking a Supreme Court justice. But how do they go about picking the professors to train the next generation of journalists and lawyers?

David Horowitz, the conservative who is president of the Center for the Study of Popular Culture, analyzed the political affiliations of the faculty at 18 elite journalism and law schools. By checking all the party registrations he could find, he concluded that Democrats outnumber Republicans by 8 to 1 at the law schools, with the ratio ranging from 3 to 1 at Penn to 28 to 1 at Stanford.

Only one journalism school, the University of Kansas, had a preponderance of Republicans (by 10 to 8). At the rest of the schools, there was a 6-to-1 ratio of Democrats to Republicans. The ratio was 4 to 1 at Northwestern and New York University, 13 to 1 at the University of Southern California, 15 to 1 at Columbia. Horowitz didn't find any Republicans at Berkeley.

Some academics try to argue that their political ideologies don't affect the way they teach, which to me is proof of how detached they've become from reality in their monocultures. This claim is especially dubious if you're training lawyers and journalists to deal with controversial public policies.

I realize, from experience at six newspapers, that most journalists try not to impose their prejudices on their work. When I did stories whose facts challenged liberal orthodoxies, editors were glad to run them. When liberal reporters wrote stories, they tried to present the conservative perspective.

The problem isn't so much the stories that appear as the ones that no one thinks to do. Journalists naturally tend to pursue questions that interest them. So when you have a press corps that's heavily Democratic — more than 80 percent, according to some surveys of Washington journalists — they tend to do stories that reflect Democrats' interests.

When they see a problem, their instinct is to ask what the government can do to solve it. I once sat in on a newspaper story conference the day after an armored-car company was robbed of millions of dollars bound for banks. The first idea that came up for a follow-up story was: Does this robbery show the need for stricter regulation of armored-car companies?

We kicked this idea around until I suggested that companies in the business of transporting cash already had a fairly strong incentive not to lose it — presumably an even stronger incentive than any government official regulating their security arrangements. That story idea died, but not the mindset that produced it.

The surest way to impress the judges for a journalism prize is to write a series of articles that spur a legislature to right some evil, particularly if it was committed by a corporation. When journalists do exposés of government malfeasance, they usually focus on the need for more regulations and bigger budgets, not on whether the government should be doing the job in the first place.

To some extent, this is a problem of self-selection. Journalism attracts people who want to right wrongs, and the generation that's been running journalism schools and media businesses came of age when government, especially the federal government, was seen as the solution to most wrongs. These executives, like the tenured radicals in law schools and the rest of academia, hired ideological cronies and shaped their institutions to reflect their views.

I'm not suggesting that journalism or law schools should be forced to have ideological balance on their faculties — this is one of those many problems that doesn't require a solution by government. But it's curious how little the institutions care about it.

They keep meticulous tabs on the race and gender and ethnic background of their students and faculty. But the lack of political diversity is taken as a matter of course. As long as the professors look different, why worry if they all think the same?

Grave after grave

GOURE, NIGER — Welcome to the most wretched country in the world.

Niger is dead last of the 177 nations ranked in the latest U.N. Human Development Report, based on its heartbreaking rates of poverty, illiteracy and mortality. On a 650-mile drive across the country from the Niger capital, Niamey, to this eastern city, I stopped in village after village where peasants told of young children dying of starvation in the last few months. One man named Haroun Mani had just buried three of his eight children.

"They didn't have enough to eat, and then they got diarrhea and weakened and died," he explained. None had seen a doctor; in Niger, there is one doctor for every 33,000 people.

Granted, it's difficult for Western readers who are dieting to comprehend people who are starving. But Niger seems a good place to ponder the failings of a system of international aid that is often irrational and catastrophically inept, leading to the deaths of those children — Suraj, 5, Barida, 3, and Hawau, 2 — along with millions more across the continent.

A crucial mistake is our refusal to provide substantial agricultural assistance to increase African food production. Instead, we ship tons of food in emergency aid after people have already started dying. It's like a policy of scrimping on manhole covers because we're too busy rescuing people who fall into manholes.

In Niger, it has been apparent since the beginning of this year that a food crisis was coming, but the world ignored a U.N. emergency appeal for $3 million in aid in February. Then in July, BBC television showed wrenching images of children dying. Niger promptly received more aid in the last 10 days of July than it had received in the previous eight months.

In fact, the situation is more complex than the television images suggest. The reality is that people in Niger are always starving.

One problem is that U.S. law generally requires our food aid to be purchased in American markets and transported on American ships. The upshot is that much of the donation is wasted on shipping costs, the aid is delayed, and when it arrives our grain risks depressing local prices and long-term production incentives. To his credit, President Bush has pushed to ease this requirement, but members of Congress are blocking him, because they value farmers' votes more than African lives.

Above all, we need a major new international initiative to extend the Green Revolution to Africa. Farmers in tropical Africa get only 1,500 pounds of cereal grain per acre, compared with 4,900 pounds in China. Pedro Sanchez, an agricultural expert at Columbia University, has estimated that Africans could triple food production if they used modern seeds and methods.

In the village of Angaual Goge Haouna, where seven children died in the last few months of starvation, villagers said they wanted more fertilizer above all, as well as better seeds and help exploiting a nearby lake for irrigation.

"I'm not only using the same techniques as my grandfather, I'm actually using the same implements," said Momom Bukhary, a 63-year-old man. "And this land used to be far more productive than it is now. When I was young, the annual harvest would last a full year, longer in good times. Now it only lasts three months, and then we run out of food."

In the news business, we don't lead with headlines like "Millions of Children Dying in Africa," because that's not actually news. It's the wallpaper.

Yet realities like that should inspire our priorities. And we're not even using our aid money wisely. Unless we help start a Green Revolution in Africa, we'll be back in Niger year after year — and every village will be surrounded by more tiny graves.

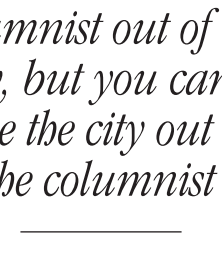
Southern literature and the meaning of Britney's bra

CHRIS ROSE

NEW YORK — Much of the celebrity world wants to help out in this time of great need for south Louisiana and Mississippi.

It warmed my heart, for instance, to see that Britney Spears was auctioning off one of her bras on eBay with the promise to donate all the money to a Katrina relief fund of one kind or another.

I guess we all contribute whatever talent we can to the effort, and certainly Britney Spears has a talent for wearing bras. She has also cultivated an attraction for controversy over the years so that even something as benign as a simple transfer of used underwear into a tax-exempt charitable donation has come back to bite her on her sweet Southern backside.



After accumulating online bids of up to $30,000, a stink was raised among competing bidders as to the true provenance of the bra; the question being not whether Britney actually owns the damn thing, but when and where she actually wore it.

This distinction may or may not have any meaning to the average newspaper reader but — trust me — it's a big deal for the type of guy who is willing to pay the comparable price of, say, a new Lexus, to own a skimpy article of clothing that has rested upon the bare flesh of pop's infamous tart. (And, I should add: I consider the readers of this column to be far from "average.")

Well, to make this story short, it turns out the bra was NOT, as originally promoted, the one that she wore for the making of her "Baby, One More Time" video — the one where she vamps as a doe-eyed Catholic school girl begging for more, more, more (and I'm not talking about algebra homework here).

But it turns out it was just from some dumb HBO promotional video she did and since she was, like, 20 when she wore this bra

Long road home

You can take the columnist out of the city, but you can't take the city out of the columnist

WEST ON LOUISIANA 451 TO LOUISIANA 1 GOING SOUTH OVER THE MORGANZA FLOODWAY THEN OVER THE SUNSHINE BRIDGE PAST SORRENTO AND ANYTHING RESEMBLING A ROAD GOING TOWARD NEW ORLEANS –

Here's what I'm thinking as I push the pedal to the metal, breaking every speed limit on every highway, knowing I'm going to write about this escapade:

What you just read was probably the longest dateline in the history of newspapers – but this has been the worst hurricane in history and this is the longest I have been away from my city in 35 years, so who cares? Just as the parking rules in New Orleans have been temporarily suspended, so have the journalism rules.

I know this because by the power of special dispensation that columnists are endowed with, I'm the one who suspended them.

After 42 days and 42 nights – by my count two days longer than Noah's flood – in the Cajun prairie and farmland of Avoyelles Parish on Bayou des Glaises, we're going home – faster than a six-legged jackrabbit.

Like gypsies, we have fled the cows and cotton fields, leaving behind as the only evidence that we once occupied a rambling 75-year-old farmhouse a strand of purple, green and gold Rex beads, resting on a sideboard.

And some cold beer in the fridge for the next displaced souls who seek sanctuary there.

Before we fled the country, we had gone into New Orleans to retrieve my aging wife's Toyota – uh, sorry, little slip of the tongue there – to retrieve my wife's aging Toyota. No way could we have packed up in one vehicle all the clothes and gear we amassed to stock the old farmhouse.

So, there we were – about to convoy in two cars absolutely crammed with computers and equipment, bags of food, four ice chests, box fans, oscillating fans, duffel bags of clothes, dirty laundry, bags of shoes, bed linens, pillows, a barbecue pit, two bags of cotton we had picked as a souvenir, a case of wine we never drank and a couple of hogs we adopted as pets.

Just kidding – no pet hogs, but we did bring home some homemade sausage. Had to – Avoyelles is hog country.

I took a look at the cars and the packing job before we pulled out and said, sure, there's enough of a crack through all this stuff to see through part of the back window. Then as I was driving, I looked through the rearview mirror at my wife's car and all I could think of was this: How can she possibly see through all those lovebugs smashed on

CHLOE ON 'FREDDIE'

Starring Freddie Prinze Jr. as a Chicago bachelor enduring the home invasion of multiple generations of female family members, the new ABC sitcom "Freddie" debuts Wednesday at 7:30 p.m.

The series has undergone a significant casting change since the show was announced in May — but not in the most important role, Zoey the teenage niece, as portrayed by Metairie expatriate Chloe Suazo.

The change, ho-hum: Madchen Amick ("Twin Peaks," "Joey") joins as the impulsive sister-in-law to Prinze's saucy chef, Freddie Moreno. If you have power, "Freddie" will be worth burning precious electrons only to monitor our local angle. Likely much better than anything they'll spin on "Freddie" is Suazo's personal story, which is:

St. Martin's Episcopal School student and mom head west to test the Los Angeles casting waters.

Suazo lands role on hot-list HBO comedy "The Comeback." Also gets cast on "Freddie." Leaves since-canceled "Comeback," which starred "Friends" alum Lisa Kudrow (hence the early, unfulfilled, heat).

Suazo charms fellow "Freddie" cast members by memorizing everybody else's lines during pilot shoot.

Suazo charms TV critics assembled for summertime Hollywood TV tour.

The next chapter airs tonight.

Chloe Suazo moved from Metairie to Hollywood and landed a role in the ABC sitcom 'Freddie,' bowing at 7:30 tonight on WGNO-Channel 26.

More tips for mending your broken home

Tread lightly

Tires take a beating in the littered streets of home

For each shingle that Katrina huffed and puffed to the ground, somewhere lurks the tack that used to hold it to a roof. Even drivers with steel-belted nerves may fear to tread. Here are tips for combating potential punctures and dealing with those you can't avoid.

CLEAR A PATH. Keep your driveway or parking spot free of tacks, nails and other sharp metal debris by using a magnet. Professional roofers use 4-foot-wide magnets on wheels to pick up the tacks, simply pushing the contraptions around in wide swaths like lawnmowers and letting the tacks come to them. Roofing supply stores sell these super-size magnets for about $140. More economical versions, available at home improvement and hardware stores, include Lowe's Mag Vac magnetic broom, a foot-wide magnet on a 4-foot-long pole, which costs about $20. Home Depot's Rolling Sweep Magnet is similarly sized but the pole telescopes from 3 feet to 4½ to 5 feet for easy storage. It costs about $25.

WORK IN BRIGHT DAYLIGHT, when the glint of the sun may make such objects easier to see. Or, this might be a good chance to actually use that metal detector your kid got two Christmases ago.

INSPECT YOUR TIRES. Look closely at your tires often. You might catch tacks before they have time to fully puncture the tire.

KEEP EMERGENCY SUPPLIES. Carry Fix-a-Flat, a product that inflates and then seals punctured tires. Note: Directions on the can say to drive the car a couple of miles immediately after use so that the increased air pressure helps spread the sealant evenly. While the repair is "lasting and durable," directions also recommend having the tire checked by a professional as soon as possible. Fix-a-Flat is widely available at discount and auto stores for $3.50 to $5. Keep flares in your car in case you get a flat on a dark street. Buy a car-charger for your cell phone.

CHECK YOUR EQUIPMENT. Make sure your jack and spare are in good condition, and that you know how to use them. Know the specs on your spare – how many miles can it travel safely and at what speeds? With space-saver tires, avoid speeds above 50 mph. If you must leave the spare tire on for more than a day or two, check the tightness (torque) of the wheel. See the American Automobile Association at www.csaa.com for instructions. Also consult the owners' manual of your car.

The back roads point the way back home

her windshield?

I also thought this: We looked either like two kids going off to college for the first time or two people who had just looted a house. I won't comment on my charming, youthful bride, but I see my face in the mirror every morning and in no way, shape or form does it even remotely resemble the look of an apprehensive 18-year-old heading off to matriculate in undergraduate school for four years or more.

So I don't think any state trooper who might have pulled me over would have bought into that.

"Sorry, officer, I didn't realize I was speeding; I'm in a hurry to get to college."

"Let me see your license, sir."

"Here you are, officer."

"You're a little old for a student; you a professor?"

"Well, I do profess some things."

"Let me ask you something, professor: What's all this stuff in your car?"

"Uh, I found it and I'm taking it back."

"Sure, you are."

"Honest. Their insurance will cover it. Er, I mean my insurance will cover it. I'm having a bad day."

"It's just beginning. Get out of the car."

Of course that never happened. But you hallucinate after being displaced and disoriented for so long. And when I passed a car whose back window had been soaped with the message "New Orleans Refugee Going Home!!" I realized I should have done the same – that was like a free pass. No one would dare pull over a senior refugee.

A couple of thoughts after a lot of miles and a lot of time behind the wheel: This state's back roads are quite serviceable. The quickest way for me to get back and forth to New Orleans from where I was in Avoyelles Parish was through Baton Rouge. But after hearing the horror stories about traffic and gridlock there, I never tried it.

The west side of the river, on Louisiana 1, was always moving, even though it was only one lane in either direction. And the Sunshine Bridge over the Mississippi River at Donaldsonville will never ever need a traffic report, since there is no traffic to report.

Finally, if you ever have to evacuate again, and you are fortunate enough to have a car with a CD player, the four-CD set named "Doctors, Professors, Kings & Queens: The Big Ol' Box of New Orleans" may be the greatest collection of New Orleans, Cajun, zydeco and Louisiana music ever put together.

From Ernie K-Doe, Henry Butler, Allen Toussaint and Tim Laughlin to Lil' Queenie & the Percolators, Dr. John, the Red Stick Ramblers and Geno Dalafose, this music will ensure your heart stays where it belongs.

And when I got near Orleans Parish, as I crossed the railroad tracks from River Road to Oak Street and Leake Avenue and officially entered the city, I opened the sunroof, rolled down all the windows and cranked up one of my all-time favorites as loud as I could stand it:

That would be Kermit Ruffins' "Drop Me Off in New Orleans."

When I turned onto my street, I cranked it up one more notch and pumped my fist through the sunroof. "Son, I said, you're home."

Books, benefits and Britney

rather than – what, 16? – its market value is diminished for reasons that are way too creepy to go into.

The end result was that Britney withdrew the bra from eBay, resulting in one less portable trailer home available for some poor evacuee stuck in Oklahoma and one more jewel-encrusted bra cluttering up what I imagine is a closet full of jewel-encrusted bras of now-dubious market value in Britney's Malibu mansion.

Now, I tell you this story for two reasons: One is that I have not written about Britney Spears in this column for several months and that seems so . . . unnatural; I thought her appearance here might signal one of those much-sought-after signs of return to normalcy in our broken-apart community.

I also mention it as a way of introduction to my involvement in a literary fundraiser in New York on Monday night — the main story I want to tell you here — but I just don't get the sense that if the first sentence of this column had been: "The diminutive novelist Donna Tartt read a poem by Edgar Allen Poe the other night to raise money for the victims of Hurricane Katrina," that I would have fully clinched your attention.

Then again, perhaps I underestimate you, the above-average reader, but that's happened before so let's move along.

My job at the NYC event — sponsored by the very highbrow BookForum magazine — was to emcee a night of readings by some of America's great authors, all of them with some kind of tie to New Orleans or Mississippi.

Along with Tartt — a Mississippi native who recounted a spellbinding tale of the panic that struck her "people" during Hurricanes Betsy and Camille — the roster included Southern humorist Roy Blount Jr., New Orleans-raised novelist Valerie Martin, former French Quarter hang-about and literary lion Robert Stone and New Orleans native and novelist Nancy Lemann, whose attempt to tell of the feelings that stir in her from Katrina's wrath left her unable to finish her talk — all these weeks later — and she walked away from the podium simply too sad to go on.

Also present were writers John Barry and Mike Tidwell, whose books "Rising Tide" and "Bayou Farewell" — two of the most passionate and urgent works of nonfiction published over the past decade — foretold exactly what would happen if and when a storm like Katrina ever slammed us.

Barry and Tidwell have now been elevated past the mere nomenclature of "auteur" to that of "visionary." Before her untimely departure, Lemann announced that Barry and Tidwell should immediately be appointed president "or something like that" and it does raise the point: Why are all of America's smartest people sitting alone in library carrels and coffee shops trying to change the world with written words while people whose primary accomplishment in life was to make a pile of money get to actually run the world?

Britney Spears attempted to do her part for hurricane relief by auctioning her bra on eBay.

This, we'll discuss at our next book club meeting.

Moving along now: The BookForum event, billed as A Night For New Orleans, was a night of passion and pathos, of humor and absurdity, of laughter and tears.

It was, in short, a celebration of what makes the people of New Orleans, Louisiana, Mississippi and the South what we are. It was held at the Great Hall at Cooper Union University in Manhattan, the very same room — using the very same podium — from which Abraham Lincoln rendered forth what historians consider the most formative and important speech of his life in the winter of 1860; that "Four score and seven years ago" thing in Gettysburg comes in a close second.

But what was I doing there? Good question. I guess the organizers just wanted a little local cred in the program, a little show from someone who's been on the streets for this battle and has sustained himself on Salvation Army beef stew and MREs for the past seven weeks rather than salmon at Nobu in Manhattan.

I feel I did a creditable job representing my newspaper, my town, my state. They love us up there, and I thought this was important to tell you since the only other story about New York residents that this paper has run since Katrina hit was about a bunch of Giants fans who were jerks to Saints fans a few weeks ago when the two teams met on "Monday Night Football." I'm willing to bet not one of those Giants fans has ever read Donna Tartt's "The Secret History."

But the people who do that kind of thing — read, that is — get the concept of "us." They think we're all nuts — the term "eccentric" was bandied about a little too liberally at the event, I thought — but they get us.

About 150 people ponied up 35 bucks apiece for the night and it all goes to the Acadiana Arts Council, which will create a series of grants and foundations that will put money directly into the hands of south Louisiana writers, artists and musicians whose livelihoods have been threatened by this whole Katrina/Rita mess.

It ain't no MTV jewel-encrusted bra, but it's money, walking-around money that our people are going to need until we get music fired up in our streets again. Because until we bring live music back to New Orleans juke joints and the dance halls of southwest Louisiana, all we've got to listen to is the radio. And I've already had about as much Britney as I can take.

After several attempts at refining a troubled BCS system, officials are slowly beginning to admit a playoff is the only answer

TWEAKED OUT

Coach Nick Saban hoisted the 2003 BCS national championship trophy after LSU defeated Oklahoma 21-14 in the Sugar Bowl. However, Southern Cal was chosen the AP national champion, creating one of several controversies the BCS has endured since its inception.

By Ted Lewis

The BCS could be only one of its annual train wrecks away from going directly to some sort of a playoff system.

At least that's the view of BCS coordinator and Big 12 commissioner Kevin Weiberg.

"If the majority of the folks agreed to take a look at something like that, it could possibly happen," Weiberg said. "It's hard to predict what would trigger our presidents changing their minds about the structure.

"But, if we have another year with three major teams unbeaten and one left out of the championship game or some additional situation, that could cause folks to at least think about it."

Last season, Southern California, Oklahoma and Auburn finished the regular season undefeated, with the Tigers being left out of the title game.

In 2003, USC finished atop The Associated Press and USA Today/ESPN polls. But, in the BCS standings, the Trojans finished third, behind Oklahoma and LSU.

LSU went on to claim the BCS national title by beating the Sooners in the Sugar Bowl; USC was crowned the AP national champion.

Of the seven BCS title games to date, only in 1999 and 2000 were the participants the only two undefeated teams from the six automatic bid conferences.

And every year has resulted in a "tweaking" of the system.

"One can only acknowledge that there has been a fair amount of controversy associated with the BCS," Weiberg said. "In part, that's because some people have assigned expectations to it that it was not capable of handling.

"It was not a playoff structure."

However, starting next year, the

Saints acquire Dolphins tailback

SAN ANTONIO — With Deuce McAllister lost for the season, the Saints traded for backup Miami Dolphins tailback Jesse Chatman on Tuesday.

Chatman is not expected to push incumbents Antowain Smith or Aaron Stecker for playing time, at least early on, but if the fourth-year tailback meets certain incentives, the Saints will owe Miami a seventh-round draft pick in 2006.

"We're happy with Antowain and Aaron. We're good to go with those guys. We just wanted to get another guy into the program here," Saints general manager Mickey Loomis said. "Obviously, you want to have three guys in your program. And we liked Jesse during free agency. We just didn't have room for him then."

Chatman, 26, had not played for the Dolphins this season and became expendable when former Saints running back Ricky Williams returned this week from his four-game suspension.

BATON ROUGE — Approximately 50,000 tickets remain unsold for the Saints' 2005 home-state debut, but the team is confident Louisiana fans will make the Oct. 30 game against the Miami Dolphins at Tiger Stadium a financial success, Saints executive vice president of administration Arnold Fielkow said.

Tom Benson
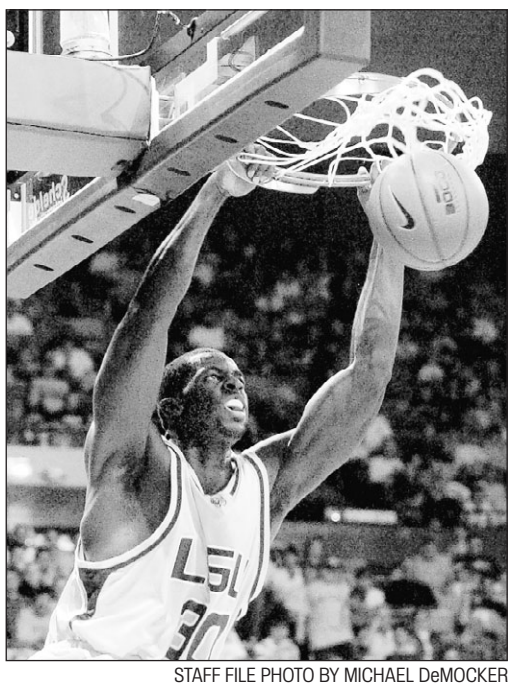
His Saints to play four games at Tiger Stadium



Even if the stadium is half full, Fielkow said he doesn't believe Saints owner Tom Benson will view it as a sign that hurricane-ravaged Louisiana can't support the team.

"We've taken the position consistently that the long-term issues will resolve themselves down the road," Fielkow said Monday night after briefing the media about the team's marketing plans for the four games scheduled at LSU, including the first that features the return of former Tigers coach Nick Saban, now the head coach of the Dolphins.

"Right now, everyone in our organization from the football team to the business side is focused simply on the next few months and being as successful

Bass' journey to NBA has potential Tulsa detour

Developmental league option for forward

By John Reid

OKLAHOMA CITY — In early August, when most of the Hornets' players were home with their families, rookie Brandon Bass spent two weeks going through extensive workouts with Coach Byron Scott.

Bass wanted to get a jump on things before training camp started, especially after finding out about a new rule that allows some first- and second-year players to be assigned to the NBA developmental league for skills development, regardless of if they make the regular-season roster.

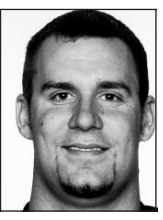
"I think about the (developmental league possibility) a lot," said Bass, who played at LSU last season and was chosen the SEC Player of the Year before the Hornets selected him in the second round of the June draft. "There are some things you can't control, so all I can do is go as hard as I can in practice to avoid going that way."

Under the new guidelines, a player can be assigned by his NBA team to the developmental league for as long as his team deems necessary. No player may be given more than three assignments to the D-league in a season, and no NBA team can have more than two players on assignment at the same time.

The eight-team NBA developmental league begins its 48-game schedule Nov. 18. The Hornets — along with the Chicago Bulls, Indiana Pacers and Milwaukee Bucks — are affiliated with the Tulsa 66ers.

"It's a resource that I have at my disposal, especially if you want to keep guys that you want to affiliate with in the future," Scott said. "They might get some experience going down there playing."

Eight of the 17 players on the Hornets' training camp roster are eligible to be assigned to the developmental league. Although guard J.R. Smith, top-draft pick Chris Paul and second-year player Kirk Snyder are eligible, they are not likely to be sent down because of their projected impact this season.



Bass could face the prospect of playing limited minutes this season because of the team's depth at power forward. A developmental league assignment could give him needed playing

INJURED ROETHLISBERGER MAY PLAY: Pittsburgh Steelers quarterback Ben Roethlisberger might be available for this week's game after a knee injury forced him to be carried off the field last night on a cart. Roethlisberger, who went 13-1 as a rookie starter for the Steelers last season, hyperextended his left knee and bruised a bone when he was injured during the Steelers' 24-22 victory over the San Diego Chargers on Monday night, the team said. Roethlisberger, 23, was injured in the final minute of the game when Chargers lineman Luis Castillo rolled into the quarterback's leg, bending his knee backward. He remained down on the field for several minutes before being carried off the field. An MRI exam Tuesday found no structural damage in Roethlisberger's knee. Steelers coach Bill Cowher said Roethlisberger hasn't been ruled out for this week's home game against the Jacksonville Jaguars. "We'll see how the week progresses," Cowher said in a news conference. "I think we all have a deep sigh of relief in regards to the prognosis." If Roethlisberger can't play, Charlie Batch would start against the Jaguars. Roethlisberger, the Steelers' first-round draft pick last year, has thrown for 913 yards for Pittsburgh (3-1) this season, with seven touchdowns and no interceptions.

Hold that record

Mark Tauscher's perfect mark ended on a dubious flag. The Green Bay Packers' right tackle had never been whistled for holding in his six-year NFL career, which followed an unblemished run at the University of Wisconsin. He was penalized in the second quarter Sunday for holding New Orleans defensive tackle Brian Young, whom he cut-block on the play. The officials apparently misidentified the culprit, because rookie right guard Will Whitticker appeared to be holding on the play. Asked if the officials got it right, Coach Mike Sherman said: "I don't think so. But I couldn't see who it was." Sherman said the game film showed Tauscher cut-blocking his man as he was supposed to. "I didn't see a penalty," Sherman said. "I'm sure the TV copy may show something different, but I was confused myself on who they penalized there." No matter. Tauscher's perfect run of 75 NFL games, including 73 starts, without a penalty — not even one that was declined — is history.

SUGGS BREAKS THUMB: Cleveland Browns running back Lee Suggs broke his right thumb during Sunday's win over Chicago and could miss a month. Suggs had two screws surgically inserted into his thumb Monday, the latest setback for the injury-prone back. Suggs missed Cleveland's first two games with an ankle sprain sustained during training camp. Last season, the 25-year-old missed three games with a neck injury and three more with an injured toe. He sat out the first nine weeks of his rookie season with a shoulder injury suffered while he was at Virginia Tech. The Browns have had high hopes for Suggs, who rushed for more than 100 yards in his final three games in 2004, but hasn't stayed healthy long enough to have a major impact. Suggs was in for only three plays in Sunday's game, but didn't touch the ball. Rookie wide receiver Braylon Edwards will remain in the hospital for at least another day following surgery to cut out an infection in his right arm. Edwards continues to receive antibiotics at the Cleveland Clinic for the infection, which has yet to be identified by doctors, the team said. The first-round pick has been hospitalized since Saturday, when he had an operation to clean out the infection that caused his arm to swell significantly.

EAGLES SIGN ONE, CUT TWO: Linebacker Zeke Moreno signed a one-year contract with the Philadelphia Eagles. A former standout at Southern California, Moreno spent four seasons with the San Diego Chargers after being selected in the fifth round of the 2001 draft. The Eagles released linebacker Mike Labinjo and defensive end Alonzo Jackson. Labinjo started the season opener against Atlanta after middle linebacker Jeremiah Trotter was ejected during a pregame brawl.

Turin faces budget gap

Turin Olympic organizers are considering sweeping cutbacks for next year's Winter Games because of a budget shortfall that could reach $63.72 million. The Italian government is proposing a $19.24 million cut in Olympic spending, adding to an existing gap of $44.48 million. "If the government doesn't intervene, I alone cannot absorb this imbalance, and presumably I would have to cut some things," Turin organizing committee CEO Cesare Vaciago said. Vaciago listed possible cuts in personnel, advertising, free public transport, cleaning and maintenance for the Feb. 10-26 games and the Paralympics which follow in March. He stressed the cuts would not involve security, which is being paid for by the Interior Ministry. Turin organizers thought they had overcome persistent budget problems in June when Premier Silvio Berlusconi signed a deal covering $156.29 million for the games. The money was used to outsource some of TOROC's activities to Sviluppo Italia, an agency linked to the Economy Ministry that promotes business development and investment. That money is needed to cover most of the $44.48 million budget shortfall Sviluppo Italia has run up due to extra expenses. "If the promise is not kept, I will be forced to downsize certain activities," Vaciago said.

Cornerback needs surgery

Wake Forest cornerback Kevin Patterson might need surgery to remove his appendix, putting him in doubt for Saturday's game at No. 14 Boston College. Patterson was admitted to a hospital Monday night after experiencing abdominal pain, coach Jim Grobe said. "I think he's got some infection," Grobe said. "My guess right now is it's going to come out." Patterson had a similar episode this summer, when hospital doctors believed he had appendicitis. He was released without further treatment after the pain subsided.

ECU PROMOTES ASSISTANT: East Carolina assistant baseball coach Billy Godwin was promoted to interim head coach, a day after the school suspended Coach Randy Mazey for unspecified reasons. Athletic Director Terry Holland said he had carefully monitored Godwin's hiring in June after the recent dismissals of the school's football and basketball coaches. Mazey's suspension is expected to be the first procedural step toward his eventual firing. The university will conduct a national search for his replacement, but Holland said he is confident in Godwin for now.

Nicklaus caddie dies

Angelo Argea, who spent two decades as Jack Nicklaus' caddie and became an iconic figure among for his shock of silver hair, died of liver cancer. He was 75. Argea died Monday night at the home of his nephew, according to close friend Bill Taylor. Nicklaus was traveling from the Bahamas and planned a statement later Tuesday, his spokesman said. Argea went to the Palm Springs Classic in 1963 to caddie for a Las Vegas hotel executive when he was told more caddies were needed for the pros. He signed up with Nicklaus, believing the reigning U.S. Open champion would not show up because of a hip injury. Nicklaus showed up, won the tournament, and he won in Las Vegas later in the year with Argea at his side. "Jack figured he better lock me up, take me with him," Argea said in an interview with Golf magazine this year. They went on to win about 40 tournaments together, including the U.S. Open, British Open and PGA Championship.

Hurricane Run out

Hurricane Run, winner of the Prix de l'Arc de Triomphe, won't run in the Breeders' Cup because of a cough. Trainer Andre Fabre said that his 3-year-old colt — considered the favorite for the Breeders' Cup Turf at New York's Belmont Park on Oct. 29, wasn't in top form. "I felt he wasn't doing too well," Fabre said by telephone from Chantilly. "He coughed for two days last week. We'll have to wait until next year." Hurricane Run, owned by Michael Tabor, is the second highly regarded horse to drop out of the Breeders' Cup, a one-day, eight-race extravaganza that usually determines division champions. Afleet Alex, the Preakness and Belmont Stakes winner, was declared out of the BC Classic on Monday because his leg injury hasn't fully healed. Hurricane Run has won six of seven career starts for earnings of $2,776,959. The colt also won the Irish Derby and the Prix Niel, a tuneup for the Arc. His only loss was by a neck to Shamardal in the French Derby. Fabre said Hurricane Run will remain in training and run again next year.

Johansson advances

Defending champion Thomas Johansson edged 18-year-old Ervin Eleskovic 7-6 (4), 7-6 (4) to reach the second round of the Stockholm Open in Stockholm, Sweden. The top-seeded Swede, who beat Andre Agassi in last year's final, was pushed hard by Eleskovic, Sweden's top junior player. Qualifiers George Bastl and Julien Benneteau also advanced. Bastl beat Tomas Cakl of the Czech Republic 6-4, 7-5, and Benneteau topped Paul-Henri Mathieu of France 6-1, 6-3. Agassi pulled out last month with an injury.

MIRZA PULLS THROUGH: Sania Mirza recovered from a second-set lapse to beat Henrieta Nagyova 6-1, 4-6, 6-0 to advance to the second round of the Thailand Open in Bangkok. The 18-year-old player, seeded fifth, was up and down in her game but strong at the end to win the match in 74 minutes. Antonella Serra-Zanetti defeated fourth-seeded Shinobu Asagoe 7-6 (2), 6-4 in the day's biggest upset. Third-seeded Gisela Dulko beat Jamea Jackson 6-4, 7-5, and No. 6 Conchita Martinez took local hopeful Tamarine Tanasugarn 6-3, 6-2. Suchanan Viratprasert carried Thailand's hopes into the second round by beating Hsieh Su-wei 6-2, 7-6 (1).

STEPANEK, ROBREDO MOVE ON: Third-seeded Radek Stepanek reached the second round of the BA-CA Trophy by beating Luis Horna 6-7 (2), 6-0, 6-3 in Vienna, Austria. Horna lost nine straight games after taking the first set, smashing his racket several times in frustration. No. 5 Tommy Robredo reached the second round, ousting Ricardo Mello 7-5, 3-6, 6-2, and Ivo Minar beat Kevin Kim 7-6 (0), 6-3.

Tracy takes Pirates job

Cubs decide to keep coaching staff intact

From wire reports

The Pittsburgh Pirates hired Jim Tracy as manager, a week after he parted ways with the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Pittsburgh signed the 49-year-old Tracy to a three-year contract. He replaces Pete Mackanin, who was named interim manager when Lloyd McClendon was fired Sept. 6.

"With his experience and winning records as a major-league manager, we feel he is the perfect fit to manage our team," Pirates general manager Dave Littlefield said of Tracy in a press release.

Tracy led Los Angeles to the National League West title in 2004, only to finish in fourth place with a 71-91 record this season. He had a 427-383 record in five seasons in Los Angeles.

Jim Tracy
427-383 in five seasons with Dodgers

The last-place Pirates finished at 67-95, tied with the Tampa Bay Devil Rays and Colorado Rockies for the second-worst record in Major League Baseball. Pittsburgh has had 13 consecutive losing seasons.

CUBS RE-SIGN COACHES: Pitching coach Larry Rothschild has signed a one-year contract to return to the Chicago Cubs after a weighing an offer to go to the Detroit Tigers and be reunited with manager Jim Leyland.

Rothschild was Florida's pitching coach and Leyland the manager when the Marlins won the 1997 World Series. Leyland was hired last week to manage the Tigers; Detroit's general manager, Dave Dombrowski, was the Marlins' GM in that championship year.

"It was a very tough decision," said Rothschild, who will begin his fifth season with the Cubs next year. "Probably for about five or six days I went back and forth a lot, talking to people. With Dave Dombrowski and Jim, we won a World Series and I had a relationship with both of them. That made it tough, but in the end my obligation was more important."

The Cubs will bring back their entire staff, including manager Dusty Baker for a fourth season, from last season's disappointing 79-83 finish, good for fourth in the NL Central.

Bench coach Dick Pole, hitting coach Gene Clines, first base coach Gary Matthews, third base coach Chris Speier and bullpen coach Juan Lopez will all return. Sonny Jackson also will return as a special assistant to Baker.

OJEDA SIGNS WITH ROCKIES: The Colorado Rockies acquired catcher Miguel Ojeda on a waiver claim from the Seattle Mariners on Tuesday.

Ojeda appeared in 59 games this season with Seattle and the San Diego Padres. He has a career .221 average with 13 homers and 57 RBIs in 182 games.

DETROIT HIRES EX-PIRATES: New Detroit manager Jim Leyland took his Pittsburgh connection to the extreme Tuesday by filling out his coaching staff with five others who also wore Pirates uniforms.

Like Leyland, two of them — Lloyd McClendon and Gene Lamont — were former Pittsburgh managers. McClendon will run the bullpen and Lamont will be the third base coach.

Former Pirates players Rafael Belliard, Don Slaught and Andy Van Slyke also were hired. Belliard was added as infield coach, Slaught as hitting coach and Van Slyke as first base, outfield and baserunning coach.

MATCHUPS

Central rivals meet in first NLCS rematch since Braves-Pirates in 1991-1992. Cardinals beat Astros in seven games last year, rallying against Clemens in Game 7 at Busch Stadium. The home team won every game in the series. ... Cardinals swept three-game series in St. Louis in April and again in July. ... Carpenter dominated Houston this season, going 4-0 with a 1.85 ERA in five starts. He pitched two complete games, including a shutout, and had two wins in games started by Clemens. ... Pettitte was 0-1 in three starts against St. Louis despite a 1.35 ERA. Oswalt was 1-2 with a 5.21 ERA in three starts. ... Sanders hit .429 with five HRs and 13 RBIs against Houston. ... Ensberg hit .339 against St. Louis with five HRs. ... Biggio was hitless in 12 at-bats and struck out twice against Mulder. ... Pujols had four homers, eight RBIs and 12 runs against the Astros. Walker 1-for-9 against Clemens this year.

WATCH FOR

▶ Houston's rotation. The Astros couldn't set up their rotation the way they wanted for last year's NLCS. With Clemens unavailable until Game 3, the Cardinals faced Backe and Pete Munro in Games 1 and 2, and Oswalt got only one start. This time, Houston has postseason stalwart Pettitte — who was out with elbow injury last year — going in the opener and Oswalt and Clemens to follow, and should need only one start from outside of that trio.
▶ Up For a Test? Cardinals were never in jeopardy of losing in first round, outscoring Padres 19-2 in first five innings. They probably can't expect things to come so easily against Houston's pitching.
▶ Houston's Problem. Inconsistent offense was Astros' biggest problem during season. The Astros got much of their offense in last year's NLCS from Beltran, and may need Ensberg, Berkman, or somebody else to carry them this time.
▶ Role Players on a Roll. The Cardinals' lineup is dangerous enough with Pujols and Edmonds. If Sanders, Eckstein and Nunez hit the way they did in the first round, St. Louis has enough weapons even for a staff as good as Houston's.
▶ Astros Time? Houston needed eight tries before it finally won a playoff series. After first-round victories the last two years, are Astros ready to advance to World Series for first time? With Clemens, Biggio and Bagwell all nearing the end of their careers, Astros may not get a better chance.

Santana helps Angels advance

By Janie McCauley
AP sports writer

ANAHEIM, CALIF. — With an injured ace and a struggling slugger, the Los Angeles Angels turned to a few seasoned veterans and a poised rookie pitcher making his postseason debut.

And the Angels eliminated the Yankees playing the way they did all year: with solid defense, aggressive at-bats and another strong night by the entire pitching staff.

Ervin Santana bailed out the Angels when Bartolo Colon left early with a stiff shoulder, Adam Kennedy hit a go-ahead triple that sent Yankees outfielders Gary Sheffield and Bubba Crosby crashing to the ground, and Los Angeles advanced to the AL championship series with a 5-3 victory over New York on Monday night in the decisive Game 5 of their first-round series.

"It shows you something about this team. Different guys know how to step up," catcher Bengie Molina said between champagne showers from younger brother, Jose.

Garret Anderson homered and drove in two runs, and the Angels produced enough offense despite getting no RBIs in the series from reigning AL MVP Vladimir Guerrero.

Less than 24 hours after arriving in California, the Angels headed to Chicago for Game 1 the ALCS against the White Sox, which was played on Tuesday night.

Santana, who started the season at Double-A, replaced Colon in the second inning and got the win by allowing three runs and five hits in 5⅓ innings. He "had flashes of brilliance" according to Angels manager Mike Scioscia and left to a standing ovation with one out in the seventh after allowing a leadoff homer to Derek Jeter.

"I don't have to be nervous," Santana said. "It's a baseball game."

George Steinbrenner's $203 million Yankees again learned that money doesn't buy success. Even with Randy Johnson coming out of the bullpen for 4⅓ shutout innings, New York was eliminated by the Angels in the first round for the second time in four seasons, scoring 20 runs in the five games with four homers — all solo shots.

"It was a street fight," Yankees manager Joe Torre said. "I'm more disappointed than last year. I felt deep down that we would get it done."

After the game, New York's charter flight was delayed, and the team didn't get back to Yankee Stadium until around noon EDT Tuesday.

"Our team played hard, but we let our fans down," Steinbrenner said in a statement. Just like last season, when the Yankees lost four straight against Boston after taking a 3-0 ALCS lead, Alex Rodriguez and Sheffield were virtually invisible when New York needed their bats most. Rodriguez, the $252 million man, hit into a double play after Jeter's leadoff single in the ninth.

"This is as low as it gets," Rodriguez said. "It's one of those things you can't figure out. ... I've got to take a long look in the mirror at myself because I didn't do my part. I mean, you win and lose as a team, but I didn't show up."

After winning four World Series in their first five seasons under Torre, the Yankees are without a title since 2000.

BRANDON BASS, second-round draft pick of the Hornets

Bass has NBA dreams

HORNETS, from C-5

experience before returning to the Hornets.

Rookie free agent forward Sean Banks, who has shown promise as an offensive player during camp, also could be affected by the new rule.

However, Scott said he won't make any decisions on who may get waived or be sent to the developmental league until he can make thorough evaluations. The Hornets' preseason opener is Thursday's night against the Denver Nuggets.

"I really never thought about the developmental league," Banks said. "But, whatever is necessary for the team, I'll do it. I don't really care about playing time. If I sit here on the bench all year, I will learn. Right now, I'm just trying to play like a robot and not mess up on a play. You have to sacrifice until you can master the system."

Most of the Hornets' rookies, like Bass and Banks, are struggling to make an impact in camp because they are still learning the offense. Bass has shown that he has the necessary physical strengths to play in the league, but he's sharing minutes at power forward with P.J. Brown, David West and Jackson Vroman.

"I know that I have to work even harder," Bass said.

With less than a month before the regular season begins, General Manager Jeff Bower said he is like most of the general managers in the league — trying to weigh whether it's more beneficial to have a developing player remain with his NBA team or be assigned to the developmental league.

"I think it's really going to be a work in progress all year," Bower said. "But we really have a great advantage with our location so close to Tulsa that access is so easy for any game or practice to monitor and stay in touch."

Although Smith is opposed to the league's implementing a 19-year-old age requirement, he has no problem with younger players being sent to the developmental league to improve their skills before returning to the NBA.

"There are certain players who just don't have it yet, and this gives them a chance to play and develop," Smith said.

Bass hopes his development will come only from the NBA, and not from playing in Tulsa.

"I just want to have a long career," he said. "That's been my dream."

Suns forward Amare Stoudemire, who signed a $73 million contract last week, had knee surgery Tuesday and will be sideline for up to four months. He is expected to return around the All-Star break, Feb. 17-21.

Knee surgery to keep Stoudemire out four months

Suns $73 million star sought opinions from three doctors

From wire reports

The Phoenix Suns will be without all-star forward Amare Stoudemire for about four months after he underwent surgery to repair damage to his injured left knee Tuesday.

The extent of the injury was determined during "diagnostic" surgery by team doctor Thomas Carter, who then proceeded with the repair, Suns president Bryan Colangelo said.

Stoudemire, who turns 23 next month, signed a five-year, $73 million contract extension last week, the maximum allowed under the NBA's collective bargaining agreement with the players union.

Colangelo said the team knew of Stoudemire's knee problem during contract negotiations, but was not aware of the extent until Tuesday's surgery. The team projects Stoudemire to return around the All-Star break Feb. 17-21.

Carter detected the defect in an MRI exam several weeks ago and initially dealt with it through treatment and rest.

Stoudemire first talked about the soreness several weeks ago. After it worsened during last week's training camp in Tucson, he sought the opinions of three doctors before giving Carter the go-ahead for arthroscopic surgery.

In a news release, the Suns said Carter repaired a joint surface defect roughly one centimeter in diameter on the inside of his left knee.

Considered the cornerstone of the franchise, Stoudemire has improved each season and was a main component of a team that won a league-best 62 games last season.

The 6-foot-10, 245-pound forward was fifth in the NBA in scoring at 26 points per game last season, his third in the league. He averaged 30 points in the playoffs, 37 in the Western Conference finals against Tim Duncan and the San Antonio Spurs.

Stoudemire's loss will leave the Suns with a vastly different team through most of the regular season. With the trade of Quentin Richardson and the departure of Joe Johnson via free agency, the only starters from last season's team will be the NBA's most valuable player, Steve Nash, and all-star Shawn Marion.

"It's out of our control, so we've got to go out and make the most of what we have and not worry about the piece we're missing," Nash said after Tuesday's practice. "We'll try to build our team and hopefully be a better team when he returns."

Stoudemire had been bothered by soreness in the knee for several months. He had worked out last week in training camp, but sat out the team's scrimmage and final practice to have the knee examined by three doctors.

SUPERSONICS HIRE CONSULTANT: Seattle hired former Cleveland coach Brendan Malone as a consultant.

A longtime NBA assistant, this will be Malone's second stint as a consultant with Seattle. He held the same position in 1996 when Seattle reached the NBA Finals.

Malone was an assistant with Cleveland last year, but was promoted to interim coach after Paul Silas was fired with 18 games left. Malone went 8-10.

Malone was the first coach of the Toronto Raptors in 1995 and previously was an assistant with the New York Knicks, Indiana Pacers and Detroit Pistons.

GETTING BACK TO BASICS: Dwane Casey sat down with Minnesota point guard Troy Hudson once this summer and popped in what the new Timberwolves coach called an X-rated videotape.

The subject? Hudson's defense last season, and much of the film wasn't pretty.

"I told him, 'We can't have that. This is not acceptable,' " Casey said.

Hudson and the rest of the Timberwolves repeatedly were burned by the pick-and-roll during a disappointing season, and that's one of several areas Casey has emphasized in his defensive-oriented approach to getting Minnesota back in the playoffs.

It's a simple play, the pick-and-roll, but it's tough to guard if players aren't in the right spot — or if they're not at full speed.

HORNETS' NOTES

Injury bug takes big bite out of Hornets

Rookies show why they pursue NBA over singing careers

By John Reid
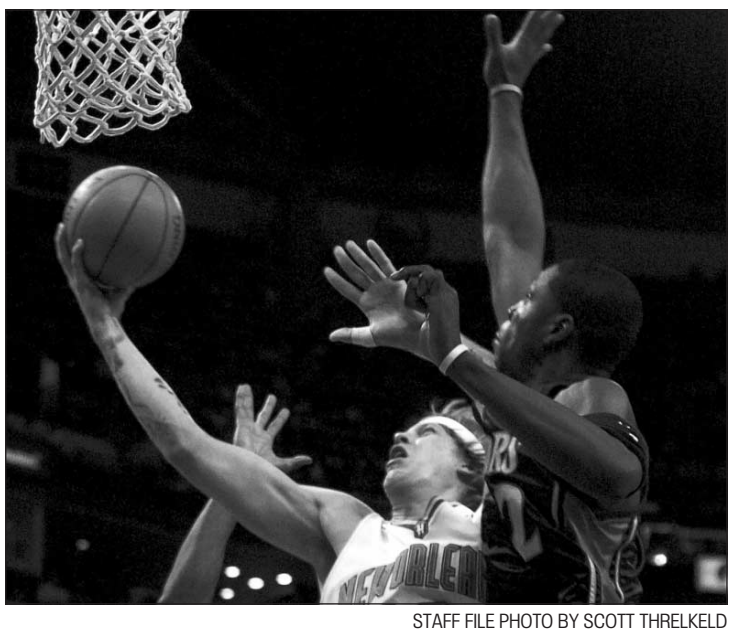
Staff writer



OKLAHOMA CITY — The Hornets can't seem to shake the injury bug in training camp.

Bostjan Nachbar, Chris Andersen, Kirk Snyder and Speedy Claxton were held out of Tuesday's practice because of injuries.

Nachbar has a sore lower back and Andersen has a sore right shoulder. Both are listed as day-to-day. Snyder (hamstring) and Claxton (right toe) were held out as a precaution by Coach Byron Scott.

The Hornets open the preseason Thursday night against the Denver Nuggets at the Pepsi Center.

ROOKIE CONCERT: The only thing missing after Tuesday's practice was a stage to perform, but that didn't stop the Hornets' four rookies from having to sing in front of their coaches and veteran teammates.

The Hornets' Chris Andersen, left, who has a sore right shoulder, was held out of Tuesday's practice because of injuries.

Earlier this week, they were told by center Jamaal Magloire that they had to look up the lyrics from either an Elvis Presley or Madonna song. The only player who had a problem doing it was former European star Arvydas Macijauskas, who said his English wasn't good enough yet to sing songs. So he was allowed to sing a song in his native Lithuanian.

Former LSU player Brandon Bass started the show, singing Elvis' hit song, "Blue Suede Shoes." Bass even did a brief dance move before he was done.

Most of the players said afterward they thought top-draft pick Chris Paul performed the best, singing Madonna's former hit song, "Vogue."

It was the second consecutive year Hornets rookies have been required to sing in training camp. This time no one refused like last season when Nate Williams declined and was forced to complete a run in a set time specified by Scott. Williams eventually sang to the team but was waived before camp concluded.

"The one thing about all four guys today, they had a little more showmanship than our guys last year," Scott said. "This is tradition around the league, period."

PRACTICE HIGHLIGHTS: Backup center Maciej Lampe made one of the best moves in Tuesday's practice when he used a crossover dribble in the lane to beat David West to the basket for a layup.

Macijauskas made a fabulous play near the end of the five-on-five drills, when he made a 3-pointer just before the 24-second shot clock expired. Forward Rasual Butler continues to play effectively at small forward, consistently hitting mid-range shots and making few mistakes.

New Orleans Bowl to be played in Lafayette

Game will match Sun Belt champ vs. Conference USA team

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

LAFAYETTE — The first goal was to keep the New Orleans Bowl alive.

The second was to find a Louisiana alternative to the Superdome.

Both goals were met with Tuesday's official announcement that the game will be played Dec. 20 at Louisiana-Lafayette's Cajun Field.

"The day after Katrina, we were already saying we have to find a way to play this game," said Jay Cicero, CEO of the Greater New Orleans Sports Foundation, which owns the event. "We knew we could have to move, and Lafayette was the first place that came to mind.

"It couldn't have worked out any better."

The only obstacle to playing the game in Lafayette was clearing about 3,500 hotel rooms for the visiting teams and fans.

That was made more difficult when Hurricane Rita landed more evacuees in the city. As of Tuesday, not only were Lafayette's approximately 4,800 hotel rooms fully occupied, but there also were more than 1,000 people still housed in the Cajundome.

However, Gerald Breaux, executive director of the Lafayette Convention and Visitors Bureau, said that all projections are that enough rooms will be cleared by December. ULL housing could be used by some groups, such as the bands.

"We expected there would be a lot of support here, but it has been far more than we could have imagined," said Billy Ferrante, the bowl's executive director. "They have cleared every hurdle."

The game, matching the Sun Belt Conference champion against a team from Conference USA, has averaged about 24,000 in attendance during its four-year run in New Orleans with an estimated economic impact of $10 million to $14 million.

Cicero said he expected an aggressive local ticket sales campaign would mean a crowd around that same number if not more, depending on the visiting teams, because this year's date is a week later than in the past.

ULL president Ray Authement said the bowl game is an excellent opportunity to showcase Lafayette and Cajun culture to the country.

"Lafayette is very close to New Orleans in our food, our culture and especially our hospitality," he said. "We are going to make the New Orleans Bowl feel at home and certainly make it a unique and enjoyable experience for our visitors."

Ferrante said that the normal bowl events would be held, including a joint team banquet on the day before the game. There could be some hurricane relief activities as well.

Cicero said financing for the game should be not a problem if ticket sales are about normal. The New Orleans Bowl will be the first Sports Foundation-sponsored event since Katrina.

"The Sports Foundation can play a role in the recovery of New Orleans," Cicero said. "We've got several events scheduled in the coming years and several more that we're bidding on.

"It was important to demonstrate that we are still functioning, even if it is temporarily in another city."

Cicero also said that, if the Superdome remains closed through next season, he would expect the bowl to return to Lafayette.

Knights reverse winless nightmare

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

RUSTON — George O'Leary's Central Florida team has won three consecutive games. No lie.

The second-year coach has turned the Golden Knights into contenders, and they are the only undefeated team in Conference USA. This past weekend, they defeated Memphis 38-17, becoming just the third team since 1955 to win three games in a row one season after going winless (Boston College 1979 and South Carolina 2000).

Central Florida (3-2, 2-0) features a duo of talented receivers — Brandon Marshall and Mike Walker. The fact that one team has two of the top C-USA receivers is notable, but the fact that both men played defense last year is astonishing.

In the secondary, Marshall was the team's leading tackler in 2004 with 51; Walker led the team with three interceptions. Now as receivers, they are in the top five in C-USA in receiving yardage — Walker is third (452), Marshall is fourth (446). Also, Walker is third in C-USA with 35 catches, and Marshall leads the league with six touchdown catches.

The Golden Knights will face Southern Mississippi this weekend in Hattiesburg, Miss.

ALL C-USA, ALL WEEKEND: This weekend is the only weekend in this season where all 12 C-USA teams will play in conference games. Tulane (2-2, 1-1) hosts UTEP (3-1, 1-1) in an ESPN game Friday at 7 p.m., and five more games are on Saturday, including Memphis (2-3, 1-2) at Houston (3-2, 2-1), CSTV's National Game of the Week.

BIG GAME — MORE TO COME? East Carolina quarterback James Pinkney is coming off his best game statistically, a 355 passing-yard effort against Rice. He was 22-for-34 with three touchdowns, and he also ran for 32 yards — a team high.

Pinkney also showed his poise, leading the team on a 68-yard drive for the winning score against Rice in the fourth quarter. Then he tacked on an 81-yard touchdown pass in the waning minutes.

Pinkney's Pirates (2-3, 1-1) play Southern Methodist (2-2, 1-1) for the first time in both schools' history.

EXTRA POINTS: Rice (0-4, 0-2), which hosts Tulsa (3-3, 2-1), finally will play a home game. It played the first four on the road and its originally scheduled home opener against Navy (Oct. 22) was postponed because of Hurricane Rita. . . . Memphis, Rice, Tulsa and UCF are the schools that have not had a quarterback throw for 300 yards in a game this season. . . . The UAB-Marshall game features two of the top three passing offenses in C-USA. The Blazers (3-2, 1-1) lead the league with an average of 305 pass yards per game; the Thundering Herd (2-3, 1-1) is third (274.8). . . . Memphis, which plays Houston, has won three of the past four meetings against the Cougars, averaging 46 points per game in those wins.

RB Jackson regains starting role

Senior to make first start of the season

By Fred Robinson
Staff writer

RUSTON — When the season started, Tulane's Jovon Jackson had failed to reclaim the starting tailback spot from sophomore Matt Fortè.

But after four games, the senior from St. Petersburg, Fla., is back in the Green Wave's starting lineup. Following two weeks of hard running, Jackson will make his first start at tailback against Texas-El Paso on Friday night.

"He's earned it," Tulane running back coach Greg Davis said. "He's just running the ball a little bit harder. He's running with authority and moving the pile."

Last week against Houston, Jackson rushed for 71 yards on 11 carries. It was the second time this season he has rushed for more than 50 yards while backing up Fortè, who had 79 yards on 21 attempts against the Cougars.

"Everything's been the same for me," Jackson said. "I've been preparing myself and things have been going well for me."

What has helped Jackson move back into the starting lineup has been his power. He has been hit many times at the line of scrimmage during the past few games, but it hasn't stopped him from gaining yards. He has carried the ball 39 times for 164 yards this season and has lost only three yards in four games.

AP PHOTO

Tulane's Matt Fortè is brought down by Houston's defense during a Conference USA game Oct. 8 in Lafayette. Senior tailback Jovon Jackson will replace Fortè in the starting lineup Friday night against Texas-El Paso.

"He's a senior and a guy who has a lot of confidence right now," Green Wave coach Chris Scelfo said. "He's getting a lot of yards after contact, which he should be doing because he's strong. If we give him a crease, he's going to get positive yards and keep us ahead of the chains."

Jackson has had three career 100-yard rushing games.

RETURN LEADERS: Although the Green Wave didn't get much help from its special teams against Houston, it still has the top punt and kickoff returners in Conference USA. Izzy Route leads the league in kickoff returns, averaging 30 yards per return, while Sean Lucas' 13.3-yard average leads the conference in punt returns.

The biggest problem for the Green Wave is it lost Route last week on the opening kickoff to a sprained ankle. The previous week against Southeastern Louisiana, Route returned a kick 97 yards for a touchdown.

"I don't know if we'll get him back (for the UTEP game)," Scelfo said. "It's very doubtful we'll get him back. It's important from the standpoint that he's one of our playmakers. When you lose a playmaker, it takes away from the production."

Tulane averaged 22 yards per return last week with Cary Koch, Ray Boudreaux, Ade Tuyo and Lucas returning kickoffs.

Before the injury, Route was one of the Green Wave's starting cornerbacks.

NOT MUCH ACTION: During the past few seasons, Tulane had trouble keeping its tight ends healthy, which prevented it from running double-tight end sets. This season, the Wave has three healthy tight ends in Bobby Hoover, Jerome Landry and Gabe Ratcliff and often uses two tight ends in short-yardage situations. But it has forgotten all three also are pretty good receivers.

In four games, only Hoover, a senior, has caught a pass. He has two receptions for nine yards.

Together, the three have 55 career receptions. Hoover has caught 37 career passes.

THE SHORT END: A short week is probably the last thing Tulane needed after being thrashed by Houston last week. Not only does the Green Wave have a quick turnaround, no off day, three days of practice and a walk-through before Friday night's game, but UTEP, the preseason favorite to win C-USA's West Division, has been off since its 21-20 loss to Memphis on Oct. 1.

WORTH REPEATING: "We got physically whipped in the second half. It's the first time this year that's happened." — Scelfo on Houston's domination last week.

Attitudes changing regarding playoffs

framework is in place for the "plus-one" format many have advocated as the first step toward a playoff, Weiberg said.

Under the double-hosting format, the two teams playing for the championship would be determined at the end of the regular season as is now done, but that game would be played a week after the four BCS bowls — Sugar, Orange, Fiesta and Rose — at one of those sites.

In the "plus-one" format, two of the bowls would serve as semifinals for the title game, also to be played a week later. Or, in another proposal, the two championship game participants would be determined after the bowls.

"Certainly, the structure we're going to next year is friendly to leading into plus-one," Weiberg said. "And we know our TV partners would be supportive of that model. I've personally been interested in looking at it. But making changes now would take the consent of all of the parties involved."

That would take some doing.

First, it's an option that a majority of the presidents, who would make the ultimate decision on a playoff, are opposed to.

Oregon president David Frohnmayer, chairman of the Presidential Oversight Committee said he doesn't see any chance of the plus-one plan being adopted before the double-hosting plan is even tried.

"We're not to that point yet," he said. "It took a long time to get to where are now and we have to give the double-hosting model a fair shake first.

"There are always some unlikely things happening that would raise the stakes, but I can't see there being any rapid momentum to going to a plus-one. There's not going to be a lot of interest in reopening this debate for a while."

But attitudes appear to be changing.

"I think we're seeing individual presidents and chancellors speaking more openly about alternatives," Weiberg said.

Among those is Ole Miss chancellor Robert Khayat, the SEC representative on the BCS' Presidential Oversight Committee.

Nobody is satisfied with the current setup, Khayat said, adding that his conference "wouldn't tolerate" another season in which one of its teams goes undefeated and doesn't play for the championship.

But Khayat also sees taking the step toward a playoff as one fraught with stumbling blocks.

"No. 1 is maintaining academic integrity," he said. "I know some people think that's a throwaway line, but there is a major commitment not to let this encroach on the academic calendar.

"Also, I know our conference doesn't want to do anything to undermine our championship game and to hurt the bowl system. What happened to Auburn last year was pretty outrageous, but somebody has to be the gatekeeper."

Auburn coach Tommy Tuberville and the Tigers were undefeated last season but left out of the BCS national championship game. Because of what seems to an annual controversy, college officials are beginning to embrace the idea of some type of playoff system.

Restructuring the TV contracts would become more complicated because, starting next year, Fox owns the rights to the Sugar, Fiesta and Orange bowls, and the title games in 2007, 2008 and 2009. ABC retains its rights to the Rose Bowl, plus will air the 2010 championship game.

Of suggestions that the contracts could be redone, Fox spokesman Dan Bell said, "We are perfectly happy with the deal we have in place with the BCS and are looking forward to beginning our coverage next season."

ABC spokesman Mike Humes said his network did not want speculate on something that might or might not happen.

Another element to consider is the increased access to the BCS gained in 2004 — after the implied threat of judicial or legislative action — by the coalition of schools from conferences without automatic bids.

That was done by going from four BCS games to five, increasing the number of BCS teams from eight to 10. But under the plus-one format, the number of BCS teams would shrink back to eight, unless a sixth game was included.

BCS sources have said that the coalition, led by Tulane president Scott Cowen, probably prevented going to a plus-one format in 2006.

San Diego State president Stephen Weber, the coalition representative to the oversight committee, declined to comment on the matter.

The four BCS bowls have expressed concern about their game being a semifinal because of the likelihood of fans not spending the traditional three or four days in the bowl cities.

But the bowls would have the least amount of clout in the matter.

"We'll adapt to whatever requirements are presented to us," said Sugar Bowl executive director Paul Hoolahan. "If we have another disaster with the BCS this year, the public outcry would be unbelievable."

Already this season there has been controversy.

The Harris Poll, created by the BCS to replace the AP poll when that organization requested that its rankings no longer be used in the formula, suffered an early embarrassment when six of the original 114-person panel — made up of former coaches, administrators and players plus current media members — withdrew.

Then, in the first week of the poll, someone voted for a winless Idaho team and three other teams with losing records.

Last week, two panelists failed to vote, and it was revealed that, unknown to the BCS or the panelists, votes for highly ranked teams could be added if a panelist left them off his ballot. While the process, known as "trimming," was done for valid statistical reasons, it was discontinued.

A more public controversy is likely next week when the first set of BCS standings for this season is released.

Although USC and Texas are ranked 1-2 by a wide margin in the USA Today and Harris Interactive polls, which make up two-thirds of the standings formula, the Longhorns' relatively weak strength of schedule brings them down in the six computer rankings that make up the other third of the formula.

That has them projected third behind Virginia Tech in the first standings, with Florida State and Georgia a close fourth and fifth, according to Jerry Palm of CollegeBCS.com. However, Palm added that, in all probability, Texas would wind up No. 2 in the standings should the Longhorns win out.

Still, the strong possibility of more than two unbeaten teams at the end of the season exists. Southern Cal, UCLA, Texas, Texas Tech, Virginia Tech, Florida State, Penn State, Georgia and Alabama go into this week's games undefeated, and as many as five could finish the regular season that way.

That would create a Category 5 brouhaha.

Even three unbeatens would result in a situation similar to last year's with the resulting turmoil.

Georgia coach Mark Richt said it is far too early to worry about a scenario where his team goes undefeated but is shut out of the title game. He added, if that did happen, "We would be fired up. I imagine everybody would be."

Weiberg, for his part, said he would love to end the first eight years of the BCS and his two-year term as coordinator with a minimum of controversy.

"Starting next year, we're going to have a different look and we don't know yet what that structure will lead to," he said. "It's a big step if we start down the path to a playoff because there will be pressure to expand it. I don't think we're anywhere close to that, but we'll just have to see what happens."

Tigers' shuffle on O-line continues

Consistent starting lineup not possible because of injuries

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — LSU's offensive line continues to be a work in progress because of injuries, but Tigers coach Les Miles is looking forward to that unit having a set lineup.

Herman Johnson got his first career start against Vanderbilt at right guard, and senior Nate Livings, whose career has been a shuffle between guard and tackle, moved to right tackle in place of Brian Johnson, who was hurt but played.

Herman Johnson played next to redshirt freshman center Ryan Miller, who was making his first career start but is now sidelined with a hyper-extended right knee.

Coaches often say the offensive line is a group that needs repetition and consistent personnel to work cohesively. Until a few more players get healthy, LSU might have to keep shuffling.

"Injuries, guys that are getting nicked. . . (guard Brett) Helms probably will return to action this week, (guard) Pete (Dyakowski) is a week away or longer. We wish those guys were around, and the lineup would be solidified," Miles said.

Helms or Will Arnold will play left guard, with Livings back at right guard and Brian Johnson at right tackle — that is, if no one else gets hurt.

LSU also is dealing with an injury problem at center. Miles said Miller is probably out this week, and Rudy Niswanger is slowed by an ankle injury suffered against Mississippi State.

Niswanger was able to take over for Miller and finish the Vanderbilt game without re-injuring his ankle. Seldom used Doug Planchard, who also is a tight end, is Niswanger's backup this week.

"We've got a lot of good guys on the offensive line," Niswanger said.

"They (coaches) want everybody to get out there and get experience because what we want is the best five guys on the field at one time. If that takes spelling some guys and bringing them back in . . . we're fortunate to have talented enough players to do that and still succeed with the offense."

FAMILIAR LOOK: LSU's defense against Vanderbilt looked like it did in former coach Nick Saban's days, with cornerbacks playing press coverage and linebackers and defensive backs blitzing. LSU defensive coordinator Bo Pelini is not speaking to the media because he felt he was unfairly portrayed early this season, according to LSU sports information Michael Bonnette.

But Miles said Saturday's results are due to gradual improvement rather than a change in philosophy.

"We see less busts, and people understand where they are supposed to be," Miles said.

Defensive tackle Kyle Williams said it has to do with confidence and comfort.

"When you have corners out there confident in what they're doing and coaches confident in what their doing, you can throw a whole lot more things at the quarterback and the offense," Williams said.

"Week by week, we get a little better and a little better. It comes with game experience of our new scheme. There's only so many things you can do in practice to simulate a game and game speed, but when you get an opportunity to go through your calls playing against a football team, everybody has nailed down schemes and playing better and it came to a head last Saturday."

To win Saturday, LSU is going to have to do the same with Florida and quarterback Chris Leak, who has showed he could handle pressure in Tiger Stadium.

As a freshman, he was harassed and sacked six times, but still guided the Gators to a 19-7 victory, completing 18 of 30 passes for 229 yards and two touchdowns, beating blitzes both times.

FRIENDLY COMPETITION: End Melvin Oliver said he and fellow end Chase Pittman have a friendly sack contest going with tackles Williams and Claude Wroten. "We've got them 6-2 right now," Oliver said with a smile.

Of LSU's 15 sacks this season, 11 have been by defensive linemen.

Experience pays off as Mesa, Pioneers dominate

CRESCENT CITY 50
DESIRE STREET ACADEMY 14

By Pierce W. Huff
Staff writer

Crescent City and Desire Street Academy opened the season against each other in stark contrast.

Crescent City, which entered the season as a District 10-1A contender, had 27 players on its roster and was missing four starters after Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf South. Desire Street, which had its Ninth Ward campus flooded and had to move to Niceville, Fla., was playing in its first game ever.

The differences between Crescent City and Desire Street showed in Monday's District 10-1A game at Tony Porter Field on the St. Martin's campus as the Pioneers dominated en route to a 50-14 victory against the Lions.

Desire Street had a turnover on its first offensive play when Crescent City's Corrie Nix recovered a fumble at the Lions' 30 after a 10-yard pass completion from quarterback Kerry Matthews to receiver Byron Weber.

One play later, running back Andrew Bartholomew darted through the middle of the Desire Street defense for a 30-yard touchdown run. He ran for the two-point conversion to make the score 8-0.

"There is no excuse," Desire Street coach Byron Addison said. "You can say that we didn't practice for two weeks and this was our first contact since the jamboree, but (Crescent City) made the plays and we didn't."

Crescent City (1-0, 1-0) increased its lead to 14-0 when quarterback Jared Mesa threw an eight-yard touchdown pass to receiver Kevin Ivey.

Mesa threw a 79-yard touchdown pass to receiver Luis Sobalvarro to make the score 20-0 in the first quarter.

Crescent City drove 26 yards on four plays for a touchdown on its next possession. Bartholomew had an 11-yard touchdown run, and Mesa ran for the two-point conversion, which made the score 28-0 with 10:44 left in the first half.

Running back Justin Bruzeau finished Crescent City's first-half scoring with a one-yard touchdown run, which made the score 35-0 with 2:33 remaining.

Roth happy for second chance

Rummel players still are trickling in from afar

By Bill Bumgarner
Staff writer

STAFF FILE PHOTO BY BRETT DUKE

Coach Jay Roth is looking forward to getting back to X's and O's as Rummel prepares to start its season.

As the flood waters of Hurricane Katrina were rising, the football fortunes of three Catholic League members were abating.

The destruction caused in Orleans Parish at Brother Martin, Jesuit and St. Augustine initially reduced the league to a fraternity of two: Rummel and Holy Cross, who were set to meet for the district championship on the 10th playing date.

But now, there may be an old face back on the Catholic League block.

Jesuit likely will announce this week that it will enter the district race. Jesuit will face Rummel on Oct. 29 at 2 p.m. at Joe Yenni Stadium. Rummel closes the regular season Nov. 5 against Holy Cross at 2 p.m. at Yenni.

The Raiders will face their first opponent, King, on Saturday at Joe Yenni at 7 p.m.

Although the school is platooning students and its enrollment has swelled to about 3,000 students, Rummel has not added any players from other schools, Coach Jay Roth said. Rummel, which opened practice with 95 players, had 60 last week and 70 this week.

"And they are still trickling in," Roth said. "We have one player who has been in a shelter for six weeks in Jennings and can't get home. We have players living in garages and homes with just the studs. One player stepped on a roofing nail; another sliced his finger helping families. Some are working because they can't pass up the money. But our coaching staff was lucky because we had no real severe damage."

The same could not be said for Roth's brother Randy, a former Rummel player, whose 150-year-old home in Pascagoula, Miss., was wiped out.

"It was built around the Civil War and made it through every hurricane until this," Jay Roth said.

The Raiders will be playing without running back Chris Jones, who is enrolled at St. Charles, defensive back P.J. Smith, who is attending John Curtis, and punter Robby Broach, also a standout pitcher, is enrolled at Hahnville.

"I can't blame them for going," Roth said. "We did not know if we were going to have a season."

Rummel will – at least for four weeks.

"We have a second chance at a season we thought we would never have," Roth said. "I tell them to be thankful for everything they have, compared to others.

"There will be no excuses. We (local teams) all have the same hardships; many of the players are out of shape; lots of good players are missing. This is like August. Yes, it's October but we're still 0-0."

Storms affecting districts, playoffs

LHSAA to decide sites of state title games

By Mike Strom
Staff writer

STAFF PHOTO BY CHUCK COOK

Unlike some high schools in the metro area, Fontainebleau and Covington began district play recently.

In 25 years of playing football, Riverdale has never won a district championship or advanced to the state playoffs. In a little more than two weeks, however, the Rebels, who were 2-8 last season, will face East Jefferson in a winner-take-all game for the District 9-4A title.

Such is the landscape of Louisiana high school football in the aftermath of hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Districts across southeast and southwest Louisiana were shredded by the two devastating storms, leaving those programs that remained scrambling to fill unexpected open dates and complete their seasons.

The Louisiana High School Athletic Association reports that 46 schools (or 15 percent of the 301 football-playing members) currently are not playing the sport, but that number represents a work in progress as more schools opt to play a partial schedule or pack their equipment away. Nineteen schools played their first game of the season this past week on the sixth playing date, and another 13 are attempting a comeback, LHSAA assistant commissioner B.J. Guzzardo said. That leaves at least 33 others that have foregone making a return in 2005.

Additionally, a total of 275 games were canceled through the first six weeks of the season, with 16 of the state's 49 football districts directly affected by the storm.

"I feel like that we're moving around the state a bit crippled," LHSAA commissioner Tommy Henry said. "We've got some parts of our state that are injured. So we're moving along crippled, but we're getting around. We'll make it to our destination."

The destination is the five state championship games that comprise the Nokia Sugar Bowl Prep Classic, which like most everything else in the southeast portion of the state must be relocated from their traditional home in the damagedSuperdome.

The LHSAA Executive Committee is scheduled to award site locations for those games at 2 p.m. today at a special meeting in Baton Rouge. LSU, Independence Stadium in Shreveport, Southeast Louisiana and Louisiana-Monroe have submitted proposals to serve as substitute hosts.

Many of the 160 slots in the five 32-team playoff brackets also figure to have a new look.

Under LHSAA rules, districts reduced to one team still automatically send that team to the playoffs as district champion. Champions from districts with two teams will be decided by one game, raising a debate over how weakened this year's playoffs will be.

"I don't really like the situation the way it's set up because it can allow some undeserving teams to advance to the playoffs," said Riverdale coach Chad Comeaux, whose team has a postseason berth riding on its Oct. 28 meeting with East Jefferson. "You could go 1-4 and go to the playoffs. To me, it doesn't seem right if you go to the playoffs at 1-4.

"But you play by rules, and if that's the way the rules are set up, then you do what you have to do. This (season) is for the kids. I do know that if we do go to the playoffs that it will be (quite) a moment for this school."

There also has been an outcry over potential inequities in the power rating system used to fill the 32-team brackets, with teams playing only a handful of games possibly taking the place of others playing a full schedule. Henry said he is adamantly against changing the power rating system once a season has begun.

Regardless, the show must go on.

"We're crippled, we're not at full speed," said Henry. "(The playoffs) are not going to be as strong or as comprehensive. We knew that and we know that. We're just grateful to have the playoffs. That's the way I see it."

SCOUTING REPORT: FALCONS

If Vick can play, Saints to have their hands full

By Brian Allee-Walsh
Staff writer

Will he or won't he?

No one knows for sure if injured Atlanta Falcons quarterback Michael Vick will play against the Saints in an NFC South showdown Sunday at the Alamodome.

Vick believed he could have played in the Falcons' 31-28 loss to the New England Patriots on Sunday at the Georgia Dome, but Coach Jim Mora thought otherwise, resting the two-time Pro Bowl quarterback in favor of second-year backup Matt Schaub, who played well in defeat.

Vick practiced sparingly last Wednesday through Friday, but was downgraded to questionable Saturday.

He remains questionable against the Saints with a sprained medial collateral ligament in his right knee.

"He wasn't ready to play," Mora said. "He simply wasn't healthy enough to go out and play (against the Patriots). It was an easy decision.

"I have to believe Mike will make progress (this week). We should have a good feel Wednesday."

Feel or not, don't look for a definitive announcement coming out of the Falcons' training facility in Flowery Branch, Ga., until later in the week. It might not come until Sunday morning, thereby forcing Saints coach Jim Haslett and defensive coordinator Rick Venturi to prepare for Vick and Schaub.

Schaub acquitted himself, completing 18 of 34 passes for 298 yards and three touchdowns and leading the Falcons back from 14-0 and 28-13 deficits to tie the score at 28 with four minutes remaining.

But Schaub is no Vick, arguably the NFL's most electrifying player.

Vick's presence means everything to the Falcons, who lost to the Philadelphia Eagles in last season's NFC championship game.

Consider:

▶ Since Vick joined the Falcons as the No. 1 overall pick in the 2001 draft, the Falcons are 26-13-1 when he plays and 9-20 when he doesn't.

▶ The Falcons are 3-0 against the Saints when he plays and 1-4 when he doesn't. Injuries have sidelined him for five games when the teams have played.

▶ In those three games, he has completed 43 of 76 passes for 576 yards and four touchdowns. He also has rushed 27 times for 215 yards (8.0 yards per carry) and four touchdowns.

Will he or won't he? Stay tuned.

Last meeting

The Saints won 26-13 on Dec. 26, 2004, at the Superdome. Schaub played for the injured Vick, completing 17 of 41 passes for 188 yards. He threw two interceptions and was sacked for a safety. Michael Lewis sealed the Saints' victory with a 96-yard kickoff return for a touchdown.

Falcons on offense

Schaub, a third-round pick from Virginia in '04, is a solid backup when given the opportunity, but Vick provides an extra dimension to their offense when he decides to leave the pocket. Vick becomes an elusive running back capable of scoring from anywhere on the field. He carries a 83.0 passer rating into Sunday's game, completing 44 of 77 passes for 495 yards and four touchdowns. He also has 32 carries for 233 yards and one touchdown. . . . Tight end Alge Crumpler (19 catches for 257 yards and two touchdowns) has given the Saints fits the past several seasons, especially on seam routes. Other targets include wide receivers Brian Finneran (19-238-1), Michael Jenkins (12-217-1) and Dez White (2-25-1). . . . Baton Rouge native Warrick Dunn and T.J. Duckett complement each other in the running game. The thunder (Duckett) and lightning (Dunn) tandem has combined on 132 carries for 655 yards and five touchdowns.

Falcons on defense

Atlanta is faced with replacing starting middle linebacker Ed Hartwell for the remainder of the season. Hartwell, the team's most significant off-season acquisition, tore his right Achilles tendon against the Patriots. Potential replacements include starting weakside linebacker Keith Brooking and versatile linebacker/special teams ace Ike Reese. Backup cornerback Chris Cash also is lost for the season with a broken arm. . . . The Falcons' strength lies with the defensive line. Rod Coleman, Chad Lavalais, a standout at LSU, and Antwan Lake comprise a three-man rotation at tackle. Ends Patrick Kerney and former Saints draft pick Brady Smith provide the up-field push off the edge. . . . Cornerback Deangelo Hall leads the team with three interceptions.

Falcons' special teams

Free agent rookie Michael Koenen has emerged as a versatile kicking specialist. He made veteran punter Toby Gowin expendable and handles the punting and kickoff duties. Against the Patriots, Koenen kicked a 58-yard field goal as time expired in the first half, the second longest field goal in franchise history. Morten Andersen holds the club record with a 59-yarder against the San Francisco 49ers in 1995. . . . Todd Peterson has converted all six field-goal attempts inside the 50. Koenen is averaging 42.7 yards per punt. . . . Return specialist Allen Rossum has been held in check. He is averaging 3.7 yards per punt return and 23.1 yards per kick return.

BY THE NUMBERS: 5 — Games in which Vick has eclipsed 100 yards rushing, most by a quarterback in NFL history. That includes a postseason game against the St. Louis Rams on Jan. 15, 2005, when he set a league record for a quarterback with 119 yards.

WORTH REPEATING: "This train has left the station and there is no turning back." — Falcons owner Arthur Blank on his personal crusade to bring a Super Bowl championship to the city of Atlanta.

Saints take stock, staying upbeat

STAFF FILE PHOTO BY ALEX BRANDON

Dolphins coach Nick Saban, who guided LSU to the BCS championship in his final season in Baton Rouge, returns to Tiger Stadium when the Saints play Miami on Oct. 30.

BATON ROUGE, from C-5

as we possibly can, and the long term will take care of itself. We've been in Louisiana for 38 years and have tremendous fans. We understand that we're in some difficult and unusual times. All we can ask our fans is to continue to support us, and we'll do our part by marketing successfully and aggressively and hope that the football team puts together a good football season."

Fielkow and director of regional sales Mike Feder have placed a team of six staff members in Baton Rouge for pregame sales, a number that will swell after Sunday's game against the Atlanta Falcons at the Alamodome in San Antonio.

Through Monday, the Saints had sold 30,000 tickets for the game against the Dolphins, which also will feature the return of former Saints running back Ricky Williams and entertainment from the LSU Marching Band.

"We've got a lot of tickets to sell in a short period of time," Fielkow said. "We need the support of our fans. It would be a tremendous statement for the state and the entire region for people to be able to come out on a Sunday afternoon and spend three hours" thinking about something other than the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

"And, if the crowd is just 50,000," Feder said, "we'll work harder."

Fielkow said the Saints will spend considerable resources in marketing the four games in Baton Rouge, and Feder said the team will continue to concentrate its efforts on a regional pitch to areas such as Lafayette, Alexandria and Lake Charles.

"One of the strengths of our franchise is that 30 percent of all our season ticket holders came from an area 50 miles outside of New Orleans," Feder said. "We've always been a regional franchise."

The Saints could potentially sell about 70 suites in Tiger Stadium, though LSU suite owners were given first preference for their use at Saints games. That figure represents nearly twice as many as the Alamodome, but only a little more than half as many as the 137 in the Superdome.

LSU senior associate athletic director Dan Radakovich said fans this week will be able to purchase parking passes for Saints games at LSUsports.net for $20 per game.

Tickets are available at the customary Saints ticket outlets, such as Ticketmaster.

Fielkow, who pushed for more than four games to be played in Baton Rouge, doesn't believe the Saints' uncertain plans for 2006, nor the decision to base team operations in San Antonio and play three "home" games there will adversely affect the way the team is viewed in Louisiana this year.

"I can only hope that fans understand that we truly are in some uncharted territory here," Fielkow said. "Everybody who lives in this region, from a football perspective, from a non-football perspective, we're all going through a very difficult time. We're all doing the very best job we can. I have faith in Saints fans. Because of that, I think there'll be good response.

"And I think that everybody, at the end of the day, will be happy with the decision made a month ago to play in both cities."

Painful reality: Athletes more than familiar with ACL injuries

Saints' McAllister one of many forced to miss rest of season

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

When Dr. William O. Roberts heard about Deuce McAllister's injury — a torn anterior cruciate ligament in the right knee — he sighed: "New Orleans has had enough rough times."

The ACL is a devastating injury — it's a season-ender and it requires extensive rehabilitation. Even after the average six to nine months an athlete sits out, "You can lose some of that quickness off the blocks, so to speak, and the ability to cut," said Roberts, past president of the American College of Sports Medicine. "The sensation of what makes some running backs really great is never back again. But there are a lot who come back to where they were."

McAllister, the Saints' star running back, joined the list of hundreds of athletes who have injured the ACL, an acronym as prevalent in sports as ERA or RBI.

The ACL is the middle of the knee, and its main function is to provide rotational stability. It is a crucial ligament for athletes, who depend on changing direction. The ACL can be torn by an unfortunate hit to the knee, but often the injury happens when an athlete changes direction or comes to a quick stop, which overextends the knee joint. When a tear occurs, an athlete will hear a pop or a series of pops.

"I can name player after player who has come back from the injury and performed at the same level from before," said Dr. Roch Hontas, an orthopedic surgeon based in Mandeville. "The only problem is the player has to miss a season."

Said Dr. Margot Putukian, director of athletic medicine at Princeton: "It's usually the most severe knee injury that you generally see in sports."

For some athletes like McAllister, the initial injury does not hurt too much. That doesn't mean it isn't severely injured. Putukian remembers a case when a basketball player hobbled into the trainer's room during a game.

"The kid tore his ACL, I checked him out, and I told him that he had a significant injury to his knee," she recalled. "Our media guy came in and said, 'Is he going to be available for the second half?' I said, 'No.' The player said, 'Yes. I'm fine, I can run on this.' . . . I saw him not that long ago and we were joking about it. He said, 'I was so mad at you. I thought you were wrong.' "

But for others, the pain is instantaneous. Sometimes, there are associated injuries, such as a meniscus tear or a bone bruise, which adds to the anguish.

Chris Long is the first-year coach of Louisiana Tech's women's basketball team, and he has seen numerous players hit the hardwood with an ACL injury. It must have hurt, he thought.

But when his ACL popped at age 29, Long said, "It felt like a bomb went off in my knee."

"When I went down," said Tulane tight end Jerome Landry, who tore his ACL in 2004, "I thought I'd never play again."

After the initial injury, an athlete must wait 10 days to three weeks to have surgery, said Dr. Greg Stewart, the new director of sports medicine at Tulane and a team physician since 1986.

"If you don't wait for the swelling to go away — and the person doesn't get full extension of the knee — it actually takes them longer to come back from the rehab than if you wait," Stewart said. "The wait lets the knee basically settle down."

Joni Crenshaw was a sophomore Alabama basketball player when she went up for a rebound and came down with an ACL pop in her right knee.

"It's an unmistakable feeling," said Crenshaw, now a Louisiana Tech women's basketball assistant. "There's no question — you know what's happening. . . . The key for me is range of motion. If you're not able to straighten your leg out the first couple of days, that scar tissue will get tough, and you won't ever get full range of motion. It's critical to straighten your knee out. You're always going to be able to bend it.

"My right knee now feels better and stronger than my left one."

When the ligament is replaced, doctors generally use the middle part of a knee cap tendon or a hamstring tendon.

The downside is some people return from the injury but have knee cap tendinitis, such as the injury suffered by Randy Livingston, the former Newman and LSU basketball star who never became a professional star.

Another option is using a tendon from a cadaver. But, as Roberts said, "If you're a little old lady, that's one thing. But if you're going to play football, you want your own tissue in there as much as possible. It's case-by-case, but the benefit of having your own tissue is — it's yours, and it's probably stronger."

"The nice thing about (a cadaver's tendon) is you can get a bigger tendon, and you don't have as many problems with the tendinitis," Stewart said. "But a lot of people get freaked out about having a dead person's tissue in your body.

"Once they put it in your body, it has to go into a process where it dies and the body has to start growing in and make it a ligament. That's the biggest problem, as opposed to the true rehab."

The rehab isn't a jog in the park. Actually, it takes a lot of rehab just to do that.

For many athletes, it takes about half a year to rehabilitate the knee. Crenshaw's surgery was performed by Dr. James Andrews, the famous orthopedist who put her on a "fast track" of four and a half months. She had sessions three times a day, and continued to work vigorously, even during the following seasons.

"Every day I did leg weights, jump rope, leg press," Crenshaw said. "We made sure we strengthened the muscles around the knee, too."

"In rehab, you start with bending the leg, then putting weight on it, then lifting," said Tulane's Landry, who missed last season but is back on the field. "The worst thing is you lose all your strength sitting out. Your leg gets so small. My left leg is still smaller than the other one."

Chatman, a bowling ball runner at 5 feet 8, 245 pounds, spent his first three seasons backing up LaDainian Tomlinson with the San Diego Chargers. He was impressive in that role last season, running 65 times for 392 yards (a six-yard average) and three touchdowns.

A product of Eastern Washington, Chatman has gained 428 yards on 79 carries in his career.

To make room for him on the roster, the Saints released cornerback Fred Booker, whom they plan to re-sign to their practice squad.

The Saints have not yet placed McAllister on injured reserve. He was waiting on further opinions on his injury.

LOCAL BRIEFS

Sugar refinery to reopen

The prospect of any business reopening in hurricane-ravaged St. Bernard Parish is sweet, but it will be especially so when American Sugar Refining Inc.'s operation in Chalmette opens in December. The sugar refinery was flooded by Hurricane Katrina, but the company said electricity has been restored and the plant should be working in December. American Sugar, which has refineries in three other states, sells its products under the Domino name.

Stressful trend

It seems that New Orleanians were stressed out even before Hurricane Katrina swept through. A report released Tuesday lists New Orleans as the ninth-largest market for high blood pressure medication among Medicare participants. Fifty-nine percent of Medicare participants in New Orleans bought the medicine in the past year. Lexington, Ky., was the largest market. The data was collected before Katrina. Scarborough Research, a New York-based market research firm, conducted the study.

Still pitching N.O.

Rae-Anne Mena's job has gotten even more important in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. Mena, who works for the admissions office at Loyola University in New Orleans, is still making the rounds at college fairs and talking up the school, even though it's closed temporarily. "Are you under water?" several prospective students asked her at a recent college fair at the University of New Hampshire. Some offer friendly encouragement, others crack jokes within earshot. "I hear their best major now is scuba diving," one man said to his son as they walked past.

No pearl to be found

It's too early to tell for sure, but Louisiana's oyster industry may have taken a hit from Hurricane Katrina. "I can't imagine that the oyster industry hasn't suffered significant damage," said Dr. Robert Romaire, resident director of the Louisiana State University AgCenter's Aquaculture Research Station in Baton Rouge. Crawfish and catfish producers apparently avoided physical or biological damage to their operations because most of these industries were out of the area affected by the storm.

Paychecks still flowing

The paychecks will keep coming to many employees displaced by Hurricane Katrina, according to a new survey. And more than 70 percent of the large firms with displaced employees say they'll provide severance if layoffs occur. The Hurricane Katrina: Special Pay Practices Survey by Mercer Human Resource Consulting reflects the practices of 31 large organizations in a variety of industries and with a collective work force of more than 3 million.

Local rents expected to skyrocket

Tighter market means higher prices

By Greg Thomas
Real estate writer

Rents in metro New Orleans will go up, in some cases by as much as 10 percent, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, real estate specialists say.

"I would be shocked if rents don't go up at least 10 percent considering that the housing (supply) took such a blow," said Jacquelyn Bruchi of Shadowlake Management Co., which manages nearly 3,000 apartments in the metro area.

The destruction of much of the local housing supply will be a key factor in driving up rents. Of the 50,000 apartment units in large complexes around the area, as many as 20 percent have been destroyed, said Larry Schedler, a broker with Larry G. Schedler & Associates. In addition, many landlords and property owners will be incurring additional expenses that will likely push up rents.

Most of the complexes that were destroyed will be rebuilt under stricter building codes that call for more expensive, hurricane-resistant materials. And most landlords will see their insurance costs double, an expense that Schedler expects to be passed on to renters.

"The average 200-unit complex, depending on age, probably was paying $375 to $425 a year per unit for insurance. It's not unreasonable that that will potentially double," Schedler said. "Landlords from Houston to Jackson to Baton Rouge have Katrina to thank for a solid market" when it comes to rents and occupancy figures, Schedler said. "Never in my 20 years in this business have I seen 'no vacancy' signs on apartment buildings. I've only seen those on hotels."

There are numerous anecdotes about landlords refusing to take advantage of already dislocated and traumatized households. Some are refusing to accept rent payments for September, even though the law says they can require payment as long as the unit is habitable. Many tenants mistakenly believe that a mandatory evacuation order, the lack of potable water and the lack of electricity

GULFPORT, MISS. — C.J. "Mac" McClendon spent years installing slot machines on the Gulf Coast. These days, he is exhuming them.

When Hurricane Katrina leveled the Gulfport and Biloxi area, it silenced about 18,000 slot machines at Mississippi's floating casinos. Some of the one-armed bandits were washed into the sea. Looters ran off with others. And about 75 percent were destroyed.

"I can't think of anything that is even close to this," said Mike Ulmer, North American casino services manager for International Game Technology, or IGT, the world's largest maker of slot machines.

Damage is greater in Louisiana. More than 12,000 electronic gambling devices — slot machines and video poker machines — at the 10 Mississippi coast casinos were roughed up by hurricanes Katrina and Rita in the state, but few were damaged. Most machines that will need to be replaced are at the Belle of Orleans, which was knocked from its moorings on Lake Pontchartrain, and at the two Harrah's Entertainment Inc. and two Isle of Capri Corp. properties in Lake Charles.

"It's not going to be on the scale of the Mississippi replacements," said Wade Duty, executive director of the Casino Association of Louisiana, a lobbying group for riverboat operators.

The bigger story in Louisiana is the video poker machines lost at bars, restaurants and truckstops in parishes

Cable, phone service spotty

Telecommunications service remains spotty in New Orleans and many suburban communities six weeks after Hurricane Katrina decimated the underground and overhead wires that carry telephone conversations, Internet traffic and cable television signals.

Many people returning to their homes and businesses are finding electricity and water flowing, but no dial tone in their phones and no picture on their screens.

"It's frustrating," said Erin Bernard, who has been without cable at her home in the 300 block of Marigny Avenue in Mandeville since Katrina hit.

"The children are missing their regular programs and my husband is missing his football games," she said.

Repair crews have been working on cable lines in the Bernard's neighborhood, but service is still out at their house. "I just don't understand," she said.

In some areas where neighborhoods remain largely empty, dead telecommunications systems have only intensified the feelings of isolation for the few people who have returned home.

The region's cable companies, Cox Communications, which operates south of Lake Pontchartrain, and Charter Communications, which operates north of the lake, say they have repaired damage to their major

Oil and natural gas production in the Gulf of Mexico continues to crank up after being shut down by Hurricane Katrina.

As of Tuesday, nearly 71 percent of daily oil production in the Gulf of Mexico, or 1.06 million barrels, remained down, according to the federal agency that monitors energy production and capacity. The daily capacity is normally 1.5 million barrels.

Fed boosted rate to keep worries low, record shows

Impact of storm a big concern

By Martin Crutsinger
AP Economics writer

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve felt the need to keep boosting interest rates in September partly out of concern that a pause might mislead people into thinking it was too worried about the economic impact of Hurricane Katrina.

Minutes of the Sept. 20 closed-door discussions revealed increased worries among Fed policy-makers about inflation because of a spike in the price of gasoline and other energy products following hurricane-related production shutdowns caused by Katrina. But the Fed officials said they believed the hit to economic growth from Katrina would prove to be temporary.

Because of this view, the Fed expressed concerns that not raising rates at the September meeting would send the wrong signal about the Fed's view of the underlying soundness of the economy.

"A pause in policy tightening at this meeting had the potential to mislead the public both about the committee's perceptions of the fundamental strength and gas production, or 6 billion cubic feet per day, also remained down Tuesday, the Minerals Management Service reported. The daily capacity is normally 10 billion cubic feet per day.

Total oil production shut down between Aug. 26 and Tuesday was equivalent to nearly 10 percent of the Gulf's yearly production, or 547.5 million barrels. For the same period, 7.4 percent of the Gulf's annual natural gas production has been delayed.

Production is expected to pick up over the rest of the year, although some capacity won't return until 2006, said Gene Gillespie, senior energy analyst at Howard Weil energy firm. Although oil prices have fallen slightly in recent weeks and hover near $65 a barrel, some wonder if prices would be substantially lower if it weren't for production delays caused by the hurricanes, he said.

As of Tuesday, 20 percent of the nation's refining capacity was still down, according to the American Petroleum Institute. Together, hurricanes Katrina and Rita damaged more offshore drilling rigs than any storm in recent times, hitting two areas of the Gulf that are peppered with offshore production platforms and drilling rigs. Rita swatted the western Gulf after Katrina hit the central Gulf. The Gulf supplies 29 percent of the country's oil and 21 percent of its natural gas.

Federal energy regulators project energy demand to be down 600,000 barrels per day this winter, in part because cooler temperatures haven't yet arrived, said Bob Yawger, vice president of energy futures at Man Financial in New York. This time of year there is a seasonal slowdown in energy demand, between the end of summer driving season and before winter temperatures kick in.

Gasoline prices, like oil prices, have dipped slightly in the weeks since the storms. In the first week after Katrina, gas prices rose an average 46 cents a gallon, according to the American Petroleum Institute. But over the next two weeks, as pipelines, refining and production resumed, prices declined 28 cents a gallon nationwide.

In New Orleans, AAA reported that a gallon of regular gas averaged $2.88 this week, two cents higher than a month ago.

renders the unit useless. But under Louisiana law, such units are deemed habitable and renters are responsible for payments whether they evacuated or not. If a unit is severely damaged, tenants do not have to pay. But questions arise when a unit is damaged but habitable. That, a spokesman with the Louisiana attorney general's office said, is when tenants need to negotiate with their landlords as repairs are made.

The local rental market is experiencing a crunch as a result of the large number of people seeking housing. Some apartment complexes have waiting lists of 300 or more applicants. Many leasing offices, according to Bruchi, are limiting their hours because they simply cannot accommodate all the interested consumers.

And rents are already creeping up in some places. Before the storm, the owner of three condos at 1205 St. Charles Ave. had the units on the market unfurnished for $1,200 a month. Now he is listing them furnished for $2,000, said leasing agent Corinne Fox of Prudential Gardner Realtors Inc.

Fox said some people are pulling their homes off the for-sale market to take advantage of the booming rental market. "Some families know they're not coming back. They've moved, got the kids in school, and new jobs," she said.

The owner of a 2,000-square-foot home on Perrier Street was willing to lease the house, furnished, for $3,000 a month instead of selling it. And an Irish Channel family that doesn't plan to return is willing to take $1,500 a month for their 2,400-square foot home.

"Their point wasn't to take advantage, but to just pay the mortgage" while helping out a returning family, Fox said.

But how high rents will go, and for how long, is the big question, said Ivan Miestchovich, an associate professor of finance, head of the University of New Orleans Center for Economic Development and the new director of the UNO Real Estate Market Data Center. Some believe that in 16 months the market could reverse course as construction and relief workers pull out of the metro area and ease the demand for housing.

By then, homeowners may also be giving up the rentals they currently occupy and moving back into renovated homes.

Landlords, meanwhile, are fuming about an executive order issued by Gov. Kathleen Blanco that prohibits them from evicting tenants in the wake of the storm. The order is preventing landlords from accessing apartments that, in some cases, have been abandoned by tenants. Many property owners would like to get into the damaged units to begin repairs, but the governor's order, which runs through Oct. 25, prevents them from doing so.

Henry Shane, chairman of Favrot & Shane in Metairie, said the ban on evictions is preventing many landlords from addressing moisture damage, which threatens the health of tenants trying to occupy undamaged units and prevents property managers from getting units in shape for storm victims desperately seeking housing. Favrot & Shane owns about 8,000 apartment units, most in East Jefferson.

"We don't want any rent, we'll return their deposits. We just want possession to restart the rebuilding process and eliminate the dangerous conditions and stop further deterioration" of the units, Shane said.

But Monday, Roderick Hawkins, deputy press secretary for Blanco, said he expected one of two things to happen this week: Blanco may amend her executive order, possibly allowing landlords to evict or remove tenants' belongings and repair units, or the Louisiana Supreme Court may take action on the eviction matter, allowing landlords to take over the units.

network lines in areas that weren't badly flooded, but outages persist because of damaged feeder lines to neighborhoods and individual buildings.

And new damage continues to occur to regional phone and cable networks as storm repair crews unknowingly sever overhead and underground wires, according to spokespeople for the companies

That's what happened Saturday in the 1600 block of Colony Place in Metairie when a front-end loader cut through an above-ground tube holding a bundle of cable TV wires that was buried under a pile of storm debris, Cox spokesman Steve Sawyer said.

The mishap shut down cable service throughout the neighborhood, he said.

"We continue to incur more post-storm damage than we had before the storm," Sawyer said.

Cable and telephone services are largely unavailable in heavily flooded areas in Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes. Cable outages remain widespread in Uptown neighborhoods in New Orleans and in some northern St. Tammany communities, while phone service remains down in large parts of Uptown and Bywater.

In New Orleans, repair crews have focused on neighborhoods along the Mississippi River from the Industrial Canal to the Jefferson Parish line. Those areas largely escaped flooding and were the first sections of the city reopened by Mayor Ray Nagin for repopulation.

Sawyer said the seemingly slow pace of the restoration effort reflects the level of damage wrought by Katrina.

"We don't know of any cable system in the United States that has ever suffered the amount of damage that we suffered," he said. "This takes time. You can't just go out and pop things back on poles."

Still, there was some good news on the telecommunications front Tuesday.

Cable service from Cox was expanded in several sections of the French Quarter, including Decatur Street, where the TV flickered on for the first time in six weeks at Coop's Place.

Patrons visiting the bar and cafe for the past several weeks haven't been able to watch their favorite sports events while downing a beer and eating cheeseburgers. "We could have made some people pretty happy if we had been able to show football games," bartender Laura Roe said Tuesday.

Coop's managers plan to show football games and professional baseball playoffs this weekend, but a new problem with the TV might prevent that from happening.

"Now we can't change the channel on the set," Roe said.

that flooded. About 5,000 video poker machines were shut down because of Katrina. Louisiana State Police and lawmakers worry that some of those machines, which generate about $4.6 million per month, won't be restored because the businesses that operated them were wiped out.

In Mississippi, IGT and other big slot makers are picking through the twisted casino barges, trying to salvage machines and reclaim the ones they leased to the gambling companies. They have not found much to save at the 13 casinos that dotted the Mississippi coast.

"Imagine throwing your computer into the ocean, drying it out and seeing how it works," McClendon said.

On Monday, McClendon and two IGT technicians descended on the Copa Casino in Gulfport to remove the 17 IGT-owned machines from the approximately 1,250 ruined one-armed bandits there.

The casino barge was lifted from its moorings and tossed onto the asphalt, where ocean waves continued to pound it, drenching the machines in salt water.

State gambling regulators are supposed to keep track of every slot machine, but Katrina has made that task unrealistic. It is unclear how many were swallowed up by the sea.

"Basically, it's impossible to account for each and every one of those lost," said Larry Gregory, executive director of the Mississippi Gaming Commission.

resilience of the economy and about its commitment to fostering price stability," the minutes stated.

The Fed did boost the federal funds rate to 3.75 percent at its Sept. 20 meeting. It was the 11th consecutive increase since the Fed began gradually raising rates in June 2004.

The increase was approved on a 9-1 vote with Fed Governor Mark Olson dissenting. The minutes explained that Olson preferred pausing in the rate hikes until the Fed had a better view of how severe the impact from Katrina would be on the U.S. economy.

Since the Fed meeting, a number of the members of the Federal Open Market Committee — the panel of Fed board members in Washington and regional Fed bank presidents that sets interest rates — have expressed concerns in various speeches that inflation pressures have increased because of a sharp spike in energy costs.

Right after Katrina hit, crude oil prices briefly topped $70 per barrel in intraday trading in New York, while the nationwide average for gasoline climbed for a time above $3 per gallon.

On inflation, the Fed staff revised its inflation outlook higher for 2005 for overall inflation, reflecting the impact of higher energy prices, but said that overall inflation should be slightly lower for 2006.

Yes, Virginia, there will be a Mardi Gras.

Luminaries from across the Carnival spectrum marched into City Hall on Wednesday to decree that they stand ready to stage a scaled-down, post-Katrina version of the Greatest Free Show on Earth in 2006 that will serve notice that the Crescent City is alive and well.

The news was greeted with glee by New Orleans City Council members, who pledged their collective support to make it happen.

"Mardi Gras is the spirit of New Orleans and we thank you for bringing this to us," a beaming Councilwoman Jacquelyn Brechtel Clarkson said as she greeted representatives of the krewes of Rex, Zulu, Endymion, Proteus, Muses, Shangri-La and Pygmalion. After his Navy service in World War II, Frank Shockley settled in southeast Louisiana, got married and started a small dairy farm with brother-in-law Philip Knieper on 80 acres southeast of Slidell.

In 1952, he built a home there just off Shortcut Highway and Avery Drive at the entrance to what was to become rural Avery Estates, a large-lot subdivision near the northern edge of Fritchie Marsh.

As the family grew, Shockley added on to the house three times. The site eventually became a cluster of homes where four of his five sons, their wives, children and his grandchildren and infant great-grandchild lived.

Until Aug. 29.

That's when the winds of Hurricane Katrina roared through the area and pushed a 22- to 24-foot storm surge through the back of the little subdivision and up to 10 feet in the front section nearest the highway.

Frank Shockley, 81, looks for the right tool to help him install a utility pole Tuesday at his home in Avery Estates.

Most of the family had evacuated to Shockley's native Arkansas before Katrina struck. Their homes in ruins, they're now staying in shelters and apartments in the Slidell area. What they saw when they returned to the family compound was, until then, unimaginable.

There are few, if any, areas of St. Tammany Parish where the devastation is more concentrated in such a small area.

The floodwaters washed away entire city blocks in the Lower 9th Ward, leaving its 14,000 residents grappling with what to make of the present, let alone the future, of a neighborhood that struggled with blight, crime and poverty long before Hurricane Katrina punched through the city's levee system.

Wednesday — the first day that some Lower 9th Ward residents were officially allowed in to see what, if anything, they could salvage — made their choices painfully clear.

WASHINGTON — The Army Corps of Engineers is planning to repair New Orleans area levee breaches caused by Hurricane Katrina with fortified walls much stronger than the originals, design documents show.

Where some floodwalls — consisting of a concrete section mounted on a steel base — collapsed, the corps wants bulkier concrete walls and significantly deeper steel anchors reinforced with concrete piles.

Corps officials say the new designs are intended to compensate for structural weaknesses caused by the breaches — and for uncertainty over the strength of the original designs.

"At this time, we haven't fully understood the failure mechanisms at all of these locations," said Walter Baumy, chief of the engineering division of the corps' New Orleans district. He said the corps is getting feedback from engineering teams investigating the breaches and incorporating that into the designs.

"They are going to be heftier, more conservative," he said of the new wall sections.

The designs, in multimillion-dollar contracts put out for bid this week, are

Home loan program unveiled

Low rates tailored for coast storm victims

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — One of the nation's largest mortgage investors announced Wednesday that it will launch a $1 billion program for low-interest loans to help up to 10,000 low-income Louisiana and Gulf Coast homeowners recover from Hurricane Katrina.

Freddie Mac, a corporation that uses bulk purchases of residential mortgages as an investment vehicle, is working with the Louisiana Housing Finance Agency and the Mississippi Home Corp. to create loans for repairs and home purchases at about 1 percent below market rates.

Qualified borrowers may buy or repair homes in a federally designated Katrina disaster area. Borrowers also can use the loans to buy a house in a different part of Louisiana if they had a mortgage on a principal residence in a storm disaster area as of Aug. 28, the day before Katrina hit.

"We have confidence in the area," said Freddie Mac Chairman Richard Syron, who was in the state capital Wednesday for the announcement. "We fully expect we're going to get paid back on these things."

People who buy or repair homes can work through the usual mortgage companies to inquire about the loans, Syron said.

To supply money for the loans, the state housing agency will issue tax-exempt mortgage revenue bonds. Freddie Mac is committing to buy up to $1 billion of those bonds, ensuring a relatively low rate.

The initiative is an expansion of an existing program. Freddie Mac decided to pursue the program after President Bush signed the Katrina Emergency Tax Relief Act on Sept. 23, which waives the first-time home-buyer requirement on loans from mortgage revenue bonds and raises the cap on home repair loans from $15,000 to $150,000 for Katrina victims.

The loans must be made by Jan. 1, 2008.

Congress relaxed the requirements of the usual low-income mortgage program.

In the Katrina program, families of three or more can earn up to 140 percent of an area's median income and be eligible. The purchase price of the house can be up to 100 percent of the average area purchase price.

"Black people and poor people bore the brunt of the devastation, because — for the most part — they lived most often in the lower-lying, more flood-prone sections of the region."
BROOKINGS INSTITUTION report

Report blames racial, class divisions

New Orleans left its black people, poor at risk

By Gwen Filosa
Staff writer

The sharp racial and income disparities in New Orleans disproportionately placed black and poor people in harm's way, making the disastrous impact of Hurricane Katrina plainly foreseeable, a new report says.

"What was happening to greater New Orleans before Hurricane Katrina greatly worsened the aftermath," said the report by the Brookings Institution, an independent, nonpartisan think tank in Washington, D.C. "Black people and poor people bore the brunt of the devastation, because — for the most part — they lived most often in the lower-lying, more flood-prone sections of the region."

Federal and local government policies, specifically those regarding public housing, isolated those who were most vulnerable to the storm because of income and neighborhood, Brookings found.

People in flooded areas were more likely to lack cars, which became critical during evacuation. Some 150,000 people in the metropolitan area had no car. One in five people in the flooded parts of the city had no car, versus one in 10 elsewhere.

The black poverty rate in New Orleans was three times higher than the white poverty rate: 35 percent compared with 11 percent. Poor blacks were five times as likely to live in areas with extreme poverty rates: 43 percent of poor blacks lived in areas of concentrated poverty while only 11 percent of poor whites did.

In 2000, the black median household income in New Orleans was about half that of white households: $21,461 compared with $40,390.

Suggestions for rebuilding

The 48-page report, released Wednesday, not only blames government policy for placing the poorest residents at risk during a Category 4 hurricane, but outlines ways to rebuild New Orleans so that such a situation never happens again.

"To strike at poverty, the federal government will need to rebuild the metro's shattered neighborhoods and do it in a way that knits together a divided region," the report said.

New Orleans residents need wide, long-term access to federal housing vouchers, which would spur home ownership, the report said. The city's low-wage economy needs to be replaced, not revived, the report added, and local businesses and workers deserve first crack at jobs in the region's reconstruction.

Families returning to New Orleans should not be segregated in high-poverty neighborhoods, as so many were before Katrina, said Amy Liu, deputy director of the Metropolitan Policy Program.

"If we are going to build affordable housing, then we need to make sure that the affordable housing is built in much more economically integrated neighborhoods," Liu said.

Recent worsening

New Orleans long has struggled with poverty, yet the intense isolation of poor black people was a pattern that developed only in recent decades, the report said. By 2000, the city had become highly segregated by race and had high concentrations of poverty.

"In 2000, city neighborhoods such as the Garden District, Lakeview and Audubon were all more than 85 percent white, while neighborhoods such as the Lower Ninth Ward, B.W. Cooper and Pontchartrain Park were all almost 100 percent nonwhite," the report said. Some 50,000 of the city's poor residents lived in 47 extremely poor census tracts in 2000.

No less than 84 percent of the city's poor population was black. Almost all of the extremely poor neighborhoods were predominately African-American: Gert Town, the 7th Ward, the Lower 9th Ward and public housing developments.

Children in single-parent households also were sharply hurt by Katrina: 46 percent of all children living in flooded areas when the storm hit had only one parent, compared with 31 percent in dry areas. In all, 57,300 children whose neighborhoods flooded had only one parent.

FEMA is urged to holster gun ban

By Kevin McGill
Associated Press writer

BATON ROUGE — Under pressure from gun rights groups, FEMA said Wednesday it is reconsidering a ban on firearms at a trailer park established to temporarily house Hurricane Katrina victims.

"We've got attorneys who are looking at that as we speak, and they're trying to figure out who wrote the rules, what the intent was," FEMA spokesman Butch Kinerney said.

The dispute involves a nearly 600-trailer encampment that opened last week near Baton Rouge. Katrina evacuees will be allowed to stay there rent-free while they try to find permanent housing.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said it has been general policy at FEMA for several years to prohibit guns at such parks anywhere in the country.

But the National Rifle Association threatened to sue, and another gun rights group, the Second Amendment Foundation, said it was looking at legal action.

"Whether it's a national disaster, whether it's by nature like Katrina or a flu pandemic or an earthquake, the Constitution can't be thrown out the window," NRA leader Wayne LaPierre said.

The East Baton Rouge Parish Sheriff's Office had asked that guns be banned at the encampment because the trailers are close together and have thin walls, according to spokesman Deputy Fred Raiford.

FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said guns would have been prohibited without the Sheriff's Office request.

N.O. public school enrollment may be halved

Only 50-60 schools needed, Picard says

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — A rebuilt Orleans Parish public school system will need less than half of the 126 buildings it now has because student enrollment in the next few years is expected to drastically decline, Education Superintendent Cecil Picard told lawmakers Wednesday.

Addressing a joint meeting of House and Senate Education committees, Picard said that based on "the best wild projections we are looking at right now," the number of students in New Orleans public schools for the near future should be about 30,000, less than half last year's enrollment.

Ten years ago, Picard said, there were 87,000 students in the system, and last year the count had fallen to about 63,000. In the days before Hurricane Katrina hit Aug. 29, about 55,000 students had enrolled.

Picard estimated the system might need 50 to 60 structures, many of which could be new, built with federal education and disaster-relief dollars.

For schools that are more than 50 percent damaged, Picard said, the Federal Emergency Management Agency will pay the cost of replacing them at their pre-Katrina value. He said there are about 100 schools that have not received a detailed inspection but he expects at least 45 of them will have to be replaced, based "on people who have done an eyeball assessment."

Rep. Austin Badon, D-New Orleans, a member of the House Education Committee, said it is still too early to project what the enrollment in the city's public schools will be. "There is no way for anyone to know," he said. "It may be 35,000; it may be 20,000.

"People have already started their lives in other places, but some may come back because of sentimental values or they may be long-term, dedicated people of New Orleans."

In response to a question from Sen. Jay Dardenne, R-Baton Rouge, Picard said that about 75 percent of the schools that have been damaged or will have to be destroyed are rated as academically unacceptable on test scores.

"I don't want to rebuild those failing schools," Dardenne said. "We dare not squander the opportunity to do it right. I am not comfortable it is going to be done right."

Picard said his office will oversee the spending, so that new and better schools can be built. "The people of New Orleans will make that decision" of which schools to rebuild or abandon, Picard said.

Financial problems

Picard said he will ask lawmakers in the November special legislative session to rework the formula the state uses to finance classroom needs at the local level.

He said 28 parishes are facing near-bankruptcy by the end of the school year, and their financial problems have worsened by taking in additional students from closed schools in parishes hit by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

He said the legislation might allow the state Board of Education to rework the state's $2.6 billion formula on a "month-to-month basis," as displaced students head back to their original school districts.

About 186,000 elementary and secondary school students were displaced by the two hurricanes and more than 41,000 of them have moved to other districts in the state, while 70,000 were evacuated and are attending schools in 47 states, including about 48,000 in Texas and 8,000 in Georgia.

Federal aid requested

Picard said he has requested a $2.4 billion federal aid package to pay operational costs of damaged schools or those that closed and may be reopening in the weeks ahead. The aid also would be used to pay the salaries and benefits of an estimated 12,000 displaced teachers and support personnel, and to replace lost state and local revenues the schools normally would receive.

Other items Picard said he will ask Gov. Kathleen Blanco to place on the agenda of the Nov. 6-18 special session include a temporary increase in the size of classes at all levels of education, a one-year suspension of the LEAP test for fourth- and eighth-graders unless local school boards want to administer it; and bills to change the amount of time students will have to attend classes this year.

State law requires a student to attend a minimum of 160 days of school out of a 177-day year.

Picard said some local school boards already have started rearranging regular and holiday schedules and lengthening school days to make up class time lost from Katrina and Rita.

Morial denounces proposals to cut benefits for victims

Don't rob poor to pay for rebuilding, he says

By David Pace
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — Paying for Hurricane Katrina relief and reconstruction by cutting federal spending on programs that benefit the poor would add a new insult to those who suffered most in the storm, Urban League President Marc Morial said Wednesday.

Morial, mayor of New Orleans from 1994 through 2002, said Congress instead should offer a three-year tax holiday to people making less than $50,000 a year who live in the hurricane-devastated region and agree to return. And businesses in the region that agree to pay workers a living wage should get a 50 percent tax cut, he said.

"Instead of burdening those already down and those already out, we must help them get back up and move forward," Morial said in a speech at Georgetown University Law Center.

Congress has provided $62 billion in emergency relief money for victims of Katrina, and estimates of the total reconstruction bill approach $200 billion.

To begin paying that bill, House GOP leaders last week proposed cutting another $15 billion from federal benefit programs, such as Medicaid, food stamps and farm subsidies, that already are slated for $35 billion in spending cuts. The House plan also would make across-the-board cuts to agency budgets.

Morial didn't offer an alternative for paying for Katrina costs, but he said there was no discussion of budget cuts and budget crises when Congress responded to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"Forget the political case, how about the moral case?" he said. "How about the case that what is right in New York City and Wall Street is right for any part of the nation?"

Marc Morial
Former mayor wants Congress to pass 'Katrina bill of rights'

Morial reiterated the Urban League's call for a "Katrina bill of rights" that would guarantee victims "the right to recover, the right to vote, the right to return, the right to rebuild and the right to work."

To implement those rights, he said, Congress should extend unemployment assistance to the 500,000 people left jobless by the storm and create a victim compensation fund similar to the one that disbursed $7 billion after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Morial also said all federal Katrina contracts that are being rebid should include provisions setting aside half the money for local companies and a fourth for minority contractors.

State and local officials also need to ensure that evacuees will be able to continue to vote in their home states, he said, in order to ensure their continued voice in rebuilding decisions.

Echoing proposals by some in Congress, Morial also said an independent agency, similar to the Tennessee Valley Authority, should be created with multiyear federal financing to direct and oversee the reconstruction effort.

"This is not about whether this Community Disaster Loan program is the perfect program. It's not. It is the only viable plan that we have."
Sen. DAVID VITTER

Senator says loan plan has room to improve

Officials balk at repayment proviso

By Jan Moller
Capital Bureau

BATON ROUGE — U.S. Sen. David Vitter, R-La., said Wednesday that a $750 million loan program he helped steer through Congress last week is far from perfect and he will work to make it more favorable to Louisiana.

"This is not about whether this Community Disaster Loan program is the perfect program. It's not," Vitter said at an afternoon news conference. "It is the only viable plan that we have."

The program, which President Bush signed last Friday night, lets local governments that saw their tax bases devastated by hurricanes Katrina and Rita borrow money to help meet payrolls and other essential expenses.

Sen. David Vitter
Urges state officials to make plan work

But unlike similar loan programs approved after other disasters, governments in Louisiana must pay back any money they receive, without hope of debt forgiveness. That came as a disappointment to state officials, who said Louisiana municipalities deserve the same type of federal grants that other disaster-devastated cities have received in years past.

State officials also have complained about a provision in the bill requiring local governments to immediately begin paying money into a sinking fund to help secure the loans, which presents a problem for parishes experiencing severe cash-flow problems. Vitter said he has been assured that the sinking fund provision will be eliminated as the Federal Emergency Management Agency writes the rules for the program.

Hope for change

Standing alongside state Treasurer John Kennedy, a Democrat, Vitter urged state officials to put partisanship aside and to try to make the program work, warts and all. In the meantime, he said he is confident in his ability to persuade Congress to eliminate the provision barring debt forgiveness.

Vitter said he opposed the provision as the bill was being debated, but became convinced that the bill could not pass without it.

Vitter also warned that the state would hurt its chances of getting a better deal on Capitol Hill if it turns its back on the loan program. "Our response to this, I think, will greatly shape the future response of the U.S. Congress to our continuing needs," Vitter said. "If we reject this plan . . . the response of many folks in Congress will be, 'Well, we tried. Good luck, Louisiana.' "

Gov. Kathleen Blanco said she is worried some local governments will end up borrowing money they won't have the ability to pay back when the loans are due. "We don't want to make dishonest people out of desperate people," Blanco said.

FEMA rules

The governor has asked Bush to waive certain requirements of federal disaster regulations to allow FEMA to reimburse local governments for routine operations. Current rules only allow governments to be reimbursed for expenses directly related to the disaster, such as debris removal and overtime pay for emergency workers.

Vitter and Blanco both said Louisiana's history of corruption has created an unfair perception among some lawmakers. "It's insulting. It's very insensitive and nearly inhumane," Blanco said.

Kennedy said the program isn't perfect, but it's the best that Louisiana is likely to get at the moment. "There is no Plan B, not that I've seen," Kennedy said. "This is the plan. We have no choice but to make it work."

Kennedy took issue with comments from Commissioner of Administration Jerry Luke LeBlanc, who said earlier this week that the loans will take up to 25 days to distribute. "I don't know where Jerry's getting that," he said. "All you have to do is fill out the application and the federal government is even going to provide an accountant to work with each individual local government."

Tom Ed McHugh, who heads the Louisiana Municipal Association, said he hasn't received feedback from his members yet about the loan program but predicted that many recipients will have trouble paying back the money. "If you ask them do we want the loan or nothing at all, they'll probably say we want the loan . . . knowing full well that their ability to repay is going to be extremely limited," McHugh said.

Business leaders looking for some answers

They want incentives to return to N.O.

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — A group of 48 New Orleans business leaders met with about half a dozen state lawmakers in Houston on Tuesday to express their concerns about the city's future and the lack of clear communication about a hurricane recovery plan, according to people who attended the meeting.

Most of the business executives are living and working in the Texas oil town, pondering whether to move back to New Orleans.

The meeting was arranged through the efforts of former Lt. Gov. Jimmy Fitzmorris, Energy Partners Chairman Richard Bachmann, who is residing in Houston, and state Sen. Walter Boasso, R-Arabi.

Other state lawmakers who attended the meeting included Sen. Ken Hollis, R-Metairie, Rep. John Alario, D-Westwego, and Sen. Max Malone, R-Shreveport, according to those who participated.

Hollis said the basic message from the business people was that "Every minute of every day, we're getting more comfortable over here" in Texas.

Foremost, the group was looking for concrete commitments that the New Orleans levee system would be repaired in a timely manner to withstand a Category 5 hurricane, Hollis and others said. The executives have a fiduciary responsibility to ensure that the company does not make investments that will be washed away by another storm, Hollis said.

"Bottom line, we're just trying to keep up the hope, and we're doing everything we can do as legislators to get them some final answers so they can plan for their business,"
Sen. WALTER BOASSO
Arabi Republican

In the meantime, the lack of a state income tax combined with the business-friendly environment and better schools in Texas have made the executives seriously question whether to return, Hollis said.

John Kallenborn, head of Chase Bank's Louisiana operations, said the business leaders expressed frustration with what they described as a lack of communication from city and state leaders about a plan of action to rebuild the city.

Kallenborn has been working between New Orleans and Baton Rouge since Hurricane Katrina, but was visiting Houston to join the meeting and to speak with other Louisiana clients who have moved at least temporarily to Texas. Chase has committed to continue operating in New Orleans.

By pointing out a number of positive developments, such as the increased business activity in Jefferson Parish and the demand for local housing, Kallenborn said he thought he and others brought an upbeat tone to the meeting.

In his discussions with New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, who did not attend the meeting, Kallenborn said the mayor made two main requests of President Bush this week. The first was for federal help to build a better levee system, and the second was for federal incentives for businesses and individuals to move to New Orleans to work or live. The incentives would phase out after a few years, or if the city's population built up to 500,000, the approximate number before Katrina.

The business executives were looking for programs like those to spark their interest in returning to the city, Kallenborn and Hollis said.

State Sen. Edwin Murray, D-New Orleans, who attended the meeting, said most people in the group intend to come back, and the meeting ended on a positive note. Members of the business group will return with specific suggestions for state legislation, Murray said.

"Bottom line, we're just trying to keep up the hope, and we're doing everything we can do as legislators to get them some final answers so they can plan for their business," Boasso said.

Communication lags hurt military's storm response

By Robert Burns
AP military writer

WASHINGTON — The military's response to Hurricane Katrina was the largest and fastest in U.S. history, but it was hampered by an early disconnect with state and local authorities, a senior Pentagon official said Wednesday.

Paul McHale, the assistant secretary of defense for homeland defense, said the military should have learned more from its experience in previous natural disasters, including Hurricane Andrew in south Florida in 1992.

Communication with state and local authorities in Louisiana and Mississippi was so poor in the hours immediately after Katrina struck the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29 that military commanders had to use couriers for messages, McHale said.

"Early situational awareness was poor, a problem that should have been corrected following identical damage assessment challenges during Hurricane Andrew," McHale said in a group interview with Pentagon reporters.

"Military command and control was workable, but not unified," he said, adding that while National Guard planning was well-executed it was not well-integrated with the Pentagon's Joint Staff and Northern Command.

By the end of this week, only about 250 active-duty military personnel will remain as part of Joint Task Force-Katrina, which was created to coordinate the federal military response in Louisiana and Mississippi. At its peak, the task force had 22,000 military personnel from all services. They were in addition to as many as 50,000 National Guard troops that operated there.

Coast forum studies rebuilding

By The Associated Press

BILOXI, MISS. — It is the private sector that holds the key to rebuilding the Mississippi Gulf Coast, battered by Hurricane Katrina but not defeated, Gov. Haley Barbour said Wednesday.

In remarks to several hundred people attending the Mississippi Renewal Forum in Biloxi, Barbour said that while the federal government had been a good partner since the Aug. 29 hurricane, "In my view, the ultimate determiner of what the coast will be like . . is going to be the private sector."

The forum, bringing together coast officials, architects, engineers and recovery experts from across the country, is a six-day planning event for the Governor's Commission on Recovery, Rebuilding and Renewal.

The commission has until the end of the year to develop a blueprint for rebuilding the six-county Gulf Coast region.

Coast residents, many of whom were poor before the storm, have shown strength of character and have improved Mississippi's image nationally in the way they are rebounding from tragedy, the governor said.

He said those people are now counting on the commission members to provide good ideas for rebuilding.

"What these people have done is just breathtaking, and that is one reason why I am committed to the success of this commission," Barbour said.

Former Netscape CEO Jim Barksdale, named by Barbour to head the commission, said ideas for rebuilding should be geared toward the private sector.

FEMA refusal to share evacuee data draws fire

Policy thwarts hunts for displaced people

By John Pomfret
The Washington Post

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS — The Federal Emergency Management Agency is restricting the release of information on Hurricane Katrina evacuees, complicating efforts by families to find loved ones and by law enforcement officials searching for parolees and convicted sex offenders.

Citing privacy concerns, FEMA has rejected a request by Texas officials for access to its database of the more than 100,000 evacuees who have registered for state aid, according to the governor's office. FEMA has also declined requests from five states to cross-check a database of convicted sex offenders and parolees against a list of evacuees requesting federal assistance, law enforcement officials said.

FEMA officials have started prohibiting workers at a large shelter here from sharing information about evacuees, even with family members, unless the evacuees have signed release forms. In many cases, relief workers said, such forms were lost or never presented in the chaos of the exodus. FEMA authorities made similar restrictions when they took over management of shelters in Beaumont, Texas, last week.

"If we find someone, we've been instructed to tell family members, 'He or she is alive and well in San Antonio,' and that's it," said Rene Gauna, a city employee working at a FEMA-managed shelter at the old Kelly Air Force Base. "We're no longer allowed to release new addresses or telephone numbers or tell people where their loved ones have moved."

Jack Heesch, a FEMA spokesman in San Antonio, said it is standard agency policy not to release "any information on anyone" to protect a person's privacy, a position generally supported by civil liberties groups. He said FEMA is prohibited from releasing information on Katrina's victims to facilitate family reunification or even to prevent "double-dipping," the abuse of federal aid by victims.

Federal privacy law is intended to protect people from identity theft and from other misuse of their personal information, but state aid officials say the regulations should be balanced against the enormity of Katrina.

FEMA is beginning to take over more shelters to lessen the financial burden on states and local communities, prompting concern that it will become even more difficult for families to find loved ones.

Edwin Coleman's family has already run into obstacles. Coleman, 80, a retired inventory clerk, was rescued from his New Orleans home four days after Katrina flooded the city. His daughter, Edwina Coleman, had been looking for him ever since and heard from friends that he was in San Antonio. When she contacted the city's biggest shelter, officials refused to release any information on her father, saying they could not find proof that Coleman had signed a privacy waiver.

After questions from a Washington Post reporter Monday, the shelter released information on Coleman and the two were reunited by telephone. "I'm glad I was found," said Coleman, who said he signed a waiver but it apparently was lost. "People have been good to me, but things have been awfully confusing."

"We were doing these kind of ad hoc reunifications all the time before FEMA came in," said Gauna, the San Antonio official. "Now we've been told it's against the law."

Since the hurricane, Web sites with information about evacuees have become common on the Internet. Private Web sites, such as one managed by the Red Cross, and those of state governments provide a varying degree of information about evacuees. Some include new addresses and telephone numbers. Others include little other than a name and last known residence.

Arkansas maintains an extensive Web site with detailed information on 29,000 evacuees. No privacy waivers were sought "because the benefits in this case so outweighed the risks," according to Alice Stewart, spokeswoman for Republican Gov. Mike Huckabee.

The Red Cross said on its Web site that all the information was obtained through waivers. Privately, several Red Cross officials acknowledged that in the rush to facilitate family reunifications and care for Katrina's victims many waivers were not signed or were lost.

Shannon Perez, Texas communications director for Service Employees International Union, one of the nation's largest labor organizations, has faced similar obstacles trying to find 314 members from New Orleans who are believed to be in Texas. Perez said she wants to find them because the union has raised $1 million for SEIU members hurt by the hurricane.

"We have money for these folks but we can't access the information," she said. "Either the databases are incomplete or we're not allowed to find out where our members are."

For law enforcement, the lack of access to FEMA information also is an irritant. Louisiana has provided states with a list of the 1,340 convicted sex offenders and 10,000 parolees who were registered in New Orleans.

In some regions, law enforcement officials met planeloads of Katrina evacuees and ran criminal background checks on all of them, prompting criticism from the American Civil Liberties Union. This occurred in Rhode Island, Massachusetts, South Carolina, Kentucky and other states to where evacuees were airlifted.

"If a busload of seniors went to Texas to see a Cowboys game, would they do a background check on them? Why are these people any different?" said Christopher Calabrese, a lawyer at ACLU headquarters in New York. Local prosecutors have requested that FEMA cross-check its database with one that includes convicted sex offenders and parolees but have been rebuffed.

In a conference call on Oct. 3 with representatives of law enforcement agencies from Louisiana, Texas, Alabama, Florida and Texas and from the Department of Justice, the federal attorney wanted to focus on the potential for fraud in the post-hurricane recovery. But, said Cliff Herberg, the first assistant district attorney in Texas' Bexar County, the call was quickly hijacked by local law enforcement concerns about potential criminals.

With a database of approximately 30,000 evacuees in San Antonio, FEMA by far has the most accurate knowledge of who is in his region, Herberg said. "We are not proposing background checks on everyone. We just want known parolees and sex offenders, and FEMA won't do it."

Herberg said law enforcement can be exempted from the privacy act when it demonstrates a need. "This is not a fishing expedition," he said. "We are putting these people in homes and shelters across the nation. We have the Louisiana lists. We've got to know who they are."

New Iberia to vote on future of police

By The Associated Press

NEW IBERIA — New Iberia voters will decide Saturday whether they want a return to a full-scale city police department or continue using the Iberia Parish Sheriff's Office for most law enforcement duties.

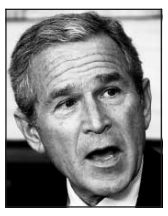
The referendum will ask voters to decide whether to empower the mayor to dissolve the contract with the Sheriff's Office and re-establish the Police Department. Mayor Daigre Curry said that if voters turn down the proposal, she will move to get rid of the Police Department's few remaining officers.

A group that favors bringing back the police, Citizens for Public Safety, has raised about $3,000, according to campaign finance reports, and spent much of that money on radio advertising and signs.

A group that favors keeping the Sheriff's Office, Citizens for Good Government, had not filed a finance report with the state ethics agency.

Troy Comeaux, chairman of Citizens for Good Government, said Tuesday that he is working on getting the group properly filed with state ethics officials. Comeaux said his group's message is that a vote against the ballot proposition Saturday is a vote against new taxes.

Comeaux said a recent report by the Greater Iberia Chamber of Commerce has shown that the city has already saved money through the contract.



Citizens for Public Safety Chairman Hervin "John" Romero said the issue is about effective police protection. He said that although deputies have done good work, public safety in the city will be a concern because of the political nature of the office of the sheriff.

Bush uses Miers' religion as selling point among GOP

Aides reaching out to conservatives

By Nedra Pickler
Associated Press writer

President Bush
'Part of Harriet Miers' life is her religion,' he says

Harriet Miers
Church membership invoked in lieu of judicial record

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Wednesday his advisers were telling conservatives about Supreme Court nominee Harriet Miers' religious beliefs because they are interested in her background and "part of Harriet Miers' life is her religion."

"People are interested to know why I picked Harriet Miers," Bush said at the White House. "They want to know Harriet Miers' background. They want to know as much as they possibly can before they form opinions. And part of Harriet Miers' life is her religion."

Bush, speaking at the conclusion of an Oval Office meeting with visiting Polish President Aleksander Kwasniewski, said his advisers were reaching out to conservatives who oppose her nomination "just to explain the facts."

He spoke on a day in which James Dobson, conservative founder of Focus on the Family, said he had discussed the nominee's religious views with presidential aide Karl Rove.

Not even a congressional recess nor Bush's preoccupation with hurricane recovery and affairs of state has shrouded the continuing controversy surrounding his selection of Miers to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Debate about Miers' credentials was prominent on the Sunday TV talk shows and has continued to occupy considerable attention on the Internet.

Some of Bush's conservative critics say Miers has no judicial record that proves she will strictly interpret the Constitution and not, as Bush says, "legislate from the bench." They say Bush passed up more qualified candidates to nominate someone from his inner circle.

Miers is Bush's second pick for the court. He chose John Roberts for the bench, initially to succeed O'Connor, but then gave Roberts the nod for chief justice when William Rehnquist died. Roberts was confirmed by the Senate on a vote of 78-22.

On a radio show broadcast Wednesday, Dobson said he discussed Miers with Rove on Oct. 1, two days before her nomination was announced. Dobson said Rove told him "she is from a very conservative church, which is almost universally pro-life," but denied he had gotten any assurances from the White House that she would vote to overturn the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision that legalized abortion.

Dobson said Rove told him that Miers had been a member of Texas Right to Life. White House spokesman Scott McClellan said she was not a member of the organization "that I'm aware of."

"My understanding is that she attended some events, some fund-raising events that they had," McClellan said.

Miers bought a $150 ticket to a 1989 fund-raising dinner for another antiabortion group, Texans United for Life, according to the president of the group, now called the Texans for Life Coalition.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, said the Senate and the rest of America deserve to know what Dobson and the White House know about Miers.

Formerly jailed reporter testifies

It's her 2nd appearance over CIA name leak

By Pete Yost
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — New York Times reporter Judith Miller on Wednesday completed her testimony before a grand jury investigating the leak of a CIA officer's name, summoned for a second appearance to discuss a previously undisclosed conversation she had had with Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff.

Miller and her attorney, Robert Bennett, emerged from the courthouse after she gave more than an hour's worth of testimony to grand jurors. Both declined to comment.

The appearance came a day after Miller surrendered previously undisclosed notes on her June 23, 2003, contact with I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Cheney's chief of staff, about former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson.

The Times said she was summoned specifically to discuss the notes and the conversation with Libby. The paper said the reporter has not escaped legal jeopardy yet because prosecutors have not lifted the contempt order that put her in jail for refusing to testify earlier in the investigation. Miller was released from jail Sept. 29 after Libby released her from her promise of source confidentiality, and she agreed to testify.

Libby has testified to the same grand jury. Cheney was interviewed by prosecutors in the criminal investigation more than a year ago.

The special counsel, Patrick Fitzgerald, is investigating whether a crime was committed when administration officials became involved in leaking the identity of Wilson's wife, CIA officer Valerie Plame, in 2003.

At the time, Wilson was among a growing number of critics suggesting the administration had twisted prewar intelligence about Iraq's nuclear weapons programs to exaggerate the threat from then-President Saddam Hussein.

THE NEWS IN BRIEF

Couple's 16th child may not be their last

LITTLE ROCK, ARK. — Michelle Duggar just delivered her 16th child, and she's already thinking about doing it again. Johannah Faith Duggar was born Tuesday at 6:30 a.m. and weighed 7 pounds, 6.5 ounces. The baby's father, Jim Bob Duggar, a former state representative, said Wednesday that mother and child were doing well. He said Johannah's birth was especially exciting because it was the first time in eight years the family has had a girl. Jim Bob Duggar, 40, said he and Michelle, 39, want more children. "We both just love children, and we consider each a blessing from the Lord. I have asked Michelle if she wants more, and she said yes, she will accept them," he said. The Discovery Health Channel filmed Johannah's birth and plans to air a show about the family of 18 next May. The Learning Channel is doing another show about the family's construction project, a 7,000-square-foot house. Michelle Duggar had her first child at age 21.

Cops: Ga. man took Cessna for joy ride

LAWRENCEVILLE, GA. — A man was arrested on charges of stealing a charter jet and taking it on a 350-mile joy ride from Florida to Georgia, police said Wednesday. The circumstances of the theft were not clear, police spokesman Darren Moloney said. The incident "appears to be a joy ride." Daniel Andrew Wolcott, 22, of Buford, Ga., was charged with felony theft and misdemeanor reckless conduct. Investigators said they made the arrest after interviewing five people who said they were on the 10-passenger, $7 million Cessna Citation 7 when Wolcott flew it. The plane, which is owned by Pinnacle Air, was found Monday at the Gwinnett County Airport-Briscoe Field near Atlanta, police said.

Priest sex abuse hushed, files say

Court forces release of Los Angeles records

By Laura Wides
Associated Press writer

LOS ANGELES — Newly released records of sex abuse claims against 126 priests that are at the core of hundreds of lawsuits against the Archdiocese of Los Angeles show that church officials for decades moved accused priests between counseling and new assignments.

Attorneys for 500 alleged victims and the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Los Angeles had previously agreed to release the information, but attorneys for accused clergy succeeded in blocking publication, arguing it would violate priests' privacy rights. An appellate court last month ordered the documents to be released after nearly three years of legal wrangling.

The records conform with the pattern of the abuse crisis that erupted in the American church nearly four years ago. In many cases, the church provided years of therapy to accused clergy, believing the men could be rehabilitated, then assigned them to new parishes, which often resulted in new claims against them.

Still, the Los Angeles Archdiocese appears to have so far avoided the damaging full disclosure forced on other American dioceses by judges and grand juries.

Church officials late Tuesday released summaries of their personnel records. By comparison, the files a judge unsealed in the Archdiocese of Boston, where the abuse crisis began in early 2002, contained doctors' reports, memos from diocesan officials about meetings with distraught parents and other details that revealed an insensitivity to victims. The documents enraged Catholics and forced Cardinal Bernard Law to resign as Boston archbishop.

Raymond Boucher, the lead plaintiffs' attorney in Los Angeles, said the newly released information was a first step, but that complete personnel files should be made public.

"The significance of these files is that they provide a little more information for the public about the church's knowledge and frankly their participation in the molestation of children, but until the (entire) files are made public, we're not going to be satisfied," he said.

Archdiocese attorney J. Michael Hennigan called Boucher's concerns that the summaries might be whitewashed "nonsense."

"Ray has not seen the files themselves and has no basis to say that beyond speculation," he said. "These are accurate descriptions of the content of the files, without disclosing confidential communication."

The records cover priests who were ordained as far back as the 1920s. Cardinal Roger Mahony had overseen many of the men. A spokesman for Mahony has repeatedly insisted the cardinal wanted to reveal the information but was barred by confidentiality laws.

David Clohessy, national director of the Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests, accused Mahony of "shameless posturing as some sort of reformer," while he used legal maneuvers to block a full accounting of his role in the crisis.

"Mahony is grasping at straws to convince his flock that he's not as awful as many of his colleagues," Clohessy said. "And as he has for years, Mahony is trying anything he can dream up to avoid having to fully reveal how little he did to safeguard innocent kids from abusive clerics."

The documents offer details in numerous cases, though much of the information has already been published. In many of the files, there was little mention of child molestation. Instead, euphemisms such as "boundary violations" were used to describe the conduct.

Flu shots slow reaching doctors

That could be trouble for high-risk patients

By Lauran Neergaard
AP medical writer

WASHINGTON — Delayed vaccine shipments to some health departments and doctors' offices are hindering efforts to protect the highest-risk patients even as grocery stores open mass flu-shot clinics.

Federal health officials insist there will be plenty of vaccine in a few more weeks.

A manufacturer barred from the U.S. market last year, Chiron Corp., is to resume sales soon, a move that is expected to boost the nation's ultimate supply to 91 million doses, said Dr. Ray Strikas of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

But until Oct. 24, flu shots were supposed to be reserved for the elderly, babies, people with asthma and others at highest risk. The CDC is getting complaints that many high-risk patients won't be reached by then, leaving them to compete for shots.

A survey of 120 local health departments around the country last week found all but six reporting delays in getting any vaccine or only partial shipments, said Patrick Libbey of the National Association of County & City Health Officials.

Pakistani soldiers and civilians carry wounded people from the recent earthquake into a U.S. Army Chinook helicopter to evacuate them back to the capital Islamabad, at an army base in the northern Pakistani town of Muzaffarabad, Wednesday.

International effort pours food, supplies into Pakistan

Millions still lack shelter, medicines

By Sadaqat Jan
Associated Press writer

MUZAFFARABAD, PAKISTAN — Rescue efforts gave way to aid relief, as hopes faded Wednesday of finding more survivors in Pakistan's devastated quake zone. Still, miracles emerged amid the misery: A Russian team rescued a 5-year-old girl trapped for nearly 100 hours under the rubble of her family home.

Trucks and helicopters with aid from dozens of countries choked roads up to the crumbling towns of the Himalayan region of Kashmir, but the hungry and homeless in hard-hit areas remained isolated four days after the temblor.

"No country is ready for such a disaster," President Gen. Pervez Musharraf said in a nationally televised address, acknowledging delays in his government response but saying that relief operations were now fully under way.

The 7.6-magnitude quake Saturday demolished whole towns, mostly in Kashmir, divided by a cease-fire line between Indian and Pakistani territories. The death toll was believed to be more than 35,000, with tens of thousands injured.

A strong aftershock shook the capital Islamabad early Thursday, causing buildings to move for a few seconds. It was not immediately clear what the aftershock's magnitude was or if it caused any damage.

U.S., Pakistani, German and Afghan helicopters delivered tents, blankets and medical equipment and brought back dozens of badly injured people on each return flight. The choppers flew in clear skies after stormy weather forced the suspension of flights Tuesday.

"The problem we are seeing right now is that there's so many injured Pakistanis, we just can't take back everyone. We are limited for space," U.S. military spokesman Col. James Yonts said at a base near Islamabad.

At a landing zone in Muzaffarabad, the capital of Pakistan's portion of Kashmir, doctors selected only the most severely injured for evacuation.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice arrived in Islamabad, where Pakistani leaders appealed for tents, water, blankets and clearing equipment.

"We will be with you in your hour of need. We will be with you not just today but also tomorrow," Rice said at a news conference with Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz.

Aziz said small aircraft were able to land at the airport in Muzaffarabad, but C-130 transport planes still were only able to airdrop equipment and supplies.

Embattled Syrian official dies

Interior minister's death called suicide

By Albert Aji
Associated Press writer

DAMASCUS, SYRIA — Syria's interior minister, who ran Lebanon for many years and was one of several top officials caught up in the U.N. probe of the slaying of that nation's former prime minister, died Wednesday. The country's official news agency said he committed suicide in his office.

The death of Brig. Gen. Ghazi Kenaan, just days before the final U.N. investigation report is due, was a new and startling sign of turmoil in Syria, whose authoritarian regime is girding for the chance that the U.N. report might implicate high-ranking officials in the assassination of former Lebanese premier Rafik Hariri. Hariri was killed by a bomb in February as his convoy drove through Beirut.

Hours before he died, Kenaan, 63, told a Lebanese radio station: "I believe this is the last statement that I can make." He confirmed speaking to U.N. investigators but denied a recent report that he told them about corrupt Syrian officials.

President Bashar Assad told CNN in an interview earlier Wednesday, before Kenaan's death was announced, that if the U.N. murder probe had any material proof of Syrian involvement, those involved would be charged with treason and could be handed over to an international court.

Many Lebanese believe that Syria played a role in Hariri's killing. The Syrian government has denied involvement, but Syria dominated Lebanese political life until mass demonstrations and international pressure forced it to withdraw its troops from Lebanon at the end of April.

The big question in Syria is how long Assad can last if the probe indicates his government played a part in Hariri's death. The regime is not very popular, but it has little opposition and any revolt would likely be pinned on the United States, which Syrians blame for the Iraqi insurgency.

Chinese get to see latest space launch

By Joe McDonald
Associated Press writer

BEIJING — Chinese exulted at their country's second manned space flight Wednesday after the government eased its secrecy and showed the launch of two astronauts on live television, scoring a success in a costly program that communist leaders hope will win them respect abroad and public support at home.

Children in Shanghai watched in class and hundreds of people gathered around a giant video screen at Beijing's main railway station to see astronauts Fei Junlong and Nie Haisheng blast off from a base in China's desert northwest.

"I am feeling really emotional," said a construction worker at the Beijing train station, who would give only his surname, Liu. "This is a proud moment — not only for China, but for Chinese people all over the world, and for humankind."

The flight came two years after China launched its first astronaut into orbit in October 2003, becoming only the third nation able to send a human into space on its own, after Russia and the United States.

None of that flight was telecast live, apparently out of fear that something might go wrong. But on Wednesday, Chinese viewers were allowed to see the liftoff and live scenes of Fei and Nie in their cockpit as they roared skyward.

The manned space program is a key prestige project for the communist government. Chinese leaders hope that patriotic pride at its triumphs will shore up their standing amid wrenching economic change and public anger at corruption and a growing gap between rich and poor.

WAR IN IRAQ

Compromise gets Sunnis on board

Suicide bomber kills 30 Iraqis at army center

By Thomas Wagner
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — The speaker of Iraq's parliament said Wednesday that lawmakers had approved a last-minute compromise on the draft constitution aimed at gaining Sunni support just days before a nationwide referendum on the charter.

In ongoing violence aimed at thwarting approval of the document, a suicide bomber killed 30 Iraqis at an army recruiting center in a northwestern town.

The lawmakers gathered for about an hour at a special session of the National Assembly to hear a set of amendments to the constitution that are at the heart of the compromise, which was reached Tuesday night.

The session, attended by 157 of the body's 275 members, ended without a vote on the measure. Parliament speaker Hajim al-Hassani said a vote was not necessary and that the amendments were approved.

"Today with the presence of the National Assembly members, it is considered to be adopted," al-Hassani told The Associated Press. The deal had already been accepted by the main parties in parliament.

Earlier in the day, Iraq's president, prime minister and other leaders praised the compromise, reached after marathon talks among Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish negotiators that were shepherded by U.S. officials.

The deal was meant to address the concerns of Sunnis, who until now have been campaigning to defeat the charter in Saturday's referendum. The breakthrough compromise greatly increase the likelihood that voters will approve it.

AP PHOTO

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, center, joins hands with other officials Wednesday as the Transitional National Assembly approved a set of last-ditch amendments to the proposed constution to win Sunni support.

"The new amendments on the draft open wide horizons and give everyone another chance to have a proportional role to participate in the political process to build the new Iraqi government," al-Hassani said earlier. "The political process in Iraq, in spite of all its many complications, is going forward."

The draft constitution already has been printed by the United Nations, and millions of copies are being distributed to voters. Any new additions probably would have to be announced in the media.

Under the deal, the two sides agreed on a mechanism to consider amending the constitution after it is approved in the nationwide vote. The next parliament, to be formed after Dec. 15 elections, will set up a commission within four months to consider amendments.

The amendments later would have to be approved by the entire parliament and submitted to another referendum two months later.

Sunnis hope to have a larger representation in the next parliament and want to try to water down the autonomous powers that Shiite and Kurdish regions will hold under the constitution's federal system.

But the current additions give no guarantee that the Sunnis will be able to push through the changes in the future, only that they will have the chance to try.

Washington welcomed the compromise as a positive step but cautioned that it would likely do little to quell insurgent violence.

"We have always emphasized the importance of encouraging as broad a participation in the political process as possible. We believe the political process should be inclusive," said White House spokesman Scott McClellan.

But McClellan added that the Bush administration expected to see "continued violence because the terrorists understand how high the stakes are in Iraq."

Sunnis had feared that the constitution would fragment Iraq because it allows Shiites and Kurds to create mini-states in the oil-rich north and south, leaving Sunnis in a poor central zone.

Sunni-led insurgents have been wreaking violence in a bid to wreck the referendum and scare voters away from the polls. At least 433 people have been killed in militant violence in the last 17 days.

Actress lays down the Law: Wedding is off

Compiled by J.E. Bourgoyne

Sienna Miller and Jude Law have ended their engagement, months after he apologized for an affair with his children's nanny, according to a published report.

A London-based representative for Miller, who became engaged to her "Alfie" co-star last Christmas, refused comment Wednesday on the story, which was posted on People magazine's Web site. The magazine did not name any sources.

Jude Law
Actor's affair with nanny soured engagement

Sienna Miller
Actress reportedly seeing Law's friend Daniel Craig

Public Eye, the London firm that represents Miller, said it would not comment on her personal life.

Law's publicist, Simon Halls, also said Wednesday he wouldn't talk about the report.

British media reported this week that Miller, 23, had been seeing Law's friend Daniel Craig while Law was fighting to win her back. Miller and Craig appeared together in the 2004 film "Layer Cake."

Miller was quoted last month as saying, "There's nothing going on between me and Daniel. We were in a movie together two years ago."

The happy couple

Ashton Kutcher and Demi Moore, who had refused to confirm their Sept. 24 wedding, have opened up their photo album.

Photos published Wednesday by OK! magazine, which paid an undisclosed sum for the pictures, show the couple tying the knot in a Kabbalah ceremony at their Beverly Hills, Calif., home.

Kutcher, 27, is wearing a cream Brooks Brothers suit and a fedora. Moore, 42, is wearing a white Lanvin gown.

Moore's ex-husband, Bruce Willis, and their three daughters, Rumer, 17, Scout, 14, and Tallulah, 11, attended the ceremony. Other guests included actor Wilmer Valderrama, Kutcher's "That '70s Show" co-star.

It was the first marriage for the actor, whose film credits include "Cheaper by the Dozen" and "Guess Who?"

Moore's marriage to Willis ended in 2000. She was married to rocker Freddie Moore from 1980 to 1984.

Cancer fighter

Joan Kennedy, former wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy and mother of Rep. Patrick Kennedy, was recovering Wednesday from breast cancer surgery.

Kennedy, 69, underwent a lumpectomy Tuesday at Massachusetts General Hospital, according to a person close to the family who, at the family's request, spoke only on condition of anonymity.

Kennedy will be treated with radiation and was expected to be released from the hospital later Wednesday, the person said.

Sen. Kennedy said that he was optimistic his former wife would beat cancer.

"Joan's a fighter and she has the great love of her children and support of all of us," he said. "We're very hopeful of the outcome. We obviously send her our love and wish her the best."

The surgery comes just months after a legal battle with her children, who argued she was unfit to care for herself due to chronic alcoholism.

The children had temporary guardianship over Kennedy, but sought to make it permanent after she was found passed out on a Boston sidewalk in March with a concussion and broken shoulder.

A settlement, reached in June, calls for two trustees to manage her estate and a guardian to supervise her personal affairs.

Cheers to baby

Woody Harrelson, who plays a father of 10 in the new movie "The Prize Winner of Defiance, Ohio," said he's going to be a real-life dad for a third time.

"The wife is preggers ... and we've narrowed it down to me," he told David Letterman, according to an interview transcript.

It will be the third child for Harrelson and his wife, Laura Louie.

Woman hands out cash to help storm victims

'God knew what he was doing,' forcing her to evacuate to Natchitoches, Denise Godbolt said. Since her son died, 'I've never been able to really find peace, but now it's so peaceful, so quiet, and I can think.'

to stake out a new life.

As she did in the wake of her son's death, Godbolt seeks divine purpose in this second tragedy. When her son died, she pronounced his funeral, at a now-flooded church a few blocks from his home, "a rejoicing day." Just six months later, she trusts the storm forced her to Natchitoches for good reasons.

"God knew what he was doing," she said. Since her son died, "I've never been able to really find peace, but now it's so peaceful, so quiet, and I can think."

Godbolt probably wouldn't have returned to the 9th Ward at all, except to pluck the treasured artifacts of her son's short life from the mangled, moldy wreckage of her household. Now at the door, the scene overwhelmed her.

"I didn't want to come back," she said, wiping back streams of tears. "That's all his things, . . . his flag, everything. I didn't want to come and see all his things like this."

Sgt. Lee Godbolt
Was killed more than six months ago while serving in Iraq

A few minutes later, Godbolt found the neatly boxed flag that had adorned her son's casket. It got a little wet, but it could be cleaned and saved. The next tears were of joy.

"Look! Look!" she said, opening the cover of the triangular box, the flag neatly folded inside. "He knew I was trying to take care of his things; I did the best I could. I carried out as much as I could."

As Meziere and Godbolt's surviving son helped her pull out other salvageable memorials, each was a reason to rejoice: the helmets and battle gear, the medals and certificates, the newspaper clippings, prayers and letters. Through a year of unimaginable hardship, Godbolt has focused on victories, however small. First she turned pain into pride for her son, and now the ruin of her home is turning into the start of a blessed new life.

"Every time I see her, she's got a smile on her face," said Meziere, who works at the National Guard Armory near Godbolt's home in Natchitoches.

Denise Godbolt almost didn't leave before the storm. But at the last minute, she yielded to the advice of friends and relatives and took off in the 1994 Cutlass Ciera Lee Godbolt once drove, and that she had since adorned with a painting of his face.

She had the image airbrushed on the car after police recovered it from car thieves. They had stolen it on his birthday, one stark reminder of the how mean her neighborhood could be. Other times, people stole the American flags that she put up in her front yard and on a staircase. At night, she slept with two-by-fours blocking her front and bedroom doors.

After creeping in traffic for eight hours on Airline Drive, the car gave out. One wheel fell off after its lug nuts came loose. She wanted to save the car; she loved that painted hood — even if the car, to anyone else, would have been nothing special. She tried to walk to a roadside emergency call box to phone authorities, but she could barely see. The storm had hit by then, and the wind and rain blinded her.

"I couldn't see. I couldn't walk. The wind was blowing my arms back," she said.

So she hopped into a car with her sister, traveling just ahead of her. She still hasn't found the Oldsmobile, but hopes it will turn up in a State Police impound lot.

Godbolt and her family went first to Alexandria, where they stayed with a friend of her sister, Mae Hagan, in a house with 17 people. Then she moved on to Natchitoches to join Charles. The place struck her as so friendly, so calm, a perfect new home. One woman she met worked at the gas station, the liquor store and the library.

"It's like Mayberry," she said.

Before long, she knew she wasn't coming back. She's rented a trailer that also houses her sister and her family, and family friends.

Godbolt began visiting churches and shelters, handing out money, she and Meziere said. A friend of Meziere's from a Catholic charity in California heard of Godbolt's dual tragedies and sent him $1,000 to give her. She didn't keep a dime, passing out the gift in $200 increments to churches in Natchitoches for the benefit of storm victims. She also donated about $1,000 of her own money, she said.

The clergy were perplexed at a storm victim donating to storm victims, Godbolt said. "I told them my hurricane came six months ago."

Shared qualities

Lee Godbolt died March 26, as he, Meziere and other soldiers returned to Camp Liberty in Baghdad to retrieve an interpreter. As they parked just outside the gates, a blue Bongo truck, a pickup not much bigger than a golf cart, pulled up next to the vehicle and exploded, detonated by the suicide bomber inside. The blast instantly killed Godbolt and another Louisiana National Guardsman, Sgt. Isiah Sinclair, 31, of Natchitoches.

Lee Godbolt had never worried, and never seemed to show fear — if he even felt it, Meziere said.

"He was funny, laid-back. You could never get mad at him," Meziere said, pointing at a clipped newspaper photo that showed Godbolt lying on a lawn in bright sunshine, smiling and goofing off. "That's Lee," Meziere said.

Meziere sees many of the same qualities in his buddy's mother, and the two of them have become close.

Her ability to smile even while cleaning out her ruined home reminded him of the first time he met her, on leave from Iraq shortly after Lee Godbolt died.

Meziere had come to console a mother on behalf of her fallen son. It didn't work out that way.

"She ended up consoling me," he said.

