Post-storm jobless claims surpass state's 2004 total

By The Associated Press

BATON ROUGE — Louisiana has paid 224,200 new claims for jobless benefits since Hurricane Katrina hit the state on Aug. 29 — exceeding the entire amount of new unemployment claims paid in 2004, the state labor department said Friday.

The agency said $133.9 million in Katrina-related unemployment claims were paid for September and the first week of October. Of the total, $111 million was for unemployment insurance benefits and $22.8 million was for special disaster unemployment assistance.

Nationwide, Katrina caused the first nationwide job loss in two years. Payrolls fell by 35,000, with jobs in retailing, lodging, bars, restaurants and leisure pursuits such as gambling all taking a hit. The national unemployment rate climbed to 5.1 percent, from a four-year low of 4.9 percent in August.

GOP-led House votes to help boost refinery construction

Democrats cry, 'Shame, shame'

By H. Josef Hebert
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — The House voted to encourage U.S. oil companies to build new refineries Friday in a raucous roll call that Republican leaders extended 40 minutes while they buttonholed their own members to avoid an embarrassing defeat.

Democrats crying, "Shame, shame" — and some GOP moderates — called the bill a sop to rich oil companies that would do nothing to ease energy costs, including expected soaring heating bills this winter.

The bill would streamline government permits for refineries; open federal lands, including closed military bases for future refinery construction; and limit the number of gasoline blends refiners have to produce, eliminating many blends now designed to reduce air pollution.

President Bush welcomed the vote. "I commend the House for passing legislation that would increase our refining capacity and help address the cost of gasoline, diesel fuels and jet fuels," he said.

The legislation, which now goes to the Senate, passed 212-210, but not before a standoff on the House floor. Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., asked at one point, "Is this the House of a Banana Republic?"

It looked as if the bill was going down to defeat, two votes shy of approval. Democrats to no avail called for gaveling the vote closed as GOP leaders lobbied their own members to switch votes and support the bill.

"He worked me over a little," said Rep. Bill Young, R-Fla., among the last group of lawmakers to switch to support the legislation, referring to his discussions with House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois.

Rep. Tom DeLay, who recently stepped down temporarily as majority leader after being indicted in Texas over a campaign finance issue, was as active as ever, administering pressure on wavering lawmakers in the crowded, noisy House chamber.

Finally, long after the vote had been scheduled to close, two GOP votes switched, providing the Republican victory. A tie would have killed the bill. "Shame, shame, shame," came a chorus from the Democratic side of the aisle.

Afterward, Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California called it all "a shameless display of the Republican culture of corruption," a theme she has used in recent days on a number of issues since DeLay's indictment in Texas on conspiracy and money laundering charges in connection with campaign finance activities.

Rep. Joe Barton, R-Texas, who had predicted a close vote, said he was not aware of "any deals" being made to get the last votes. No Democrats voted for the legislation, although three initially favored it, only to change their minds after talking to Pelosi and Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the second-ranking Democrat.

Supporters of the measure said Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita made clear that the country needs more refineries, including new ones outside the Gulf region. No new refinery has been built since 1976, although large refineries have been expanded to meet growing demand.

Critics of the legislation argued that a cash-rich industry with huge profits over the past year shouldn't need government help to build refineries. They said the bill would allow the oil industry to avoid environmental regulations and would lead to dirtier air.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., accused GOP leaders of using "the hardships and devastation of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita ... to pass Republican and industry wish lists" that would do nothing to curtail gasoline prices or help people facing huge heating bills this winter.

Pelosi called the bill a rehash of "all the special favors to the industry that were too extreme" for Congress last summer when it passed energy legislation.

Barton said the bill simply would give industry more certainty that a refinery project will not be delayed in government red tape.

Opponents said the bill would stifle legitimate lawsuits against refinery projects and in some cases override state or local objections if a refinery were located on federal land. A community or citizens group would have to pay an oil company's legal costs whether they won or lost a lawsuit challenging a refinery under one provision in the bill.

Limiting the number of gasoline blends refiners would have to produce to six could hinder the ability of states and cities to meet federal air quality requirements, according to state and county clean air officials, who lobbied against the legislation.

Others opposed to the bill were the National League of Cities, nine state attorneys general and various environmental organizations.

Legislative session set to begin Nov. 6

Budget revisions will wait for later

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Gov. Kathleen Blanco will call lawmakers into special session Nov. 6-18 to deal with "urgent matters" stemming from Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita, administration officials confirmed Friday.

"It will be narrowly focused, allowing legislators to focus on urgent matters" that cannot wait until the 60-day general session that begins March 27, Blanco spokeswoman Denise Bottcher said.

Bottcher said the details of what will be taken up in the session have not been worked out.

Blanco's two chief legislative floor leaders — Senate President Donald Hines, D-Bunkie, and House Speaker Joe Salter, D-Florien — said after meeting with members of the administration and legislative leaders that Blanco aides wanted the session delayed to give them more time to work on legislation to be debated.

The previously discussed date for the session, Oct. 23 to Nov. 3, "was too early for them (the administration) to get everything together," Hines said.

Salter agreed: "Everybody was talking after the hurricane about having a session as soon as possible. I didn't see how they could be ready by the 23rd (of October)."

A special session can be called by the governor, who sets the agenda of items to be debated and announces that agenda at least five days before the session is scheduled to begin; or lawmakers can call themselves into a special session, something that has not happened in modern times.

Bottcher earlier this week called the Oct. 23 start date "a working date," and conceded that it was "a tight deadline" to have bills drafted to address post-hurricane problems. "We were working against a tight deadline before Hurricane Rita came along," and that delayed things even more, Bottcher said.

Hines and Salter said that a second special session will be needed, probably in January, after revenue estimators have a chance to meet and assess the hurricanes' impact on lost revenues, which has been estimated at about $1 billion so far.

The revenue panel is expected to meet in December.

Bottcher said the governor is considering a fiscal-only session in January but has not yet made a decision.

Hines and Salter said they think a special session in January will be needed. Hines said that when the fiscal session is held will also depend on how much financial relief the federal government approves for Louisiana by late this year or early next.

Hines said he expects the November session to deal with codifying some of the actions Blanco took in suspending laws dealing with lawsuits and when they must be heard and disposed of; evictions; and reworking the state's formula for financing public elementary and secondary education in light of prolonged school closures in some areas and the influx of displaced students into other school systems.

Salter said he does not expect a second special session dealing with budget issues until January.

The fall session, he said, will be confined "just to matters and legal issues that cannot wait until January or the regular session" in March.

Katrina may have been Category 3

Weather officials probe strength

By Denise Kalette
Associated Press writer

MIAMI — Government hurricane specialists said Friday that they are investigating whether Katrina was actually a Category 3 storm, not a 4, when it struck the Gulf Coast.

Analyzing the hurricane's strength has been made more difficult because instruments used to measure the wind failed or were swept away when the storm hit Aug. 29. Also, communications were cut off to the National Weather Service's radar station in Slidell, and flooding prevented workers from getting in or out. Hurricane specialists are examining data from planes that flew through the storm on the day it struck New Orleans, trying to gauge whether wind speed measurements accurately reflected conditions on the ground, said Jack Beven, hurricane specialist with the National Hurricane Center in Miami.

A downgrade in strength could be a dark sign for New Orleans, where the storm levees are generally thought to be able to protect the city from the rains and surge of a Category 3 storm. Portions of the levee system were either topped or failed in the storm, sending devastating floodwater into the city.

The categories are part of the Saffir-Simpson scale of a hurricane's intensity, used to measure potential property damage and coastal flooding.

"It should be pointed out that New Orleans was on the western side of the hurricane, and regardless of how strong it was, New Orleans did not get the worst that the storm had to offer," Beven said.

The National Hurricane Center routinely re-examines data from storms to accurately assess their size and power.

Several weather instruments were positioned throughout the New Orleans area, including Louis Armstrong International Airport, Lakefront Airport and the Naval Air Station in Belle Chasse. But all failed.

When Katrina struck the mouth of the Mississippi River south of New Orleans at daybreak on Aug. 29, it was a Category 4, with wind speed of 135 mph, Beven said. The strongest part of the storm actually missed New Orleans but instead passed over the mouth of the Mississippi River and into the Mississippi Gulf coast.

"From 20 to 70 miles east to northeast of New Orleans, that's where the worst effects of the storm were, winds and tides, over on the Mississippi Gulf coast, Gulfport, Biloxi, Waveland, Pass Christian and even over to Ocean Springs," Beven said. "The winds and the tides there were much higher than what you had in the New Orleans area."

Beven said the hurricane center is internally debating whether Katrina was a Category 3 or 4, and specifically where. The center is examining data from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration and Air Force hurricane hunter aircraft that flew through the eye and the strongest winds of the hurricane many times on the 29th.

"We were getting a continuous flow of data ... the data is taken automatically every 20 or 30 seconds. That's one reason we haven't finished yet: There's a lot of data to evaluate," Beven said.

Scientists are also investigating why a 20- to 30-foot storm surge along the Mississippi coast seemed more consistent with a Category 5 hurricane than the designated Category 4, according to specialists at the hurricane center.

"At one point Katrina was a Category 5. It may have been that the winds died down to a Category 4 or 3, but the ocean was so stirred up by the hurricane that the surge was more equivalent to a 5," Beven said.

Hurricane categories have been changed in the past, based on analysis after the storm. Hurricane Andrew, which hit Florida in 1992, was upgraded years later to a Category 5 storm from Category 4.

Riverboat casinos ready to roll

Kenner vessel among those to reopen

By The Associated Press

Four Louisiana riverboat casinos that were forced to close by Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita, including one in Kenner, are preparing to receive gamblers again.

The Treasure Chest Casino, a riverboat casino in Kenner, will open Monday for the first time since Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast, said the casino's owner, Boyd Gaming Corp. The casino closed Aug. 27, two days before Katrina's arrival.

In Lake Charles, the L'Auberge du Lac Hotel & Casino opened parts of its complex Friday with gambling scheduled to begin today, the same day Isle of Capri Casinos Inc. planned to reopen its two gambling boats in the market.

L'Auberge du Lac, which opened in late May, is owned by Pinnacle Entertainment Inc.

Both closed shortly before Rita hit on Sept. 24.

Two of the four casinos in the New Orleans are remain closed: Harrah's New Orleans Casino and the Belle of Orleans riverboat. The Boomtown Belle reopened Monday. Neither the Belle of Orleans nor Harrah's have announced possible reopening dates.

In the Lake Charles market, Harrah's Entertainment Inc.'s two-riverboat complex remains closed because of extensive hurricane damage, along with the Delta Downs race track and its slot machine casino. Harrah's said this week that it cannot project a reopening date.

Boyd Gaming, which owns Delta Downs, said this week that it hopes to have at least part of the facility open in late November.

Rita evacuation brought bumps in the road

Contraflow wasn't part of Texas' storm plan

By Liz Austin
Associated Press writer

AUSTIN — State and local officials have taken a beating for waiting until millions of Hurricane Rita evacuees had been trapped in gridlock for more than 24 hours before they opened Houston's major highways to one-way outbound traffic.

About 60 of approximately 100 Rita victims died during the evacuation, including 23 residents of a Bellaire, Texas, assisted-living facility whose bus was consumed by fire and explosions near Dallas. Hundreds of drivers ran out of gas and sat on the road shoulder waiting for help.

"It certainly wasn't pretty in all cases and wasn't without some difficulties," Texas Department of Transportation spokesman Randall Dillard said. "The time people spent in their cars and the conditions they faced is certainly not something we want to see repeated."

But, he added, it wasn't easy to convert 487 miles of highway, including two interstates, to one-way traffic, and doing so earlier would have made it even harder to get supplies such as gasoline into Houston before the storm hit.

Nevertheless, gasoline stations ran dry and shut down, and supermarkets were running out of food in the days before the storm.

One-way traffic, or contraflow, wasn't part of the state's emergency management plan because officials didn't think so many people would evacuate. State Emergency Management Coordinator Jack Colley said just 1.3 million people needed to evacuate from the projected strike zone — well below the regional highway system's capacity.

But with Hurricane Katrina's devastation fresh in their minds, about 3 million people fled their homes, including many from areas that were not even prone to flooding. And many families took two or three cars instead of packing into one vehicle.

That onslaught of vehicles quickly overwhelmed highways in Houston and throughout southeast Texas.

Because there wasn't a contraflow plan, Houston Mayor Bill White and Harris County Judge Robert Eckels had to ask Gov. Rick Perry to order it. Perry signed the order Sept. 22, a day after the start of the mass evacuation. The first 80 miles of contraflow lanes opened at noon on I-45.

To open the contraflow lanes, the state Department of Transportation had to install barricades at 133 ramps on Interstates 45 and 10 and coordinate the placement of a police officer at each one to make sure people didn't drive around them. It also had to find contractors to break down median barriers to let cars cross the highways.

By 3 p.m., the agency was operating 155 miles of contraflow traffic on I-10 between downtown Houston and Seguin, 30 miles east of San Antonio, and 153 miles of contraflow traffic on I-45 between Conroe and Ennis.

About 180 miles of highways in southeast Texas also opened to contraflow to help people evacuate from towns near Beaumont north to Lufkin and Jasper.

The lane turnaround got traffic moving more quickly, but it didn't solve every problem.

The contraflow lanes eventually had to merge with the regular lanes, creating still more traffic jams. And blocking inbound traffic made it harder for the Department of Transportation to bring gas to stranded motorists as the Houston area's supplies ran low.

As two task forces prepare to study what went wrong with the evacuation and what could be done better, Dillard said he expects directions to more quickly implement contraflow in the future will be added to the state emergency management plan.

"It won't be the first step, but if it's needed it certainly will be part of the plan," Dillard said, adding contraflow had never been used to this extent in an evacuation in Texas.

LSU professor Brian Wolshon, who studies hurricane evacuations, said he's glad Texas is taking a closer look at its contraflow plans. But he said he could have told state officials a traffic jam was inevitable if a big hurricane headed toward Houston.

"I don't think we necessarily need to see a Rita or a Katrina and then say 'Gee, we didn't realize these things were going to happen,'" Wolshon said. "We can look at this stuff well in advance if there is the will and the available funds."

Criticism over ice contracts heats up

FEMA defends deals decried as wasteful

By The Associated Press

MONTGOMERY, ALA. — A trucker who got $20,000 from the government for hauling bagged ice that never made it to any victims of Hurricane Katrina said he's finished working for federal agencies, despite the big payday.

Paul Mullinaux was part of an infamous post-Katrina convoy that carried ice from manufacturing plants to staging areas in Montgomery and elsewhere and then to refrigerated storage without ever getting it to people who needed it after the storm.

The Montgomery Advertiser reported Mullinaux's windfall Friday along with contract details that included truckers being paid $54 an hour to wait in their rigs, which had to run their engines to keep the refrigeration working, and the government's agreement to pay what one person said was three times the going price for ice.

Mullinaux said he hardly feels right depositing his check after seeing the ice operation, run by the Army Corps of Engineers and the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"I don't know how FEMA gets away with it. I don't know how the Army Corps of Engineers gets away with it," Mullinaux said. "I'm going to take their check for $20,000, but I'm ashamed to do it. I'll never do it again."

FEMA ordered 180 million pounds of ice to distribute to victims after Katrina. But trucks hauling millions of pounds of leftover ice were sent as far north as Maine last month to storage sites after the government realized it had too much ice.

The Army Corps of Engineers awarded an emergency ice contract with IAP Worldwide Services Inc. of Cape Canaveral, Fla. The government paid 28 cents a pound for ice, almost three times the going rate, according to Jeff St. Cin, president of the Ozark-based Gulf Ice.

They also paid $2.60 a mile for the roughly 4,000 truckers to haul the ice all over the country. FEMA paid $54 an hour for each truckload of ice while the drivers awaited orders, according to the contract with IAP posted on the Corps' Galveston District Web site in Texas.

Corps spokesman Marilyn Uhrich said IAP was the only company that submitted a bid to supply ice.

IAP describes itself as FEMA's "contractor of choice" for emergency power generation and ice after a natural disaster. The company coordinated the delivery of 100 million pounds of ice in Florida after hurricanes hit the Sunshine State last year.

After Katrina, some truckers waited for more than a week in Montgomery for instructions. Corps officials said that of those, 114 truckloads of ice were sent from Alabama to a storage facility in Gloucester, Mass. That cost approximately $385,000 in mileage alone.

FEMA spokesman Don North defended the spending, saying it was better for the government to be prepared for the worst and have too much ice rather than have too little.

FEMA and corps officials said the ice was more expensive than normal because the contract required delivery of 100 truckloads on short notice.

Government watchdog Tom Schatz said government waste from Hurricane Katrina and Rita would grow into the billions of dollars. He said he was more concerned with poor planning than a pricey contract.

"They should just have a deal with Wal-Mart, Lowe's, Home Depot and other large companies to get all this stuff out there as quickly as possible, and that would solve a lot of problems," said Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste.

Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.

Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. This is a very limited opportunity, and availability is restricted.

We have employment opportunities available in the Sales Department, including management availabilities.

Sales Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 7pm
Service Hours: Mon - Fri 7:30am - 6pm • Sat 7:30-4

We are committed to rebuilding Jefferson Parish and Southeast Louisiana. We need your support. Together, we will prevail and have a better place to live and work than before Hurricane Katrina.

As you read this, Ray Brandt Toyota, its employees and families, and the residents of Southeast Louisiana all have something in common; we are truly "blessed".

Lawmakers condemn recovery effort as wasteful

At least one wants millions rescinded

By Jonathan Weisman and Griff Witte
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers from both parties on Thursday sharply questioned nearly every aspect of the Bush administration's response to Hurricane Katrina, focusing their discontent on suspect contracts and eliciting a pledge that hundreds of millions of dollars in deals awarded with no competition would soon be put up for bid.

Nine House and Senate panels held hearings on hurricane relief, with a sense of frustration frequently bursting to the surface. Several members chastised administration officials, citing tales of small Gulf states businesses losing work to giants such as Halliburton Co. Others challenged administration stances on tax breaks and health care for the displaced.

Under questioning about the agency's reliance on contracts that lacked full and open bidding, R. David Paulison, the acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said, "I've been in public service a long time, and I've never been a fan of no-bid contracts."

Asked by Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., why the agency did not hold competitions before Katrina struck, Paulison replied that "all of those no-bid contracts, we are going to go back and rebid. We're in the process of rebidding them already."

A FEMA spokeswoman later said the new bidding process affects only the four largest no-bid deals. Those are $100 million contracts awarded to the Shaw Group, Bechtel Corp., CH2M Hill Inc. and Fluor Corp. to find and engineer sites for temporary housing for displaced residents.

Paulison told the panels that his agency had delivered nearly 85 million liters of water, more than 4 million meals and nearly 176 million pounds of ice by Oct. 3, while registering more than 1.7 million victims for disaster assistance. He also announced a higher estimate of Katrina homeless, from 300,000 to "between 400,000 and 600,000 households."

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, who chairs the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, decried "a trail of missteps that calls into question what has been done during the last four years and that continues to plague the recovery even today."

"Back off our bill"

Paulison's pledge to rebid some Katrina contracts showed a willingness to re-examine some of those decisions, though the actual impact of the move could prove limited.

The agency said Thursday that it has no plans to compete numerous other deals signed in the wake of Katrina with little or no competition. Also, FEMA has already committed a large amount of money to the four firms doing the housing site work, $49.2 million in the case of Bechtel. And there is no timeline for how quickly the competition will proceed. Each of the firms said Thursday that they will continue to work in the meantime.

The day's events indicated the administration has yet to regain its footing since its slow response to the hurricane's initial onslaught more than a month ago.

In a House Appropriations subcommittee hearing, Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., called the Department of Homeland Security "dysfunctional" and suggested that Congress should rescind half the more than $60 billion it has provided for the relief effort unless FEMA can better document how it is being spent.

DHS Deputy Secretary Michael Jackson responded that the department will be watching the money closely. "The opportunity to go awry here is large, and we must be extremely diligent in preventing fraud and waste," he said.

Members of both parties raised doubts that President Bush's proposed business tax breaks would lure employers and employees back to the battered Gulf Coast. Meanwhile, a continuing dispute over health care for Katrina evacuees led Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, to sharply rebuke Treasury Secretary John Snow. For weeks, the administration has blocked legislation that would temporarily expand Medicaid eligibility rules and raise federal health care reimbursement rates to states affected by the hurricane.

"Tell the White House to back off our bill," Grassley told Snow. "There are people hurting down there, and we want to get them help."

Apples and kumquats

Lawmakers indicated they would also challenge Bush's proposal to create a vast, tax-favored Gulf Opportunity Zone, stretching from Louisiana to parts of Florida. Under the proposal, much of the cost of business investments would be tax-deductible.

"The energy of the private sector will be unleashed and ignited" by the plan, Snow told the Senate Finance Committee. "These are tried-and-true measures. They've worked. We've seen them work."

But a Congressional Research Service study presented to the committee appeared to indicate otherwise.

A "significant body of empirical studies focused mainly on state enterprise zones" in large part "have not found evidence of effects on growth or employment," the CRS found.

The Gulf Coast's situation is unique, said Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., since much of the work force has simply left. "You can incentivize all the businesses you want to relocate in a depressed area, but you have to have a work force to make those businesses work," he said.

Meanwhile, the incentives working now appear to be favoring large contractors at the expense of local companies, lawmakers charged.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said union maintenance workers at the Superdome and Ernest N. Morial Convention Center have been replaced with out-of-state workers earning lower wages without benefits. And he charged that a Mississippi modular classroom maker was rebuffed in its bid to supply 300 classrooms when the Army Corps of Engineers turned to an Alaska firm charging more than twice the price.

Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., questioned whether the federal government should be left with the tab to replace New Orleans' now-condemned charity hospitals when Oklahoma emergency medical technicians reported only minor flood damage to the basement.

And he again assailed FEMA's $236 million contract with Carnival Cruise Lines, which has provided three ships to house evacuees and relief workers. Under that contract, Senate investigators have determined that Carnival will earn nearly 50 percent more per berth than the company would have under normal sailing operations.

Carnival spokeswoman Jennifer de la Cruz said Coburn's comparison is "like comparing apples to kumquats." Carnival's contract price includes the cost of canceling the cruises of more than 120,000 passengers, paying travel agents' commissions on those lost cruises, loss of onboard revenues such as shore excursions, casinos, spas, alcoholic beverages, and gift shops, loss of tips for crew, and the cost of income taxes that otherwise would not have been paid.

Paulison defended the Carnival contract, saying the ships are now "almost completely full," and at a cost of $168 a day per person, are proving "very cost effective."

Faces of Katrina tragedy seen again

Subjects of photo are still together

By Michael Graczyk
Associated Press writer

HOUSTON — When the TV is off and the only sounds in the neat, three-bedroom house come from the hum of the air conditioner and the gurgle of an aquarium, 89-year-old Nita LaGarde sometimes has to fight back tears as she falls asleep in her white wooden bed with clean linens.

"This is nice," she said.

The tears are not so much for what she lost, but for what she has found: a new life and new, loving friends in Houston, a city she had never even visited until a month ago during the culmination of a hellish journey.

America met Mama Nita, as she is known, and 5-year-old Tanisha Belvin as they fled the horror of the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center in the days immediately following Hurricane Katrina.

A grim-looking LaGarde was seen sitting in a wheelchair, her withered white hand clasping Tanisha's tiny black hand in a Sept. 3 photograph taken by Eric Gay of the Associated Press. The photo of their rescue from the Convention Center was published on front pages around the nation, and the pair became a symbol of the disaster.

"I wasn't going to let her go," LaGarde said of her tight hold on Tanisha in the photo.

Also with them, but out of the picture, was Earnestine Dangerfield, 60, Tanisha's grandmother and LaGarde's neighbor of 20 years at the duplex they shared in New Orleans' flooded 9th Ward.

Now, all three are living under the same roof in Houston, courtesy of a local couple.

AP PHOTO

In a photo that has become emblematic of the tragedy wrought by Hurricane Katrina, 89-year-old Nita LaGarde clings tightly to the hand of Tanisha Belvin, 5, as they are evacuated Sept. 3 from the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center. The image was run in newspapers across the country, including in Houston, where LaGarde and Belvin have made a new home — together.

The three had escaped the rising waters in New Orleans by climbing into the attic then punching a hole in the roof. With LaGarde and Tanisha tied to Dangerfield with an orange electrical cord, the three were rescued by neighbors in a canoe. They were taken to a bridge, where they stayed for two days.

From there, a helicopter took them to an interstate overpass, then a police truck moved them to a spot outside the Convention Center, where they waited amid the squalor for more days, Mama Nita trading a spot on the concrete for a mattress from a looted hotel. Finally, with fears for LaGarde's declining health, soldiers summoned a helicopter to pluck them from among the thousands waiting to get away.

"They kept us together," Dangerfield said. "I told them: Where she goes, I got to go."

All they had were the clothes they were wearing and LaGarde's mattress as they boarded a plane for Houston, 350 miles away.

"We've been through hell," LaGarde said. "I didn't worry. I just wanted to be out of there."

They received medical treatment in Houston, then a spot at the city's Reliant Center shelter. They were moved again, to an adjacent arena, and then once more, to a motel in the suburb of Tomball. They still had LaGarde's mattress.

"When you lose everything, you just want to hold something that's yours," Dangerfield said.

That was where they were when the Houston Chronicle followed up on the AP photo, which had prompted many calls from readers wishing to help. The story moved a retired Houston couple, Joe and Daisy Maura, to offer them a vacant house they rent.

"We got our kids together and told them what we were going to do," said Daisy Maura, 67, who retired in August after 45 years as a Houston public school teacher and principal. "We're going to adopt this family."

"You know good people when you see them," said her husband, 68, a retired school basketball coach. "You think: They're just family. Now they're part of us. They are not here alone."

The Mauras got in touch with emergency officials, who put them in contact with LaGarde and Dangerfield.

"This is too good to be true," said Dangerfield, a former bus driver in New Orleans. "When I walked in the door, I dropped to my knees. This is better than I had in New Orleans."

"I feel like a millionaire," LaGarde said.

LaGarde was born in Smoke Bend, La., and moved with her family in 1937 to New Orleans, where she worked in a plant that made airplane parts, as a waitress and for 10 years in a bakery at night while raising a son and daughter. Her husband died in 1986.

"I ain't going back no more," she said. "There ain't nothing to go back to."

During the interview, Tanisha was in perpetual motion, tugging at her grandmother, then racing around the living room. She was shy with strangers but cuddled up to Daisy Maura as if the woman were a lifelong relative. In her room, the little girl had her own TV, a few toys, and a choice of top or bottom bunk.

It hasn't all been easy. LaGarde and Dangerfield are trying to replace personal documents and get simple things such as New Orleans telephone books. They do not have a car and have to rely on the Maura family to get around. Dangerfield is still trying to find other relatives scattered in Mississippi and Missouri.

And when Hurricane Rita threatened the Houston area two weeks ago, Tanisha, who has enrolled in kindergarten, was afraid their new home would be washed away just like their old one. She is afraid whenever the weather turns ugly, Dangerfield said.

But on the night Rita brushed by Houston, the Mauras had them at their house, where LaGarde, as the oldest in attendance, was the queen of their hurricane party.

(LaGarde's age somehow got reported as 105 in the caption and story that accompanied the AP photo. "Eighty-nine is bad enough," she cracked.)

"Everyone here's been wonderful," LaGarde said. "We've met so many people. I thank God every day for the people in Houston."

ElBaradei, agency share Nobel prize

By George Jahn
Associated Press writer

VIENNA, AUSTRIA — Mohamed ElBaradei and his International Atomic Energy agency won the 2005 Nobel Peace Prize on Friday, leaving the chief U.N. nuclear inspector strengthened in a job he nearly lost because of a dispute with the United States over Iran and Iraq.

ElBaradei suggested winning the world's most prestigious award vindicated his methods and goals — using diplomacy rather than confrontation and defusing tensions in multilateral negotiations that strive for consensus.

He also suggested the conflict with Washington was over, saying Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "wished me well" in a congratulatory phone call.

The Bush administration has bristled at ElBaradei's positions on the nuclear threat posed by Iran and Iraq and unsuccessfully lobbied to block his appointment to a third and final four-year term this year. The endorsement by the Nobel Committee was viewed as a major boost to the 63-year-old Egyptian diplomat and his mandate to curb nuclear proliferation.

ElBaradei (pronounced ehl-BEHR'-uh-day) and the IAEA locked horns with Washington in the run-up to the 2003 Iraq war by challenging U.S. claims that Saddam Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction. More recently, ElBaradei's refusal to back U.S. assertions that Iran has a covert nuclear weapons program hardened opposition to him within the Bush administration.

After the award was announced, ElBaradei refrained from criticizing the United States in comments to Associated Press Television News and two other media outlets.

"I don't see it as a critique of the U.S." he said Friday. "We had disagreement before the Iraq war, honest disagreement. We could have been wrong, they could have been right."

Instead, ElBaradei said, the honor was "a message — 'Hey guys, you need to get your act together you need to work together in multinational institutions.'"

The award also was a signal "going to the Arab world, going to the Western world that we ... have a lot in common and we need to work together to survive," ElBaradei said.

AP PHOTO

Mohamed ElBaradei, right, the director of the International Atomic Energy agency, said winning the world's most prestigious award vindicated his use of diplomacy in international disputes. ElBaradei and the IAEA locked horns with Washington in the run-up to the 2003 Iraq war and recently clashed with the administration over Iran's nuclear weapons program.

Describing his phone conversation with Rice, he said that they both "agreed that we will have to continue to work together" on issues including dispelling suspicions about Iran's nuclear ambitions and getting North Korea to return to the nonproliferation fold.

"The award sends a very strong message: 'Keep doing what you are doing,'" he said. "We continue to believe that in all of our activities we have to be impartial, objective and work with integrity."

In Washington, Rice reaffirmed in a statement that the Bush administration was "committed to working with the IAEA to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons technology."

Nobel Committee chairman Ole Danbolt Mjoes also denied the award was meant as a slap at the United States.

"This is not a kick in the shin of any nation, any leader," he said. "It is a challenge to all leaders in the world and all the world's nations to go much further on the road toward ridding the world of nuclear weapons."

The award was the highlight in the career for the diplomat, who received a doctorate in International Law at the New York University School of Law in 1974 and later became an adjunct professor there.

ElBaradei joined the IAEA in 1984 and rose from within the ranks of the 139-nation agency, becoming its head in 1997. Naturally shy, he grew into the job as the IAEA dealt with crises in Iraq, North Korea and Iran, becoming an ever more outspoken advocate of nonproliferation in comments that mutated from stilted statements to polished soundbites.

The Nobel Committee recognized ElBaradei and the U.N. nuclear agency "for their efforts to prevent nuclear energy from being used for military purposes and to ensure that nuclear energy for peaceful purposes is used in the safest possible way."

"At a time when disarmament efforts appear deadlocked, when there is a danger that nuclear arms will spread both to states and to terrorist groups, and when nuclear power again appears to be playing an increasingly significant role, IAEA's work is of incalculable importance," it said in a statement.

ElBaradei and the agency had been among the favorites to win as speculation mounted the Nobel Committee would seek to honor the victims of nuclear weapons and those who try to contain their use.

The committee has repeatedly awarded its peace prize to anti-nuclear weapons campaigners on the major anniversaries of the 1945 atomic bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Japan.

Among the dozens of foreign leaders congratulating ElBaradei was German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder — a strong critic of the U.S. invasion that toppled Saddam. He praised ElBaradei's "courageous stand for an objective view of the situation in the run-up to the Iraq war."

Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf also applauded the committee's decision — despite often tense relations with the IAEA, most recently over revelations of an enormous nuclear black market run by disgraced Pakistani scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan.

ElBaradei's agency has been pivotal in nearly three years of investigations into Iran's suspect nuclear activities, including programs that can be used for making weapons.

Last month, the IAEA board put Iran on notice that it faces referral to the U.N. Security Council unless it dispels international concerns about it nuclear aims — despite ElBaradei's private preference for a less confrontational approach.

The agency has had no control over North Korea since the country quit the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty in 2003, but ElBaradei has said he hopes to have his inspectors back in the country, the "sooner the better" in the wake of the North's announcement that it wants to end its atomic weapons program.

In Iraq, IAEA inspectors searched for evidence of a nuclear weapons program in the months ahead of the 2003 U.S. invasion but failed to find concrete evidence to back U.S. assertions Saddam's regime had such a program.

The Nobel committee received a record 199 nominations for the peace prize, which includes $1.3 million, a gold medal and a diploma. ElBaradei and the IAEA will share the award when they receive it Dec. 10 in the Norwegian capital of Oslo.

Two Arabi families: the Lameus & the Fleetwoods. Two hurricanes: Betsy and Katrina.

NOT AGAIN

Edward Fleetwood is a collector of classic car models. He was able to recover a few, but many were beaten up by the floodwaters that came after the hurricane.

Mike Lameu of Arabi recovers from his parents' home the American flag that draped his father's casket. His father, Lawrence, was a Marine who served in the Korean War. The flag was one of the few items Lameu and his family could salvage.

The Lameus and the Fleetwoods survived Betsy in 1965 and returned to their Arabi roots to rebuild and recover their lives. But now, after Hurricane Katrina, the families aren't sure they have the heart to go through it all again.

adamantly work to get the area opened sectionally."

The plan, however, is not without roadblocks. The van system would have to pass City Hall muster, and Marchand said Mayor Ray Nagin told her this week he did not have the "manpower" to cordon off blocks north of North Claiborne Avenue to prevent neighbors from entering areas where power lines still dangled across streets and some homes appeared on the verge of collapse. City officials could not be reached Friday and had not issued a plan for reentry into the Lower 9th Ward.

Further, soil and air quality test results in the historic Holy Cross neighborhood and blocks northward have not been released, meaning returning refugees would have to use boots, gloves and masks to protect themselves against possible toxins from an oil spill in St. Bernard Parish, Marchand said. An Environmental Protection Agency spokeswoman said Friday that no date had been set for issuance of that data.

Also, recent seepage through patched portions of the Industrial Canal's eastern levee at North Claiborne and Florida avenues could pose problems for residents, though gravel and sand piled this week to 10 feet above sea level appeared to be plugging the gaps, a spokeswoman for the Army Corps of Engineers' New Orleans district said.

"A little bit of rain or a little bit of wind, and it should hold up fine," spokeswoman Susan Jackson said. "If we get a real heavy storm, if we get another Rita, that definitely will raise everybody's level of concern."

Some low-lying sections above North Claiborne Avenue still held small ponds of water Friday, though most streets had been emptied by St. Bernard Parish pumps, Jackson said. All seven pumps at the Florida Avenue station still were at least two weeks from being operational, she said, adding that four temporary pumps installed by the corps were ridding the area of its last patches of floodwater Friday.

Despite those complications, Lower 9th Ward residents grew increasingly eager to cross bridges over the Industrial Canal to get home to their vacant streets, especially after watching residents of flood-ruined Lakeview, Gentilly and eastern New Orleans begin trekking this week through swamped houses, saving photographs, jewelry and other mementos from overwhelming mold and muck.

One problem, some said, had been the inclination by politicians and news reporters to lump together the entire area from Florida Avenue to the river, and from the canal to the parish line, as a disaster zone adequate only for bulldozing and therefore off-limits to average citizens.

Some homes in the Lower 9th Ward near the Industrial Canal levee break have collapsed. City officials could not be reached Friday and had not issued a plan for re-entry into the Lower 9th Ward.

A drive through the roughly two-square-mile sector Friday, though, revealed a disparate scene, with most buildings above North Claiborne Avenue indeed destroyed by Katrina and Rita. But south of that main drag, many structures appeared sound, and some on the highest ground even lacked telltale water marks on exterior walls because floodwaters apparently did not settle there for long periods.

"The national media really doesn't have any way of realizing the distinctions between the parts of the Lower 9th Ward, so I think they've been thinking the whole Lower 9th Ward is a write-off. But if you actually see the houses, you come to a very different conclusion," said Stephanie Bruno, a project director at New Orleans' Preservation Resource Center.

"In the Holy Cross area, these are definitely houses that can be repaired and rehabited without major problems," she said, referring to blocks south of St. Claude Avenue. "This is a fiercely proud neighborhood, and they just need to get into their neighborhood to get their neighborhood back."

Despite checkpoints staffed by the New Orleans Police Department, Willie Fernandez managed to "finagle" his way back to his Caffin Avenue home Friday. Erecting a pile of mattresses and broken wooden furniture, Fernandez said he did not understand why homeowners living near Holy Cross School, which administrators said could reopen by Jan.1, could not have returned when the flood receded weeks ago.

"To have to sit back and wait while your whole area is dry, that's what really hurts," he said.

Evacuated to her cousin's home in Marksville, Stacy Rockwood's anger also festered. Rockwood said satellite photos she saw on the Internet suggested her Flood Street house might not have lived up to the roadway's name. But she knew from neighbors who had sneaked into the Holy Cross area that many homes had been left unlocked by rescue workers. In fact, on a single block of Forstall Street near Burgundy Street, four of seven front doors stood wide open Friday morning.

"I have personal fears that my house will be looted because it's open," Rockwood said. "I don't want to stay; I just want to get in to see it. I want to see how bad the mold is, and I know it's getting worse every single day."

Even residents with homes above North Claiborne Avenue, where smashed windows in nearly every building provided a view into muddy hellholes, said they wanted to get in. Sharon Johnson-Murphy, who saw her house for the first time Friday after entering the Lower 9th Ward with a contractors' access pass, said her neighbors should be allowed to return to realize that their homes truly are gone.

"They still got a lot of people who think their houses can be salvaged, but it's over. This will no longer be my home," Johnson-Murphy said, snapping photos of her mangled front door and of interior walls that crumbled at the gentlest touch. "You need to see it to really believe it. It's good to see it and get out.

"I'm OK now," she said. "I can put it out of my mind."

HURRICANE AFTERMATH

Riley: Bad officers to be dealt with more severely

CRIME, from A-1

The pace is quickening a bit now that patrols are up and running, but there is no question that both the incidence and level of violence are low.

The past two days were telling, Riley said, scanning the numbers on his Blackberry. On Wednesday, there were 41 arrests, with 28 of those classified as "municipal," meaning misdemeanor-type incidents like traffic violations or drunk and disorderly conduct. Thursday saw just 19 arrests, 15 of which were for municipal offenses.

"I don't know why people in Baton Rouge and elsewhere think there is a lot of crime in New Orleans," Defillo said, reacting to panicky comments on Thursday at a meeting in Baton Rouge of small-business owners from New Orleans. "It's just not here."

Indeed, in neighborhoods that flooded, there remain more dirt and dust-covered cars than people. And interviews Friday with New Orleanians in several neighborhoods that stayed dry showed crime has slipped from its normally high perch in the list of their concerns.

While the perennially understaffed NOPD has been further reduced in strength by the storm's tumult, to fewer than 1,500 officers, state troopers from all over the country are assisting with patrols, and National Guard troops — about 2,700, an NOPD spokesman said Friday — remain a highly visible presence throughout the city since the 82nd Airborne pulled out.

Humvees rumble along residential streets and soldiers are present in NOPD's makeshift headquarters, in a ballroom of the French Quarter's Royal Sonesta Hotel, giving New Orleans the feel of a city under occupation.

"How brazen would you have to be to be a criminal these days?" marveled Robert Boulanger,27, a carpenter who rides around the city on his bicycle and said authorities stop him regularly. "A friend of mine had his car broken into but that's about it."

On the corner of Simon Bolivar Avenue and Josephine Street, Antoinette Simmons, 34, was returning to her home. In the past, she conceded, crime worried her daily. Now it's not an issue.

"It's empty," she said of her neighborhood. "You don't have to worry about too much."

But Riley, a deputy superintendent who took over as acting chief last week after Superintendent Eddie Compass was eased out, has plenty on his desk. It's not just the spike in homicides that had begun to worry the department.

Stricter rules

Instead, Riley is supervising Nagin's re-entry plan, and has issued orders for cops to be at their most courteous, letting residents know they are welcome.

While a smile and a wave may be the department's public face, in private many officers are still seething over colleagues who appear to have deserted their posts during the storm's aftermath or who joined in the looting they were supposed to avert.

It's hardly the first time the NOPD has had to deal with lawlessness in its own ranks. At the zenith of the department's dysfunction, in the mid-1990s, two officers were sent to death row for murder and dozens of others were charged with felonies. Riley said no big-city department is immune to the problem, and noted the vast majority of officers behaved honorably, at times even heroically. But he said he won't sugarcoat the issue.

"You will see very soon the development of a police integrity bureau that I consider hard-hitting," he said. "I won't let officers embarrass this department and our penalties are going to be a little more severe."