Wednesday, she was the same, taking breaks to talk and trade hugs with visiting relatives, friends and neighbors. She often put her own troubles aside to offer encouraging words to those more beaten down by the storm.

"Did you see your church?" friend Janie Marchaud asked her.

Denise Godbolt nodded, knowing Philadelphia Ministries, just a few blocks away, resembled her devastated home.

"I'm still trying to wake up. It's like a nightmare," Marchaud, tears welling in her eyes, told Godbolt as they traded hugs.

As the hours passed and the soldier's mother salvaged more mementos, her face brightened and her tears dried. After enduring a war that took her son and a storm that took her home, any obstacle that lay ahead will seem like a blessing, she said.

"It hit me below the belt for a few minutes," she said of her first view of the house. "But I'm coming around. This isn't my home — I'm just passing through. I just came to pick up a few of his little things. But he lives in my heart. This old world can't take that away from me, and it can't take away my happiness and my joy."

Some vow to rebuild; others see no point

9TH WARD, from A-1

Street house, to the hurricane. His residence in eastern New Orleans was washed out, too, along with his hopes for rebuilding the hardest-hit parts of the city.

Born and raised in New Orleans, Barard bought a house in the Lower 9th when he got married and began to raise a family. But Katrina did him in.

But even before the storm, he said, the quality of life in the city had been steadily declining. "If my kids were small, I wouldn't raise them here," said Barard, who retired five years ago after 23 years in the transportation department of Lockheed Martin.

A few blocks away on St. Maurice Street stood Troy Green, 28, who was figuring he could rebuild his flood- and wind-damaged double, along with his barbershop on the first floor near the garages. But he doesn't want to live in New Orleans anymore.

"I think my house could be fixed. I did a lot of work on it myself," Green said, lugging out possessions to his front porch. "I probably wouldn't stay here, not in Orleans Parish. Probably Jefferson Parish, on the west bank."

A bleak picture

The Lower 9th, a predominantly African-American community where 36 percent of the population lived below the poverty line and a quarter of households had income of less than $10,000, sits in ruin. Its families are scattered in different states, and in different states of employment and financial standings. Some have said goodbye for good. Others vow to come back. Someday.

Returnees still blocked from part of 9th Ward

the Lower 9th as a pulpit for his plan to bring back New Orleanians to the city as it is rebuilt.

"Jobs are here," Jackson said Wednesday at a news conference off Caffin Avenue, where he delivered a busload of about 200 people back to the city, though he has since acknowledged that at least 150 of the 200 people he bused into New Orleans were not local evacuees and that most were not even from southeast Louisiana. "For the most part, housing is not."

The Lower 9th on Wednesday was a dusty, bleached-brown picture, covered with drying, cracked sludge left over from the filthy floodwater that only recently receded. Entire houses have disappeared, and others are peeling off their foundations. Children's tricycles are stuck in chain-link fences. Cars are ruined. Power lines, garbage and God knows what else cover streets near the Industrial Canal, where the water breached the levee.

Electricity and water service aren't back, and Mayor Ray Nagin had the National Guard and city police block off the worst-hit part of the area.

Coming home

Beverly Ladmirault, who bought her home on Egania Street after Hurricane Betsy pummeled the Lower 9th Ward in 1965, said her home didn't appear to have structural damage. However, her brother, Earl Johnson, was unable to get into the house he bought 30 years ago, in the 6400 block of North Johnson Street, because of the still-horrid conditions.

The Lower 9th should be rebuilt, Ladmirault said. "Of course. All my sisters and brothers, we all live here," she said. "Everybody's house is underwater. Thank goodness my son moved to Picayune, Miss., last year. I'm able to stay with him."

Many former Lower 9th Ward residents, homeowners in one of the city's poorest corners, have already moved on to new lives in Texas and other states.

"I love it," Keokuk Lewis said of Hurst, Texas, her family's new home. "It's quiet and big. And there's not a liquor store and fried-chicken stand on every corner."

Lewis, a licensed practical nurse, and her husband, Reginald, a truck driver, are optimistic about landing jobs in Texas and shopping for a new home. "You can buy more house for your money in Texas," Lewis said. "One-hundred-and-fifty-thousand dollars in Texas could get me 2,000 square feet, custom built. One-hundred-and-fifty-thousand dollars can't get me nothing in New Orleans."

Her mother, Celestine James, also owned a home in the Lower 9th, next to four empty lots.

"Where am I going to live at?" James said of New Orleans. "The mayor's telling me to come back. What am I coming back to? Everybody don't live on Bourbon Street."

'No plan for return'

Jackson called on the Federal Emergency Management Agency to place trailers in City Park and on golf courses and military bases to help displaced residents start over near home. People could still vote in Orleans Parish and travel for work and family obligations, he said.

"Just as there was no plan for rescue or relocation, there is no plan for return," Jackson said.

James' plan doesn't include returning.

She grew up in the Desire public housing complex and raised her children in the Lower 9th Ward. But over the years she watched the historic neighborhood turn into a haven for drugs and crime, she said, without even a decent sit-down restaurant. James, also a nurse, said she will miss her hometown but is eager to start fresh in Texas.

"I love New Orleans," she said. "But I see now, this showed me I can go somewhere else and I can live. I can make it."

Mark Brink's muffler shop at 5229 St. Claude Ave. isn't going anywhere, though. Brink and his older brother, Freddie Brink III, swept and shoveled out debris from the building, which took 5 ½ feet of water from Katrina. They talked about a new line of business: Buying catalytic converters from wrecked cars and trucks to resell the bit of platinum inside each one.

"From Claiborne to the river is OK," Mark said of the Lower 9th Ward, where he has run the shop since 1984. "I'm going to focus on recycling the catalytic converters and do mufflers on the side."

Plan is to restore levees before June

part of the corps' effort to restore pre-Katrina levels of storm-surge protection to the city by the start of the 2006 hurricane season in June, a schedule political leaders consider key to protecting and reassuring the public that it is safe to return to and live in the city. Baumy said the effort could cost $400 million.

Katrina's storm surge did a number on the region's levees, overflowing some and bursting through others. Concrete-and-steel floodwalls along canals and waterways sustained more than two dozen breaches, according to an engineering survey completed last week.

Learning about weakness

The steel-and-reinforced-concrete vertical wall used along many local waterways, known as an "I-wall" design, has proved to be unexpectedly weak in many areas, including the 17th Street and London Avenue drainage canals. There, engineers who have studied the breaches believe that sections collapsed without being topped by storm-surge waters, pointing to a possible role for human error of design, construction or maintenance in the flooding of large portions of the city.

But even in other areas where floodwaters topped levees, engineers surveying the damage said last week they are concerned with the high number of breaches and apparent weaknesses in the system.

Robert Bea, a geotechnical engineer at the University of California, Berkeley, who is on a National Science Foundation team investigating the breaches, said the corps is applying knowledge about weak soil conditions gained from the failures.

"They are alert to deeper, weaker (soil) layers and are trying to compensate for that," he said. "A levee is like a chain, and it will break at its weakest link."

For example, the documents show the corps intends to demolish a particularly vulnerable half-mile-long section of the floodwall along the Intracoastal Waterway south of eastern New Orleans, where storm surge topped the wall, then breached or moved multiple concrete sections. The old I-wall section will be replaced with a fortified "kicker pile wall."

Much deeper base

The old wall's sheet pile base is 12.5 feet deep. The new wall's base will be 45 feet deep. Instead of a simple vertical wall, the concrete wall section will be an inverted L-shape, anchored by the sheet pile and additional reinforced concrete piles driven diagonally into the ground.

In an adjacent breached area, plans call for replacing a wall with a sheet pile base 5 feet deep with 20-foot-deep piling.

The engineering challenges for the effort are significant. In some cases, topping eroded the normally dry side of the wall, scouring a hole 25 or 30 feet deep that is now packed with sandbags and other fill material that will have to be removed.

"That disturbed the site conditions quite a bit," Baumy said "So we tried to drive them (the sheet piles) down much deeper to cut off any seepage problems. It's a crude way of sealing a breach, dropping sandbags from a helicopter."

Don Basham, the corps' chief of engineering and construction, said Katrina's damage had weakened entire levee structures, making it unwise to just restore the previous configuration

"You've got whole different foundation characteristics to start from, so it starts you looking to a whole new set of parameters of how to replace that wall," he said.

The corps has not yet made public proposed designs to repair the 17th Street and London Avenue canal breaches. Baumy said designers were still working but that they expected to have them out within weeks. Corps officials have said they want to learn more about the floodwall failures before they repair the breaches in case the investigation reveals design flaws that could lead to a failure next year.

Speed is an issue

Interim plans for the 17th Street and London Avenue canals call for a temporary sheet-pile dam connected to the existing concrete wall, extending 50 feet out into the canal and running parallel to the breached area. That will allow the corps to dredge the area and study what went wrong, then keep it dry while a new wall section is built, Baumy said.

The new sheet pile depth for the 17th Street Canal is 45 feet. Documents for the London Avenue Canal were not available. Corps officials have not said what the old sheet pile depth is in the canal flood walls, but Bea said that based on his observations, it might be 10 to 20 feet.

Bea said he was concerned with the speed at which the corps is moving ahead with the new designs, fearing it could lead to trouble down the road. "When I see that sort of scrambling, I worry," he said.

Ill wind won't kill Mardi Gras spirit

the 30-minute discussion.

But in an e-mail late Wednesday, Nagin said he was buoyed by the interest of so many krewes in rolling next year. "This shows the spirit of our city when so many people who have already experienced loss are willing to ensure together on their own to ensure that the 150th Mardi Gras is not defeated by Katrina," he said.

Next year's Carnival season kicks off Jan. 6 and culminates on Fat Tuesday, Feb. 28.

But many officials have speculated whether a storm-ravaged city that has slashed 3,000 jobs and watched its tax revenue evaporate can handle the expense and logistics associated with Carnival.

The message from krewe leaders was that New Orleans can't afford not to hold the event.

Bill Grace, a former Rex who leads the Mayor's Mardi Gras Advisory Committee, said there are practical reasons to keep the 150-year-old tradition alive, citing economic impact studies showing that Carnival produces $900 million in annual spending and more than $50 million in direct tax benefits to government.

"But it also would be symbolic," Grace said, "to let everyone know this city is back on its feet and ready to invite people back."

That sentiment was echoed by Stephen Perry, president of the New Orleans Metropolitan Convention and Visitors Bureau, who joined the krewe captains, Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, float builder Blaine Kern and Carnival historian Arthur Hardy in the presentation.

In addition to providing a "reaffirmation of our culture and history," Perry said a Carnival next year will "put people back in our hotels, back in our restaurants."

All told, leaders of 24 of the krewes that paraded this year in Orleans Parish have said they would like to give it a go next year.

Kern, whose Mardi Gras World tourist attraction in Algiers has been serving as a makeshift military outpost, said he is confident the city will find many out-of-towners willing to fill in for locals who won't be in a position financially to participate in the big party next year.

"I've been approached by hundreds of firefighters, police, nurses, doctors and military personnel who want to come back and ride," he said.

Before the city can greenlight a parade season, council members acknowledged that a number of issues must be addressed, including assurance from the Police Department that New Orleans can provide adequate security for locals and visitors alike.

Council President Oliver Thomas said he thinks public safety can be ensured by calling on the National Guard, the State Police and suburban law enforcement agencies to help out a beleaguered New Orleans Police Department.

Sgt. Joe Valiente, the department's chief liaison with Carnival krewes, told the council that he thinks interim Police Superintendent Warren Riley is in "full support" of a 2006 Carnival season.

When Valiente said he could put together a plan of action in about three weeks if the council gives the NOPD a mandate to do so, Thomas shot back, "Mandate!" A second later, Councilman Jay Batt, who invited the Carnival community to appear, added, "You got it!"

With some krewes likely to be facing their own financial difficulties, the council is expected to waive rules that require a minimum numbers of riders, floats and marching bands. Those regulations were established several years ago to guard against krewes staging shoddy productions.

Other concerns expressed by krewes include parade routes, the piggybacking of parades, the availability of hotel rooms and the condition of Carnival ball venues such as the Morris F.X. Jeff Municipal Auditorium and the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center.

Perhaps the most nettlesome question will be whether the city will be forced to slay the most sacred of cows: New Orleans' prohibition against the commercialization of Carnival. In recent years, suburban parishes have allowed businesses to sponsor floats and riders to toss doubloons and certificates that can be redeemed for free or reduced-price products.

New Orleans, however, has been steadfast in opposing the practice.

But Councilman Eddie Sapir said the extraordinary situation that the financially crippled city finds itself in may call for the council to revisit the ban.

"We never want to commercialize Mardi Gras," Sapir said.

But he said that if everyone involved is "very clever and we don't cross that line, we may be able to get millions of dollars from sponsors this year and this year only."

Though he has no clear plan in mind at this time, Sapir said there might be a way for corporations to write checks to the appropriate (city) departments to help out.

"I think we can find plenty, plenty good, clean sponsors for a good, clean event," he said.

Grace said his advisory committee plans to meet later this month and report back to the council on what type of "flexibility" might be needed to get parades rolling.

Landrieu, whose position places him in control of the state's Culture, Recreation and Tourism department, said holding a Carnival season in 2006 will demonstrate that the city is capable of staging other big events, from the Jazz & Heritage Festival to the Zurich Classic golf tournament.

"Mardi Gras embodies everything we're about," Landrieu said, "from the frivolousness of how we deal with things to the earnestness of how we deal with things."

N.O. City Council defers vote on resident rule

By Bruce Eggler
Staff writer

With little discussion, the New Orleans City Council voted 4-2 Wednesday to defer for six months a vote on the explosive issue of whether to relax the city's residency requirement for police officers.

Council members Renee Gill Pratt, Cynthia Hedge Morrell, Eddie Sapir and Cynthia Willard-Lewis voted to defer the issue over the objections of Jay Batt and Jacquelyn Brechtel Clarkson. Council President Oliver Thomas was absent for the vote.

Under current law, all city employees, including police, must have their "domicile," or principal residence, in the city in order to be hired or promoted. Workers already on the payroll are allowed to continue living outside Orleans Parish but are ineligible for promotion unless they relocate.

Debate on the issue has followed racial lines to a large extent. Black people have traditionally been more apt to support the residency requirement, and white people more apt to oppose it. New Orleans' population is about two-thirds black, while its suburbs are mostly white, and some supporters of the requirement fear that lifting it could lead to an increase in the percentage of police officers who are white.

Citing the extensive damage to the city's housing caused by Hurricane Katrina, Batt had proposed an ordinance saying that suspending the requirement for police was "necessary to retain and recruit law enforcement officers."

Clarkson wanted to amend the ordinance to make firefighters, emergency medical service workers and Sewerage & Water Board employees also exempt from the domicile requirement. But the council voted to defer action on her amendment as well as Batt's ordinance for six months.

Evacuee goes from the Big Easy to the Big Freezy

Local woman finds refuge in Alaska

By Trymaine D. Lee
Staff writer

New Orleans native Gloria Williams enjoys the view of the snow-capped mountains near Anchorage, Alaska, but she hopes her exile in the Land of the Midnight Sun will set with a sweet homecoming.

Alaska is beautiful, Williams said Wednesday by phone, with its crisp air, warm hearts and native cultures. But for the 66-year-old nursing supervisor, New Orleans is home, though water-warped, near-lifeless and more than 3,000 miles away.

"But the minute I can move back, I will. I lived my life there. New Orleans is home, and I'm going back home. But by the grace of God, I made it out."
GLORIA WILLIAMS

"For diehards like me, that have something to go home to, we're coming home," Williams said. "I love New Orleans. We're not a dying breed at this point, not yet."

She misses her pre-Katrina routine: waking just after 4 a.m. each day, opening the doors of the Delgado STD clinic just after 6 a.m., shutting down at 4:30 p.m. Once home she'd sweep the porch and sidewalk of her Short Street home in Carrollton. Then it would be off to St. Francis De Sales for dance practice or Bible study.

"You never know what you have until you don't have it," she said. "You don't know how soothing it was for me. My job, church." All that has changed. Now she takes her morning walks and entertains fantasies of returning home one day.

Long, strange trip

Wednesday about 10 a.m., Williams gazed from a window of her eldest son's Anchorage apartment, smiling upon a mountainous horizon that was dashed with white tops and cloudy halos. The scene is much softer than those seared into her mind, from her last days in New Orleans, where she worked as part of a first-response team inside the Superdome.

She expected to be there only a few days, so when she arrived Sunday morning, all she had in hand was a few uniforms and enough diabetes medicine to last a couple of days.

Soon, floodwaters around the Dome rose, and the number of evacuees inside swelled to dangerous levels. The lights and air conditioning had failed. By Tuesday, the group had decided to gather a few needy patients and head across the street to the New Orleans Arena, where they stayed until Thursday.

Williams' medicine was running extremely low. Her normal dose, a pill in the morning and one at night, was cut in half. To preserve her pills, she pinched some down the middle, nibbling on one pill throughout the day. She ate crackers and drank water to survive. National Guardsmen arrived that Friday and airlifted the group to safe ground, where they boarded buses for Dallas. At the time, Williams had no idea where she was going, how her 47-year-old son had fared in the flood or where she was going to find medicine to stave off "diabetic fits."

"All I had was $5 in my pocket and four dirty uniforms," she said. Once in Dallas, a doctor in the group booked a room. She found a phone and called her son, who asked her to come to Alaska.

Her son, Andre Williams, 50, placed "a million" phone calls and located his younger brother, Darrius Jones, 47, to soothe his mother's soul. Jones had evacuated to Baton Rouge with relatives. Jones, who moved in with his mother this year from Atlanta, fled their home once water began to seep into their garage. He took his mother's Toyota and fled the city. Jones grabbed some jewelry, his mother's purse and the boom box she used for dance practice before leaving. The car, with the items inside, was stolen in Baton Rouge, he later told his mother.

"I wasn't going anywhere without knowing where my youngest son was," she said in a motherly manner.

Andre Williams arranged for a plane ticket to be waiting for his mother the next morning. During a layover in Las Vegas, she broke down in tears. Her city was underwater, and her future seemed just as soggy.

"New Orleans was chaotic, such a mess," she said, breaking down in tears. "I didn't want to leave the way I did."

Williams understood that she couldn't go home. She was going to Anchorage, and that was it. Home wasn't an option. As she cried, walking to the gate of her flight to Alaska, a young woman with a cell phone pinned to her ear placed a hand on her back.

"She said everything's going to be all right," Williams said. "The blessed young thing."

Kindness of a stranger

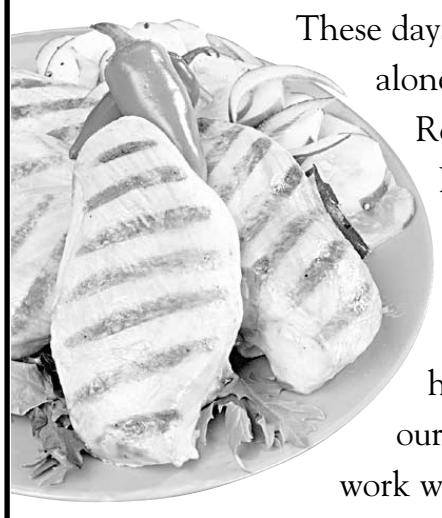
Williams appreciated the gesture and kept on her way. She found a seat in the waiting area, cracked a newspaper and cried some more. The woman came back 20 minutes later. She said her mother was a nurse in Seattle. She asked Williams for the address to where she'd be staying in Alaska. Williams assumed the nice young woman wanted to check on her, knowing she was being displaced by Katrina.

The woman picked up her cell phone and walked away chattering into it. "She came over to me not long after and said 'I travel a lot by air, so I have some extra miles.' "

A week later, an envelope addressed to Williams arrived at her son's one-bedroom apartment. Written on a note inside the envelope, the woman detailed how she had made arrangements for Williams to fly home once New Orleans was opened for residents to return.

"To check on stuff," Williams said the woman wrote. "Not only did she give me air fare to New Orleans, she gave me a ticket to come back to Alaska if things didn't work out," Williams said. She said she read the letter that day and cried.

Williams' journey has led her 3,411 miles from home to a place where the culture and climate could not be more different from New Orleans.



"I can see the snow-capped mountains, see true native Eskimos, native Indians. And everybody is just warm and openhearted. It's like everyone is trying so hard to help you," Williams said. "But the minute I can move back, I will. I lived my life there. New Orleans is home, and I'm going back home. But by the grace of God, I made it out."

ing out a tire and then blowing out the spare on our way out. Then up to New York, through Massachusetts and on to my sister's summer house in Kennebunkport for a while until we ended up here, in Bar Harbor, Maine, which is where I grew up."

In the wake of the storm, residents of the New Orleans area remain scattered across all 50 states, with high concentrations of residents across the South and in major metropolitan areas, according to a map showing where hundreds of thousands of Katrina evacuees have applied for federal assistance.

From Oahu, Hawaii, to the deepest regions of New England, most selected their evacuation locations based on where they had family or close friends. Some now say they're desperate to return, while others have turned their evacuation into a vacation, or "evacu-cation." Still others don't think they'll ever return and are now signing mortgage papers in their new communities.

"We ended up in Hawaii, because we have friends there," Uptowner Kristin Isenberg said. "And they gave us a call after the storm, and they said, 'Why don't you come stay with us? You can enroll the kids in school and stay as long as you need.' We were originally thinking about going to stay with my husband's family, but Hawaii just sounded a little more pleasant than Albany, New York. And I said, 'This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. Let's go stay in Hawaii for a couple months and make lemons into lemonade.' And it's been wonderful."

Loyola University philosophy professor and temporary Albany resident Terence Hoyt said he has no complaints.

"I like it," he said from his parents' house in the upstate New York town. "I think it's one of the nicest places in the country to live in, particularly in the fall."

Though O'Connor, Isenberg and Hoyt all said they're planning to make their way back to the city in the weeks or months ahead, others won't be so quick to return.

Setting down roots

Joe Doucette, an Uptowner before the storm, just got approval for a mortgage on a house in Charlotte, N.C., and said he won't even be thinking about coming back for at least a year.

"We have a 2-year-old, and we have to take that into major consideration," he said. "If we didn't have her, I think we'd be stuck in down there or at least more likely to go back."

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin previously asked parents to think carefully about returning to the city with children.

If he feels the city's ready, Doucette, a contractor, said he can always turn around the Charlotte house he's planning to fix up for a profit in a year. If not, he said, that's OK too.

"Charlotte's a nice place," he said. "I haven't had a bad meal here yet."

His friend Ted Sheppard, who was planning to team up with Doucette for some contracting work before Katrina, said he's comfortable with his family in Savannah, Ga., and unlikely to return.

"I don't think it's going to be a place for my children, and, even when it is, I think it's going to take a really long time for that to happen. And when it does happen, we'll probably be pretty well settled here," he said.

That said, Sheppard said he's planning to fix up his Broadmoor home, which took 6 feet of water, and either base his business from there or rent it out.

"I want to be part of the effort to rebuild New Orleans," he said.

Sense of place

Sociologists say residents' decisions to return are based on a variety of factors, not the least of which is their attachment to the city.

"If you lived in Chicago or

Question remains: Who was in charge?

BROUSSARD, from A-1

hospitals. He further called Young's comments at Wednesday's council meeting a "sanctimoniously hypocritical" maneuver to gain political favor that contrasted with Young's silence Aug. 28 as Broussard decided to evacuate pump station staff.

"At no time do I remember you telling me that we should not send the pump operators away," Boussard said. "I think you're politically perfect. . . . However, in an emergency situation, you were invisible.

"It will be a rainy day in hell . . . before I tell a pump operator that they will stay in any structure . . . during a Category 4 or 5 storm," Broussard said. "You say you're sensitive to life. I say you're full of s- - -."

'Doomsday' debate

The exchange, which drew gasps from an audience accustomed to civility in the council chambers, cast wide open the growing public debate over why the parish's "doomsday" plan calls for pump operators to retreat to Mount Hermon, near the Mississippi border, and whether their protracted return after Katrina exacerbated house flooding and jeopardized the lives of residents who did not evacuate.

In pitting two of the parish's most powerful elected leaders, it also raised the question of who was in charge as Katrina hurtled toward Jefferson Parish and how information about the status of canals and pump stations was gathered as winds strengthened and water levels in canals and Lake Pontchartrain rose before the storm.

During major storm events, Broussard generally has stationed himself at the parish's Emergency Operations Center in Marrero, assuming additional executive authority granted by law during a declared emergency such as Katrina. Meanwhile, he has assigned the council's seven members to monitor conditions inside the parish or supervise satellite government operations elsewhere in case Jefferson is washed away.

Broussard said Wednesday that in the hours leading up to Katrina, he relied on Young to provide status reports on levees and pump stations in East Jefferson. Broussard said he assumed that responsibility himself on the West Bank. Young, however, disputed the point and said Wednesday was the first time Broussard had buttonholed him to that task.

"You know very well that you did not assign me to the pump stations during this hurricane," Young said.

"You are a liar, sir," Broussard replied.

Later, Young said he was based in East Jefferson to provide updates at Broussard's request, eventually hunkering down at East Jefferson General Hospital. Young said he phoned the EOC on Aug. 28 about 8 p.m. to report that water levels in several canals were high and should be pumped down, only to learn from Broussard's top aide, Tim Whitmer, that pump station operators already had evacuated.

Whitmer said he did not remember that exchange, though he said it might have happened. "I simply do not recall that specific phone call," he said.

Young, however, was adamant, adding that although Broussard said he put his faith in him to monitor East Jefferson conditions, the parish president never conferred with him about policy decisions, including the pump operators' evacuation, before or during the storm.

Broussard "never consulted me on the east bank," Young said after the meeting. "I was not the decision maker. I wasn't the point man. I was not the go-to guy. There was an emergency declaration, and (Broussard) was the decision maker. And I was constantly reminded that this was not my call and the parish president was the only one who has the authority to make that call."

Broussard told the council that even as anger continues to swell among residents whose homes flooded while pump stations sat empty, he again would send pump operators outside Jefferson if another strong hurricane approached, though he might dispatch them to a different location.

"The destination was logical," Broussard said later. "As for the question of closer, is there an area where access back in will be easier and therefore the reentry back will be quicker? We're looking into that."

In the case of a Category 3 storm, Broussard said he might consider keeping operators in the parish, though he was not sure if any building in Jefferson could withstand that level of hurricane.

'I'm not campaigning'

The council's six other members stayed silent during the Young-Broussard exchange, with Council Chairman Tom Capella weighing in only to call for an end to the dialog after several minutes. The debate hit a climax when Broussard accused Young of using the pump-station issue to launch his own bid for the parish presidency in 2007.

Broussard said he intends to run for a second term that year. Young said he has not ruled out a race in two years for parish president, though he added that his demand for a new evacuation policy is not about winning votes.

"I'm not campaigning," Young said. "I'm not even thinking about the next election. This is not politics. This is about protecting life and property."

West Nile cases increase, but not because of storms

Most bites occurred before Katrina hit

By The Associated Press

BATON ROUGE — Louisiana has confirmed 30 new cases of West Nile virus, but they don't appear to have anything to do with the hurricanes that hit the state, the state epidemiologist reports.

"The gloomy predictions of large outbreaks of West Nile did not come through and may not materialize before the end of the season," Dr. Raoult Ratard said.

He said most of the cases apparently were from bites before hurricanes Katrina and Rita. The few cases that appear to have developed after the hurricanes were mostly in the Baton Rouge area and the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain, where the virus was heavily present before the hurricanes, Ratard said in a news release late Tuesday.

In all, 129 cases have been diagnosed this year, 74 of them dangerous infections of the brain or spinal fluid; 37 of less-serious West Nile fever; and 18 without any symptoms, often found when people who didn't know they were infected gave blood. Six people have died, none of them since the last report.

The new cases included four in New Orleans, three each in Rapides and Caddo parishes, two each in Ascension, East Baton Rouge, Iberville, Tangipahoa and Washington parishes, and one each in Beauregard, Calcasieu, Caldwell, Jefferson, Livingston, Morehouse, Ouachita, Richland, St. Tammany and Vernon parishes.

The Shreveport and Monroe areas of north Louisiana, neither of which was hit by the hurricanes, have the largest numbers of cases, Ratard said.

To avoid West Nile virus, residents should apply mosquito repellent, wear long sleeves and long pants, and avoid wearing perfumes or colognes when outside for prolonged periods of time. Also, remove any standing water from around your home and make sure your windows and doors have secure screens.

"In comparing this year to other West Nile seasons in Louisiana, the pattern this year appears similar to 2003 and 2004, rather than in 2002, when the state saw a massive outbreak of the disease," Dr. Ratard said. "We do not anticipate seeing such an outbreak this year, even after the recent storm activity."

In 2004, there were 114 cases of West Nile and seven deaths, and in 2003 there were 122 cases and seven deaths from the disease. In 2002, the state had 329 cases and 25 deaths.

At this time last year and the year before, about 75 cases had been diagnosed.

SHEILA STROUP

In search of a flock dispersed

Once the water from Hurricane Katrina was gone, Coleen Landry sneaked into City Park.

"There was nobody here but me. I felt like the little girl in 'The Secret Garden,' " she said.

She went to check on the swan family she had been photographing all summer and to see how the park's ancient live oaks had fared.

"See these oaks? They stood their ground," she said. "But the swans were nowhere to be seen."

Coleen went back again and again, looking for the five cygnets that hatched in May, but she didn't find them, their parents or the pair the parents had raised two years ago.

Then one day she saw one of the 2-year-olds swimming with some geese in Bayou St. John.

"I got so excited I almost jumped out of the car," she said. "I just wonder what happened to her sister."

A grieving mother

A few days ago, Coleen learned that four swans had shown up in Audubon Park after the hurricane, so she went to see whether they were part of her little family.

"It's the mother and three babies," she said, after checking. "The mother really looks like she's grieving. They do that when they lose a mate."

The swans are in a lagoon with plenty of duckweed to eat, and it appears that some of the other waterfowl they hung out with in City Park have migrated with them.

Coleen is hoping that somehow, somewhere, the father, the other two cygnets and the other 2-year-old survived Katrina and are paddling around in some bayou or lagoon. The young swans' feathers would be white by now, and they would be nearly as big as their dad.

"I wonder if anyone has seen them," she said. "The parents were so good at taking care of their babies, and I'd love to get them back together."

Defender of oaks

Coleen was on the board of the Friends of City Park for 14 years, and she must be one of the best friends the park has.

Besides looking out for the swans, she is chairman of the Live Oak Society, which is dedicated to protecting, preserving and honoring the live oak, a hallmark of the park.

"As long as I'm chairman, I plan to stick to that," she said.

She is concerned about the live oaks, both in City Park and in the rest of New Orleans. In the park, the ancient oaks need tender loving care now because the ground beneath them is like concrete.

She hopes that when the Army Corps of Engineers start cleaning up, they'll bring in a mulcher and turn the tons of debris into wood mulch to put under the oaks.

"That would get rid of the mess and feed the trees," she said.

She is also upset to see live oaks around New Orleans being bulldozed when they should be saved.

"You don't just cut down a tree because it's hurt; you cut off the bad parts and you nurture it," she said. "Take away all the trees, and you've got a naked city."

Voodoo music fest to return, for a day

It will honor those helping with recovery

By Keith Spera
Music writer

The Voodoo Music Experience is back — sort of.

The two-day music festival, initially scheduled for City Park on Halloween weekend, was moved to Memphis, Tenn., in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

But producers announced Wednesday that they'll stage Voodoo in both cities: as a free, invitation-only concert for police, firefighters, military and National Guard members, and rescue personnel on Oct. 29 at Riverview Park behind Audubon Zoo, and as a ticketed event on Oct. 30 at AutoZone Park in downtown Memphis.

The New Orleans concert, which also will be open to those who purchased Voodoo tickets before Sept. 22, boasts most of the heavy-hitters from the initial lineup: Nine Inch Nails, Queens of the Stone Age, the New York Dolls, the Secret Machines and DJ Tiesto, plus a dozen local favorites, ranging from trumpeter Kermit Ruffins, the Rebirth and New Birth brass bands, trombone collective Bonerama and keyboardist Jon Cleary to rockers World Leader Pretend, Cowboy Mouth and Supagroup.

The New York Dolls and Cowboy Mouth also will perform in Memphis, along with Cake, the North Mississippi Allstars, the Decemberists and Better Than Ezra. Additionally, Dr. John, the Neville Brothers and Ivan Neville's DumpstaPhunk are scheduled for a free show in Memphis, part of a Halloween weekend concert series.

"The New Orleans show is for the community, first and foremost the people who are rebuilding the city," Voodoo producer Stephen Rehage said. "Memphis is the fund-raising side."

Rehage said Nine Inch Nails frontman Trent Reznor first suggested moving part of Voodoo back to New Orleans. Reznor lived for several years in a Garden District mansion and operated a recording studio on Magazine Street.

'WE CAN'T RESCUE A CITY OF PETS'

Mark Percy said he thought he had seen a ghost when he pushed open the flood-swollen door of his parents' home in eastern New Orleans and encountered the family's black cocker spaniel, Sabu.

The dog was still alive despite being entombed in the dank, moldy ranch house for more than five weeks. Sabu had been stashed in the attic at the onset of the flooding, but in the intervening days, he had fallen through the damp ceiling onto the ground floor. "He scared me to death," said Percy, 20, marveling at the emaciated creature that rolled in the dry grass and lapped pellets of kibble from the sidewalk. "He's a soldier. At best, I thought somebody got him. I thought he'd be dead."

The somebody that Percy hoped would have gotten the trapped dog was one of the hundreds of animal rescuers from across the country who wandered New Orleans in the days and weeks after Hurricane Katrina, checking lists of pet-owner addresses, listening for barks, looking for furred faces in windows and otherwise searching for trapped animals. Their hand-marked vehicles, crowbar house break-ins and caged survivors were a leitmotif of Fish caught off the Louisiana and Mississippi coastlines show no signs of contamination from oil spills and foul floodwaters pumped out of New Orleans after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, dispelling — for now — fears that Gulf of Mexico seafood was dangerously tainted.

The region's fishing industry remains crippled as thousands of boats, marinas and processing plants were destroyed, and it remains unclear when fleets will return to the water. But federal officials say the marine resources on which commercial and recreational fishers depend escaped problems so far.

Test results released this week showed no high levels of chemicals or harmful bacteria in dozens of fish tissue samples taken by scientists aboard a Na-

Working alone with a shovel in her back yard two weeks after Hurricane Katrina, a Christian woman in River Ridge honored Jewish tradition and carefully buried the ruined sacred Torahs of a flooded New Orleans synagogue, to the relief of its distressed members who could not care for the scrolls themselves.

Becky Heggelund's willingness to bury the seven Torahs of Congregation Beth Israel lifted a huge load of anxiety from the members of the 102-year-old Orthodox congregation, the synagogue's leaders said. "She was the only one we could find to step in on our behalf. Her respect for our faith and our tradition was just a beautiful trib-

N.O. considers bypassing historic preservation law

Mayor's proposal draws criticism

By Bruce Eggler and Gordon Russell
Staff writers

An unsigned proclamation by New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin that would temporarily suspend the powers of city agencies that normally must sign off before buildings in the city's older neighborhoods can be torn down has preservationists fearing a spate of hasty demolitions of historic structures.

The precise intent of the declaration, which is undated, is unclear. City officials already have the power to tear down buildings without review if an inspector deems the structure to be in danger of "imminent collapse."

The order — which applies to the New Orleans Historic District Landmarks Commission, its Central Business District counterpart and the Housing Conservation District Review Committee, which reviews demolition applications in old neighborhoods not governed by the HDLC — would have to be filed in Civil District Court and with the state to give it the force of law.

The proclamation seems to give the Nagin administration broader latitude to raze buildings in the city's older neighborhoods, not including the French Quarter. But city officials did not offer any explanation of why they sought the extra authority.

But though animal rescues continued this week in largely empty neighborhoods, and though the resilience of domesticated animals — from house cats to lap dogs to exotic birds — was sometimes astonishing, time was no longer on their side.

Amanda St. John, the founder of Muttshack, a volunteer rescue organization based in Los Angeles, said the condition of the animals being brought to Muttshack's Hayne Boulevard headquarters in Lake Castle Private School had deteriorated since the first weeks of the rescue. Predictably, the animals were becoming "skinnier and sicker and quieter."

"A lot of homeowners are coming home to dead and dying animals," she said.

The disposition of the animals had also changed. Gone were the gregarious dogs prancing toward their rescuers, replaced by sullen frightened creatures who had begun adapting to life on the street. Cages in the rescuer's canine compound were marked with red labels designating animals too hostile to handle.

One recent afternoon, Karen O'Toole of Chicago and Nancy Cleveland of Los Angeles, two of Muttshack's most dedicated rescuers, cruised the gray junk-strewn New Orleans neighborhoods — neighborhoods that were sometimes disheveled even before Katrina — conducting still another stray cat sweep. As their white van lurched from place to place, braking abruptly at any sign of life, they tore open small packages of pet food, tossing them from the moving vehicle like beads from a Mardi Gras float. The two women's hands were punctured and scratched from handling cats.

"Now we're seeing strays everywhere," O'Toole said. "Whether their owners were told to leave them off or if they were released when the owners evacuated, there are poodles to pit bulls running loose. In a normal city, a stray can rummage through the garbage at a restaurant or convenience store, but here there's nothing. We put out food everywhere, but there's a handful of us, we can't rescue a city of pets."

In the course of a few hours, O'Toole and Cleveland collected four stray cats from t cages that had been set and tried unsuccessfully to coax a wary dog toward them on Ursuline Street. John Williams, a neighbor watching the scene, said the dog looked "like a damn hyena." But that furtive stray seemed tame compared to the pair of wildly barking pit bulls on Gov. Nicholls Street. Too violent to safely noose, they were fed in place.

"Animals act differently now," O'Toole said, "not because they're mean but because they're scared. Cute little poodles will tear your head off."

To emphasize the grimness of the situation, the women broke from the hunt from time to time to give macabre tours of houses and yards where, despite their efforts, animals have perished. A chow in the Lafitte public housing development seemed to have melted into the rug where he starved to death. A mummified pit bull hanged from his leash on an eastern New Orleans fence where he may have strangled as flood waters receded. A cat skeleton peeked from beneath a pile of rubble. The rescuers recall a small dog, alive but too weak to move, that had presumably been put out with the trash in front of a home. Another dog, found in a bathroom, barely had the strength to raise its head to greet rescuers.

"This is an animal holocaust," Cleveland said.

Some pets abandoned

Though the ad hoc animal rescue operation that saved the lives of thousands of pets in the weeks after Katrina is a humanitarian success, controversy simmers around the zealotry of some of the rescuers, who blithely broke into homes to save animals they felt were in jeopardy, regardless of whether they had been contacted by animal owners. O'Toole and Cleveland believe the lives of the animals outweighed the rights of the owners.

"I thought when they opened the city, people would rush back to get their pets," O'Toole said, "but some people have just abandoned them. We were told to no longer be going into people's residences as of last Wednesday, but we're working in neighborhoods where the houses are condemned."

As an example of their approach, Cleveland and O'Toole mentioned breaking into every apartment in a complex in eastern New Orleans that they believed had been abandoned and doomed to demolition. O'Toole said she had learned to divine the presence of dogs and cats by certain exterior clues. If she saw a dog figurine in a window, she would search for a dog. If a house had an abundance of house plants or decoration, she would suspect a cat.

"I've never felt bad about breaking a window once," said O'Toole.

Back at the Hayne Boulevard headquarters, a dog handler walked a terribly skinny German shepherd on the parking lot. The animal's head was tilted disconcertingly to one side, the apparent result either of chemical toxins or a severe ear infection. He paced unsurely in tight circles. Elsewhere on the parking lot a skeletal chow was bathed to remove dirt and possible pollutants. The dog had gone deaf and blind for unknown reasons. Another chow, also blind and rescued from beneath the same house, lay forlornly in a cage in the veterinary station.

"Now the animals we're seeing are much more critical," said Muttshack veterinarian Sabra Lucas of Troutville, Va. "We're seeing a lot of chemical burns, skin sloughing, emaciation, severe dehydration — basically, they're just starved."

No euthanasia

Despite the near-death condition of some of the animals, the veterinarians have euthanized none. St. John says that, curiously, the most damaged animals are often the first to be adopted once they've reached evacuation sites. "Old people take old dogs, people with heart conditions take dogs with heart conditions, people with a limp take dogs with a limp," she said.

Several owners have appeared at the Muttshack compound to retrieve lost pets, or surrender ownership, but the majority of the animals remain unclaimed. These castaways are cataloged, photographed and implanted with microchips to help reunite them with their owners, should their owners reappear, before they're taken away to "no-kill" shelters, then foster homes across the country. The animal shelter at the Lamar Dixon Expo Center in Gonzales, a clearing house for thousands of rescued animals, closed Oct. 10.

Even at the height of the rescue effort, the reuniting of animals and their owners has been a hit-or-miss endeavor, plagued by mistaken identities, clerical errors and miscommunication. St. John believes that though Muttshack continues occasionally to reunite animals with their owners, the possibilities are becoming slimmer.

Everybody who had an animal had a lottery ticket," she said. "If we found your dog, if anyone found your dog, you won the lottery. The truth is, the chances of winning are small."

St. John expects Muttshack to remain in New Orleans until January.

tional Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration research vessel. Earlier results revealed no high levels of petroleum products.

"So far, so good," said Steve Murawski, chief scientist for NOAA-Fisheries.

Oil spills caused by Katrina sent more than 8 million gallons of crude into southeast Louisiana bayous and rivers, according to the U.S. Coast Guard. And 224 billion gallons of floodwaters were pumped out of New Orleans following Katrina and Hurricane Rita, sending toxic heavy metals such as lead, copper and cadmium into Lake Pontchartrain.

"There's been so much speculation about the toxic soup" of floodwater being pumped from the city, Murawski said. "But we haven't detected any bacteria or hydrocarbons or any of the chemicals we were looking for. . . . This doesn't mean we're all clear and good to go. What it means is we haven't detected anything yet."

Murawski explained that some contaminants can build up in fish tissue over months or years, necessitating continued tests in coming months. The first round of sampling targeted Atlantic croaker, blue crabs and bigeyed tuna, which NOAA considers "indicator" species — barometers for contamination in general.

A separate battery of tests focusing on shrimp, which support a $500 million industry in the Gulf of Mexico, is pending.

The Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality is doing similar work in Lake Pontchartrain. To date, no major problems have been found, said Chris Piehler, a senior environmental scientist with the agency.

Although elevated levels of bacteria from sewage were found in some parts of the lake, state officials have insisted proper handling and thorough cooking will kill any dangerous organisms. No emergency closures for recreational or commercial fishing have been issued in Louisiana since the storm with the exception of oysters. The entire coastline remains closed to oyster harvesting.

Initial tests of oyster meat revealed some with high levels of fecal coliform bacteria from sewage, an outcome many in the industry had expected because oysters feed by filtering out small particles in the water, said Mike Voisin, a Houma oyster farmer and chairman of the Louisiana Oyster Task Force.

But Voisin said the oysters should "clean themselves out" by the same filtering process, and he predicted some areas in central Louisiana soon could reopen to harvesting.

As for other marine life, the studies done at state and local levels have revealed the fear of contamination to be "a nonevent," said John Sackton, editor of Seafood.com, a fishing industry news service.

Sackton cited a recent wholesale price increase of 17 cents a pound for large shrimp, from $3.98 in July to $4.15 in October.

"This is a sign there is not a market impact from the worries about water contamination," he said. "The market is reacting more to a supply issue than anything else."

SCROLLS, from B-1

ute," said congregation President Jackie Gothard.

It means that they need not worry about their old Torahs as they gather to observe Yom Kippur today in a donated Kenner hotel. The service will be led by a rabbi dispatched from New York with his own Torah.

A self-described unaffiliated Christian, Heggelund worked as a secretary at Beth Israel for eight years during the 1990s, she said.

She bonded emotionally to the congregation and its members, attending many of their weddings and funerals. "I learned to love the religion and the basis for it," she said, adding that she came to understand its rituals and values, including Jewish reverence for the Torah.

The Torah is the center of Jewish life and law, and in the Orthodox tradition the exact record of God's own words. As a result, the handwritten scrolls containing the first five books of the Bible are any community's most precious possessions.

Their construction, repair and handling are surrounded by a ritual of veneration.

"We don't worship idols, and we don't have icons or relics," congregation President Jackie Gothard said. "But the closest thing we do have is the Torah scroll."

Torahs are ritually produced on parchment only by specially trained scribes. The Hebrew calligraphy is precise and must be flawless. Rigorous tradition dictates how the sections of parchment are joined. Tradition also dictates how letters and words can be repaired after decades of use at weekly synagogue prayer.

And tradition prescribes that at the end of their usefulness, they must be ritually buried in a cemetery among deceased Jews.

That was not possible shortly after Katrina struck the city. In fact, it is not possible yet.

Like other Katrina evacuees, members of Beth Israel scattered through Louisiana and Texas.

They left their seven Torahs behind in the temple's ark. Most were over a century old. Some had been with the congregation since its founding, Gothard said.

"We evacuated with no idea what the extent of this would be," she said. "We were like everybody else. We figured we'd be gone two or three days, we'd come back, clean up, that would be it."

But for weeks after Katrina, there was no returning to Beth Israel, located on Canal Boulevard in Lakeview, less than half a mile from the infamous breach in the 17th Street Canal.

The synagogue was filled with eight feet of water.

About two weeks after the storm, Gothard received word that the scrolls had been rescued from the temple by Isaac Leider of ZAKA, a New York-based Jewish rescue and recovery organization.

Leider was prepared to take them to Baton Rouge, but Gothard wanted to keep them closer. Heggelund was the only person around New Orleans that Gothard could find who would be likely to know how to treat the scrolls, Gothard said.

In fact the animal-skin scrolls, precious though they were, had melted after two weeks immersion in a foul mess. Five had disintegrated into formless goo. Two others were clearly beyond repair," Heggelund said.

"It was very painful, because I knew how precious these were. But by this time, they were also biohazards. You know the smell coming out of everybody's refrigerators? That's what this smelled like."

Heggelund removed their velvet covers, the silver crowns atop the wooden spindles, the decorative silver breastplates and pointers. She cleaned them and put them away for safekeeping.

To keep the scrolls from touching the ground, she laid them on a vinyl tablecloth on her backyard deck and dug a huge hole, six feet by six feet by four feet deep, she said.

She wrapped the scrolls in the tablecloth, bundled that into a vinyl barbecue grill cover as a makeshift shroud, then filled the pit with dirt.

They remain there.

In time, they will be retrieved and disposed of properly in a Jewish cemetery, according to Jewish tradition, said Gothard.

That would be after Yom Kippur, observed in a hotel donated by friends of Gothard's — Kent and Ken Patel.

They are Hindu.

"Isn't this whole thing amazing?" asked Gothard's husband, Sol.

New rule's intent not quite clear

DEMOLITIONS, from B-1

Nagin spokeswoman Sally Forman said the document "speaks for itself." She said she did not know whether the mayor plans to sign it.

The proclamation says that in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, "the application of the rules, regulations and review of those commissions and agencies is logistically impossible and impractical." It then gives Nagin the authority "to suspend the provisions of any regulatory ordinance prescribing the procedures for conduct of local business or the orders, rules, or regulation of any local agency" in cases where complying with those laws would cause delays.

Greg Meffert, Nagin's chief technology officer and the mayoral aide who oversees the City Planning Commission and the HDLC, said Tuesday that he's not sure what the order means in practical terms. But he sought to allay the fears of preservationists and HDLC board members that the administration will ignore the preservation agencies and their concerns.

Meffert said the Landmarks Commission "has an active, vibrant role in what we're doing. Their input is definitely being heard. They're helping us preserve whatever historic architecture we can."

Inspectors from the agency have been in the field, checking buildings in historic areas for structural damage, Meffert said.

He said all of the city's oversight boards and agencies — including the HDLC, the Planning Commission and the Vieux Carre Commission — will see staff cutbacks as a result of the massive layoffs Nagin announced last week.

But that doesn't mean the agencies will disappear or become irrelevant and that wholesale demolition of historic buildings will be commonplace — quite the contrary, Meffert said. "We understand we don't want to be Baton Rouge South," he said.

The New Orleans HDLC, which regulates buildings in local historic districts outside the CBD and French Quarter, on Tuesday held its first meeting since Katrina.

"The HDLC is open and operating as close as possible to normal procedures," Chairman Jesse LeBlanc said.

LeBlanc said he was aware that Nagin had been contemplating signing an order suspending the commission's operations. But until he's notified that it has been signed, he said, the commission would continue operating as usual.

Representatives of the Louisiana Landmarks Society and Preservation Resource Center expressed concern about the effects of the order, and Meg Lousteau, executive director of the landmarks group, said it might be challenged in court.

Janet Howard, president of the watchdog Bureau of Governmental Research, questioned the wisdom of the proposal.

"Whether the city's damaged housing stock is something that can be preserved is a major issue that should be debated as part of a planning process," Howard said. "Eliminating the procedural safeguards for historic neighborhoods would be tantamount to making the decision before the community has had the discussions."

Howard compared the proposed suspension of the HDLC and other panels to Nagin's announcement last week — without any public debate or discussion — of a plan to create a casino zone along Canal and Poydras streets.

"These things should be flowing out of a planning process," she said.

A preliminary survey by the Landmarks Commission's staff found that 115 buildings in seven local historic districts had been seriously damaged by Katrina and that 56 more were "compromised." The survey did not include the Holy Cross neighborhood, much of which was flooded.

But LeBlanc said he was hopeful that state and federal officials understand the importance of preserving the city's old neighborhoods and historic architecture, and that they will not automatically seek to bulldoze every damaged building. "FEMA is committed to the preservation of New Orleans," he said of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"We'll be actively fighting to preserve every building we can," said Scott Sewell, vice chairman of the commission and a prominent Republican with ties to the Bush administration.

Up and running

Kirschman's, one of the area's oldest family-operated chain of stores for furniture, appliances and electronics, is "up and running and fully functioning" at locations on the West Bank Expressway in Gretna, on Highway 190 near I-12 in Mandeville/Covington and also in Baton Rouge and Lafayette.

Fourth-generation Kirschman's family member Michael Kirschman says the store on Veterans near I-10 in Metairie is open "at a limited capacity, because we did suffer damage" from Katrina. "And we expect to reopen our Gulfport store (I-10 near Highway 49) in less than 30 days," he says.

The Slidell Kirschman's on North Shore Boulevard will remain closed while the company concentrates on the Gulf Coast restoration.

The once-busy Kirschman's on Chef Menteur Highway in Gentilly is closed because of structural and water damage in that hard-hit neighborhood, says Kirschman.

As you would expect, "refrigerators and mattresses are being sold in record numbers at all locations," he says.

Goods are being trucked directly to the stores, and most customers are taking that merchandise themselves. The stores are offering limited delivery, says Kirschman. The company's distribution center on Almonaster near I-10 in eastern New Orleans is "structurally fine," he says, "but our work force has been scattered," which has made delivery difficult.

Credit cards are accepted, and Kirschman's house charge accounts are still good options for payment.

Hearing well

Audibel Hearing Healthcare has reopened offices at 3929 Veterans (in the Iberia Bank Building) in Metairie, at 1601 Highway 190 in Covington and at 429 W. Airline in LaPlace.

The company also operated undamaged locations in Hammond, Gonzales and Bogalusa.

Audibel's Keith Stroud says offices on Canal Boulevard in Lakeview and Jean Lafitte in Chalmette were essentially destroyed by Katrina, and he is looking for a new location in Orleans Parish. The company's Slidell office on West Gause is currently being repaired and should reopen next month.

Better yet: "If your hearing aid was lost or damaged during the flooding or devastation of Hurricane Katrina, you may qualify for a free replacement, thanks to the generosity of the manufacturer," says Stroud, who has been in the hearing aid business in Louisiana since 1958.

The company is also currently offering free hearing tests, as well as repairs on existing hearing devices at the offices that are now open.

Appointments, details: 780-7102 in Metairie, 985-892-9421 in Covington, 985-653-8896 in LaPlace.

Postal workers return, and so does mail

Home delivery resumes for some

By Joan Treadway
Staff writer

Postal workers who opted to take temporary assignments outside Louisiana after Hurricane Katrina are starting to move back to the New Orleans area, speeding up the revival of the local mail delivery system.

As of Tuesday, mail services were re-established for every ZIP code in New Orleans, he said. Postal carriers are making street deliveries wherever possible, and over-the-counter service is available for all others. In Jefferson, St. Charles and St. John the Baptist parishes, postal service is fully operational, except in a few isolated areas where debris covers the roads or there is roadway damage, Lewin said.

The U.S. Postal Service offered out-of-state duty to many workers when it became apparent that mail couldn't be sent out from the city and many of the surrounding parishes immediately after the storm, said Dave Lewin, a state spokesman for the agency: "Now every day, a few more are returning home."

More than 4,000 postal employees lived and worked in the area before Katrina, he said. He did not know how many left or how many had returned.

Mail carriers who are returning are being greeted warmly by both returning residents and the diehards who never left, he said Wednesday. Last week, he said, he was with carriers when they re-entered the French Quarter and "people were hugging them, applauding them and taking photographs of them."

The agency said it realizes that hurricane survivors are waiting for important items, such as FEMA checks, to come through the mail, Lewin said.

But the agency remains understaffed and is delivering only first-class mail, such as personal letters, and Priority Mail packages — not advertising materials or periodicals, he said.

It will take many months to reopen the flooded main post office on Loyola Avenue, he said. But mail is being delivered to the Central Business District, including ZIP codes 70112, 70113 and 70130, and to the Vieux Carre, ZIP code 70116.

In areas that are accessible, carrier delivery service is being provided in Algiers, which covers ZIP codes 70114 and 70131. Limited retail service is available at the Algiers station from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Over-the-counter mail service is available at these locations: the Carrollton station, 3400 S. Carrollton, for ZIP codes 70118, 70125, 70178 and 70185; the Mid-City Station, 501 N. Jefferson Davis Parkway, for 70119 and 70179; and the Uptown station for ZIP codes 70115, 70122, 70124, 70175, 70182 and 70184. These sites are open Monday through Friday from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

Outside the French Quarter but within the 70116 ZIP code, mail can be picked up at the Uptown station at 2000 Louisiana Ave. during the same time frame.

"The only major issue in St. Tammany Parish is Slidell's main post office, which was flood-damaged," he said. "We are making repairs and expect to be open in about four weeks, and we are currently operating out of the West Slidell station."

The rest of St. Tammany is enjoying a fully operational service, he said.

The postal service re-established mail service for residents and businesses in St. Bernard Parish on Wednesday, he said. Customers from that parish can now pick up their mail at a temporary postal annex set up next to the Covington Post Office at 1775 N. Columbia St.

Beaten retiree pleads innocent

Man's lawyer calls charges groundless

By Michael Perlstein
Staff writer

The 64-year-old retired teacher whose beating by three New Orleans police officers in the French Quarter was taped by a TV news crew pleaded innocent Wednesday to public intoxication, resisting arrest and public intimidation.

Robert Davis, his left eye still bruised and swollen, ducked into a waiting car without commenting after his midmorning arraignment at the temporary criminal court at the city's Amtrak station.

His attorney, Joseph Bruno, said the charges against his client are groundless. Inside the makeshift courthouse, Bruno met briefly with city officials to discuss having the charges dismissed, and they agreed to continue their talks. A trial date for Davis was set for Jan. 18, and he was released on his own recognizance.

Bruno repeated Davis' contention that he hasn't had a sip of alcohol in 25 years. He said it was odd that Davis was never asked to take a breath test, despite the public drunkenness charge lodged against him. Police spokesman Capt. Marlon Defillo said police typically do not test suspects for public intoxication and usually depend on an officers' expertise holding up in court.

Davis was trying to buy cigarettes Saturday night at a store on Conti Street near Bourbon Street when he asked a police officer about the time of the curfew, Bruno said.

Another officer intervened, prompting Davis to tell the officer that the interruption was "rude and unprofessional," Bruno said. When Davis proceeded to cross the street to purchase cigarettes, the officer he addressed and two others sucker-punched him from behind and pummeled him, leaving him dazed and drenched in blood, he said.

The officers' attorney, Frank DeSalvo, said police were only trying to subdue Davis and that their actions were justified because of Davis' resistance. Davis had stumbled into a police horse, had slurred speech and had been belligerent toward officers before his arrest, DeSalvo said.

"I see an incident of a man trying to be brought under control who doesn't want to be brought under control," DeSalvo said.

The day after the beating, the officers were charged with simple battery and suspended without pay. They are under internal investigation by the Police Department as well as the U.S. Justice Department, which has opened a civil rights probe.

Bruno said Davis had returned to the city to inspect his flooded house in the 9th Ward after spending about six weeks as an evacuee in Atlanta. He said that when the beating took place about 9 p.m., his client had eaten dinner and was trying to buy cigarettes before returning to the hotel where he was staying.

State's vocational schools anticipate building boom

Construction workers' training likely free

By Coleman Warner
Staff writer

Post-secondary vocational schools in Louisiana are gearing up to provide entry-level construction training to thousands of workers who can become part of a post-Hurricane Katrina building frenzy, state officials say.

Information is being collected on potential students through the Louisiana Community and Technical College System, and classes could begin as early as next week, said Jim Henderson, senior vice president for workforce training for the system.

East Jefferson and West Jefferson vocational campuses are expected to offer two- to three-week courses in basic construction skills, including use of tools, blueprint reading and safety measures, officials said.

Those completing the classes will have an excellent shot at construction jobs in south Louisiana that pay $12 to $13 an hour, and can later obtain training for specialized, higher-paying jobs, such as in the plumbing or electrical trades, they said.

The workers will earn credentials that can be used to land good jobs across Louisiana or in other states, vocational educators say.

"Before Katrina struck, construction was already a high-growth, high-demand industry in Louisiana, with a work force of 127,170 and projections of growth to over 160,000 by the year 2010," Henderson said. "Meeting this unparalleled surge in demand, post-Katrina, will be critical to the rebuilding of the state."

Depending on demand, the courses may also be offered at off-campus sites convenient to displaced workers, including trailer parks set up by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. One state vo-tech school in Orleans Parish and another in Slidell aren't available because they were hit hard by the hurricane.

"Sidney Collier (in New Orleans) looks like a total loss, and Slidell, they're still waiting for an assessment," Henderson said. "It's severely damaged."

Delgado's main City Park campus and Nunez Community College in Chalmette ordinarily might offer such training, but they are temporarily closed because of flood damage.

Students are not expected to be charged for the courses, because schools will tap state and federal job training funds, officials said.

The engineering and building company Fluor Corp., hired by FEMA to help create trailer parks for storm victims, asked state officials for help in filling vacancies and the vocational system responded aggressively, said Dickie Jones, human resources director.

"We're hiring those folks now," he said. "Several thousand people will be employed by us and our subcontractors. I would assume that there's going to be some short-term and some long-term employment. . . . Hopefully, whether you work for Fluor or you work for anybody else, you will continue your training. We open up a whole new career path."

Persons interested in enrolling in the trade courses should call a state vocational school in their area, call a state information desk at 1(866) 310-1586, or check the Web site www.lctcs.net. Key local contacts include Louisiana Technical College's Jefferson Campus in Metairie at (504) 736-7072 and its West Jefferson Campus in Harvey at (504) 361-6464.

Private schools continue reopening

Demand grows as parents return

By Mark Waller
Staff writer

Three more private schools on the east bank of New Orleans plan to reopen in the coming weeks, making at least eight that are poised to return while Orleans Parish public schools remain closed.

Ecole Bilingue, an Uptown school that immerses its students in the study of French, is planning to return Monday for the first time since Hurricane Katrina struck Aug. 29. Its affiliated nursery school, normally at a separate site, also will operate at the school's Calhoun Street campus because of storm damage to the nursery school.

Victor Papai, a board member at Ecole Bilingue, said Wednesday that the school is resuming classes to serve the needs of parents who must get back to their jobs in the New Orleans area.

The school will accept students from other French immersion programs that remain closed, he said. It previously had 140 students in the elementary school grades. It expects about 40 to return Monday, including a few children displaced from other schools.

Opening on Oct. 24 will be St. Paul Lutheran School in the Faubourg Marigny, where 208 students attended kindergarten through eighth grade before Katrina. Principal Sue Schiller said she doesn't know how many to expect back.

"I know I've been getting calls from parents saying, 'We need to get back to work. When are you going to open again?' " Schiller said.

Schiller said she expects to accept some displaced students at the 166-year-old school.

And in a letter to parents on Tuesday, Gary Mannina, headmaster of St. Andrew's Episcopal School, announced a Nov. 2 return to the Carrollton school.

State records indicate St. Andrew's enrolled about 160 students in pre-kindergarten through sixth grade during the last full school year. Mannina's letter did not address how many might come back in November.

Other east bank New Orleans schools that have announced imminent returns are Academy of the Sacred Heart, De La Salle, Louise S. McGehee, St. George's Episcopal and St. Louis Cathedral Academy.

Some Orleans Parish public school officials have argued they cannot open east bank schools before the summer of 2006 because of lost instruction time in the weeks after Katrina hit. Some Catholic education leaders have criticized public officials for moving too slowly in re-establishing educational services to New Orleans.

Two east bank magnet schools, now part of the Orleans public system, hope to reopen in January as charter schools with more independence from the School Board. Several West Bank public schools in New Orleans, which also will operate as charter schools, are aiming to return next month.

St. Tammany Parish jail getting back to normal

But Katrina's taste is still lingering

By Meghan Gordon
St. Tammany bureau

Though operations at the St. Tammany Parish jail have largely returned to normal, Sheriff Jack Strain said this week that Hurricane Katrina's effects on the Covington facility linger.

Among the most apparent signs of the storm's aftermath is the last family to relocate from emptied inmate quarters: a courthouse deputy, his pregnant wife and six children who are awaiting a trailer to replace their Slidell home.

More significantly, Strain said, Katrina cut a chunk of the jail's revenue as the facility sent about half of its inmates to six northern Louisiana jails.

Yet the biggest problem at the jail became but a memory when the Sheriff's Office rigged generators to the city's water pump within a week of the storm. Strain said the sole chink in the jail's armor — its reliance on city water — crippled operations for several days, as the nearly 1,000 inmates and guards lived under one roof without working toilets.

"Inmates are not a friendly group of people. Whenever they are confined in their own excrement, they get kind of rowdy," Strain said. "We had at least three situations where they — I don't want to say that it was approaching a riot situation — but where deputies had to go in and contain them.

"So the simple water problem, though it may seem simple to some, really became an operations problem here."

Strain said that despite the generator at the jail, the air conditioning system was rendered useless by the lack of city water. He said tempers soared right along with the temperatures inside the cinder block building.

"It really was a nightmare," Strain said. "Thank goodness we were in the process of getting rid of those prisoners, as it were, to bring down the numbers of people using the facilities."

Warden Marlin Peachey drove to Hammond to call other Louisiana wardens, hoping to follow through with a standing plan to clear out inmates to make room for possible post-storm looters. He found space for 409 of the 880 inmates in East Carroll, Evangeline Madison and Richland parishes.

St. Tammany deputies transported about 80 inmates, while the out-of-town jails used their own vans to pick up the remaining transfers.

Katrina puts squeeze on Slidell budget

$5 million shortfall expected, mayor says

By Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

Slidell's revenue base — sales, property and utility taxes and fees — was badly hurt by the storm, including damage to 40 percent of the housing stock, the shuttering of many smaller businesses and a government still working out of the maintenance barn on Bayou Lane.

Slidell faces a shortfall of at least $5 million in its already tight $35 million budget as a result of expenses related to Hurricane Katrina, Mayor Ben Morris told the City Council on Tuesday night.

Finance Director Sharon Howes and her staff are working on projections of income and expenses for the next three to six months, Morris said. "I can tell you it's not especially pretty," he said of the early financial forecast.

A little more than three months into the new fiscal year, the costs of rebuilding and recovery continue to mount. Morris said the city is talking with a local bank about a line of credit and looking at a low-interest loan from the state to keep the government operating.

Slidell's revenue base — sales, property and utility taxes and fees — was badly hurt by the storm, including damage to 40 percent of the housing stock, the shuttering of many smaller businesses and a government still working out of the maintenance barn on Bayou Lane.

Most city buildings, including City Hall and the adjacent Finance Department, were flooded by Katrina. City offices soon will relocate to a dozen office trailers, provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, on the overflow parking lot for nearby Heritage Park.

Slidell already has received $4.66 million from FEMA. That payment represents 100 percent of the cost of operations above the norm, Morris and Chief of Staff Reinhard Dearing said. Additional submissions will be made to the agency.

However, Howes and others noted, the cost for buildings, vehicles, equipment, relocation expenses and similar losses from the hurricane are only 75 percent reimbursable. The city will have to come up with the 25 percent match unless FEMA waives it.

The Schneider Canal drainage station, whose pumps have protected most of devastated south Slidell from lesser storms in recent years, must be rebuilt, Morris said. That project alone will cost $3 million or more.

The administration began taking steps last spring to keep balanced the previous-year budget, stretched thin by escalating fuel, utility, employee health care costs, and sluggish sales tax performance. That tax represents almost half of the city's annual budget.

Those measures are continuing, Morris said Tuesday. About 25 of the city's employees have left since the hurricane, and very few of them, if any, will be replaced anytime soon, he told the council.

And, with the exception of a new operations center at high-ground Slidell Municipal Airport and an amphitheater at Heritage Park, all capital improvements work has been frozen, he said.

Despite the gloomy financial outlook, Morris said he's not considering layoffs of any civilian or police personnel at this time.

"I'm not desperate — yet," he said.

Company makes U-turn on travel trailer plans

Workers to live in Lacombe

By Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

In the face of mounting neighborhood opposition, Textron Marine and Land Systems has scrapped plans to house displaced workers in 200 travel trailers at the Oak Harbor Golf & Country Club near Slidell. Instead, Textron will put the trailers in Lacombe, a top company official said Wednesday.

Earlier in the day, representatives of Oak Harbor Estates said that unless a compromise was reached, they would go to court to block Textron's proposal to put trailers on the golf course.

The efforts of Textron, which has its main plant in eastern New Orleans and an assembly finishing plant in Slidell, to deliver on $660 million in Army contracts for armored security vehicles for the war in Iraq were set back several months by Hurricane Katrina.

Company officials hope to resume full operations by late November but need to find places for their hurricane-displaced workers to live, said Clay Moise, Textron's vice president for marine and combat vehicles.

In a meeting last week with representatives of Oak Harbor, a huge upscale residential complex of eight residential sections, Textron asked about placing the trailers on the driving range for as long as a year.

"Almost 40 percent of our (1,200-person) work force lives in St. Tammany, some of them in Oak Harbor," Moise said. "Many of the people who are protesting are themselves disadvantaged by the storm. Half of Oak Harbor is destroyed, including my mother's home."

But as word spread of that meeting and St. Tammany Parish President Kevin Davis' promise to try to help the company, the opposition grew. Textron officials continued looking at other sites and settled on Lacombe west of Slidell.

Of the possible sites looked at around Denham Springs, Lacombe, Picayune and Slidell, Moise said, Lacombe was the early front-runner.

Textron will lease the land from a developer. The developer has built streets and installed water, sewerage and drainage systems for a new subdivision but will forgo further development to allow the trailers, Moise said.

He said he wasn't certain of the subdivision's name or specific location.

Earlier, David Corne of The Inlets in Oak Harbor said an emergency meeting of the eight section presidents would be held once a specific presentation was received by Textron about its trailer proposal.

"The associations will fund a legal action if it comes to that point," he said.

About 60 anxious, poster-waving residents of the area showed up on Oak Harbor Boulevard in front of the golf club to protest the plan at what they thought was to be a meeting between Davis and Textron officials.

Davis said later Wednesday that after receiving an e-mail from Textron recently, he didn't call or arrange any such meeting. He said he simply suggested Textron officials meet with homeowners to discuss what they would like to do.

Corne couldn't be reached for comment on Textron's plans to put the trailers in Lacombe.

Donald Muth, who lives in Masters Point, had initiated petitions from residents who wanted to take legal action against any effort to set up trailers against their will and were willing to donate $100 each to the cause.

Advised later of Textron's decision, Muth nevertheless remained skeptical. "I would still feel more comfortable if I could see something in writing, like Textron's not coming here. I hope he (Moise) is correct."

"It was his idea," Rehage said. "He initiated it. He said, 'New Orleans is a special place. I want to play for those people.' "

Nine Inch Nails and the other headlining acts are donating their services. Any profits from the Memphis event are earmarked for local cultural organizations and charities offering hurricane relief.

They include the New Orleans Restoration Fund, an offshoot of the Entertainment Industry Foundation; Mercy Corps; Habitat for Humanity; Bring New Orleans Back; community radio station WWOZ 90.7; and local arts collective YA/YA Inc.

Building awareness of the effort to resurrect New Orleans is also a goal, Rehage said.

"On a national level, people see it on TV, there's a great outpouring of support, and then they put it on the back burner," said Rehage, whose house flooded. "We want to say that it's important to stay focused on rebuilding New Orleans. Don't forget about us."

Tickets to the Memphis show went on sale Wednesday for $35 each.

Schools will counsel storm-affected pupils

Therapy also given to displaced workers

By John-John Williams IV
River Parishes bureau

Starting three new schools within a month is hard enough, but losing a home, escaping near-death conditions and not knowing if your parent is alive can take its toll on anybody Just ask Frankie Burbank, an 18-year-old senior who attended McDonogh 35 Senior High School in New Orleans before transferring to Destrehan High School last month.

Burbank has lived through a nightmare. She was separated from her mother, who elected to stay behind in New Orleans during Hurricane Katrina to care for her disabled husband.

Burbank and eight members of her family went to a Shoney's Inn in Metairie to ride out the storm. The restaurant held for a while, but they had to evacuate when it started to flood and the roof collapsed.

Mental health experts say those affected by Hurricane Katrina will need counseling in the upcoming months, and schools are taking notice.

Some districts have formulated plans to assist students, teachers and other employees with counseling, as many attempt to return to a semblance of normalcy and complete the academic year.

Since the storm, St. John the Baptist Parish public schools hired six employees to identify affected students, and Giselle Juneau, coordinator of pupil appraisal in the district is the driving force behind the district's efforts.

"If a child doesn't have an outlet, that (stress) can build and fester and the symptoms they have normally could get worst," Juneau said

The employees will spend the next few weeks meeting with each displaced student — about 1,400 — in groups of seven. The employees will assess every displaced student, Juneau said.

"We're not doing counseling," Juneau said. "We're giving them a little place and a little group so they can talk and so we can identify children who need more individual support and counseling."

St. Tammany Parish reopened public schools on Oct. 3 with 1,800 displaced students. The district is providing administrators, teachers and parents with informational packets informing them how to deal with traumatic stress and how to spot signs in children.

"The student's response to loss and how they are re-engaging in the learning process is important to us," said St. Tammany's schools Assistant Superintendent Maria C. Guilott. "We are approaching this from many different angles. We are working at building our community and working at building hope."

Counselors also are ready to provide services for students, Guilott said.

"They will do it as long as the children need it," Guilott said. "Our counselors have worked with grief and loss before."

Annette Houston, a business teacher at East St. John High School, a school in St. John Parish that has absorbed about 300 displaced students, said she has noticed some displaced students are having a hard time adjusting.

"Some are coping better than others," Houston said. "We don't know everything these kids saw when they were evacuating and in these shelters."

Houston said she favored counseling for displaced students.

Burbank finally got a telephone call from her mother, Marylen Burbank, two weeks after the storm. Burbank said she never gave up hope that her mother was alive.

"I kept watching the news to see where she was placed," Burbank said.

When Burbank was reunited with her mother in San Antonio, Texas, she learned that her mother had spent five days stranded on the roof, with nothing to eat. She was eventually airlifted to safety and then taken to San Antonio.

"I know she's a brave woman," Burbank said. "She found old paint and brush to make a sign" for rescue workers to see."

Burbank joined about 1,600 displaced students two weeks ago when they attended St. Charles Parish Public schools for the first time.

The district does not have a special counseling plan like St. John, but the staff has been alerted to spot signs of trauma, said Rochelle Cancienne, director of public information for the district.

"The counselors that we have in place are addressing any needs that these displaced students may have," said Cancienne. "Administrators at the schools are aware of the circumstances and are directing them (students) to the counselors. There is definitely an awareness."

St. John gathered all of the mental health providers in the district last week to formulate a way to address the stress that many of its students and staff are facing.

The district increased its enrollment by 21 percent when it absorbed 1,360 displaced students, according to the Louisiana Department of Education.

"All the mental health providers will set the parameters for what they plan to do with individual counselors at the schools," explained Ann LaBorde, executive director of personnel and legal services for the St. John public school district. LaBorde said the district also plans to provide counseling to staff members. The district hired around 40 displaced teachers after Katrina, but the counseling will not be limited to displaced employees.

Burbank said she looks forward to continuing her senior year at Destrehan High and will accept counseling if it is provided.

"Just because of all of the things others went through, and it could have been me," she said. "We still don't know if our friends or loved ones are dead. The (recovery) process is not promising. It takes a long time."

St. John Parish may cancel garbage pickup contract

Post-Katrina trash continues to pile up

By Allen Powell II
River Parishes bureau

As complaints about garbage collection in St. John the Baptist Parish have continued to pile up after Hurricane Katrina, several council members have suggested that the parish consider terminating the company's contract and seeking new service.

Councilman Ronnie Smith, the chairman of the parish's solid-waste committee, along with several other council members, spent a large chunk of Tuesday's council meeting chastising Waste Management officials for failing to pick up garbage and trash on the regularly scheduled days before and since Hurricane Katrina disrupted service.

In fact, Smith went one step beyond complaining and told Waste Management officials that if service does not improve he will ask the council to terminate the company's contract in 30 days.

Waste Management's performance has come under fire several times since Hurricane Katrina hit the area on Aug. 29, causing widespread evacuations and damage. The company has struggled to deal with increased garbage, worker shortages and difficulties reaching its main dump sites. The company is recruiting out-of-state workers and has increased the pay of its current workers, but still is having problems retaining many of those employees, said Brian Brining, a district manager for Waste Management.

Although the company recently returned to a somewhat normal collection schedule for regular garbage pickups, it still has not fully resumed its collection of bulky items and debris, although that could happen by next week. The company actually suspended that service after Katrina in an effort to concentrate on emptying garbage cans, Waste Management spokesman Rene Faucheux said.

But Smith said that the company still is doing a poor job of emptying garbage cans six weeks after Katrina made landfall. Smith said the council's office has been deluged with calls from throughout the parish about cans that are not being emptied on their scheduled days, or not emptied at all.

Councilman Sean Roussel echoed Smith's complaints, and noted that the company has done a poor job of notifying the council of when it is behind schedule, so that council members can notify their constituents.

"We can't continue having this sporadic pickup," Roussel said.

Councilman Cleveland Farlough actually asked the council to consider waiving the garbage fee for the month of September because of the spotty pickup. He said that St. Charles Parish, which was more heavily damaged by Katrina than St. John, has already taken that step.

Farlough, along with Councilman Richard "Dale" Wolfe, said that Waste Management was failing to adequately collect trash long before Katrina and residents are tired of paying for a service they do not receive.

"People are telling me they don't want any more excuses, any more explanation . . . They just want it fixed," Farlough said.

However, parish Finance Director Jeffrey Clement said that waiving that fee would mean that the parish would have to come up with about $236,000 for Waste Management, which is how much the company receives monthly for garbage collection. Clement said the parish's solid-waste fund does not have any reserves to finance a fee waiver.

Councilman Steve Lee said the parish's contract does not allow it to pass the cost of the fee waiver along to Waste Management, which makes issuing the waiver "fiscally irresponsible."

Councilman Allen St. Pierre noted that the council could soon have residents asking for a fee waiver whenever they are dissatisfied with their garbage service if it grants one this time.

"It can't be done," Lee said, before he and six other council members voted against Farlough's motion. "We've been told by our legal counsel it can't be done."

Farlough and Wolfe voted for the measure. Council members Jaclyn Hotard, Lee, Sherry McTopy, Lester Rainey Jr., Smith, St. Pierre, and Roussel voted against the proposal.

PUBLIC NOTICES

The following resolution was offered and seconded unanimously by the Council of the City of Harahan.
RESOLUTION

A resolution giving preliminary approval to the issuance of not to exceed Three Million Dollars ($3,000,000) of Indebtedness by the City of Harahan, State of Louisiana, providing certain terms of said Indebtedness; making application to the State Bond Commission for the approval of said Indebtedness; and providing for other matters in connection therewith.

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED by the Mayor and Council of the City of Harahan, State of Louisiana, that:

SECTION 1. Preliminary Approval of Indebtedness. Preliminary approval is given to the issuance of not exceeding $3,000,000 of Indebtedness (the "Note") of the City of Harahan, State of Louisiana (the "Issuer"), pursuant to L.A. R.S. 39:1430, and other constitutional and statutory authority, for the purpose of paying current operating expenses of the Issuer, and paying the costs incurred in connection with the issuance thereof. Said Note may be drawn down from time to time and shall be payable from and secured by a pledge of the revenues of the Issuer's general fund and other available funds of the Issuer. The Note shall bear interest at a variable or fixed rate or rates not to exceed eight percent (8%) per annum, to be determined by subsequent proceedings of this Mayor and Council at the time of the sale of the Note, and shall mature in annual installments due no later than ten (10) years from the date of issuance. The Note shall be issued in fully registered form, shall be sold to the purchasers thereof at a price not to exceed 100% of par, plus accrued interest, if any, and shall have such additional terms and provisions as may be deemed necessary by this Mayor and Council.

SECTION 2. State Bond Commission. Application is hereby made to the State Bond Commission, Baton Rouge, Louisiana, for approval of the issuance and sale of the Note and for consent and authority to proceed with the issuance and sale of the Note as provided above, and Bond Counsel is directed to make application to the State Bond Commission in accordance with the foregoing on behalf of the Issuer.

SECTION 3. Declaration of Intent. Prior to the delivery of the Note, the Issuer anticipates that it may pay a portion of the costs of the project from the General Fund or other available revenues. Upon the issuance of the Note, the Issuer reasonably expects to reimburse any such expenditures of other available funds from a portion of the proceeds of the Note. Any such allocation of proceeds of the Note for reimbursement will be with respect to capital expenditures (as defined in Reg. 1.150-1(b)) and will be made upon the delivery of the Note and not later than one year after the later of (i) the date such expenditure was paid or (ii) the date on which the project was placed in service. This Section is intended to be declaration of official intent within the meaning of Reg. 1.150-2.

SECTION 4. Employment of Bond Counsel. A real necessity is hereby found for the employment of special bond counsel in connection with the issuance of the Notes, and accordingly the law firm of Foley & Judell, L.L.P., Bond Counsel, is hereby employed as Bond Counsel to handle all matters of a legal nature in connection with the negotiation, sale, issuance and delivery of the Notes. Said special bond counsel shall prepare and submit to the Issuer all proceedings necessary for the due authorization, issuance, sale and delivery of the Notes, shall counsel the Issuer as to the issuance and sale of the Notes and shall furnish their opinion covering the legality and tax-exemption of the Notes. The fee of special Bond Counsel in connection with the issuance of each series of the Notes is hereby fixed at a sum not to exceed that permitted by the Attorney General's fee schedule for each issue or issues of revenue bonds based on the principal amount of the Notes actually issued, sold, delivered and paid for, plus "out-of-pocket" expenses; provided, however, that said fee shall be contingent upon the sale, issuance and delivery of the Notes. A certified copy of this Resolution shall be forwarded to the Attorney General of the State of Louisiana for his approval of the employment herein provided for.

SECTION 5. Additional Authority. The Mayor and/or Clerk of the Issuer are hereby empowered, authorized and directed to do any and all things necessary and incidental to carry out all of the provisions of the Resolution, including without limitation the execution of a commitment letter (with an 8% interest cap) from the purchaser of Note.

The foregoing resolution having been submitted to a vote, the vote resulted as follows:

(ONE OR MORE SERIES)

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN by the Board of Trustees (the "Board") of the Parish of Jefferson Home Mortgage Authority (the "Authority"), a public trust duly created by a Trust Indenture dated February 9, 1979, as amended, pursuant to the provisions of the Louisiana Public Trust Law contained in Chapter 2-A of Title 9 of the Louisiana Revised Statutes of 1950, as amended (La. R.S. 9:2341-9:2347) (the "Act") for the benefit of the Parish of Jefferson, State of Louisiana (hereinafter sometimes referred to as the "Parish"), of its intention to issue not exceeding $30,000,000 aggregate principal amount of Parish of Jefferson Home Mortgage Authority Single Family Mortgage Revenue Bonds, in one or more series, on one or more issuance dates (the "Bonds"). The Bonds will be issued to provide funds to finance the purchase of certain qualifying mortgage loans under the 2005C Single Family Mortgage Loan Program of the Authority within the Parish of Jefferson. The Bonds shall be issued pursuant to the Act and authorized pursuant to the provisions of a Trust Indenture (the "Indenture"), for the purpose of providing funds for the Authority to (i) finance the purchase of mortgage loans and/or mortgage-backed securities issued by FNMA or GNMA with respect to mortgage loans on owner-occupied residential immovable property owned by low and moderate income persons in the Parish of Jefferson to be originated by participating mortgage lenders; (ii) refund certain outstanding obligations of the Authority; (iii) make deposits into certain funds as may be required to secure the Bonds and successfully market the Bonds; (iv) pay capitalized interest, if any, on the Bonds; and (v) pay the cost of issuance associated with the Bonds.

The Bonds shall be limited and special revenue bonds of the Authority and not of the Parish of Jefferson. The Bonds shall bear such date or dates, mature at such time or times (not exceeding thirty-five (35) years from their date of issuance), bear interest at such rate or rates and carry such registration and exchangeability privileges as shall be provided for in the Indenture. The Bonds shall be issuable, in one or more series, on one or more issuance dates, in such denominations, be fully registered without coupons, carry such registration and exchangeability privileges, be payable in such medium of payment and such place or places, and be subject to such terms of redemption as such Indenture may provide. The Bonds shall be payable from and secured equally and ratably by a pledge of the revenues of the Authority and all other payments and receipts received directly or indirectly from mortgage loans, all funds established by the Indenture and the rights and interest of the Authority, directly or indirectly, in and to the mortgage loans and the proceeds and collections of the Authority therefrom, subject to application for the purposes and under the conditions as set forth in the Indenture. The Authority will in the Indenture enter into such covenants with the future holder or holders of the Bonds as to the issuance of future bonds, the carrying of insurance, if any, the keeping of books and records, and other pertinent matters as may be deemed proper by said Board to assure marketability of the Bonds, consistent with the provisions of the Act.

The Indenture shall also include remedies in case of a default and such additional covenants, agreements and provisions as are judged advisable or necessary by the Authority for the security of the holders of the Bonds, including sinking funds and revenues for the payment of principal and interest, all as provided by the Act.

Schools starting to show rebound

Jeff Catholic school attendance is up

By Mark Waller
East Jefferson bureau

Catholic schools in Jefferson Parish have enrolled almost 1,000 more students than they had before Hurricane Katrina, the superintendent of New Orleans area Catholic education said Wednesday.

Before Katrina struck Aug. 29, Jefferson Parish Catholic schools served 18,255 students. Now, in their second week open since Katrina, 19,239 students are attending, said the Rev. William Maestri, schools superintendent for the Archdiocese of New Orleans.

He attributed the growth largely to an influx of students who formerly attended schools in New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish, where no public or Catholic schools have reopened in New Orleans. He said he did not have a breakdown of how many students came from each parish.

The numbers in Catholic schools contrast to those in Jefferson public schools, which saw enrollment drop more than 30 percent when they reopened Oct. 3. But the public schools have posted steady increases since then. Jefferson Parish schools Superintendent Diane Roussel said she expects the public schools soon to reach 75 percent of the pre-Katrina student population, which was about 50,000 students.

The overall shift accelerates, at least in the short term, a trend long apparent in a parish that has been among the leaders in the United States for percentage of children in private schools.

Maestri and Roussel delivered their reports to the Jefferson Parish Council.

Maestri said 31 out of 32 Jefferson Catholic schools are back in operation. The exception is St. Joseph the Worker in Gretna, which he said suffered wind and rain damage.

Catholic schools are providing free lunches to all students during October, to help parents as they re-establish themselves in the New Orleans area after evacuating from the storm, Maestri said.

"I imagine the enrollment will continue to rise for some time," he said after his presentation to the council. "These numbers are not a movie. They're a snapshot."

Council members praised the Catholic schools for their strong comeback.

"With the schools opening, that really helps us jump-start Jefferson, because it brings our population base back," Councilman John Young said. "The schools were really a key, in my opinion, in bringing us back."

Roussel told the council that the turnout in Jefferson public schools has been stronger than expected, based on the experiences of Florida school systems rebounding from hurricanes.

She said about a third of the students in some Florida school systems returned on the first days back after hurricanes there, while Jefferson saw more than half its students return last week. Jefferson has reopened all but five of its 84 schools.

"Jefferson is back," Roussel said. "I know it by the traffic, and I know it by the number of children registering.

"If you average it out," she said, "we're taking in a thousand a day."

Magnet schools still attracting debate

Jefferson to revisit hot-button issues

By Rob Nelson
West Bank bureau

While still grappling with concerns over enrollment, finances and the hours of the school day after Hurricane Katrina, the Jefferson Parish School Board also will dive into two hot-button magnet school issues at its meeting today.

In addition to possibly tweaking the school calendar, the board will vote on two motions that prompted sparks earlier this year: a plan to relocate the Patrick Taylor Science and Technology Academy and plans to create separate magnet school systems on each side of the Mississippi River.

The dual system motion, proposed in August by board members Karen Barnes and Cameron Henry, calls for creating an elementary and middle magnet school in West Jefferson and expanding an existing East Jefferson magnet middle school over the next four years to include high school.

East Jefferson houses a magnet elementary and middle school in addition to the Taylor school in Elmwood. A magnet high school is slated to open in Gretna in the fall next year.

The call for dual systems, an outgrowth of deep political tension and concerns earlier this year about parent-provided transportation to the magnet schools, capped months of board infighting about how to proceed with Jefferson's fledgling magnet school initiative, which began in 2004.

Henry said he is confident the board will approve his motion and that system administrators have assured him the district can financially and logistically handle the endeavor, even in light of Katrina.

The success of the district's first magnet schools proves there is a need for more, Henry said. "We had more students than spots," he said. "Logistically, (the plan) helps out the school system."

Board member Mark Morgan, a longtime opponent of the dual system, conceded the votes are in place to pass the plan. But he said there are still no specifics on where the West Bank magnet schools will be, a critical problem since the area has been overcrowded for years.

"This is divisive," he said. "It divides the east bank and the West Bank. Historically, that's always been a problem with the School Board."

The board also will consider shifting the Taylor school to Deckbar School in Jefferson beginning next fall and putting the Deckbar students at Rudolph Matas Elementary School. Taylor is housed in a school system office building in Elmwood.

Deckbar Principal Barbara Doublet remained lukewarm to the idea, saying the school, which serves students throughout East Jefferson with behavioral problems, is better situated at its own campus.

"These children cannot take change," she said. "They are used to one place and doing things a certain way."

In May, the board ignited a controversy by abruptly voting to move Taylor to T.H. Harris Middle School in Metairie. The proposed move, which showcased tension between Taylor students and employees at the Elmwood building, was eventually killed because of strong backlash from parents.

Board members said the Elmwood location could not handle the projected growth of the school and lacked basic amenities such as a gymnasium and cafeteria.

Parents argued that the school needed its own culture and that sharing a campus could jeopardize the national grant financing the program.

At the time, the board directed Superintendent Diane Roussel to submit a relocation plan by Nov. 1. A committee of parents, administrators, teachers and even students drafted the current proposal.

The board will deal with a third controversy when it re-examines its revised school year calendar. Last month, it approved a plan calling for classes to begin an hour earlier beginning Oct. 10 to recoup 24 days of lost teaching because of Katrina. Under the calendar, high schools would have started at 6:15 a.m.

Board members said they were swamped by complaints from parents, forcing Roussel to scrap the plan.

Alternatives include adding more time to the end of the day or slicing holidays, the latter a move board officials initially said they wanted to avoid because of traditionally low attendance when classes are held on holidays.

Trailers cropping up near Westwego

Federal employees, Jeff cops to move in

West Bank bureau

Almost a hundred RVs are being set up at Bayou Segnette State Park outside of Westwego to house federal employees and Jefferson Parish sheriff's deputies displaced by Hurricane Katrina.

Families of 63 federal employees — 47 from the Minerals Management Service and 15 from the National Park Service — are slated to move in beginning this weekend, state and federal officials said. At least 10 deputies also are expected to live at the site, with possibly more to follow.

"This is going to be for people who work and reside in this area," said National Park Service director Fran Mainella, who visited the campground for a tour of the 32-foot trailers on Wednesday.

Any remaining trailers could be opened up to the general public, park officials said. The federal government is leasing the 98 camp sites from the Louisiana Office of State Parks for $16 each per night, which works out to $572,320 over the 12-month lease.

Similar trailer communities are planned at Fairview Riverside State Park in Madisonville and Tickfaw State Park near Springfield, said Stuart Johnson, assistant secretary for state parks.

Lot cleared without Mandeville permit

By Richard Boyd
St. Tammany bureau

A heavily wooded Mandeville lot owned by a politically connected engineer was recently clear-cut without city approval.

So far, city officials have accepted the explanation from Shelby LaSalle that the removal of trees from the site was unintentional and the result of a misunderstanding with a contractor. The incident will be discussed at tonight's City Council meeting.

LaSalle said Wednesday that he is "devastated, embarrassed and humiliated" by the clear-cutting of the lot on West Causeway Approach, which was done without a building permit. Normally, lot owners apply for a permit and the city tree inspector does a tree inventory and identifies trees that must be saved during the lot clearing based on a consultation with the owner and a review of the building plans.

LaSalle said the clear-cutting was a mistake by Boh Bros. Construction Co. workers who were supposed to clear away downed limbs and damaged pine trees on the commercially zoned property. The lot is next to the new offices of Krebs, LaSalle, LeMieux Inc., at 1580 West Causeway Approach.

Workers brought in bulldozers, trucks and other equipment on Sept. 28 and in short order stripped the 120-by-240-foot lot of all vegetation.

Councilwoman Zella Walker had the incident added to tonight's City Council agenda for discussion. "I just want to make sure we are all satisfied about what happened and how," she said.

Council President Trilby Lenfant said she accepts LaSalle's explanation and apology to the city and that she wants tonight's discussion to focus on whether the city's land-use law needs to be amended to tighten language about city rules for land clearing.

Mayor Eddie Price said he was upset to see the lot cleared but is convinced that LaSalle did not intend for it to happen.

"He does a lot of volunteer work for the city, and he is a good resident and corporate citizen," Price said. "Shelby shares our vision for Mandeville, and I know he would never attempt to undermine any city regulatory provisions."

City Hall will not issue a misdemeanor citation against LaSalle, which would require him to appear in magistrate court where he could be fined as much as $500 per day until the lot is restored to its pre-cleared state, Price said.

"We will not do that; that could take 20 years or more for the trees to grow back, and it would be unrealistic to fine someone $500 per day until then," he said.

City Planning Director Louisette Kidd said she was "very upset" when she learned of the clear-cutting after city inspector Bill Wohler stumbled upon it Sept. 28.

"But Shelby has been so contrite about it, so upset that it happened and apologizing so much to us that I am satisfied that it was a very unfortunate error," she said.

She said the discussion tonight should also focus on the penalty provisions in the city ordinance.

LaSalle said the lot was heavily forested with tall pines and grasses. He said several limbs and some of the trees were downed or broken by Hurricane Katrina. "Boh Bros. contacted me and offered to clear the debris on the lot. I clearly said that I just wanted the limbs and broken trees taken out. It got misunderstood, and they just clear-cut the entire lot," he said.

LaSalle's firm is a longtime consultant for the Lake Pontchartrain Causeway Commission, and numerous Causeway contracts have been awarded over the years to Boh Bros. He has also done several consulting projects for the city of Mandeville and other municipalities in St. Tammany Parish, as well as for parish government.

Debris squads remove soggy mounds from curbs in Jefferson Parish

By Michelle Hunter

STAFF PHOTO BY DONALD STOUT

The westbound lanes of West Esplanade Avenue in Metairie are given over to hurricane recovery for a time. These trucks were among more than 800 on the job in Jefferson Parish on Tuesday.

Lynn LaBrot stood in the driveway of her Metairie home and cradled her toy poodle, Kibble, while a modified log-loader mounted on the back of a truck grappled with the remains of her Chinese elm tree.

The six-man crew finally freed the stubborn stump and dropped it into the back of a dump truck already brimming with her neighbors' Hurricane Katrina storm debris. LaBrot's block had been taken over by massive trucks and track hoes, which obstructed the streets and churned up swirling clouds of white wallboard dust.

But only Kibble seemed even remotely bothered by the roaring diesel cacophony. Judging by the smiles and waves from human beings on the street, the workers seemed to be the most popular guys in Jefferson Parish.

"Well, them and the garbage men," LaBrot said.

The campaign to rid Jefferson Parish curbs of piles of brush, construction materials and other soggy residential remains has been chugging along at a steady pace. Debris squads like the crew that tackled LaBrot's neighborhood, in the 4700 block of Hessmer Avenue, have already carted off more than one million cubic yards of the stuff, said Deano Bonano, the parish official in charge of debris collection.

Despite their progress, mounds of storm detritus remain a common sight on both sides of the Mississippi River. It's an ominous indication of the monumental task that lies ahead. Before it's all over, Bonano estimates, more than 4.5 million cubic yards of debris will be collected in Jefferson Parish alone.

"It'll be the largest cleanup in U.S. history," he said. "In my 18 years, nothing has even come close to this."

The Army Corps of Engineers is heading up storm-debris collection in unincorporated Jefferson Parish, Westwego and Jean Lafitte, and Grand Isle will join the list by the end of the week, Bonano said. The Federal Emergency Management Agency is picking up the tab. The job does not include regular household garbage, which is the responsibility of parish contractor Waste Management.

Kenner, Harahan and Gretna have hired others to handle storm cleanup.

From a conference room in Lafreniere Park in Metairie, officials with the corps and its main contractor, CERES Environmental, have kept tabs on the more than 800 trucks buzzing around scooping up storm debris. Every morning, teams of workers head out into assigned zones. They barricade a portion of a street, tackling the job house by house, one block at a time.

On Hessmer Avenue on Tuesday, a track hoe and a small, crane-like loader pushed and lifted wooden boards, furniture, roofing tiles, mattresses and tree brush into a truck, which raced off to a dump site once it was full. Another truck waiting a block back zipped in to take its place.

Foreman Gary Warlick said the crews carry on like that from dawn to dusk. The work is monotonous and time-consuming. But it always seems to draw a crowd of grateful residents.

"Boy, am I glad to see you," Dave LaBrot told one truck driver as he walked outside to join his wife.

It is a common reaction.

"We get a lot of free water, coffee and doughnuts," Warlick said. "People have been real nice. And everybody has been very understanding."

So far, the crews have made a first pass by more than 75 percent of residences. That has taken about four weeks, Bonano said.

But it will take many more months and several more passes before the job is done. As the crew from subcontractor Durr Heavy Construction moved down Hessmer, Dave LaBrot used a little red wagon to cart to the curb a load of shingles just loosened by his roofer. Another neighbor dumped more broken wooden fencing on the street.

"Obviously, this is going to be an ongoing process," Bonano said. "Be patient. We're coming."

Jeff waste hauler declared in default

Council upset over Katrina response

By Kate Moran
East Jefferson bureau

ReactingWednesday to the tide of complaints from residents exasperated at the mounds of garbage accumulating on their curbs, the Jefferson Parish Council declared its refuse hauler, Waste Management, in default of its contract.

Marc Ehrhardt, a spokesman for Waste Management, said the company is exploring its options on how to respond to the parish's move.

The parish had given Waste Management a wrist slapping even before Hurricane Katrina struck, forcing the company to use its garbage trucks over a weekend to collect recycling material that sat unclaimed for two weeks. The council's frustration hardened after Waste Management was slow to mobilize its work crews after the storm, allowing spoiled food and other fetid material to pile up in streets, officials said.

Deano Bonano, the parish administrator who oversees garbage collection, said Waste Management did not resume service until nearly three weeks after the storm. Today, six weeks after Katrina, he said the company still has not returned to the twice-weekly pickup required by its contract.

"We had problems with them all summer," Bonano said. "Then the storm came and exaggerated the situation."

In normal times, Waste Management circulates 40 trucks to handle refuse throughout the parish. Although it shipped 10 additional trucks into the parish after the storm, Bonano said the backlog of uncollected garbage is so large that the company needs to double its fleet to chip away at the piles.

"They are so far behind the curve that they're never going to catch up," Bonano said.

Waste Management issued a written statement late Wednesday afternoon arguing that it would have been unsafe to truck employees into Jefferson Parish immediately after the hurricane. The company managed, however, to have the parish landfill up and running within 48 hours of the storm.

"Louisiana law recognizes that performance of services is excused entirely or in part when events like Hurricanes Katrina and Rita make the performance of contracts impossible for a time," Tim Hawkins, the company's market-area vice president, said in the statement.

On Wednesday, the council authorized Parish Attorney Tom Wilkinson to notify the bond company that insures the contract that Waste Management is in default. The bond company, Travelers Casualty and Surety, will either force the company to comply, bring in another hauler to deal with the refuse, or compensate the parish for the full annual value of the contract, which expires in 2009 and is worth approximately $11 million this year.

If the parish is successful in placing the company in default, Wilkinson said the parish will inherit the trucks now operated by Waste Management. The council would then have to decide whether to hire another private hauler or use its own employees to operate the trucks.

The contract Waste Management signed with the parish requires it to remove all bagged garbage plus downed tree limbs, refrigerators and other household appliances. Because the hurricane produced such a heavy volume of debris, the Army Corps of Engineers is paying private contractors to haul away ruined vegetation, drowned carpets and soggy Sheetrock. The Environmental Protection Agency is handling refrigerators and other goods that contain hazardous materials.

While the overall volume of garbage has increased since the storm, Bonano argued that Waste Management is actually performing less work than its contract demands because the federal government is handling all refuse except the regular bagged garbage.

While Waste Management represented the clearest problem for the parish, council members were also frustrated Wednesday with what they called slow removal of storm debris by the Army Corp of Engineers, which has 800 trucks in the parish.

Councilman Chris Roberts said he is relaying complaints from his constituents but has no recourse to make pickup move faster because it is federal money, not parish money, that is paying for the removal of storm debris.

To address the situation, the council hired Richard C. Lambert Consultants to dispatch inspectors who can direct the Army Corps to neighborhoods that sustained the heaviest damage. The company is earning roughly $6,500 a week for its services and is expected to work for the parish for another month.

"They are our eyes and ears in the streets," said Tim Whitmer, the parish's chief administrative aide.

Bonano said Wednesday the parish created a map highlighting sections of the parish that flooded and has asked the Army Corps to place twice as many crews in those areas. However, he cautioned that the quantity of debris is so large that it could take months to clear it all away.

Between Oct. 1 and Oct. 10, contractors working for the Army Corps removed 1.1 million cubic yards of ruined vegetation and storm debris from the parish. That figure does not include the regular bagged garbage that is the responsibility of Waste Management.

"That's a lot of debris, ladies and gentlemen," Bonano told the council members.

Audrey Vitter

Sen. Vitter's mother dies at age 84

Audrey St. Raymond Vitter, mother of Sen. David B. Vitter, died Saturday of congestive heart failure in Atlanta. She was 84.

Mrs. Vitter was born in New Orleans and lived in Cambridge, Mass., during World War II. She lived in New Orleans until Hurricane Katrina, when she evacuated to Atlanta.

She graduated as valedictorian from St. Joseph Academy High School and she received a scholarship to Ursuline College. After graduation from college, she earned a master's degree in social work from Tulane University.

She was active at St. Rita of Cascia Parish as president of the Sodality, and founder of the Samaritan Ministry to the Infirmed and Elderly. She was a leader in the Parish Renew Program from 1983 to 1986 and co-chaired the committee to write the history of St. Rita Parish in 1999. She received the Order of St. Louis Medal from the Archdiocese of New Orleans.

Survivors include four sons, Albert L. Vitter III, J. Mark Vitter, Jeffrey S. Vitter of West Lafayette and Sen. David B. Vitter of Metairie; two daughters, Martha L. Jackoniski of Atlanta and Donna L. Vitter of Paris; 15 grandchildren; and a great-grandchild.

A memorial Mass will be held at a later date.

YOUR OPINIONS

The police have been through more than most

After numerous viewings of the videotape involving New Orleans police officers and the 64-year-old retired elementary school teacher, we also are disturbed.

The Fraternal Order of Police will not attempt to justify the behavior of the three officers. We will, however, insist that the officers receive proper legal representation and are afforded the due process that is their right. We will wait, as we all should, for the investigation.

Further, we will work with the New Orleans Police Department to assure that all officers suffering through the ordeal of Hurricane Katrina have access to psychological testing and counseling.

Lastly, we will urge the citizens to refrain from passing judgment on the men and women of the New Orleans Police Department.

While the vast majority of our citizenry packed up their families and evacuated to high ground, our police officers remained. While many of us were amazed at the dramatic rescues shown on television, our police officers were wading through chest-deep water to save victims of this storm.

While many of us were turning off our televisions rather than watch the images of bloated bodies being removed from flooded residences, our police officers were living it, feeling it and smelling it, and reliving it again at night as they tried to sleep.

While most of us have used the seven weeks since Hurricane Katrina to begin our recovery process, file our insurance claims and to wait on our phones for FEMA and Red Cross to answer, police have been working 12 to 18 hours per day.

Let us, as police officers, understand that the citizens we serve also suffered.

Let us, as civilians, realize that lawful police orders must be obeyed immediately.

Let us agree that wrongdoing by police officers or civilians will not be tolerated. Let's all of us work together to rebuild our great city.

Pumps have fatal flaw

It appears the Jefferson Parish pumping system is at its weakest during the most critical times due to a need to have humans on location.

If the pumping system were designed correctly, it would operate under the worst conditions. In case of an emergency, operators should be able to activate automated grate cleaning equipment, emergency generators and emergency stop and start. Most of the Jefferson Parish flooding would then be avoided.

Some pumping equipment could be damaged during a storm. It is still less costly to repair damaged pumps than it is to allow a great part of the east bank of Jefferson to be flooded.

Let's build an automated pumping system without dependence on human operators, before the next Katrina.

Just adding to the chaos

The Rev. Jesse Jackson's grand publicity stunt to bring home 600 displaced New Orleans residents to "help rebuild the city" has done nothing but add to the growing chaos.

Thankfully, the 600 people turned out to be 200, because many of those 200 people that he managed to scrounge up from other states and bus into the city aren't even from New Orleans.

Now we have an additional 200 non-residents competing for precious few places to live with homeless New Orleanians who want to return home and get back to work. Jackson has done nothing but compound the problem.

Go home, Jesse. The real residents of New Orleans don't want, nor do we need, your kind of help.

Many stayed for the worst

Bravo and kudos to Jefferson Parish Sheriff Harry Lee for not sending his troops out of harm's way to north Louisiana during Hurricane Katrina.

Thanks to East Jefferson Hospital and its staff and to the pumping station operators in Orleans Parish. Even though they were fighting a losing battle, they stayed the course during our time of need.

Their jobs were to be there in the event of emergencies, and they were.

A win-win answer? Too simple

Everyone is so quick to say that there is no place for displaced New Orleanians to stay. I say balderdash!

The only thing that the mayor and his hand-picked committee have to do is find a functioning hotel or motel in the area that could hold 200-plus people and bill FEMA for the lodging. People should be required to go out and seek employment immediately, or forfeit the room.

Such joint cooperation among the mayor, FEMA and the hotels would jump-start business in New Orleans and give employment to displaced residents. But no, I guess that's too simple.

If police are 'busy,' crime drops

Re: "Crime rate barely a blip on the radar," Oct. 9.

The crime rate is barely a blip because when police refuse to accept crime reports, there is a perception of no crime.

Such was the case Oct. 7 when looters broke into a Marina Lake house on Breakwater Drive belonging to my husband and me.

The house had been destroyed in Hurricane Katrina. The crime took place while we were packing what we managed to recover. I had just witnessed these same individuals looting our neighbors' houses. However, when my husband and I tried to file a report, we were told by a 3rd District detective that the police were too busy taking care of much bigger crimes and that there was no place to jail these individuals.

Further, the detective refused to go into our house to take pictures or to collect important evidence that included a flashlight and screwdriver with the burglar's fingerprints on it.

We not only had fingerprints but we even had the names of the three looters and the license plate of their truck. Even with all this evidence, no report was filed.

Mayor Ray Nagin made a public statement that looters would be dealt with severely. Evidently, such is not the case.

OUR OPINIONS

Midnight blues

New Orleans was beloved for its nightlife in the days before Katrina, and giving visitors and returning residents something to do is crucial to the city's recovery. So it was jarring early Tuesday when, just after midnight, police officers began moving down Bourbon Street and shutting down bars. The sweep was part of a new effort to enforce the city's midnight-to-6-a.m. curfew more strictly.

Many business owners in the Quarter view the crackdown as a reaction to the beating Saturday of a 64-year-old former teacher by New Orleans police officers. But strict enforcement of a midnight curfew does nothing at all to prevent a repeat of that incident, and it has been bad for business in the French Quarter.

City Councilwoman Jacqueline Brechtel Clarkson has asked acting Police Superintendent Warren Riley to push the curfew in the Quarter back to 2 a.m. That request is more than reasonable.

Keeping people off the streets at night may well have played a role in keeping crime down in New Orleans since residents began returning. Yet the overall policy has a downside and not just for the hospitality industry in the Quarter. It also hems in all companies that normally have employees who work late-night or early-morning hours. (Full disclosure: This newspaper is such a business.)

The public safety benefits of the curfew policy have to be balanced against the need to restart the local economy. Instead of tightening up the curfew, city officials ought to be rolling it back.

Regulations before jobs?

By now, it's almost a cliché: Greater New Orleans can recover from Hurricane Katrina if evacuees come back and have good jobs waiting for them when they arrive. And in fact, there are private employers in the region who desperately want to hire evacuees right now.

But certain Federal Emergency Management Agency policies are discouraging workers from returning. Those policies must be revised immediately.

The hurricane created havoc in the local housing market, and FEMA had been providing trailer homes to some business owners so that returning workers could stay near their jobs. That made sense.

But the agency also stipulated that when returning workers opted to live in those trailers, their families would have to forfeit federal rental assistance — even when some family members stayed behind in their evacuation sites. The possibility of losing access to the $2,358 housing vouchers could be enough to keep some workers from coming back.

It's understandable that FEMA would want to keep any one family from receiving more aid than it's entitled to. But at this point, the agency's top priority should be to help revive the local economy.

Fortunately, shipyard owner Donald "Boysie" Bollinger, a major Republican donor, brought the issue directly to President Bush's attention. Mr. Bollinger says the president told him FEMA's policy was "incorrect" and would be changed.

The White House needs to make sure that FEMA makes good on the president's comments. Katrina devastated the local economy and scattered local residents far and wide. Making it harder for employers to bring evacuees back to work is the last thing FEMA ought to be doing.

The tyranny of tiny minds

The day will come when people will get worked up over the camper in a neighbor's driveway or sign stuck in the public right of way, and their aggravation will be reasonable. But we haven't yet reached that point in post-Katrina Louisiana.

Unfortunately, though, not everyone understands that compassion and flexibility are more important to recovery than rigid enforcement of every rule.

In St. Tammany Parish, for example, some homeowners associations are notifying residents that campers or trailers on their property violate restrictive covenants.

The seven-member board of Crestwood Estates subdivision near Covington sent letters last week demanding the removal of all mobile homes by Oct. 11. The letters also pointed out that the lots in the subdivision "are for single-family residential purposes only."

Homeowners who have been housing family members and friends left homeless by Hurricane Katrina are understandably distressed. The letter, signed by Chairman Todd McCormick and board member Roy Woodman, says that it's been five weeks since the storm — as if five weeks is too long to be hospitable.

"We as a community must persist in taking steps toward returning our subdivision to its normal state," the letter says.

It's hard to see how giving homeless friends and family the boot will help Crestwood residents return to normal, unless small-mindedness is their natural state. Obviously it isn't. Crestwood homeowner Colleen Oltmann has been using her house and father's camper to shelter her parents, her sister's family, her brother and his girlfriend. About half of Crestwood's residents have similar situations, another resident said.

Mr. McCormick now says that the letter could have been worded better. He says residents can seek variances for things that are prohibited by deed restrictions. If that's the case, it would have been easy enough to send a cordial letter telling people how to apply for a variance. The board ought to do so now and include an apology, too.

Mr. McCormick and the other members of the homeowners board should ask themselves how they'd want to be treated if they found themselves without homes. During a crisis, deed restrictions should hardly be the most pressing concerns.

AFTER BEING EVACUATED TO AUSTIN, BIG CHIEF KEVIN GOODMAN PLANS TO REKINDLE THE FLAMING ARROWS' MARDI GRAS INDIAN TRADITION IN HIS NEW TEXAS HOME

TRIBE on the move

AUSTIN — For more than a century, the Mardi Gras Indians have symbolized a unique New Orleans culture.

On Fat Tuesday, the various tribes paraded through mostly African-American neighborhoods in elaborate Indian "suits," painstakingly sewn by hand for months on end. The Indian rhythms and chants passed down from one generation to the next inform and invigorate New Orleans music, from the Dixie Cups' 1965 smash "Iko Iko" to the Neville Brothers' catalog and beyond.

Before Katrina, it was inconceivable that the Mardi Gras Indian tradition could take root anywhere other than the city of its birth.

Post-Katrina, at least one Big Chief plans to rekindle that tradition in Austin.

Big Chief Kevin Goodman leads the Flaming Arrows, the downtown Mardi Gras Indian tribe founded in 1963 by his father. For 43 of his 45 years, he has either "masked Indian" or participated in some other way. He has even nurtured his family tribe's third generation by masking his 5-year-old daughter, Kevon, and 6-year-old son, Dillon, with the Young Flaming Arrows.

In 2004, Kevin Goodman did not mask. Instead, he sewed an Indian suit for his young daughter Kevon Goodman.

However, in the wake of Katrina and its hellish aftermath, "my spirit for Mardi Gras was just gone," Goodman said recently. "But after we got to Austin and folks started showing us love and giving us hugs and welcome, it made me want to give something back.

"(My Mardi Gras spirit) is coming back more and more. When you already have something in your soul and heart, it's not hard to get it back."

Goodman grew up in the 7th Ward, "back o' town" near the intersection of Frenchmen and North Rocheblave streets. His father,

On the Air

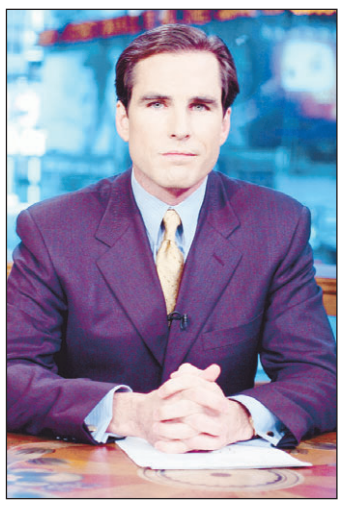
Though there's been some revisionist reporting lately on the degree to which New Orleans was plundered by its own residents during the lawless days after Hurricane Katrina, vivid scenes of such will always stay with Bob Woodruff, who covered the aftermath for ABC News.

"It was a 'Mad Max' world," he said. "I've never before seen such open looting. We can all understand people taking water and food, the basic necessities.



"But bags of shoes?"

Like many journalists in the outlaw zone, Woodruff witnessed open ransacking.

He did so by walking into besieged stores with a camera running and talking to the perpetrators.

"There seemed to be no shame," he said. "They had no fear, either, of us documenting them doing it.

What is restoration dry cleaning?

Can textiles such as drapes, linens, rugs and clothing be saved through this special dry cleaning method?

Your local dry cleaner may be fantastic at getting out red wine, but when it comes to mold, dye migration and water stains, your best chance at reclaiming your textiles will come from a specialist.

WHAT MAKES A DRY CLEANER A RESTORATION SPECIALIST?
The machines that restoration dry cleaners use agitate at higher speeds and the specialists stock detergent formulas specially created for each contaminant, such as mold, soot or smoke. Many have the time-tested ability to eyeball the damaged items and tell if they are worth restoring.

HOW BEST TO USE A RESTORATION DRY CLEANER?
Insurance companies often dispatch these individuals to homes and businesses to assess what can be saved. The cleaners can do on-site inventories. In a catastrophe such as Hurricane Katrina, however, insurance companies are more likely to issue a check and close out the case than inquire about reclamation of specific items. Because restoring fine textiles is often less expensive than replacing them, it may be in your best interest to hire a restoration dry cleaner.

HOW TO NEGOTIATE WITH A CLEANER?
Insurance companies often only pay if the cleaner successfully cleans the item. Try to negotiate a similar deal, but expect the company to be choosy about what it agrees to restore.

HOW DO YOU ASSESS THE DAMAGE ON YOUR OWN?
The answer varies depending on the type of stain.

Mold: If mold is still "fuzzy," you have a chance of saving the textile. If the growth has advanced to dark spots that cover a majority of the item's surface, it may be too late. If an item was in a room where mold grew, it still should go through an "extract and kill" sequence so that the spores can be eradicated.

Dye migration: If items were in a drawer and the dye from one garment transferred to the other, the stained garment can likely be saved by lifting out the dye.

Water stains: Most water marks can be removed.

WHAT TO LOOK FOR WITH PARTICULAR ITEMS?

Window treatments: If only the bottom few feet of your draperies got wet, there is a chance that they can be restored. Many drapes already have some degradation due to their exposure to sunlight. Hold curtains to your ear and pull on the fabric. If you hear it crack or tear, it is an indication of sun damage and that item may shred in the restoration process.

Rugs: First use a vacuum that can extract the water and then hang the rug to dry. The age and wear and tear on the rug will affect the restoration. Valuable wool rugs can be taken to an Oriental rug specialist.

Bedding and towels: If the linens were even in a room with mold, they must be decontaminated.

Tablecloths: Cloth tablecloths should be treated as any other textile.

Down feather-filled items: A mattress pad should be tossed as the cost of restoration is similar to the cost of a new one. The fabric of a down-filled comforter can be saved, but the feathers should be replaced.

To find a restoration dry cleaner, check with your dry cleaner, your insurance agent or The Certified Restoration Drycleaning Network at (888) 379-2532 or crdn.com.

HERE IS A PLEASANT LITTLE GAME that will give you a message every day. It's a numerical puzzle designed to spell out your fortune. Count the letters in your first name. If the number of letters is 6 or more, subtract 4. If the number is less than 6, add 3. The result is your key number. Start at the upper left-hand corner and check one of your key numbers, left to right. Then read the message the letters under the checked figures give you.

TRIBE on the move

Big Chief Kevin Goodman, flanked by Flaming Arrows queens Annie Jenkins, left, and Joell Williams, expects to stage Mardi Gras in Austin next year. 'New Orleans is not going to be ready,' he said.

Prior to Mardi Gras 2004, Kevin Goodman's then-4-year-old daughter, Kevon, modeled her Indian suit for her father.

CHIEF, from C-1

Theodore "Big Chief Merk" Goodman, established the Flaming Arrows in that neighborhood. After his father died in 1996, Kevin Goodman took over leadership of the tribe.

He was working as a house painter and living in an apartment in eastern New Orleans when Katrina struck. The apartment flooded. He retreated to the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, enduring several days without supplies or official aid.

"Our bodies were torn down spiritually, mentally, physically. We were drained. We were left for dead," he said.

"My brains were about to burst. It was so sad. No food, no water, elderly people without medicine. I wouldn't want anybody to go through that."

A helicopter finally transported him to Louis Armstrong International Airport, where he boarded a chartered flight to Austin.

"I didn't know I was going to Austin," he said. "At the airport, they said, 'FEMA is going to fly you to Austin.' "

After arriving in the Texas capital, he and other evacuees bunked in a makeshift shelter at the Austin Convention Center.

"Coming from the Convention Center in New Orleans to the Convention Center in Austin, it was like coming from hell to heaven," Goodman said. "We had everything we needed — water, food, shelter. All the people in Austin have shown us a lot of love and made us feel at home."

During the two weeks he spent at the shelter, he orchestrated a second-line parade. The day of the parade, Lola Stephens, co-owner of the East Austin soul food restaurant Nubian Queen Lola's Cajun Kitchen, was volunteering at the Convention Center. She invited Goodman, along with other displaced musicians, to stage a benefit for themselves at her restaurant on Sept. 11.

He also picked up gigs at the Continental Club and networked with locals through the Austin Music Co-op. On Sept. 26 he joined Cyril Neville and an Austin/New Orleans amalgamation at Antone's, the famed downtown blues club. Goodman contributed background harmonies and tambourine to "Big Chief," "Let's Go Get 'Em" and other Big Easy standards, as female members of the Flaming Arrows danced in front of the stage.

"They say this is a place for music lovers, and so far we're fitting right in with all the musicians," Goodman said. "We're trying to make Austin our home."

He has moved into an apartment near the University of Texas, subsidized by aid organizations. Come February, he does not expect to lead the Flaming Arrows through the streets of the 7th Ward. "New Orleans is not going to be ready," he said. "Time is too short."

Instead, he's planning to relaunch the Flaming Arrows in Texas.

"We'll parade in Austin," he said. "All the people that came to see us in New Orleans can come see us in Austin. They say they have a small Mardi Gras here. We're going to make it big.

"We're trying to get the New Orleans vibe and keep the flame in Texas. If we can pull off Mardi Gras in Austin, New Orleans is in trouble."

He hopes to flesh out the Flaming Arrows — only his Spy Boy, Second Chief and two of the tribe's queens have joined him so far in Texas — with new recruits.

"It doesn't matter the race, creed, religion," he said. "I'll be teaching classes on sewing .... I'll be educating people on the lyrics, the dancing, the culture."

His Indian suits, like those of other downtown tribes, sport elaborate geometric designs rendered with feathers, beads and sequins; two of Goodman's old costumes, including the red one he wore in 2003, are on display at the Backstreet Cultural Museum in Treme. One may be part of a New Orleans culture exhibit planned for the Voodoo Music Experience, which organizers moved from City Park to Memphis on Halloween weekend.

The floodwaters in eastern New Orleans destroyed the purple, green and gold suit he'd begun sewing for Mardi Gras '06. He plans to craft his Austin suit in a different color.

"Since this is the first time in Austin, I may do a white suit, or a light lavender," he said. "A fresh start. Clean."

He's also putting down Austin roots in another way. During a break at Antone's, he wrapped an arm around Annie Jenkins, his girlfriend and a Flaming Arrows queen.

"She's got a little chief in here, a papoose," he said, rubbing her belly. "He's going to be born in Austin."

Woodruff has seen it all

WALKER, from C-1

"One looter came out of a store and I asked, 'Do you realize that's wrong? To steal things like bags of shoes?' He said he didn't speak English."

Woodruff has had a piece of pretty much every big news story for ABC in recent years, and is often mentioned as one of the squadron of correspondents in line to replace the late Peter Jennings as anchor of the flagship evening newscast "World News Tonight."

He got into the globetrotting-correspondent game via an unusual route. Holding a law degree from the University of Michigan Law School, Woodruff was teaching law in Beijing when the Tiananmen Square uprising caught the world's attention. Hired by CBS News as an interpreter, he caught the broadcast-news bug.

The presence of news crews at Tiananmen Square documented a moment in history that might've otherwise been cloaked in cover-up by the Chinese government.

Many of the electronic journalists who worked in New Orleans last month have mentioned that the reaction they got from suffering stay-behinders was gratitude for providing a similar service, by documenting their plight and the aftereffects of inept relief efforts.

"One of the most amazing things was when we went into the convention center on Thursday," Woodruff said. "People were so desperate for someone from the outside, someone even remotely of authority, to come in there and listen to them.

"When we walked in we were given a standing ovation, my crew and me."

Woodruff said that's only happened once before in his career, when he was covering ethnic cleansing in Yugoslavia.

"It was a very frustrating moment," he said. "All we could really do was get word out, put their pictures on TV and maybe somebody would respond."

Commentary in recent weeks has recognized a flowering of passionate reportage in much of the post-Katrina coverage. Woodruff said the nature of the story made for simple line-drawing.

"I think people in journalism felt good about the mission," he said. "It's not waking up to take an advocacy position.

"Most stories are complex, with many sides. This is one of those stories that was essentially one-sided – people were in dire need of help.

"To me it was almost like covering a forest fire. There is evil – a fire that needs to be put out. The good guys have hoses.

"This is not the Iraq invasion. There's a lot of complexity to a story like that."

Woodruff, who was embedded with a Marine recon division during the invasion of Iraq, has worked in ABC's London bureau covering various crises in Europe and Asia, and as ABC's reporter covering the U.S. Justice Department.

Like many of the national correspondents who came to New Orleans, he'd also seen the devastation wrought by the Asian tsunami.

Though the scope of the big wave's hit was much wider, what Woodruff saw in New Orleans reminded him in many ways of what he saw in Indonesia.

"The similarities were striking," he said. "I remember being struck in Indonesia during the tsunami coverage by seeing a body on the street corner underneath a traffic lamp. It was two and a half weeks after the tsunami came through, and I was shocked by the body still being there.

"I never thought in a million years that I'd see that in the U.S. A week and a half after the hurricane, there were still bodies lying around."

On Jackson Avenue, Woodruff said, he saw one neighbor bury another after the body had been left untouched for several days.

"And you realized that people of this town just wanted some dignity at a time when they were denied the very basics of human dignity."

Brooks shoulders greater burden

With McAllister out, game in his hands

By Brian Allee-Walsh

SAN ANTONIO — Saints quarterback Aaron Brooks' job just got tougher with the loss of two-time Pro Bowl running back Deuce McAllister to a season-ending knee injury.

Then again, that's why club owner Tom Benson pays Brooks the big bucks.

"I'm not overly excited about it, but I am looking forward to the challenge," Brooks said Wednesday. "I mean, I'm not too happy about losing our star running back, but that's the National Football League.

"Hey, what can you do about it? It is what it is. I've got to stay strong and be optimistic and stay positive for these guys and keep moving on and do the best I can."

Coach Jim Haslett reminded Brooks of that during Wednesday's practice.

"Guys were moping around yesterday because Deuce got hurt," Haslett said, "and I asked Aaron, 'How'd you get your job? Jeff Blake got hurt, right? No one had any remorse. You came in and led the team to its only playoff win ever.' If Jeff Blake hadn't gotten hurt, the Saints might never have a playoff win.

Will the 'real' Saints stand up?

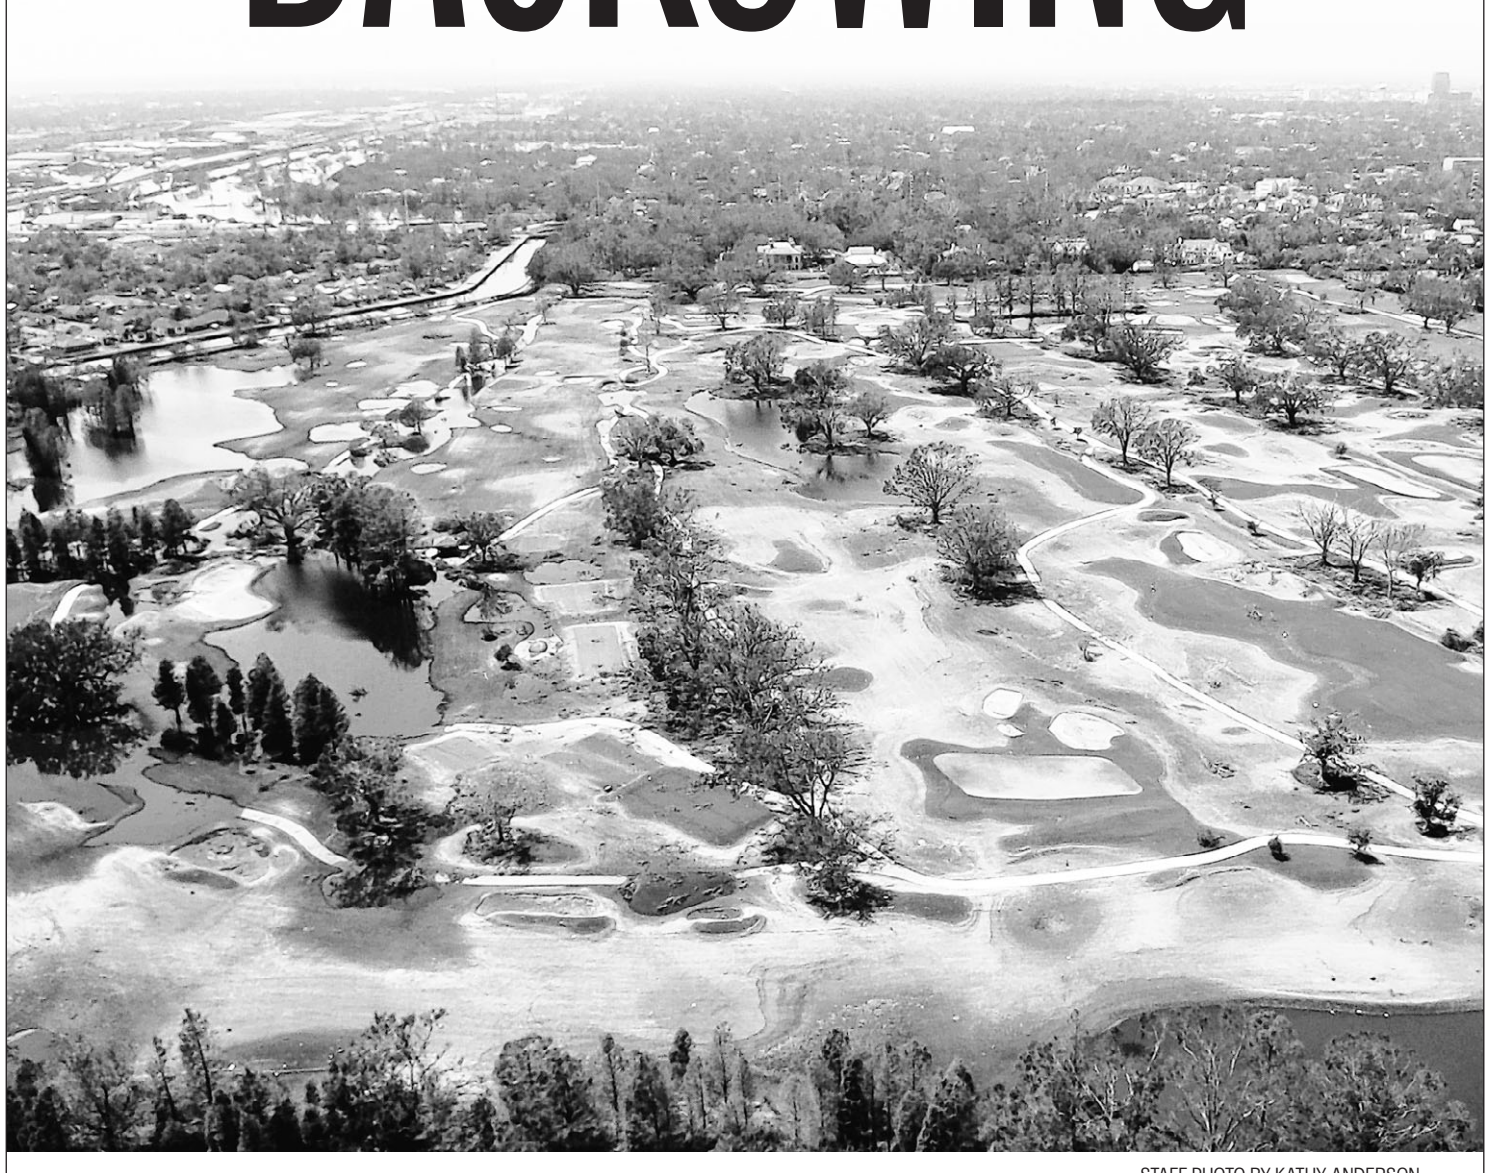
The Saints now look to the past for aid, a tricky proposition when you consider that few players on the current roster were Saints the last time the team required this kind of resuscitation, in 2000.



Those Saints were a sight to see, a collection of throwaways, past-their-primes and never-weres, bonding together like a fist and pounding away during the most adverse of times, riding their devil-may-care attitude to a division title and the first — and only — playoff victory in franchise history.

The 2005 Saints, too, are a sight to see. A sore one, so far, with precious few faces from 2000. So, it remains to be seen what can be gleaned from that earlier team, particularly when this team seems to not glean many positive lessons even from week to week.

Golf courses in the New Orleans area, many of which recently underwent major renovations, have taken a huge step back with the destruction by Hurricane Katrina. Now many wonder if the golf industry can recover.

Bayou Oaks Golf Course is one of many courses devastated by Hurricane Katrina. 'Even if we could get the debris cleared up and get trailers to operate out of, we don't have anybody to do anything,' City Park executive director Bob Becker said.

By Richard Meek
Staff writer

As New Orleans continues to recover in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, the golfing community is casting a wary eye toward an uncertain future.

The golfing arena took a double hit from Katrina: The availability of public golf courses has dropped because of water and wind damage, and the displacement of such a large number of people potentially could cause a significant drop in patrons.

"The economic impact is in the millions of dollars," said Robert Brown, director of the Gulf States Section of the PGA. "And those are dollars you can't recoup. For every day a facility is closed, the golf pro can't make up those rounds. We won't know the full effect for two to three years. My sense is that some courses won't survive down the road."

"I don't know if it will ever recover," said Gordon Digby of Kemper Management Group, the company that manages Bayou Oaks Golf Club. "We don't know who's coming back."

Digby and the golfing community appear to have cause for concern. Bayou Oaks, the city's flagship public golfing facility with 54 holes, received as much as eight feet of water on the course for several weeks and suffered an estimated $25 million in damage. All three courses are closed, as is the nearby driving range, which also suffered substantial water damage.

Shreveport to host prep title games

City, stadium to cover expenses

By Mike Strom
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — It's hard to beat free.

Shreveport and Independence Stadium offered just that Wednesday during an impressive presentation that secured northwest Louisiana the host role for this year's state high school football championships.

The Louisiana High School Athletic Association executive committee unanimously approved moving all five of the state championship football games to Shreveport in lieu of the Superdome, which sustained heavy damage from Hurricane Katrina.

Shreveport and Independence Stadium will pay for all expenses associated with staging the event. "We feel like we have the facilities, we feel like we will have the hotels available by the time of the game and we feel like we can put on a good environment for the kids," said Shreveport mayor Keith Hightower, who participated in Shreveport's impressive 20-minute presentation.

For the first time, the Nokia Sugar Bowl Prep Classic will be staged in a three-day span. The Class 3A state championship game is scheduled for Dec. 8 at 7 p.m. The 2A and 4A title games will be played Dec. 9, and the 1A and 5A finals are Dec. 10. Kickoff times for the final two days will be determined later, LHSAA commissioner Tommy Henry said.

Independence Stadium, annual host to the Independence Bowl, is an outdoor stadium with a seating capacity of 50,000 and features a similar artificial playing surface as that used by the Superdome. The venue was selected over stadiums at LSU, Louisiana-Monroe and Southeastern Louisiana University. LSU's proposal targeted only the two Saturday games because of this year's increased use of Tiger Stadium, which also is being used by the Saints and Tulane. Louisiana-Monroe and Southeastern Louisiana University sought all five games. LSU proposed a fee of $27,000 for the two Saturday games.

"I look at this as being about more than just money," Henry said. "Money is important, but you want first-class facilities. These (sites) are all first-class facilities. The proposals we sent out were a request for help. This was not a bidding process. We asked these people for help, and they all said that they will."

The state volleyball championships were awarded to Comeaux High School in Lafayette on Nov. 9-12. The tournament was forced to move from the Pontchartrain Center in Kenner due to damage incurred by Hurricane Katrina.

Paul, Smith set to take first steps as Hornets icons

Maturity is key for both young starting guards

By John Reid

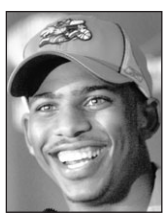
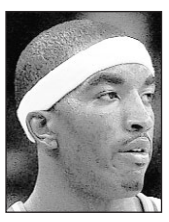
OKLAHOMA CITY — Hornets guards Chris Paul and J.R. Smith have the same circle of friends, which includes young NBA stars LeBron James and Carmelo Anthony.



Their friendship goes back to several years ago, when they all participated in national AAU summer tournaments. Now James and Anthony act as the league's top ambassadors in reaching out to help young NBA players faced with some of the same obstacles they experienced in 2003, when they were two of the most-hyped rookies in the league since Michael Jordan.

James was the high school megastar from Akron, Ohio, and No. 1 overall pick in the 2003 draft, going to the Cleveland Cavaliers. Anthony was the freshman sensation who led Syracuse to the national championship in New Orleans before declaring for the NBA draft and being selected third overall by the Denver Nuggets.



"I spoke to Carmelo yesterday," Paul said. "The thing he says is, 'just play and not worry about what's going on the outside.' I think a lot of times other people try to put pressure on you. But the game is played between you and your teammates, and you have to go out and play your heart out."

At 20, Paul and Smith are not even old enough to drink or enter a casino, but they are the faces and future of the Hornets' franchise. They are the team's dynamic backcourt duo, capable of breaking down de-

SAM PERLOZZO
Signs three-year contract with Orioles

O'S TAKE INTERIM TAG OFF PERLOZZO: The interim tag is gone: Sam Perlozzo is the new manager of the Baltimore Orioles. Perlozzo, who took over for Lee Mazzilli on Aug. 4, signed a three-year contract Wednesday and will guide a team trying to end a run of eight straight losing seasons. Perlozzo went 23-32 after replacing Mazzilli. But he asked that he not be judged on wins or losses because of the steroid suspension of first baseman Rafael Palmeiro, the termination of the contract of pitcher Sidney Ponson and injuries to outfielder Sammy Sosa and second baseman Brian Roberts. "We like the way he guided the Orioles in the second half under very difficult circumstances," said Mike Flanagan, who was hired as the team's executive vice president Tuesday. Perlozzo, 54, said he hoped to get the job two years ago, but the Orioles instead hired Mazzilli. "It's certainly something that I've wanted for a long time," said Perlozzo, who was born in Maryland. "I'm tickled to death. We're ready to move forward. . . . I always felt in due time I would be rewarded. I totally believe this was the time it was supposed to be." In 2002, Perlozzo was a finalist for the Mariners' job. But Bob Melvin, a rookie manager whom Perlozzo once coached in the minors, was chosen instead. Melvin was dismissed after last season and replaced by Mike Hargrove.

Coach K to lead U.S.

Duke's Mike Krzyzewski was picked to coach the U.S. basketball team for the 2006 World Championships and 2008 Beijing Olympics, a source told The Associated Press on Wednesday. Krzyzewski was chosen during a USA Basketball conference call last week, said the person, who did not wish to be identified because the announcement has not been made. Official word is supposed to come Oct. 29. The American men finished sixth at the 2002 World Championships in Indianapolis and third at the 2004 Olympics. The team at the Athens Games was without several top NBA players and was coached by Larry Brown. Krzyzewski, who has led Duke to three national championships, would be become the first college coach to run a U.S. men's basketball team at the World Championships or Olympics since NBA players began playing in international competition in 1992. Krzyzewski was an assistant on the U.S. Dream Team at the 1992 Barcelona Games that was coached by Chuck Daly.

JOHNSON TO HEAD QUALIFYING TEAM: Davey Johnson will manage a U.S. team of minor leaguers next month in Phoenix in a regional Olympic qualifying tournament. Johnson led the United States last month at baseball's World Cup in the Netherlands, where his team finished seventh. He has managed for 14 seasons in the majors with the New York Mets, Cincinnati Reds, Baltimore Orioles and the Los Angeles Dodgers. He also coached the Dutch team at the Athens Olympics. "I'm looking forward to again having the opportunity to wear the uniform of the United States, and to the challenge this time of making sure that America advances to the 2006 continental qualifier in Cuba," he said. USA Baseball announced the hiring Wednesday for the qualifier Nov. 15-19. Four of the six countries will advance to the next qualifier in Havana in August. The U.S. baseball team failed to qualify for the Athens Olympics. "Davey brings a consistent managerial style to Team USA that we have not had in recent years," USA Baseball executive Bob Watson said. Joining Johnson's staff are Rick Eckstein (bench coach), Marcel Lachemann (pitching coach) and Mike Barnett (hitting coach). USA Baseball is in the process of selecting a 24-man roster for the round-robin event, which includes Canada, Guatemala, Mexico, Nicaragua and Panama.

HAYES, EIGHT OTHERS MAKE HALL: Bob Hayes, the only man to win an Olympic gold medal and a Super Bowl ring, will join Evelyn Ashford, 1980 hockey coach Herb Brooks and the 1984 U.S. men's gymnastics team in this year's class for the U.S. Olympic Hall of Fame. Gymnast Shannon Miller, figure skater Kristi Yamaguchi, swimmer Rowdy Gaines and Jack Shea also were selected for the Hall. Paralympian Diana Golden-Brosnihan and NBC sports chief Dick Ebersol also will be inducted Dec. 8 in Chicago. "This is an incredibly humbling experience for me and without a doubt the greatest award I've ever received," Gaines said Wednesday after the selections were announced during the U.S. Olympic Committee media summit. "To join some of the greatest athletes in history, I really can't put it into words. It really is amazing." Hayes was dubbed the "World's Fastest Human" after he won a pair of gold medals at the 1964 Olympics. He tied the world record in the 100 meters, then anchored the 400 relay team that set a world record. After his track and field career, Hayes spent 11 years in the NFL and was part of the Dallas Cowboys' team that won the Super Bowl after the 1971 season. Hayes died of kidney failure in 2002. Ashford won five Olympic medals, including four gold. She won the 100 meters at the Los Angeles Games, and helped the Americans win three straight golds in the 400 relay at the 1984, '88 and '92 Games. Ashford made five Olympic teams, but only competed in four because of the United States' boycott of the 1980 Games. Brooks led a team of college players to the "Miracle on Ice" victory over the Soviet Union in the 1980 semifinals. The Americans went on to win the gold medal, their only one since 1960. Brooks also played on the 1964 and '68 teams, and was the last player cut in 1960. He died in a car accident in 2003.

Penn RB commits suicide

Two days after one of the best games of his career, Penn running back Kyle Ambrogi committed suicide, the university and police said. The 21-year-old senior, who died at his suburban Havertown home Monday, had been battling depression, the Daily News reported Wednesday, quoting the player's family. "I knew my brother had been having some problems," Ambrogi's brother, Greg, a sophomore defensive back on the team, told the paper. "I thought he was getting better. I can't believe it happened. I can't cry yet." Haverford Township police chief Gary Hoover told The Associated Press that Ambrogi's gunshot death wasn't being investigated as a criminal matter. Quakers coach Al Bagnoli called the player "one of our shining lights." The brothers had a big day Saturday in Penn's 53-7 rout of Bucknell. Kyle, a backup, carried five times for 18 yards and two third-quarter touchdowns. Greg scored a touchdown after recovering a fumbled snap in the second quarter.

TIME WANTS SETTLEMENT THROWN OUT: Time Inc. asked a judge to throw out its settlement and dismiss defamation claims of former Alabama football coach Mike Price over a Sports Illustrated article recounting his night of drunken partying at a Florida strip club, court documents showed Wednesday. In a motion filed in federal court, Time claimed Price and his lawyer, Steve Heninger, violated an agreement to make only limited public comments about the deal, reached last week to resolve Price's $20 million defamation suit against the magazine, which Time publishes. Heninger denied violating the settlement's terms. U.S. District Judge Lynwood Smith made no immediate ruling Wednesday on the motion, filed late Tuesday, but he did grant Time's request to seal court documents related to terms of the settlement.

BC LINEMAN DOUBTFUL: Boston College lineman Mathias Kiwanuka is "highly unlikely" to play against Wake Forest because of a right knee injury that may have happened when he was hit after the whistle against Virginia. Kiwanuka said Wednesday he has a sprained or slightly torn medial collateral ligament in his right leg. He already had a sore ankle. No. 14 Boston College (5-1, 2-1 Atlantic Coast Conference) has a bye week after Saturday's game, then plays on Thursday, Oct. 27, against third-ranked Virginia Tech.

Sharapova escapes upset

Top-ranked Maria Sharapova avoided losing her homeland pro debut when Anna-Lena Groenefeld retired with an ankle injury while controlling play Wednesday in the Kremlin Cup at Moscow. Groenefeld won 6-1 in the first set of the second-round match, and was leading 4-2 in the second set when she had to quit. Groenefeld tried to continue after receiving treatment, but served two double faults with tears in her eyes and retired. "I know that I did not win this match fairly," Sharapova said. "I do not like such victories." Sharapova has six career victories due to an opponent's retirement, but this was the first in which she was trailing. In men's first-round action, Daniele Bracciali upset top-seeded defending champion Nikolay Davydenko 3-6, 6-4, 6-4. Cyril Saulnier rallied to upset second-seeded Dominik Hrbaty 4-6, 6-3, 6-3. In the quarterfinals, Sharapova will play another Russian, Elena Likhovtseva, who rallied to upset fifth-seeded Patty Schnyder 1-6, 6-4, 6-3. Two-time defending champion Anastasia Myskina and former winner Mary Pierce staged comebacks — third-seeded Pierce, the 1998 champion, beat Flavia Pennetta 4-6, 6-2, 6-3 to advance to the quarterfinals. Myskina, seeded sixth, ousted three-time champion Magdalena Maleeva 2-6, 6-4, 6-2 and will face Kveta Peschke in the second round today.

Snyder returns to work from injured hamstring

Center Andersen only Hornet who will miss game

By John Reid
Staff writer

OKLAHOMA CITY — Hornets forward/guard Kirk Snyder, who had been sidelined since Saturday with a hamstring injury, practiced Wednesday.

Snyder went through the workout without limitations and said he is ready to play in tonight's preseason opener against the Denver Nuggets.

"This is a new situation, and you want to be out there and showcase what you do best," Snyder said. "The coaches are used to seeing you, and any time you can get out there is important."

The Hornets obtained Snyder in a trade from the Utah Jazz in August, and they're hoping he can come off the bench to provide help at shooting guard and small forward.

Snyder entered camp as one of the team's best conditioned players. During a running drill during the second day of camp, he lapped several of his teammates.

Hornets spokesman Scott Hall said backup center Chris Andersen, who has a sore knee and shoulder, is the only player who has been ruled out from tonight's game. Hall said Andersen's knee injury is the reason he's not playing. With Andersen out, Maciej Lampe could play more behind starting center Jamaal Magloire.

Forward Bostjan Nachbar (sore lower back) and point guard Speedy Claxton (right toe) were held out of Tuesday's practice by Coach Byron Scott, but they returned Wednesday.

SHORTENED WORK: Scott put his team through a shortened 1½-hour practice Wednesday at Southern Nazarene University before they boarded a chartered flight to Denver.

"We got in a little up-and-down work and some five-on-five," Scott said. "I just wanted to shorten it a little bit today."

EVALUATING: Players whom general manager Jeff Bower and Scott will be evaluating tonight include forwards Brandon Bass and Sean Banks, shooting guard Arvydas Macijauskas, Snyder and point guards Alex Garcia and Troy Bell. Nachbar and Rasual Butler are in a close battle to earn the starting small forward spot. But Nachbar is projected to start tonight, with Butler expected to play an equal amount.

"I want to get a real good look at some of the new guys we have in an actual game situation," Scott said. "I'm also curious how the first five do as well. This game will give us a good idea of where we are."

On Saturday night, the Hornets will play the Orlando Magic in St. Petersburg, Fla.

down defenses with Paul's accurate passing and shooting and Smith's soaring dunks. They make their debut tonight in the Hornets' preseason opener against the Denver Nuggets at the Pepsi Center in Denver.

"I can't wait for us to get out there finally," Smith said.

Paul was the No. 4 overall pick in the June draft after guiding Wake Forest to 48 wins in two seasons. Although he wasn't the first point guard selected, many draft experts rated him as the top prospect at the position because of his scoring and ballhandling. After going 18-64 last season and trading point guard Baron Davis to Golden State in February, the Hornets were desperate to land a player like Paul.

"He's a very mature young man, and he knows what he wants to do out there on the court," Coach Byron Scott said. "You can tell by the way he plays that he's a little ahead of his years."

The day before the Hornets started training camp at Southern Nazarene University, Scott said he wouldn't be surprised to see Paul win the league's rookie of the year award this season.

"I think he kind of liked that I said it, because it's a challenge for him," Scott said. "He probably was thinking about it anyway, and he loves challenges.

"The maturity of J.R. has skyrocketed, as well, just being around Chris."

During the first two months of last season, Smith struggled to meet Scott's expectations as a defender. It wasn't until after the Hornets traded veteran guard David Wesley to the Houston Rockets last December that Smith began to play extended minutes, even when he made mistakes defensively. But his confidence surged, and so did his overall play.

Starting in January, he was selected Western Conference Rookie of the Month three consecutive months.

"What motivates me is when people think I can't do something. I'm just going to do it," Smith said. "Once I show I can do something, it really gets me pumped."

Smith now concentrates as much on his defensive play as he does dunking.

Paul is likely to go through some adjustments during the season, too. But the team is pushing his development at a far more accelerated pace than what Smith experienced last season. Paul is going to be the starting point guard, and he may have to direct some veteran players to where they're supposed to be on the court when certain plays are called.

"The best I can do is hold up my end of the bargain," Paul said. "I have to be a constant professional, keep a level head. The one thing that I have been blessed with is basketball sense. I've always been able to read defense and learn plays quickly. I still get nervous before every game, but I'm ready for what's ahead."

Smith said he's going to help Paul every step of the way to insure a smooth transition.

"It's definitely a responsibility when they make you the face of the franchise," Smith said. "We have to go out and lead by example."

Injury to Cavs' James a mystery

Stoudemire was 'fortunate' in surgery

From wire reports

LeBron James winced with pain at times during practice Wednesday, a day after he woke up with a strained chest muscle.

James sat out the Cleveland Cavaliers' exhibition game Tuesday night against Boston and is listed as questionable with a strained left pectoral muscle for Friday night's home exhibition game against Philadelphia.

He began experiencing pain Tuesday. But he said he is baffled about how he was injured in an exhibition game Monday night against Washington.

"I don't know where it came from," James said. "I don't remember getting elbowed in the chest. I woke up yesterday morning and it was hurting. It's something I've never felt before."

He said he wouldn't have been able to play Tuesday night, even if it had been a regular-season game.

"I'm not 100 percent right now, but I'm getting there," he said.

BRASWELL CUT BY HEAT: Miami waived Kevin Braswell, two days after the veteran guard help beat reigning NBA champ San Antonio with a buzzer-beating layup.

Signed as a free agent Oct. 3, Braswell had four points, one assist and one rebound in six minutes against the Spurs, his only game with the Heat.

Braswell spent last season with the Florida Flame of the NBA Developmental League, where he averaged 11.3 points.

STOUDEMIRE FORTUNATE: Amare Stoudemire's surgery was limited to repairing torn cartilage in his left knee, a "best-case scenario" for the Phoenix Suns' All-Star, said the doctor who performed the surgery.

Although other players have struggled to come back at full strength after microfracture surgery, Suns team doctor Thomas Carter said Stoudemire doesn't have the same obstacles to overcome.

"The rest of the knee was absolutely normal," Carter said Wednesday, one day after Stoudemire's surgery. "It's a best-case scenario when you go in there and there's nothing else wrong with the knee."

Stoudemire, 23, will be sidelined for about four months. The surgery came just days after he signed a five-year, $73 million contract extension.

Stoudemire won't be able to bear weight on the knee for four weeks. During that time, he'll spend six to eight hours per day on a continuous passive motion machine to speed his recovery by continually moving the knee.

SAINTS' NOTES

N.O., McAllister make it official

Saints put tailback on injured reserve, sign third-year safety

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — The Saints placed tailback Deuce McAllister on injured reserve Wednesday, officially ending his season with a torn anterior cruciate ligament in his right knee.

The Saints replaced him on the roster with third-year safety Siddeeq Shabazz, who spent his first two seasons with the Oakland Raiders and Atlanta Falcons before spending this preseason with the Washington Redskins.

Shabazz (5 feet 11, 200 pounds) primarily will play special teams and add some depth to a position depleted by injuries to Jay Bellamy and Mel Mitchell.

The New Mexico State product was drafted in the seventh round by the Raiders in 2003. He played in 15 games for the Falcons last season, with nine tackles in the regular season and two in the playoffs.

"We wanted to sign him last week, but we couldn't find a roster spot," Saints coach Jim Haslett said of Shabazz. "He's a guy that's extremely fast, very smart. He'll know Atlanta (this week's opponent) a little bit, but we brought him in to play special teams and learn the safety spot."

HODGE MIGHT BE CLEARED: Starting linebacker Sedrick Hodge believes he will be able to avoid a one-year suspension for violating the league's substance abuse policy. Hodge said he missed a drug test while on vacation during the offseason and believes the matter can be cleared up by producing proof that he was away.

Haslett said the only information he received that Hodge would be suspended was from a CBS Sports report Sunday. Hodge served a four-game suspension for violating the policy last year.

Atlanta lost to the Patriots 31-28.

Falcons coach Jim Mora said he expects Vick to continue practicing all week. The team will evaluate his status on a day-to-day basis. The quarterback is listed as questionable.

The Saints were preparing to face Vick in practice Wednesday, with athletic rookie quarterback Adrian McPherson acting as Vick in the scout-team offense.

Vick has won all three times he has faced the Saints — he has missed five games against the Saints because of injuries over the past four years.

HORN DOES, TOO: Saints receiver Joe Horn was involved during most of Wednesday's practice and is expected to try to return from a hamstring injury that has sidelined him the past two weeks.

He remains questionable but insisted he will "definitely" play.

"One hundred and 55 percent, definitely," Horn said. "Unless something ungodly happens."

Horn had been promising he would play the past two weeks, however, and he even qualified his promise Wednesday by saying later, "In my heart, I'm 150 percent ready to play."

OTHER INJURIES: Saints offensive tackle Jammal Brown (ankle) did not practice and is "questionable at best" to play this week, according to Haslett.

Defensive end Darren Howard did not practice, resting a lingering knee injury, but is expected to play. Linebackers James Allen (hamstring) and T.J. Slaughter (groin) and safety Mel Mitchell (hamstring) have not practiced since being injured Oct. 2 against Buffalo.

Linebacker Terrence Melton (ankle) also did not practice.

RUBBING IT IN: Horn said his kids have been giving him a hard time all week about the Saints' 52-3 loss at Green Bay.

Horn said when he got home Sunday night, his 11-year-old son challenged him to a game of Madden 2006.

"He said, 'I'm Green Bay, and you're the Saints. I'm gonna beat you as bad as they did,' " Horn recalled, admitting he laughed pretty hard about it, despite being upset and embarrassed by the loss.

AROUND THE LEAGUE

Giants' Shockey gets $31.2 million deal

From wire reports

Jeremy Shockey, the New York Giants' flamboyant and sometimes spectacular tight end, signed a five-year, $31.2 million contract extension on Wednesday.

Shockey's agent, Drew Rosenhaus, said the deal makes him the NFL's highest-paid player at his position. It includes a $3 million signing bonus for Shockey, who had two years left on his contract.

Shockey, New York's first-round pick in 2002, caught 74 passes for 894 yards as a rookie and was voted to the All-Pro team and the Pro Bowl.

He has been bothered by injuries the past two seasons, although he made the Pro Bowl again in 2003. Last season, he was the Giants' leading receiver with 61 catches, but complained at times about having too many blocking duties in a controlled offense designed to help rookie Eli Manning break in at quarterback.

With Manning blossoming this season, Shockey has caught 17 passes for 251 yards and two touchdowns in four games.

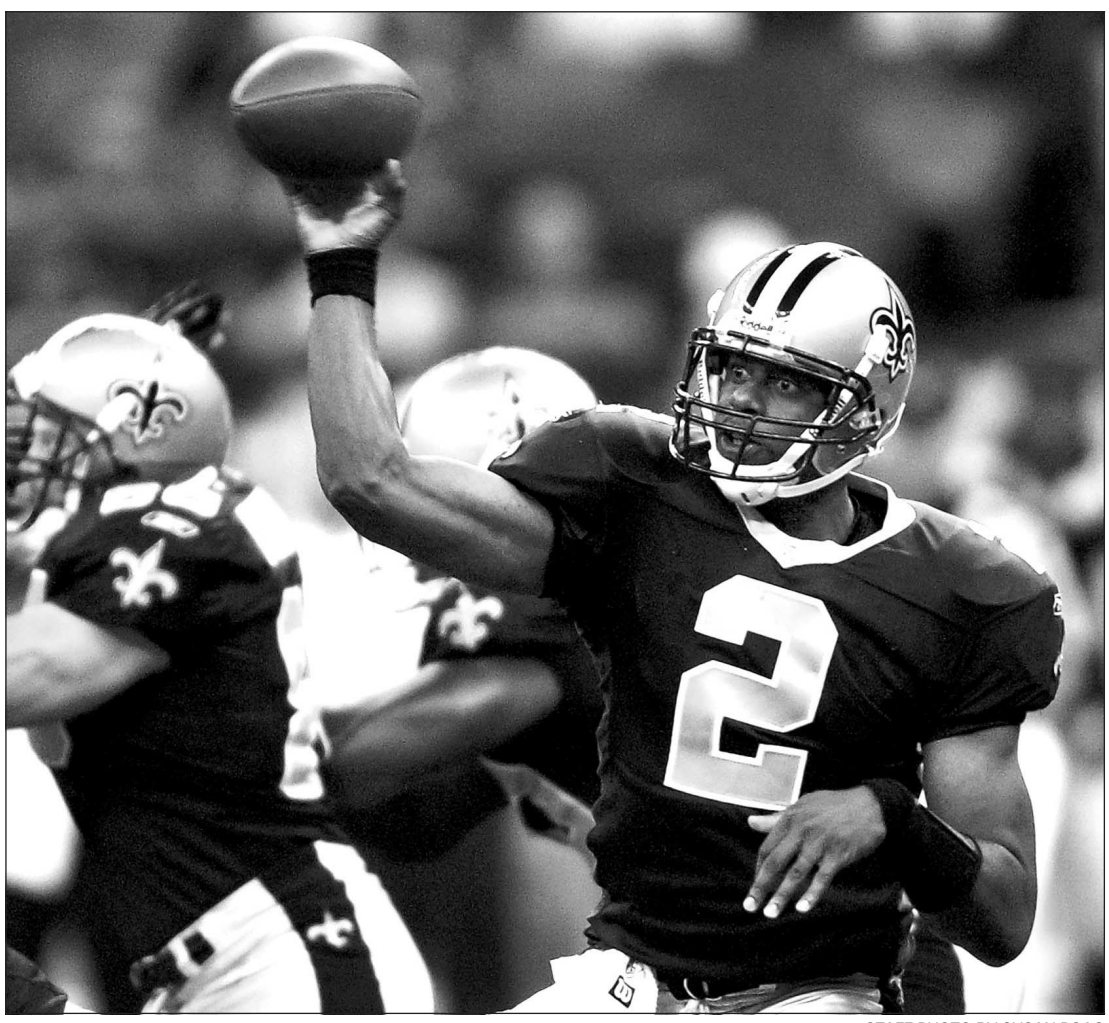
CARDINALS RELEASE DAVEY: Former LSU and New England Patriots quarterback Rohan Davey was released by Arizona.

The Cardinals had signed Davey after starter Kurt Warner injured his groin three weeks ago. Warner is expected back.

FALCONS LOSE TWO STARTERS: Atlanta placed linebacker Ed Hartwell and cornerback Chris Cash on injured reserve.

Hartwell, a starter and key free-agent offseason pickup, and backup Cash sustained season-ending injuries in Sunday's loss to New England. Hartwell had surgery Monday to repair a torn right Achilles' tendon. Cash broke his right arm.

PANTHERS' BACKFIELD HURTING: Stephen Davis and DeShaun Foster were among four injured running backs to miss practice with Carolina.



They have knee injuries and are questionable for Sunday's game against the Detroit Lions. Rod Smart (groin), who also returns kicks, and fullback Brad Hoover (shoulder) also missed practice.

AFC

NFL FINES THREE: Tampa Bay's Ronde Barber was fined $30,000 by the NFL for punching an official during Sunday's game with the New York Jets.

Baltimore's Terrell Suggs and Ed Reed, a former Destrehan High School standout, were fined $15,000 each for making contact with an official during the Ravens' game in Detroit.

EDWARDS OUT OF HOSPITAL: Cleveland Browns wide receiver Braylon Edwards was released from the hospital but might not play for a month while recovering from an infected right arm.

Saints quarterback Aaron Brooks says he, like his teammates, must guard against trying too hard to overcome the absence of star running back Deuce McAllister. 'I think it's important for me not to try to do too much because when you try to do too much, bad things happen,' Brooks said.

Coaches say Brooks' role won't change

training camp. So this is an opportunity for somebody to step up. If you lose a great player on your team, other players have to pick it up. I think this team will rally around this, I really do."

Because of the nature of his position, Brooks naturally shoulders a great offensive burden. But Saints coaches say Brooks' role on game day won't change dramatically with Antowain Smith and Aaron Stecker sharing McAllister's duties in the backfield.

"Aaron's got to take a little more control of this team," Haslett said. "I don't think he should do any more than he's doing. I don't think he should force anything else upon himself. But I think everybody needs to pick up their game, including him."

"Aaron is a smart guy," Saints offensive coordinator Mike Sheppard said. "So when he sees that the offense is the same, then he's going to understand that all he has to do is get the ball to the playmakers. We're going to keep rolling. If Aaron just does a nice job of playing quarterback, then we feel we have enough playmakers in there to be able to move the football and get points and help our team win."

After opening with a 23-20 victory at Carolina in Week 1, the Saints have fallen on hard times. They have lost three of their past four games, including a 52-3 blowout at Green Bay on Sunday.

Brooks struggled as the score suggests, completing nine of 22 passes for 146 yards with two interceptions before his exit midway through the third quarter. Packers' cornerback Al Harris returned the first interception 22 yards for a touchdown in the first quarter.

After five games, Brooks has thrown two touchdown passes and seven interceptions and has a passer rating of 62.6, 27th among starting NFL quarterbacks.

"All A.B. needs to do is keep on doing what he's doing," Saints wide receiver Joe Horn said. "Everybody has to raise their level of play, not just A.B. Everybody else has to pick up the load around him. Guys have got to fill in and do their jobs. They've got to do what Mr. Benson pays them to do."

"Aaron's going to have to step up and take more of the load because we might have to change up what we do some on offense," Saints tight end Ernie Conwell said. "You don't have No. 26 back there to carry the ball 25, 30 times a game. I've been in this situation before at St. Louis. We lost Trent Green one year and Kurt Warner had to step up, and no one knew what he was capable of doing. All of a sudden, we had a huge turnaround, and we won the Super Bowl. And the rest is history."

"There are some tendencies for people to step up and get out of character and try to do too much," Saints cornerback Fred Thomas said. "I did it a couple of times myself and put myself in a bad situation. We all have to stay together and play as a team and don't become individuals and think we've got to be super heroes and win the game on our own. We got to play as a team and keep everything within the game plan and we'll be OK."

Brooks agreed with Thomas, saying players must guard against trying too hard to overcome McAllister's absence.

"I've just got to be me," Brooks said. "I've just got to be the leader I am and encourage guys a little more. Guys have got to be more accountable, but I think it's important for me not to try to do too much because when you try to do too much, bad things happen."

Opinions varied from players when asked if opponents might consider changing their defensive strategy with McAllister out of the lineup.

"I don't think defensive coordinators will game plan differently because of our style of play or because Deuce is down," Horn said. "We're a downhill football team."

"Obviously, when you have Deuce back there, defenses have to account for him all the time," Conwell said. "I'm sure teams are going to adjust to some degree, but we are who we are. We're not going to revamp this whole offense in a week, or, for that matter, even during the course of a season."

Fumbling, bumbling Saints need help

DeSHAZIER, from C-5

Can the season-ending injury to running back Deuce McAllister become a rallying point, like season-ending or season-interrupting injuries to quarterback Jeff Blake, running back Ricky Williams and a host of others five seasons ago? Only if the current Saints, who are far more intimate with the pleasures of mediocrity than the ecstasy of winning seasons and playoff appearances, somehow can find it within themselves to break the cycle and smash through the franchise's personal glass ceiling.

Why the pessimism over the on-field product? Better question: From what, so far, has there been reason to draw optimism?

There's been no carryover from a 4-0 finish last season, which was supposed to have been the representation of the "real" Saints, as opposed to the guys who lost eight of their first 12 games of the season. The adrenaline rush of playing on behalf of the displaced citizens of a Hurricane Katrina-ravaged Gulf Coast has petered out.

So it doesn't seem logical to believe the 2-3 Saints are going to get signficantly better.

When a team is talking about fixing the exact same things it has vowed to fix the previous four years — illogical penalties, head-scratching turnovers, an inability or unwillingness to stop the run — it can't blame its fan base for losing patience and belief.

It can't have ill feelings toward anyone who refuses to invest emotionally in it, anyone who prefers to remain even-keeled and analytical rather than suffer through the wild mood swings that go along with rabidly buying into a team that wins one, loses two, wins one, gets embarrassed in two, wins two, loses one and on and on until it finishes at or near .500 and out of the playoffs.

But the team should be more than peeved at itself. Because this far into the same regime, having this many repetitions in the same system and this many opportunities to learn from penalties, there's no way the Saints still should be talking about the same housecleaning problems, none of which have anything to do with being displaced.

It should be astounding when the team commits 10 penalties and two or three turnovers, not routine. By now, the team should be a well-oiled machine.

Instead, the current Saints need to look to the past for help.

True, some veteran additions have had success elsewhere, sometimes having to crawl out of holes en route to doing so. But strange things seem to happen to them when they're wearing a Saints jersey.

Either they lose their roadmaps to the postseason, or they can't find enough willing followers in their new locker room.

And now, everyone in that locker room must dig. In the end, fans must hope they find the kind of resolve that hasn't manifested itself in a playoff berth since the 2000 season.

White Sox look rusty in Game 1

Road-weary Angels grab lead in ALCS

By Rick Gano
AP sports writer

CHICAGO — The Chicago White Sox's offense looked a bit rusty, even if they insisted a three-day layoff had no bearing on their performance in Game 1 of the American League championship series.

They had trouble getting down bunts when they needed them, couldn't steal their way into scoring position or deliver run-scoring hits against the Los Angeles Angels — a team that was supposed to be weary after two long trips.

"Anytime you don't hit well and don't throw up a lot of offense, it looks flat," Paul Konerko said after a 3-2 loss Tuesday night. "It doesn't matter if you had days off or if it is the middle of the season or whatever.

"We didn't play well and we lost by a run. If we tighten up our game a little bit, it will be better for us. That's what we do, why we are here and we've been successful doing that all year."

While running up an AL-best 99 wins and then sweeping the defending champion Boston Red Sox in the first round, the White Sox were able to manufacture runs while also showing power with 200 homers.

Joe Crede hit a solo homer off Paul Byrd and A.J. Pierzynski had a run-scoring single, but there were numerous missed opportunities for a team that has squandered home-field advantage in its first ALCS appearance since 1993.

"We hit a lot of balls hard. We had some chances, we just didn't get them in," Pierzynski said. "I thought we were fine at the plate. We just didn't get a big hit."

Jose Contreras gave up three runs and seven hits in 8⅓ innings, good enough to win on most nights. Instead, he took his first loss since Aug. 15 after running off eight straight wins to close the regular season and then beating the Red Sox in the division series opener a week ago.

"I feel bad for Jose. He pitched great and we didn't come through for him," Konerko said.

For example: Needing a run and a big hit in the eighth, Konerko flied out with two on.

Needing a sacrifice in the ninth after Carl Everett reached on an error to start the inning, Aaron Rowand bunted into a force and a potential rally fizzled. Crede then struck out with a runner on to end the game.

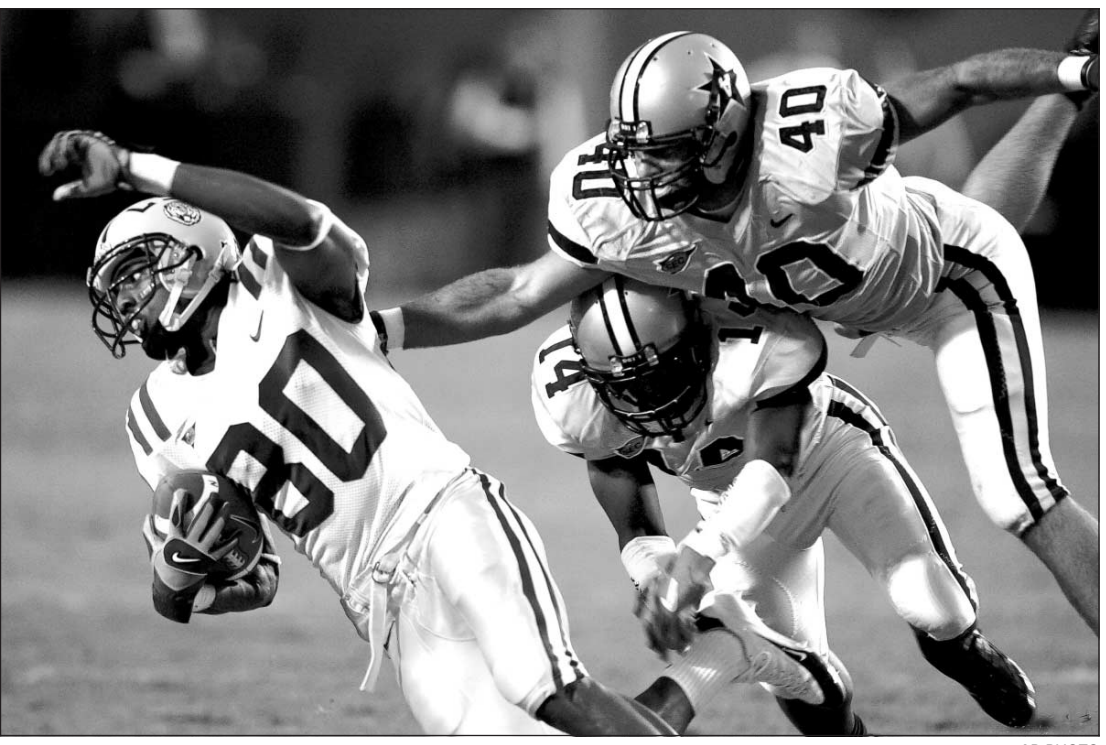
"I felt we were ready to come back," Crede said. "We just weren't able to capitalize, not able to execute when the opportunity came along."

The White Sox had speedy leadoff hitter Scott Podsednik on twice but couldn't get him around; once he was thrown out trying to steal.

They tried a little bit of everything from No. 3 hitter Jermaine Dye bunting and popping out to start the sixth, and Pierzynski trying unsuccessfully to steal in the seventh when he apparently misread a sign.

"(Dye) tried to get on base, make things happen and when you're batting third, he thought the third baseman was playing back," White Sox manager Ozzie Guillen said. "He just wanted to make something happen to start the inning."

Pierzynski, who didn't steal a base in the regular season, said he thought a play was on when he took off for second.



"I saw hit-and-run," he said. "Did I miss a sign? I guess I did. . . . That's what happens."

Juan Uribe reached on an infield single, starting the eighth, but Podsednik couldn't get down a bunt and then was called out on strikes.

LSU receiver Dwayne Bowe (80) catches a pass against Vanderbilt on Saturday night in Nashville, Tenn. Bowe has caught three touchdown passes in the past two games.

Bowe's loquacity quiets opponents

LSU wide receiver's verbage a barometer of on-field success

BATON ROUGE — Welcome back, Dwayne Bowe, to the land of the loquacious.

LSU VS. FLORIDA
2:30 p.m.
Saturday 4

If the colorful, free-flowing vocabulary the junior wide receiver used this week is an indication, it feels good to re-establish residence back home.

After taking a two-game verbal sabbatical, Bowe finally provided himself plenty of material to talk about, catching three touchdown passes combined against Mississippi State and Vanderbilt, and doubling his season totals in receptions and yards during one extra-productive quarter in Nashville, Tenn.

"I told JaMarcus (Russell) right before the game started, 'I'm hot, I'm ready, I'm feeling it.' So he just fed me."

Interesting choice of words, considering the cold night temperature in Vanderbilt Stadium kept Bowe from the first pregame warm-ups. While Early Doucet, Skyler Green and the gang went through the scripted motions, Bowe laid in the treatment room, receiving attention on the same ankle injury that scratched him from the Arizona State debut.

Bowe finally came out of the tunnel when the linemen emerged, much later in the pregame routine.

Fortunately for Bowe, it didn't take long to get loose and feel comfortable.

First play from scrimmage: Russell to Bowe, 17 yards.

Third play from scrimmage: Russell to Bowe, 30 yards, much of it after the catch.

Sixth play from scrimmage: Russell to Bowe, 30 yards for a touchdown.

"That first drive made me feel like my normal self," Bowe said. "Focusing in. Nothing distracted me. Like we were in the huddle, I told JaMarcus, 'Hey man, I'm hot.' There were a lot of plays I would have gotten the ball again, but the O-linemen missed assignments or they blitzed and it caused disruption in JaMarcus' view.

"If those didn't happen, I would have at least had 180 on them."

Bowe showed his ability to separate from defenders on the post-pattern touchdown, waiting for Russell's floated pass to finally land, slowing up to get two feet in when one would have done.

"If I would have keep running, I would have run right out the gate," Bowe said.

In the first quarter, Bowe caught five passes for 98 yards and the touchdown, and was on pace to break some school and possibly conference single-game records when, all of the sudden, he vanished. Not only did Bowe not catch another pass, Russell looked his way just once more, throwing an incompletion.

"He has his days when he'll just throw to Early and Skyler," Bowe said. "I tell the (receivers) if they score, that's six — I'm going to get three and they are going to get three."

Asked if Russell offers subtle hints on whether he's going to shine or be shunned, Bowe simply said, "It just happens."

Palmer has potential to be NFL star if Price is right

Miners coach sees similarities between Miners QB, brother

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

RUSTON — When UTEP coach Mike Price watches his quarterback, he sees a Heisman Trophy winner.

Sort of.

"They look so much alike, they look like twins," Price said of Carson and Jordan Palmer, the latter Price's starting signal-caller.

TULANE VS. UTEP
7 p.m.
Saturday
in Ruston

Jordan Palmer sure looks like his older brother, the Cincinnati Bengals quarterback whose 2002 season for Southern California was bronzed. But the comparisons go beyond the mug shot.

"(Carson Palmer) had a more prolific high school career because Jordan only played one year in high school as starting quarterback," said Price, whose team plays Tulane on Friday in Ruston. "But as far as their sophomore years in college, I think they're pretty equal."

Jordan Palmer now is a junior, a second-year starter and budding star. There won't be a Heisman hootenanny for him this season, at least, and he probably isn't the even the best quarterback in Conference USA. But he has a strong arm, an infectious attitude and pedigree.

When asked if Jordan Palmer could be an NFL quarterback, Price said, "No question. We'll see how he does this year. He's been doing good. We'll see how he finishes the season before I make any prediction. But I think he has NFL ability."

Last season, the 6-foot-5, 230-pound Palmer emerged — as did his team, which went 8-4 after three losing seasons. Palmer threw for 2,818 yards and 26 touchdowns, the most by a UTEP quarterback in a single season. He ranked 28th in the nation in passing efficiency (136.4), and in games he threw two or fewer interceptions, UTEP was 7-2.

The Miners entered this season, their first in C-USA, as front-runners to win the Western Division and play in the conference's inaugural championship game. So far, the Miners are 3-1, 1-1.

Palmer spearheads the potent pass offense, which averages 298 yards per game, second in C-USA (Tulane's pass defense also is second, allowing 158 yards per game). Palmer's 293.8 passing yards per game trails only UAB's Darrell Hackney (298.4). And Palmer has eight touchdowns and six interceptions; his passing efficiency is down from last year, settling at 119.9, eighth-best in C-USA.

"I'm definitely not where I'd like to be," said Palmer, 21. "I'm still forcing the ball and making some bad decisions, and at quarterback, that's all it really comes down to — decision-making and trying to put your team in a position to win. I don't think I've done a great job at that so far, but I still have a lot of games left. And when you do make mistakes, it's obvious and apparent that you're going to learn from it."

"Because of his position and having so much authority and touching the ball so much, he's just going to continue to improve," said Price, who coached NFL-bound quarterbacks Drew Bledsoe and Ryan Leaf at Washington State. "And he works so hard off the field, and he watches a lot of tape, day and night. He's going to do nothing but get better."

According to Palmer and Tulane coach Chris Scelfo, credit for UTEP's pass success goes to the offensive line. And there are plenty of sure-handed receivers. Yes, Chris Francies (15 catches) will miss Friday's game with a rib injury, but there's Johnnie Lee Higgins with his team-high 21 catches and five scores, and Jayson Boyd with 12 receptions.

"They execute," Scelfo said of the UTEP offense. "They don't do anything fancy, they just line up — and they don't ask (Palmer) to do a whole lot."

Said Palmer: "I feel like I've got a long ways to go, but at the same time, I've got so much talent around me, it's going to speed that process up."

LOUISIANA-LAFAYETTE AT ARKANSAS STATE

6:30 p.m. today in Jonesboro, Ark.

The Ragin' Cajuns (1-4, 0-1 Sun Belt Conference) led 10-7 after three quarters last week against Florida Atlantic but gave up 21 fourth-quarter points in a 28-10 loss. Freshman running back Tyrell Fenroy rushed for 82 yards on 16 carries for ULL and scored on a one-yard run to cap the first drive of the game. . . . The Indians (2-3, 1-1), who have averaged 35 points and 403 yards per game, haven't played since losing at Louisiana-Monroe 31-27 Oct. 1. Arkansas State running back Antonio Warren, who ranks seventh in Division I-A in rushing with an average of 131 yards per game, didn't play in that game because of a sprained ankle.

Auburn plans one-day trip

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Availability of hotel rooms continues to be an issue for teams playing at Tiger Stadium.

Auburn coach Tommy Tuberville said he is assuming there won't be enough available when his team comes to Baton Rouge to play LSU on Oct. 22. Therefore, Auburn will make it a one-day trip.

Tuberville said the school has been assured there will be enough rooms, but that evacuees of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita and recovery workers continue to occupy rooms. Florida is flying in Friday, but is splitting its traveling party between 30 rooms in Baton rouge and 30 in Lafayette.

ARKANSAS: Running backs Darren McFadden and Felix Jones became the first pair of freshmen to rush for at least 100 yards in a game in Arkansas history.

They combined for 227 yards and four touchdowns in a 44-15 victory against Louisiana-Monroe. Jones is the second freshman to have two 100-yard games in a season. The first was quarterback Matt Jones in 2001.

GEORGIA: After playing third fiddle to Tennessee and Florida in preseason rankings, the No. 5 Bulldogs are in the driver's seat for the SEC East title.

The Bulldogs have the No. 1 offense in the Southeastern Conference, averaging 455.6 yards per game, seventh in the nation. Quarterback D.J. Shockley is the conference's No. 1 rated quarterback in passing efficiency.

KENTUCKY: The Wildcats are off this week, which is just as well.

At least the football team won't have to worry about being overshadowed by the start of basketball practice Friday. Midnight Madness never fails to draw large crowds.

OLE MISS: The Rebels offense hasn't had much to smile about, but one move has paid off.

Mico McSwain moved from safety to running back early in fall camp and has rushed for 391 yards in five games. He is averaging 7.5 yards per carry and is 11 yards behind the freshman mark of former Rebel Deuce McAllister, now with the Saints.

SOUTH CAROLINA: Syvelle Newton, a quarterback last season who moved to wide receiver this season, now might get a chance at tailback.

He practiced there this week after showing his running ability at quarterback against Kentucky on Saturday.

TENNESSEE: The Volunteers are seemingly out of the race for the SEC East title with losses to Florida and Georgia after being the preseason favorites to win the conference title.

"If I could sprinkle magic dust on it, heck, I'd fix it," Tennessee coach Phillip Fulmer said.

Making things worse, Jason Allen, Tennessee's best defensive back and an expected high draft pick, is out for the season with a dislocated hip suffered in the second quarter against Georgia.

Brady likes team's attitude

Young, talented Tigers ready to make impact in up-tempo scheme

Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Basketball practice hasn't started for LSU yet, but Tigers coach John Brady likes the way his team shows up.

Searching for an indicator from a team that will have seven freshmen and four players who have Division I experience, Brady proudly brings up the Sunday night gatherings.

"If I call a meeting at 6 p.m., they're in there sitting down at 5:45 p.m.," Brady said at Wednesday's media day. "These guys are there — early. They're eager."

"This is the best group in terms of their approach to the work, managing of their time this early and being receptive to what we want to do."

Brady likes what he sees, calling the enthusiasm the best of any of his teams to this point.

He'll get a more practical understanding of this year's team when it begins practice Saturday. LSU will try to build on last season, when the team earned its second NCAA berth in three years. The Tigers were eliminated in the first round after a miserable performance against UAB.

Despite being short on experience, the Tigers, who were 21-11 last season, will be one of the tallest and most athletically gifted teams Brady has fielded in his nine seasons at the helm. They lost SEC Player of the year Brandon Bass to the NBA, but return SEC Freshman of the Year Glen Davis and add potential impact freshman forward Tasmin Mitchell.

The Tigers will have to work around the absence of starting point guard Tack Minor, who is out until December because of a violation of academic policy. But Brady believes the team will develop playing the most difficult schedule of his tenure.

Players also notice something special about the prevailing attitude.

"Everybody is willing to learn, get better," said Davis. "That shows a lot about the team. All this summer, we've built a bond. We're building something strong. We're taking a serious approach."

Height and athleticism is something Brady hasn't had in abundance on the roster since the days of 7-footer Jabari Smith and 6-9 Stromile Swift. The Tigers have seven players 6-8 or taller, but it's not just the height that creates optimism. These are players that can run. Brady is hoping it translates into a swarming defense that can block shots and reach into passing lanes and deflect passes that the Tigers can turn into easy baskets.

Brady's teams usually play man-to-man defense, with enough zone thrown in to change the pace. But defense this season could evolve into something entirely different, with many players getting a chance to play.

"You'll see more of a wide open, sort of it-looks-like-we-haven't-practiced-defense-yet-we-have sort of thing because of the versatility of our guys," Brady said. "If we can extend the floor in our half-court defense, we're going to be able to touch some balls normally we may not have in the past."

WOMEN

Augustus focuses on lone remaining prize

By William Kalec
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — The "Old Lady" does as the photographer instructs, flashing the same Colgate smile Sports Illustrated used to introduce her to the world, way back in the day.

Hold the basketball — her scepter — up in the air like that, the cameraman says, as LSU's senior guard poses in the House that Pete built — but Seimone redesigned.

Rows upon rows of plush purple seats, fit for royalty but intended for a swelling season-ticket base, surround the necessary cog in Skip Bertman's grand experiment to turn women's basketball into the new baseball at LSU. Seimone Augustus, the backyard prodigy, has more than kept up her end of the lopsided agreement she signed four years ago, transforming an entire program and local public perception of an ignored sport, in exchange for a bachelor's degree she earned this summer.

But the youthful daydreams of filling the PMAC with multiple national championship banners gave way on LSU basketball media day — the first of many lasts — to the reality that Augustus has six months to win the lone piece of hardware missing from her case.

"The legacy, it's cemented with something that can't ever be replaced by people that win five, six, seven or eight championships. I think she's OK with that," LSU coach Pokey Chatman said. "But then there's the competitor in her that has a certain level of ability and has played a high level of basketball. Why the heck would you not want to win the ultimate prize?

"Would she feel like she's fallen short? I feel in the short-term, you always do. In the long-term I think she's smart enough to realize what she's done."

Post-bracket favorites to win the national title last March, LSU and Augustus exited again in the national semifinals, losing to eventual champion Baylor. Even without WNBA Rookie of the Year Temeka Johnson and interior players Tillie Willis, Wendlyn Jones and Crystal White, the Lady Tigers are a consensus Top 10 among preseason magazine polls (Athlon ranks LSU No. 1).

"That's the only thing on my mind right now," Augustus said of cutting down the nets in Boston. "I mean, I've received every accolade and I'm very appreciative of them, but if I could trade all that in to get a national championship I would. Because that means more to me.

"I think we've always had what it takes to be a national champion, we just have to pull it all together," Augustus said. "It's leadership. It's team chemistry. Bonding. Everything off-the-court as well as on-the court."

Don't expect Augustus to inherit occasional duties at point guard (as Connecticut's Diana Taurasi did when Sue Bird left), because in LSU's motion offense, as Chatman said, "everyone is a point guard."

Considering LSU plays every Final Four participant from last season and 2004 (UConn, Minnesota, Michigan State, Baylor and Tennessee) on its schedule, Augustus should have a fairly accurate barometer of where her story might end before the postseason begins.

"It's something I want to do before I leave, but if it doesn't happen, I mean, we've had a lot of exciting moments here and it wouldn't be a damper on what we've done here," Augustus said. "But it would put something else on my résumé — national championship."

Comets have what it takes to stay with Curtis

Attractive matchups dominant this week

LORI LYONS

Football fans in the River Parishes weren't exactly overjoyed when the Louisiana High School Athletic Association put John Curtis in District 10-2A.

The Patriots have dominated the state's prep football scene for decades, establishing itself as a football powerhouse. Since 1975, Curtis has won a state-record 19 football titles.

But over the years, the Patriots have also turned themselves into a prep pariah. Nobody wants Curtis — not in their classification, not in their district, perhaps not even on their field. The Patriots were placed in Class 2A last year after 4A principals voted not to allow them to play up in classification.

And that meant a trip to sugar cane country, where Donaldsonville, St. James and St. Charles awaited.

Curtis will head to the cane fields of LaPlace tonight with a 1-1 record to face St. Charles. Four of the Patriots' games had to be canceled because of Hurricane Katrina. On Sept. 30, what should have been their fifth playing date, the Patriots lost their season opener to East St. John 16-6. Last week, they pulled out a 27-21 victory against Choctawatchee High School of Fort Walton, Beach, Fla., 27-21.

Despite two hurricanes, an ever-changing schedule, an influx of displaced students from Orleans and Jefferson parishes and the coming and going of several displaced athletes, St. Charles has managed to remain undefeated this season. This week the Comets moved up to No. 2 in the Class 2A poll.

St. Charles has outscored its opponents 185-32. The offense is averaging 274 yards, and the defense is holding opponents to 117. Running back Chris Jones, who transferred from Rummel, rushed for 144 yards and three touchdowns last week. Receiver Casey Robottom has 24 catches for 398 yards and six touchdowns. He also has returned two kickoffs and a pair of punts for touchdowns.

No one has wanted to play against Curtis over the years, but this is a different season, and St. Charles can more than handle its own: St. Charles 35, Curtis 33.

This week's other games:

Destrehan 27, Assumption 24: The Wildcats have had to pull their past couple of victories out at the end.

East St. John 35, Ehret 27: Watch East St. John's Johnny Owen run.

West Jefferson 36, Hahnville 30: The Tigers couldn't stop Owen last week. They'll have trouble with Kevin Grant.

Lutcher 28, Holy Cross 24: The patched-together Tigers put together a great victory last week. But Lutcher is getting stronger every week.

Riverside 24, Donaldsonville 12: The Rebels will be flying high after last week's victory.

West St. John 28, St. John 27: If any team can beat the Eagles, it's this one.

Last week: 7-1. Season: 11-3.

Jesuit set to begin season

By Billy Turner
Staff writer

Jesuit, which went unbeaten in the regular season last year, finally will have a chance to do it again this football season.

The Blue Jays will begin a three-game season Oct. 22, when it plays against Holy Cross at Joe Yenni Stadium, according to Jesuit athletic director Frank Misuraca. The teams will play at 2 p.m.

Brother Martin also will return, with either one or two games. The Crusaders will play Jesuit on the final playing date, and Brother Martin athletic director Barry Hebert is trying to secure an opponent and a site for a game on the ninth playing date. The Crusaders will not be eligible for district honors.

Blue Jays football coach Vic Eumont was in California on Monday, preparing to return. His home in Lakeview was destroyed by flooding, as was all the material and files in his office at the school located on Banks Street.

"I guess I will live out of my car," Eumont said. "But it's important to give these kids a chance to play." Practice will begin Saturday or Sunday in the morning. Jesuit students will be attending St. Martin's from 4 p.m. to 10 p.m.

Eumont evacuated to Memphis with his wife when the storm came, but after seeing there was nothing left, went to California to stay with relatives.

Many of the Jesuit players have played at various locations. Danny Zimmerman, expected to be the starting quarterback, has been starting for Salmen.

Eumont said he has no idea which of his players will show up to practice, but he's sure he will have a smaller squad. Misuraca said he believed there were 38 players registered.

"They're scattered across the country," Eumont said.

Jesuit, part of District 8-5A, normally plays its home games at Tad Gormley Stadium. That stadium was flooded, so Misuraca scrambled to find places to play.

Other games scheduled include one against Rummel on Oct. 29 at 2 p.m. and one against Brother Martin on Nov. 5 at 10 a.m. Both will be at Joe Yenni Stadium.

Jesuit's swimming team, which has won multiple state championships, began practicing Monday and will compete in the state championships in November. Jesuit cross country runners will compete for state honors as well.

Basketball will be a problem because the gym floor buckled badly, according to Misuraca. "We will be looking for a place to practice and play games for the coming year."

Hebert said the Crusaders' football coaching staff, including head coach Wayde Keiser and whomever is teaching at the transition site at Baton Rouge-Catholic, where the Brother Martin students will be until the school opens on Jan. 17, will coach the team.

"We're just trying to give the kids an opportunity to play a couple games in their Brother Martin uniforms," Hebert said. "We're doing (this) for the kids, trying to have some fun."

DOGGED DETERMINATION

Brother Martin's Andy Florek has not let misfortune alter his course toward getting a state cross country title

By Pierce W. Huff
Staff writer

In the world of Brother Martin cross country runner Andy Florek nothing means more than meticulous training and winning the next race.

When Hurricane Katrina slammed the Gulf South, forcing Florek and his family to relocate twice, Florek still trained. He ran through the parks and streets of Houma and Baton Rouge to keep himself in shape.

And when Brother Martin competed in its first meet of the season two weeks ago, Florek was there, sprinting to a first-place finish that led the Crusaders to the team championship.

This is shaping up to be Brother Martin's year, with Florek cast in the lead role.

In a way, Florek has the season set up just the way he wants it.

Katrina didn't hinder Florek; in many ways it strengthened him. It was terrible experience when his family home received an inch of water in the garage and wind damage. And it was an inconvenience when his family relocated twice, but the time away from New Orleans allowed Florek the chance to concentrate more on his running.

"The storm opened my eyes a lot," Florek said. "It made me tough and hard. It made me mentally tough, because I had to make myself run on my own."

Katrina showed him that his training regimen was sound enough to handle any distraction. He kept on running, more than 30 miles a week with varying paces on different days.

Florek began the season by winning the St. Joseph's Invitational in Baton Rouge with a three-mile time of 15 minutes, 57 seconds. Last weekend, he finished second, but set a school record with a time of 15:15 at the Baton Rouge-Catholic Invitational.

Brother Martin coach Dennis Panepinto said the strong finish created a day of mixed emotions for Florek.

"On one hand he had the best time in Brother Martin history, and on the other hand he lost," Panepinto said.

Florek returns to training this week. His goal is to break the 15-minute barrier.

Panepinto, who has worked with Florek since the runner was an eighth-grader, knows that Florek will work hard enough to achieve anything he desires.

"He was a little kid jumping up and down and getting in my face when I first started working with him," Panepinto said. "I call little, young guys here puppies because they're always jumping around, but by the time they get to be seniors they get to be big dogs."

That's what Florek has become, Panepinto said.

Brother Martin cross country runner Andy Florek said his continued training in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina helped strengthen his mental toughness.

Place: Joe Yenni Stadium.

Last week: Bonnabel defeated Fisher 20-7. Riverdale lost to Ridgewood 32-8.

Last year: Did not play.

Notable: This is a non-district game. Three Bruins' players who had transferred to East St. John have returned to Bonnabel. Riverdale's William Lee scored the Rebels' touchdown last week on a pass reception.

WHERE Y'AT?

Catching up with metro-area athletes displaced by Hurricane Katrina

By Billy Turner
Staff writer

They were so happy, genuinely happy, to be on the cover of the Orleans Parish edition of The Times-Picayune high school football section.

The bold type spoke volumes for these guys: "Ascending Order," read the headline.

This was their year. This was their time.

On the cover were McDonogh 35's center Rashad Williams, guard Julius Nero, guard Justin Francois, guard Charles Stevens and tight end Derrick Johnson, but it also could have included tackle William Walker, guard Josh Keelen and guard Quincy Hooks.

The picture could also have included standout players and college prospects such as Ronald Cousin or running backs Alfred Reese, son of head coach Wayne Reese, and John Donald.

"I really feel like we were going to be one of the best (Class) 4A teams around," Wayne Reese said.

Reese, who had coached for more than two decades in the metro area, called them the best group he ever had. The players were big: Walker tipped the scales at 300 pounds. They were athletic: Nero at 6 feet 3, 265 pounds was exceedingly quick. They were smart: all had grade-point averages 2.9 or better.

The players talked about the opportunity they had as they approached, for most of them, their senior season. McDonogh 35, which finished 7-3 last season was picked to win its district after being moved to Class 4A, had never received as much attention; it was the school's first cover story.

The cover story was published Thursday, Aug. 25. By Saturday, the players were evacuated. On Monday, Aug. 29, Hurricane Katrina hit. McDonogh 35's dream season was gone, as was its players.

The players are scattered. Walker is playing in Maryland, Keelen is at Istrouma, Nero in Houston, Williams at a military school in New Jersey and Hooks is at Scotlandville Magnet.

McDonogh 35 also has four players at Southern Lab, including Reese's son, and Cousin. Southern Lab was winless until the McDonogh 35 kids arrived.

"They're all doing well," Wayne Reese said. "The problem is all our kids were taking prep courses for college. Some of those wouldn't transfer. But they're all doing well, all playing."

MORE AT LAB: Four St. Augustine football players are attending Southern Lab. Strong safety/linebacker Chad Jones, receiver Shelby Skipper, offensive lineman Rishaw Johnson and quarterback Eric Rogers have been playing for Southern Lab the past four weeks.

Jones, a 6-foot-3, 180-pound junior, has started four games.

"Chad is basically a kid who has all of the material that you need to be a star," Southern Lab coach Michael Roach said. Johnson, a 6-4, 295-pound junior, has started on the offensive line.

Skipper, a 5-6, 145-pound senior, doesn't start, but he is one of the players in Southern Lab's receiver rotation. Rogers, a 6-foot, 175-pound senior, is a backup quarterback and played in his first game last week.

Southern Lab (2-3, 0-1 District 7-1A) will travel to play Northlake Christian on Friday at Southeastern Louisiana University's Strawberry Stadium.

TEXAS EPISCOPAL: Episcopal High in Houston has several metro-area athletes, including five football players. Newman's Doug Prechter, brothers Bryan and Michael Poppler, and Country Day's Cooper Johnston and Matt Stone are at Episcopal. Stone is the starting quarterback. He inherited the job when Episcopal's quarterback suffered a knee injury at the beginning of the season. Newman assistant coach Nowell Hesse has joined the Episcopal junior-varsity football coaching staff.

MORE NEWMAN: Two other Newman players are in the Houston area. Hunter Freiberg is playing for St. John's of Houston, and Robbie Evans is at Stratford. Closer to home, Newman's Alex Adams and Andy Lass are playing for St. Martin's, which opens its season Saturday against Ridgewood.

AROUND THE HORN: Three Brother Martin baseball players have relocated. Center fielder Phillip Freeman is at Captain Shreve, pitcher Andrew Valez is at Dutchtown and shortstop Ryan Hebert is at Denham Springs. Crusaders wide receiver Casey Moriarity is at St. Charles, which plays John Curtis on Friday. . . . Shaw wide receiver Josh Hill, attending St. Piux X in Houston, caught six passes for 138 yards in his first game at the school.

*(Editor's note: The Times-Picayune is running a weekly notebook on metro area student-athletes displaced by the storm who are now competing at schools around the state or nation. # Damage to courses called 'catastrophic' and wind. There has even been some informal discussion of moving the Zurich Classic of New Orleans away from the TPC in the event that if the tract is not ready for the 2006 event.

And the Joe Bartholomew Golf Course, which was set to reopen in Pontchartrain Park after several months of renovation, was under water and its status is unknown. Compounding the problem at Bartholomew is that it was operated by the city, and Mayor Ray Nagin announced last week the layoff of 3,000 employees.

"There will be a big change in the local golfing scene," said Dennis McGrail, the director of golf at English Turn Golf and Country Club. "We're all taking a big hit because it hit during September. That's one of the biggest months for everybody, and we lost that revenue."

But there is good news. English Turn is scheduled to open its back nine in the middle of October and the full 18 in November. Audubon Golf Club is scheduled to open Nov. 5, and Colonial Country Club opened Saturday.

"The course fared well and is in great shape," said Colonial head pro Steve Schmitt.

Courses in surrounding areas, including Ormond Country Club, Belle Terre Country Club, Abita Springs Golf and Country Club, Royal Golf Club, Timberlane and Willowdale Country Clubs already have opened.

Pinewood Country Club, a semi-private facility, opened the back nine this past Saturday. Head pro James Leitz said he hopes to have the front nine open within a month.

The shelving of Bayou Oaks and Eastover by Katrina may have the most significant impact on the community. Bayou Oaks was the largest public golf facility in the area, and Eastover was the most popular site for charity golf tournaments that raised millions of dollars for local nonprofit organizations. Losing those courses removes 90 holes from the city's golfing inventory, the equivalent of five courses in an area already noted for its shortage of public golfing facilities.

"This may be a blessing for some courses," Brown said. "The attrition of the facilities hopefully will match the attrition of the population. The golfers that played at City Park or Eastover will want to play golf. So they will have to go to other facilities."

The outer roof of the clubhouse has blown off and the grass has died at the Golf Club of New Orleans at Eastover, the city's most popular host of charity golf tournaments that raised millions of dollars for local nonprofit organizations.

Clubhouse ruined

Digby termed the damage to Bayou Oaks "catastrophic."

"The clubhouse is ruined, the maintenance equipment is ruined, and the carts are ruined," he said. He added that the 200 carts housed in the cart shed cost $3,700 each. The storm also moved a 10,000-gallon fuel tank 100 yards from its site. Digby said Kemper has furloughed all of its approximately 100 employees that worked at the course, and has been actively assisting them in finding other employment.

"Even if we could get the debris cleared up and get trailers to operate out of, we don't have anybody to do anything," said Bob Becker, executive director of City Park. Becker added the park has laid off 90 percent of its employees, reducing a workforce of approximately 235 employees to 15.

He said he is encouraged by grass growing into some of the flooded areas of the course. Digby said before any of the three courses could reopen, it would have to be cleared of downed trees, and some of the greens would have to be rebuilt. The fairways also would have to be resprigged.

"We would like to get at least one course open, but I don't know how we could do that," Becker said. "We have no staff or equipment. We can't do anything."

Digby said if money was available to complete the work and buy equipment, at least one of the courses could be open by June.

Even when Bayou Oaks is able to rebuild, some question remains as to how many courses will reopen. Digby and Becker agree that decision will be mandated by the population that returns to the Crescent City. Already this year, City Park closed the South Course because of a lack of play.

"If we lose 100,000 people, do we really need 54 holes?" Digby said. "We just don't know, and it's too early to tell."

Becker said the future of Bayou Oaks and the park lies with FEMA.

"If we get the funding, we really have the opportunity to upgrade the courses," he said. "If we don't get the money, there won't be anybody at City Park."

The situation at Eastover may be equally as dire. Jimmy Headrick, the former head pro who was laid off after spending 18 years at the eastern New Orleans facility, said the course sustained substantial damage from flood waters, which rose from the two canals that knife their way through the 36-hole layout.

He said the canals empty into Lake Pontchartrain, and when the lake backed up, so did the canals, flooding the golf course, cart shed and clubhouse with more than eight feet of water.

Jay Maumus, Eastover's tournament director, said the club hosted 238 tournaments last year, raising more than a combined $1 million for local charitable organizations. He said the annual Child's Wish tournament was scheduled for September, and that added an estimated $75,000 to the agency's coffers.

The Cystic Fibrosis tournament, hosted annually by Archie Manning, raised more than $100,000 from its annual event.

"It's going to take a big chunk out of the budgets of some of the charities," Maumus said. "There's no inflection of money. And all of the money that was raised in the tournaments stayed local. It's a real big hit to the charities because it was a major part of the fund-raising for some of them."

Pate said the course will welcome back the charity tournaments and added the facility will be less dependent on the tourism/convention industry. He also said approximately $2 million will be spent refurbishing the original 18 holes, and that the land used for the extra nine holes for the Teeth of the Gator and Rabbit courses will be sold for residential development.

Personnel concerns

Even when some of the courses reopen, they may face other challenges in staffing and attracting play. Some courses already have laid off their staffs, and others have lost staff members to relocation or more lucrative jobs in the construction industry throughout the area.

Leitz of Pinewood said his staff has dwindled to him and his 21-year-old son, who are cutting the grass and clearing debris.

"I think many courses are going to have to rely on volunteers to help around the course," said Leitz, who added the course lost more than 600 of its signature trees. "We'll all be stretched financially."

There's also the question of the city's population, as displaced residents begin to move back. Additionally, the ability to rebuild the city's tourism industry also will have a direct impact on the future of the area's golf courses.

"We have a lot of concerns about the immediate future," English Turn's McGrail said. "It depends on our local leaders and politicians and their plans to rebuild the city. I don't know if a rebuilt New Orleans will be more attractive to those who want to play golf. New Orleans was never a big golfing destination to begin with."

Despite the concern, most agree that the future looks bright for the golfing community and the New Orleans area.

"The city is not going anywhere," Becker said. "The heart of the city's economy survived. It will be a different place in many ways. It's a great opportunity to build a great city and correct some of our problems. But if you're not optimistic, then you should get out."

Post-Katrina retail

Welcome to the new post-Katrina retail market. As retailers in Uptown New Orleans slowly reopen their doors, it's clear that businesses are focusing on providing what their customers need most. At the Winn-Dixie on Tchoupitoulas Street, large displays of AM/FM radios, bleach, brooms and other cleaning supplies were grouped near the front of the store. Cases of bottled water were stacked near each checkout station.

Business center opens

What's being called the first business recovery center in the New Orleans area has opened in Metairie. The office, which helps hurricane-whacked businesses to get back on their feet, will be staffed with representatives from the U.S. Small Business Administration, the Louisiana Insurance Commission, the Jefferson Parish Economic Development Commission and small business development centers along with some accountants and others. The center is at 5210 West Esplanade and is open weekdays from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. It is sponsored by JEDCO, Jefferson Parish, the Jefferson Parish Business Council and the Jefferson Chamber of Commerce.

Tree damage estimated

Forestry experts and leaders in the industry say preliminary estimates of the economic devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina exceed $600 million in timber damage and reduced prices for damaged trees. The Louisiana State University AgCenter estimates that more than 50 percent of the trees in some of the parishes in southeast Louisiana were damaged by Hurricane Katrina. They also say that only about 30 percent of those trees will be salvaged. "The hurricane damaged many large valuable trees in southeastern Louisiana," said AgCenter forest products specialist Todd Shupe. "Now, many of these valuable trees will likely sell at pulpwood prices — a fraction of their previous value."

Storm contracts landed

Trussco Inc., the environmental unit of Carencro-based Omni Energy Services Corp., has been retained by various oil and gas companies operating in the Gulf of Mexico to assist in environmental cleanup resulting from hurricane-related oil spills. Trussco work crews have also completed work on the New Orleans Arena and should begin work on the Superdome over the next few days.

Oil activity updated

McMoRan Exploration Co. said Wednesday that its Long Point exploratory well on Louisiana State Lease 18090, located onshore in Vermilion Parish, has been drilled to 19,000 feet. The Long Point site is one of five prospects McMoRan is actively exploring. The others are JB Mountain Deep at South Marsh Island Block 224; Cane Ridge at Louisiana State Lease 18055; Elizabeth at South Marsh Island Block 230; and Cabin Creek at West Cameron Block 95.

Major office towers opening as repairs are completed

By Greg Thomas
Real estate writer

Although it appears the New Orleans area's major office towers were devastated by Hurricane Katrina, several of them are open, and even some heavily damaged buildings are expected to open by mid-November.

For example, the Galleria in Metairie, with hundreds of windows and some of its siding ripped away by the storm's winds, is expected to open Nov. 14, said Mike Campbell, general manager of the Feil Organization . Occupancy at the Galleria was 97 percent at the time of the storm, he said, and he "has not heard of one tenant that does not plan to return."

Meanwhile, Place St. Charles on St. Charles Avenue has opened, though tenants are just starting to trickle in, said Mike Siegel of Corporate Realty, which manages and leases the building as well as being headquartered there.

Hibernia National Bank recently announced plans to move into nine floors of Place St. Charles, one of the largest lease deals in recent years, and Siegel said he didn't think the storm would delay the move.

Also open is Canal Place, despite a fire at the mall during Katrina's aftermath. The office tower was unaffected by it, said Siegel of Corporate Realty, which manages the property.

The World Trade Center at Canal and Poydras streets opened Wednesday.

Joe Rault said the Xerox Center at 2400 Veterans Memorial Blvd. in Kenner had some roof damage and moisture intrusions but is open and tenants are returning.

Work to repair Hurricane Katrina damage is under way at the former Amoco Building at 1340 Poydras St. on Wednesday. Sandra Corrigan, senior vice president of Regis Realty, which manages and leases the building, said the property is being secured with plywood. It lost hundreds of windows during the storm.

Orleans home closings still stalled after Katrina

Computer part needed for work to arrive today

By Greg Thomas

Home sales still cannot be completed in Orleans Parish, despite ongoing efforts by officials to relocate the archive, mortgage and conveyance departments from the flooded basement of the Orleans Parish Civil District Courthouse to the Convention Center.

The demon this time is a missing computer part needed to connect the recorder of mortgages' computers to a main server of the Civil District Court at its temporary location on Worth Street in Gonzales. The part, ordered last week, is expected to arrive today. Employees are planning to work over the weekend and hope to have the computer system up on Monday.

Realtors and others estimate that hundreds of sales are in limbo until the computers are working and the books set up.

WASHINGTON — One of the two major competitors to build the next era of American space vehicles unveiled its design model Wednesday, and it looks a lot like NASA's old Apollo spacecraft.

But executives with Northrop Grumman Corp. and the Boeing Co., which are putting together a joint proposal to NASA, said that their Crew Exploration Vehicle benefits from significant technological advances not available for the old Apollo program. The new spacecraft is scheduled to take astronauts and payloads to the international space station by 2012 and

Boats slipping tether of N.O.

Paddlewheelers will sail in B.R., Memphis

By Rebecca Mowbray
Business writer

The three paddlewheelers of the Delta Queen Steamboat Co. will resume carrying passengers on vacations on American waterways in April and May, but they won't be leaving from New Orleans, at least for awhile.

The storied Delta Queen steamboat, National Historic Landmark, will begin operating from Baton Rouge on April 21, and will be joined by the American Queen paddlewheeler in Baton Rouge on May 31. Their sister boat, the Mississippi Queen, will begin operating out of Memphis, Tenn., on April 23, as it normally does in the spring.

But Bruce Nierenberg, president of the New Orleans company, which operates river cruise vacations that appeal to upscale retirees, said the Baton Rouge itineraries don't mean the vessels are gone for good.

"That's strictly just to get the boats back to service," Nierenberg said. "We didn't know what the New Orleans availability would be. We know that they can operate out of Baton Rouge, so we scheduled that first cruise from there."

Since Hurricane Katrina, about 60 people from the company's administration have been working out of the Buffalo, N.Y., headquarters of the Delta Queen's parent company, the Delaware North Cos. Inc. In a press release, the company characterized this move as "indefinite."

Another 15 people who work in marine, hotel and technical operations have been working in Memphis, because two of the Delta Queen vessels sail fall voyages in that region. Some 400 to 500 employees continue to work on the boats.

About 50 to 75 people who were not able to move with the company to Buffalo were laid off at the end of last month, Nierenberg said.

The temporary move to Buffalo marks a new chapter for the Delta Queen Steamboat Co., which shut down in bankruptcy in 2001 after its previous owner failed in a bid to expand the company and move it to Florida. Delaware North bought the business at a bankruptcy court auction in 2002 and resuscitated it in New Orleans. In 2000, the threat of losing the iconic Delta Queen, as well as a

Greg Riera, head of leasing for Jones, Lang, LaSalle Americas Inc., said 1555 Poydras St. and 1515 Poydras St. will open today. Both buildings sustained some flooding but little other damage.

The storm has only somewhat slowed the move of Tulane School of Medicine into the nearly 200,000 square feet of space at 1555 Poydras, one of the largest and most significant leases inked earlier this year, Riera said.

The Dominion Tower, on the other hand, may be the slowest building to reopen. It sits next to the Superdome, and debris that flew from the stadium caused significant damage to the property.

Judah Hertz of the Hertz Investment Group said Dominion's exterior has been sealed but that repair estimates for the interior are beginning. Hertz would not say when the property would be ready.

Hertz also owns Poydras Center, the Texaco Building and the LL&E Building, all on Poydras Street. Hertz said LL&E, which had roof damage and lost ground-floor windows, "is targeted to open next week." He said the Texaco Building will open the following week and Poydras Center the week after that.

One Lakeway, Two Lakeway and Three Lakeway, the mirrored office properties facing Lake Pontchartrain in Metairie at the foot of the Causeway, sustained much the same kind of damage as most other high-rises in the city. But leasing manager Bruce Sossoman said One Lakeway will open Monday. No exact date for opening Two or Three Lakeway has been firmed up. He said all three buildings would be in full service by Nov. 15. Three Lakeway, the tallest of the three buildings at 34 stories, lost more than 100 windows, the most damage of any of the buildings.

Adding to the good news, Sossoman said occupancy was at 90 percent before Katrina and that since then, many small tenants have signed leases to move in, which will raise its occupancy to 95 percent.

The Pan-American Life Insurance Building on Poydras, from the street, appears intact, but it did sustain some damage to its roof, said its director of corporate marketing, Tom Richert. Though the company has temporarily relocated to Dallas and Baton Rouge, its marketing and sales team will return to Poydras Street at the end of the month.

Technically, the building is open, Richert said, and a plan to phase in other tenants, including the balance of Pan-Am employees, is being discussed now.

The Freeport-McMoRan Building at 1615 Poydras St., which is owned by Stewart Capital, also appears unscathed from the street but did take on some moisture. The building is closed, and officials were unavailable for comment late Wednesday.

Representatives of the Energy Centre on Poydras Street, owned by IPS REIT of Toronto, could not be reached for comment late Wednesday. Several real estate specialists said the building appears to be in good shape.

At 1250 Poydras St., leasing manager Bill Moody said contractors think repairs could be wrapped up in two weeks. Asked if tenants are planning to return, he said, "It's a mixed bag." He could not give a date when the building would open.

At 1340 Poydras St., formerly the Amoco Building, Sandra Corrigan, senior vice president of Regis Realty, which manages and leases the building, said the property is being secured with plywood. It lost hundreds of windows.

She anticipates that tenants will be allowed to move back within two weeks, although many will have to tolerate plywood over the windows.

Hundreds of shelves installed in office

RECORDS, from C-11

Stephen Bruno, New Orleans' custodian of historical records, scrambled to find space for his office and that of Recorder of Mortgages Desiree Charbonnet and Register of Conveyances Gasper Schiro at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center in the immediate wake of the storm.

Hundreds of metal and wooden shelves have been installed in the Convention Center-based office, which is located next to the Riverwalk parking lot. Those shelves will hold the books abstractors use to research the ownership of properties before real estate sales can close. This research is used to prove that properties being sold do not have liens or existing mortgages on them.

The mortgage and conveyance offices are somewhat computerized, with mortgage records back to 1987 and conveyance records back to 1985 searchable by computer.

Without the computers, no abstract work can be performed and no deals can go to closing.

Munters, a document restoration firm, retrieved the real estate records from the offices and used 17 refrigerated trucks to freeze dry them and transport them to Boston.

Deputy Register of Conveyances Donald Gunaldo said that Munters has said the conveyance books should return Nov. 18 and the conveyance office should be "fully functional by Nov. 24." The three departments opened Monday for intake of documents. These included some purchase agreements and commercial leases, but none involved large transfers or lease transactions.

Negotiations are ongoing to permanently relocate all three offices at 1340 Poydras St., but that office building was seriously damaged by Katrina's high winds, resulting in hundreds of broken windows and water intrusion.

Real estate records in Jefferson, St. Charles and St. Tammany parishes were not damaged in the storms and are open for searches. The St. Bernard records, though not available for searches, are intact.

Vessels helping in relief operations

proposed merger between Entergy Corp. and Florida Power & Light Co., jump-started a move to make New Orleans more business friendly.

But Nierenberg said the move to Buffalo shouldn't signal anything about the company's future. "We don't know. That's why we used the word 'indefinite,' " he said on the phone from Buffalo. "New Orleans is a great place to run a business. The only reason to be here is that we couldn't be there."

Gary LaGrange, president and chief executive of the Port of New Orleans, where the Delta Queen Steamboat Co. rents office space, said he's not overly concerned. "I'm not going to press any panic buttons. We have no reason to believe they won't come back," LaGrange said.

In the meantime, Nierenberg is putting his vessels into service to help with the relief efforts.

The American Queen has been chartered by an energy company to house workers through March. The vessel, which normally travels on inland waterways, sailed into the Gulf of Mexico for the first time and docked at a location along the Gulf Coast that's kept secret because of Department of Homeland Security regulations. To sail the paddlewheeler into the ocean, the vessel was retrofitted to make it more seaworthy, then it hugged the coast in churning to its destination.

Delaware North also is negotiating private and government charters for the Delta Queen and Mississippi Queen from December through March.

"If New Orleans doesn't come back, I don't know how I'm going to come back," Nierenberg said.

Michoud to work on Lockheed prototype

back to the moon by 2018.

The Northrop Grumman/Boeing design is of more than passing interest to New Orleans because Lockheed Martin Corp.'s Space Systems unit is the other major competitor for the new space vehicles. If it is the winning contractor, Lockheed Space Systems might well do at least a portion of the work, if not the major construction, at the Michoud Assembly Plant in New Orleans. The company already has said it will build much of a prototype of the vehicle at the local plant.

Potential sites for development of the new spacecraft under Northrop Grumman/Boeing could include facilities in California, Houston, central Florida and Huntsville, Ala.

Leonard Nicholson, the Northrop Grumman/Boeing team's deputy program manager, said that though it's too early to project costs, or personnel decisions, he would expect whatever management team wins the final NASA contract to rely on the "expertise" of workers who put together components of the shuttle program. The shuttle system, which has relied on Michoud for external fuel tanks, is being phased out to make way for the new crew exploration vehicles.

Though similar in appearance to the Apollo spacecraft that lifted astronauts to the moon in the late 1960s and early 1970s, the model for the new spacecraft put together by Northrop Grumman/Boeing teams is nothing like "your father's Apollo" in terms of capacity and safety features, according to Doug Young, the program manager.

Though only slightly heavier, the proposed spacecraft will carry up to twice as many astronauts as the three that traveled on Apollo and carry substantially more fuel, allowing for longer space missions. The design, according to Young, incorporates redundant features allowing for the safe return of astronauts even in the case of serious system failures.

The spacecraft, according to NASA specifications, must be designed so that it could be used for both manned and unmanned missions.

Young said the expanded capability is all because of major advances in technology.

"Look back 12 or 15 years at what we carried around for music, like a Sony Walkman; you had 14 songs on a tape, and now we got iPods with hundreds of songs that are a 10th the size," Young said.

Lockheed executives are expected to discuss their design efforts for the new NASA spacecraft in the next several days, according to company spokesmen.

Karen Edwards was prepared to give up her home of 27 years. Before she returned Monday to her house in Little Woods, at the far edge of eastern New Orleans, she resigned herself to the terrible possibility that she might have to let go and live elsewhere.

Her neighbor warned her when she arrived: "You don't want to go in." The one-story, brick-and-wallboard house had been filled with a few feet of floodwater, and the damage was considerable. But after a couple days, Edwards had steeled her resolve to rebuild.

"I'm getting used to it," she said. "Now there is some hope."

Eastern New Orleans, which contains 67 percent of the land in Orleans Parish and about 20 percent of its population, is among the areas hit hardest by Hurricane Katrina. The community was extensively flooded and the ruin of its neighborhoods is so thorough that many residents have nothing left to salvage. But some are eager to repopulate.

"We plan to clean it up and see what happens," Clarence Edwards said. "What we can do, we'll do."

Karen Edwards, who grew up in the Lower 9th Ward and witnessed Hurricane Betsy's havoc as a teen, said she is emotionally attached to her house on Forum Avenue.

Tim Brown, 47, holds a wedding photo he salvaged from his Bullard Avenue home. Residents were not permitted access into eastern New Orleans until Oct. 5.

"This is our house," she said. "It's the only home we've ever owned." She glanced down at her collection of decorative eggs, spilled from their shelves across the floor. Her sons' graduation photos hung on the wall: young men in robes smiling from stages at LSU and McDonogh 35 High School.

The Edwardses, temporarily displaced to Clinton, Md., said they are frustrated by a lack of information from city officials and the slow recovery of the area's infrastructure. Residents were not permitted access into eastern New Orleans until Oct. 5; the area lacks water and

Hospital deaths to be probed by Foti

Reports of euthanasia spark investigation

By John Pope
Staff writer

Based on allegations that Memorial Medical Center doctors considered putting frail patients to death in the first days after Hurricane Katrina, state Attorney General Charles Foti has ordered an investigation of all hospital and nursing home deaths after the storm.

In response to a request from Foti, Orleans Parish Coroner Frank Minyard said he has supervised autopsies of 35 Memorial Medical Center patients at the temporary morgue at St. Gabriel.

The procedures include tests for narcotics such as morphine that could be used to put people to death. The test kits were shipped to a Pennsylvania laboratory for processing, and Minyard said he does not know when the results will arrive.

Kris Wartelle, a Foti spokeswoman, said the investigation is expected to be finished in two weeks.

The bodies of 45 people were removed from the hospital. Of those, 11 people had been in the hospital morgue before the storm, and 34 people, most of them weak patients in a long-

WASHINGTON — If investigators find that design flaws caused the failures of New Orleans canal floodwalls during Hurricane Katrina, fixing the problem could delay the restoration of the levee system to its pre-storm strength, pushing work into the next hurricane season, Army Corps of Engineers chief Carl Strock said Thursday.

"If what we are talking about is putting levees back at the same elevations, putting floodwalls back at the same elevations but perhaps with different foundations, I still think it's conceivably possible" to finish by the June 2006 target date, Strock said.

"If we find that the entire foundation of the 17th Street Canal or London Avenue Canal is suspect, and we have to go and do a massive rebuilding of BATON ROUGE — With 65,000 people leaving emergency shelters in the past two weeks across the country, President Bush is nearing his goal of emptying the barracks-style accommodations by Saturday.

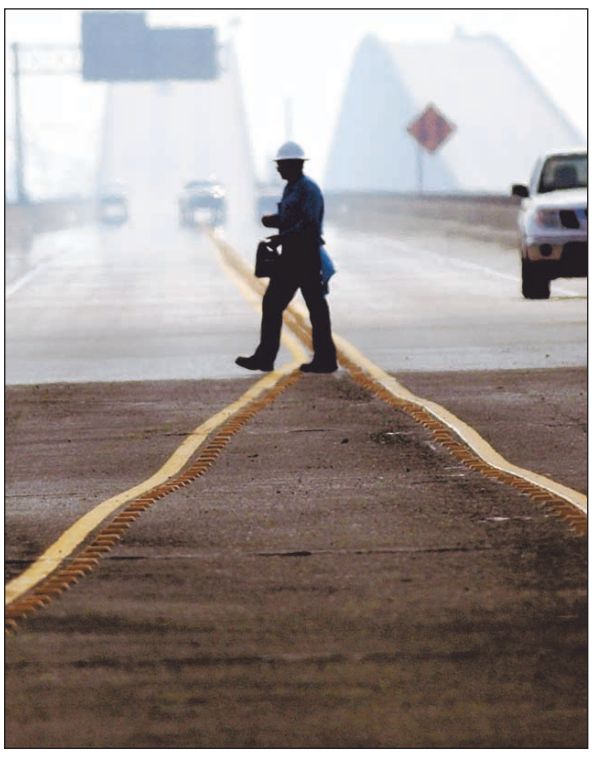
What is less clear, especially in Louisiana, is how many people have been able to get into a permanent home and begin the task of rebuilding their lives after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Statistics from the American Red Cross show that many people are still in temporary housing, with roughly 600,000 hurricane victims living in hotel rooms across the country as of Wednesday, with the Federal Emergency Management Agency picking up the tab.



In Baton Rouge, volunteers and operators at the shelters that are remaining open report that about six weeks after Hurricane Katrina hit the New Orleans area, they still get daily calls from people looking for places to stay. Some of these evacuees are trying to get back to New Orleans from other states, while others need to move because their shelter is closing.

"I had more calls over the weekend than since the hurricane first started," said Jane Peterson, a volunteer who has been helping run a small shelter at the Antioch Family Church in suburban Baton Rouge.

Even if people do have roofs over their heads, critics of the federal and state housing policies after the storms said that officials need to start focusing on finding better — and in many cases cheaper — solutions.

"Until you have a place to stay, you can't create any sense of rebuilding your lives and of healing," said Jim Kelly, chief executive officer of Catholic Charities in New Orleans.

Interstate 10 traffic over Lake Pontchartrain resumes today, after construction to restore one of the twin bridges wraps up ahead of schedule.

The former eastbound bridge between New Orleans and Slidell will open to two-way traffic between 3 and 4 p.m. after Boh Brothers Construction crews complete final safety checks and lane markings, said Mark Lambert, spokesman for the state Department of Transportation and Development.

The speed limit will be 50 mph. Westbound vehicles must merge onto the bridge near the lakeshore in Slidell, then cut back over to the westbound interstate lanes when they reach eastern New Orleans.

Hurricane Katrina's tidal surge battered both spans, leaving the westbound bridge in worse shape. The transportation department asked Boh Brothers to restore the less-damaged span to two-way traffic by Oct. 31.

Project supervisor John Horn said crews had to reposition 171 of the eastbound bridge's 433 sections that shifted up to 5 feet but remained atop support pilings. Another 39 sections that

Companies flood Washington with lobbyists

Many seek role in rebuilding of Gulf Coast

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Hurricane evacuees aren't the only ones looking to the government for assistance these days. A long line of private companies has formed at the door of the U.S. Capitol, some seeking help getting back in business after Katrina and others trying to land contracts to deal with the destruction or to participate in the rebuilding.

The crush has created a boom for Washington lobbyists experienced at getting the ears of key policymakers and navigating the labyrinths of federal agencies.

"We see this after every major disaster or tragedy," said Larry Noble, executive director of the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics. "People are putting forward their wish lists and saying it's all connected to the hurricane. We saw it after 9/11. Everyone was saying then that it was national security."

With Congress busy writing a tax-relief bill designed to boost businesses along the Gulf Coast, companies and lobbyists are jostling for position to get their voices heard.

Capital One Corp. is part of a coalition of banks and investment firms that have long pushed Congress for tax credits to kick-start construction projects in the name of "community development." With New Orleans looking to rebuild after Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita, the group saw a fresh opportunity to push its cause. To help, Capital One hired the Cypress Group, a Washington lobbying firm that employs Patrick Cave, former aide to Rep. Richard Baker, R-Baton Rouge, a senior member of the House Committee on Financial Services.

Some companies in the storm-battered Gulf states have hired lobbyists just to guide them through unfamiliar Washington terrain.

A familiar face

Pat Ryan, chief operating officer of Southern Recycling, has been trying to buy some of the scrap metal mixed in with the tons of debris left in wake of the two storms, but he hasn't been able to get the attention of the Army Corps of Engineers, which is overseeing debris removal. So he hired someone who used to oversee the corps: former Rep. Bob Livingston of Louisiana.

As chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Livingston set the corps budget for years in the 1990s. Now, as a Washington lobbyist, Livingston has an insiders' understanding of how to get the corps' attention.

"Part of the whole problem is knowing who to talk to to get something done," Ryan said. "We were looking for someone to tell our story."

Andrew Leveris, president and CEO of Dow Chemical Co., didn't need a lobbyist to tell his hurricane story to senators. He was invited to testify about his company's post-hurricane concerns last week.

Dow's Louisiana operations weathered the storms. So Leveris used his testimony before the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee to press for more offshore drilling for natural gas, a cause that gas-powered industrial plants championed long before Katrina and Rita damaged production facilities in the Gulf of Mexico.

"If prices remain at or near current levels, manufacturers will be driven out of the market, and many may not return," Leveris said.

Entergy seeks help

At the same hearing, Entergy Corp. Vice President Curtis Hebert predicted dire consequences if Congress didn't help bail out the utility: a doubling of electric rates in New Orleans. Entergy's New Orleans operation filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection last month after losing 123,000 customers to the storm and facing more than $1.5 billion in damage.

The company is looking for a financial bailout much like Congress gave to the airline industry after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. It would also like to get a slice of the $60 billion Congress gave to the Federal Emergency Management Agency for relief and recovery efforts. But a federal law, the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief Act, prohibits payments to investor-owned companies such as Entergy.

Entergy urged Sens. Mary Landrieu, D-La., and David Vitter, R-La., to include a waiver of the Stafford Act in the hurricane-relief bill they were writing. So did CLECO, a central Louisiana power company that sustained $126 million in damage in the two storms. CLECO hired Adams & Reese, a Washington lobbying firm that employs the wife of Vitter's chief of staff. Entergy spokesman Morgan Stewart said no special connections were necessary to get the senators to include the waiver in their bill. He said the company was invited to submit suggestions.

"We've had a great relationship with them for a long time," Stewart said.

With dozens of hurricane-related bills filed over the past month, some companies have instructed their lobbyists to keep an eye out for those that can help or hurt their businesses.

The Gulf South Pipeline Co. is especially worried about any plans to move or alter the levees in metropolitan New Orleans because it has miles of oil and gas pipelines buried inside. If the pipelines have to be moved, the company would likely look to Congress to help pay the bill.

In the short run, Gulf South is hoping to persuade Congress to help pay for debris removal from its right-of-way property snaking throughout the disaster zone. FEMA is paying to remove debris only from public property — for now.

"The private sector isn't eligible," said Curtis Moffatt, a lobbyist at the firm Van Ness Feldman. "The issue is whether there will be other federal money available."

Stones for sale

Not all companies with Washington lobbyists are looking for tax breaks or federal financial bailouts. At least one is just looking to unload some rocks.

The Brutz Group, which owns mines in Michigan, hired the Washington lobbying firm Brownstein Hyatt & Farber to shop around 250 million tons of jaspilite stone. Michael Levy, a lobbyist at the firm, said the stone is denser than granite and would be terrific for, say, levees. He is keeping close tabs on the Army Corps of Engineers and its building plans in New Orleans.

"He would like sell a big lump of it at very low prices," Levy said. "This is a moment in history where they know there is a huge demand."

FEMA amends guidelines on housing subsidies

Workers in trailers don't lose eligibility

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Employees can live in government-supplied trailers to be close to their jobs without forfeiting their families' rent subsidies, federal officials said Thursday.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said it will provide 17-foot travel trailers so displaced workers can live near their jobs and get back to work, a move designed to stimulate the economy of south Louisiana decimated by hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

In a policy shift, FEMA also said workers whose families did not return to the area would still be eligible for the $2,358 housing subsidy available to evacuees.

"If workers and families are in different locations and it's not feasible to commute, we will pay for both," agency spokeswoman Nicol Andrews said. "We will do whatever we can to help people get back to work and back to life."

FEMA had balked at allowing families to get the rent subsidy if they also were getting a trailer from the government, a decision criticized by local businesses desperate to get workers back on the job. Louisiana shipbuilder Donald "Boysie" Bollinger said President Bush told him during a trip to New Orleans on Tuesday that the FEMA policy was "incorrect" and would be fixed.

Under the program, businesses seeking trailers need to apply to the Louisiana Department of Economic Development. The state agency will then prioritize requests and send them to FEMA, which will deliver the trailers. Businesses are responsible for hooking up water, sewer and other utilities.

The program was a big hit before FEMA terminated it two weeks ago out of concern that people unaffected by the hurricanes might be moving into the trailers. Now, employees' FEMA numbers are required with each application.

Pete Chocheles, of the Jefferson Parish Economic Development Commission, said that through September, companies in Jefferson Parish had requested 2,000 trailers from FEMA. About 700 were delivered before the program was put on hold.

After Hurricane Rita in late September, priority was given to oil and gas companies in an effort to get the industry back on its feet quickly.

Cleanup crews say firm is refusing to pay up

Workers allege OMNI changed time sheets

By Meghan Gordon
St. Tammany bureau

Weeks after completing the first push through the debris-strewn streets of post-Katrina New Orleans, a group of subcontractors has rallied around its claim that a Slidell contractor arbitrarily docked workers' pay and refuses to address their complaints.

The crews said OMNI Pinnacle slashed their time sheets long after they completed the work, despite their own monitors signing off on the recorded hours each day. They also complained that the general contractor withheld a 20 percent retainer in violation of their contract allowing just 10 percent.

Most of all, the subcontractors said they're fuming that their questions have been all but ignored by OMNI Pinnacle, which has staging areas in Algiers and Pearl River.

"They're telling me they ain't got time to deal with it," said Greg Littleton of Virginia, Ill., who received $485,240 after submitting a $785,270 bill for the work his 200-man crew performed for several weeks around the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, among other sites. "They've had ample time. The last day we worked was the day Rita hit. I've had enough."

Brian Reine, managing member of OMNI Pinnacle LLC, posed rhetorical questions when asked to explain why his company cut time sheets to 10 hours a day after the fact, instead of ordering the crews to limit their hours at the beginning.

"Do you know when the sun comes up in the morning?" Reine said. "When do you think it's safe? . . . What time was curfew in the city of New Orleans?"

The week after the storm, the sun rose at about 6:35 a.m. and set at about 7:25 p.m. in New Orleans, according to the U.S. Naval Observatory.

Sally Foreman, Mayor Ray Nagin's spokeswoman, did not respond to an interview request about whether the city restricted cleanup crews to 10 hours a day.

Company denies wrongdoing

Reine predicted in the days after Katrina struck that his disaster response company stood to make more than $100 million from contracts he had secured beforehand with New Orleans and St. Tammany Parish. This week he deflected questions about the subcontractors' gripes.

"That's all just a bunch of bull," he said. "You bring me some names of people and companies that worked for me that have any kind of problems, and I'll show you any kind of document you want."

When asked by a reporter for a time and place to review the names and documents, Reine hung up the telephone.

As in other disaster cleanups, subcontractors said, they went immediately to work for OMNI on verbal agreements that were put into writing days into the project. Each was assigned to work within a geographical boundary on any given day. They trudged through sludge, occasionally stumbled across bodies and encountered military officials who commandeered their equipment.

"My crew was subject to disease, dead bodies and not getting paid, living in tents, dodging mosquitoes and eating MREs. We were subject to all of this. We agreed to go into it, and we done it. But we should get paid for it."
TODD LEGER, Sunrise Lawn Care

Hours allegedly crossed out

Robert Wendt, project manager for ADS Timber of Baton Rouge, said his struggle represents the typical case of a crew that worked for days in dangerous conditions on the promise of good pay.

On Sept. 14, for instance, he and seven workers submitted their hours as 7 a.m. to 6 p.m. But when he received a smaller payment, the 11 hours on the time sheets were crossed out and replaced with 10 hours.

Before Wendt received the smaller-than-expected check, an OMNI representative said he had to sign a waiver that declared the check was "payment in full" or he would receive nothing.

"The quote was, 'You can't get a check until these are properly filled out,' " Wendt said.

Weeks later, Wendt is still trying to claim subsequent checks that OMNI secretaries have told him were ready only to tell him otherwise after he had set out on the 180-mile round trip to Behrman Park in Algiers.

"You call up and your checks are ready, then you go all the way down there and you get the run-around," Wendt said. "I don't actually have a count of how many times we were lied to."

'We should get paid for it'

Todd Leger, who worked for OMNI under his Evangeline Parish lawn care business, Sunrise Lawn Care, said he dedicated himself to the project, thinking he would come close to paying off his house after weeks of hard labor. But after all the work, he said, he's still in the hole and the resulting tension is threatening to shatter his marriage.

"My crew was subject to disease, dead bodies and not getting paid, living in tents, dodging mosquitoes and eating MREs," Leger said. "We were subject to all of this.

"We agreed to go into it, and we done it. But we should get paid for it."

Leger said the only response he has received from Reine is that he bears the burden of proving that he worked the 12 hours he originally claimed, not the 10 hours now reflected on his altered time sheets.

But fellow subcontractor Bert Ward said the scales are tipped in OMNI's favor, because there's no shortage of work crews from around the country who want a piece of the massive ongoing cleanup project.

"One can drop out, and four are in your place," said Ward, who lives in Citronelle, Ala. "That's why the bigs can get away with this."

Ward enlisted Baton Rouge lawyer Roth Walsh to review his complaints with OMNI along with those from five or six other subcontractors. Walsh said Thursday that their only recourse may be to file a lawsuit.

"It looks like OMNI is not living up to their end of the bargain," he said after reviewing Ward's contract. "And if this turns out to be true, we will pursue any and all means necessary to see that they collect any money owed to them."

City may hire extra workers for absentee ballots

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — If tens of thousands of voters who evacuated New Orleans for Hurricane Katrina are still away from their homes early next year, the city may have to hire extra workers to deal with absentee ballot applications for Feb. 4 elections, officials said Thursday.

Secretary of State Al Ater said almost 300,000 registered New Orleans voters left the city after Hurricane Katrina.

"We don't have enough personnel now," he said. "We have employees scattered in Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas and Mississippi."

The comments came as a task force assembled by Ater started looking at possible ways to reach New Orleans voters who have been displaced and want to cast ballots in the February municipal primary.

Rep. Peppi Bruneau, R-New Orleans, said that besides having more personnel to handle an expected avalanche of absentee ballots, Orleans Parish Voter Registrar Louis Keller will need a larger office on a temporary basis.

Ater said he is talking to the Federal Emergency Management Agency about supplying temporary buildings and 200 to 500 generators to power voting machines if full power is not restored in New Orleans by the election.

Ater said that if new workers are needed they must be hired soon and trained. Ater has asked Gov. Kathleen Blanco to include on the agenda of a Nov. 6-18 special session the authority to conduct elections among large numbers of voters who have been displaced by the hurricanes and send them notifications about their rights under state law, rights they could lose by registering to vote in another parish or county out of state.

Ater has indicated he would like to cross-check his list of registered voters with lists from FEMA or the American Red Cross to get current addresses of voters and inform them of their rights.

But Sen. Chris Ullo, D-Marrero, warned that if some groups or individuals get letters and others do not, Ater could be held liable and the election results could be challenged in court and voided.

Ater said his plan is to run newspaper, radio and television ads in the markets where New Orleans voters are, outlining how to obtain absentee ballots and telling them that they would forfeit their right to vote if they reregister in another parish or state.

State Rep. Charles Lancaster, R-Metairie, chairman of the House committee that oversees Ater's office, said the task force should work on consensus legislation to reach voters displaced from New Orleans and other areas by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita "without doing something negative to our election system. I want to make sure we do elections and we do them right."

Bruneau said no one should lose the right to vote, but warned Ater the state needs to be very careful.

Bruneau said he does not see the need for broad, sweeping powers to be vested in the hands of the secretary of state or two legislative committees that would have to approve whatever emergency plan the office devises.

"This is a book we are writing for the first time," he said.

Not everyone's laughing at Vitter's hurricane humor

Senator draws fire for 'partisan' jabs at Blanco

By Jan Moller
Capital Bureau

BATON ROUGE — Days after Louisiana officials pledged to work together to help get federal aid to repair damage from hurricanes Katrina and Rita, Sen. David Vitter, R-La., rekindled the partisan firefight by offering a caustic evaluation of the state's response to the disasters.

Speaking Wednesday to the Lafayette Parish Republican Executive Committee, Vitter responded to a question about Democratic Gov. Kathleen Blanco's performance during the storms by saying he would be willing to sign a recall petition. Vitter also responded to praise for his own post-hurricane performance by saying, "It's easy to look like a giant in a land of pygmies."

Vitter said his remarks, reported Thursday in the Baton Rouge Advocate, were meant as a joke and that he would not apologize to Blanco. "It was an off-the-cuff joke, and I think that was recognized by everyone there," Vitter said. "The response was a lot of laughter, and I think it was taken as such."

But the comments were the latest sign of deep political differences at a time most officials are calling for unity. Vitter and Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu had clashed earlier over details of a federal loan program for local governments in need of cash to pay essential employees.

"There are no winners in the game they're playing," said Elliott Stonecipher, a political analyst and demographer in Shreveport.

Although Stonecipher predicts that Blanco will experience the biggest fallout from the feud, since she is up for re-election in 2007 while Vitter's seat is safe until 2010, he said the infighting is likely to hurt the whole state as Louisiana asks Congress for more aid in the weeks ahead. "The place for him to make a difference is in being much more statesmanlike, much less partisan," Stonecipher said.

Blanco's office declined to respond to Vitter's comments. But her administration continued to complain about the $750 billion loan program that Vitter steered through Congress last week.

In a conference call with reporters, Commissioner of Administration Jerry Luke LeBlanc said the program is proving cumbersome and that it leaves local governments in an awkward position because they have to start repaying the loans almost immediately. In previous disasters, Congress has allowed the president to forgive loans if the local governments could not repay.

"We're waiting for the feds to tell us how this is workable," LeBlanc said. "They themselves are having trouble in trying to execute the provisions of this loan program."

Stonecipher said Vitter's comments about Blanco reinforced the reputation he earned years ago as politician with a propensity to ruffle feathers.

"This is the Vitter that we knew so well before his ambitions were maybe a little bit more clear," Stonecipher said. "These kinds of quotes are the kinds of things that David Vitter is likely to say, and whether he turns them into a joke or not they are illustrative of what he feels."

As a guest on a Baton Rouge radio show Tuesday, Vitter criticized Blanco's handling of the Katrina aftermath and Landrieu's role in the Senate debate on the loan package.

He said Blanco should have called a special session of the state Legislature two weeks ago to deal with problems from the hurricane instead of planning a session for November. He also criticized Landrieu for delaying a vote on the loan package.

"I can tell you, in the Congress, where it matters, it is not helping, it's hurting," Vitter said of Landrieu's questions about the program.

A spokesman for Landrieu said she was trying to warn senators about the possible snags the legislation would likely present to local authorities trying to obtain the money.

"I believe Sen. Landrieu realized these hurdles beforehand, which is why she tried to work with the Republican leadership to help them understand the nuances of Louisiana local governments," said Brian Richardson with Landrieu's office. "But unfortunately what she had to say fell on deaf ears."

Pollster Bernie Pinsonat of Southern Media and Opinion Research said Vitter is being forced to walk a fine line between trying to get the state as much help as possible while maintaining support among conservatives who fear that the state will waste any money it is given. He said Vitter's comments in Lafayette were a bid to reconnect with a conservative base that was rattled by the senator's support of a $250 billion proposal to rebuild New Orleans that has been roundly criticized as excessive.

Vitter joined Landrieu in proposing the package, which has drawn fire from all corners, conservatives and liberals alike.

"He was burned politically by having his name attached to that," Pinsonat said. "Now he's trying to show that he's a Republican fiscal conservative and he's not part of the tax-and-spend crowd. On the other hand, there's the local government crowd that's desperate, . . . and they don't feel the loan program is much help."

Dillard has plans to offer classes starting in January

University to use Elmwood location

By Coleman Warner
Staff writer

Dillard University will offer classes at a Tulane University center in the Elmwood business park and possibly in a Tulane office building in downtown New Orleans in January as the historically black institution recovers from massive Hurricane Katrina damage, a Tulane executive said late Thursday.

The classes, to be taught by Dillard professors, will be the largest off-campus operation for Dillard or Xavier universities during the spring semester, Tulane Senior Vice President for Academic Affairs Lester Lefton said.

The downtown Tulane building that could house Dillard classes is at 1555 Poydras St.

Dillard and Xavier students can attend Tulane or Loyola University classes on a space-available basis in the spring. How many can do so hasn't been determined.

They will hold a visiting-student status that will allow for credits to be transferred easily to their home institution, and they won't pay tuition in addition to what they already have paid to Tulane or Xavier, said Lefton, who is serving as facilitator for a working group of executives from Tulane, Loyola, Xavier and Dillard.

Lefton spoke at the end of a daylong planning meeting at a Tulane office in Houston that included 23 officials from the four New Orleans institutions.

"This is a work in progress," said Lefton, who also is Tulane's provost. "This is our first meeting. We broke into task forces to address a wide range of issues."

Xavier and Dillard were hit with extensive flooding, with Dillard believed to have had far worse damage because of a number of low-elevation buildings on the Gentilly campus. Tulane sustained extensive damage from flooding, but it primarily faced only wind damage on the river side of Freret Street. Loyola had little damage.

Xavier tentatively plans to reopen its campus near South Carrollton Avenue in January.

Services to Dillard and Xavier students will offered by Tulane and Loyola at no additional charge, as the four institutions help one another maintain a sense of identity in the coming year, campus officials said in a news release this week.

"The New Orleans area universities are a vital part of the state's economy and higher education community," said Loyola's president, the Rev. Kevin Wildes. "It's imperative that we are all able to resume operations and welcome back our students in January 2006."

The University of New Orleans launched regular classes this week, although at a fraction of the scale of its normal operations, at its Jefferson Parish branch on Causeway Boulevard in Metairie. UNO's top administrators, who have been temporarily working out of the Louisiana State University system offices at the LSU campus in Baton Rouge, are setting up new offices at the Jefferson center as repairs are done on UNO's Lakefront campus. The main UNO campus was partially covered by floodwaters after Katrina.

Council seeks to keep daylight a while longer

Keep clocks ahead to work, city pleads

By Bruce Eggler
Staff writer

If the New Orleans City Council has its way, daylight-saving time will be extended in the city past its normal end Oct. 30 to give homeowners and others an extra hour of evening daylight to work on their hurricane-damaged property.

The council Wednesday unanimously passed a resolution, introduced by Councilman Jay Batt, asking Gov. Kathleen Blanco to issue an executive order extending daylight-saving time in Orleans Parish "until further notice."

Otherwise, the resolution says, the workday would in effect be reduced by one hour starting Oct. 30.

The resolution was one of a flock of hurricane-related measures the council dealt with this week. Other measures concerned issues such as banning the burning of debris in Orleans Parish, urging Blanco and the Legislature to suspend the collection of sales tax on construction-related materials, and creating a citizen committee to advise the council on hurricane recovery.

Other matters

By the other measures, all approved by unanimous votes, the council:

▶ Banned the burning of debris in the parish because of fears that such fires would get out of control and would release dangerous pollutants into the air. The ban will be in effect for as much as one year but will be reviewed within 120 days to decide whether it can be ended.

▶ Urged Blanco to suspend the collection of sales tax on construction materials in Orleans Parish until the Legislature can meet to consider a longer-term exemption, which the council requested remain in effect for at least one year. The council also authorized the city to stop collecting city sales tax on such items.

▶ Authorized creation of an 11-member Advisory Committee on Hurricane Recovery to advise the council on ways to "facilitate the city's post-hurricane recovery efforts." Council members view the panel as a rival to the 17-member group of community leaders Mayor Ray Nagin has created to recommend ways to rebuild the city. Only one council member, Oliver Thomas, sits on Nagin's group.

Each council member would have a representative on the 11-member group, with the other four members appointed by the state's two U.S. senators and the city's two U.S. representatives. The group is supposed to hold its first meeting within two weeks.

Hire local residents

▶ Urged "all employers, both public and private, to give first preference in hiring and job training to the returning survivors of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita" and supported the right of all displaced New Orleans residents to return to their homes and "participate in the rebuilding of their communities."

▶ Urged the Coast Guard, the state and the Port of New Orleans "to order that motor vessels and barges be removed from inland waterways" 72 hours before the anticipated arrival of a hurricane. The measure was prompted by reports that pounding by a runaway barge helped break the Industrial Canal levee, flooding the Lower 9th Ward.

▶ Asked the Nagin administration to direct the public to "place storm and flood debris a distance away from cable communications boxes, fire hydrants and regular household garbage" and urged contractors to "use the utmost care and caution to avoid damage to cable or other utility connections and fire hydrants" while removing debris.

▶ Asked the Aviation Board to consider modifying the leases of vendors at Louis Armstrong International Airport whose business has been drastically reduced since Katrina.

Trailers planned near airport on site where houses were razed

Kenner, Armstrong singing same tune

By Matt Scallan
Kenner bureau

A decade ago, Louis Armstrong International Airport bought out hundreds of homeowners who had alleged in a lawsuit that airport noise harmed their health. The houses were razed, and as part of the deal the land was ruled off limits for residential use.

But with housing space at a premium in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, Kenner officials are eyeing some of the still-vacant buyout property as a spot for temporary housing for essential workers.

"This is an emergency situation," said Phil Ramon, chief of staff in Mayor Phil Capitano's administration. "We're looking for housing for our employees, FEMA workers and police officers who need a place to live."

Katrina's flooding created a severe housing shortage in the New Orleans area. Many residents have lost their homes, and thousands of government workers and contractors are in town trying to find temporary quarters.

STAFF MAP

The area that Kenner officials are considering is between the intersection of 20th Street and Connecticut Avenue and the airport fence line.

The Federal Aviation Administration paid for the $60 million buyout, and Armstrong's aviation director, Roy Williams, said FAA approval is needed before the property may be used for housing. But he doesn't expect any difficulty in getting it.

"For one thing, it's a short-term situation. And because our traffic is so far below normal, you're not going to have the exposure to noise that you would have had before," he said.

Armstrong's air traffic is down from a pre-Katrina average of 174 flights per day to 25 per day, although airport officials say they expect growth in the next few months.

The airport is planning its own trailer park just east of the facilities of the two companies that service private and corporate aircraft. The New Orleans Aviation Board approved the construction of a site for as many as 350 trailers for its employees and their families, and those of the Transportation Security Administration, which screens baggage.

Ramon said Kenner will let the airport speed construction of the park, provided all the water, sewer and electrical hookups are done by certified plumbers and electricians.

"This is one area where we're working together," Ramon said. "We told them to keep us informed and that we'll worry about the permit later."

Ramon added that Kenner officials got the idea for the location of the city trailer park when the airport considered using the 20th Street area for its project.

Dispute over runway lands in Jefferson Parish

Ruling came days before Katrina hit

By Matt Scallan
Kenner bureau

The reconstruction of the east-west runway at Louis Armstrong International Airport was finished two days before Hurricane Katrina hit, but the courtroom fight over whether the airport needed Kenner's approval for the project continues.

The state 4th Circuit Court of Appeal in New Orleans has ruled that the dispute should be heard in the 24th District Court in Jefferson Parish, rather than in Orleans Civil District Court. The ruling was released Aug. 26, three days before Hurricane Katrina struck, but because of the storm's chaotic aftermath, airport officials said they were unaware of the decision until this week.

The New Orleans-owned airport filed suit in Orleans court after Kenner Mayor Phil Capitano threatened to shut down the construction project unless the airport obtained a Kenner building permit. The work proceeded while the suit was pending, and Kenner sought to move the suit to Jefferson's court.

In the suit, the airport argued that it was simply maintaining the existing runway and didn't need a city permit, under a 1994 agreement between Kenner and the airport. Kenner argued that because the rebuilt runway would be wider than the existing one, the airport needed city approval.

The appeals court's 3-2 decision reverses a ruling by Orleans Judge Ethel Simms Julien that the case should be heard in New Orleans. Judges David Gorbaty, Michael Kirby and Edwin Lombard were in the majority. Judges Joan Armstrong and James McKay III were in the minority.

Man booked with posing as evacuee

By The Associated Press

BARBERTON, OHIO — A man who police say conned relief workers into thinking he was a Hurricane Katrina evacuee has been charged with felony theft by deception.

Frank Edwards Jr., 32, of Barberton allegedly used a Mississippi identification card to get $574 intended for food, clothing and shelter from the local chapter of the American Red Cross.

He also called the Federal Emergency Management Agency's toll-free number to get another $2,000, police said.

Edwards had a valid Mississippi ID because he lived there for a short time in 2004, authorities said. But an anonymous caller tipped off the Red Cross to the alleged scam.

Edwards was being held in the Summit County jail in lieu of $10,000 bond.

MARK MORGAN, Jefferson Parish School Board member

School Board member accused of illegal deal

But Morgan says repair contract was authorized

By Rob Nelson and Mark Waller
Staff writers

An unexpected political bombshell exploded at the Jefferson Parish School Board meeting Thursday as members accused their colleague Mark Morgan of illegally authorizing a contract reportedly worth more than $5 million to repair three West Bank schools severely damaged by Hurricane Katrina without approval from the board or school system.

In addition, board member Gene Katsanis, suggesting Morgan's actions could be criminal, is pushing for a full-fledged investigation, calling for a board committee to refer the case to the Jefferson Parish district attorney's office, the U.S. attorney's office and the state Board of Ethics.

Meanwhile, Morgan defended his actions, saying he had received legal clearance from a board attorney and that the administration was aware of the work occurring at West Jefferson High School, Homedale Elementary School and the Thomas Jefferson Senior High School, a magnet school slated to open next fall.

Morgan, often a political outcast since joining the board last year, blamed the controversy on lingering bad blood between him and other board members.

Work at 3 schools

Board members Libby Moran, Martin Marino and Katsanis took aim at Morgan, with Katsanis saying he and Marino toured the three schools Tuesday and discovered work in progress that had not been approved.

"Mr. Marino and I walked onto that campus, we saw four people sweeping the steps, with brooms sweeping the steps, and the steps were no more than 8 foot wide," Katsanis said of the work at Thomas Jefferson. "Every wall in that building was gutted. Every tile was sitting in a plastic bag."

Katsanis said 43 people were working at Thomas Jefferson. Doing such extensive work, beyond basic storm remediation, during emergency times, Katsanis said, is particularly inappropriate at a school not scheduled to begin taking students until next year, while other schools have more urgent needs.

"You do not exceed your authority or go beyond the limits of the law," Katsanis said, referring to Morgan. Marino said Morgan's actions are "basically almost malfeasance."

Morgan said he evacuated to Memphis, Tenn., and returned to Gretna on Sept. 2. The next day, Morgan said, he began touring schools and took note of the extreme damage at the three schools in his district.

He said he grew frustrated that Superintendent Diane Roussel's administration was failing to respond to the needs of schools in his district. He said he personally paid for tarpaulins to cover roofs.

"At this point I became highly critical of the administration and their efforts to repair my schools," Morgan said. "Day after day of good weather went by and nothing was done in my district."

Board attorney consulted

After Thursday's meeting, Roussel said members of her administration entered the parish to begin recovery as soon as it was possible.

"We came in as quickly as we were allowed to come in, even with passes," on the first days after the storm, she said. "Most of us could not even get to our houses."

Days later, Morgan said, he met with parish officials and asked what companies they were using for repairs and cleanup. He was referred to Certified Cleaning and Restoration in Metairie, Morgan said, adding that the company handled repairs at Jefferson Parish's Elmwood government center, the Joseph S. Yenni Building.

Morgan said board attorney Olden Toups told him that a board member would have the authority in emergency situations to sign a contract for school repairs. On Sept. 10, Morgan signed an "emergency work authorization" with the restoration company to allow repairs relating to water damage, debris removal and carpet removal, among other items.

Morgan said he never discussed a price with the company and directed the business to consult with the administration before proceeding with the work. Below his signature on the contract, Morgan wrote, "follow up by Dr. Roussel," referring to the superintendent. The contract does not detail a price or list the three schools.

Roussel said at Thursday's meeting that she met with officials from the company at a Sept. 14 School Board meeting in Baton Rouge.

"I informed those gentlemen that Mr. Morgan had no authority to contract business with them," Roussel said. She said she then told them to stop the work immediately and to contact the school system's assistant superintendent for facilities, David Taylor, to follow proper channels in securing any other work. After that, she said, the company did secure other work in the school system through Taylor.

"Not to disparage his concern or his work or anything else," Roussel said of Morgan, "but my word is my bond. I am a person of my word, and I know what happened."

Stoppage ordered

Work on the three schools began Sept. 11, the day after the emergency authorization was signed, Morgan said. After the board meeting three days later, according to the company, Morgan said, Roussel directed them to the system's facilities department and gave the green light for the work to proceed.

On Thursday Roussel told the board, "I have never seen a contract until Mr. Grant showed it to me yesterday," referring to board attorney Jack Grant.

"The administration is trying to pretend they didn't know this work was going on," Morgan said after the board meeting. Roussel ordered a work stoppage at the three schools Tuesday.

Officials with Certified Cleaning and Restoration could not be reached for comment Thursday.

Addressing the board on whether a member can individually enter into contracts, Grant said, "The resounding answer is no."

Grant said Toups' advice allowing Morgan to contract with workers in an emergency was limited to putting tarps on roofs.

"I don't want you to think that absolves anybody," Grant said of the legal advice.

Roussel said the price tag at all three schools is about $5.3 million, more than the system has spent on storm remediation at all other schools combined. "People just can't be spending public dollars without any authorization," she said.

Morgan said the company told him it has not sent an invoice. Board attorney Grant said no documentation of the exact costs exists.

Storm recovery workers raise Gulfport crime stats

Drug, traffic arrests up in Miss. county

By The Associated Press

GULFPORT, MISS. — Public safety trends post-Katrina show an increase in traffic violations, illegal drugs and property crimes. And, according to authorities, crimes by out-of-state residents who are here to help with hurricane recovery.

Now that law enforcement agencies have switched from rescue efforts to recovery, they report a steady increase in traffic violations, traffic accidents and crashes caused by drivers without insurance.

They also report that traffic stops, in many cases, lead to drug arrests, which have tripled in Harrison County's unincorporated areas, according to Sheriff George Payne. Patrol officers and investigators countywide also report an increase in property crimes.

"It's requiring extra manpower every shift," said Payne, whose deputies, along with local police agencies, have help from 155 out-of-state officers. After the hurricane, an estimated 700 visiting officers came to help.

An increase in arrests of out-of-state visitors, however, is not surprising, Payne said.

"If you study other areas that have been through a disaster on a smaller scale, they've had the same trend. When you have thousands of out-of-state workers coming in, you're going to see an increase in the opportunity kind of crimes from people who don't live here."

Take Tuesday, for instance. At least seven of the 26 people jailed in Harrison County on felony charges are from out of state.

A man arrested in Gulfport was listed as a fugitive on a cocaine distribution charge from Wayne County, Ind. Two others were wanted for auto theft from Scott City, Md.

Most arrests of out-of-state residents involve people who have come to work or serve as volunteers, said Sheriff's Capt. Tony Sauro, who coordinates visiting officers' work from a command center in Gulfport.

"A lot of those we're arresting are relief workers or construction personnel, people from every imaginable agency," Sauro said. "A lot of them are driving with a suspended license and no insurance. Wouldn't it be a shame to be victimized all over again by somebody that came here to help?"

Officers overlooked tagless vehicles and numerous traffic violations just after the hurricane, he said, "but that's changing. We've got to hold people responsible. We'd rather do it before they hurt or kill someone."

Visiting officers also help local patrol officers keep an eye out for criminal activity, said Long Beach Deputy Police Chief Wayne McDowell.

On Tuesday, officers in Long Beach arrested four construction workers from Texas. They were charged with trespassing and possession of stolen property.

They're accused of picking up tools including a bench grinder, a chain saw, floor jacks, wrenches and screwdrivers.

Relief workers worried about donation fatigue

So many disasters tend to numb givers

By Greg Barrett
The Baltimore Sun

First there was Hurricane Katrina. Then Hurricane Rita. Then Hurricane Stan and the subsequent mudslides that spawned more death, destruction and homelessness this month in Central America.

Then, last weekend, a magnitude 7.6 earthquake in South Asia killed more than 35,000 people and left more than 2 million homeless.

By all accounts, relief organizers cannot recall being hit by such a succession of large-scale natural disasters, dating back 10 months to the Southeast Asia tsunami. It is, they fear, enough to spread the charity thin and play havoc with nonprofit budgets.

As the nation's robust philanthropic community approaches the annual giving season — traditionally between the end of October and the first of the year — officials of charities large and small say they worry about "disaster fatigue" and what some nonprofit analysts call "the CNN effect."

"The urgency of the news motivates people initially to give ... but then that wanes," said Daniel Borochoff, president of the American Institute of Philanthropy, a charity watchdog group based in Chicago. "There is a saturation point where people don't want to think about disasters any longer, and they will just tune them out."

Even before Saturday's earthquake in Pakistan, donations to the American Red Cross Katrina fund had slowed, from $409.1 million in the first week to $200.5 million the second week and $94.1 million last week. Tuesday, officials there said it was too early to tell what effect the earthquake might have on the fund.

AP PHOTO

Guatemalans protect bags of food dropped off Wednesday by U.S. soldiers in a helicopter near Guatemala City. 'This is unprecedented. We haven't seen this many large-scale emergencies all at once,' said Sean Callahan of Catholic Relief Services, which is responding with aid to Pakistan, India, Guatemala, El Salvador and southern Mexico.

"The local chapters are nervous, and the fund-raisers are anxious about what will happen," said Lauri Rhinehart, a 14-year veteran of the Red Cross and its director of disaster fund raising. "In my time here, I've never seen the activity at this organization at this frenzied of a pace across the board."

To date, the Red Cross effort to raise more than $2 billion for Katrina relief is about $900 million short. It has spent $400 million more than it has raised. Last month, it took out a loan for $150 million, she said.

"We're going to go back and look at our fund-raising strategy ... but we are not waiting to raise it before we spend it," Rhinehart said. "We will pull the money from somewhere."

As if looking for reassurance, Red Cross officials recently reviewed the giving trends of Americans after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. They were encouraged by the longevity of the giving, but only as it could be applied to a single emergency and a snapshot in time.

"This is unprecedented. We haven't seen this many large-scale emergencies all at once," said Sean Callahan of the Baltimore-based Catholic Relief Services, which is responding with aid to Pakistan, India, Guatemala, El Salvador and southern Mexico, and is also providing relief in the conflict-torn Darfur region of western Sudan, where an estimated 2.4 million are homeless.

"It's just one thing after another overseas and, in addition, the U.S. gets hit with its worst-ever (natural) disaster," said Callahan, who is headed to Pakistan today. "Not only are people pulled to help their brethren overseas, but they also are trying to help the people down South."

According to research conducted by the Center on Philanthropy at Indiana University and published by the Giving USA Foundation, the nation's generosity swells after disasters and overall charity is on solid footing. Nearly $3 billion was given in response to the Sept. 11 attacks; last year, a record $248.5 billion was given to the nation's nonprofit organizations, including religious groups.

"People raised these same sorts of issues after 9/11 and after the tsunami: Will it pull away the giving to other philanthropic sources and causes and disasters?" said Bob Ottenhoff, president of GuideStar.org, a database of financial and program information collected on the nation's 1.5 million nonprofits. "In those cases it did not. People not only responded generously to the requests around those two causes, but they continued to give to their traditional causes."

Catholic Charities USA has collected $53 million for Katrina victims, the most it has generated for a single disaster and about $21 million more than it collected after the 2001 terrorist attacks.

But this week, its officials brainstormed about ways to jump-start a campaign that has lost strength. They discussed returning to donors who have already contributed to its hurricane relief fund and asking them to give again, this time with the long-term needs in mind, said John Keightley, the senior vice president for planning and external relations.

The nonprofit also considered using specific relief objectives — such as housing for a defined period for a particular group of homeless — and trying to "sell it as a packaged program" to corporations, Keightley said.

"It can be more of a plan now than a response," he said. "You recognize that this is part of a broader context (of global disasters), but you can't get beaten down by it or too afraid of it."

Right now, the Red Cross is pulling from its general disaster relief fund to aid wildfire victims in California and flood victims in Kentucky.

"Our mission isn't just the highly visible disasters," Keightley said. "Though it's that too."

Award trimmed in DA bias case

But $2.5 million still owed over firings

By Gwen Filosa
Staff writer

A federal judge has modestly reduced the original $2.8 million verdict that a jury awarded to the 43 employees fired by Orleans Parish District Attorney Eddie Jordan after he took office in 2003.

U.S. District Court Judge Stanwood Duval eliminated monetary awards given to seven of the plaintiffs who the jury found would have probably lost their jobs during any transition at the office, no matter who assumed the district attorney post, reducing the verdict from $2.8 million to $2.48 million.

The amended verdict includes neither the attorney's fees for the winning plaintiffs' lawyers nor the interest that federal law allows.

With interest, which starts ticking on the day the lawsuit was filed in May 2003, the new judgment would cost about $2.7 million if paid today.

A magistrate judge has yet to rule on attorney's fees, but the plaintiff's lawyers have asked for more than $1.4 million to pay for their work on the lengthy case.

Jordan, the city's first black district attorney, wrongly used race as a factor in firing dozens of white employees after taking office, a jury found in March after a trial. Jordan was sued as a public official.

As a first step toward building his staff, Jordan fired 53 of 77 white workers who were not lawyers — investigators, clerks and child-support enforcement workers — and replaced almost all of them with black employees.

The ten jurors, eight white and two black, gave the fired workers $1.9 million in lost wages and damages, including the seven administrative workers who had served Harry Connick and who they said would have likely been replaced by his successor.

Duval later ordered Jordan to pay front pay, or "future lost wages," to 39 former employees who asked for it, inflating the judgment to $2.8 million. Four of the plaintiffs conceded they had no front pay claim because they most certainly would have been replaced by a new district attorney.

The amended judgment is a modest win for Jordan, who is appealing the entire verdict and asked Duval to reduce the jury's original award.

Duval amended the verdict Sept. 30, taking away various money awards from Helen Draughon, Trudy Guerrera, Linda Hellmer, Frank Lippert, Cathy Orgeron, Katherine Theriot and George Vogt III.

Hellmer lost the most of the lot, having been given $141,538 in back pay and benefits and front pay and benefits from the jury. Orgeron had won the smallest amount of the seven, $3,485 in back pay.

Clement Donelon, the plaintiffs' lead attorney, said he was disappointed by the judge's decision but not surprised.

Cop suspended in beating had psychiatric treatment

He may have tried suicide 10 years ago

By Michael Perlstein
Staff writer

One of the three New Orleans police officers suspended and charged in connection with the videotaped beating of a retired teacher in the French Quarter received psychiatric treatment after an apparent suicide attempt in the mid-1990s, but was hired as a cop about a year later when he passed the department's psychological tests, according to his attorney and three people who worked with the officer before he joined the force.

Lance Schilling, charged with simple battery along with fellow 8th District officers Robert Evangelist and Stewart Smith, was treated after he fell ill from self-inflicted carbon monoxide inhalation, according to three people he worked with at the Rendon Inn, a Broadmoor restaurant and bar.

Steve Daney, a former cook who described Schilling as "a good, good friend," said Schilling had bouts of depression, but he had never known him to be violent or even discourteous. As for the apparent suicide attempt, Daney said, "He was young. He was 18 or 19 years old. We all go through those kind of issues when we're young and we think the world is falling apart."

Joseph Bruno, attorney for beating victim Robert Davis, said he forwarded information about Schilling's psychiatric history to the FBI, which is helping in the police investigation and a parallel civil rights investigation by the U.S. Justice Department. He said that despite the length of time since the 1990s incident involving Schilling, the background is relevant.

"I think it's a very important piece of information and it may go to the heart of what happened," Bruno said. "What I've been saying all along is that this is not an indictment of the whole Police Department, but just a few bad apples."

Schilling's attorney, Frank DeSalvo, said he is aware of his client's history, but doesn't think it played any role in the arrest of Davis, 64, a local man whose videotaped beating near Bourbon Street on Saturday has aired repeatedly on national television amid questions about the catastrophe-strained New Orleans Police Department. DeSalvo said Schilling lost his home in the storm, but the stress of that personal loss didn't affect his job performance.

"I know that when you see the arrest, it seems overzealous. But their performance was perfectly within the realm of reason," DeSalvo said, arguing that expressions of shock by Mayor Ray Nagin and other officials don't take into account all the circumstances surrounding Davis' public intoxication arrest.

The videotape

Television news footage of the arrest shows Evangelist and Schilling striking Davis repeatedly, leaving the suspect covered in blood from an apparent head laceration. Moments later, Smith is seen berating a television news producer in a profanity-filled tirade as he backs the newsman against a car and jabs a finger at him.

DeSalvo, in an interview Thursday, backed off his earlier statements that Schilling and Evangelist hit Davis only in the back and neck, but said whatever actions they took were necessary because Davis was trying to lower his arms to his waist.

"When he dropped his hands to his waistband, the officers are trained to assume he's going for a weapon. That's what the punches were about. Officers who don't assume a suspect is going for a gun end up dead," DeSalvo said.

DeSalvo said those split-second actions by the officers will make up the bulk of evidence in any criminal or civil case against them. He said nearly decade-old psychiatric issues shouldn't even be admissible in court.

"I understand his attorney is talking about using the suicide attempt, but I don't know how they'll get that information into a courtroom," DeSalvo said. "I believe he's trying to use that to show negligent retention, making the city liable for hiring him and keeping him. But I don't think it's going to fly."

Hiring standards

Lt. David Benelli, president of the Police Association of New Orleans, said the fact that Schilling passed the city's hiring standards to become an officer should make any past medical history a moot point.

Daney said he is having difficulty coming to grips with the behavior he saw "over and over and over" while watching news accounts of the beating.

"Lance and I are good, good friends, but I'm so angry at him," Daney said. "I'm angry at him and the other officers. I know they're going through a lot of stress, but our military in Iraq is going through a lot of stress and they don't go around beating up civilians.

Davis, who lost his 9th Ward house in flooding from Katrina, said he hasn't had a sip of alcohol in 25 years and was merely looking for a place to buy cigarettes when the confrontation took place. He said he asked an officer about the time of the curfew, when he was interrupted by another officer, with whom he exchanged words. He said he was "sucker-punched" by the second officer after he turned and walked away.

Background info sketchy

As for the backgrounds of Evangelist and Smith, police disciplinary records that usually provide such information have been unavailable because of the post-Katrina chaos. But this is not the first incident for Evangelist that prompted an administrative investigation, though he ultimately was cleared of any wrongdoing.

In the pre-dawn hours of Sept. 7, 2004, Evangelist was one of two passengers in a police squad car driven by officer Leonard D'arensbourg. D'arensbourg was driving the wrong way in a commuter lane of the Crescent City Connection when he collided head-on with a Chevrolet Blazer, killing the driver of the Blazer, Tommie Varnado, 51.

Evangelist and a woman the officers picked up at a New Orleans bar were injured. A police report of the crash showed that Evangelist broke his foot, elbow and three ribs. Bartender Melissa Rose was knocked unconscious, suffering a broken nose, facial cuts and broken ribs.

Evangelist was placed on desk duty while his role in the accident was investigated, but he resumed regular patrol duties after he was cleared, Benelli said. D'arensbourg is awaiting trial on a negligent homicide charge.

St. Bernard seeks to save schools

Money for benefits to run dry after Nov.

By Sandra Barbier
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

The St. Bernard Parish School Board voted Wednesday to cancel its contract with teachers and other employees so that the district can avoid laying off workers and continue providing health insurance benefits to regular and retired employees.

"We're trying to protect their benefits for as long as possible," St. Bernard Parish schools Superintendent Doris Voitier said after the meeting, held at the state Department of Education building in Baton Rouge. The School Board will be able to pay for health insurance coverage through the end of November, but it is requesting money from the state to continue the coverage beyond that.

Teachers and other school system employees are not being paid.

Besides trying to protect worker benefits, Voitier said, the board is seeking to maintain an operational system so that it can reopen one or two schools. The goal is to have a high school for about 500 students and a combined elementary and middle school for about 800 students in January, she said.

School Board attorney Al Bordelon said that under the contract with the St. Bernard Parish Association of Educators, the board could be obligated to lay off its employees because the board cannot fulfill any of the terms in the contract, such as pay and tenure hearings. "We can't pay them. We don't have any money," he said.

He said the board could declare the contract null because of an "act of God." Employees were placed on emergency disaster leave, "so that they are technically still employed," he said.

Voitier said the school district has enough money to pay for health insurance for about 1,100 active and 500 retired employees only through the end of November.

In addition to seeking money from the state to extend the insurance benefits beyond November, the board will ask the state to continue paying the parish at least part of its Minimum Foundation Program allowance, the main source of state money for education, so it can maintain a staff of about 120, or return 10 percent of its essential staff, to plan the reopening of the two schools.

Meanwhile, a St. Bernard Parish representative at Wednesday's meeting pressured board members not to wait for children to return to the parish, but to open a school or classroom immediately. "Have a ribbon-cutting and say the schools are open. If you don't do that, you are cutting the throat of St. Bernard," said Alan Abadie, an attorney who said he was speaking for Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez and Sheriff Jack Stephens.

But board members and Voitier said schools can't open until the parish has emergency medical service and other essential services, and a school site is provided with utilities and declared environmentally safe for children.

"We all want our schools open, and open as quickly as possible," School Board member Diana Dysart said.

Voitier said the Federal Emergency Management Agency has for the first time created an educational strike force through which all requests and approvals for schools are being funneled. On Wednesday, federal workers began taking air and soil samples at what remains of the district's existing schools.

"Because it deals with children, they are putting more stringent guidelines on us than any other public entity," Voitier said. Any site for a temporary school will have to be approved as safe, as well as have water, sewerage and other utilities. Voitier said educators also must plan for children's welfare outside school, possibly with before- and after-school care while parents are working on the parish's recovery.

School officials have been trying to get permission to apply its prestorm federal grants and allocations for those uses, she said.

Debris fuels fire fears

By Allen Powell II
River Parishes bureau

The clusters of wood chips and tree limbs piled near the corner of McReine Road and River Road in LaPlace do not look threatening, but for more than a month they've kept Guy Reine awake at night.

Reine, 63, says his insomnia, along with his tirades against Parish President Nickie Monica at the past two St. John the Baptist Parish Council meetings, is driven by extreme fear and anger.

Reine is afraid that a fire will start in the storm debris collected by the parish and kill him and his family in their homes across the street. And he is angry because he thinks Monica doesn't really care.

"All this craziness you've seen me doing . . . I hate it, but it's about these kids here," said Reine, who has one daughter and three grandchildren living on his 17 acres across from the dump site. " I go to bed every night for the last month wondering if someone is going to go over there (to that debris) and throw a match."

The object of Reine's ire is one of six dump sites throughout the parish that are being used to store debris from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita until it can be taken to a larger dump site in the Bonnet Carre Spillway. The dump sites, which handle tree limbs, wood chips and trash, are being operated by contractors for the Army Corps of Engineers.

Reine says he understands that sacrifices have to be made in light of Katrina. But he is bothered that the parish has not secured the site to prevent unauthorized access and has not been active in mitigating that risk by ensuring that the wood chips are regularly sprinkled with water. Moreover, Reine said he is upset because Monica promised him that the site would be cleared more than a week ago.

Parish Chief Administrative Officer Natalie Robottom said the parish knows of Reine's concerns and is working to alleviate some of them. While she acknowledged that some of the promises made to Reine about the removal of debris and the watering of wood chips have not been carried out, she said that was a result of broken promises by outside contractors hired by the Corps of Engineers, not an unwillingness by the parish.

Robottom said the parish asked the contractor to water the wood chips several times, and it was done regularly before Hurricane Rita. But she said that since Rita, she could not say how often the chips are being watered. She said the parish depends on the contractor to carry out assignments and has not been monitoring the process.

Now that the corps' contractor has secured enough trucks, Robottom expects the dump sites will be cleared soon.

Don't give up, parish urges

Plaquemines council focuses on services

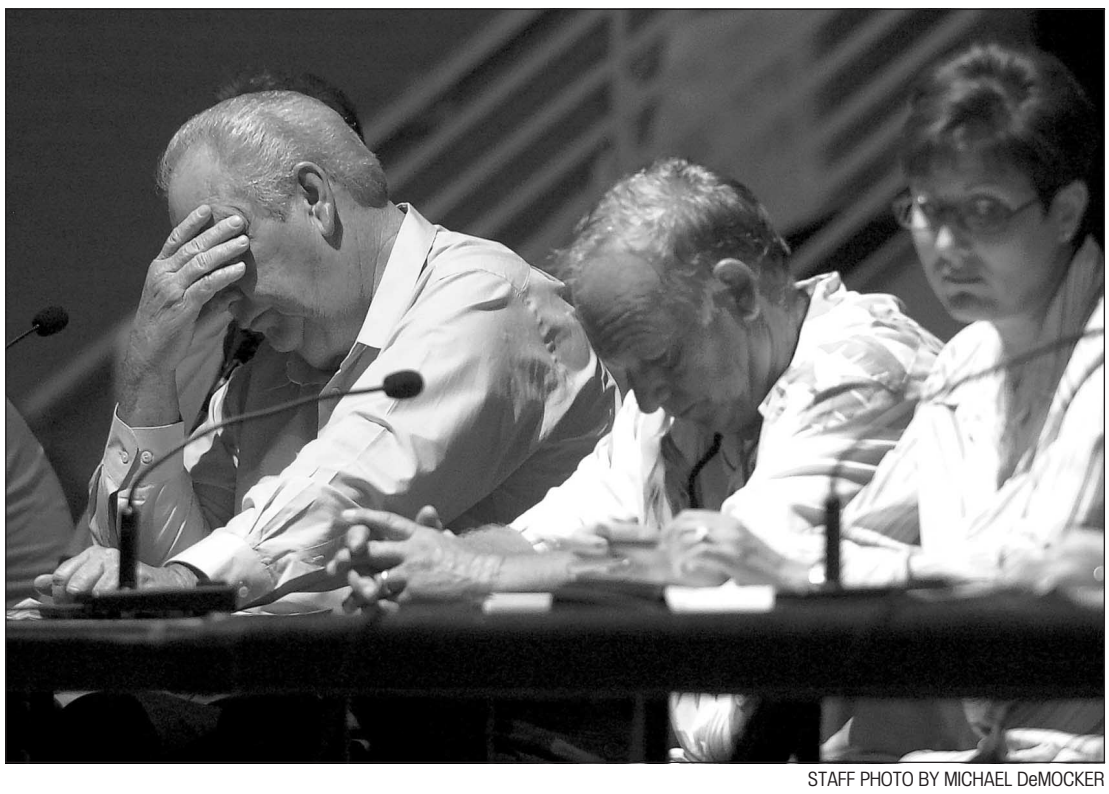
By Karen Turni Bazile
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

The Plaquemines Parish Council on Thursday held its first meeting since Hurricanes Katrina and Rita ravaged the parish, and its members told residents the focus now is to get the parish running the way it was before the storms.



"We wanted to get a sense of services that we need to provide to the people for recovery and rebuilding, and it gives us a chance to give out info," Parish Council Vice Chairman Steve Vaughn said of the meeting, held in makeshift chambers in Belle Chasse High School's auditorium.

The council's normal chambers at the Magnolia Center in Pointe a la Hache were destroyed by floodwaters and winds from Katrina.

About 75 people attended the meeting, which was also videotaped for broadcast on the local government access channel.

Councilwoman Lynda Banta asked residents for patience as the government tries to re-establish services and to come back as soon as essential services are available.

"Just don't just give up on our community," Banta said. "When I met with (President Bush) I told him my biggest concern was that we are so small, are we going to be forgotten? He assured us we would not be forgotten."

The emotional toll of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita was clear Thursday as fatigued Plaquemines Parish Councilmen Jerry Hodnett, left, and Mike Mudge, and clerk Missy Leblanc attend the council's first meeting since the hurricanes, held in the auditorium at Belle Chasse High School.

In fact, Parish President Benny Rousselle said he got Bush to sign a note promising to support the rebuilding of Plaquemines.

Council Attorney Kevin Conner told the audience that the council's powers are severely limited during the state of emergency declared by Rousselle. But Conner said that declaration also makes the parish eligible for much-needed federal aid.

Residents asked a number of questions during the meeting, but the overriding theme appeared to be apprehension about the parish's levee system.

"The No. 1 question should be the levees," retired 4th Circuit Court of Appeal Judge Robert Lobrano said. "Do I take my insurance money and rebuild with only a Band-Aid holding the levee together?"

Lobrano who lives in Belair, about 11 miles south of Scarsdale on the parish's east bank, said a breach in the parish's back levees put 11½ feet of water on his property during Hurricane Katrina, flooding his home built 10 feet off the ground. His home flooded again during Hurricane Rita — and still has water in the garage, he said.

Rousselle said he has commitments from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to provide technical support so National Guardsmen can rebuild levees owned by the parish and private companies. Meanwhile, the corps has promised that federally owned levees will be rebuilt to pre-Katrina levels in time for the start of the 2006 hurricane season on June 1.

Rousselle also said he has asked Federal Emergency Management Agency officials to set up two sites with 500 trailers, one in Davant on the east bank of the Mississippi River and one in Diamond on the west bank. But, he said, FEMA has approved two sites, each with only 150 small travel trailers that can house about four people.

Besides hammering out details on the trailer site locations, Rousselle said he also has met with Coast Guard officials and Sen. David Vitter, R-La., about removing stranded boats and about temporary housing for employees.

Rousselle also said he needs citizens who want their homes demolished by the government to sign a right of entry form — available online at www.plaqueminesparish.com, at the Belle Chasse council office or at the Disaster Relief Center in the Belle Chasse Auditorium on Louisiana 23.

Rousselle said he thinks 90 percent of structures south of Myrtle Grove on the west bank and 95 percent of all structures south of Woodlawn on the east bank should be demolished.

Vaughn said residents with questions can call the government at (504) 392-6690, (504) 297-5600, (866) 833-4432 or (888) 683-8210.

Baby girl marks milestone in N.O.

By Steve Ritea
Staff writer

When Heidi Poche and her husband were deciding on a name for their daughter — the first baby born in a New Orleans hospital, according to Touro Infirmary, since the crippling storms — two names were not on the short list.

"No Katrina, no Rita," she said from her hospital bed Thursday. "We love the name Camille and it was even turning my stomach."

So instead they settled on something safe: Julia Marie, who was born at 9:30 a.m. Wednesday weighing 7 pounds, 11 ounces. "If they name a storm after Julia, I don't know what I'll do," she said.

Poche, her husband Stephen and their two other children, 4-year-old Sarah and 19-month-old Ellie, returned to their undamaged home in Algiers almost two weeks ago after spending nearly a month with family friends in Baton Rouge, where they evacuated before Katrina.

Stephen and Heidi Poche show off their new addition, Julia Marie Poche, who was born at 9:30 a.m. Wednesday to become the first baby born in a New Orleans hospital since Hurricane Katrina.

Although she was initially skeptical about returning to New Orleans, Stephen made trips into the city beforehand to haul out the refrigerator and get the house ready for his family. And with cleanup progressing well on the West Bank, now "it's looking like a normal day with a little tree damage" over there, she said.

Since the storm, Poche said she had been keeping up with Touro's status on the Internet and began to doubt that Dr. Laura Sporl, who delivered Ellie, would be able to deliver her third child.

She was planning to have her baby at West Jefferson Medical Center until Monday, Poche said, when Sporl called and announced, "I'm coming home."

Poche also was among the first patients at Touro, which officially reopened Wednesday with 50 of its normal 500 beds available, a spokeswoman said.

"All the nurses were so excited to have a real live patient," Poche said.

Pearl River having population surge

Gulf Coast evacuees seek high ground

By The Associated Press

PICAYUNE, MISS. — Pearl River County sits on the first high ground off the Gulf Coast, equidistant between New Orleans and Gulfport and easily accessible by either.

That setting has resulted in a post-Katrina population boom for a normally laid-back county with only a couple of towns and an easy way of life.

"Where it used to take you five minutes to get across town, it now takes 20," said Tom Milar, Picayune's deputy police chief. "The growth rate of this county has moved up 10 years."

Milar estimates that Picayune's population is nearly 40,000 people now. Before the storm, there were only 13,500 residents, he said.

A few miles further north on U.S. 59, the city of Poplarville has also experienced growth but not quite on Picayune's level.

Poplarville Mayor Billy Spiers said traffic is bad there, too, and his town had only 2,700 residents before the storm, most of whom he knew by sight.

"I wouldn't be scared to say there are 4,500 people now," Spiers said. "I've seen faces I never saw before the storm."

All these new faces have presented a multitude of challenges for both cities that go beyond bumper-to-bumper traffic, Milar and Spiers said.

Police in both places are stretched thin, and the hope is that FEMA will provide grants to allow the two police departments to permanently increase their numbers.

"We went from 12 accidents a week to 40 accidents a week," Milar said. "Calls for service went from 4,000 per month to 7,000 per month."

In addition, schools have had to bear the weight of numerous new students.

Spiers said several teachers have told him there are a couple hundred new students in Poplarville's school system, which had already been under a little strain before the storm.

It is hard to say where all these people are staying, too, as FEMA has been slow in setting up trailers in the county, both officials said. In Poplarville, Spiers said a lot of New Orleans residents had vacation homes that they've moved into.

In Picayune, Milar said there are no rentals available anywhere, so homes are being pushed to beyond capacity.

"Property values increased 20 percent overnight," Milar said. "In one place, there's 30 people staying in one house. Lots of two-family houses are now four-family houses."

This overcrowding will bring benefits though.

"In restaurants . . . you can't get in at lunch time," Spiers said. "And gas lines are long all day. The city will reap the benefits in sales tax."

The county is bound to experience significant economic growth from the sudden population boom, something the mayor and Picayune City Council have been meeting weekly to capitalize on, Milar said.

Milar and Spiers said most people they talk to say they are staying put, too.

"It looks like we're gonna be in it for the long haul," Milar said.

Girl puts her mouth where her money is

By The Associated Press

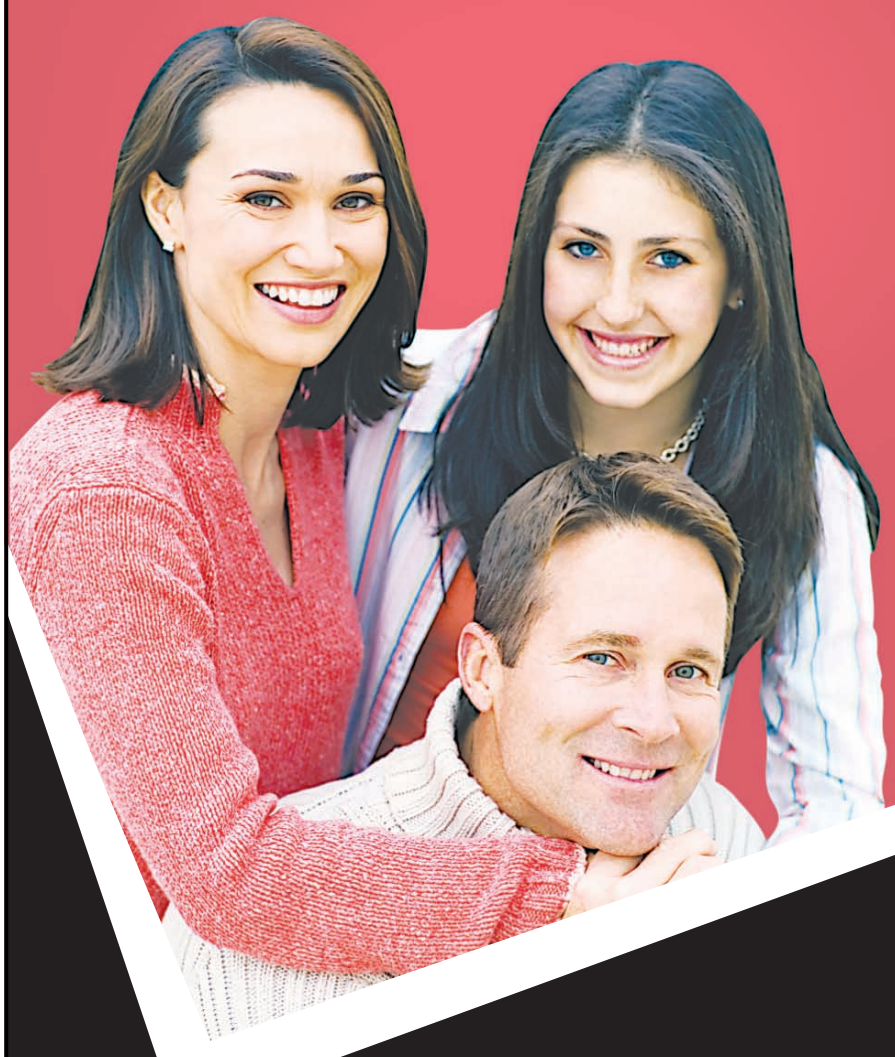
BRANDON, S.D. — An 8-year-old girl with a big heart and loose tooth found a creative way to help people displaced by hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Briton Nordmeyer of Brandon sent her tooth to the Red Cross chapter in Sioux Falls, S.D., hoping the tooth fairy would leave money there instead of under her pillow.

The tooth poked a hole through the envelope and fell out, but her letter made it.

After word spread of her generosity, a $500 check came in from an anonymous donor, said Jeff Stingley, director of the Sioux Empire Red Cross chapter.

Briton had told her mother she wanted to do something for children who lost everything in the storms.



"It's really nice to help them get new food, homes, schools, toys, lots of stuff to help them," Briton told KELO-TV of Sioux Falls.

Stingley said Wednesday the $500 anonymous check was the only one that mentioned the tooth but that he thinks Briton's story prompted other donations to the chapter.

THE NEWS IN BRIEF

Police chief retiring on eve of key election

NEW IBERIA — The city's police chief, who heads what little is left of the New Iberia Police Department, has announced his retirement just days before voters decide whether to revive the agency. Robert Feller, a 36-year department veteran, said Wednesday that he had been considering retirement before his agency was slashed last year to a handful of officers in favor of a contract with the Iberia Parish sheriff for most law enforcement services. On Saturday, voters will decide whether to revive the department or keep the contract with the sheriff. Mayor Hilda Curry said that if voters decide to stay with the sheriff, she will move to eliminate all of the Police Department. The city made the contract with the sheriff as a money-saving move, but backers of re-establishing the Police Department say no savings have been realized.

Jailer accused of sex with Caddo inmate

SHREVEPORT — A Caddo Parish sheriff's jailer has been accused of having sex with an inmate. Herbert Paul Simons, 50, of Shreveport was arrested Monday and booked into Caddo Correctional Center on one count of malfeasance. He was fired from his position as a jailer at the center the same day, sheriff's spokeswoman Cindy Chadwick said. Chadwick said Simons, who had worked at the jail for two years, was arrested just hours after sheriff's investigators received allegations that Simons had sex with a male inmate earlier that day. Although the alleged act was consensual, according to Chadwick, state law prohibits guards from having sex with inmates.

Medicare defrauders sentenced to prison

MONROE — Two men have been sentenced to federal prison for a fraud involving Medicare funds and their operation of a rehabilitation hospital in Columbia. Jedd Jones, 44, was ordered Wednesday to serve a year and a day in federal prison, while his former business partner in the Riverbend Rehabilitation Hospital, William Clark, was sentenced to 30 months. Both had faced 20 counts including conspiracy to commit Medicare fraud, making false statements, money laundering and health care fraud. They were indicted in March 2003. In April, Clark and Jones each pleaded guilty to one count of health care fraud. The other charges were dropped. Clark and Jones concealed their controlling interest in Riverbend so the hospital would pay their consulting and management company fees from March 1996 to March 2000, prosecutors said. The practice is illegal when one party controls both companies. U.S. District Judge Robert James ordered restitution totaling more than $4 million.

Caddo coroner's office, lab probed

By The Associated Press

SHREVEPORT — Two grand juries will investigate allegations of forged death certificates, fake documents and financial improprieties at the Caddo Parish coroner's office and a forensics laboratory owned by the parish's recently deceased coroner, prosecutors say.

Caddo Parish District Attorney Paul Carmouche said his office is investigating the authenticity of a deathbed letter in which Dr. George McCormick named one of his staff members to a top post in the office. McCormick died Sept. 20 of a heart attack.

The investigation also includes allegations of forgeries on some death certificates handled by the office, Carmouche said.

Authorities also have seized billing records and unfinished autopsy reports from McCormick's forensics laboratory in Bossier City.

Carmouche said evidence will go to a grand jury next month.

"This case is a little different than normal in our experience," he said. "We are continuing to get information about the coroner's office, some of which may be true, some of which may be just rumor. We decided to subpoena a number of the witnesses we're talking to, have them come in front of the grand jury under oath and see if we can get to the bottom of some of this."

Bossier Parish District Attorney Schuyler Marvin said another grand jury will investigate billings at McCormick's laboratory. He said it was too early to say whether he anticipates indictments.

Former LSU worker found dead in jail

By The Associated Press

BATON ROUGE — A former Louisiana State University employee apparently put a plastic bag over his head and suffocated in jail a day before his sentencing on a child pornography charge, authorities said.

Ron Brown, a former university public relations worker, probably killed himself early Wednesday in the West Baton Rouge Parish Jail, Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal Wayne Pilar said. Where Brown got the bag was unclear, Sheriff Mike Cazes said.

An autopsy was ordered.

Brown, 60, of Denham Springs, pleaded guilty in November to sexual exploitation, enticing for illegal sexual activity, and receiving and possessing child pornography. He faced up to 60 years in prison at his sentencing, which had been set for Thursday.

U.S. Attorney David Dugas said authorities were investigating Brown's death.

Brown's attorney, Thomas Damico of Baton Rouge, said his client had been worried about the impact that news coverage of the sentencing might have on his family.

WASHINGTON

THE NEWS IN BRIEF

Common Cause seeks Frist stock probe

WASHINGTON — A government watchdog group has filed a complaint with the Senate ethics committee requesting a probe into whether Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's ownership of HCA Inc. stock in a family trust posed a conflict of interest. Common Cause told the Senate panel that the shares, contained in a limited family partnership established by Frist's parents, was a conflict of interest because he knew he owned the shares and was informed of transactions between 1998 and 2002. Frist has stated in the past that there was no conflict as the Senate considered healthcare legislation because his shares in the hospital chain were held in a blind trust. "It seems apparent from these recently published reports that Sen. Frist faced a genuine conflict of interest long before his recent sale of HCA stock," Common Cause President Chellie Pingree wrote in a letter to the panel. The Associated Press reported about the family trust, which was not part of his Senate-approved blind trust, this week. The Securities and Exchange Commission last month authorized an investigation of Frist's order in June to sell blind-trust shares of HCA, a Nashville, Tenn., company founded by Frist family members.

Delay phone records subpoenaed in Texas

AUSTIN, TEXAS — A Texas prosecutor subpoenaed records for the home telephone of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and the phone of his political campaign Thursday. Also subpoenaed by prosecutor Ronnie Earle were records for two numbers for DeLay's daughter, Danielle DeLay Ferro. DeLay is facing charges of money laundering and conspiracy in a Texas campaign finance case. The subpoenas list telephone numbers, but not whom they belong to. They ask for information about the calls and the numbers' subscribers, voice mail service, billing information, long-distance calls made from or charged to the numbers and special features. "The thing is no big deal," said Bill White, Austin attorney for DeLay. Earle's office declined comment on the subpoenas. He has said the investigation is continuing. DeLay denies any wrongdoing.

Budget debate is brewing as Republicans look for cuts

Demos say programs for poor need funds

By Andrew Taylor
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats and their allies are ramping up a campaign against GOP plans to cut the federal budget to help finance hurricane relief. Republicans are convinced the cuts are an issue around which they can rally their core supporters.

At issue are Republican plans to trim $35 billion or more from federal benefit programs such as Medicaid, farm subsidies and food stamps. The budget-cutting effort — the first such plan in eight years — has been in motion since the spring but has attracted renewed attention after Hurricane Katrina.

Republicans claim momentum as the enormous costs of Katrina have brought renewed attention to the problem of budget deficits. For them, the debate is an opportunity to reclaim their budget-cutting credentials with conservatives who think the GOP has been too loose with the federal checkbook during its years in power.

"Politically, Republicans now need to be visibly engaged on behalf of something that resonates with their own voting base," said Mike Franc, vice president of government relations at the Heritage Foundation. "Where else do you turn to get your base excited?"

For Democrats, just the opposite is true. Trimming the budget means at least some politically polarizing cuts to high-profile programs such as food stamps and Medicaid, giving them an opportunity to tar Republicans as targeting the less fortunate.

"Paying for hurricane relief on the backs of the poor is not going to be a winning issue for Republicans," Democratic strategist Jim Jordan said. "It's like they wake up every day determined to reinforce their own negative stereotypes."

In fact, the content of the upcoming budget bill is not at all clear. Under Congress' arcane budget process, legislative committees have been given a set of deficit cut targets to achieve through any combination of spending cuts, new revenues — or even spending increases, as long as they are paid for with cuts elsewhere.

In the Senate, GOP moderates vow to limit cuts to programs aimed at the poor such as Medicaid and food stamps. And cuts to the student loan program would affect lenders rather than students. In fact, student aid would increase by $5.5 billion under a Senate measure already approved by the Health, Educations, Labor and Pensions Committee.

There is no shortage of demands to use some of the savings in the upcoming bill to pay for new spending unrelated to hurricane relief. The powerful lobby for doctors is pushing to reverse a 4 percent cut in their Medicare payments. Among the pet programs lawmakers hope to fund with spending cuts elsewhere in the budget are subsidies for dairy farmers and money for updated radios for first responders.

Republicans also note that the $35 billion in deficit savings over five years is a relative pittance in a budget slated to total about $14 trillion over the same period. And large chunks of that savings are expected to come from new sources of revenue such as auctioning off the public airwaves to wireless communications companies and from drilling leases in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska.

In the House, GOP leaders promise to up the ante from $35 billion to $50 billion, but budget experts in the Senate say that chamber has its hands full just trying to produce the lower figure.

Some political analysts say the budget debate is fraught with risks for Republicans. And if they are successful in forcing a bigger dent in spending, it may mean greater political opportunities for Democrats.

"It's real important to the conservatives in Congress that are pushing it," said Thomas Mann, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution. "But whether they can produce something that's impressive enough to satisfy their (conservative) constituents without opening themselves to harmful political attacks from Democrats is uncertain."

White House says Miers won't quit

Despite criticism, she'll stick it out

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The White House on Thursday dismissed the possibility that Supreme Court nominee Harriet Miers might withdraw if she encounters heavy fire in her Senate confirmation and suggested her nomination was becoming embroiled in "side issues like religion."

Harriet Miers
Supreme Court nominee

Asked if there were any circumstances under which she would ask that her name be withdrawn, presidential spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters: "No one that knows her would make such a suggestion."

"And no one that knows her record and her qualifications would make such a suggestion," McClellan said.

Conservative critics have complained that Miers lacks a clear judicial philosophy and have questioned whether she is the best-qualified nominee, given that she has never been a judge and has little public record.

President Bush and White House officials have sought to reassure conservatives by emphasizing Miers' evangelical faith. "Part of Harriet Miers' life is her religion," Bush said Wednesday.

Yet in a combative exchange with reporters, McClellan on Thursday said: "You all want to focus on side issues like religion."

"We've always talked about her record and her qualifications," McClellan said.

Undercover spy to lead secret agency

CIA manager's job to oversee human spying

By Katherine Shrader
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — A top CIA manager who remains undercover will soon oversee traditional human spying activities for the entire intelligence community, a position created in the post-Sept. 11 intelligence overhaul.

Publicly, he is referred to simply as "Jose."

His posting as director of the new National Clandestine Service ends weeks of debate over whether the CIA would retain its primacy over the government's traditional human spywork, as an increasing number of U.S. national security agencies take on these types of assignments.

Jose will now broadly coordinate operations for the CIA, FBI, Defense Department and other agencies involved in human intelligence, or the information gathered by people, rather than by technical means.

"This is another positive step in building an intelligence community that is more unified, coordinated and effective," National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said in a statement Thursday about the new service.

Forming a National Clandestine Service was one of more than 70 recommendations from President Bush's commission on weapons of mass destruction, which released a bruising report in March about the current capabilities of the 15 agencies that make up the U.S. intelligence community.

The report concluded that the "toughest targets remain largely impenetrable" to human spying operations.

CIA Director Porter Goss drafted a plan that would place the National Clandestine Service under his chain of command. The plan's acceptance is viewed as a victory for the CIA.

Intelligence veterans have said for months that any arrangement that somehow undermined the CIA's role as the top producer of human intelligence would hurt the agency's clout and deepen problems with agency morale.

In a statement, Goss said the decision represents "an expression of confidence in the CIA" from Bush and Negroponte. "No agency has greater skill and experience in this difficult, complex, and utterly vital discipline of intelligence," Goss said.

With Thursday's announcement, Jose is promoted from his current position as chief of the CIA's most well-known division, its clandestine service, formally called the Directorate of Operations. He will have two deputies: one that oversees the daily activities of that CIA directorate and another that coordinates the work of the entire intelligence community.

According to a CIA fact sheet, the goal is to create standards for training, conduct and intelligence-gathering techniques that will apply across the various intelligence agencies.

The new service will also be responsible for ensuring intelligence operations don't conflict with each other. On the ground level, for instance, that may mean ensuring procedures are followed to prevent the FBI and CIA from recruiting the same source.

Easing air quality rules proposed

White House plan benefits power plants

By John Heilprin
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration proposed new regulations Thursday that could let the nation's dirtiest power plants release more air pollutants each year — and possibly undercut lawsuits aimed at forcing companies to comply with the Clean Air Act.

The proposal follows a June federal court ruling that said power plants can throw more pollutants into the air each year when they modernize to operate for longer hours.

It's the latest in a series of attempts by the Environmental Protection Agency to make the nearly 30-year-old Clean Air Act rules for coal-fired power plants more industry-friendly. Some changes were held up by lawsuits from environmentalists and state officials.

"We are now doing to smokestacks what we did to tailpipes," said EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson, who predicted the regulations would spur greater technology innovation.

"We want to remove any unnecessary regulatory obstacles," he said. "We're focused on practical, achievable results that don't get delayed by years of litigation."

The EPA proposal affects the nation's 600 coal-burning power plants, which represent 55 percent of the nation's electric generating capacity. Industry officials say the plants are getting cleaner. But they continue to produce millions of tons of nitrogen oxides and sulfur dioxide blamed for smog, acid rain and soot, and other fine particles that lodge in people's lungs and cause asthma and other respiratory ailments. They also remain a big source of mercury, which works its way up the food chain after being absorbed by fish.

EPA "is embracing industry-backed loopholes that undermine basic protections for millions of Americans breathing harmful smokestack pollution," said Vickie Patton, an attorney who handles air quality issues for the advocacy group Environmental Defense.

Proponents say other EPA and state regulations would prevent that from happening.

"The heavy lifting of emissions control is already ensured by tough new EPA rules on interstate emissions and mercury control," said Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council, which represents electric utilities.

Utilities are legally obligated to continue to cut their pollution, said Dan Riedinger, spokesman for the Edison Electric Institute, another trade group. He said it was "a gross distortion of the facts" to conclude that power plants would increase pollution.

But an analysis of EPA data by Environmental Defense shows many East Coast power plants won't install new controls to clean up sulfur dioxide by 2015, despite EPA's predictions.

In June, the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said Duke Energy Corp. didn't need permission from EPA or states when it improved eight power plants in North Carolina and South Carolina from 1988 to 2000. But EPA seems to depart from another ruling in June, by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. In a challenge by New York to EPA's air programs, that court said "Congress directed the agency to measure emissions increases in terms of changes in actual emissions," not by hourly rates.

Gingrich may run for president

By The Associated Press

MOBILE, ALA. — Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich said Thursday he might run for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008 — unless some candidates promote his ideas.

"There are circumstances where I will run," Gingrich said before a speech at the University of Mobile.

Asked under what circumstances he would enter the race, Gingrich, 62, said, "My hope is that five or six candidates are going to jump up, steal all of my ideas, and I will be able to relax and go golf."

Woman booked with cutting open pregnant neighbor

By Ramesh Santanam
Associated Press writer

PITTSBURGH — A woman clubbed her pregnant neighbor over the head with a baseball bat, drove her to the woods and cut her belly with a knife in an attempt to steal her baby, police say.

Police said Wednesday's attack on Valerie Oskin was stopped before her baby was taken after a teenager on an all-terrain vehicle came across the women.

Oskin, 30, later underwent an emergency Caesarean section at a hospital. State police Thursday said she was in critical condition and her baby in stable condition. She was believed to have been in her third trimester of pregnancy, authorities said.

Peggy Jo Conner, 38, of Ford City, Pa., was arraigned Thursday on charges of attempted homicide and aggravated assault and was jailed without bail.

The assault began Wednesday morning, when Conner hit Oskin several times with a bat, Andreassi said. Conner put Oskin and Oskin's 7-year-old son in her car, dropped the boy off at a family member's home and drove the pregnant woman about 15 miles to a secluded area about 50 miles northeast of Pittsburgh, Andreassi said.

There, Conner cut Oskin across her abdomen with a razor knife, authorities said.

"She was sliced over an old (Caesarean) scar and severely bleeding," Trooper Jonathan Bayer said.

A 17-year-old boy on an ATV spotted Conner kneeling next to the pregnant woman on the ground, Bayer said. The boy rode home and told his father, who called authorities, who arrested Conner at the scene.

THE NEWS IN BRIEF

Black student who defied Wallace dies

ATLANTA — Vivian Malone Jones, one of two black students whose effort to enroll at the University of Alabama led to George Wallace's infamous "stand in the schoolhouse door" in 1963, died Thursday. She was 63. Jones, who went on to become the first black person to graduate from the school, died at Atlanta Medical Center, where she had been admitted Tuesday after suffering a stroke, said her sister, Sharon Malone. "She was absolutely fine Monday," Malone said. Jones, a retired federal worker who lived in Atlanta, grew up in Mobile, Ala. She had enrolled at historically black Alabama A&M University in Huntsville when she transferred to the University of Alabama in 1963. The move led to then-Gov. Wallace's infamous stand in defiance of orders to admit black students. Jones and James Hood, accompanied by then-Deputy U.S. Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach, enrolled after Wallace finished his statement and left. At an appearance last year in Mobile, she recalled meeting with Wallace in 1996, when the former governor was in frail health. He died in 1998. "I asked him why did he do it," she said. "He said he did what he felt needed to be done at that point in time, but he would not do that today. At that point, we spoke — I spoke — of forgiveness."

7th day of rain tangles Northeast

TRENTON, N.J. — A seventh straight day of rain across much of the soggy Northeast trapped motorists in their cars, delayed airline flights and sent streams surging over their banks Thursday. Flood warnings covered parts of Connecticut, New York and New Jersey, and residents in some New Jersey communities were urged to evacuate their homes. Northern New Jersey received as much as 4½ inches of rain in 48 hours, and forecasters said some areas of the state could get 2 inches more by Friday. A deluge over the weekend dumped about 5 inches across the state and as much as 10 in a few spots. The rain was expected to continue through Saturday. Across the Northeast, at least 10 people have died since last weekend because of the downpours, and four others were missing in New Hampshire. "We're just bracing for the next storm," said Bergen County Executive Dennis McNerney. "But we're not building an ark just yet."

4 polio cases found in Amish community

ST. PAUL, MINN. — Four children in a Minnesota Amish community have become infected with the polio virus, the first known infections in the U.S. in five years, state health officials said. Health officials said the cases do not pose a threat to the general public because most people have been vaccinated against polio. But they said they expect to find more infections within the Amish community because some of its members refuse immunizations on religious grounds. None of the children has shown any symptoms of the paralyzing disease. About one in 200 people who contract the polio virus suffer paralysis because of it; others typically shed the virus after weeks or months. None of the four children had been vaccinated. Three are siblings; the fourth is an infant from another family. Officials would not identify the Amish community but said it consisted of 100 to 200 people. Dr. Harry Hull, the state epidemiologist, said the infections were traced back to an oral vaccine that was administered in another country, probably within the past three years. Use of oral polio vaccine containing the live virus stopped in the United States in 2000. The live-virus vaccine caused an average of eight cases of polio a year in the United States.

Playwright Pinter wins Nobel Prize

LONDON — In honoring British playwright Harold Pinter on Thursday, Nobel Prize judges have again chosen an artist of literary achievement and political contention. The 75-year-old Pinter, widely considered to be the most influential British playwright of his generation, is also an unrelenting critic of U.S. involvement in Iraq and of the government of Prime Minister Tony Blair. "I think the world is going down the drain if we're not very careful," a frail but defiant Pinter, who has been treated for throat cancer in recent years, said to reporters outside his London home. Pinter will receive $1.3 million for winning the Nobel.

Bird flu case puts Turkey on high alert

KIZIKSA, TURKEY — A team in white, full-body protective suits scoured a village in western Turkey on Thursday for any poultry that farmers might be hiding or that could have escaped destruction after the European Union confirmed a virulent strain of bird flu had been detected in the region. The Turkish government said it has contained the outbreak of the H5N1 virus, which scientists worry might mutate into a human virus and spark a pandemic. Bird flu was detected after 1,800 turkeys died on a farm in Kiziksa, 80 miles southwest of Istanbul. Authorities have destroyed some 8,600 turkeys and chickens in the area and placed the village under quarantine, but hundreds of poultry apparently escaped the destruction. "Normally it would be over, but a few people are hiding their chickens," said one veterinary official.

Many earthquake survivors now must sleep in the street in Balakot, Pakistan. An aftershock jolted parts of the country Thursday, panicking the hungry, homeless survivors of last weekend's devastating quake.

U.N.: Time is running out for some quake survivors

As winter nears, need is desperate

By Zarar Khan
Associated Press writer

MUZAFFARABAD, PAKISTAN — With snow falling in parts of Kashmir, harried relief workers tried to reach remote areas on foot Thursday as the U.N.'s emergency relief chief warned time was running out for many survivors of South Asia's massive earthquake.

U.N. Undersecretary General and Emergency Relief Coordinator Jan Egeland flew by helicopter to the Kashmiri city of Muzaffarabad, where he said millions of people urgently needed food, medicine, shelter and blankets. The U.N. estimates 2 million people are homeless ahead of the Himalayan region's fierce winter.

"I fear we are losing the race against the clock in the small villages" cut off by blocked roads, Egeland said. "I've never seen such devastation before. We are in the sixth day of operation, and every day the scale of devastation is getting wider."

The plea came after a 5.6-magnitude aftershock jolted parts of Pakistan early Thursday, forcing a rescue team to suspend efforts to save a trapped woman. She died before the rescuers returned to the precarious rubble.

The quake death toll was more than 35,000, and tens of thousands were injured. India has reported more than 1,350 deaths in the part of disputed Kashmir that it controls.

Carrying water, juice and milk, a relief team from Britain-based Plan International flew in a helicopter to villages in northern Mansehra district in North West Frontier Province and found death and misery.

"The whole valley is smelling awfully," said Dr. Irfan Ahmed, the aid group's health adviser. "People were hungry and panicking."

"Conditions are going from bad to worse. These people don't have any shelter. Also, the school has collapsed, and the children were in those classrooms," he said.

The 5.6-magnitude aftershock early Thursday was centered 85 miles north of Islamabad, near the epicenter of Saturday's 7.6-magnitude quake that demolished whole towns.

U.S. military directs copters to Pakistan

Aid may improve opinions of America

By Matthew Pennington
Associated Press writer

BALAKOT, PAKISTAN — With a whoosh of dust, the twin-rotor Chinook helicopter circled a scene of devastation in the quake-flattened town of Balakot in northern Pakistan and landed on a riverbank, in front of hundreds of bedraggled survivors of southern Asia's earthquake.

Within minutes, the U.S. Army crew had disgorged its cargo of tents — donated by the Iranian Red Crescent — and filled the hulking copter with 12 badly injured people on stretchers and shrouded by blankets.

In a move that could boost America's battered profile in the Islamic world, the U.S. military has diverted eight heavy-lifting helicopters from the war on terrorism in neighboring Afghanistan to help earthquake victims. It's due to send another two dozen helicopters from further afield in the days ahead.

"I don't have a bad feeling about America," said Wali ur-Rehman, who lost four children in the quake and cradled a surviving son, 2-year-old Kalil, in his arms. "It's a long, long way away, and they are helping us."

Six days after the temblor, the injured, many with open fractures that have become infected, were still pouring in from outlying villages to Balakot. From the air, it appeared that the ground has been pulled out from under the town. Buildings were spread-eagled, tin roofs were grounded.

Local police and rescue workers estimated 2,000 to 3,000 people had died in Balakot, including hundreds of children buried in three destroyed schools. Many more were feared dead in outlying villages, which have seen little of the aid that has gravitated toward the town.

The U.N. undersecretary general and emergency relief coordinator, Jan Egeland, flew over Kashmir by helicopter Thursday and warned that time was running out for the tens of thousands left homeless by the quake.

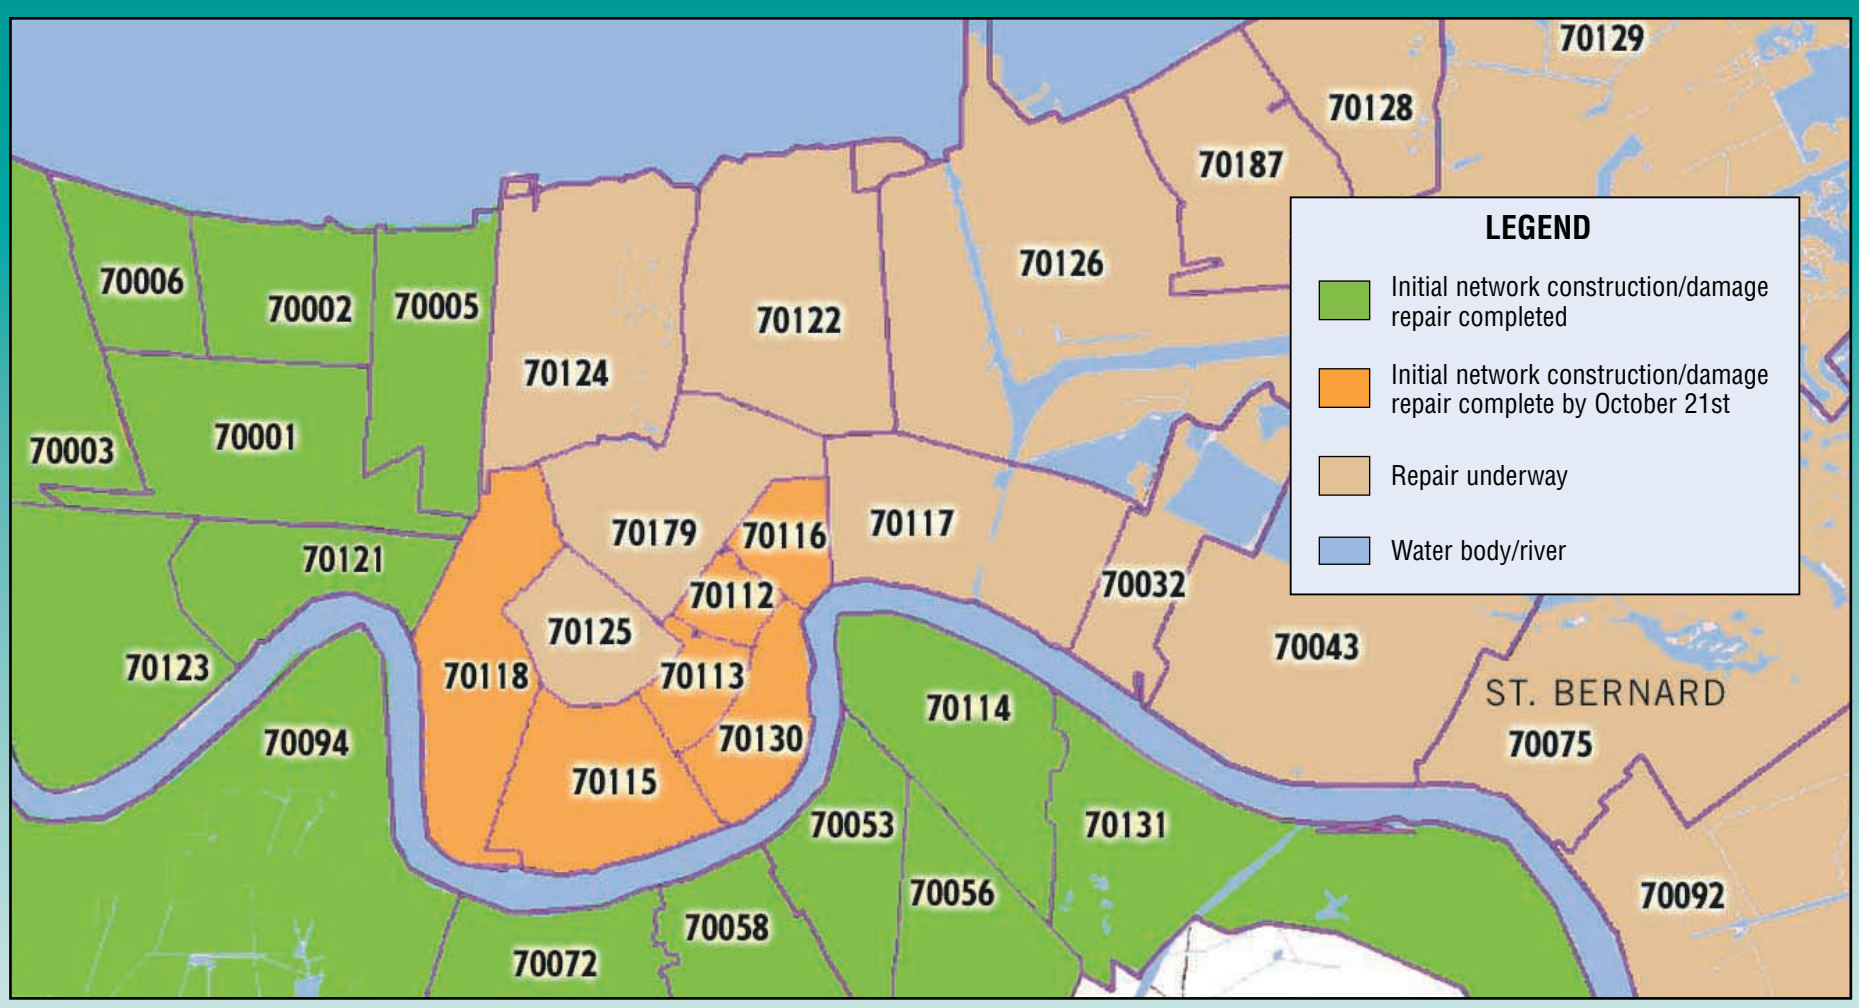
"I fear we are losing the race against the clock in the small villages" cut off by blocked roads, Egeland said. "I've never seen such devastation before."