Last week, Riley announced that four officers had been suspended, one reassigned, and at least a dozen others put under investigation for allegedly looting or failing to combat looting in their presence. That number grew Thursday when Riley revealed he is taking a close look at roughly 40 Third District officers based on the suspicion that they bolted from the city in Cadillacs swiped from a downtown dealership.

As for the alleged deserters, Riley reiterated his position that not every cop who didn't appear at his usual post should be labeled a coward. In many cases, officers were marooned in their homes by floodwaters, or moved with family members to Jefferson Parish, which made a return into the city impossible, particularly for officers assigned to districts like the 7th in eastern New Orleans or the 3rd in Lakeview, both of which were essentially submerged.

"Right now things get better every day, but I would say the department is working at 60 to 65 percent efficiency," Riley said. "Getting it back to 100 percent is the number one goal."

A career in the force

Riley, who next week marks his 24th anniversary with the department, calls the moment "bittersweet." The ascent to acting police chief was complicated by his friendship with Compass and his loyalty to Nagin, who reportedly forced Compass out.

But Riley, a Southern University graduate who spent much of his career in the 5th and 6th districts before rising through the ranks to a post at headquarters, has never made a secret of his ambition and drive. He made an unsuccessful run last year for criminal sheriff, with Mayor Ray Nagin's backing.

His career record is not spotless. He has been suspended from the force during investigation of traffic accidents, and in a case that became a major issue last year during the sheriff's race, he acknowledged a lapse in judgment during his time as an investigator with Internal Affairs.

In that case, Riley failed to follow up on an interview with the girlfriend of former officer Victor Gant, who spoke with Riley at headquarters and said Gant had assaulted her.

Gant's girlfriend was later killed, and Gant emerged as a suspect in her death.

But investigators found no evidence that Riley had tipped Gant in any way and it appeared to be true that the girlfriend declined to make out a formal complaint against the officer when Riley interviewed her. Top-ranking Public Integrity Bureau officers essentially cleared Riley of any wrongdoing.

Despite those past problems, Riley is considered a strong candidate to become chief on a permanent basis. "I think Riley is the guy," said Rafael Goyeneche, the executive director of the Metropolitan Crime Commission and a seasoned NOPD analyst. This is not entirely to Goyeneche's liking. The importance of the job requires a national search for Compass' successor, said Goyeneche, who favors hiring a talented and disciplined executive over a swashbuckling crimefighter.

Riley said he has not been told whether the mayor will make his promotion permanent, and Nagin has given no indication of long-term plans for the post. Meanwhile, Riley says, he's trying to focus on the job. He sidesteps questions about the NOPD's controversial residency rule or the pace of federal aid in the wild first week after Katrina, saying he didn't want to delve into political issues.

"I'm just trying to deal with the crisis here," said Riley, whose daughter evacuated with his ex-wife to Texas and has enrolled in school there. "I haven't had time to really reflect on all of that and I don't know what my opinion might be."

Plan would open casinos downtown

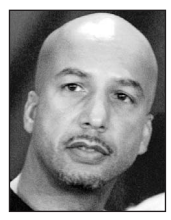
lucky" to get to half of the pre-Katrina revenue level. And without significant financial support in the next 90 days, he said, he will have no choice but to lay off more city workers.

And without drastic action to spark development in the city's port and tourism industries, he said, "we're going to limp along for the next three to five years."



Faced with what will be a long recovery period, Nagin said, the city can't afford to lay back and do the same thing.

"I'd love to have another solution for our citizens," Nagin said. "I'm not a big gaming person. I'm not a big gambler."

The mayor conceded that several obstacles stand in the way.

For one, the state's arrangement with Harrah's New Orleans Casino guarantees that Harrah's will be the only land-based casino in the state. If the agreement is violated, Harrah's does not have to pay its taxes to the state.

Each year, Harrah's is required to pay a minimum of $60 million or 21.5 percent of its revenue, whichever is greater. Most years, Harrah's has paid the 21.5 percent, which has amounted to $65 or $70 million in recent years.

Mayor Ray Nagin
'I'd love to have another solution for our citizens'

The Legislature would have to approve Nagin's concept, and the state would have to hammer out a new agreement with Harrah's – one likely to prove costly to the state, Nagin said. Even if the idea clears those hurdles, New Orleans voters would decide the matter in a referendum.

The proposed Casino Conversion & Gaming Zone would cover a U-shaped area starting at Claiborne Avenue and running along Canal Street, around Harrah's and back up Poydras Street to Claiborne.

Only hotels with at least 500 rooms would be eligible. The hotels that appear to fit the bill are the Hyatt, the Sheraton, the Hilton, the Marriott, the Ritz-Carlton, the Park Plaza and the Astor Crowne Plaza. It was not clear Friday whether the Monteleone and the Fairmont, which are near the zone and have more than 500 rooms, would qualify.

Hotels that converted to casinos would have to offer all forms of gambling, not just slot machines, and would have to agree to pay a "living wage" of at least $8 an hour plus health insurance and benefits, Nagin said.

Under Nagin's proposal, the city and state would equally split all gambling revenue. The mayor said he did not have an estimate on how much tax money would come in, but said that Mississippi's Gulf Coast casinos were generating about $150 million per year for the state before Hurricane Katrina made landfall.

"We have an incredible opportunity to accelerate growth right now," he said.

No single casino or hotel company would be allowed to hold a market share greater than 25 percent, the mayor said. He said he had had a brief discussion with the director of the Greater New Orleans Hotel and Lodging Association, who showed "some interest and excitement" about the idea.

"We're well on our way to recovery," he said. "We just want to accelerate the process."

Nagin also said that he had discussed the notion with Blanco and Andy Kopplin, who leads Blanco's hurricane-recovery effort. He said the idea caught them "a little off-guard."

"They were open to it," he said. "I'm not saying they endorsed it wholeheartedly, but they're open to it."

Asked whether he feared that his idea could put New Orleans' rich cultural traditions at risk, turning the city into a Southern Las Vegas, Nagin said he's not worried.

The mayor said New Orleans has so much more than Las Vegas, citing great food, historic architecture, the French Quarter and Mardi Gras Indians, among other cultural touchstones.

"I don't ever see a scenario where New Orleans becomes Las Vegas," Nagin said.

Rove told Bush he wasn't involved in CIA leak

By John Solomon
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove told President Bush and others that he never engaged in an effort to disclose a CIA operative's identity to discredit her husband's criticism of the administration's Iraq policy, according to people with knowledge of Rove's account in the investigation.

They said Rove's denial to Bush occurred during a brief conversation in July 2003, shortly after media reports revealed that former Ambassador Joseph Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, worked as a covert CIA operative.

Those with direct knowledge of evidence gathered in the criminal investigation spoke to The Associated Press only on condition of anonymity because of grand jury secrecy.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald is wrapping up an investigation into whether Rove; Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby; or other White House aides divulged Plame's identity in violation of federal law.

Besides the disclosure of Plame's identity, the investigation is examining whether presidential aides mishandled classified information, made false statements or obstructed justice.

Rove is slated to testify before the grand jury soon for a fourth time, although prosecutors have told him they no longer can assure he will avoid indictment. Rove offered in July to return to the grand jury for additional testimony, and Fitzgerald accepted that offer after taking grand jury testimony from the formerly jailed New York Times reporter Judith Miller.

The discussion with Bush, along with others, was general and did not get into specifics concerning Rove's contacts with two reporters, Time magazine's Matthew Cooper and syndicated columnist Robert Novak, who wrote stories identifying Plame, the people familiar with Rove's account said.

They said Bush asked Rove to assure him he was not involved in an effort to divulge Plame's identity and punish Wilson, and the longtime confidant assured him so. He answered similarly when White House press secretary Scott McClellan asked a similar question.

Robert Luskin, Rove's attorney, declined Friday to comment on the specifics of the discussions with Bush but confirmed his client maintains — then and now — he did not engage in an effort to disclose Plame's identity.

Rove has told a grand jury he first learned of Plame's work for the CIA from news reporters and then discussed it with Novak and Cooper.

"Did Karl purposely set out to disclose Valerie Plame's identity in order to punish Joe Wilson for his criticism? The answer is, 'No,'" Luskin said. "That was his answer in July 2003 and in October 2003 (when he first testified) And it remains his answer today."

Let our family make your family comfortable.

Cleanup at SUNO has yet to get started

SUNO, from A-1

Supervisors. Board members said they are determined to bring SUNO back to life, ordering new filings in a long-running higher education desegregation lawsuit that seek court backing for rebuilding the 49-year-old college.

"I will say emphatically: We will do everything we know to do to make sure that campus again becomes alive and well," said board Chairman Johnny Anderson. "We want to make sure that we do whatever we can to restore hope."

The brighter talk for SUNO — still vacant, waterlogged and strewn with debris — came as cleanup work picked up momentum at Xavier and Dillard universities, older private institutions that also serve predominantly black student bodies. Hundreds of contract workers are now buzzing about a fenced-off Xavier campus. Flood and wind damage from Katrina was extensive at all three universities, more comprehensive in its reach than that seen, for example, at Tulane University or the University of New Orleans. Loyola University had only light wind damage.

The water line matches up with the window sill at Southern University at New Orleans, where lingering floodwater delayed remediation.

National attention

The paralyzing blows to all three New Orleans universities targeting African-Americans, with a combined student body of 10,000 and workforce of 1,500 before the storm, is beginning to grab national attention. The United Negro College Fund, affiliated with Dillard and Xavier, has begin a fund-raising campaign; the National Association for Equal Opportunity in Education is looking for ways to help; and a smattering of foundations are pitching in with grants, officials said.

"We're getting offers of help; we're getting word that people are trying to structure efforts for us," said Edward Jackson, interim president of the Southern University System and chancellor of Southern in Baton Rouge, a refuge for many SUNO students.

Dillard President Marvalene Hughes, who took over the post in July, said she has received "enormous support" from former colleagues and other colleges across the country. When she gave an address Sunday at Hampton University in Virginia, for example, Hughes was presented $10,000 raised at the campus for Dillard.

Brown and Princeton universities weeks ago promised technical help for Dillard as well as support in repairing buildings and restocking the library. At the time, Brown President Ruth Simmons, a Dillard graduate, said Dillard has "been a dependable source of support in the struggle to overcome disadvantaged backgrounds."

Dillard, Xavier and SUNO officials say they will rebound quickly, with tentative plans by the three to resume classes, in some cases off campus, in January. But their agendas hinge on the availability of federal storm relief money, the supply of housing for students and faculty and, especially in the case of SUNO, the repopulation of New Orleans. Dillard and Xavier recruit strongly outside on New Orleans and the state.

Louisiana's commissioner of higher education, Joseph Savoie, also noted that "none of these institutions have significant endowments that they can lean on."

Xavier and Dillard have long-term endowment funds of $54 million and $46 million, respectively, a fraction of that reported by many public or private universities, while SUNO recently started building an endowment, now totaling about $2 million.

While such funds are designed in part for emergency needs, campus policies restrict their use, and officials at the three universities said they hope to cover restoration costs with insurance payments and federal aid.

Specific damage estimates are not yet available from the universities, but they are already seeking to get a slice of a federal relief package that could ultimately total billions of dollars. The help would be directed to a wide range of needs, including building repair and reconstruction costs, financial aid for students and temporary pay support for faculty and staff members. Dillard is seeking at least $350 million, while Xavier is asking for at least $75 million, their presidents said.

Avoiding layoffs

In both cases, the universities hope for a quick response, within the next few weeks, hoping to avoid layoffs.

"I'm sitting here on a wing and a prayer … I'm at the drop-dead stage," Xavier President Norman Francis said, while Hughes said, "It will be very difficult replacing people who have spent so many years coming to understand the Dillard culture."

Gex, at SUNO, said he hasn't yet received word from state officials about whether he must lay off any of the university's 450 staff members, including 160 faculty members. In the meantime, administrators are trying to keep them engaged in "meaningful work," in some cases teaching classes at the Southern campus in Baton Rouge. He didn't know Friday how much in federal aid the campus is seeking.

Long before Katrina hit, many in the higher education have seen the SUNO campus as vulnerable to elimination or merger with another institution, due to its relatively small size, limited resources and frequent internal political squabbles. But SUNO advocates on Friday said they see no threat of the campus being shut down permanently, and in fact hope for a bright future founded on new construction. Savoie echoed that view, saying that, while various public colleges around New Orleans may see changes in their missions, there "will be an important role for an institution like SUNO … I don't see a diminished role, I see an enhanced role."

Gex said that surveys of displaced SUNO students, now concentrated in Baton Rouge but also scattered to other states, show they are eager to return to the campus, but flood damage has made housing a critical issue. Locating a colony of FEMA trailers on a north section of the campus, possibly within a few months, offers an answer, he said.

"I think we can get them (students) all back eventually," Gex said. "If we can deal with the housing piece for both faculty and students, we'll get a very good return."

FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said SUNO's push for help with housing and classroom space is among "various opportunities" that the federal agency may consider in New Orleans but that it was premature to discuss the matter in detail.

One SUNO faculty member, asking not to be named, said professors are eager to return but that there is frustration that a cleanup of the site hasn't yet begun, even as mold continues to spread through areas not hit with floodwater. Gex said remediation was delayed by lingering floodwater, but activity, including grounds cleanup and security improvements, should be seen within a week.

SUNO's student government president, Avis White, used an appearance at the system board meeting to thank the Baton Rouge campus for giving SUNO students refuge, saying officials went out of their way to reopen class registration and find book vouchers for the New Orleanians. In an interview, she said it seems more realistic to hope for a resumption of classes at the campus next summer, rather than in January, but that many students are prepared to pitch in with the cleanup.

"We may be displaced, but we're not destroyed," she said. "We'll be back."

HEAVE: THE NEW BREACH THEORY

Investigators are looking into soil heaving as the reason for the 17th Street and London Avenue canal breaches. A look at the theory:

Water still seeping through repairs

LEVEES, from A-1

"It's like jumping on a diving board if you haven't got one side pinned down," he said, adding that the fact that the east side levee wall failed and the west side didn't supports the theory.

The "heave" phenomenon, with water pressure pushing under the levee walls and driving the soil in an arc on the other side, points to possible design or construction flaws in the walls and contradicts initial explanations by the Army Corps of Engineers that the floodwalls had been topped by storm surge.

Water did not top either the 17th Street or London Avenue canal walls, said Dr. Peter Nicholson, an engineering professor at the University of Hawaii and leader of a second investigative team representing the American Society of Civil Engineers.

The teams have been in New Orleans for the past week, touring various levee breach areas as part of an initial investigation into Katrina's effects on the levee system. They expect to issue a preliminary report on their findings in 30 days. All of the engineers said it's too soon to call their preliminary findings conclusive, in large part because the information they are gathering must be matched to the design and as-built drawings of the levees, which have not yet been found by the Army Corps of Engineers.

The corps has its own investigative team also looking at the levees. Paul Mlaker, who is leading that effort, said the corps is still looking for a variety of documents that investigators need to confirm their initial findings, including the construction plans and schematics that would indicate exactly how the wall was designed and constructed.

A key issue that officials hope is answered by those documents is how deep the metal sheet piling is beneath the concrete upper wall. Mlaker could provide no estimate Friday of how deep the pilings were supposed to be.

Corps officials also are searching for records of test borings conducted in advance of the wall construction that might indicate whether builders should have been aware of the soft soil beneath the wall.

Engineering Professor Raymond Seed, also of University of California-Berkeley, said corps officials indicated to the researchers that soil borings were taken every 500 feet along the path of the levee. Corps officials are now taking new borings in the canal adjacent to the wall to help determine what soils actually are beneath the wall. Seed said they may also pull some of the sheet piling beneath the wall to determine exactly how deep it was built.

Gordon Boutwell, a soils specialist with the civil engineers team, said water from the canal would leak through peaty soil faster than through more dense clay, "and when the levee starts to fail, the peat loses a lot of its strength."

He said the layer of peat may be 5 to 8 feet thick and is believed to be 20 to 25 feet below the base of the levee wall.

At the London Avenue Canal, the same heaving of soil is believed to have occurred, several of the engineers said. In addition, there's also an indication that the connection between the concrete levee wall and the metal sheet piling may have failed in at least part of the breach there.

Seed also said that although there's evidence that a barge that floated into the 9th Ward from the Industrial Canal hit one of the wall panels there, it doesn't look like that alone caused the failure of a 200-foot-long section of that levee wall. Instead, there's clear evidence that water topped a lengthy stretch of the wall, eroding the earth below it on the east side of the levee.

Mlaker said water is still leaking through temporary repairs at both the 17th Street and London Avenue canals, which he said is the result of the porous materials – rock and gravel – used to fill in the breaches. Both temporary repairs have been raised to 10 feet.

Mlaker said sheet piling may be installed on the canal side of the repairs in the 17th Street Canal to allow workers to remove the initial temporary repair and replace it with a second temporary repair.

Bea said that if there's a silver lining to the levee story, it's a stretch of levee along Lake Borgne that did not fail despite being topped. He credited a wide stretch of wetlands and trees in front of that levee with blocking the waves that eroded a similar stretch of levee along the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet from its original 17 feet or taller height to only 4 feet.

With the wide Gulf Outlet channel in front, that levee was hit by continuous waves as the storm went across the area, he said.

Gulf Coast death toll from Hurricane Katrina hits 1,240

of 1900 was responsible for at least 8,000 deaths and remains the deadliest hurricane in history. The death total from the Lake Okeechobee hurricane of 1928 that overtopped a levee at the Florida lake killed at least 2,500 people.

Lapore said Katrina probably would be ranked as the fourth deadliest storm, with the overall death count of 1,240 including deaths in Florida, Mississippi and Alabama.

By comparison, the death toll following Hurricane Camille was 256, and Hurricane Betsy, 75. An unnamed hurricane that hit Land Island in Louisiana in 1856 killed 400, a hurricane that hit Grand Isle in 1909 killed 350 and a 1915 hurricane that hit New Orleans killed 275.

The exact number of deaths in the older storms is hard to know because officials believe huge storm surges washed away bodies, Lapore said. And once people were separated it was hard for them to find one another, a problem that has arisen in the wake of Katrina despite advanced communications.

Archives from the weather service show 14 of the 15 deadliest hurricanes were the equivalent of a category 3 or higher, and the large death totals were primarily a result of storm surges of 10 feet or higher associated with those storms.

Since Katrina came ashore as a Category 4 storm, it could be expected to result in a high death tally. Lapore said there are several factors besides wind speed that combine to make some storms more deadly than others.

For New Orleans, topography and population concentration added to the mix.

"There are a host of factors that play into the outcome, some of which we have control over and some of which we do not have control over."

Police shot man listed as Katrina victim

By Janet McConnaughey
Associated Press writer

NEW ORLEANS — One person listed as a victim of Hurricane Katrina was actually shot by police.

Officer Ronald Mitchell shot and killed Danny Brumfield, 45, outside the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, the New Orleans Police Department confirmed Friday. Police said it happened Sept. 3 about 2 a.m., in the darkness before the National Guard arrived and began evacuating the Convention Center.

A police statement released after The Associated Press asked about the shooting said that, moments after Mitchell and his partner heard what appeared to be a gunshot, a man jumped onto the hood of their patrol car swinging something shiny. It was attempted murder of a police officer, a four-paragraph news release said.

That wasn't what happened, say Brumfield's daughter, Shantan Brumfield, and his niece Africa Brumfield, both of whom were there and both of whom were interviewed by phone by the AP.

They say the officer who shot Brumfield had hit him twice with a squad car before doing so — a nudge the first time, and a heavier bump the second. That was when he leaped onto the hood and was shot, they said. Afterward, they said, the car ran over him, and other officers didn't come to investigate for several hours.

Police say he was shot because he appeared to be attacking an officer. Capt. Marlon Defillo, a New Orleans police spokesman, said he had not heard any reports about Brumfield being hit or run over by a car. He said the homicide section is investigating the incident, and all information will be turned over to the district attorney's office.

By all accounts, that night was a time when looting was rampant and widespread rumors of violence had everyone, including police, running scared.

Brumfield had spent several sleepless nights caring for his own five grandchildren and others in the area, because people thought they had to clutch their children against rapists and killers who would snatch them into the dark.

"The lady next to us, she had like 10 or 15 children with her and nobody to help her," Shantan Brumfield said. "He helped her feed the children. I don't know if they were her children or nieces or nephews."

When Hurricane Katrina approached, Brumfield had stayed to protect his house from looters. He wound up having to saw through the roof so that he, his wife, Deborah, and her diabetic mother, Ruby Augustine, could escape from floods that reached high on the second floor.