Fateh Sher, 22, a medical student volunteer in Balakot, said the American helicopter missions would change people's opinions of the United States — whose Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice promised long-term aid during Pakistan's "hour of need."

"The media and all others who come here can see that America can help us," Sher said.

Another volunteer, Irfan Haider, was more circumspect.

"America always helps, like they did during the tsunami," he said, referring to the assistance given by the U.S. military to parts of Indonesia, Thailand and other nations hit by the devastating waves that killed tens of thousands of people in December.



"But I think the U.S. should not help Israel. America's politics are still a problem," Haider said.

Pakistan's government is a strong ally in the war on terrorism, but its 150 million mostly Muslim people deeply resent the United States.

"Miss Behavin' " — the lewd logo of the Chinook — was covered with green gaffer tape to respect "cultural sensitivities," said Chief Warrant Officer Mark Jones, the chief pilot.

"This is a good job," he said. "You see the people. They are scared and they're hurting. It's good to know we are getting them out to hospital, especially the kids."

Important news about COX service

We appreciate your patience as we continue repairing the cable system to get service back up to all serviceable homes in the area.

No other cable system has ever been exposed to such severe conditions. While we have made significant progress in reconnecting thousands of homes and businesses, your location may still not have service.

Here are some reasons why you may not have service even though the network in your area is restored:

- A utility pole or line is down
- The cable is down between the pole or pedestal and your premises
- Your line has been severed by neighbors digging in their yards or cutting down trees
- Electricity has not been restored at a key point in the network
- Pedestals have been destroyed as storm debris was picked up

We have over 1000 employees and construction contractors working across the entire metro-area to restore service to customers as quickly as possible. These crews are going street by street, working to replace or repair the network.

Again, we thank you for your continued business and your patience as we rebuild Greater New Orleans together.

Rebels hit Russian city, dozens dead

Attack opens new front in long war

By Fatima Tlisova
Associated Press writer

NALCHIK, RUSSIA — Militants attacked police and government buildings in Russia's volatile Caucasus region Thursday, taking hostages and turning a provincial capital into a war zone wracked by gunfire and explosions that left at least 85 people dead, mostly insurgents.

Chechen rebels claimed responsibility for the offensive in Nalchik, the capital of the mostly Muslim republic of Kabardino-Balkariya, as a new front opened in the Kremlin's decade-old battle against Islamic insurgents.

The rebels' struggle against Russia, originally a separatist movement, increasingly has melded with Islamic extremism in the past decade and fanned out beyond Chechnya's borders to encompass the entire Caucusus region.

The insurgent strategy of simultaneous attacks on facilities in Nalchik, a city of 235,000, was similar to a rebel siege last year in another Caucasus republic, Ingushetia, in what appears to be an attempt to target areas outside Chechnya and keep Moscow off-balance.

Kabardino-Balkariya is the fifth of seven republics in the mountainous region to be hit by the spillover of violence from the struggle in Chechnya. The insurgents are trying to exploit tensions among a variety of ethnic groups in the impoverished region as well as native Muslims and the ethnic Russians, who are Christian.

President Vladimir Putin, beleaguered by attacks that have killed hundreds of civilians and underscored his failure to bring the southern area under control, ordered a total blockade of Nalchik to prevent militants from slipping out. He told security forces to shoot any armed resisters.

AP PHOTO

A Russian officer walks a man down the street in Nalchik, Russia, after militants launched simultaneous attacks on police and government buildings.

Thursday's fighting began about 8:30 a.m. Thursday after police launched an operation to capture about 10 militants in a Nalchik suburb. All 10 suspected militants were killed, Russian Deputy Interior Minister Alexander Chekalin said.

Gunmen staged simultaneous attacks against three police stations, the city's airport and the regional headquarters of the Interior Ministry and Federal Security Service in what appeared what appeared to be an effort to divert police.

The attack at the airport was repelled, the facility was placed under military control and all flights were canceled, news reports said.

The militants also attacked the regional headquarters of the Russian prison system, the Emergency Situation Ministry's press office said. Interfax said a border guards' office also came under attack.

Security soaring ahead of Iraqi vote

Checkpoints go up, polls barricaded

By Hamza Hendawi
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Hundreds of Iraqi police and army troops fanned out across Baghdad on Thursday, setting up checkpoints and fortifying polling stations with barbed wire and blast barriers two days ahead of a historic constitutional referendum.

From the city's Shiite stronghold of Kazimiyah to its southern approaches in the notorious "Triangle of Death," the capital's usually chaotic traffic was down to a tiny fraction. Many stores didn't bother to open and others shuttered early ahead of a 10 p.m. curfew.

By nightfall, Baghdad streets were almost emptied of civilians. The large army and police presence, combined with the scarcity of people and vehicles, gave the city a disquieting calm.

Similar security precautions were in place across much of Iraq in anticipation of a spike in attacks by insurgents who want to derail the political process. Nearly 450 people have been killed in violence over the past 18 days.

AP PHOTO

Iraqis grieve for the two Iraqi policemen killed when a car bomb hit their patrol vehicle in Kirkuk, Iraq, on Thursday. In the past 18 days, nearly 450 people have been killed in Iraq as the insurgents try to scare voters away from the polls Saturday.

In the so-called Triangle of Death, a mainly Sunni area known for kidnappings and killings, Iraqi troops searched cars under the watchful eyes of comrades manning machine-gun positions. U.S. helicopters hovered over the area.

U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch provided an upbeat assessment of the security situation ahead of the vote, arguing that the insurgent danger was far less than on the eve of the Jan. 30 parliamentary election. Also, Iraq's security forces total 200,000 now, compared to 138,000 in January, Lynch said.

In a clampdown to safeguard the vote, Iraq's borders closed Thursday at midnight and will reopen Sunday. Baghdad's International Airport will be shut Friday and Saturday. Private vehicles are banned for two days starting Friday evening. A nationwide 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. curfew began Thursday and remains in force until Sunday.

If the charter is adopted, a general election will be held in two months to elect a full-term parliament. If it fails, an election will still be held in December but only for another interim chamber that will try again to draft a charter.

The constitution will fail if it falls short of a simple majority or is rejected by two-thirds of voters in three of Iraq's 18 provinces.

Underlining fears of a surge in violence, President Bush on Thursday sought to rally U.S. troops in Iraq, saying, "The enemy understands that a free Iraq would be a blow to their vision.

"We put in motion something that can't be stopped, and that is the march of freedom," he told soldiers based in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit in a video conference.

There are 156,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, a total that has been rising in recent weeks as the 101st Airborne returns, along with lead elements of the 3rd Corps Support Command. The last-minute amendments to the draft constitution adopted Wednesday were designed to win Sunni Arab support but did not meet all their demands — primarily for a clear assertion of Iraq's Arab identity and a reduction of wide powers accorded to provincial governments that Sunnis say could lead to Iraq's breakup.

Saddam likely to face murder charges next week

By Mariam Fam
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Ousted Iraqi President Saddam Hussein likely will face charges of premeditated murder, torture and forced expulsion and disappearances when he goes on trial next week for a 1982 massacre of Shiites, a court official said Thursday.

Saddam and seven other defendants are accused of killing 143 Shiites in the village of Dujail, north of Baghdad, after a failed assassination attempt against Saddam.

Prosecutors have not announced the exact charges, which are expected when the trial opens on Wednesday. Investigating Judge Raid Juhi told reporters in Baghdad that the charges would focus on the areas of "crimes of premeditated murder, forced expulsion of residents, torture and forced disappearances of individuals."

Saddam could face the death penalty if convicted.

Juhi also reaffirmed that there would be no postponement of the trial's start, which Saddam's attorneys had sought to review documents they received Sept. 25.

"The special tribunal has enabled the representatives of the defense through all legal means to completely review all the evidence, documents and investigation papers," he said.

The trial is expected to be the first of about a dozen involving crimes committed by Saddam and his regime.

Here all along

Throughout the rage of Katrina and Rita, our team has remained available to all we serve. We moved from damaged Galleria offices to temporary facilities still in the heart of our community, all the while maintaining contact with clients to serve their needs. We have guided hundreds through the complexities of FEMA filings and insurance claims. And in these extraordinary times, we continue to offer aid in every way, from arranging temporary housing to helping individuals and businesses recover from devastation.

We are grateful to the members of our team who have been on call to help at a moment's notice. And we thank the thousands of first responders who have helped the Gulf Coast through the nation's most fierce natural disaster. The dedication and sacrifices of all these men and women is further evidence that justice isn't only about law books and courts. It is the continuing effort to do what is right.

Crews working to restore power to east

EAST, from A-1

sewage service, and most of it lacks electricity.

Fearing the unknown

"Nobody official is talking about what the plans are for what's happening here now," Karen Edwards said. "The movers and shakers and decision-makers all live Uptown," Clarence Edwards said. He said he was troubled by rumors that his neighborhood would be bulldozed.

On that point, officials agree: "No home will be bulldozed unless the owner and the city determine it will be," said state Rep. Austin Badon Jr. "The homes will not be bulldozed," said state Sen. Ann Duplessis. Both New Orleans Democrats, their districts encompass eastern New Orleans.

District E City Councilwoman Cynthia Willard-Lewis, whose home in Lake Barrington West was flooded, said crews have been working aggressively to restore power since before residents were permitted re-entry. An industrial corridor that includes Textron Marine and Land, Folgers Coffee and Lockheed Martin has electricity, she said, and crews were working to light Interstate 10.

She said residents should communicate with Entergy to request service. A longtime resident of eastern New Orleans, she plans to rebuild and encourage the area's recovery. "We are not backing off," she said.

Duplessis, whose Eastover Country Club home took on 8 feet of water, said restoring power as well as ensuring that the area is safe are key considerations. "We just don't have all the answers yet," she said. "As soon as I can come back, I'm coming back. We're all in the same boat. We're not just sitting around hoping something happens."

Life litters front yard

Badon visited his gutted home in Lake Forest Estates on Wednesday. "That's my life there on the front yard," he said, gesturing to the house's disgorged contents piled by the curb. He acknowledged that residents face serious challenges when they return, but he remains optimistic they can rebuild.

"I'm not letting some little storm run me away from my home," he said.

Badon said electricity and water should be restored throughout the area within four weeks, though it will take longer in the outlying areas such as Village de L'est. The Department of Environmental Quality "has not found anything in the soil, air or water that says we cannot rebuild," he said.

He said insurance rates will rise, and local legislators are depending on the congressional delegation to prevent them from becoming too expensive. "We can't afford it at the city and state level," he said. "We've got to have some federal assistance."

But property values also will rise, he said, and eastern New Orleans will revive. "This was such a nice, family-oriented area of the city," he said. "We have a unique opportunity to make it better. We need to take advantage of that."

His next-door neighbors on Waterford Boulevard also want to rebuild, but they want several questions answered first. "We are going to repair the home," Sylvia Duke said as she walked through the gutted shell of her Acadian-style house, whose oak floors and cypress wainscoting were torn out.

Duke, who owns a home health agency, said she was frustrated that she couldn't reopen her business because her 35 employees cannot get local housing. "The longer we keep them out, the less likely they are to return," she said, noting that one nurse left for Dallas, where she had four job offers.

Duke said she wants to see an improved education system, safely rebuilt levees and a "stable tax base" before she would live in New Orleans again. Otherwise, she said, the couple will sell their home and relocate.

Signs of life

A few signs of rebuilding are evident in the area. Outside Eastover, whose golf course is scorched with desiccated mud, a vinyl banner announces, "It Ain't Over — It's Eastover. We Are Rebuilding," and a telephone number is listed for the Eastover Development Co. No one answered at the number Wednesday and Thursday.

In Barrington Park on Wednesday, Joe Rochon was busy salvaging items from the house his father built 30 years ago on Bullard Avenue. His father died in May 1999, but he said his mother, Gloria Rochon, is eager to restore the house and return to live there.

The brick home had about 5 feet of floodwater, but its metal roof was undamaged. "I think it's feasible," Rochon said. "It's going to have to be gutted. It has a lot of memories. We'd like to see it restored. If my father were alive today, that's what he would want to do."

Rochon said his mother would return even if the neighborhood were barren, devoid of former neighbors as well as local shops. "That's how it was 30 years ago," he said. Rochon and his two brothers plan to be nearby. "We're around to help her," he said.

'I won't be back'

Other displaced eastern New Orleans residents are determined not to return. After Larry Cole cleaned out his apartment at Lakeland Manor on Wednesday, he was heading back to Jackson, Miss. That's where he wound up after a helicopter plucked him from atop the nearby levee at Hayne Boulevard on Sept. 1.

"I'm moving out. I won't be back," he said. "There's nothing to come back to. There's too much destruction."

Emma Porter planned to remain in Atlanta, where she had been staying with a family of 14 until Saturday, when she moved into an apartment. She returned Wednesday to her home on Dwyer Avenue, which had stood in 4 feet of water. It was scarred with mold and her muddy possessions were scattered around its interior.

"This is devastating, just having to sit here waiting for an adjuster," she said. "This leaves me with absolutely nothing. How can I start over?" She pointed to a china cabinet in which glasses still held cloudy water. In the kitchen, the refrigerator lay upended, its corner on the counter where the flood moored it. "I can't salvage anything," she said.

Porter held back tears. She wasn't looking forward to the drive back to Baton Rouge, where she would catch the bus to Atlanta, a trip that took her 10 hours. Thinking about rebuilding was impossible, and thinking about the future was too much to bear.

"I can't think past today," she said. "I truly feel like I'm on the verge of a nervous breakdown." She wanted to curl up in a closet and pretend it never happened, she said, "or pinch myself and say, 'Hey, it was all a bad dream.' " that levee and add additional structures there, then that might be more than we can do before next hurricane season."

The issue is key to the resettlement of the New Orleans area, which is going more slowly than officials had hoped. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and other officials are urging residents to return. But after Katrina flooded the city Aug. 29 and Hurricane Rita dealt a second blow about three weeks later, questions have been raised about the short- and long-term safety of the levee system.

Many parts of the city's hurricane protection system — such as at the Industrial Canal, also known as the Inner Harbor Navigation Canal, and the St. Bernard back levee — were clearly overwhelmed by Katrina's storm surge, he said, so work will start on them soon. The corps put contracts out for bid earlier this week to repair eight breach areas.

But in the 17th Street and London Avenue canals, engineers who have studied the levees say water did not overflow the concrete walls but that they broke as soil beneath them gave way. That could indicate a design or construction problem. Engineers from the corps, American Association of Civil Engineers and the National Science Foundation are investigating the levee system, looking for clues to what caused the breaches.

Plan B

Strock said he hopes the corps will have enough information and a plan on how to address the 17th Street and London Avenue breaches in 30 to 60 days. In the meantime, the corps intends to install temporary steel dams to patch them.

If investigators conclude that the foundations of those floodwalls are faulty, he said, "What we might do is go full bore, focus our efforts right now on the Inner Harbor while we design the fixes for the others, and then turn our attention to those and go at those full bore."

Strock said that if the investigation shows the canals need completely new structures, then the corps will examine all options, including floodgates at the mouth of the canals.

"We must restore this level of protection by hurricane season next year," he said. "It may not be repairing the floodwalls; it may be doing something in a more permanent fashion across the fronts of these canals to take the surge off before it gets into the canals."

Assuming the corps gets financing, Strock said, he believes it can pursue such an alternative solution without going through the laborious process of getting a new authorization from Congress. As long as the corps provides the same level of storm protection already authorized, he said, he believes there's significant flexibility on what structures it can build to provide it.

The corps originally proposed floodgates for the canals when the system was constructed more than two decades ago, he said, but local officials expressed concern that closed floodgates would limit the pumping stations' ability to get water out of the city during a storm.

Looking for answers

Strock said the corps is determined to get to the bottom of what caused floodwall breaches in the drainage canals.

"These were very visible, clearly defined breaks in the levees, and the fact that they did occur in canals, in restricted parts, indicates there is something that needs to be looked at there," he said.

But he cautioned against jumping to conclusions, noting that the levee system is complex and that some walls were overwhelmed. If the corps designed for a particular set of flood and wind conditions in canals, he said, and "if we find out that we designed against those conditions and those conditions were not exceeded, then we'll conclude we did have a failure of something, either design or construction."

He also addressed concerns by some critics who have questioned whether the corps should investigate itself when it could turn out that its errors played a role in the disaster.

"If it does develop that we have a design or construction problem in there, then we will accept accountability for that," he said. "I don't know what form it takes — shoot me at sunrise or whatever. But we will own up to that because we have to. If there's any problem there, we need to know because we cannot afford to put back a system that's flawed."

Only 1,800 families have FEMA trailers

SHELTERS, from A-1

The number of people in shelters in Louisiana has dropped from 40,500 at the beginning of the month to just about 9,300 people recorded in shelters Thursday, according to state statistics. Nationwide the shelter population has shrunk to almost 17,000 on Thursday, from 83,718 living in shelters on Oct. 1.

State officials have speculated that this decrease is due to people returning to the New Orleans area as various parts of the city opened up. Others have found their way to relatives or friends, occasionally in other states, they said.

Lois Hankton and her family had journeyed through four different shelters — including one in Arkansas — before finding their way to the Antioch Family Church last week. Hankton, who said she has yet to receive any money from FEMA, asked the agency to put her in a travel trailer.

Outside the Baton Rouge River Center, a shelter that is scheduled to close today, former Lower 9th Ward resident Darryl Hood said he was told that there aren't any more travel trailers available in the 573-unit park that opened in Baker last week.

Hood, who was evacuated to Tyler, Texas, from the Superdome, said that after a few weeks he eventually made his way back to Baton Rouge and doesn't want to go into the nearby shelter that officials say will be the next interim home for about 100 of the people left at the center.

"I'm tired of going from shelter to shelter. I want to see a living room set," Hood said.

While FEMA has pledged to pay the rent of dislocated storm victims for up to 18 months, trailers are the main solution that has been embraced by the federal agency and state government. But setting up trailer communities or placing the units at houses that were damaged has been painfully slow, with only 1,852 families placed into travel trailers as of Thursday, according to agency statistics.

Overall, 4,662 families in Louisiana have been placed in trailers, hotel rooms leased by FEMA or cruise ships docked in New Orleans, said James McIntyre, an agency spokesman. Another trailer site is under construction in Baton Rouge, with another 37 sites in the final stages of lease negotiations, he said.

Some Baton Rouge shelter residents have been skeptical of the Baker trailers, about 80 miles from New Orleans, saying they are holding out for temporary housing closer to their homes.

Policy experts from both ends of the political spectrum have been critical of the trailer policy, arguing that evacuees from the New Orleans area would be better served if the government helped place them in private-market apartments — even if that means they could not immediately return to Louisiana.

But officials with Gov. Kathleen Blanco's administration have repeatedly stated that returning people to Louisiana is a primary goal, arguing that those coming back could benefit from the jobs that will be created during the rebuilding effort.

Vice Adm. Thad Allen, who is in charge of the federal response to the hurricanes, echoed this priority at a press conference Wednesday, announcing television commercials that will be broadcast throughout the country to notify displaced residents about the opportunity for temporary housing in the state.

"Our goal is to go out and find the folks that left New Orleans," said Allen, who noted that Blanco and New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin have emphasized their desire to have people return to the state. Nagin made visits to shelters in the state Wednesday and Thursday to reinforce that message.

That priority has warped the federal housing response, said Ronald Utt, a research fellow at the conservative Heritage Foundation. Utt and other housing experts have said it makes more sense to expand federal voucher programs that subsidize rental costs and allow people to resettle in other areas.

"I think as a consequence you are ending up with a program that is excessively costly and socially destructive," Utt said.

For example, the Red Cross has estimated that the cost of all the people staying in hotel rooms is $137 million and rising with no clear date on when people will be moved someplace else. At the same time, FEMA has several contracts with companies worth up to $100 million apiece to build out the infrastructure and find sites for trailer communities.

People who have been running the smaller shelters around the state said that as FEMA and the state look to bring people back from out of state, they are still trying to work with the residents who remained here.

Pastor Bobby Richard, of the Hope Alive Community Worship Center in Broussard, said he and other religious leaders in Acadiana have formed a coalition to help find better housing for people who have been in shelters. They are trying to move people staying at the Cajun Dome in Lafayette to smaller church shelters, where they will try to get them into an apartment or something within 30 days, he said.

While FEMA is setting up trailers and mobile homes in the area, Richard said he isn't waiting for that to happen and is sending out church members to help shelter residents apply for apartments. This has been much more effective than sending the residents out on their own, he said.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin gets an earful during his visit to the River Center shelter Thursday in Baton Rouge. Volunteers and operators at Baton Rouge shelters that are remaining open report that about six weeks after Hurricane Katrina hit the New Orleans area they still get daily calls from people looking for places to stay.

Kevon Burfect, 5, of New Orleans pulls up tape with volunteer Matthew Davis, 19, at the River Center in Baton Rouge as the shelter has begun cleaning up for its closing. Statistics from the American Red Cross show that many people are still in temporary housing, with roughly 600,000 hurricane victims living in hotel rooms across the country as of Wednesday.

Work continues Thursday on the eastbound lanes of Interstate 10 twin spans. Project supervisor John Horn said crews had to reposition 171 of the eastbound bridge's 433 sections that shifted up to 5 feet but remained atop support pilings. Some 39 sections that crashed into the lake were replaced with undamaged ones from the westbound bridge.

Alternate U.S. 11 plan

Lambert said transportation officials were still considering whether to route twin span traffic in one direction while sending traffic in the opposite direction across the U.S. 11 bridge. But he said such a plan is unlikely unless peak traffic in one direction tops 70 percent. He said the open U.S. 11 bridge has experienced only 60 percent surges in either direction.

"It's real problematic to try to send traffic northbound (in) two lanes on Highway 11," Lambert said, "because once they get there, you've got this tremendous load of traffic, and where do they go?"

Boh Brothers' early completion of the $30.9 million twin span project's first phase earned the contractor $1.1 million, the state's maximum bonus of $75,000 for 15 days.

Lambert said the project's second phase to reopen the westbound bridge is on schedule. Crews will install temporary spans in place of the bridge's 265 missing spans by Jan. 14.

Causeway tolls to resume

The 24-mile Lake Pontchartrain Causeway between Mandeville and Metairie will resume toll collection Monday at 10 a.m. General Manager Robert Lambert said he was waiting for the I-10 bridge to reopen before charging the usual $2 and $3 tolls on southbound traffic.

Lambert said he expects Causeway traffic to dip some but to remain at least 10,000 vehicles a day higher than the pre-Katrina average of 30,000.

Administrator denies euthanasia reports

term care center within the hospital, died after Katrina blew through.

Published reports on the inquiry have relied heavily on allegations from Dr. Bryant King that doctors had discussed giving patients lethal doses of narcotics and that an administrator had suggested praying about it.

King could not be reached for comment Thursday, and two Memorial staff doctors who were at the hospital until the last patient left said no such discussions ever took place.

The administrator who allegedly urged praying denied doing so, said Steve Campanini, a spokesman for Tenet Healthcare Corp., Memorial's owner.

The administrator, whom Campanini declined to name, "authorized me to say that there was no such meeting and that Dr. King either misspoke or is a liar," Campanini said.

Memorial, the massive Napoleon Avenue hospital between Clara and Magnolia streets, has been the focus of attention because of reports of doctors struggling to care for patients in darkness and stifling heat after generators failed and floodwaters surrounded the building.

Under these trying circumstances, "physicians and staff ... performed heroically to save the lives of their patients," Campanini said in a statement.

And if anyone had thought of mercy killing, "I'm of the opinion ... that it would have been brought up through proper channels in the medical staff," said Dr. Glenn Casey, the hospital's head of anesthesiology. "That never happened."

The crisis at the hospital began shortly after Katrina blasted the New Orleans area Aug. 29. It ended Sept. 2, when the last patient was evacuated. Memorial has been closed since then, and Campanini said Tenet has not decided whether to reopen it.

In the days after the storm, the medical staff met every eight to 12 hours to discuss plans to treat and evacuate patients, said Casey, a 23-year staff member.

Euthanasia "was never discussed," he said.

Dr. Richard Deichmann, an internal-medicine specialist who was at the hospital until the last patient left, was "really surprised" by King's charges, said his wife, Cecile Many. Deichmann was traveling Thursday and could not be reached for comment but had discussed the allegations with his wife.

Despite such denials, the allegations "are serious enough for us to launch a full-scale investigation," Wartelle said.

The inquiry grew out of the investigation of the deaths of 34 residents at St. Rita's Nursing Home in St. Bernard, Wartelle said.

The owners of that nursing home have been booked with 34 counts of negligent homicide.

Investigators from the Medicaid Fraud Control Unit in Foti's office are "looking into deaths that could have occurred because of the disaster," Wartelle said. "They want to see whether there might have been negligence or abuse."

In a message published on www.nola.com, The Times-Picayune's Web site, in the days after the storm, King's sister, Rachelle King, said her brother had told her discussions of putting patients to death were under way.

Hospital management "decided to selectively withhold food and water from patients," she wrote. "Doctors are being forced to decide who gets to live and who will starve to death."

Campanini denied that allegation, saying, "Our focus was on saving lives and getting people out."

King is a hospitalist, a doctor who tends to other physicians' patients while they are hospitalized.

He was a contract doctor, not a staff member, and he had been at Memorial about a month before Katrina, Campanini said.

"He was not an insider," Campanini said. "He was not a part of the management group that was in charge."

I Angela Robinson am responsible only for financial debts incurred by myself as of January, 2005.

THE MIRACULOUS PRAYER
Dear Heart of Jesus, in the past I have asked for many favors, this time I ask you this very special one (mention favor) take it dear Jesus and place it within your own broken heart where your Father sees it. Then in your merciful eyes, it will become your favor, not mine. Amen. Say this prayer for 3 days, promise publication and favor will be granted. Never known to fail. F.T.

Thatcher's 80th birthday fit for a queen

Compiled by J.E. Bourgoyne

Margaret Thatcher turned 80 Thursday with a rare return to the limelight: a posh party attended by the queen and the former prime minister's two successors, all celebrating Britain's "Iron Lady."

Margaret Thatcher
'Iron Lady' parties on

Although she has grown frail after a series of small strokes, Thatcher looked healthy as she arrived at the party about 15 minutes late, a delay that an aide said was because she took a congratulatory phone call from President Bush.

Wearing a navy blue coat and dress, a string of pearls and — as always — a matching handbag that was her trademark, she smiled and paused for photographs before slowly making her way into the plush Mandarin Oriental Hotel near London's Hyde Park.

Earlier in the day, her assistant Gilly Penrose said Thatcher was feeling good about her milestone birthday.

"Her house is looking like a florist's and she's very much enjoying it," Penrose said. "She's very philosophical about (her age), because she's very active still."

Heading the high-powered guest list were Queen Elizabeth II, and her husband, Prince Philip; Prime Minister Tony Blair; and Sir John Major, Thatcher's immediate successor at No. 10 Downing St.

The queen shook Thatcher's hand on arrival.

Thatcher has become more reclusive in recent years and given up most public speaking on her doctors' advice, but she remains a powerful force 15 years after leaving office as Britain's first female prime minister.

All is lost

Josh Holloway and his wife reportedly were robbed at gunpoint in their Honolulu home.

There was no indication the robber recognized the 36-year-old actor, who plays hunky con man Sawyer on the ABC castaway drama "Lost," television station KHON reported.

The robber rousted the couple from bed early Wednesday, took cash and credit cards and drove off in Holloway's Mercedes-Benz, the station said.

For mom, not me

Charlize Theron says marriage doesn't suit her, but she's not ruling out the possibility of becoming a mother someday.

In an interview on "Access Hollywood" that aired Tuesday, the actress, 30, said she was "happy for people who want to get married."

But, she said, "it's not my thing."

Theron's mother, Gerda, was married this past weekend.

"I'm extremely happy in my relationship," said Theron, who has dated Stuart Townsend for several years. "I would love to have kids."

Townsend and Theron, who won an Oscar for her role in 2003's "Monster," appeared in the films "Trapped" and "Head in the Clouds."

Motley stunt

Tommy Lee was burned Wednesday when a pyrotechnics stunt went wrong at a Motley Crue concert in Casper, Wyo.

Lee was taken to a hospital for treatment, but was not badly hurt, said Sgt. Doug Beran of the Casper Police Department. Beran declined to discuss details of Lee's injuries, citing privacy considerations.

The drummer, 43, who was injured toward the end of the band's set, played one more song before the concert was cut short, Beran said.

Tom Morton, a reporter for the Casper Star-Tribune, said Lee appeared to be injured when sparks began flying as he swung above the stage, suspended from a wire, back and forth among several drum sets.

DECLARATION OF EMERGENCY

Department of Health and Hospitals
Office of the Secretary
Bureau of Health Services Financing

Minimum Standards for Home Health Agencies
Emergency Preparedness
(LAC 48:I.9121)

The Department of Health and Hospitals, Office of the Secretary, Bureau of Health Services Financing hereby amends LAC 48:I.9121 as authorized by R.S. 36:254 and R.S. 40:2116.31-40. This Emergency Rule is promulgated in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act, R.S. 49:953(B)(1) et seq., and shall be in effect for the maximum period allowed under the Act or until adoption of the final Rule, whichever occurs first.

The Department of Health and Hospitals, Office of the Secretary, Bureau of Health Services Financing adopted a rule revising the regulations governing the licensure of home health agencies in February of 1995 (Louisiana Register, Volume 21, Number 2). This rule was subsequently amended in November of 1996 to revise the provisions contained in 9165 through 9169, 9173, 9177 and 9193 (Louisiana Register, Volume 22, Number 11) and in December 2001 to amend provisions of the February 1995 and November 20, 1996 rules (Louisiana Register, Volume 27, Number 12). The Department now proposes to amend the December 20, 2001 rule to revise the provisions governing emergency preparedness requirements for home health agencies. This action is being taken to prevent imminent peril to the health and well-being of Louisiana citizens that have been evacuated as a result of natural disasters or other emergencies. It is anticipated that the implementation of this emergency rule will be cost neutral for state fiscal year 2005-06.

EMERGENCY RULE
Effective October 15, 2005, the Department of Health and Hospitals, Office of the Secretary, Bureau of Health Services Financing amends the provisions contained in the December 20, 2001 rule governing emergency preparedness requirements for home health agencies.

Title 48
PUBLIC HEALTH - GENERAL
Part I. General Administration
Subpart 3. Licensing and Certification

Chapter 91. Minimum Standards for Home Health Agencies

9121. Emergency Preparedness

A. The home health agency shall have an emergency preparedness plan which conforms to the current Office of Emergency Preparedness (OEP) model plan and is designed to manage the consequences of natural disasters or other emergencies that disrupt the home health agency's ability to provide care and treatment or threaten the lives or safety of its clients. The home health agency is responsible for obtaining a copy of the current Home Health Emergency Preparedness Model Plan from the Louisiana Office of Emergency Preparedness.

B. At a minimum, the agency shall have a written plan that describes:

1. the evacuation procedures for agency clients who require community assistance as well as for those with available caregivers to another location;

2. the delivery of essential care and services to agency clients whether they are in a shelter or other locations;

3. the provisions for the management of staff, including distribution and assignment of responsibilities and functions;

4. a plan for coordinating transportation services required for evacuating agency clients to another location; and

5. assurance that the agency will notify the client's family or caregiver if the client is evacuated to another location.

C. The home health agency's plan shall be activated at least annually, either in response to an emergency or in a planned drill. The home health agency's performance during the activation of the plan shall be evaluated and documented. The plan shall be revised if the agency's performance during an actual emergency or a planned drill indicates that it is necessary.

D. Any updates or revisions to the plan shall be submitted to the parish Office of Emergency Preparedness for review. The parish Office of Emergency Preparedness shall review the home health agency's plan by utilizing community wide resources.

E. As a result of an evacuation order issued by the parish Office of Emergency Preparedness (OEP), it may be necessary for a home health agency to temporarily relocate outside of its licensed geographic service area. In such a case, the agency may request a waiver to operate outside of its licensed location for a time period not to exceed six months in order to provide needed services to its clients and/or other evacuees of the affected areas. The agency must provide documentation as required by the Department.

AUTHORITY NOTE: Promulgated in accordance with R.S. 40:2116.31-40.

HISTORICAL NOTE: Promulgated by the Department of Health and Hospitals, Office of the Secretary, Bureau of Health Services Financing, LR 18:57 (January 1992), amended LR 21:177 (February 1995), LR 27:2249(December 2001), LR 31:

Interested persons may submit written comments to Ben A. Bearden at the Bureau of Health Services Financing, P.O. Box 91030, Baton Rouge, Louisiana 70821-9030. He is responsible for responding to inquiries regarding this Emergency Rule. A copy of this Emergency Rule is available for review by interested parties at parish Medicaid offices.

TO OUR COMMUNITY

It is hard to believe that the natural disaster called Katrina happened barely two months ago. Without question, all of our lives have been changed forever by this event. Soon, we will begin to measure time by whether an event happened before or after Katrina. In years to come, we'll ask each new acquaintance where they were when Katrina hit, just as we already do with other milestone national tragedies.

The Ochsner family of physicians, nurses, allied health professionals, employees and volunteers rode out the storm together on our Main Campus keeping our patients safe and cared for while the hurricane raged outside. For some patients what was needed was a gentle hand, words of reassurance and continuation of our plan of care. For others who came to us after the storm, many for the first time, the needs were far greater: a lung operation, heart bypass surgery, kidney and liver transplants, outpatient dialysis or intensive care for their babies. None of these services ever stopped—before, during or after the storm—except for a brief moment to shake our heads in wonder at the power of nature.

Together, we continued helping our patients by being available to you in the many communities of Louisiana where Katrina sent you—the North Shore, New Orleans and Baton Rouge. We have been open in all of those locations serving all members of your family, of every age, no matter if their condition was routine or complex.

Working closely with our colleagues in Baton Rouge, we quickly set up a lifeline to the external world, making it possible to bring our staff and employees to the parts of the region that needed medical care the most. On the North Shore, operations also were reopened swiftly—no small task in the wake of the storm.

We thank our employees everyday for everything that they did—yet we know that our thanks can never be big enough. We marvel not only at their stamina, courage and commitment but also at their ability to keep a sense of humor amid the challenges we faced.

Our hard work has been supported by the extraordinary efforts of firefighters, police officers, emergency medical services workers, rescue workers, volunteers and healthcare workers in facilities across the region who have given all they can in these unprecedented times. We are grateful to them and to our partners and vendors who made sure that we had essential stocks of supplies before and after the storm.

For those of you just coming home, we welcome you back. We urge you all to look after your own health and the health of your families. We can help you do that as normalcy returns.

Ochsner is a vital part of the New Orleans and Louisiana healthcare system that you can depend on today. At Ochsner, it is our mission to put patients first…everyday…just as we did throughout Katrina and beyond.

With heartfelt good wishes for you and your family,

Mayor falls short on vision

Hurricane Katrina was responsible for a great unmasking in America.

If the talking heads are to be believed, no one knew that abject poverty existed in this nation until the sheets were blown back in New Orleans.

Another great poverty was unmasked by the storm, and it wasn't in the Superdome or in the Convention Center. It is the poverty in the thinking of our mayor.

I do not make this observation lightly. These are fragile, desperate, dangerous times. There is far too much at stake to stoop to petty name calling. But every time Ray Nagin makes a statement about his vision for our future, I am more fearful than I was even in those frightful days immediately after the hurricane when the national news media pronounced New Orleans nearly dead and our enemies said we were not worth reviving.

This indictment of the mayor and his ideas does not emanate from me. The mayor's wounds in this regard are self-inflicted.

Relying on casinos

Last week, he challenged himself and his citizenry.

"Now is the time to think outside the box." Nagin said. "Now is the time to think about a bold vision for a cash-strapped city. We need solutions."

What was the mayor's "bold vision?" What was his idea of thinking "outside the box?"

Casinos.

Even people who like casinos wouldn't consider them bold or innovative. The dubious success of Las Vegas has already spawned dozens of clones around the country. Does our mayor think it bold to chase a trend that's decades old?

And is it wise for him to announce plans to compete directly with the casinos on the Gulf Coast of Mississippi when, at the moment, we are in a virtual partnership with that state to get federal funds for rebuilding? The Republican governor of Mississippi, Haley Barbour, is far closer to the president than our own Democratic governor. It's a bad time to antagonize him.

My most charitable analysis is that the mayor's vocabulary, not his thinking, is limited. Perhaps he simply doesn't understand the meaning of the phrase "bold vision." But considered in context, this copy cat approach has been emblematic of the Nagin administration. He destroys that which he does not understand in the hope of replacing it with the shiny, shallow, new stuff he does understand.

Lack of understanding

What can we conclude from the mayor's rush into the cold arms of organized gambling?

I conclude that Nagin really does not understand New Orleans. Though born and bred here, he fundamentally doesn't understand those things that make us great.

He understands why people love Las Vegas. But he doesn't understand our city. His city. I wish he was more thoughtful. I wish he was less generic. I wish there was time for him to take a crash course in New Orleans culture. I wish that the poverty of the mayor's vision had not been unmasked just when boldness is so desperately required.

Layoffs hit NORD, library hardest

Many city workers get last paycheck today

By Frank Donze
Staff writer

It goes without saying that the drastic reductions in the municipal workforce ordered by New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin were brutally painful. But in a city left largely devoid of children by Hurricane Katrina, the deepest cuts are the most predictable.

The budget ax that officially falls today when many City Hall workers receive their last paychecks came down hardest on the New Orleans Recreation Department and the public library system, which each lost more than 90 percent of its personnel.

The bulk of the remaining employees in both agencies — 20 with NORD and 19 in the libraries — will be concentrated in Algiers, a relatively unscathed section of New Orleans that appears to be recovering faster from the storm than any other.

Plans call for operating only the main library on Loyola Avenue and the Algiers Regional Library.

Until full electrical power has been restored to the city's east bank and services like schools, groceries and department stores are operational, Nagin has said that New Orleans will not be a good place for children to live.

"These are crippling cuts for every aspect of government," said city Finance Director Reggie Zeno, who relied on individual department heads to identify essential workers needed to provide the most basic services to a population estimated to be less than 100,000.

As the number of residents grows in the coming months, Zeno said, the Nagin administration hopes to slowly bring back workers or make new hires.

"When the situation improves, we want to phase in employees," he said. "Of course, that depends on whether we get

Nearly 700 employees of the Audubon Nature Institute have been laid off, leaving only a couple hundred workers to tend the institute's four main facilities — Audubon Zoo, Audubon Louisiana Nature Center, Audubon Aquarium of the Americas, and the Audubon Center for Research of Endangered Species on the West Bank — according to an institute official.

"While it was a gut-wrenching and unpleasant task, from a financial standpoint it was necessary," said Larry Rivarde, senior vice president

Eight staff members lifted the massive turtle from the crate, walked a few feet to the edge of the Gulf of Mexico exhibit and lowered him into the water with a splash. Immedi-

The big Regional Transit Authority bus rumbled along a nearly deserted St. Charles Avenue on Wednesday morning, carrying three passengers from Carrollton toward the Central Business District in lonely, air-conditioned comfort.

A day later and an hour earlier, another bus on the same route seemed practically packed by comparison, with about 20 passengers riding at least part of the way to Canal Street.

In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, the RTA is offering skeleton service, operating 28 buses on 13 New Orleans routes.

The ridership also is skeletal, totaling just over 2,000 in the first week after service resumed Oct. 2.

St. Charles Parish residents were largely spared the losses suffered by their neighbors to the east.

But in the weeks following Hurricane Katrina, pressing needs, hard times and a sense of propriety forced locals to lay by the wayside a number of recreational and seasonal diversions to address the devastation that had engulfed the region.

Festivals were canceled, recreation was put on hold, and community education classes were postponed until next semester. These Katrina casualties, although small in scope, demonstrate just how far the effects of the storm reverberated, touching nearly every aspect of life, from the serious to the mundane.

Hard-hit areas to see flood of adjusters

Entire grids will be evaluated at a time

By Manuel Torres
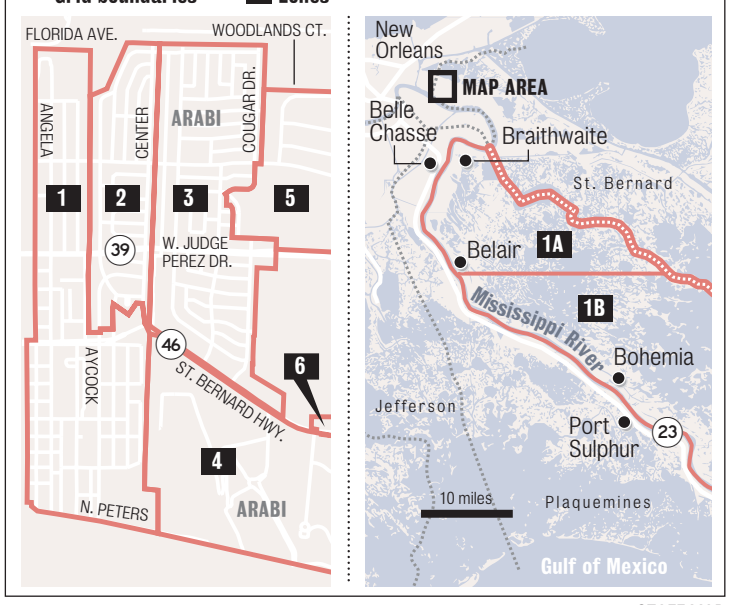
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

Hundreds of insurance adjusters on Monday will begin evaluating entire areas of St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes at a time, instead of going house to house — the start of a plan intended to speed up claims for thousands of Katrina-ravaged homeowners.

Parts of Arabi in St. Bernard and the entire east bank in Plaquemines are set to be the first zones targeted by a pilot program that insurance companies and government officials negotiated over the last three weeks.



In what would be a first in the state, officials are hoping to increase the number of insurance adjusters — and their rate of progress — working in some of the storm's hardest-hit areas by getting companies to work together in assessing a block, or even an entire neighborhood, instead of the usual house-by-house assessments.

Amy Whittington, spokeswoman for state Commissioner of Insurance Robert Wooley, said the mass evaluations will be easier for flood claims, as all of Starting Monday insurance companies will begin working in a coordinated effort to adjust claims for St. Bernard and Plaquemines Parish properties damaged by Hurricane Katrina. # Aquarium lost about 10,000 animals and managing director for the zoo, park and Nature Center.

The 690 axed full- and part-time employees included 420 from the zoo, 220 from the aquarium, and the remaining 50 from the research center and Nature Center, Rivarde said. The remaining nearly 200 employees — both full and part time — now are spread out among the facilities.

"It's sad for us," said Karyn Noles-Bewley, senior vice president and managing director of the Aquarium, IMAX and Woldenberg Riverfront Park, who said 95 full-time and 125 part-time employees from her staff were let go. Only 48 full- or part-time employees remain.

The Audubon staff is like family, she said, "It's more sad than anything."

The layoffs took effect Oct. 7, another blow to the aquarium, which sustained structural damage and lost about 10,000 of its 15,000 animals when their life-support system was compromised during the storm.

"Our water quality began to decline, because even though the generators were operational, it does not provide us with sustained levels of power to maintain all our exhibits at optimal water-quality levels," she said.

Getting the facilities back up running will be costly.

The nonprofit institute has launched a new Web site and fund-raising campaign to help raise $60 million for rebuilding the aquarium and zoo, along with other facilities. The American Zoo and Aquarium Association has wired $500,000 to the institute for its employees and their families, the animals and the facilities.

Although no date has been set for the opening of the institute's facilities, Rivarde said he is confident that "Audubon will come back. Audubon will be a thriving entity once again."

Many workers stayed at the aquarium during the storm to care for the animals but were forced to evacuate after floodwater began rising on Canal Street. In their absence the aquarium was staffed by members of the New Orleans Police Department 6th District Communications Center, as well as the institute's President and CEO Ronald Forman, she said.

The evacuated staff were back on the job at the aquarium as soon it was safe for them to return to the city, Noles-Bewley said.

Current full-time staff members are working shifts, "living at the aquarium — sleeping on cots and eating MREs — to care for the animals, repair the facility and work toward reopening the aquarium," she said

Noles-Bewley said the aquarium evacuated some animals after the storm because of the uncertainty about when electricity would be restored, availability of generator fuel, and food shipments for animals. Evacuees included King Midas, a giant sea turtle who was sent to Moody Gardens Aquarium in Galveston and returned Thursday to his New Orleans home in the Gulf of Mexico exhibit; 19 penguins and two sea otters that went to Monterey Bay Aquarium in California; a sea dragon sent to the Dallas World Aquarium; and raptors and birds sent to the Houston zoo.

Among the animal casualties were the popular sand tiger sharks in the Gulf of Mexico exhibit, she said.

The aquarium emerged from the storm with roof damage that caused leaks throughout the facility, damage to the exterior glass in the Mississippi exhibit and the Amazon atrium and to the mechanical system, and failure of pumps and motors throughout the system, Noles-Bewley said.

Woldenberg Riverfront Park and Aquarium Plaza also were damaged, she said.

"There's not a tree left in the plaza," Noles-Bewley said. "We lost about 40 trees in Woldenberg Park and the Aquarium Plaza, our lighting system in the park was damaged and our irrigation system was damaged."

In the face of the setbacks, Noles-Bewley said the aquarium has received an outpouring of support from aquariums across the country.

"We have already received offers from other aquariums to provide us with animals for our reopening — more sand tiger sharks and brown sharks — and our colleagues at other aquariums have offered their boats, staff and resources to assist us in collecting animals so we may open," she said.

Rivarde said all of the institute's facilities suffered structural damage resulting from Katrina.

The Nature Center in eastern New Orleans received the most damage from both flood and wind and may have to be rebuilt, Rivarde said. He said the facility's five to six buildings took on about 4 to 5 feet of water.

"We're probably looking at having to rebuild the whole facility," he said.

For the most part, wildlife at the zoo and Nature Center were spared because of the institute's hurricane plan, but two baby otters didn't survive, he said.

The majority of zoo animals remained in their habitats and were cared for by personnel who "did a Herculean job," said Rivarde. He said the only animals to be evacuated were five sea lions that are at Moody Gardens in Galveston until they are brought back to the zoo.

The Nature Center animals were transferred to the zoo before the storm and are safe, Rivarde said

"All are safe and sound and well-fed. The only thing they miss are the guests."

the resources to fund the salaries. We've got to have the resources. Until then, we'll be moving forward as best we can to rebuild government."

The preliminary tally provided by Nagin staffers shows that the city's 6,498-member, pre-Katrina workforce lost 2,437 employees (37.5 percent) as the administration adjusts spending to account for the loss of virtually all tax revenue.

And while that number is below the 3,000-layoff estimate made by the mayor nearly two weeks ago, Nagin aides said Thursday that the process is ongoing. Once the Sewerage & Water Board submits its layoff list, they say, the total likely will be at or near the mayor's forecast.

At this point, all city department heads, most of whom serve at the mayor's pleasure, remain on the payroll, Zeno said.

And the only rank-and-file positions spared from the cuts are those with a direct impact on public safety, including police officers and firefighters, emergency medical workers who run ambulance services and electrical and health inspectors needed to get commerce up and running.

But even those employees must cope with the loss of civilian support personnel.

For example, the Police Department lost 291 of its nearly 2,300 employees, including dozens of clerical workers, 60 communications specialists and about 150 school crossing guards, positions the administration says are not needed at this time because so many public schools remain shuttered on the city's east bank.

Police officers will take over administrative functions formerly handled by civilians.

The Fire Department, which has relatively few administrative jobs, fared better than any other large city agency, losing only seven of its 777 positions.

Zeno said the Sanitation Department, a critical component in the city's recovery from Hurricane Katrina's destruction that employs a private contractor to handle garbage collection, will continue to function, albeit at a reduced level.

Nonetheless, the agency, which is receiving help from private companies hired by the Army Corps of Engineers, lost 50 of its 81 staff positions.

Other areas of government that were hit hard include:

- Public Works, which lost 199 of its 258 positions, including nearly 100 parking control officers and dozens of street maintenance workers. A skeleton crew will continue to enforce parking regulations.
- Health, which lost 133 of its 333 employees. City officials said most of the department's health professionals are being kept on the payroll.
- Law, which lost 49 of 96 workers, most of them staff attorneys.
- Civil Service, which lost 25 of 37 jobs. The agency, which oversees hiring and firing of city workers, is not expected to be very busy for the next several months, officials said.
- Traffic Court, which eliminated 147 of its 166 jobs. The court is expected to see a greatly reduced workload in the near term because so much of the city, including eastern New Orleans, the Lower 9th Ward, Gentilly and Lakeview, remains largely uninhabited.

At Louis Armstrong International Airport, 74 civil service employees and 25 temporary employees were laid off, leaving 117 permanent employees and six temps.

Aviation Director Roy Williams said the facility will be able to get by for now because of the reduced traffic at the airport.

For example, he said the airport doesn't need as many firefighters on a shift as it did when traffic averaged 174 takeoffs and landings per day, compared with the current level of 25.

Administration officials said that as business picks up at Armstrong International, they plan to increase staffing accordingly.

The mayor's office slashed 35 percent of its 100-member staff and the City Council lost nearly 40 percent of its 76 employees.

Zeno said the reductions in the executive and legislative branches likely mean that job titles will no longer have much importance.

"Everybody works for the city and there may be some shifting of responsibilities," he said. "We're looking to make maximum use of the staff we have left. People will be cross-trained and they'll be asked to perform tasks they may not have performed previously."

Zeno said the administration is getting closer to closing a deal for a $50 million line of credit that will help the city make payroll for the next month or so.

But beyond that, he said the city is counting on its share of a $750 million loan package approved recently by Congress for municipal governments across the Gulf Coast crippled by Katrina.

As spelled out in the legislation, Zeno said the city is counting on 25 percent of its basic annual operating budget, or about $120 million. The state is coordinating distribution of Louisiana's portion of aid.

"If the federal loan doesn't come through, we're really in bad shape," Zeno said. "Without it, we may not have enough cash to fund any payroll, including police and fire. Needless to say, the federal money is critical."

Soccer, baseball return to parish

ST. CHARLES, from B-1

Board, were suspended for the fall semester for the first time since the program's inception in the 1970s.

"We've been delayed by hurricanes, but we never had to cancel a semester," said Gwen Cashio, senior secretary for student and community services. "We were so crushed because we had such a nice program to offer."

Cashio said the School Board canceled 203 community classes, which ranged from knitting to ceramics to culinary instruction, in response to a number of concerns.

Officials were unsure of the status and availability of the school facilities, where the classes are taught, and worried about staffing and attendance, Cashio said.

The program, which attracts about 1,000 students per semester, will be back for the spring semester, she said.

"I think people are going to be ready to get back to it," Cashio said. "People are looking for that release — let's do something fun and get back to normal, regular life."

The Alligator Festival, an annual tradition sponsored by the St. Charles Parish Rotary Club and held in Luling, also was canceled for the first time in its 25-year history. The festival, typically held at the end of September, draws a crowd of about 40,000, said Flint Distefano, the event's coordinator.

But organizers felt that it was inappropriate to hold festivities this year.

"We just thought it was improper to put a bigger burden on anyone that ought to be spending money on necessities," Distefano said.

The parks and recreation department was hit with setbacks by Katrina, namely widespread damage to its facilities.

According to Director Larry Matson, damage left by Katrina remains scattered throughout St. Charles Parish in the form of shattered fences and broken utility poles that rim the storm-ravaged parks and baseball fields.

But despite extensive damage and post-storm upheaval, the parks and recreation department is in the process of getting back on track.

Matson said he is applying for Federal Emergency Management Agency aid to repair 20 of the parish's 26 parks, where damage includes broken scoreboards, battered baseball dugouts, wrecked fences and downed electric poles.

The department was forced to suspend youth football and cheerleading for the season because of a shortage of referees and field space, Matson said. Some other programs, such as girls and boys basketball, were postponed, with registration scheduled to start Oct. 24.

The department has released an updated schedule. Youth soccer is up and running, having started on a limited schedule in early October, and adult flag football teams are playing. Fall baseball is also under way at Destrehan High School, although it, too, is being played on a limited basis.

In the meantime, Matson said, residents eager to resume their pre-Katrina lifestyles have been contacting the recreation department with queries about teams and startup schedules.

"They've been saying these kids need to get out and play and get back to their normal lives," he said. "And we all do, too."

Another opening

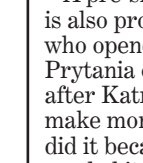
Universal Furniture is scheduled to open its West Bank location at Manhattan and the West Bank Expressway in Harvey today. This marks the second Universal to reopen after Katrina. The Kenner location at 2500 Williams has been open for nearly three weeks.

The company's Ernie Bonnoitt says the Kenner store was not damaged by the storm, and that shoppers have been depending on Universal for much-needed appliances and bedding.

Half of the roof was blown off the Harvey location, but it has been tarped and temporarily repaired, giving shoppers an additional Universal to help replace items lost in the storm.

Bonnoitt reports that Universal's venerable St. Claude Avenue location took the hardest of hits from Katrina. Extensive flooding wreaked havoc on the inventory, but the company plans to refurbish and reopen early next month.

Universal's store and warehouse on Broad and Earhart were also damaged. No word yet on reopening.



Special financing and "everyday low pricing" is, of course, being advertised by Universal. "We were here to help our community and our customers after Hurricane Betsy in 1965, after the floods in intervening years, and now we're determined to make a difference after Katrina," says Bonnoitt.

Pampering

Dr. Cynthia Mizgala (pictured), the plastic surgeon, had scheduled a grand opening of her new offices in mid-September. Those plans were obviously scrapped, but the new center, which includes complete spa services as well as surgical procedures, is now up and running at 4720 I-10 Service Rd. at Clearview, next to Tulane-Lakeside Hospital.

Mizgala's new offices, in suite 105 of the medical complex, offer everything from Botox injections and facials to breast surgery and tummy tucks.

"Right now, we are offering free facials to emergency personnel who have been working so hard to get the area moving again," says Mizgala, who has been practicing locally since 1993.

The new location also offers manicures and pedicures, microdermabrasion and other pampering and appearance-improving services.

"We're seeing people now who are stressed out from the work they've been doing to get back into their homes," says Mizgala. Appointments: 885-4515 or www.awomanplasticsurgeon.com.

Free film

Rene Brunet of The Prytania Theatre, Uptown at 5339 Prytania St. says the theater, Hibernia National Bank and the Louisiana Film Commission will host a free, open-to-the-public showing of "Waiting" tonight at 7.

The comedy about waiter-buddies, filmed at Bennigan's in Metairie, is billed as a hit for people who liked the "American Pie" genre of movies.

A pre-show buffet at 6 p.m. is also promised, says Brunet, who opened the undamaged Prytania only a few weeks after Katrina. "I didn't do it to make money," says Brunet. "I did it because the people needed it, and I believe in 'the show must go on' philosophy."

Beginning Saturday, The Prytania will show "In Her Shoes" with Cameron Diaz and Shirley MacLaine daily. More info: 891-2787.

Aquariums, zoos took in evacuees

ately Midas dove deep, swimming in broad strokes across the 400,000-gallon tank.

The small assembly of staff members cheered. Ron Forman, Audubon Nature Institute president and chief executive officer, stood at the exhibit's edge, a big smile on his face.

"It's so great he's back," Forman said. "This has been an emotional time. Our staff has been sleeping here for seven weeks, working really hard."

Approximately 10,000 animals perished in the chaotic days after the storm as water quality deteriorated in the tanks. Midas, though, was one of many animals the staff was able to save. The turtle was evacuated to the Moody Gardens Aquarium in Galveston, Texas.

The penguins and sea otters were shipped to the Monterey Bay Aquarium in California, where the penguins are now on exhibit. Some salt and freshwater fish were taken to the Dallas World Aquarium, said Melissa Lee, director of public relations.

The famous white alligator, all birds and the leafy seadragons, a threatened fish species related to seahorses, also survived.

Even clown fish pulled through. "The Nemos made it," assistant curator Rich Toth said.

Animal caretakers stayed at the facility during and after the hurricane, trying to save as many animals as possible. Forman said he secured 4,000 gallons of fuel for the generators running the aquarium's life support systems, but the water quality eventually started to break down in the tanks. "The water started to darken. We didn't have any fresh water coming in. As we got into the sixth or seventh day, the fish started to suffer and die," he said.

Offers of help came rushing in from zoos and aquariums throughout the nation, Forman said. "The Monterey aquarium sent a private plane," he said. "Tears were in (Audubon staff members') eyes as they watched our animals leave. They built this aquarium and to see it dying was really hard."

After rescuing animals and removing dead ones, staffers turned to the task of filtering and cleaning the exhibits. On Thursday, the crystal clear water in the Gulf of Mexico display sparkled as several large tarpon and a few redfish made laps around the tank. "This is a testament to our filtration systems. They're fantastic," Toth said.

Forman attributed the quick cleanup of the facility to the devoted aquarium staff. "Our staff left their families and dedicated themselves to saving these animals," he said.

Although the Audubon Institute had to lay off employees, he said zoos and aquariums across the country offered displaced staff members jobs.

Cities seek storm cleanup payback

Some of them may go broke

By Richard Boyd
St. Tammany bureau

With some St. Tammany Parish municipalities on the verge of going broke, state Rep. Pete Schneider said Thursday he was trying to unravel a seemingly impregnable wall of bureaucracy and free up government reimbursements for Hurricane Katrina clean-up costs.

"Time is of the essence. We have municipalities in this parish that can't hold on much longer if they don't get those reimbursements," a frustrated Schneider said.

At a legislative subcommittee public hearing Wednesday in Mandeville looking into storm related matters, Schneider, R-Slidell, and state Reps. Tim Burns, R-Mandeville, and Mike Strain, R-Abita Springs, got an earful from St. Tammany Parish President Kevin Davis, Mandeville Mayor Eddie Price and Madisonville Mayor Peter Gitz.

All three said they had learned that the Federal Emergency Management Agency has dispatched money to Baton Rouge to provide 100 percent federal reimbursement costs to the municipalities for their immediate post-Hurricane Katrina costs in clearing trees and other debris to get streets open. But they said the money was being held up until a state audit could be done on each application.

"We are in tough times here; we need our money back," Price said.

Davis said the situation is so serious that two municipalities will go broke in two weeks without reimbursement. Later, outside in the parking lot of the Paul Spitzfaden Community Center, he identified them as Pearl River and Folsom.

Davis was outside along with Price because Schneider, after hearing the complaints, turned the meeting over to Strain and went into the parking lot with his cell phone to call state Auditor Steve Theriot. After getting him on the phone, they went into a room and using a speakerphone, Davis and Price repeated their complaint. Gitz had returned to Madisonville.

As it turned out, the holdup is not with the auditor or audits, but with the military.

"There is not going to be an audit before issuing the checks but apparently some colonel has to approve the issuing," Schneider said. "And even more baffling, the checks will actually be cut in Carville."

By late afternoon Thursday, Schneider was still trying to determine when money would be coming to St. Tammany Parish. If need be, he said he would contact Gov. Kathleen Blanco, who is de facto commander-in-chief of the state National Guard.

Price testified at Wednesday's hearing that using a 76-hour 100 percent reimbursement plan for street tree removal, the city hired Coastal Waste Management and spent $400,000 of city money before the Army Corps of Engineers moved in and took over the debris removal process under contract to FEMA which will cover the remaining costs.

"Here we are six weeks later and we don't have the reimbursement. We were down $300,000 for our August sales tax collections before Katrina and we know that September collections will be practically zero. We need our money back," Price said.

Gitz said he raided limited town coffers for more than $200,000 to finance initial clean-up until FEMA and the corps set up operations and took over. "We need our money back as soon as possible," he said.

Earlier in the week Folsom Mayor Marshell Brumfield, who did not attend the Wednesday meeting, said the village spent $120,000 initially for clean-up and is waiting for reimbursement. Pearl River officials said last week they spent more than $100,000 and are waiting for FEMA reimbursement. Abita Springs Mayor Louis Fitzmorris said his town spent about $300,000 and "desperately" needs reimbursement.

During the nearly three-hour hearing, the three legislators also heard pleas from law enforcement, fire and city and town officials for state financial help in improving communications systems and obtaining more generators to keep essential services going after storms destroy electrical distribution systems.

The three are members of the House Subcommittee on the Northshore Parishes of the House Special Committee on Disaster Planning, Crisis Management, Recovery and Long Term Revitalization. Schneider is chair of the subcommittee and is conducting a series of hearings in St. Tammany, Washington and Tangipahoa parishes.

Buses replacing streetcars for now

carried an average of 855,000 riders a week.

But despite long waits between buses on some lines, business seems to be building.

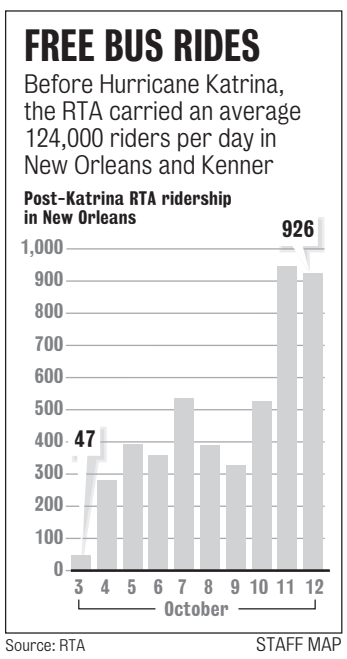
Ridership nearly doubled between Monday and Tuesday of this week, from 528 to 946, though it fell slightly Wednesday.

One reason for the growing ridership: Everybody rides for free these days and will continue to do so for as long as six months, with the Federal Emergency Management Agency picking up the tab through the Federal Transit Administration.

The 35 historic St. Charles Avenue streetcars survived the hurricane and subsequent flooding without damage, but mud and debris still cover the streetcar tracks in many places, and many of the poles holding the cars' electric power line were damaged, meaning that buses will continue on the route for the foreseeable future.

Besides the St. Charles line, other routes in service are Marigny-Bywater, Tchoupitoulas, Magazine, Jackson, Louisiana, Leonidas and six West Bank lines: Algiers Loop, Gen. Meyer, Pace Boulevard, Aurora Express, Algiers Local and Gen. de Gaulle.

The Marigny, Louisiana and Leonidas routes are somewhat different than they were before Katrina. Details can be found on the RTA's Web site, www.norta.com.



The RTA also operates the Kenner Loop route in Kenner, though not the bus lines that run through East Jefferson between Kenner and New Orleans, which are operated by Jefferson Transit. Daily ridership on the Kenner Loop has varied between 50 and 228 since it resumed Oct. 2. That line is charging a 40-cent fare for adults, half the normal rate.

Except for two weekday-only lines in Algiers, buses operate seven days a week, but service does not begin until 8 a.m. and the last trip ends by 6 p.m., a real drawback for many potential riders.

One reason for the short hours is that the bus drivers are living in Baton Rouge and must be bused to and from New Orleans each day, said Pat Judge, the RTA's director of public affairs.

He said the agency is looking at ways to expand the service, both in hours and in the number of lines operating.

"Additional lines and service will be considered as buses, fueling and maintenance services can be secured," Judge said. "Temporary housing continues to be a critical need for RTA operators, maintenance workers and administrative staff."

Changes in service will be announced on the agency's Web site.

In a report to the City Council this week, Judge also said:

▶ About 190 buses were lost to flooding. The remaining fleet is either in service or is being recovered after temporary use by the National Guard and others in the hurricane's aftermath.

▶ All 24 streetcars on the year-old Canal Street line were flooded and their running gears are inoperable. One car was shipped to Pennsylvania this week for damage assessment.

▶ At the urging of Mayor Ray Nagin, the RTA is considering using a number of the undamaged St. Charles streetcars on the Riverfront streetcar line. Although the Riverfront track appears to be undamaged, six of the seven Riverfront cars are inoperable.

▶ The RTA's staff of 1,300 is dispersed over a wide geographic area and many are homeless.

▶ The agency's administrative offices in eastern New Orleans suffered severe water and roof damage. The A. Philip Randolph bus barn on Canal Street and the eastern New Orleans bus facility and maintenance building were flooded and badly damaged.

▶ An undetermined number of LIFT vehicles and paratransit vans used to transport people with disabilities were damaged, but many are still operable.

▶ Union Passenger Terminal, where Amtrak service resumed this week, is being served by the Algiers Loop and Gen. Meyer lines, which run to Canal and Rampart streets.

Slidell mayor wants to keep corps contract

Slow debris removal cause for complaints

By Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

Although he's not happy about the slow progress, Slidell Mayor Ben Morris says he has no intention of breaking the city's contract with the Army Corps of Engineers for removing tons of storm debris in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

"I'm not upset with the corps or their contractors," he said this week. "I understand the logistics of what has to be done. I think they're doing a hell of a job with what they've got to work with."

Complaints have mounted in recent weeks about the snail's pace of moving the mounds of wood chunks, limbs, ripped-out wallboard, ruined appliances and other debris off front lawns and street curbs.

Morris himself has been among the complainers. But asked whether Slidell was considering canceling its agreement with the corps, he responded, "Absolutely not."

The city simply can't afford to pay 25 percent of the cost under the traditional federal reimbursement procedure to remove the 1 million-plus cubic yards of debris in the city and take it to dump sites, he said.

The city initially hired Gulf States Contractors for storm debris pickup. Then the corps offered Slidell a better deal financially: The corps would act as general contractor, hire the subs and pay the entire cost.

Morris and the City Council signed off on the deal. The corps selected Ceres Environmental Services of Brooklyn, Minn., to oversee the debris removal project. Gulf States, a Smith Enterprises company, was chosen as the lead subcontractor.

As of Oct. 6, 285,247 cubic yards of debris had been hauled away by Gulf States and its small army of haulers. By Thursday, another 51,854 cubic yards had been removed for a total of 6,129 truckloads to date, Public Works Superintendent Dan Yeates said.

Gulf States and its haulers are attempting to load and run 70 trucks a day. Each load ranges from 27 to 75 cubic yards of limbs, logs, tree stumps and, in separate trucks, construction debris, Yeates said.

Meanwhile, the fact that the Gulf States loads are uncompressed, coupled with unusually heavy traffic through the Slidell area, is slowing the massive cleanup operation, city officials and haulers say.

The work is expected to be going on another six months, Morris warned residents. "This is not a fast process," he said. "The tonnage out there is staggering."

In contrast, the cleanup in the much larger unincorporated area of St. Tammany Parish is moving much faster. But unless the Federal Emergency Management Agency waives the 25 percent "local match," the parish will have to pay that much of the cost.

The parish hired Omni Pinnacle, one of the Reine family companies, for its debris cleanup. Some 280 crews are now at work on parish streets and roads, parish officials say.

As of Thursday, parish spokeswoman Suzanne Parsons Stymiest said, Omni and its subcontractors had picked up almost 1.5 million of the estimated 6 million to 7 million cubic yards in the unincorporated area.

The Environmental Protection Agency will oversee the disposal of yet another category of ruined "white goods": refrigerators, freezers, air-conditioning units, and washers and dryers damaged by the hurricane. They're also supposed to be placed in a separate area.

Plan speeds up assessment process

ADJUSTERS, from B-1

St. Bernard and most of Plaquemines flooded Aug. 29 during Hurricane Katrina. Many of those same areas flooded again when Hurricane Rita passed by on Sept. 25.

"There are areas where companies can actually say, 'OK, all this block was flooded,' " Whittington said. "But for wind damage, they may still have to do it house to house."

Officials in both parishes pushed for the mass assessments, arguing that until residents settle their insurance claims they are unlikely to begin tearing down and rebuilding damaged structures.

The plan will divide both parishes into grids or sections of about 1,000 homes each, with 25 sections designated in St. Bernard and nine in Plaquemines. Adjusters will complete one grid at a time, allowing for reconstruction efforts to begin in each area as adjusters move out.

But officials Thursday emphasized that no demolitions have been scheduled yet. St. Bernard officials last week said they will make recommendations to homeowners as to whether their homes suffered enough damage to warrant a tear-down, but it'll be up to each property owner to decide whether to demolish or repair a home.

Whittington said hundreds of adjusters from multiple companies are expected Monday to begin work in the first grids of each parish. She said one large company, which she would not name, is sending 300 adjusters to the two parishes.

"It's a large effort," she said.

The first grids, where work will begin Monday and extend through the week, include the following areas:

▶ In St. Bernard: Parts of Arabi roughly bounded by Florida Avenue to the north, the Orleans Parish line to the west, the Mississippi River to the south and Aycock and Center streets to the east.

▶ In Plaquemines: All east bank areas, from the St. Bernard Parish line to the community of Bohemia.

Wooley's office sent maps of the grids to insurance companies this month, so they could identify customers in the area and prepare to handle their claims. Wooley said the firms are trying to contact their customers to let them know which day they can expect adjusters to evaluate their homes.

Officials will review at the end of the week how many homes were completed and make adjustments for the remaining grids.

OF THE
Orleans Levee District
10761 PERKINS ROAD, SUITE A
BATON ROUGE, LA 70810
TEL. 225-763-2040

October 6, 2005

Ms. Anne Soileau, Acting Director
Department of State Civil Service
P.O. Box 94111
Baton Rouge, Louisiana 70804-9111

Dear Ms. Soileau:

In accordance with Civil Service 17.8, the Board of Commissioners, Orleans, Levee District is requesting approval to implement a furlough without pay for its employees who have not contacted our agency since Hurricane Katrina. The reason for this request is that we assume these employees may never report back to work, and we therefore do not wish to continue paying their salaries. We request the furlough apply to the Orleans Levee District, in the following geographic areas: Orleans Parish. We purpose the furlough for all the employees listed in this plan to begin on October 18, 2005 and end at close of business on November 29, 2005. This would equal 240 hours of furlough for all the affected employees.

Since we are not proposing the furlough of all of our employees, our agency asks for an exception to the regular layoff avoidance rules, as provided for by Civil Service Rule 17.3 be approved, thus allowing our agency to furlough only those employees who have not contacted us since Hurricane Katrina. As a second part of this exception request, we propose to list the names of those who will be covered by this furlough measure, instead of those who will be excluded from it. The reason for this request is that this proposed list will be shorter than that of those who have contacted our agency since Hurricane Katrina.

In the event that any of the affected employees should contact our agency before the effective beginning date of the furlough, our agency will not include them in the furlough.

In the event that any of the affected employee(s) should contact our agency during the period of the furlough, our agency will place him or her on special leave, annual leave, or direct the employee back to work, instead of furloughing him or her. In this unprecedented type of furlough, we cannot foresee the recall schedule from furlough for these employees, since we do not know who may respond or when. Those not responding will be furloughed the entire period of time stated in this plan, and therefore, there will be no recall from furlough for them. Since the normal recall provisions stated in Civil Service Rule 17.8 are not applicable in this furlough, we ask for an exception to any specific recall schedule, subject to our planned actions stated above in this plan.

The employees and their job titles we are proposing for this furlough are as follows:

| Employees | Job Titles |
|---|---|
| Wayne Beaulieu | Mobile Equip. Master Mech. |
| Vanessa Coleman | Guard |
| Kevin Davis | Trades Apprentice |
| Raynetta Hammler | Police Officer 3 |
| Alvin Hartford | Mobile Equip Oper. 1 |
| Kevin Kazmierczak | Fireman Advanced |
| Stanley McRae | Laborer |
| Joseph Oliver | Bridge Operator 2 |
| Lester Rosiere | Mobile Equip. Master Mech. |
| James Watson IV | Laborer |

If you require additional information, please contact Cynthia C. Taylor, Human Resources Director at (225) 763-2062 or at ctaylor@orleanslevee.com at our agency.

Thank You Sincerely,

CLAMORING CLERGY

Pastors push for leadership roles in rebuilding city

By Bruce Nolan
Staff writer

Pastors of the small- and medium-size black churches that once anchored New Orleans neighborhoods in thick webs of financial and emotional support have begun to call for a larger voice in the rebuilding of the flood-damaged city.

Those calls began Tuesday in a meeting of nearly 50 pastors laboriously pulled together for a discussion at Holy Faith Temple Baptist Church in Treme.

In two hours of discussion, it became clear, most had lost their churches. Their congregations were scattered, and many had lost their homes and everything they own.

But the topic of the moment was whether the city was willing to make a place for their community leadership on the panel of business, financial and cultural leaders charged with making threshold decisions on how to rebuild New Orleans.

"In the black community the church is the hub of our life," the Rev. Moses Gordon said. In planning to restore New Orleans "we must take our rightful places and have the kind of influence God wants us to have."

Several were especially dismayed that Mayor Ray Nagin has proposed a broad expansion of casino gambling to energize the city's ravaged economy. "Some things are already being proposed that don't necessarily give us the answer," Gordon said.

Although dramatic, the proposal is widely seen as a long shot at best, given substantial political and legal obstacles.

Nagin's 17-member Bring Back New Orleans Commission contains only one black clergyman, the Rev. Fred Luter of Franklin Avenue Baptist Church.

Luter is a boyhood friend who leads a powerful congregation that before Hurricane Katrina had more than 12,000 members. But nearly all the pastors gathered in Treme — leaders of much smaller neighborhood churches typical to New Orleans — clearly thought his appointment did not address their concerns.

First among those was making sure that thousands of reconstruction jobs would be dealt preferentially to returning New Orleanians, they said.

And they wanted education restored as quickly as possible so families with children could return to New Orleans.

Some were worried about the way that has begun to happen.

The Rev. Arthur Wardsworth, who pastors two churches in Algiers, complained that a move to charter Algiers' public schools and distance them from the Orleans Parish School Board is also a way to steer education out of the hands of black elected officials. In an interview later, Wardsworth said he is not opposed to charter schools in principle but believes that the post-Katrina chaos has provided charter-school advocates cover to quickly break off Algiers schools without adequate public discussion.

That discussion pointed the way into a deeper and more problematic concern for many: a fear that those planning the revival of New Orleans want a "gentrified" community with a much-reduced black presence.

"There's an element in this city that doesn't want this city to look anything like it did before Katrina," said Wardsworth, to general approval.

The pastors were pulled together by Gordon, whose Fellowship Missionary Baptist Church is closed and badly damaged, and the Rev. W. Franklyn Richardson, a prominent pastor and former general secretary of the National Baptist Convention, USA, from Mount Vernon, N.Y.

In the weeks after Katrina, Richardson began to use his regional and national contacts to assemble short-term aid to displaced families and clergy stripped of their congregations and their income.

The Katrina Church and Community Relief Fund has raised $99,000 and distributed $75,000 to local families and individual pastors, he said.

Longer term, Richardson, who helped lead the Treme meeting, hopes the organization can use local churches to steer capital and economic aid into shattered New Orleans neighborhoods.

Assembled from temporary homes as far away as Houston, the pastors who gathered Tuesday shared their stories of personal and professional loss.

Many thanked Richardson for aid he has already steered their way. And all explicitly thanked God for what meager blessings they retained.

"My church was in the Lower 9th. I guess that tells you everything," was a typical introduction. Many added that they had lost their homes.

In interviews later, many said they were living on a spouse's income, supplemented by gifts from preaching in other churches and the charity of friends.

"This suit and the shoes I have on are about all I own," said the Rev. Sam J. Johnson, who received a $1,000 grant from Richardson's fund.

Johnson said his Corinthian Missionary Baptist Church No. 2 in Central City had just finished a renovation of more than $1 million when Katrina struck.

With the project done, the church and its meeting rooms were beautiful, he said.

"Now you look in there, and it's like it's a hundred years old," Johnson said.

Volunteers needed to clean Magazine

From staff reports

In what New Orleans officials hope will be the first in a series of business corridor cleanups, Magazine Street shopowners, with the help of area residents and the National Guard, will sweep the Uptown thoroughfare clean of hurricane debris Saturday.

The all-day volunteer effort — dubbed "Let's Clean Magazine!" — will begin at 9 a.m. at Magazine and Napoleon Avenue.

Volunteers are being asked to bring gloves, brooms, dustpans, rakes and garden clippers. Additional cleaning supplies will be provided by area merchants.

Anyone interested in participating in the project can call Margaret Beer at (281) 703-8456 or send an e-mail to mbeer@mayorofno.com.

The mayor's office is encouraging business owners and residents of other commercial areas to help organize similar cleanups.

Kenner aid site opening earlier

Kenner bureau

Because of declining numbers at the Red Cross drive-through financial assistance site in Kenner, officials are moving up the start time to 7:30 a.m. and will not let applicants line up before that time, Kenner officials said Tuesday.

Almost since the site opened a week ago, Red Cross officials had been filling up the site, a parking lot near the Louis Armstrong International Airport, with hundreds of cars each night before the center opened at 9 a.m. But no more.

"Motorists are warned not to come before 7:30 a.m., as you will be turned away," a Kenner statement said.

At the site, volunteers sign up disaster victims for financial assistance. Those who qualify are mailed a check of about $350 per person, depending on the number of people in a household, within three days.

The site will close at various times each day depending on the demand.

Applicants are asked to bring a driver's license or other form of identification and a utility bill, and Social Security cards for children.

Wallace Moll

Wallace Moll, 79, career law enforcer

East Jefferson bureau

Wallace Moll, a retired chief deputy of the Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office, died Sunday at River Region Hospice in River Ridge. He was 79.

Mr. Moll was born in New Orleans and lived in Metairie for the past 41 years.

He was a special agent in the Army's Criminal Investigation Division and worked for the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the State Police before joining the Sheriff's Office in 1980, shortly after Harry Lee was first elected sheriff. He retired in 1986.

"I appointed Wally Moll as chief deputy because of his vast law enforcement experiences," Lee said.

"I thought he did a bang-up job for me."

Lee said he met Moll while he was a federal magistrate and Moll was with the ATF.

"I had no law enforcement experience when I was elected, and Wally was a big help for me," Lee said.

Mr. Moll had been a senior special agent in the ATF for 27 years and a State Police detective assigned to the Federal Bureau of Narcotics.

He served on the staff of the Louisiana Law Enforcement Institute for 20 years.

Mr. Moll was a member of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, the Louisiana Peace Officers' Association, National Sheriffs' Association, the Mississippi Law Enforcement Officers Association, the Reserve Officers Association of the United States, the Fraternal Order of Police, the American Legion, the New Orleans Scottish Rite, the Jerusalem Temple, the Ionic Lodge and the National Rifle Association.

He is survived by his wife, Crusella Newitt Moll; a daughter, Cynthia Moll Roos; and a brother, Melvin Moll.

Funeral services were held Thursday at Leitz-Eagan Funeral Home Chapel. Interment will be in Metairie Cemetery.

N.O. courts carry on in Gonzales and B.R.

Jury trials on hold as system regroups

By Susan Finch
Staff writer

Many of New Orleans' courts are up and running, even if they aren't in New Orleans.

Orleans Parish courts and parochial offices normally housed in the Civil Court Building on Loyola Avenue are conducting legal business at a temporary location in Gonzales.

There, judges sign pleadings, conduct contradictory hearings, hold conferences and conduct nonjury civil trials. The judges also may schedule other matters at 453 South Blvd., Baton Rouge, which houses the offices of the State Pardon Board.

No jury trials are scheduled because massive evacuations have made assembling a jury pool nearly impossible, a court spokesman said. The clerk of Civil District Court, the clerk of 1st City Court, the civil sheriff of Orleans Parish, and the constable of Orleans Parish are working at 1026 E. Worthy St., Gonzales. Operating hours for the court and the parochial offices are 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday through Friday.

The recorder of mortgages, the registrar of conveyances, and the Office of Notarial Archives resumed operations Monday at the New Orleans Convention Center. The status of Criminal Court is more complicated.

Until recently, the judges were taking turns presiding at first appearances, or bond settings, for suspects arrested in New Orleans at Hunt Correctional in St. Gabriel. But Magistrate Gerard Hansen has relocated to the Union Passenger Terminal, which has served as a makeshift criminal justice center in the weeks after Hurricane Katrina.

The judges will continue traveling to Hunt on a rotating basis through next week to set trial dates and review the status of inmates to make sure nobody is in jail who shouldn't be.

But starting Oct. 27, the judges will have access to a makeshift courtroom in the "show-up room" at the House of Detention, Chief Judge Calvin Johnson said.

Courts will ramp up considerably after Oct. 25, the end of what Gov. Kathleen Blanco declared a "court holiday" for the system to get back in shape after back-to-back hurricanes effectively shut it down.

By Nov. 1, "We'll be doing preliminary hearings and real status hearings and dealing with issues in terms of setting trial dates," Johnson said.

The court's Tulane and Broad headquarters building likely won't be ready to handle jury trials until February, he said. Johnson meets with fellow members of the city's criminal justice system on Tuesday mornings at the attorney general's office in Baton Rouge.

"We are working seven days a week to get our system operating in a fashion whereby we can do the things that need to be done," he said. "We're going to get it done."

Johnson bristled at recent comments from Mayor Ray Nagin that the city doesn't have a functioning criminal justice system.

He said he made several efforts to invite Nagin representatives to attend the regular Tuesday meeting, but has received no response.

"I guess he's just uninformed about where the system is and what we are doing," Johnson said.

Likewise, people who think the hurricanes washed away their legal troubles are woefully mistaken, he said.

"If they think because of Katrina, everybody is going to walk out the door, they've got another think coming," he said. "Some people really believe that. That's just not going to happen."

Traffic Court resumed operations Monday at the Algiers courthouse on Morgan Street, and the four court divisions will convene weekdays 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. on the second floor. Additionally, traffic court continues operating at Baton Rouge city court building, 232 St. Louis St., to serve New Orleans motorists who haven't returned home.

Orleans Parish Municipal Court continues operating at Union Passenger Terminal pending construction of a temporary court facility inside the Textile Building near Orleans Parish Prison.

HELLMERS
Leonard H. Hellmers, Jr., a resident of New Orleans, LA, died at the age of 65 at 10:35 a.m. on Sunday, October 9, 2005, at East Jefferson General Hospital (Jefferson Parish, Louisiana) from complications associated with kidney cancer. He was born in New Orleans on December 5, 1939, and attended William Frantz Elementary School (kindergarten), St. Paul Lutheran School (grades 1-8), and F. T. Nicholls High School (grades 9-12), from which he was graduated in 1957 as a National Merit Scholar. He studied chemistry, physics, and mathematics as an undergraduate at Tulane University and Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge.
Leonard was a Private First Class in the United States Army. He was selected to attend the Army Language School at the Presidio of Monterey in California where he studied Italian, and was assigned as a linguist in the US Army Security Agency, serving primarily in Frankfort, Germany. Following his honorable discharge, Leonard resumed his academic career at what was then LSU New Orleans (today's UNO), where he earned a Bachelor's degree in mathematics. An interest in theater drew him to Florida State University in Tallahassee, where he earned a Master of Arts and eventually a Doctor of Philosophy degree. He was a college professor in the theater departments of Wesleyan University in Watertown, Connecticut, and Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa.
Leonard left the academic world and became Research Director for the marketing research firm ASI in southern California. Following the death of his father in 1984, he returned to the family home in New Orleans to care for his widowed mother and sister Eileen, where for a time he operated his own marketing research business. At the time of his death, he was retired. Leonard's interests were many and varied, reflected in his large personal library. He had a special interest in and performed independent research on the origins of language. He was a musician, and played the string bass professionally during his high school and college years.
Leonard was the oldest child of Leonard and Meta Wegener Hellmers, both of whom are deceased. He is survived by his sister Janet and her husband, Wolfgang Neumann, Leonard's brother-in-law and longtime friend; his brother Norman and his wife Patricia O'Brien Hellmers; and, by his younger sister, Eileen. He is also survived by six nieces and nephews, Katrina Neumann Arceneaux, Krista Neumann Kettler, Kirsten Neumann Fortson, Erik Neumann, Jennifer Hellmers Bjornstad, and Jeffrey Hellmers, by five grand-nieces and nephews, Erika and Evan Arceneaux, Katherine and Benjamin Kettler, and Soren Bjornstad, and by many relatives and friends.
The family thanks the staffs of East Jefferson General Hospital and the Oncology-Hematology office of Drs. Brinz, Burroff, Gurtler, and Russo for their many kindnesses, and especially Dr. Angelo Russo, whom Leonard trusted and admired.
Following cremation, his remains will be interred in the Hellmers family tomb in Metairie Cemetery. No services are planned at this time.
Donations in his memory may be made to the Hurricane Restoration Fund of St. Paul Lutheran Church, 2624 Burgundy Street, New Orleans LA 70117.

Tax on foreign oil and gas would revitalize state

Gov. Kathleen Blanco and the Legislature must soon face the task of rebuilding New Orleans and south Louisiana. They should consider a tax on foreign oil and gas processed in Louisiana.

Such a tax could invigorate our economy, restore our wetlands and bring our people home.

Hurricane Katrina's damage to Louisiana was no surprise to those who have studied coastal erosion and flood control in south Louisiana. As they use our natural resources and harm our wetlands, major oil companies profit from politics tilted in their favor.

While other states turn them away, these companies process foreign oil and gas in Louisiana virtually tax-free to supply America petroleum products. They have crushed all previous attempts to modernize Louisiana's 85-year-old system for taxing oil and gas. The major oil companies must now acknowledge their moral obligation to assist Louisiana in this unprecedented time of need.

I propose a 4 percent tax on oil and gas processing to generate $4.8 billion per year. I would use the proceeds to eliminate the state income tax, the state severance tax, the state sales tax on business utilities and the state corporate income tax. This will leave $1.2 billion, which could be bonded to yield $10 billion for immediate coastal restoration and levee repair.

The impact at the gas pump will be spread across the country, and I estimate no more than a nickel a gallon.

The people of Louisiana welcome the president's offer of federal assistance, but how soon after the news crews leave New Orleans will the deficit-ridden U.S. government turn its attention elsewhere?

Louisiana needs consistent funding to overcome hurricane devastation.

Jackson exposed

Finally, the Rev. Jesse Jackson has revealed his true nature — a lying, camera-hogging hypocrite. Why else would he bring 200 people — most of whom are out-of-state strangers — to New Orleans?

He said he was bringing 600 evacuees home to go back to work — a big, fat lie. Perhaps he couldn't find 600 evacuees who wanted to work. Then he has the gall to say that it's Mayor Ray Nagin's job to find them housing. Where? As he well knows, there is nowhere left in New Orleans to live that isn't already occupied.

If the Rev. Jackson is so concerned about these evacuees, then I suggest that he take them to his home and find them jobs. It will be a long time before New Orleans can provide housing for anyone, working or not.

Golfers don't need high ground

Let's let FEMA (if it ever gets its act together) put their trailer park for displaced New Orleanians on the golf course in Audubon Park.

It has excellent public transportation, a great location and is currently only used by a few rich.

Let them build a course in the Lower 9th Ward. Few will mourn a flooded golf course.

They all axed for you

As we rebuild our homes and lives following Katrina, I would like to remind the citizens of the Greater New Orleans area to please remember the Audubon Nature Institute.

The staff at the Audubon Zoo and the Aquarium have suffered much due to lack of visitors and therefore lack of revenues with many being laid off recently. I hope and pray that the animals at the zoo aren't the next casualties.

It takes a huge sum of money to operate the zoo, to feed the animals and to pay for veterinary care and utilities. It would be truly tragic to see our magnificent zoo slip into disrepair and neglect. By all means, take care of your own homes and families first, but if you can spare any money to help the zoo and aquarium, please do so.

Jeff decision made no sense

As a longtime resident of Jefferson Parish with a recently flooded home, I am extremely annoyed at the excuses from the public officials whom we entrusted with our well-being.

The explanations for the unmanned pumping stations make no sense. Our leaders tell us that essential pump personnel were spared a "death sentence" and evacuated because no buildings in the parish could withstand the force of Hurricane Katrina. On the other hand, the lives of other essential employees, as well as the physicians, nurses, administrative staff and patients at the two parish hospitals, were apparently deemed expendable, as no attempt to evacuate these facilities was even considered. The lives of essential police officers, firefighters and emergency medical technicians also must have been low priority. Most such personnel were required to work or be fired! It is now clear who was intended to be placed in the body bags that we heard so much about.

"Katrina" comes from the Greek word for cleansing. The question is now or the next election. Either way, credibility is lost.

No reason for police brutality

Let us assume, but not concede, that Robert Davis was drunk, provoked New Orleans police officers and resisted arrest. None of these conditions justifies the brutal and bloody beating he received from the three officers. Shame!

The videotape of the incident revealed the presence of several other NOPD officers, more than enough force to subdue a 64-year-old man without resorting to such violence. Why did these other officers fail to take action to stop this excessive response?

Locals and tourists who enjoy the many attractions of New Orleans need assurances from the mayor and police chief that such police brutality will no longer be tolerated.

OUR OPINIONS

No time to fight

The squabbling between U.S. Sens. Mary Landrieu and David Vitter needs to end. Right now.

Louisiana doesn't send a large delegation to Capitol Hill. So even at the best of times, the state's two senators and seven representatives need to be able work together for the common good.

That level of cooperation is more crucial now than ever before. The two catastrophic hurricanes that hit the Gulf Coast this year have threatened the future of the New Orleans area and Louisiana as a whole. Our state cannot recover without significant help from Washington, and that will not happen if Louisiana's two senators keep picking at each other.

In the aftermath of Katrina, the two senators did agree to introduce a $250 billion redevelopment bill. Of course, many observers outside the state scoffed at a package that they viewed less as a serious relief proposal than as an ill-considered grab for federal money. And even then, the two senators ended up filing separate versions of the bill.

Their disagreement widened during the debate over legislation authorizing $750 million in post-disaster loans to local government agencies. In an unusual step, this measure specifies that the loans cannot be forgiven. Sen. Vitter voted for the bill; Sen. Landrieu voted against it.

Both senators offer defensible reasons for their positions. Sen. Landrieu maintains that Congress shouldn't place more restrictive conditions on loans to Louisiana than on loans to other disaster-stricken areas, and she is absolutely right. But Sen. Vitter has suggested that his position was more realistic. Top Republican lawmakers in the House, he suggests, are deeply skeptical of Louisiana politicians' ability to spend aid money effectively. Without the added restriction, the bill might never have have passed.

It's unfortunate that the two could not reach a common position on the bill. But what's alarming is their very public squabbling. The senators argued about strategy on the Senate floor and refused to yield time to allow each other to respond to questions.

Sen. Landrieu, a Democrat, and Sen. Vitter, a Republican, are unlikely to agree on every issue. And honestly, they don't even have to like each other. But each senator has an obligation to put the welfare of the state before any personal or political differences. If Louisiana's two senators can't come up with a way to help the state move forward, it doesn't set a very good example for the rest of the Senate.

The Saints go marching in

Not long ago in a land that seems very far away, Saints fans were looking forward to the start of football season with optimism.

The offseason had been good to the team, and coach Jim Haslett and his staff seemed to be making smart moves.

Then came Hurricane Katrina, which upended our homes and uprooted us all. Even then, and even though owner Tom Benson seems enamored with the idea of moving the Saints to San Antonio, fans still clung to their team. We were all hoping for some magic, something to distract us from the mud and misery around us.

Then came New York: Giants 27, Saints 10.

And Minnesota: Vikings 33-16.

And Green Bay: Packers 52-3.

And then came the saddest development of the season. Deuce McAllister, the brightest light on the team, was lost with a torn anterior cruciate ligament in his right knee.

As one doctor put it, "New Orleans has had enough rough times."

Yes, more than enough for a lifetime.

Suddenly, the little joy left in this season has vanished.

Mr. Benson could make fans feel a little better, though. He could commit to keeping the Saints in New Orleans. He could help find a quick, economical way to refurbish the Superdome and make it the premier stadium it once was.

The NFL wants the team to stay. Reportedly, his top staff wants the team to stay. The New Orleans area needs the Saints to stay put and help rebuild this community.

Tom Benson has the power to make sure that happens. He ought to jump at the chance to help the people and place that have been so good to him for so many years.

Going into this season, the Saints urged fans to "believe." Saints fans have been believers for years. Now Mr. Benson ought to show the people in this struggling community that he believes in us.

Election recommendation

This newspaper makes the following recommendation for Saturday's ballot.

•••••••

ST. TAMMANY PARISH
PEARL RIVER

To levy a 1/4-cent sales tax for sewerage

YES

The town of Pearl River is asking residents to approve this new quarter-cent sales tax that would be dedicated to operations of the town's sewerage system. The tax would be in effect for 10 years. Pre-Hurricane Katrina estimates showed that the tax would generate about $70,000 a year. If approved, the tax rate in the town would increase to 9 percent.

It appears that the town has managed its system well over the years, but it is seeking to raise revenue to upgrade and replace parts on its aging facilities.

Beware upsetting our high-strung police

JAMES GILL

Cops making a nighttime arrest on Bourbon Street will routinely throw in a public intoxication charge which, justified or not, is very hard to beat. Often, of course, it is justified.

You wouldn't want to bet that anyone hanging around there is stone-cold sober, unless a gang of evangelicals happens to be looking for souls to save.

But any sobersides caught up in the Vieux Carre sweep just has to take his medicine. The presumption is that anyone who falls foul of the police has committed excessive revelry. No blood-alcohol tests are required, and judges rely on what police department spokesman Marlon Defillo terms the arresting officer's "expertise."

When three cops are working together, their combined expertise should enable them to spot a drunk at a hundred paces.

It is unlikely, therefore, that the cops who beat up and arrested Robert Davis last weekend could really have thought he was blitzed, if, as he says, no liquor has passed his lips since a bender in 1980.

Davis was booked not only with being drunk but with resisting arrest, battery on a police officer and public intimidation — the standard litany of charges cops reach for when a citizen makes them mad.

The cops, caught by a news cameraman, looked pretty burly, but they must be delicate souls if they really found Davis, a 64-year-old retired elementary schoolteacher, as big a handful as the charge sheet suggests. The video does not give the impression that the cops found Davis intimidating. He was pretty much helpless as they delivered a pummeling. You'd be a sucker to take their word for anything.

Davis pleaded not guilty in court Wednesday and got a January trial date, but the charges will surely be dismissed long before then. It is not easy for the courts to defer to the expertise of cops who lay a drunk charge on a citizen whose temperate intimates vouch for his temperate habits.

It is possible that the cops made a mistake, albeit one that would bring their departments fallibility to a new level. More likely, though, their real expertise is in lying. Every police department has its share of officers who are happy to fit up citizens with bogus charges, confident that the courts will take their word for it.

We evidently have our share of such officers here, although police union chief David Benelli points out that the camera caught the assault from only one angle and that due process needs to take its course. Fair enough. Those goons are entitled to a presumption of innocence.

Their trial is set a week later than Davis', but few defendants face such damning evidence as this. The video makes for pretty disgusting viewing, but credit the officers' lawyer, Frank DeSalvo, with giving us a good laugh nevertheless. They arrested Davis, DeSalvo said, because he was stumbling drunk and they were trying to protect him.

Let us all hope we never need protection from such cops as these. Davis sure wasn't stumbling after they got through, because they had smashed him to the ground. He seems to have had no idea that the cop repeatedly punching him in the back of the neck was doing it for his own good.

Even if, as DeSalvo contended at a press conference Wednesday, Davis was not the innocent stroller he claims to be, no provocation from an elderly citizen can warrant such a violent reaction. These cops are toast. Once the criminal case is over, Davis will probably have a sure-fire civil claim. But that is by no means the end of the travails the police department has heaped on the city.

Officers allegedly rode around after the storm in Cadillacs removed from a dealership, while some 250 are under investigation for possible desertion.

Two days after the Davis beating, a couple of cops had an ugly run-in with relief workers handing out food in the park on Washington Square. The stress of Katrina has left a lot of us a bit ratty, no doubt, but the Police Department seems to be returning to the days when it was regarded as a public enemy, before it was restored under the Marc Morial administration.

The department has suffered "a massive collapse," Morial told Agency France Presse, and we "are almost faced with rebuilding" it. Amid all the investigations of corruption in his administration, Morial has been pretty quiet lately, and must have relished the rare opportunity to make us yearn, in one respect at least, for the good old days when he was in charge.

We're all tired; sorry, it's no excuse

JARVIS DEBERRY

Police enforce the midnight curfew on Bourbon Street Monday.

I lost my home to Hurricane Katrina.

I reported to work the Sunday before the storm and was in New Orleans that Monday. Though I left Tuesday with dozens of Times-Picayune employees, I have been at work virtually every day since.

I haven't beaten anybody up in the French Quarter.

Other reporters at this newspaper also lost homes to Hurricane Katrina.

They've been at work, too. They haven't beaten anybody up in the French Quarter.

You, dear reader, may have lost your home to Hurricane Katrina. I don't know if you've been able to return to work or if you've lost your job, but I feel safe in my assumption that you haven't beaten up anybody in the French Quarter either.

Earlier this week, Lance Schilling and Robert Evangelist, two New Orleans police officers from the 8th District, were booked with beating up a 64-year-old man on Bourbon Street. Videotape shows the officers pummeling the man with their fists. A third officer, Stewart Smith, is captured on videotape menacing an Associated Press cameraman who had the audacity to film what the police officers were doing.

An attorney for the cops has gone on a campaign to convince you and me that we didn't see what we saw. Lt. David Benelli, president of the Police Association of New Orleans, when he was interviewed on a local television station trotted out the standard line about how the accused are entitled to due process (should anybody ever get anything less?), but he managed to say one thing that was original.

He asked the public to understand that police officers are under a tremendous amount of stress and that many of them have continued to work despite the loss of their homes.

Benelli did not say that the officers beat Robert Davis because they had lost their homes. After all, that would have been an admission that the cops are guilty. But he did suggest that we ought to try to be understanding given the fact that so many officers lost so much.

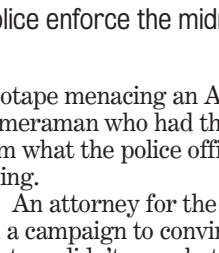
We all could use an extra dose of understanding these days, but none of us is entitled to that much.

Neither the stress of seeing people trapped on rooftops, the stress of losing one's home, nor the stress of working long hours gives anybody leave to beat up another. If that were the case, I'd have license to go out now and take out my frustrations on the first person I saw.

These days, it is near impossible to get booking information on anybody arrested for a crime in New Orleans. For that reason I don't know that any of the three officers arrested for beating Robert Davis lost a home during the storm. Public records indicate that Robert Evangelist lives in an apartment complex in Algiers. That doesn't mean he didn't suffer loss, of course, but the west bank wasn't hit as hard as the part of the city across the Mississippi River.

At the end of the day it doesn't matter if or how much the officers suffered. It doesn't mitigate a beating.

I don't know if Robert Davis was drunk. (He says he hasn't had a drink in 25 years.) I don't know if he's telling the truth when he says that a cop started hitting him when Davis told him he was rude and unprofessional to interrupt Davis' conversation with another officer



But if the officers are so confident that they were acting appropriately, what explains the anger unleashed on the cameraman filming the action? Are we supposed to believe the officers were angry because they were caught on tape following procedure and acting within the law?

No. No more than we are to believe that their fury had anything to do with Hurricane Katrina. Stress can do a lot of things. But it can't make us beat people up against our wills.

Harriet Miers, in her own vapid words

DAVID BROOKS

Of all the words written about Harriet Miers, none are more disturbing than the ones she wrote herself. In the early '90s, while she was president of the Texas bar association, Miers wrote a column called "President's Opinion" for The Texas Bar Journal. It is the largest body of public writing we have from her, and sad to say, the quality of thought and writing doesn't even rise to the level of pedestrian.

Of course, we have to make allowances for the fact that the first job of any association president is to not offend her members. Still, nothing excuses sentences like this:

"More and more, the intractable problems in our society have one answer: broad-based intolerance of unacceptable conditions and a commitment by many to fix problems."

Or this: "We must end collective acceptance of inappropriate conduct and increase education in professionalism."

Or this: "When consensus of diverse leadership can be achieved on issues of importance, the greatest impact can be achieved."

Or passages like this: "An organization must also implement programs to fulfill strategies established through its goals and mission. Methods for evaluation of these strategies are a necessity. With the framework of mission, goals, strategies, programs, and methods for evaluation in place, a meaningful budgeting process can begin."

Or, finally, this: "We have to understand and appreciate that achieving justice for all is in jeopardy before a call to arms to assist in obtaining support for the justice system will be effective. Achieving the necessary understanding and appreciation of why the challenge is so important, we can then turn to the task of providing the much needed support."

I don't know if by mere quotation I can fully convey the relentless march of vapid abstractions that mark Miers' prose. Nearly every idea is vague and depersonalized. Nearly every debatable point is elided. It's not that Miers didn't attempt to tackle interesting subjects. She wrote about unequal access to the justice system, about the underrepresentation of minorities in the law and about whether pro bono work should be mandatory. But she presents no arguments or ideas, except the repetition of the bromide that bad things can be eliminated if people of good will come together to eliminate bad things.

Or as she puts it, "There is always a necessity to tend to a myriad of responsibilities on a number of cases as well as matters not directly related to the practice of law." And yet, "Disciplining ourselves to provide the opportunity for thought and analysis has to rise again to a high priority."

Throw aside ideology. Surely the threshold skill required of a Supreme Court justice is the ability to write clearly and argue incisively. Miers' columns provide no evidence of that.

The Miers nomination has reopened the rift between conservatives and establishment Republicans.

The conservative movement was founded upon the supposition that ideas have consequences. Conservatives have founded so many think tanks, magazines and organizations, like the Federalist Society, because they believe that you have to win arguments to win political power. They dream of Supreme Court justices capable of writing brilliant opinions that will reshape the battle of ideas.

Republicans, who these days are as likely to be members of the corporate establishment as the evangelical establishment, are more suspicious of intellectuals and ideas, and more likely to believe that politics is about deal-making, loyalty and power. You know you are in establishment Republican circles when the conversation is bland but unifying. You know you are in conservative circles when it is interesting but divisive. Conservatives err by becoming irresponsible. Republicans tend to be blown about haplessly by forces they cannot understand.

For the first years of his presidency, George Bush healed the division between Republicans and conservatives by pursuing big conservative goals with ruthless Republican discipline. But Harriet Miers has shown no loyalty to conservative institutions like the Federalist Society. Her loyalty has been to the person of the president, and her mental style seems to be Republicanism on stilts.

So conservatives are caught between loyalty to their ideas and loyalty to the president they admire. Most of them have come out against Miers — quietly or loudly. Establishment Republicans are displaying their natural loyalty to leadership. And Miers is caught in the vise between these two forces, a smart and good woman who has been put in a position where she cannot succeed.

The joke's on the poor

A Page 1 article in The New York Times on Tuesday carried the following headline: "Liberal Hopes Ebb in Post-Storm Poverty Debate."

I might have started laughing if the subject weren't so serious. Who in their right mind — liberal, moderate, Rotarian, contrarian — could have possibly thought that George W. Bush and his GOP Wild Bunch (Dick Cheney, Karl Rove, Tom DeLay et al.) had suddenly seen the light ("Eureka! We've been wrong!") and become serious about engaging the problem of poverty in America?

The article noted that some liberal activists had hoped that the extraordinary suffering caused by Hurricane Katrina might lead to a genuine effort by the administration and Congress to address such important poverty-related matters as health care, housing, employment and race.

After all, the president himself had gone on national television from the French Quarter of the stricken city of New Orleans and promised "bold action."

"As all of us saw on television," said Bush, "there is also some deep, persistent poverty in this region as well. That poverty has roots in a history of racial discrimination, which cut off generations from the opportunity of America. We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action. So let us restore all that we have cherished from yesterday, and let us rise above the legacy of inequality."

I assumed that most people watching the president realized that he was deeply embedded in a Karl Rove moment. The speech was a carefully scripted, meticulously staged performance designed primarily to halt the widespread criticism of Bush's failure to respond more quickly to the tragedy.

As the president spoke, it never occurred to me that anyone would buy into the notion that Bush and his supporters would actually do something about poverty and racism. Someone who believed that could probably be persuaded to make a bid on eBay to buy the Brooklyn Bridge.

Bush is the standard-bearer par excellence of his party's efforts to redistribute the bounty of the United States from the bottom up, not the other way around. If there's one thing the president has been good at, it has been funneling money to the rich. The suffering wrought by Katrina hasn't changed that at all.

One of the first things the president did in the aftermath of Katrina was to poke his finger in the eyes of struggling workers by suspending the requirements of the Davis-Bacon Act in the storm-ravaged areas. Passed during the Great Depression, the law requires contractors on federally funded construction projects to pay at least the prevailing wage in the region.

This is one more way of taking money from the working poor and handing it to the wealthy. A construction laborer in New Orleans who would ordinarily be paid about $9 an hour, the prevailing wage in the city, can now be paid less. So much for the president's commitment to fighting poverty.

Poverty has steadily increased under Bush, even as breathtaking riches (think tax cuts, cronyism, war profiteering, you name it) have been heaped upon those who were already wealthy. Class divisions are hardening, and economic inequality continues to increase dramatically.

Bush's political posturing (his speeches, his endless trips to the Gulf Coast) is not meant to serve as a beacon of hope for the downtrodden. It is a message to middle-class voters, who have become increasingly disturbed by the president's policies and were appalled by the fact that he seemed unmoved by the terrible suffering that followed Hurricane Katrina.

The man who campaigned as a compassionate conservative and then turned the federal government into a compassion-free zone is all but handing out press releases that say, "I care."

He cares all right. About his poll ratings. In the end, much of the money to help lower-income victims of the recent storms will most likely be siphoned from existing, badly needed and already underfunded programs to help the poor and near-poor.

A real effort to fight poverty and combat discrimination? From this regime? You must be joking.

The combination of wind, heat and floodwater proved deadly to many New Orleans landscapes. But a scientific survey of post-Katrina plant and soil conditions found some reassuring signs of life.

First, the good news. The old-timers and the natives fared better than the newcomers in the lush local landscape that flooded after Hurricane Katrina. Native live oaks and cypress trees, and historic garden favorites such as gardenias, crape myrtles, althea and crinums, are the few bright living spots in an otherwise drab Orleans and Jefferson parish landscape.

Now, the bad news. Magnolia trees throughout the region are dead or perishing since they wither in saturated soil or water that covers the roots. And, as so many homeowners found out the hard way, it's really not good to have pine trees close to your house.

Those are some of the conclusions of a caravan of Louisiana State University plant scientists and state agriculture and forestry staff who recently surveyed flood effects on landscapes, trees and soils in areas in Kenner, Old Metairie, central New Orleans, Lakeview, City Park and the New Orleans Botanical Garden.

What they saw resembled the back side of the moon more than lush Metairie, where state master gardener coordinator Robert Souvestre grew up, and semitropical New Orleans, where consumer horticulturist Dan Gill has been the go-to gardening guru (and Times-Picayune garden columnist) for years.

If laughter and antidepressants are the best medicine in these trying times, you can't do much better than "Greater Tuna" at the Skyfire Theatre in Covington.

The production is notable on several fronts. It is the first post-Katrina theater produced in the area. (Hurrah!) Owner-producer Zachary A. Casey said the Skyfire suffered no hurricane damage. "This place was built in 1941 and it's like a bunker," he said. "In previous storms, it's been used as an evacuation center."

It's good to be back, dawlin!

Performer Becky Allen feels at home in the French Quarter, but the folks in Jackson, Miss., just don't get her

By Millie Ball
Staff writer

Over-the-top actress Becky Allen and her mother flitted into the Guy Keefer salon in the Omni Royal Orleans last Friday to tell salon owner Dickey Smith they were back in town.

They'd evacuated to Jackson, Miss., and stayed with relatives, said Allen, who's in her mid-50s and was dressed in a rather subdued fashion for her: dangling earrings, oversized black beads, black tights, a loose black top cut down to there with a rhinestone mosquito hawk pin at the plunge point, red vest to her knees. Her blonde hair hung below her shoulders. She and her mother tried to do each other's roots while they were away, they said.

Jackson wasn't a bit like home. "People stared at me in Jackson," Allen said. "I was wild to them. I couldn't diminish myself enough so people wouldn't stare at me," she said, all wide-eyed. "I mean, I didn't wear my eyelashes; I didn't wear makeup. But they all knew I was crazy."

Allen said she was in Wal-Mart one night when a man asked what religion she was. "He said, 'Are you Buddhist or Catholic or what?'

"And I said, 'I'm from New Orleans.'

"And he said, 'You don't have to tell me that!' "

Her mother, Myrtis Butzman, said she went to a red hat society meeting for women over age 50, where the conversation was about crocheting and cooking. "I'm 92, and I told them I'm going to learn to crochet when I'm old!" said Butzman. A trim woman who looks as if she's in her early 70s, she wore a conservative cream-colored pantsuit. Her blondish hair was short and cut in a stylish blow-dry style.

"I normally go to the gym three hours a day," Butzman said. "This is what I always show people I can do." She sat down in a nearby chair and raised her right leg straight above her head.

Allen said there were nine family members at her uncle's house in Jackson, plus four dogs and three cats. "I'd get up at 7 a.m. to go to the bathroom and someone would come in and say 'Hi!' all chirpy. They'd say, 'You want breakfast?!'

"But you know what, we all got along. We had no TV. We

PLANTS, from C-1

As Gill and Souvestre surveyed, they called the names of the plant life, living and dead.

"I think I just saw a Norfolk Island pine."

"The yews here didn't make it."

"That's our first holly we've seen live."

"Look how the wind shredded the leaves on these fotinas."

At the Jefferson Parish LSU AgCenter office in Kenner, the horticulturists picked up Jefferson and Orleans parish horticultural agents Ginger Fortson and Karen Blackburn, among others.

Dozens of soil samples were taken, their locations noted on a GPS locator so they can be retested in the same spot. Ed Bush and Jeff Kuehny started sampling in a Kenner park, where Gill immediately noticed that improper staking led to the uprooting of many young trees that should have survived.

"One thing homeowners will want to know is what condition the soil will be in," Blackburn said as she held a plastic bag for a soil sample. "They will want to find out about salinity, any salts or oils or anything they may need to be cautious about. Do they need to amend their soils? How are plants going to react?"

One of the big landscaping concerns is the salinity of floodwater, so samples were taken in areas where fresh water covered the landscape, as well as in other areas where the mildly salty brackish water from Lake Pontchartrain stood for days.

The visual surveys by Souvestre, Gill and Fortson focused on the few green or even blooming plants. They found lots of Bermuda grass greening up, although the St. Augustine and centipede turf grasses were killed.

Home landscape losses will depend on the amount of floodwater and how long it stood, the horticulturists said. Smaller sago palms that were covered with water were dead, but older ones, whose fronds were above the water line, seem to be thriving. In general, azaleas and any shrubs that stood in water for days drowned and are dying of root rot, a classic flood condition, Gill said.

Even small, subtle changes in elevation make a difference in what lives and dies.

"You can see in this ligustrum, look at the pattern of damage," Gill said. "The slightly lower one is succumbing to root rot, but the slightly higher ones are going to make it."

Urban forester Hallie Dozier, of the AgCenter's department of renewable natural resources, had spent the previous two weeks looking at and photographing storm-damaged trees in other Louisiana parishes.

"I especially wanted to come here because all the other damage I saw was wind," Dozier said. "I really wanted to see the effects of the flood."

She took dozens of digital photographs, as did everyone in the group. She aimed her camera at a pine tree broken off 10 feet above the roofline of a house, a classic example of pine damage.

"They break up high," she said. "They are really bad trees to have near your house, because they break and are so big when they hit something. Typically, they're not going to hit anything, but if they do, you are big-time out of luck."

Because of the diversity of plant materials available, the group went to Old Metairie, where floodwater marks rose four or five feet on upscale homes.

"I used to send people who wanted shady landscapes to Old Metairie" to get ideas, Gill said, "because it had the most beautiful ones. And they will be back again, I guarantee you."

In landscapes where significant tree loss occurred, the most difficult thing for many gardeners will be switching from a shady landscape to a sunny one with a whole different palette of plants, Gill said.

Fortson said she thinks that lost shade will cause air temperatures as well as air conditioning bills to rise.

"Just one tree planted in the right place in a residential lot can make as much as 35 percent difference in your cooling costs," she said.

At the New Orleans Botanical Garden, the vivid colors of thriving water lilies were a bright spot against the background of formal hedges of dead boxwood, their geometry surrounding thorny sticks that were once rose bushes.

Longtime garden volunteer Mary Biundo had talked her way past security guards and was surveying surviving plants in the butterfly garden. Like everybody else, she was noting the silver lining in the dead landscape.

"In a way, the garden was getting out of hand, and this is kind of a catharsis," she said. "I love it out here. I'll be back."

Botanical Garden Director Paul Soniat was perspiring along with the few other workers cleaning up, one of whom was City Park Director Bob Becker, dragging a big branch. (Three weeks ago, City Park furloughed all but 11 of its 260 workers.) Soniat said he relates the devastation of the garden to its barren condition when he started there in 1982.

Now, at least, he said, they have the framework of the garden, mostly intact buildings and infrastructure, and a generous foundation that is paying the garden staff for a couple of months.

"Luckily, we have the Azby Fund, a great donor for us, which has come in and supported our relief and rebuilding efforts, and that's a major thing," Soniat said. "We wouldn't be able to do this right now without them. It's stabilized our staff, plus gives us some money to fix our buildings and hopefully buy some plants. It's going to be a long struggle."

The most plant materials lost were several big magnolias in the back of the garden, Soniat said, and the garden will have to start over with "pretty much all the perennials and shrubs. But we needed to clean up anyway, right?

"The garden fared much better than other parts of the park. It's all relative."

The goal is to get the Pavilion of the Two Sisters open by January, Soniat said. The new Conservatory of the Two Sisters is structurally perfect, but most plant materials in the fern and rain forest exhibits were cooked by the combination of floodwater and high temperatures.

Electrical failures meant the greenhouse vents couldn't be opened.

Two of the garden's newest features, the Japanese Garden and the cactus collection, recently installed in a renovated greenhouse, looked relatively untouched. One of the park employees told Gill that New York police officers guarding the nearby New Orleans Museum of Art had watered and saved some of the cactus.

Amid the general garden gloom, Fortson pointed out what was thriving: "Hibiscus, rose of Sharon, japonicas, camellias, sasquanas, they're all good," she said. Coral vine was blooming on one of the overhead trellises. Even a few of the antique roses were in full flower.

"Those are the old garden plants that have always been used here," she said. "The plants you see in historic gardens are the ones that seemed to fare the best."

Gill agreed. "Look at those crape myrtles," he said. "Those are all new leaves." But he soon gestured elsewhere: "See that tree that laid down and died? That was a pink-flowered tabuea, probably the only one in the South."

One of the things that bothered him more than the plant loss, Gill said, was the garden's ruined library, many volumes in a small room used by the master gardeners. It had local gardening history books that went back for decades and cannot be replaced, he said.

And some of the plant losses did affect him directly.

"See that clematis?" he said, pointing to an umber mass on the garden's front fence. "It's a tropical species, and it's been there since the 1980s. It came through the 1989 freeze beautifully. I would always tell people (who asked about clematis) to go out to City Park and look at the one on the fence."

Finally, the caravan wound through the streets of Lakeview. The convivial group grew more somber, noting more and more dried dust, then cracked mud, an inch thick on the ground, on cars, on downed limbs, on drowned homes.

"The mud is definitely localized," Souvestre said. "This is where we should be taking samples. Can we grow anything in it?"

By this time, late in the day, Dozier said she had reached her hurricane maximum and had to take a break.

"I just keep thinking how many hearts are broken," she said.

One person asked Souvestre if people here will replant. He shrugged.

"Spring is spring," he said. "People will be tired of winter."

One of City Park's famous Dueling Oaks, under which disputes were settled by swordplay or pistols in old New Orleans, was fatally uprooted by a hurricane in 1949. Now, Hurricane Katrina has dealt the remaining Dueling Oak what experts call "a major hit." About a third of its major interior limbs fell, said Tom Campbell, director of the state's urban forest program.

As a New Orleanian, Campbell knows how much the beloved live oaks mean to the citizenry. The Anseman Oak looks pretty good, he said, and the Ancient Grove of the oldest live oaks in City Park "did pretty well."

"I kind of had a nice drive down St. Charles Avenue the other day," Campbell said. "Actually, it wasn't nice, but I came out of it pretty optimistic. Live oaks are kind of like a sculpture of what's happened to them over the years.

"A lot of them lost small limbs, and they'll be OK. The ones that were standing in water for a long time might be a different story."

He said that once they leaf out next spring, live oaks "will be significantly normal looking. And once the debris is picked up, you don't see what was, just what is.

"So even though the crown is less full and significant limbs have been lost, it's going to look pretty dad-gum good on St. Charles and in the Ancient Grove."

Another of the area's landmark oak trees — Seven Sisters Oak, the mammoth tree near the lakeshore in Mandeville that is acknowledged as the largest live oak in Louisiana — fared better than the Dueling Oak. Its seven major trunks are intact.

"It's taken a beating but it's still standing," said Ginger Fortson, a Jefferson Parish extension horticulturist who lives on the north shore and visually surveyed the tree. "It lost a few little limbs, but it looks to be in good shape."

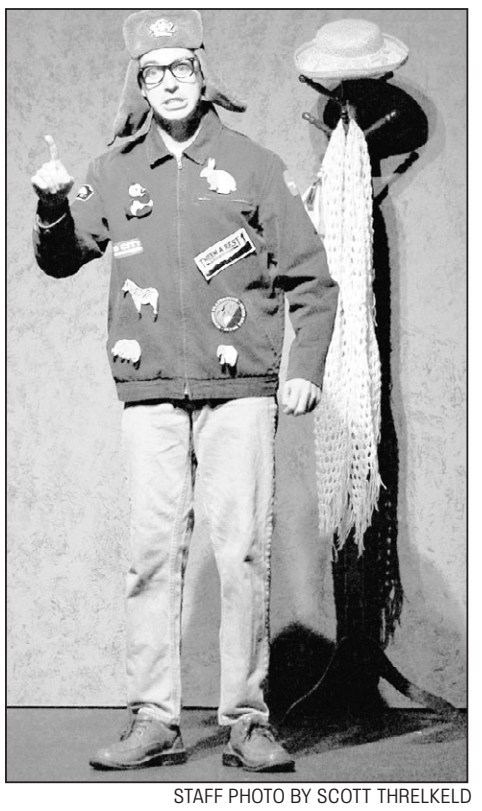
had no gas for the generator so we had to siphon it from the cars."

The salon's phone rang, and Allen asked, "You want me to get that?" Dickey Smith is one of her best friends, and the salon was short staffed. The receptionist is staying in Atlanta. A stylist isn't coming back. Another is, but wasn't back yet, so Allen went into receptionist mode.

"Guy Keefer salon."



"We went to Vicksburg for gambling," Butzman said. "And my family did social things, so I went to Wal-Mart and I got one good outfit — good slacks and a good top. And I'd take it off every night and hang it up and wear it again the next night."

Allen said she and Brett Messmer, her roommate, went out for sushi one night and after their first sake asked for a second round. "The man said, 'You split.' It's a dry county or something. He was the sake police.

"I said, 'I gotta go back to New Orleans.' "

Petey Fisk, who runs the Greater Tuna Humane Society, is one of 20 roles Gary Rucker plays in 'Greater Tuna,' which opened last week at the Skyfire Theater in Covington.

Two actors, 20 characters

'TUNA', from C-1

nization raising money for local storm victims.

The play reunites two of our best and most enjoyable actors. Once rivals, stringbean Gary Rucker and husky Sean Patterson have practically become a comedy team, most recently in "The Bible" at Le Petit Theatre, as Patchwork Players cohorts for the past several seasons, as co-stars at the Tulane Shakespeare Festival and as co-directors of family fare at Le Petit.

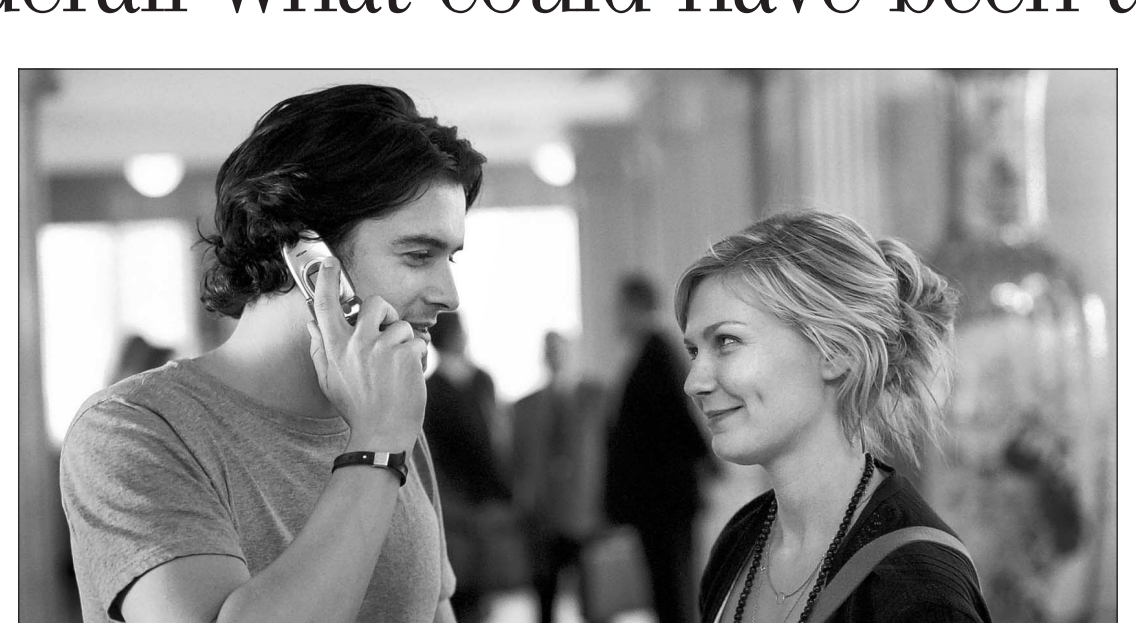
"Greater Tuna," the much-produced comedy by Joe Sears, Jaston Williams and Ed Howard, is the quick-change comedy in which two actors play 20 characters of all ages and sexes in the fictional town of Tuna, Texas, a Southern-fried "Peyton Place" where all the housewives are desperate and all the men bigoted, demented or just good ol' boys.

"Tuna" is usually played by middle-aged actors and works best that way. But the younger Rucker and Patterson are such inventive performers, with an effortless rapport, that the laughs are there in abundance, along with a poignant moment or two.

Lassoing the loco characters together are periodic reports by the radio team of Thurston Wheelis (Patterson) and Arless Struvie (Rucker) of radio station OKKK, where the big news in Texas' third smallest town is that the local hanging judge has been found dead in bed, clad only in a "one-piece Dale Evans swimsuit."

Rucker's best characterizations are bitchy biddy Vera Carp, of the Smut Snatchers, who want certain books and dictionary words removed from the high school library; sleazy, secretive juvenile delinquent Stanley Bumiller and sensitive Petey Fisk, who heads up the Greater Tuna Humane Society and can't bear to put an animal down. Luckily, Rucker also plays little Jody Bumiller, who keeps bringing the animals home.

Patterson has the juicy role of malicious, gray-haired geriatric Aunt Pearl Buras, who gloats over the coffin of the judge who jilted her in the long ago, saying that she'd vowed there'd come a day when she'd sing over his grave, "And Judge, I feel a song comin' on!" He's also the Rev. Spikes, whose eulogy for the judge is an endless series of bombastic clichés ending with, "I never heard the man say 'Die' – he just did."



Patterson's a hoot, too, as R.R. Snavely, given to UFO sightings and touchingly funny as the long-suffering Bertha Bumiller.

You may have been eating so much of it lately that anything with "tuna" in the title puts you off. But "Greater Tuna," ably directed by George Sanchez, is a mood elevator better than anything the doctor might prescribe.

MOVIE REVIEW

Detours derail what could have been a pleasant journey

By Stephen Whitty
Newhouse News Service

Orlando Bloom, left, and Kirsten Dunst star in 'Elizabethtown,' directed by Cameron Crowe.

Most movies start with a character at the beginning of a journey. There's something they need to have or know. There are people they have to meet, and lessons they have to learn.

"Elizabethtown" plays in reverse.

Its hero begins the movie at the end of a journey. He has a great job, a beautiful girlfriend, a tight-knit family. But then he loses it all, all at once. And as he flies off to Kentucky to prepare for his father's funeral, he begins another trip, back into his past.

"Elizabethtown" has been on its own surprising journey. After a few false starts and re-cast roles — at one point, director Cameron Crowe intended to make this with Ashton Kutcher and Jane Fonda instead of Orlando Bloom and Susan Sarandon — the film debuted at the Toronto Film Festival. Praise was scarce, and complaints about its off-on-a-tangent plot sent Crowe home again, promising to trim down the side trips.

He's done that, to a point, cutting the film by about a quarter of an hour and losing a third-act twist that undercut the film's own point. But he's failed — or, perhaps, simply refused — to rethink the whole movie, leaving it in all its arbitrary disorder. And while that gives rise to some of the movie's more offbeat pleasures, it also remains its greatest problem. What once felt like whimsy in Crowe's "Singles" or "Jerry Maguire" has lapsed into self-indulgence.

The movie begins as a corporate comedy, with Alec Baldwin playing the same sort of crazed captain of industry he played in "Along Came Polly," and Bloom — without a sword in his hand, for once — very good in his first modern turn as the firm's boy blunder, Drew. Then it segues into a domestic drama, with Sarandon charmingly scattered as Bloom's mom and brand-new widow, and Judy Greer sweetly stressed as the good-girl daughter.

And then the movie goes on a road trip.

Drew takes a flight back to the hometown his father was visiting when he died, ostensibly to collect the body and say a few kind words to some long-lost relatives. But on the flight back he meets Kirsten Dunst's chatty Claire, a flighty flight attendant who tries to serve her passengers nurturing words of advice. And then he gets to tiny Elizabethtown, Ky., where he eventually turns into the lost young man (c.f. "Garden State," or better yet, "The Graduate") redeemed by the love of a quirky young woman.

Drew's passivity is a bit of a problem — at least those other movie heroes wanted something — although not as much as the movie's plotting, which can grow forced. For example, Drew is a sneaker designer who's wasted eight years and $1 billion on a new shoe style; while the numbers might work for a studio spreadsheet, they don't make much sense in terms of the footwear business. (In fact, the entire movie — plucky guy learns to get back on his feet after a flameout — sounds a lot more like Crowe's life after "Vanilla Sky" than anything Phil Knight and Nike ever went through.)

And yet there's plenty to like here, much of it precisely because the movie is so overstuffed with ideas. There are the dynamics of family, with an emphasis on its supports and affection (Crowe may be one of the few filmmakers willing to admit to a happy childhood). There are deeply realized, delicately nuanced performances from Bloom and a delightfully mischievous Dunst. And, as usual, there's the eclectic Crowe soundtrack, which plays like your best friend's finest mix tape.

Like most journeys, "Elizabethtown" could have used a bit more planning; its detours make back-seat drivers of us all. Why didn't Crowe condense some of the family sideshows? Or cut the long and unfunny memorial service completely, and go straight from Bloom and Dunst's morning-after quarrel to his father's funeral and Bloom's final road trip? Enough of the director's cut. It's time to give fans the audience's cut.

But then that's what rentals — and remotes — were made for.

ELIZABETHTOWN

Be prepared before disaster hits

DEAR READERS: In the wake of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, and projections from the National Weather Service indicating that there are more to come, it is apparent that too many of our citizens are at a loss about how to prepare for a natural disaster.

Wanting to help not only the hurricane survivors, but also to offer information so that ALL of us will be better prepared for potential disasters in the future, I turned to my friends at the Federal Citizen Information Center in Pueblo, Colo.

True to form, they have come through with an excellent publication from the U.S. Department of Homeland Security: "Preparing Makes Sense. Get Ready Now." It explains how to assemble an emergency supply kit and develop a family plan that can be invaluable in all kinds of emergencies. The booklet is free. It's available in both English and Spanish, and can be ordered by writing to: Preparing Makes Sense, Pueblo, Colo. 81009, or by calling toll-free: 1-888-878-3256 Monday through Friday, 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. ET.

For survivors of the hurricanes, and for those individuals who want to help with the recovery effort, one of the best online sources is www.FirstGov.gov. This Web site has links to help locate loved ones, register online for government assistance, replace your vital personal documents, locate state and local services, as well as volunteer opportunities.

Because scam artists are always quick to take advantage of those in need as well as those who want to help, www.FirstGov.gov offers sound advice for avoiding frauds and schemes, and making sure the charity that you donate to is reputable. (Free copies of "Preparing Makes Sense" can also be ordered online at FirstGov.gov.)

While my prayer is that our country will be spared future disasters, my goal today is to encourage you to send for this free publication and to further protect yourselves and your loved ones by using the resources at www.FirstGov.gov.

Love, Abby

DEAR ABBY: At a friend's wedding last weekend, my best friend's husband propositioned me. He said if I ever wanted "something on the side" to give him a call. I was floored. I had always considered him to be a creep, but never thought he would pull something like that.

I told him it would never happen, but if I ever considered it, it certainly wouldn't be with my best friend's husband. He said that that's why I was the perfect candidate — because I would never say anything to her.

What should I do? I don't want to tell her and have that be the reason she splits up with her husband, but I think she should know her husband is on the prowl. She has two small children with this loser, and although he seems to be a good father, apparently he's a bad husband.

Appalled in Huntington Beach, Calif.

DEAR APPALLED: Considering the number of sexually transmitted diseases there are that can have serious, lasting health implications, you'd be doing your best friend a favor by speaking up. One way to lead into it would be to ask if her husband had had "a lot to drink" at the wedding, because "this is what he said to me." She should consult her doctor about being checked for STDs — as well as asking for a referral to a marriage counselor, because her marriage is in trouble.

Falcons not satisfied with '04 outcome

Only standard good enough for Mora is winning Super Bowl

By Brian Allee-Walsh
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — The star-crossed Atlanta Falcons gave their long-suffering fans reason to boogie in 2004, advancing to the NFC championship game, for only the second time in franchise history, under rookie coach Jim Mora.

And, while the Falcons appear to be legitimate playoff contenders again, provided quarterback Michael Vick stays healthy, naysayers quickly point to their erratic past.

AT SAN ANTONIO
SAINTS VS. FALCONS

In 39 NFL seasons, the Falcons have never posted consecutive winning records. Not under Norm Van Brocklin, Leeman Bennett, Jerry Glanville or Dan Reeves.

"That's unbelievable," said Mora, who will bring his 3-2 Falcons into an NFC South showdown against the Saints at the Alamodome on Sunday. "I kind of equate it to what my dad went through in New Orleans. They had never had a winning season until he got there.

"I thought about that this offseason: I thought, here I am, at an organization, that in 40 years has never had back-to-back winning seasons."

The New England Patriots provide additional perspective on the Falcons' futility. Consider: Bill Belichick's Patriots have won consecutive Super Bowl championships, including three of the last four, and are attempting to become the first team in league history to win four of five.

St. Augustine basketball coach and athletic director Bernard Griffith guided the Purple Knights to four state championships.

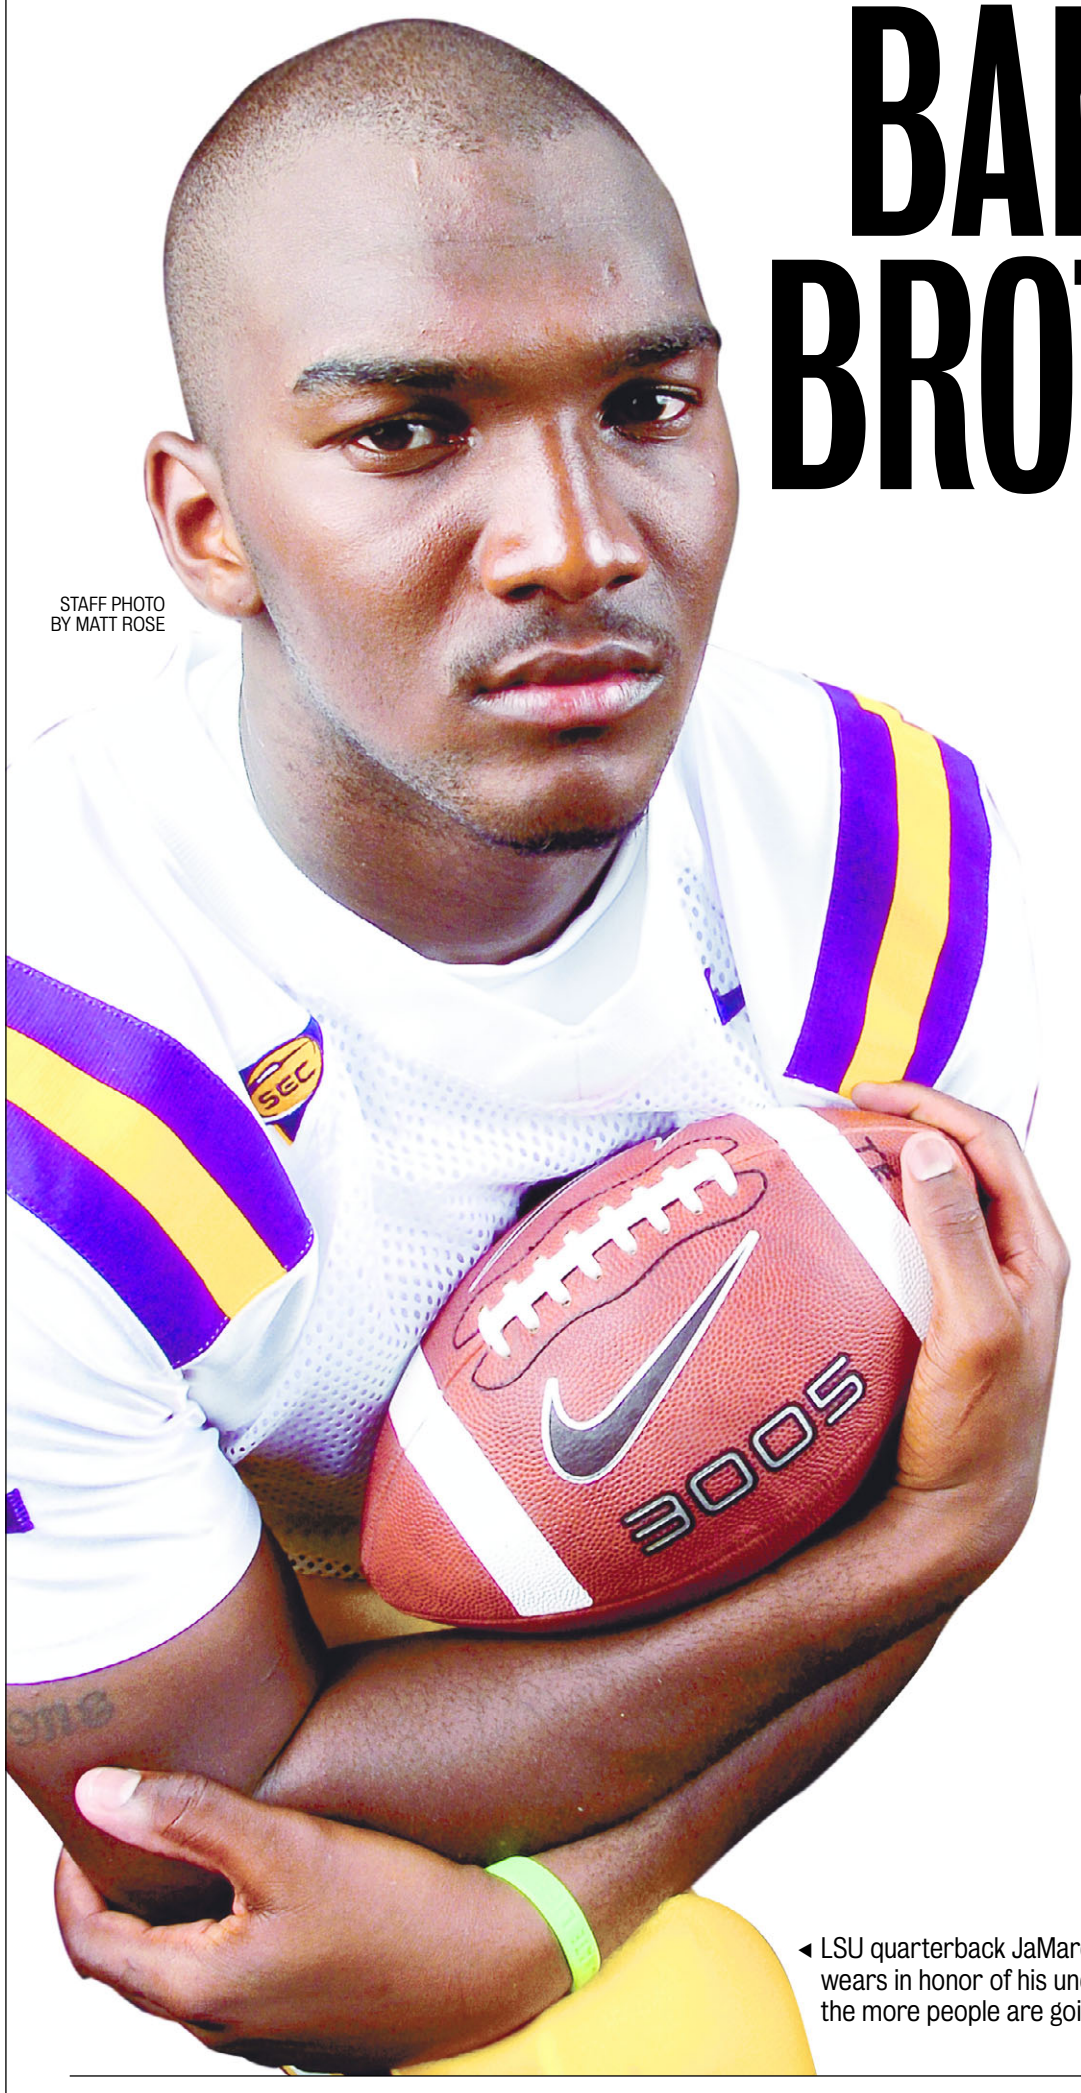
It figures that St. Augustine basketball coach Bernard Griffith landed on his feet in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

His résumé is hard to ignore. Griffith, who guided the Purple Knights to four state championships in his 20-plus years as coach, is now an assistant with the Dallas Mavericks, where former St. Aug player Avery Johnson is the head coach.

Despite his good fortune, Griffith said he would much rather be home, teaching, coaching and guiding St. Augustine's athletic programs.

That probably won't happen this year. The school was submerged in six feet of water from flooding, and its interior was destroyed. Officials hope to have the school back in operation next school year.



Griffith said not having St. Augustine athletics in New Orleans is almost like no red beans and rice on Monday or no Mardi Gras.

"It's almost like we don't exist anymore," said Griffith, who also is the school's athletic director. "We're missing, and we were an integral part of the community. The school gave the city something to identify with, whether you loved us or hated us.

Tiger Stadium game is crucial for Miles, Meyer

PETER FINNEY

Recent history tells us the Florida Gators left LSU's past two football coaches with different memories.

As different as white and black.

For Gerry DiNardo, we go back to an October evening in 1997, the time Steve Spurrier's Gators arrived in Baton Rouge as the No. 1 team in the country and lost 28-21. It was historic not because it was DiNardo's greatest victory in five years, but because it marked LSU's only victory ever over a top-ranked team at Tiger Stadium.

For Nick Saban, we return to Tiger Stadium exactly six years later, the day a freshman quarterback named Chris Leak ran and passed Ron Zook's Gators to a

RUSTON — When Tulane's defense ranked No. 1 in the nation after allowing 352 yards in its first two games, Green Wave coach Chris Scelfo cautioned that it had yet to go up against an "offensive juggernaut."

The Green Wave has played two games since Scelfo's warning, and its defense has fallen to No. 12. The slide could continue tonight when Tulane takes on Texas-El Paso, the favorite to win Conference USA's West Division.

"Two weeks ago, we were the No. 1 team in the nation, and to play like that on national television left us with a bad feeling," Tulane senior linebacker Antonio Mason said of the Wave's 35-14 loss to Houston. "We look at this as a big game to bounce back.

"The stage is definitely set. It's back on ESPN, so we can redeem ourselves from what we showed last week."

It isn't just the poor performance in the loss to Houston from which Tulane is trying to recover. In the past two games, the Wave's defense has let the game get out of hand in the second half.

Tulane was gouged by Division I-AA Southeastern Louisiana for 226 of its 309 yards in the third and fourth quarters. Houston's offense dominated the Wave in the second half with a series of big plays. The Cougars had seven plays in the third quarter that totaled 182 yards

FG MEET TO HAVE 34 STAKES RACES: A schedule of 34 stakes races worth more than $3.5 million headlines the 37-day Fair Grounds meet beginning next month at Harrah's Louisiana Downs in Bossier City, Fair Grounds president and general manager Randall Soth announced Thursday. The Fair Grounds-at-Louisiana Downs season begins Nov. 19, with the Gentilly Stakes for 2-year-old Louisiana-breds on turf serving as the opening day feature. The opening day feature will be the first winter in 92 years that live racing will not be conducted on Gentilly Boulevard in New Orleans. The Fair Grounds sustained damage from Hurricane Katrina on Aug. 29, and will instead run its 134th season in Bossier City. "We are most grateful to the management of Harrah's Louisiana Downs, the Louisiana HBPA and the various regulatory agencies, most notably the Louisiana State Racing Commission, for working with us to bring the Fair Grounds meet to Louisiana Downs," Soth said. Four graded stakes will be conducted as part of the meet, beginning with the $400,000 Grade II New Orleans Handicap on Jan. 7. Three Grade III events will be part of "Road to the Derby" Kickoff Day on Jan. 14, all with $200,000 purses. Along with Kickoff Day, the other major event day on the schedule is the 15th annual Louisiana Champions Day on Dec. 10, featuring seven Thoroughbred and three Quarter Horse stakes worth $1 million in purses. The traditional holiday feature, the Thanksgiving Breeders' Cup Handicap, is slated for Nov. 24. It is one of six stakes to feature added money from the Breeders' Cup Stakes program, the most ever in a Fair Grounds season. A total of $225,000 is available for Breeders' Cup-nominated horses. The deadline for stall applications for the Fair Grounds-at-Louisiana Downs meet is today. Horsemen can contact the Churchill Downs or Harrah's Louisiana Downs racing office, or visit the Fair Grounds' Web site at www.fairgroundsracecourse.com for more information.

LeBron hospitalized

Cleveland Cavaliers All-Star forward LeBron James remained hospitalized with pain in his chest from what the team called a strained muscle. James was admitted to the Cleveland Clinic for tests Wednesday night, hours after he was wincing during practice. James said he doesn't know how he got the injury, which team doctors initially diagnosed as a strained left pectoral. General Manager Danny Ferry said tests on James have not shown anything abnormal, and his understanding is that James' heart "is not an issue."

The Oakland Athletics received permission to interview Texas pitching coach Orel Hershiser for their vacant manager's job, Rangers spokesman Gregg Elkin said. Oakland is looking to replace Ken Macha, who failed to reach a contract extension with the club last week. The 47-year-old Hershiser, a three-time All-Star and 1988 Cy Young Award winner with the Dodgers, has been the Rangers' pitching coach the past three seasons.

Women allowed to qualify

Women golfers could be playing at next year's British Open. The Royal & Ancient Golf Club, the governing body for the sport outside the United States, said it was changing its entry rules to allow women to qualify for the oldest of the four majors. Any woman finishing in the top five — including ties — in any of the four majors can try for the Open through regional and final qualifying. In addition, any women meeting the entry requirements for international qualifying, final qualifying and the Open itself can enter at these stages directly.

BAIRD HOLDS ONE-SHOT LEAD: Briny Baird shot a 10-under 62 to take the first-round lead in the Michelin Championship in Las Vegas, with the players going low on the tournament's two desert courses. Baird played at the TPC at Summerlin, where the par is 72. The other course being used for the first two rounds, the TPC at The Canyons, is a par 71. Ryan Palmer shot a 9-under 62 at The Canyons, and Charles Howell III had a 9-under 63 at Summerlin.

WIE BEGINS PRO CAREER: Michelle Wie made her debut as a professional golfer with a 2-under-par 70 in the first round of the women's World Championship in Palm Desert, Calif. Wie had four birdies through her first 12 holes before giving back two strokes with a pair of bogeys to finish in a six-way tie for 12th at the Bighorn Golf Club, six shots behind leader Annika Sorenstam. Sorenstam had eight birdies during her round.

LSU QB comforts ailing uncle

RUSSELL, from C-6

innuendo possibly perking a few ears.

"RRGGGHH-RAY," Ray spits, the perfect segue to his show-closing inspirational message, "Always remember, wherever you go, that's where you are."

Thursday morning's 6-10 shift concludes with an uplifting song of hope and faith — a brief getaway from the all-day hip-hop and R&B. Ray bangs out a promo, checks messages at his cubicle/shrine to his nephew, LSU quarterback JaMarcus Russell, and is gone. The 38-year-old smooth talker slides into a green Cadillac Escalade and rolls out of the parking lot, passing station vans featuring his cartoon likeness on the door. Even if he didn't have an LSU novelty license plate that clashes with the elephants and War Eagles seen around town, everyone would still recognize Ray-Ray. That's everyone — from the hostess at Ruby Tuesday to the guy manning the weed-whacker section at Lowe's.

"Hey, I just have a good time," he explains. "This is my city and these are my people. They're good to me."

But beneath this always-enthusiastic on-air bravado rested a secret he refused to immediately share with anyone, especially JaMarcus. It happened in late January, mere weeks before spring football. JaMarcus and Matt Flynn were both trying to make a positive first impression on Les Miles and gain a nose in the race for the starter's job. That's enough stress. JaMarcus didn't need this emotional boulder strapped to his thick shoulders, Ray thought.

So in April, shortly after LSU's final scrimmage, Ray-Ray announced on the radio that cardiologists determined recent bouts of fatigue and weakness were caused by cardiomyopathy, a disease that inflames the heart and, if not discovered and treated, eventually leads to malfunction. The community responded, creating fund-raising drives to raise the difference of whatever insurance would not cover as the Russell family searched for answers.

"I was just wondering how this could happen," JaMarcus said. "He doesn't smoke. He doesn't drink. He works out, at times. He was always kind of a big guy, but never really that big. I just wondered how he could get in that situation."

As much as it hurts to spend Saturday on his couch, in front of the big screen, there's no way Ray can drive to Baton Rouge. Not this weekend. It'd be too strenuous, too risky. On Sunday, Ray has an appointment in Birmingham, where he'll learn more about the severity of his condition, which will determine his position on the donor list and date to receive a heart transplant.

"I feel about as good now as I have for a while," Ray said. "But there is that uncertainty, you know. So every time I talk to JaMarcus it's about football. It's about (LSU coach) Les Miles or (offensive coordinator) Jimbo Fisher or the receivers or the schedule and the defense they play that week. It's not about me. I think we both want an escape from what I'm going through."

Opening doors

Ray was JaMarcus' original ambassador to the backstage, the credentialed world he'd frequent soon enough, courtesy of a blessed right arm. When the Senior Bowl came to Mobile annually, JaMarcus stayed glued to Ray's hip, absorbing the nuances and culture of a professional environment, checking out how soon-to-be millionaires acted in front of their eventual employers.

This is how you act, Ray said to his impressionable nephew. This is how you get to this level.

"I wasn't going to let him fall through the cracks," Ray said. "I was always the guy to tell him what he needed to hear. You got your hangers-on — guys who tell you you're the greatest. Forget that. I wasn't going to let that happen. The wolves weren't going to get to him."

Right before JaMarcus' recruitment turned silly, Ray was scheduled to perform at a comedy club in Rochester, N.Y. It was 2001, he says, right after JaMarcus' junior season. He flew out of New Orleans on a magnificent Fat Tuesday — sunny, 80 degrees. When Ray landed, a blanket of snow and something called wind chill welcomed him up north. The next day he'd return to New Orleans, 79 degrees.

Expectedly, the rapid climate shifts toyed with Ray's body, temporarily masking a much more serious condition as nothing more than a cold.

"I'm in the airport, 15 minutes, and I lose my voice," Ray said. "I had no idea there was fluid in my lungs and fluid around my heart. I got home and said, 'Man, I might be ready to kick the damn bucket.' So I drove myself to the hospital."

There, doctors discovered Ray had congestive heart failure and prescribed medication and suggested a change in diet, specifically lower sodium intake. Following guidelines, Ray didn't have any further significant complications until this past January when he took a decongestant that interacted with his other drugs.

Certain his condition had worsened, Ray sought a second cardiologist's opinion.

He didn't go home that night. Not right away, choosing instead to park his car in an empty lot with the engine and radio off. All alone, Ray cried.

"First thing you think about is, 'Where do we go from here?' " Ray said. " 'What are we going to do? How am I going to take care of my family? How is this going to play out?' But I had to do it. I knew not all sickness means death, but they told me if I went any further (without treatment) I wouldn't be here more than a year and a half."

As JaMarcus later learned, asking Ray to hold down more than a single potato chip was a challenge as excess pounds rapidly slid off his uncle's frame. After his scheduled stint at the station, Ray would sometimes sleep from 11 a.m. straight through to the beginning of the next morning's shift. To quell any suspicion from JaMarcus, Ray tagged along to the LSU spring game. The family parked behind the south end zone and headed toward the Lawton Room, across the street from Mike the Tiger's cage — approximately the length of a football field apart. Ray stopped four times. Don't worry, he told the rest of them, he'll catch up. Go ahead.

Making the trip, in hindsight, was completely ill-advised and set Ray back at least two weeks, he figures. When JaMarcus returned home for spring break, he offered Ray a diversion from the gloom-and-doom talk that surrounded him like a fog.

"I was thinking a lot about the situation he was in and how in the world we were going to get him to be better," JaMarcus said. "I kinda figured if God was ready, he wouldn't have given him this time to bounce back. He would have taken him when he had a chance.

"I just talked to him because the more people that came to see him was only making it worse. They all wanted to know how he was doing and asking him questions that kept his condition on his mind. So I just opened up my playbook."

Ray's glassy eyes followed his nephew's fingers, examining with renewed focus Fisher's jumble of O's dancing around X's.

"He was all slumped over," JaMarcus said. "As soon as I pulled it out, he sat up in his chair. He'd asked, 'So if you do this, then . . .' and I'd tell him my reads and options. He liked that. He needed that."

'Wear my band'

Though he did nothing to conceal or hide it, JaMarcus wore his own secret throughout training camp. It surely was photographed unintentionally dozens of times considering the number of lenses LSU's quarterback attracted in August. And it's impossible no reporter noticed the lime-green band around JaMarcus' left wrist. It was right there. Unobstructed.

But hardly anyone bothered to ask. Instead, they were too busy with whether he and Ryan Perrilloux were friends, what it's like to house Fats Domino after Hurricane Katrina and other unimportant matters.

Aware of Ray-Ray's popularity in the Mobile area, the Alabama Organ Center adopted the radio personality as a spokesman for donation awareness, presenting him a "DONATE LIFE" wristband they intended to mass produce by the fall. Knowing re-enforcements were on the way, Ray bequeathed one of the originals to JaMarcus.

"Dude, I need you to wear this," Ray said as Russell was about to leave for school. "Wear my band. When people ask you what it's about, tell them. It's for organ donation."

But hardly anyone — in the QB-competition obsessed media, anyway — bothered to ask. Regardless, JaMarcus kept it on as LSU traveled to Arizona State. On the first drive, ESPN aired a close-up of JaMarcus checking his play-call armband; beneath it shined a fluorescent gesture of compassion and respect.

Ray — hosting eight friends — excused himself from the living room.

"I'm a big sissy, man," Ray said, cracking up. "I didn't get teary-eyed but I got emotional. After everybody had left, the party was over and I was cleaning up the cups, it hit me, man. I cried."

When told that story, JaMarcus' normally steady voice turned soft.

"It's motivation to me," he said. "The more I do on the field, the more people are going to see this (band) and know it's not a joke.

JaMarcus tugs at the band, snapping it against his skin.

"I haven't taken it off since I got it," he said. "I put it on upside-down. It's still upside-down, now. I won't even take it off to change it. If it breaks or tears I got new ones to put on. This is my way of showing him I love him."

LSU defense seeks to thwart Leak

FINNEY, from C-6

19-7 upset over an LSU team that came in ranked No. 6.

For the two coaches, the fallout was as different as the two final scores.

A week after fans tore down the goal posts, the Tigers lost to Ole Miss and failed to contend for the SEC championship during DiNardo's last three seasons.

A week after losing to Florida, Saban's Tigers ran the table, won eight in a row to finish 13-1 and capture a national championship.

So much for recent history.

Question of the moment: What will the Florida Gators mean to Les Miles?

And, while we're at it, what will LSU mean to Urban Meyer?

For these two rookie SEC coaches, facing one another at Tiger Stadium on Saturday, you resurrect the old cliché: a must victory.

It wasn't long after Miles' Tigers let a 21-0 halftime lead against Tennessee evaporate that Meyer's Gators had their heads handed to them by Alabama, a crushing 31-3 whipping that turned Gatorland upside down.

The two scores triggered a bundle of questions from both camps that may be answered Saturday, keeping in mind another loss virtually will knock the loser out of a shot to win its division (LSU in the West, Florida in the East) in the race for the conference title.

LSU fans want to know: Can a Tigers' defense that performed effectively against two overmatched foes, Mississippi State and Vanderbilt, do half as well as Bama did against the Gators' spread-option offense?

From Florida comes a question in two parts: Can the spread option that worked wonders for Meyer at Bowling Green and Utah, and landed him a $2 million annual salary in Gainesville, pay dividends against upper-echelon SEC defenses? Also, is Leak the kind of quarterback to handle Meyer's offense?

A natural dropback passer, Leak has been battling the intricacies of an attack best suited to an option QB. However, until the debacle in Tuscaloosa, his athletic ability managed to overcome many of the negatives.

Bama pressured Leak, sometimes with a three-man rush, and punished him throughout a game that turned into a mismatch. "Chris," said Meyer, "was running for his life."

One statistic that has Gators fans worried: Against the Vols and Crimson Tide, the spread option produced one touchdown and 19 points.

After a 35-9 beating of Mississippi State, Meyer said, "I thought we'd be much further along. I think Chris is an excellent college quarterback, but we'd like to do some more things. We've had a lot of other breakdowns than the quarterback. It's not fair to slap it all on Chris."

Meyer can only hope his junior quarterback will have the kind of game he produced as a freshman at Tiger Stadium, the day Leak took charge after the Tigers grabbed a quick 7-0 lead on a punt return by Skyler Green.

So what is Les Miles' wish?

It would probably go like this.

From sophomore JaMarcus Russell, the kind of performance he had as a freshman in the Capital One Bowl, when he went 12-of-15 with two TDs against Iowa.

From senior defensive tackles Claude Wroten and Kyle Williams, it is the simple message of "punish the quarterback before he punishes us."

Gators' coach downcast

Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — LSU coach Les Miles and his counterpart at Florida, Urban Meyer, know about short honeymoons.

Both first-year coaches have been criticized early in the season. The griping started in the first game for Miles, who was sure to spend his first year in the shadow of his predecessor, Nick Saban.

For Meyer, who rode into Gainesville, Fla., on a tidal wave of hype, reality set in last week. The first boos of his new regime came Saturday as Florida struggled to a 3-3 tie with Mississippi State in the second quarter. The Gators eventually prevailed by a more acceptable score of 35-9 against the undermanned Bulldogs. However, fans who welcomed Meyer from Utah as an offensive genius with his spread-option attack want to know where's the much-anticipated juggernaut?

Some of it is fans being fans. After all, the Gators are 5-1 and ranked No. 11 as they prepare to meet LSU in Tiger Stadium on Saturday. Florida leads the SEC in pass offense (258.2 yards per game), in which it is 29th in the nation, and is averaging 412 yards total offense.

But the offense has sputtered against the SEC's elite. The Gators were embarrassed by Alabama 31-3 and scored one touchdown against Tennessee in a 16-7 victory. Florida needed two safeties and a blocked punt for a touchdown to help put weak Mississippi State away.

There are obvious explanations. The Gators still have talented front-line players, but depth is wafer-thin, and injuries have hit hard on offense. And history suggests that Meyer's complex processes take time to learn. Yardage and point averages increase significantly in the second year of implementation of the attack, which blends elements of option running with a spread-out passing game.

But, even given that, Meyer is disappointed.

"I thought we'd be much further along in our offense," he said. "I thought we would have identified a tailback so we can jump on his back and go play a little bit. I thought by now we'd have four or five legit playmakers at wide receiver.

"The injury to (wide receiver) Andre Caldwell set us back because he was really coming along. It's frustrating for our players and for me. Whenever you start taking players out of the lineup, you're going to hurt. That has set us back a little."

When offenses fail, the quarterback gets the first finger point. Chris Leak isn't particularly suited to the option part of the attack. He's more of a drop-back passer who is mobile but not a particularly good runner. Making matters worse, he went the whole week before the Mississippi State game without throwing in practice because he reinjured his shoulder against Alabama. He needed a cortisone shot to play last week.

Leak hasn't gotten much help. The offensive line has been horrendous, allowing 20 sacks. Tailback DeShawn Wynn has been slowed by a shoulder injury, but poor play by backups forced him into the lineup last week. Jemalle Cornelius' bad ankle has reduced the receiving corps to two capable bodies, Dallas Baker and Chad Jackson, who leads the SEC in receptions and yards.

Last week, Leak threw an interception on the first play of the game and had 65 passing yards at halftime. He left the game for six plays with his arm hanging at his side, but returned to go 11-of-17 for 180 yards and one touchdown in the second half.

"Obviously, it's tough for him to throw with two or three guys in his face," said Florida center Mike Degory.

Between the injuries and the first year of the system, Meyer said he has had to pare down the playbook.

"It's not the spread offense right now," he said. "I think what we've done is squeeze it down because that's how we beat Tennessee — play great defense, play great field position."

Saints ready to showcase Plan B

Smith, Stecker set to fill in for McAllister

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — Although they already had a capable backup in Aaron Stecker, the Saints targeted veteran tailback Antowain Smith in free agency for a specific reason.

The 6-foot-2, 232-pound straight-ahead runner has a similar build and style to starter Deuce McAllister. The way the Saints figured it, if Smith had to come in, they could continue to operate the same power running game they have built the offense around.

Unfortunately for the Saints, McAllister went down for the season last Sunday in Green Bay, but they hope planning ahead pays off.

"It was one of their pitches (during free agent visits). The same kind of big guy, the same hard-nosed runner," said Smith, who was asked if he feels like the offense will continue without much of a dropoff. "We have no choice. We've got to make it go."

The Saints probably will add more of a wrinkle to their offensive game plan with Stecker expected to see more playing time, too. Stecker (5-10, 213) is a more elusive back who can get around the corner and catch passes out of the backfield.

At the very least, the Atlanta Falcons should have some difficulty trying to plan for both running styles.

Smith, 33, said he won't mind if he's limited to 10 or 15 carries, as long as he's getting his job done.

Smith said it's an advantage for a featured tailback to get 20 carries or more in a game, but he said he won't be demanding such a workload.

Saints running back Antowain Smith (32) no longer worries about whether he'll get 20 or 25 carries in a football game. Instead, he's just happy to contribute, saying, 'Oh, no, no, no. I did that when I was younger. I'm old now.'

"Oh, no, no, no. I did that when I was younger. I'm old now," Smith said with a wide smile. "I have no problem with sharing the wealth now."

Smith, who became a full-time backup for the first time in his career last year in Tennessee, said he still feels he has plenty left. But he also is satisfied with his career accomplishments, having gained 6,295 career rushing yards with two 1,100-yard seasons in Buffalo and New England and two Super Bowl rings with the Patriots.

"I've been a starting running back in the league most of my career," Smith said. "I've had 1,000-yard seasons. I've won two Super Bowls. What more can you ask for?"

Maybe another 1,000-yard season and another trip to the playoffs? The Saints sure wouldn't mind.

"He's a guy that loves football. He's conscientious about it," Saints coach Jim Haslett said after rattling off Smith's résumé. "Maybe not as fast as he used to be, but he's a big man."

INJURY UPDATE: Saints receiver Joe Horn (hamstring) practiced for the second straight day, but he remains questionable after missing the past two games. Haslett said Horn is not at 100 percent yet. Horn has been insisting that he plans to play.

Saints defensive end Darren Howard (knee) has not practiced yet this week and remains questionable. Howard's knee has bothered him for years, flaring up on occasion, but it's been more about dealing with pain and discomfort than risking long-term damage. He saw a doctor about the knee Thursday.

Also not practicing for the Saints were offensive tackle Jammal Brown (ankle), linebackers James Allen (hamstring), T.J. Slaughter (groin) and Terrence Melton (ankle) and safety Mel Mitchell (hamstring). All are listed as questionable, but only Brown and Melton seem to have a realistic shot of playing.

Falcons quarterback Michael Vick (knee) also practiced for the second straight day and is expected to start against the Saints. Haslett said that's what his team is planning on: "We prepare for Vick," Haslett said. "We'll deal with (backup Matt) Schaub if he plays."

SOLD OUT: The Saints announced Thursday that they sold all 65,000 tickets for Sunday's game, the second of three being played at the Alamodome this season. When tickets went on sale last month, the Falcons game immediately was the top seller, largely due to the appeal of Vick.

A POOR MAN'S VICK: Saints rookie quarterback Adrian McPherson earned some comparisons to the speedy and strong-armed Falcons quarterback when the Saints drafted him in the fifth round this year. And this week, he has been able to put those similarities to good use. McPherson has been acting as Vick in the scout-team offense.

McPherson said it's been fun and exciting because he normally plays receiver on the scout-team offense, while Todd Bouman serves as the opposing quarterback. McPherson also hopes it's a chance to impress the coaches and improve as a player.

Haslett said McPherson did impress him, and he told the quarterback so after Wednesday's practice.

DUNN CAN RELATE: Falcons tailback Warrick Dunn was affected as much by Hurricane Katrina as any NFL player. The Baton Rouge native said he has family members who lost everything in New Orleans and that he still has 25 people living in his house in Baton Rouge. Dunn has been one of the most proactive professional athletes in the Gulf Coast relief effort, challenging all professional athletes to give what they can.

State may reduce its payment to Saints

With team elsewhere, contract issues remain

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — The $15 million state payment due to the New Orleans Saints in July could be reduced because the team will not be able to play its games in the Hurricane Katrina-wrecked Superdome this season, officials said Thursday.

"It will be between $3.3 million and $15 million," Superdome attorney Larry Roedel said.

Roedel and Superdome Commission chairman Tim Coulon said no decision has been made on how much the payment will be.

Roedel said based on language in the contract, the state could pay a pro-rated portion of the $15 million next year, two-ninths of the games that are supposed to be played in the Dome, or about $3.3 million.

Coulon said there are conflicting provisions in the contract that will have to be resolved in negotiations with Benson and the Saints. "The Dome is not available for use for anyone," Coulon said.

Roedel said that there are provisions in the contract that deal with forces of nature preventing games from being played, relocation expenses and other major items that have to be resolved.

Saints attorney Phil Wittmann said that the team can decide by Nov. 29 — 90 days after Katrina struck — to terminate its lease with the state. He said he has not spoken to Benson about that option but expects to do so in the days ahead.

"All of our talks have been geared toward getting four home games played in Tiger Stadium and three in the Alamodome," he said.

"We have not decided on whether to play in the (Superdome) next year or not," Wittmann said. "We want to wait to hear what our engineers tell us" about the soundness of the facility. The Dome lost a protective covering on its roof and was home to at least 20,000 evacuees in the days after Katrina.

The state's contract with the calls for payments of $186.5 million over 10 years with the amounts escalating from $12.5 million in 2002 to $23.5 million in 2011. The state has had trouble making the $15 million payments in the past two years and has either issued notes or borrowed the money from the state Department of Economic Development.

Roedel said the contract calls for the Saints to play at least nine games in the Superdome. But because of damage to the stadium and the Saints' training facility in Metairie, owner Tom Benson has shifted the team's base of operations to San Antonio.

The Saints will use LSU's Tiger Stadium for four home games and the San Antonio Alamodome for two other home games. They also played their Oct. 2 home game against Buffalo in the Alamodome. The only games the team played in the Superdome were two preseason games.

State officials estimate the cost to repair the stadium could be $400 million to $500 million.

Neither Coulon nor Roedel would estimate how much money the state may owe the New Orleans Hornets of the National Basketball Association because they are playing most of their home games in Oklahoma City this year because of Katrina damage to the New Orleans Arena.

Coulon said the state has signed a $5 million contract to get the Dome cleaned up from the storm and evacuees' damage and another $2 million contract to get a temporary roof on the stadium. Work on both projects should, start next week, he said.

Falcons aiming to stay winners

SAINTS, from C-6

For Mora, last season's 11-5 record, NFC South championship and trip to the NFC championship game against the Philadelphia Eagles provided a glimpse into the team's future.

But, to run with the more successful teams on a consistent basis, the Falcons must first walk tall.

"I didn't feel that we had great success last year," said Mora, who inherited a team that finished 5-11 in 2003 under Reeves and interim coach Wade Phillips. "I feel like we had a great year. But I don't want our standard to be winning 11 games and getting to the NFC championship game. I want our standard to be winning the Super Bowl.

"I can tell you this: At no point during the season did we ever sit back and say, 'Wow! We're sure doing good.' Nor at the end of the year did we sit back and say, 'We had a hell of a year.' We fell short of our goal. That's what I want it to be around here. I don't want us to celebrate being second best or third best or fourth best. I don't think you need to do that. That's the wrong thing to do."

Mora, 43, prides himself on doing things the right way, a philosophy adopted from working with many of the game's most respected coaches and executives, such as Bill Walsh, Don Coryell, Steve Mariucci, Bobby Beathard, Jim Finks, Ernie Zampese, and, of course, his father, the longtime Saints and Indianapolis Colts coach.

The younger Mora wasted little time making his presence felt, becoming just the 11th coach to win a division title since the NFL-AFL merger in 1970.

"Jimmy's done a good job with that team," Saints coach and longtime friend Jim Haslett said. "He's got a lot of ideas and has good football instincts. Being the son of a football coach for all those years kind of rubs off on you."

"The players love him," Falcons running back and Baton Rouge-native Warrick Dunn said. "He's young, energetic. He gets in your face. He's a guy who can challenge you, but do it in the right way. Guys respect that. You have to take chances to play well and to win games. He thinks like us. So when you see that, you kind of respect that and you want to go out and play for him."

Said Mora: "I think the players believe that I'm in the boat with them, and whatever I ask them to do, I'm going to demand of myself and my coaches. My dad was that way."

With help from team owner Arthur Blank and General Manager Rich McKay, Mora wants to prove that the Falcons are not a one-hit wonder.

"We were disappointed that we didn't win in Philadelphia," Blank said, "but our resolve could not be any stronger or determined than it is. I've said many times that I will not rest until I have the opportunity to wear a Super Bowl ring on behalf of our fans, and I know that Rich McKay, Jim Mora and all of our players, coaches and staff feel the same way.

"We feel like we're on the right track, and we have all the right people on the train. This train has left the station and there's no turning back."

Mora, too, believes the right people are on board.

"We got rid of some guys who really didn't fit into what we wanted to accomplish," Mora said. "We wanted to lay the groundwork and do the things that we think are right to build a winning program. We've got the support of our owner and GM and an organization that is committed to winning. Plus, we've got guys like Mike Vick, Warrick Dunn, Alge Crumpler, Patrick Kerney and Keith Brooking. We've got a good base of high character players that we can build upon."

St. Louis releases Hawthorne

From wire reports

Safety Michael Hawthorne, who lost his starting job in last week's loss to the Seahawks, was released by the St. Louis Rams.

Hawthorne, signed to a free-agent contract in the offseason, started the first five games at free safety. Mike Furrey replaced him in the second quarter of a 37-31 loss to Seattle and tied for the team lead with a career-high nine tackles, including seven solo.

In recent weeks, Rams coaches have been critical of the lack of discipline at the safety position, and Hawthorne was out of position on several plays last week. The overall defense has struggled, allowing 81 points the past two games.

Hawthorne, who is in his sixth year from Purdue, played with the Saints from 2000-02 and the past two seasons with the Green Bay Packers.

GIANTS' PETERSON OUT: New York Giants cornerback William Peterson is expected to miss a minimum of four to six weeks with a lower back injury.

Peterson, who is in his fifth year in the NFL, missed the Giants' 44-24 win over St. Louis on Oct. 2 after experiencing pain in his lower back and has not practiced since. The Giants had a bye last week.

Peterson has been examined in the past week and a half by Dr. Frank Cammisa, the Giants' spine specialist, and a second spine specialist in California, Dr. Robert Watkins.

Peterson, who missed 11 games in 2003 with a stress fracture in his lower back, said he initially noticed the pain in a game against the Saints on Sept. 19.

STEELERS DUO HURT: Pittsburgh quarterback Ben Roethlisberger and receiver Hines Ward missed practice for the second consecutive day. Roethlisberger hyperextended his left knee in Monday's 24-22 victory at San Diego, and Ward has a nagging hamstring injury.

TAYLOR MISSES PRACTICE: Jaguars running back Fred Taylor missed part of practice with a sprained right ankle and was downgraded to questionable for Sunday's game at Pittsburgh.

Taylor injured his ankle late in last week's victory over Cincinnati. He ran 24 times for a season-high 132 yards, but sat out the final series after turning his ankle on a 2-yard run with about four minutes to play.

Taylor, who has 105 carries for 401 yards and one touchdown, missed the final two games last year after tearing ligaments in his left knee.

DAVIS BACK, FOSTER AILING: Carolina Panthers running back Stephen Davis and fullback Brad Hoover returned to practice, while backup rusher DeShaun Foster missed his second day because of a sprained knee.

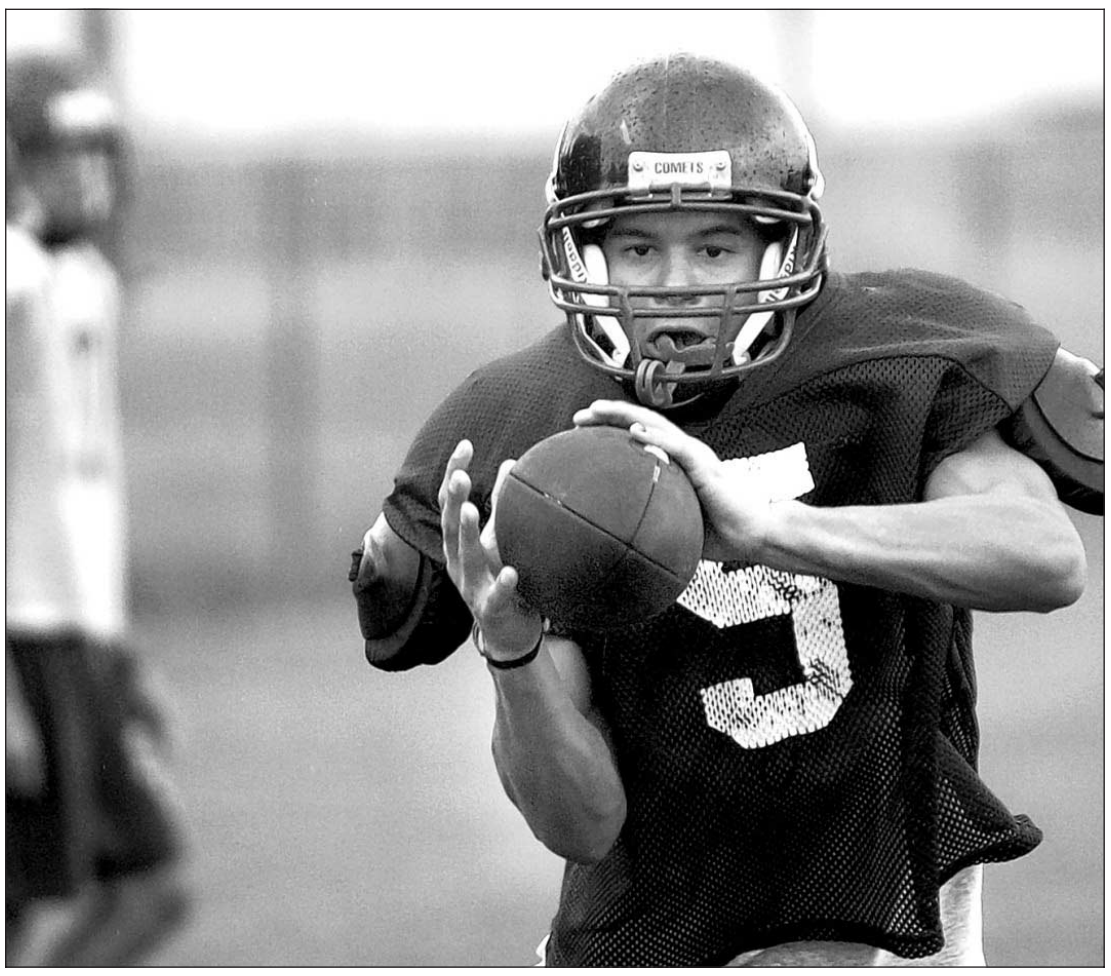
Both Davis and Hoover remained questionable on the injury report, and coach John Fox was noncommittal about his starting backfield's status for Sunday's game at Detroit.

Foster, also questionable for the Lions game, has 373 total yards from scrimmage, second on the Panthers to wide receiver Steve Smith.

Running back Rod Smart, the team's k ick returner, also is doubtful for Sunday's game.

BILLS' VILLARRIAL RETURNS: Chris Villarrial returned to practice after spending Sunday night in the hospital because of an intestinal disorder that doubled him over in pain and limited his breathing, forcing him to miss Buffalo's 20-14 victory over Miami.

Without divulging the exact nature of the condition, Villarrial said he is taking medication and expects to play when the Bills host the New York Jets on Sunday.



Listed as probable on Buffalo's injury report, Villarrial was released from the hospital Monday and held out of practice as a precaution Wednesday.

FREENEY TOO TIGHT: Indianapolis Colts defensive end Dwight Freeney left practice early after having difficulty loosening up. Freeney walked off the field carrying an ice pack, but Coach Tony Dungy said Freeney was not expected to miss Monday night's game against St. Louis.

Robottom's Burden lessened

He has helped lead St. Charles to 5-0 record

By Lori Lyons
Staff writer

STAFF PHOTO BY BRETT DUKE

In five games this season, St. Charles' Casey Robottom has caught 24 passes for 398 yards and six touchdowns and returned two punts and two kickoffs for touchdowns.

Heading into this football season, the burden was heavy on St. Charles Catholic wide receiver Casey Robottom.

The Comets, last year's District 10-3A champions, were heading into new territory — a new classification and district — without much of what made them so successful last season. Gone was running back Tyrell Fenroy, who had rushed for more than 2,000 yards. Gone was quarterback Jesse Martin, who had passed for more than 1,700 yards. And coming was 19-time state champion John Curtis, forced down from Class 4A to 2A and into the same district with the Comets. The two will meet tonight in a District 9-2A showdown.

But the Comets were returning Robottom, a 5-foot-11 senior who caught 34 passes for 696 yards and 10 touchdowns last season. Much of his team's expectations for success had been placed firmly on his shoulders.

"I did feel it, actually," Robottom said. "With Tyrell (Fenroy) gone, I knew I'd have to step up my game."

But thanks to Hurricane Katrina, Robottom's burden has been lightened ever so slightly. After the storm shut down virtually every school in Jefferson and Orleans, St. Charles — the lone Catholic high school in the River Parishes — received an influx of more than 100 students. The football team got about 18 players. Some have left. But one who stayed is running back Chris Jones, formerly of Rummel. He rushed for 144 yards and three touchdowns last week and has helped take some of the heat off Robottom.

"It has helped take some of the pressure off," Robottom said. "Having (Jones) play well has opened up the passing game a little. I think it's made us a better team. We have more weapons."

Coach Frank Monica agrees.

"It's definitely helped us," Monica said. "With Chris' running, Casey doesn't have to win the game. (Quarterback) Phillip Sutton doesn't have to win the game. Chris doesn't have to win the game. We can spread it all around."

But more often than not, when the Comets win, it involves Robottom, who was all-district in football, baseball and basketball last year. In five games this season, he has caught 24 passes for 398 yards and six touchdowns, his longest a 55-yard catch. He also has returned two punts and two kickoffs for touchdowns.

"He's the best I've ever coached on the high-school level or the college level," Monica said. "He's made catches that are just unbelievable. But, to our fans who have watched him, it's routine. It's just Casey. He's really, really good when the ball is in the air. He plays a lot taller than he is."

But Robottom said his favorite thing is to return kicks. He returned two — one for 98 yards — for touchdowns against Pine.

"It's just you against the other team," he said.

Robottom and the rest of the Comets are hoping for their best game tonight when Curtis comes to town. The Patriots have played only two games this season, losing to East St. John 16-6 and defeating Fort Walton Beach, Fla., Choctawhatchee High 27-21. Many of the Patriots who had scattered to other schools have since returned.

"If they have a weakness, it's got to be in the tuba section," Monica joked. "They have no weaknesses. They're not fancy. They've been running the same thing for years, and you know what they're going to do. You just have to try to stop it."

CAPSULES

Hahnville (4-1, 0-1) at West Jefferson (2-0, 1-0)
Time: 7 p.m., at Memtsas Stadium.
Last week: East St. John defeated Hahnville 35-20. West Jefferson defeated Assumption 39-36.
Last season: Hahnville defeated West Jefferson 24-21 in the regional round of the Class 5A state playoffs.
Notes: District 5-5A game. West Jeff defenders insured last week's victory when defensive end Derandus Frye's pass rush resulted in defensive back Joshua Smith's interception on a fourth-and-seven play from the West Jeff 29-yard line with 1:55 remaining. Senior fullback Kevin Grant rushed for 226 yards and three touchdowns on 22 carries. Sophomore Edward Robinson is averaging 127.5 rushing yards and 14.2 yards a carry with a team-leading four touchdowns.

Ehret (1-1, 0-1) at East St. John (3-1, 1-0)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: East St. John defeated Hahnville 35-20. Destrehan defeated Ehret 21-14.
Last season: Did not play.
Notes: District 5-5A game. Ehret is trying to avoid an 0-2 start in district, and is still starting six players two ways and facing one of the state's deepest teams. Plus, the Patriots have lost linebacker Brandon Washington, who had to return to the Houston area to assist his mother, Ehret coach Billy North said. Ehret's Chris Mitchell had 11 tackles playing safety in addition to playing every snap at quarterback last week. East St. John's Johnny Owen, a relocated Brother Martin student, rushed for 254 yards and three touchdowns on 25 carries against Hahnville, and the Wildcats piled up 471 total yards.

Higgins (1-1) at Bogalusa (0-3)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Higgins defeated Cox 22-0. Bogalusa lost to Independence 30-0.
Last season: Did not play.
Notes: Non-district game. Higgins welcomes starting tailback Joshua Brumfield back this week from storm evacuation. Brumfield's return will allow two-way standout Michael Roussel to be used as a wingback and receiver in addition to safety. The Hurricanes are averaging 244.5 rushing yards and 5.9 yards per carry. Corey McCann is averaging 103 rushing yards and 5.7 per carry. Bogalusa has been outscored 70-0 by Independence and Amite, two of Class 3A's top-ranked teams. All three of Bogalusa's losses have been in District 9-3A play.

Cox (0-1) at Vandebilt (2-3)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Cox lost to Higgins 22-0. Vandebilt lost to Holy Cross 27-20.
Last season: Did not play.
Notes: District 8-4A game. Cox expects to have top running back Eddie Lacey and defensive end John Weber back from hurricane evacuation. Quarterback Rudy Chattman is expected back next week, a move that will allow Edward Scott to return to receiver. The host Terriers lost to Holy Cross via an 85-yard fumble return for a touchdown in the closing minutes. Vandebilt was attempting a game-winning 25-yard field-goal attempt on the play.

Salmen (0-2) vs. East Jefferson (1-0)
Time: 7 p.m., at Joe Yenni Stadium.
Last week: Salmen lost to Lutcher 44-21. East Jefferson defeated Grace King 34-14.
Last season: Did not play.
Notes: Non-district game. Salmen quarterback Danny Zimmerman was slated to be the starting start quarterback for Jesuit this season. Warriors quarterback Jaeson Hoffman started his season in grand style, completing six of eight passes for 100 yards.

Destrehan (5-0, 1-0) at Assumption (2-3, 0-1)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Destrehan defeated Ehret 21-14. Assumption lost to West Jefferson 39-36.
Last season: Did not play.
Notes: District 5-5A game. These teams last played in 1994; Destrehan won 27-13. Assumption receiver Carl Francis caught five passes for 86 yards and three touchdowns and had 16 carries for 74 yards and another touchdown last week. Destrehan rushed for 206 yards last week, led by Raynor Derkins' 114 yards on 23 carries.

Holy Cross (1-1) at Lutcher (2-3)
Time: 7 p.m
Last week: Holy Cross defeated Vandebilt 27-20. Lutcher defeated Salmen 44-21.
Last season: Did not play
Notes: Non-district game. Holy Cross got its game-winning touchdown on an 85-yard fumble return by Phillip LeBlanc. Vandebilt was attempting a 25-yard field goal when the holder missed the snap. The Tigers were outgained 282 yards to 164 and were held to seven yards rushing. Lutcher got two touchdown passes last week from David Gautier, a transfer from West St. John.

John Curtis (1-1, 0-0) at St. Charles (5-0, 1-0)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Curtis defeated Fort Walton Beach, Fla., Choctawhatchee 27-21. St. Charles defeated Donaldsonville 37-6.
Last season: Did not play.
Notes: District 10-2A game. St. Charles has outscored its opponents 185-32. Last week, Chris Jones rushed for 144 yards and three touchdowns as the Comets defeated previously unbeaten Donaldsonville. St. Charles held the Tigers to 88 yards.

Riverside (4-1, 1-0) at Donaldsonville (4-1, 0-1)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Riverside defeated St. James 29-19. Donaldsonville lost to St. Charles 37-6.
Last season: Did not play.
Notes: District 10-2A game. Riverside rushed for 214 yards last week, led by Jarid Caesar's 185 yards and three touchdowns. But the Rebels had zero passing yards. The Riverside defense held St. James to 175 yards. Donaldsonville was held to 88 yards. Quentin Foster scored the Tigers' lone touchdown on a 46-yard fumble return.

West St. John (1-4, 1-0) at St. John (4-1, 1-0)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: West St. John defeated White Castle 44-2. St. John defeated North Iberville 68-26.
Last season: Did not play.
Notes: District 9-1A game. West St. John got its first victory of the season by gaining 289 yards. Rams quarterback Olajuwon Hall threw for two touchdowns, and Jaron Howard rushed for 133 yards. St. John wingback Chase Blanchard ran for three touchdowns and caught another to finish with 283 all-purpose yards. He also was voted homecoming king.
SATURDAY'S GAMES

Rummel (0-0) vs. King (0-1)
Time: 7 p.m., at Joe Yennis Stadium
Last week: King lost to East Jefferson 34-14. Rummel did not play.
Last season: Rummel won 28-0.
Notes: Non-district game. Marvin Jackson is the Raiders' lone tailback. King had three turnovers in the loss to East Jeff.

Ridgewood (1-0) at St. Martin's (0-0)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Ridgewood defeated Riverdale 32-8. St. Martin's did not play.
Last season: Did not play.
Notes: The Saints have a roster of about 30 players, which is minus eight starters, including kicker Ben Bologna, running back-defensive back Aaron Hyatt and lineman-linebacker Michael Gieger, who are attending Baton Rouge-Episcopal. Ridgewood will welcome the return of running back Lawren Duvernay, who had been in West Virginia. Ridgewood's Daniel Villafranco passed for 114 yards and running back Joseph Corpura rushed for 113 yards last week.

Crescent City (1-0) at Fisher (0-2)
Time: 2 p.m.
Last week: Crescent City defeated Desire Street Academy 50-14. Bonnabel defeated Fisher 20-7.
Last season: Did not play.
Notes: Non-district game. This game originally was scheduled for tonight, but a malfunction of Fisher's stadium lights during the Bonnabel game necessitated a day game. Quarterback Brad Navero rushed for more than 100 yards and Fisher's lone touchdown. Navero has scored both Gator touchdowns. Crescent City defensive back Ray Jeanfreau had six tackles, a forced fumble, a fumble recovery and an interception last week. Running back Andre Bartholomew rushed for 119 yards and a touchdown.

Players miss game atmosphere

ST. AUGUSTINE, from C-6

"St. Augustine was almost like your heart and soul, because for some reason it tends to stick with you. Tradition is the main thing at St. Augustine. If you're in New Orleans and you ask people what school they went to, and you're in an adult setting, they don't start telling you the universities they went to, but if they went to St. Aug that's the first thing they are going to say."

This school year, one of the city's most storied athletic programs will be silent. No St. Augustine Marching 100 band at football games. No jam-packed St. Aug gym for Catholic League basketball games. No Purple Knights track team trying to defend its Class 5A state championship.

The track team will be one of the school's tough-luck stories this season. The squad would have been the favorite in the indoor and outdoor state meets.

The Purple Knights returned the nation's top high school 800-meter runner, senior Karjuan Williams. He is enrolled at New Bern High in New Bern, N.C., located about 120 miles southeast of Raleigh.

Williams and several other returning contributors from last year's team would have given the squad a solid nucleus.

"I really think that if we had a chance to run this year, we could win that thing," track coach Darren Dixon said.

Though not much was expected from the Purple Knights' football team, Griffith said he thought the squad would have improved.

St. Augustine entered this season looking to rebound from a 3-6 finish in 2004, and Griffith thought the program was headed in the right direction under Coach Tyrone Payne. The highly touted prospects who failed to jell into a winning team last season had graduated and were replaced by younger, harder workers who were eager to live up to the Purple Knights' winning ways, he said.

"I thought the football team, with a play here or there this season, could have been in pretty good shape," Griffith said.

Instead, the players have moved on; four are playing at Southern Lab.

Chad Jones, one of those players, said he'll miss playing in Tad Gormley Stadium. "A lot of people are going to miss St. Aug," Jones said. "We had a lot of fans come from all over to see us play games."

Griffith also was expecting his basketball program to improve this season. He said the team was on the upswing, returning most of its top players from last season, when it finished 15-14, 3-7 (tied for fourth) in the Catholic League.

Griffith maintained St. Augustine's winning tradition when he took over as coach more than 20 years ago. He won four state championships, one national championship and posted numerous district titles and playoff appearances. He also coached numerous professional basketball players through the years, including Johnson.

"We did things that were meant to be eye-catching," Griffith said. "We had guys go to college and the pros, we won district championships, and we raised the level of play."

This year, all Griffith and St. Augustine are left with is what might have been.

INSIDER

TULANE (2-2, 1-1 in C-USA) VS. UTEP (3-1, 1-1)

THE VITALS

Kickoff: 7 p.m. at Joe Aillet Stadium in Ruston
Coaches:
Tulane's Chris Scelfo (33-42, seventh season); UTEP's Mike Price (11-5, second season)
TV/Radio: ESPN/no radio in New Orleans; north shore WJSH-FM (104.7) and Baton Rouge WSKR-AM (1210)

KEEP AN EYE ON

TULANE RUNNING BACK JOVON JACKSON: The brawny senior is expected to start his first game this year, after a sturdy showing in last week's loss to Houston. Jackson has been getting carries in previous games — 11 to Matt Fortè's 21 last week — but hasn't been the featured back. His smashmouth style has been productive at times. Tulane's offensive line has been spotty at holding back defenders for Fortè, who likes to run to the outside. Jackson will face the No. 3 run defense in Conference USA in the Miners, who allow 141.8 yards per game.

GAMEPLAN

Last week, Tulane had to vastly improve its run game. Now, it's the passing game that needs work. Quarterback Lester Ricard had one of his worst showings against the Cougars, and the Wave expects the junior to get into a rhythm against the UTEP defense. Tulane's defense had its worst game against Houston, but it wasn't all bad; the defense made some key stops, but many were in the first half. The beleaguered Wave must play four quarters of intense football because UTEP has a high-scoring attack that doesn't let up (29.8 points per game, second-best in C-USA).

KEY MATCHUP

UTEP'S OFFENSIVE RHYTHM VS. TULANE'S DEFENSIVE RHYTHM: Who will set the tone? UTEP's offense relies on its potent passing game, which will be hampered with the loss of senior receiver Chris Francies, who has the nation's third-longest string of games with a reception (37) but is out with bruised ribs. UTEP quarterback Jordan Palmer leads a pass offense that averages 298 yards per game, second in the conference. Tulane's defense, anchored by three senior linebackers, has allowed only one score in the first half all season. Tulane's defense has allowed 56 first downs, the fewest allowed among C-USA teams.

BY THE NUMBERS

7 — Points scored by a Tulane opponent in the first half. 80 — Points scored by a Tulane opponent in the second half. 4 — Home sites for Tulane this season (Shreveport, Baton Rouge, Lafayette and Ruston). 48 — Tackles by Wave linebacker Anthony Cannon, a team-high. 1 — Interceptions by a Wave cornerback this year (Jeremy Foreman).

ODDS AND ENDS

This is the first game that Tulane does not have to travel to play — the Wave is based at Louisiana Tech this semester, where tonight's game will be played. . . . The Miners will be missing their sack leader, senior defensive tackle Chris Mineo, out for the remainder of the regular season with an ankle injury. . . . Tulane defensive end Michael Purcell has started the past two games, combining for seven tackles, a sack and a forced fumble. . . . Wave opponents are 0-for-4 on fourth-down conversions. . . . Tulane is 6-for-10 on fourth-down conversions this season (60 percent) compared to 27-for-73 on third downs (37 percent).

FROM THE COACH'S MOUTH

"They don't have a weakness on defense. They're great." — UTEP coach Mike Price on Tulane's defense, ranked 12th in the country.

and led to 21 consecutive points.

"It was definitely a reality check," strong safety Tra Boger said. "It was another reminder that no matter where we're ranked, we just have to go out there and play as best and as hard as we can."

The Wave's defense, Mason said, cannot sit back and think too much about what it failed to do the past two games. He said the defense must use that time concentrating on righting its slide.

"We just have to look forward," Mason said. "Since we don't have any bye weeks, we don't have time to reflect on what's happening. We just have to go to the next game and wipe it from our memories."

But erasing last week's game will not be easy. UTEP's offense is just as potent as Houston's. The Miners rank third in the conference in scoring offense (29.8 points a game) and second in passing (298).

"Of course, we'd like to think it's going to be easier staying focused. But, right now, we're just looking to turn things around," Boger said. "We just have to get back to the basics and play fundamentally sound and let it take care of itself."

What could help Tulane's defense this week, Wave defensive coordinator Eric Schumann said, is UTEP's offensive philosophy is much different from Houston's.

"They do a little trickery, but not like Houston. With Houston, every play is a trick play, and we put such an emphasis on getting a handle on the trickery that it probably hindered (the players)," Schumann said. "The big thing is to get back and play the base defense.

"UTEP has a base offense, and they try to match you up and exploit individuals. They do have some reverses and run a little bit of bootleg, but it's not a half a game of it."

UTEP's passing, led by quarterback Jordan Palmer, gets most of the attention, but it has a running attack that Tulane will have to stop to have a chance to win.

Last week, the Wave gave up 130 yards to Houston's Ryan Gilbert, the No. 2 rusher in C-USA. UTEP's Tyler Ebell, averaging 80.8 yards a game, is third in the conference.

Although the Green Wave allowed 277 rushing yards against Houston, it still is No. 1 in the conference against the run (117.2) and in total defense (275.2). With that in mind, Boger said it lends hope for the defense's return to being a force.

"You're going to have your ups and downs in everything you do," Boger said. "It's how you respond to those down times that really measures your character."

COLLEGE BASKETBALL

Dickerson coping with new kind of 'madness'

Tulane coach says players need practice, not 'sideshow' now

By Fred Robinson
Staff writer

STAFF PHOTO BY TED JACKSON

Tulane men's basketball coach Dave Dickerson said he hasn't lost focus on doing what he was hired to do — rebuild Tulane's basketball program. But he said he's also paying more attention than ever to what his players may really need, someone to talk to.

Just two months ago, Dave Dickerson, Tulane's new men's basketball coach, had visions of Midnight Madness giving the Green Wave's 2005-06 season its first spark of enthusiasm.

"You know, Lefty Driesell is the one who started Midnight Madness at Maryland," Dickerson said of his former coach.

When Tulane officially begins practice Saturday, Dickerson won't have the opportunity to inject Green Wave fans with the same late-night enthusiasm. Dickerson isn't going to find many Tulane fans at Texas A&M in College Station, home for the men's team since Hurricane Katrina.

"That's going to be different for me," Dickerson said. "We're going to celebrate the start of basketball season by having each other to be around.

"We're two weeks behind as far as getting into basketball shape. Practice is what we need right now; we don't need a sideshow."

Not only will the opening of basketball season have a different twist for Dickerson, but the first part of the Green Wave's season will be played before its adopted fans. The team isn't scheduled to return home until the end of the first semester. And for now, that's not a big deal for Tulane's players.

"It's been tough, but we couldn't have been put in a better place," said senior center Quincy Davis. "The hospitality and support here have been unbelievable."

Because of what Dickerson and his players have gone through the past six weeks, it has forced him to look at things a little bit differently.

"The thing that I'm excited about is just being a basketball coach and the anticipation of having a season," Dickerson said.

Dickerson said he hasn't lost focus on doing what he was hired to do — rebuild Tulane's downtrodden basketball program. But he said he's also paying more attention than ever to what his players may really need, someone to talk to.

"I can't describe the personal stories," he said. "I think I talk to them more about life now. You try to make sure as coaches that we know our players as people. You don't want to let anything slip through the crack. The biggest thing is we understand everyone has been affected by this situation."

And when Dickerson asks a player how he's doing, it's no longer just a greeting; it's a sincere question.

"And you listen to how they answer," Dickerson said. "It's important to have frank conversation. We have to be emotionally prepared first, then mentally and physically ready to play basketball."

Tulane's players have much more than basketball on their minds. They have not returned to New Orleans since evacuating Aug. 28, and after getting reports from people who have been back to the city, Davis wonders whether not returning should be an option for the team.

"We've thought about getting back, and we know it's going to be different," Davis said. "From what I've heard, (the city's) dead. Even if the university gets back up and running, it can't survive without the city. I don't think it would be a bad idea to stay here."

Sophomore guard Taylor Rochestie said he can't be too concerned about what's going to happen in a few months.

"I'm just worrying about the first semester," he said. "I'm just fortunate we do have a season and a place to stay. I'd love to get back, but there are so many variables."

Green Wave women small in numbers, big on desire

Stockton's team has 10 players, but no seniors, this season

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

RUSTON — The basketball team has only 10 players.

Three potential starters are out for the year.

And there isn't one senior on the roster.

That's enough to make a coach peruse the 401K.

Then, try moving the team to a campus 866 miles away, missing half of preseason conditioning and, oh yeah, wondering about where some players will live once they return to their tattered homes.

"I've never gone into a season worrying less about wins and losses as I do about maintaining and keeping everybody strong and tough to get through this," said Lisa Stockton, the veteran coach of the women's team at Tulane.

The Wave, 11-16 last season, jetted to Lubbock, Texas, with a gym bag full of uncertainty. After missing three weeks of a six-week conditioning program, the team got back into a routine at Texas Tech, home for the semester and the non-conference season.

"Lubbock is definitely a little boring compared to New Orleans," said junior guard Jami Montagnino, who averaged 7.5 points last year. "But it's a good college-based community that's been supportive of our team.

"When we first got here, we were shorthanded on toiletries, towels, sheets and stuff. They supplied us with all types of gifts and gift cards to go get groceries and clothes, and they said they'd support us during our games. They're making this our second home."

The 10 players share a dorm floor and have bonded since Hurricane Katrina. Forward Alendra Brown, a New Orleans native, said she loses herself when she's with her teammates or on the court, and she looks forward to the official start of practice Saturday.

"It was a disaster, but you really don't realize it until you go to your room and you're like, 'I'm in Lubbock, Texas,' " said Brown, a sophomore from McMain whose family's home had 10 feet of water. "It's still unbelievable. . . . I'm still trying to realize it — 'Oh my God, I'm actually homeless.' "

But there are two positives in the eyes of the coach — the players are closer and the freshmen make up the most mature freshman class Stockton has coached.

Montagnino has been the rock.

"I can't say enough about this kid," Stockton said. "This situation brings out the best in certain people, and she's become more vocal, and her toughness is really contagious. She's one of those players who won't let our team feel sorry for ourselves."

The Wave is without its leader in assist and minutes, D'Aundra Henry, who has been medically redshirted for the season. Two promising post players, Destiny Drew (knee) and Cashmir White (back), have suffered career-ending injuries.

"With only 10 players, we'll use everybody," Stockton said. "Everyone's investing in it, thinking, the team needs me."

Though the schedule is not complete, Tulane is expected to play the majority of its non-conference games at Texas Tech or nearby Lubbock Christian University. Tulane expects to be back on its New Orleans campus in 2006, playing its conference schedule at Fogelman Arena.

"More than likely we will probably lose some games (from our schedule)," Stockton said. "It will be tough for all of our opponents to get there."

Tulane's schedule is expected to be completed by Tuesday, but the team does know the Nov. 23 game against Howard will be in Lubbock. The Wave will play its first Conference USA game at Texas-El Paso on Nov. 25 — the Miners are scheduled to come to Fogelman on Feb. 4. The Nov. 28 game against LSU will be in Baton Rouge. Tulane will travel to Tucson, Ariz., for a tournament Dec. 3-4, and the Dec. 12 home game against Southeastern Louisiana will be pushed into 2006, during C-USA play.

"I just think it's important for our players to keep as much of their season as we can," Stockton said.

The coach and the players are confident about the future — as confident as they can be post-Katrina. The Wave has two commitments for next season. While the team's uniforms and equipment were damaged in the storm, Nike has been very generous. And, because the team doesn't have any seniors, there is not as much of a rush to recruit for immediate impact.

Said Stockton: "The good news is we have no seniors. The bad news is we have no seniors."

FEMA says cruise ships cheaper than hotels

SHIPS, from C-11

are cost-effective," said James McIntyre, a FEMA spokesman. "We will not be moving people off the cruise ships and upsetting their normalcy just to fulfill the hotels' request."

In September, FEMA chartered three cruise ships from Carnival Cruise Line to be used in the relief efforts. Two of them, the Ecstasy and the Sensation, are docked in New Orleans, and a third, the Holiday, is in Mobile, Ala.

When the cruise ships were first brought under contract, the vessels provided immediate housing with safe water, electricity and sewerage at a time when those services didn't exist on land. But now that hotels have basic services, and there are as many as 9,000 hotel rooms open in Orleans Parish, Perry said there's no reason for emergency workers to continue to stay on the ships.

"It's time for FEMA to start contracting with local businesses," Perry said. "We need those people in the hotels. We feel very, very strongly about this."

FEMA said it was puzzled by the hospitality industry's stance, because the request for the cruise ships came from the city.

"Our understanding from the city was that they wanted to keep as many of the hotel rooms available as possible for the contractors and residents that would be returning and would need lodging," said Coast Guard Cdr. Craig Lloyd, who acted as liaison to the city after Hurricane Katrina. "We're supporting the city on this. The request came from the city for the cruise ships."

FEMA further argued that it was cheaper to house emergency workers on cruise ships than in local hotels. It costs the government an average of $168 per person per day on a cruise ship for lodging, three meals a day and laundry service. By contrast, FEMA said, it costs about $190 per day just for lodging at New Orleans hotels.

The cost of housing relief workers and evacuees — and whether they would be better off in shelters, cruise ships, hotels, trailers or apartments — has generated controversy in recent weeks.

The federal government is paying up to $236 million to charter the ships: $192 million to rent the ships, as well as reimbursement of up to $44 million for port, sewerage and fuel costs. The three ships can house 5,556 people at standard double occupancy, or as many as 7,012 people including berths that are capable of holding three or four passengers. That means that the government is paying about $185 to $233 per person per day, depending on how many people are onboard.

Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu's office said it plans to take the lead in resolving the issue and is working on a letter expressing the hospitality industry's concerns.

markets, especially the U.S. Treasury securities market, where interest rates have risen, tugging mortgage rates with them.

According to Freddie Mac, the U.S. housing agency that sells guarantees for home loans, this week's 6.03 percent for 30-year mortgages is the second highest level of the year. Thirty-year rates were at 6.04 percent the week of March 31.

This week is also the third time this year mortgage rates have been above 6 percent — an important psychological level. When rates were below 6 percent, they helped spur home buying and refinancings of home loans that allowed Americans to spend their way out of the most recent economic downturn.

Officials say city is back

WTC, from C-11

Perry said the convention announcement is one of the first new conventions the visitors bureau has booked since Hurricane Katrina.

"In the past few weeks we haven't been working on the future, but on the present," he said.

Perry said the visitors bureau has reconfirmed about 10 conventions for next year and is working on the details for 32 others. But nearly 30 had to be canceled, he said.

Although the world trade center event will not be among the largest the city welcomes — the Shanghai meeting had about 650 attendees — Perry said it's the mid-sized groups that keep the convention industry busy.

"This is the exact size of meeting New Orleans is famous for. And we're very excited about it," he said.

What's more, he said, the international event "will send a signal across the planet that New Orleans is not only back but thriving," he said.

SAMSUNG, from C-11

consumers of the benefit of competitive prices," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said.

Samsung said the company "strongly supports fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anti-competitive behavior." Spokeswoman Chris Goodhart declined to identify the seven employees or say whether they still worked for Samsung.

Samsung received grand jury subpoenas in connection with the investigation during 2002 and put aside $100 million late last year to pay potential criminal penalties.

Samsung's top competitor, Hynix of Seoul, agreed earlier this year to plead guilty to price fixing and pay a $185 million fine. Last September, rival Infineon Technologies AG of Germany agreed to a $160 million fine. Another competitor, Micron Technology Inc. of Boise, Idaho, has been cooperating with prosecutors and was not expected to face charges.

The government accused the companies of conspiring in e-mails, phone calls and face-to-face meetings to fix prices of memory chips between April 1999 and June 2002. The chips are used in digital recorders, personal computers, printers, video recorders, mobile phones and many other electronics.

The government said the victims of the alleged price fixing were Dell Inc., Compaq Computer Corp., Hewlett-Packard Co., Apple Computer Inc., International Business Machines Corp. and Gateway Inc.

Barnett said Apple and Dell raised computer prices to compensate, and other companies responded by reducing the amount of memory installed in computers they sold but kept consumer prices the same.

The investigation started in 2002, a year after memory chip prices began to climb even though the high-tech industry was in a tailspin. At the time, the increases were attributed to tight supplies, although then-Dell Computer CEO Michael Dell blamed them on cartel-like behavior by chip makers.

Soft soils under levee sank city

SHAKY FOUNDATION
A spongy layer of swamp peat soil may have been the weak point in levee construction. Investigators believe that sheet piles anchored to the peat soil gave way to high water pressure, causing the entire wall to collapse.

Swamp peat was poor anchor, engineer says

By John McQuaid
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Soil tests indicate that a soft, spongy layer of swamp peat underneath the 17th Street Canal floodwall was the weak point that caused soil to move and the wall to breach during Hurricane Katrina, an engineer who has studied the data says.

"The thing that is remarkable here is the very low strength of the soils around the bottom of the sheet pile" base of the floodwall, said Robert Bea, a geotechnical engineer at the University of California, Berkeley, who examined the test results. Bea is a member of the Bowing to pleas and protests planned by French Quarter denizens, New Orleans officials appeased them late Friday by extending the city's midnight curfew to 2 a.m.

The new curfew, 2 to 6 a.m., applies only to lesser-damaged areas of the city that have been fully opened to residents since Hurricane Katrina. The open ZIP codes — 70112, 70113, 70115, 70116, 70118, 70130 and 70131 — cover parts of Uptown, the Garden District, the Central Business District, Central City and Algiers. For the rest of the city, the curfew remains 8 p.m. to 6 a.m.

Tropical Isle club owner Earl Bernhardt said Mayor Ray Nagin answered the pleas of French Quarter bar owners.

"It was a wise decision on his part," Bernhardt said. "That's what a politician is supposed to do: listen to his constituents. Thankfully, he did."

In a written statement, Nagin

Lower Plaquemines residents aren't dealing just with flooded homes. They're finding the full fury of Katrina, 'like a bomb went off.'

After several days sifting through the rubble that was once the Plaquemines Parish fishing community of Buras, Jane Bogart-Smith has found only enough possessions to fill a half-dozen boxes and one plastic barrel.

Raging Mississippi River floodwaters stirred by Hurricane Katrina ripped her house to shreds and scattered her belongings up and down Louisiana 11. A month later, Hurricane Rita breached the weakened levee system and reflooded the lower half of Plaquemines, further jumbling the ruins of Bogart-Smith's home — part of a mess of destruction that stretches nearly 50 miles from Myrtle Grove to Venice, the southernmost tip of the narrow parish that juts far into the Gulf of Mexico.

As the second round of floodwaters slowly dries, many residents of lower Plaquemines finally are

Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard said Friday he is moving to sack the head of the East Jefferson Levee District, who publicly questioned the Broussard administration's decision to evacuate drainage pump workers as Hurricane Katrina hurtled toward the Gulf Coast.

Broussard sent a letter asking Gov. Kathleen Blanco to remove Patrick Bossetta as levee board president and to install Bobby Bourgeois, one of Broussard's deputy chief administrative assistants, as an interim board member.

The request was the latest sign that the Aug. 28 evacuation of the pump operators has become a political powder keg for Broussard. Bossetta was among the first to go public second-guessing the administration, but other critics have come forward in Kenner, on the Parish Council and especially among the residents whose homes Katrina flooded.

Broussard cited Bossetta's remarks in a written statement disclosing that he had written to

New Orleans public school employees who do not return to work will see a dramatic change in their health benefits starting Dec. 1, when their existing coverage becomes a catastrophic insurance plan that requires employees to pay the first $5,000 to $10,000 of medical bills.

Only about 26 of the district's estimated 7,000 employees are now working for the system. Although as many as eight schools are expected to open on the West Bank next month, a board majority voted to charter them last week, removing those schools from their union obligation to rehire district employees. Board Vice President Lourdes Moran, who pushed the chartering effort, said they plan to hire New Orleans teachers, however.

The district also is attempting to reopen up to seven undamaged schools on the east bank in January.

Landlords in the New Orleans area say they have thousands of apartments that could be rented to meet the crying need for housing in the region, but executive orders by Gov. Kathleen Blanco are preventing them from taking the legal steps to free up the space.

The problem has become a hot-button issue in the business community, which is groping for housing options for employees and families willing to move back into the area.

Several apartment managers say they have waiting lists of hundreds of people seeking a place to live.

"Government officials continue to report on the housing shortage while failing to acknowledge the hundreds and hundreds of apartments that stand vacant or in need of repairs, yet remain inaccessible to landlords due to the governor's order," said Suzanne Rouse, a manager at Tonti Management, a Metairie firm.

Blanco spokesman Roderick Hawkins said the governor could amend her executive order or that the state Supreme

Average Social Security checks to top $1,000

But higher costs may eat up 4.1% raise

By Larry Lipman
Cox News Service

WASHINGTON — Social Security beneficiaries will get a 4.1 percent cost-of-living increase next year, pushing the average monthly check for retirees above $1,000 for the first time.

The increase, worth $39 for the average beneficiary, is the largest since a 5.4 percent jump in December 1990.

The annual adjustment — known as a "COLA" — began in 1975 and is based on the increase in the Consumer Price Index from the third quarter of one year to the next.

The higher payments to 48 million beneficiaries will show up in January. A similar 4.1 percent increase in Supplementary Security Income benefits to 7 million people will begin Dec. 30.

The announcement of the Social Security COLA comes a month after Medicare announced a $10.30 increase in premiums for next year, a 13 percent increase. By law, the Medicare premium increase cannot be larger than the Social Security increase.

William Novelli, chief executive officer for AARP, the nation's largest organization for people 50 and older, said the unusually high Social Security adjustment normally would be welcome news for beneficiaries, "but this COLA is being eaten up by rising gasoline and heating costs, another double-digit increase in the monthly Medicare Part B premium and escalating health-care bills."

Barbara Kennelly, president of the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare, noted that the average increase for a retired beneficiary will be $39 a month, but retirees who choose the new Medicare prescription drug benefit will see their Medicare payments rise about $43 a month.

Combined with winter heating bills anticipated to be 30 to 50 percent higher than last year, the increased Medicare costs mean many retirees are likely to have less money to spend next year, she said.

"Approximately half of the seniors now receiving Social Security rely on it for most of their income. The COLA is the only raise they'll see, and yet it is already disappearing before their eyes," Kennelly said.

The increase raises the average benefit from $963 to $1,002 a month, and the maximum individual retiree benefit from $1,939 to $2,053.

In addition to the annual cost-of-living adjustment, the Social Security Administration also announced that the cap on wages subject to the 12.4 percent payroll tax — split between workers and employers — would increase from $90,000 this year to $94,200 next year.

Of the nearly 160 million workers who pay Social Security taxes, about 11.3 million will pay higher taxes as a result of the increase in the wage cap, it said.

The age for retirement with full Social Security benefits will increase by two months next year.

Rove before grand jury for final time

Bush aide at center of CIA leak probe

By Pete Yost
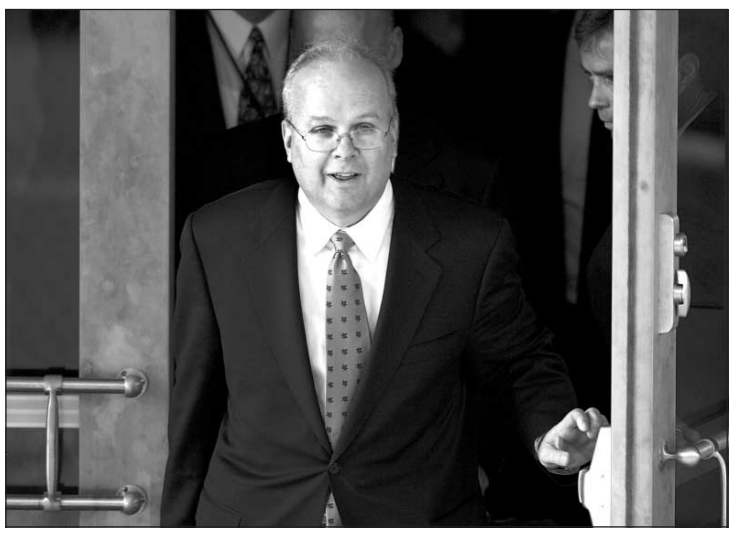
Associated Press writer



WASHINGTON — Karl Rove testified to a grand jury for the fourth and final time Friday, smiling as he emerged from hours of questioning about his possible role in the leak of a covert CIA officer's identity.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said that statements in the summer that Rove retained the president's confidence remained true. However, McClellan declined repeatedly to utter words of confidence outright.

Prosecutors had warned Rove before his latest grand jury appearance that there was no guarantee he would not be indicted. The grand jury's term is due to expire Oct. 28.

"Karl continues to do his duties as deputy chief of staff and senior adviser to the president," McClellan said. "What I said previously still stands."

Rove spent about four and one-half hours inside the federal courthouse, and left without commenting to reporters.

AP PHOTO

Karl Rove, President Bush's top political advisor, leaves U.S. District Court in Washington Friday. Rove testified for the fourth time Friday before the grand jury in the CIA leak probe, following public disclosure of his conversations with two reporters about the identity of a covert officer at the spy agency.

His lawyer, Robert D. Luskin, said Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald "has not advised Mr. Rove that he is a target of the investigation and affirmed that he has made no decision concerning charges. The special counsel has indicated that he does not anticipate the need for Mr. Rove's further cooperation."

Fitzgerald has a variety of options as he weighs whether anyone broke a law that bars the intentional unmasking of a covert CIA officer. Defense lawyers increasingly are concerned Fitzgerald might pursue other charges such as false statements, obstruction of justice or mishandling of classified information.

Until three months ago, the White House had denied that Rove and Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, were involved in leaking the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame in 2003.

The White House denials gave way to "no comments" following revelations in July that Rove and Libby had been sources for Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper in a story that identified Plame, the wife of Bush administration critic and former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson.

New York Times reporter Judith Miller testified twice in recent days about three conversations she had with Libby in June and July 2003 regarding Wilson and Plame.

Cheney on Friday was asked about Libby's earlier grand jury testimony and conversations with Miller.

"I'm simply not at liberty to discuss the issue. I understand you've got to ask those questions, but it is an ongoing investigation and we're under instructions not to discuss the matter," Cheney told Fox News Channel.

McClellan told reporters, "The president made it very clear, we're not going to comment on an ongoing investigation. We're aware of all those things. But we've got a lot of work to do and that's where we're focused."

The exposure of Plame's name came after Wilson publicly criticized the administration, saying it had twisted prewar intelligence on Iraq. The criticism came as the U.S. military engaged in a fruitless search for weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. The existence of such weapons was the primary reason the administration gave to justify going to war.

Eight days after Wilson made his allegations, columnist Robert Novak identified Wilson's wife as a CIA operative, saying she had suggested her husband for a mission to Africa for the agency.

Wilson's trip on behalf of the CIA led ultimately to his conclusion that the administration had manipulated intelligence to exaggerate the Iraqi threat.

Novak said his sources were two senior administration officials. Rove spoke to Novak about Wilson's wife and is apparently one of Novak's sources. The other is still a public mystery. Novak is believed to have cooperated with Fitzgerald's investigation, though he has declined to comment.

Officials: Census in 2010 in jeopardy

Cuts by Senate may doom game plan

By D'Vera Cohn
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — The next census is five years away, but it is already in trouble.

Not the same trouble that dogged the 2000 census, which was plagued by partisan battles over the quality of the door-to-door count and whether the official tally should be statistically adjusted to compensate for people who were missed. Then, congressional Republicans were intent that the Census Bureau had enough money to do the best possible door-to-door count, so sampling would not be needed.

This time, Census Bureau officials have said that sampling would not be practical. Now they are having money trouble. For the second year in a row, the Senate approved an appropriation that Census Bureau officials said is so low they would have to pull the plug on their game plan for the 2010 head count. The replacement, they said, would provide less information and end up costing more in later years.

Last year, the bureau and its supporters successfully persuaded House-Senate conferees to go with the higher House-approved budget figure. Census officials and their allies in social science, civil rights and business groups have mobilized again, but this year they are making their case in a tougher environment, as soaring spending for hurricane relief and the war in Iraq is prompting talk of across-the-board budget cuts.

Delay's campaign blasts prosecutor

Derogatory info is his counterattack

By John Solomon
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — Tom DeLay is using his congressional campaign to distribute to voters derogatory information about the Texas prosecutor who has indicted him, and to raise more money for a re-election bid that has been affected by the criminal case.

"Help Tom fight back," reads one of the solicitations on the www.TomDelay.com Web site that voters are being directed to as part of an Internet-based campaign paid for by DeLay's re-election committee.

Contributors, voters and others who sign up can get regular e-mails and an electronic "tool kit" from DeLay's campaign with the latest disparaging information his legal team has prepared on Texas prosecutor Ronnie Earle.

"Join thousands of conservatives across the country in the fight against liberal DA Ronnie Earle," recipients are told.

Recipients are offered a full dossier about the Democratic prosecutor and his "baseless political indictment," with subjects like:

▶ "Ronnie Earle's previous misuse of his office," which highlights failures in Earle's career such as his unsuccessful case against Republican Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison in the 1990s.

▶ "Earle asks for a Do-Over," which focuses on the prosecutor's decision to seek a re-indictment of DeLay on different charges after the congressman's lawyers raised technical questions about the first indictment.

▶ "Coming Soon: The Ronnie Earle Movie," which highlights reports that Earle allowed a film crew to follow him during parts of the investigation.

Legal experts said DeLay's use of congressional campaign donations to attack Earle probably was permissible, though it could lead to legal questions about whether he was trying to influence potential jurors for his trial.

"He clearly is aiming at the jury pool and aiming at voters, hoping to generate as much sympathy as he can," said Larry Noble, the government's former chief election enforcement lawyer. "And it shows DeLay never misses a beat when it comes to fundraising, no matter how dark things get."

Bruce Yannett, a former Iran-Contra prosecutor, said DeLay's campaign effort might raise questions of trying to taint the potential jury pool, but the legal standard for making such a case is difficult to meet.

Nonetheless, Yannett said he could not imagine former President Reagan overtly using his campaign to attack prosecutors during the 1980s investigation of the Iran-Contra affair. "It does seem a little unusual," Yannett said.

DeLay has been indicted along with several colleagues on charges he conspired to launder illegal corporate contributions to Texas state candidates. He denies the charges.

Earle, apparently, hasn't been solicited by the campaign. "I haven't seen it and have no comment," the prosecutor said when reached Friday. Earle has strongly denied politics has anything to do with his prosecution.

Don McGahn, a lawyer for DeLay's campaign, said the use of the campaign for the anti-Earle effort was "perfectly legal" and had nothing to do with trying to sway jurors.

The indictment "is obvious big news in Texas so it is obviously something the campaign should address for the voters whom it affects," McGahn said. "The intent is just for people to understand the truth. There is no other purpose here."

"Ronnie Earle is wrong on the facts. Ronnie Earle is wrong on the law," the Web site states as it analyzes the twists and turns in the case in the most favorable light to the congressman.

It also gives readers their own tools, letting them send a letter to newspaper editors in support of DeLay, contact a radio talk show or e-mail DeLay's statement to friends.

Budget deficit eases for '05

But amount is still third-highest ever

By Andrew Taylor
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — The federal deficit hit $319 billion for the budget year just ended, down from last year's record red ink though a surge in Katrina-driven spending threatens to drive it up again.

The improvement from the record $413 billion recorded in the 2004 budget year, which the Treasury Department reported Friday, is largely due to a surge in federal revenues from an improving economy.

The figures were released three days before Congress returns from a recess and commences a struggle to cut $35 billion from federal benefit programs over the next five years to help defray hurricane recovery costs. Friday's deficit figures underscored that even if lawmakers agree to such savings, they would have a barely visible effect on the overall red ink figure.

Despite the improvement from last year's budget gap, the 2005 shortfall was still the third-highest ever recorded. The government's 2005 budget year ended Sept. 30.

Because hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit in August and September, only about $4 billion of the $62 billion in emergency aid provided for the storms was actually spent in fiscal 2005, according to a senior Treasury official. Congressional analysts figure another $30 billion of that aid will be spent in the budget year that began Oct. 1, though more spending is likely to be approved in coming weeks.

The most recent White House estimate for the new fiscal year projects a $341 billion deficit, but that was issued before the hurricanes hit.

Republicans emphasized that the figure was an improvement from earlier deficit projections.

At the beginning of this year, the White House projected a $427 billion shortfall for 2005, which would have set another record in sheer dollar terms. The Congressional Budget Office forecast a gap of $365 billion, although both lowered their forecasts as the year progressed.

The improvements were due to a surge of 15 percent in federal revenues over 2004 levels. Meanwhile, spending went up 8 percent.

Texas judges will vouch for court nominee

Move seen as effort to bolster support

By Deb Riechmann
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — Stunned by conservative opposition to Supreme Court nominee Harriet Miers, President Bush next week will bring in former judges from her home state of Texas to trumpet her qualifications for the nation's highest court.

The event is part of an administration effort to refine its push for Miers after its initial strategy failed to quiet vocal opposition from members of the president's own party.

The Republican critics, who suggest Bush passed over candidates with long records of conservative rulings from the bench, said that if the White House strategy continues to amount to a "trust me" message, they'll continue to grumble.

On Friday, press secretary Scott McClellan repeatedly used the words "qualified" and "well-qualified" to defend Miers and said she deserved a fair hearing in the Senate Judiciary Committee. Conservative opponents say emphasizing her resume is part of a retooled White House tack.

The White House also has sought to dampen opposition from the GOP's right flank by noting that Miers attended an evangelical church in Texas that is almost universally pro-life. The president earlier this week spoke of how religion was "part of Harriet Miers' " life.

That further inflamed some critics, rubbing against the grain of judicial conservatism — the idea that judges should strictly interpret the Constitution and that their opinions should not be colored by personal beliefs on such issues as abortion.

Bush has announced his allegiance to judicial conservatism by saying repeatedly that judges shouldn't "legislate from the bench." To erase any doubt, McClellan stressed that Miers was "firmly committed to strictly interpreting our Constitution and our laws."

So far, Miers' conservative critics have not been persuaded.

The National Pro-Life Action Center on Friday called on Bush to withdraw his "ill-advised" nomination. Gary Bauer, a leading conservative, wrote his supporters on Friday: "The nomination of Harriet Miers has split conservatives unlike anything I can remember. The debate will not end, in fact it will become more intense."

Manual Miranda, a former counsel to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, said White House advisers are meeting next week to regroup and hone their message. The White House did not confirm that such a meeting was scheduled.

"They need to stop what they're doing — a series of ham-fisted messages such as pushing the religious issue and suggesting that she's someone that can be counted on to vote a certain way," Miranda said. "That gives no comfort to conservatives because the bottom line with conservatives is that she's un-credentialed."

On Monday, as senators return from visits to their districts, Bush is hosting a White House event with former justices of the Texas Supreme Court. Miers will be meeting with more senators next week and is expected to return a 12-page questionnaire to the judiciary panel early next week.

Three former justices wrote to Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, on Friday trumpeting her credentials to wear a Supreme Court robe.

"These accomplishments can only be attributed to Harriet Miers' legal brilliance," the letter said. "They demonstrate her unquestioned ability and the confidence she has uniformly earned from her peers."

Some conservatives caution against a rush to judgment.

She deserves a chance to prove herself, said Ronald Cass, dean emeritus of Boston University School of Law and co-chairman of the Committee for Justice, which backs Bush's nominees for the bench.

"If Miers' performance at those hearings is not that of a person who seems ready to interpret the Constitution thoughtfully, she will lose my support," he said. "If she comes across as an experienced, intelligent lawyer committed to law-bound judging, then she should gain public support from conservatives now criticizing her nomination — though the damage to our party at that point might be irreparable."

The White House also is rebutting criticism that Miers lacks knowledge of constitutional law. McClellan said a White House counsel deals with laws governing war powers, presidential powers and pardons and executive privilege as well as constitutional amendments. "She's really quite an expert on dealing with the realities of the struggles between the executive branch, the legislative branch — and I'm going to say — the judicial branch," White House chief of staff Andy Card told C-SPAN on Thursday.

IRS doesn't do well on audit

Missing equipment brings some heat

By Mary Dalrymple
AP tax writer

WASHINGTON — Treasury inspectors who went looking for equipment used by the law enforcement arm of the IRS couldn't find 10 percent of a random sample of the division's radio, video and communications devices.

The inspectors for tax administration looked for 700 pieces of equipment, including firearms, used by criminal investigators at the Internal Revenue Service.

They found the firearms but couldn't locate 70 other items, according to a report by Inspector General Russell George. The missing equipment, from video and photography gear and portable radios to fax machines, had been purchased for more than $240,000.

Auditors also discovered that IRS criminal investigators were prepared to write off more than $1.3 million in equipment as lost in 2004 and 2005.

"Unless (the department's) management takes action to improve the controls and procedures over this equipment, they will continue to be at risk of losing control of more investigative equipment," George concluded in the report.

Nancy Jardini, chief of IRS Criminal Investigation, in a letter to the auditors agreed to implement the recommended changes and agreed the agency must do a better job of tracking its equipment.

However, she also said that the 70 items that investigators couldn't locate were not necessarily lost, and that the $240,000 price tag inflates the value of older equipment.

IRS criminal investigators pursue tax, money laundering and bank secrecy crimes. The department has 40,000 pieces of equipment purchased for about $128 million.

The auditors, who provide independent oversight of IRS operations, said lost investigative equipment like radios could compromise ongoing investigations.

Investigators also raised alarms about missing identification badges, known as pocket commissions, questioning whether they could be used in ways that damage IRS credibility or national security.

3,663 Iraqis die under interim regime

Government has been in power 6 months

By The Associated Press

Today's vote on Iraq's constitution takes place nearly six months after the country's first elected government took power, and during that period at least 3,663 Iraqis have been killed in war-related violence, according to an Associated Press count.

The current interim government took power April 28 after long negotiations that followed parliamentary elections in January.

The AP gathered the statistics on Iraqi dead on a daily basis from hospital officials, Iraqi police, the Iraqi military and other government officials.

The Iraqi deaths include civilians, bodyguards, police, security forces and the military. They do not include the nearly 1,000 Shiite pilgrims killed in an Aug. 21 stampede on a Baghdad bridge that began when rumors spread through the crowd that a suicide bomber was among the faithful.

As of Thursday, the AP count also showed that at least 395 members of the U.S. military had died in the same period.

Since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, at least 1,970 members of the U.S. military have died, according to a separate AP count.

On eve of vote, insurgents cut power

Iraqis to cast ballots on constitution today

By Hamza Hendawi
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Insurgents sabotaged power lines Friday, plunging the Iraqi capital into darkness and cutting off water supplies on the eve of a landmark vote on a constitution that would define democracy in the country.

The charter, hammered out in months of bitter negotiations, is supported by a Shiite-Kurdish majority but has split Sunni Arab ranks after last-minute amendments designed to win support among the disaffected minority.

In Friday sermons across the nation, the message from Shiite pulpits was an unequivocal "yes," but it was not unified in Sunni Arab mosques — varying from "yes," "no" and "vote your conscience."

Amid security concerns, Iraqis were hunkered down for most of the day in their homes, with the streets of the Iraqi capital almost empty hours before a 10 p.m. curfew and the country sealed off from the outside world as borders and airports were closed for today's referendum.

The widespread power outage blamed on insurgents hit soon after sundown, when Muslims break their daily fast during the holy month of Ramadan, leaving Baghdad's skyline black except for pinpoints of light from private generators.

Water also ran out in homes in some parts of the capital, and water pressure waned in others as tanks ran out. Power appeared to be returning slowly. The blackout was not expected to affect today's balloting, because paper ballots will be used, not machines.

AP PHOTO

The boots of a man wounded Friday in a roadside bombing lie on the ground as a U.S. military vehicle secures the area in Baghdad. The U.S. military has warned of an upsurge of violence leading up to today's referendum on a constitution.

Insurgents, meanwhile, detonated a bomb outside the Sunni Islamic Party's office in central Baghdad, then set fire to the party's main office in Fallujah. Nobody was injured in what were apparently symbolic attacks against that group's recent decision to support the charter.

Today's referendum, a key stop in Iraq's passage to democratic rule that the United States hopes will pave the way for withdrawing foreign troops, takes place as American and Iraqi forces battle an enduring Sunni-led insurgency in Baghdad and areas to the west and north.

"Besides Allah, we need this constitution to protect us," said Rajha Abdul-Jabar, 49, a Sunni Arab mother of five married to a Kurdish dentist. "I, my husband and our children will go and vote yes tomorrow," she said in the small convenience store she runs.

Kurds, a sizable minority that is mainly Sunni, fully support the charter.

Jameel Safar, 30, a Kurd in Baghdad, said the charter will safeguard Iraq's unity, but later added: "The Kurds are entitled to everything. We have a right to our own nation like everyone else."

Although there has been a lull so far this month in major insurgent attacks in Baghdad, the U.S. military has warned of an upsurge in violence to coincide with the vote.

Mahmoud al-Saaedi, an Electricity Ministry spokesman, said power lines were sabotaged between the northern towns of Kirkuk and Beiji leading to the Baghdad region. He did not specify how insurgents damaged the lines, but militants in the past have used bombs to hit infrastructure.

Tens of thousands of Iraqi army troops and police officers, meanwhile, formed security rings around the nation's estimated 6,000 polling stations and set up checkpoints on highways and inside cities.

The capital's usually congested streets were virtually deserted by late afternoon. Most shops did not open at all, and those that did closed early. Lines of cars a mile long waiting to fill up at gas stations provided one of the few signs of normalcy.

Ratification of the constitution requires approval by a majority of voters nationwide.

However, if two-thirds of voters in any three of Iraq's 18 provinces vote "no," the constitution will be defeated. Sunni Arab opponents have a chance of swinging the ballot in four volatile provinces — Anbar, Nineveh, Salahuddin and Diyala.

In Baghdad, security was particularly tight in flashpoint areas where insurgents are active, such as the Sunni Azamiyah district in the north and Dora and Ghazaliya to the west.

Iraq's Kurdish President Jalal Talabani and Shiite Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari appeared on television late Friday to make last-minute appeals for a "yes" vote.

Talabani also called on the Sunni Arab insurgents to lay down their arms and join the political process. "Our dear brothers, the way to achieve your legitimate demands and rights is through political struggle . . . and not terrorism or violence or boycotting," he said.

Most of Iraq's Shiites, about 60 percent of an estimated 27 million population, were expected to approve the charter, especially after Shiite spiritual leader Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani called on followers to do so.

In an effort to familiarize voters with the draft, local television stations aired readings of amendments adopted this week, too late to be included in the U.N.-printed text distributed to Iraqis.

Those amendments persuaded the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's largest Sunni Arab political group, to drop its opposition to the draft and call on its supporters to vote in favor of the constitution. The move split Sunni Arab ranks and boosted the chances for the charter's passage.

The minority, which had been dominant under Saddam Hussein, opposes a federalist system enshrined in the constitution that will let Shiites and Kurds form miniature states in the south and north. The draft was passed despite Sunni objections, but the issue remains.

Method for applying foam likely at fault

Problem grounding shuttle till at least May

By Marcia Dunn
AP aerospace writer

CAPE CANAVERAL, FLA. — Inadequate methods of applying and repairing foam on the space shuttle's fuel tank probably contributed to the dangerous loss of a chunk of the insulation during Discovery's launch 2½ months ago, a NASA investigation team concluded Friday.

So much work is needed to understand the problem and correct the deficiencies that shuttle flights are on hold until at least May, and possibly even next summer.

NASA's Richard Gilbrech, head of the investigation team, said no one may ever know exactly what caused a 1-pound, 3-foot section of foam to break off Discovery's external fuel tank in late July. It was a scary repeat of what happened during Columbia's doomed flight in 2003.

Gilbrech's team suspects workers inadvertently crushed the foam while conducting repairs in that area, or handled it in such a way that resulted in damage. The tank was worked on considerably more than previous ones because of all the post-Columbia modifications.

In addition, thin lines may have been introduced into the foam when it was sprayed onto the tank, weakening the material.

"We don't think in and of itself crushed foam alone could have been the cause of the foam coming off," Gilbrech said. "We believe it was potentially a combination" of things.

The investigation team found no evidence of negligence, said Gilbrech, who is deputy director of NASA's Langley Research Center in Virginia. Workers followed procedures, "it's just we didn't really have an appreciation for the significance that this handling damage could have."

Numerous tests are planned in coming months to establish just how sensitive the foam is and whether it can be easily crushed by workers. Foam is about as well understood right now as steel was during the Industrial Revolution, Gilbrech said.

Another possibility is that the 1-inch layer of underlying foam may have cracked because of thermal stresses, causing the layer on top to pop off, Gilbrech said.

"We're attacking all fronts and trying to learn as much as we can, but I don't know that we'll ever pinpoint one of those potentials as the root cause," he said.

NASA already has introduced new techniques for applying foam and is limiting workers' access to vulnerable areas.

Some redesign work will be required in the spot where foam came off Columbia and resulted in a fatal blow to the wing. During Discovery's liftoff, an 8-inch piece of foam broke off that same area. In all, worrisomely large foam chunks flew off in five spots.

Shuttle program manager Wayne Hale said it is too soon to set a launch date for the next shuttle mission but cited May as a possibility. It depends on progress made at the fuel tank assembly plant in New Orleans, which was in the path of Hurricane Katrina.

It will be December before the factory's entire 2,000-person staff is back on the job, Hale said. Only 500 are now working.

Space operations chief Bill Gerstenmaier said 18 more shuttle flights are planned to the international space station and possibly one to the Hubble Space Telescope before the fleet is retired in September 2010.

Russia seeks rebels behind attack

Militants may hide along with civilians

By Mike Eckel
Associated Press writer

NALCHIK, RUSSIA — Russian security forces combed a city of shattered glass and bloodstains Friday, searching for militants amid fears they may have melted into the civilian population to regroup after fierce attacks that left at least 108 people dead.

Authorities claimed that all pockets of active fighting had been put down a day after the attacks and President Vladimir Putin promised all such violence will be put down "hard and consistently," but the bloodshed underlined the spreading violence in the restive Caucasus region.

As officials announced successful operations to liquidate rebels on Friday, it became clear that security forces had rescued nearly 20 hostages in various offices around this southern Russian city — and killed dozens of militants.

The head of the regional government, Gennady Gubin, said Nalchik, a city of 235,000 people, was being searched for rebels, according to the Interfax news agency.

"It is bad that such bandit raids are still possible here (in Russia)," Putin said. "It's a great tragedy that we are sustaining losses among law enforcement officers and peaceful civilians."

Chechen rebels have claimed involvement in Thursday's attacks on police and security facilities. The fighting in the Kabardino-Balkariya republic near Chechnya has raised fears that Islamic militants who have been fighting Russian forces for most of the past decade were opening a new front in the troubled Caucasus region.

Rebels for years have harassed Russian forces in Chechnya with roadside bombs and homemade explosives but the Nalchik attacks appeared to be part of a strategy to target areas outside the volatile republic and keep Moscow off-balance.

Russian officials said the 2002 seizure of hundreds of people in a Moscow theater, the 2004 school hostage-taking in the southern city of Beslan that killed 330 and other terror attacks were conducted by the Chechen militants with support and guidance from the al-Qaida.

However, no firm evidence exists suggesting the two groups are coordinating their strategies.

Chechen insurgents like Shamil Basayev — the main warlord in Chechnya's decade-old fight against Russian forces — have long infiltrated republics like Kabardino-Balkariya in the mostly Muslim region.

Dutch arrest 7 terror suspects

By Sebastian Rotella
Los Angeles Times

PARIS — Dutch police arrested a known teenage extremist Friday and six other suspects for allegedly plotting to assassinate Dutch politicians and to attack the headquarters of the Dutch intelligence service, authorities said.

The group, they said, has links to a cell broken up last year after the Nov. 2 assassination of Theo Van Gogh, a filmmaker and descendant of the artist Vincent Van Gogh.

As anti-terror agents carried out raids in Amsterdam, an outlying suburb and The Hague, well-armed police guarded the Netherlands' intelligence service headquarters, Parliament and other government buildings in The Hague. Authorities said the security deployment came in response to an imminent threat posed by the suspects as they prepared to buy automatic weapons and explosives to carry out attacks.

The accused ringleader is Samir Azzouz, 19, a Dutch citizen of Moroccan descent acquitted in April of charges he plotted to bomb the Amsterdam airport, according to Vincent Van Steen, a spokesman for the AIVD intelligence service.

Europe scrambles against bird flu as disease nears

Alarm grows with new cases in Turkey

By Emma Ross
AP medical writer

LONDON — Senior veterinary officials from around the European Union agreed Friday on new measures aimed at preventing a lethal strain of bird flu from entering the bloc, a day after it was confirmed on the continent's doorstep in Turkey.

The officials also moved to calm fears on a continent with vivid memories of mad cow disease, saying there was no reason to avoid cooked chicken because bird flu is killed in seconds when the meat is cooked.

The new measures, agreed upon after two days of emergency talks, focus on infection-control measures on farms and expanding early detection systems to high-risk areas, such as wetlands frequented by wild birds, said a statement issued late Friday by the EU.

The EU has banned poultry imports from Turkey and Romania, where bird flu was also detected this week. Officials in the two countries destroyed more fowl on Friday.

In Turkey, Betul Demirel of Seker Pilic poultry company said the sector had come "close to a standstill" after people stopped eating poultry products. "There is an 80 percent decrease in sales," since the outbreak began, she said.

Turkish veterinary officials in protective plastic suits, masks and goggles were trying to catch the remaining birds in the village of Kiziksa, where the virus was detected, and to persuade villagers who were hiding their chickens to surrender the birds.

Officials carried out medical tests on nine people in a neighborhood where 40 pigeons reportedly died, but released them from medical observation Friday after determining they did not likely have bird flu.

EU health officials assured Europeans it was safe to eat poultry and that human infection with bird flu was rare. It was too early to determine whether there had been an impact on poultry consumption across the continent.

Preliminary tests found bird flu in a duck and a chicken from Romania, but definitive test results on whether it is the virulent H5N1 strain are not expected until Saturday at the earliest. The lethal strain, blamed for the deaths of 60 people in Asia, was confirmed in Turkey on Thursday.

Officials in the Balkans sought to soothe fears by showing they weren't afraid of fowl.

Romanian President Traian Basescu on Friday urged his people to continue eating chicken, saying his wife is cooking it at home. In Hungary, where the Poultry Product Board reported the sale of chicken immediately fell 10-15 percent when the outbreak started, Agriculture Minister Jozsef Graf ate a roasted leg of chicken Friday at a downtown food market.

The risk of contracting bird flu from handling raw packaged chicken bought in supermarkets is considered negligible, said Bernard Vallat, director general of the World Organization for Animal Health, adding that no such cases have ever been recorded.

During the late 1980s and 1990s, mad cow disease severely hurt the beef industry in several European countries. Exports from affected countries were banned and thousands of cattle were destroyed to stop the spread.

The World Health Organization moved Friday to calm fears about bird flu by stressing that the risk of people getting infected is very low.

Since the outbreak began in Asia two years ago, 117 people have become infected. They were mostly poultry farmers and others involved in plucking and preparing sick birds, handling cockfights or playing with ducks and drinking duck blood.

However, concerns over infection ran high in Greece, where citizens were reported to be crowding pharmacies to buy the antiviral Tamiflu drug, as well as flu vaccines, which experts say are useless against bird flu.

The rush prompted the health ministry to issue a public appeal against panic-induced shopping for vaccines.

Deputy Health Minister Thanassis Yiannopoulos told private Alter television on Friday, "We must not all rush to the pharmacy to buy vaccines, because the people who really need them will not have any."

Seasonal flu vaccines are considered important for the elderly, young children and people with heart disease and chronic respiratory diseases. However, swiftlystamping out the outbreaks in poultry is important for human health because the further the virus is allowed to spread, the more opportunities it has to mutate into a form that passes easily to and between people, sparking a human flu pandemic.

Authorities were combing areas along the path of migratory birds for dead birds, and rushing any samples to laboratories for testing, Agriculture Ministry official Beytullah Okay said.

Experts believe the disease came from wild birds migrating through Turkey from the Ural Mountains in Russia to Africa.

Bird-flu resistance is found in ill girl

Officials advising stockpiling 2 drugs

By Malcolm Ritter
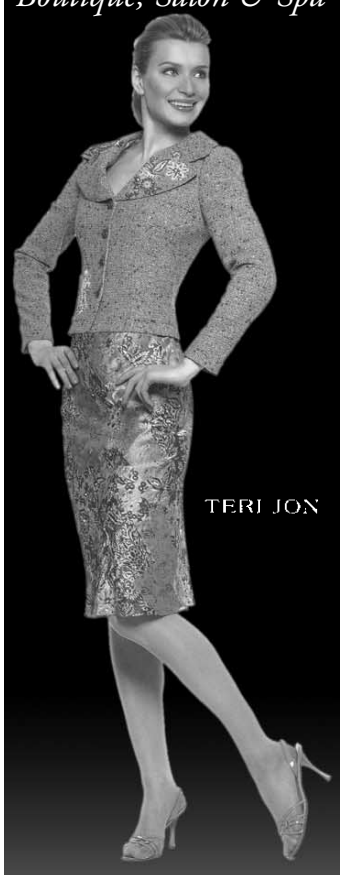
AP science writer

NEW YORK — Bird flu virus found in a Vietnamese girl was resistant to the main drug that's being stockpiled in case of a pandemic, a sign that it's important to keep a second drug on hand as well, a researcher said Friday.

He said the finding was no reason to panic.

The drug in question, Tamiflu, still attacks "the vast majority of the viruses out there," said Yoshihiro Kawaoka of the University of Tokyo and the University of Wisconsin-Madison. The drug, produced by Swiss-based Roche Holding AG, is in short supply as nations around the world try to stock up on it in case of a global flu pandemic.

Kawaoka said the case of resistant virus in the 14-year-old girl is "only one case, and whether that condition was something unique we don't know."



He also said it's not surprising to see some resistance to Tamiflu in treated individuals, because resistance has also been seen with human flu.

In lab tests, the girl's Tamiflu-resistant virus was susceptible to another drug, Relenza, which is made by GlaxoSmithKline.

Kawaoka and colleagues report the case in the Oct. 20 issue of the journal Nature, which released the study Friday. The researchers conclude that it might be useful to stockpile Relenza as well as Tamiflu.

There's no evidence that so-called H5N1 viruses, like the one recovered from the girl, are becoming generally resistant to the class of drugs that includes Tamiflu, the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention said Friday.

Both Tamiflu and Relenza are being stockpiled by the U.S. government. Doctors have good reason to believe Tamiflu would be effective at combating a pandemic strain of bird flu, although it's not clear how long people would have to be treated or what doses they'd need, Dr. John Treanor said.

Evacuating tenants left a mess behind at the Severn Pointe apartment complex in Metairie. The tenants have not returned, so the apartment cannot be rented to someone else.

High court considers special eviction rule

EVICTIONS, from A-1

Court could resolve the issue.

Original order extended

The controversy stems from a suspension of legal deadlines ordered by Blanco after Hurricane Katrina ravaged the state and left court systems in the New Orleans area in disarray.

The first order Sept. 6 basically delayed legal actions until Sept. 25 on a broad scope of malpractice and civil cases, including eviction proceedings, and was generally greeted as a sensible step to prevent confusion and to protect the rights of parties in lawsuits. State officials also were concerned about the potential for price gouging by landlords who might cancel old leases and replace them with much higher rents.

Blanco later extended the order until Oct. 25. Meanwhile, many tenants who fled the New Orleans area have not returned or contacted their landlords. Rental managers have been unable even to begin the legal remedy of the eviction process, in which tenants and landlords would be permitted to present their cases. Apartment managers who want to repair damaged properties have in some cases been legally hamstrung and unable to move out people's possessions or take control for the rehabilitation.

"The governor may have intended well at the time this order was issued," Rouse said. But now, weeks later, "this order is doing greater harm to Louisiana citizens here now looking for housing ... and to housing providers trying to provide it."

In response to "many inquiries" about the issue, state Attorney General Charles Foti wrote a letter Oct. 3 to judges, justices of the peace and clerks of courts emphasizing that Blanco's order "has the effect of suspending all eviction proceedings until Oct. 25." Foti also asked the state Supreme Court to consider a special rule for evictions, according to spokesmen for Foti and the court. They would not elaborate on the intent of the request.

The Supreme Court is considering the request, spokesman Robert Gunn said Friday.

'Unable to mitigate damage'

The Apartment Association of Greater New Orleans Inc. wrote Blanco on Sept. 28 asking her to reconsider her order, pointing out that tenants couldn't be reached, that their belongings were being destroyed by moisture and mold, and that the units were further deteriorating by allowing the items to remain.

"Owners are left behind with abandoned, wet, molding belongings from residents," wrote Tammy Esponge, an association executive. "As you can imagine, all resident contact information has changed, (and) emergency numbers cannot be reached, therefore we are unable to mitigate damage as the insurance companies suggest."

Esponge said mold is attracting insects and causing bad odors and severe moisture in the units.

"We are asking that you work with the multifamily (housing) industry and help us come up with a reasonable solution for owners to regain possession of their units," Esponge wrote.

Esponge said she has not heard back from Blanco.

Many units survive storm

Larry Schedler, a broker specializing in the multifamily housing market, said he believes that 20 percent of the local apartment market has been destroyed, mostly the 7,000 units in eastern New Orleans.

But in most apartment complexes, probably half the units have slight or no damage, and yet the landlords are facing the brick wall of Blanco's order in removing tenants' possessions or repairing the properties, Schedler said.

Several apartment managers in the area reported a similar situation and said they had long lists of people who have signed up to rent apartments as soon as the units become available.

Henry Shane, chairman of Favrot & Shane, which has about 8,000 units, mostly on the east bank of Jefferson Parish, said he has 1,800 units abandoned in which he would like to implement the eviction process. He, too, wrote Blanco asking to "give me control of my property and help me protect the welfare of the residents (in undamaged units) living next to this stuff."

Stonebridge Manor in Gretna has a waiting list of more than 300 people. Shane's company estimates that out of the 50,000-unit market of apartments in complexes of 100 units or more, "there are probably 20,000 to 30,000 units sitting in the same situation."

The housing shortage is presenting a serious dilemma for local employers trying to get back on their feet.

"The housing issue is one of the most difficult yet critical issues to get the whole parish back," said Alan Donner, vice president of business development for East Jefferson General Hospital, which is open but struggling to find lodging for staff and their families. "There are limited resources, and the demand far exceeds the supply."

The hospital opened a trailer park with 66 units in River Ridge and is renting 72 rooms at the Sheraton Hotel in New Orleans, but still has a "couple hundred families with unmet needs," Donner said.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency told the hospital that it would get preferential treatment on housing, but the assistance has been "slow and trickling," and various promises "have evaporated," Donner said.

No place to go

Adelina Morris, a dietitian assistant at the hospital who evacuated to Dallas and wants to come back to work, said she has looked in vain for a place to rent while her Carrollton home is repaired. She wants to bring her extended family back to New Orleans.

"What am I supposed to do?" Morris said.

James Garner, a New Orleans real estate lawyer, said that although the governor's executive order may seem onerous to landlords, he believes "the intentions of the governor were good. In some situations the order was necessary. But like most things in life, it's impossible to promulgate one large rule that envisions every circumstance."

But Semmes Favrot, a private practice attorney for Favrot and Shane, said that although he has sympathy for the plight of evacuated tenants, six weeks after the storm should be ample time for them to contact landlords and state their intentions about returning or not.

FEMA still spending on no-bid contracts

Despite assurances, it has rebid only 4

By Lara Jakes Jordan
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — The government is spending $347 million on Hurricane Katrina-related contracts that were awarded with little or no competition, despite a public pledge by FEMA's chief to reopen no-bid agreements.

In its most recent weekly spending report to Congress, the Homeland Security Department detailed 73 contracts awarded on a basis of "other than full and open competition." Most of the contracts on the Oct. 13 list provided travel trailers, communications systems and food from the disaster relief fund run by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Last week, FEMA Acting Director R. David Paulison told senators, "All of those no-bid contracts, we are going to go back and rebid." Later that day, FEMA officials said they would rebid only four contracts of up to $100 million each, a point that spokesman Larry Orluskie repeated Friday.

"A lot of the contracts that were previously awarded without competition are completed or are beyond the point where it would be economically feasible to re-compete," Orluskie said. He did not know how many of the contracts were completed.

"The whole competition process doesn't happen overnight," said Orluskie, defending contracts that were quickly awarded as Katrina loomed. "And when it's about saving lives and protecting property, you need it now."

Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., said the largess of noncompetitive contracts is a product of poor planning by FEMA before Katrina hit, and will result in a "substantial waste of taxpayer funds."

"At least some of these contracts are for ongoing services, and those agreements certainly should be rebid as quickly as possible," Lieberman, the top Democrat on the Senate Homeland Security Committee, said in an e-mail to The Associated Press.

As of Oct. 10, FEMA had awarded $2.3 billion in contracts for Katrina recovery efforts, agency documents show. The new totals show that no-bid and limited competition agreements make up about 15 percent of all hurricane relief contracts.

At an Oct. 6 hearing of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, Paulison defended the initial need for no-bid contracts to get help to hurricane victims as quickly as possible. But he said those agreements should be reopened to competition to prevent waste or abuse of federal funds and save taxpayers money.

"I've been a public servant for a long time, and I've never been a fan of no-bid contracts," Paulison said at the hearing.

Paulison's testimony came as fiscal watchdogs pummeled FEMA for approving noncompetitive, open-ended or otherwise vague spending agreements that audits historically have cited as being highly prone to abuse.

"Our hope had been that he was actually given the authority to make federal contacting more competitive, but it doesn't look like it," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight.

FEMA is rebidding contracts to four firms: Bechtel Corp., Fluor Corp., the Shaw Group and CH2M Hill. Those contracts were approved before or as Katrina hit. Each of the agreements has a $100 million spending cap, but the four companies had spent only a combined $132 million as of last week, FEMA officials said.

Of the remaining 73 limited-competition contracts, the largest is for $50 million with Clearbrook, LLC, of Mobile, Ala., which provides prefabricated housing. A $37.3 million contract is for hotel rooms by CS&M Associates of New Orleans.

Curfew in N.O. pushed to 2 a.m.

Quarter bar owners cheer extended hours

By Brian Thevenot and Lynne Jensen
Staff writers

Bowing to pleas and protests planned by French Quarter denizens, New Orleans officials appeased them late Friday by extending the city's midnight curfew to 2 a.m.

The new curfew, 2 to 6 a.m., applies only to lesser-damaged areas of the city that have been fully opened to residents since Hurricane Katrina. The open ZIP codes — 70112, 70113, 70115, 70116, 70118, 70130 and 70131 — cover parts of Uptown, the Garden District, the Central Business District, Central City and Algiers. For the rest of the city, the curfew remains 8 p.m. to 6 a.m.

Tropical Isle club owner Earl Bernhardt said Mayor Ray Nagin answered the pleas of French Quarter bar owners.

"It was a wise decision on his part," Bernhardt said. "That's what a politician is supposed to do: listen to his constituents. Thankfully, he did."

In a written statement, Nagin said he was trying to strike a balance between safety and late-night commerce with the extended hours.

"We are taking steps to accommodate business while also ensuring public safety," he said.

New clientele

Although some bars have been repopulated by prestorm regulars, most of Bernhardt's patrons are now "Red Cross workers, medical personnel and insurance adjusters who are working long hours" and don't show up until 11:30 p.m., Bernhardt said.

The midnight curfew was killing his business, he said.

"There was no way we could have made it, money-wise," he said.

The new curfew marks a reversal of a midnight curfew Nagin said would be strictly enforced in the wake of a nationally televised beating by New Orleans police of a man on Bourbon Street.

Three police officers who punched and tackled 64-year-old Robert Davis, a retired teacher, have been charged with simple battery and suspended without pay, pending an inquiry. The officers charged Davis with public intoxication, resisting arrest and public intimidation. Both Davis and the officers have plead innocent.

Before the beating, the midnight curfew, as well as other, earlier curfews in the first days after Katrina, had been roundly ignored by many people, especially in the French Quarter. Some bars had stayed open, in their typical prestorm fashion, until the last paying customer walked out.

In recent days, many Bourbon Street bars have reopened in the Quarter, and some local staples have been open for weeks. Johnny White's never closed, and Molly's at the Market reopened immediately after the storm.

But many popular destinations for both locals and tourists, including Pat O'Brien's and the House of Blues, remain closed.

Eager to return to normal

Jim Monaghan Jr., proprietor of Molly's, said he has obeyed the midnight curfew since Nagin announced his intent to enforce it. But he and many of his patrons had planned to flaunt the curfew early today in protest.

"It was going to be a peaceful thing," Monaghan said of the planned protest, "nothing where anybody would be drug away in handcuffs right now, at least not at Molly's."

Monaghan said he had not coordinated with other bars in the Quarter but had heard that others would stay open, too. Residents also planned to sit on their stoops and balconies in defiance of curfew enforcement.

Monaghan vowed to abide by the new extended hours, however, which he called an acceptable short-term compromise. But bar owners are eager to return to the old status quo, he said — no closing time.

"It's a compromise for now, not forever," he said. "I want to know if this is going to last a month, if it's going to be forever. I just want to know. If it's forever, certainly that would change the face of New Orleans."

News of the extended curfew sparked a "yoo-hoo and yippee" from Coop's Place bar manager Fay Sanchez. "And it's the same from everybody here," she said.

Sanchez said Coop's has been obeying the midnight curfew but will stay open the extra two hours.

"I really didn't think it was going to happen until next week," she said.

"Think of a layer cake. In the middle I've got my icing. All of a sudden, I push on the top of my piece of cake, and what it's moving on is this weak, slick icing. The whole thing moves."

THOMAS ZIMMIE, civil engineer at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute

Levees compared to spongy layer cake

FLOODWALL, from A-1

National Science Foundation team that is studying the levee system's performance during Katrina.

Bea said other data shows the same peat layer also runs under the London Avenue Canal breaches and probably was instrumental in those collapses as well.

Investigators are focusing on the 17th Street and London Avenue canal levee walls because, unlike other parts of the system, they apparently were not topped by Katrina's storm surge. That could mean a design or construction flaw is to blame for the collapses, and for the flooding of much of central New Orleans.

Army Corps of Engineers officials say they must determine whether human error played a role in the breaches. If it did, they say, they may have to rebuild the canal walls immediately so they don't pose an additional risk during next year's hurricane season.

Investigators from the corps, the American Society of Civil Engineers and the National Science Foundation have spent the past two weeks examining the floodwalls and other parts of the levee system. At the two drainage canal breaches, they say the culprit appears to be the layer of peat around or not far beneath the base of the walls.

Graphs show problem

The Corps of Engineers has not yet released the results of soil borings in the breached areas to the outside investigators. But the corps included some soil boring data for the 17th Street Canal breach this week in a contract for temporary repairs posted on its Web site. The Times-Picayune asked Bea to examine the results.

The canal walls consist of a concrete cap on a steel sheet pile base, driven 17 ½ feet deep at 17th Street and 16 feet deep at London Avenue, corps design documents show. Bea said the soil boring data shows the peat layer starts about 15 feet to 30 feet beneath the surface and ranges from about 5 feet to 20 feet thick.

Signs of trouble appear in graphs in the corps' soil data showing the "shear strength" of the soil, its ability to resist deformation and lateral motion. In one boring, at 27 feet, the soil strength is near the bottom of the scale, about 0.02 tons per square foot. Eight feet deeper, the strength is 0.25 tons per square foot, more than 10 times greater. At 70 feet, the strength even greater: 0.6 tons per square foot.

The data also show the soil at the peat level has a high water concentration. Put together, those data indicate it would be very vulnerable to the stresses of a large flood, Bea said.

At 17th Street, the soil moved laterally, pushing entire wall sections with it. Bea and other engineers say that as Katrina's storm surge filled the canal, water pressure rose in the soil underneath the wall and in the peat layer. Water moved through the soil underneath the base of the wall. When the rising pressure and moving water overcame the soil's strength, it suddenly shifted, taking surrounding material — and the wall — with it.

"Think of a layer cake. In the middle I've got my icing. All of a sudden, I push on the top of my piece of cake, and what it's moving on is this weak, slick icing. The whole thing moves," said Thomas Zimmie, a civil engineer at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute who is on the National Science Foundation team and surveyed the levees this week.

Swampy soil

The Lakefront area used to be a swamp, and was filled over the decades as development advanced northward toward Lake Pontchartrain. But the soft swamp and river soils — layers of mud, peat, sand and silt — remain under the surface and can pose problems for those trying to anchor structures in them. The normal solution, engineers say, is to drill piles as deep as possible so that they go all the way through weak layers and are more firmly anchored.

The contractor who built the 17th Street Canal reported problems drilling the sheet pilings in the soil. Segments of the wall leaned slightly when the concrete was poured, according to a legal ruling in a contract dispute over the matter. An administrative law judge ruled that was because of the unusual bracing system used to build the structure rather than unexpected soil conditions.

Bea said that while the investigators have theorized the corps missed the peat layer in soil tests before the wall was built, the data they now have shows the peat would be hard to miss.

"The soil profile that we've got in front of us is showing that peat layer is large in extent, not narrow. They are mapping it between multiple borings. My suspicion, or fear, that they had missed it between two borings is not justifiable. It looks like it's about a thousand feet wide. That used to be a swamp. We built levees and cut canals in it, but never went in there and took out the peat."

Soil tests indicate that a soft, spongy layer of swamp peat underneath the 17th Street Canal floodwall was the weak point that caused soil to move and the wall to breach during Hurricane Katrina, an engineer who has studied the data says. He said other data shows the same peat layer also runs under the London Avenue Canal breaches, above.

The Board of Commissioners
OF THE
Orleans Levee District

10761 PERKINS ROAD, SUITE A
BATON ROUGE, LA 70810
TEL. 225-763-2040

October 6, 2005

Ms. Anne Soileau, Acting Director
Department of State Civil Service
P.O. Box 94111
Baton Rouge, Louisiana 70804-9111

Dear Ms. Soileau:

In accordance with Civil Service 17.8, the Board of Commissioners, Orleans Levee District is requesting approval to implement a furlough without pay for its employees who have not contacted our agency since Hurricane Katrina. The reason for this request is that we assume these employees may never report back to work, and we therefore do not wish to continue paying their salaries. We request the furlough apply to the Orleans Levee District, in the following geographic areas: Orleans Parish. We purpose the furlough for all the employees listed in this plan to begin on October 18, 2005 and end at close of business on November 29, 2005. This would equal 240 hours of furlough for all the affected employees.

Since we are not proposing the furlough of all of our employees, our agency asks for an exception to the regular layoff avoidance rules, as provided for by Civil Service Rule 17.5. We request that an exception to the rule 17.3 be approved, thus allowing our agency to furlough only those employees who have not contacted us since Hurricane Katrina. As a second part of this exception request, we propose to list the names of those who will be covered by this furlough measure, instead of those who will be excluded from it. The reason for this request is that this proposed list will be shorter than that of those who have contacted our agency since Hurricane Katrina.

In the event that any of the affected employees should contact our agency before the effective beginning date of the furlough, our agency will not include them in the furlough.

In the event that an affected employee(s) should contact our agency during the period of the furlough, our agency will place him or her on special leave, annual leave, or direct the employee back to work, instead of furloughing him or her. In this unprecedented type of furlough, we cannot foresee the recall schedule from furlough for these employees, since we do not know who may respond or when. Those not responding will be furloughed the entire period of time stated in this plan, and therefore, there will be no recall from furlough for them. Since the normal recall provisions stated in Civil Service Rule 17.8 are not applicable in this furlough, we ask for an exception to any specific recall schedule, subject to our planned actions stated above in this plan.

The employees and their job titles we are proposing for this furlough are as follows:

| Employees | Job Titles |
|---|---|
| Wayne Beaulieu | Mobile Equip. Master Mech. |
| Vanessa Coleman | Guard |
| Kevin Davis | Trades Apprentice |
| Raynetta Hammler | Police Officer 3 |
| Alvin Hartford | Mobile Equip Oper. 1 |
| Kevin Kazmierczak | Fireman Advanced |
| Stanley McRae | Laborer |
| Joseph Oliver | Bridge Operator 2 |
| Lester Rosiere | Mobile Equip. Master Mech. |
| James Watson IV | Laborer |

If you require additional information, please contact Cynthia C. Taylor, Human Resources Director at (225) 763-2062 or at ctaylor@orleanslevee.com at our agency.

Thank You Sincerely,
Max L. Hearn • Executive Director

The midnight curfew was killing his business, he said.

"There was no way we could have made it, money-wise," he said.

The new curfew marks a reversal of a midnight curfew Nagin said would be strictly enforced in the wake of a nationally televised beating by New Orleans police of a man on Bourbon Street.

Three police officers who punched and tackled 64-year-old Robert Davis, a retired teacher, have been charged with simple battery and suspended without pay, pending an inquiry. The officers charged Davis with public intoxication, resisting arrest and public intimidation. Both Davis and the officers have plead innocent.

Before the beating, the midnight curfew, as well as other, earlier curfews in the first days after Katrina, had been roundly ignored by many people, especially in the French Quarter. Some bars had stayed open, in their typical prestorm fashion, until the last paying customer walked out.

In recent days, many Bourbon Street bars have reopened in the Quarter, and some local staples have been open for weeks. Johnny White's never closed, and Molly's at the Market reopened immediately after the storm.

But many popular destinations for both locals and tourists, including Pat O'Brien's and the House of Blues, remain closed.

Eager to return to normal

Jim Monaghan Jr., proprietor of Molly's, said he has obeyed the midnight curfew since Nagin announced his intent to enforce it. But he and many of his patrons had planned to flaunt the curfew early today in protest.

"It was going to be a peaceful thing," Monaghan said of the planned protest, "nothing where anybody would be drug away in handcuffs right now, at least not at Molly's."

Monaghan said he had not coordinated with other bars in the Quarter but had heard that others would stay open, too. Residents also planned to sit on their stoops and balconies in defiance of curfew enforcement.

Monaghan vowed to abide by the new extended hours, however, which he called an acceptable short-term compromise. But bar owners are eager to return to the old status quo, he said — no closing time.

"It's a compromise for now, not forever," he said. "I want to know if this is going to last a month, if it's going to be forever. I just want to know. If it's forever, certainly that would change the face of New Orleans."

News of the extended curfew sparked a "yoo-hoo and yippee" from Coop's Place bar manager Fay Sanchez. "And it's the same from everybody here," she said.

Sanchez said Coop's has been obeying the midnight curfew but will stay open the extra two hours.

"I really didn't think it was going to happen until next week," she said.

Bernhardt, whose homes in Slidell and Biloxi, Miss., were destroyed by Katrina, said it is important for the mayor to support bar owners who responded to his request to reopen "to show the nation that New Orleans is going to make a comeback."

RECONNECTED

It may not be called the twin span any more, but the I-10 bridge is open again

By Meghan Gordon
St. Tammany bureau

As cars and trucks rumbled into New Orleans behind them, Gov. Kathleen Blanco and U.S. Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta on Friday praised the early completion of repairs to half of the Interstate 10 twin spans as a critical step in restoring commerce and residents to the metro area.

Traffic flowed in both directions across the former eastbound-only bridge, which sustained the least damage when Hurricane Katrina's tidal surge ripped entire 65-foot slabs off their supports.

Blanco said the state's $30.9 million contract with Boh Bros. Construction Co. to restore both bridges by mid-January represents a model for Louisiana to follow as it launches countless rebuilding projects. She said officials "cut through red tape" to secure the competitive bid within nine days of the storm. Crews were on the job within two weeks.

Boh Bros. will receive $1.1 million, the maximum incentive, for completing the 45-day project in 28 days.

"This is a magnificent milestone," Blanco said from atop a trailer bed parked across the closed westbound span south of Slidell. "Seven weeks ago, we would have never thought that we would have to be reopening this span that has connected our worlds so profoundly. We lost the momentum of our lives. It symbolized the separation that was created between St. Tammany Parish and Orleans and well beyond."

Mineta acknowledged that the severed interstate had crippled roadways in St. Tammany Parish, as traffic funneled onto the few remaining routes to New Orleans.

"The people of New Orleans and Slidell are getting more than their bridge back," Mineta said. "They are getting an end to detours, they are getting new opportunities for drivers and suppliers to come back into the Crescent City, and they are getting hope again that this city's rebirth will happen as fast and as sure as this bridge was repaired."

Behind the wheel of a sport utility vehicle, Blanco drove Mineta across the bridge from eastern New Orleans before the ceremony, during which she described the trip as the most "meaningful drive I've taken in my life." The pair greeted St. Tammany Parish President Kevin Davis and Slidell Mayor Ben Morris, who thanked the officials for the fast-track project that they said will alleviate significant daily traffic tie-ups.

STAFF PHOTO BY JOHN McCUSKER

Traffic was heavy Friday afternoon on both the repaired Interstate 10 span and the Highway 11 bridge, bottom. Gov. Kathleen Blanco said the state's $30.9 million contract with Boh Bros. Construction Co. to restore the twin spans by mid-January represents a model for Louisiana to follow as it rebuilds after Hurricane Katrina.

"It's going to be great getting some of the pressure relieved off Highway 11, Gause Boulevard and everywhere else," Morris told Mineta.

The contractor's next task will be to restore traffic to the 5.4-mile westbound bridge. The second phase's target completion date is Jan. 14, but Boh Bros. stands to gain the same bonus for early completion or face a daily $75,000 penalty for late work.

Project supervisor John Horn of Volkert Construction Services said the second phase is about 25 percent complete.

Sewage treatment plant getting back online

Partial processing of raw waste set to restart Sunday

By Joan Treadway
Staff writer

New Orleans' raw sewage, which has been dumped into the Mississippi River since shortly before Hurricane Katrina, will be partially treated before being released into the river starting Sunday, officials said.

Untreated sewage has been dumped into the river since Aug. 28, the day before Katrina hit, when high winds had kicked up and it was expected the east bank treatment plant would lose power, said Marcia St. Martin, executive director of the Sewerage & Water Board.

After the storm, the plant, which is in the Lower 9th Ward, not only lost power but also was heavily flooded after an Industrial Canal levee burst, said David J. Smith, southern regional vice president for Veolia Water, the Houston corporation that runs the plant under a contract with the board.

Both the board and the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency pressed the corporation to reactivate the plant, at 6501 Florida Avenue, as soon as possible.

As of Sunday, the plant will be sending water "that is partially treated and fully disinfected into the river," Smith said.

A temporary release of raw sewage is allowed during emergencies under the board's permit from the EPA, St. Martin said.

"It's a definite step forward," said Bill Honker, an EPA spokesman in New Orleans. Honker said the agency did not view the discharge into the river as a major problem because so few people were in the city. But as evacuees return and the population grows, he said, "There would have been an increased threat of health problems down the river."

The repairs that led to this development were accomplished with the help of the Navy, which airlifted equipment into and out of the site by helicopter because the plant was not reachable by road until this past Monday, he said. The Army Corps of Engineers also used all-terrain vehicles to move in equipment.

The project involved removing two 1,000-horsepower motors from the plant and sending them to be cleaned, Smith said. The motors drive the site's two largest pumps, which normally send fully treated water into the Mississippi.

By Friday, one motor had been returned to the plant and the other was expected to be back in place today, he said.

Each pump handles 60 million gallons of treated water a day, he said. The plant is designed to handle 122 million gallons daily, but this full capacity will not be required initially because so many residents remain displaced, he said. Even if one of the pumps fails to operate, the other one should still be able to meet the current need for 20 million gallons daily.

This first phase also involved bringing in two huge generators to power the pump's motors, because the plant still has no electricity, he said. The water sent into the river as of Sunday will have been disinfected through chlorination, and additionally, a small amount of human waste will have been removed.

In later phases, to be implemented in the next 60 days, all waste will be taken out of the water, he said.

The plant's three other smaller pumps also will be put back into operation, in a plan meant to coincide with the return of more evacuees.

Smith has presented the estimated cost of the whole job, $156 million, to St. Martin, who can now try to collect the sum from the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

British rations rejected for storm victims

Mad cow fears keep meals in cold storage

By Ceci Connolly
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — In the early days of September, as military helicopters plucked desperate New Orleanians from rooftops and Red Cross shelters swelled with the displaced, nearly 400,000 packaged meals landed on a tarmac at Little Rock Air Force Base and were whisked by tractor-trailer to Louisiana.

But most of the $5.3 million worth of food never reached the victims of Hurricane Katrina. Instead, because of fears about mad cow disease, the rations routinely consumed by British soldiers have sat stacked in a warehouse in Arkansas for more than a month.

Now, with some of the food set to expire in early 2006 and U.S. taxpayers spending $16,000 a month to store the meals, the State Department is quietly looking for a needy country.

In a disaster recovery effort that has been criticized as slow and inefficient, the long and costly journey of the British rations is a tale of good intentions colliding with a cumbersome bureaucracy.

No fewer than six federal agencies had a role in accepting, distributing and rejecting the food. Even now, there remains disagreement within the Bush administration about which office shipped the meals to 14 locations in Louisiana and which is responsible for paying the mounting storage fees.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency "knew from e-mails the stuff was moving out there, but we never had control or said anything about it," spokeswoman Kim Pease said. "It was under control of" the U.S. Agency for International Development, he said.

But USAID spokesman Kevin Sheridan said his agency simply provided logistical support, helping deliver to the Gulf Coast region foreign donations that were acquired by the State Department.

A spokesman for the British Embassy, citing diplomatic protocol in requesting anonymity, said he was puzzled by the turn of events.

"There was a specific request for emergency ration packs, and we responded to that," he said. "We had no reason to believe there would be a problem."

What is clear is that by late on Sept. 8, inspectors from the Agriculture Department halted distribution because the packaged meals violated import laws that "no beef or poultry of any kind is accepted from Great Britain," spokeswoman Terri Teuber said.

At the same time, it appeared the urgent need for food had subsided as evacuees reached shelters. "There is no question that different consideration would have been given to the situation if people were going hungry," Teuber said.

Catastrophic plan to take effect Dec. 1

ating officer installed by turnaround firm Alvarez & Marsal, said the plan is a financial compromise, allowing the severely cash-strapped district to continue functioning and, it is hoped, open some schools without leaving its employees out in the cold.

The catastrophic plan would not require employees to pay any premiums, but individuals who seek medical attention or get prescriptions would be responsible for the first $5,000, and families would have to pay the first $10,000. Under the current plan, employees pay $15 to visit a doctor's office and up to $45 for prescriptions.

Continuing the current plan for all employees would cost the district $3.6 million a month, compared with $1.9 million a month the district will spend on the catastrophic plan.

Initially unsatisfied with the catastrophic plan, board members asked George and other officials last week to offer another alternative, despite warnings that the delay would inhibit the district from beginning the less-expensive plan Nov. 1 and thereby cost the district an extra $1.7 million.

On Friday, board members ended up rejecting the alternative, a self-insured plan they deemed too costly and problematic, and unanimously approved the catastrophic plan. That plan covers employees through June 30.

Teachers union President Brenda Mitchell has said the plan is not reasonable or affordable for employees.

A sudden infusion of federal money could always allow the district to return its furloughed employees to their current health plan, but counting on that money is a gamble, George said, that could hamper the district's ability to reopen schools if the money does not come.

Also Friday, George said the decision to charter all 13 West Bank schools would not help nor hinder the district's financial picture, although several voiced opposition.

The district would continue to own school buildings and be responsible for their condition, George said, and lease them at no cost to the charters. A new board overseeing the schools would initially be populated by School Board members, who would eventually rotate off in favor of members of the Algiers community.

Mitchell, for one, said the district ought to put a moratorium on any more charters, saying that although she supports them, "I think we're rushing into this."

Florida Woods, president of the district's principals association, accused "some of you board members" of "taking advantage of a tragedy to wrest control of our schools."

Moran, who said she has received enthusiastic praise and criticism alike for the effort, said the movement was primarily designed to take advantage of a recently announced $20.9 million federal grant to expand, repair and create charter schools.

Although interim Superintendent Ora Watson said she "resents" suggestions that "schools could not open if not for chartering," George said at a meeting last week that the district had about $74.5 million on hand but needed $209 million to open schools on the West Bank.

The district's tentative plan to open seven schools on the east bank in January will similarly rely on the federal government lifting restrictions on $61 million in grants the district has been awarded. The district also is desperately hoping state lawmakers gathering next month do not decide to shift $16.5 million New Orleans receives each month through the Minimum Foundation Program to other districts that have enrolled thousands of the city's students.

However, more east bank charters are reportedly already in the works and could upend that plan in the weeks or months ahead. Two board members considered swing votes on the issue also indicated a willingness to consider more.

Board member Heidi Daniels, who voted for the West Bank charter plan last week, said she could support more if she is satisfied with their curriculum and staffing plans. Phyllis Landrieu, who walked away from her seat and did not vote last week, said she was initially miffed by the lack of advance warning she had, but is now "comfortable" with the plan and willing to consider other charters even though they are "not the only way" to go.

In another matter, George said the state's contract with Alvarez & Marsal, the New York turnaround firm brought in to take over the district's troubled finances before the storm, will be shortened from two years to 18 months — ending in December 2006 — although they will still do the same amount of work.

Hurricane Katrina has required the company to bring in more staff and expand its duties, including managing claims to insurance companies and the Federal Emergency Management Agency and overseeing repairs or construction of new schools, he said.

FEMA could reimburse $4.2 million of Alvarez & Marsal's costs, George said.

Unmanned pumps political powder keg

LEVEE, from A-1

Blanco. He also criticized Bossetta for failing to inform him that Metairie was flooding after Katrina passed Aug. 29.

Bossetta suggested at a levee board meeting Oct. 4 that the levee district take responsibility for pump stations to ensure they are staffed during hurricanes. He said pump workers are essential employees who should be required to remain at their posts, or at least be sheltered nearby, so they can return quickly after a storm subsides.

When he found out Friday, through rumor rather than official channels, that he would be removed, Bossetta redoubled his critique of the Broussard administration.

"Everyone makes mistakes. The mark of a true leader is admitting his mistake," Bossetta said. "The mistake was sending the pump station personnel out of East Jefferson. The half truths being perpetrated on the citizens of Jefferson by the emergency operations center under the direction of Aaron Broussard are truly a travesty."

Levee board members are appointed by the governor, four of them on recommendation of East Jefferson legislators and one — in this case, Bossetta — on recommendation of the parish president. Bossetta was first appointed under Parish President Tim Coulon's administration and was reappointed after Broussard succeeded Coulon in 2004.

Broussard said Bossetta did not call to warn him about flood-water rushing into Old Metairie from New Orleans on Aug. 30, after the breach developed on the New Orleans side of the 17th Street Canal. In his statement, Broussard said he was "shocked" that he had to hear about the plundering waters from residents who called Jefferson's emergency operations center in Marrero.

Aaron Broussard
'I have lost confidence in Mr. Bossetta's leadership ability'

"I believe Mr. Bossetta failed miserably in his primary fiduciary responsibility to protect the citizens of East Jefferson," Broussard's statement said. "His failure, in my opinion, constitutes gross negligence. I have lost confidence in Mr. Bossetta's leadership ability, and we are still in hurricane season."

Broussard also said that the sandbags placed on Airline Drive to dam the waters from New Orleans were placed there under his orders, rather than those of Bossetta.

Bossetta said he has no doubt that he was removed because of the criticism he lobbed at the administration, not for his failure to communicate during the disaster.

Greg Buisson, a political consultant to Broussard, said Bossetta was venturing "outside of his jurisdiction" when he proposed that the levee district take control of the pump stations, owned and operated by parish government.

Bossetta continued to lay blame for the flooding at the feet of Broussard, saying active pumps would have kept the parish dry because Katrina brought limited rainfall and the levees all held firm within Jefferson Parish.

"Our levees, although they do need additional height, would hold and indeed did hold," Bossetta said. "I am proud of the East Jefferson Levee District maintenance and police departments, who unselfishly did a heroic job during the events of Katrina and Rita."

Broussard administration officials said this week they are not prepared to draw conclusions about why East Jefferson flooded.

The governor has not yet decided whether to remove Bossetta. Bourgeois, the replacement put forward by Broussard, is a former executive director of the levee district.

Alan Alario, another member of the levee board, would not comment on Bossetta's removal, except to say, "Now is the time for recovery. It's not the time for politics."

Many state employees could face job loss

Health plans might be cut by $1 billion

By Jan Moller
Capital Bureau

BATON ROUGE — More than 18,000 state employees could lose their jobs and nearly $1 billion could be cut from health-care programs for Louisiana's poorest citizens as the state scrambles in the months ahead to balance a budget devastated by the impact of hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Commissioner of Administration Jerry Luke LeBlanc said the state's $7.2 billion general fund could face a $1.5 billion shortfall this year as sales, income, corporate and other taxes fall far short of projections made before the storms. The overall state budget is $18.7 billion, which includes federal dollars, fees and other income.

"Please understand, we are not here to create a gloom-and-doom scenario. The numbers are the numbers," LeBlanc told the Joint Legislative Committee on the Budget.

The presentation was the most detailed account to date of how the storms are likely to affect the state budget, detailing how much would have to be carved from every state agency and laying out a step-by-step plan for how the cuts would be implemented.

Jerry Luke LeBlanc
Official fingers hurricane impact

The scenario presented to legislators assumes that $1.5 billion would need to be trimmed from the general fund, but the exact amount of the shortfall won't be determined until the state's revenue forecasting panel meets later this year.

The biggest hit

Under LeBlanc's projections, the biggest hit would come to health-care programs, mainly Medicaid, which would lose about $301 million in general-fund dollars and almost $1 billion when matching federal financing is included; education would be trimmed by $280 million and social services would face a $43 million cut.

Everything from road maintenance and termite protection to child welfare and job-training program would eventually fall under the ax. "We have a state government to manage; it is in trouble and we have some tough decisions ahead of us," LeBlanc said.

If state agencies decided to lay off employees to make up the shortfall, 18,186 workers would lose their jobs. The actual toll would likely be less severe, as an estimated 6,000 of the state's 85,469 employees still have not reported for work since the storms and are in danger of being furloughed.

If the forecasting panel declares that the budget is in deficit, Gov. Kathleen Blanco has the authority to trim about $308 million through across-the-board cuts to state agencies without seeking approval from the Legislature. The state also could tap one-third of its rainy-day fund, or $153 million, through a two-thirds ballot by the Legislature without going into session.

Special session?

After that, a special session will be required to make additional cuts and to borrow the balance of the rainy-day fund. If Blanco makes all the cuts she is authorized to make, and the state taps the entire rainy day fund plus a $150 million projected surplus from the fiscal year that ended June 30, the Legislature would still need to trim more than $581 million to balance the books.

Blanco has called a 13-day special session of the Legislature starting Nov. 6 to address storm-related issues, but major decisions on state spending are not expected to come until lawmakers meet again in a second special session that's expected to convene in January.

Some lawmakers said the state shouldn't wait that long to start making deep cuts. "Every month we wait it becomes a bigger percentage of the budget," Rep. Steve Scalise, R-Jefferson, said.

LeBlanc's projections are preliminary, and assume that the state won't be getting additional dollars from the federal government. It also doesn't account for new costs that might be associated with the storm. The state Department of Health and Hospitals, for example, has projected that 60,000 people could be added to the Medicaid rolls because of the storm. It also does not account for costs the state would incur if it began to furlough its workers, who would then be eligible for unemployment and other benefits.

Sen. Jay Dardenne, R-Baton Rouge, said the Legislature should start the entire budget process anew, with different priorities, rather than simply making cuts to existing programs."

Although program cuts are virtually certain, another possibility for the state is to borrow money to make up some — or all — of the shortfall. Although the state typically sells bonds only to finance infrastructure projects such as roads and government buildings, the state Constitution allows the state to incur debt "if the funds are to be used to repel invasion; suppress insurrection; (or) provide relief from natural catastrophes."

LeBlanc said he doesn't think it's feasible to cut $1.5 billion in what's left of the fiscal year. "I do not believe that at the end of the day . . . that in one-half of a fiscal year that you can cut this amount of money and not effectively shut down the entirety of state government."

Hundreds file for bankruptcy since Oct. 1

By The Associated Press

BATON ROUGE — Hundreds of Louisiana residents hit by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita have flocked into bankruptcy court to seek protection from debtors.

In the New Orleans-based federal bankruptcy court of the Eastern District of Louisiana, 439 claims were processed on Wednesday, making 1,554 since Oct. 1. That's a tenfold increase from last year.

"Unfortunately, it's been especially busy in the last two weeks," Baton Rouge lawyer Bruce Deuhne said. "A lot of these people are so confused. We're still seeing people show up and they're hit with huge losses from the hurricane, and then with huge losses from the financial consequences."

Louisiana's three district bankruptcy offices have processed 28,604 bankruptcy filings since Jan. 1, which is more than all of 2004.

"The debtor lawyers that I know, and I know most in the state, are very, very busy," said David Rubin, who chairs the Baton Rouge Bar Association's bankruptcy law section.

Casino storm tax break blasted

65 in House sign letter to president

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Sixty-five members of the U.S. House of Representatives are asking President Bush to exclude gambling facilities from the list of Gulf Coast businesses eligible for tax breaks aimed at boosting rebuilding efforts after Hurricane Katrina.

The 51 Republicans and 14 Democrats who signed the letter to Bush — none from the Louisiana delegation — said that most casinos are hugely profitable and carry insurance, making government assistance a luxury at a time the priority should be help the most "needy and the vulnerable" victims of the hurricane.

"With budget deficits growing to historic levels, we need to make sure tax dollars are going to those who truly need the government's help," lawmakers said in the letter put together by Rep. Frank Wolf, R-Va., a longtime gambling foe. "Tax beaks for the gambling industry do not make sense."

Frank Fahrenkopf, president and CEO of the American Gaming Association, said getting casinos back and operating in Louisiana and Mississippi is critical to reviving the economies of the two states.

"From the governors to state legislators to mayors and city council members, every individual political leader tasked with rebuilding their state and communities will tell you the Gulf Coast's recovery is directly linked with the full recovery of the gambling industry," Fahrenkopf said.

Nagin pushes casinos

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin has proposed an expansion of gambling in his city that would allow hotels with 500 or more rooms to offer casino gambling, although opposition from Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco and others make the proposal a long shot.

The debate over the next phase of financing for hurricane recovery efforts will occur amidst intense discussions about budget cuts and deficit reduction. Proposals include trimming another $15 billion from federal benefits programs such as Medicaid, food stamps and farm subsidies on top of the $35 billion in reductions incorporated in an earlier House budget plan.

Some Democrats have suggested temporarily pushing aside tax cuts enacted during President Bush's first term, or at least putting off votes on proposals to make some of those cuts permanent and perhaps eliminating cuts that have not yet been implemented. Most Republicans are expressing a preference for spending cuts.

House GOP leaders have rejected a proposal to delay implementation of next year's prescription drug benefit for the nation's 41 million Medicare recipients, but have expressed support for an across-the-board 2 percent cut in discretionary spending.

While arguing that everything should be on the table to help avoid significantly adding to the federal deficit, Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, said tax cuts as the best way to keep the national economy strong and promote business investment in the Gulf Coast.

Jindal hopeful

Jindal expressed hope that the need to help deal with rising costs of Katrina relief, and the ongoing war in Iraq, will spur serious discussions about Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid reform that that can generate big savings, without necessarily cutting benefits.

But the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities said that the Republicans are disproportionately targeting programs that benefit the poor and middle class in its grab bag of Katrina spending offsets. It said that the conservative House Republican Study Committee would trim $375 billion over 10 years, or about 40 percent of its proposed budget cuts, on programs that primarily benefit low income Americans.

"The cuts proposed in Medicaid and other low-income programs would significantly reduce aid to the most vulnerable Americans, while cuts in programs such as Medicare and school lunches would reach into the pockets of millions of Americans who are not affluent," the Center said in a recent report.

The center said that Republicans could achieve $200 billion in budget savings over 10 years simply by canceling two tax cuts that overwhelmingly benefit wealthy Americans — one a repeal of a law that was to phase out personal exemptions for high-income taxpayers and the other a repeal of a measure that limits itemized deductions. The two tax cuts are scheduled to begin phasing in next year.

Leads GOP charge

Rep. Mark Pence, R-Ind., who is leading the GOP charge for spending reductions, said he has no doubt that canceling planned tax cuts, which he calls a tax increase, will slow the economy.

"Let us have the courage to make the tough choices to find the means to pay for the cost of Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath through reductions in government spending," he said.

National Urban League President Marc Morial, former mayor of New Orleans, in a speech at Georgetown Law School, said he might buy into the spending-cut philosophy if the Congress had imposed similar fiscal discipline when it cut taxes, and provided assistance for other disasters, including the destruction of the World Trade Center in the 2001 terrorism attacks.

"Katrina has given us an opportunity – not just to put up new buildings and stronger levees, as we must – but to put the principles that we have aspired to for so many years into real practice," Morial said of programs that will help tens of thousands of poor people achieve real economic opportunity.

Idaho senator says fraud part of La. culture

More lawmakers join debate on storm relief plan

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — A U.S. senator from Idaho is the latest to slam Louisiana's reputation for political corruption as Congress considers whether to spend billions of dollars on hurricane recovery.

Sen. Larry Craig, a Republican, told his home state constituents that fraud is as much a part of the fabric of Louisiana as it is in Iraq and that flooded sections of New Orleans should be abandoned.

"Fraud is in the culture of Iraqis. I believe that is true in the state of Louisiana as well," Craig was quoted as saying Thursday in the Lewiston (Idaho) Morning Tribune.

The McCall (Idaho) Star News, quoted him saying "Louisiana and New Orleans are the most corrupt governments in our country and they always have been. . . . A rookie cop in New Orleans, they pay him or her $17,000 starting pay and then wink and say you better make the rest of it on the street."

As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Craig is in a position to back up his opinions with actions by withholding support for hurricane-related spending.

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La. blasted Craig's comments as "old stereotypes" and "ignorant remarks." But Louisiana's sometimes shady political past has clearly become part of the hurricane-recovery debate in Congress.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., has urged his colleagues not to let Louisiana politicians get their hands on the $62 billion appropriated so far because of "mind-boggling incompetence" in dealing with the storm and Louisiana's "long history of corruption."

Earlier this week, Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, was slightly more diplomatic, but just as worried. Collins, chairwoman of the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs, urged Senate leaders to quickly take up legislation to strengthen oversight of hurricane-related spending. She said it is becoming "increasingly evident" that federal relief efforts are "vulnerable to widespread abuse and waste."

As Craig toured his state during the congressional recess, he also had some thoughts on redeveloping New Orleans that may be worrisome to people in flood-ravaged neighborhoods contemplating rebuilding.

The Morning Tribune quoted him as saying there is growing Senate support for abandoning whole sections of New Orleans flooded by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. He mentioned the Lower Ninth Ward as an example.

"I'm not humorous when I suggest we should turn it back to what it was, a wetland," Craig was quoted as saying.

The comment echoed a remark by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., in the days after Katrina hit Aug. 29. He said that whole neighborhoods of the city should be bulldozed.

Landrieu conceded that the state has a checkered political past, but also noted other states with ethically challenged politicians. She mentioned House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, who was recently indicted on money laundering and conspiracy charges.

She called Craig's references to the Ninth Ward, "absolutely offensive."

"I remain hopeful that these hurtful remarks were not reported as he intended," Landrieu said.

A Craig spokesman said Friday that the senator stands by the comments, but the spokesman added they weren't intended to reflect on Landrieu personally.

Generator safety study is planned

By The Associated Press

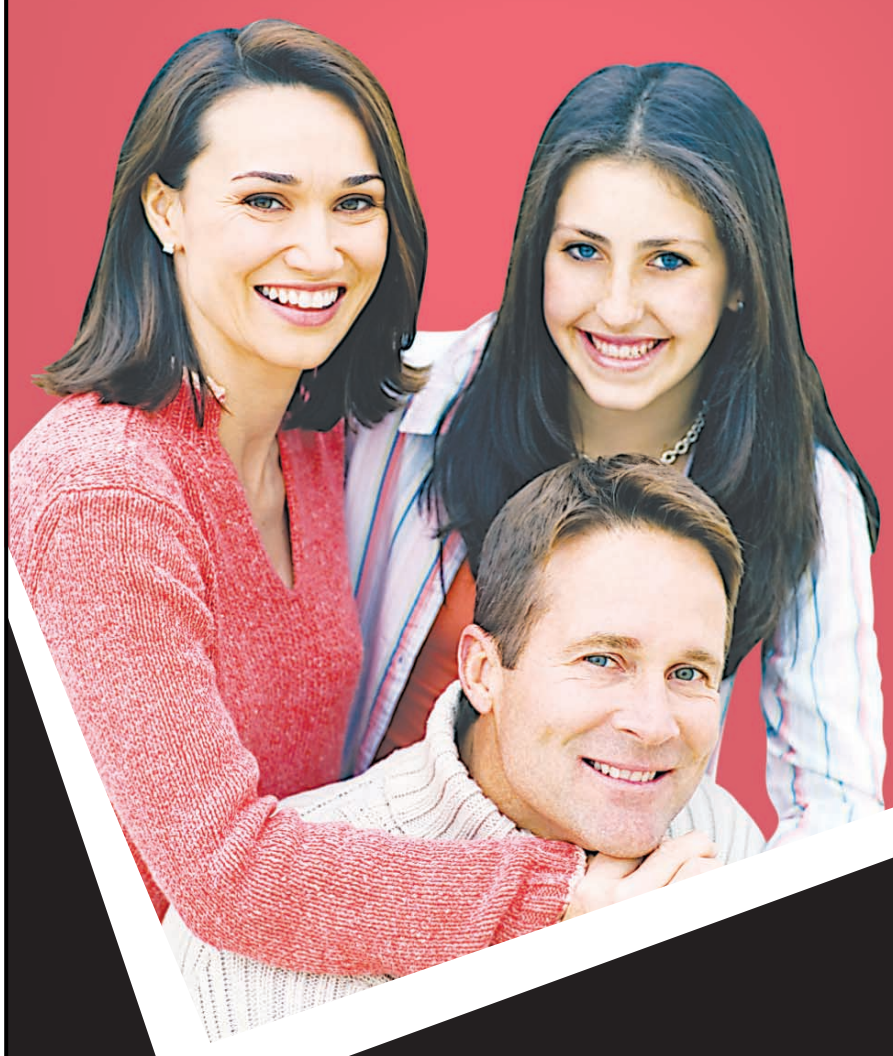
WASHINGTON — Investigators will look into improving generator safety after misuse of the portable power sources killed at least five people and sickened dozens more following Hurricane Katrina, the Consumer Product Safety Commission said Thursday.

Many Katrina victims relied on portable generators after the hurricane knocked out most of the power in the Gulf Region.



Portable generators can emit carbon monoxide, a colorless, odorless gas that can kill or severely poison those inhaling the gas in poorly ventilated areas.

Calling the investigation a priority, CPSC Chairman Hal Stratton in a statement directed his staff to "consider all potential methods for improving portable generator safety," including implementing an automatic cutoff that would shut down a generator when CO levels reach certain levels.

Iraq prepared him for St. Bernard

Parish hires expert in rebuilding cities

By Karen Turni Bazile
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

STAFF PHOTOS BY CHRIS GRANGER

Shirley Campbell, a resident of Arabi for about 50 years, asks David Dysart, right, which school he went to in St. Bernard Parish. Dysart, who is helping oversee the rebuilding of the parish, surprised her when he said he was from Kansas.

Davd Dysart, back right, sits at the head of a table during a meeting in a portable trailer with Phillip Truxillo, left, of Entergy, and Alan Abadie, right, with the St. Bernard Parish government. Dysart, who helped rebuild Fallujah, Iraq, as a Marine Corps officer, is now working as a civilian to help the parish rebuild after Hurricane Katrina.

U.S. Marine Reservist Lt. Col. David Dysart knows how to rebuild St. Bernard Parish – flooded rim to rim by Hurricane Katrina – because he's done it before.

Dysart was the man the U.S. military relied on the rebuild Fallujah, Iraq.

Sent to the parish as part of the military's support efforts in the immediate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, parish officials decided to keep Dysart after his military tour was complete.

"We hired him because of his experience," Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez said. "He's the only guy we know of who has experience putting a complete city back together."

Rodriguez said that Dysart, who now holds the position of the director of reconstruction for St. Bernard Parish, will help organize the recovery and ensure the parish gets proper federal aid and reimbursement.

"We wanted him longer, but he said all he needed is to be here for four months, and we will be able to run this ourselves," Rodriguez said.

Dysart, who served as the director for the Civil Military Operations Center in Fallujah, was charged with rebuilding the city that lies below sea level by the Euphrates River.

After armed forces overtook the city in November 2004, they cut electrical power and damaged pumping stations where insurgents were holed up.

Five days after the offensive started, Dysart, who was with the 4th Civil Affairs Group, began his efforts to rebuild the infrastructure in the city.

About 80 percent of Fallujah's 26,000 homes had been damaged, with 50 percent rendered uninhabitable by the offensive and flooding brought on when the pump stations stopped operating. Those housing statistics mirror St. Bernard.

Even with his experience in Iraq, Dysart called the destruction in St. Bernard "unsurpassed in this country. There are lots of comparisons to Fallujah. It sent chills down my arms when I first came here."

St. Bernard Parish Council Chairman Joey DiFatta said parish officials were so taken with Dysart's abilities that they asked him to join their team after his military tour ended.

They are paying him $10,000 a month, the same pay and benefits he received as a lieutenant colonel in the Marine Reserves, DiFatta said. The parish expects that money to be reimbursed by FEMA.

"We're proud to have him on board," DiFatta said. "His expertise will surely expedite" the process of rebuilding the parish and bringing back its residents.

Parish Chief Administrative Officer Danny Menesses said Dysart's newly created position is above all other parish departments.

"He is a facilitator and a tool to help me with all things that are not a normal part of operating government," Menesses said. "He is helping coordinate every aspect that comes with a disaster of this magnitude."

Dysart said the parish also has hired an outside disaster management company, Response Management Associates, to manage the mounds of federal and state assistance coming through the parish is such a short time.

Despite the accolades from officials, Dysart, 44, from Kansas City, Mo., is quick to deflect attention.

"I'm not down here to save the parish," Dysart said. "The parish is doing what needs to be done.

"They have an excellent vision for the future of the parish. They are fighting hard to make sure that this parish survives and has a rebirth for the future.

"My job is only to assist."

Many in N.O. plan to stay away, poll finds

40 percent of locals are tossing in towel

By Will Lester
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — Four in 10 residents of New Orleans who sought Red Cross help after Hurricane Katrina say they don't expect to return home — an exodus that could dramatically change that city, a poll of those hurricane survivors found.

Black residents were twice as likely as white ones to say they would not return. Almost nine in 10 whose homes are no longer livable say they don't expect to return, the CNN-USA Today-Gallup poll found.

The poll indicates tens of thousands of Gulf Coast-area residents are pondering whether to go back to their homes in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama or relocate, according to the poll released Thursday night. Two in 10 said they would definitely not or probably not return to the hurricane ravaged areas, while another 13 percent said they probably would return home.

The hurricane that leveled many coastal communities along the Gulf Coast and inundated New Orleans at the end of August has left many people still struggling to get a grip on their emotions, the poll found.

A majority of those polled said they still harbor feelings of depression, sadness, anger and stress more than a month after the hurricane hit. They were asked in an open-ended question what kind of emotions they have been feeling in recent days — and a fourth of those polled said they were feeling better or almost normal.

Asked how they felt when the hurricane hit, more than eight in 10 said their feelings ranged from terror to sadness to feeling anxious and lost.

Among the poll's other findings.

▶ Asked what helped them get through the hurricane and recovery period, people mentioned family most often, followed by faith.

▶ Three-fourths said they had feared for the life of elderly relatives as the storm moved through.

▶ Nearly four of 10 who had jobs are out of work.

▶ Half said they had feared for their own lives, and half said they had been separated for at least a day from a relative they had been living with.

▶ Four in 10 went without food for at least a day, and almost as many went without drinking water for a day.

▶ Almost half, 44 percent, of those who had been separated from family members said they were still separated from a member or members of their family.

▶ More than a third said they are having trouble sleeping and experiencing feelings of anxiety and depression.

▶ A third said their home was either destroyed or damaged so badly they couldn't live in it.

▶ Half of those polled said they were either living outside their own home — either with a friend or relative in a home or apartment rented after the storm, or in a motel or shelter.

The sample was drawn from a database of people who applied for help from Red Cross and interviews were done on landline phones and by cell phone.

The poll of 1,510 adults among the 470,000 who registered for help from the Red Cross was taken from Sept. 30-Oct. 9 and has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Houston school offers N.O. kids bit of home

More than 300 students attend New Orleans West

By Pam Easton
Associated Press writer

HOUSTON — Far from the French Quarter, children driven from New Orleans by Hurricane Katrina are doing their schoolwork amid reminders of home.

At New Orleans West, a charter school set up for storm victims in a small, once-shuttered brick elementary school, the student uniforms are the traditional Mardi Gras colors of purple, green and gold.

Towana Pierre-Floyd
'I have lost what they have lost, likely'

The school's symbol is a Texas Lone Star with a Louisiana fleur de lis in the middle. And the principal wants to find a Louisiana flag to fly atop the Texas flag.

More than 300 youngsters in kindergarten through eighth grade attend the school.

The teachers and administrators are also Katrina victims from New Orleans. Keeping New Orleans schoolchildren together, and matching them with teachers from their hometown, are seen as a source of comfort.

"It soothes me in a real sense to know that I can connect with those students. I am from where they are from. I have lost what they have lost, likely," said teacher Towana Pierre-Floyd, 22.

Many of the children are from the impoverished neighborhoods hit hard by Katrina.

Many of their homes were flooded, and many still don't know where some of their relatives and friends are. Their belongings are covered with mold, mildew and mud.

Like other students, Ceyonne Riley, 10, is using donated school supplies and backpacks.

"I don't want to start over, but now we have to," she said as she took a break from a culture class where students sang "Lean on Me."

Ceyonne proudly displayed one of her few possessions, a digital watch her mother recently bought her.

She knows of only one other student from her school in New Orleans who is in Houston with her. Other than that, she does not know where any of her classmates ended up, nor if they are OK.

The school 350 miles west of New Orleans tries to get the students to talk about Katrina and confront their anxieties, though the results are not always what teachers had in mind.

New Orleans West teacher Towana Pierre-Floyd, standing, works with students Monday in Houston. Pierre-Floyd, 22, was teaching in her native New Orleans before Hurricane Katrina struck. She now teaches at New Orleans West, a structured charter school set up for students and teachers displaced by the storm.

One teacher encouraged students to debate such issues as the federal government's response to Katrina. "It got out of hand," Principal Gary Robichaux said. "There was too much emotion.

"Once you opened the bottle, it all came out."

Teachers are now using other methods, including putting pictures of the flooded city on large pieces of butcher paper and allowing students to write down the feelings evoked by the images.

"I feel bad because my home is not the same," one student wrote about a picture of New Orleans under water.

Another wrote: "I cry some times."

"I feel sad for all the people," scribbled a third.

Dr. Britta Ostermeyer, a psychiatrist who directs a Harris County health program, said the school is a good idea for those planning to return to Louisiana.

"If you put the students with other students from New Orleans and their own teachers, in the short run, they are going to feel more supported and might have a better sense of belonging," she said. "They all feel, 'We are from New Orleans and are going to make it together.' "

But in the long run, if parents decide to stay in Houston, it would be better for the students to begin getting used to their new surroundings, she said.

The principal said many of the students plan to return to New Orleans.

But in the meantime: "They feel at home here. We went through the same thing they went through."

NYU is short 1 Olsen twin — for now

Compiled from wire reports

What would Bob Saget say about this?

Mary-Kate Olsen, who shared the role of Michelle Tanner with her twin sister, Ashley, on the '80s comedy "Full House," has left college — at least for now — early in her sophomore year.

"Mary-Kate Olsen has not dropped out, she has simply taken an approved leave of absence to devote more of her time and energy to her business," Olsen's publicist, Michael Pagnotta, told The Associated Press.

Mary-Kate Olsen
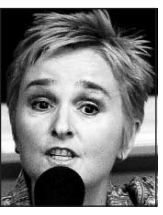
Taking time to focus on business

The 19-year-old actress' decision to take the leave of absence was reported Friday by People magazine on its Web site.

Mary-Kate wants "to focus on her increasing responsibilities as co-president of Dualstar Entertainment Group and to pursue personal interests," the magazine quoted Pagnotta as saying.



Ashley, also co-president of Dualstar, remains at New York University.

Pain puffed away

Melissa Etheridge says she smoked medicinal marijuana to help with the side effects of chemotherapy during her treatment for breast cancer.

The 44-year-old singer, who was diagnosed over a year ago, is now cancer-free.

"Instead of taking five or six of the prescriptions, I decided to go a natural route and smoke marijuana," Etheridge said in an interview to air Sunday on "Dateline NBC."

Melissa Etheridge
'I decided to go a natural route'

When asked how her doctors reacted, Etheridge said, "Every single one was, 'Oh, yeah. That's the best help for the effects of chemotherapy.' "

The singer says she smoked marijuana every day for her pain and symptoms and "the minute I didn't feel it, I stopped."

The use of marijuana with a doctor's recommendation is legal in California and nine other states, but is against federal law.

Grand tour guide

Ellen DeGeneres will get a fancy tour guide when she takes her talk show to Manhattan next month.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has agreed to show DeGeneres around the city during the comedian's Thanksgiving Week visit.

"We'll go see some theater, and we'll hang out and do some stuff there. We'll go to clubs," DeGeneres said during Thursday's taping of "The Ellen DeGeneres Show."

"You'll go to the clubs," Clinton replied.

DeGeneres also congratulated Clinton on her 30-year marriage to former President Clinton.

"He's the kind of person you really want to be married to for 30 years because he washes dishes," Clinton said.

Wed for a spell

Tori Spelling's husband has filed for divorce, a little more than a year after the couple married.

The couple separated last month. Actor-writer Charlie Shanian is seeking spousal support from Spelling, according to papers filed Thursday in Los Angeles Superior Court.

Spelling, best known for her role as Donna on TV's "Beverly Hills, 90210," met Shanian on stage in 2002 during the Los Angeles production of his romantic comedy "Maybe, Baby It's You."

Party on, Garth

Garth Brooks will be among the performers at the Grand Ole Opry's 80th birthday bash airing tonight from Nashville, Tenn., on the Great American Country network.

Brooks has performed at several charity events since he announced his retirement in 2000.

The singer, 43, remains retired from performing, but is participating in the 80th birthday celebration to pay tribute to the Opry and its heritage, the Grand Ole Opry said in a recent statement.

The lines approaching the Crescent City Connection toll booth are a little more congested than usual due to a variety of reasons attributed to Hurricane Katrina, including less staff to man the booths, the high-occupancy lanes being currently closed and the many new commuters without toll tags.

CCC traffic down, but backups aren't

By Paul Purpura
West Bank bureau

It flies in the face of reason that despite fewer vehicles crossing the Crescent City Connection this week, motorists are still seeing backups at the toll plaza in Algiers.

But that was the case, as bridge officials resumed toll collections Monday after six weeks of allowing motorists free passage because of Hurricane Katrina and the subsequent recovery operations.

"We expected less traffic," said Randy Paisant, assistant director of the Crescent City Connection. "We didn't expect this much backup."

Indeed, about 50,000 vehicles passed through the toll plaza Wednesday, but on a typical weekday before Katrina, the number was 90,000, Paisant said.

The blame lies in no one place, he said.

"Some of that may be attributed to out-of-town people," Paisant said. "They're not accustomed to the toll plaza. Some of this will settle down with time."

Toll tag use has dropped about 12 percent compared with pre-Katrina days, Paisant said. One explanation for this, he said, is that emergency vehicles that had toll tags don't have them now.

"We can move almost twice as many vehicles through the toll tag lanes than the cash lanes in an hour," Paisant said.

Exacerbating the delays, he said, are "inconsiderate" drivers who do not have toll tags but use the five toll-tag-only lanes to get close to the plaza and then cut into the cash lanes where the delays are longer. Out-of-town motorists unfamiliar with the plaza also find themselves unwittingly in the toll tag lanes and are forced to do the same, Paisant said.

While emergency vehicles get free passage, many such vehicles are unmarked, meaning toll collectors have to verify their status. For instance, many National Guard troops are using unmarked vehicles, he said.

Fewer toll collectors are working, meaning one manned booth is closed. Paisant said the bridge employed 41 toll collectors before Katrina, but only 20 are back at work. More employees want to return to work but are unable to because their homes were lost and they do not have temporary housing, Paisant said.

Fewer toll collectors are working, meaning one manned booth is closed. Paisant said the bridge employed 41 toll collectors before Katrina, but only 20 are back at work.

Meanwhile, the high-occupancy vehicle, or transit lanes, are closed because emergency communications equipment is located on the bridge.

Resuming toll collection was necessary because it is the sole source of revenue for operations and maintenance for the bridge and the U.S. 90 Business thoroughfare from Bridge City to Claiborne Avenue, Paisant said. Before the storm, the CCC collected roughly $50,000 a day, he said.

The state has an insurance policy that covers three weeks of revenue, less expenses, in the event that toll collection is suspended.

Evacuees in B.R. shelters are on the move again

Some like trailers, others long for home

By Laura Maggi
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Since Hurricane Katrina slammed into her hometown more than six weeks ago, Glenda Delay has sought refuge in three emergency shelters. With the shelter at Baton Rouge's River Center all but closing down Friday, she was on the move again, planning to take four young nieces on a bus trip to join her daughter in South Carolina.

"This is another place where we have to leave," Delay said Friday morning, leaning against a security barricade waiting for a ride to a local nonprofit agency to get money for the bus tickets. "I'm tired."

Officials had announced earlier this week that they would be closing what had been one of the largest evacuation shelters in the state, sending many residents to a newly created trailer park in Baker or, once that filled up, other nearby shelters.

By Friday afternoon, Baton Rouge city officials had determined that about 60 to 65 people could go to a Baker church shelter, while roughly 30 people categorized as "special needs" residents could stay at the River Center for the next few days. An aide to Baton Rouge Mayor Kip Holden said officials decided to keep the convention center open for those evacuees after a request from Vice Adm. Thad Allen, who is running the federal response to Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

The city is trying to get public facilities, as well as privately owned buildings that have been used as shelters by churches and other groups, back to their "intended functions," said Irma Plummer, the assistant chief administrative officer in the mayor's office.

There were still more than 1,700 people in Baton Rouge shelters Friday, compared to 6,700 people who were at the River Center alone in the immediate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. The number of people in shelters across the nation also has been rapidly shrinking, down to about 15,600 as of Friday, according to statistics kept by the state Department of Social Services.

Some shelter residents at the River Center chafed at having to be moved again, saying they did not want to take the trip 10 miles north of the city to Baker. Others were looking for more private accommodations, hoping to eventually get one of the travel trailers that are being put up around the city in parks by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Local officials said the 570-unit Baker trailer park has filled up, but another is under construction near the Baton Rouge airport and more are under consideration. Some people staying in Baton Rouge shelters have declined trailers in the area, saying they are hoping for housing closer to the New Orleans area.

For Donald Smith, the shelter at the Baker Municipal Auditorium wasn't such a bad move, although it was the third shelter he has been at since the storm. He left one in Arkansas a couple of weeks ago in an attempt to move closer to New Orleans.

The more bucolic setting of the Baker shelter — next to a small park and the local library — seemed an improvement from the sprawling convention center in downtown Baton Rouge.

"It's a pretty nice place," said Smith, 47, who noted that younger evacuees might be frustrated with the more suburban atmosphere in Baker.

Even John Hubbard, a Lower Ninth Ward resident who had vowed for several days not to move to a Baker shelter, said he liked his new surroundings, even if it is yet another emergency shelter. "I changed my mind. I like Baker," said Hubbard, pointing to the park with picnic benches.

Delay, who lived in the Carrollton area, said she is hoping her trip to South Carolina will be temporary and she can make one last trip — back to New Orleans.

Her daughter, who has been staying in a hotel, plans to move into an apartment this weekend. They will live there for a while, but Delay said she hopes to return to the city in a few months once it is more suitable for children.

LaPlace man, 21, held in nightclub shootings

By Allen Powell II
River Parishes bureau

St. John the Baptist Parish deputies have booked a LaPlace man with attempted first-degree murder in connection with two shootings at a Reserve nightclub on Oct. 8.

Lorenzo Eugene, 21, of 1508 Lafreniere St., is accused of shooting a 17-year-old man and a 25-year-old man at Dreams Nightclub on River Road. Eugene has been booked with attempted first-degree murder, aggravated battery, illegal use of weapons and aggravated obstruction of a highway or commerce. Eugene is being held at the Sherman Walker Correctional Facility in LaPlace in lieu of $350,000 bond.

According to sheriff's reports, Eugene and several of his friends approached the 17-year-old victim outside the nightclub shortly after 1 a.m. and got into an altercation with him because he was a resident of Garyville. The victim was struck once in the mouth with a gun and then shot once in his left side when he attempted to flee. The victim was able to make it to the front of the nightclub before he collapsed and was taken to River Parishes Hospital.

The 25-year-old man was shot in the thigh by what appears to have been a stray bullet while he stood near the bar inside of the club. That victim, who was not involved in the altercation, was also taken to River Parishes Hospital for treatment.

Maj. Mike Tregre, a spokesman for the Sheriff's Office, said deputies were able to apprehend Eugene thanks to witness descriptions. Deputies are still searching for several other suspects, although Tregre would not release their names or say how many of them are being sought.

Registrar moves to Clearview Mall

East Jefferson bureau

Residents from anywhere in Louisiana may register to vote, or change their registration to reflect post-Katrina addresses, beginning Monday at Clearview Mall in Metairie.

The service is available weekdays from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. at a temporary site set up in the center of the mall by the Jefferson Parish registrar of voters. Registrar Dennis DiMarco moved his east bank operations to the mall after Hurricane Katrina damaged his suite at the Joseph S. Yenni Building in Elmwood.

The registrar's West Bank office at 5001 West Bank Expressway in Marrero remains open for these and other services.

Rescuers end their search for victims of earthquake

As hope fades, toddler found alive in rubble

By Zarar Khan
Associated Press writer

MUZAFFARABAD, PAKISTAN — Rescue workers abandoned the search Friday for survivors trapped in the rubble of last week's earthquake, although individual efforts continued, with an 18-month-old girl pulled alive from the ruins of her home.

A top U.N. official warned that reconstruction of the devastated region will cost billions of dollars and take as long as a decade. Weather forecasters said heavy rains expected in the quake zone this weekend could disrupt efforts to provide food and shelter to an estimated 2 million people ahead of the harsh Himalayan winter.

With Pakistan's death toll from the Oct. 8 earthquake estimated at more than 35,000, Jan Egeland, the U.N. undersecretary-general and emergency relief coordinator, said the search-and-rescue phase was over.

"It's a cruel reality," he said. "But after a week, very few people survive."