His mother-in-law, wife and son wound up at the Astrodome. Danny Brumfield wound up in front of the Convention Center, where he found his daughter and her children. Several of their other relatives were there, too, Shantan Brumfield said.

They and other people in the area had set up chairs near some steps. The children were inside, adults in the chairs as a barricade of bodies. Shantan Brumfield said a commotion broke out shortly before the squad car came by. Africa Brumfield said a woman had been screaming for some time.

Danny Brumfield got into the street. His niece thought he was trying to stop the police car; his daughter wasn't sure why he did.

Africa Brumfield said the officer slammed on the brakes and her uncle put his hands on the hood to show he wasn't carrying any weapons. Shantan Brumfield said he put his hands on the hood after he was hit, apparently trying to stop it.

Both agree that the car sped up, hit him again, and he jumped onto the hood.

Shantan Brumfield said he reached up toward the glass, as if trying to get the car to stop and let him down. Africa Brumfield said he had reached down and pulled out a pair of shears which she had given him earlier that day, as the only weapon they had to protect the children.

That was when he was shot. Then, both said, the car left, over Brumfield's body rather than around it.

Africa Brumfield said she wrote her uncle's name and birthdate on a piece of duct tape which she wrapped around his arm, and her cousin wrote information about her father on a piece of paper which they put into a zip-lock bag and taped to his body.

Someone found a black blanket with which they covered the body, so his grandchildren wouldn't have to see it.

Buses showed up about 10 a.m. that day, three blocks away.

"My mother walked up to him. She said her goodbyes there," Africa Brumfield said. "She said, as much as we didn't want to leave his body there, we really didn't have any other choice.

"Then we ran because our lives depended on it."

By the time his body was recovered and released to his family, it was unrecognizable.

"Everything you've ever seen in a horror film does not compare to that reality," Africa Brumfield said. "The only way I was able to identify him was that the position my uncle died in was entrenched on my mind."

Uprooted firm finds home in Slidell

More may be on way, local officials say

By Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

A major high-tech company is moving into Slidell Memorial Hospital's Wellness Pavilion and a group of New Orleans area physicians may relocate to the hospital's Primary Care Pavilion, officials have said.

Hospital officials called the arrangement a "win-win situation" for the community, its economy and health care in the post-Katrina environment of recovery and rebuilding.

City officials agreed, noting that it matters little where in Slidell the high-tech company called 3001 Inc. is located.

The firm, a defense contractor and public and private industry company based in Fairfax, Va., had been negotiating with city, military and other officials about moving its New Orleans branch headquarters to Slidell.

Initially, 3001 wanted to move to the Defense Information Systems Agency at Gause and Robert boulevards. Hurricane Katrina, the uncertainty surrounding the anticipated closure of DISA, and other factors changed those plans.

Slidell Memorial spokesman Sam Caruso Jr. said the geospatial services company first approached hospital officials a few months ago about leasing the second floor of the Primary Care Pavilion at 901 Gause next to the hospital's main campus.

An instant-care medical group led by Dr. Miguel Culasso has a five-year lease, signed in January 2004, for the bottom floor of the once-empty care pavilion.

But after Katrina devastated much of the New Orleans area Aug. 29, "we have had numerous inquiries about space from physicians" who no longer have space in which to practice because of the storm's widespread destruction, Caruso said.

As a result, Chief Executive Officer Bob Hawley and other hospital officials decided to lease the second floor of the Primary Care Pavilion as physician offices, which is what it was originally intended for when it was built in 1997.

As to when physicians from the south shore and elsewhere will be setting up shop there, Caruso said the hospital is in "very preliminary" talks with several groups, adding, "We cannot reveal the names yet, pending further negotiation."

In the meantime, 3001 already is moving into the Fitness Center on the second floor of the Wellness Pavilion at 501 Robert Blvd., Patrick Upton, a 3001 supervisor, said Thursday as a crew worked on renovations and installations.

Parish seeks OK for loan

Cash flow critical for debris removal

By Charlie Chapple
St. Tammany bureau

St. Tammany Parish will ask the State Bond Commission for permission to borrow up to $10 million as a precautionary move to prevent cash flow problems during recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

"This doesn't mean we're going to borrow the money," parish Chief Administrative Officer Bill Oiler said after the Parish Council on Thursday night approved, without discussion, measures to seek a loan backed by future revenue.

"This is being done just as a precaution in case we have cash flow problems," Oiler said. "We don't want to get caught in a cash flow situation. But if we do, we'll have this to fall back on."

So far, the parish hasn't experienced money problems while awaiting FEMA reimbursement for the costs of hurricane cleanup

Maternity home near Mandeville rejected

No deal reached on site for unwed moms

By Charlie Chapple
St. Tammany bureau

A zoning permit for a maternity home for unwed mothers northeast of Mandeville has been narrowly rejected by the St. Tammany Parish Council, ending eight months of debate between proponents of the project and opposing residents of Forest Brook subdivision.

During a meeting Thursday night, the council voted 8-6 to concur with a Zoning Commission decision to deny the permit sought by Bill and Shari Karanas to build and operate the nonprofit maternity home on 1.25 acres south of Louisiana 1088 and west of Forest Brook Boulevard.

Scott Mitchell helps daughter Susan to the sink in their new FEMA trailer, which is parked at their home in Slidell's Park Place subdivision. The Mitchells are among 29 St. Tammany Parish families to have such trailers, and Scott Mitchell couldn't be happier about it. FEMA and other aid agencies have 'been a blessing to us,' he said.

FEMA trailers roll in, families close behind

Tammany residents homeward bound

By Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

The Mitchell family of Slidell's Park Place subdivision and the Lenahans of rural Lacombe are among the luckier victims of Hurricane Katrina.

They have a place to live other than with relatives, friends or the trailer park and tent cities that have been springing up since the powerful storm roared through the New Orleans area and the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29.

The Mitchells and Lenahans are living on their own property, in travel trailers provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. As of Friday, only 29 families in St. Tammany Parish could say that, FEMA officials said.

Until most of the debris was cleared from their yard, the Mitchells' home on Park Drive fit snugly into the ugly picture of devastation painted by Katrina in so many of the subdivisions in south Slidell and elsewhere. One major difference is the air-conditioned travel trailer now sitting in their front yard.

Taking little more than the clothes on their backs and a few belongings as Katrina approached, the family fled to stay with relatives in Simmesport, where they watched with mounting anxiety the national weather and news reports about the New Orleans area.

Jeanne Mitchell, who's on leave from her job as a bus attendant for the St. Tammany Parish school system, stayed in Simmesport with 8-year-old daughter Susan as husband Charles Mitchell, a former longshoreman on disability retirement, made several trips back to Slidell.

Tolls won't be taken on Causeway after all

Bridge is losing $40,000 each day

From staff reports

Tolls will resume Monday on the Crescent City Connection, but the decision to reinstate tolls on the Lake Pontchartrain Causeway has been rescinded, officials said.

After six weeks of allowing motorists to cross the Crescent City Connection free of charge, the state will resume collecting tolls on the bridge and ferries at 5 a.m. Monday, said Randy Paisant, assistant director of the bridge authority.

However, National Guard and emergency vehicles will not be required to pay the tolls, he said.

Lake Pontchartrain Causeway officials have rescinded their decision to reinstate tolls on Monday.

Motorist using the Gretna-Jackson Avenue and Canal Street-Algiers ferries, which have been operating since Sept. 16, also will resume paying tolls on Monday. The Algiers-Chalmette ferry has been out of service because of hurricane damage.

State officials did not estimate how much toll revenue was lost since they suspended collection. Tolls were stopped on Aug. 26 to allow motorists to evacuate the region quickly as Hurricane Katrina bore down on the coast.

Since the toll revenue is used to pay bridge employees' salaries and other operations costs, the state has insurance to covers three weeks of income

Kenner raises stink about trash pickup

Companies say they're doing their best

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

The Kenner City Council spent more than an hour Thursday complaining that no one wants to pick up the city's garbage in the wake of Hurricane Katrina – not its longtime trash hauler, Waste Management; not the newly contracted Ramelli Janitorial Service; and certainly not the out-of-state companies that didn't even reply to a bid request.

"I know I'm getting calls that people's garbage has not been picked up since before the storm," Councilman Marc Johnson told his colleagues during their meeting. "What's the plan? Because it's unacceptable."

But the garbage companies already on the ground in Kenner say they are doing the best they can to deal with the unprecedented disaster, and a Waste Management official said the company has a meeting scheduled with the city Monday to discuss getting on a once-a-week pickup timetable.

"I expect we will have a set schedule," said Rene Faucheux, Waste Management's manager of municipal and community affairs for south Louisiana. He said Friday that his company has done several sweeps of the entire city, but acknowledged that some areas could have been missed in the confusion.

"There's just an unprecedented amount of garbage and trash in the city," he said.

Upset with Waste Management, Kenner Mayor Phil Capitano fired off a warning letter last week and contracted with Ramelli Janitorial Service, a New Orleans company, to cover half of the city, while Waste Management continues with the other half.

Kenner's chief of staff, Phil Ramon, said the city sought other proposals, but no companies responded. But council members said Thursday that hiring Ramelli to split the load isn't working.

Difficulty hiring workers has hampered his company's progress, company President Bob Ramelli said. He said the process also is going slow because Federal Emergency Management Agency workers ride along and dictate what workers can pick up.

"We have to determine what is trash," he told the council Thursday. "We're trying to do our best."

Trash cans line Martinique Avenue in Kenner on Friday. 'I know I'm getting calls that people's garbage has not been picked up since before the storm,' Councilman Marc Johnson said Thursday.

Ramelli said he would have a total of six more trucks – for a total of 10 – in Kenner once they are approved by FEMA. Ramon told him not to worry about FEMA.

"I will take care of that," Ramon said forcefully. "Get the trucks in our city."

Ramelli Janitorial Inc. contributed $2,000 to Kenner Mayor Phil Capitano last year after Capitano was elected mayor, according to campaign finance reports Capitano filed with the state.

Ramelli finished his remarks by asking that frustrated Kenner residents not yell at his drivers.

"They said, 'We're not coming back,' " Ramelli said, imitating the drivers. " 'This is a hostile environment.' "

Hospital makes room for displaced doctors

SLIDELL, from B-1

Upton said the company hoped to have the facility "fully functional" by late next week or early the following week. And the company's stay is expected to be a long-term one, he said.

"They're running our network lines and everything right now," he said of the crew. "And then somebody from the hospital has to come get the exercise equipment out of here."

The company relocated its New Orleans branch to temporary headquarters in Lake Charles in the wake of Katrina, "and then (Hurricane) Rita came along and chased us out," Upton said.

At first, 3001 expects to staff the Slidell office with personnel from the New Orleans branch and the Intel-Defense Solutions branch at Stennis Space Center in Hancock County, Miss., company officials have said.

The company was established in 1965 in the Lake Charles area as a two-person consulting, engineering and surveying firm for projects in southwest Louisiana. It now has more than 150 employees with offices in seven states and projects throughout the Americas.

The New Orleans office is no longer in operation. Andy Dougherty, who heads the division at Stennis, was unavailable for comment.

Caruso indicated the Fitness Center will be relocated. For those who regularly used it until it closed last week, he said, the hospital has an agreement with Slidell Athletic Club to take center members at the rates they were paying through December 2006.

He acknowledged there is some medical equipment in the center that is unavailable at similar private facilities in the area.

"For the few patients that use those machines, we are working with their physicians and some of our existing space elsewhere on our campus to ensure that they do not lose access to those machines," he said.

The center had three full-time employees "and a couple of part-timers," Caruso said. The full-timers have been offered positions elsewhere in the hospital's operations, he said.

Outpatient rehabilitation services occupy the first floor of the Wellness Pavilion, and a hospital business office and other tenants are on the third floor. "They will all remain in place," Caruso said. "And we remain the owner of the entire building."

and recovery, Oiler said. But the way the parish is paying for debris pickup is a major reason that officials took the precautionary move.

While most debris pickup contractors are paid directly by FEMA, the parish annually seeks and awards a bid to a contractor for debris cleanup in case of a hurricane, flood, tornado or other natural disaster. The arrangement means that the parish has a contractor ready to roll for debris cleanup. But it also means that the parish pays its contractor, Omni Construction of Slidell, and then seeks reimbursement from FEMA.

On Thursday alone, there were 78,000 cubic yards of debris collected at a cost of $14 per cubic yard, Oiler said.

"You multiply 78,000 cubic yards by $14 and see what it comes to," he said. It totals nearly $1.1 million.

With bills like that, the parish needs additional money available to ensure that there's no disruption of debris pickup because of a cash-flow shortfall, parish President Kevin Davis said.

In other matters involving parish finances, the Parish Council gave bonding attorneys the green light to refinance outstanding bond debts of $31 million to construct the parish courthouse and $14 million for additions to the parish jail.

The measures approved by the council allow bonding attorneys to lock in an interest rate to refinance the debts when the rates are low enough to save the parish money.

The council Thursday night also:

▶Removed from consideration "at this time" an ordinance that could have led to a referendum on limiting Parish Council members to three consecutive terms.

▶Extended for six months a ban on issuing building permits on all properties that abut Tantella Ranch Road north of Goodbee and all properties that abut Louisiana 1077 from U.S. 190 in Goodbee northwest to the Tangipahoa Parish line. The moratorium was imposed because of developmental pressure on a mostly rural area of the parish.

▶Extended for six months a ban on issuing building permits for a part of Highland Park subdivision near Slidell. The ban was imposed because of drainage concerns.

Only 29 local families have trailers

TRAILERS, from B-1

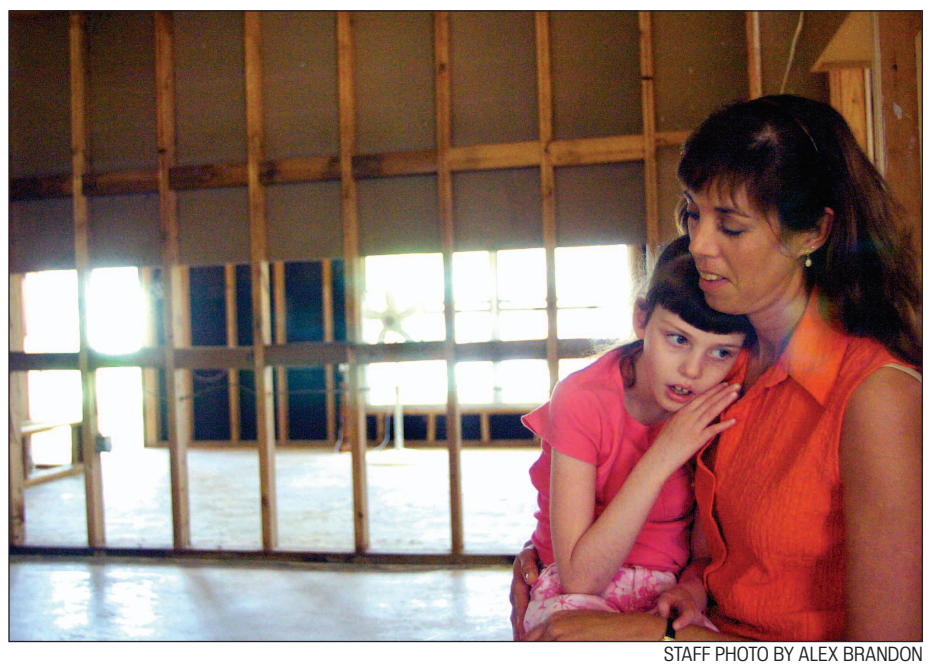
What Mitchell finally saw when he reached the house where he's lived for 12 years was shocking: More than 4 feet of storm surge had pushed its way through the house.

"I have flood insurance, but no contents" insurance through a separate homeowners policy, he said. "So we lost everything."

FEMA regulations allow use of the temporary housing for up to 18 months while a family's home is being repaired or rebuilt. The Mitchells estimate it will take at least eight months to restore their house.

They still have some compensation issues with their insurance company — they haven't yet seen an adjuster for the final settlement tally — and they can't hire a contractor for the major rebuilding work until the claim is finalized. But their persistence with FEMA paid off.



Mitchell was "thrilled" by the trailer's arrival and had nothing but good things to say about FEMA and other relief agencies such as the Salvation Army. "They've been a blessing to us," he said.

Mitchell hired someone to clear the debris from his yard, while he and his brother have been tearing out wallboard and fighting the mold in his home. After one last trip back to Simmesport to retrieve their scant belongings, Mitchell, his wife and daughter returned to what is now their new home Thursday night.

"Maybe we can get our life back together," he said Friday.

Jeanne Mitchell agreed. Among other things, her left-behind car was flooded in the storm.

"But we're just thankful we have our lives," she said. "We can replace everything else.

STAFF PHOTO BY ALEX BRANDON

Jeanne Mitchell and daughter Susan, 8, look over their flooded-out Slidell home Friday. The Mitchell family is living in a FEMA trailer on the property while they restore their house, a process they think will last at least eight months.

The Mitchells' temporary home is the first FEMA trailer to show up in Park Place in a city that now has thousands of unlivable houses and a parish in which an estimated 20,000-plus homes suffered major wind or water damage.

Theirs is one of 29 trailers moved by FEMA contractors from the 300 parked in a staging area south of Slidell onto home sites in St. Tammany Parish.

Several miles to the west, at Tom and Connie Lenahan's house off Lake Road in Lacombe, five feet of water had surged through the first floor. Mud covered the first and second floors and crept two steps up toward the master bedroom on the third floor. The smell of mold is in the air.

The Lenahans, both of whom are rural-route mail carriers, have done only the necessary cleanup and repairs, including ripping out the drywall, so they can come and go inside the house.

There's little else that can be done until an insurance settlement is reached.

"Are we going to fix this or are we going to knock it down?" Lenahan asked rhetorically about his home. He clearly wants to restore it, but he estimates it will take about a year before it can be put in a safe and livable condition.

They also want to have their two younger sons home by Christmas from their current home-away-from-home with relatives in Ohio, but they'll all be living in the trailer then.

Officials have estimated at least 20,000 homes in St. Tammany are unlivable at this time and are unlikely to be anytime soon. Parish President Kevin Davis has asked for as many as 23,000 trailers and other types of mobile housing.

As of Friday morning, only 686 FEMA trailers had been received in Louisiana. Of that number, only 109 have been placed next to damaged homes, officials reported. Most of the others are in mobile home parks, public parks and similar sites.

Asked what was taking so long to move out all 300 trailers south of Slidell, and to make way for the many hundreds more promised to the stricken area, FEMA officials had responses but not answers likely to please the hurricane homeless.

James McIntyre, a top FEMA official headquartered in Baton Rouge, said the applicants must already be in FEMA's computer system for temporary housing assistance.

Inspectors must determine whether the home sites are suitable for trailers. The sites must have water, sewer and electricity hookups, and the homeowners must sign "right of entry" releases, McIntyre said.

interruptions, said Secretary Johnny Bradberry of the Louisiana Department of Transportation and Development.

On the Causeway, southbound drivers will continue to be waved through the north toll plaza without paying the $2 and $3 rates.

General Manager Robert Lambert said the bridge is losing an estimated $40,000 a day on the lifted tolls at a time when traffic across Lake Pontchartrain has soared compared with pre-Katrina levels.

"Fundamentally, we just want to help the recovery of the whole area," Lambert said. "And we feel like, while this is going to be a direct loss of revenue to the Causeway, we think it's the right thing to do."

Lambert said he hopes to continue the free passes until two lanes of the Interstate 10 twin spans reopen at the end of the month. Nevertheless, he said, he isn't certain the bridge can sustain the losses while continuing to meet its debt obligations.

to Tupelo, Miss., with her grandparents after Hurricane Katrina.

The teenager's mother, Shantelle Williams, said her daughter had removed her seat belt moments before the crash because they were about to stop at a convenience store. "She was ejected from the car and killed instantly," Williams said.

Williams, who owns The Medicine Shoppe on U.S. 190 Business in Covington, said she stayed behind to watch over her home in Money Hill and her business.

"I sent her to Angie to ride out Katrina with her paternal grandparents. But after the storm, when they had no electricity, they decided to evacuate and move north and stayed for several days in Tupelo before starting on the trip back," she said.

She said the grandparents were both injured but are recovering.

Madelyn had attended Abita Elementary and Abita Middle schools.

Funeral services were conducted Sept. 18 in Bogalusa with burial in Pinecrest Cemetery in Covington. She is also survived by her father, Kevin Williams of Abita Springs; a sister, Alex Williams, 10, of the Abita Springs area; a newborn half-sister, Isabella Williams of Abita Springs; and her maternal grandparents, Billy and Jackie Brignac.