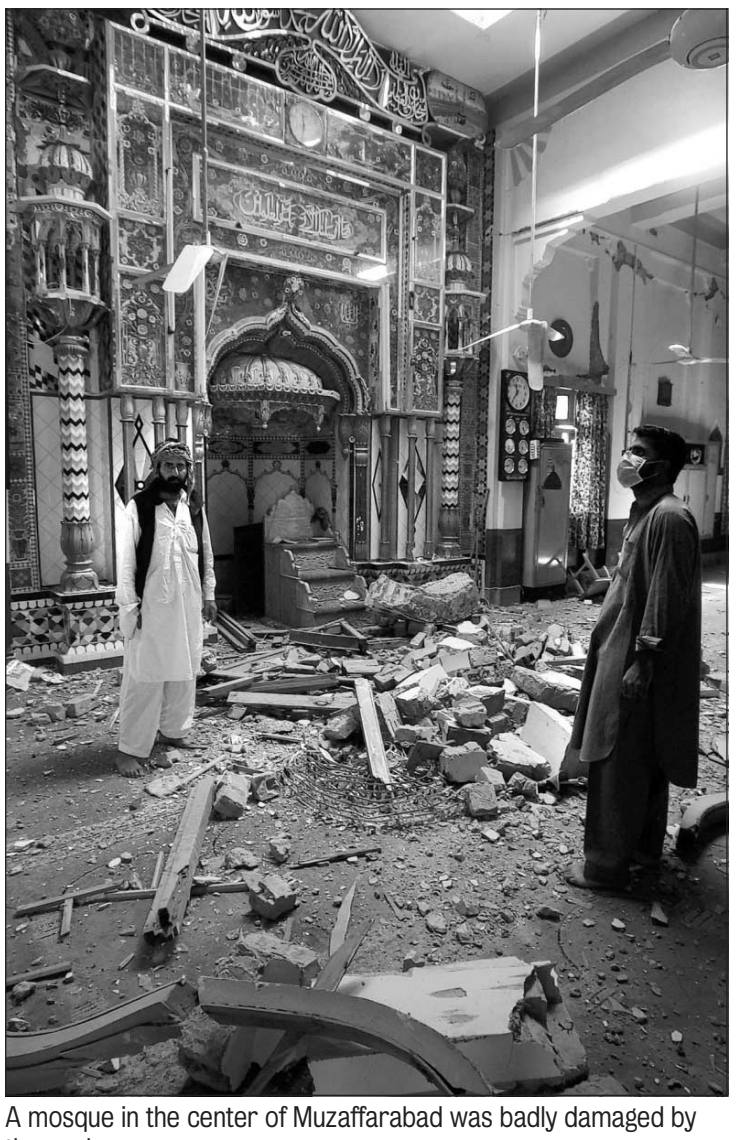
Still, a doctor, Mazhar Hussain, told Pakistan's GEO television and the British Broadcasting Corp. that his rescue team had pulled the toddler, unconscious but alive, from under the door of her collapsed house, which had protected her. Her mother and two brothers were found dead nearby, but her father survived.

"Her right hand is broken, and she has a fracture in her left leg," he said on GEO, speaking from Balimang, where the girl was found.

Egeland, who traveled to hard-hit areas, said he feared bottlenecks of relief supplies.

"If we don't work together, we will become a disaster within a disaster," he said. He said it would take billions of dollars and "five to 10 years" to rebuild.

In Islamabad, police launched a criminal investigation into the collapse of a 10-story luxury residence that was the capital's only structure to fall in the magnitude-7.6 quake, killing at least 40 residents.



"We will arrest all those who didn't perform their duty well," said the city police chief, Sikandar Hayat. "They might be the builders, contractors or supervisors."

Most of Pakistan's deaths were in the divided Himalayan region of Kashmir, where snow has started to fall in some areas.

AP PHOTOS

People affected by the devastating Oct. 8 earthquake gather for the distribution of aid in Muzaffarabad, Pakistan, on Friday. The death toll from the quake in Pakistan is estimated at more than 35,000.

A mosque in the center of Muzaffarabad was badly damaged by the quake.

India has reported more than 1,350 deaths in the portion of Kashmir it controls.

Mohammed Hanif, a senior meteorologist in Islamabad, said rain was expected in Kashmir and other parts of Pakistan over the next day.

"Rains with thunderstorms will definitely disrupt relief operations in earthquake-hit areas," he said.

Earlier this week, rains and hailstorms grounded helicopters flying food and other supplies to devastated areas.

Many exhausted relief workers dealt with the added burden of fasting during the day for the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

Water and electricity were restored to parts of Muzaffarabad, a Kashmiri city of 600,000 in the heart of the quake zone. Authorities were working to bring power back to outlying villages.

The country's relief commissioner, Maj. Gen. Farooq Ahmad Khan, said Pakistan expected to get 2 million blankets and 100,000 large tents before the onset of winter. He said 200,000 houses had been destroyed.

UNICEF said the international relief effort must focus on helping children at risk of death from cold, malnutrition and disease. The U.N. agency said it was sending high protein bars, boots and sweaters for children, blankets, water containers, plastic tarpaulins, tents and medical supplies.

Pakistani military helicopters and copters from other countries flew in and out of a sports stadium in Muzaffarabad, where a temporary hospital had been set up. The helicopters ferried aid workers to isolated villages, including those in the Neelum and Jehlum valleys, and brought back hundreds of injured people.

Pakistan's information minister, Sheikh Rashid Ahmed, said helicopters from other nations had helped save 6,000 injured people by ferrying them to hospitals. On Friday, 45 helicopters flew a total of 80 sorties, he said.

The U.S. military has deployed 13 helicopters to Pakistan, and has been dropping relief supplies by air from C-130s. It also prepared to send a 36-bed Mobile Army Surgical Hospital from Germany, as well as a water purification crew.

Earthquake victim, Abdul Razak, 10, from Kashmir, recovers from having his left arm amputated at a hospital in Rawalpindi, Pakistan, on Friday. Dozens of Pakistani earthquake victims have lost limbs because of delays in getting the injured from isolated villages to a place with proper health care.

Amputations are widespread amid quake

Most unable to get the proper treatment

By Matthew Pennington
Associated Press writer

RAWALPINDI, PAKISTAN — Thirteen-year-old Riffat Nazir's right leg was trapped under the door frame when last weekend's quake brought her family's two-story mud house down around her in Kashmir.

It took three days for her family to dig out their dead and give them a proper Muslim burial, and three more before they could transport the girl to a hospital near the Pakistani capital. By then, doctors had no choice but to amputate.

Dozens of Pakistani quake victims have lost limbs because of delays in getting the injured from isolated villages to a place with proper health care.

At Rawalpindi General Hospital, where Nazir was recovering Friday from the operation to amputate her right leg below the knee, surgeons have performed more than 200 major operations in the past six days, mostly on patients suffering crushed limbs.

Helicopters have transported a flood of patients from the quake zone to the north, where few hospitals were left standing after last Saturday's 7.6-magnitude temblor. Rawalpindi's three main hospitals and three others in nearby Islamabad have been choked by the crisis.

"The patients are coming late and suffering gangrene in their wounds," said Dr. Kamran Saeed, an orthopedic surgeon who had performed eight of the 25 or so amputations carried out at Rawalpindi General in recent days.

"You cannot save the leg or arm. You have to save the life of the patient," he said.

Injured people stranded in remote villages in the mountains of Kashmir and many outlying areas — where thousands have died — have seen no rescue workers. They often have had to rely on relatives carrying them for hours on foot to have a chance of survival.

Riffat's mother, Rahila Bibi, said that in their village of Hollian, all 60 houses were toppled by the quake, killing about 100 people. Bibi lost two sisters and more than 25 relatives in all. Two other sisters were injured and remain stranded in the village.

"The house was demolished. The cattle are dead, and we have nothing to live on. Everything is destroyed," said Bibi, wiping tears from her tired eyes with the colored shawl that was coiled loosely around her head.

Villagers using simple tools and their bare hands toiled six hours to free Riffat from beneath the heavy baked mud and timber of the simple five-room house.

It took another three days to locate all the family's dead relatives and bury them quickly — regarded as a spiritual necessity for Muslims.

Finally, six villagers helped carry Riffat 15 hours on a charpoy — a traditional rope-mattress bed that sits outside many homes in rural Pakistan — to the nearest town on a narrow dirt road blocked by landslides.

After that, they traveled by vehicle for another five hours to the main city in Pakistan's part of Kashmir, Muzaffarabad, where after a day's wait, a foreign helicopter brought the girl and her mother to the hospital in Rawalpindi. A day later, she underwent an operation.

Now Riffat lies recovering in bed, blood dripping into her veins from an IV bag and a gray teddy bear at her bedside. She'll spend the next two weeks at least in the hospital and will be fitted with a prosthesis after the wound fully heals in six to nine months.

All but the maternity and pediatric wards at Rawalpindi General have been devoted to the quake emergency — the worst crisis to test the hospital since 1988, when an ammunition dump in this garrison city exploded, killing hundreds.

While the flow of patients slowed Friday compared to previous days, beds for arriving quake victims were still spilling out into the reception area. Doctors, assisted by medical students, have been working around the clock, sleeping when they can.

Saeed said the general emergency care given to patients brought from the quake zone had been "excellent," although sometimes overtight bandaging and tourniquets by inexperienced medics — without clinic or hospital buildings to work in — have made things worse, obstructing the flow of blood to a wounded limb.

So far, the hospital has treated 947 patients from the earthquake, of which only two have died, said Dr. Shahzad Rehan, the medical superintendent. He expected more amputations would be necessary as others victims like Riffat finally arrive at the hospital.

Muslims in region take comfort in faith

BALAKOT, PAKISTAN — On prayer mats set atop the roof of one flattened mosque, the men bowed their heads in silence, seeking solace amid the rubble.

For devout Muslims in the quake-ruined town of Balakot, it was the first time Friday prayers had been held since last weekend's devastating quake. They came by the hundreds — some carrying shovels, some wearing face masks — all looking for spiritual comfort.

"God is angry with me, but I cannot be angry with him," said Fazlur Rahman, 67, who lost his daughter in the disaster. "This is a test of my faith. I have nothing else."

His weather-beaten face crumpled with pain as he talked about his 25-year-old daughter, Shaziya, who was buried under the debris when their home buckled under the 7.6-magnitude quake, which killed an estimated 35,000 people in Pakistan.

"She had asked me to bring her something to eat. I walked away only a moment when everything collapsed. She didn't even have time to cry out. I rushed back to her and shouted her name, but there was no reply," he said, thrusting his scarf into his mouth to muffle his sobs.

He came alone to the Syed Ahmed Shaheed Mosque, now a pile of twisted pylons and smashed concrete on the banks of the Kunhar River.

"The prayers satisfy me," he said. "They lessen my pain."

In Balakot, a town of about 60,000 people that was largely leveled by the quake, survivors have little else to cling to but their faith. Once a picturesque spot at the foot of the mountains that drew local tourists, the town has few buildings standing whole and none of its mosques left.

Despite the devastation, the devout arrived in the hundreds for Friday prayers.

The Uniform Hazardous Waste Manifest rules by USEPA/USDOT shall become effective September 5, 2006. The Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality (LDEQ) will no longer have authorization to require hazardous waste handlers to acquire from LDEQ and use the Louisiana Uniform Hazardous Waste Manifest. After the effective date of the new manifest rules (September 5, 2006), Uniform Hazardous Waste Manifest forms must be obtained only from EPA-registered and approved sources. These sources must apply for registration by submitting the required information regarding the strict manifest form printing and tracking requirements specified by the new rule and then obtain express authorization by the EPA to be a manifest form printer/provider. The LDEQ will not become an EPA manifest form printer/provider. However, the LDEQ has anticipated the need for Louisiana Uniform Hazardous Waste Manifest forms based on previous order statistics and will have supplies up to the rule effective date of September 5, 2006. Until the effective date of the new rule, LDEQ will continue to make its current supply of manifest forms available to hazardous waste handlers that must use the forms in compliance with the applicable regulations in LAC 33:Part V, Louisiana Hazardous Waste Regulations. If these supplies become exhausted before the effective date of the new rule, LDEQ will refer hazardous waste handlers' requests for manifest forms to any other available source that provides manifest forms under its authorization and regulations, i.e., EPA, other authorized manifest state, EPA-approved new manifest form supplier, etc. After the effective date of the new rule (September 5, 2006), the LDEQ will refer manifest form requests to the EPA registry of approved new manifest form providers/printers.

You may access the Federal Register, 70 FR 10814 (March 4, 2005), to read the complete final rule. Contact Mr. James Miller, Office of Environmental Services, for further information at 225-219-3245 or James.Miller@la.gov.

IX:6901, 6903, 6905, 6907,
6909, 6911, and 7135 (OS066E)

In accordance with the emergency provisions of R.S. 49:953(B) of the Administrative Procedure Act, which allow the Department of Environmental Quality to use emergency procedures to establish rules, and of R.S. 30:2011 and 2074, which allow the department to establish standards, guidelines, and criteria, to promulgate rules and regulations, and to issue compliance schedules, the secretary of the department hereby declares that an emergency action is necessary in order to prevent the unauthorized disposal of sewage sludge in treatment works treating domestic sewage and other areas unprepared to receive the waste stream.

Sewage sludge is managed by three different programs within the state and the EPA. The multiple permitting process is a cumbersome and expensive process for both the state and the regulated community, hence, inadequately permitted and/or designed facilities to accept the waste, which is produced in a persistent manner. The potential for dumping of sewage sludge presents a potential health risk to the public and the environment in areas of the state that are under-developed for receiving the waste. This emergency rule attempts to streamline and expedite the permitting process by removing the solid waste requirements for the management of sewage sludge from the solid waste regulations (LAC 33:Part VII). Sewage sludge will be managed by LAC 33:IX.Chapter 69 that is reflective of and equivalent to the Clean Water Act Section 503 program at the federal level.

This Emergency Rule is effective on September 1, 2005, and shall remain in effect for a maximum of 120 days or until a final rule is promulgated, whichever occurs first. For more information concerning OS066E you may contact the Regulation Development Section at (225) 219-3550.

In accordance with the emergency provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act, R.S. 49:953(B), which allows the Department of Environmental Quality to use emergency procedures to establish rules, and under the authority of R.S. 30:2011, the secretary of the department hereby declares that an emergency action is necessary in order to implement rules to add mercury-containing devices and electronics, including cathode ray tubes (CRTs), destined for recycling as universal wastes.

Under the Emergency Rule, metallic mercury must be recovered, recycled, reused, or sequestered, and not incinerated, landfilled, or released in any way; electronics, including CRTs, must be sent for dismantling and recovery of components, in a way that prevents releases to the environment. Large amounts of debris and waste must be disposed of as a result of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. It is desirable to divert as many electronics and mercury-containing devices as possible away from disposal sites. By including these wastes as universal wastes, the opportunity exists to divert these items for recycling, thereby improving the environment and simplifying recovery. The department has proposed a rule to promulgate these regulation changes.

This Emergency Rule is effective on October 3, 2005, and shall remain in effect for a maximum of 120 days or until a final rule is promulgated, whichever occurs first. For more information concerning HW088E you may contact the Regulation Development Section at (225) 219-3550.

(0510Pot2)

Under the authority of the Louisiana Environmental Quality Act, R. S. 30:2001 et seq., the secretary gives notice that the Office of Environmental Assessment, Plan Development Section, will submit a proposed revision to the ozone maintenance plan for Grant Parish. This revision to the State Implementation Plan (SIP) is mandated under Section 110(a)(1) requirements of the 1990 Clean Air Act Amendments (CAAA).

According to the Phase 1 Implementation Rule published April 30, 2004 (69 FR 23951), areas that are designated attainment for the 8-hour ozone National Ambient Air Quality Standards (NAAQS) and are designated attainment for the 1-hour ozone NAAQS with an approved maintenance plan must submit a revision.

A public hearing will be held at 1:30 p.m. on November 29, 2005, in the Galvez Building, Oliver Pollock Conference Room, 602 N. Fifth Street, Baton Rouge, LA. Should individuals with a disability need an accommodation in order to participate, please contact Vivian H. Aucoin at (225) 219-3575 or at the address listed below. Interested persons are invited to attend and submit oral comments on the proposal.

All interested persons are invited to submit written comments concerning the SIP revision no later than 4:30 p.m., November 29, 2005, to Vivian H. Aucoin, Office of Environmental Assessment, Box 4314, Baton Rouge, LA 70821-4314 or to FAX (225) 219-3582 or by e-mail to vivian.aucoin@la.gov.

Inmates fighting for their freedom

Hurricanes delay court hearings

By Gwen Filosa

Defense attorneys in New Orleans are fighting to free inmates stuck behind bars — without conviction or hearings — in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, which forced an evacuation from the parish prison days after the storm struck.

At least two motions have been filed on behalf of such inmates, including a federal case on behalf of 94 women shipped to the state's maximum security prison in Angola for safekeeping after floodwaters threatened the local jail.

Gyntrella Gettridge was booked into Orleans Parish Prison with criminal trespass, accused of sleeping near a ferry, six days before Hurricane Katrina hit the city. Gettridge, 31, wound up being evacuated to Angola, where she lived for three weeks before U.S. District Judge Jay Zainey ordered her and 59 others released on Sept. 22.

Gettridge and 59 others named in the civil action have been freed, while attorney Nick Trenticosta works on the cases of the remaining 34 women locked up. The 94 were all misdemeanor cases, Trenticosta

Inside the tan and Army-green tents opposite the now-condemned University Hospital, health care workers from Charity and University hospitals have created a medical facility, complete with everything from heart monitors to X-ray machines, as a first line of defense in protecting the city's fragile public health care system.

Although not a military operation, health care workers at the temporary facility have teamed with the Army, which is running a combat hospital inside the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, to fill the void left by the closure of Charity Hospital.

The public facility was opened this week by Louisiana State University to replace most of the services that for the Past month had been provided by the USNS Comfort. The Navy ship departed the Poland Avenue wharf last week.

The temporary site in the 500 block of South Johnson Street will address basic medical needs as the city begins to repopulate.

Many of those who return will be without health insurance, said Dr. Cathi Fontenot, medical director for the Medical Center of Louisiana. For now, the services will be free. Over the next few weeks, more such clinics will open throughout the city, she said.

Fontenot, who oversees Charity and University hospitals, both of which were damaged by Hurricane Katrina, envisions a new medical complex to replace the ones she lost.

"We are still, in my heart of hearts, looking for a new facility," Fontenot said, adding that her staff is adapting to the current environment. "Our people can work anywhere."

Called EMEDS, or Expeditionary Medical Support, the units at South Johnson are similar to those used to treat wounded soldiers in Iraq and

More than six weeks after Hurricane Katrina roared through New Orleans, the underpass at the railroad tracks and Canal Boulevard is still under water. The culprit, apparently, is not floodwaters but a broken water main. The dip has been pumped out only to fill up again, though workers are determined to dry it out once and for all.

Former Federal Emergency Management Agency chief Michael Brown took a lot of heat last month when he tried to blame his agency's problems in responding to Hurricane Katrina on what he called Louisiana's "dysfunctional" governmental and emergency management systems.

But people observing the goings-on in New Orleans government this week might conclude that Brown had a point.

Example A: Ignoring arguments that the city and state already had more than enough task forces and advisory boards trying to plan post-Katrina reconstruction, the City Council followed through Wednesday on the plan it had announced earlier to create its own 11-member advisory committee.

That's in addition to panels created by Mayor Ray Nagin, Gov. Kathleen Blanco and Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu.

It was clear from council members' comments that the main motivation for forming the new group was pique that, in their view, Nagin has been ignoring the council in seeking advice on how to revitalize the city.

Councilman Eddie Sapir said he did not even know the name of Nagin's group, widely publicized in the media as the Bring Back New Orleans commission, and said the council managed to get a representative on it only after "some strong, strong urging."

Council President Oliver Thomas, a longtime Nagin ally who was named to the commission, agreed. "They didn't want me on it," he said.

Councilwoman Renee Gill Pratt said Nagin's group contains only one woman and is not Jefferson Parish public schools have added almost 6,000 more students since reopening two weeks ago, bringing the total to 34,552, or 70 percent of its enrollment before Hurricane Katrina.

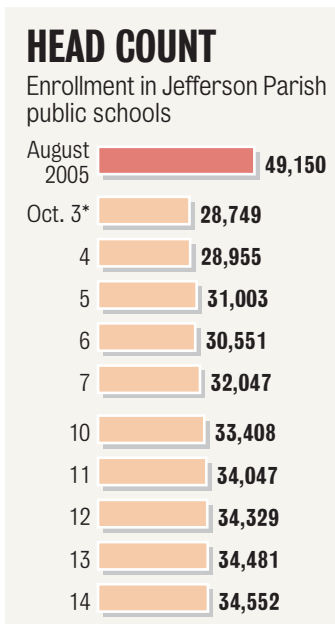
Public school officials on Friday hailed the numbers as a sign of strong recovery for both the school system and the community in general, although Catholic school officials this week reported their Jefferson Parish turnout to be even stronger, with more students enrolled in the parochial schools than before Katrina.



"The important point is we're at 70 percent," said Leigh Barton, assistant superintendent for research in Jefferson public schools. "Other people may not consider that quite an accomplishment. I think it speaks volumes to the rebuilding of Jefferson Parish."

School system spokesman Jeff Nowakowski said on Friday the schools expect a surge in January when parents move back for the new semester.

On Oct. 7, at the end of their first week back, the schools counted 32,047 students. On Monday, 33,408 students enrolled.

Jeff schools revamp Post-Katrina calendar

Students lose days off vacation time

By Rob Nelson
West Bank bureau

Slicing into holidays and converting previously planned half-days into full days, the Jefferson Parish School Board has unanimously adopted a revised school-year calendar.

The board first amended the calendar Sept. 29, calling for the school day to start an hour earlier. That plan was scrapped after board members reported strong public backlash to the schedule, under which high schools would have started at 6:15 a.m.

At the time, officials said the state had not informed them how many of the 24 class days lost to Hurricane Katrina the system would have to make up.

According to Jefferson administrators, state officials have said seven days will have to be recouped, but the state Department of Education said no decision has yet been reached.

Department spokeswoman Meg Casper said the state wants to petition the Legislature to allow state Superintendent Cecil Picard to approve revamped calendars on a case-by-case basis. Casper said she did not know how Jefferson arrived at its seven-day figure.

Under Jefferson's latest revised calendar, students will lose one day of winter and spring break and several "records day" for teachers will now be full days for students.

The new calendar is as follows:

- ▶ Nov. 11, end of first marking period.
- ▶ Nov. 18, report cards issued.
- ▶ Nov. 21-25, Thanksgiving break.
- ▶ Nov. 28, parent conferences for elementary and high schools, half day for those students.
- ▶ Nov. 29, parent conferences for middle and special schools, half day for those students.
- ▶ Dec. 17-Jan. 1, winter vacation.
- ▶ Jan. 2, school resumes.
- ▶ Jan. 16, Martin Luther King holiday.
- ▶ Jan. 20, end of second marking period.
- ▶ Jan. 27, report cards issued.
- ▶ Feb. 27, 28 and March 1, Mardi Gras holiday.
- ▶ March 20-24, standardized testing week.
- ▶ March 24, end of third marking period.

Afghanistan. It's a 24-hour clinic for people with minor health problems. Pharmacy and dental services also are available.

Patients with serious trauma or in need of major surgery are sent to the Army's field hospital at the Convention Center. Once there, a patient can stay for two days. Those in need of longer-term care are sent to Ochsner Foundation Hospital, East Jefferson General Hospital or West Jefferson Medical Center.

"We have been here for several weeks," said Dr. Jennifer Avegno, a Charity Hospital doctor working at the Convention Center. "This has never, ever happened before. The military has never partnered with civilians before."

Army Maj. Paula Lodi, an administrator for the combat military hospital, said the civilian medical staff complements her unit's efforts by assisting walk-in patients.

The Army's function is to fill the void created by the closure of Charity.

"The void of Charity is the trauma services," Lodi said. "We do trauma and acute care."

The 205-member unit, which treated soldiers during a tour of duty in Iraq, hasn't seen much bloodshed in New Orleans. There hasn't been a shooting or a murder in the city in weeks.

Most patients need treatment for injuries suffered while repairing their homes. Some have fallen off ladders, others have stepped on nails. One man came in Thursday with second-degree burns on his hand from a blow torch.

"We're seeing everything that you would see in an emergency room," Avegno said. "We have full surgical capabilities. There are some limitations that we have, but not many."

Back on the job

Aisha Brooks ate lunch in her car outside the Convention Center on Thursday as her husband was wheeled into surgery.

Brooks said she brought him to the facility to have a nail removed from his foot.

"He didn't feel it go in his foot," Brooks said of her husband, who was injured as he checked on their storm-damaged home in Harvey. "He was told if he had waited one more day, he would have lost his foot."

At the South Johnson Street site, patients sat patiently awaiting treatment in an air-conditioned triage tent.

Daniel Lowery Jr., a respiratory therapist, stood in the parking lot turned medical center and looked across the street at University Hospital, where he used to work.

Though he could no longer go inside the condemned building, Lowery said it was comforting to work beside those with whom he rode out the storm just weeks before.

Word was spreading that they were back. More patients would be coming soon. The staff is ready, he said.

Refuse hauler refusing to keep on trucking

Subcontractor cites contract, corps woes

By Richard Boyd and Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

A bureaucratic tangle and contract disputes threaten to prolong the already slow-moving pickup of tons of storm debris along city streets and leave dozens of haulers either unpaid or only partially paid in Slidell, Mandeville, Covington and Pearl River.

The cleanup of the mess left in the wake of Hurricane Katrina ground to a halt, at least temporarily, Friday when the lead subcontractor walked off the job and said the company will pull out of Slidell and Covington if the problems aren't cleared up soon.

Joe Schaefer, the Army Corps of Engineers' mission manager for storm cleanup in St. Tammany Parish, said later that corps officials would work through the weekend to resolve the problems.

"Yes, that's our goal, to get it cleared up by Monday," he said, adding that he was in the middle of a meeting and couldn't comment further at that time.

Officials with Gulf States Contractors, a Smith Enterprises company in Slidell, said they will stay on the job if the corps is true to its word.

Debris cleanup in unincorporated areas of St. Tammany is being handled by Omni Pinnacle under a separate contract.

The debris haulers in the parish's municipalities complained that they aren't being paid by the contractor, Ceres Environmental Inc. of Brooklyn Park, Minn., hired by the corps to oversee the cleanup in the parish. Ceres has not responded to a reporter's requests for comment.

Gulf States is picking up tree, construction and other debris in all three cities through an interim agreement with Ceres, which replaced Ashbritt Inc. of Pompano Beach, Fla. Ceres has a one-year contract with the corps that is worth up to $500 million for cleanup work in Louisiana.

But after seven weeks on the job, Gulf States has been unable to get a permanent contract with Ceres, and the corps has shut down Mandeville's temporary dump site four times on grounds that the road leading into it is too dusty, Smith Enterprises chief Chris Jean said Friday.

Jean said Gulf States simply cannot continue to work under such conditions, which include a dispute with Ceres over the interim contract.

"I'm out of pocket over $8 million," Jean said. "I've been paid about $1.7 million."

City officials complained about the situation Friday morning in a meeting with Schaefer and other officials.

Mandeville Mayor Eddie Price said he would ask the City Council to fire the corps if the problems aren't fixed by Monday. Other local officials made similar threats.

"I am at wit's end," Price said. "These corps people don't see the urgency in this trying to restore Mandeville. . . . We can't work with the corps. I don't understand their mindset."

Because of the situation, he said, Mandeville apparently will have no debris pickup over the weekend.

Slidell Chief of Staff Reinhard Dearing said Gulf States had agreed to continue working in Slidell over the weekend because of the promise to end the problems.

"Hopefully by Monday there will be a contract in place between Ceres and Gulf States," Dearing said. Otherwise, he said, he'll urge cancellation of Slidell's agreement with the corps.

Dearing noted, and Gulf States confirmed, that Gretna terminated its contract with the corps a week ago because of similar problems. Gulf States has remained on the job there under a direct contract with Gretna.

Terminating the contracts with the corps could mean that the cities struggling to recover from the devastation left Aug. 29 by Hurricane Katrina would have to pay 25 percent of the cleanup cost for at least the remainder of the job.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency would reimburse them for the 75 percent, the traditional procedure that parish government chose when it hired Omni Pinnacle for cleanup in the unincorporated areas.

Price said 25 percent could have dire consequences for Mandeville's already troubled budget. The city is reeling from a $300,000 decline in August sales tax collections and a near-zero collection for September, he said.

Slidell Mayor Ben Morris said earlier this week that his city's strained finances couldn't spare a dime. The city faces a potential $5 million revenue shortfall in its $35 million budget, which took effect July 1.

Price earlier in the week pleaded with some state legislators for help in trying to cut through a bureaucratic logjam and get a FEMA reimbursement of $400,000 the city paid Gulf States to clear city streets of trees, downed power lines and debris within 70 hours of the storm.

Jean said Gulf States is now out "about $8 million for the debris removal" for which it hasn't been paid. "We can't continue this drain. We are making our payroll, but we have to get paid by the corps' contractor and we have to have a contract before we can continue."

Jean and Dearing said the major sticking point is less about money than about potential legal settlements.

Immediately after the storm, Jean said, Gulf States had the lead subcontract with Ashbritt. "Three weeks into it, the corps comes in and tells all these mayors that they will take over the operation, that FEMA will bear 100 percent of the cost, and they will do all the paperwork. All the mayors took them up on the offer."

The trouble came when the corps replaced Ashbritt with Ceres, Jean said.

"We got paid for our initial work by Ashbritt, but we have had no payments from Ceres and no contract until their lawyer called our lawyer at 10 p.m. Wednesday with an offer we rejected," he said.

Roussel trumpets rise in Jeff rolls

SCHOOLS, from B-1

By Friday, Jefferson officials counted 4,540 displaced students on their rolls, with 2,817 from New Orleans, 931 displaced from one part of Jefferson to another, 383 from St. Bernard Parish and the rest from several other parishes.

"Even though 100 percent of the people aren't back, I think it's a rapid rebuilding," said Jefferson Superintendent Diane Roussel, who predicts the system will soon reach 75 percent. Roussel said high percentages of natives living in the New Orleans area mean people have strong attachments and many will likely return.

Roussel said Jefferson has posted much stronger turnout than Florida school systems reported after hurricanes, even though Katrina's disruption was longer.

But the Catholic schools in Jefferson Parish appear to be doing even better, in terms of percentages returned. This week Archdiocese of New Orleans officials reported enrollment at 19,239, which is almost 1,000 more students than the Catholic schools had before Katrina. Catholic school officials attributed the growth to the influx of displaced students.

the petition," Jefferson Parish Registrar of Voters Dennis DiMarco said, adding that he encouraged Johnson to seek the judge's order. "This is really unprecedented that we've had such devastation and wholesale closure of office buildings."

The registrar's office opened its West Bank location last week, but its east bank office is still shuttered.

Johnson, who has represented the 1st District since 1994, is the first Kenner politician to attempt the petition drive.

Kenner voters in 1995 amended the City Charter to limit council members to two consecutive terms. Voters gave politicians the choice to seek additional terms by accumulating signatures from a third of the voters in their districts.

Johnson was unsure Friday how much time he will request for his extension, but said it will probably start on the day that Kenner Mayor Phil Capitano declared a state of emergency in the city, Aug. 28.

"I will be asking for that time back," he said.

Johnson didn't have an exact count of the signatures he had assembled before Katrina.

"I'm very close to the 2,100," he said, estimating that he has gathered at least 1,600 of the 2,100 required names.

MAYORS SEEK MONEY: Struggling to make ends meet during their own recovery after hurricanes Katrina and Rita decimated their communities and government finances, the five mayors of Jefferson Parish's smaller municipalities wrote to President Bush this week seeking a meeting to talk about their needs.

Westwego Mayor Robert Billiot penned the letter dated Oct. 10, the same day that Bush visited the Gulf Coast for the eighth time since Katrina and had dinner in the French Quarter.

"We have not received an invitation" to meet with you "nor have we heard from any of your staff," Billiot wrote. "We are all local government entities and elected officials burden by Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita."

The letter was written on behalf of the other mayors: Ronnie Harris of Gretna, Tim Kerner of Jean Lafitte, David Camardelle of Grand Isle and Paul Johnston of Harahan.

Winn-Dixie has opened 29 of the 43 supermarkets in the New Orleans division.

Thanks to the unscathed, million-square-foot distribution center in Hammond, the corporation was able to reopen a number of stores in the area immediately after the storm, says spokesman Patrick McSweeney. "We were up and running a day after the hurricane," he says.

By Aug. 31, two days after Katrina hit Louisiana and Mississippi, Winn-Dixie was able to reopen stores in Luling, LaPlace, Hammond and other cities west of New Orleans. Winn-Dixie stores on Airline and Jefferson Highways are up and running, and the Veterans store, "on the dry side" of the 17th Street Canal on Veterans near Heritage Plaza, opened Sept. 15.

McSweeney says the Uptown Winn-Dixie on Tchoupitoulas at Jefferson Avenue reopened last week and continues to be repaired and restocked. Manager Marla Hubble says even the deli is back in operation, serving to-go meals, cooked entrees and hot lunches.

The Winn-Dixie on Lapalco in Gretna is set to open by the end of the month, says McSweeney.

"Depending on the level of damage to the stores and our neighborhoods, we are getting everything back to normal as quickly as possible," says McSweeney.

"Our customers continue to express their gratitude to the managers and the staff at each store — most of which were open until 10 p.m. the night before Katrina hit. As people move back in, they are telling us how glad they are to be able to shop for the things they need to get their lives and homes going again."

Although the staff has been depleted by people who have yet to return or who are not able to return to their homes, stores are operating at full capacity where possible.

Job fair: An open house and job fair for new Winn-Dixie employees will be held this Thursday through Sunday, from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. at all locations that are open. Online applications: winndixie.com.

Pharmacies: Winn-Dixie also plans to open pharmacy units in portable housing next to a number of store locations without those services beginning this weekend, says McSweeney.

said, and scores of them were awaiting release when the hurricane hit.

"We had one person who was reading tarot cards without a license," Trenticosta said. "Whoever is holding them in custody can find out their release date and release them. That didn't happen."

Attorney Rick Teissier filed a motion in state court in an effort to have 14 inmates awaiting trial when the hurricane struck released immediately. The 14 defendants include Glenwood Brown, 54, booked with aggravated battery; Stanford Beasley, 51, who is accused of dealing cocaine and marijuana, and Tyrone Fisher, 39, booked with public drunkenness and violating parole.

While all 14 have been locked up for more than 45 days, none has been formally charged with any crime, Teissier said in his motion, filed Friday in Baton Rouge, where some aspects of Orleans Parish Criminal District Court have temporarily relocated.

"None have been interviewed by any public defender since Hurricane Katrina," the motion says, "and many have never even met a public defender."

Yet parish court officials say they are up and running, holding bond hearings at the state prison in St. Gabriel. Gov. Kathleen Blanco gave the Orleans court system until Oct. 25 to recover from the back-to-back hurricanes.

Chief Judge Calvin Johnson has said that by Nov. 1, the Criminal District Court judges from Tulane and Broad will be holding preliminary hearings and setting court dates, but trials at the storm-battered courthouse may not start again until February.

Defense attorneys, however, say the disaster exposes weaknesses in the Criminal District Court system.

"The catastrophe of Hurricane Katrina has exacerbated the fundamental flaws previously existing within the system for providing indigent defense," Teissier wrote, adding that the lack of financing for indigent defense and staggering caseloads have been longtime pitfalls.

Customers trying to call the parish's east bank Water Department office are urged to have patience because the office's phone system remains damaged, officials said.

The department, located in the first floor of the Joseph S. Yenni office building, 1221 Elmwood Park Blvd., Elmwood, is not operating at full capacity and repairs are not expected to be completed for a week.

Customers may experience a busy signal or a lengthy waiting period before being connected to a representative and are reminded that the parish's two water department offices are open during weekdays.

To open a new account, customers must show a valid Louisiana driver's license and Social Security card, along with a deposit of up to $100. To cancel an existing account, customers must give the date water service will be terminated and a valid address for the final bill.

The telephone number for the Water Department is 736-6060.

Rooting friends held for looting, instead

They were trying to save friend's treasures

By Richard Boyd
St. Tammany bureau

When Daniel and Maude Griffis went to their friend's destroyed home in Eden Isles on Sept. 15, they were trying to be helpful, hoping to retrieve some of their friend's soft drink collectibles from the rubble. What they got was a trip to the St. Tammany Parish jail in Covington, booked with looting.

After reviewing a flurry of correspondence from the Griffises and their friend, Austin Graham, and talking to all involved, the district attorney's office this week dropped the police charge and will not prosecute the Slidell couple.

"We have a very high bar for considering dismissing looting cases in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, but after extensive review, we are satisfied that these two people were just trying to help their friend with whom they share a hobby of collecting certain soft drink memorabilia," said Rick Wood, a spokesman for the district attorney's office.

Maude Griffis said the experience of being arrested and having their names appear in a newspaper account of those booked with looting after Hurricane Katrina "has been very embarrassing for us. We were just trying to help out our friend before the cleanup crews came down his street and smashed up and hauled away his collection."

But when a Kentucky state trooper, assisting in St. Tammany Parish after the storm, drove down Pebble Beach Drive south of Slidell and saw the Griffises, of Lafitte Drive in Slidell, digging in rubble, he called a St. Tammany deputy who placed the couple under arrest when they could not prove they were at their own home.

After the arrest, Graham sent a notarized statement to District Attorney Walter Reed's office saying that he had evacuated for the storm and asked his friends to check on his property and try to recover as much of his collection as possible. Wood said he followed that up this week by signing a form to dismiss the charges.

Graham had hired someone to gut his flooded house and put items curbside for pickup by debris removal contractors. That included a lot of his collectibles and antique vending machines. He said he asked his friends to try to save as much as possible before it got destroyed.

Although their effort was interrupted by the trip to jail, they got out on $30 bonds each and returned to Graham's home the next day, risking arrest again.

"By then the bulldozers had come and a lot of his collection was hauled away," Daniel Griffis said. "But before the arrest, I had set aside a lot of it and the bulldozers had not touched it. We managed to salvage a pickup load of his collection and we are holding it and cleaning it for him while he tries to figure out what to do with his house and his life."

inclusive of the whole community. Actually, the 17-member group has two female members.

Council members have complained almost since the day Nagin took office that he has does not communicate with them. He has repeatedly promised to do better but has often been upset over what he sees as politically motivated opposition to his plans by some council members.

As usual, no high member of the administration attended the council meeting, making clear that even in the wake of the greatest natural disaster in the city's history, communication across the hallway that separates the mayor's City Hall office from the council's offices has not improved.

•••••••

'MEAN-SPIRITED' LAWSUIT?: In another example of lack of cooperation among local officials, Nagin on Friday blasted Criminal Sheriff Marlin Gusman for filing what Nagin called an "incredibly insensitive and mean-spirited" motion in federal court seeking to hold the city in contempt for failing to pay Gusman money due him for housing city prisoners in Parish Prison.

Until Katrina forced evacuation of the prison, Gusman was billing the city about $3 million per month.

Gusman said the city failed to pay its bills for July and August, the last two months before Katrina hit, leaving his office unable to meet the "limited payroll (needed) to be able to continue to rehabilitate facilities damaged by" the storm. Without those facilities, he said, he cannot house people arrested by the Police Department.

"At a time when we are working diligently to rebuild New Orleans, I find this action incredibly insensitive and mean-spirited," Nagin said. "We just had a round of painful layoffs. If this motion is successful, it could force further layoffs of our police officers and other city workers."

Saying that the city has "lost all revenue sources for operating expenses," Nagin called on Gusman to "drop this counterproductive lawsuit and join us to lobby both the state and federal government for the financial resources we desperately need to bring New Orleans back."

Gusman responded with a statement pledging "to work with the mayor on all public safety issues" and to join the city in lobbying federal and state officials.

•••••••

WILSON EYES MAYORAL RUN: Hard as it is to believe someone might actually want to be mayor of a city in the desperate situation facing New Orleans, it appears there may be no shortage of candidates to try to unseat Nagin in the mayoral election scheduled for February.

Former City Councilwoman Peggy Wilson said Friday she is giving "very, very serious" consideration to running and could make an announcement in early November.

She said she is working on lining up support. Asked if she is having success raising money in the current crisis, she said, "I am indeed."

Wilson said she has heard talk of at least five other potential major candidates, though none of them has announced. Some are unlikely to run if Nagin remains in the race.

The only candidates who announced before Katrina were community activist and former state Rep. Leo Watermeier and radio announcer James Arey.

Wilson said she thinks Nagin is vulnerable because "a lot of people think he's leading the city in the wrong direction."

•••••••

COUNCIL APPLAUDS LAW FIRM: Council members managed to agree on one thing this week, giving local lawyer Russ Herman a loud ovation after he said his law firm would provide free legal advice to every New Orleans police officer and firefighter who stayed on the job during and after Katrina and whose home was destroyed or badly damaged.

Herman said his firm — Herman, Herman, Katz and Cotlar — will handle insurance claims and other paperwork and will help the city workers find a lawyer to file suit if necessary, provided the police officer or firefighter pledges to remain in or return to the city.

Herman's firm has received several contracts from the council in recent years, though for amounts far smaller than some other local firms.

Algiers tenants raise uproar

Forest Park apts. closing for repairs

By Rob Nelson
West Bank bureau

Dozens of residents and community activists protested outside the Forest Park Apartments in Algiers on Friday, rallying against a decision by the complex to shut down the property to make repairs in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

In a letter dated Wednesday, complex officials informed residents that starting Sunday no one will be allowed to live in the 284-unit complex because of health and safety reasons and because major repairs necessitate a complete closure.

"All utilities will be turned off, and all gates will be locked on that date," the letter said.

Residents blasted the decision, likening the move to evictions, which are currently illegal under an executive order by Gov. Kathleen Blanco that is set to expire Oct. 25.

Estimating that 80 percent of the units are damaged, Rodney Howington, the complex's property manager, said he is not evicting residents.

Residents are not being charged rent for September or October and will be given the first opportunity to return to the complex once repairs are complete, he said.

In addition, residents' security deposits are being returned, Howington said.

Outside Forest Park's rental office, dozens of protesters, armed with signs and chants of "Stop the evictions," gathered to decry their forced relocation.

"We feel like we can live here," resident Charlestine Jones said. "We have no place to go."

Anthony Mitchell, who has lived in the complex for about 20 years, called the situation unfair and insensitive and said he will not return to the neighborhood.

"My thing is, all the apartments back here aren't bad," said Mitchell, who had packed his car for Kenner, where he will stay with a friend. "I think they're going to fix it up and then raise the rent."

Howington said the renovation work will require a shutdown of electricity and water, making conditions in the complex unlivable during the work.

The scene grew tense after several residents squeezed their way into the rental office. Workers then called the police.

Eventually, Howington agreed to meet with tenants individually as police helped form a line of residents outside the door. The situation seemed to end without incident.

More than 100 employees representing all departments at Meadowcrest Hospital in Gretna lined the sidewalk in front of the hospital Friday to protest the continued use of the hospital as a dormitory for the National Guard and others. West Bank bureau

Carrying signs bearing slogans such as "Patients or Politics," about 100 Meadowcrest Hospital employees demonstrated Friday outside the West Bank facility, saying they could lose their jobs if Jefferson Parish doesn't release the hospital it commandeered six weeks ago to house workers after Hurricane Katrina.

The demonstration was triggered by news that Parish President Aaron Broussard on Wednesday extended to Oct. 26 an emergency order which, under state law, lets him commandeer private facilities. That order had been set to expire today, and Meadowcrest employees said the extension means jobs could be lost.

"We should be in there working," said Shan Hurling, an emergency room registered nurse. "The state of emergency is over. It's time to rebuild."

"Standing out here walking on this grass isn't helping" people, said her husband Red Hurling, also an emergency room registered nurse.

Following federally mandated notification requirements, Meadowcrest on Monday will formally tell its 700 employees, including a medical staff of 400, that they may lose their jobs, hospital spokeswoman Sandra Cordray said. Another 100 contract personnel in food service, housekeeping and physical therapy work at Meadowcrest, she said.

"Potentially those jobs are at risk," she said.

Broussard commandeered Meadowcrest days after Hurricane Katrina swept through the area. Hospital employees and patients already had evacuated the facility.

Broussard has said he took over the hospital to provide housing for medical and emergency personnel and National Guard troops.

The parish president, who met with Meadowcrest officials this week and plans another meeting on Monday, could not be reached for comment on Friday.

Before learning that the parish will hold onto Meadowcrest an additional 12 days, hospital officials had hoped to begin preparations today to reopen the emergency room and limited outpatient services around Nov. 1, said Steve Campanini, a spokesman for Tenet Healthcare Corp., which owns Meadowcrest.

In light of the extension, "The number of employees we can keep at that hospital depends on when we get the hospital back" and which medical services the facility will be able to provide, Campanini said.

Jefferson Parish Council President Tom Capella said Friday that Broussard has assured him he will release Meadowcrest as soon as housing is found for people staying at the hospital.

"It is the parish president's call at this point," Capella said. "I have expressed my concern to him" that Meadowcrest officials get the hospital back as soon as possible. "We want every employee back."

The emergency order extension came a week after the parish-owned West Jefferson Medical Center made an unsolicited offer to buy Meadowcrest, its competitor on the West Bank, for $15.7 million.

In turn, Meadowcrest officials on Oct. 7 sued West Jefferson, saying in the lawsuit that the parish hospital was positioning itself to expropriate Meadowcrest. The lawsuit asks a federal judge to stop the expropriation.

The lawsuit, coupled with the timing of Broussard's extension of the emergency order, has led employees to cry foul.

"Are we worried about land grabbing or serving the community here?" said Christian Harris, a Meadowcrest emergency room charge nurse.

Mayor reconsidering storm firings, demotions

Gretna council cites lack of 'compassion'

By Dennis Persica
West Bank bureau

Gretna Mayor Ronnie Harris said he will consider rescinding actions against two city supervisors who were demoted and three employees who were fired in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

A special council meeting Thursday to discuss future policy on which city employees must work during hurricanes quickly became a forum for the disciplinary actions against several employees who either didn't show up for work as the city prepared for Katrina or left their jobs once the storm hit.

Harris said he first fired, then demoted, two "mid-level managers" and a mechanic in the Public Works Department because they didn't show up for work as Katrina approached. He said he also fired three employees who were laborers or equipment operators when they left their jobs after the storm.

The City Council asked Harris to reconsider the disciplinary actions and said the mayor should have shown more compassion for the workers, some of whom had elderly parents or pregnant wives to bring to safety. Council members also said there was not clear city policy in the face of an emergencies such as a powerful storm.

"I believe we did have a policy," Harris told the council.

Once City Hall personnel are told to leave as a storm approaches, remaining city employees, including drainage operators and streets department workers, are deemed essential to the city's effort and are paid time and a half for every hour they work, Harris said.

"We needed every able body on hand" during Katrina, the mayor said, "and we also needed superintendents."

The absence of the two mid-level supervisors was especially critical and had an effect on the morale of other employees, Harris said, adding that he didn't feel the supervisors who left their posts could be effective leaders when they returned.

None of the disciplined employees was named publicly during the meeting, which lasted just over an hour. The council asked that Harris give the supervisors their old jobs back and rehire the fired employees.

Harris, who said the mechanic has since found a better-paying job, said he wanted to consult with his department heads before making a final decision on the council's request.

In a way, Thursday's discussion replicated the controversy going on at the parish level, where Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard's decision to evacuate critical pump operators has drawn criticism. In Gretna's case, however, the argument has been over Harris' desire that all essential city employees stay on the job during hurricanes.

Councilman Wayne Rau alluded to the parish controversy, referring to the parish's plan to evacuate pump operators in hopes of getting them back on their jobs a few hours after a storm passed. But when the parish pump operators tried to return, they found the trip back to be a slow one because of downed trees blocking the roadway.

"A well-intended plan in that particular situation didn't work out," Rau said.

Miss. schools trying to figure how to pay bills

Reserves dwindle; big loans are sought

By Cathy Hayden
The Clarion-Ledger

JACKSON, MISS. — St. Martin's Middle School in Ocean Springs was flooded to the ceiling. Tables floated on the rising waters and became stuck in the structural supports. The city's middle and upper elementary schools also were flooded by Hurricane Katrina.

One school district has spent almost all of its reserve fund. Another wants to borrow millions of dollars just to stay afloat.

Katrina's destruction has left officials at the hardest-hit school districts on the Mississippi Gulf Coast trying to figure out how to pay the bills.

Buildings must be cleaned, utility bills paid and buses maintained. And bills for replacing textbooks, furniture and buses must be paid without putting budgets in the hole.

"If we had not had $1.8 million in reserves, right now we would be defunct," said Kim Stasny, superintendent of Bay St. Louis-Waveland schools.

The district on Nov. 1 expects to become the last in Mississippi to reopen since the Aug. 29 hurricane hit the state. Coast school officials are still tallying the financial loss to buildings, buses, books and other materials, but the state estimates it will top $1.2 billion.

Bay St. Louis and Waveland were among those worst hit. Before Katrina, the district was receiving about 40 percent of its financing through property taxes on homes and businesses. The rest of its money comes through state and federal aid. The district still receives its monthly state money, allowing it to continue paying teachers.

State Superintendent of Education Hank Bounds has sought a congressional appropriation that includes $253.6 million to offset the loss of tax revenue over the next four years in the 28 hardest-hit districts. That request is still pending.

Stasny has asked to borrow $10 million from the Mississippi Development Bank through a special governmental fund to help meet payroll in coming months. It's part of $100 million set-aside so local governments can keep essential services running.

"Our collections for the rest of the (school) year are going to be low. In January and February, it's going to come to a screeching halt, I'm afraid," she said. "Many of our businesses were destroyed. Our ad valorem (property tax) is going to be nil and I don't know when we'll get that rebuilt."

North Bay Elementary had 6 to 8 feet of water inside, the new gymnasium floor at Bay High is rippled and mold is growing in every building. Furthering the problems, local evacuees broke into Bay High to use it as a shelter, and more than 300 people wound up staying there. But some of them ransacked the school, carrying off athletes' sneakers and jerseys, among other things. "We had a lot of damage, just from that," Stasny said.

In the Hancock County system, Lynel Necaise, the district's business officer, has concentrated on ordering textbooks and furniture so her schools can reopen. The district will have portables to replace two destroyed elementary schools.

Also survived by her cousin and care giver, Jacquelyn Wack, and many other cousins. She was a graduate of Sophie B. Wright High School and a librarian at Tulane University's Howard Tilton Library for 43 years. Ms. Wood was a parishioner of St. Angela Merici Catholic Church.
Relatives and friends of the family were invited to attend the funeral. Services were held at the Metairie Funeral Home of L.A. MUHLEISEN AND SON, 2929 Metairie Rd. on Friday, October 14, 2005 at 2:30 PM. Visitation was from 11:00 AM until 2:30 PM on Friday. Temporary interment was in Jefferson Memorial Gardens, St. Rose LA, with final interment to be in Greenwood Cemetery.

MEMORIALS

MEMORIAL FOR
SANDRA DOLORES FONTAINE
Born: July 15, 1964 Died: Sept. 6, 2004
It has been a year since Dolores left us.
We will always miss her funny personality, her creativity, and her great capacity of love for family and friends. Although she is no longer physically with us, she is forever in our hearts, and her spirit lives on. Fondly rememberd and sadly missed by Carol Ann, Johnny, Steve, Charlie, Karen and many family and friends.

IN LOVING MEMORY OF
RAYMOND A. WILSON
October 15, 1964 August 4, 2004
There are tears and fond remembrance
Dearest Ray-Ray for you still,
For you held a place within my heart
That none can ever fill.
Loved and Missed By, Wife
Also Missed by Family and Friends

Restoring our city.

Preserving our legacy.

For 133 years, we've had a long legacy of serving the families of New Orleans. Even today, this spirit of dedication and caring still lives on in each member of our staff. We weathered the devastation of Katrina and have emerged from it with an even stronger sense of hope and pride in the community we are privileged to serve.

Although our properties have experienced some damage from the storm, we are pleased to announce that we are currently serving families. We're here to help the families of New Orleans during their times of greatest need. Please call today for caring assistance and more information.

YOUR OPINIONS

Stop playing, get to work on rebuilding our city

We need a new beginning in New Orleans, one that does not depend on tourism or sports. We need to focus on education and business.

We need to step out of our teen years, and into adulthood as a city. Just as an adult can put away his partying and sports, and go out and earn a living to support his family, so must our city.

New Orleans cannot function on tourism anymore. After Sept. 11, many people said that we needed to get our head out of the sand and bring in business, because tourism dropped dramatically. Mayor Ray Nagin was elected primarily because he was a successful businessman, and promised to increase businesses in the city.

Today, we are bankrupt. Our city was devastated, not by a hurricane, but by the incompetence, greed and downright neglect of the Levee Board, mayors (past and present) and the City Council. All the above should hang their heads in shame because they knew, or should have known, that the levees weren't safe as far back as 1998!

Grow up, New Orleans. Stop playing and protect your people. Once we get the levees repaired, once we get viable businesses up and running, once our children are in schools that are safe, clean and staffed with qualified teachers, then we can talk about bringing sports teams back.

For now, we must do the mundane, the un-fun. We don't need to listen to jazz yet, either, as the mayor suggested. The sounds of running water, air conditioners, traffic and phones ringing is music enough to most of our hurting ears.

The party's not over

During the past five weeks, the Gulf Coast has been devastated by two of the strongest Atlantic hurricanes on record, Katrina and Rita. The destruction has been mind-boggling and has left New Orleanians and the nation with lasting impressions of human suffering and desperation. In an unprecedented event, not seen since the Civil War, New Orleans, a major metropolitan city, was almost completely evacuated and all commerce came to a halt.

As we reflect on the past and future of New Orleans, we have two choices. We can acquiesce to the forces of nature and wallow in our own self pity, or we can draw upon the strength of our history and ancestors.

Our history has been a turbulent one. Yet, what our history has taught us is that we are a resilient people. And just as we have rebuilt in the past, we will rebuild a bigger, taller, and better New Orleans, one in which we preserve not only our rich history and culture, but also one in which we ensure our economic prosperity.

I have spoken about the future of Mardi Gras. My statement is simply, "we will have Mardi Gras in 2006." In reality, the simple truth is that we must have Mardi Gras in 2006 to announce to the nation and the world that we are alive and well, and that the party continues.

Let this be our philosophy: we may be down, but we are only resting for the bigger party yet to come.

Finally, if you believe in our city as I do, you have to know that our brightest and most prosperous days still lie ahead.

Being tired is no excuse

The police beating video reminds me of something I would see on the news during Mardi Gras, not when our city has just been hit by the worst natural disaster in history. Our city is going through enough right now, and it is more upsetting to see the Police Department act so irrationally.

While the media have been reporting that fatigue of the officers might have played a role in the outburst, that is absolutely no excuse to beat a man or curse out a member of the Associated Press and tell him to "go home." I myself and a number of other people in New Orleans are working extremely long hours and are very tired. It is stories like this that discourage the people of our great city, giving them the idea that the Police Department is not even capable of protecting us.

We are all tired and we all could use a long break, but we aren't going to get that for a while. We need to work together — especially the people that have been put on the streets to protect us as we rebuild New Orleans.

Mayor betrays loyal officers

Shame on Mayor Ray Nagin for prejudging the police officers involved in the Bourbon Street incident.

These officers were loyal and dedicated and stayed through the storm and the aftermath to protect us. They may have lost their homes. The mayor said he did not know what the "old man" did, but whatever it was, he did not deserve what happened. But that "old man" was big and strong enough to keep four strapping police officers struggling with him for over 2½ minutes before he could be cuffed. He refused to obey initial verbal commands, and Mace proved ineffective. Those officers resorted to blows only when the "old man" could not be subdued otherwise.

The blows were few in number and did not involve night sticks or other objects that might cause serious harm. I personally do not see any evidence of brutality, let alone criminal wrongdoing, from the tape; yet without a complete investigation, and from having seen only a portion of the tape, the mayor has publicly condemned them.

It is unprecedented in the history of the NOPD that officers have been charged criminally with a municipal offense before an internal investigation was completed. The mayor has, to put it simply, sold them out.

Generosity from afar

Newspapers, TV and radio are constant reminders of the tragedy of Hurricane Katrina. It consumes our every waking minute and, at times, invades our dreams. Meanwhile, across the country, people are meeting and planning how they can provide services — free of charge — that will alleviate our troubles for a while and put a smile on our faces.

Such a generous act was provided at our home on Monday afternoon when firefighters from Illinois came to help cut down a massive oak tree in our backyard. They would accept no money and then thanked us for allowing them to help!

Gentlemen, your goodwill and kindness shows us that America does love New Orleans and wants to see her bloom again.

OUR OPINIONS

The silent treatment

Not everyone who says they are searching for a hurricane evacuee has good intentions: identity thieves or abusive ex-spouses might be among those with malignant goals who are seeking information about residents who fled the area.

But the Federal Emergency Management Agency's efforts to protect the privacy of evacuees goes too far when it prevents law enforcement officials from finding parolees and convicted sex offenders.

FEMA won't let Texas officials have access to the records of 100,000 evacuees who have applied for state aid, according to a report in The Washington Post. FEMA also refused requests by five other states that asked to cross-check databases of sex offenders and parolees against the list of evacuees who've applied for federal aid.

That policy makes no sense. Hurricane victims certainly should enjoy the same privacy as other people, but convicted sex offenders or those serving parole shouldn't be able to elude law enforcement officials. The post-hurricane confusion shouldn't become an opportunity for people to vanish.

FEMA's new tight-lipped stance is also hampering families who are trying to find each other. The agency is directing shelter workers to confirm only that an evacuee is alive and in a given city. They aren't supposed to reveal phone numbers and addresses unless the evacuee in question signed a release form. The trouble is, many forms were lost in the chaos that followed the storm.

People whose lives have been horribly disrupted by Hurricane Katrina can't begin to move forward if they're still searching for scattered family members. If the lack of a piece of paper is preventing reunions, the least FEMA can do is get the word out to evacuees that they need to file a new release form.

Privacy is important, but so is getting lives and families back together.

Importing ideas

The New Orleans metro area needs to be in control of its own fate, but that doesn't mean we shouldn't look elsewhere for guidance in rebuilding.

Soliciting ideas from the smartest, most creative experts available is something that state and local leaders ought to do. The involvement of the nonprofit Urban Land Institute is a good sign that the Nagin administration isn't thinking too narrowly in seeking advice for the city's revival.

The prestigious Washington, D.C.-based think tank on land use and real estate will advise Mayor Ray Nagin's Bring Back New Orleans commission on everything from neighborhoods to business centers. And it's doing so at no charge.

A team of 15 experts, yet to be named, will arrive next month. Rachelle Levitt, vice president for policy and practice, says there's keen interest in this project. That's understandable: it's hard to imagine a more interesting challenge for an urban planner than bringing a city back from a catastrophe of this scale.

The institute developed a retail plan for the World Trade Center site after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and also helped Grand Forks, Minn., with its downtown redevelopment plan following a 1997 flood. But Katrina is in a class by itself.

What the city stands to gain is cutting-edge recommendations based on what successful developers and planners all over the world have done. And it will come from objective experts who shouldn't have political or economic agendas.

Given the scope of what needs to be done here, it will be all too easy for people to focus inward, but looking outward is far wiser.

Let 'em have it

North shore municipalities that opened their coffers to clean up trees and debris blocking roads after Katrina can't get anyone to cut them a check for reimbursement, even though the Federal Emergency Management Agency has sent the state money to cover 100 percent of such costs.

Frustrated mayors and parish officials told state legislators Thursday that they are in desperate straits because of the delay. Two, Pearl River and Folsom, will go broke in two weeks without the money, St. Tammany Parish President Kevin Davis said.

That's inexcusable. Cities that are struggling to maintain services in the face of huge revenue losses shouldn't face the prospect of going under because of an inefficient bureaucracy.

Officials can't even find out what the problem is. Mr. Davis, Mandeville Mayor Eddie Price and Madisonville Mayor Peter Gitz said that money was being withheld until a state audit was done on each application. But when legislators contacted State Auditor Steve Theriot, he said that wasn't the case.

Instead, state Rep. Pete Schneider said that "some colonel" has to approve applications before they can be issued.

That's a pretty muddled way to do business, and it's incomprehensible that the state and FEMA can't do a better job cutting through the snarl of red tape for these cities.

Maybe the government needs to appoint someone like the Special Man to distribute this money, especially since so many municipal governments are having to deal with the mess of not one, but two, hurricanes.

Towns like Mandeville, Madisonville and Pearl River spent their own money in good faith. Someone should just say, "let 'em have it."

OTHER OPINIONS

A melancholy welcome to St. Bernard

MANUEL TORRES

Suburban Report

My new neighbors tell me I would have liked Halloween.

It was the biggest event of the year in the Lexington Place subdivision in Meraux, where my wife and I had bought a home just over a week before Katrina hit. We were moving to the parish as I prepared to join The Times-Picayune's St. Bernard bureau. We were looking for a kid-friendly neighborhood for our two young boys, and everyone guided us to Lexington.

Halloween, we were told, was more than a celebration here — it was a production. Neighbors tried to outdo each other with displays that would have made light-extravaganza-hog Al Copeland proud. The lights, smoke machines and super-sized inflatable monsters attracted so many trick-or-treaters that on Halloween sheriff's deputies closed traffic into the subdivision at 5 p.m.

"Get lots of lights and lots of candy," was the first piece of neighborly advice we received.

Then came Katrina.

In place of scary-looking jack-o-lanterns and orange lights, the neighborhood is now littered with nature's perverse "decorations": crushed cars and upside-down boats perched atop fences and homes.

Somebody's shed crashed onto my sun room, and I think the pickup truck that's rammed into my backyard belongs to a guy from the street behind us. Down my block, the storm's surge lifted an entire house, slab and all, and deposited it on a front lawn across the street.

"It looks like a real horror flick," a neighbor across the street said recently when we met.

She was with her husband, both like myself clad in what has become St. Bernard's fall fashion — rubber boots, gloves, dust masks.

They built their home 14 years ago, watched their kids grow there, and like most in the parish, lost it all in the storm. The salvaged contents of their three-bedroom house fit in a Rubbermaid box.

Like them, I felt like an exiled St. Bernard resident.

In place of scary-looking jack-o-lanterns and orange lights, the neighborhood is now littered with nature's perverse 'decorations': crushed cars and upside-down boats perched atop fences and homes.

We talked the small-talk of the time. Sorry about all this. How's your family? Where are you now? Do you plan to come back?

The last one is the tough one.

This kind of destruction was just not what anybody in St. Bernard expected to see in our lifetime. But here we are. This muck-ridden place that bears only a ghostly resemblance to the community of just a few weeks ago is where I plan to be, along with my colleagues at the paper who also lost their homes in St. Bernard. We'll be here to cover the story of how we pick ourselves up, dust ourselves off and try to get on with life again.

People around the newsroom still occasionally come by to ask me in a hushed tone, like there was a death in the family, "What are they going to do with you now?"

They mean now that our office on Judge Perez Drive is destroyed and the future of the parish is uncertain. I used to give long answers about the prospects for reconstruction. Now I have a stock response: A news bureau, like the rest of the parish, is much more than just a building. It's a state of mind.

And St. Bernard is still very much alive in the minds of many residents, who cry as they express their love of the place, and almost ask for apologies for not being able to answer if or when they will return.

Like them, I don't have all the answers yet.

But lately I've been feeling the urge to start designing an oversized Halloween display.

Miss. myth spins faster than Katrina

ROBERT S. McELVAINE

CLINTON, MISS. — In the weeks since Hurricane Katrina struck, Haley Barbour, the Mississippi governor and former Republican national chairman, has been dividing his time between dealing with the disaster and spinning a myth. He has received more assistance from the Bush administration in the latter endeavor than in the former. Much of importance about the political future of the United States is riding on whether the public accepts this fiction as fact.

At the end of a "Primetime" program two weeks after the storm, host Ted Koppel summarized the Mississippi Myth and showed that he had bought it: "We have focused tonight exclusively on New Orleans, because the system seemed to work in Mississippi."

One reason why the Katrina catastrophe has not done for President Bush what the terrorist attacks did four years ago is that, this time, there was no external enemy against which to unite the American people and direct their anger. Instead, the Federal Emergency Management Agency and Bush himself became the "them." Their response was to shift blame to Democratic officials in Louisiana.

Mississippi Gov. Barbour has set himself up as the head cheerleader for Bush and FEMA. He repeatedly has dismissed all criticism of federal response to the catastrophe.

But since Katrina ravaged Mississippi as well as Louisiana, the crisis presents something akin to a controlled experiment to determine with whom the preponderance of the responsibility for negligence in the response rests.

Because Barbour is a Republican, the Bush team was not in a political position to shift blame to the state government in Mississippi. Barbour, moreover, fancies himself a contender for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. He plainly sees Katrina as an opportunity to build for himself a Rudy Giuliani-like reputation for crisis leadership.

Throughout the calamity, Barbour has not been willing to criticize the Bush administration or federal relief efforts. On the contrary, he has set himself up as the head cheerleader for Bush and FEMA. He repeatedly has dismissed all criticism of federal response to the catastrophe.

"That's all cooked up by the news media and a few enemies of George Bush," he contends. "The federal government has been fabulous in our state."

AP PHOTO

Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour, right, talks with Lt. Dean Jenkins with Indiana Conservation and other volunteers in Vancleave, Miss., Tuesday. Barbour visited to thank volunteers assisting in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

One definition of "fabulous" in my dictionary is "resembling a fable, absurd." If that was what Barbour meant, his statement was accurate.

Michael Brown, who is still on the FEMA payroll as a consultant, echoes the Barbour-Bush line that the system worked in Mississippi. He claims that he had no problems in this state. Let's not mince words: That is a lie.

In fact, as any number of Mississippians in the heavily Republican region flattened by Katrina will attest, FEMA was every bit as incompetent in Mississippi as it was in Louisiana. "You can try to throw as much as you can on the backs of Louisianians," the conservative Democratic Rep. Gene Taylor of Mississippi told Brown at a House committee hearing, "but I'm a witness as to what happened in Mississippi. You folks fell on your face."

Most prominent Mississippi Republicans have not concurred with Barbour's rosy assessment of federal disaster efforts. Sen. Trent Lott flatly stated that Mississippians "are disenchanted" with the federal response in their state.

By nine days after the storm, Lott had concluded that FEMA wasn't up to the job. "We're just going around them," said the former Senate Republican leader. When the Harrison County sheriff told Lott that FEMA was diverting supplies, Lott's response was to the point: "If anyone from FEMA tries to confiscate anything, arrest them."

Republican Rep. Charles W. Pickering Jr. also has severely criticized FEMA on several counts.

Barbour's disingenuous assessment notwithstanding, the system plainly did not work in Mississippi. What actually happened in Mississippi under a supposedly competent and efficient Republican governor was so similar to what happened in Louisiana that it constitutes compelling evidence that, while there were also obvious breakdowns at the local and state levels, the basic failure was at the federal level.

The truth is that in this crisis Mississippi is the non-exception that proves the federal rulers wrong.

THOMAS L. FRIEDMAN

Winning the race

What if we were really having a national discussion about what is most important to the country today and on the minds of most parents?

I have no doubt that it would be a loud, noisy dinner-table conversation about why so many U.S. manufacturers are moving abroad — not just to find lower wages, but to find smarter workers, better infrastructure and cheaper health care. It would be about why in Germany, 36 percent of undergrads receive degrees in science and engineering; in China, 59 percent; in Japan, 66 percent; and in America, only 32 percent.

It would be about why U.S. 12th graders recently performed below the international average for 21 countries in math and science, and it would be about why, in recent years, U.S. industry appears to have spent more on lawsuits than on R&D. Yes, we'd be talking about why the world is racing us to the top, not the bottom, and why we are quietly falling behind.

And late in the evening, as the wine bottles emptied, someone at the national dinner table might finally say: "Hey, what if we were really thinking ahead? What if we asked some of the country's best minds to make a list of the steps we could take right now to enhance America's technology base?"

Fortunately, two senators, Lamar Alexander and Jeff Bingaman, asked the National Academy of Sciences, the National Academy of Engineering and the Institute of Medicine to form a bipartisan study group to produce just such a list, which was released on Wednesday in a report called "Rising Above the Gathering Storm."

The report's key recommendations? Nothing fancy. Charles Vest, the former president of MIT, summed them up: "We need to get back to basic blocking and tackling" — educating more Americans in the skills needed for 21st-century jobs.

Among the top priorities, the report says, should be these:

(1) Annually recruiting 10,000 science and math teachers by awarding four-year merit-based scholarships, to be paid back through five years of K-12 public school teaching. (We have too many unqualified science and math teachers.)

(2) Strengthening the math and science skills of 250,000 other teachers through extracurricular programs.

(3) Creating opportunities and incentives for many more middle school and high school students to take advanced math and science courses, by offering, among other things, $100 mini-scholarships for success in exams, and creating more specialty math-and-science schools.

(4) Increasing federal investment in long-term basic research by 10 percent a year over the next seven years.

(5) Annually providing research grants of $500,000 each, payable over five years, to 200 of America's most outstanding young researchers.

(6) Granting automatic one-year visa extensions to foreign students in the U.S. who receive doctorates in science, engineering or math so they can seek employment here, and creating 5,000 National Science Foundation-administered graduate fellowships to increase the number of U.S. citizens earning doctoral degrees in fields of "national need." (See the rest at www.nationalacademies.org.)

These proposals are the new New Deal urgently called for by our times. This is where President Bush should have focused his second term, instead of squandering it on a silly, ideological jag called Social Security privatization. Because, as this report concludes, "Without a renewed effort to bolster the foundations of our competitiveness, we can expect to lose our privileged position."

Although uninvited guests named Katrina and Rita blew many couples' nuptial plans out of the water, one local couple still set sail last weekend on the sea of matrimony. And a rescheduled bridal show can help steer other displaced brides and grooms in a similar direction.

'It was the day we had planned for more than a year,' says Jamie Dill, wiping away a tear on her wedding night, six weeks after Hurricane Katrina.

Wedded blitz

By Maria Montoya
Staff writer

Jamie Dill's invitations were sealed and mailed. Her gown picked out. Bridesmaids and groomsmen good to go. The wedding of her dreams a month away from reality.

Then came Katrina.

While many brides-to-be across the area panicked, Dill remained steadfast. She'd waited five years to marry her high school sweetheart, Jason Ledet. Displaced or not, she wanted her wedding to go on as planned.

"As we watched everything that was going on, we knew we had to have the wedding no matter what," Dill said of her Oct. 8 nuptials. "Even if it wasn't going to be anything like we planned it, we had to have the wedding. It was the day we had planned for more than a year."

As Dill and Ledet walked down the aisle at St. Henry's Catholic Church on Gen. Pershing Street, they were excited not only for their new status as man and wife, but for the fact that their family could focus on celebration rather than devastation for the first time since Aug. 29.

For most other brides-to-be in the affected areas, however, Katrina and Rita are causing wedding rescheduling nightmares.

WEDDING VENUES, C-4

THE ULTIMATE BRIDAL SHOW

What: Displaced brides who need help reorganizing their weddings due to Hurricane Katrina and/or Rita can register for services and meet with area vendors that are now operating.

When: 1 to 5:30 p.m. Sunday. Fashion show at 4 p.m.

Where: Marriott Hotel, 5500 Hilton Ave., Baton Rouge.

Cost: $6 per person, with a portion going to the Red Cross.

Call: (225) 752-9183 or visit the Web site at www.theweddingmarket.com.

HOW TO RESCUE YOUR HURRICANE-DELAYED WEDDING

Assess your contracts. Before making any calls, examine the fine print in written agreements you might have made. Many contracts have an "act of God" clause that releases you from your contract.

Be patient. Chances are the folks you were working with in planning your wedding are Katrina or Rita victims too.

Make contact, not assumptions. Most brides have room blocks for their events, but not all hotels are able to honor those arrangements because contract and relief workers are occupying most of the city's habitable hotel rooms. If you want to go ahead with your date, contact the hotel to confirm that your event will go on as scheduled.

Be open to new ideas. Many businesses are up and operating, and smaller hotels and venues are accepting new weddings and are willing to work with displaced brides.

Prioritize. Determine what is most important to you so you can decide if it's better to stick with the original date and make adjustments or wait for the wedding you originally planned.

MAGAZINE, STREET OF DREAMS, REAWAKENS

COMEBACK TRAIL Signposts on the road to normalcy

FOR SHOPPERS, one of the many storm-tarnished gems in New Orleans' crown is poised to shine again. Everyone is invited to head to Magazine Street today with brooms, rakes and garden clippers in hand to participate in a volunteer cleanup effort.

The cleanup crew will gather first at Napoleon Avenue and Magazine at 9 a.m. before dispersing throughout a six-mile stretch of the shopping mecca. In conjunction with the effort, several boutiques and spas have readied themselves to throw open their doors today, if they hadn't already.

For instance:

Weinsteins (4011 Magazine St.), Filly (5418 Magazine St.), Trashy Diva (2048 Magazine St.), Winky's (2038 Magazine St.) and Metro Three (2032 Magazine St.) will be offering everything from haute couture to cheeky T-shirts reading "Nagin for President."

Neophobia (2022 Magazine St.), Talebloo Antiques (2015 Magazine St.), Melange Sterling Silver (5421 Magazine St.), Retro-Active (5418 Magazine St.), Hugh Martin Home (4222 Magazine St., #A) and Plum (5430 Magazine St.) have both functional and quirky home furnishings in stock.

Aidan Gill (2026 Magazine St.) is open for shaves, haircuts and single malt scotches, while Belladonna (2900 Magazine St.) has a limited menu of manicures, pedicures, facials and massages, as well as Halloween decor mixed in with its still burgeoning housewares department. The spa Charlotte Williamson (4864 Magazine St.) has opened its doors, too.

Savvy Gourmet (4519 Magazine St.) is hosting Saturday night open houses at which shoppers can find any number of cool cooking gadgets. Scriptura (5423 Magazine St.) and Stationer of New Orleans (3947 Magazine St.) will be open as well with their selections of stationery and accessories.

Once the street has been brought back to its original patina, expect even more retailers to join the mix. Bryan Batt of Hazelnut's (5515 Magazine St.) is organizing a Nov. 5 grand opening of the street, hoping that by then, "open for business" signs will have replaced wooden storm boards on every block.

EATING OUT

Emeril Lagasse appeared on the cover of Cigar Aficionado magazine this month, but he hasn't appeared in New Orleans since Hurricane Katrina.

WHERE'S EMERIL?

Celebrity chef has been a New Orleans no-show since the storm

Emeril Lagasse has, in the way only Emeril Lagasse can, appeared to be everywhere recently.

Everywhere but New Orleans.

Since Hurricane Katrina forced the closure of Lagasse's three New Orleans restaurants and layoffs within his company, the quintessential celebrity chef has maintained a rigorous schedule of appearances, and not just on his two television shows, "Emeril Live" and "Essence of Emeril," both of which air daily on the Food Network.

There are the "Good Morning America" segments every Friday and, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, big-ticket charity events in New York City, Las Vegas, Miami and elsewhere. You'll also find him on the covers of the October issues of Gourmet and Cigar Aficionado magazines.

Earlier this month saw the release of his 11th cookbook, "Delmonico: A Restaurant With a Past," prompting a publicity tour kick-off on "The Tonight Show With Jay Leno."

The busy schedule, Lagasse said, is one of the main reasons he hasn't gotten around to visiting New Orleans since Hurricane Katrina hit the city Aug. 29.

"I know this is a major catastrophe, but I work so far in advance. My things are planned, my people are planned," Lagasse said Wednesday from Raleigh, N.C., another book-tour stop. But even in absentia, Lagasse contends, "I don't know anyone out there who's been more rah-rah for the city of New Orleans in the last couple of weeks."

In terms of people reached, Lagasse may be right. As arguably the most recognizable restaurant chef in the world, and perhaps the most famous personality in Louisiana, Lagasse commands a large audience whenever he speaks.

But for Lagasse, New Orleans is more than home. The chef, a Massachusetts native, fixed his star to the city's culinary reputation when he took over the kitchen at Commander's Palace in 1983, and both the man and the city have benefited tremendously. Emeril's, Emeril's Delmonico and NOLA, the chef's New Orleans restaurants, are part of a nine-restaurant empire that includes locations in Las Vegas, Orlando, Miami and Atlanta. WEDDING, from C-1

Hotels are filled with rescue workers, leaving no room at the inn for out-of-town wedding guests. Many restaurants, banquet halls and churches are in shambles, and those that are up and running are scrambling to reassemble their service staffs. Families throughout the Gulf Coast are scattered and, in many cases, financially or emotionally wrecked.

These aren't exactly the ingredients for wedding-day magic. But help for displaced brides is on the way, says wedding planner Allie Wester, who has organized a wedding show for hurricane-harried brides-to-be.

At "The Ultimate Bridal Show" Sunday at the Marriott Hotel in Baton Rouge, Wester plans to register affected brides for services being offered by vendors throughout the state, many of them at lower-than-usual prices. A handful are even willing to donate their time at cost.

"People all across the industry are just wanting to help every one of the girls who's been impacted by either one of the hurricanes," Wester said. "Some of them have lost everything, while others may just need help with bits and pieces of their wedding."

The event was originally scheduled for last month, but had to be rescheduled as Hurricane Rita approached.

A portion of the $6 admission fee will go to the Red Cross, according to Wester.

In addition to the usual wedding-show trappings, such as a fashion show and a honeymoon giveaway, experts will be on hand to offer advice for prospective brides dealing with the now-complicated details of finding venues and vendors.

"I wanted to do something to help and this is what I know best, weddings," Wester said. "A lot of us are hoping this will be a fun day for the brides — a distraction from all the disaster they may be facing in their lives."

Wester said brides should know she is working with vendors to make sure that donated services go only to those truly in need. Documentation and proof that a wedding was in the works pre-Katrina and Rita will be required from brides-to-be looking to register for relief.

"We may not be able to give a bride her date back, but we want to help any way we can," Wester said, "because weddings are a big part of getting back to a normal way of life."

Mr. and Mrs. Jason Ledet couldn't agree more. Going ahead with their original date was symbolic to the couple. Katrina damaged their St. Rose home, but would not destroy their wedding plans.

"You have to just go with your heart," Jamie said. "A bride shouldn't automatically postpone or cancel just because our city is suffering. The city needs our help to rebuild and families need to get back to normal, and nothing says normal more than a having a wedding."

Plus, Jason added, in such stressful times, a party can bring some welcome relief.

"It's all about what is important to you," Jason said on his wedding day. "A big party with hundreds of people just wasn't possible at this time, but to me the only thing that mattered was my bride saying 'I do.' And today, she did."

Where the weddings are

How some New Orleans-area ceremony spots are coping post-Katrina

Astor Crowne Plaza
739 Canal St., www.astorcrowneplaza.com

Sales Manager Don Zimmer reports that all weddings and wedding room bookings are canceled until January. The hotel is working to reschedule events starting in mid-January.

Audubon Nature Institute's Aquarium and Zoo
riverfront and Uptown, www.audubooninstitute.org

Anyone who had an event planned for this year will get first choice of available dates for next year, according to Richard Buchsbaum, vice president of food and beverage. "There are some real mixed emotions from everyone, but overwhelmingly all of our clients are telling us they want their event to be in New Orleans no matter what," he said. "It's tremendous how much everyone wants to see the city rebuilt."

Café Amelie in the Princess of Monaco Courtyard
912 Royal St., (504) 412-8965

Chef Jerry Mixon and owner Susan Hoffman are reopening their doors this week. They've already heard via e-mail from most of their prospective brides and estimate that 85 percent are rescheduling for later this year and next year. "There are a good number of brides out there that we'd love to help," Mixon said. "We'd hate to see anyone left without a venue, so we are open and ready to get some parties planned."

Elms Mansion
3029 St. Charles Ave., (504) 258-3352
faithelms@yahoo.com

Faith Roche, co-owner of the Elms, reports, "We lost our homes in Lakeview, but thank God the Elms grounds are untouched." The mansion's first wedding will take place the first week of November and Roche expects to have several weddings happening by mid-November. Displaced brides can reach Roche at the phone number and e-mail listed above.

Magnolia Plantation
818 Elmwood Park Blvd., Harahan, (504) 733-5020

"Elmwood is high and dry," said Colette Sterbcow of Magnolia Plantation, where the next wedding will take place Oct. 22. Sterbcow reports that most of her vendors have checked in and she is working with brides who need to reschedule or cancel. "We're trying to give everyone the time they need to figure out how to go forward with their event," she said. "We want to try to work with whatever needs a bride might have at this time."

Muriel's Jackson Square
801 Chartres St., (504) 568-1955

Sales Manager Annie Flettrich is preparing for Muriel's first post-Katrina wedding on Oct. 29. She said any bride set on doing a New Orleans-style soirée "should know that most of the Quarter and parts of Uptown are looking more normal every day."

New Orleans City Park
(225) 342-4933 or (504) 554-1775

There are varying levels of damage to the facilities and gardens at City Park. Chief Executive Officer Bob Becker says the staff is still assessing the damage and focused on getting the Botanical Gardens and Pavilion of the Two Sisters restored. "We are asking anyone with an event scheduled between now and December to reschedule with our catering coordinator," Becker said.

New Orleans Opera Guild Home
2304 Prytania St., (281) 469-2296

Spokeswoman Elaine Trouard says the Garden District structure has some water damage and several windows were blown out by high winds. The members of the Opera Guild hope to have events resume by mid-January. Prospective brides forced to cancel will be reimbursed on a case-by-case basis.

Omni Royal Orleans
621 St. Louis St., (504) 529-5333

Celebrating its 45th anniversary this year, the Royal Orleans is one of the few hotels still offering weddings and honoring room blocks for events on a large scale. Denise Weaks, director of sales, says a good number of the hotel's staff have returned. "We are committed to making sure everything is perfect for the brides who have their events planned with us," she said.

Ritz Carlton
921 Canal St., (904) 491-6655

No events will be scheduled until the Spring of 2006, according to Char Schroeder, a spokeswoman for the hotel. "Brides really want to have their weddings in New Orleans," Schroeder said. "I'm excited to say most of our brides will be (rescheduling) their events in the spring."

Emeril a no-show

operations as well as the name of his New Orleans headquarters on St. Charles Avenue, brings in nearly $200 million in annual revenue, according to Gourmet.

Almost seven weeks after New Orleans fell victim to the worst natural disaster in the country's history, it's fair to question the chef's priorities. His business has taken a hit — while none of his restaurants flooded, Emeril's was looted and Delmonico damaged by wind. But the company is diversified, geographically and otherwise. With revenue streaming in from sources as disparate as toothpaste endorsements, branded cookware and wildly popular restaurants in still-thriving locales, Lagasse is certainly doing a whole lot better than the city that launched him.

At the very least, one imagines the folks in Raleigh would understand if the chef postponed his book signing to survey what has been lost, and personally provide a lift to those who lost it.

Instead, Lagasse said, he deliberately laid low after the storm.

"I stayed out of the media purposefully for the first couple of weeks," he said. "I didn't think it was the right thing to do."

Lagasse did not emerge from Katrina personally unscathed. His West Bank mansion was damaged, but not destroyed, and the house he was renovating on the Mississippi coast was, as he put it, reduced to "two sticks." While his wife and children evacuated safely, he had to arrange to move his daughter's wedding ceremony to Las Vegas from New Orleans, where the nuptials were scheduled for the weekend after the storm.

In the days after Katrina hit, Lagasse said, "I was the guy that spent 18 hours a day on the telephone, finding people, moving people, (checking on) the other six restaurants . . . now I've got a third less revenue. I was running the business, and the business is about people."

Before Katrina, Lagasse employed 380 people in New Orleans. His management team is still intact, he said, and many restaurant employees were relocated to other operations in Las Vegas, Atlanta and Florida. He can't say how many of his New Orleans employees are still on the payroll.

"My problem is, I got everybody all over the place. Some are in Atlanta, some are in Orlando, my assistant's in L.A.," Lagasse said. "We had layoffs at Homebase, but we tried to have as few as possible."

One Homebase employee no longer on the payroll said she was informed of her job status during a Sept. 12 phone call from a supervisor. "This is your last day," the employee was told. "There will be no more paychecks."

Another Homebase employee said she called her supervisor the Wednesday after the storm to inform him of her willingness to work from afar. "The following Wednesday he called and said that I was being let go," she said. "There was no mention of any sort of coming back."

The quick layoffs contrasted sharply with Dickie Brennan and Company's decision to keep all of its roughly 400 full-time employees on the payroll, with checks including tips for wait staff.

Coupled with Lagasse's relatively low profile in the weeks following Katrina, the cutbacks — which, according to an employee still working for Homebase, included accountants assigned to Lagasse's local restaurants — bred uncertainty as to whether the chef would return to New Orleans at all.

Lagasse's first public comments about the future of his restaurants were made Sept. 16 on "Good Morning America."

"I want to give people jobs, believe me," Lagasse said, according to the transcripts. "I want to get back there and rebuild and want to be a part of the community. My heart is with my staff."

Later in the segment, Lagasse said, "I can't wait to get back in there."

A month later, he still hasn't. But he insists that he will. Eventually.

"I can't be more positive about New Orleans," he said. "That's my home. That's Homebase. As soon as we can get open, believe me, we'll be open."

A multitude of issues is holding Lagasse back from saying exactly when he'll reopen his local restaurants. He's worried about the health risks, about supplies, about staffing, about another hurricane. His brother and both parents, all Homebase employees, are on the ground, reporting back to him.

"I lost pretty much all our refrigeration," Lagasse said. "That stuff is all custom built."

It's also too early to tell how much of his restaurants' world-class wine collections made it through the storm.

"I've got to make a decision shortly," he said, "but putting a date on it, I can't really answer that right now."

In the meantime, Lagasse said he will continue to appear on television and at book signings. He's due to sign books at a Sam's Wholesale Club in Philadelphia on Wednesday.

When pressed to explain why he has yet to make an appearance in New Orleans, Lagasse re-emphasized his ongoing fundraising efforts for victims of the storm. On Tuesday, an eight-course dinner for 20 prepared by Lagasse and chef Mario Batali was auctioned off for $100,000 at a benefit in New York City. Lagasse said the money will go directly into the Emeril Lagasse Employee Disaster Relief Fund, which was set up to benefit all non-management employees in his company, including those who were laid off.

"I did a thing at the Smithsonian with Cokie Roberts, talking positive about New Orleans," Lagasse said, referring to another recent book signing, this one at George Washington University. "I do that stuff every day. Unfortunately, I'm not on the local Channel 6 in front of the broken window at Emeril's."

If he had been, Lagasse no doubt would have attracted the attention of every major media outlet reporter and camera crew in New Orleans to cover the devastation. The message blasted around the world would have been priceless: I'm a New Orleanian. I'm here to help. I'm coming back.

That's the message another New Orleans celebrity chef, Paul Prudhomme, sent out Sept. 20 during an appearance on MSNBC's "Hardball With Chris Matthews."

"We're feeding anybody in sight," Prudhomme said via satellite from the French Quarter. "If you're hungry, we want to feed you. . . . If you're in the military, we especially want to feed you.

"That's my job, to lift people up with great food."

That Lagasse, one of popular culture's great media masters, took a pass on the chance to put his own mega-celebrity to good use at such an unprecedented moment is just one of many post-Katrina mysteries. What isn't a mystery is that plenty of people have managed to do what Lagasse has yet to attempt: serve food to people in post-Katrina New Orleans.

Everyone has obstacles.

On the first night that New Orleans water was certified drinkable, sommelier Jeff Kundinger, whose Lakeview home was destroyed by Katrina, donned a coat and tie to work the floor at Cuvée. Chef Bob Iacovonne labored essentially alone in the kitchen. His pastry chef and both his sous chefs were rattled by the storm. "None of them are coming back," he said.

The menu that night included a shrimp and fried mirliton Napoleon, a Cuvée signature, and crab-topped salmon in brie orzo. Producing food of that quality in post-Katrina New Orleans requires hunger, courage and sacrifice. And as anyone who has eaten in post-Katrina New Orleans has come to understand, being the recipient of such a gesture is more nourishing than mere food could ever be.

When he could sell cookbooks to an audience of millions, why would Lagasse bother?

DEAR ABBY

Jeanne Phillips

Lover has many acquaintances

DEAR ABBY: I got the surprise of my life three years ago when my husband of 28 years asked for a divorce. Not long after the divorce became final, I ran into "Tim," an old high school classmate, and fell head over heels for him. He stays at my house every weekend and is on his own during the week.

Last week I used Tim's e-mail account to send an e-mail. When I pulled up the account, I discovered that for the past three years, the man I'm in love with has been seeing five other women! He reminded me that he has been a bachelor for 20 years and has many female acquaintances. He sees nothing wrong with going out with them, and sees one of them once a week.

I am extremely uncomfortable knowing that Tim has been seeing other women and wasn't upfront with me about it. I was under the impression that we had an exclusive relationship. Are my feelings unreasonable?

Shocked in Ohio

DEAR SHOCKED: If Tim lied to you about having an exclusive relationship, then you have reason to be angry. However, if he did not — and exclusivity was important to you — you should have made certain it was discussed. Surely, if Tim was deceiving you, he wouldn't have given you his password. Now that you know his feelings about monogamy, it's up to you to decide whether you will tolerate an open relationship, because it appears that's all he's willing to have. P.S.: At the risk of sounding like a broken record, I suggest that you be checked for STDs.

•••••••

DEAR ABBY: Please settle a disagreement my wife, "Angela," and I are having. We heard from some friends that Angela's nephew was being married. Angela saw her nephew on a couple of occasions, and he never once mentioned that he was even engaged. The wedding was held in July. We did not receive an invitation. Now an announcement has arrived in the mail stating that they are married. Angela has heard through the grapevine that the bride is registered for wedding gifts at a local department store. I say we should send them a card since we were neither notified of the engagement nor invited to the wedding. Angela is very upset over this because she has always felt close to her nephew — but apparently her feelings weren't reciprocated. She thinks we should send a nice gift. What do you think, Abby?

Confused and Sad

DEAR CONFUSED AND SAD: You and your wife are in no way obligated to send a gift to her nephew and his bride. However, because your wife feels she would like to send something, a "token" gift would be suitable — and very generous under the circumstances.

•••••••

DEAR ABBY: I'm 24 and find myself in a situation where my relationship with my boyfriend may be coming to an end. The breakup isn't the part I fear the most. It hurts, but time heals and I know I will be OK. What I'm dreading are the inevitable questions I'll be getting about why it happened. Why can't people — especially family — just accept things for what they are? Talking about it won't make it any better. How should I respond to people who ask me questions? I want to be polite but still make it clear that questions only make it worse.

Sad in Chicago

DEAR SAD: Here's the mantra. Say, "It's really too painful to discuss right now, and I'd appreciate it if you would drop the subject." And if the questioner is insensitive enough to persist after that, repeat it. Then change the subject.

Bankruptcy court busy

Hundreds of Louisiana residents affected by Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita have gone to bankruptcy court to seek protection from debtors before tougher new restrictions go into effect Monday. In the federal bankruptcy court of the Eastern District of Louisiana, based in New Orleans, 439 claims were processed Wednesday, bringing the total since Oct. 1 to 1,554. That's a tenfold increase from last year. "Unfortunately, it's been especially busy in the last two weeks," Baton Rouge lawyer Bruce Deuhne said. "A lot of these people are so confused. We're still seeing people show up, they're hit with huge losses from the hurricane, and then with huge losses from the financial consequences." Louisiana's three district bankruptcy offices have processed 28,604 bankruptcy filings since Jan. 1, which is more than all of 2004.

Katrina hurts Hancock

Hurricane Katrina took a bite out of Hancock Holding Co.'s third-quarter earnings. The Gulfport, Miss., company reported third-quarter net income Friday of $1.44 million, down from $15.4 million during the same quarter a year earlier. On a per-share basis, the company earned 4 cents, down from 47 cents in the same quarter a year earlier. Katrina cost Hancock more than $26 million before taxes, including storm-related provisions for credit losses, direct expenses tied to the storm, and fees and service charges that were waived to help bank customers affected by the storm. Excluding Katrina's impact, Hancock's third-quarter earnings would have been $18.81 million, or 57 cents per share.

Seafood industry not gone

Louisiana seafood products making their way to the market now are safe — despite disruptions and losses the industry sustained because of Hurricane Katrina, according to experts at the Louisiana State University AgCenter. Oyster beds in the Gulf of Mexico east of Terrebonne Parish are closed, but shellfish harvested from other areas are safe to eat, said Dr. Jon Bell, a seafood technology professor at the AgCenter. Bell said the westernmost portions of the Louisiana oyster beds were never closed and that they produce about one-third of the state oyster harvest.

Rig count rises

The number of rigs actively exploring for oil and natural gas in the United States increased by one this week to 1,482. Of the rigs running nationwide, 1,262 were exploring for gas and 215 for oil, Baker Hughes Inc. reported Friday. Five were listed as miscellaneous. A year ago, the rig count was 1,225.

Flood maps' release delayed

Rebuilding effort won't have to wait

By Jeffrey Meitrodt
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Though federal officials were on the verge of releasing new flood maps for New Orleans just before Hurricane Katrina struck the city in late August, those maps won't be released for at least another year, which means people interested in rebuilding their flooded homes can move forward without waiting to see what the new maps look like, representatives of the Federal Emergency Management Agency told state lawmakers Friday.

In fact, it could take as long as five years for the agency to issue new maps, said Carl Watts, a compliance expert with the National Flood Insurance Program, which is overseen by FEMA.

The maps are used by local officials to determine the minimum elevation needed for homeowners to avoid damage from a "100-year flood." In New Orleans, homeowners have been required to build at those elevations since the city joined the flood insurance program in the early 1970s.

FEMA hasn't updated the flood maps in New Orleans since 1984. Until the agency issues new maps, homeowners and contractors can rely on the older maps for elevation requirements, Watts said. He said those maps can be found on FEMA's Web site, as well as the city's Office of Safety and Permits.

Of the 256,000 homes covered by federal flood insurance in the seven-parish metropolitan area, more than 155,000 stand at elevations that are too low to protect them from a 100-year flood, according to flood insurance data supplied by FEMA.

In the past, those properties were able to qualify for discounted flood insurance because they were built before the city joined the program. But under local building codes, any house that sustained damage estimated at 50 percent or more of its market value will have to be brought into compliance with the current elevation requirements, Watts said.

For instance, if it cost $49,999 to repair a house worth an estimated $100,000, the property owner would not have to build at a higher elevation — even if all of the neighboring houses had to be raised, Watts said. However, if the repairs on that house cost $50,000 or more, the property owner would have to meet the current elevation requirements.

State Rep. Cedric Richmond, D-New Orleans, said those kinds of calculations could prove costly for many of his constituents, who haven't been forced to meet the elevation requirements because they were living in homes that predated the city's first flood maps. What happens, he asked, if Katrina

INFLATION JUMPS 1.2%

By Martin Crutsinger
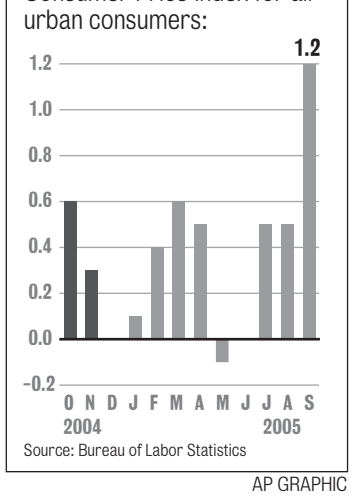
AP economics writer

WASHINGTON — Consumer prices soared last month by the biggest amount in a quarter-century, propelled by hurricanes Katrina and Rita and the record gasoline costs in their wake. The storms caused industrial production and consumer confidence to plunge, raising new worries about the economy's ability to bounce back.



The Labor Department reported Friday that inflation jumped 1.2 percent last month. Ninety percent of the increase came from a record-shattering 12 percent surge in energy prices, reflecting tight supplies after widespread shutdowns of refineries and oil and natural gas production along the Gulf Coast.

Those shutdowns contributed to 1.3 percent drop in industrial production in September, the biggest falloff in 23 years.

On the consumer front, retail sales managed to eke out just a

The price of gas looms large at nearly $2.95 a gallon for regular unleaded at a Sunoco station in Solon, Ohio, on Monday. The average retail price of gasoline is $2.94 a gallon nationwide, or about $1 a gallon higher than a year ago, according to AAA. Analysts said they did not expect a sharp move lower anytime soon because of the persistent supply constraints caused by back-to-back hurricanes.

Web page loses donation button

PayPal halts storm relief on sex site

Internet payment service PayPal has pulled the plug on hurricane donations to a New Orleans dot.com because the company's Web site helps men connect with each other for sex and sells sexually explicit videos.

CFS.com, which operates the "Cruising for Sex" Web site, fired back in court, asking a California judge in San Jose to force PayPal to restore the donation link on the New Orleans company's site.

"At no time . . . did CFS.com use PayPal to send or receive payments or donations for sexually oriented goods or services," the company claims in its lawsuit.

The rift surfaced shortly after CFS.com founder and COO Keith Griffith added a PayPal link to the company's Web site on Sept. 1, three days after Hurricane Katrina tore through the central Gulf Coast and devastated New Orleans. PayPal is the leading conduit that allows Internet users to pay for goods or services online.

The link was created to raise money for the company's New Orleans employees, who were forced to evacuate and faced uncertain losses in the wake of the storm.

After about $2,000 was raised through the link, PayPal shut down the operation.

The hurricane donation link appeared on the same page as solicitations for escort services, as well as a separate donation link to support the Web site.

Hibernia vote is next month

Shareholders face revised sale offer

Hibernia Corp. shareholders will meet Nov. 14 at the Houstonian Hotel in Houston to vote on the new terms of the bank's merger with Capital One Financial Corp.

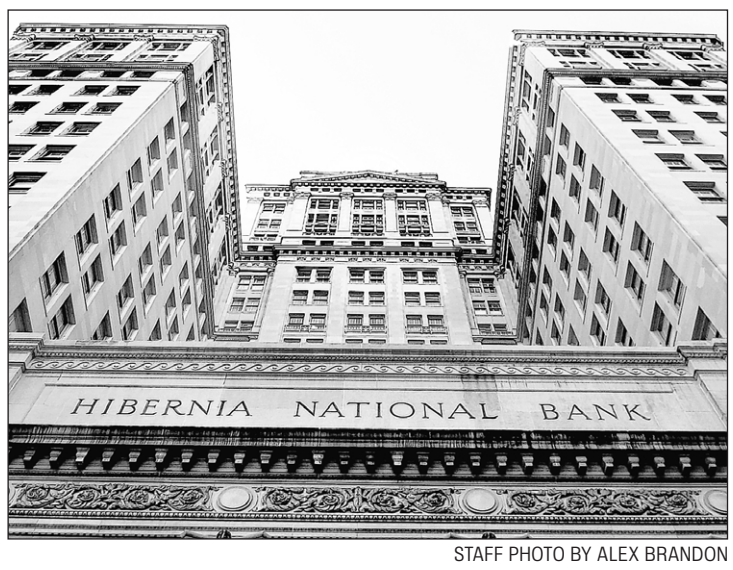
The closing of the merger, which shareholders approved in August, was postponed twice after Hurricane Katrina hit in late August and new merger terms were negotiated.

Shareholders meeting in Houston will have to vote again on the merger agreement and make new declarations as to whether they want to turn their Hibernia shares in for Capital One stock, cash or a combination of the two.

In a proxy statement outlining the new merger proposal, Hibernia said it "expects to experience substantial employee and recovery costs."



Hibernia said its consumer, mortgage, auto, commercial and small business loan portfolios have been affected because borrowers may not be able to repay loans and because the collateral pledged for some loans may have been damaged.

The bank also said it may have difficulty competing with banks that were not impacted.

Hurricane Katrina forced Hibernia to initially close 129 branches, which represented 5 percent of its deposits.

In early September, Herb Boydstun, Hibernia chief executive, said decisions on reopening some of the branches would depend on how the surrounding areas redevelop. On Friday, the bank had reopened all but 27 branches in the New Orleans area.

Housing shortage hinders rebound

Employers scramble to shelter workers

Textron Industries and Land Systems was a company on the ball.

Days after Katrina devastated its eastern New Orleans assembly center, executives were tracking down the company's 1,200 employees, rebuilding the plant, and searching for housing to bring highly skilled craftsmen back to work.

But seven weeks and tons of bureaucratic red tape later, the company — a defense contractor with strong government connections — is still awaiting delivery of the 200 Federal Emergency Management Agency trailers it needs to house key workers temporarily.

Meanwhile, production on the armored vehicles needed to protect U.S. soldiers in Iraq has dropped from 30 a month to eight.

If Textron has had a hard time dealing with FEMA, the problems confronting businesses with fewer government connections are only more daunting.

"I cannot imagine being a midsized nonpublic company in the middle of a hurricane zone trying to navigate these bureaucratic waters," said Clay Moise, Textron's vice president of marine and combat vehicles. "Fortunately, we have a lot of connections, being a government contractor, and it still took us this long. If we weren't, we would have been in a world of hurt."

Textron's frustrations are shared by thousands of business owners who are grappling with what has emerged in recent weeks as the single most critical issue to the region's rebirth: finding housing for workers.

Almost two months after Katrina put an abrupt end to commerce, many companies remain shuttered for the sole reason that their employees have nowhere to live. Others are running at a fraction of their usual staff while they wait for FEMA's slumberous

HOUSTON — Across the street from the Astrodome, in the alcove of a motel where the night manager sits behind bulletproof glass, a young man leaned against a faded stucco wall.

A grin crept beneath his wispy mustache when a stranger approached.

"Do you know who I am?" he asked.

His name is Jabar Gibson.

The first bus to arrive in Houston loaded with Hurricane Katrina evacuees from New Orleans was not operated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency or any other government authority. It was an Orleans Parish school bus, its driver too young to drink but already a convicted car thief. His cargo: 60 of New Orleans' poorest residents, the youngest a week-old infant and the oldest 59.

It was known as the "renegade bus." Gibson, 20, was its renegade driver.

Gibson acknowledges he stole the bus, although in what has become Katrina lingo, he "commandeered" it to rescue himself and his neighbors. While the storm's floodwaters ultimately did not advance into Algiers, there was no way of knowing that in the chaotic Tuesday morning after the storm. Water was filling up the east bank, Mayor Ray Nagin was on the radio that afternoon predicting several feet on St. Charles Avenue, and panicked residents crossed the bridge to the West Bank, telling tales of impending doom.

"The police was leaving people behind. I had to pick up people on the bus. The police didn't want to do nothing. We stepped up and did what we had to do," said Gibson, who declined to say more because he since has agreed to a movie deal that prohibits interviews.

Pump workers say they wanted to stay

Facing danger part of the job

By Michelle Krupa

Even as they followed orders to abandon their stations before Hurricane Katrina slashed ashore, some of Jefferson Parish's pump operators asked why they couldn't stay.

Why couldn't some volunteers, possibly as many as 30 workers on the West Bank alone, ride out the hurricane in a parish building, they asked, or even hunker down inside pump stations while their colleagues evacuated 100 miles north, as dictated by the parish's "doomsday" plan?

"The question was raised, yes," said Jimmy Aragon, who oversees West Jefferson's 14 staffed pump stations and was among the last wave of 236 pump workers to evacuate Aug. 28, the night before Katrina's landfall. "But we were told that West Jefferson (Medical Center) was full. They were housing firefighters and policemen.

"But there wasn't a choice," he said. "Everybody was ordered to go. There was no choice. We couldn't have stayed if we wanted to."

With thousands of Jefferson homes now in various states of ruin because of flooding, the order by Parish President Aaron Broussard

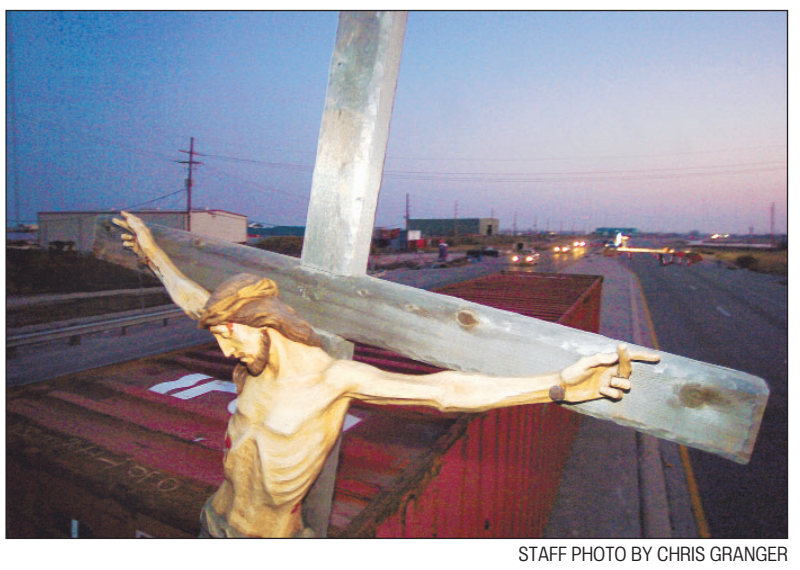
Shuffling like a tightrope walker on planks resting atop splintered wood and twisted metal surrounding his smashed home, Walter Alfonso carried an ice chest filled with mud-covered porcelain angels.



"This is all I could find," said Alfonso, 79, as he emerged from a labyrinth of debris left by Hurricane Katrina, which lifted and slammed his house into four others in Yscloskey, a fishing village in eastern St. Bernard Parish.

While his wife, Pauline, scrubbed the angels in a bucket of bayou water, Alfonso spoke about growing up in Yscloskey with a fondness that belied the hardships he had endured.

He said he quit school in second grade after his father died. As an 8-year-old, he began working as a fisher. He recalled setting out each morning in a skiff with a friend twice his age to check their crab traps in Lake Borgne.

Marchers in D.C. call for unity

Black activists focus on poverty

By Jonathan Tilove
Newhouse News Service

WASHINGTON — Black Americans thronged the National Mall in Washington on Saturday in an assemblage of mutual affirmation, demanding more of their nation and of themselves.

"It's nothing but black folks in love with each other from one end to the other," said Jamil Muhammad, national spokesman for the Nation of Islam, gazing out from the podium on a sunny fall day following a week of rainy weather.

The Mall was not as thick with people or moment as the Million Man March, whose 10th anniversary this gathering commemorated. That march, the largest public coming together of African-Americans in the nation's history, stunned America with its sheer size and its air of bliss. It was historic and, for many who attended, a moment of personal transformation.

But the crowd Saturday was ample enough to stretch, if loosely, the length and breadth of the Mall, giving the gathering the grandeur and scope of a successful occasion. Organized mostly below the radar of the national media, and with far smaller expectations, Saturday's event achieved the formidable goal of not being a letdown to those who made the trek.

Proceeding with little of the advance controversy of 10 years ago, mostly over the leadership of Nation of Islam Minister Louis Farrakhan, the Millions More Movement also succeeded in presenting a more complete portrait of black America, and its leadership, in a united front.

"We have seen an unprecedented gathering of the leaders of black America coming together to speak with one voice," declared Farrakhan. "The whole spectrum of black thought was represented on this stage, in front of the Capitol of the United States of America. This tells us that a new day is dawning in America."

AP PHOTO

Participants gather on the National Mall for the Millions More Movement march on Saturday. Thousands of African-Americans marked the 10th anniversary of the Million Man March.

"If there is a million, or less, or more," he said, "the meaning of this day will be determined by what we do tomorrow to create a movement, a real movement among our people."

Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C., chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, described a program, soon to be presented by the caucus, calling not only for the rescue of those hundreds of thousands, many of them black and poor, displaced by Hurricane Katrina, but also to eradicate poverty in America in the next decade.

The event's agenda was broad, ranging from reparations for slavery to the creation of a national black board of education, black control of the businesses that serve the black community and the creation of an independent black political movement.

"Any nation of 40 million should have their own political movement," said political scientist Ronald Walters, who advised Jesse Jackson in his presidential campaigns.

But mostly, for those who came, it was an occasion of shared identity and purpose.

"It's a really wonderful, positive force to see the beauty of black people of all hues from all different parts of the country and across the planet to come together in one spot and say, 'We're one," said Kofi Jones, an artist and activist from Cincinnati and one of the organizers of the National Hip Hop Political Convention.

As Munir Bahar marched across the Mall with a platoon of young men from the Brother-to-Brother mentorship program he founded as a student at Morgan State University, Norman Winchester, a supervisor in an auto parts plant in Detroit, recorded the scene on his video camera.

When Bahar barked, "Present arms," the young men in dark pants, white shirts and red ties, raised their right hands skyward in the Black Power salute.

"Young bloods," said Winchester, narrating his video. "Here is the future. That's what we have to look forward to."

Unlike 10 years ago, this gathering was not focused solely on men, and there were efforts, especially from the podium, to reach out to other communities of color — to Latinos and Native Americans especially. But the crowd was almost entirely African-American, and more male than female.

"It's a celebration," said Deborah Gilchrest, a mental health rehabilitation technician who came from High Point, N.C., with her husband, Kevin, who runs a barber shop and beauty salon there.

"We need to unite as a people, or perish as individuals," Kevin Gilchrest said.

Rivers crest in soggy N.Y. region

Prolonged rain is finally tapering off

By Todd Zeranski
Bloomberg News Service

Record rainfall in the New York metropolitan region will begin to taper off tonight, allowing swollen rivers to crest and begin to recede, easing flooding in low-lying areas, according to the National Weather Service.

A low-pressure system that stalled off the mid-Atlantic coast brought 2.75 inches of rain yesterday in New York's Central Park, for a total of 11.71 inches since Oct. 7, the third wettest October since 1903, the weather service said.

Parts of New Jersey, southern Connecticut and the Hudson Valley are flooded. The Passaic River in New Jersey and the Ramapo River in New York and New Jersey are especially swollen, Peter Gabrielsen, a National Weather Service hydrologist, said in a telephone interview from Bohemia, New York.

"We're having a month's worth of rainfall in a week," Gabrielsen said. "This type of weather system isn't unusual for this time of year. What is unusual is that it's staying around, it's not leaving."

In Pompton Lakes, New Jersey, the Ramapo is expected to crest at 13.6 feet (4.15 meters), about two feet above the flood stage of 11.7 feet, by this evening, the weather service said. The Quinnipiac River in Wallingford, Conn., reached 7.7 feet this morning, inches from its 8-foot flood stage, forecasters said.

On Long Island, "extreme high tides with wave action" caused beach erosion and damaged boardwalks at Fire Island National Seashore, said Chief Ranger Wayne Valentine.

"We're still getting the full brunt of it," Valentine said. "Because of the rain and the winds, you can't even drive the beach. There is no beach right now.'

New Jersey on Friday partially activated its Office of Emergency Management in response to flood warnings caused by rising waters.

"We're at about the peak of the flooding. The local areas, the floodwaters will maintain their heights and recede" beginning this evening, Gabrielsen said.

At least 10 deaths in the Northeast have been blamed on the weather in the past week, the Associated Press reported. Four people were reported missing in New Hampshire, the AP said.

GUARANTY SAVINGS AND HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATION

Guaranty Savings and Homestead Association is a locally operated savings and loan institution established in 1937. Through the years Guaranty has been attentive to and served the financial needs of our customers as well as the wider metropolitan community. We know that the City of New Orleans and the metropolitan area will be rebuilt, and we are here to assist in that effort. We are thankful and remain committed to the community that helped us to become who we are.

Our main office located at 3798 Veterans Memorial Boulevard is fully operational and two of our full service branches in Mandeville and Metairie, together with a loan production office in Ponchatoula, are open. Unfortunately, our Mid-City branch location at 3915 Canal Street in New Orleans sustained substantial damages due to flood waters associated with Hurricane Katrina. We are committed to making the necessary repairs to the facility and will re-open it when it is safe for both our employees and customers.

We offer various fixed rate and balloon products on both residential and commercial real estate, with attractive rates and amortization periods up to thirty years.

NEWS BRIEFS

Protest turns violent at Nazi parade in Ohio

TOLEDO, OHIO — A crowd that gathered to protest a neo-Nazi march Saturday turned violent, throwing baseball-sized rocks at police, vandalizing vehicles and stores, and setting fire to a neighborhood bar, authorities said. Mayor Jack Ford blamed the rioting on gang members taking advantage of a volatile situation. He said he was declaring a state of emergency and setting an 8 p.m. curfew. He also asked the Highway Patrol for help. "It's exactly what they wanted," Ford said of the group that planned the march, which was called off because of the rioting. At least two dozen members of the National Socialist Movement, which calls itself "America's Nazi Party," had gathered at a city park just before noon and were to march under police protection. Organizers said they were demonstrating against black gangs they said were harassing white residents. About 150 police officers in helicopters and on horses and foot chased bands of youths throughout the afternoon. A group pounded on a convenience store and overturned vehicles. A fire was set in a nearby bar. At least six people were arrested. Police Chief Mike Navarre said officers had a report of a man shot in the area, but they had not found a victim. No other injuries had been reported, Navarre said.

Train crash, fire force evacuation

TEXARKANA, ARK. — Hundreds of homes were evacuated Saturday after a liquid propane gas tank was hit by a Union Pacific train car, exploding in a ball of fire and leaving a plume of smoke over the south end of the city, a police spokesman said. Officers went door to door and urged thousands of people to move to the north side of town while firefighters put out the blaze. The air quality was of most concern because a train car carrying vinyl acetate caught fire, police spokesman Chris Rankin said. Rankin said fumes from the chemical are "most definitely poisonous." The evacuation was suspended about four hours after the 5 a.m. crash, when police were told the fire was under control. Police on the scene said several structures were destroyed by fire, Rankin said. Local hospitals said seven people had been treated for respiratory problems or possible exposure to fumes. Wadley Regional Medical Center was in the evacuation area, and several patients and nurses complained of nose and eye irritation, spokeswoman Shelby Brown said.

Times reporter pleads forgetfulness

WASHINGTON — Notes by The New York Times' Judith Miller that were turned over in a criminal investigation contain the name of a covert CIA officer, but the reporter has told prosecutors she cannot recall who disclosed the name, the newspaper reported Saturday. The prosecutor in the case asked Miller in recent days to explain how Valerie Plame — misspelled in those notes as "Valerie Flame" — appeared in the same notebook the reporter used in interviewing her confidential source, Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, according to the Times. In response to questioning by Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, Miller replied that she "didn't think" she heard Plame's name from Cheney's aide, Lewis "Scooter" Libby. "I said I believed the information came from another source, whom I could not recall," Miller wrote, recounting her testimony for an article that the newspaper posted on its Web site Saturday afternoon. "Valerie Flame" actually was the name in the notebook, and the Times said Miller should have written Valerie Plame.

Large Sunni turnout targets constitution

Their numbers reflect desire to defeat it

By Lee Keath
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Sunni Arabs voted in surprisingly high numbers on Iraq's new constitution Saturday, many of them hoping to defeat it in an intense competition with Shiites and Kurds over the shape of the nation's young democracy after decades of dictatorship. With little violence, turnout was more than 66 percent in the three most crucial provinces.

The constitution still seemed likely to pass, as expected. But the large Sunni turnout made it possible that the vote would be close or even go the other way. Washington hopes the constitution will be approved so that Iraqis can form a legitimate, representative government.

Whole families turned out at voting stations, with parents carrying young children, sometimes in holiday clothes. Men and women lined up by the hundreds in some places or kept up a constant traffic into heavily bunkered polls, dressed in their best in suits and ties or neatly pressed veils — or in shorts and flip-flops, weary from the day's Ramadan fast.

"I'm 75 years old. Everything is finished for me. But I'm going to vote because I want a good future for my children," Said Ahmad Fliha said after walking up a hill with the help of a relative and a soldier to a polling site in Haditha, a western Sunni town.

Some 9 million Iraqis cast ballots, election officials said, announcing a preliminary turnout estimate of 61 percent.

A day that U.S. and Iraqi leaders feared could become bloody turned out to be the most peaceful in months, amid a heavy clampdown by U.S.-Iraqi forces across the country.

Insurgents attacked five of Baghdad's 1,200 polling stations, wounding seven voters, but there were no suicide bombings or other major attacks. Four Iraqi soldiers were reported killed by attacks far from polling sites.

"The constitution is a sign of civilization," Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari said after casting his ballot. "This constitution has come after heavy sacrifices. It is a new birth."

The country's Shiite majority — some 60 percent of its estimated 27 million people — and the Kurds — another 20 percent — largely support the charter, which gives them autonomy in the northern and southern regions where they are concentrated.

The Sunni Arab minority, which dominated the country under Saddam Hussein and forms the backbone of the insurgency, widely opposes the draft, convinced its federalist system will tear the country into Shiite and Kurdish mini-states in the south and north, leaving Sunnis in an impoverished center.

Most Sunnis appeared to be voting "no" even after one major party, the Iraqi Islamic Party, came out in support of the draft because last-minute amendments promised Sunnis the chance to try to change the charter later.

The bar for Sunni opponents to defeat the constitution is high: They must get a two-thirds vote in any three of Iraq's 18 provinces. They were likely to reach that threshold in the vast Sunni heartland of Anbar province in the west. They must snatch the two others among the provinces of Salahuddin, Ninevah or Diyala, north of Baghdad.

Survey finds morale is bleak at DHS

Employees denigrate Homeland Security

By David E. Rosenbaum
© 2005, The New York Times

WASHINGTON — At the Department of Homeland Security, only 12 percent of the more than 10,000 employees who returned a government questionnaire said they felt strongly that they were "encouraged to come up with new and better ways of doing things."

In the agency, which has responsibility for protecting the country against terrorism and responding to natural disasters, only 3 percent of employees said they were confident that personnel decisions were "based on merit."

Fewer than 18 percent said they felt strongly that they were "held accountable for achieving results." And just 4 percent said they were sure that "creativity and innovation are rewarded."

In each of these instances and many others, the responses of the Homeland Security employees were less favorable than those of all the other departments and large agencies surveyed by the federal Office of Personnel Management.

"It shows there is something fundamentally wrong at the organization," said Peter Cappelli, professor of management and director of the Center for Human Resources at the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania.

"If you were on the board of directors of a company and you got results like this," Cappelli said, "you would lean on the managers to fix the problem or get rid of them."

The department was created by law in 2002 and was not fully in operation until late 2003. It brought together workers from established agencies with widely varying histories, missions and cultures, including the Coast Guard, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the Secret Service, the Customs Service and the Transportation Security Administration.

Asked about the survey, Russ Knocke, press secretary for the department, said the morale problems occurred because "the Department of Homeland Security was a merger of 22 agencies, a start-up all at once, and a number of the agencies experienced some growing pains the first couple of years."

"This is a unique circumstance," Knocke said. "This is not like a business in the private sector or even other departments in the federal government. It's a unique department with a great sense of urgency for fulfilling its responsibility."

The survey was taken by the Office of Personnel Management in 2004. Forms with 88 multiple-choice questions were sent to 276,424 federal employees selected at random, and 147,914, including 10,473 from the Department of Homeland Security, returned completed questionnaires. The department employs 180,000 workers.

This month, Scott Lilly, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, a liberal research institute, used the survey to publish the first comparison of how employee attitudes in various agencies compared with one another.

Of 30 Cabinet departments and large independent agencies, the employees at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and the National Science Foundation had the highest morale, Lilly found.

In terms of positive answers, by Lilly's calculations, the Department of Homeland Security ranked dead last on half the questions.

The department finished in the top half of the 30 departments and agencies on only one question. More than 56 percent strongly agreed with the statement "The work I do is important." That placed Homeland Security employees second only to those at the Veterans Affairs.

Iraqi women wary of constitution

Some fear losing out to fundamentalists

By Ellen Knickmeyer
The Washington Post

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Three school years' worth of unbaked clay pieces have piled up in Hanna Milla's darkened office at Iraq's National Museum of Modern Art: rounded vases, stern masks, a lumpy hawk on its post, all shaped by the hands of young students and smoothed by Milla's coral-tipped fingers. And all waiting to be fired in kilns that have sat cold for years.

Teachers in the museum's warren of classrooms and halls last ran the kilns in January 2003, as students and instructors prepared for what would be their last exhibition as war closed in.

At the exhibition that night, the instructors — almost all female — mingled with students and artists, sipped drinks and eyed the displays. For the women, it would be the last late evening for years.

As in all wars, Iraqi women have largely retired to the dark corners, forced to yield the center to men waving guns. Saturday's vote on a constitution will not improve their lives, Milla and her colleagues say; at this point, they cannot imagine anything that would. They just hope it won't make their lives any worse.

AP PHOTO

An Iraqi woman casts her vote Saturday in Baghdad in Iraq's constitutional referendum. Some say Saturday's vote on a constitution will not improve the lives of women.

As the constitution was being drafted by rival factions battling for control of Iraq, the women who make up more than 50 percent of the population were never treated as more than a side issue.

President Bush has depicted women's rights as one of the reasons Americans are fighting in Iraq. A Western official in Baghdad said Friday that the proposed constitution is "a good constitution for women, and very frankly that's something we were very insistent upon."

The draft that went before voters Saturday specifies equality regardless of gender and reserves 25 percent of the seats in the National Assembly for women.

But it also would give each Iraqi household the option of using religious law to decide matters of inheritance, divorce, alimony and other family issues. Rights advocates have said they fear that women will be coerced by male relatives into accepting the least favorable interpretations of religious law.

The constitution also would set aside seats for Muslim clerics on the Supreme Court, which would weigh the constitutionality of all laws. That alarms proponents of women's rights.

"They call this constitution a tent, but they pulled Iraqi women out of this tent," said Zakiya Khalifa Zaidi, 73, a well-known actress who is now an activist.

"The constitution was written in a very tense atmosphere," Zaidi said. "That's why we lost many of our rights amid the chaos."

Hajim Hasani, speaker of the National Assembly, agreed, saying, "Women lost ground in the constitution."

Quake death toll continues to rise

By Carlotta Gall
© 2005, The New York Times

MUZAFFARABAD, KASHMIR — The death toll from the earthquake in South Asia a week ago has risen to 38,000, with 62,000 people injured, as more bodies have been pulled from the rubble, the senior military spokesman for Pakistan, Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, said Saturday.

President Pervez Musharraf warned that the toll was likely to increase even more as recovery teams reached the more remote towns and villages.

In Muzaffarabad, the capital of Pakistani-controlled Kashmir and one of the most damaged towns in the region, doctors warned that many more people were going to die because of the lack of medical facilities in the earthquake zone and the long delays in transporting victims to medical care.

"There's nowhere to put the patients," said Dr. Dominique Gladin, of the French nongovernmental aid group Service d'Aide Medicale Urgente, which has a team of 47 in Muzaffarabad.

World not ready for bird flu, some say

U.S. official touring Asia has grim outlook

By Margie Mason
AP Medical writer

HAIPHONG, VIETNAM — After wandering amid cages of birds and rabbits at an open-air market in Hanoi, after watching the gutting of a freshly slaughtered chicken, and after visiting a Haiphong family sickened by bird flu, the United States' top health official came to a grim conclusion: Preventing the start of a global flu outbreak is just about impossible.

U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt was wrapping up a fact-finding mission Saturday in the region hardest-hit by bird flu. He said his tour of Thailand, Cambodia, Laos and Vietnam has painted a clearer picture of just how daunting it would be to identify and contain an outbreak if the virus mutates to a form easily spread among people. It could skip across borders and oceans, killing millions and crippling entire nations.

"Can we create a network of surveillance sufficient enough to find the spark when it happens, to get there fast enough?" he said. "The chances of that happening are not good."

Leavitt, who is expected in Indonesia today, told reporters the trip has given him a realistic view of the challenges in Asia where people and animals living closely together is rooted in the culture.

AP PHOTO

A Romanian health worker carries domestic birds before gassing them in the village of Vulturul, about 180 miles east of Bucharest, on Saturday. Romanian authorities called for calm and placed an eastern region under quarantine Saturday as tests confirmed that the deadly strain of a bird flu virus that has devastated flocks and killed dozens of people in Asia has moved into eastern Europe.

"I was at a market in Cambodia and talked with a pig vendor who traveled 600 kilometers (373 miles) the night before to sell her pigs," he said. "She had carried them on the top of a bus in a box next to a load of chickens, and I was sitting next to her ... with several other baskets of geese and several baskets of turkeys and ducks and then right next to pigs."

He said the U.S. government was considering ways to help offset the economic loss to Asian farmers forced to slaughter infected flocks, but help would be limited. Without subsidies, poor farmers resist killing their sickened livestock.

Leavitt doesn't believe that the United States, or the rest of the world, is prepared for a flu pandemic. While bird flu has rarely spread person-to-person and has infected just 117 people in two years, most health experts expect it to mutate one day to a more contagious form. The current virus has killed about half of the people it infects, although no one knows how deadly a new form of the bug might be.

The drug that seems most effective against bird flu is Tamiflu, which was created to treat ordinary human flu but is now in short supply and can't be made fast enough because of pandemic fears.

Leavitt has been talking with drug and vaccine manufacturers to try to increase the stockpile should a catastrophic outbreak reach North America. The government now has enough Tamiflu to treat about 4.3 million Americans.

Production of a new vaccine has just started, and Leavitt said the United States may help finance some of the $100 million production burden.

Earlier this month, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan suggested patent rules might be suspended in an outbreak to allow other companies to make generic forms of Tamiflu, produced by Swiss-based Roche Holding AG.

Cash runs out on Medicare perk

Low-income seniors may pay the price

By Robert Pear
© 2005, The New York Times

WASHINGTON — About 192,000 Medicare beneficiaries with low incomes face a steep increase in costs because Congress has not renewed a program that paid their monthly premiums, the Bush administration said Saturday.

An e-mail notice sent Friday night to Congress said legal authority for the program expired at the end of the fiscal year on Sept. 30. So the low-income beneficiaries, who are 65 and older or disabled, will have to pay the premiums that until now were paid for them by the federal government.

The basic Medicare premium, $78.20 a month, will rise to $88.50 in January. Premiums are normally deducted from Social Security checks.

"The administration has no authority to reinstate the program," the notice said. "Congress must act. The president's 2006 budget proposed a one-year extension of the program. Without a reinstatement of the program, these 192,000 beneficiaries will be individually responsible for the payment of their Medicare Part B premiums."

Under the program, the federal government can pay premiums for Medicare beneficiaries with incomes from $1,097 to $1,464 a month. That amounts to $13,164 to $17,568 annually.

The House and the Senate have passed separate bills to reinstate the program. The cost, about $200 million a year, would be offset by denying federal payments under Medicaid and Medicare for Viagra and other drugs for erectile dysfunction.

Congress left Oct. 7 for a 10-day recess without resolving differences between the two houses on the legislation.

Kevin Concannon, director of the Iowa Department of Human Services, said, "Congress just walked away and left a lot of poor people hanging. It's frustrating and disheartening. We hope Congress will extend the program, but there is no guarantee."

If Congress, scheduled to reconvene on Monday, does nothing, the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services said, beneficiaries will have to pay Medicare premiums for October and subsequent months. Several months' premiums could be deducted at once from a person's Social Security check.

The agency said that if the Social Security Administration receives a list of names in November, "the beneficiary will see his or her December check reduced by $234.60" — the amount for October, November and December at $78.20 a month.

MORTGAGE PAYMENT DEFERRAL

Dear Mortgage Loan Customers

Immediately following Hurricane Katrina, Fifth District Savings Bank determined that it was important to permit our loan customers to use their funds to provide support for their families and loved ones during this very difficult time.

Fifth District mortgage loan payments have been automatically deferred for 60 days (September and October) by extending the term of your mortgage loan by two additional months. During this "grace period," you will not incur late charges, and your account will not be delinquent.

Beginning in November, Fifth District will resume collecting mortgage payments by preauthorized debit of your checking or savings account just as before, or you may pay in person at any one of our offices, or by mail.

Please call our Mortgage Loan Department at (504) 363-6505 for more information about our mortgage loan deferral policy.

Some say there's more to Miers

Bush nominee touted as tough, tenacious

By Donna Cassata
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — For all that talk about Harriet Miers' being a paper-pushing idolizer of the president, acquaintances say there is another side to her.

The Supreme Court nominee is a tough, ambitious lawyer who willingly used her spurs in cowboy country, a competitor who clawed her way to Texas' legal pinnacle and a behind-the-scenes player who held her own and then some in the White House's West Wing, they say.

Observations, testimonials and tidbits from friends and former colleagues have put Miers' life in sharper focus and shaped the debate over whether the 60-year-old White House counsel can survive the conservative maelstrom over her nomination.

The Dallas City Council was her lone elective office. That run, however, paled in comparison with hard-nosed campaigns for president of the Dallas Bar Association and the State Bar of Texas, which required strong political skills. Miers was the first female president of both groups.

"Law firms are pretty cutthroat," said Lorelee Bartos, Miers' campaign manager for the council race in 1989.

Miers, one of 12 women in her Southern Methodist University Law School class, has a track record of surmounting challenges and stiff opposition. She was the first woman hired by her Dallas law firm, in 1972, and the first female president of Locke, Purnell, Rain & Harrell.

"You don't get to be those things without having that fortitude in you," Bartos said.

Miers developed a reputation as a meticulous, persistent inquisitor and worked for clients such as Microsoft Corp. and the Walt Disney Co. Some critics have complained about a singular focus on dotting I's and crossing T's at the expense of the big picture.

'Tough and smart'

Miers' acquaintance with Bush, whom she met in the 1990s, led to a professional relationship marked by unwavering loyalty since Bush was Texas governor.

When the newly elected president needed a White House staff secretary in 2001, he turned to the person he had relied upon as a candidate to research any weaknesses that could be exploited by his opponents. She later served as deputy chief of staff for policy and now, counsel.

"You need to be tough and smart and articulate and prepared. She's all those things," Brett Kavanaugh, an assistant to the president and staff secretary, said in a phone interview. In White House meetings, Miers "always gets to the heart of the matter," said Kavanaugh, a former associate counsel.

She was in charge of the White House selection of a chief justice nominee, vetting candidates' records and often playing the tough questioner.

> "You need to be tough and smart and articulate and prepared. She's all those things."
> BRETT KAVANAUGH
> assistant to the president

"We'd be talking about somebody's background," said Leonard Leo, now on leave as executive vice president of the Federalist Society, the conservative group whose headlined speakers have included Supreme Court justices and Bush administration officials.

"There would be a moment of silence when she was clearly thinking about what was being said and then she would challenge it, asking, 'But what specifically in those opinions strongly suggests that this is someone who ascribes to judicial restraint?' " Leo said.

Big-time Bush backer

Recently released birthday greetings and well-wishes between Bush and Miers sound like the adult equivalent of high-school mash notes.

"Dear Governor GWB, You are the best Governor ever — deserving of great respect!" Miers wrote in 1997.

A regular at Camp David and the president's Texas ranch, she wrote of her hope that Bush twins Jenna and Barbara would recognize that their parents are "cool."

Such gushing language shows another side of Miers, who lists her favorite movie as "The Sound of Music" and would prefer ice cream for her last meal.

She also is known as a self-effacing, intensely private person who rarely talks about herself and would cringe at the dissection of her life and career.

Conservative columnists are clamoring for Miers to withdraw her nomination, citing her lack of a judicial record. Internet blogs are cattily complaining about her hairstyle and use of black eyeliner.

For all of the unanswered questions about Miers, her devotion to Bush has never been in doubt.

In "Ask the White House" online chats, Miers was the loyal soldier, never deviating from the administration line. Her 1984 red Mercedes with aging campaign bumper stickers is a mainstay in the White House parking lot — a reminder of the long hours she puts in for her boss.

She realized a long time ago that she would never be a beauty queen. In a speech in May, she recalled that like other little girls, she used to watch Miss America when she was growing up and imagine someday having the looks to traverse a runway draped in an ermine robe.

"As they say in Washington, that was a stretch," Miers told an audience of friends, family and former colleagues in her deliberate, Texas drawl. Her aspirations later focused on medicine, then the law.

Conservative credentials

The legal profession became her life. She never married, and frequently travels from Washington to Dallas to be with her ailing mother, Sally, 91, who is in a nursing home. Like the president, she has a brother named Jeb — one of three brothers. A sister, Catherine, died in 2003.

Years ago, concern about his sister's living alone in Dallas prompted one brother to buy Miers a .45-caliber Smith & Wesson. Texas Supreme Court Judge Nathan Hecht, a friend, said Miers kept the gun for a long time but was a lousy shot.

Hecht also was part of Miers' religious conversion from Roman Catholic and occasional worshipper at Episcopal and Presbyterian services to an evangelical at Valley View Christian Church in Dallas.

At age 34, Miers was baptized by full immersion, consistent with the church's teachings.

Looking to assuage conservatives, White House officials have cited her conservative religious beliefs while arguing that she would not let them influence her judicial opinions. Hecht has said Miers believes life begins at conception and opposes abortion.

Fraud trial focuses on Botox knockoff

1,000 patients may have been injected

By David Royse
Associated Press writer

Plastic surgeon Frederic Corbin was intrigued last year when he saw an ad for a product that offered the same protein used in the wildly popular wrinkle treatment Botox — only much, much, cheaper.

"My initial reaction was, 'Hmm, Botox now has some competition,' " recalled Corbin, who practices in Beverly Hills, Calif.

But when he received a vial of the botulinum toxin in the mail, he was puzzled by the warning: "For Research Purposes Only. Not for Human Use."

He says he returned it and more or less forgot about it until he heard about four people last December whose mysterious paralysis was linked to the use of a Botox knockoff.

Authorities have found that dozens of doctors around the country bought unapproved botulinum, which in its raw form is one of the most potent neurotoxins on Earth. And investigative documents indicate that more than 1,000 people may have been injected with it, many unaware they weren't given federally approved Botox.

The company accused of selling the unapproved toxin and marketing it as a Botox substitute goes on trial next month in federal court in Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

"We don't know how dangerous it is. It's not as well controlled as the commercially available product," said Dr. Thomas Rohrer, a Boston dermatologic surgeon who has written extensively about botulinum, which he describes as more powerful than cyanide.

Tucson, Ariz.-based Toxin Research International and owners Chad Livdahl and Zarah Karim, who are jailed awaiting the trial, are accused of defrauding people who thought they were getting a safe, approved Botox treatment.

No one is known to have been hurt by TRI's toxin; the four paralyzed people were injected with a toxin bought straight from the manufacturer that supplied TRI, not from the company itself.

Eric and Bonnie Kaplan were allegedly injected by Dr. Bach McComb, who also injected himself and his girlfriend, Alma Hall. Federal prosecutors say McComb worked as a consultant for TRI.

Attorneys in the case say McComb injected himself and the others with the wrong dose. They have all partially recovered. But last December, when McComb, Hall and the Kaplans lay paralyzed on ventilators and unable to swallow or see, investigators searching the clinic where McComb worked found marketing materials from TRI.

Although TRI hasn't been directly linked to the paralysis case, authorities say the Arizona company told other doctors its product was safe and on its way to being approved for people.

According to case documents, at least 180 doctors — plastic surgeons, dermatologists, naturopaths — ordered Botulinum Toxin Type A from TRI.

TRI attorney Ben England said "we disagree" that TRI was acting fraudulently, and declined to elaborate.

Most doctors who bought the toxin haven't been publicly named, and officials say many patients don't know they got the unapproved toxin.

In Salem, Ore., Dr. Jerome Lentini is one of the few who has been criminally charged, accused of injecting a TRI toxin into hundreds of patients, many of whom signed a consent form that implied they were getting FDA-approved Botox.

Americans tarry when it's time to marry

People near coasts are waiting longer

By Stephen Ohlemacher
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — Couples in the Northeast are hearing wedding bells later than men and women elsewhere in the country — especially in Utah, where younger newlyweds are the norm.

A Census Bureau study released last week found many regional differences in the marrying habits of Americans, with those near the East and West coasts generally waiting longer to get married than those in Middle America. The study also found that Southerners are the least likely to live together without getting married.

"Later marriage is very strongly associated with higher levels of education," said David Popenoe, co-director of the National Marriage Project at Rutgers University. "That's why people in the Northeast have such a late age of marriage."

The age when couples get married also can be influenced by religion and whether they are willing to live together without getting married, Popenoe said.

"It delays marriage," Popenoe said of living together before marriage. "Men marry too late from the point of view of women, especially educated men. It leaves more women single, or marrying beyond the age of childbirth."

The median age for first marriages in the United States is 26.7 years for men and 25.1 for women. That is roughly a year older than a decade ago for both, said Martin O'Connell, chief of the Census Bureau's fertility and family statistics branch.

Men wait longer than women to marry in every state, and no one gets married younger than couples in Utah, where the median age is 21.9 for women and 23.9 for men. At the other end of the spectrum, men and women in Washington, D.C., both wait until they are about 30.

"Big cities tend to have high ages for marriage," said Zhenchao Qian, associate professor of sociology at Ohio State University.

The Census Bureau analyzed data from the American Community Survey from 2000 to 2003, developing state-by-state averages on marriage and fertility for the first time.

Among the study's findings: 29 percent of all new mothers were unmarried. Among the unmarried mothers, half were poor, compared with 12 percent of married mothers who lived in poverty.

The states with the most unwed new mothers also tended to be the ones with the highest percentage of new mothers living in poverty.

West Virginia, Mississippi and Louisiana had high percentages of unwed mothers living below the poverty line.

Producer: 'Accident' killed kung fu master

Compiled from wire reports

Bruce Lee's former producer, Raymond Chow, says the kung fu star's sudden death at age 32 is a straightforward case of taking the wrong medicine.

Lee died of an edema, or swelling of the brain, in the home of Hong Kong actress Betty Ting Pei in 1973. The coroner described his passing as "death by misadventure."

The circumstances of Lee's death fueled speculation that drugs were involved and that Lee was having an affair with Ting.

Chow, one of the founders of Golden Harvest studios, said Lee died because he took headache medication that he was "hypersensitive" to at someone else's home, refraining from referring to Ting directly.

He said Lee was sensitive to one of the three ingredients in the medication, equigesic.

"The bottom line is it was an accident," Chow told The Associated Press during a recent interview.

'ER' delivery

Ming-Na has given birth to her second child, an 8-pound, 9-ounce boy named Cooper Dominic Zee.

"Mother and baby are doing great," her husband, actor-producer-playwright Eric Zee, told The Associated Press.

Star of show about fertility clinic has second child

Ming-Na, 41, played Dr. Deb Chen on "ER." This season, she appeared on the NBC drama "Inconceivable," about a fertility clinic, which has been pulled from the network's schedule.

Cooper was born Wednesday at 2:23 p.m. at St. John's Hospital in Santa Monica, Calif. He joins his 4-year-old sister, Michaela.

Parenting by Perot

Two-time presidential candidate and Texas billionaire Ross Perot is offering some parenting advice: Keep your kids away from the TV. Give them boxes to make forts. And let them have imaginary friends, Perot said.

Such activities stimulate the brain's synapses and boost creativity, which will do wonders later in life in the workplace, he said.

Perot, a pioneer of the data processing industry, spoke at a ceremony where he received a technology development award. The American Computer Museum of Bozeman in Montana presents the annual award.

Creative skills start at an early age, he said, so parents should encourage their kids to be imaginative.

"And just think, if you are not creative, you cannot do what these people did," Perot said, motioning to his fellow award winners. "They're wired."

Back to 'Life'

Ricky Martin, whose hits include "Livin' La Vida Loca," says the fame and fortune he experienced in the late 1990s left him feeling bored and embittered.

Ricky Martin
'I was starting to become a victim of fame'

"There was a moment (in 2002) when I was onstage and I was just so angry," Martin says in the Oct. 24 issue of People magazine.

"I thought, 'Something is wrong. I have the applause, I have a great band behind me, I live comfortably'. . . . I was starting to become a victim of fame. Everything was too serious, and I wasn't enjoying it."

Soon afterward, he quit the stage and began touring the world. Now back in the United States, the 33-year-old singer says he's looking forward to his Latin American tour this fall.

His new album, "Life," was released last week.

Horse power

A daughter of New York's billionaire Mayor Michael Bloomberg won $16,000 in a horse jumping event.

Georgina Bloomberg, 22, defeated Michael Whitaker of Great Britain on Friday to win the knockout event in the Las Vegas World Invitational show jumping contest.

"I've had the mare since she was 6 years old," Bloomberg said of Nadia, a 10-year-old Dutch warmblood mare. "She's a great speed horse."

Petty prize

Tom Petty will receive the Century Award, Billboard's highest honor for creative achievement, at this year's Billboard Music Awards.

The show will air live on the Fox network from the MGM Grand Garden Arena in Las Vegas on Dec. 6.

"This award comes at a particularly nice time, as the Heartbreakers and I go into the 30th year of our career," the 54-year-old rocker said in a statement released Thursday. "I'm very honored that Billboard has acknowledged me."

Tom Petty

Previous award recipients include George Harrison, Buddy Guy, Billy Joel, Joni Mitchell, Carlos Santana, Chet Atkins, James Taylor, Emmylou Harris, Randy Newman, John Mellencamp, Annie Lennox, Sting and Stevie Wonder.

Red tape suffocating companies struggling to survive

temporary housing program to assign them trailers.

Still others have tried to make it on their own, signing master leases on apartments or setting up small trailer cities on company property, at considerable expense.

Even some of the region's top Republicans, typically loathe to criticize the Bush administration, say they are boggled by the logjam.

"If FEMA would have said early on that anybody who has a home with utilities could get a trailer, and any employer who wants to help facilitate housing can get trailers, think of how much more quickly they could have moved," said U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, who has been fighting the agency for weeks to work through bureaucratic hurdles. "These are some of the low-hanging fruit. They should have been some our early victories."

The region's housing problem has compounded the already acute difficulty employers face in rehiring laborers and service industry workers, such as housekeepers and waiters, a group that is dependent on the availability of low- to moderate-income housing in the best of times. Companies that have tried to attract new workers say it's virtually impossible, even with signing bonuses, benefits and hourly wages that in some economic sectors have been pumped up by double-digit percentages.

That's because FEMA's trailer program applies only to workers from the disaster zone who have lost use of their homes. New workers from undamaged areas don't qualify. The region's remaining rentals also are either booked up or out of reach for new laborers.

Add to the mix FEMA's failure thus far to open a trailer city anywhere in the New Orleans area, and the result is a mix of problems that many fear will drive more and more businesses to neighboring boomtowns such as Houston and Baton Rouge.

"Metro New Orleans is going to die if we don't get people back in here to work," Moise said.

Bureaucratic blockages

In the days after Katrina's devastating blow, Dane Revette, energy director for the state Department of Economic Development, had one thing on his mind: helping the area's petrochemical plants get back in business.

With a heavy proportion of the nation's gasoline supply produced at refineries in Louisiana, Revette knew that the industry's biggest obstacle would be finding a place to house workers. So he called FEMA for help.

He was shocked at what he heard.

The massive federal agency had no program to provide temporary housing for businesses. According to its policies, only individuals, families and those receiving public housing could qualify for trailers. That just wouldn't do, Revette said.

So he proposed a new program, to allow businesses to apply for trailers on site as long as they had sewer, water and electricity hookups. FEMA agreed to try it, and within five days of the storm, Revette was shepherding the first shipment of 20 trailers to the Motiva refinery in Norco. Trailers to other plants followed in short order.

But the honeymoon didn't last long. FEMA soon halted the program, saying the state's Economic Development Department had inadequately recorded FEMA identification numbers that would prove that qualified disaster victims were living in the trailers, he said. Revette assigned more state workers to collect the data and things eventually got rolling.

Then Hurricane Rita threatened. Once again, trailer deliveries were stopped for a time.

Then on Sept. 30, the wheels of bureaucracy screeched to a halt a third time, when Daniel Craig, director of FEMA's recovery division, wrote a memo saying the trailers could go only to businesses providing "a service essential to the restoration of the community," Revette said. Essential services, according to FEMA, include education, emergency and medical facilities, utilities and public works agencies. Period.

That disruption lasted 10 days, while 2,462 trailer orders languished. Before that, FEMA had delivered only 2,298 trailers to businesses in the disaster zone, state officials said.

"It boils down to this: If you work in an operating room, you are required to make an immediate decision. If you are a National Guardsman in Iraq, you have to make immediate decisions," said Don Pierson, assistant secretary for the state Economic Development Department. "But in a governmental situation, people have a tendency to seek approval from authority and notify their supervisors. Agencies like FEMA need to come on the ground with people who can make decisions, as opposed to being worried about whether they are violating Rule 6b(c)."

Business owners say they don't care whether the FEMA trailers are located on company property or at a worker's home. What does matter is that workers get trailers in a timely manner so they can get back to their jobs.

But FEMA has performed below par even in its longstanding trailer-assistance programs for individuals and families, many say.

According to an Oct. 6 report in The Wall Street Journal, FEMA ordered only 125,000 trailers and mobile homes post-Katrina, despite the fact that more than 300,000 families were left without homes. Six weeks after the hurricane struck, only 6,200 of the trailers were ready to be occupied.

Local officials also have criticized the slow pace. In one case, St. Tammany Parish President Kevin Davis threatened to lead a caravan of local residents, with pickup trucks and trailer hitches, to commandeer empty trailers from FEMA holding sites. The federal government has since stepped up deliveries to that parish.

'A slow process'

Coast Guard Capt. Tom Atkin, chief of staff for Vice Adm. Thad Allen, the official in charge of the federal relief effort, said Friday that FEMA's priorities right now are "housing, housing and housing."

Christian Lienemann works on a customer's car Thursday at his auto shop, Mobile Auto Tech, on Cleary Avenue in Metairie. Wind and water damage from Hurricane Katrina rendered Lienemann's home unlivable, and he and his wife, Toni, are living next to their business in a trailer they bought after the storm.

"That is the single focal point," agreed Ted Monette, FEMA's deputy coordinating officer for Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes.

Monette said the relief agency had initially been using multiple contractors to provide trailers in each parish but that the process became "unwieldy." Both men acknowledged that they have been questioned by members of Congress and local officials about the pace of the effort.

About 10 days ago, Monette said, the contracts were reconfigured, with one contractor apiece being assigned to St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes, and three to New Orleans. Fluor Corp., CH2MHill and the Shaw Group will provide trailers to New Orleans, while Fluor is assigned to St. Bernard and CH2MHill to Plaquemines Parish. In addition, housing "strike teams," composed of federal and local officials, are trying to find spots suitable for trailers on public and private lands, Monette said.

He estimated that about 100,000 families in the region are in need of temporary housing. Only 1,852 such families had been placed in travel trailers as of Thursday, according to FEMA statistics. FEMA also has opened only one large trailer settlement, in Baker, about 80 miles from New Orleans.

FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said a second park is under construction in Baton Rouge, and another 37 sites scattered throughout the region are in the final stages of lease negotiation.

By the end of the month, a few sites should be ready for families to move in, Monette said. He could not say how many people the trailer parks would accommodate or where they would be situated.

"It's going to be a slow process," he said.

Important news about COX service

We appreciate your patience as we continue repairing the cable system to get service back up to all serviceable homes in the area.

No other cable system has ever been exposed to such severe conditions. While we have made significant progress in reconnecting thousands of homes and businesses, your location may still not have service.

Here are some reasons why you may not have service even though the network in your area is restored:

- A utility pole or line is down
- The cable is down between the pole or pedestal and your premises
- Your line has been severed by neighbors digging in their yards or cutting down trees
- Electricity has not been restored at a key point in the network
- Pedestals have been destroyed as storm debris was picked up

We have over 1000 employees and construction contractors working across the entire metro-area to restore service to customers as quickly as possible. These crews are going street by street, working to replace or repair the network.

Again, we thank you for your continued business and your patience as we rebuild Greater New Orleans together.

Trailer city in New Orleans is urged

HOUSING, from A-11

Lower 9th Ward, said he is one of many New Orleanians "dying to get back to the city to work." But with no car and no place to live, things look hopeless.

"I applied for a FEMA trailer, but I'm just in line waiting on the process," said Metoyer, who is now in a shelter in Baker. "I'm way out here; I'm stuck."

Before Katrina, Metoyer, 48, was doing concrete work for his father-in-law's company, CC&D Construction. Now he spends his days shuffling around the shelter, hoping and praying he can return home soon. His best chance, he said, is landing in a trailer community in the New Orleans area, near the millions of dollars in cleanup and construction work now going to out-of-state laborers.

But so far, FEMA officials have not said when, or where, such a temporary community might open.

"No work, no work," he said. "I need work."

Steve Maguire, director of process improvement and temporary mayor of Kamp Katrina, a temporary housing area for employees of Northrop Grumman's Avondale shipyard, talks with Paul Wineburg, a foreman from New Orleans, on Thursday.

Privatized solutions

To cope with the housing issue, some employers, such as shipyard giant Northrop Grumman Corp., decided to create their own solutions rather than depend on government assistance.

The company, which employed 6,800 people at its Avondale shipyard before Hurricane Katrina, contacted FEMA early on but was told the trailers would be available only to individuals and families, not corporations, according to the company's vice president of operations, George Yount.

So it moved on.

At its own expense, the shipbuilding giant erected "Camp Katrina," an assemblage of temporary buildings that house bunk rooms, TV lounges and laundry facilities. The shipyard also persuaded the Navy to dock a "living" barge, with room to house as many as 500 workers, at the shipyard. The company now has living quarters for almost 900 workers, and there are no restrictions: Both new and old workers are allowed to stay.

"We had been told from the get-go that the (FEMA) trailers were for families, so I didn't waste time whining about that," Yount said. "I needed a solution."

But not all companies have the means, or desire, to set up temporary housing in the parking lot out back.

Ralph Brennan, who presides over a company with three New Orleans restaurants, saw his staff plummet from 350 to 80 after the storm. Brennan couldn't even fully staff his Bacco restaurant in the French Quarter on Monday, when President Bush and his wife, Laura, popped in for a meal with little advance notice.

Though most of his managers are back, Brennan said he expects to lose two-thirds of his hourly workers. So he has raised workers' hourly pay by 25 percent and is considering partnering with another company to set up a FEMA trailer colony. But it's not something his company is excited about.

"We would rather operate our core business," said the company's marketing director, Charlee Williamson, "than be in the travel trailer park business."

Nowhere to put new hires

Henry Shane, of all people, should have a leg up on housing for employees. As co-owner of Favrot & Shane, the largest apartment owner in the state, his company manages more than 8,000 apartments on the east bank of Jefferson Parish alone.

But his situation illustrates how complex the post-Katrina housing and employment dilemma can be.

Shane said he lost about 50 of his groundskeepers and laborers after the storm, jobs he desperately needs filled to get his complexes running normally. If those laborers wanted to come back, he might be able to help them get FEMA trailers or arrange for places to stay with colleagues. But none are calling, either because they've found better work elsewhere or are settling into new communities.

So Shane has started advertising for new workers to fill those jobs, and he has sharply increased wages to compete in the unusually tight labor market. That effort is failing, however, because he has nowhere to put the new hires.

Even at the higher wages, the new workers rarely qualify to rent his units, which are typically leased by tenants making $80,000 or more, he said. The demand for those units also is through the roof, with banks and law firms requesting hundreds at a time. So far, Shane has had to limit customers to five apartments apiece.

"There is no such thing as cheap housing anymore," Shane said. "That's all underwater or out of the mix. Those that were cheap on the West Bank are probably raising rents. New Orleans east is not an option. The biggest issue is that we are totally without housing for workers who want to come in to make a good laborer's wage."

As a result, Shane, like many other employers, has turned to contractors who bring in large crews of mostly Hispanic laborers to kick-start his business. These aren't the full-time employees he needs, but they take care of the short-term reconstruction problem, and they are willing to sleep wherever: his apartment complex's recreation room, an empty warehouse, makeshift cabins.

"If you are from Florida and Texas and have 500 workers, I'm your man," Shane said.

Shane also is battling an edict signed by Gov. Kathleen Blanco that prohibits landlords from evicting tenants until Oct. 25, even if the apartments are destroyed and the tenants have not come to collect their belongings.

Until the moratorium is lifted and the thousands of damaged apartments can be rebuilt, FEMA needs to get creative about ways to bring workers into the city, Shane said.

Most promising would be the creation of small trailer settlements in the New Orleans area, so workers can get to their jobs and rebuild their homes at the same time. Shane personally has loaned land in the Elmwood area for that purpose, as has Northrop Grumman, which offered the government 40 acres in Waggaman.

Other organizations in New Orleans also have asked for trailer cities, including City Park and Southern University at New Orleans, both of which need the rent money they envision flowing from such encampments to help pay their own expenses.

"I don't know what the long-term answer is," Shane said. "But in the short term, they need to get some units closer to the area."

Others say what's needed is a beefed-up federal response that includes quicker delivery of trailers to businesses and more flexibility on who is eligible to use them.

Then there is the sentiment held by businessman and Republican Party activist Donald "Boysie" Bollinger, who owns Bollinger Shipyards and is struggling to fill 600 jobs that pay between $16 to $18 an hour.

"At some point we have to incentivize our citizens to come back," Bollinger said at a recent meeting of Mayor Ray Nagin's Bring New Orleans Back commission. "It's nice to be watching TV all day long, sitting by the swimming pool and getting three squares a day. When is the government going to realize they have to force them back?"

TO OUR FANS

NEW ORLEANS HORNETS

Dear Ticket Holders,

Thank you for your patience over the last several weeks while we re-established our operations. The tragedy of Hurricane Katrina has brought about a great deal of uncertainty and change, and we hope that you, your family and your friends are safe and healthy as we begin the re-building of our city.

We understand that many of you were anxious to find out about your options regarding your season ticket plans and we sincerely apologize for any inconvenience. Fortunately, we are now able to begin the process of re-connecting to the most important members of our team - our season ticket holders.

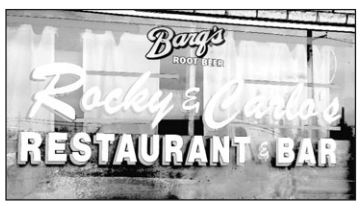
In order to give you as much flexibility as possible, we are providing two options for the money you have paid for the 2005-06 season:

1. You may obtain a full refund. Within 30 days of notifing us, you will receive either a check or credit back on your credit card.
2. You may keep the money you have on account with the Hornets and receive 4.5% interest per annum (retroactive to September 1). Your monies on account (plus the interest you have earned) can then be applied to your 2006-07 season tickets.

In a couple of weeks, we will be announcing how you can obtain a ticket plan to our six regular season home games in Baton Rouge. We are holding the best seat locations for you, our suite, season and group ticket holders. We appreciate your continued support, and we look forward to seeing you at those games.

We have set up a dedicated customer service line at 1-866-811-4667. Hornets staff will be available Sunday through Friday, 9:00 am to 5:00 pm. When you call the Hornets customer service line, a representative will assist you with your selection of option 1 or 2 above, your complimentary tickets to the October 25th Hornets vs. Heat game, and answer questions you have about the regular season games in Baton Rouge.

Thank you for your support,



Paul Mott

What became of St. Bernard's most famous sites?

ROCKY AND CARLO'S RESTAURANT

You haven't really tasted St. Bernard's culture until you've tried the baked macaroni and cheese smothered in beef gravy at Rocky and Carlo's Restaurant in Chalmette. Founded in 1965, the iconic Italian eatery serves up a steady diet of irreverent banter from the waitresses and generous mess-hall portions, levying 25-cent fines against anyone who requests a doggie bag.

The wood-paneled restaurant flooded during Katrina, but repair work began last week, and the owners have vowed that waitresses will once again greet diners with the familiar, "What can I get ya, Dawlin'?"

CHALMETTE BATTLEFIELD

The battlefield was the site of the Jan. 8, 1815, Battle of New Orleans, a decisive American victory over the British in the War of 1812. The triumph made Gen. Andrew Jackson a national hero and ended the Britain's efforts to regain control of the former colonies. The battlefield and adjacent Civil War-era Chalmette National Cemetery could reopen as early as January, after crews remove downed trees and repair damage to the Malus-Beauregard House, built in 1833.

BLACKIE CAMPO'S MARINA

For generations of New Orleans area anglers, Blackie Campo's Marina at Shell Beach has been the launching point for dreams of landing the big one in St. Bernard's world-class fishing waters. In continuous operation since 1931, the marina has made the name "Blackie" as synonymous with fishing as "Archie" is with football.

Katrina's 25-foot tidal surge washed away all the boats and boat houses, leaving only the steel beams of the hoist rising above the mud. With the commercial fishing industry devastated by the storm, Campo, 87, has said he's unsure when he might rebuild the marina.

ISLENOS MUSEUM

Established in 1980, the Islenos Museum chronicles the hardscrabble history of the Canary Island settlers sent to St. Bernard in the 1770s to protect the Spanish colony from a feared British invasion. Many of the soldier-farmers later sold their land to sugar plantations and made a living as fishers and trappers on the tranquil bayous and marshes in lower St. Bernard, where their descendants still work as commercial fishers.

Housed in a Creole cottage dating from the 1840s, the museum was split in half by a massive water oak that fell on the roof. Several other historic buildings at the complex had relatively minor damage, but the museum has been closed indefinitely.

DOCVILLE OAKS

This canopy of live oak trees on St. Bernard Highway in Meraux is one of the most prized natural features in a parish known for its scenic beauty. Transported from the Olivier Plantation in Model A wreckers, the trees were planted in the 1930s by Dr. Louis A. Meraux, who was sheriff of St. Bernard from 1924 until his death in 1938. Hurricane Katrina's 145-mph winds snapped large branches from many of the defoliated oaks, but none of the trees was felled and all are expected to survive.

TEST OF STRENGTH

ST. BERNARD, from A-1

"I remember we got 30 cents for a bushel of crabs. It was tough, but I had no choice," he said.

As an adult, Alfonso continued to make his living fishing and trapping muskrats, much like his Isleno ancestors, the Canary Islanders sent by Spain to settle St. Bernard Parish in the 1770s. And, like his ancestors, he rebuilt his home when it was destroyed by the occasional hurricane, first in 1956 and again in 1965 after Hurricane Betsy.

"There was no FEMA or flood insurance back then, but we had each other," he said. "This time it's different, though. Everybody's wiped out and there's no one to lean on."

Nearly every one of St. Bernard's 26,700 homes was flooded by Katrina's 25-foot storm surge, and authorities have said most will have to be bulldozed.

With few inhabitable structures, more than 400 recovery workers sleep on an old cruise ship provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. And, until recently, parish officials met in a cramped oil refinery office, with fly strips dangling from the ceiling, to discuss the daunting task of essentially rebuilding their community from scratch.

Contrast that with New Orleans, where the French Quarter emerged virtually unscathed along with other historic neighborhoods, including parts of Uptown and Treme. In Jefferson and St. Tammany parishes, schools have already reopened. And, in Plaquemines Parish, where the storm devastated fishing villages along the Mississippi River, Belle Chasse suffered little damage and is buzzing with economic activity, providing a solid base for rebuilding.

STAFF PHOTO BY CHRIS GRANGER

Drawing obvious inspiration from actor Arnold Schwarzenegger, residents of a home on Paris Road in Chalmette made their sentiments known with a sign on their garage, reflecting the tenacity of many in St. Bernard in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

In St. Bernard, the road to recovery is much steeper. The parish's tax base was wiped out overnight, and just one in four homeowners had flood insurance, raising serious questions about how to finance a reconstruction expected to cost at least several billion dollars. Meanwhile, the fishing industry, which has been under pressure from cheap imports and farm-raised seafood, faces fresh challenges, especially if damage to oyster beds proves to be as severe as feared.

Experts say the devastation could accelerate a pre-storm trend of commercial fishers selling out to wealthy recreational fishers, who could afford to lose their vacation homes if and when the area gets hit by another big storm.

But the parish also has some demographic factors working in its favor. It is the least transient parish in the New Orleans area, with many families calling St. Bernard home for several generations. According to the 2000 census, 65 percent of St. Bernard residents were living in the same house they occupied five years earlier, compared to 56 percent in New Orleans and 54 percent in St. Tammany Parish.

See ST. BERNARD, A-15

Part of the menu, right, stayed intact when Hurricane Katrina swept through Chalmette and Rocky and Carlo's Restaurant. Trevor Raphael, right, and Bobby Dickerson, left, both with Gioe's Trucking and Demolishing, prepare the wall for demolition. The owners of the restaurant hope to reopen as soon as possible.

Worn out from a day of cleaning the family house in Meraux, Brandon Waguespack, 16, hangs his head as he takes a break from picking up and sweeping away debris.

Parish goes from tight-knit to hard-hit

ST. BERNARD, from A-14

"Even in communities without such deep roots, there is more continuity to a way of life than most people realize," said Russell Dynes, a sociology professor at the University of Delaware's Disaster Research Center.

"When a catastrophe like Hurricane Katrina strikes, it looks very bleak at first, but people will undergo great hardships to return and rebuild," he said. "It's home, after all, and the cruise ship isn't."

'The Parish'

Although St. Bernard is technically a suburb of New Orleans, residents cherish the parish for its small-town feel, as a place where everyone seems to know one another and where it's not uncommon to find three generations of a family living on the same block.

Until the 1940s, most residents made their living as farmers, fishers and trappers on the tranquil bayous and marshes in the lower half of the parish, where sediment from the ever-shifting Mississippi River delta began forming thin ribbons of land 4,000 years ago.

After World War II, suburban tracts sprouted in Arabi, Chalmette, Meraux and Violet in western St. Bernard as economic pressures forced many to trade a life on the water for blue-collar jobs in the area's two oil refineries and other factories. The towering 500-foot Kaiser Aluminum Plant smokestack remains a landmark years after the factory was shuttered.

In the wake of Katrina's flooding, some residents say they are drawing strength from St. Bernard's long history of overcoming adversity, whether it was the Isleno farmers and fishers who repeatedly rebuilt their storm-battered palmetto huts in the 18th century or the refinery workers who repaired their ranch-style homes after hurricanes Betsy and Camille in the 1960s.

That sort of resilience and self-reliance was on display after the Aug. 29 hurricane. With outside help slow to arrive, local authorities and a flotilla of volunteers in private boats rescued hundreds of people from rooftops.

Since 1883, the Whitney has been committed to New Orleans. We helped build the city and we're going to do our part to help rebuild it. We took another important step this week by reopening our headquarters at 228 St. Charles Avenue.

Since the storms, we've reopened more than 115 branches in Louisiana and across the Gulf Coast, with more planning to open every day. And, beginning this week, Whitney Bankers will be back home in the Main Office, eager to meet with their clients.

The city we love is going to come back.

'We're going to rebuild ... bigger and better'

ST. BERNARD, from A-15

"Living in an area that catches every storm that boils out of the Gulf will breed a certain toughness in a people," said Lawrence Powell, a Tulane University history professor. "That may be the parish's best hope for rebuilding."

Perhaps no one embodies that toughness more than Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez. Just a month after being released from a hospital intensive care unit where he was treated for complications from gall bladder surgery, Rodriguez, 69, rode out the storm at the parish government complex in Chalmette and lived on the roof for three days with other parish officials.

"There are plenty of tough SOBs here who aren't going to let a storm push them around," Rodriguez said. "I'm not saying it's going to be easy, but we're going to rebuild St. Bernard bigger and better."

Fighting despair

Parish officials said one of the biggest obstacles to rebuilding is helping residents overcome the initial shock and sense of hopelessness many experienced when they saw their ruined homes for the first time.

Some people who returned with moving vans, and the intention of hauling away a truckload of belongings, left with a few things stuffed in a garbage bag.

"The cleanup phase is the hardest, because all you see is the destruction," Parish Councilwoman Judy Hoffmeister said. "But once the first new houses start going up, I think it will give people a real psychological boost."

In their public comments, council members have been fiercely optimistic about the parish's future. "We lost seven homes in my immediate family, and we're going to build seven new ones," Parish Council Chairman Joey DiFatta said. "Even my 80-year-old mother is coming back."

Parish officials said they view the devastation as a clean slate to address long-standing problems, such as drainage, bottlenecks on east-west thoroughfares, and levees that could be higher and stronger.

"We want to focus not on what St. Bernard was, but on what it could be," DiFatta said.

Dynes said talk of rebuilding St. Bernard "bigger and better" isn't necessarily empty optimism.

"There are all kinds of examples throughout history of renewal and rebirth after catastrophes. Look at London after World War II or San Francisco after the 1906 earthquake," he said.

Devastated communities seeking to rebuild face a "classic chicken-and-egg dilemma," said John Lindsay, chairman of the Department of Applied Disaster and Emergency Studies at Brandon University in Manitoba.

"In order to get the economy back up and running, you need people to return," he said. "But for people to be able to afford to move back, they need jobs."

Parish officials hope to make the transition by helping residents find temporary housing and jobs with contractors clearing storm debris.

"I signed a $122 million contract for cleaning up this mess, and I want as much of that money to stay in St. Bernard Parish as possible," Rodriguez said.

He said the parish is seeking federal funding for 6,000 travel trailers that residents could park in their driveways and live in while rebuilding their homes.

Parish officials are also working to replace the cruise ship, which costs FEMA $52,000 a day, with a small city of trailers and mobile homes near the government complex.

Overly optimistic?

Rodriguez said he hopes to have 20,000 to 25,000 people living in the parish a year from now, or about a third of the pre-storm population of 68,000. That's a more optimistic view than you'll get from patrons of Lehrmann's Bar and Seafood in Chalmette, one of just a few parish businesses that have reopened.

"I'd say that out of 50 people, half say they aren't coming back. Most of the rest aren't sure, and only a few say they definitely plan to return," co-owner Pat Lehrmann said.

The biggest concern on nearly everyone's mind seems to be the levee system that was overwhelmed by Katrina's powerful storm surge.

The Army Corps of Engineers has said it will rebuild the levees to pre-storm levels before the next hurricane season begins. But that's little comfort to some.

"That obviously wasn't good enough before Katrina, and it certainly won't be good enough now that even more of the coastline has disappeared," said Carol Larmeu, 66, whose home on Perrin Drive in Arabi had water nearly to the roofline.

Others are concerned that even if they rebuild their homes, they won't be able to recreate St. Bernard's tight-knit community of people who prided themselves on looking out for one another.

"I don't want to come back unless my neighbors do," said Joan Fleetwood, 66, as she used a metal detector to search the muck in her Arabi home for a medallion her mother had given her just before she died. "I know people say this all the time, but my neighbors really are like family to me."

Rodriguez said he's not worried about the parish losing its cherished sense of community. If anything, he said, the storm will bring people closer.

"The people who come back are going to be diehard St. Bernard residents," he said. "They're going to be the kind of people who will come back again if we get wiped out next year."

That includes Donald Bordelon, who survived the storm on the roof of his Arabi home. When the floodwaters receded eight days later, he climbed down and began gutting the house in preparation for rebuilding it.

"This is my home, pure and simple," said Bordelon, who has continued to reside in the house despite not having electricity or running water. "I know that doesn't mean much to some people who pick up and move every few years, but it means everything to me."

Eastern half of parish is decimated

ST. BERNARD, from A-16

greeted at the parish line on Paris Road by a large crucifix and a spray-painted sign that reads, "Keep the Faith," an attempt to prepare them for the postapocalyptic destruction they are about to encounter.

Block after block of homes in western St. Bernard subdivisions have waterlines at least 6 feet high, and as many as 1,200 houses in Chalmette and Meraux were slimed by a million-gallon crude oil spill at the Murphy Oil Refinery.

In the eastern half of the parish, beyond the levee protection system, many structures were simply washed away.

The roads running through the fishing villages of Alluvial City, Yscloskey, Hopedale and Delacroix are lined with pilings supporting nothing, skeletonized buildings draped with marsh grass, and porch steps leading eerily to nowhere. Many residents have spray-painted their addresses on the road so insurance adjusters will know where their homes used to be.

The storm even swept away the sign at the end of Delacroix Highway that said, "Fin de la Tierra," meaning End of the Earth.

Major questions loom about financing for the reconstruction. DiFatta said he would like to see the federal government establish a grant program that would give residents as much as $100,000 to rebuild their homes in St. Bernard.

"These people are going to have to rebuild their lives somewhere," he said. "It might as well be here."

But some observers said such a large-scale federal bailout is unlikely.

"I can't see the political storms aligning to allow that," said Powell, the Tulane professor. "I wish them well, but the view from the man on the street is, 'Why rebuild something if it's just going to flood again? Why not let it return to nature?' "

Sheriff Jack Stephens, who has laid off more than half his 400 employees, predicted eastern St. Bernard will become a fishing resort as commercial fishers give way to recreational fishers, who prize the area for its redfish and speckled trout.

"Fishermen have been selling their land to sportsmen for years," Stephens said. "The storm is only going to speed that up by giving people another reason to leave."

Stephens said he is one of just five year-round residents in Fort Beauregard Marina Estates, an upscale subdivision with more than 100 lots near Shell Beach.

"The rest of the people just come down a few times a year to go fishing," he said.

Dynes said catastrophes often speed up cultural and economic changes that were already under way.

"If the commercial fishing industry was waning before the storm, this could put it under even more pressure," he said.

DiFatta said a shift from commercial to recreational fishing wouldn't necessarily be unwelcome.

"It could be a win-win situation for everyone," he said. "The fishermen get decent money for their land, the sportsmen get access to some of the best fishing in the world, and we start to get our tax base back."

Off to Missouri

Larry Barton, an oyster harvester from Hopedale, has little hope of returning to the water anytime soon. His fishing boat was swept away and deposited in a field. A casket from a nearby cemetery rested against it.

"You're talking about bulldozers and bonfires throughout St. Bernard for months," he said. "After that, it could take three to five years to reseed all the oyster beds wiped out by the storm."

For now, he plans to keep the lot where his home was reduced to a pile of cinderblocks and work for his brother's construction company in Missouri.

"We'll all find jobs somewhere, but it might not be where we want," he said. "There's nothing like the smell of the salt air and the freedom of being on the open water."

Meanwhile, Alfonso said that after 79 years of living on the water, he plans to move inland, probably to Hammond.

"This storm was bad, but the next one will be even worse," he said. "We've got less and less protection."

But with the danger comes breathtaking natural beauty. Alfonso said he will miss living on the open marshland where he could watch the sun rise and set from his raised home while listening to the marsh grass rustling in the wind.

"People here like to call this God's country, and I agree," he said. "But I'm worried that God might be taking it back."

to remove pump operators, possibly against their will, and to ship them to shelters near Mississippi has drawn a growing chorus of criticism, prompting questions about why the call was made and whether it imperiled residents who did not evacuate.

Several veteran pump employees who did leave their posts and later returned to restart the pumps, told The Times-Picayune last week that they supported Broussard's decision at the time it was made, when National Weather Service reports forecast "a most powerful hurricane with unprecedented strength."

To allow the operators to remain at their posts would have been "a death sentence," according to Broussard, who called the workers out when Katrina was aimed at Jefferson Parish and was forecast as a Category 5 monster, with sustained winds of 165 miles per hour and a "life-threatening" storm surge of 18 to 22 feet. Broussard has vowed to stick with the same evacuation plan if another strong hurricane approaches on the same path.

The pump workers said, however, that they could support a plan to use shelters closer than Washington Parish during strong storms, noting that communication problems plagued their re-entry after Katrina and probably delayed draining Jefferson of floodwaters by several hours. Some said they would not oppose keeping pump workers inside the parish, an option Councilman-at-large John Young pushed last week.

Without fail, the workers said that as part of government's rank and file, they would have stayed at their posts during Katrina if assigned, even in light of desperate meteorological warnings. Some even said they reported to work the day before the storm, prepared to stay despite the danger.

"I called my wife up, and I said, 'If we do stay for this storm, some people may not make it,' " said Kenneth Babin, a pump operator for 21 years and a father of two. "She knows that's my job title. Whatever they direct me to do, that's what I do. I know what's the risk when I took this job."

Catch-22

For the pump employees, most with more than 20 years in the parish drainage department, Katrina marked the first evacuation during a storm or heavy rain. Unlike many residents, they knew far in advance that the parish's emergency handbook called for removal of essential employees and the shutdown of pump stations, which are staffed by as many as 25 workers and cannot operate without human labor, in advance of a Category 4 or 5 hurricane.

But the decision to leave Jefferson Parish, where no building has been certified to withstand a hurricane stronger than Category 3, was not made without pause, said Bill Duplaisir, an operations manager who oversees 70 pump employees. Joining a convoy of 700 public vehicles that left the parish Aug. 28 about 6 p.m., Duplaisir said he knew some residents had not evacuated and that shuttered pumps endangered their lives.

"That's a Catch-22 situation," he said last week. "You're damned if you do, and you're damned if you don't. It crossed my mind that there are people still here and we're leaving, but if we stay, we die. What purpose does that serve?"

Indeed, pump workers said they did not trust the stations' engineering to protect them in a Category 4 or 5 hurricane, a belief bolstered in 2001 by the Louisiana State University Hurricane Center, which found no building in Jefferson equipped for such a storm.

"Most of these stations, if we get a 10- to 15-foot storm surge, pretty much all the equipment we have here would be under water. Plus, you have 4,160 volts in some of these stations," Babin said, noting the increased threat of electrocution and of power surge, which could severely damage equipment, if diesel generators were functioning at the height of a hurricane.

Communications failures

The pump operators said that after Katrina's landfall, problems with cell phones, satellite phones and text messaging systems hampered their return. Duplaisir said his crew did not know the status of Interstate 10 or Interstate 55 as they headed home from Franklinton and could not connect with top officials who rode out the storm in Marrero, or even with state troopers, to help spirit them home.

"We were coming back blind, and without proper communications. If the communications system had been up and running, we could have been back by 3 p.m" Monday, Duplantier said, adding that it wasn't until 9 p.m. that he reached the foot of the Causeway, where floodwaters forced pump workers to hitch rides with 2 ½-ton National Guard trucks to get to their stations.

Babin said arriving to that scene, knowing that his task for 21 years has been to keep the parish dry, was shocking. His empathy for property loss, however, would not be detached, as Babin learned when he crossed the river to visit his own house, in a basin served by the Estelle Pump Station.

"I lost everything I own," he said. "I'm in the exact same position. My heart goes out. . . . But I still wouldn't say we abandoned our post. We just did what we were told."

George Davis, an operator at the St. Charles Parish line pump station in Kenner, said he has fielded complaints from flood victims angry about Broussard's evacuation order.

"We catch a lot of flak," Davis said. "They give us a lot of ribbing over that. I just say, 'I'm just the low man on the totem pole.' I don't feel responsible. I don't know if we would have stayed if we would have avoided that or not."

Clear hindsight

With so-called "safehouses" in design or construction at the parish's 20 staffed pump stations, Broussard has said keeping workers at pump stations in strong storms could become an option. But Aragon and Davis said they are not fully confident in those structures.

"They're kind of saying that it's going to be OK, but that remains to be seen," Davis said.

One pump drainage employee, who asked not to be identified because he said he feared he would be fired for second-guessing the evacuation plan, said he would have ridden

Some workers at jobs during worst of storms

Emergency personnel evacuate within parish

By Michelle Hunter
East Jefferson bureau

On the eve of Hurricane Katrina's landfall, as 1,100 Jefferson Parish government workers made their way north to Washington Parish, Wes Mobley and about 20 of his employees with Sodexho food services company prepared to hunker down in the cafeteria of West Jefferson Medical Center in Marrero.

Their goal was to feed the more than 2,000 patients, doctors, nurses and others who sheltered at the hospital, which never closed its doors.

The Sodexho workers slept on air mattresses on the kitchen floor, serving 5,000 meals a day under the same miserable conditions shared by most everyone who rode out the hurricane in the New Orleans area: no electricity, no bathrooms, no running water and no air conditioning.

But leaving was not an option, said Mobley, whose company holds the food services contract with West Jefferson. Their services were just as critical to hospital operations as the physicians.

"There's never a situation in which we don't stay," he said.

Sodexho's troops are among the thousands who remained in Jefferson Parish throughout the storm. While the parish government employees drove to safety north of Lake Pontchartrain under the parish's "doomsday" plan, hospitals, law enforcement agencies, fire departments and workers at some hotels rode out the storm.

"I felt a civic responsibility," said Dr. Charles Thomas, a surgeon who sent his family off to safety and spent 18 days treating the sick and injured at West Jefferson.

At Ochsner Foundation Hospital in Jefferson, essential personnel such as doctors, nurses, technicians, and maintenance and janitorial staff are divided into two teams when storms threaten, said Mike Hulefeld, vice president of clinical services. Team A works through the brunt of the storm and up to five days after. Until Katrina, Hulefeld said the hospital had never had to send in Team B.

But the hospital weathered the storm, caring for 400 patients with the help of more than 1,000 employees. Ochsner has no plans to evacuate, even during Category 4 or 5 storms, Hulefeld said.

"Our goal and our responsibility is to care for this community and care for the people who are here during the storm, whether they should be or not," he said.

More than 1,000 employees of the Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office, about 60 percent of the department, were required to stay for the storm, Chief Deputy Newell Normand said. While clerks and other support staff were given the go-ahead to evacuate with their families, the patrol division, the investigations bureau, the traffic division, the corrections department and the 911 center were on duty and stationed around the parish.

Workers took shelter at West Jefferson Medical Center and the department's main office in Harvey on the West Bank, Normand said. In Metairie, they were quartered at the east bank lock-up on Metairie Road, East Jefferson General Hospital, Omega Hospital, the Landmark Hotel and the Four Points Sheraton.

"We evacuate within the parish," Normand said.

Sheriff's Office vehicles were parked on the second and third floor of parking garages around the parish or on the West Bank Expressway to keep them from flooding.

The Sheriff's Office fared well during the storm, Normand said. The department lost fewer than 30 of its 1,400-plus fleet due to damage.

As a general rule, the Sheriff's Office does not evacuate for hurricanes. But Normand couldn't say that day would never come. It might depend on the severity of the storm. But on Aug. 28, when Katrina was taking aim on New Orleans as a Category 5, Normand said evacuation was not a consideration.

It also wasn't an option for some parish hotels. More than 600 people, including employees, their families, a handful of tourists and a number of local officials and law enforcement agencies headed to the Airport Hilton in Kenner for shelter. By the time the call for a mandatory out Katrina at one of Jefferson's public hospitals in order to return to his pump station quickly after the winds died down, an option Broussard has eschewed, saying those buildings cannot withstand a Category 4 or 5.

"If I could have stayed where I wanted to stay, which was the hospital, I'd have found a hole somewhere to hide in," the pump worker said. "There were a few of us, some of my fellow co-workers, (who wondered) if the policemen and firemen were holed up there, if it was good enough for them to stay in, why can't it be good enough for a few operators?"

But Duplaisir said heroic statements made in hindsight, knowing that Katrina actually made landfall as a Category 4 storm 50 miles southeast of lower Marrero, should not bolster criticism of the evacuation. Had the storm jogged just a bit, he said, Jefferson could have taken its burnt.

"Look what happened at the Superdome and at Methodist Hospital," he said. "They'd have been rescuing us off the tops of the buildings just like they were everyone else. We got lucky this time. The hospital didn't go under water. But look what happened in New Orleans."

When guests stay, so do hotel workers

HOLDOUTS, from A-19

evacuation went out, General Manager Craig Mouney said his hotel had accepted responsibility for the guests.

"What else can we do?" he said. "We'd be putting people on the street. At that point, you're putting them in harm's way. You just hunker down and pray for the best."

Many agencies opted for partial evacuations. A consortium of West Bank fire departments operated with a skeleton crew of about 35 firefighters, compared to the more than 100 that can serve on an average day, said Don Robertson, chief of the Marrero-Harvey department. Those firefighters retreated to West Jefferson Medical Center when the storm worsened.

About half of the East Jefferson Levee District's police force evacuated with parish workers to Franklinton Junior High School in Washington Parish, a new strategy based on Katrina's forecast strength, Chief Rocky Daigle said. During most hurricanes, all officers are on call with the option of staying at the Airport Hilton or at their own homes. But the storm's magnitude prompted Daigle to make sure at least half of the 23-officer force and their vehicles were safe.

"None of them really wanted to go," Daigle said. "To the 'T,' they wanted to stay. But it was my decision to go ahead and send them off. We had never dealt with a Category 5."

Should there ever be a next time, Daigle said, he'd probably try to get equipment to higher ground and put the officers up at the Airport Hilton.

FEMA moves to clear out shelters

But some struggle to obtain housing

By Kevin McGill
Associated Press writer

GONZALES — Lisa Austin couldn't hide her excitement Saturday as she pushed a shopping cart full of luggage out of the cavernous convention hall in Gonzales, where she had lived for nearly seven weeks.

The broken windows and soaked carpets in her house in New Orleans had been repaired, and she was heading home.

"I've never missed my home as much as I miss it right now," she said.

Watching her leave the Lamar-Dixon Expo Center, Ray Schiavo was as frustrated as Austin was happy.

He said he had been waiting weeks to get into a rental house in Metairie, but miscommunication and red tape with the Federal Emergency Management Agency had left him stuck without the check he needs to get back on his feet.

"I've got a job waiting for me. I've got a house waiting for me. But I'm still here," Schiavo said.

FEMA largely succeeded in moving some 270,000 Hurricane Katrina evacuees out of shelters by Saturday, a self-imposed deadline, estimating that 95 percent had gone on to other housing options.

As of Saturday afternoon, 14,468 people remained in shelters, according to state and federal officials. Louisiana shelters held 9,003 of them, and the remainder were spread among 11 other states.

Despite progress, there still are families like Dolores Meinke's, stuck in shelters they are trying to leave.

The 73-year-old's home was nearly destroyed by floodwaters in New Orleans. She and her family have been trying to arrange to put a trailer on property her nephew owns in the Pearl River area.

Before they can do that, though, they have to travel to the property and get a notarized letter granting them permission to put the trailer there.

Vice Adm. Thad Allen, the Coast Guard commander in charge of FEMA's response to Katrina, said last week that nobody would be forced out of any shelter because of the Saturday deadline and that federal staff would work with the remaining evacuees to help them find more permanent housing.

FEMA ascribes the slow pace to difficulties in land acquisition, gaining permits and to disruptions caused by Hurricane Rita.

Katrina displaced an estimated 1.5 million people when it struck Aug. 29. Shelter population peaked at about 273,000 in the days after the storm, according to FEMA.

"It is a monumental effort that FEMA has undertaken and we understand that that effort is going to take time, but we had hoped it would come about quicker than it has," said Mark Smith, spokesman for Louisiana's Office of Emergency Preparedness.

Michael Logan is one of the dwindling few. He finds himself still in the Cajundome in Lafayette, trying to qualify for a FEMA camper trailer he could put on his damaged coastal property.

"I hope — that's all I can do is hope, because I ain't going to get no answers — that they can just set me up with a place, a camper trailer," Logan said. "I told them just set it up, I'll do all the other work."

This bus, taken from the Algiers bus barn with the intention of evacuating residents of the Fischer housing development, didn't make it to Texas. Its driver crashed it into a metal trash bin.

Riders first denied entrance to Astrodome in Houston

BUS, from A-1

Somehow, school bus No. 0235 made it to Houston, enduring near-mishaps, mechanical problems and brushes with police. Somehow, desperate residents of the Fischer housing development who had viewed Gibson as a hoodlum suddenly trusted him as their hero. The kid got a school bus. He got them out of there.

His act of heroism came less than two weeks after his most recent arrest. Gibson, who said he was expelled from high school in the 10th grade for fighting and claims he is known by police as the "kingpin" of the Fischer development, led police on a high-speed chase Aug. 18. It ended with a car wreck, four police officers suffering minor injuries, and the arrests of Gibson and Otis Louis, 22. Information on the status of that case was unavailable from the Orleans Parish district attorney's office.

Gibson faces a pending charge of possession of crack cocaine stemming from a June arrest. In 2002, he pleaded guilty to felony car theft charges and was sentenced to two years probation.

"I was in the wrong place at the wrong time, a lot of times," Gibson said. "But all that's behind me now. I'm trying to be a new me. . . . I feel like the Lord, all the problems I was going through, he just turned it around for me."

Getting out

Though Gibson is saving his story for Hollywood, interviews with six people who rode the bus, drivers of other commandeered school buses, Gibson's friends, as well as law enforcement and Red Cross officials, provide an account of what transpired:

The Tuesday morning after Katrina hit, Gibson decided it was time to go. So he and three friends hit the streets with a piece of hose pipe and a plastic jug to siphon gas.

By 5 p.m. they'd filled a jug,

It was from this peg inside the bus depot on Patterson Street in Algiers Point that Jabar Gibson got the key that took bus No. 0235 and a load of evacuees to Houston in the aftermath of Katrina.

but the truck they planned to use to escape wouldn't start. A mechanic who lived at Fischer said he'd try to fix it, but by 11:30 a.m. the next day, Wednesday, he was still under the hood.

Finally he climbed into the driver's seat and turned the ignition key and pressed hard on the accelerator. The engine roared.

Gibson and his friends hustled toward the car, just as a school bus rattled down L.B. Landry Avenue toward Fischer.

Gibson waved the driver down and asked where he got the bus. Algiers Point, said the man, driving off.

Gibson looked at his friend, Dennis "Chopper" Landry.

"Now we got a way to get everyone out of here," Gibson said. Gibson, Landry and Terrance "Chili" Henderson, along with a few others, piled into the truck and headed for Algiers Point.

Word began to spread through Fischer: "They're going to get buses!"

The wooden doors to the bus barn had been blown out or bashed in — it was hard to tell which because the hurricane had torn shingles off the roof and ripped holes in the wooden building. Inside, the door to the

Have stolen school bus, will travel

BUS, from A-21

front office was open. Gibson and the others got bus keys that were hanging on the inside of the wooden door.

They found the bus numbers matching their keys. None of the young men had ever driven a bus, but they cranked them up and drove through a front gate already torn off its hinges.

"Everybody pack your bags and get ready," hollered Shelinda "Sheba" Clark as the buses came into view. "The levee's going to bust!"

Gibson pulled up in the first school bus. Six others pulled behind the front building and onto LeBoeuf Street. A few minutes later came the eighth and final bus, trailed by the police.

With the last bus still rolling, its young driver jumped out and ran. One of the officers jumped on the rolling bus and stopped it just before it smashed into Gibson's. The officer stepped out and strode toward Gibson's bus, already loaded with about 60 people.

"Everybody off the bus," he ordered, and the passengers dragged their bags back onto the sidewalk.

Gibson handed the second officer the keys and made his plea.

"We need the buses to get the babies and elderly out of here," he begged her.

His plea continued. The woman listened. A few minutes passed.

She handed the keys back to Gibson.

"Keep the buses," she said, and the officers climbed into their squad car and left.

The passengers reloaded. Gibson climbed behind the wheel and stared at the unfamiliar panel behind the steering wheel. He fiddled with some of the buttons. He had no specific destination, just Texas, and he asked someone for directions.

A woman a few seats behind him stood up and shrieked.

"Let me off the bus! You're all going to drown and die!" she said.

It was Makivia Horton, five months pregnant, and one of the 24 people who had escaped the east bank over the bridge and boarded Gibson's bus. Other passengers tried to calm her as her fiance blocked her path to the aisle. Horton kept screaming.

Suddenly a woman sitting across the aisle pulled out a handgun. She shouted at Horton and told her to sit down and shut up.

Someone grabbed the gun.

"If she wants off the bus, let her off the bus," Gibson said, "because once I start, I ain't stopping."

"Everything's cool," Horton's fiance said, and off pulled Gibson, with the young passengers waving and screaming at those who stayed, mostly adults who gave up spots on the bus to make sure the infants, children and elderly got out.

Two other buses trailed Gibson's as they cruised down Landry and pulled onto the West Bank Expressway, headed west out of town on U.S. 90.

Slipping by

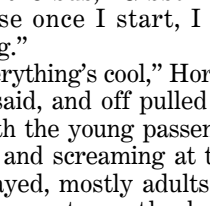
Less than 10 minutes into the ride, they passed two mail trucks, apparently commandeered by about a dozen people, now standing on the side of the road and being questioned by two police officers.

Gibson knew if the cops stopped him and discovered he was driving a bus without being licensed to do so, not to mention out on bail with felony charges pending, he might be headed for jail rather than Texas. He eased his foot off the accelerator and quietly slipped by.

Passengers said his inexperience as a bus driver showed at times, with the vehicle weaving onto the shoulder of the road on curves, with Gibson struggling to control it.

"It's OK," an older woman told other passengers. "That's my son driving."



Indeed, Bernice Gibson sat in the back of the bus near Gibson's 9-month-old daughter and the baby's mother.

Despite his mother's confidence, others worried. And though they didn't know it, there were things to worry about. When Gibson and the other drivers took the buses, they didn't notice the papers posted outside the doors of the

Riders' oasis was store in Berwick

BUS, from A-22

papers listed 41 buses that needed repairs.

At the bottom of one list was No. 0235. The bus' transmission was due for service and it had a broken radiator cap, both potential causes of a breakdown.

Unaware of the mechanical concerns, Gibson sped down the road toward Texas with two other buses driven by his friends traveling alongside. About 90 minutes into the trip, one of the other drivers, Martin, waved at Gibson and motioned for him to stop. Martin's gas needle was hovering around empty, and he was afraid he'd run out of gas and get left behind.

They decided to abandon Martin's bus, dividing the passengers onto the other two buses. Suddenly, Gibson's bus was so cramped that people were squeezed four to a seat while others sat or stood in the aisle.

A second bus soon had a problem.

Gibson noticed that a back tire on the bus driven by Henderson was going flat. He pointed to the rear wheel, but Henderson kept driving until the bus began to swerve and slide.

At about 3:30 p.m. they pulled off the road in Berwick, a few miles west of Morgan City, and drove to a Conoco gas station that had only three working pumps. But one pump had diesel, and the station sat next to a laundry and a small convenience store.

Before anyone got off his bus, Gibson warned them not to steal or do anything stupid. Then passengers poured into the convenience store.

Phuoc Nguyen, 29, and a member of the family that owns the store, stood behind the cash register. As the horde of people filled the store, Nguyen said he considered setting off the silent alarm at his feet that would bring the Berwick police and fire departments. But he didn't.

Next door, they were filling up the buses with diesel fuel.

Someone told the station owner, Michael Borel, about the leaking back tire on one of the buses. Borel, 40, and a self-described "coonass," said he'd call for help.

Borel called police instead. Five minutes later, they arrived. But there was only one squad car and two buses.

Gibson pulled away and left the other bus behind.

As the bus clipped along, he kept glancing in the rearview mirror. No sign of the police or the second bus.

They were on their own. If bus No. 0235 broke down, they'd be stranded.

Meanwhile, someone alerted Texas state troopers about the "renegade" school buses headed their way. Their orders were to stop the vehicles on sight.

'Do what's right'

No. 0235 rolled on another four hours before Gibson pulled into another gas station, near Lake Charles. Instead of calling the police, the cashier gave the passengers two ice chests, two cases of water and important information: The Astrodome in Houston was opening its doors as a shelter for Katrina evacuees.

It was night when the bus crossed into Texas, where they met a trucker who offered to lead them to the Astrodome. The bus somehow went unnoticed by Texas state troopers, and it was nearing midnight when the old home of the Houston Oilers and Houston Astros came into view.

The children broke into wild cheers.

Back in New Orleans, the first FEMA bus would not pick up evacuees at the Superdome until later that day — those at the Convention Center would wait two more days — but Gibson, even with Texas law enforcement out to stop him, had safely evacuated a busload of New Orleanians to Houston.

TV cameramen and reporters rushed to greet the bus and said officials had been waiting on buses from the Superdome and that Gibson's had been the first to arrive. Immediately recognizing the situation, Gibson told the reporters he had come from the Superdome, but his story did not match what other passengers said.

Security guards watched the scene carefully. They'd been instructed to accept only chartered buses carrying evacuees from the Superdome. This clearly was no chartered bus.

A battalion of guards blocked the gates. Gibson climbed off the bus. So did Sheila Nathan, her teary-eyed toddler and three other grandchildren. Eventually, the bus was empty, its passengers on the street. The police discovered that these evacuees were not from the Superdome. This was not one of the official buses.

Some of the evacuees were crying. Others were pleading. A few were cursing. Suddenly, reporters discovered what was happening — the police were refusing entry — and descended on the bus and its passengers. They clustered around.

"Now we don't have nowhere to go," Gibson told the reporters. "We heard the Astrodome was open for people from New Orleans. We ain't ate right, we ain't slept right. They don't want to give us no help. They don't want to let us in."

The media interviewed others, too, then sought out officials. They found Robert Eckels, who by virtue of his position as judge of Harris County, ran the Astrodome. For almost 20 minutes, Eckels huddled with other officials and discussed the tense situation.

Then he climbed into his silver Lexus and, heading for the exit gate, stopped in front of a knot of reporters. Wearing a weary smile, he answered questions. Someone asked about "the renegade bus."

"That bus that arrived earlier was (driven by) a young man who had loaded up a bunch of kids and just gotten into the bus and driven here," Eckels said. "It was not one of those buses (from the Superdome). At this point, our plan, our agreement, is to take the Superdome buses."

Eckels drove off, exiting through the same gate through which police refused to let the yellow school bus enter. Minutes later, a more sympathetic official arrived on the scene: Margaret O'Brien-Molina, a gray-haired woman of 53 and head of the Red Cross chapter in Houston.

She'd heard about the "renegade bus." She'd heard about Eckel's decision. She'd heard about the wailing babies.

Striding past the policemen, O'Brien-Molina walked outside the gate and approached the desperate passengers. Nathan, with her 5-year-old toddler in her arms, began to lose strength and composure. She fought back tears as she told the crying child she could no longer hold her. O'Brien-Molina scooped the girl into her own arms, kissed her on the forehead and ushered the passengers back onto the bus.

She issued a command to police: Move aside. The school bus is coming through.

The officers opened the gate, and bus No. 0235 rumbled through. Gibson was still behind the wheel, his face bathed in the lights of TV cameras. Trailing behind, another bus motored in. It was unrelated to the renegade bus, this one filled with elderly evacuees, a few in wheelchairs and several in need of medical attention.

Twenty minutes later, inside the Astrodome, O'Brien-Molina led a tour of the building and explained the setup for about 10 reporters. Then she spotted the 5-year-old girl she'd held in her arms. The girl was lying on a cot next to her grandmother. Yes, she explained, she understood that Houston had agreed to accept only the 23,000 evacuees from the Superdome and that their obligation would grow more difficult by accepting Gibson and other evacuees.

"We've got to make sure that we can take care of them," she said. "On the other hand, you got to do what's right."

STAFF PHOTO BY MICHAEL DeMOCKER

A book called 'Prayers and Promises' rests on the steps of one of the Orleans Parish school buses taken from the bus depot in Algiers Point after Hurricane Katrina.

Confessing his story

Then Gibson did what was right. He told Houston sheriff's deputies the whole story, about how he'd stolen the bus, got permission to keep it from a New Orleans police officer and embarked on a 12-hour trip to the Astrodome. Sheriff's deputies said they were concerned mainly with finding the other buses, and eventually all but two were tracked down.

One of the buses had gotten stuck in mud in Fischer's grass courtyard and never made it out. A young driver accidentally rammed another bus into a trash bin and abandoned it when the vehicle started leaking transmission fluid. The passengers on Henderson's bus, separated from Gibson's at the Berwick gas station, did not make it to Texas and ended up in a shelter in New Iberia.

Eventually, Constance Haynes, the resident council president at Fischer who watched the buses leave before evacuating in her own car the next day, learned about Gibson's journey and the national attention.

Upon returning recently to Fischer after spending more than a month in assorted shelters, Haynes grinned and said, "I've always had a soft spot for the thugs. . . . Those boys have big hearts. . . . They're heroes."

But as New Orleans Police Department spokesman Garry Flot searched for the officer who allowed Gibson to take the school bus, he said the department had no precedent for how to deal with a "hero" facing criminal charges.

Police apparently are not searching for Gibson. He's staying with Landry in a hotel room that costs $49.99 a night.

"He could go from thug to hero from hero to thug again," Flot said.

Gibson still faces a court date on the crack cocaine charge.

"That's in the past," Gibson said. "That ain't me. Everybody does wrong things. But right now I feel like I done something right."

CHURCH, from A-1

expressed their yearning to be together physically. And each one gave thanks for tiny blessings in a world of hurt.

"I find there's a strong sense of isolation when you're in this evacuation mode," their pastor, the Rev. Cornelius Tilton, said after the call was over. "What I liken it to, we're almost in the Diaspora, like the Jews after the fall of Jerusalem.

"We needed to reconnect, do some healing and let people know they're not out there all by themselves."

Tilton, their pastor of 17 years, had not seen most of the church's 70 members since Aug. 28, the day before Katrina stuck.

The storm blew out dozens of stained glass windows and damaged the roof of the congregation's 149-year-old building on the relatively high ground of First Street near the Mississippi River.

But many church members were hard hit by the storm that flooded 80 percent of the city. They were stranded where they fled.

Many said they had no house to return to.

Storm roll call

In the weeks since Katrina, Tilton has learned the whereabouts of nearly all his flock. More recently he began to lay plans to bring them together, at least by telephone, to hear each other's voices for the first time since the storm.

For an hour and 15 minutes their electronic assembly was a borderless blend of worship and fellowship.

They began the encounter with exultant group praise, each church member in each new apartment, each loaned bedroom — and a few in their battered New Orleans homes — singing alone into the phone, "This Is the Day the Lord Has Made."

Tilton called a storm roll and each church member checked in with a short story:

There was Pat Barnes, who said she would not return from Clarksville, Tenn.; young Alex Santemas, a newly enrolled senior in high school in La Junta, Colo., where it was "different, safer," although "small town life is hard"; and Tracy Stewart, who announced her engagement and plans to marry back in New Orleans.

She was smothered in congratulations.

"I miss church, but I'm so glad you're all safe," said Diane Phillips from her home in Algiers.

An ache to return

One after another, Irish Channel's members told their stories of evacuating for what they thought would be two or three days. Many told of subsequent wanderings from city to city as New Orleans drowned and days turned to weeks.

A few, like Barnes in Tennessee, said their relocation seemed permanent.

Most said they ached to return.

"I'm like a child without a toy, not being able to play the organ every Sunday," said Diane Peterson Gray from Port Hudson.

Yet many said they felt blessed in the midst of privation.

"I've been blessed to be able to help people," said Phillips, back in New Orleans. "I know they would have done the same for me. I'm low on food, low on money. I don't know what's going to happen next, but I'm not going to lose my faith in God."

A chorus of murmured "amens" floated back over the line in response.

"God didn't bring us this far just to leave us," the pastor's brother, Gerald Tilton, said. "I've seen things in the last month I can do without ever seeing again. But I know it's part of a divine plan. It's all gonna be all right. I'm just gonna keep on keepin' on.

"But I want to see you all again."

"Amen," they murmured.

Church update

For 75 minutes they updated and encouraged each other. They shared Scripture. Pastor Tilton went over the birthdays come and gone, and congratulations and laughter floated through the air.

He updated them on church business. Their scheduled donation of $700 to support eight students in Ghana would be made on time, he said.

He briefed them on his own condition. He was shuttling weekly between his temporary home in Houston and New Orleans, where he looks in on some church members and where, as president, he hopes next month to reopen Christian Bible College.

He told them he hoped to resume services at thechurch home Nov. 6, but that they would continue to meet by telephone, on Thursday nights.

He exhorted those who found new church homes. "Wherever we find ourselves we have to be a blessing to others," he said.

But he reminded them too, that their New Orleans church would continue to need their financial support as it rebuilds.

'Victors, not victims'

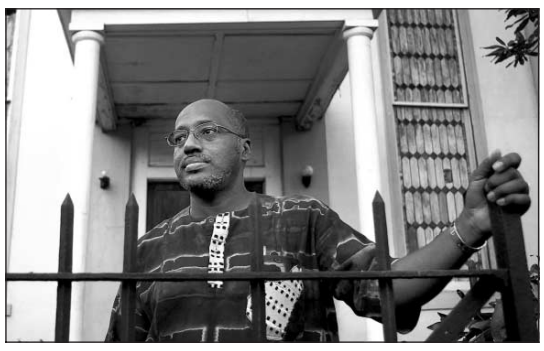
When it seemed time, Tilton began to draw the call to a close. "Remember, you are not victims, but victors," he said.

As a final act he summoned his invisible flock to call out their individual praises to God — an invitation that produced a drawn-out, heart-felt collision of "Hallelujahs," "Praise him!" and "Glory's" that finally died away into a soft babble of voices.



The background hiss and crackle gave way to a deepening silence as members began to drop off the line.

Then one last unidentified voice asked:

"When you want to get some shrimp?"

for Humana Medicare Advantage members:

You don't have to worry about your health coverage during this difficult time!

Humana is open for business, serving all Medicare Advantage members. And to help our members in hurricane-stricken areas, we've made some special arrangements for the next month or so.

Medical Care:
- If you were displaced by the hurricane, you can use providers who are not part of the network, and we'll pay your claims as if you used network providers.
- If you need to see a specialist or be admitted to the hospital, you won't need any special authorizations or referrals ahead of time.

Prescriptions:
- If you need to replace your medications, you can refill your prescriptions now. All of our participating pharmacies will fill at least a 30-day supply of any prescriptions, regardless of when you last filled them.
- You can also get a 30-day supply of any medications that required special authorization without waiting for approval.
- If you ordered your prescriptions by mail, our mail-order pharmacy is now replacing all lost or damaged orders without charging copayments or shipping costs. You can have the medicines mailed to a different address if you'd like by calling 1-866-427-7478 or 1-920-337-5090.

Premiums:
- Effective August 26, 2005, all Humana Medicare Advantage members in the affected parishes listed on our website, www.humana.com, have a grace period until October 25, 2005, to pay their premiums.

Questions:
- Members and providers can call 1-866-427-7478 or 1-920-337-5090 for additional assistance.

Storms serve as national wake-up call

Across U.S., people prepare for 'Big One'

By John Pomfret
The Washington Post

BERKELEY, CALIF. — Maureen Katz grew up with earthquakes, and when a 1989 quake rattled the San Francisco Bay Area, killing 62 people and collapsing freeways, she still found those tremors "a thrill ride."

It took distant hurricanes to change Katz's mind. Not long ago, she and some neighbors met to discuss preparing for "The Big One," the long-expected next major rupture of the San Andreas Fault that would dwarf the one that ravaged San Francisco in 1906. They drew up a list of supplies and, this being liberal Berkeley, had a politically tinged discussion about buying guns.

From civilians to bureaucrats to businessmen, firefighters, mayors and sheriffs, the twin hurricanes that pounded the Gulf Coast have touched off a nationwide conversation about disaster preparedness. The mantra, being repeated by civilians and government officials alike, is: We are on our own.

The response differs fundamentally from the nation's reaction to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Then the primary ingredient was a fear that seemed to naturally lead people to accept the government's agenda of how to respond. This time, Katz and others interviewed for this story note, another emotion has taken its place: outrage — primarily at the government's botched response — a far more empowering sentiment, Katz added.

"I don't think I really believed the infrastructure had been so badly eroded that they really would take three days to get water to people, and it ended up taking them even longer," Katz said. "I had this basic belief that help would be there, but watching Katrina I realized it's not going to be there, and I have responsibility for my kids."

In the days after that meeting with their neighbors, Katz, her husband and their two elementary-school-age children had purchased an enormous waterproof box that now anchors their back yard. They stuffed it with a four-day supply of water, protein shakes, power bars, a change of clothes, flashlights, transistor radios, multipurpose tools, dried fruit, duct tape, dog food, rope and bleach — to purify water in a pinch.

The rethinking of the danger preparedness is occurring coast to coast in private homes and in government offices.

In Memphis, there is talk of positioning food caches in preparation for a major earthquake like the one in 1812 that leveled the city. In New Jersey, the governor has begun reviewing the security of chemical plants in case of a terrorist attack. In Los Angeles, which has faced earthquakes, urban unrest and wildfires, officials now are urging residents to stock five to seven days of food and water instead of their previous recommendation of three. A federally funded study in May estimated that as many as 18,000 people could die and hundreds of thousands could be left homeless if a major earthquake were to hit Los Angeles.

Hurricanes Katrina and Rita have also prompted officials to go back to the drawing board on the critical issues of evacuation plans and temporary housing, said Sandra Hutchens, director of the L.A. County Sheriff's Office of Homeland Security. "The hurricanes brought home how much work we still have to do," she said.

"I never, ever considered an evacuation strategy in San Francisco that would require the entire city to evacuate," said San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom of his city of 750,000, where a city-funded study in 2003 estimated that an earthquake registering 7.9 on the Richter scale would level more than 45,000 buildings. "I'd have to have five aircraft carriers collecting dust, waiting off the coast."

Among officials nationwide, the hurricanes have prompted hearings on disaster preparedness, talk of tougher restrictions on building in coastal areas and along earthquake fault lines — an increasingly common practice during the recent nationwide real estate boom — and reevaluations of the qualifications of disaster preparedness officials.

"Everyone is now taking a look at how we are situated and asking questions like, 'Do we have the best and brightest in place?' " said San Francisco's Fire Chief Joanne Hayes-White.

Politicians, eager to traffic in pork or preparedness or both, also predict the disasters will smooth the way for expensive government bonds to upgrade infrastructure. Next year, Newsom said, he plans to ask San Francisco's voters to approve the city's most expensive general bond issuance ever, an estimated $800 million plan to retrofit San Francisco General Hospital. Newsom said its chances of passing are better because the hurricanes have brought disaster preparedness to the front of many people's minds.

Local and state officials also believe the disasters will breach a fire wall erected by the Department of Homeland Security after the Sept. 11 attacks. Under the federally funded Urban Area Security Initiative, local governments were given large grants to train for terrorist attacks but are prohibited from using the money to prepare for natural disasters.

"We've broadened the discussion," Newsom said. "After 9/11, ne'er did I hear a word about Mother Nature. It was all about bioterrorism, dirty bombs, the prospects of another airliner being used. It's understandable. In the past, the focus was always on Mother Nature. Now we've got to balance the two, and that's the lesson of Katrina."

Multiple probes are an exercise in hostility

Bickering lawmakers duplicating efforts

By Mary Curtius
Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON — Rep. Thomas Davis III of Virginia thought he was offering lawmakers political catnip when he called former Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown to testify before his committee last month.

The Republican chairman of a special House panel investigating the government's handling of Hurricane Katrina, he figured the chance to publicly question Brown would prove irresistible to the Democrats who had stayed away, regarding his probe a whitewash of the federal government's handling of the disaster. But the partisan chasm that has widened since Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast proved more powerful than the lure of confronting the bureaucrat blamed by many for much of what went wrong with the government's response.

House Democrats maintained their boycott and continued to criticize the probe as a Republican effort to minimize the federal government's inaction. Davis also failed to persuade his Senate counterpart, Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairwoman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs committee, to attend.

Nor does he expect Democrats to relent this week and join his panel's questioning of Michael Chertoff, secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, which oversees FEMA.

The controversy surrounding the committee illustrates how far Congress has strayed from the bipartisan, joint House-Senate inquiry that Republican congressional leaders announced last month into the actions of local, state and federal officials in the wake of Katrina.

Instead, three separate, overlapping investigations are under way — the one in the House, one in the Senate and one by the White House. They are expected to produce three reports about missteps made by government officials — and offer three sets of recommendations for fixing what went wrong.

And that, said Richard Falkenrath, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, a centrist think tank in Washington, is bad news for the nation.

"The thing that we might lose is an opportunity to get on a better trajectory in terms of preparing this country for catastrophic disasters," said Falkenrath, who served in the Bush administration's Homeland Security Department.

Other congressional observers and outside experts caution that none of the findings might be considered definitive, and could be contradictory.

House and Senate members have cooperated before in conducting major inquiries, most recently following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. After public pressure, however, an independent commission also was set up to investigate the attacks.

Democrats pushed for a similar independent panel for the Katrina probe. But the White House and the GOP congressional leaders balked at this idea.

In addition to the probe Davis is running, Collins and the ranking Democrat on her committee, Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, are conducting the Senate investigation. Frances Townsend, President Bush's homeland security adviser, is spearheading a White House inquiry.

Each probe is churning out its own requests for documents from the Department of Homeland Security, FEMA and other government agencies. The House and Senate committees are conducting their own hearings, and sometimes will question the same witnesses.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Democrats had no faith that the Davis-led panel would mount an aggressive inquiry into the Bush administration's role in the response to the hurricane, because Republicans refused to give Democrats equal representation on the committee.

"The American people want to see Congress work together," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill. "When the Democrats choose not to join a committee that has been set up based on democratic majority traditions, it is disappointing and bothersome. They are only hurting themselves."

Hurricanes show cost of failing to learn from previous storms

Floyd foreshadowed evacuation calamities

By Spencer S. Hsu
The Washington Post

On Sept. 25, White House press secretary Scott McClellan defended the tumultuous evacuation of 3 million Texans from the path of Hurricane Rita, saying, "This was an unprecedented number of people who were being evacuated." His comments echoed sentiments offered by Texas' governor, a senator and several mayors.

In fact, the evacuation was the largest in U.S. history — at least since 1999.

Barely six years ago, in a lesson seemingly forgotten by U.S. authorities, Hurricane Floyd prompted the headlong flight of more than 3 million people from coastal Florida, Georgia and the Carolinas.

The result, as summarized in a 240-page report by the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Army Corps of Engineers, foreshadowed the anarchy on freeways leading away from Houston last month: 18-hour traffic jams outside Charleston, S.C.; complaints that two-way highways were not quickly converted into one-way exit routes; and shortages of food, water and other supplies for hundreds of thousands of exhausted evacuees.

The repeated cycle of calamity, response and criticism highlights a persistent flaw in the nation's disaster preparedness: the inability of emergency agencies to learn from past mistakes, even those committed in recent years, say current and former government officials.

Personnel turnover, constantly changing priorities and split responsibilities among federal agencies and state and local governments sap the nation's ability to break patterns of bureaucratic failure, experts say. From establishing compatible communications systems for first responders to enforcing baseline preparedness standards for cities and states, goals remain frustratingly out of reach.

Heightened debate over the military's role in domestic preparedness is also familiar ground. On Sept. 3, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff declared that the sluggish response to the "ultra-catastrophe" wrought by Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast required officials to "break the mold" of disaster response and improve on an eight-month-old National Response Plan. President Bush proposed enabling "the Defense Department to become the lead agency in coordinating and leading the response effort" on Sept. 25.

But 13 years earlier, authorities said that Hurricane Andrew had delivered a "mega-catastrophe" to south Florida. Then-Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Sam Nunn, D-Ga., called for an expanded domestic role for the military; others called for improvements to a year-old Federal Response Plan, the NRP's precursor.

Within five months, the Pentagon retooled its response to domestic disasters, issuing its first directive to speed "military support to civil authorities."

Yet the changes did not take root in time to help Katrina's victims.

"We shouldn't be in the same situation, especially now that we have a department whose mission is to increase our preparedness," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee and head of the Senate investigation into the Katrina response.

Arnold Punaro, an aide to Nunn for 24 years and a major general in the Marine Corps Reserve, said the problem is not a shortage of plans or policies but a failure to practice and execute existing powers. "The problem with lessons learned is people unlearn them and make the same mistakes over and over again," he said.

John Koskinen, the federal official in charge of preparing for the year 2000 software flaw, said a deeper concern is the assumption that disaster preparedness is someone else's problem — state and local government's or the military's.

Nine months after Hurricane Floyd rolled up the Southeast's coastline and struck North Carolina as a Category 3 storm, consultants PBS&J of Tallahassee, Fla., prepared a detailed evacuation assessment for FEMA and the corps.

"Florida, Georgia, South Carolina and North Carolina experienced the largest evacuation effort in American history," FEMA said in a Sept. 14, 2000, news release. "Traffic engineers estimated that 3 million people took to the highways in what was to become a frustrating effort. Instead, they created the largest, longest, and most incredibly snarled traffic jam ever known."

Floyd's large size and "uncertain path" created "unanticipated volumes of evacuees," who fled areas not considered unsafe, the PBS&J report stated, circumstances shared with Hurricane Rita last month.

Although the four Southeastern states updated their evacuation models and rebuilt some highways, the message never reached far enough over the Gulf, said PBS&J Vice President Donald Lewis.

The Floyd-affected states updated their computer population and evacuation models to track inland vehicle movements. The improvement would have cost Texas" $100,000 at the most," Lewis said, but it wasn't done.

TO OUR COMMUNITY

It is hard to believe that the natural disaster called Katrina happened barely two months ago. Without question, all of our lives have been changed forever by this event. Soon, we will begin to measure time by whether an event happened before or after Katrina. In years to come, we'll ask each new acquaintance where they were when Katrina hit, just as we already do with other milestone national tragedies.

The Ochsner family of physicians, nurses, allied health professionals, employees and volunteers rode out the storm together on our Main Campus keeping our patients safe and cared for while the hurricane raged outside. For some patients what was needed was a gentle hand, words of reassurance and continuation of our plan of care. For others who came to us after the storm, many for the first time, the needs were far greater: a lung operation, heart bypass surgery, kidney and liver transplants, outpatient dialysis or intensive care for their babies. None of these services ever stopped—before, during or after the storm—except for a brief moment to shake our heads in wonder at the power of nature.

Together, we continued helping our patients by being available to you in the many communities of Louisiana where Katrina sent you—the North Shore, New Orleans and Baton Rouge. We have been open in all of those locations serving all members of your family, of every age, no matter if their condition was routine or complex.

Working closely with our colleagues in Baton Rouge, we quickly set up a lifeline to the external world, making it possible to bring our staff and employees to the parts of the region that needed medical care the most. On the North Shore, operations also were reopened swiftly—no small task in the wake of the storm.

We thank our employees everyday for everything that they did—yet we know that our thanks can never be big enough. We marvel not only at their stamina, courage and commitment but also at their ability to keep a sense of humor amid the challenges we faced.

Our hard work has been supported by the extraordinary efforts of firefighters, police officers, emergency medical services workers, rescue workers, volunteers and healthcare workers in facilities across the region who have given all they can in these unprecedented times. We are grateful to them and to our partners and vendors who made sure that we had essential stocks of supplies before and after the storm.

For those of you just coming home, we welcome you back. We urge you all to look after your own health and the health of your families. We can help you do that as normalcy returns.

Ochsner is a vital part of the New Orleans and Louisiana healthcare system that you can depend on today. At Ochsner, it is our mission to put patients first…everyday…just as we did throughout Katrina and beyond.

With heartfelt good wishes for you and your family,

Sign of times for Alabama hotels: No vacancy

Katrina recovery affects entire region

By Garry Mitchell
Associated Press writer

AP PHOTO

Joy Ward of Hattiesburg, Miss., shops for pottery from Holley Hill Pottery in Holley, Fla., on Friday while attending the 34th annual National Shrimp Festival, based in Gulf Shores, Ala. The festival resumed this year after being canceled last year because of Hurricane Ivan.

MOBILE, ALA. — With storm evacuees filling nearly 10,000 rooms in Alabama, high hotel occupancy rates have perked up the Alabama Gulf Coast economy in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, which otherwise has dealt a blow to tourism in the area.

Besides evacuees, workers in construction, cleanup and relief activities in Louisiana, Mississippi and southwest Alabama for weeks have filled many hotel rooms, particularly in a 30-mile radius of Mobile, which has about 5,600 rooms.

"The biggest problem has been people getting frustrated at not finding a room," Comfort Suites manager Miroj Rajbhandari said. "It's good for the hotel to be full, but not because of a natural disaster."

Rajbhandari expects his 64-room hotel in Mobile to be full through November.

At Bayou La Batre Inn and Suites, the storm-damaged fishing village's only motel, front desk clerk Annette Rice said Katrina's floodwaters did not get inside. The motel's 40 rooms have been rented by a mix of guests.

"We have quite a few guests from Mississippi," she said. "We're about the closest one to the state line."

Mobile Marriott manager Tony Dughaish, president of the Hotel and Motel Association, expects Mobile will remain "center stage" in the hotel market because of its proximity to storm damage in New Orleans and Biloxi.

"All these contractors and insurance adjusters are stationed in this area," he said.

Although some volunteers in the storm recovery slept in tents in nearby D'Iberville, Miss., near Katrina's major damage, some of the larger, more expensive hotels in Mobile had vacancies this week. But those with rooms are keeping them.

Marvin Davis, a spokesman for the Federal Emergency Management Agency's operations in Mobile, said he had attempted to change hotels for the next two weeks, but decided to keep his current room in the port city to avoid a long commute from another location.

Alabama tourism officials welcomed the hotel bonanza but worried the lack of rooms could be a negative for the tourism industry. Mobile and Baldwin counties account for 35 percent of the state's tourism spending.

Tourists won't visit if they can't find a room to rent.

Although many rooms have been taken by government and relief workers, Victoria Kling of the American Red Cross said there were 30,960 hurricane evacuees this week in 9,986 rooms in 544 hotels in Alabama.

Rental homes, apartments and condos also were snapped up within days of the Aug. 29 hurricane, the nation's most destructive.

"We rented 48 of 53 houses in two days after the storm," said Marti Nabors, office manager for Roberts Brothers, one of Mobile's largest real estate firms. The company had about 400 single-family homes and this week had only eight properties available, Nabors said.

Besides the no-vacancy problem, Katrina closed some major tourist attractions, such as the Dauphin Island Ferry, Battleship Park in Mobile and the 405-room Grand Hotel Marriott Resort, Golf Club & Spa at Point Clear. It cut attendance at others, such as the Bellingrath Gardens and Home in Theodore.

Gulf Coast attractions lost tour bus business when Katrina wiped out the Mississippi coast casinos. Bellingrath, for example, draws sightseers off Interstate 10, from casinos and New Orleans, gardens Director Bill Barrick said.

Bellingrath, world-famous for its azaleas and other floral displays on placid Fowl River, had minor storm damage and reopened in mid-September. Attendance fell about 30 percent, but Barrick expects it will rebound for traditional Christmas festivities.

Still repairing from Hurricane Ivan last September, Gulf Shores and Orange Beach officials revived the four-day National Shrimp Festival, which kicked off Thursday with large crowds under sunny skies. It was canceled last year because of Ivan damage.

Brandy Johnson at the Regatta condominiums in Gulf Shores said it's good to bring back the Shrimp Festival, which usually attracts about 200,000 visitors, if only to prove the resort survived Katrina.

"Everybody thinks Gulf Shores isn't here," she said.

Katrina, which devastated Dauphin Island and Bayou La Batre, spared Gulf Shores and nearby beach resorts.

"The impression in the Midwest and other parts of the country is that Alabama's beaches were blown away just like our sister states. That's not the case at all," state tourism Director Lee Sentell said.

He said there are about 60,000 hotel and motel rooms in Alabama and they generally have about a 60 percent occupancy rate. It will be at least another month before lodging tax revenue totals for September are available to register the Katrina impact.

Canine flu has pets sick as, well, a dog

Potentially fatal bug no mere kennel cough

By Jim Fitzgerald
Associated Press writer

CHESTNUT RIDGE, N.Y. — Every inch the pampered purebred, Curry stands like a statue for his haircut at the Best Friends Pet Resort and Salon.

He looks, and is, perfectly healthy. But Curry, a fluffy white bichon frise, was one sick puppy a month ago. And the Best Friends kennel was forced to close for three weeks after more than 100 other dogs began showing signs of what turned out to be a new disease: canine influenza virus, or dog flu.

"He was extremely lethargic, having a hard time breathing," said Curry's owner, Margaret Ragi of Upper Saddle River, N.J. "The life just wasn't there in his eyes. We were really worried."

Lots of dog lovers are worried these days. Experts say the flu is spreading steadily through the nation's dogs, with no vaccine available to curb it. Perhaps 5 percent of its victims are dying.

Researchers recently found to their surprise that the virus had crossed over from horses to dogs, striking greyhounds at racetracks in 11 states. Now it has been found in pets, with cases documented in California, Florida, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon and Washington state.

"One-hundred percent of dogs will be susceptible," said Edward Dubovi, director of the animal virology lab at Cornell University. "I would expect to see this infection moving thorough groups of dogs until a large percentage gets infected and there are a lot of immune dogs."

Cynda Crawford, a veterinary immunologist at the University of Florida, said researchers are getting positive readings on 30 percent to 40 percent of the blood and tissue samples sent in by veterinarians who think they might be treating a dog with influenza. The symptoms include a cough, low-grade fever and a runny nose.

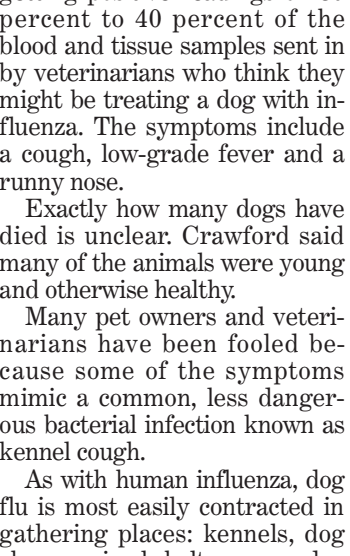
Exactly how many dogs have died is unclear. Crawford said many of the animals were young and otherwise healthy.

Many pet owners and veterinarians have been fooled because some of the symptoms mimic a common, less dangerous bacterial infection known as kennel cough.

As with human influenza, dog flu is most easily contracted in gathering places: kennels, dog shows, animal shelters, even dog runs in parks.

That has resulted in a lot of lonely dogs, as pet owners keep them home to avoid the flu. Several days after the kennel in Chestnut Ridge, N.Y., reopened, there were just six dogs in "doggie day care," down from the usual 17, and just 50 boarding, down from 150, said manager Kelly Kurash.

The suburban New York kennel had closed Sept. 10 after staffers realized the illness going around was not kennel cough. Dogs were sent home or to hospitals, and one sheepdog died a few days later.



"We knew we were dealing with something more serious," said Deborah Bennetts, spokeswoman for the Best Friends chain, based in Norwalk, Conn. "It seemed to be spreading, and some dogs were getting seriously ill."

Tests on the dogs confirmed the new virus.

Best Friends had the entire building disinfected and the air conditioner filters changed. When the kennel reopened Sept. 30, some dogs were turned away. At the 42 Best Friends kennels in 18 states, "we're not allowing any dog that has boarded within the last two weeks or has been at a dog show or some kind of group setting like doggie day care," Bennetts said.

Dubovi said researchers are at work on a vaccine, but it could be months before it becomes available.

Some vets fear another upswing in cases at Thanksgiving and Christmas, when, as in the late summer, many people go away and put their dogs in kennels.

Saddam trial to focus on '82 massacre

Iraqi officials aim for quick conviction

By Robert H. Reid
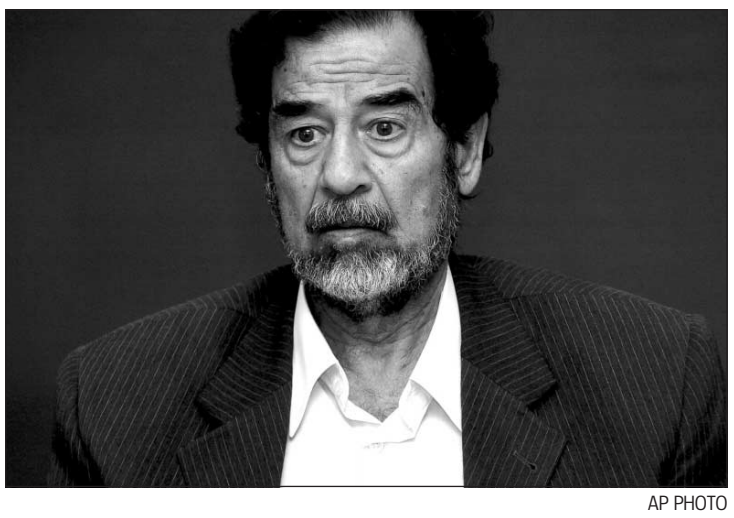
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Iraqi authorities have chosen a little-known case to launch the prosecution of Saddam Hussein because it affords the best chance for a speedy conviction — and because it gives the long-suppressed Shiite majority a first crack at the former Iraqi dictator.



But the decision to push ahead with the trial, due to start Wednesday in the capital's heavily guarded Green Zone, also carries some high risks for Iraq.

The timing, four days after the contentious constitutional referendum, and the case itself may fuel fears among Sunni Arabs that the Shiite Muslims who now control Iraq are more interested in settling scores than in providing justice.

The trial focuses on the role of Saddam and seven allies in a 1982 massacre in Dujail, a heavily Shiite town 50 miles north of Baghdad. About 150 people were executed and up to 1,500 others imprisoned and tortured after Shiite militants there failed to assassinate Saddam.

The toll pales against the thousands of Kurds who were gassed to death in Halabja in 1988 or with the thousands of Shiites slaughtered after a 1991 uprising — or even with the countless Iraqis whose lives were ruined by Saddam's regime.

But a comprehensive trial covering all of Saddam's alleged crimes could take years to complete, especially in the midst of a bloody insurgency being waged largely by the ousted president's fellow Sunni Arabs.

AP PHOTO

Trial begins Wednesday for former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein, centering on the roles he and seven allies played in a 1982 massacre in Dujail, a heavily Shiite town 50 miles north of Baghdad. About 150 people were executed and up to 1,500 others imprisoned and tortured after Shiite militants there failed to assassinate Saddam.

So Iraqi leaders and their American advisers — who seem keen to avoid a repeat of the U.N. trial of former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic that has dragged on since 2002 — chose this case.

Milosevic has skillfully manipulated his proceedings to win back a measure of support among his fellow Serbs, many of whom believe the trial is unfair.

Iraqi officials hope to avoid that, and are aiming for a speedy conviction — likely followed by a death sentence. For months, Iraqi officials have hinted they have seized documents tying Saddam directly to the massacre.

"The Dujail case is the easiest to put together as far as evidence-gathering and preparation is concerned," one of the judges on the Iraqi Special Tribunal told The Associated Press. "There are documents that have been seized and verified concerning the case."

His identity, and those of others on the tribunal, are being kept secret to deter reprisals by Saddam loyalists or other insurgents.

Saddam's legal team, in turn, seems likely to ask for an immediate delay when the trial starts Wednesday, arguing it has not been allowed to see key documents and has not had sufficient time to prepare a defense.

Saddam himself has challenged the entire legitimacy of the court that will try him. The judges are Iraqis appointed under an interim Iraqi government created by the U.S. occupation authorities.

It is likely the court will grant an adjournment for some weeks, after the initial two days.

'Electoral propaganda'

Nevertheless, Iraq's government hopes to get quickly back on track — and hopes a conviction will send a clear signal to Sunni Arabs that Saddam is never coming back and encourage them to come to terms with the new Iraq.

Officials are also gambling that the trial will remind all Iraqis of the brutality of the former regime at a time when the incessant violence of the insurgency has many people pining for the relative stability during Saddam's 23-year rule.

However, it is unclear how the trial will be perceived in the towns and villages of the Sunni heartland. Sunnis reared in a culture of vendetta killing may take an entirely different view of the crackdown in Dujail in reprisal for an assassination attempt.

Some mainstream Sunni leaders suspect the decision to start the trial within days of the constitution referendum is aimed at rallying Shiites ahead of parliamentary elections in December.

"Saddam should be judged sooner or later, but trying him following the referendum is only for electoral propaganda," said Alaa Mekki of the Sunni-led Iraqi Islamic Party.

Many Sunni Arabs already are angry about the proposed constitution, seeing it as an attempt to weaken their community imposed by the Shiite Muslim majority and the allied Kurds, both of which were oppressed by Saddam's regime.

If the trial is not perceived as fair, it could worsen sectarian tensions.

Dujail massacre

The events in Dujail began July 8, 1982, when Saddam and his entourage visited the farming community for a meeting with tribal leaders. The town was a stronghold of the Shiite Dawa Party, which was staging terrorist attacks on Saddam's secular regime to protest his then-ongoing war with predominantly Shiite Iran.

Tribunal to test Iraqi justice

By Anthony Deutsch
Associated Press writer

THE HAGUE, NETHERLANDS — With just two weeks before the trial's start, one of Saddam Hussein's defense lawyers waited in his London office for a courier to bring formal notice of the charges against his client. It didn't arrive.

"This is a joke," said Abdel-Haq Alani. "How can we prepare a defense in a few days?"

The Iraqi Special Tribunal that will try Saddam beginning Wednesday is a work in progress as Iraq tries to build a democratic tradition while seeking to adhere to international norms of justice in dealing with allegations of war crimes and crimes against humanity.

There will be some differences from recent international tribunals that have handled such cases, the most significant being that Saddam faces the death penalty as a possible punishment. Also, he is being tried by his own countrymen.

He is being taken before a formal court, however. Romania's communist dictator, Nicolae Ceausescu, was executed by firing squad alongside his wife following a summary military court hearing in a 1989 uprising, while Italian dictator Benito Mussolini was lynched with his mistress by communist partisans in 1945.

The bodies, from left, of Achille Starace, former secretary of the Fascist Party; Italian dictator Benito Mussolini; and Mussolini's mistress, Clara Petacci, hang by their heels in front of a filling station in Milan, Italy, on April 29, 1945, after being executed near the city by communist partisans — without a formal trial.

AP FILE PHOTO

Human rights advocates hope the course of justice for Saddam will generally follow the model of Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic, who was flown to a U.N. war crimes court in the Netherlands in June 2001 to face charges of genocide and crimes against humanity in the Balkans.

The Milosevic trial has proceeded for more than three years with meticulous care to ensure the appearance of fairness, although critics say the judges have gone overboard in making that point.

They also complain that the court's allowing Milosevic to defend himself has given him a podium to promote his political agenda back home in Serbia rather than to contest the 66 charges against him.

Michael Scharf, a former State Department attorney who helped train Iraqi judges for Saddam's trial, said the Iraqi Special Tribunal's statute safeguards Saddam's rights and is founded in international law.

He argues that letting Saddam take the stage like Milosevic would be a mistake.

"It is not an international right to be able to defend yourself. Milosevic was erroneously given that opportunity and ended up resurrecting his reputation back home, restoring his legacy and making him look like a martyr," Scharf said. Saddam's defense will look very similar to that of Milosevic, Scharf predicted, with his lawyers trying to turn the tables and incriminate the former dictator's Western enemies.

Alani, Saddam's London-based attorney, expects the court to appoint a lawyer to defend Saddam rather than allow him to conduct his own defense.

"At the end of the day, it is little more than a political farce and has nothing to do with law. This is Saddam in a lynch court, being tried by enemies," Alani said.

Richard Dicker, director of the International Justice Program at New York-based Human Rights Watch, said the Iraqi tribunal risks jeopardizing its legitimacy if basic rights are not afforded Saddam.

"We have real concerns about shortcomings in the law and procedures of the tribunal that raise questions about the fairness of the trial," Dicker said.

Saddam's trial, he said, is a further development in the emergence of an international system of justice that began with the trials of German and Japanese leaders after World War II and continued with the creation of special courts to judge war crimes in Yugoslavia and Rwanda in the 1990s.

But the Saddam trial diverges from the rules of those courts, Dicker said. It lowers the bar for reaching a conviction so that "beyond a reasonable doubt" is no longer required. And the prosecution didn't give Saddam's lawyers adequate time to prepare, disclosing their evidence less than a month before the trial's start, he said.

"For justice to be done, the trial has got to be fair," Dicker said. "If it is not fair, it will simply be a political show trial."

Sunnis: Timing may rally Shiites

SADDAM, from A-34

Dawa believed the visit was a chance to strike back for the execution of its key figures, including a party founder, Ayatollah Mohammed Baqr al-Sadr.

As Saddam's motorcade entered town, Dawa gunmen opened fire from palm groves, triggering a gunbattle that lasted for hours. Iraqi army helicopter gunships and infantry rescued Saddam, who allegedly promised no reprisals.

But Iraqi secret police reportedly rounded up whole families, razed the town's fruit groves, destroyed houses and systematically executed nearly 150 people, some as young as 13. Others were herded off to prison.

Despite the brutality, the Dujail massacre generated little international attention. Few foreign journalists were based in Iraq at the time, and the world's interest was focused on the war in Lebanon, where Israeli troops were besieging the capital of Beirut.

At the time, Western governments also were more concerned with Islamic extremism than Saddam's brutality, because of the 1979 rise to power of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini in Iran.

Indeed, Western governments rarely spoke out against measures taken by Arab leaders to crush Islamic fundamentalists.

Five months before Dujail, for example, Syrian President Hafez Assad had slaughtered an estimated 20,000 people in the extremist hotbed of Hama and razed the city to the ground. There was little protest internationally, beyond statements of condemnation by human rights groups.

Dujail, at the time, was merely a footnote in comparison.

Furthermore, the Dawa Party was widely perceived in the West as an instrument of the Iranian intelligence services. A year after Dujail, U.S. officials accused Dawa of bombing the American Embassy in Kuwait.

Now, however, the Dawa Party is part of the Iraqi government, and its members include Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari.

Rice finds success with diplomacy

'It's Powell's policy without Powell'

By Paul Richter
Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON — For four years, Secretary of State Colin Powell and his team faced off against administration hawks on one foreign policy issue after another, and usually went down in defeat.

These days, his successor, Condoleezza Rice, is pushing nearly identical positions, and almost always winning.

An administration that was criticized in its first term for an assertive, go-it-alone approach has reversed ground again and again, joining multinational efforts to keep nuclear arms from North Korea and Iran, mending ties with Europe, and softening a hard line on the United Nations and International Criminal Court.

"She's clearly trying to accomplish a number of the goals that Powell was going after, until he found himself stymied," said Stewart Patrick, who served in Powell's policy planning office.

A former senior State Department official put it more bluntly: "It's Powell's policy without Powell."

Second-term shift

The shifts have surprised many people in the foreign policy community, who had expected a different approach from Rice. As President Bush's first-term national security adviser, she was a blunt advocate for the tough White House line.

But Rice's course says a lot about the arc of the administration's foreign policy in the second term. The new diplomacy of compromise has grown in part from the way that the continuing burden of Iraq has limited U.S. options. After a period of military action and assertive self-interest following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the United States has been obliged to give ground to other countries to solve problems.

Rice's stance also raises intriguing questions about how much her instincts really differ from those of her predecessor. Although her ringing rhetoric suggests she shares the neoconservative view that America must move aggressively to reshape other countries, her actions over the past nine months hint at an old-fashioned "realist," someone willing to deal with flawed regimes and settle for less-than-perfect solutions.

Condoleezza Rice
Calls for Saudis to expand democratic participation

The new direction stems partly from the fact that Rice has shifted from a neutral post as national security adviser to a job in which she is more removed from the influence of other powerful administration figures — such as Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld — while facing daily pressure from foreign leaders, current and former officials and other experts say.

The foreign policy change shouldn't be overstated, experts said. Despite course adjustments, the Bush team remains highly assertive in its dealings with other countries. In many ways, the Bush team remains skeptical of international institutions.

Even so, the change has been undeniable.

Aid to North Korea

The most striking shift to an approach like Powell's came three weeks ago, when Rice's envoy to the talks on the North Korean nuclear issue joined a tentative deal that promises the regime of Kim Jong Il energy aid, light-water nuclear reactors and security guarantees if it forswears nuclear weapons.

Powell's State Department wanted the kind of engagement with the North Koreans that led to last month's deal. But the more hawkish officials who dominated in the first term hoped they could force an agreement from Pyongyang without concessions, and allowed the State Department officials only limited contacts.

In 2002, when Assistant Secretary of State James Kelly wanted to try to open a discussion with North Korea, other senior officials decided that he could travel to Pyongyang only in the company of other U.S. aides, who would keep an eye on him.

"They made sure that there couldn't be anything like the kind of engagement that led to this (new) deal," said a former Powell aide, who declined to be identified because of the sensitivity of the comparing the two leaders' approaches.

On the Iran nuclear issue, Powell pushed to have U.S. officials work with European countries. Powell obtained clearance from the White House to begin working in that way, but only over the objections of others in the administration, who argued that the Europeans would be too conciliatory and that their efforts would yield nothing.

In March, Rice took a significant additional step in that direction by announcing the administration's official support for the efforts of Britain, France and Germany to work out a deal.

Another important foreign policy shift came in April, when the administration for the first time set aside its strong objections to the International Criminal Court.

Administration officials, led by U.N. Ambassador John Bolton, who was then the State Department's arms control chief, had taken an unyielding line on the court, which was created to judge war crimes and genocide cases. Bolton argued that the tribunal infringed on U.S. sovereignty and could lead to trials by foreign judges of U.S. troops, and military and civilian leaders.

But in April, U.S. officials abstained from voting on a U.N. resolution, thus allowing the United Nations to recognize the court's jurisdiction over cases arising from the fighting in Sudan's Darfur region. Powell had recommended an abstention months earlier, former aides said.

'A different period'

Bush administration officials say that policies have changed along with circumstances.

"We're in a different period," said an administration official who spoke on condition of anonymity because of departmental policy. "We had to respond militarily after 9/11. . . . Now the overriding goal is to try to help the Iraqis and Afghans achieve political victories and build new states. There aren't military solutions to either of those problems."

Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs, said in an interview that Rice had emphasized from the beginning of her term that she intended to stress diplomacy and international institutions to advance Bush's agenda. He cited the administration's approach in the North Korean and Iranian talks, the International Criminal Court resolution, and the U.S. decision at last month's meeting of the General Assembly to soften ambitious demands for U.N. management reform.

RICE, from A-36

At the same time, Burns said, "we're prosecuting a war on terrorism with military and intelligence means, and we'll be tough as nails where we have to be."

Some analysts argue that Rice's vigorous effort to promote the president's showcase "democracy promotion" campaign in the Middle East lines her up with neoconservatives. But there is a debate over how aggressive the administration's democracy promotion effort has turned out to be.

In June, Rice took a bold step with a speech in Cairo that challenged Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak to reform his government. But when the Sept. 7 presidential election drew widespread criticism, the administration responded in a muted fashion, pointing out two of the election's shortcomings, yet calling it a "landmark" step.

Rice, who calls her approach "practical idealism," has repeatedly called for Saudi Arabia to broaden democratic participation, while emphasizing that it must do so in its own way and at its own pace.

James Dobbins, a former Bush administration envoy who directs Rand Corp.'s International Security and Defense Policy Center, said the democracy promotion effort cannot be portrayed as contributing to a new moderation in administration policy.

Yet dealings with individual countries, with the possible exception of Syria and Lebanon, are "being pursued with some degree of pragmatism," he said. "They've been looking for incremental progress rather than dramatic change."

Primaries making both parties edgy

Senate race prospects are shifting rapidly

By Ronald Brownstein
Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON — A few weeks ago, Democrats feared they might not attract even a single first-tier candidate to challenge Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, one of their top targets for 2006.

Now, to the surprise of Democratic leaders in Ohio and Washington, two serious candidates are pursuing the nomination: Rep. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio, and attorney Paul Hackett, the Iraq war veteran whose strong bid for a U.S. House seat in a special election this summer rocketed him to celebrity status in the party.

If Hackett doesn't step aside, as some in the Democratic establishment hope, the party faces the prospect of an expensive and divisive primary in a Republican-leaning state where Democrats usually need every dollar, and every last vote, to prevail.

"I would guarantee it's going to get nasty," said David Woodruff, Hackett's campaign manager in the House race. "We are going to have an aggressive campaign."

The possible Ohio collision is one of several Senate primaries that loom as wild cards as the two parties devise their strategies for the 2006 campaign. Each party confronts the risk that its nominees in key states will be weakened by intraparty fights before the survivor can take on the opposition in the general election.

The single most damaging primary could occur in Rhode Island, where conservative Stephen Laffey is challenging moderate Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee in a heavily Democratic state. A sharply contested primary could also complicate GOP chances in Tennessee.

But it appears that primaries may cause more headaches for Democrats than Republicans next year.

In addition to Ohio, candidates are competing for Democratic Senate nominations in Montana and Rhode Island, two other states with Republican incumbents who are top targets for Democrats. And full-scale primaries are developing in Maryland and Minnesota, two states where retirements have left Democrats defending open seats.

Some Democrats regard this proliferation of primaries as evidence that ambitious politicians see 2006 as a good year to be running under the party label. If Democrats have too many candidates in some states, they said, Republicans appear to have too few, after their preferred challengers to Democratic incumbents chose not to run in states such as North Dakota, West Virginia and Florida.

Others note that primaries can help the surviving candidates by sharpening their campaign skills and organization and generating more attention from the media. "For some candidates, it gets them up to speed," said Gary Jacobson, a political scientist at the University of California, San Diego.

But many Democrats worry that these contests will divert resources and divide local parties, especially in the states with targeted Republican incumbents.

"Primary candidates spend months publicly beating one another up and spending money that should otherwise be hoarded for use against the other party," Democratic consultant David Sirota wrote recently in The American Prospect, a liberal magazine. "Meanwhile, incumbents rise above it all ... stressing their credentials as statesmen."

As of now, the primaries developing for open seats could generate one major confrontation for each party next year.

In Maryland, Democratic Rep. Benjamin Cardin is the favorite in what could become a crowded field to succeed retiring Democratic Sen. Paul Sarbanes. But with former National Association for the Advancement of Colored People President Kweisi Mfume also running, Democrats could be hurt if the race opens racial divisions, especially since Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, an African-American, is the virtually certain Republican candidate.

In Tennessee, meanwhile, Republicans are nervously watching an ideological free-for-all among conservative former Reps. Ed Bryant and Van Hilleary and more moderate former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker that could complicate their chances of holding the seat being vacated by retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

But it is the primaries in races involving incumbents that are prompting the most handwringing on both sides.

In Rhode Island, Laffey is already strafing Chafee in a race that appears likely to generate more acrimony than the state's Democratic Senate primary. Chafee could lose support in the center if he tacks right to squeeze out Laffey, or he could or depress general election turnout among conservatives if he doesn't.

If the Ohio race between Sherrod Brown and Hackett develops, Democrats will have contested primaries in three of the six states where GOP incumbents are considered politically vulnerable.

In Rhode Island, Secretary of State Matt Brown and former state Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse are competing to oppose Chafee or Laffey. In Montana, state auditor John Morrison and state Senate President Jon Tester are battling for the nomination to oppose Republican Sen. Conrad Burns.

Each of these races could pivot on the same dynamic. Matt Brown, Tester and Hackett in Ohio are positioning themselves as populist outsiders and their opponents as more conventional career politicians.

With Whitehouse considered a likely winner over Brown, and Morrison a less decisive favorite over Tester, the potential for a primary that sparks the most disunity among Democrats seems greatest in Ohio.

Hackett attracted a nationwide Democratic following when he caustically denounced President Bush and the Iraq war in his close race in the special House election in a heavily Republican district around Cincinnati in August.

After Hackett's showing, Democrats courted him to challenge DeWine, a second-term moderate whose poll numbers have sagged amid scandals engulfing Ohio Republican Gov. Robert Taft. The pursuit of Hackett intensified after Sherrod Brown, a staunchly liberal former Ohio secretary of state, indicated in August that he wouldn't run.

On Oct. 3, Woodruff announced that Hackett intended to run. Three days later, Brown decided to enter the race.

Already the prospective race has divided Democratic activists on the Internet, with many angrily accusing Brown of betrayal, and others, like Sirota, declaring Brown a stronger candidate against DeWine.

Some political operatives believe Hackett will step aside for Brown, who would likely receive strong support from party leaders and organized labor in a primary.

In an interview with Mother Jones magazine published this week, Hackett said that in a recent phone conversation he thought that Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., head of the party's Senate campaign committee, was nudging him to quit the race. Phil Singer, the committee's spokesman, denied the allegation.

Woodruff said Hackett planned to announce his candidacy with a bus tour beginning in Cincinnati on Oct. 24. And Hackett this week hasn't sounded very deferential.

"To me, a race between two professional politicians is a no-brainer win for DeWine," Hackett told Mother Jones.

Vatican rethinks policy on gay priests

Ban to be dropped in favor of oversight

By Brian Murphy
AP religion writer

For more than four decades, the Roman Catholic Church has followed both the rules and reality concerning gay priests.

The Vatican — as far back as 1961 — has made it clear they are not wanted. But many seminaries continued to tolerate what one conservative theologian calls a "lavender subculture" that has brought perhaps thousands of homosexual men to ordination.

Now those parallel worlds are coming under new and uncomfortable scrutiny.

The Vatican is putting the finishing touches on a document that strengthens its view that gay orientation and the priesthood are essentially incompatible. But the text — which could be released as early as next month — reportedly will not impose a blanket ban on gay priests. Instead, it may demand years of chastity before entering seminary and prohibit any public acts deemed to support the sexually active gay community.

If true, the Congregation for Catholic Education will be mostly bolstering existing Vatican positions rather than shutting the door completely on gay clerics as many liberal Catholics have feared. The question then becomes: What message is the Vatican hoping to send?

Experts in church policies don't expect widespread purges of gay clerics from parishes, schools and seminaries. Many places — particularly in Europe and the United States — are suffering under priest shortages and couldn't risk further losses.

What's more likely, they say, is that bishops will gain new leverage to dismiss or sideline clergymen considered in open defiance of the document. Also, the Vatican statement may serve as a foundation for much more intensive screening of seminary candidates to try to identify — and possibly reject or discourage — those who are gay.

"It could end up restricting entry into the priesthood to heterosexuals, which is a de facto extension of the existing teachings," said Scott Appleby, a professor of religious history at the University of Notre Dame. "Even worse, it would place homosexuals into the position of hiding their orientation, lying and suppressing their identity or not entering the church."

"There can be little doubt that over the centuries that there have been great priests, bishops — and maybe even popes — who by today's criterion would be deemed homosexual in orientation. It's not the nature of one's temptations — be they sexual or something else — it's how to deal with these temptations."

the Rev. RICHARD JOHN NEUHAUS editor of the New York-based religious and public affairs journal First Things

Even some conservative Catholics wonder whether the church could become bogged down in internal contradictions from its own rules: If a priest remains celibate and loyal to other Catholic tenets, why does his sexual orientation matter?

"This is where it gets very tricky," said the Rev. Richard John Neuhaus, editor of the New York religious and public affairs journal First Things.

He sees the upcoming document as an attempt to curb "a growing influence of gay lifestyles, or what's been called a lavender subculture," in seminaries and other church institutions.

But this can indirectly strike at one of the core elements of the Catholic priesthood: the belief that the call for a vocation can come to anyone. Estimates of the number of gays in U.S. seminaries and the priesthood range from 25 percent to 50 percent, according to the Rev. Donald Cozzens, a former seminary rector and author of "The Changing Face of the Priesthood." Credible global statistics are unavailable.

"There can be little doubt that over the centuries that there have been great priests, bishops — and maybe even popes — who by today's criterion would be deemed homosexual in orientation," Neuhaus said. "It's not the nature of one's temptations — be they sexual or something else — it's how to deal with these temptations."

No place is this more an issue for church leaders than in the United States, where the nation's bishops were launching a new campaign Friday to attract seminarians.

The sex abuse scandals have forced an unprecedented introspection into the clergy and how to train future priests.

In September, Vatican-directed inspectors started visiting all 229 American seminaries. Part of their mission is to seek any "evidence of homosexuality" at a time when some Catholics have put forward the highly contested premise that gay priests were more likely to be responsible for criminal behavior such as serial, same-sex molestations.

Archbishop Edwin O'Brien, who leads the U.S. military archdiocese and is coordinating the seminary evaluations, strongly opposes any openings for gay men in the priesthood.

But apparently the document will offer some avenues — however narrow — for gay priests.

Earlier this month, a senior Vatican official said the document may allow gay men into seminaries if they have lived a chaste life for at least three years. Other possible stipulations reportedly being discussed include forbidding gay seminarians or priests from making public comments or acts that would draw attention to their sexual orientation.

Bishop William Skylstad, the president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said he was heartened by reports indicating that the document may be "much more nuanced" and "far more sensible" than an outright ban.

The Vatican has often visited the issue of homosexuality, reflecting an unbending theological opposition but also an acknowledgment that discrimination based in sexual preference is unjustified.

A key document from 1961 said gay men should be barred from the priesthood. In 2003, homosexuality was described as a "troubling moral and social phenomenon" in a document by the powerful Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, then headed by German Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, who became Pope Benedict XVI this year.

Vatican teaching also holds that gay people are "intrinsically disordered." The church, however, says gays and lesbians should be treated with compassion and dignity.

Declining vocations and relaxing the rules on priestly celibacy are among the main topics among 250 bishops and other prelates from around the world gathered at the Vatican to examine various aspects of the Catholic Mass and make recommendations to the pope. The three-week meeting wraps up Oct. 23.

But synod participants say the document on gay priests has been barely mentioned, reflecting the imbalance between the intense interest in the United States and limited impact in other regions.

"In the synod, nobody is talking about that," the Rev. Josep Maria Abella Battle, superior general of the Missionary Sons of the Immaculate Heart of Mary. "I know in America there is a lot of worry."

Relief blanket takes bureaucratic trek

Disaster aid effort tangled in red tape

By Neelesh Misra
Associated Press writer

AP PHOTO

Rukhsana Ganai holds a blanket last week given to her as relief by the government, five days after the quake struck Indian Kashmir, at Tilgam, about 25 miles north of Srinagar, India. The 685-mile journey of the thin woolen blanket from New Delhi, reflects the often long, bureaucracy-filled process of disaster relief in India.

TILGAM, INDIA — The wool blanket — gray-blue-and-green plaid with fringe — started out in a New Delhi government supply office. Loaded onto a rickety yellow truck with tents and other Indian-made blankets, it traveled north to earthquake-stricken Kashmir.

That took one day.

The blanket sat for two more days in the town of Baramulla because quake victims did not have the right paperwork. On Wednesday, the blanket was taken to another town but held up again, this time by a Hindu holiday.

By Thursday afternoon — five days and 650 miles after it left the Indian capital — the blanket was in the hands of a retired farmer with one kidney and 20 grandchildren. He was grateful but wondered how this thin piece of cloth, just 3 by 5 feet, could possibly save his family.

The blanket's journey reflects the long, bureaucracy-tangled process of disaster relief in India, a country of more than 1 billion people that every year faces some of the world's deadliest natural disasters, often with thousands killed and wounded and thousands made homeless.

After a 620-mile trip, government aid workers unloaded the blanket Monday from the truck and packed it with other supplies into the deputy commissioner's compound in Baramulla. The garrison town — a base for Indian soldiers defending their portion of divided Kashmir from the Pakistani side — is surrounded by villages destroyed by Saturday's 7.6 magnitude earthquake.

An estimated 143,000 people in Indian Kashmir were made homeless by the quake. Around Baramulla, when the blanket arrived, hundreds of people already had spent two nights sleeping outside in freezing Himalayan temperatures made worse by rain and snow.

But none of the tents or blankets could be distributed, because victims did not have request slips stamped and signed by the officer in charge. They spent Tuesday night, again, outside.

"It was raining last night, and it was very cold. But we could not send out these blankets," said Khursheed Ahmed Ganai, an aid volunteer.

Wednesday morning, the top officer, A.G. Malik, was surrounded by agitated villagers demanding request slips. They accused Malik of playing favorites and settling scores, of letting religious or political affiliations determine who got help.

"Only those with the long arms, those with political links, are getting aid," said Mohammed Amin Quereshi, shouting curses outside Malik's office.

"He is not giving me the paper slip because they are ignoring the Hindus," shouted Vijay Kumar, a member of the minority in the Muslim-majority state.

Malik denied the charges, suggesting there were conflicts over where to deliver the aid and to whom. "People come up with all sorts of recommendations for aid distribution," he said.

Some villagers stood outside and looked longingly at the stacks of tents and blankets.

"We are sleeping under the naked sky," said Latif Ahmed Gilani.

Overnight, from Tuesday to Wednesday, six children in Kashmir died of hypothermia from sleeping outdoors.

Wednesday afternoon, Mohammed Ramzan, a tax official overseeing relief work, arrived in Baramulla from a town 18 miles away. He asked for 1,500 blankets and 55 tents for 97 villages. He supplied a letter from his boss and photocopies of earthquake damage as credentials.

Malik gave him the coveted requisition papers — but only for 200 blankets and 10 tents.

Soon, the plaid blanket and the other goods were back on a truck.

After an hour-long journey along a poplar-lined mountain highway, past horse-driven carts, careening trucks and quake-destroyed villages, the blanket arrived at the local tax collection office in Pattan — another hub for dozens of devastated villages.

More than 18,700 people around Pattan were affected by the quake. Night was coming and the air was getting nippy. Ramzan promised villagers standing around waiting for the aid truck that tents and blankets would be handed out right away.

Then his boss, local tax collection chief Mohammed Shafi, weighed in: Aid distribution had to be supervised by a panel of four officials, and he was the only one present.

"The others haven't come to work today," Shafi said. "It's a government holiday."

The holiday Durga Puja marks a Hindu celebration of the victory of good over evil.

Eight miles north of Pattan, the village of Tilgam overlooks the snow-covered peaks of the Pir Panjal mountain range.

Thursday morning, Abdul Jabbar Ganai, a 65-year-old a rice farmer who retired after having a kidney removed, waited for a promised aid shipment. Ganai is the patriarch of a large extended family. Before the quake he, his three sons, their wives, and their 20 children all lived together in a traditional mud-and-wood house with intricately carved doors and latticed windows.

The exterior of the house still stands; the inside was an unlivable mass of bricks and rubble.

His grandchildren were roaming the mud paths of the village barefoot. They had nothing to eat, and the family was spending its nights huddled around a fire.

By noon, the aid had not arrived. So Ganai took a public bus to the Pattan tax office and got in line with a few hundred others. All four tax officials were present and aid was being handed out.

Two hours later Ganai had some supplies — including the plaid wool blanket — but it hardly seemed enough.

"For a family of 28, I have been given three blankets and one tent. What do I do with this?" he asked.

"Oh well, at least some of the children can sleep tonight."

We're open for business to help you smile.

Gas on in most repopulated areas

GAS, from A-40

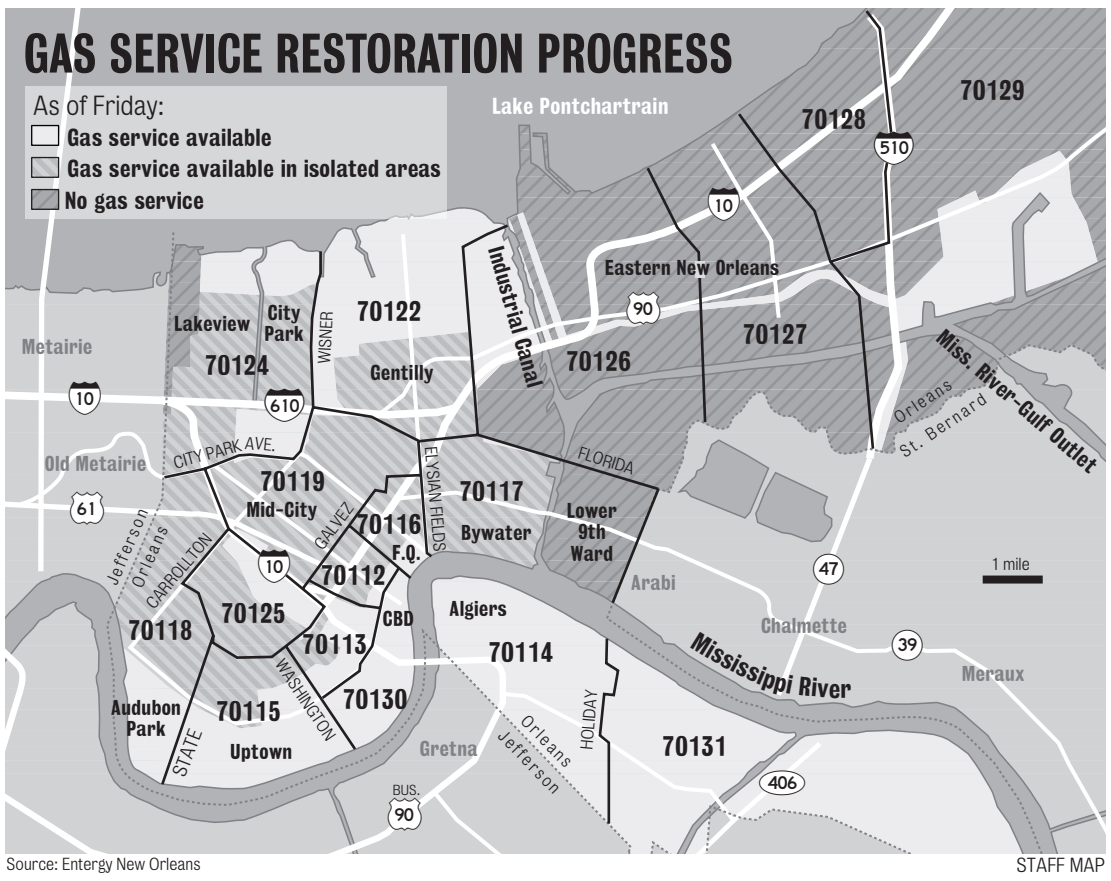
So far, Entergy crews have removed a half-million gallons of water from the city's 170-year-old gas system, or enough to fill more than 300 Olympic-size swimming pools. And they still have hundreds of miles of pipes to go in the most badly flooded parts of the city.

Entergy crews are clearing the pipes by isolating sections and sucking out the muck with pumps.

Five Entergy workers spent a recent morning digging a hole in the neutral ground at South Carrollton Avenue and Fig Street to expose a 9-foot section of gas main. Using a metal sleeve that wrapped around the pipe and a specialized drill, they cut a 2½-inch-wide hole into each end of the exposed 12-inch steel main. Through the holes they inserted inflatable cloth barriers that temporarily blocked the flow of water and gas to the pipe's mid-section.

The middle section of pipe was cut out and caps placed on the open ends of the main.



The new caps, coupled with others installed earlier on the same pipe dozens of blocks away, created an isolated section that could be cleared with pumps.

That work is being repeated all over the city.

The job is somewhat easier in more modern neighborhoods such as eastern New Orleans, where younger and more resilient pipes are able to tolerate high-pressure levels, said Dennis Ziegeler, a trainer with Entergy and 42-year veteran of the company's gas system.

Workers in those areas simply fill the pipes with pressurized air and blow out the water and debris through openings in the network, Ziegeler said.

Though gas is flowing again in the pipes running under most of the New Orleans neighborhoods that have been officially repopulated, many people returning to homes and businesses are finding their pipes empty.

Source: Entergy New Orleans STAFF MAP

Though not as critical as electricity and water, gas is an important service for 315,500 homes and businesses in the region. Cooking is virtually impossible without the service for people with gas stoves. And the service will become more critical for people with gas heaters as temperatures dip in the coming weeks.

In New Orleans, gas is available to 59,000 of Entergy New Orleans' 145,000 gas customers, or 41 percent, but only 12,000 meters have been turned on, said Rusty Burroughs, regent manager of Entergy's gas operations.

In the suburbs, Atmos has restored gas services in the parishes of Jefferson, St. Charles, St. John the Baptist and St. Tammany and the upper portion of Plaquemines Parish, Atmos spokesman Carl Weber said.

Gas service remains shut off for most or all of eastern New Orleans, St. Bernard Parish and lower Plaquemines Parish, areas that sustained the most damage from winds, storm surge and flooding and remain largely unpopulated.

After focusing on clearing flood water and debris from pipes in unflooded areas that are inhabitable, Entergy crews last week began working their way from neighborhoods along the Mississippi River toward the city's mid-section and the Lakefront.

"There are enough companies still open to where the insurance marketplace is still open."
DAVID DANIEL, independent insurance agent

Insurers have money to pay, expert says

INSURANCE, from A-40

State Farm, which controls 35 percent of the local homeowners' insurance market and is the state's largest carrier, has written dozens of policies in the New Orleans area since late August, said Dick Luedke, spokesman. But other large players have a moratorium on new business.

Allstate Insurance, the state's second-largest carrier, has had a moratorium on new homeowners policies since Katrina hit on Aug. 29, said April Eaton-Robinson, spokeswoman. However, the company has begun writing new automobile policies in the southern part of the state. And the company will write new homeowners coverage for existing policyholders.

"We will provide replacement policies for current customers who lost their homes and need a rental policy or need another homeowners policy," Eaton-Robinson said.

St. Paul Travelers, with 3 percent of the local business, was writing new policies in the state before the storm but has a temporary moratorium in place, said Jennifer Wislocki, spokesperson.

Agents are restricted from writing new policies "while we evaluate our position in the state," Wislocki said.

And AAA Homeowners Insurance is not writing in the 10 coastal parishes because of the damage sustained and an inability to determine the situation, said Mike Right, spokesperson. The carrier has 6,000 homeowner policies in the state.

"I think there are one or two" insurance carriers left that are writing new policies, said Don Beery, vice president and partner of Eustis Insurance. And those carriers who are writing policies will not cover newly purchased property until any damages are repaired, Beery said.

David Daniel, owner of the independent insurance agency Daniel and Eustis in Baton Rouge, said the moratoriums are not extensive enough to cause a problem for consumers who are displaced and buying new homes in Baton Rouge.

"There are enough companies still open to where the insurance marketplace is still open," Daniel said.

Insurance carriers often pull back on issuing new policies in areas that have just been hit with a disaster that results in a large number of insurance claims. Such curtailments help companies minimize their exposure in certain regions. Last year after four hurricanes hit Florida, some smaller companies pulled out of that state altogether and larger carriers stopped writing new business, said Jeff Grady of the Florida Association of Insurance Agents.

Grady also said insurance companies pushed up their rates between 15 and 30 percent after the hurricanes.

But Louisiana insurance reforms adopted by the state Legislature in 2003 have helped strengthen the local market.

The reforms made it easier for insurance companies to seek rate increases. They also combined two state-subsidized programs aimed at homeowners in flood-prone areas south of Interstate 10.

Insurance companies had found it difficult to compete with the state-sponsored FAIR and Coastal insurance programs, as they were called, because neither passed their full costs on to policyholders. The 2003 reforms merged the two programs into a newly created Citizens Property Insurance Corp., an insurance program for those who can not get coverage on the open market at reasonable prices. It provides that policyholders shoulder a greater portion of the costs through deductibles and rates that are typically 10 percent higher than market rates. The plan can pay off excess liability by issuing bonds.

The Citizens plan remains a viable option for consumers who are having trouble getting insurance in the wake of Katrina. Since the hurricane, Citizens has written 400 to 500 new policies, mostly in northern Louisiana, said Terry Lisotta, executive director. Normally the state writes 2,500 to 3,000 new policies a month. Citizens has no limits on the amount of business it can write. However, buildings must be inspected to determine that they are not damaged before they can be covered by the plan.

In addition, the agency has provided temporary coverage to 700 new customers statewide. Such temporary coverage is often used to allow a consumer to go to a home closing.

Today, Citizens has 135,000 policyholders, Lisotta said, and 61,000 claims to process for Katrina. The plan has set aside reserves of $12,000 per claim, or a total $732 million, plus expenses for a total $900 million liability. He said claims have ranged from $300 to $35,000. The cap on an individual claim under this plan is $500,000. Citizens does not handle flood insurance claims, which are insured under a federally sponsored program.

'We're going to be the good news story'

PLUSH, from A-40

From left, Plush Appeal owner Daryl Fletchinger, his wife, Catherine, and daughter Alyssa, along with operations manager Garrett Plaisance, stand amid boxes of ruined toys in one of their warehouses.

But Fletchinger, like so many of his cohorts who have begun to repopulate New Orleans, is determined to rebuild. And his story is emblematic of the struggles of so many.

"We're going to be the good news story," he said. "We're tired of bad news. Certainly, there are a lot of obstacles, but it's important for people not to lose hope. I don't think giving up on the city is a viable alternative."

Returning to business, however, will be a viable alternative only after more work than Fletchinger ever imagined. The greatest challenges so far have been keeping customers, finding employees and securing money to rebuild.

Plush Appeal manufactures, imports and distributes stuffed toys that are used mostly in the claw vending machines found at carnivals, bowling alleys and the like. The company was preparing to ship its Halloween line when Hurricane Katrina forced it to shut down its Toulouse Street and North Cortez Street locations. What remains of that line is a soggy, molding mess of furry dogs and bears and monkeys strewn across the floor in boxes and bags. All will be destroyed.

The Mardi Gras Spot manufactures, imports and distributes beads and other Mardi Gras paraphernalia for about 45 New Orleans area Carnival krewes. The Mardi Gras Spot store opened at the beginning of the year to sell those products to individual consumers as well as to krewe members year-round.

Now that Plush Appeal's Halloween line has been wiped out, the company has turned its attention to its Christmas products. Using Nov. 1 as its deadline, Fletchinger and his small staff are plowing ahead toward restocking at least a part of the company's warehouse with goods to get out to clients.

"This month is absolutely crucial because I need to start shipping Christmas as soon as possible," he said. "Our customers that have Halloween merchandise in their machines want to have Christmas merchandise in their machines Nov. 1."

The good news for Fletchinger is that his customers are largely outside of Louisiana and spread throughout all 50 states, Canada and South America.

"That business is unaffected," he said.

Other local small businesses will not be so lucky.

"The biggest problem I would anticipate is (lack of) customers," said Paul Marshall, a professor of management at Harvard University School of Business. Small businesses "usually have customers nearby," he said.

Fletchinger, however, is worried that every day he is unable to supply his customers is another day that the customers can start buying merchandise from his competitors.

"It's difficult to get your customer base back when they've developed a rapport with your competitor," he said.

Already, money at the small company has become scarce. Fletchinger has begun spending from the company's reserves while waiting for relief to come.

He's bought two trailers to house employees, and laptop computers to replace the many desktop machines that were lost, all without federal or insurance assistance.

"Let's put it this way: Our insurance company, they told us they would give us money. We haven't seen it," he said.

Securing loans through the Small Business Administration hasn't been any easier.

"The paperwork is very extensive," he said. "The records they're requiring are extensive."

And getting those records has been a challenge in itself. The company lost all of its records in the flood and it has taken weeks to make contact with banks, accountants and insurance companies.

Though he understands that those institutions, too, have been hurt, his company is running short on time.

"We work on a hand-to-mouth system," he said. "The factories need money. If they don't have money, they can't buy material. If they can't buy material, they can't make our products. If they can't make our product, then we can't do business."

Another concern had been to what scale Carnival will return next year. Worry about the season has been tempered by the announcement Wednesday from some Carnival krewes that they will parade.

"The question is, do we scale back the orders some?" he said. "There's not one contract that we will not be able to honor, whether it's on the plush side or the bead side."

But like all other businesses in the New Orleans area, Plush Appeal and The Mardi Gras Spot are struggling to bring workers back.

To bring his workers closer, Fletchinger bought two 29-foot camper trailers for $75,000 in Lafayette. He's furnished them with pillows, linens and other necessities. The trailers sleep eight people each, he said.

He's spent $2,500 more on two laptops so they can begin to get back to work.

"That's another thing about this," he said. "Expenses that you never expect come along daily."

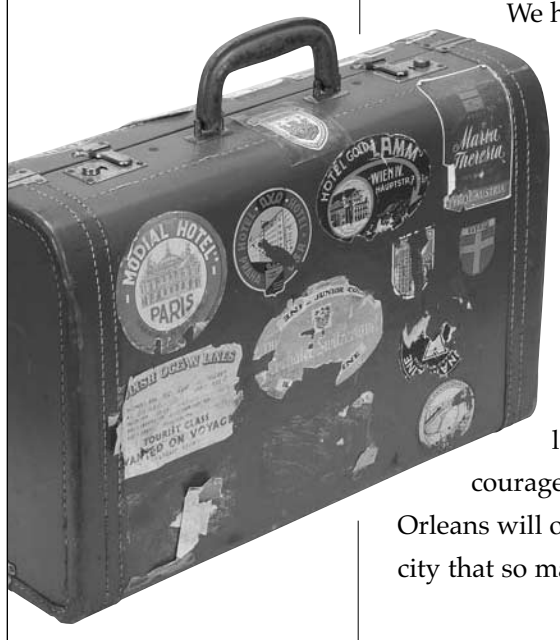
Even with all those worries, Fletchinger was giddy recently at the thought that reopening could happen soon. The trailers he ordered had arrived and workers had begun to return.

"What we're doing here on our own is coming along faster than expected. We're throwing every possible able-bodied man at this project," he said. "I think we're going to be better, bigger, stronger.

"If there has been one good thing, it's that the people who are doing the debris and trash removal have been coming the last couple days," he said. "They've been hauling wet inventory away. I don't know whose company this is or whose guys they are, but God bless them. That's been our pleasant surprise."

But in the post-hurricane environment, every blessing or pleasant surprise seems offset by a disappointment. That came later in the day for Fletchinger, when he was told that BellSouth Corp., the company's telephone provider, would need another month to restore service to his facilities.

"That is a disastrous announcement," he said. "It really took a little of the wind out of the sails of my entire staff. It's hard to believe that it's going to take a whole month to get our phone service up and running."



But a few minutes later, his mood cheered again.

"We're a 'never say die' bunch," he said.

WHAT'S ON THE LIST

The list above includes the 50 largest mutual funds plus many funds found in 401(k) and 403(b) retirement plans of major local employers. If your employer's retirement plan offers a mutual fund not listed here, please call (504) 826-3418 to see if it can be included. Please identify the fund by its group name, fund name and ticker symbol. Pension plans and individual stocks cannot be listed. The lists of Top 10 and Bottom 10 Performing Funds and The Top 5 Funds by Objective are drawn from all funds on the market.

HOW TO USE THIS CHART

This chart is designed to let you track the performance of your mutual fund, and compare it against the performance of others. Heres what to look for, column by column: Last Fri. NAV refers to the net asset value, or per share value, for each fund at the end of the trading day Friday. Week % chg is how much, on a percentage basis, the fund grew or decreased in value during the previous week. 13-wk % chg indicates performance over the past 13 weeks. YTD % chg indicates performance since Jan. 1. The next column, yr return/rank, shows performance over time relative to other funds, and will change week to week. If this is the first Sunday of the month, it shows 1-yr return/rank, which is the performance over the past year; the second Sunday, the column will be 2-yr return/rank, showing cumulative performance over the past two years; and so on, up to five years cumulative performance, in those months with five Sundays. The rank gives a letter grade, A-E, for each fund. An A fund is in the top 20 percent of all funds with the same objective. A B fund represents the next 20 percent, on down to an E fund, which is performing in the bottom 20 percent of funds with like objectives. The last column, Fund objective, indicates what kind of fund it is. Funds are categorized based on what their objective is, such as investment in certain industry sectors, long-range growth, international stocks, etc. See below for a key to the abbreviations in this column.

Natural beef horns in on sales

Stores stampeding to sell new product

By Jeff Barnard
Associated Press writer

BROTHERS, Ore. — Back in 1986, with red meat becoming a dirty word in a more health-conscious United States, a group of cattle ranchers gathered in Doc and Connie Hatfield's barn to talk about finding a new market for their beef.

After hearing from a trainer at a health club, they chose what has come to be known as natural beef — produced without growth hormones or antibiotics, and fed exclusively vegetable feeds — and market it directly to natural food stores, where they could get a premium price.

"We were going broke. We were whining about how tough things were," said Connie Hatfield, one of the founders of the co-op Country Natural Beef, widely sold as Oregon Country Beef. Then "we found out about the market for antibiotic- and hormone-free beef."

Thanks to concerns about mad cow disease, the success of natural foods stores and Americans' growing desire to know where their food comes from, natural meat is one of the beef industry's fastest-growing sectors. Over the past 10 years, Oregon Country Beef has gone from processing 3,400 head a year to 40,000. Since the mad cow scare in 2003, production has more than doubled, with a 73 percent increase over the past year.

Estimated at $500 million to $550 million a year, the market for natural and organic beef accounts for less than 1 percent of overall U.S. beef production, but is growing about 20 percent annually, while overall beef production of 24.6 billion pounds this year is down from 25.1 billion in 1995, according to the National Cattlemen's Beef Association.

Under the U.S. Department of Agriculture definition, almost anyone can slap a "natural" label on minimally processed beef. But through the efforts of ranchers and natural beef marketers, natural beef has come to be defined as raised without antibiotics or growth hormones, and never fed the meat byproducts that can carry mad cow disease. Organic beef must meet strict regulations, including the requirement that cattle eat only organic feed.

One of the pioneers and industry leaders is Coleman Purely Natural in Golden, Colo. Chairman Mel Coleman Jr. said the company will be pressing the USDA to make the "natural" label for beef more definitive.

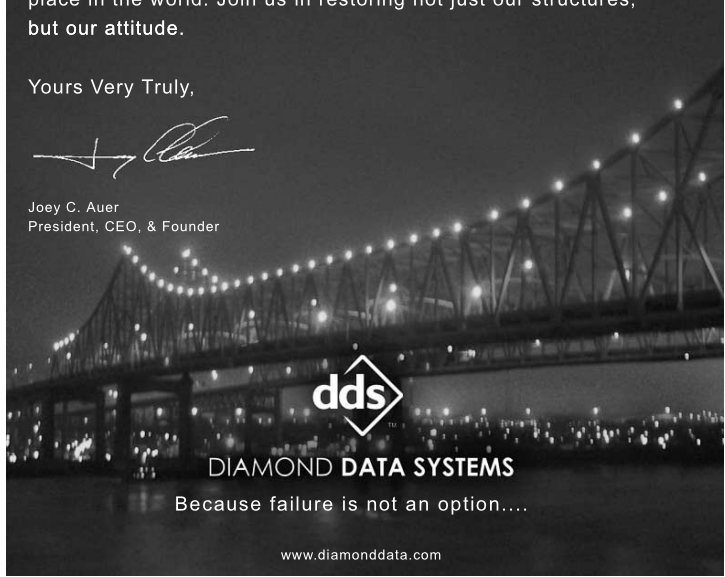
The growing demand has moved natural beef into mainstream stores. For example, Laura's Lean meats are sold in Albertson's and Fred Meyer stores in Oregon, and shoppers on Fresh Direct, a New York-based Internet grocer, can choose from USDA choice top sirloin steak for $4.99 a pound and Creekstone Farms antibiotic-free choice top sirloin for $5.99.

At the Newport Avenue Market in Bend, Ore., where all the beef sold is Oregon Country Beef, most customers are looking for taste and tenderness, meat manager Randy Yochum said.

But many are also like swim instructor Ulani Levy, whose father is a toxicologist, and who's concerned about antibiotics in her food and hormones given to cattle to make them grow faster.

"I'll be eating this the rest of my life," she said, packages of natural T-bone steaks in her hand.

Still, Coleman said he can count on the fingers of both hands the outfits doing more than $1 million a year in sales.



Oregon Country Beef made a key move last year when it made a deal with Burgerville, a Vancouver, Wash., chain dedicated to locally produced and sustainable foods, to produce all their hamburger.

Oregon Country Beef's growth has also been tied to getting into dozens of Whole Foods Markets, a chain with 176 stores in the United States, Britain and Canada, and 65 more in development.

Fund basics worthy of reviewing

Alfred from Daytona Beach, Fla., dropped me a note, pointing out that my recent two-part quiz helped him learn about mutual funds, but did not answer his burning question.

"I bet there are a lot of questions that don't really teach people like me how funds work, but which might help us learn how to better work with our funds," Alfred wrote. "Maybe you could answer one of those for me."

He's right, of course. Investing in funds involves more than just knowing how a fund operates. With that in mind, here are a few recent basic questions from readers who wanted to know more about funds than "what's happening now."

Question, from Alfred in Daytona Beach: I want to put a few hundred dollars into mutual funds for my grandchildren, but my broker tells me that he can't do it in the funds I own now. There must be a way to open a small account. Can you tell me how to do it?

Answer: Many funds waive account minimums for accounts that are registered for children, so start by investigating the funds you currently own (your broker may not be aware of the rules, as many load funds do not normally offer low minimum investments).

What's more, many funds will waive account minimums simply for agreeing to make regular deposits drawn electronically from a bank account. So even if a fund says it has a $10,000 or $25,000 minimum, call its service line to see if the amount can be waived.

If you want to shop low-minimum funds or those that waive minimums, check out the Web site of the Mutual Fund Education Alliance, www.mfea.com. In the 'mutual fund center' there, the Alliance has a section on funds you can get into for $50 or less, as well as low-minimum funds.

One warning about funds with low minimums: Carrying a lot of small accounts comes at a price, typically above-average expenses.

Question, from Jules in Timonium, Md.: I am a new investor, and I own three funds, two large-cap growth funds and one small-cap fund. I could invest a little more, and I am wondering if I should put it into the same funds or into something different. How many funds should I buy?

Answer: This is not a right-or-wrong answer question. Many life-cycle funds are designed to be a one-size-fits-all asset-allocation option, growing more conservative as the investor ages; you could argue that they are appropriate as a complete portfolio in a single fund.

The bigger issue is that proper portfolio construction centers on buying different asset classes, and never holding too many funds in one category. Most studies show that four funds in one category — like large-cap growth — creates a 'closet index fund,' where the performance tends to mimic an index for that asset type, but the costs are those of active management.

So adding additional funds makes sense, provided they cover bonds, or international stocks, or something not currently represented in the portfolio. If the next purchase is another large-cap growth fund, however, the diversification effect is reduced; that's not building a portfolio, it's assembling a collection, which can be a mistake.

Question, from an anonymous e-mailer: How do I decide if I should take my funds' dividends in cash, or reinvest the money in the fund?

Answer: Again, there is no right answer, but it mostly depends on needs. If you own a fund in a taxable account, you will owe taxes on any payouts you receive whether you take the money or roll it back into the fund, so the decision comes down to a few issues:

► Do you need the cash? Most equity funds make a payout near the end of the year, and if you will need cash to pay taxes or cover other expenses, taking a distribution in cash certainly beats the accounting headaches that can come from selling shares to scare up liquid assets.

► Do you want to increase your holdings in the fund? If you need to rebalance — moving some of your cash to an asset class that holds a less-prominent position in your portfolio — or simply want to set a limit because a fund represents too big a chunk of your overall assets, take the money and move it elsewhere.

If you own several funds run by the same firm, find out if the company offers a cross-reinvestment program. This allows you to take the distribution you get from one fund and automatically roll it into a second fund, a kind of automatic rebalancing plan.

MONEY WATCH

YOUR GUIDE TO PERSONAL FINANCE

How to right your financial ship

MARY JUDICE

Money Matters

It's been seven weeks since I last wrote, and, needless to say, much has happened in all of our lives.

Most of our finances have been turned upside down.

We've learned a lot about federal assistance, the Red Cross and how to access help. From those first frantic days after Hurricane Katrina when getting cash was a major accomplishment, to now when we're talking about rebuilding and wonder how we will put our lives back together, it has been a roller-coaster ride fraught with uncertainty.

And it's not over. That's the subject of this column.

If you're like most of us, you have your ups and downs. There are so many decisions to be made.

I ran into my doctor this week, and he admitted that he is very confused. Having lost his home and car, and not knowing how he will restart his practice, he doesn't know where to start.

He's not alone.

We have many decisions to make, both financial and non-financial.

Managing has never been more important. I think it's a good idea to track your spending, which for me is a natural curb on spending. Not only do you know how much you are spending, but you may be able to better distinguish needs and wants.

It's smart to keep your expenses in check, because though you may currently have reprieves on credit card bills, taxes and mortgage payments, these debts will come due soon.

Here are a few other tips to follow:

► Keep logs on your conversations with insurance adjusters, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, bankers and the like. For most of us, the past six weeks have been a blur with days running together. You may need to get back in touch with these people or review decisions you have made. Keeping a diary will help you keep track of whom you have talked to and when.

► Save receipts for most expenses, because they may be tax deductible and you may be able to make insurance claims for some of the expenses. I haven't researched this fully, and we are not far enough along in the process to know how all of this will be handled. But it will be good to have the necessary documentation if you need to itemize expenses.

STAFF ILLUSTRATION BY TONY CHAMPAGNE

► Times like this call for organization. While The Times-Picayune was publishing from Baton Rouge, I borrowed a nephew's backpack, bought some file folders and began to create a file system for work and for my personal business. Now I'm in the process of emptying the backpack and creating permanent files.

► Take pictures of damage and let your insurer know that you have these pictures. And follow through on claims. I understand that some of them are more complicated, such as receiving a settlement check for a totaled car. You may need to give your insurer power of attorney so your totaled car can be towed. This will allow you to move ahead in getting your life back in order.

Also, as you settle claims you will have a better idea of the resources you have to start over.

During our six weeks in exile, I collected a bevy of questions from readers who managed to get through to us in Baton Rouge and from my colleagues who are working through the same quandaries you are facing.

There were issues of how shopping for a car and a home simultaneously will affect your credit score, how to handle mortgage payments, whether FEMA checks are taxable and when you can apply for federal assistance.

I will deal with these and other questions of immediate importance going forward. And I will attempt to recap the legislative solutions that have been implemented.

It's good to be back. I look forward to hearing from you.

Gift shares

Q: Can I give single shares of stock as holiday gifts? If so, how?
T.D., Oradell, N.J.

A: This is a wonderful gift idea that could transform your loved ones' financial futures.

There are several Web sites where you can buy one share of a stock as a gift. Examples include www.registerstock.com, www.oneshare.com and www.frameastock.com. It's not the smartest way to invest for yourself, though, as you might end up paying $15 or more in fees to buy one $30 share of stock (that would put you down 50 percent from the get-go). But if it's a gift, then the recipient ends up with a $30 stock that might be worth $60 or more one day. It sure beats giving a sweater that never gets worn.

If you're buying stock for yourself, take commissions and fees into account. Try to not pay more than 2 percent or 3 percent of an investment's value in fees. (For a $500 investment, that would be $10 or $15.) Learn more about how to invest effectively with just a few dollars via direct investment plans or dividend reinvestment plans (DRIPs) at www.dripcentral.com and www.fool.com/School/DRIPs.htm.

Q: What is the Federal Reserve?
C.Y., Martinsville, Ind.

A: Founded by Congress in 1913, it's the central bank of the United States. In its own words, the Fed's duty is "conducting the nation's monetary policy by influencing money and credit conditions in the economy in pursuit of full employment and stable prices; promoting the stability of the financial system; providing banking services to depository institutions and to the federal government; and ensuring that consumers receive adequate information and fair treatment in their interactions with the banking system." FOOL'S SCHOOL®

529 plans 101

Saving for a college education is a daunting task, especially with many schools charging more than $20,000 per year. To maximize savings while minimizing taxes, many folks are using Coverdell IRAs (formerly known as Education IRAs) and custodial accounts. There's also a (relatively) new option you should consider: the 529 plan.

A 529 plan allows you to either prepay tuition for qualified colleges or save funds in a tax-free account to be used to pay higher education costs. You can do this for any child in your life — your kid, your grandkid or the kid next door who mows your lawn. (If you're going back to school, you can even set up a 529 plan for yourself.) You don't necessarily have to live in the state of the plan that you choose, either.

A 529 plan allows you to sock away huge sums of money — more than $200,000 in some states — versus the maximum annual Coverdell IRA contribution of $2,000. Most 529 plans have no age or income limitations, so higher-bracket taxpayers can participate. Another advantage is that the person who establishes the account decides when distributions may be taken.

Also, 529 plan earnings aren't taxed, so you can build a big war chest much faster than if you had to pay taxes on the investment gains and income every year. When the money is used to pay for qualified college expenses, the earnings are federal tax-free. (This is true through 2010, at least.)

There are some drawbacks to 529 plans, though. If the student doesn't go to college, there may be a 10 percent penalty on the earnings, depending on the circumstances. Additionally, the funds in the 529 plan account are managed by plan administrators, not by you (which is actually a plus for some folks). Finally, once the money is in the plan, it must stay there — or in another 529 plan.

Still, 529 plans are many people's best bets. Some are much better than others, though. Learn more at www.savingforcollege.com, www.collegeboard.com, www.fool.com/college and "The Motley Fool's Guide to Paying for School" (Motley Fool, $12.50) by Robert Brokamp.

THE MOTLEY FOOL TAKE

Healthy Amazon

Online retailer Amazon.com (Nasdaq: AMZN) took another step toward redemption recently when Standard & Poor's raised its rating from B+ to BB-. This means that although Amazon's creditors aren't exactly staring at investment-grade paper, at least they're getting closer.

The timing of the upgrade is sweet, considering that U.S. retail sales dipped by 2.1 percent in August, the nation's worst showing in nearly three years. It's also a handy retort to cynics who figured that the company was a likely bankruptcy candidate a few years back, given its red ink at the time.

In fact, Amazon, a Motley Fool Stock Advisor (www.fooladvisor.com) recommendation, is in much finer shape these days. This past quarter, the company's free cash flow rose by 37 percent on a 26 percent spike in sales. And today's Amazon is also a global force, with 45 percent of its worldwide sales coming from outside the United States.

The higher rating means creditors should offer lower borrowing rates, perceiving loans to Amazon as less risky. Then again, Amazon's been working on a better plan to achieve the same end: It's been paying off its debt. It now sports $1.5 billion in long-term debt, quite a bit less than the $2.3 billion on its balance sheet at the end of 2002. Sales have nearly doubled in that time, too. This is a healthy, growing company.

NAME THAT COMPANY

Not long after the Wright brothers took flight in 1903, my founder turned a shipyard into an airplane factory. Business stalled after World War I, so for a while I made furniture and boats. You may have heard of my B-52s or my Stratoliners, or you may have flown on one of my 707s, 727s, 747s or even my Air Force One. I've also made subway cars and wind turbines, among other things. Since 1996, I've merged with or bought part of Rockwell International and Hughes Electronics and merged with McDonnell Douglas. I moved my headquarters from Seattle to Chicago in 2001. Who am I?

LAST WEEK'S TRIVIA ANSWER

I was founded in 1833, when two fellows began selling herbs, roots, leaves, bark and vegetable extracts. Today I'm the 16th-largest corporation in America, raking in more than $50 billion annually. I'm the leading provider of supply, information and care management products and services to the health care industry, helping firms reduce costs and streamline processes. I provide pharmaceutical and medical-surgical supply management, such as health care information technology for hospitals and physicians, and hospital and retail pharmacy automation. Based in San Francisco, I employ more than 24,000 people worldwide. Who am I? (Answer: McKesson)

SHEILA STROUP

Exile clings to stories about N.O.

The first time I talked to Dorothy McLeod after Hurricane Katrina, she asked me to send her some copies of The Times-Picayune.

"Are you sure?" I said. "They aren't going to make you feel any better."

Yes, she was sure, she said.

I'd been worrying about my friend for 2 ½ weeks, and the note I'd received from her that day was heart-rending. "Oh, my God! Oh, my God!" it began. "I have a $1 watch on my arm from Walgreen's, which is the only thing left to my world."

Dot, in her 70s and in poor health, had left her home in Gentilly and gone to stay at the Days Inn in eastern New Orleans, as she always did when a hurricane threatened. She was evacuated from the rooftop by helicopter and, after a series of harrowing experiences, ended up in the Alzheimer's unit at a nursing home in Fort Worth, Texas.

"It was the only place they had room for me," she said.

Taking it all in

I had misgivings when I packed three weeks' worth of papers and sent them off to her.

The first one, from Sept. 2, had an unforgettable image of a woman on her knees outside the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, begging for someone to come to the aid of the people stranded inside.

"HELP US, PLEASE" the headline read.

Day after day, the headlines told the never-ending story the world was trying to understand: "7th day of hell." "Disease, fire threaten city." Day after day, words and images captured the devastation, the loss.

Most mornings, it was painful for me to make it through the one paper that landed at the end of our driveway. How would Dot make it through 21?

When I called her on the phone, she answered my question. She said she had been reading one paper each day as if she were at home.

"I keep the box taped up so nobody will steal them," she said.

Looking for closure

She said that at first she was thinking about cutting out some of the pictures and putting them in a scrapbook.

"But I want to save everything. I read the stories again and again," she said.

When I asked her if she wanted me to send her another stack of papers I'd been saving for her, she said yes. She was almost to the bottom of the box.

"I want to see the things I didn't see on television, stories about my neighborhood," she said.

She had lived in her little house near Elysian Fields Avenue since 1955. Katrina left 8 feet of water in it.

"We shopped at Ferrara's, three blocks away," she said "They called it a supermarket, but it was a family affair. Everybody knew everybody."

When she could no longer get around, her friend Henry Kraft would go there to shop for her.

Now Henry has evacuated to Tennessee, and he wants her to move there, too.

"Henry says, 'The past is past,' but I just don't know," Dot said. "I want to go home and have everything be like it used to be. I just don't have a home to go to."

There was a time when Roux Merlo wouldn't have dreamed of placing flower pots on the sidewalk in front of his T-shirt shop on Magazine Street.

But on Saturday, as nearly 300 residents and a National Guard unit fanned out along the thoroughfare in a city-sponsored cleanup, the pots seemed appropriate. Merlo, whose family owns All American Tees, said he'd never seen Magazine Street so clean.

"This was always dirty," Merlo said, as a street sweeper drove by. "Every day, I would come out and clean. Now I can put out plants. . . . I see this street bustling. There's going to come a time that this street is going to be better than before."

A popular 6-mile corridor stretching from downtown to Audubon Park, Magazine Street before Hurricane Katrina was a destination for everything from antiques to pedicures to vintage clothing. Although it escaped the brunt of Hurricane Katrina's wrath, the street fell victim to heaping piles of rancid garbage and foul-smelling refrigerators, now curbed in front of homes. Though some shop owners were ready to open after the storm, many said such sights and smells wouldn't be good for business.

So on Saturday, the city organized a massive cleanup with the help of the National Guard, which supplied rakes, brooms, dust

Charter school proposal halted

Lawsuit claims public didn't have input

An Orleans Parish Civil Court judge has ordered the School Board to stop its plans to charter public schools on the West Bank or anywhere else in the city, granting a motion by an Algiers community group that alleges the decision was made without adequate public input.

Judge Nadine Ramsey, operating from the court's interim home in Gonzales, approved a temporary restraining order late Friday afternoon. School Board attorney Regina Bartholomew said Saturday the district plans to file a motion this week asking the order be dissolved. A hearing on the matter is also expected this week or early next.

School Board Vice President Lourdes Moran, who pushed for the chartering, called the court action "just a hiccup," adding: "This will be resolved and we will move forward."

The order does not prevent the state Board of Elementary and Secondary

Tatum Pilot pulled a few tattered white rags from the back seat of her dusty blue Geo Prizm and wiped down its front, side and rear windows. She plopped in, stroking the dashboard seductively. She closed one eye, then slowly slid a key into the ignition. After sputtering a bit, the engine growled, then rattled triumphantly.

"I'm just so thankful," Pilot said with a sigh. Hopping from her car, she pointed to the hundreds of other vehicles that had been towed to a city-operated site at North Claiborne Avenue and St. Louis Street, under Interstate 10.

Metairie resident and well-known musician Freddy Staehle has found friends, family and faith since Hurricane Katrina spelled disaster for thousands of people on the Gulf Coast.

After riding out the storm in a Kenner motel, only to be chased away by the destruction and looting, the Staehle family made its way to Baton Rouge to stay with relatives. But with 18 people sharing one house, tensions soon boiled.

Grocery in Kenner truly is full-service

It was raining the day Fred Duncan returned to his south Kenner business, two weeks after Hurricane Katrina. In the three-story apartment complex next door, he saw a man sweeping out the rain that had fallen through the roof, which had been blown off by the hurricane.

"I went into a couple of their apartments, and it was raining on their heads," Duncan remembered. "I said, 'You all come over here.' "

Duncan first sheltered about 14 people in a vacant room in the Duncan Food Mart building at 1005 Third St. During the day, cots and mattresses are lined up against the wall. At night, one resident said, the bedding is moved to the center of the floor in front of an industrial-sized fan.

But as a few have found space at relatives' houses and two have gone to the hospital, the shelter now houses seven people. Duncan gives them hot meals cooked in his grocery store and lets them use a bathroom and shower.

Katrina claimed 150,000 vehicles in N.O.

CARS, from B-1

Many of the cars in the makeshift tow yard, which stretches for nearly 10 blocks from St. Louis Street to Gov. Nichols Avenue, fared much worse than Pilot's Geo. The cars, trucks and SUVs without busted windows had rusted wheels or flat tires or bore scars of vandalism. Most were powdered in a ghostly gray haze — residue from the floodwaters they'd soaked in for several days, if not weeks.

The fiberglass and steel corpses are being dragged from the streets as part of an effort to clear the more than 150,000 "clearly waterlogged" vehicles strewn across the city's highways, byways and neutral ground. Officials said the North Claiborne lot is one of a few city properties where vehicles are being towed. So far, the city has scooped up more than 2,268 vehicles.

"Its been a tough task for us," said Parking Division administrator Richard Boseman. "We only have six drivers back out of 30 . . . It was sort of overwhelming at first, but I think we're hitting a stride, catching our rhythm."

A monumental task

The city has towed an average of 100 cars a day, Boseman said, hitting a high one day last week with 160 tows.

John Shires, director of the Department of Public Works, said his small staff of tow truck drivers is working with the State Police and the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality to ensure the cars are being towed, guarded and stored safely. The most populated areas of the city and routes used by first responders — police, firefighters and medical personnel — are being cleared first, Shires said.

The State Police are logging each vehicle's identification number, which will be entered into a database and sent to the Department of Motor Vehicle, the National Insurance Crime Bureau and insurance companies.

"We don't want any of these vehicles getting out of the state," Shires said, "or sold." Officials fear that cars damaged during the flood will be slipped back into the market and sold to unsuspecting buyers.

John Rogers, an environmental scientist with the state DEQ, said the towing and cataloging of the city's flood-foiled vehicles is a monumental task.

Flood-damaged vehicles are lined up for blocks under Interstate 10 along North Claiborne Avenue. The city has towed an average of 100 waterlogged vehicles each day to various sites around New Orleans.

"It's huge," Rogers said. "This operation will take months, not weeks. It looks like people got surprised by the high water and just left in whatever could take them out."

The DEQ is working with the city and the State Police antifraud unit to designate and manage environmentally sound tow sites. The organization also acts as a liaison between the Army Corps of Engineers, FEMA, the city and State Police.

Rogers suspects a third of the city's abandoned cars will end up in one of the aggregation lots. The others will be picked up by insurance companies. Officials estimate that 68,000 claims have been placed with state insurance companies. The cars that are left in the lot will remain until insurance companies take them.

Pilot was fortunate. She was able to locate her vehicle and drive it off the lot, which officials are urging against. Shires hopes people will wait for their insurance companies to contact them before fiddling with their vehicles, driveable or not.

"I'm lucky," Pilot said, "I didn't get any water like those over there." Pilot fled her home in the Iberville housing complex two days after Hurricane Katrina struck. Pilot parked her car on a high point in the center of the nearby Winn-Dixie parking lot, in the 1500 block of St. Louis Street.

The smell from hell

On Friday about 1 p.m., Joe Messina backed a flatbed tow truck under the interstate at Kerlec street, off North Claiborne Avenue. He was dropping off an older black Camaro. "The real problem with towing these cars," he said authoritatively, "is the stink. Just when you thought you smelled the worst of them and think you got used to it, you get one that's even stinkier."

Messina, 34, is a driver with Car Crushers, a tow company contracted by the city to do some of its dirty work. "The ones that sat in the water the longest smell the worst," Messina said. "Off Carrollton and Tulane, Broad, I don't think I've seen any car that wasn't totally under water."

Rogers said vehicles that have dried out are likely safe to the touch, posing no real health hazard. "As long as the car has dried sufficiently, the E. coli should be dead," he said. Many of the flooded vehicles in St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes were contaminated with petroleum-tainted water, he said. In a city-owned parking lot next to the St. Louis Winn Dixie, hundreds of cars, with their doors ajar, trunks popped and bodies rusting, seem to lay wounded or dead, begging to be put out of their misery.

"My car wasn't like this when I left it," said Anthony Owens, 49, of Gentilly. Owens buried his head under the hood of his 1990 Toyota Celica, emerging after a minute or so of tinkering. "I know it's still a good car," Owens said, assuring himself that the broken back window and dented passenger door was "no big deal."

Owens said he bought the car a year ago from an older woman in the neighborhood who kept it clean and mostly used to run errands and get to church. The day after Katrina, Owens said he parked the car on the Claiborne Avenue overpass to avoid the rising flood water. Though Owens said he found shelter in Baton Rouge, concern over his car's post-hurricane condition nagged at him.

Earlier this week, a friend in the Police Department told Owens where he could find his car. He made it back to the city Thursday, found his damaged car and visited his flood-ravaged home. "It's going to be all right," Owens said. "Got to keep it rolling, man. Got to keep it rolling."

Charters proposed to jump-start N.O. schools

SCHOOLS, from B-1

Education from approving the charters, which could come up at its Thursday meeting, Bartholomew said. It does freeze any further action, however.

In her ruling, Ramsey said the board's decision shows "a flagrant disregard of the constitutional right of public participation in government."

The judge added: "It is in this time of crisis, when the citizens of Orleans Parish are concerned about the very future of their communities, that the role of public input is crucial. The people of New Orleans are entitled to participate in the process that will potentially change the landscape of their public educational system."

The motion was filed by Willie Zanders, an attorney known for his legal actions against the district, on behalf of Rev. Arthur Wardsworth, pastor of Second Good Hope Baptist and Mount Pilgrim Fourth Baptist churches in Algiers, and the Algiers Group. Wardsworth described the group as a 2-year-old organization of about 70 mostly African-American community leaders there.

The motion accuses Moran and the board, which voted 4-2 to approve the charters Oct. 7, of violating open meetings law when their plan was not laid out during an agenda item on the plan for reopening West Bank schools, Moran said. It also accuses them of not seeking more community input.

The issue came up later in the meeting and public comment was allowed.

Wardsworth stressed that he is not opposed to charter schools, but said they shouldn't be rushed through without adequate community input.

"Let's slow down a minute," he said. "Is this the best thing for us? I'm just echoing the sentiments of the community."

State Rep. Jim Tucker, R-Algiers, floated the idea to a group of about 20 business and community leaders, including Wardsworth, at an invitation-only meeting Oct. 5, two days before School Board members approved the charters. More were invited and did not attend, he said.

The charters have been planning to follow a schedule originally set by the district to open eight of 13 undamaged schools in Algiers sometime in November to students across the city. Although the current School Board would initially oversee the West Bank charters, members would eventually begin rotating off in favor of members of the Algiers community.

Officials from the turnaround firm charged with righting the district's troubled finances have painted a less-than-rosy picture, saying the district's ability to open schools this academic year is dependent on concessions from the federal government as well the political climate in Baton Rouge, where some state lawmakers meeting in special session next month have discussed shifting education funds out of New Orleans and into other districts now educating the city's students.

Moran said the chartering effort was principally designed to take advantage of a recently announced $20.9 million federal grant to expand, repair and create new charter schools.

Charters could be the only way to get West Bank schools open in November, Moran said.

"We have families that want to come back, and this is being done to accommodate them," she said.

In Chalmette

Gulf Coast Bank and Trust reopened this week in a temporary trailer branch behind the original location at 8216 W. Judge Perez Dr. in Chalmette.

The bank set up tents Thursday, under which customers and emergency-relief workers dined on smoked sausage, jambalaya, turtle soup and baked chicken prepared by Patton's Caterers of Chalmette and Slidell. The Crescent River Band with Frankie Mann played while customers met with tellers inside the temporary office on site.

Gulf Coast Bank President Guy Williams was showing off the branch building, which has already been gutted for renovations, even though signs of flood water are still visible to the top of the first floor of the two-story building.

"We will have this original location up and running within 90 days," says Williams.

Gulf Coast Bank has also already gutted its Lakeview location on Harrison Avenue between Canal Boulevard and Marconi, and plans to open "as soon as possible."

The Lower St. Bernard Office and the East Judge Perez Drive Gulf Coast Bank remain closed.

Branches in the CBD, Metairie, Kenner, Terrytown, Covington and Baton Rouge are operating as normal.

The new Chalmette facility is currently open from 9 to 3 weekdays. More details: 1-866-312-9016.

PART I OF A IV PART PUBLIC SERVICE SERIES. HURRICANE KATRINA IN JEFFERSON PARISH.

What happened?

Days before Katrina made landfall, the attention of Jefferson Parish government turned to evacuating our community and bracing for the storm. As the hurricane passed, we committed ourselves to bringing our citizens home and rebuilding our community. The work of restoring Jefferson to normal continues. However, unanswered questions and persistent rumors about flood control in Jefferson Parish consume some of our citizens. Below is an account of the events as they unfolded.

A CALL TO REMEMBER

Midday Sunday, August 28th. The telephone call Jefferson Parish officials hoped would never happen ... did. National Hurricane Center Director Max Mayfield telephoned Jefferson Emergency Management Director Dr. Walter Maestri. His words were intense and firm. 'This is the one," he said. "This is no test." That call set off a planned chain of commands called "Doomsday."

THE DOOMSDAY PLAN

In the hurricane season of 1998, tens of thousands fled from Hurricane Georges. The lessons learned from that near miss helped Jefferson Parish officials develop the "Doomsday Plan," a comprehensive strategy for protecting Jefferson's citizens and property in the event of a monstrous hurricane. The Doomsday Plan is implemented when it is evident that a Category 4 or 5 hurricane will make landfall at or very near Jefferson Parish. Under Doomsday, a select few parish administrators weather the storm in Jefferson. All other essential personnel, except first responders in the police and fire departments, are evacuated to safe haven north of I-12 to clear the "flood inundation zone." This is done to save lives and ensure that following a catastrophe, essential government employees can return to restart and rebuild the parish.

NO PLACE IS SAFE

The decision to house key personnel outside Jefferson was not made lightly. Studies by the LSU Hurricane Center and professional engineering firms had revealed that NO public building in Jefferson Parish is built to withstand a Category 4 or 5 storm. Jefferson's own Emergency Operations Center is not certified to stand up to the force of such a powerful hurricane. Given this fact, it is the decision of emergency officials to put lives before property and evacuate all citizens from Jefferson Parish - ALL CITIZENS.

ABOUT THE PUMPS

Approximately 200 men and women are needed to operate Jefferson's complex network of 22 manned pump stations. Some pump station facilities date back to 1918, while the most recent station came online this year.

Understanding the intricate nuances of each machine requires skill and years of hands-on training for pump operators. Additionally, the pump stations are equipped with massive grids/screens to protect the system from sucking in debris. During a major storm, pump station screens become clogged by fallen trees, furniture, mattresses, garbage cans, and more. Front end loaders and Bobcats must be used to keep the screens clear so the pumps can operate efficiently. Each station requires a crew of pump operators and screen cleaners, between 10 and 30 people (depending on the station size), to operate effectively and safely.

AT THE PUMPS

As pump station crews prepared for Katrina, they pumped every canal to the lowest possible level. Screen cleaners cleared all grids of debris, however, as winds increased to more than 50 mph, heavy equipment became unsafe to operate. With debris cleared and canals pumped down, the pumps were turned off and sealed from the onslaught of rising and rushing waters from Lake Pontchartrain and the Gulf. All that could be done at the pumps to prepare for the pending storm was accomplished.

CONVOY TO SHELTER

With Katrina at Category 5 status and only hours from landfall, Jefferson Parish moved approximately 3000 pieces of equipment and almost 1200 employees to safe haven. Two waves of convoys crossed the Causeway and I-55 to pre-determined shelters. At 7:00 p.m. on Sunday, August 28th, with winds already at tropical storm strength, the final convoy crossed to safety, including Jefferson's 200 pump station personnel.

RETURNING TO OPERATE

Katrina made landfall at 7:00 a.m. Monday, August 29th, and pump station crews immediately prepared to return. The journey back was treacherous. Crews chainsawed their way along tree-laden streets and highways, risking death if they touched downed power lines.

Parish leaders attempted to return the pump station personnel by helicopter, but no pilot would fly in the still tropical storm strength winds. Communication systems were down, some destroyed. Parish officials dispatched a team from Jefferson to help the crews on the northshore return.

WHAT WE FOUND

At approximately 7:00 p.m. Monday, August 29th, pump station personnel began arriving at their posts to find many stations damaged by winds. At some stations, the water level in the lake was high and prevented some of the electric pumps from operating. Some facilities suffered roof damage and structural damage. In some cases pump station operators had a difficult time starting pumps because of mechanical and/or electrical problems caused by wet conditions within the stations.

Ironically, some pumps with manual shutoff valves offered the parish greater protection against a forceful backflow surge. Other pumps, using compressed air as a backflow preventer, were not as reliable and some water pushed through those pumps back into drainage canals.

THE DECISION

The decision to shelter pump crews away from pump stations was made by emergency officials. The decision put saving lives ahead of saving property. It is also designed to help Jefferson Parish return to its feet quickly after a major storm. Between 8 and 10 inches of rain fell in a six hour period, and the pumps funded by Congress allow us to pump no more than 5 inches of rainfall in that time. In Old Metairie, the floodwall breach at the 17th Street Canal caused water to flow through New Orleans then west into Jefferson. Jefferson Parish built a dam across Airline Drive and other connecting streets to prevent further flooding in Old Metairie and Rio Vista.

SAFE HOUSES ON SITE

In recent years, we have urged the Federal Emergency Management Agency and others to help us erect a SAFE HOUSE at every manned pump station so we can keep crews on hand to get pumps back up and running as soon as possible after a hurricane. We were rejected for federal funds, but the parish managed to allocate local funds to construct some safe houses. When Katrina hit, the construction of five safe houses was approximately 35% complete, and others were being planned.

MORE TO COME

Because we believe you deserve the entire story and all the reasons behind our government's decisions, we will continue this correspondence over the next three days, answering commonly asked questions and projecting into the future with a dedicated page on "Where we go from here."

Evacuee rediscovers religion

SHELTER, from B-1

Finally, Staehle and his family of five made it to LaPlace, to a shelter set up at the New Wine Christian Fellowship.

"I've been away from religion for such a long time," said Staehle, a professional drummer who has played with artists such as Mick Jagger, Ringo Starr, Carly Simon and Eric Clapton.

He and his family are now living in the shelter with his wife, Barbara; three children, Adrian, 15, Amanda, 10, and Meghan, 17; and a granddaughter, Jordan, 1. "The hand of God directed me here. I know that I am in the Lord's house."

A clear need

Seeing a need to help people in crisis, the Rev. Neil Bernard's congregation opened the shelter after being notified of a group of over 40 people who were living in front of Home Depot on Airline Highway in LaPlace for several days after Katrina passed Aug. 29.

"They had been in LaPlace, moving from place to place outdoors," Bernard said. "They weren't received well and were moving from place to place. They just wanted something to eat. We just responded."

The church converted its massive sanctuary into a makeshift shelter. Now, over 100 cots line the walls of the room surrounding the stage and seats where church services are regularly held.

The shelter, which Bernard says is the only one in the River Parishes, has housed over 550 people since Katrina hit. Bernard estimates that well over 1,000 people have received some type of help from the shelter. There have also been two childbirths to take place in the shelter since it opened.

"Some walked all the way from New Orleans to the River Parishes. We've had people who have escaped from rooftops," he said. "One man was released from the emergency room and had no place to go. Stories like that make it worth it."

The shelter provides about 600 meals a day.

"When people are hungry, you feed them," Bernard said. "When they are naked, you clothe them. When they are homeless, you take them in."

Eventually, the church wants to help find permanent housing or FEMA trailers for every person at the shelter, Bernard said.

The church has been flooded with support in Katrina's wake.

Pulling together

Former LSU standout and current NBA superstar Shaquille O'Neal recently sent a truckload of water and other supplies to the shelter. A tuck full of watermelons arrived two weeks ago from Maryland. Area stores and hotels have provided items ranging from clothing to soap and shampoo. Teams of volunteers, including teachers and students, have helped cook and serve meals.

Staehle said his family left the acrimony of the relative's home in Baton Rouge on Sept. 13. They piled into a 1986 Chevrolet and headed for the unknown. With their apartment in Metairie heavily damaged by the storm, the Staehles had no particular destination.

A 911 operator told Freddy Staehle about the New Wine shelter in LaPlace.

"We each had a bag of clothes," Staehle said. "We had a little food. We filled the trunk with basic things."

Staehle said his family was immediately welcomed with open arms. At first Staehle was a little apprehensive about his new surroundings.

"This experience in the church has been one of the best experiences I've had in 20 years," Staehle said. "I'm completely grateful."

Slow-motion aid

Staehle is currently in the process of looking for housing. He has twice applied for temporary housing from FEMA.

"I haven't received it," Staehle said. "There are so many people that have applied. They (FEMA) are doing the best job with what they can do."

Staehle's prominence in the music world has not kept him and his family from hard times.

"That makes me feel bad, not being able to provide for my family," Staehle said.

Staehle's family has remained in relatively good spirits.

"It could be worse," said Staehle's daughter, Meghan, who is the mother of a 1 ½-year-old girl named Jordan. "It's still annoying and aggravating . . . wanting your own things and own space. This place is a lot nicer than the other place we were at."

The Staehles have claimed a small space near the entrance of the shelter. A pink tent used by Staehle's daughter, Amanda, uses marks the spot. The Staehles have lined up six cots next to each other. Bags and other personal items surround the sleeping area.

"I know there are a lot of families that are worse off than us," Staehle said. "They haven't found shelters like this."

Staehle said the Katrina experience has forced him to do some soul searching and turn over a new leaf. He has attended church services regularly since arriving at the shelter. He was even baptized three weeks ago. Staehle said he plans to attend church services even after he and his family leave the shelter.

"I'll be back for service," Staehle said. "I even told Rev. Bernard that I would play the drums. They provided us with shelter. This church has done such a great service to these people."

pans, gloves and other supplies. The Army Corps of Engineers followed in trucks, removing refrigerators and other large items thrown out on the streets after the storm.

"This whole concept of 'Let's Clean Magazine' is to help the small-business owner get ready for commerce," said Margaret Beer, who helped organize the effort for the city.

As the city begins to repopulate, there will be a need for more businesses like the ones on Magazine, she said.

Mayor Ray Nagin, who came to the cleanup wearing jeans and a "Bring New Orleans Back" T-shirt, said he was encouraged by the number of people who came out Saturday.

"It's not surprising," Nagin said, surveying the crowd of volunteers. "They love this city."

Nagin said that while Magazine is the first street the city has chosen to tackle, other landmarks such as Canal Street will soon follow.

Many of the volunteers who participated in the cleanup Saturday were in the process of restoring their own homes, while others suffered only minimal damage.

Volunteer Dorothy Nelson, who came back after the storm to find that the only damage to her Uptown home was two broken windows, said it's going to take a lot more than a street-cleaning effort to revitalize New Orleans.

"I went through Lakeview yesterday, and I was horrified at what I saw," said Nelson, adding that the whole community will need to work together to rebuild the city. "The more we rely on people other than the federal government, the better off we'll be."

The volunteers were a welcome sight to Laura Hourguettes, who owns Lili Vintage Boutique. The cleanup brought more people than she's seen in weeks to Magazine, the shop owner said.

The street as a whole suffered little damage, said Hourguettes, who recently replaced a storefront window broken by a woman who stole only one dress.

"It was a cute dress," said Hourguettes, with a chuckle. "It was a little crocheted number that people liked. She broke the window and put it on."

As she prepared to reopen Saturday, Hourguettes said she hopes her clothing store will attract just as many passionate, law-abiding shoppers.

Now that the trash is gone, business will pick up, said Susan del Corral, who recently reopened New York Pizza on Magazine.

"This is going to be the big turnaround right here," del Corral said. "No one wanted to come back because it stinks. I wasn't going to come back until I could get rid of my trash."

Hospitals in Miss. evaluate crisis plan

Lessons from Katrina studied nationwide

By Nicole Lee
The Sun Herald

GULFPORT, MISS. — As hospitals along the Gulf Coast recover from Hurricane Katrina, administrators at two facilities that managed to stay open through the storms say their No. 1 challenge was communication — internally and with police, fire and emergency responders.

Experts say communication gaps are a weak spot in the disaster-preparedness plans of hospitals nationwide. As first responders prepare for the next disaster — whether it's a hurricane or a public health threat such as avian flu — they're looking to use the lessons from Katrina to heighten preparedness across the county.

Hospitals are constantly preparing for the worst. Last year, facilities across Mississippi were given satellite phones and radios to ensure information was relayed effectively, said Jim Craig, the director of health protection at the state's health department.

That would have worked, said William Peaks, the chief executive officer of Garden Park Medical Center in Gulfport, if Katrina's winds and rain hadn't damaged the hospitals' satellite dishes.