In the other accident, Hadden was riding a bicycle westbound on U.S. 190 west of Covington when a wrecker hit him from behind, authorities said. Hadden, of 11263 U.S. 190, was killed instantly in the 1:50 a.m. accident.

No charges have been filed, and a State Police spokesman said Thursday that the matter is under investigation.

The driver of the Holden's Wrecker Service truck was identified as Wayne Williams, 39, 73260 Pruden Road, near Covington. He told investigators that he did not see Hadden, who allegedly darted from behind an eastbound vehicle into the path of the truck, police said.

Hadden's mother, Kimberly Hadden, said her son was returning to their home after working at Sicily's Pizza on U.S. 190 in Covington, where he had been employed about two weeks. She said he had reflectors but no lights on his bicycle.

Funeral services for Hadden were held Wednesday at Calvary Christian Center in Hammond, with burial at Sand Hill Cemetery in Ponchatoula.

Hadden is also survived by his father, Todd Hadden of the Goodbee area; a brother, Randy Hadden, 19, of Mississippi; a sister, Selenia Hadden, 16, of the Goodbee area; paternal grandparents, Joy and Will Hadden of Bogalusa; and maternal grandfathers Jack Powell of Eggly and Steve Kraemer of Raceland.

Orleans board makes 13 schools charters

East bank sites may follow later

By Steve Ritea
Staff writer

In an unprecedented move, the Orleans Parish School Board voted to charter all 13 schools on the city's West Bank Friday, keeping power with the board temporarily but giving those schools what proponents say will be a new level of financial stability while the district wrestles with its fiscal crisis.

The shift to charter schools apparently has the support of the city administration. Mayor Ray Nagin, at a news conference held at the same time as the board meeting, said he would ask Gov. Kathleen Blanco to help him create a citywide charter school system.

Board members voted 4-2 to approve the West Bank plan near the end of a meeting in the New Orleans City Council chambers, with members Cynthia Cade and Torin Sanders opposed.

Board member Phyllis Landrieu stood up and walked to the side of the chamber just before the vote and responded "absent" when her name was called.

Cade, Sanders and interim Superintendent Ora Watson said they had heard little or nothing about the plan by Vice President Lourdes Moran prior to the meeting.

"I think an inclusive process may have been violated, unintentionally," Watson said.

Cade said she learned of the charter movement only after she was contacted by a reporter Thursday.

Asked why she kept some of her colleagues in the dark until the last minute, Moran commented: "I knew we would all get into an argument about contracts," referring to recent battles on the board that have sometimes held up progress.

Although Cade asked that the decision be deferred, Moran stressed in an interview after the meeting that it was necessary to move quickly in order for schools to be ready to accept students in November.

The charter is subject to approval by the Board of Elementary and Secondary Education.

Although the district currently has nine charter schools and two more are in the works, Friday's decision creates an unprecedented system of 13 charter schools.

The decision followed the lengthy outlining of a plan by Alvarez & Marsal, the turnaround firm tasked with righting the district's finances, to open up to eight schools on the West Bank in November. The eight schools are among the 13 proposed in the charter plan but would be operated as traditional schools under the Alvarez & Marsal proposal.

Both plans would offer access to students throughout the city until more schools can be opened on the east bank.

Partnership discussions

Board member Una Anderson said more charters on the city's east bank are a strong possibility, particularly Uptown, where many are undamaged.

Anderson said she would likely not push to charter the district's remaining schools under a single system, opting instead to seek out partnerships with universities or businesses.

At his news conference, Nagin initially said he wants to create at least 20 charter schools partnered with foundations, universities or businesses. He said he has had discussions with a number of foundations that are willing to bankroll such an operation.

Earlier in the School Board meeting, Sajan George, the chief operating officer installed by turnaround firm Alvarez & Marsal, said the district could only afford to open the eight West Bank schools if the federal government agreed to let the district use $61 million in project-specific grants on basic operating expenses and the state continued paying the district $16.5 million each month through the Minimum Foundation Program based on last year's enrollment.

Since thousands of the district's students have flooded to other school systems across the state and nation, there is some fear that MFP money would follow those students and funnel out of the district.

Rep. Jim Tucker, R-Algiers, said he expects legislation aimed at pulling that money away from New Orleans to be presented at a special legislative session planned for early November.

Those fears, coupled with the district's unstable finances, largely drove Moran's plan to charter all of the West Bank schools, she said.

Focus on finances

The charter would give schools more academic freedom, although they would still be subject to state laws and accountability standards.

At first, Moran said, the charter board, overseeing all 13 schools, would be made up of the current School Board, with members rotating off in favor of members of the community in Algiers.

The plan is also an attempt to take advantage of a recently announced $20.9 million federal grant to expand, repair and create charter schools.

Moran moved fast on the plan, first floating it to a core group of community leaders in Algiers at an invitation-only meeting on the west bank on Wednesday.

Several expressed frustration with politics on the current School Board at that meeting, saying anything that stripped power away from that body and the administration is a positive.

But Moran and Tucker, who appeared alongside Rep. Jeff Arnold, D-Algiers, and City Councilwoman Jackie Clarkson to present the plan, kept the focus on finances.

Before she brought up the charter issue, Moran said she is also gravely concerned about state MFP funding for next year, since the student counts that dictate that financing are typically made Oct. 1 for the following year.

No students are currently attending public school in New Orleans.

Bill Roberti, the district's chief restructuring officer and an Alvarez & Marsal employee, said, "That's one of the things the state superintendent is grappling with."

Asked how Friday's decision will impact the district's finances, Roberti shrugged and commented: "The money still follows the kids to the West Bank."

Beyond that, he said, it was far too early to assess what impact the chartering will have on district finances.

"It's not the district's money," board member Jimmy Fahrenholtz countered. "It's the children's money. It should stay with them and follow them."

Moran said she will likely use a plan outlined by Roberti and George to open chartered schools on the west bank.

"There's no reason to reinvent the wheel," she said.

Those eight schools have the capacity to educate up to 7,111, and 1,873 students so far have expressed interest in returning to the district.

'Giving away the schools'

The Alvarez & Marsal plan also called for contracting out a number of services including food service, transportation and payroll.

Moran stressed that the schools would be all-inclusive, including provisions to help students with behavioral problems. She also indicated a willingness to work with the district's teacher's union, although charters would not be beholden to the district's contract with the United Teachers of New Orleans.

The charter system would also have freedom to author its own policies and procedures, freeing them from what she called contradictory and sometimes confusing policies in the district.

Some protested the move as selling off the school district.

"While we're still counting bodies in New Orleans, you're giving away the schools," said Willie Zanders, a local lawyer who has represented several district employees with grievances.

Another attendee branded it racism, likening it to a "public lynching" as he screamed at the top of his lungs.

Watson said research about the academic strength of charter schools is not conclusive and said everyone needed more time to study Moran's option, adding: "I don't think we should go down this road in financial fear and implement a different governance for schools in a substantive part of our district."

Moran denied charges that she was simply trying to wrest the school away from district control, stressing fiscal considerations above all else.

"I'm not saying I want to do this because I want to change governance," she said. "I am interested in making sure we access all the resources necessary to have a quality education."

Noting that the $20.9 million grant might soon be eaten up by other entities, she added: "We don't want to miss an opportunity."

Residents: Home was too close for comfort

HOME, from B-1

Since the project was proposed in February and decided by the commission in April, opponents and proponents of the home have met numerous times in hopes of reaching a compromise.

The last meeting was held in late August while the Karanases' appeal of the commission decision was tabled by the council. Bill Magee, attorney for the couple, said the Karanases made numerous concessions at that meeting.

They included limiting the home to 20 unwed mothers ages 14 to 24, no babies as residents of the home, additional green space and fencing around the perimeter of the site, and moving the home farther away from houses in Forest Brook.

But Forest Brook residents said the concessions weren't enough. Jay Melancon of the subdivision's homeowners association said the proposed 7,877 square-foot home would be incompatible with houses in Forest Brook that average about 2,300 square feet. And residents remain strongly opposed to the home next to their subdivision.

Despite numerous meetings with the builders, "We just didn't work things out," Melancon said. "We tried."

Councilman Joe Impastato of Lacombe, whose district includes the area, agreed with the residents and asked the council to concur with the Zoning Commission. "This is an agonizing decision," he said. "But the site they've chosen is next to a subdivision. ... And it's an institutional use of 8,000 square feet."

Had the proposed home been smaller and closer to Louisiana 1088, farther away from the subdivision, "it may have been more palatable," Impastato said.

In other development matters Thursday night, the council:

▶Concurred with the Zoning Commission's approval of M-2 intermediate industrial zoning for a business park on a 38-acre tract between Louisiana 1085 and Interstate 12, just west of Louisiana 1077. Some citizens had appealed the commission's decision to the council, but the issue was amicably resolved after the Zenith Interest Partnership agreed to several conditions for its property southwest of Covington. They included a 110-foot buffer along Louisiana 1085 and eliminating what some considered more onerous uses allowed in M-2 zones, such as an auto salvage yard.

▶Eased a condition placed by the Planning Commission on its approval of conceptual plans for a 101-home subdivision, Eagle Landing, proposed for Goodbee by Rue du Chene Developers LLC. The condition called for the developers to pay for the installation of a traffic signal at Louisiana 1077 and U.S. 190, south of the proposed subdivision, before they could begin construction. The condition was changed to require installation of the traffic light before the parish gives final approval for the developers to sell lots in the subdivision.

No-bid contracts lead to questions

Many companies were campaign contributors

By Kate Moran
East Jefferson bureau

Most of the emergency purchases that Jefferson Parish made in the days after Hurricane Katrina addressed pressing needs such as food, water and medical supplies, or covered repairs to water mains, government offices and other damaged public infrastructure. Some were as mundane and specific as $2,500 for orange traffic cones, $5,900 for washing machines and clothes dryers at Meadowcrest Hospital in Gretna, and $125 for a fuse from Nu-Lite Electric Wholesale.

But parish administrators also executed a number of vaguely defined and open-ended contracts that were not bound by a dollar value, according to an examination of documents released this week. Companies such as Shaw Environmental of Baton Rouge, the beneficiary of a contract to "coordinate all matters dealing with the effects of Hurricane Katrina" – and a political contributor to Parish President Aaron Broussard and two council members – were given a window to stay involved with lucrative relief work for weeks to come.

These generic contracts might not constitute an immediate worry for local taxpayers, because the parish is seeking to recoup the bulk of its hurricane costs from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. But the companies that won the business did so without undergoing the same competitive bidding process that usually would prevail to give the public the lowest price for services.

Normally, the Parish Council would issue an open call for estimates from companies that hoped to perform government work. The council would choose from among the offers, then pass on a contract to the council chairman for signature.

In emergency situations, however, state law gives the parish president discretion to award contracts to address urgent needs.

Tim Whitmer, chief administrative assistant to Broussard, said the administration adhered to rudimentary bid procedures even after the hurricane, by making rounds of calls to obtain oral estimates from local firms. In some cases, however, officials could locate only one or two companies that had workers available in the area, Whitmer said.

"One of the most shocking disclosures after Katrina and Rita was how little prepared the local and state governments were, not only in handling the hurricanes but also their aftermath.
JONATHAN TURLEY
professor of public interest law at George Washington University

He said companies that received the generic contracts – such as Shaw Environmental – were given "task orders" to handle a broad range of issues. For example, Shaw handled applications from business owners seeking "Jumpstart Jefferson" passes, which allowed them entry to the parish when it was generally off limits to others.

Chris Sammons, vice president of corporate communications for the Shaw Group, said the company repaired water lines and helped deliver food, water and generators to hospitals. In addition, it helped pump water out of Old Metairie, he said.

Whitmer said the oral estimates obtained by administrators satisfied the FEMA guidelines for awarding government work in disaster situations.

FEMA, which itself doled out billions of dollars worth of no-bid contracts in the wake of the storm, announced Thursday that it would revisit many of those awards. Parish officials said they have no immediate plans to follow suit.

Councilman Chris Roberts said the council could not review most of the emergency contracts because much of the work that the administration assigned has already been completed.

"A lot of work is already done," Roberts said. "The parish ordered immediate, quick repairs. We were the first parish in the entire region to get up and running."

Jonathan Turley, professor of public interest law at George Washington University, said governments in hurricane-vulnerable states such as Louisiana should have contracts already in place that they can activate during a disaster, instead of signing new contracts during the emergency period. Such an arrangement could protect taxpayers from price gouging, he said.

"One of the most shocking disclosures after Katrina and Rita was how little prepared the local and state governments were, not only in handling the hurricanes but also their aftermath. You got the feeling that states like Louisiana had the same level of hurricane protection as Iowa," said Turley, formerly a professor at Tulane University.

"Politicians love disasters: Financial restrictions are lifted. Procedures are waived. Citizens turn docile as kittens, and there is very little accountability," he said. "It is not surprising that politicians and companies find disasters to be a terrific time for self-dealing."

Some of the companies that received the largest Jefferson contracts have no apparent ties to parish leaders. For example, a review of campaign finance records dating from 1994 shows Broussard and council members received no campaign contributions from Certified Cleaning and Restoration, which won a $3.2 million contract to clean the ravaged Joseph S. Yenni Building in Elmwood.

Yet a number of companies that have contributed regularly to Broussard and council members received emergency work. The Shaw Group, which also donated to Gov. Kathleen Blanco's last campaign, has given a combined $10,000 to Broussard, Roberts and Councilman Elton Lagasse since 2003, according to campaign finance reports.

Since 2000, Mosquito Control of Harvey, which won an emergency contract to spray pesticides, has given a combined $11,750 in campaign contributions to Broussard, Roberts, Lagasse and Councilman Louis Congemi. The company is Jefferson's longstanding mosquito abatement contractor.

Also since 2000, the Government Advisory Group of Kenner has donated $9,550 to Broussard, Congemi and Lagasse. The company won an emergency contract for an unspecified amount to manage housing relocation for a period of 18 months.

And Durr Heavy Construction, general contractor for post-Katrina mobile home sites, has donated $9,100 to Broussard, Lagasse, Congemi and Roberts since 2001.

Civil, criminal courts face funding crisis

Orleans DA cuts nonessential staff

By Susan Finch
Staff writer

Banished to temporary quarters because of hurricane damage to their buildings, New Orleans' criminal and civil courts are struggling to keep going with fewer employees to conserve dwindling operating revenue, judges said in separate news conferences Friday.

Civil District Court, whose judges are temporarily housed in a two-story wood frame office building in Gonzales, depends upon filing fees to pay for its operations. Fewer filings in civil court will mean less income, Judge Ethel Sims Julien said Friday.

Likewise, Criminal District Court Chief Judge Calvin Johnson said the court won't be able to function if the city discontinues funding other agencies that make up the criminal justice system. Though the state pays for judges' salaries, the city funds the Police Department, and it contributes some financing to the district attorney and clerk of court.

"If we expect people to come back to the city" Johnson said, "we have to have a fully functioning criminal justice system."

Johnson spoke to reporters at Hunt Correctional Center in St. Gabriel, where teams of criminal division judges are taking turns handling cases three days a week.

Orleans Parish District Attorney Eddie Jordan, who also spoke in St. Gabriel, said he's let go of about 40 of his nonessential workers, and he warned that he'll have to give his prosecutors their walking papers if the city doesn't come through with more money. The city supplies about one-third of the DA's operating funds; state and federal grants each supply another third.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency is helping with plans to get the city's various courts, including its Municipal and Traffic courts, back into operation at their usual locations.

Julien said the civil courts, including First and Second city courts, are essential because they're the places where disputes can be settled peacefully.

Julien said she expects the courts will see a rising number of cases involving insurance claims, custody disputes and evictions.

Orleans Parish Civil Sheriff Paul Valteau said Friday morning that his office also will suffer from the fact that fewer cases will be filed in the court. One source of the sheriff's revenue is fees from the seizure and sale of real estate foreclosed upon by mortgage companies.

While the South Broad Street building that houses Municipal and Traffic courts is out of commission, Municipal Court's judges are hearing cases daily at the Union Passenger Terminal, where criminal court magistrates are also setting bonds for people arrested in New Orleans. Traffic Court will resume operations Monday at the Algiers courthouse, where the courts' four divisions will convene weekdays between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m.

Riverboat casinos ready to roll

Kenner vessel among those to reopen

By The Associated Press

Four Louisiana riverboat casinos that were forced to close by Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita, including one in Kenner, are preparing to receive gamblers again.

The Treasure Chest Casino, a riverboat casino in Kenner, will open Monday for the first time since Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast, said the casino's owner, Boyd Gaming Corp. The casino closed Aug. 27, two days before Katrina's arrival.

In Lake Charles, the L'Auberge du Lac Hotel & Casino opened parts of its complex Friday with gambling scheduled to begin today, the same day Isle of Capri Casinos Inc. planned to reopen its two gambling boats in the market.

L'Auberge du Lac, which opened in late May, is owned by Pinnacle Entertainment Inc.

Both closed shortly before Rita hit on Sept. 24.

Two of the four casinos in the New Orleans are remain closed: Harrah's New Orleans Casino and the Belle of Orleans riverboat. The Boomtown Belle reopened Monday. Neither the Belle of Orleans nor Harrah's have announced possible reopening dates.

In the Lake Charles market, Harrah's Entertainment Inc.'s two-riverboat complex remains closed, along with the Delta Downs race track and its slot machine casino. Harrah's said this week that it cannot project a reopening date.

Boyd Gaming, which owns Delta Downs, said this week that it hopes to have at least part of the facility open in late November.

Kenner Council huffs over pumps

They weren't told of decision to evacuate

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

Kenner politicians added their voices to the chorus criticizing Jefferson Parish's decision to evacuate its drainage pump operators before Hurricane Katrina, and they asked that Kenner workers be trained to run the pumps.

"Kenner has been seriously affected by this," Councilman Kent Denapolis said at Thursday night's City Council meeting. "There is no doubt in my mind that this caused great destruction in my district."

Hundreds of homes across Metairie and Kenner flooded after Katrina struck Aug. 29.

Jefferson Parish officials, who run the drainage system for the entire parish, including municipalities such as Kenner, have defended their decision to evacuate pump operators as one that put employees' lives before property. They say the pump stations were designed to Category 3 hurricane standards, no match for the Category 5 winds that Katrina was packing as it bore down on Louisiana on Aug. 28, the day pump operators were removed to shelter in Washington Parish.

Kenner council members said they should have been made aware of the plan.

"I would never have thought bailing out of the pumping station was ever an option," Councilman Marc Johnson said.

The council unanimously requested that the parish train Kenner workers to operate the pumps. It also asked the parish to make improvements that would allow the pumps to run even if flooded, to automate pumping stations and to investigate the possibility of draining parts of south Kenner to the Mississippi River, instead of toward Lake Pontchartrain.

Years ago, a proposal to drain River Ridge to the river via a pipeline along Kenner's eastern city limits was shot down by Kenner officials.

Kenner council members questioned why Jefferson Parish didn't keep Kenner in the loop about the evacuation plan.

Phil Ramon, chief of staff to Mayor Phil Capitano, said city officials attended every parish emergency meeting before Katrina and learned Aug. 28 that the pump operators would be evacuated to the north shore. He said parish officials did communicate with Kenner.

"People are furious about this plan, that nobody knew about," Councilman Dominic Weilbaecher said Friday. "Nobody told them the plan included having unmanned pump stations. That's information that should be shared with the people in the city."

Denapolis questioned why the pump operators were taken so far away, and why they didn't stay in local shelters with other essential workers.

"Our firemen stayed behind. Our police stayed behind," Denapolis said. "I'm perplexed they were overlooked as non-essential personnel."

FEMA releases flood maps to help with rebuilding

New elevation levels in Miss. are recorded

By The Associated Press

JACKSON, MISS. — The Federal Emergency Management Agency said Friday that it is putting out interim flood elevation maps to help hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast communities make early rebuilding decisions.

Analysts have decided that the old flood elevation levels were 3 to 8 feet too low in the three coastal counties of Hancock, Harrison and Jackson, a FEMA statement said. Flood elevation is the height above ground at which there is a 1 percent chance water could reach in a given year.

The new elevations for Hancock, Harrison and Jackson counties were being released to Gulf Coast officials and will be included on updated flood recovery maps now scheduled for release in November.

The new maps update the existing flood elevations developed in the mid-1980s and include tide and storm data collected after Hurricane Katrina and earlier storms like Elena and Georges.