"There was a time period when we were kind of on our own," he said.

When the storm came, the receiver on Garden Park's satellite dish had to be recalibrated. Peaks said the hospital had short-wave radios, but they were rendered inoperable when the towers they rely on for transmission were damaged.

During Katrina, the hospital's roof was damaged, and its first floor — which houses its emergency room, operating rooms and radiology services — flooded 4 to 6 inches deep. So far, $4 million has been spent on repairs.

In a perfect world, all hospitals, health care facilities and public safety personnel would use a standardized communication system when disaster strikes, said Colleen Conway-Welch, the dean of the Vanderbilt University School of Nursing. Conway-Welch has helped coordinate the National Center for Emergency Preparedness, which trains health care providers and emergency responders how to react in mass casualty situations.

"In all of these plans, there is a huge paralysis of communication in these areas," she said. "I'm not sure that any hospital could be able to respond" to a disaster on Katrina's level.

She advised hospitals to examine the locations of their generators and any other equipment that might be vulnerable to natural disaster or terrorist attack.

When their cell phones died, the staff members at Memorial Hospital at Gulfport relied on human "runners" to relay information, said Gary Marchand, Memorial's CEO and president. Luckily, Marchand said, Memorial includes in its disaster-preparedness plan someone responsible for monitoring TV broadcasts and posting updated information on a bulletin board.

As a result, walkie-talkies and antennae for TVs will be added to Memorial's disaster plan, Marchand said. And a "single source of communication" among health care facilities and federal, state and county governments would make the response more flexible, he said.

Bettie Conley Helis, oil industry pioneer

By John Pope
Staff writer

Bettie Conley Helis

Bettie Conley Helis, a successful businesswoman who became an early mentor to other women trying to build careers in the male-dominated oil industry, died Sept. 17 in Sarasota, Fla. She was 87.

Mrs. Helis, a resident of the New Orleans area since 1947, died while visiting her daughters in Sarasota after leaving home when Hurricane Katrina approached.

She began her career as a secretary in the oil company founded by William G. Helis Sr. and managed by his son, William G. Helis Jr., after his death.

In the 1980s, she married the younger Helis. She became a philanthropist when she continued Helis' charitable work after his death in 1988.

Principal beneficiaries included the New Orleans Museum of Art, the Louisiana Philharmonic Orchestra, WYES-TV, Tulane Summer Lyric Theater and the New Orleans Opera Association, said Kathy Schersten, one of her daughters.

Although she lived well and was driven around in a black Buick, "she never threw her weight around," said Shirley Aronoff, a longtime friend. "She never changed a bit from the time I knew her 40 years ago when she was a secretary."

A native of Eau Claire, Wis., who attended Eau Claire Teachers College, she moved to New Orleans in 1947 with her first husband, Robert Conley, when the Missouri Pacific Railroad transferred him to Louisiana.

Shortly after they arrived, she went to work at the Helis firm, and she continued after her divorce eight years later, Schersten said.

"She was a career woman and single mom before career women and single moms were around," Schersten said.

As she continued her 40-year career, eventually rising to become personnel director, she realized that women needed to be taught how to succeed in the oil business, Schersten said.

Mrs. Helis was a founder of the New Orleans chapter of the Desk & Derrick Club, an organization for women in the oil industry designed to recognize promising women and nurture their careers. She was president of the local and national organizations.

In recognition of her generosity, Mrs. Helis was named a fellow of the New Orleans Museum of Art and a member of WYES' Producers Circle. She was a member of the women's guild of the New Orleans Opera Association and the Ladies Philoptochos Society, a charitable organization of the Greek Orthodox Church in the United States.

In addition to Schersten, survivors include another daughter, Dyane Young of Sarasota; two stepsons, John P. Hanemann II of St. Francisville and William C. Hanemann of Pearlington, Miss.; a stepdaughter, Cassandra Helis Citro of Los Angeles; a grandchild; and a great-grandchild.

A funeral was held Sept. 20 in Sarasota. A New Orleans service will be held at a later date at the Lake Lawn Metairie Funeral Home chapel. Burial will be private.

Here all along
Throughout the rage of Katrina and Rita, our team has remained available to all we serve. We moved from damaged Galleria offices to temporary facilities still in the heart of our community, all the while maintaining contact with clients to serve their needs. We have guided hundreds through the complexities of FEMA filings and insurance claims. And in these extraordinary times, we continue to offer aid in every way, from arranging temporary housing to helping individuals and businesses recover from devastation.
We are grateful to the members of our team who have been on call to help at a moment's notice. And we thank the thousands of first responders who have helped the Gulf Coast through the nation's most fierce natural disaster. The dedication and sacrifices of all these men and women is further evidence that justice isn't only about law books and courts. It is the continuing effort to do what is right.

YOUR OPINIONS

Regulations may raise the cost of new homes

Much has been said about rebuilding our city, and many politicians have stated that we should rebuild better and higher. As the victims have seen over the past four weeks, the media and activists with personal agendas have exaggerated many statistics. Let us be careful not to run hastily into the adoption of more regulations, which could raise the cost and lower the availability of housing in our hometown.

Home builders do not object to building codes and, in fact, endorse guidelines for quality construction. However, the Home Builders Association is deeply concerned about the ability of our citizens to afford a new home.

Much discussion has come from the academic world as well as from the sellers of building codes, suggesting that we should adopt codes similar to those used in Florida. What I would like our leaders to consider is the difference between Katrina and the Florida storms.

Katrina was a flooding event; the Florida storms were wind events. The homes in the New Orleans area survived the storm, but not the flood from the levee breaks. It would make terrific sense to invest in our levees.

Purveyors of the new building code predict that it would add 1 percent to 2 percent to the cost of building a home. The Home Builders Association of Greater New Orleans' assessment is more like 8 percent, or $6.50 per square foot. This would add $13,000 to the price of a 2,000-square-foot home.

This price increase will raise the yearly salary needed to qualify for a home loan by $3,600. For working families, the extra $300 per month could be the difference between renting and owning a home.

Let's build better and higher, but let's be sure to consider our police, firemen, teachers and other middle-income home buyers as we rebuild.

Neighbors should learn compassion

Regarding the homeowners' association members in the Crestwood subdivision in Covington, where is their compassion? They were inconvenienced by Katrina, but their lifestyle did not change. I wish they could walk a mile in a Katrina victim's shoes.

Try being homeless or put in a shelter — then maybe you will forget about "keeping up appearances" and think more about being your brother's keeper. This goes for you too, Oak Harbor.

Also, where is the coverage of the devastation rendered to the less-affluent neighborhoods of Slidell? Take a drive out Short Cut and view Tammany Mobile Home Park, Northshore Mobile Home Park and Avery Estates. Apple Pie Ridge is gone too.

These homes were tossed about like an angry toddler throws his toys. Hundreds of families were displaced. These folks have nothing to come back to. There is nothing left of the camps along Highway 90. But all we see is New Orleans, New Orleans, New Orleans. There is life (or lack of it, now) somewhere besides New Orleans.

It would be nice for the rest of the world to see and help these folks too. They are the backbone of the work force, and commerce will suffer for the lack of housing and assistance available for them.

How soon we forget the little folks and the tragedies that happened just weeks ago.

Casinos will boost recovery

I completely disagree with The Times-Picayune's assessment of Mayor Ray Nagin's casino plan. This plan is excellent.

Before Katrina, New Orleans had been looking for ways to revitalize Canal Street. Canal has been in disrepair and consequently has been discouraging our top industry tourism. The mayor's casino plan will inevitably lead to hotels jockeying for CBD real estate in order to reach the 500 room minimum and increase gaming space. To do this they will buy out many of the vacant storefronts and rundown business. The casino plan will lead to rising real estate value in the CBD, which will give the small business owners larger payoffs.

Mayor Nagin needs to ensure the historical integrity of the CBD by starting a strict commission regulating the casinos and demanding that during the construction process the building facades in our beautiful downtown are kept intact. In other words, the casinos need to work within the structures available. This will keep our architecture's integrity, while ensuring that we have a truly unique gaming setting.

Mayor Nagin's plan may not be traditional, but it will be the fastest way to bring large amounts of revenue to the city, while improving our No. 1 industry and encouraging the redevelopment of the CBD.

Those who stayed need help

If there has ever been a dysfunctional organization, it is FEMA. It cannot be disputed that the money is being distributed in an unfair and inconsistent manner.

Initial funds were distributed only to those who evacuated. My family stayed because we have livestock, and we feared that had we left we may not have been able to get back to tend to our animals.

We lived for 31 days without electricity, 27 on a generator. We spent close to $1,000 to buy fuel. People in my area missed work, paychecks were short and our expenses were high. We've had to clear trees, rebuild fences and cover roofs without the benefit of money from FEMA.

I'm not comparing my losses to those who lost their homes or loved ones. But I, like many others who chose to stay home, could've used some emergency funds.

I guess next time, I'll have to evacuate too, and then maybe I won't feel so stressed over finances.

Trouble follows, insurance lags

Our home had minimal damage that our insurance will likely not cover and we did not receive displacement money from them. My husband's company transferred him to Florida for six to nine months and we also rented a house outside Baton Rouge, not knowing how long before life would be normal. We put our kids in a Catholic school only to receive a bill for tuition even though we prepaid at home.

We received food stamps, FEMA and Red Cross assistance. Then Hurricane Rita flooded the home we are renting and ruined all of our belongings. They are not covered by our insurance because your flood insurance doesn't travel with you!

It's wonderful that FEMA and other agencies exist, but what real assistance is out there? How can we be forced to pay thousands of dollars every year in insurance that doesn't have to pay you because of their many loopholes?

OUR OPINIONS

A promise to stay

The state and federal governments have long maintained a major presence in greater New Orleans. And they should continue to do so, even after Hurricane Katrina.

Especially after Hurricane Katrina.

From the Louisiana Supreme Court to military bases to the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, state and federal facilities represent a key part of the local economy, and the loss of any of them would be a blow to a metro area that has already suffered plenty. Employees at some key government facilities have already found quarters elsewhere; the medical school at Louisiana State University, for example, is operating in Baton Rouge.

Given the stakes, New Orleans area residents need to be reassured that any such moves are only temporary.

President Bush, Gov. Kathleen Blanco and members of Congress and the state Legislature ought to promise that state and federal agencies operating in this metro area before the hurricane struck will remain afterwards. That commitment should be simple and unconditional: No disinvestment, no withdrawal, no retreat.

Such a promise would guarantee that good public-sector jobs will remain in the metro area year after year into the indefinite future, and that alone would have a significant economic impact. More important, a no-disinvestment promise would also be a sign to private-sector companies that top government officials are confident in the metro area's ability to rebuild.

In the immediate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, some clueless members of Congress sniffed that New Orleans should not be rebuilt at all — a mindset that did not bode well for the metro area's future. Since then, though, federal and state officials have given little indication that they plan to pull existing operations out of our region for good.

Truth is, if government agencies start withdrawing from this metro area, they probably won't do so as quickly or overtly as a few businesses have. Take Ruth's Chris Steak House. That restaurant chain, which was founded in New Orleans by the legendary Ruth Fertel, moved its headquarters from Metairie to the Orlando area because of the hurricane. Executives soon announced that the company's move out of state would be permanent.

Public officials might be less willing to abandon Southeast Louisiana at its time of greatest need. But they might lose interest as people outside the metro area turn their attention elsewhere. And the presence of government jobs in greater New Orleans could be threatened by the tendency of bureaucracy to take the path of least resistance. For instance, state officials might decide not to rebuild Charity Hospital (or replace that time-honored but troubled institution with programs of comparable medical, educational and economic value). LSU officials could conclude that it's easier to put the Health Sciences Center near the system's flagship campus in Baton Rouge.

That would be a mistake. And when local officials in the metro area deal with their state and federal counterparts, they need to stress the benefits of remaining in greater New Orleans.

State and federal leaders clearly recognize the importance of rebuilding this region. "There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans," President Bush said in a nationally televised speech from Jackson Square last month. "Out of this devastation will come a new city," he said during a visit last week.

These were stirring words. They need to be backed up by a commitment to stay in the New Orleans area beyond the reconstruction period.

In many ways, prospects for the metro area have been improving dramatically. Flooded areas were pumped dry much sooner than initial estimates suggested. Most parishes in the metro area are back in business. Stores that have reopened are flooded with customers who are eager to get on with their lives. Neighborhood by neighborhood, the power on the east bank of Orleans Parish is coming back on.

Still, this metro area faces a gargantuan task. And the adrenaline rush that helped New Orleanians withstand the first few weeks of the Katrina crisis has given way to the long, slow grind of rebuilding. And residents of this metro area need to know, in no uncertain terms, that our state and federal governments will support us the whole way.

JAZZ AND RAZZ

► The Rev. JESSE JACKSON has talked incessantly of the need to get New Orleanians home to rebuild their community. But the job seekers he brought here on a five-bus caravan last week were mostly from other places, like Mobile and Memphis — a situation he refused to explain. His posturing has done nothing to help New Orleans or the people from the city who lost homes and jobs.

► Communications were critical during Hurricane Katrina and its immediate aftermath, but Jefferson Parish officials say the FEDERAL EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT AGENCY removed the radio cables and equipment leading to an antenna on the Galleria office building and replaced it with equipment belonging to FEMA. That irresponsible action knocked out radio communication for the parish for several hours on Aug. 31, two days after Hurricane Katrina made landfall.

► BOH BROTHERS CONSTRUCTION finished repair work on the eastbound bridge of the Interstate 10 twin spans sooner than expected, allowing the state highway department to open it to two-way traffic more than two weeks ahead of the Oct. 31 deadline. Crews repositioned 171 bridge sections that had been moved by Katrina's storm surge and replaced 39. Work on the more severely damaged westbound bridge is on schedule for a Jan. 14 reopening.

Nagin, Blanco asked to detail response

Senate panel probes actions after storm

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — A Senate investigatory committee has asked Gov. Kathleen Blanco and New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin for a detailed accounting of their response to Hurricane Katrina.

The Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Government Affairs has asked Nagin for:

▶ A description of "all actions taken to evacuate or attempt to evacuate individuals without personal transportation and those with medical conditions and special needs."

▶ All documents from Aug. 29 to Sept. 6 that refer to the levee system; lawlessness, looting or other law enforcement, public safety or public order issues; the situation at the Superdome and the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center; and the "evacuation of the Superdome/Convention Center or other areas of New Orleans."

▶ Any information that reflects on the "failure or inadequacy of emergency communications, and accounts of desertions" at the Police Department as well as conflicts responding to the disaster with federal, state and city agencies.

The committee has asked Blanco for:

▶ Information related to evacuations planned or carried out by the state.

▶ All documents from Aug. 23 to Sept. 6 related to requests or offers of assistance by federal, state, local and nongovernmental agencies.

In letters to Blanco and Nagin, committee Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, and ranking Democrat Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut said they understand city and state officials are busy overseeing recovery efforts.

Flooded homes may get tax relief

But governments would lose revenue

By Gordon Russell
Staff writer

In a rare bit of good news for those whose lives were turned upside down by Hurricane Katrina, it appears that a consensus is emerging on a package of proposals that would protect owners of properties trashed by the storm from the added insult of a hefty tax bill.

The dark cloud to that silver lining, of course, is that local governments already bled dry of sales tax money and other revenue streams are likely to face further shortfalls in the coming year.

While officials are still trying to get a handle on the damage in the hardest-hit parishes, Tom Arnold, assessor for New Orleans' 5th District and the president of the city's seven-member board of assessors, said the valuation of property in the city will likely be cut by about 60 percent.

In St. Bernard Parish, the devastation is so complete that Assessor Marlene Vinsanau plans to ask for a two-year tax amnesty for all businesses and residents, saying she can't in good conscience try to levy taxes on anyone.

Assessors in the New Orleans region, along with those responsible for collecting taxes, have had a series of meetings in recent weeks with Elizabeth Guglielmo, chairman of the Louisiana Tax Commission, to try to come to agreement on what needs to be done. Among the ideas that have gained wide currency in the group:

▶ All properties damaged by hurricanes should be reassessed immediately, not just property that has flooded, as current law holds.

▶ Homeowners forced out of their houses by storm damage should be allowed to continue enjoying a homestead exemption — a privilege that now requires that a property be "owned and occupied" — provided they sign

Welcome to the post-Katrina world of New Orleans area traffic, where driving is more dangerous, bottlenecks shift to new spots, rush hour rears up at unpredictable times, and lines of cars, trucks and trailers, many filled with out-of-town contractors or government workers, seem to jam most major thoroughfares.

As parts of the region repopulate and recover from the Aug. 29 hurricane, southeast Louisiana's demographics are fluctuating wildly amid the fluid demands of disaster response and businesses reopening. Congestion has returned to some of its usual haunts, only now it is fueled a bit less by home-and-work commuters and more by

For the New Orleans Creoles now living there and elsewhere around Louisiana, their city was far more than home: It was homeland, the capital of an ethnic nation unique in the United States.

"New Orleans was our womb, and for most of us, it was going to be our grave," said Timothy Bordenave, who is living in a cottage in Natchitoches, a five-hour drive from the city, describing the lifelong connection to New Orleans felt by many of the city's Creoles, the population of mixed-race families who trace their roots to the city's French and Spanish colonial era.

The Creoles have been more distinctly connected to a place — New Orleans — than perhaps any other American ethnic group except their rural Louisiana neighbors, the Cajuns. But unlike the Cajuns, who settled in Louisiana after

Death toll shoots up in hard-hit Kashmir

Rains after quake may increase count

By Tini Tran
Associated Press writer

BALAKOT, PAKISTAN — Pakistani officials predicted Sunday that many more thousands of dead would be found in earthquake-ravaged Kashmir as heavy rains in the Himalayan region drenched homeless survivors in mud and misery.

The latest estimate of at least 40,000 deaths in Pakistan's portion of Kashmir alone would mean more than 54,000 people were killed when the magnitude-7.6 quake hit the mountains of northern Pakistan and India. That represents a jump of 13,000 from the official count of known dead.

A spokesman for the prime minister of the region warned that the cold and wet could cause further deaths among the 2 million or so people thought to be homeless.

About a fifth of the villages in the quake zone remained cut off eight days after the tremor turned villages scattered across lush mountainsides into death traps, and the bad weather over Kashmir halted aid flights by helicopters.

Central government officials in Islamabad said early in the day that confirmed casualties totaled 39,422 dead and 65,038 injured for all of Pakistan, including more than 13,000 killed in North West Frontier Province. About 1,350 deaths were reported in India's part of Kashmir, for a total of just less than 41,000.

But a spokesman for the state government chief in the Pakistani portion of Kashmir, which suffered the worst quake damage, said later that officials think the death toll would rise rapidly as teams search more debris.

"The death toll is not less than 40,000" in just Pakistani Kashmir, said Abdul Khaliq Wasi, a spokesman for Sikandar Hayat Khan. He stressed that number was only "a closest estimate" and did not reflect the number of bodies recovered.

Khan, the Kashmiri prime minister, gave an even worse prediction to Pakistan's Geo television.

"Some people fear that the death toll could be 100,000, and they may be right," he said.

A precise death toll will be difficult to determine because many bodies are buried under collapsed buildings and landslides.

"The United Nations is still operating on the government's official numbers," said Andrew MacLeod, humanitarian affairs officer with the U.N. Coordination and Assessment Team. "There are regions that still have not been reached, and the death toll is not final."

Maj. Gen. Farooq Ahmed Khan, the Pakistani relief commissioner, voiced fears about the chill downpours that were making conditions even more miserable for quake survivors forced to live in the open.

WAR IN IRAQ

Iraq constitution seems assured of passage

AP PHOTO

Adel Lami, left, chief of the Independent Electoral Commission in Iraq, follows the work of election employees as they enter data from Saturday's constitution referendum in Baghdad. The final tally is not expected before Tuesday, but early counts indicate that Sunni opposition failed to block its passage.

Five U.S. soldiers killed in bomb blast

By Lee Keath
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Iraq's landmark constitution seemed assured of passage after initial results Sunday showed that a strong push by minority Sunni Arabs to veto fell short — a major step in the attempt to establish a democratic government that could set the stage for the eventual withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Opponents failed to secure the necessary two-thirds "no" vote in any three of Iraqi's 18 provinces, according to counts that local officials provided to The Associated Press. In the crucial central provinces with mixed ethnic and religious populations, enough Shiites and Kurds voted to stymie the Sunni bid to reject the constitution.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani issued a decree setting Dec. 15 for Iraqis to go to the polls again, this time to elect a new parliament. If the constitution passes, the first full-term parliament since Saddam Hussein's fall in 2003 will install a new government by Dec. 31. If the charter fails, the parliament will be temporary, tasked with drawing up a new draft on which to vote.

But the outcome could further divide the nation, with many Sunnis fearing the new decentralized government will deprive them of their fair share in the country's vast oil wealth. Large numbers of Sunnis voted "no," and some of their leaders were already rejecting the apparent passage.

While a strong Sunni turnout in Saturday's referendum suggested a desire among many to participate in Iraq's new political system, there were fears that anger at being ruled under a constitution they oppose could push some into supporting the Sunni-led insurgency.

"If the constitution was passed, the attacks will definitely rise against the occupation forces, and the security situation is going to be worse," said Sheik Abdul-Salam al-Kubaisi, a prominent cleric with the influential Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars, which government officials accuse of links to the insurgency.

In a sign of the relentless danger, five U.S. soldiers were killed Saturday by a bomb in Ramadi, a hotbed of militants west of Baghdad, the military announced. It was the deadliest attack on U.S. troops since a Sept. 29 bomb blast in the same town also killed five soldiers. A Marine was also killed by a bomb Saturday in the town of Saqlawiyah, the military said.

The most recent deaths brought to at least 1,976 the number of U.S. service members who have died since the war began in 2003, according to an AP count.

President Bush congratulated Iraqis on the referendum, which across the country saw few attacks and no deaths of voters in violence, and said the new constitution was a victory for opponents of terrorism.

The outcome could further divide the nation, with many Sunnis fearing the new decentralized government will deprive them of their fair share in the country's vast oil wealth.

On Sunday, U.S. military helicopters, Humvees and armored vehicles were helping transport the last ballot boxes from polling stations to counting centers in the provincial capitals. Those centers were making initial counts, then were to truck the ballots to Baghdad for the final tallying, which was likely to begin today.

In Baghdad's main counting center, workers tallied votes from the region around the capital. The center was shaken Sunday when militants fired two mortars into the Green Zone, the heavily guarded district where the U.S. Embassy, Iraqi government offices and the counting site are located. But the mortars did not hit the center and caused no casualties or significant damage.

Provinces in the south, where most of Iraq's Shiite majority are concentrated, racked up big "yes" numbers — more than 90 percent in favor in most places. Results were not yet available from Kurdistan, but the Kurdish voters, more than 80 percent, celebrated as they went to the polls to mark their new dominance of the country.

Between 54 percent and 58 percent of voters showed up Saturday in most parts of the south, according to U.N. elections chief Carina Perelli. The drop could reflect a belief that the constitution's victory was a sure thing or a vein of discontent among Shiites.

"Why should I care? Nothing has changed since we have elected this government: no security, no electricity, no water," said Saad Ibrahim, a Shiite resident of Baghdad's Karrada. "The constitution will not change that. The main issue is not getting this constitution passed, but how to stop terrorism."

WASHINGTON — New details about Judith Miller's decision to cooperate in the CIA leak probe are raising questions about whether Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff and his defense lawyer tried to steer the New York Times reporter's testimony.

The dispute arose as the newspaper on Sunday detailed three conversations that Miller had with the Cheney aide, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, in the summer of 2003 about Bush administration critic Joseph Wilson and Wilson's wife, covert CIA officer Valerie Plame.

The issue over the contacts between representatives for Miller and Libby has arisen even though Libby's lawyer insists his client granted an unconditional waiver of confidentiality more than a year ago for the reporter to testify.

The criminal investigation into the leaking of Plame's identity is nearing an end, and two Democratic senators said any Bush administration aide indicted in the probe ought to step aside.

Bush should return to the standard he first set when he said that anyone involved in the leak would be fired, rather than stick to a later statement that anyone convicted of a crime would be ousted, said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Presidential aide Karl Rove and Libby "have been implicated directly in an effort to discredit Joe Wilson," said Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat. Durbin told "Fox News Sunday" if Rove or Libby are indicted, "the tradition is they should be removed."

Rove gave grand jury testimony Friday — his fourth appearance. He was warned in advance by the prosecutor, Patrick Fitzgerald, that there is no guarantee he would escape indictment.

Rove did not initially tell investigators that he had a conversation with Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper about Wilson and his wife's status as a CIA officer.

"There's no question that, when you don't reveal something that appears to be material to an investigator initially, it raises questions in a prosecutor's mind and perhaps a grand juror's mind," said Joseph diGenova, a U.S. attorney in the Reagan administration.

"But it's also true, for those of us who have had witnesses as government attorneys and as defense attorneys, that people do forget things," he told ABC's "This Week."

In urging her to cooperate with prosecutors, Libby wrote Miller while she was still in jail in September, "I believed a year ago, as now, that testimony by all will benefit all. . . . The public report of every other reporter's testimony makes clear that they did not discuss Ms. Plame's name or identity with me."

One of Miller's lawyers, Robert Bennett, said on ABC that Libby's letter was "a very stupid thing to do."

When asked whether he thought Libby's letter was an attempt to steer her testimony, Bennett said, "I wouldn't say the answer to that is yes, but it was very troubling."

In a first-person account in the Times, Miller said that in her recent grand jury testimony, Fitzgerald asked her "whether I thought Mr. Libby had tried to shape my testimony."

Miller said she told the special counsel that Libby's letter could be perceived as an effort by Libby "to suggest that I, too, would say that we had not discussed Ms. Plame's identity." But she added that her notes of the conversations "suggested that we had discussed her job" at the CIA and not her name.

Miller wrote Plame's name in the same notebook she used when taking notes of her Libby interviews in 2003, but the reporter said she did not think she had gotten the name from Libby. She said she could not recall from whom she got the name.

The Times reported that over a year ago Tate passed along to Miller lawyer Floyd Abrams information about Libby's grand jury testimony — that the White House aide had not told Miller the name or undercover status of Plame.

Miller told the newspaper that Abrams gave her the following description of a conversation Abrams had with Tate: "He was pressing about what you would say. When I wouldn't give him an assurance that you would exonerate Libby, if you were to cooperate, he then immediately gave me this, 'Don't go there,' or, 'We don't want you there.' "

In an e-mail to the Times on Friday, Tate called Miller's interpretation "outrageous." "I never once suggested that she should not testify," Tate wrote. "It was just the opposite. I told Mr. Abrams that the waiver was voluntary."

Tate added, " 'Don't go there' or 'We don't want you there' is not something I said, would say, or ever implied or suggested."

$1.2 million raised for DeLay's war chest

3-month influx set record, aide says

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Cash in the campaign coffers of Rep. Tom DeLay rose to $1.2 million during the past three months, although much of the money came before the former majority leader was indicted in Texas.

DeLay raised about $920,000 in the three months that began July 1 and ended Sept. 30 in anticipation of a March primary race. His Democratic challenger in the November election is expected to be former Rep. Nick Lampson, who lost his seat in 2004 after he was forced to run in a new district under a redistricting plan pushed by DeLay.

Aide Shannon Flaherty said Sunday that the fund raising set a new record for DeLay. His previous three-month top haul was $800,000, she said.

DeLay, R-Texas, was required to step aside as House majority leader when a grand jury in Texas charged him with conspiracy on Sept. 28. A charge of money laundering came on Oct. 3. Both filings stem from a state campaign finance investigation led by Texas prosecutor Ronnie Earle.

DeLay has denied wrongdoing. He is scheduled to appear in court Friday in Austin, Texas.

Most of the money DeLay raised came from individuals. But he also gained heavy support from Winstead, Sechrest and Minick, a law firm based in Dallas that gave a total of $125,650.

Rice praises Miers' 'probing intellect'

Focus on her religion leaves many uneasy

By Hope Yen
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — Criticism of Harriet Miers as an unqualified crony of the president is unfounded, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday, praising the Supreme Court nominee for a "probing intellect" that will make her a great justice.

President Bush earlier this month chose Miers, a longtime confidante who has never been a judge, to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Since then, Miers' nomination has divided conservatives who support the president and those who say it was a risky choice because she was a blank slate on issues such as abortion and gay rights.

Three Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which is expected to hold confirmation hearings next month, criticized what they called vicious attacks by the Republican right. They said Bush had made Miers' confirmation more difficult by highlighting her conservative religious beliefs, which was seen as an effort to close a growing split among the GOP.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said she remained open to voting to confirm Miers, citing in part the conservative criticism.

"The way she's being beaten up by the far right is very sexist. People should hold their fire and give people an opportunity to come before a hearing," Feinstein said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Rice said she has worked closely with Miers, the White House counsel and a former deputy chief of staff, on international legal issues such as a president's wartime powers.

"She's got a very probing mind and a probing intellect," Rice said on "Fox News Sunday."

"She is the kind of person who is — if there have been four arguments given, Harriet's going to look for the fifth," said Rice, who was interviewed from London at the end of a diplomatic trip.

Referring to Miers' critics, Rice said, "I think that when they get to know her in the hearings, in the confirmation hearings, that they're going to see a woman of extraordinary talent, extraordinary integrity and somebody who would be an extraordinary Supreme Court justice."

Asked whether she urged Bush to select Miers, Rice said, "I'm not in the habit of recommending Supreme Court justice nominees to the president."

Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat, meanwhile, took issue with Bush's emphasis of Miers' religious beliefs.

"It's going to make for a very difficult line of inquiry at our hearing, but we have to understand what she's all about, what her values and beliefs are, so we can make an informed judgment," said Durbin, who serves on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Bush on Wednesday said: "People are interested to know why I picked Harriet Miers. They want to know Harriet Miers' background. They want to know as much as they possibly can before they form opinions. Part of Harriet Miers' life is her religion."

Durbin said he did not think Bush "did her a favor this last week by bringing up her religion as part of the reason why she should be considered positively as a nominee."

Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden, another Democrat on the panel, called the religious references inappropriate, saying it showed that Bush was desperate.

"I call that groping. It sounds like a man who is going down and decides to try to throw something to his supporters," said Biden on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Feinstein said her questioning during the hearings will focus on whether Miers can rule independently and show a "breadth of knowledge" in topics including the separation of church and state, states' rights and the separation of powers.

"This is a very pivotal appointment," Feinstein said. "I'm more interested in her judicial philosophy, whether she is going to be able to be independent, whether she will be able to cut the umbilical tie to the president and call things as she sees them."

Joining Feinstein on the program, Sen. John Warner, R-Va., said Miers was "highly qualified" and rejected calls from some conservatives that she withdraw her nomination.

"Let's give her an opportunity to be heard before the committee," said Warner.

Storm system threatens Gulf Coast

Warning in effect for Cayman Islands

By Jay Ehrhart
Associated Press writer

GEORGE TOWN, CAYMAN ISLANDS — A tropical storm warning was in effect Sunday for the Cayman Islands and residents began preparing for the worst. The U.S. Gulf Coast could be affected later in the week, forecasters said.

The system could become Tropical Storm Wilma, which would make it the 21st named storm of the season, tying the record for the most storms in an Atlantic season, the National Hurricane Center in Miami said.

The only other time so many storms have formed since record-keeping began 154 years ago was in 1933.

At 8 p.m., the tropical depression was centered about 150 miles southeast of Grand Cayman, forecasters said. It was nearly stationary over the past several hours and had sustained winds near 35 mph. Depressions become tropical storms when their winds reach 39 mph.

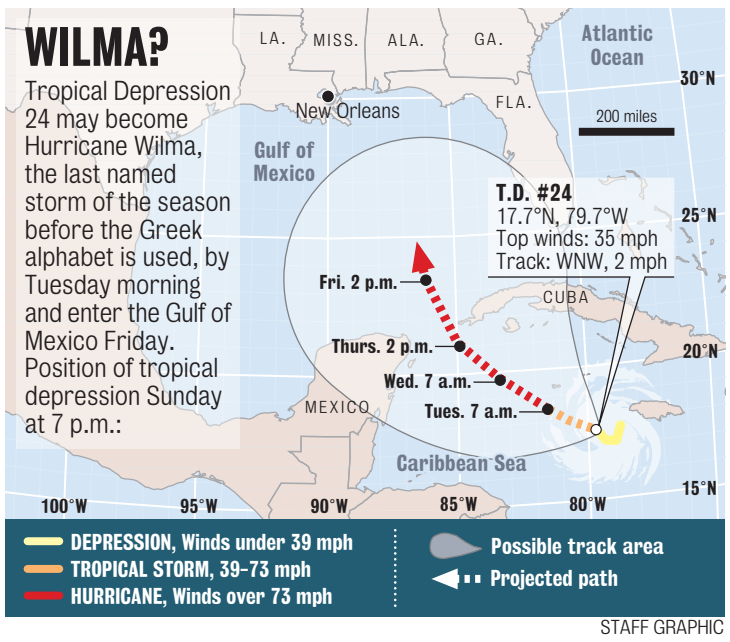
Long-term forecasts show the storm would likely move west and north, putting the storm in the Gulf of Mexico later this week. Forecasters said water temperature and other conditions were favorable for it to become a significant hurricane.

"Once storms get into the Gulf of Mexico, I'm aware of only one storm on record that dissipated," hurricane specialist James Franklin said. "It has almost nowhere to go except land somewhere."

A hurricane watch was issued for the Cayman Islands, meaning hurricane conditions could be felt there within 36 hours. A tropical storm warning, indicating tropical storm conditions within 24 hours, also was posted.

The depression is expected to bring 4 to 6 inches of rain in the Cayman Islands and Jamaica, with as much as 12 inches possible in some areas, forecasters said.

In the Cayman Islands, 51-year-old Susan Craig was ready.



"I still have all the supplies from the previous storms this season, basically a lot of peanut M&Ms, so I am ready just in case," she said.

The chairman of the Cayman Islands' National Hurricane Center, Donovan Ebanks, said authorities had been monitoring the weather for several days.

"Because of where it is, and the fact that it is projected to become a tropical storm by tomorrow and possibly a hurricane in a couple of days, we've decided to go ahead and issue a tropical storm warning and a hurricane watch," he said.

In Jamaica, officials issued a flash flood warning for northwestern parts of the island. Jamaica's office of disaster preparedness said several businesses had been flooded in Montego Bay.

Hurricane season ends Nov. 30. Wilma is the last on the list of storm names for 2005; there are 21 names on the yearly list because the letters q, u, x, y and z are skipped. If any other storms form, letters from the Greek alphabet would be used, starting with Alpha. That has never happened in six decades years of regularly named Atlantic storms.

Tourists stay loyal to New Orleans

Despite devastation, they're coming back

By Matt Sedensky
Associated Press writer

Jeanie Reavis has come for Mardi Gras and Jazzfest and Creole Christmas, taking dozens of trips to the city she loves. She will head to New Orleans again Monday, undeterred by the destruction she witnessed on her TV screen from 700 miles away. She says she has to.

"Everyone thinks I'm crazy, but everyone that knows me knew that as soon as it was open I'd be getting down there," said the 54-year-old secretary from Loami, Ill., near Springfield. "I really need to see it."

With the French Quarter, the city's main tourist draw, spared from most of Hurricane Katrina's wrath, visitors are beginning to trickle back and others are vowing to keep upcoming reservations.

Reavis will visit New Orleans with her husband, as they have more than 30 times before, though this time will be more a pilgrimage than a vacation.

"For me, New Orleans is my favorite place in the world," Reavis said. "My only reservation is that I'm sure I'm going to cry when I see it."

She may be surprised.

Bourbon Street is already alive with drink-guzzling, bead-tossing, music-blaring action, though much of it is generated by relief and reconstruction workers, reporters, locals and military personnel, who represent a big chunk of New Orleans' current population.

"The city's coming back to life," said 41-year-old Treila Griffin of St. Joseph, Mo., enjoying a cigarette and a drink served in one of the city's trademark cups shaped like a hand grenade. "They're not going to let it take them down, that's for sure."

The dichotomy of the city is stark.

Revelers enjoy a weekend night at a strip club or on the balcony of a bar, while other residents return to neighborhoods nearly washed away by the storm. Restaurants that are open grapple with inadequate staffing and use paper and plastic instead of china and glass, while some New Orleanians debate bulldozing their homes or whether to return at all.

"You've got to start rebuilding somewhere," said Eric Bansch, a 21-year-old student from College Station, Texas, visiting New Orleans with friends. "They can still party. That's what I like to see."

Kim Priez, vice president of tourism for the New Orleans Convention and Visitors Bureau, said the city officially is reopening to travelers Jan. 1, though she frequently is encountering those who can't wait.

"It's not going to be quite where we used to be," Priez said. "But if they know that, then we're welcoming them."

Priez notes that businesses are slowly reopening, but many remain shuttered. Visitors who previously made reservations are advised to call hotels to be sure they've reopened. The status of landmark establishments is as varied as everything else here: Revered beignet stop Cafe Du Monde is to reopen Wednesday, but the National D-Day Museum likely will remain closed for months.

Steve Litvin, a hospitality and tourism professor at the College of Charleston in South Carolina, said he'd be surprised if New Orleans sees many visitors in the next year.

"Tourists can go wherever it is they wish, when they wish," he said. "When a tourist picks their destination of choice, the choice will be someplace without problems. Why go somewhere that will provide anything less than a wonderful experience?"

It's clear, though, that the emotional attachment of many to this city — its architecture, food, music and everything else that makes it unique — would bring them back.

Mike Zaborowski knows he may not be able to do everything he'd like when he visits Nov. 2 from Newark, Ohio, but he's not willing to cancel a trip he's been planning since last year.

"It's not that I want to see the devastation," the 51-year-old park ranger said. "I just want to enjoy the French Quarter like I did all the other years."

Police note uptick in traffic accidents

TRAFFIC, from A-1

convoys of trucks, heavy equipment and utility crews.

New pockets of gridlock are engulfing the north shore, in part because Katrina crippled a major bridge, and every weekday the traffic volume between New Orleans and Baton Rouge rivals that generated by an LSU home football game.

Rolly Ann Smith of Slidell leaves home on workdays at 5 a.m. to reach her temporary Entergy office on the West Bank at 6 a.m., a schedule she redesigned specifically to get her on the road home at 3:30 p.m. Without that lead time, Smith can't beat the traffic that clogs the two-lane U.S. 11 bridge across Lake Pontchartrain, and her one-hour commute home turns into a three-hour grind.

"Today I didn't get to leave work on time, so I'll probably be spending the night on the interstate," she said Thursday at 4:30 p.m.

Commuters such as Smith got a little relief Friday when one of the Interstate 10 twin spans opened to two-way traffic, but things are still far from normal.

And similar scenarios play out daily for tens of thousands of residents forced to live, work or educate their children somewhere new.

"By the time you get home at 6 or 7 or later, you're so stressed out and tired that you don't want to do anything or talk to anybody," Smith said. "You basically just take a shower and go to bed so you can up and make the drive again the next morning."

I-10 commuters shuttling between temporary homes in Baton Rouge and workplaces or former homes in the New Orleans area — as well as those living close to New Orleans but commuting to interim workplaces in Baton Rouge — now routinely get out of their vehicles to stretch and compare notes when wrecks bring miles of traffic to a standstill. In East Jefferson, police say, eastbound traffic often is stacked up to the 12-mile bridge over the Bonnet Carre Spillway and LaBranche Wetlands.

Crews used concrete slabs from the westbound Interstate 10 bridge over Lake Pontchartrain to repair the eastbound span, which opened to two-way traffic Friday. Hurricane Katrina tossed slabs from both spans into the lake. Boh Bros. Construction Co. has a contract with the state to finish restoring both bridges by mid-January.

Paralegal Margaret Beyer knows all about the morphing congestion. She drives from her home in Metairie to work in Baton Rouge at the temporary headquarters of displaced New Orleans law firm Adams and Reese.

"I leave at about 7:15 and get to work about 9 — on a good day," she said. "On the worst day I've had, it took 2 ½ hours to get here and four hours to get home."

Daytime traffic volume along I-10 through East Jefferson and New Orleans has risen so much in recent days that the state Department of Transportation and Development has returned to performing night work on the Pontchartrain Expressway overpass rehabilitation project.

"We didn't have to do that before," said Brian Buckel, the department's chief project engineer in New Orleans.

'Like evacuation traffic'

Along with motorists, the normal bottlenecks along I-10 have shifted west. No longer does the split at Interstate 610 clog with commuters streaming from the New Orleans Central Business District to suburban parishes.

These days, westbound afternoon traffic doesn't usually start stacking up until Clearview Parkway, as people pour out of their flood-damaged Metairie and Kenner neighborhoods for the drive west toward temporary living quarters closer to Baton Rouge. The bulge remains solid until it passes through the two-lane chokepoint at Interstate 310.

"It's like evacuation traffic out there," said Lt. Chris Bodet of State Police Troop B, a traffic manager and chief architect of Louisiana's hurricane contraflow plan. "It's like every day is a mini-evacuation. People have cleaned out their houses and have all their belongings packed in their vehicles and on top of their vehicles.

"The same thing is happening on Highway 11 across the lake as well, especially with the folks from St. Bernard getting to go in now and salvage things from their homes," Bodet said. "And they're all leaving just ahead of dusk, which further exacerbates rush-hour traffic."

Traffic analysts also report increased congestion along the West Bank Expressway, due in part to the army of trucks hauling storm debris to Waggaman area landfills, and on the north shore, where backups on West Causeway Approach and along Louisiana 22 to Madisonville have become commonplace.

Causeway crush

Bodet speculates that congestion is worse nowhere than in St. Tammany Parish, where a post-Katrina population explosion is creating such havoc that all eight lanes of the U.S. 190-Interstate 12 interchange often come to a standstill.

Traffic on the Lake Pontchartrain Causeway also has been heavy, and even though the partial reopening of the twin spans

Causeway traffic jumps 41 percent

might help to some degree, southbound traffic leading to the bridge is sure to slow even more with the resumption of tolls today.

Some 48,000 vehicles are now using the bridge daily, up 41 percent from its pre-Katrina load of 34,000 cars, according to Causeway Commission figures. General Manager Robert Lambert said he doesn't see volume dropping much lower than 40,000 any time soon.

"I expect our traffic to continue to be above pre-Katrina levels for quite some time because of all the construction," Lambert said.

Another twist: Before Katrina, 90 percent of the Causeway's traffic was passenger vehicles. Today, it's 70 percent.

"They have gone from 3,400 trucks a day on the bridge to about 14,000 trucks a day," Bodet said. "It's not just the volume of traffic that is increasing. It's the complexion of traffic that's changing as well.

"There's a different kind of commuter today, and they're driving different vehicles," he said. "The secretary in the sedan is now the laborer in a truck. You may not have business commuters pouring into the CBD every morning, but you've got a pile of people going in, and most of them are driving trucks.

"Add to that displaced residents driving slower than usual and moving in clusters with all their belongings, and you've got some unusual driving patterns to contend with," he said. "But it's something everyone has to bear with and deal with."

'Like the Wild West'

Driving now is riskier business, too.

On Wednesday, State Police from the Mandeville-based Troop L investigated 28 wrecks, compared with a pre-Katrina weekday average of 10. Kenner-based Troop B responded to 19 wrecks Wednesday, up from a pre-hurricane norm of 11.

Law enforcement officials say drivers are speeding, running red lights and rubbernecking in record numbers. And road debris — be it insulation and tree limbs flying off uncovered trucks or grandma's rocking chair tumbling from the roof of the family van — is making for hazardous driving and creating additional delays.

A flatbed wrecker on I-10 recently ran over bedding and linens on the Transcontinental Drive overpass in Metairie. The material got caught up in the wrecker's undercarriage, spilling hydraulic fluid all over the interstate.

"It turned in to an unnecessary three-hour ordeal, and this is now common," Bodet said. "It's like the Wild West out here, with stuff flying everywhere and people running into each other."

Lambert said driving habits on the Causeway, for weeks closed to all but emergency vehicles, worsened as restrictions were loosened to allow reconstruction personnel and, ultimately, the general public.

"We began to see a complete change in motorists' driving habits and attitudes," he said. "They began not paying attention to civil law. We were seeing road rage, hand gestures, threats, speeding — all of that.

"We couldn't allow it to continue," said Lambert, who has since stationed police and maintenance vehicles at strategic points all along the bridge.

"We began having police units driving in the middle at 68 miles per hour," he said. "That prevents speeding and passing to the right. We had to take back control of the bridge, and we did."

On the lake to the east, Friday's reopening of one of the I-10's twin bridges, both damaged by Katrina, is likely to bring some relief to motorists who have been using the U.S. 11 and U.S. 90 bridges nearby. But Mark Lambert, a spokesman for the Department of Transportation and Development, cautioned drivers not to expect miracles.

"The only thing that will really help the situation is less congestion or substantially more lanes, and I don't see any of that happening anytime soon," Lambert said. "The department is recommending to Congress more than a half-billion dollars worth of construction projects, and a number of them would provide some short-term and long-term relief to this traffic."

It remains to be seen how much money Washington will send.

"We'll get what we get, and until then, we've got what we've got," said Lambert, a former Slidell resident now living in Baton Rouge. "It used to take me 35 to 40 minutes to get to work, and now it takes anywhere from an hour and 10 minutes to an hour and a half.

"I try different routes, but none of them work."

Oversight on Katrina spending sought

PROBE, from A-1

But they said it's important for Congress to investigate the flawed response to the hurricane by federal, state and local officials and asked that the information requested be provided by Nov. 3.

A lot of red faces

The storm, which hit the New Orleans area Aug. 29, caused widespread damage as high winds tore at buildings and levee breaches sent water pouring into many neighborhoods. Tens of thousands of people were stranded for days as flooding, violence, confusion and miscommunication hindered rescue attempts.

The head of a House committee investigating Katrina rescue and relief efforts said that if there is any good news emerging from the botched rescue efforts, it's that government officials at "all levels" are so embarrassed by the inadequate initial response that there's almost certain to be a much better reaction the next time there's a hurricane, disease outbreak or a terrorist attack.

Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., who is leading the House investigation, said he is not interesting in producing a document outlining blame. "We want to be able to report what happened and where, what decisions were made, and try to talk about what went right and what went wrong, so that we can learn by our mistakes," Davis said in an interview.

He said his panel is scheduled to resume hearings Wednesday, with testimony from Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. The committee had investigators in Louisiana last week to interview local officials and examine documents, Davis said.

Blanco to testify

A date will be set soon, he said, to hear testimony from Blanco and Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour. Davis' committee is being boycotted by House Democrats who want an independent panel, such as the commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, to evaluate failures associated with the government's response to Katrina. Some Democrats from Gulf communities affected by the storm, including Reps. William Jefferson of New Orleans and Charlie Melancon of Napoleonville, have participated in previous hearings as nonvoting members.

The Senate panel has scheduled a hearing for Thursday on "Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans: A flooded city, a chaotic response." It hasn't released a witness list for the session.

Collins and Lieberman, meanwhile, sent a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee and Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada asking them to schedule a vote on committee legislation that would establish a special inspector general to audit Katrina-related relief efforts and a chief financial officer to oversee federal expenditures on the disaster.

"It has become increasingly evident that federal efforts to respond to the effects of Hurricane Katrina are vulnerable to widespread abuse and waste," committee members said in the letter. "Reports abound of questionable contracting, unused and wasted resources, misallocated assets and crippling confusion. These reports have shaken federal confidence in the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the Department of Homeland Security and other federal relief agencies."

Call hotline for free N.O. debris pickup

From staff reports

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has announced a hotline for free pickup of hurricane debris in Orleans Parish.

Landowners can call toll-free 1 (800) 849-1355 for information and to give permission for corps contractors to go onto their property. The contractors are removing hurricane debris from front yards, public lands and rights of way.

The corps asks people to separate debris this way:

- Vegetation and woody debris;
- Construction debris, including building materials such as drywall, lumber, carpeting and furniture;
- Household and garage hazardous waste such as oils, batteries, pesticides and paints;
- Household garbage;
- "White goods" such as refrigerators, washers, dryers, freezers, air conditioners, computers and electronics.

Blanco urged to include tax issues in next session

TAXES, from A-1

a statement swearing they intend to reoccupy the property when it's livable. Homeowners would still be limited to a single exemption.

r The dates that the tax rolls in affected parishes will be open for inspection, the review period and the dates that bills will be mailed out should all be pushed back to give assessors time to take stock of the damage. A drop-dead deadline may be set, but one hasn't been agreed upon yet.

▶ Taxpayers who own damaged properties should be given the opportunity to request that they pay taxes in installments. Such a provision exists under current law, but the Dec. 31 deadline to apply would be extended.

"We're just trying to change the law to cover hurricanes," Arnold said. "We can't do anything until we get the legislation. If the law doesn't change, we can only reassess the flooded areas."

Guglielmo said there is a consensus that current law has "shortcomings" with respect to storm-damaged property and that the only way to fix it is through new legislation. Guglielmo, an appointee of Gov. Kathleen Blanco, said the commission will ask the governor to include property tax issues in her call for a special session.

Blanco spokeswoman Denise Bottcher said the governor is reviewing proposals for the session, but no decisions about the call have been made.

"We're seeing what absolutely needs to be in the call as an urgent matter and what can perhaps wait until January," Bottcher said.

Challenges for assessors

It's not clear what would happen if the Legislature doesn't take up the matter. In normal times, tax rolls are finalized before the end of the year, and tax bills are mailed out in December or January. But Blanco has already issued an executive order giving three extra months to assessors in the hardest-hit parishes.

How much time assessors will need to revalue property in their parishes varies from place to place.

St. Tammany Parish Assessor Patricia Schwarz Core said the damage to her parish was "substantial" — and worse in certain areas, such as the Eden Isles subdivision — but acknowledged that it was minor in comparison with St. Bernard Parish.

Core hopes to have properties in her parish revalued by the end of the year. Vinsanau of St. Bernard hopes to wipe the books clean for 2005 and then begin reassessing as properties come back into use, a process that could take years.

In the more lightly damaged areas, assessors will rely to a degree on property owners to account for their lost property values by providing pictures, insurance data and repair estimates.

Jefferson Parish Assessor Lawrence Chehardy, for instance, said he is developing a form for property owners to fill out explaining their losses. The estimated losses will have to be backed up with some evidence, he said.

But in heavily flooded areas, assessors say they plan to take a broad-brush approach. In New Orleans, for example, Arnold said assessors are working with Greg Meffert, Mayor Ray Nagin's chief technology officer, to use software that shows peak water levels to allow for more efficient mass appraisals.

The notion of pro-rating assessments for 2005 — putting damaged properties on the roll at full value for the first eight months of the year, and at reduced value for the last four — appears to have lost steam, although assessors say they think some local government officials may still favor such an approach.

Guglielmo said the Tax Commission does not plan to lobby for such a method.

"The problem is that the amount of tax relief you would provide would be minimal compared to the damage that's been suffered," Chehardy said. "Homeowners and business people have suffered in some cases damage that they may not be able to recover from. To hit them with a tax bill substantially the same as the one they would have gotten without the damage would be counterproductive."

Will rates go up?

Another lingering question — one that may or may not be addressed with legislation — is what happens to the tax rate once the rolls are revised. Some assessors and business leaders worry there could be a push to raise the millage rate to compensate for lost property value.

And, in fact, some fear that the reassessment likely to occur in the next few months could trigger a "roll forward" of the tax rate. State law requires that after each constitutional reassessment, tax rates must be adjusted so that the change in valuation does not result in a change in revenue.

In normal years, that means the tax rate is rolled back, after which local officials may roll it forward after holding a public hearing.

John LeBlanc, director of the Tax and Finance Council of the Louisiana Association of Business and Industry, said he doesn't believe the Katrina reassessment would qualify as a "constitutional reassessment," which generally occurs every four years and which could trigger the roll forward. But he thinks legislation may be needed to ensure it doesn't happen.

"Obviously, we have suffered a reduction in values in the affected areas, and we need to make sure reductions don't trigger increased taxes on the other taxpayers in the parish," LeBlanc said. "That's not a way to get people to stay, and it's not a way to get people to come back. To the extent that it's unclear in the law, the more it needs to be clarified."

Arnold said he doesn't think there'd be much support for any tax increase, no matter how desperately local governments need money.

"Even the mayor's people agree that if they roll up from 171 mills to 350 mills, that's not going to encourage people to stay," he said.

Turning to feds

A dicier question may be what happens to special millages dedicated to paying off general obligation bonds. The tax rates for such obligations are set each year based on the tax roll turned in by the assessor, and it's not clear what would happen if local governments refuse to raise rates to pay off the bonds.

"They're required to levy enough taxes to pay for those bonds," LeBlanc said of local taxing authorities. "If there's only a few taxpayers, that means a few taxpayers paying the whole thing. How's that going to work?"

Arnold said local governments will have to rely on federal relief.

"That's why we have people in Washington, D.C., to help us out," he said.

Communication snafus not new

First responders still looking for answers

By Jennifer C. Kerr
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — Police and other emergency agencies responding to Hurricane Katrina were plagued by the same communications problems exposed by the World Trade Center bombing in 1993, yet a solution is still considered years away.

At issue is the ability of emergency responders, including firefighters and police, to talk to one another on their radios within the same city and across multiple cities and regions. "Interoperability" is the technical term.

Tight space on the radio spectrum, bureaucratic disagreements over how to resolve the problem and the sheer number of local, state and federal agencies involved in disasters have all complicated the search for an answer.

In addition, the problem is an expensive one to address. Highlighting the resources needed, the Homeland Security Department alone has provided more than $1.5 billion since 2001 to cities and states for radios and other equipment — just for starters.

"It's a big, complex problem," said Harlin McEwen, chairman of the Communications and Technology Committee for the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

A project in San Diego illustrates how difficult it is getting officials from local, state and federal governments to agree on what will work and then coordinating efforts to see that the plan is carried out.

It took about 30 days to put in place the technology needed to improve communications. But it took about two years to get all the agencies — police, fire, federal officials and others — to agree to the plan, said David Boyd, the director of interoperability at the Homeland Security Department.

Progress has been made in recent years in the day-to-day radio communications for many cities. But events such as the Sept. 11 attacks and Katrina — catastrophes that involve many different agencies — expose the vulnerabilities that remain.

While officials look for better ways to coordinate efforts, there is a move in Congress to free up more radio spectrum to help emergency agencies communicate better in New York and other large metropolitan areas.

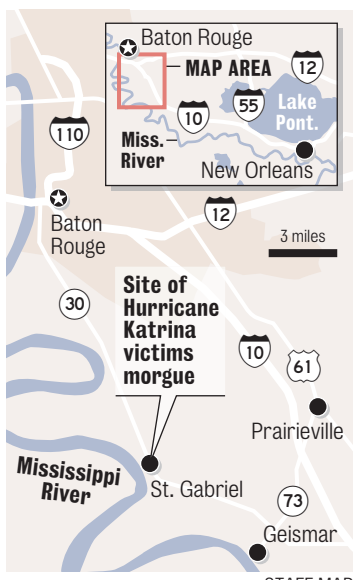
Nancy Eleby, left, and her sister Earline Eleby-Coleman stand with Eleby-Coleman's son, Taylor, 5, in front of the morgue Friday to ask for the release of their mother's remains. Clementine Eleby died Sept. 1 at the Convention Center, and she would have turned 80 on Friday.

N. Morial Convention Center on Sept. 1 and then seemingly vanished into an overwhelmed bureaucracy.

Inside are other visitors. Working, eating and sleeping in campground conditions, about 135 medical and forensic specialists from around the country have interrupted their lives to decipher the identities of the dead for the sake of the living.



And then, passing one by one through a frigid postmortem assembly line, there are the collected "individuals" — the staff does not call them "bodies" or "corpses" — that as of Friday numbered 842. They, too, are visitors, but it is unclear how long they will stay.

Of the bodies, 294 are "complete unknowns," and 82 have offered clues that officials think might reveal the identities. Only 132 individuals had been released to families, and 128 are waiting to be released once relatives can be contacted.

In a category that disturbs some family members awaiting news, about 200 other identified bodies are scheduled for autopsies, a process that could take days or weeks. Authorities say they are withholding information about those individuals until after the autopsies because of a concern that families will rush to plan funerals and then be disappointed by the delay in receiving the remains.

That is the current measure of death for the Disaster Mortuary Operational Response Team, called DMORT, a federal operation directed by state officials that was opened to a news media inspection late Friday. The facility is handling more than 80 percent of the dead from Hurricane Katrina.

"I won't welcome you here, because none of us wants to be here," said DMORT commander Dr. Louis Cataldie as he introduced himself.

Sluggish pace

Since the storm, Cataldie has led what he calls a "horrible" and painfully slow process of collecting and identifying the dead that even he admits has been unfair to grieving families, many left in the dark about the fate of their loved ones. Some bodies might not be identified for months, a year, or maybe more, Cataldie said. Some may "never, ever be identified."

He and other officials at the St. Gabriel center say the conditions left by the storm made their job complex. For example, many of the dead were "floaters" who lay in water or mud for days, swelling the bodies and rendering their appearances indistinguishable by race or gender. The number of wallets or other identification found on the bodies was "minimal," Cataldie said.

Clothing was ragged, "animal activity" had removed flesh and many fingerprints were unreadable. Many died away from their homes. Bodies were found washed up on house porches that were not their own.

Once the bodies are examined, the next step would be to find information to match the traits, but that has proved hard to come by, officials say. For example, doctors consider dental X-rays one of the best ways to identify a victim, but they are looking for a needle in a haystack unless they know where the dead person's dental records are kept.

At a Louisiana State University medical center in New Orleans, the dental X-rays kept on higher shelves survived, but the ones on lower shelves were below the flood line and ruined. A New Orleans city clinic gave the mortuary center 1,700 dental X-ray pictures that were soaking wet. At St. Gabriel last week, the small film strips were laid upon a patio to dry in the sun, anchored by small rocks to keep the wind from blowing them away.

A squad of dental experts with a fleet of computers in one of the mortuary trailers began the dental matching process on Thursday, about six weeks after the storm. Comparing postmortem X-ray images of the dead with images from past dental appointments, the crew quickly began making progress. They found three matches during a three-hour period Friday evening, leading to shouts of "yeehaw" and wide smiles all around.

About six to eight autopsies per shift are performed in the St. Gabriel morgue. Once information like X-rays, fingerprints and personal effects is gathered, crews of analysts try to match them with information supplied by relatives.

Discouraging work

The morgue has taken over a group of one-story brick government buildings that was once a school and still serves as St. Gabriel's town hall. The complex is festooned with dozens of large tents and truck trailers for dining, showers, decontamination, refrigerators and generators, creating a constant humming noise outdoors.

The staff comes from all reaches of the country, many in military or local government positions. They volunteer for the job, and the federal government pays them a salary to work 12-hour daily shifts for two weeks. During that time they don't leave, sleeping on cots and dining together under a tent mess hall. Chaplains and psychologists are on hand for support, all part of the "self-contained community."

Reminders of death are everywhere, and comforts are few. The mornings begin with a group prayer, the Pledge of Allegiance and a song, such as "Amazing Grace" or "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot." A staff-adopted dog named Iber captured their hearts but soon left with a departing dentist. Children have mailed them art for the walls, one piece with an angel and winged crosses floating on clouds.

A two-page memorandum to the staff from Michael Chertoff, the nation's homeland security chief, is taped on an outdoor marker board. The edges of the memo are crinkled and the corners torn except where the tape is holding the pages down. The last line of the message says, "Keep up the great work."

Looking for answers

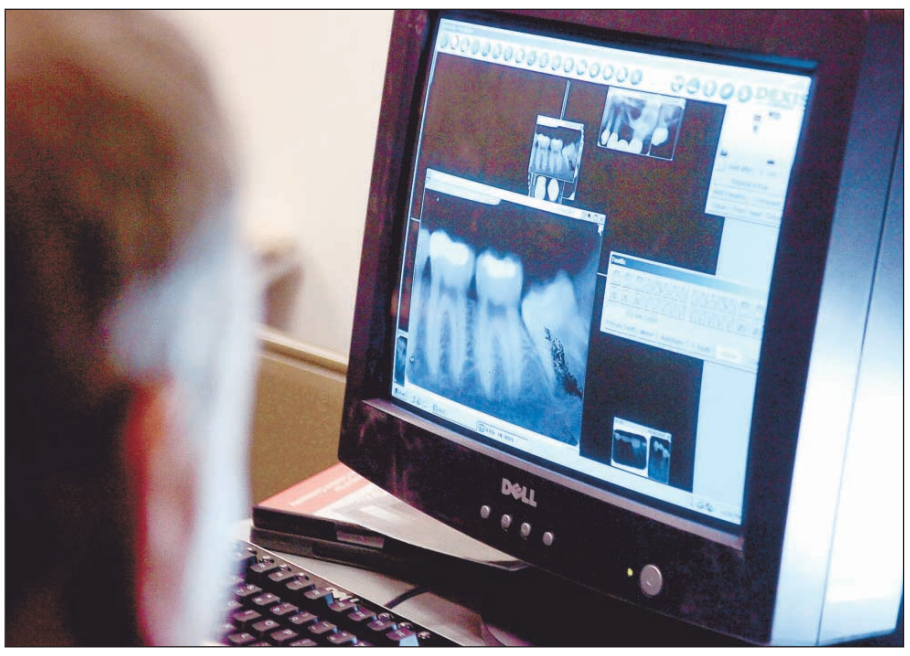
ducts chill the air and blow a constant wind inside. The morgue staff wear protective suits, covering them head to toe.

All the bodies come through here. Each is escorted by a staff member throughout the staged process, starting with a cleansing in a shallow pool of special solutions and then on to checkpoints for measurements, personal effects, fingerprints and X-rays. A staff member uses a hand-held device to extract samples for DNA testing from each person's right tibia.

Autopsies are performed at the stage labeled pathology, which can handle six to eight bodies per shift. Perhaps more than any other factor, autopsies set the pace of progress at the mortuary center.

The bodies are moved "Head First — Please," as instructed by a sign. Paperwork is kept in plastic-bagged envelopes. Identification is attached to the body bags, but no ID tag is fastened to the corpses.



Once the information is gathered, crews of analysts try to match the individuals with information supplied by family members or friends. The staff does not contact relatives. That is done by the Family Assistance Center, an operation occupying a former Jumbo Sports retail store in a Baton Rouge strip mall, operated by the health department and the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Even the Family Assistance Center was built on a premise that underestimated Hurricane Katrina, said Bob Johannessen, a spokesman for the state health agency. The center started with computer databases designed after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks to handle plane crashes or collapsed buildings, tragedies in which lists of the dead were probably available. The system had to be rethought after Katrina.

STAFF PHOTOS BY ALEX BRANDON

Coast Guard Capt. Don Fletcher, left, of Clearwater, Fla., works with Capt. Daniel Huber of U.S. Public Health Services to identify bodies using dental records. Work has proved difficult, with some dental records ruined or damaged by floodwaters in New Orleans.

Dental experts began examining records Thursday in what is considered one of the best ways to identify bodies, many of which are badly disfigured. Although records have not always been easy to find, progress is being made: Three matches were found during a three-hour period Friday evening.

Suffering in uncertainty

One of the harsh realities in the weeks after Katrina was that rescuers took the living and left the dead to be collected later, separating family members from the bodies of their loved ones.

Among the distressed people in that situation were Earline Eleby-Coleman and her sister Nancy Eleby, who say their mother, Clementine Eleby, died at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center on Sept. 1 before the stranded throngs there were evacuated.

Aware that members of the news media were gathering outside the St. Gabriel center on Friday afternoon, the sisters showed up to tell a story of how they tried repeatedly and failed to get any information from DMORT, the governor's office, FEMA or anyone else about their mother, who would have celebrated her 80th birthday Friday.

Nancy Eleby clutched a sign that read, "Free the Soul's held hostage at St. Gabriel morgue" while her sister distributed a poem she wrote titled "The Forgotten," an aching appeal to authority figures for help.

"Officials say be patient and wait, we have to be careful and make no mistakes; But I know there is a better way, to speed up the process each and every day," the poem reads.

The sisters were not allowed into the center, but journalists, once inside, stormed Cataldie with questions about the Elebys' plight, and he agreed to meet with the women. Cataldie said four bodies were recovered from the Convention Center, but he would not say why the mortuary team was unable to determine whether Eleby was among them.

On Saturday, Eleby-Coleman and a state official reported that Cataldie and the sisters had a positive meeting and that new information from the sisters had given all of them high hopes that Clementine Eleby would soon be discovered among the center's bodies.

In the meantime, Eleby-Coleman said, "I can't stop crying, and I can't sleep." She recognized that her desperate request, launched from the street, had kicked authorities into high gear in a way that higher-ups had failed to do. She said she hopes others can get similar attention.

"We hope and pray that everyone can find peace with knowing where their loved ones are," she said.

HURRICANE AFTERMATH

"The people I saw in church every Sunday: Where are they? People I've known since I was a kid, I have no idea what happened to them."

JACQUES DETIEGE
a New Orleans businessman now living in Houston

Natchitoches may be Creole center

CREOLES, from A-1

being expelled from Canada by the British, the Creoles lived in the birthplace of their culture.

And now, after the recent storms and the blows they dealt to Creole communities around New Orleans, scattering them to states from coast to coast, many Creoles fear that without a geographical base, their already fragile culture and their identity could be lost.

"The Creole culture was already dying, and now I think it's gone," said Julie Sardie, a New Orleans marketing executive who is living in a transplanted Creole community in Houston. Sardie's mother, Jackie, added, "We're just sick, suffering so bad over not the loss of our houses, but the loss of our home, our culture, the things we did."

Multicultural crossroads

Many Creoles trace their roots to immigrants and slaves from the former French and Spanish colonies in the Caribbean, particularly Cuba and what is now Haiti. Historians say it was New Orleans' position as a crossroads and port town that allowed for the easy mingling of races and nationalities that in turn gave birth, in the 18th century, to a part-European, part-Afro-Caribbean society that grew to about 20,000 people in Louisiana by the mid-1800s.

The Creole culture that developed over generations, known for a distinctive cuisine, language and music, contributed to New Orleans' identity and helped define Louisiana to the world. Before Hurricane Katrina, experts estimated that 10 percent to 20 percent of black people in New Orleans — 30,000 to 60,000 people — considered themselves Creole by ancestry, but even more lived lives influenced by the culture because of their proximity to it.

And now most are gone.

With their geographic underpinnings swept away, many New Orleanians of Creole descent are trying to figure out how best to preserve a community separated from both its birthplace and its home base.

"Everywhere you go they're trying to exist, but it's like the life's been drained out of them," said Sardie, who is in touch with the large group of displaced New Orleans Creoles in Houston. "I just want to cry."

Bordenave, who manages a blues restaurant, said: "We can exist outside New Orleans, but it's easier and more natural to live in an atmosphere that reflects our history, love of music and architecture, eating and celebrating."

Dreaming of return

As for going back home, Bordenave family members are taking a wait-and-see approach, as are many. They wonder whether the new New Orleans will be anything more than a hollow imitation of the old city.

"We'll give it a year, then consider other options if New Orleans doesn't work out," said Curtis Bordenave, Timothy's brother, an electrical contractor whose family name appears in stone at one of the city's oldest cemeteries. Leaving the city would not be easy, he said, not "when you loved a place and it was good to you."

When they were in New Orleans, the Sardies — Roman Catholics all, as are most Creoles — could tell what holiday they were celebrating by what dish was on the table, they said. Gumbo des herbes meant Holy Thursday; crawfish bisque was saved for Good Friday; and a "cowan," or turtle, feast, signaled the arrival of Easter Sunday. Christmas celebrations began on the night of the 24th and usually included midnight Mass and a revillon dinner featuring file gumbo.

And though most of the country associates Carnival with a single day — Fat Tuesday — in New Orleans the Mardi Gras season opens Jan. 6, the 12th night after Christmas. For people such as the Sardies and the Bordenaves, Carnival time was not so much about catching beads in the French Quarter as going to black-tie or masquerade parties and debutante balls in quieter parts of the city.

"Oh God, I'm going to miss that so much," Jackie Sardie said. "During Mardi Gras we might go to 15 or 20 dances. We really believed in clubs, parties and dances. It's something I fear we will never have again."

Oasis amid decay

For many, these things were the only good reasons to be in New Orleans.

"We didn't stay there for the city administration or the great benefits: The crime and the schools were horrible," Sardie said. "We put up with all of that because our culture was there. That's the only reason we were there."

Many, though, had already left, with some lighter-skinned Creoles living as white people in other parts of the country. Large numbers of Creoles also departed Louisiana after World War II, frustrated with the slow pace of racial progress in the South.

An even older diaspora existed before the Civil War, and it grew in the 1890s after Homer Plessy, a Creole New Orleanian, lost his Supreme Court case against John Howard Ferguson. Plessy had been jailed for sitting in a car reserved for white citizens on the East Louisiana Railroad. He challenged the restriction as unconstitutional. The decision in Plessy v. Ferguson ushered in the "separate but equal" standard for the races.

The Creoles who left New Orleans in the past, however, generally planned their moves as families. Last month the evacuation scattered people haphazardly, not even giving them a chance to say goodbye or tell one another where they were going. Families that had lived within blocks for generations ended up in different states.

"The people I saw in church every Sunday: Where are they?" asked Jacques Detiege, a businessman from New Orleans now living in Houston. "People I've known since I was a kid, I have no idea what happened to them."

The Creoles in New Orleans were an economically diverse group. Some lived in simple but historic houses in the Treme area near the French Quarter, while others were concentrated in Gentilly and in more modern, upscale neighborhoods in eastern New Orleans. Large swaths of the latter two areas were damaged beyond repair in the flood and might be condemned.

Death knell or awakening?

This enormous displacement is not without precedent, said James Wilson, assistant director of the Center for Louisiana Studies at the University of Louisiana-Lafayette. The Cajuns, who were expelled from Canada in the late 1700s, managed to carry on against the odds, Wilson said.

"They were able to preserve and maintain their way of life even though only a small fraction resettled in south Louisiana," he said. "They were forced to adapt and learn English, and this produced a backlash, a strong connection to their identity. The Creoles have gone through the same thing, as an outside group. They've learned to survive and maintain their distinctiveness."

In fact, many Creoles think their recent trials will make them only stronger.

"Katrina was not a death knell for Creole culture, quite the opposite," said Janet Ravare Colson, the assistant director of the Creole Heritage Center at Northwestern State University in Natchitoches. "I think it was an awakening. People want to know about their heritage now more than ever."

Colson said the number of people contacting the 7-year-old center for information has spiked since Hurricane Katrina, and that she could hardly handle the demand on the center's limited budget.

Some Creoles say the area around Natchitoches, which already had its own sizable Creole community many generations old, will become the new center of the culture.

Mary Bordenave, Curtis' wife, is among those who wonder whether the Creoles will emerge better off because of the adversity. "Maybe this was a great thing for the Creoles," she said.

Endangered spirit

Sybil Kein, a retired English professor and New Orleans native whose Gentilly home was destroyed in the flood, said: "We'll meet on the Cane River. We're going to have a whole lot of Creoles there because for many of us, we can't think of any other place outside of New Orleans we'd want to be."

However, what will happen to New Orleans without its Creoles is unclear.

"Much of what made New Orleans unique was the Creole influence," said Mary Gehman, an assistant professor of English at Delgado Community College and the author of several works on Creole history. "With the razing of large areas of condemned buildings and replacing them with modern housing with faux touches, the displacement of neighborhoods, the emphasis on a Las Vegas-style entertainment destination in the new New Orleans, I fear little will survive of the original spirit of the place."

Burial offers storm victim's family peace at last

After six weeks, body's journey now complete

By Aaron Sharockman
St. Petersburg Times

BELLE GLADE, FLA. — Kathleen Bowie waited six weeks to mourn her husband, a trucker she met and married in less than a month, and someone she still loved though he kept girlfriends most everywhere he traveled.

She, like many others, had seen the picture of his death in New Orleans — stiff on a plywood board, wrapped in a green bed sheet, surrounded by flood waters. Xavier Bowie died the day after the storm when his liquid oxygen tank ran out. A girlfriend ferried his shrouded corpse on a plywood raft in search of help.

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, people focused so much on saving the living, there was no time to treasure the dead.

Saturday, under a white, flat roof in a Baptist Church on another town's Canal Street, the Bowie family finally said goodbye.

Xavier Bowie, 57, drinker, carouser, Baptist. Died, Aug. 30, 2005, New Orleans. Buried Oct. 15, 2005, Belle Glade. Fla.

One of his sons, Xavier Bowie Jr. saw him in New Orleans along with his mother not more than a week before he died. His father had been diagnosed with lung cancer nine months earlier. His silver hair had fallen out from chemotherapy.

"We had our differences," the younger Bowie, 33, said. "But we talked for two hours I made peace with my father."

Death heals wounds, but not scars.

Xavier Bowie drove trucks after four years in the Navy. First at the Glades Sugar Mill, in Belle Glade, then around the country. He was a partier by many accounts, perfect for New Orleans, his family agreed.

A year ago he nearly died after a night of gambling and drinking. On the drive home, he made a wrong turn. He was jumped, hit in the head with a pipe, "and left for dead," said son Jim Bowie, 32, who visited him shortly afterward.

That was the last time Jim Bowie saw his father.

Twenty years ago Xavier Bowie left his four sons and daughter, Alisha Hall, in Belle Glade with their mother, his wife Kathleen.

"He could be tough," said Jim Bowie, who admitted there was a lot about his father he never understood.

Added his sister, Hall, "We had our good times, and bad times of course."

Family members recalled both on Saturday during a 90-minute service at Mount Calvary Baptist Church. The Rev. Skylyn Hagins, an old friend, spoke with a driving cadence, mixing scripture with memories of Bowie.

Son Anthony Bowie, 31, who now lives in Wesley Chapel, Fla., read a poem while brass ceiling fans rattled overhead. Xavier Bowie Jr. wept.

"Katrina did not kill him," said Hagins. "God called him home."

The image of Bowie's death, however, became an immediate icon of Hurricane Katrina's devastation. It also was how his sons realized their father had died.

It was one of the first pictures that described the human toll from the flood. It filled the pages of the New York Times, Washington Post and Los Angeles Times and dozens of others.

In the picture, Evelyn Turner, who described herself as Bowie's common-law wife, sits on the plywood, wiping tears away with a white washcloth with mud caked to her right knee.

Bowie was diagnosed with lung cancer in December. He ran out of bottled oxygen the day after Katrina flooded Bowie's New Orleans neighborhood. Turner, 54, waded out from their house on Annette Street for help.

By the time she returned, Bowie was dead.

Turner, who is now staying with relatives in Shreveport and did not attend Saturday's funeral, then wrapped Bowie in a sheet. With the help of friends, she floated him down the main road.

There, she met a man in a flatbed truck who took the two of them to the corner of Poydras Street and Loyola Avenue. They rested him on a grassy bank at the foot of City Hall, a block from the Superdome and waist-high water.

"I could feel that something happened," said Jim Bowie, whose aunt, Ethel Bowie Thompson, died of lung cancer while living in New Orleans last November. Xavier Bowie had moved to New Orleans to live with his sister. "I just knew he wouldn't make it."

The road home was a six-week circuitous trip for a lifelong truck driver who, in his profession, was certainly used to such things.

From the grass in front of City Hall, Xavier Bowie's body was taken to St. Gabriel, a city to the west of New Orleans that became a clearinghouse for the dead. There, it sat for weeks.

Jim Bowie tried to make the drive once to rescue his father's body, but he only made it as far as Columbus, Ga., before the approach of Hurricane Rita turned him away.

Xavier Bowie's body finally

Delta towns hit hard by storm surge of evacuees

AP PHOTOS

Nicole Johnson works as a cashier at a convenience store in Waterproof, a small town on the Louisiana side of the Mississippi River that has seen an influx of evacuees. She wonders what kind of jobs will be available in a community that can't offer opportunities to its own young residents.

'We have hopes and dreams like everybody else,' says Police Chief Earl Pinkney, who grew up in Tallulah. 'That's what hurts, that the potential here is so great.' Tallulah and other communities in the cash-poor Delta are reeling from decades of poverty, racism and, now, a hurricane.

Weak economies can't withstand the new influx

By Errin Haines
Associated Press writer

MIDNIGHT, MISS. — Midnight, Miss., is little more than a faded general store, a towering cotton gin, a Baptist church and shotgun homes scattered along a few narrow streets.

The view is the same across the Southern Delta: row houses with peeling paint, sagging facades and tired wooden boards clustered between the cotton fields.

And that was before Hurricane Katrina damaged many of the towns and brought thousands of unemployed, homeless new residents.

Stanley Bates lives in Midnight in a skinny maroon house a few hundred feet from the church and the gin. For years, he has worked the fields during cotton season, which has dwindled from four months to three weeks.

The work is hard, and it pays only $5.15 an hour, but it's the sole payday for the 300 or so people here. And when the season's over, Bates said, "We right back where we started."

Decades before Katrina struck the Gulf, the storm that hit the Mississippi-Louisiana border was named Poverty. It left Midnight and neighboring towns slumped along the two-lane highways like grandmothers in rocking chairs, watching life pass them by.

Midnight is a sorry town, a throwaway, Bates says, looking with cloudy eyes at his cramped, worn hands.

"We were suffering before that damn hurricane came," he said.

New Orleans and the Gulf Coast of Mississippi and Alabama were Katrina's most obvious casualties, but the predominantly black, perennially poor Louisiana and Mississippi Delta is also reeling — its legacy of poverty and racism magnified by the storm.

For years they have been waiting: waiting for better jobs, for decent housing, for good schools.

What they got instead is a flood of jobless and homeless hurricane refugees from the coast — people seeking help from towns that can barely help themselves.

Overnight, populations grew by the hundreds in Delta towns that were the end of the road for evacuees who went as far as they could on one tank of gas.

"Before we got any evacuees, we were already struggling," said Lake Providence Mayor Isaac Fields Jr., who estimated his northern Louisiana town of 5,000 swelled by 1,000 in the days leading up to and immediately following Katrina.

Fields had no idea so many would be coming. After all, Lake Providence is 280 miles from New Orleans, and there's not much waiting when you get there.

"We want anybody who wants to stay to stay," Fields says. "But we don't have the jobs to offer them."

But finding work might be a snap compared to finding a place to live. With up to 200 people on the affordable-housing waiting list before the hurricane, those who blew in after the storm have little hope of finding a home in the city any time soon.

Like the rest of the Delta, it's not the best place for an evacuee to make a fresh start — unless you're a much-needed teacher, retiree or someone with entrepreneurial pluck.

Tallulah is poor but proud, with well-kept yards abutting trailers and shotgun houses. Walnut Bayou and warm brick facades are welcoming. The town motto is painted on the water tower: "Tallulah: A City on the Move."

"We have hopes and dreams like everybody else," says Police Chief Earl Pinkney, who grew up in the Louisiana town. "That's what hurts, that the potential here is so great,"

Here, folks who have little themselves have given evacuees clean clothes, a bed, a hot meal, prayers, money and toiletries. Friends, relatives, churches and community organizations were often several steps ahead of the federal government and charity agencies.

"We're down home. We take people in," said Mississippi Valley State University English professor Ron Hudson, a native of Itta Bena.

The plantation legacy created a village mentality that makes those who have the least among the most generous. Here, they say, you give what you have to those who need it more.

Workers never did make much when cotton was king, but they could usually find work. But economic changes and technical advances in the farming industry since the Great Depression of the 1930s destroyed that life, and nothing has arrived to replace it.

"As agriculture declined and as machines took over, the Delta became increasingly poor," Jackson State University economics professor McKinley Alexander said. "The people who remained were either elderly or least prepared to enter the work force."

White landowners abandoned the fields — and masses of black laborers. Some blacks headed north for manufacturing jobs.

According to 2000 U.S. Census figures compiled by the Mississippi Urban Research Center at Jackson State University, at least a third of the nearly 454,000 people living in the Delta's 18 counties are below poverty level. In some counties it's 40 percent. The national average is about 12 percent.

Most of the homes here are at least 25 or 30 years old, and worth an average of $56,000 — less than half the national average home value. Thirteen of the counties are more than 50 percent black. Nationally, African-Americans' average household income is $29,423, compared to $44,867 for white Americans.

Many who fled here to escape Katrina are new to the Delta, but others are people who grew up here and moved away.

"The problem is, what's going to happen if these people choose to settle in and remain there?" Alexander said. Money from FEMA or the Red Cross could create a temporary boom in towns where evacuees have landed, he said, but that will soon run out.

Fields, who was born and raised in Lake Providence, does not like talking about the poverty there. Since becoming mayor three years ago, he has adopted the motto "New Vision, New Voices," and dreams of the day the empty landscape might be filled with industry.

But for now, "it's just like a sore," Fields said. "Poverty means you have people suffering, not being able to take care of themselves."

Brian Cain tried to get to Mississippi but only made it to the state line. For days, he slept on the levee in historic town of St. Joseph, until he walked past Wenda Fry's front yard three weeks ago.

He offered to mow her lawn, noticed she had a vacant trailer around back and asked if he could move in. She agreed.

Before long, Mayor Ed Brown noticed the slim, scrappy 46-year-old working in Fry's yard and offered him a job on the spot.

"I been working ever since," Cain says. "I do anything."

2 movies to tell opposite sides of battle

By The Associated Press

In making a movie about U.S. Marines in the battle of Iwo Jima, Clint Eastwood became concerned that he was telling only half the story.

So he made another movie.

The two films — "Flags," telling the story of six men who raised an American flag on Mount Suribachi, and the tentatively named "Lambs Before the Wind" on the Japanese side of the battle — are scheduled for simultaneous release next fall.

Eastwood had difficulty articulating to Time magazine why he took on the ambitious projects.

"I don't know — sometimes you just get a feeling about something. You have a premonition that you can get something decent out of it," he told the magazine in an interview in this week's issue. "You just have to trust your gut."

Nearly 7,000 American troops and more than 20,000 Japanese died in the battle from February to March 1945.

Mount Suribachi, a 550-foot dead volcano at the tiny, teardrop-shaped island's southern tip, was where five Marines and a Navy corpsman raised a U.S. flag on Feb. 23, 1945. The flag-raising — the second one that day on the mountain — was captured in the famous photograph by Associated Press photographer Joe Rosenthal.

Eastwood, 75, has won two best-director Oscars, for "Million Dollar Baby" and "Unforgiven."

Mean mom?

Madonna says she's the disciplinarian with 9-year-old Lourdes and 5-year-old Rocco.

The former material girl told Newsweek that she doesn't let her children watch TV or look at magazines. She says milk and ice cream are also off-limits.

"When Daddy gets home, they get chocolate," Madonna said. "I'm the disciplinarian."

She's also strict about laundry duties: If Lourdes leaves dirty clothes on the floor, "we take all of her clothes and put them in a bag, and she has to earn all of her clothes back by being tidy," Madonna said. "She wears the same outfit every day to school until she learns her lesson."

Award is sweet

Vanna White stopped by her hometown of North Myrtle Beach, S.C., Saturday to honor a local ice cream parlor for all the sweet treats dished out there.

White gave Original Painter's Homemade Ice Cream an award from the Turner South cable network program "Blue Ribbon," whose viewers voted Painter's the best ice cream in the South.

It didn't take much to get the "Wheel of Fortune" star back. She loves the ice cream, especially the maple nut, and Painter's dubs one of its concoctions the "Vanna Banana" sundae.

Co-owner Dominic Mantzanas said White acts like just another patron.

"She stays to chitchat with the customers — one of the nicest people you'd ever meet," Mantzanas said.

Admirers remember John Paul's pontificate

By The Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI praised his predecessor, John Paul II, as a beloved man whose moral authority was recognized well beyond the Catholic church, as the faithful marked the anniversary Sunday of the 1978 election of the first Polish pontiff.

Karol Wojtyla, archbishop of Krakow, Poland, was elected on Oct. 16, 1978, to lead the Roman Catholic church. The selection of the first non-Italian pontiff in 455 years stunned many around the world. John Paul's pontificate was the third longest in history.

John Paul's "moral authority was recognized as well by many non-Christians and nonbelievers, as shown by the moving demonstrations of affection during his illness and the strong condolences after his death," Benedict said in his traditional Sunday noon remarks to pilgrims and tourists in St. Peter's Square.

John Paul helped galvanize Poles at home in opposing the Communist regime that ruled their predominantly Roman Catholic country at the time of his election. He was credited with playing an important role in the demise of East bloc communism in the decade after the start of his papacy.

Fractured voices lost in winds

Last month, Community Labor United, a group formerly based in New Orleans, held a retreat in South Carolina. Since then, the group has been meeting by conference call.

The National Trust for Historic Preservation co-hosted its meeting last month with the Vieux Carre Property Owners and Residents Association, among other groups. That meeting was held in Baton Rouge.

When the Louisiana Coalition, "a nonpartisan, nonpolitical collaborative" consisting of dozens of New Orleans community groups, announced its formation last month, it planned to hold regular meetings in Baton Rouge. Earlier this month, Viking Range Corp. convened a meeting of New Orleans restaurateurs to discuss the rebuilding of our restaurant culture. The meeting was held in Greenwood, Miss., the company's corporate hometown.

On Nov. 7 and 8, ACORN will hold a community forum on rebuilding New Orleans. They too will hold it in Baton Rouge.

Divided attention

Community organizing has never been an easy business. But it's made even more difficult when the community you are organizing is spread out over a dozen states, not all of them contiguous.

And how do you get people to focus on the big picture when the insurance company hasn't been calling them back or the kids aren't comfortable in their new school, or Uncle Fred is still missing, or the blue roof people have yet to say when they'll be able to place the protective covering over your leaking home? Community groups have always operated at a disadvantage. Corporations and political parties have paid staffs whose job is to influence public policy. Millions of dollars can be at stake, and that's enough money to keep the attention of a lobbyist solidly focused on the task at hand.

But most of the time, individual citizens have a lot less at stake. While a penny here or there in tax breaks could mean millions in aggregate for a corporate taxpayer, an individual citizen might not find it worthwhile to attend all the meetings held to discuss such a measure.

Influence in doubt

The unevenness of this matchup is even more acute in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. These community groups are trying to organize when there is no community, at least not in a geographic sense. We may all have ties to pre-flood New Orleans, but we don't all live in or near its old boundaries.

In the past, even when communities organized petition drives, met with their representatives on the City Council, and solicited expert opinion in support of their positions, they usually lost their battles in the City Council chambers or the mayor's office.

How can they hope to be successful in this new environment when so much is at stake?

The truth is, it may already be too late. The mayor and the governor have already named their blue ribbon rebuilding commissions. Representatives of community-based organizations have not been given seats at the table.

Mass in St. Bernard draws 1,500 faithful

Turnout 'heartwarming' despite uncertain future

By Sandra Barbier
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

About 1,500 St. Bernard Parish residents hungry for a taste of their lost community returned Sunday morning to attend Mass celebrated by Archbishop Alfred Hughes in the blacktopped parking lot at Our Lady of Prompt Succor Catholic Church in Chalmette.

Hughes called the turnout "extraordinary and heart-warming," but residents and Hughes both said they would be cautious about returning to stay in the parish, which was inundated from end to end by Hurricane Katrina and a tidal surge that breached levees meant to protect it.

"I think the decisions on churches (in St. Bernard) are related to flood control," Hughes said following the Mass, which was concelebrated by priests and deacons of St. Bernard Parish's seven Catholic parishes.

"I think it is very important that we

Although their boats and homes were torn asunder by Hurricane Katrina, Venetian Isles residents say they want to rebuild in the subdivision that lies outside levee protection.

Although their houses are built on a thin strip of unprotected waterfront property near the Chef Menteur Pass, residents of Venetian Isles are returning to their ravaged houses and vowing to rebuild.

"I'm coming back. Most of the people are coming back," said Evelyn DaSalla, a retired club owner. "We're outside the levee, but we're safer because that water went right back out."

She and her husband, retired New Orleans police officer Clement DaSalla, said their house was the second one built on Trieste Street. "We picked this lot when it was woods," he said.

Standing in their back yard, where their broken dock snaked atop the shore, the DaSallas pointed across the water at Bayou Sauvage National Wildlife Refuge. They described an easy lifestyle of birding and fishing that made their home special.

"It's a different kind of life," she said. "It's a wonderful, wonderful place to live."

The couple are living in Ponchatoula, but said they are eager to return. "Maybe we'll be back here in a year and a half," Clement DaSalla said. "And it will be nice."

On Friday, Hurricane Katrina's elemental fury was obvious throughout the subdivision. Roofs had been sheared, siding peeled like thin rinds. Homes lay eviscerated, their interiors exposed. Boats and vehicles were stranded hundreds of feet from where they stood before the storm.

The house at 4450 Trieste was fused with another across its cul-de-sac; it had been lifted from its foundation and spun around. "Do Not Destroy" was written on its side in green spray paint.

Venetian Isles was developed in the 1960s by New Orleans East Inc., which opened its initial phase in April 1965. Built beside Chef Menteur Highway, its network of canals promised easy access to Lake Pontchartrain and the Gulf of Mexico.

It has flooded before, notably because of Hurricanes Betsy and Camille. In an Aug. 31, 1969, Times-Picayune article, the tract's developer said it received "far less damage" from Camille, when its older homes had as much as 3 feet of water. Residents said Katrina brought a surge of more

As night falls in New Orleans, homeowners and renters returning to Uptown and other neighborhoods find themselves sometimes awash in darkness while walking city streets.

Streetlights work on one block, but not another. Only light from the moon and stars illuminates some shadowy corridors of five or more blocks — a state of affairs that will persist a bit longer.

Entergy does not intend to repair city streetlights until it completes an assessment of damage to the lights in Algiers and the six east bank ZIP codes taking the lead in Mayor Ray Nagin's repopulation plan, said Amy Stallings, a spokeswoman for the energy company.

The report on Algiers should be finished in a week, and the one on the six ZIP codes should be completed in two weeks, she said.

The city, which pays Entergy to maintain its 53,000 streetlights, then will decide which repairs will occur first, Stallings said. Toppled light poles, broken fixtures and severed wires are

St. Charles official urges study of levee

Despite dodging Katrina bullet, parish still at risk

By Jenny Hurwitz
River Parishes bureau

St. Charles Parish residents have faced myriad changes since Hurricane Katrina slammed the metro area. But Emergency Operations Director Tab Troxler contends that at least one aspect of parish life has remained constant.

Pre-Katrina, the parish faced a high risk of devastating flooding if hit by a slow-moving Category 2 storm, Troxler said. And now, post-Katrina, parish residents face that exact same risk.

"Nothing has really changed," Troxler said of the parish's vulnerability. "I just know now that I have a platform to express this."

In the face of this possibility, and in the wake of the devastation brought on by Katrina that crippled other parishes in the region, officials are considering embarking on a surveying study to determine levee elevations parishwide. It comes as part of what emergency workers deem a necessary first step to creating a disaster-resistant community, Troxler said.

Troxler began pushing for the survey after attending a meeting with officials from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration in Washington, D.C., earlier this week, where he learned that the agency is looking to update its storm surge and hurricane models.

As part of that update, the parish must provide recent elevation information to NOAA.

The last time the parish completed a comprehensive elevation survey was in 1995, as part of a drainage study for both the east and west banks.

That drainage study, which began in 1991, spanned four years and cost about $2 million, whereas a survey assessing the elevation of levees throughout the parish could take four to six months and cost up to $250,000, Troxler estimated.

The east bank's hurricane levee can withstand up to a 6-foot storm surge, caused by a tropical storm or a Category 1 hurricane, Troxler said. The levee, which still is under construction, eventually will be able to weather up to a Category 2 hurricane, he said. The parish's west bank, which does not have a hurricane levee in place, could withstand tropical storm conditions only, Troxler said. Parish President Albert Laque said he is contacting potential contractors and assessing costs. He hopes to bring a proposal before the council within the next few weeks, he said.

Since the start of hurricane season, Troxler has been warning parish officials that a slow-moving Category 2 hurricane could inflict considerable damage, flooding homes on both banks with 5 to 10 feet of water.

"Many people are saying, 'Could our parish look like St. Bernard?' " Troxler said. "And I'm saying, 'Yes.' "

Since 1995, when the drainage study was completed, the parish's elevation has changed drastically, thanks to coastal erosion. Now, scientists estimate that parts of the parish are sinking as much as a ¼-inch to an inch annually, with rates of sinkage varying throughout the parish, Troxler said.

Troxler pointed to one specific area, at the corner of Lakewood Drive and U.S. 90 in Luling, which was measured last year at 2.3 feet above sea level. Since 1995, that area has sunk about 5 inches, he said.

However, he cautioned that all homeowners across the parish should be concerned about the subsiding elevations, not just those living in certain neighborhoods. "The message should never be that living in Destrehan is safer than living in Luling," he said. "We're all in the same boat."

According to Troxler, a footprint detailing the range in elevations throughout the parish could help in the planning and development of future infrastructure, forcing officials to create a better network of storm-resistant shelters or multipurpose structures, built on higher ground, that could double as emergency operation units and withstand Category 4 or 5 conditions.

A study also would provide scientific proof of the risk facing residents, encouraging them to build their homes higher and to retrofit existing structures for greater protection, he said.

Unfortunately, Troxler said, it's difficult to rally support for such surveys because people are willing to pay for only programs that deliver immediate results.

The process of updating the parish's resistance against hurricanes will be a long, multiphased effort that will not happen overnight, he said.

But, he argued, with public support, it could be possible to build a community that is more resilient and does not face the constant risk of flooding.

"An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," Troxler said. "Hopefully, these (recent) storms will be a catalyst for that."

Two drivers killed in Tammany collisions

No citations issued in weekend crashes

From staff reports

Two people died in separate weekend collisions in St. Tammany Parish, State Police said.

Alvin Meliet, 50, of 485 Laura Drive North, Mandeville, died Sunday at 4:23 a.m. at Louisiana Heart Hospital after the four-door 2002 Honda he was driving rear-ended an eighteen-wheeler on Interstate 12 near Airport Road in Slidell.

Meliet's car struck the tractor-trailer, driven by Terry L. Hoyt of Clinton, and went out of control, spinning counter-clockwise onto the median. The car came to rest facing south, police said. Both vehicles were traveling eastbound about 2 a.m., when the crash happened.

Both drivers were wearing seat belts, police said. The tractor-trailer driver had not been cited Sunday night, police said.

On Saturday about 5:30 p.m., Derrick S. Sandifer, 27, of Franklinton, died at LSU Medical Center at Bogalusa, during surgery after he was injured in a three-vehicle crash on Louisiana 16, west of Louisiana 21, near Sun, police said.

The right tires of an eastbound 2005 Ford Power work truck driven by Steven Bailey, 25, of Granbury, Texas, went off the road while he was negotiating a curve. He abruptly steered the truck onto the highway and sideswiped the rear of a 1992 GMC pickup driven by Celeste Tufts, 23, of Mount Hermon, which was traveling in the opposite direction, police said.

Meanwhile, a 1994 Toyota, driven by Sandifer, also traveling in the opposite direction, veered left to avoid the Ford but hit it head-on, police said. Mike Carroll, 25, of Mount Hermon, a passenger in the Toyota, was taken to Lakeview Hospital in Covington for serious injury. Bailey told police that Sandifer struck his vehicle while Sandifer was trying to pass the GMC, investigators said.

Sandifer was not wearing a seat belt, but the other drivers were, police said.

No citations were issued, pending investigation by Trooper Huey Galmiche.

Pedestrian hit by police car

From staff reports

A pedestrian was seriously injured Sunday morning in LaPlace when he was struck by a State Police car driven by a visiting officer, State Police said.

About 5:40 a.m., the unidentified man was crossing U.S. 51 from west to east, in the middle of the block just north of Woodland Place, when he was hit by a marked car driven by Trooper Jeff Cupples. Cupples was on his way from his temporary home in LaPlace to New Orleans to work with the antilooting task force, said Trooper Omar Landrum, police spokesman.

The pedestrian, who received head and internal injuries and a broken right thigh, was taken to River Parishes Hospital in LaPlace, police said. Cupples is from Troop G in Bossier City.

Speed and alcohol were not factors in the crash, which is being investigated by Trooper Greg Marchand. No citations are pending, Landrum said.

encourage people to come back when it's safe," Hughes said. "There's obviously a desire to rebuild, but we want to make sure as we move into the next hurricane season that people are not in peril."

Hughes' sentiments were echoed by Meraux resident Ronnie Blanchard, who with his wife, Lisa, and youngest daughter, Raeanna, attended the service. The Blanchards had evacuated to Baton Rouge, but just moved into an apartment in Metairie.

Asked if they will return, Ronnie Blanchard said, "We're undecided at this time, because of the speculation of whether or not the parish is going to improve the levee system.

"I'm very concerned that the future storms that are increasing in velocity will once again overrun us, and all of the rebuilding that we do with hundreds of thousands of dollars that we put back in our lives . . . will be taken away," he said.

Except for the momentary roar of a gray helicopter flying overhead and the brief hum of the generator of a nearby work vehicle, most of the Mass was held against a backdrop of sunlit silence. In his sermon, Hughes contemplated the tremendous losses, but he warned listeners that no loss is as great as the loss of heaven. And, he asked the crowd to consider the good that could come from the devastation, such as a simpler, less materialistic lifestyle, and more cooperation between church and state and among people of differing ethnic backgrounds.

Archbishop Alfred Hughes celebrates Mass on Sunday in Chalmette. St. Bernard Parish Councilman Craig Taffaro thanked Hughes for 'starting the spiritual birth of St. Bernard.'

The service began with a guest choir from St. Mark Catholic Church in Gonzales and the congregation together singing, "Amazing Grace." After the Mass, Federal Emergency Management Agency contractors from the parish emergency base at the Port of St. Bernard served chicken salad and slices of pie. St. Bernard Parish Councilman Craig Taffaro thanked Hughes for "starting the spiritual birth of St. Bernard." Another council member, Mark Madary, said he hoped the service was for people "to say hello, not goodbye."

But Madary sympathized with elderly residents who experienced the flooding in Hurricane Betsy decades ago, and now Katrina. He also railed against FEMA for refusing to provide trailers for temporary housing in the parish until electricity, water and sewers are restored.

Madary said the parish is ready to supply electricity to trailers on residents' lots.

"We have electricity overhead," and 2,000 temporary poles on order to hook up the trailers, he said.

"Whatever roadblock FEMA wants to throw up, parish government is going to take down. Even if it means stationing water in tanks along the street . . . so people can come back, we'll do it," he said.

Our Lady of Prompt Succor's pastor, the Rev. Danilo Digal, said the crowd was "a very powerful sign the church is still alive in St. Bernard." Digal predicted residents will return, even if it takes three or four years.

Masses will continue to be held each Sunday at 11 a.m. on the playground at Our Lady of Prompt Succor, with the priests of each church parish taking turns, Danilo said. Mass also will be celebrated every Sunday at 11 a.m. at Assumption Church in Braithwaite in Plaquemines Parish.

First Bank & Trust was among the first locally owned and managed banks to have the majority of its branch offices back up and operational after Hurricane Katrina.

That's the word from Vice President Stephen Dickey, who says, "In Hurricane Katrina's aftermath," says Dickey, "First Bank was also able to open its doors to other banks that had no place to service its customers."

First Bank's offices in Harvey, Elmwood, Algiers, Metairie Road and Baton Rouge are doing full-service business now, and the branches in Kenner and the CBD are being repaired.

Plus: First Bank has introduced a competitively priced Certificate of Deposit, from which all proceeds will be "dedicated to offering loans to small business owners in the area, assisting in the rebuilding effort," says Dickey. The "Katrina Recovery CD" is advertised at a current three-year interest rate of 4.25 percent.

First Bank has also sponsored standing-room-only seminars in conjunction with the Small Business Administration, designed to help business owners jump-start their return to the New Orleans area. More info: 586-2620.

Bergeron revives

Bergeron Chrysler Jeep and Bergeron Volvo at 3525 Veterans in Metairie suffered "more than a million dollars in damage to our dealership and inventory," says dealer Denis Bergeron III.

The staff was able to move nearly the entire fleet of vehicles from the acreage and showroom prior to Katrina's arrival, but many of those cars, vans and trucks were damaged by wind-blown debris. No flood waters went through the dealership, says Bergeron, but serious roof damage wrecked much of the dealership's showroom and service buildings.

"This was the biggest hit we took in 40 years," says Bergeron.

Bergeron, however, is now fully operational at the same location, operating from offices in trailers on the adjacent pre-owned lot.

Bergeron says he sees "a daunting challenge ahead. We've lost entire zip codes of customers. But we're selling cars. We're all in this together, and this dealership is here to help." More: 888-2131.

Heart Hospital

Louisiana Heart Hospital (LHH) on Louisiana Highway 434, just north of I-12 at exit 74 on the north shore, is hiring displaced health care professionals from other facilities in the New Orleans and north shore areas and the Mississippi Gulf Coast. LHH is also offering office space to physicians who lost their offices to Katrina.

LHH, which remained open during the storm and its aftermath, suffered only minor damage. The day after Katrina hit, hospital doctors even performed open-heart surgery. For three weeks after the storm, community leaders and other officials met daily at the hospital to coordinate recovery.

"We just completed the orientation process for 40 new hires from other facilities, and we are looking to hire more," said Chris Coffey, vice president of Business Development.

LHH has also made 7,200 square feet of professional space available on an intermediate or long-term basis to doctors, while physicians in the adjacent medical building have also made room for colleagues.

than 10 feet.

But some houses were spared significant damage from Katrina. Marion Britsch's home at the end of San Remo Drive, built on piers, is 18 feet above sea level, she said. "We were high and dry," she said from her porch. "My bedrooms look like the day I left them."

The roof and a few windows were damaged, but she said parts of the house were OK. Her husband and son were busy fixing it Friday, and an electrician had made repairs. "We need power, and we need water," she said.

The Britsches are staying in Slidell in a trailer, but they plan to return. "Definitely we're coming back," she said. "Most of the people here are ready to come back. I know of no one that has just walked away."

She attended an Oct. 5 funeral in Baton Rouge for the Rev. Arthur "Red" Ginart, pastor of the nearby St. Nicholas of Myra Church, who died in the hurricane. She said it was well-attended by Venetian Isles residents, and everyone she spoke to planned to return.

Harry Bode, a contractor, returned to his house on Florence Street on Friday to meet insurance adjusters. The gabled roof of his two-story wood-frame house had been ripped away. "I feel fortunate," he said. "At least I had something to come back to."

Cars and boats alike were tossed like toys when Hurricane Katrina hit Venetian Isles in eastern New Orleans.

Bode, whose family lived in the house only three months, said they would like to return, but it probably won't happen soon. "We love it out here, but not right now," he said.

Others also were circumspect, saying they will wait to see what their insurance claims yield. "I'm in kind of a limbo state," said Jay Gibson, who was cleaning up his Trieste Street home with his mother, Esther Gibson. "You've just got to take it one day at a time."

Gibson was concerned about his insurance coverage. He was dealing with separate adjusters, and he said his flood claim was OK, but he was uncertain about his homeowners claim. Other residents had similar concerns — they said flood policies were being honored, but homeowners claims were being resisted.

Vera Sue Smith, who rode out the storm with her husband, James P. Smith, in their brick home on San Marco Drive, said she doesn't know whether they can rebuild. She was concerned her insurance payment would be capped at $250,000, which would not be enough, she said.

"We don't know whether they're going to allow us to" rebuild, she said, referring to the possibility of new building regulations or mandatory insurance compliance rules. "We're going to do something, but at this point, my hands are tied."

2 homes destroyed by fire

Treme blaze damages 2 other homes

By Bob Ussery
Staff writer

The cause of a three-alarm fire that collapsed two Treme residences into piles of flaming rubble and partially burned two other houses is under investigation by New Orleans firefighters.

When firefighters were dispatched to the 800 block of North Johnson Street on Saturday at 8:27 p.m., a two-story home on the lake side was engulfed in flames shooting 12 to 15 feet into the street, District Chief Gary Haydel said. That residence collapsed first.

Meanwhile, to the Dumaine Street side of the first home, an unoccupied one-story residence at 831 N. Johnson also was burning. Firefighters kept that building from burning completely.

The first firefighters on the scene also could see flames spreading to the two-story home on the other side of the first building. That house burned and collapsed, but firefighters kept flames from taking another home, at 811 N. Johnson.

Haydel said radiant heat set fire to a pile of debris across from 831 N. Johnson. And an hour after the fire broke out, a cottage at 818 N. Johnson began to smoke, also across from the fire. Firefighters burst into the apparently vacant home and kept it from burning. Haydel said radiant heat or embers could have set that house to smoldering.

Haydel said the block appeared to be devoid of residents except for one person on the porch of another residence across from the fire. There were no spectators.

"Usually there are all kinds of people at a fire like this," Fire Superintendent Charles Parent said at the scene.

Electrical service on the block was still out in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

Fire officials could not immediately tell if there was anyone in the collapsed homes.

Chief Norman Woodridge said 40 firefighters fought the fire. Fire hydrants were working and there was no problem with low water pressure.

The city lost service on Aug. 29. Utility crews began restoring power Sept. 4 at the Crescent City Connection and the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center. All of Algiers had electrical power Saturday, and restoration of service to the east bank ZIP codes at the heart of the mayor's rebuilding effort — 70115, 70116, 70118, 70112, 70113 and 70130 — were "substantially complete," she said.

Meanwhile, "we continue to do work to restore power to other more severely damaged areas of the city," Stallings said.

Fats Domino's home, mementos wrecked

By the Associated Press

Visiting his home for the first time since he was rescued from rising floodwater in a boat, Fats Domino found his piano overturned among mud and debris and his house in ruins.

Despite the destruction, the 77-year-old musician found a few bright spots during the tour with WWL-TV: a favorite shirt that survived unblemished and a bust that made it through the storm unbroken.

But those were the exceptions. More common were his electric keyboard, sitting against a wall covered in dried mud, mildew and mold, and his white grand piano overturned, broken and stained with the filth that flowed into the Lower 9th Ward along with the floodwater.

The water reached well over eight feet, brushing the bottoms of chandeliers inside the home.

Domino's fate was not known for several days after the Hurricane Katrina-spawned floods hit the low-lying neighborhood. He was rescued in a boat along with other family members from an upper-floor balcony.

The side of the balcony was spray-painted with a premature farewell when it was feared Domino had not survived. "R.I.P. Fats. You will be missed." Below that were spray-painted messages from authorities who searched Domino's and others' homes for bodies after the flooding receded.

DECLARATION OF EMERGENCY

Department of Environmental Quality
Office of the Secretary

8-Hour Ambient Ozone Standard and Nonattainment New Source Review
(LAC 33:III.11.504, 607, 711, 2201, and 2202) (AQ253E1)

In accordance with the emergency provisions of R.S. 49:953(B) of the Administrative Procedure Act, which allows the Department of Environmental Quality to use emergency procedures to establish rules, and under the authority of R.S. 30:2011, the secretary of the department hereby finds that imminent peril to the public welfare exists and declares that an emergency action is necessary to implement rules concerning the revised primary and secondary National Ambient Air Quality Standards (NAAQS) for ozone and transitional provisions for nonattainment new source review under the revised standard.

This is a renewal of Emergency Rule AQ253E, which was effective on June 15, 2005, and published in the Louisiana Register on June 20, 2005. The department is drafting a rule to promulgate these regulation changes.

On April 30, 2004, EPA enacted 8-hour ozone NAAQS classifications, effective June 15, 2004 (69 FR 23858). The revised 8-hour NAAQS is more protective than the existing 1-hour ozone NAAQS. In order to transition from the existing 1-hour standard to the new 8-hour standard, EPA adopted a rule for implementation of the 8-hour ozone NAAQS-Phase 1 (the 'Phase 1 Implementation Rule') on April 30, 2004 (69 FR 23951). In the Phase 1 Implementation Rule, EPA revoked the 1-hour standard in full, including the associated designations and classifications, effective on June 15, 2005.

Litigation by a number of stakeholders pending in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit challenged various aspects of the Phase 1 Implementation Rule, resulting in EPA's agreement to reconsider several portions of the rule through renewed notice and public comment. EPA only recently made final decisions on reconsideration, thus clearing the way for effectiveness of the Phase 1 Implementation Rule (70 FR 30592, May 26, 2005). As a result, Louisiana is required to adopt the 8-hour revised standard and measures to implement such standard. This Emergency Rule is necessary to address two of the most immediate aspects of implementation: 1) revision of LAC 33:III.711 to replace the 1-hour primary ambient air quality standard with the 8-hour standard; and 2) revision of nonattainment new source review provisions for parishes that were reclassified from severe under the 1-hour standard to marginal under the 8-hour standard (parishes of Ascension, East Baton Rouge, Iberville, Livingston, and West Baton Rouge). Because such parishes are still in nonattainment and because EPA has not yet developed guidance for nonattainment new source review under the 8-hour standard, the department is adopting measures to ensure that these parishes continue to make progress toward attainment while still accommodating growth. Regulatory changes will also delete references to the 1-hour standard and substitute the 8-hour standard, and take other actions to transition to the 8-hour standard. The attainment date for the Baton Rouge area under the 8-hour standard is June 15, 2007. Failure to adopt this rule on an emergency basis (i.e., without the delays for public notice and comment) would result in imminent peril to the public welfare as the department would not have the authority to enforce the 8-hour standard.

This Emergency Rule is effective on October 13, 2005, and shall remain in effect for a maximum of 120 days or until a final rule is promulgated, whichever occurs first. For more information concerning AQ253E1, you may contact the Regulation Development Section at (225) 219-3550.

This Emergency Rule is available on the Internet at www.deq.louisiana.gov under Rules and Regulations, and is available for inspection at the following DEQ office locations from 8 a.m. until 4:30 p.m.: 602 N. Fifth Street, Baton Rouge, LA 70802; 1823 Highway 546, West Monroe, LA 71292; State Office Building, 1525 Fairfield Avenue, Shreveport, LA 71101; 1301 Gadwall Street, Lake Charles, LA 70615; 111 New Center Drive, Lafayette, LA 70508; 110 Barataria Street, Lockport, LA 70374.

Office of the Secretary

Expedited Penalty Agreement
(LAC 33:I.801, 803, 805, and 807) (OS054E6)

In accordance with the emergency provisions of R.S. 49:953(B) of the Administrative Procedure Act, which allow the Department of Environmental Quality to use emergency procedures to establish rules, and of R.S. 30:2011 and 2074, which allow the department to establish standards, guidelines, and criteria, to promulgate rules and regulations, and to issue compliance schedules, the secretary of the department hereby declares that an emergency action is necessary in order to implement expedited penalty agreements.

This is a renewal of Emergency Rule OS054E5, which was effective on June 10, 2005, and published in the Louisiana Register on June 20, 2005. This version of the Emergency Rule adds a new Stage II Vapor Recovery violation and edits the violations to LAC 33:III.2132.F, adds new Underground Storage Tank (UST) violations and penalty amounts for LAC 33:XI.711 and 905, and updates the UST citations. The Emergency Rule will abate the delay in correcting minor and moderate violations of the Environmental Quality Act. Delays in enforcement reduce the effectiveness of the action, unnecessarily utilize resources, and slow down the enforcement process. In the past three years alone, the Enforcement Division has received 8,139 referrals and has issued 4,259 actions. Currently strained budget and resource issues pose imminent impairment to addressing minor and moderate violations. This Rule will provide an alternative penalty assessment mechanism that the department may utilize, at its discretion, to expedite penalty agreements in appropriate cases. The report to the Governor by the Advisory Task Force on Funding and Efficiency of the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality recommended this action as a pilot program. The legislature approved the report and passed Act 1196 in the 2003 Regular Session allowing the department to promulgate rules for the program. This Emergency Rule allows the operation of the pilot program to commence immediately, without the delay and inflexibility of a permanent rule. It will also allow the department to gather information to formulate a long-term rule and to evaluate the environmental and public health benefits and the social and economic costs of such a program in order to justify these requirements for the permanent rule.

This Emergency Rule is effective on October 8, 2005, and shall remain in effect for a maximum of 120 days or until a final rule is promulgated, whichever occurs first. For more information concerning OS054E6 you may contact the Regulation Development Section at (225) 219-3550.

This Emergency Rule is available on the Internet at www.deq.louisiana.gov under Rules and Regulations, and is available for inspection at the following DEQ office locations from 8 a.m. until 4:30 p.m.: 602 N. Mercury-Containing Devices and Electronics as Universal Wastes
(LAC 33:V.109, 305, 1501, 2201, 3801, 3806, 3810, 3813, 3821, 3823, 3841, 3843, 3845, 3855, 3877, 4301, and 4911) (HW088E)

In accordance with the emergency provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act, R.S. 49:953(B), which allows the Department of Environmental Quality to use emergency procedures to establish rules, and under the authority of R.S. 30:2011, the secretary of the department hereby declares that an emergency action is necessary in order to implement rules to add mercury-containing devices and electronics, including cathode ray tubes (CRTs), destined for recycling as universal wastes.

Under the Emergency Rule, metallic mercury must be recovered, recycled, reused, or sequestered, and not incinerated, landfilled, or released in any way; electronics, including CRTs, must be sent for dismantling and recovery of components, in any way that prevents releases to the environment. Large amounts of debris and waste must be disposed of as a result of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. It is desirable to divert as many electronics and mercury-containing devices as possible away from disposal sites. By including these wastes as universal wastes, the opportunity exists to divert these items for recycling, thereby improving the environment and simplifying recovery. The department has proposed a rule to promulgate these regulation changes.

This Emergency Rule is effective on October 3, 2005, and shall remain in effect for a maximum of 120 days or until a final rule is promulgated, whichever occurs first. For more information concerning HW088E you may contact the Regulation Development Section at (225) 219-3550.

ORLEANS PARISH COMMUNICATION DISTRICT
DECLARATION OF PUBLIC EMERGENCY
HURRICANES KATRINA AND RITA

WHEREAS, Hurricane Katrina struck the southeastern part of the state of Louisiana and Hurricane Rita struck the southwestern part of the state causing severe flooding and damage, which has threatened the safety, health and security of the citizens of the state of Louisiana, along with private property and public facilities;

WHEREAS, Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath, and Hurricane Rita caused severe flooding and damage in the City of New Orleans and rendered the 911 Emergency Telephone System inoperable, requiring temporary facilities to continue the vital work of the 911 Emergency Telephone System as administered by the Orleans Parish Communication District, a political subdivision of the State of Louisiana created by Act 155 of the Louisiana Legislature in 1982;

WHEREAS temporary communications facilities are urgently needed on the City Park Avenue site in the City of New Orleans, which site is currently leased by the Orleans Parish Communication District and is the intended location of a permanent communications facility;

WHEREAS the urgent need for a temporary communications facility will not admit to the formalities of compliance with R.S. 38:2212;

WHEREAS due to Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath, and Hurricane Rita, the calling of a meeting of the Board of Commissioners of the Orleans Parish Communication District impractical due to the pressing duties of the Commissioners;

WHEREAS the Commissioners of the Orleans Parish Communication District have been polled and agree that this Resolution is necessary to preserve the lives and property of the citizens of the City of New Orleans;

NOW THEREFORE I, DAN GILBERT, Deputy Director of the Orleans Parish Communication District, under the authority of R.S. 38:2212 D.(1)(a) do hereby declare that an emergency exists as defined in R.S. 38:2212 A.(6)(a) and publish this notice in compliance with R.S. 38:2212 D.(1)(a).

This ad is published to enable the public, appropriate government, organizations, and persons engaged inexcavation-related activities to recognize a hazardous liquid pipeline leak, to report it to the operator or the fire, police, or other appropriate public officials.

Indications of a leak might include: 1) A strange or unusual odor in the vicinity of a pipeline 2) A hissing or roaring sound (caused by natural gas or product escaping from a pipeline) 3) Flames originating from an opening in the ground or 4) The boil effect of bubbles escaping from the surface of a water body.

If you become aware of a pipeline leak, 1) LEAVE THE AREA IMMEDIATELY, 2) Avoid driving near escaping gas, 3) Avoid direct contact with the escaping gas or liquids, 4)Avoid creating sparks or sources of heat which could cause the natural gas to ignite and burn. If you find yourself in a suspected gaseous area, do not light a match, start an engine, or even switch on an electric light. 5) Notify the pipeline operator and/or the local police department as soon as you reach a safe area. Call collect. Give your name, a description of the leak and its location. If you do not know who the pipeline operator is, call your local fire police, or sheriff's department, or the state police. Advise them of the nature and location of the emergency.

If you see someone digging near a pipeline or doing other construction work, or if you plan to do such work near a pipeline yourself, please call the telephone number shown on the pipeline sign and let the pipeline company know so damage can be avoided. ## YOUR OPINIONS

Close front doors when storm comes knocking

Approximately 30 years ago there was a plan put together by the Army Corps of Engineers that, had it been implemented, would have substantially mitigated the destruction caused by the storm surge on both the south and north shores of Lake Pontchartrain.

The plan was to put gates (with levees) at the passes from the Gulf of Mexico into the lake. That would have been at the Rigolets and at the Chef Menteur passes.

The gates would have been open at all times except upon the approach of a hurricane.

The structures would interrupt the push of water from the Gulf into the lake. Flooding might still occur but at a greatly reduced level. In a lower category hurricane, house flooding may not even happen.

The Corps took this project seriously. It was killed because some people thought that the project would result in a "dead lake," i.e., a lake with no sea life in it.

I am not criticizing those people. They may have been right. But, I know that this is why the project was killed because one of the leaders of the opposition told me the story himself. And, about three weeks before I left office as mayor of Slidell, someone at the Corps of Engineers confirmed the story to me.

But, three decades or more have passed. Improved technology or design may eliminate potential damage to the lake.

It is time to reconsider this project.

The levees can be repaired, strengthened and doubled in height. But, if the "front door" is left open, the Gulf waters will continue to be a battering ram pushing Lake Pontchartrain into the city and onto the north shore.

Casinos mean quick revenue

Businesses will relocate here only when it makes business sense to do so. In the meantime we should not discount Mayor Ray Nagin's proposal to allow hotel-casinos to develop in the area.

Hotel-casinos are a business that could show immediate profits and become a large draw to tourists all over the United States.

New Orleans will always be different from Las Vegas or Atlantic City. Hotel-casinos would just be an added spice.

Bringing hotel-gaming to the city will give us a starting point. Gaming-hotels could provide immediate jobs. Those jobs could provide immediate demand for homes to be rebuilt, neighborhoods to redevelop, schools to be rebuilt and even churches to provide spiritual guidance to the return of old and the influx of new people.

Hotel-casinos turned desert sand into gold in Las Vegas and a sleepy Mississippi Gulf Coast into a money engine providing the state of Mississippi with a large percentage of its income. Atlantic City, for all the denigrating reports one may hear, has in truth seen a great deal of growth in jobs, tourism and public infrastructure directly related to hotel-gaming.

We will always have the unique New Orleans flavor, but right now we need immediate help, right now we need action. We really need to give the mayor's proposal immediate and serious consideration before allowing our good neighbor to the east to eat the whole pie before we even get to the kitchen table.

Jefferson Parish residents began to clean up Sept. 5, the first day they were allowed back into their homes after Hurricane Katrina. Martha Grinstead, left, and her son, Carl Moten, returned to her home in Lincolnshire in Marrero and found a watery mess inside.

Dumping on Jeff president

Re: "His conscience is clear but name is mud," Other Opinions, Oct. 12.

I strongly disagree with the column by James Gill. What rubbish it is to think Aaron Broussard is not worthy of having his name adorn parish property.

One must not forget a man of Broussard's talents. I propose naming the landfill for all the trash and debris from Hurricane Katrina the "Aaron Broussard Center." I am sure many residents will offer to pay for the Broussard sign.

So no more trash talking — Broussard is worthy of this honor.

Give evacuees brooms, shovels

I question the logic and am repulsed by the arrogance of those who question the right to work of certain ethic groups, namely our Latin American neighbors who are currently employed in the clean-up of metropolitan New Orleans.

The clean-up crews in New Orleans are housed and fed and paid to perform needed services that the residents either won't or can't perform. How did the Mexicans and Hondurans get here? Certainly not with FEMA checks. The evacuees in shelters around the country have not been detained. They have been welcomed with open arms; they have been fed, clothed and received thousands of FEMA dollars to spend as they choose. But they have not chosen to buy a bus ticket or a plane ticket or made any effort to return so they can help rebuild their community.

If Mayor Ray Nagin is concerned about the 3,000 city employees who must be let go, give them a broom and shovel and put them to work. Why not start a campaign to get to work?

Make New Orleans great

I am a third-generation New Orleanian. I love New Orleans and hope to raise my family here.

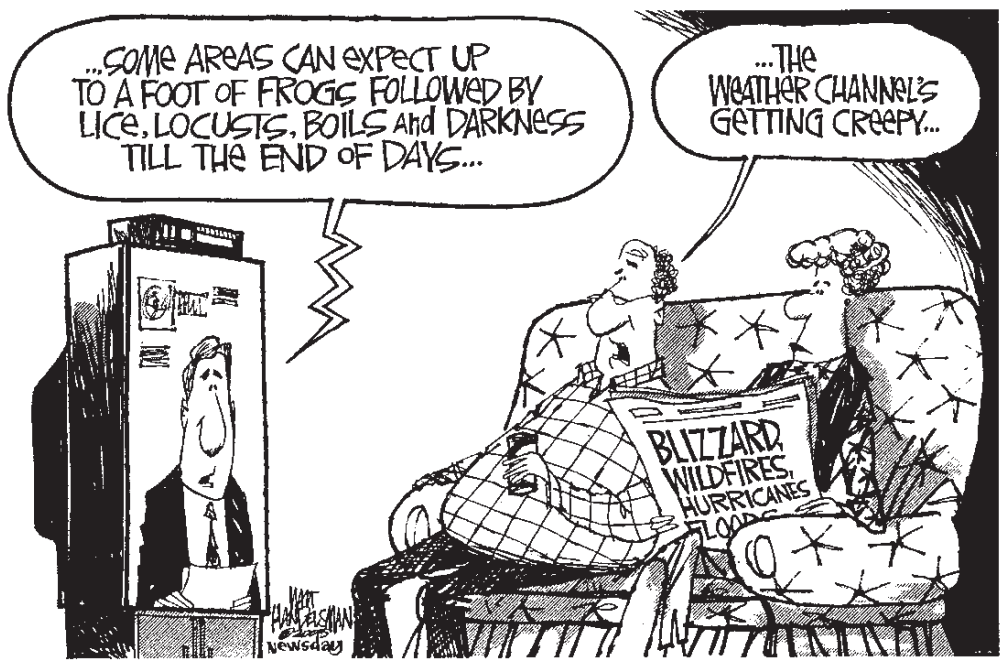
However, since Hurricane Katrina came to town and the levees broke, I am left asking myself many questions.

The mayor has been given a golden opportunity to make New Orleans a bigger, better and cleaner city. But the news I read makes me sad, very sad. I am left to wonder, what is the mayor's plan? Does he have one or does he just pull ideas out of a hat? Does he think things through?

Now is the time to clean house, to make a new start. We must ask the citizens of the city to help. Many are already there. We shouldn't criticize those from outside ("the Mexican work force") who have come to help.

We should focus on the big picture. Reach out to businesses, large and small. Talk to the council men and women. Ask them what their constituents are feeling, or just ask the citizens. Hold town meetings.

Let's consolidate the school system. Make sure all public school teachers are certified. Have a real litter campaign, have it start at home.



Now is the time to make New Orleans great. Please don't let us down, again.

OUR OPINIONS

Preserving the city's character

New Orleans is steeped in history, and its buildings tell the story of almost 300 years of life along the lower Mississippi River.

Greek revival mansions, Creole cottages, high-ceilinged shotguns and Arts and Crafts bungalows all evoke a particular time and style. This place has more architecturally and historically significant houses than almost any U.S. city.

As New Orleanians move into the reconstruction phase of life after Katrina, it is crucial to salvage as many of those historically valuable buildings as possible. In that light, the proclamation issued by Mayor Ray Nagin to suspend the authority of city agencies that are supposed to sign off on demolitions of historic buildings is disturbing.

The mayor apparently has not signed the proclamation to bypass the Historic District Landmarks Commission, its Central Business counterpart and the Housing Conservation District Review Committee, and he shouldn't. Such a move would be bad policy, and there is no reason to take such a drastic step.

The city has the power to tear down buildings that are in imminent danger of collapse without going through a review process. Inspectors can determine which buildings are about to fall down and are therefore a hazard to the public. If a historic building is not in danger of crashing in on itself, it shouldn't be demolished without going through a review process.

There may well be ways to streamline that process, and the HDLC seems to be trying to do just that in the aftermath of Katrina. It ought to be a fairly simple matter to tell which buildings are barely standing and which are banged up but salvageable.

With the city making deep cuts in staffing, the HDLC, Vieux Carre Commission and other oversight agencies may find it more difficult to do their jobs, and the city should make every effort to ensure that inspectors and other essential staff are available.

Greg Meffert, the Nagin aide who oversees the City Planning Commission and the Historic District Landmarks Commission, promised last week that the HDLC will have "an active, vibrant role" in what the city does in historic neighborhoods.

Mr. Meffert's assurances aren't sufficient, though. He had no background in planning or historic preservation when he was put in charge of those departments, and the administration did not make preservation a high priority before the hurricane.

Fortunately, many of the city's older buildings survived the storm in decent shape, a testament to the strength of their design and craftsmanship. Even in areas of the city that took a beating from Katrina, many historic buildings can and should be restored. New Orleans had a dearth of affordable housing before the storm. As people return to a city with so many houses in shambles, finding a place to live will be a challenge.

Some houses — maybe many houses — will have to be bulldozed in the coming months. Where historic buildings can be saved, though, there should be every effort to do so.

If we knock them down willy-nilly, New Orleans won't look like New Orleans anymore.

People first

The number of Hurricane Katrina evacuees living in temporary shelters has steadily declined in recent weeks, but not everyone has worked out stable housing arrangements. Far from it.

Hundreds of thousands are still living in hotel rooms. Some people who've left large shelters, such as Baton Rouge's River Center, have merely moved into smaller shelters. Meanwhile, the Federal Emergency Management Agency and state officials are focusing on putting people in temporary trailers. But that process is slow. And the result could be anything but desirable, if thousands of evacuees end up marooned in makeshift trailer villages in isolated parts of Louisiana.

The first priority should be to do what's best for individual evacuees — to help them move into homes near jobs. In a great many cases, that would mean helping evacuees find private apartments. Even if those units are located out of state.

In some cases, evacuees could be placed in temporary trailers located near work sites or their former homes. But when that's not possible, people should not be forced into so-called "FEMA villages" in out-of-the-way locales. One such camp has already been established in Baker, and more are likely on the way.

In difficult circumstances, temporary trailer villages may be the best option. Kenner wants to house essential employees temporarily on vacant land near Louis Armstrong International Airport, and the airport itself has similar plans. Unfortunately, other temporary trailer parks could be much larger and more isolated than those set up at major employers' request.

The trailer camp that FEMA established last year in Charlotte County, Fla., shows what can go wrong. Residents moved in — temporarily, they thought — after Hurricane Charley pushed them from their homes. For those who still live there 14 months later, it's hard to find jobs and run errands, and crime is a significant problem.

So far, Gov. Kathleen Blanco's administration has insisted that returning evacuees to Louisiana should be a primary goal during the recovery process. Cynics say the Blanco administration doesn't want to send potential voters out of state. A more charitable view is that sending evacuees elsewhere might look like an admission of failure on Louisiana's part.

And in truth, New Orleans area residents tend to have an intense attachment to home and deserve the opportunity to return. Some metro area employers are already complaining about the difficulty of finding workers, and seeking those jobs ought to be an option for evacuees.

Still, FEMA and the Blanco administration need to recognize that some families will have trouble gaining traction in a metro area where the housing market is in turmoil and a number of schools are out of commission. Evacuees shouldn't be kept in limbo indefinitely. Government officials should not begrudge them the right to get on with their lives.

OTHER OPINIONS

Closer look at Bush comes a little too late

PAUL KRUGMAN

George W. Bush, I once wrote, "values loyalty above expertise" and may have "a preference for advisers whose personal fortunes are almost entirely bound up with his own." And he likes to surround himself with "obsequious courtiers."

Lots of people are saying things like that these days. But those quotes are from a column published on Nov. 19, 2000.

I don't believe that I'm any better than the average person at judging other people's character. I got it right because I said those things in the context of a discussion of Bush's choice of economic advisers, a subject in which I do have some expertise.

But many people in the news media do claim, at least implicitly, to be experts at discerning character — and their judgments play a large, sometimes decisive role in our political life. The 2000 election would have ended in a chad-proof victory for Al Gore if many reporters hadn't taken a dislike to Gore, while portraying Bush as an honest, likable guy. The 2004 election was largely decided by the image of Bush as a strong, effective leader.

So it's important to ask why those judgments are often so wrong.

Right now, with the Bush administration in meltdown on multiple issues, we're hearing a lot about President Bush's personal failings. But what happened to the commanding figure of yore, the heroic leader in the war on terror? The answer, of course, is that the commanding figure never existed: Bush is the same man he always was. All the character flaws that are now fodder for late-night humor were fully visible, for those willing to see them, during the 2000 campaign.

And Bush the great leader is far from the only fictional character, bearing no resemblance to the real man, created by media images.

Read the speeches Howard Dean gave before the Iraq war, and compare them with Colin Powell's pro-war presentation to the United Nations. Knowing what we know now, it's clear that one man was judicious and realistic, while the other was spinning crazy conspiracy theories. But somehow their labels got switched in the way they were presented to the public by the news media.

Why does this happen? A large part of the answer is that the news business places great weight on "up close and personal" interviews with important people, largely because they're hard to get but also because they play well with the public. But such interviews are rarely revealing. The fact is that most people — myself included — are pretty bad at using personal impressions to judge character. Psychologists find, for example, that most people do little better than chance in distinguishing liars from truth-tellers.

More broadly, the big problem with political reporting based on character portraits is that there are no rules, no way for a reporter to be proved wrong. If a reporter tells you about the steely resolve of a politician who turns out to be ineffectual and unwilling to make hard choices, you've been misled, but not in a way that requires a formal correction.

And that makes it all too easy for coverage to be shaped by what reporters feel they can safely say, rather than what they actually think or know. Now that Bush's approval ratings are in the 30s, we're hearing about his coldness and bad temper, about how aides are afraid to tell him bad news. Does anyone think that journalists have only just discovered these personal characteristics?

Let's be frank: The Bush administration has made brilliant use of journalistic careerism. Those who wrote puff pieces about Bush and those around him have been rewarded with career-boosting access. Those who raised questions about his character found themselves under personal attack from the administration's proxies. (Yes, I'm speaking in part from experience.) Only now, with Bush in desperate trouble, has the structure of rewards shifted.

So what's the answer? Journalists who are better at judging character? Unfortunately, that's not a practical plan. After all, who judges their judgment?

What we really need is political journalism based less on perceptions of personalities and more on actual facts. Schadenfreude aside, we should not be happy that stories about Bush's boldness have given way to stories analyzing his facial tics. Think, instead, about how different the world would be today if, during the 2000 campaign, reporting had focused on the candidates' fiscal policies instead of their wardrobes. •••••••

Broussard's fate just part of the picture

DREW BROACH

Jefferson Report

AP PHOTO

President Bush walks with Lt. Gen. Russ Honore, Hurricane Katrina task force chief, and Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard, center, as Bush arrives in New Orleans Tuesday.

Before we go off recalling or indicting Aaron Broussard, as some of his constituents insist, let us step back and consider how we arrived at this point.

Jefferson Parish was created 180 years ago to provide local government for the few hardy souls who made their home in the swamps. In retrospect, we can conclude that anyone who lived here then was foolish to risk life and property against the meanderings of the Mississippi River, the tidal surges from the Gulf of Mexico and the occasional catastrophic hurricane.

But live here, and reproduce, they did. And with each successive disaster, the taxpayers here and elsewhere in the country made incremental improvements against Mother Nature. Levees now contain the river (virtually all the time). The swamps have been leveed and drained to keep Lake Pontchartrain and the Gulf of Mexico out (most of the time). Huge custom-made pumps efficiently move internal rainfall out of neighborhoods (well, some of the time).

After the 1978 flood, our political leaders went hat in hand to local taxpayers and to Congress, got some money and made more improvements. Same after the 1995 flood, which persuaded Congress to establish the Southeast Louisiana Urban Flood Control project and locals to raise property taxes.

So on Aug. 28, what did the parish president know and when did he know it?

Broussard had a Category 5 hurricane bearing down on Jefferson Parish and threatening a direct strike within 18 hours. He had levees and a drainage system that, while incrementally improved over the past 180 years at a cost of billions of dollars, provided Category 3 protection at best. He had, according to an LSU study, no buildings in which to survive a Category 4 or 5 storm.

And he had on the shelf a plan, written during his predecessor's administration, to remove all but a handful of employees, including the operators of the drainage pump stations, to safety far away, rather than subject them to death at their posts and taxpayers to ruinous lawsuits.

What happened in the next 12 hours or so, of course, is that Katrina weakened to a Category 4 or perhaps 3 and veered a bit east, largely sparing Jefferson Parish. Wind damage here turned out to be minimal. Thirty people died in Jefferson, but thousands survived, including many public employees in public buildings.

Thousands of homes in Metairie, Kenner, Terrytown and elsewhere flooded, however. Did they flood because the pump stations were left empty?

Maybe so.

Did they flood because the storm surge was higher than the discharge level of the pumps, leaving us spitting in the wind even had the pumps been staffed and running?

Maybe so.

Did they flood because the internal rainfall exceeded the capacity of the canals to remove the runoff?

Maybe so.

The answers will all come out in lawsuit, as our energy shifts from anger to analysis. In the meantime, conventional wisdom holds that Broussard is toast. But if all we do is to end one political career, the lessons of Hurricane Katrina will be lost on everyone except Broussard.

The larger lesson for those of us still living in reclaimed swamp is that Katrina was not, at least for Jefferson Parish, the Big One. For our lives and property to survive a direct hit by a Category 5 hurricane, we need not just safe houses for pump operators, but stronger, higher levees and higher discharge levels on the pumps. Katrina showed that in East Jefferson. Even Rita showed that along the Harvey Canal and in Jean Lafitte.

We're unlikely to pay for all this ourselves. So again we turn to the rest of the country, through Congress, where such projects long have been considered pork barrel.

Our challenge, then, regardless of whether we direct our anger at Broussard, is to direct our attention to making another round of incremental improvements to our protection. That will take an involved citizenry, persuasive public officials and a sympathetic Congress.

And whether we are up to this challenge is a question of far greater importance than whatever revenge we exact on Aaron Broussard.

Of faith, works and nominee Harriet Miers

CAL THOMAS

The White House and other supporters of Harriet Miers' nomination to the Supreme Court are using religion when it suits them and not using it when it doesn't.

During John Roberts' confirmation hearings for chief justice, his supporters said questions about his Catholic faith, or suggestions that there are "enough" Roman Catholics already on the bench, smacked of anti-Catholic bigotry and should be avoided. Some invoked the constitutional clause prohibiting a "religious test" for high office.

Now comes Harriet Miers, and the White House seems to be promoting her evangelical faith as a qualification. The message is that evangelical Christians and pro-lifers can trust her because she is one of them. That has not always been the case with previous nominees to high office with similar spiritual and political pedigrees.

The question is: What difference would her faith make in her job should she be confirmed?

Her friend, Texas Supreme Court Judge Nathan Hecht, was asked on Fox News Sunday (Oct. 9) how Miers could separate her faith from her work. Hecht replied it is "easy" because, "Legal issues and personal issues are just two different things. Judges do it all the time. In fact, a judge is going to take an oath that says I'm going to judge rightly in cases, which means that you have to set aside your personal views in deciding the case. And if you don't do that, you're either a bad believer in your views, a bad judge or both."

From that answer comes this question: If Harriet Miers can easily set aside her faith on the job, what is the point of nominating someone with such faith? Why not nominate someone of no faith and the question would never come up? Is faith good only for the confirmation process, but not the job?

I'm all for "people of faith" in government, but what kind of faith? Is it faith in a God who is hauled out at convenient moments and then returned to His box when He isn't needed, or is it a God who informs, converts, strengthens and directs in every area of one's life?

If Harriet Miers is "pro-life" and if she believes, as has been reported, that aborting a pre-born child is the taking of an innocent human life, why should she not be expected to favor overturning Roe v. Wade if the opportunity presents itself? Not to do so would be hypocritical.

Former New York Governor Mario Cuomo delighted his fellow liberals when he engaged in his own version of faith-works separation. Cuomo said that while he accepted the teaching of the Catholic Church that abortion is the taking of innocent human life, as governor he could not impose that view on others who do not share it. But Cuomo could, and did, enforce his church's teaching that capital punishment for convicted murderers is wrong and during his three terms as governor he used his power to bar executions.

During her confirmation hearings, Harriet Miers will be asked if she could set aside her conviction that abortion is wrong and uphold a legal doctrine created in the mind of one man, Justice Harry Blackmun, who sold it to six of his eight colleagues.

There are religions that teach life does not begin until the moment a baby takes its first breath. If an adherent to one of those faiths is ever nominated to the Supreme Court, should such a person be required to separate that "faith" from judging? Just what is being asked of Harriet Miers and what is she prepared to concede, deny or affirm?

Yes, decisions should be based on the Constitution, but according to which interpretation? Like the Bible, in which Miers believes, there are liberal and conservative interpretations. The Declaration of Independence makes four references to "our Creator," Supreme Judge," "Divine Providence" and "Nature's God." Its author, the deist Thomas Jefferson, rightly claimed that individual rights come not from man and his institutions, but from above.

Harriet Miers should not be required to deny her faith as the price of confirmation, but neither should she be allowed to hide her intent to use it, or lose it, once on the bench.

The Apostle James wrote, "Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone" (James 2:17). Will the faith of Harriet Miers die on the court, or will her works die? Inquiring minds not only want to know; we need to know before passing judgment.

Bad cops should save the excuses

Say what you want about the incident in New Orleans. Just spare me one word.

Please do not say "stress."

For those who missed it, here's the scene: It is Saturday night in the fabled French Quarter. Police are arresting one Robert Davis, a 64-year-old former schoolteacher.

As an Associated Press camera records the episode, an officer on horseback moves into the frame, apparently to block the camera's view. But the camera operator, shooting over the horse's flank, captures officers pinning the old man to a brick wall and one apparently delivering vicious blows to the head. Davis is then wrestled to the ground, several officers on top of him. Another tape, this one shot by CNN, shows him writhing handcuffed in a pool of blood. When he tries to roll over, an officer's foot shoves him back.

Police say he was arrested for public drunkenness, battery and public intimidation. Davis later told reporters he had simply asked an officer on horseback about the curfew time when another officer barged into the conversation. Davis called that officer unprofessional and walked away at which point, he says, the cop hit him from behind.

Which brings me back to that word I don't want to hear.

Actually, I'm hearing it already. Observers are explaining what happened by pointing out that New Orleans police have suffered great hardship since Hurricane Katrina. We are reminded by reporters and civic leaders that they've been working 12-hour shifts and that most are homeless. Daniel Winn, who works at a bar, told The New York Times, "Look at what these cops have gone through. Sleeping in their cars, lost their families. They can't control their behavior."

If that's true, heaven help us all. So before we cue the violins consider three things.

One: Davis, though arrested for public drunkenness, says he hasn't had a drink in 25 years. He apparently wasn't tested for blood alcohol, but if the man's been a teetotaler since the Reagan years, it should be easy to prove. Which would blow holes in the stated reason for his arrest.

Two: The image of out-of-control cops painted by Davis is supported by footage showing one officer cursing at and roughing up an AP producer after the arrest.

Three: You don't generally try to block people from seeing what you're doing, as the officer on horseback did, unless you know what you're doing is wrong.

Three cops have been arrested on battery charges and suspended without pay. I have no idea what will happen to them in the court of law. I fear the verdict in the court of public opinion.

That fear is rooted in the fact that we are often loath to hold police accountable. Indeed, some of us are still making excuses for the miscreants who bashed Rodney King's head in. Some folks just find it convenient to look the other way as extra-legal "justice" is dispensed. They assuage conscience by assuring themselves the bad guy must've had it coming.

And stress is such a convenient excuse. Who doesn't understand stress?

Problem is, that explanation dishonors every harried cop in the Big Easy who somehow manages to do his or her job professionally. Heck, if stress is an excuse, everyone in town should get a free whack at somebody.

I am not without sympathy for the burdens borne by New Orleans' finest. For that matter, I have sympathy for Davis, who, before he was beaten, had enjoyed a free dinner served to those left homeless by the storm.

But sympathy is not a blank check for misbehavior.

"It's a difficult time, but it doesn't excuse what our jobs are supposed to be," police spokesman Marlon Defillo told a reporter.

I couldn't have said it better myself.

METRO

STAFF PHOTO BY JENNIFER ZDON

A message of humor and hope graces a refrigerator in front of a Mid-City home on Oct. 9. More spray-painted refrigerators, with slogans such as "Please send to George W. Bush," line French Quarter streets.

Heard the one about the garden of the month?

HUMOR, from B-1

Zulu umbrella, stuck in the branches of a battered river birch tree, and set it with wine glasses, candles and slightly molded silk flowers. The backdrop, which also served as a photo opportunity for National Guardsman, was an American flag and a hand-made sign mocking federal powers that be.

"I have a really weird sense of humor," Marie Massett said, cleaning out her 1940 raised cottage now reeking of bleach.

"Come see my life," Massett said, making her way over buckled floors into a front bedroom. "Forty-two years of marriage, and this is all that's left, packed up into five garbage bags."

Gone is the cedar hope chest her husband, Irvin, gave her as a traditional pre-wedding gift, demolished by post-hurricane flood water that emptied from the 17th Street canal into Lakeview and beyond. Saved is the tiny porcelain bride and groom that stood atop their wedding cake.

"It's a little worse for wear, sort of like us," Marie Massett said.

Laughing it up

Like the Massetts, many people throughout the city are mitigating grief, and expressing subsequent anger, with humor.

Smelly refrigerators, some spray-painted with slogans such as "Please send to George W. Bush," line French Quarter streets. Kermit the Frog, wearing a dust mask, stood strapped to a light post along the Esplanade ridge. Plywood leaning on a picket fence protecting a dead lawn near Marconi Drive proclaimed "Garden of the Month."

Black and white mannequin heads sat facing one another on the neutral ground near a St. Claude Avenue beauty shop.

Bumper stickers and coffee mugs bearing sayings such as "Make levees not war," and "Proud to swim in New Orleans" are popping up in shops and on the Internet.

Utility poles along Moss Street bear colorful paintings by Bayou St. John resident and local artist Maggie Mae, who said she wanted to brighten up the neighborhood's post-storm palette of brown and gray.

In temporary exile in the French Quarter after a pillar-to-post existence in towns such as Bunkie and Breaux Bridge, Mae grabbed her half-finished canvases and scribbled sayings such as "Gone fishing" across them.

"It's what we're about," Mae said. "We look at things differently. We look at the lighter side. That's how we survive our football team for God's sake."

Commercial success?

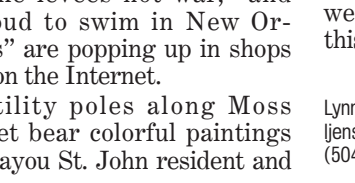
Becky Anderson took time from ripping nearly everything from her home on Pontalba Street to snap a photo of a Ziplock bag containing the dry baptismal gown her daughter wore 29 years ago.

It was the only thing she could salvage from her grandmother's armoire, now awaiting the garbage truck. "But maybe I will get to make a commercial," said Anderson, who, like so many, doesn't have enough insurance to cover her loss.

Listing the contents of a home is tedious, and attempting to assign value to many items is futile, said Irvin Massett, eyeing the stack of vintage record albums he collected over the decades.

"Bing Crosby on a 78: How are you going to put a value on that?" Massett said.

One valued piece of music saved by the Massetts is a cassette tape by local singer Benny Grunch, known for his "Ain't Dere No More" list of places such as Schwegmann's, McKenzie's and K&B, no longer on the city map.



Time for a new record, Marie Massett said: "New Orleans — ain't dere no more."

As hopeless as that sounds, the Massetts believe that the city will bounce back.

"Katrina was the first disaster," she said. "The second is coming back to what's left. But we are going to fight to save this little house."

Officials' call angers Haslett as Falcons win on last-second FG

Penalty gives Atlanta second chance at winning kick

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — A week ago, the Saints lost by seven touchdowns at Green Bay.

That was nothing.

The emotions inside the postgame locker room Sunday following their last-second, 34-31 loss to the Atlanta Falcons at the Alamodome ranged from seething anger to somber numbness.

But one thing was clear: The Saints badly wanted this game, and it stung when the Falcons got two chances to kick a winning field goal after a controversial holding call against defensive tackle Tony Bryant.

"The play at the end, the call by the officials, is flat-out chicken (. . .)," Saints coach Jim Haslett said. "It's a flat-out chicken (. . .) call by the crew, by 95 especially, James whatever his last name is (side judge

Exasperated Jim Haslett walks back to the sideline after arguing with the officials about a defensive holding penalty that allowed Atlanta a second chance to kick the winning field goal on the final play against the Saints on Sunday at the Alamodome in San Antonio.

Yellow hanky caper latest folly in zany rivalry

All you have to do is wait and you've seen it all.

That's assuming you've been following the Saints since Day One.

Over the years, our heroes have lost games in all sorts of extraordinary ways, especially to the Atlanta Falcons.

There was Big Ben I.

And there was Big Ben II.

I'm talking about those Hail Mary passes, launched into the end zone, as the game clock ticked down.

Both times it was Touchdown Atlanta.

And then there was Yellow Flag I, a

LSU coach Les Miles says he will have to coach his players differently, 'Make the same point a different way,' to help them reduce the number of mental mistakes.

LSU's mistakes no laughing matter

But Tiger defense no longer punch line

By William Kalec
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — On a nondescript night between Ohio Turnpike exits long since forgotten, Les Miles confessed to Jack Sito, a high school buddy, that he dreamed of hosting a network late-night talk show, like Johnny Carson.

Well, in honor of that ambitious goal, we're going to let Coach strap on the swami hat and play Carnac the Magnificent. This old shtick is always great. Here it goes:

Auburn, Alabama, itself . . . What are three remaining roadblocks LSU must maneuver around en route to Atlanta and the SEC championship game?

(Laughter sign flashes in studio).

Good one. Only to Miles, it sure isn't funny, not in mid-October when unforced penalties and a propensity to put the ball on the ground should be either quelled, or better yet, a non-issue. Yeah, Miles might have a little thespian in him, but trust the tone — an excited/agitated swirl — he used while conducting the postgame news conference in Tiger Stadium was not an act.

That's the inner Bo Schembechler in Miles coming to the surface.

He was steamed but optimistic, determined that the penalties and turnovers, now entering its third week as a popular Tuesday sidebar topic, soon will cease to be newsworthy. Even 24 hours removed from venting to the media, enough time to cool down and re-examine the situation, Miles hardly sounded giddy Sunday, most perturbed that many of the guilty belong to his Unity Council, a player-voted leadership

Haslett: 'We played well enough to win'

SAINTS, from C-1

James Coleman).

"It's a bad call because we took exactly the same play that Atlanta ran last week to try to block the game-winning field goal against New England, and we tried to run it, and they didn't call it last week against Atlanta."

The call came after Falcons kicker Todd Peterson missed a 41-yard field-goal attempt, wide left, with two seconds remaining.

The officials penalized Bryant for what they termed a "pull and shoot" — a technique in which the defensive lineman pulls an offensive player to the side, creating room for another defensive player to run in and try to block the kick.

If anything, the penalty at least seemed unnecessary because Saints cornerback Jason Craft did not get in and block the kick.

But the flag flew anyway, and Peterson made the ensuing 36-yard attempt.

"If they are going to call penalties like they did at the end of this game, what am I going to do?" said Haslett, who explained that Bryant's technique is legal as long as he is moving forward while pulling the offensive player to the side.

Bryant argued that he was trying to shoot the gap, and that the offensive player leaped on top of him, taking both men down.

"If anything, he should've been called for holding me," said a dejected Bryant — in a far different situation than he was in Week 17 last season, after he blocked a field-goal attempt at Carolina on the final play of the game. "I'm just trying to go out there and make a play, man. He jumped on top of me when I was trying to shoot through the hole, and he fell on me, and I just fell down. When I saw the flag, I was like, 'Yeah, they called it.' But it was on me.

"Things like that happen. When you put the game in the hands of the refs, you've got to expect things like that."

Haslett also was critical of two other decisions made by the officials during a back-and-forth game against Atlanta. He said the Falcons should have been penalized for using leverage to block Saints kicker John Carney's 47-yard field-goal attempt just before halftime — which Atlanta linebacker Demorrio Williams returned 59 yards for a game-changing touchdown.

Haslett also felt Saints receiver Az-Zahir Hakim was wrongly penalized for offensive pass interference on an apparent touchdown pass three plays before Carney's kick.

Saints offensive tackle Wayne Gandy said it was tough to dwell on a few isolated plays after such an evenly matched, hard-fought game.

"It was a good game I think, on both sides. They had an untimely turnover, we had one. I think it was a very even-flow game," Gandy said. "I guess if anything, you just hope that the game is never decided for anyone like that.

"We all felt if we just got that ball back, we got into overtime and won that toss, we (would have won) because we had worn them down, and that's a hell of a defense. We stepped up to the plate, and it was actually just a joy to be a part of something like that.

"It was a great football game. We just ended up on the wrong side. . . . You know, it's funny that you can lose 52-3, then you can lose 34-31, and it's the same feeling."

The Saints (2-4) played maybe their best all-around game of the season, except for a handful of bad plays and some spectacularly bad fortune.

They outgained the Falcons 456 yards to 266, and Saints tailbacks Antowain Smith and Aaron Stecker stepped up big in Deuce McAllister's absence, combining for 174 yards and two touchdowns.

Atlanta quarterback Michael Vick, who sat out last Sunday's loss to the New England Patriots with an injured knee, had limited success against the Saints. He completed 11 of 23 passes for 112 yards, with one touchdown and one interception. He had eight carries for 51 yards.

The first disastrous play of the game for the Saints came on a fumble by Smith late in the second quarter, when New Orleans was leading 10-3 and driving into Falcons' territory.

The ball was popped loose by Atlanta linebacker Michael Boley, right into the hands of cornerback DeAngelo Hall, who returned it 66 yards for a tying touchdown.

The Saints marched back down into scoring position on their next drive, but Hakim's touchdown catch was called back, and Carney's field-goal attempt was blocked — by Boley again — and returned for the touchdown.

The Saints rebounded from that disheartening turn of events and came back in the second half to tie the score at 17 in the third quarter, at 24 early in the fourth and at 31 with 46 seconds remaining on a spectacular 15-yard touchdown pass from Aaron Brooks to a sliding Devery Henderson in the back of the end zone.

But in less than a minute, the Falcons drove downfield to set up Peterson's field-goal attempt.

Attempts, that is.

"I thought we did a good job all day," Haslett said before his rant on the officials. "I was proud of the way the team came back from last week, we played well in a lot of areas. When you turn the ball over for a touchdown, and when you have a blocked field goal for a touchdown, then we had an interception that led directly to a score, we have to eliminate mistakes.

"But it's a shame, because I thought we played well enough to win."

Falcons coach Jim Mora, whose team lost a three-point decision to the Patriots last week, admitted that his team had some good fortune. But he said if your team is good enough and continues to fight, you can put yourself in a position to take advantage of those breaks.

"I don't know if they did it. I don't know if they didn't do it," Mora said of the final penalty call. "I don't know if we did it and got away with it. We got fortunate. We got a mulligan. We got lucky. And we'll take it."

Saints place-kicker John Carney's field-goal attempt on the final play of the second quarter is blocked by the Falcons on Sunday at the Alamodome in San Antonio. The ball was returned 59 yards by Demorrio Williams for a touchdown that gave Atlanta a 17-10 halftime lead. Todd Bouman is the holder.

Atlanta running back Warrick Dunn beats the Saints' Dwight Smith (24) and Josh Bullocks to the end zone on a 21-yard touchdown run in the fourth quarter.

Another wild finish, another sad ending for for the Saints

FINNEY, from C-1

ticky-tack end zone interference call against the Saints at the end of a game in Atlanta.

And, once more, it was touchdown Falcons.

If you were watching Sunday, and happened to be familiar with Saints-Falcons history, what you saw, let's say, was Double Whammy I.

And one more Atlanta Falcons victory.

This one carved out new ground.

This one saw the Saints victimized by a flag that was not thrown at the end of the half, and a flag that was at the end of the game.

The final score, officially, was Falcons 34, Saints 31.

It was 34-31, and not headed to overtime, only after the Falcons got a second shot at a field goal following a yellow handkerchief tossed at the Saints for allowing what might best be described as illegal infiltration into, let's say, place-kicking territory.

It's one of those calls that officials will make, let's say, one time in 100.

And that's only part of Sunday's story.

The classic irony was, on the final play of the first half, with John Carney prepared to kick the Saints into a 13-10 lead, there came a Falcon, using one of his teammates as a springboard, hurdling into place-kicking territory.

The Falcons should have been flagged.

But no flag.

The kicked was blocked, the ball was picked up, returned 59 yards, and, instead of Saints 13, Falcons 10, it was Falcons 17, Saints 10.

A 10-point turnaround.

It was enough to make a Saints fan look upward, clasp his hands and ask: "After all these years, after the wrath of Hurricane Katrina, are we still living under the curse of Marie Laveau?"

Seldom had an NFL Sunday been more devastating to Jim Haslett, coming a week after his team came apart at the seams in a 52-3 loss at Green Bay.

This time Haslett watched the same team control the line of scrimmage against a highly rated Atlanta defense and dominate a first half with Aaron Brooks throwing strikes, with Antowain Smith and Aaron Stecker more than making up for the loss of Deuce McAllister.

In the first 30 minutes, with the defense minimizing Michael Vick's effectiveness, it was all Saints. Haslett's offense was on the way to expanding a 10-3 lead when Smith, who had scored a touchdown on an up-the-middle run, gave one away when his fumble produced a 66-yard return that tied the score.

Moments later came the blocked field-goal attempt.

Would the Saints fold?

Not on this Sunday.

They pulled even once, they pulled even a second time, and they had it going into sudden death.

Until that yellow handkerchief of death fell on the carpet of the Alamodome.

Falcons win 34-31.

Welcome to Double Whammy I.

MEMORABLE FINISHES

The Saints and Falcons have had some wild endings to their games:

OCT. 16, 2005
Result: Falcons, 34, Saints 31
Atlanta kicker Todd Peterson takes advantage of a second chance, making a 36-yard field goal, after the Saints are called for defensive holding on his missed attempt at the end of the game.

SEPT. 2, 1979
Result: Falcons 40, Saints 34 OT
Saints lose when punter Russell Erxleben throws an interception that is returned for a touchdown.

NOV. 24, 1991
Result: Falcons 23, Saints 20 OT
Atlanta wins on a 50-yard field goal 13 minutes into the extra period. Norm Johnson's winning kick was set up by a 57-yard pass from Chris Miller to Michael Haynes from the Falcons' 2-yard line to the Saints' 41. Johnson's field goal came three plays later.

OCT. 27, 2002
Result: Falcons 37, Saints 35
Jay Feely's 47-yard field goal splits the uprights, ending an exhilarating, last-second Atlanta victory. Feely's kick capped an 11-play, 60-yard drive and completed a frantic final six minutes in which the Falcons and Saints traded four scores.

NOV. 12, 1978
Result: Falcons 20, Saints 17
With 19 seconds remaining, Atlanta's Alfred Jackson catches a touchdown pass deflected by teammate Wallace Francis.