"Our goal is to help states and local communities make the best decisions while reconstructing their communities," said Vice Admiral Thad Allen, principal federal official and federal coordinating officer for Hurricanes Katrina and Rita recovery efforts.

Todd Davison, mitigation division director with FEMA's regional office in Atlanta, said water driven inland by Katrina far exceeded the 1 percent chance flood event, sometimes called the 100-year flood.

Because of this, he said, coast governments had requested that new flood maps be developed to assist with planned new construction.

Davison said FEMA would meet with coast leaders next week to go over the new maps but "it is their option to adjust and adopt their local codes and ordinances to include these new elevations."

Until the new maps are approved by local communities, existing elevation maps will be in force, he said.

The new maps include survey information collected in the field after Katrina and a review of storm surge data dating back 20 years. While the new elevations are higher than the existing standard, they are below the storm surge levels reached by Katrina, a Category 4 storm.

He said Katrina's surge was well beyond the 100-year flood mark and that requiring structures to be built to survive such a storm would be cost-prohibitive.

If new elevation requirements are adopted and followed, it will mean a "significant decrease in their insurance premiums" both now and in the future. He said the standards would also help local communities qualify for various federal and state programs.

Davison and Mike Womack, deputy director of the Mississippi Emergency Management Association, said the elevation changes should not mean a major change in how structures are built on the coast.

Davison said many of the structures destroyed by Katrina were built before the current requirements. And he said there were cases where older buildings had been elevated on pilings and survived the storm's furry.

Davison said permanent maps will be released in 12 to 24 months.

Evacuees being relocated from Mass. shelter

By The Associated Press

BOURNE, MASS. — State officials are looking for permanent housing in Massachusetts for as many as 100 Hurricane Katrina refugees who are scheduled to leave their temporary home on a Cape Cod military base this month.

The state hopes to relocate all 156 of the people living at Camp Edwards by Oct. 21.

About a third are expected to leave the state, with most returning to the Gulf Coast, but most of the rest have said they want to stay in Massachusetts, Massachusetts National Guard spokesman Lt. Col. Paul Smith said Friday.

"There is also a population that still isn't sure yet what they want to do," he said.

A total of 235 evacuees have lived at Camp Edwards. Of those, 70 have already relocated to other states, while Massachusetts officials have found housing for nine others.

The refugees' housing costs will be subsidized by the Federal Emergency Management Agency for as long as one year.

The state also has helped 13 people find jobs, including as a cook, maintenance worker, carpenter, welder or hotel worker. Eight more are still looking for jobs, while more than 100 have applied for unemployment insurance, according to state Health and Human Services Undersecretary Steven Kadish.

"Most people were working (before the hurricane)," he said, "and many were self-employed."

Although Camp Edwards is bidding farewell to its "guests," Smith said he and other members of the National Guard expect to keep in touch after they leave.

"It's been an enriching experience," he said. "People have been eager to share. It's interesting for us Yankees to find out about a part of the country we're not familiar with."

Meadowcrest is suing West Jefferson

Hospitals have been fierce competitors

By Paul Purpura
West Bank bureau

Meadowcrest Hospital, which has been closed since it was commandeered by Jefferson Parish days after Hurricane Katrina passed, sued West Jefferson Medical Center in federal court Friday, claiming that its publicly owned competitor is setting the stage for taking the Gretna facility by force.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court, alleges that West Jefferson Medical Center on Sept. 27 made an unsolicited offer to buy Meadowcrest for $15.7 million and that the offer was the first step in a formal expropriation process required by state law.

"In a brazen attempt to exploit the ongoing tragedy of Katrina and eliminate its principal competition, WJMC has now commenced efforts to expropriate Meadowcrest's entire physical facility," according to Meadowcrest's lawsuit, which seeks to stop the move through an injunction.

"There is no other explanation for this naked use of the expropriation power except for WJMC's desire to create a monopoly over inpatient acute care hospital services on the west bank of the Mississippi River," according to the lawsuit.

Peter Butler, attorney for West Jefferson, said he could not comment on particulars of the lawsuit, including the expropriation.

Initially, Meadowcrest's attorney asked for more information about the offer, Butler said. West Jefferson provided the information and asked for a response by 5 p.m. Friday, he said.

"Instead of getting a response to the offer, I got a lawsuit," Butler said.

Meadowcrest is asking a federal judge to stop West Jefferson's attempt to acquire the hospital, saying the move violates federal antitrust laws. The lawsuit specifically names as the defendant Jefferson Hospital District No. 1, which does business as West Jefferson Medical Center.

Tenet Healthsystems, the Dallas-based parent company for Meadowcrest, also declined to comment on the suit. "I think it's self-explanatory," spokesman Harry Anderson said Friday evening.

Meadowcrest hopes to reopen Nov. 1. Parish President Aaron Broussard took control of the facility during Hurricane Katrina to use it as a dormitory and offices for doctors, nurses, National Guard troops and other emergency workers, officials said.

Using powers given by state law to parish presidents during emergencies, Broussard commandeered the hospital after 700 staff members, patients and family members who rode out the storm there evacuated Sept. 1 amid concerns over security and patient care, Meadowcrest officials said.

Butler said West Jefferson's offer to buy Meadowcrest was unrelated to Broussard's commandeering of the hospital.

The combination of events has left West Jefferson Medical Center in Marrero as the West Bank's only open hospital and has called attention to the fierce competition between the parish's public medical center and the for-profit Meadowcrest.

West Jefferson is one of five hospitals currently operating in the New Orleans area; others are closed because of hurricane damage. Among the shuttered facilities is Charity Hospital, which is the region's sole Level One trauma unit, treating emergencies such as gunshot wounds.

West Jefferson remained open through Katrina and is "taking care of whatever comes our way. I don't think there's an impact" associated with Meadowcrest's closure, Mark McGinnis, the public hospital's senior vice president and chief financial officer, said this week before the lawsuit was filed. "You don't have a fully populated area."

Area hospitals that are open include Ochsner Foundation Hospital and East Jefferson General Hospital. Kenner Regional Medical Center, also taken over by the parish, regained its facilities this week and is providing limited services, officials said.

Meadowcrest will stay under parish control until Jefferson's state of emergency is lifted on Oct. 15, said Tim Whitmer, Broussard's chief administrative assistant. Broussard could extend the emergency declaration, which he has done once in Katrina's aftermath.

But, Whitmer said, "we don't see that happening at this point."

The parish will pay Meadowcrest and Kenner Regional, but that amount has not been determined.

"Legally, Tenet will be properly compensated for the parish's occupation of (the hospitals) and will pursue those remedies," said Steve Campanini, a spokesman for Tenet.

Some of West Jefferson's staff was housed at Meadowcrest, neighboring Wynhoven Health Care Center and other places, said Jennifer Steel, the public hospital's spokeswoman.

About 350 of West Jefferson's 1,800 employees lost their homes, McGinnis said. "Housing is a critical issue," he said.

Once the parish releases Meadowcrest, Tenet will spend two weeks preparing its Nov. 1 opening of the emergency room and limited diagnostic and outpatient services, Campanini said.

"We would add more services, including inpatients, as the community needs become more apparent," he said.

Employees have been retained and are getting full benefits, but their pay has been halved, he said. They also have been offered jobs at other Tenet hospitals, Campanini said.

Phillip Sowa, Meadowcrest's chief executive, could not be reached for comment. But in a posting on the hospital's Web site, he said he was forced to respond to a "fact sheet" circulated by West Jefferson after Katrina, which said Meadowcrest closed "for no apparent reason."

The comment was "incorrect and harmful," Sowa wrote.

Meadowcrest had 146 patients the day before the Aug. 29 storm, and began asking for government help Aug. 31 to evacuate the hospital, Sowa said on the Web site.

He described a scene after the storm in which people showed up seeking shelter and had to be turned away.

"The situation turned ugly with reports of threats and violence to our people," he said, adding that employees' cars were stolen from the parking garage, electricity was lost and some medical equipment, run by emergency generators, overheated and failed.

Asked about the posting, McGinnis said Sowa is "entitled to his opinion." The scene at West Jefferson, which had more than 300 patients when Katrina hit, was not much different, McGinnis said.

But the emergency room continued receiving patients, including evacuees from the Superdome and a New Orleans police officer who was shot by a looter in Algiers, McGinnis said.

"For four days we didn't have air conditioning," he said. "We didn't have water. We couldn't flush toilets. We just worked through it ... It was a pretty dreadful situation."

Bridge City man is booked with murder in stabbing

Evacuee's host slain in Luling

By Littice Bacon-Blood
River Parishes bureau

A 31-year-old Bridge City man was arrested in Houston on Thursday and booked with the stabbing death of a Luling man who had taken him in several days after Hurricane Katrina, St. Charles Parish sheriff's authorities said Friday.

Houston police officers arrested Jason Pfeil at a construction site and booked him with the first-degree murder of 41-year-old James E. Underwood, St. Charles Parish Sheriff Greg Champagne said Friday. Pfeil was driving Underwood's 1996 black Dodge pickup, the same vehicle a witness reported seeing leaving the crime scene, Champagne said.

Authorities found Underwood's body in his Luling apartment on Sept. 22. They don't have a motive for the stabbing, Champagne said.

Pfeil is expected to be returned to St. Charles Parish to face the charges, Champagne said.

Champagne would not say how authorities tracked Pfeil to Houston, but said that he didn't "cover his tracks" very well.

"We had information as to who he was and what he might be doing," Champagne said. "The detectives did a good job."

Champagne said investigators believe that Underwood allowed Pfeil to live with him after the younger man evacuated for Hurricane Katrina. They think the two men may have met during a meeting of one of Underwood's support groups for recovering alcohol and drug abusers.

Pfeil is a recovering alcoholic and drug abuser, Champagne said. Underwood, who worked at Cytec Industries, was a recovering alcoholic, he said.

"(Underwood) did volunteer work in the jail," holding Alcoholics Anonymous group meetings, Champagne said. "We don't know details, but we know Underwood invited (Pfeil) to live with him after the storm."

Authorities found Underwood's badly decomposed body on the floor of the bathroom after a neighbor reported that she had not seen him since Sept. 6. Underwood had been stabbed multiple times, Champagne said. He would not say where on his body Underwood had been stabbed.

"We don't know what the motive was," Champagne said. "We do know that there appeared to be efforts to clean up the crime scene to some degree."

Ruined city still is picturesque

Sightseers drawn to the destruction

By Mary Foster
Associated Press writer

There's a new kind of tourism in New Orleans. Forget photos of elegant French Quarter balconies, street musicians or even cheerfully bombed college girls flashing their breasts.

These days, relief workers, National Guardsmen, firefighters and police officers are snapping pictures of the remnants of Hurricane Katrina: piles of garbage still rotting in the hot sun, cars crushed by toppled walls and rows of shattered buildings.

"I wish we were taking pictures with strippers on Bourbon Street," said Stephen Lawrence of the Costilla County, Colo., sheriff's department. "But the things we're seeing are interesting. It's a part of history."

Boston University sociology professor Daniel Monti said the lure of such a disaster is common. Just as the World Trade Center site in New York became a tourist draw after the Sept. 11 attacks, the aftermath of Katrina has the same appeal.

"This is a once-in-a-lifetime occurrence," Monti said. "I don't know that we've ever had a natural disaster that affected such a large part of the country. People want to recall it, to memorialize it."

Favorite tourist spots have even developed. Visitors are making regular pilgrimages to two cars on the edge of the French Quarter that are still under the pile of fallen bricks that crushed them in the storm.

"It's compact parking," joked Steve Dicketts, a private security agent from Virginia Beach, Va. "Quite a sight."

Dicketts has visited New Orleans before, but his pictures from that trip are nothing like the ones he's taking now.

"This isn't the same city," he said. "You will never see this again. They will take it away and rebuild, so you want to get it now."

New Orleans' new sights are just as awe-inspiring as the old ones. On a street full of bricks from smashed 19th-century buildings, John Harris posed in front of the only standing wall.

"This is awesome," said Harris, who was in town with a group of Baptist relief workers delivering supplies. "We're getting pictures to show people at our church."

Even the breaks in the levees that flooded most of the city are now attractions. And when 40 fire trucks and crews from around the country responded to a small fire, the firefighters linked arms and posed for pictures in front of the tiny puff of smoke.

Members of the American Society of Travel Agents have had only cancellations of trips to New Orleans, according to Liz Connolly, a spokesman for the group. But J. Stephen Perry, president of the New Orleans Convention & Visitors Bureau, said his organization has already had calls from people who would like to visit the city while the storm debris is fresh.

"We hear from them every day," he said. "We just tell them that it's a hard time to come in right now. The hotel rooms are being taken by recovery workers. The area isn't safe. There are just too many problems."

The visitors bureau plans to market New Orleans again to regular tourists who plan to visit beginning at Christmas.

But until then, the ruins of the city provide a powerful draw for people already here.

"I was here four or five years ago," guardsman Reid Anderson said. "The pictures I'm sending home now are nothing like the ones I took then, but I'm probably taking more this time."

Bulldozer kills man at Kenner dump site

Houma resident was run over

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

A Houma man working at a temporary dump site in Kenner was accidentally killed Thursday when he was run over by a bulldozer, Kenner police said.

Terry Porche, who family said is from Houma, was working as a flagman at the dump in the 600 block of Charles Street near Airline Drive, police spokesman Capt. Steve Caraway said.

"It was unpreventable," Caraway said. "There was nothing they could do."

Witnesses told police that Thursday at about 6 p.m. Porche was walking backwards behind the bulldozer when he tripped and fell, Caraway said. The bulldozer, being driven by Kenneth Kelly, 39, of Franklin, backed over him, Caraway said.

Kelly will not be cited, Caraway said.

"The machinery is very loud, and he didn't know the guy was behind him or had fallen," Caraway said.

Both men were contractors working for FEMA, Caraway said.

The dump site where Porche was killed is being used for Jefferson Parish debris, said Phil Ramon, chief of staff for Kenner government. He said that site and another on the east side of Hollandey Street where Kenner debris is being dumped were chosen to expedite cleanup of city streets, so trucks wouldn't have to travel to a landfill farther away.

Kenner City Council members criticized the dumps Thursday at a Kenner council meeting because of the smell. Ramon said only trees and debris is supposed to be dumped at the site, not garbage.

But Deborah Capers, a neighbor, told the council that some city residents, upset that curbside garbage hasn't been picked up, are dumping their ruined refrigerators and waste at the site.

Ramon said Friday that he has written a letter asking Police Chief Nick Congemi to enforce laws against illegal dumping.

Beau Rivage casino is worse than first thought

Damage could total hundreds of millions

By Adam Goldman
Associated Press writer

BILOXI, MISS. — When Hurricane Katrina finished pounding this seaside city, it appeared that the Beau Rivage – the $800 million crown jewel of Gulf Coast casinos – had escaped serious damage.

But a closer look revealed a gloomier picture, and now the resort's Las Vegas-based parent company, MGM Mirage Inc., predicts the Beau Rivage will be the single-biggest loss of any of the 13 casinos lining the Mississippi coast.

Officials estimate that fixing the 1,740-room resort could cost hundreds of millions of dollars and take 12 to 16 months – a frustrating setback for the 3,400 people who worked there.

"When you look at it, your heart kind of sinks," said Cindy Nieder, a security supervisor and a Beau Rivage employee since the property opened in 1999. "It was so pretty in here. We had flowers and little shrubs. It was beautiful."

The Beau Rivage was built to withstand a Category 5 hurricane, and its exterior walls and core architectural structure emerged largely intact. But the real damage is inside.

MGM Mirage allowed a reporter inside the Beau Rivage for the first time this week, giving The Associated Press a tour of the damage caused by a tidal surge towering more than two stories – a height the resort's designers hadn't planned for.

The company has hired a small army to revive the Beau Rivage, but debris remains visible in all corners of the gutted first floor.

Large sections of the southern wall facing the Gulf of Mexico have huge gashes from the giant waves that repeatedly crashed into them, and the first two floors of the parking garage were wiped away.

A pile of battered computers is all that remains of the front desk. The atrium has been reduced to rubble thanks to the heavy equipment tearing up the floors. The only people around are construction workers trying to piece the resort back together.

MGM Mirage had spent millions improving the Beau Rivage in recent months, adding a nightclub and new restaurants; those investments were flushed out to sea. The new $4 million club is gone, except for the center bar and the coral glass above it.

Many seats in the cavernous showroom that holds 1,550 people were yanked out, along with the slot machines on the casino floor. Nickels are scattered everywhere.

The cage, where people cashed their chips, is like a deserted bank, with only the bars and teller stations signaling there was ever a casino here. Almost all of the first-floor carpet has been removed, and the ceilings are exposed, revealing a tangle of electrical wires.

The popular restaurants have disappeared.

George Goldhoff, vice president of food and beverage at the resort, said his operation was wrecked. A custom-made meat smoker has vanished.

"It's not there," he said. "There's no telling where it went."

The brewpub's gleaming, stainless steel beer tanks didn't survive, and the four 10,000-gallon aquariums that held sharks and other marine life were washed out to sea. Goldhoff didn't know what happened to the creatures.

"Free Willy, baby," he said.

Architects who inspected the Beau Rivage say it is structurally sound because the design helped mitigate and divert the force of the winds. The barge on which the casino rested managed to remain in place thanks to the oil-rig technology used to construct it. The adjacent marina that has 31 slips and can accommodate huge yachts also escaped the storm's wrath for the most part.

While power hasn't been restored to the entire building, it's possible to take an elevator to the executive offices on the second floor. The sturdy hotel tower and its many rooms also are in good shape – a relief to MGM Mirage executives.

But Goldhoff, who helped open the Bellagio megaresort in Las Vegas, knows he has a daunting rebuilding job in front of him.

The thought of it, he said, "makes the hair on my arm stand up."

Entergy may close old power plants

Electricity would be bought wholesale

By Keith Darcé
Business writer

Utility customers in Louisiana could save $59 million a year if Entergy Corp.'s electricity utilities outside New Orleans shut down old, inefficient power plants and replaced them with electricity purchased from wholesale suppliers, according to a newly released report from state Public Service Commission consultants.

However, that figure is far below the hundreds of millions of dollars in savings predicted by some of the wholesale suppliers who want the state's biggest utilities to purchase more of their electricity.

"A (power plant) retirement strategy will not produce massive customer rate savings, but it might be able to provide at least modest savings to Louisiana customers," concluded the 109-page report by J. Kennedy & Associates of Roswell, Ga., Exeter Associates of Columbia, Md., and Stone, Pigman, Walter Wittman LLC of New Orleans.

At $59 million, the savings would average of $59 a year, or less than $5 a month, for each of the 1 million customers. However, any actual savings would likely be much different because regulators can distribute the money in a variety of ways.

The report supports Entergy's ongoing strategy of supplementing its power generation capacity with attractively priced electricity purchased on the wholesale market and the acquisition of newer, more efficient generators, said Michael Twomey, vice president of regulatory affairs for the utility.

At least one wholesale power supplier said the report should prompt state regulators to continue studying potential plant retirements.

"It validates what we have said all along: that retirements are justified," said Tom Allen, spokesman for New South Energy, a subsidiary of Calpine Corp.

"With gas prices up, efficiency now more than ever is tantamount and important."

The PSC initiated the study in 2003 to determine whether rates could be lowered by forcing Entergy to replacing some of the 14,000 megawatts of power the utility generates from old natural gas and oil-fired generators, many of which have been operating for more than 30 years.

During the past five years, competitive power suppliers have built numerous modern and more efficient gas-fired generators in the state capable of generating 17,000 megawatts of electricity.

Owners of those plants have pressed regulators to force Entergy to purchase larger amounts of power from them.

In addition to modest savings to customers, the consultants concluded that retiring some of Entergy's old plants would produce "significant" reductions of so-called greenhouse gas pollutants.

And the consultants said customers stand to benefit more from Entergy adding modern generators to its in-house fleet of power plants by purchasing financially troubled plants at sharply discounted prices from competitive electricity suppliers.

Entergy purchased one such plant, the Perryville Power Station in northeastern Louisiana, last year from Cleco Corp. Another plant acquisition is pending in Mississippi.

Still, the laws of physics and geography pose barriers to shutting down large numbers of Entergy's older generators, the consultants reported. The movement of electricity over the company's vast grid of wires requires power plants to be strategically located in order to maintain a stable flow of power.

"These constraints force the operation of substantial portions of Entergy's old gas generation and limit the ability of the newly acquired units to displace the high-cost generation," according to the report.

Upgrades to the company's transmission lines could lessen those problems, but the cost of those improvements could offset much of the savings reaped from retiring old plants, the consultants said.

Jackson: Buses to bring back those seeking jobs

But mayor worries they'll be homeless

By The Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — About 600 displaced residents will return from shelters around the country to their storm-ravaged city and be matched with jobs and housing early next week, the Rev. Jesse Jackson said Friday.

In a conference call with reporters, Jackson said a caravan of buses will begin their journey from Chicago early Monday morning, will travel to shelters in St. Louis; Memphis, Tenn.; Jackson, Miss.; and Mobile, Ala., and will arrive Tuesday in New Orleans.

"People who have been displaced have the right to return, the right to reclaim their property," said Jackson, speaking from California.

Later Friday, Mayor Ray Nagin said that while he was in favor of allowing local people to fill city jobs, he had doubts about Jackson's plan. No housing exists for the displaced residents, he said.

"We're going to have a mess. These people are going to come here and be homeless," Nagin said, adding he hoped to talk to Jackson soon about the busing plan.

During the conference call, Jackson characterized his Rainbow/PUSH Coalition's efforts as "a time to heal, a time to rebuild," and reiterated his criticism of federal work repairing damage from Hurricane Katrina.

He said displaced residents should be getting the contracts being awarded to out-of-town companies for construction and debris removal.

Jackson said service-sector jobs in restaurants and hotels are plentiful, and that returning residents would be housed in hotel rooms and trailers and on military bases.

"There are jobs – there's no doubt about that," he said. "Those who've been displaced are not getting them."

Jeff schools lead way to recovery

In the first few days after our community was devastated by Katrina, a very poor and uninformed decision was made to announce that Jefferson Parish schools would not open until January. Laying blame for that decision when so much work is left to be done is a waste of time and energy, but that errant announcement in conjunction with rumors that the school system would lay off thousands of employees has made the recovery of our community more difficult. Hundreds, if not thousands, of families made decisions to take jobs and enroll children in schools outside of Jefferson Parish when that announcement was made.

On Sept. 7, when Jefferson Parish was still closed, water remained in our streets, electrical service was sporadic and communication nearly impossible, the parish School Board met in Baton Rouge.

Despite the personal losses of board members and key administrators, all were in attendance. All board members reported that they had personally gone to their district and surveyed their schools. This first-hand survey by the elected leaders of the school system was critical in the decision-making process and the subsequent unanimous votes by the board to reopen the system Oct. 3 — and not to interrupt teacher pay and benefits.

Despite the bickering and politics seen on the board in the past, the board was united in its mission to re-establish one of the cornerstones of our community. The board understood reopening of schools was vital to signaling our citizens to return and rebuild, vital to the recovery of our local economy and vital to the well-being of our children. The board understood that the initial release of the January reopening date was a detriment to recovery and must be overcome.

Once the decision to open was made by the board, the massive task was met head-on by our administrators, teachers and staff. Countless hours were spent by administrators calling teachers, and teachers calling students to inform them to return. Blessed with good weather, massive repairs were made, and 79 of 84 schools opened Oct. 3. Jefferson Parish schools are now receiving students from surrounding devastated parishes, and we have exceeded attendance expectations with more that 50 percent of our pre-Katrina students and growing every day. More that 85 percent of teachers have returned.

We predict that by January (ironically the initial reopening date) our numbers will exceed our pre-Katrina numbers. All this has been accomplished without a single penny of federal disaster relief aid.

Our general fund surplus (our rainy day fund) has been depleted, and our immediate financial future is uncertain due to loss of tax revenue, but we are open and serving our community.

My hat is off to my fellow board members their leadership and resolve in rebuilding not only our school system but our community. And regarding Superintendent Diane Roussel, our administrators, teachers and staff members, words cannot express my appreciation for their loyalty and efforts.

What are schools without teachers?

Congratulations to Edna Karr Magnet School for being named a Blue Ribbon School for the second time in 10 years. Initially, I was excited to hear that my children's schools, Edna Karr and Alice Harte Elementary, would be reopening Nov. 1. However, it was disheartening to learn that the teachers who have made these schools two of the top-performing schools in the state might not be returning.

Instead, the Orleans Parish school system has chosen to rely on UTNO, the teachers' union, to staff the schools as they see fit. Only in the Orleans Parish system would the teachers who have helped my children become the best and the brightest be removed for teachers who have been in academically unacceptable schools for two decades.

Maybe Edna Karr and Alice Harte should follow Lusher and Ben Franklin's lead and apply to become charter schools.

No help from FEMA

I filed online for FEMA assistance and checked back 24 hours later, but they could not find my record and told me to file again. After another 24 hours I checked again, but then they said I had filed twice and that it would delay my application.

I saw President Bush on television when he said that FEMA would provide $2,000 emergency assistance. Well, I have neighbors who got $2,000 per person and got money from their insurance companies as well. My wife and I cannot even get $2,000 for the two of us. We are 66 and 64 years old and were displaced for one month. Our insurance company gave us $1,600 for a maximum of 14 days' assistance.

I am tired of hearing all the excuses from our federal government and from FEMA. They need to cut the red tape and provide the assistance promised. Forget about asking for help from Congress and the White House. They all sent me a standard form letter telling me to contact FEMA. What a joke.

City not ready for the chronically ill

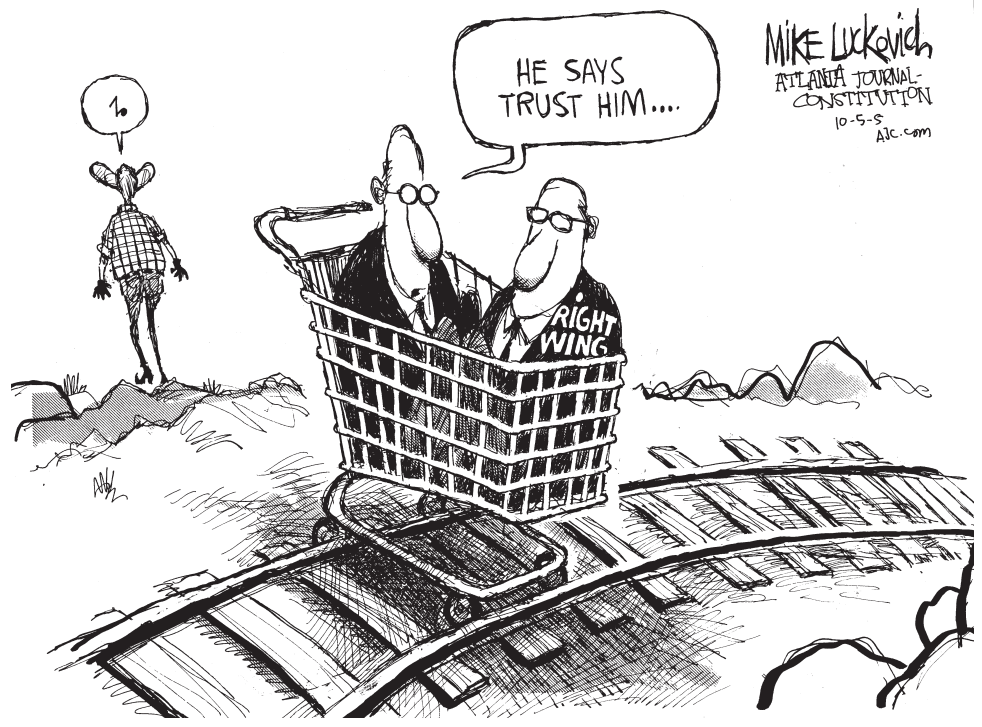
I am a social worker at a local hospital. I work primarily with patients who have chronic diseases, primarily end-stage renal disease, and with dialysis patients. While I am proud of Mayor Ray Nagin and support his efforts to repopulate the city, I am finding that important information is not getting out to the population I serve.



Dialysis is a life-sustaining kidney replacement therapy that patients require three days a week. In order to perform this procedure, a safe water supply is a must. Not only were many of the city's dialysis units flooded or damaged, the east bank water supply is unsafe.

Many patients have come home to find their Orleans Parish dialysis units not open and the systems that provided transportation to and from their units and doctors' offices unavailable. While there are units open in Algiers and Jefferson Parish, many people lack transportation to get to them. These patients were not prepared for the lack of services available within the city.

I hope The Times-Picayune will assist the health care community in better informing persons with serious, chronic or life-threatening illnesses to contact their local health care providers prior to returning to the city and to have a viable plan for transportation and obtaining medication.

OUR OPINIONS

The easy slander

St. Tammany Parish President Kevin Davis got an official apology out of the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Tuesday, and he deserved one. After he publicly criticized the agency, a FEMA spokeswoman suggested that he was merely trying to enrich himself.

Federal agencies shouldn't try to deflect criticism of their work in Louisiana by making up corruption allegations on the spot. And when they do, they shouldn't get away with it.

In an interview with CNN on Sunday, Mr. Davis praised FEMA's top management and field workers for their work. But he also complained that because of bureaucratic barriers created by the agency's middle managers, help is slow to reach the disaster victims who need it.

In comments posted on the news network's Web site, agency spokeswoman Nicol Andrews responded that Mr. Davis had tried to get FEMA to hire a construction company he owns to develop property "to which he has personal ties." She apparently was referring to a site in the Lakeshore Estates area capable of accommodating 1,200 FEMA trailer homes. The land in question is owned by developer Robert Torres, a friend and political supporter of Mr. Davis.

The parish president says the site already has electricity, water and sewerage and therefore could quickly become a temporary housing site. Regardless, if FEMA had a better idea in mind, it didn't have to use Mr. Torres' land. And contrary to Ms. Andrews' comments, Mr. Davis doesn't own a construction company at all.

Our state's fabled history of political intrigue and cronyism cannot serve as an all-purpose response to Louisiana's cries for help.

Yes, some past and current public officials in the metro area and elsewhere in Louisiana have given plum contracts to friends and political allies. Yes, one former governor is in jail, and the past three insurance commissioners have done time as well. If Hurricane Katrina breaks the back of the so-called Louisiana way, it will have done our state one service amid all the misery and heartbreak.

But people outside Louisiana should also know that there are voices — and institutions — demanding accountability from those who misuse their positions and misspend public money. Ray Nagin was elected mayor in New Orleans because city residents were fed up with the culture of patronage and wanted a leader who would foster business development in an honest, straightforward manner. Whatever their other strengths and weaknesses, the mayor and Gov. Kathleen Blanco both have reputations for forthrightness. "Google me," the mayor dared those who questioned the city's ability to use outside aid effectively.

If federal officials are worried about where money is going, they can assign more public-corruption prosecutors to U.S. Attorney Jim Letten's office. They can send in a little army of watchdogs, auditors and inspectors general. But for heaven's sake, our area needs help, and it needs help yesterday.

FEMA has been raked over the coals in the past month or so because of its slow initial response to Katrina. It's just a little too convenient for that agency to let on that state and local officials in Louisiana are, everywhere and always, up to no good.

And it's simply not true.

Envious of us?

Those of us who were chased out of our homes by Hurricane Katrina would rather have had our lives continue along in normal fashion than be put in a position in which a $2,000 check from the Federal Emergency Management Agency was needed. But two Baton Rouge residents apparently were envious of the money the federal government was distributing to hurricane victims — so much so that they pretended to be victimized, authorities say.

Ursula R. Johnson, 33, and John Philip Dugan, 19, both appeared before a federal magistrate in Baton Rouge on Tuesday after each was booked with fraud. A third person is wanted on similar allegations of lying, and federal prosecutors say at least 21 other people in New Orleans and Baton Rouge are being investigated.

Most of us have the decency not to tempt fate. We have at least a rudimentary sense of karma that prevents us from faking pain and misery, lest we find ourselves in a situation where faking it won't be required.

But according to the Department of Homeland Security agent who took statements from the accused, Mr. Dugan needed money for car repairs. Why not file a fake claim with FEMA? Ms. Johnson's motivations are less clear. But the agent did say that she admitted using her brother's name and her aunt's New Orleans address to get money. When the money arrived, she forged her brother's name and deposited the check into a bank account they share.

Such accusations of greed shouldn't surprise us. Following the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, there were people who pretended that they had lost loved ones so they could qualify for government relief. Federal prosecutors suggest that as relief money continues to be distributed, false claims will continue apace.

That's shameful. Those of us who were forced to evacuate or who lost homes and cars during the hurricane should be comforted in our grief and perhaps even praised for having endured as much as we have. The one thing we shouldn't be is envied. This has not been a bonanza for us. It's been a trial. Anybody despicable enough to fake injury deserves not just jail time, but scorn.

To fix N.O. finances, look to N.Y.

NICOLE GELINAS

Mayor Ray Nagin painted a dire picture of New Orleans' finances Tuesday, when he said he must cut half of the city's work force because the city is running out of cash.

This was no surprise. Just like many people, cities live from paycheck to paycheck. New Orleans has been virtually empty of residents and businesses for five weeks now, so the city isn't earning any tax revenue to pay its bills.

The problem is that New Orleans must show its evacuees — scattered around the nation — that it can provide them with basic services in order to convince them to come back. But it's a vicious circle: The city can't provide residents and workers with those basic services unless the residents and workers are already back, and paying their taxes.

But New Orleans' post-Katrina fiscal crisis can be fixed, with some creative thinking. And the city can look to New York as a model — no, not to Gotham's experience after 9/11, but to its experience during an earlier budget crisis, way back in 1975.

Thirty years ago, New York City, just like New Orleans, couldn't pay its bills. The cause of the problem was different: A free-spending New York had borrowed millions each month from banks and bondholders to pay the bills for years, and those lenders had finally said that the jig was up. The constant borrowing had become unsustainable and had to stop.

New York's 1975 crisis was more limited than New Orleans' current crisis, but the bottom line was similar: Without enough money to pay the bills, New York would have had to implement drastic service cuts, possibly driving what was left of its tax base away. And it was too late for outside observers to chastise the city for poor management and tell it to do better on its own.

By that point, just as in New Orleans now, New York was in dire fiscal straits, and needed an outside savior. And the federal government was refusing to step in.

Unlike municipal officials in New Orleans, New York's leaders had one priceless asset: The world's most brilliant private-sector financiers lived in New York. Many of them cared about the city, despite elected leaders' mistakes, and wanted it to recover.

Investment bankers led by Felix Rohatyn worked with Democratic governor Hugh Carey to design a unique bailout package to get New York City out of its hole, so that it could start fresh with better management practices in the future.

The city was in no shape to issue more bonds itself. So the state, not the city, issued them — covering New York City's huge budget gap well into the future so that the city was able to avoid massive service cuts. This gave the state and outside fiscal experts valuable time to step in and impose strict fiscal-management practices on the city, so that a repeat crisis would never occur.

There's no reason New Orleans can't do what New York did three decades ago, but with a twist.

Mayor Nagin needs about $20 million each month to pay his workers. A $120 million bond issue would cover these costs for six months. Louisiana, with its own economy so dependent on New Orleans, likely can't issue bonds on behalf of New Orleans at a low interest rate, like New York state did for New York City — unless the state first secures a federal guarantee on those state bonds.

The feds can and should provide that guarantee, which in effect would temporarily relieve New Orleans of the need to slash day-to-day spending. Three decades ago the federal government refused to help New York in such a manner. But New Orleans' acute fiscal crisis — the temporary disappearance of its entire tax base — is due to a natural disaster, not to chronic overspending.

With the federal government on board, Louisiana could then issue $120 million in 'New Orleans Operational Recovery Bonds' on the global bond market at a low interest rate. (Federally guaranteed bonds feature some of the lowest interest rates in the world.) The state, in turn, would give the money to the city only for the city to meet its payroll, and for no other state or city purpose, as would be agreed to in the bond documents.

Louisiana could structure the debt so that the first year's interest on it was 'borrowed' as well — that is, the state would make its first interest payments on the debt, say, a year from now.

This plan not only would allow New Orleans to pay its workers, easing the recovery. It would buy the city valuable time, creating a structured environment in which to assess its day-to-day fiscal needs for the post-Katrina future. New Orleans, perhaps with a commission of nationwide municipal-finance experts working on a pro-bono basis, could go over its books as information becomes available, and determine what level of tax base it can expect to have in a few months' time.

The city would also have time to determine, as the months pass, what kind of municipal services it will need, say, a year from now, and how best to pay for those services on a sustainable basis.

When New Orleans' tax base has begun to recover, Louisiana could look to the city to begin to pay back some of its debt: It would cost about $650,000 a month for the city to repay $120 million emergency debt over 30 years. New Orleans can't afford that now — but a recovering city with a recovering tax base could.

Is this a risk for the state, and, in turn, for the feds, who would guarantee the state debt? Sure. But Louisiana has no real choice. Louisiana, on a long-term basis, needs a recovered New Orleans to provide much of its tax revenue.

And national taxpayers who fund the federal government have their own selfish interest as well as a moral obligation at stake here: No city — whether well-managed or poorly managed, or in surplus or deficit, to start with — could survive an extended evacuation of its tax base without help.

We need info to weather the storm

BARUCH FISCHHOFF

In an emergency, our future may hang on a few words, provided by someone in authority, as we face a fateful decision. The clock might be ticking quickly, as when a severe storm approaches, or slowly, as when we ponder treatment for a severe illness.

Good information doesn't make the world better, but it does tell us what we're up against. The back-to-back calamities on the Gulf Coast have shown what can happen when people have bad or incomplete information to act upon. Sadly, many problems there were predictable, given how official communications were managed and how rampant rumors became. Preparations could have been much better had state, local and federal authorities spoken with a single voice and made sure their words were being understood.

There are many things that might be said in advance about any looming risk, whether immediate or long-term. Far from the action, it's interesting to think about how oceanic loop currents may (or may not) affect hurricane intensity or how tighter airport security does (or does not) reduce the odds of a terrorist attack. But when we need to make a quick decision, what we really need are the most critical facts: Will there be enough gas available on the evacuation route? Is vaccination at all effective after exposure to smallpox? Can I trust the schools to protect my children while I ride out the crisis at work?

It's not that hard to understand the answers to these questions. But if people who need to know these facts don't get them in a timely and understandable way, then those responsible for communicating the facts have failed.

Without a scientific analysis of what happened after Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita, we won't know exactly what officials said and what citizens heard. A preliminary assessment suggests the messages worked much better for some people than for others. In both hurricanes, many people got out of harm's way. In Katrina, many others remained behind and suffered. Some stayed willfully, some didn't understand their predicament, some had no options. With Rita, many people left who could have stayed home had they only understood — and believed — official communications. Instead, many fled, creating a massive traffic jam in which a bus overheated and exploded, killing 23 passengers.

Communicators fail for known reasons. Here are some possibilities that a Katrina commission should examine looking backward, and that every citizen should consider looking forward, in assessing the communicators in a crisis:

They don't understand how to talk to their public. People tend to exaggerate how well they can put themselves in others' shoes. As a result, the experts say things that people already know, in terms the public doesn't understand, while omitting important information. When talking to patients, physicians have some chance of recognizing that they're missing the mark. Experts making official announcements over radio and television have no chance at all.

The line to enter a Sept. 12 town meeting for St. Bernard Parish residents at the Capitol went out the door. Residents were desperate for information about their homes and the future of their community.

Nor is there any substitute for asking people in the intended audience how they interpret a message, before releasing it to the world. Seemingly simple terms, such as "shelter in place," "climate" and even "safe sex" mean different things to different people. No one would put a drug on the market without testing it. Yet we rely on labels that leave users guessing at the extent of the risks and benefits. We issue emergency instructions without running them by anyone.

They don't trust their public. Sadly, once we misunderstand other people's predicaments, we often judge them harshly if their actions don't make sense to us. We don't guess that a woman might have stayed behind in a hurricane because she didn't know her ex-husband had already taken their child to safety, or that a man on probation might decide he couldn't leave because he couldn't reach his probation officer.

Officials aren't immune to these biases. One often hears "experts'" predict mass panic in an emergency. Yet studies since the London blitz during World War II have shown that people behave responsibly, even bravely, in crises.

They don't care solely about their public. Risk communication is a public health function, helping people make the best choices. Yet the job is often given to public affairs or public relations or even marketing people. These professionals have valuable skills, but they naturally focus on their employers' welfare, not just that of their audience. When people feel their lives are on the line, they just want unspun facts.

Only the most cynical public affairs person would emphasize spin over substance in a crisis. But research finds that changing hats isn't that easy. Conventional concerns so permeate people's thinking that they cannot set aside their habitual ways of communicating.

They have nothing to tell their public. Without proper advance research, an agency cannot assess the risks that its public faces. In that case, it's better to plead ignorance than offer confident guesswork. Of course, no one wants to be told: "Beats me. You're on your own." But that's more useful than an unsupportable "Trust me." Still, there's always the temptation to pretend to know what should have been known, and to blame the victims for not doing the impossible.

Communication is part of any relationship. After Katrina and Rita, after the anthrax mailings, the abortive smallpox vaccination campaign — indeed, after any public crisis — citizens will ask, "Did you listen to us so that you could tell us what we needed to know?'" When the answer is yes, the authorities increase their standing as information providers. When the answer is no, the authorities undermine our resilience as a society.

Baruch Fischhoff, a professor of social and decision sciences at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh, is president of the Society for Risk Analysis. He wrote this column for The Washington Post.

Bush's work wives

I hope President Bush doesn't have any more office wives tucked away in the White House.

There are only so many supremely powerful jobs to give to women who are not qualified to get them.

The West Wing is a parallel universe to TV's Wisteria Lane: Instead of self-indulgent desperate housewives wary of sexy nannies, there are self-sacrificing, buttoned-up nannies serving as adoring work wives, catering to W.'s every political, legal and ego-affirming need.

Maybe it's because his mom was not adoring enough, but more tart and prickly, even telling her son, the president, not to put his feet up on her coffee table. Or maybe it's because, as his wife says, his kinship with his mom gives him a desire to be around strong, "very natural" women. But W. loves being surrounded by tough women who steadfastly devote their entire lives to doting on him, like the vestal virgins guarding the sacred fire, serving as custodians for his values and watchdogs for his reputation.

First he elevated Condi Rice to secretary of state, even though she had bungled her job as national security adviser, failing to bring a sense of urgency to warnings about terrorism aimed at America before 9/11, and acting more as an enabler than an honest broker in the push to invade Iraq.

But what were these limitations, considering the time the workaholic bachelorette logged at W.'s side in Crawford and Camp David, coaching him on foreign affairs, talking sports with him, exercising with him, making him feel like the most thoughtful, farsighted he-man in the world?

Then he elevated his longtime aide, speechwriter, memoir ghostwriter and cheerleader Karen Hughes to undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, even though it is exceedingly hard for the 6-foot Texan to try to spin a billion Muslims whom she doesn't understand the first thing about.

But who cares about her lack of expertise in such a critical job, as long as the workaholic loyalist continues to make her old boss feel like the most thoughtful, farsighted he-man in the world?

And now he has nominated his White House counsel and former personal lawyer, Harriet Miers, to a crucial swing spot on the Supreme Court. The stolid Texan, called "Harry" by some old friends, is a bachelorette who was known for working long hours, sometimes 16-hour days, and was a frequent guest at Camp David and the Crawford ranch, where she helped W. clear brush.

Like Hughes and Laura Bush, she's a graduate of Southern Methodist, and she has always been there for W. In 1998, during his re-election race for governor, Harry handled the first questions about whether Bush had received favorable treatment to get into the Texas Air National Guard to avoid the draft. Though the former Democrat gave a grand to Al Gore in '88, she passed the loyalty test for W. during the Bush vs. Gore standoff in 2000, when she recruited conservative lawyers to work for the Bush scion in Tallahassee, Fla.

But who cares whether she has no judicial experience, and that no one knows what she believes or how she would rule from a bench she's never been behind, as long as the reason her views are so mysterious is that she's subordinated them to W.'s, making him feel like the most thoughtful, farsighted he-man in the world?

David Frum, the former White House speechwriter and conservative commentator, reported on his blog that Miers once told him that W. was the most brilliant man she knew.

Bushie and Harriet share the same born-again Christian faith, which they came to in midlife, deciding to adopt Jesus Christ as their savior. The Washington Post reported that she tithes to the Valley View Christian Church in Dallas, "where antiabortion literature is sometimes distributed and tapes from the conservative group Focus on the Family are sometimes screened," and where, when she returns, Miers asks well-wishers to pray for her and the president.

Born Catholic, she switched to evangelical Christianity in her mid-30s and began to identify more with the Republicans than with the Democrats, The New York Times reports Wednesday; she joined the missions committee of her church, which opposed legalized abortion, and one former political associate said that Miers told her she had been in favor of a woman's right to have an abortion when she was younger, but that her views hardened against abortion once she became born again.

W. is asking for a triple leap of faith. He has faith in Miers as his lawyer and as a woman who shares his faith. And we're expected to have faith in his faith and her faith, and her opinions that derive from her faith that could change the balance of the court and affect women's rights for the next generation.

That's a little bit too much faith, isn't it?

Katrina brings winds of change for some firms

But other businesses energized about return

By Mary Judice
Business writer

Like many other New Orleans companies, energy firms have gone into exile in Gulf Coast cities from Baton Rouge to Houston in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, and many are starting to plan their homecoming pending repairs to their buildings and the return of basic city services.

But a couple are looking for change first.

Energy Partners Ltd., a publicly traded exploration company with headquarters in New Orleans, has temporarily moved its 80 employees to Houston. The company is grappling with whether it stays there.

Richard Bachmann, chairman and chief executive, said he is frustrated with the lack of leadership at the state and city levels of government and the lack of communication with industry leaders.

"We will wait to see (that) they don't make a mess of things," he said.

"The heart of the oil and gas industry is in Houston," he said. "The longer companies are left there, the more comfortable they are in exile."

Tidewater Inc., a New Orleans company with about 80 employees in its headquarters on Poydras Street, also is watching.

"Until we see what shakes out in the reconstruction effort, and how it is accomplished, we will take a wait-and-see position," said Dean Taylor, president and chief executive of Tidewater.

Taylor said that instead of infighting and finger-pointing among elected officials, he would like to see them spend their efforts creating tax-free zones and tax holidays for businesses.

He said that even if his company does not maintain headquarters in New Orleans, it may leave administrative staff the city.

However, many other energy employers say they're starting to plan for their return.

Chevron Texaco moved its Gulf of Mexico unit from the unit's Gravier Street headquarters, where nearly 1,000 employees worked, to Lafayette, where it already had offices.

"Chevron is evaluating the safety, security and reliability of our building and city infrastructure, which will determine our timeline for returning to the city," spokesman Mickey Driver said.

Partial power has been restored to Chalmette Refining Co., a l83,000-barrel per day refinery owned by Exxon Mobil and Petroleos de Venezuela, and repairs are under way. Mark Boudreaux, an Exxon spokesman in Houston, said 200 to 300 of the refinery's 600 employees have returned to work.

"Our intention is to bring the refinery up and have people restored to work," he said.

Dominion Resources, whose office tower in New Orleans Centre was severely damaged, said January is the earliest the company could return its 340 employees to the headquarters from temporary offices in Houston, spokesman Dan Donovan said. He said the company might look for other office space in New Orleans, if necessary, in order to return to the city.

But he said there are considerations other than office space. The company's employees "need a safe and suitable place to live," he said.

Shell Exploration and Development will reoccupy its office site in One Shell Square "when it becomes habitable," the company said in a press release.

"The intention is to return with all employees. The question is time," said Chris Bozman, manager of public relations for Shell Oil in Houston. Shell has moved the 1,000 New Orleans employees to offices in Houston and to a training center in Robert.

Bozman said the company is awaiting repairs as well as basic utilities and a fire and medical response system.

Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold and McMoRan Exploration have moved staff to Baton Rouge but plan on moving back when repairs are made to their Poydras Street headquarters. Spokesman Bill Collier said the company expects repairs to be completed by Nov. 15.

"The key date is Nov. 15, when we will start moving back," he said. "We plan on moving everything back."

At a meeting in Baton Rouge, Dickie Brennan maps out a strategy to revive his three French Quarter restaurants, and help his employees rebuild their lives

Mike Cobb, Michelle Benoit and Eric Offray get the first post-Katrina order of food out of the kitchen and onto the tables of customers at Dickie Brennan's Bourbon House restaurant in the French Quarter.

Even with most of the city unpopulated, many of the tables inside Bourbon House were filled at lunchtime Wednesday.

Dickie Brennan's three French Quarter restaurants had been shut down for over five weeks. Two of them, Palace Cafe and Dickie Brennan's Steakhouse, suffered damage in Hurricanes Katrina and Rita; the latter was flooded and won't be ready to reopen for months.

Yet at a meeting of Brennan's management at Ruffino's restaurant last Monday in Baton Rouge, where the restaurateur had set up a satellite office of Dickie Brennan and Co., the prevailing feeling was one of abundant good fortune.

Brennan felt lucky to have one of his restaurants, Bourbon House, nearly ready for business, with hopes that the Palace Cafe would soon follow. His staff was lucky, too, and not just because Brennan's company had the wherewithal to keep all full-time employees - roughly 400 people — on the payroll, including tips for waiters.

Soon after the meeting started, the arrival of Eric Offray, Palace Cafe's kitchen manager, was met with applause and hugs.

The more things change

... the more some things in New Orleans stay the same

You hang around New Orleans long enough these days and you begin to absorb what is new and what is returning to normal.

For instance, I was sitting on my front stoop and an RTA bus marked MAGAZINE zoomed by. I thought: Well, how about that! That's a good sign.

Never mind that the bus was empty; at least it was running and that's a sign of normalcy. And it was driving way too fast and therein was another harbinger of the same-ol', same-ol'.

Then, about 90 seconds later, another RTA bus marked MAGAZINE whizzed by, shaking my house to its foundation. It, too, was empty, but it was the realization that there were probably only two busses running the entire Magazine Street route and here they were, one right after the other and I thought: We're back!

What could be a better indication of a return to the old ways than the colossal inefficiency of our public transportation system? I don't know about you, but I will sleep better tonight; at least, that is, until an RTA bus blows by the house at midnight at Category-5 speed and does more damage to my plaster ceilings than Katrina did.

Of course, a common joke around here — dire times make for dire humor — is that when the mayor gets around to laying off those 3,000 workers, will anybody notice? I believe he, or some other public official, called them non-essential employees and I'll let you fill in your own punch line here.

I just hope it's not the two guys who've been assigned to cut the grass on the neutral grounds for the past 10 years; man, things would really be

DO-IT-YOURSELF FILM FEST

Were it not for That Which Must Not Be Named, the 17th annual New Orleans Film Festival would be in full swing this weekend. Festival programming had been set to begin Friday. A statement on the festival's Web site, www.neworleansfilmfest.com, says, "We are conferring with state and local officials and plan to begin programming in New Orleans and other cities as soon as possible."

In the meantime, fans can re-create the festival experience with a collection of titles available for rent on DVD. All have played at the New Orleans Film Festival.

WELCOME DISTRACTIONS

Trivial pursuits to take your mind off you-know-what

Shine (PG-13, 1996)
Every festival has to start with a big-ticket attraction featuring A-list talent. Director Scott Hicks' biography of troubled pianist David Helfgott is perhaps the most successful mainstream film ever to have its local premiere at the New Orleans festival. The cast includes Geoffrey Rush, Noah Taylor and Armin Mueller-Stahl.

Schultze Gets the Blues (PG, 2003)
The foreign selection is writer-director Michael Schorr's study of a German miner forced into early retirement. Schultze (Horst Krause), an amateur accordionist, travels through Texas and Louisiana to learn the influence of polka music on tejano and zydeco styles. (It's not the blues he gets at all.) True, the film isn't very good, but every festival has to have a clunker. Besides, those who stick with it to the end will see scenes filmed at Mid-City Lanes Rock 'n' Bowl. Mostly in German with subtitles.

Naqoyqatsi (PG, 2002)
No festival is complete without a capital-A Art Film to leave movie-goers scratching their heads. This mesmerizing film is a feature-length montage depicting the globalization of technology and violence, set to a score by composer Philip Glass. Writer-director Godfrey Reggio is a New Orleans native. The film completes the "qatsi" trilogy Reggio began in the 1980s.

Down by Law (R, 1986)
Artistic Director John Desplas has said that writer-director Jim Jarmusch's comedy is the festival's most-requested title, earning the cult hit a near-permanent spot on the schedule. The movie, filmed in Louisiana, tells the story of three very different men who end up in the same prison cell. They are played by Tom Waits, John Lurie and Roberto Benigni. The cast includes Nicoletta Braschi and Ellen Barkin.

RENTERS HAVE RIGHTS, TOO

New Orleanians who rent apartments have many of the same hurricane mitigation issues as homeowners: Who do they call? What does insurance cover? Can or will the place be fixed? Here's a look at renter's concerns and how to address them.

THIS MOLD HOUSE

More tips for mending your broken home

FIRST, CALL YOUR LANDLORD and try to ascertain the condition of your rental home. Or, if you have returned there, call to give a report on its condition. Most landlords will work with tenants to get the property back in shape and abate the rent for the time the apartment was not habitable. Many landlords also are being flexible about lease requirements, given the scope of the disaster. Work together to determine a date for moving back in.

THE CONTENTS ARE YOUR PROBLEM. While the landlord is responsible for insuring the building, the renter must insure its contents. But few take advantage of this option: Industry estimates are that only 20 to 30 percent of renters carry insurance on their belongings. Non-homeowners can buy both flood insurance and renters insurance to cover the cost of replacing damaged belongings. A maximum of $100,000 in flood insurance for contents is allowed on National Flood Insurance Program policies. As with structural concerns the dweller's possessions, are covered by flood insurance if the damage is from rising water, and by renters insurance if the damage is from wind or storm.

KNOW YOUR EVICTION RIGHTS. Keep in mind: Gov. Kathleen Blanco has suspended all legal deadlines until Oct. 25, meaning that all legal evictions are on hold until then. According to New Orleans Legal Assistance, a renter generally cannot be evicted if he has a written lease and the apartment was "partially" damaged. Check your lease to see if the landlord can evict for "partial" destruction. "Total" destruction allows the landlord to evict. If you don't have a lease, the landlord can evict by giving you 10 days notice before the end of the rental month.

YOU CAN LEGALLY CANCEL YOUR LEASE only if the apartment was partially or totally "destroyed." Short-term repairs, such as replacing the carpet, don't count. The good news is that you generally are not obligated to pay rent for the time you're forced to be out of the apartment due to flood damage and necessary repairs, says New Orleans Legal Assistance. If the landlord doesn't repair the damage to the apartment, you can make the repairs yourself and deduct the cost from your rent, but you cannot withhold rent in order to force the owner to fix things. For general information on legal issues, visit www.lawhelp.org; rental issues vary widely, and renters should seek legal advice for problems that they cannot resolve.

IN CASES OF FINANCIAL HARDSHIP, FEMA (800-621-3362, or www.fema.gov) or the Red Cross (800-975-7585, or www.redcross.org) may award rent money, and you may be able to deduct property losses not covered by insurance on your income tax. Also, renters may qualify for loans from the Small Business Administration (800-659-2955, or www.sba.gov.) to repair or replace personal property.

Upbeat Dickie B

BRENNAN, from C-1

"He carried his kids out of flood waters on his back," whispered marketing director Lee Anne Garner. Offray, his wife and two young children eventually made their way from the Upper 9th Ward to the Astor Crowne Plaza, where the Bourbon House anchors the first floor.

"Sometime Monday morning Eric calls me on my cell phone and he says, 'I've got an axe, and I'm going up to the attic. Do you think that'll be OK? My car's already under water,' " said Steve Pettus, managing partner of Dickie Brennan and Company. "And then I didn't hear from him for three days."

The group of roughly two dozen managers was joined via speaker phone by a crew readying the Bourbon House for its reopening.

"What about the water in the hotel?" Brennan asked.

Through static, the voice said something about "chlorine" and "potable water."

Brennan seemed to understand: "So guests can shower in this water and we can't use it for anything?"

"We're getting all of our deliveries in tomorrow," Bourbon House chef Jared Tees said through the speaker phone. "But I don't think the protein cooler made it."

Brennan said the refrigeration equipment at all three restaurants would need to be replaced.

Pettus delivered a run-down of property damage at the company's two other properties. The Steakhouse filled with three inches of seeping ground water after the pumps that normally keep the sub-basement restaurant dry were knocked out with the rest of the city's power.

"We'll meet with the architect and contractor at the Steakhouse later this week," Pettus told the managers. "We have some holes in the roof at the Palace Café. We had a satellite dish land on the roof."

"That wasn't ours?" Brennan joked.

Steakhouse general manager George Henriquez also spotted some mildew at the Palace. "We can clear that up tomorrow," he said.

Having to open three restaurants in stages is in some ways a blessing, Brennan said, allowing the company to devote spare resources to helping employees resettle and, if necessary, rebuild.

"We're not a construction company, but we think we have enough hands to get people back and situated," Pettus told the group. "Is there a Steakhouse person who wants to be the point person on that?"

Brennan and Pettus urged the managers to prepare mentally for Friday, when all company staff was due to report to New Orleans for work. 35 FEMA trailers have been reserved for employees who need them.

"Most of our conversations are going to be about how we survived this disaster," Brennan said.

Waitress Lacey Raschke hustles beverages to a table of customers at Bourbon House, the first of Dickie Brennan's three French Quarter restaurants to reopen.

Returning staff are "going to have a lot of questions," Pettus added. " 'How do I get my kids into school? Where do I live?' " In preparation the company's lawyers prepared a thick volume detailing, among other things, assistance opportunities for displaced Louisianans.

Henriquez raised the issue of increased opportunities for New Orleans laborers. "We need to talk about restructuring our pay scale," he said, citing circulating stories of dishwashers commanding $10 per hour on the West Bank.

Brennan reported that his father, Dick Brennan, Sr., had already offered to pitch in scrubbing pots.

"We might open up the Palace where we open up the kitchen and do it cafeteria style," he said. "We're all going to be creative. But we're going to take care of people, bottom line."

"Our goal," he added, "was never to be the first restaurant open in New Orleans, but to open the best restaurant that we can."

Brennan hoped the Friday meeting would allow the company to give checks to some of the over 100 employees that are still unaccounted for. Barbara Krieger, Brennan and Pettus' executive assistant, announced that Warren Carter, a Bourbon House oyster shucker, had been located in Iowa, where he was taken in by customers of the restaurant.

Carter told Jim Leslie, Bourbon House's general manager, that the customers supplied him with a car, a home and a job. They also set up a relief fund for him at a local bank.

"He said if he didn't work at the Bourbon House," Krieger said, "he wouldn't have known these people and wouldn't have had anyplace to go."

There are signs of the times on Lee Circle

different around here without them.

I have a feeling I just really ticked off 3,000 people, maybe more. But then, that would be another sign of normalcy, wouldn't it? People being angry at the local newspaper: a comfort zone if ever there was one.

A casual drive around town — or at least what remains of it — is also a compelling reminder of the old days. It reminds you how much a simple afternoon drive can be facing danger to its core.

First of all, at least half the city's one-way signs were turned sideways by the wind and now point in the wrong direction. And half the people driving around here are guys from out of state in massive pickup trucks and the National Guard put up temporary stop signs at intersections where traffic lights are now working, so it's all a game of Russian roulette. Or maybe chicken.

A run to the local drug store/gas station/strip club has turned into a not-so-virtual game of Grand Theft Auto.

Every now and then I see some church lady tooling down the road at 7 mph in her cream-colored, four-door Grand Marquis and I can only wonder: Why are you here?

I know it's probably bad taste to kick the city while it's down, but it really can be interesting/fun/mind-boggling to watch some of the old New Orleans civic quirks work their way back into operation.

For instance, the mayor has urged business owners to come back into town and open up and we residents have been encouraged to patronize them, but neighborhood restaurants and bars are bum-rushed by the authorities every night at 8 p.m. and told to close for curfew.

I'm no restaurateur, but I can imagine it's got to be hard to build up a steady dinner clientele when you close at sunset. Oddly — maybe not so oddly, when I think about it — the strip clubs on Bourbon Street have somehow been exempt from this rule and there are tons of big, beefy guys in town (who drive really big pick-up trucks) who are all too happy to stuff garter belts full of fivers until the sun comes up and then they have to report to work and operate heavy machinery on a one-way street.

Yes, indeed, all is returning to normal. I think there is no better indication of this than the running commentary that has been taking place on the plywood boards mounted over the windows of Sarouk Shop Oriental Rugs down on St. Charles Avenue near Lee Circle.

Early on, in the hairy days of Aftermath, the owner/proprietor/squatter who was living there spray painted (I'm no handwriting analyst, but I'd say it was with some urgency): "Don't try: I am sleeping inside with a big dog, an ugly woman, two shotguns and a claw hammer."

Claw hammer. Nice touch.

Then, in a spray paint posting dated 9/4/05 (talk about meticulous graffiti!), it says: "Still here. Woman left. Cooking a pot of dog gumbo."

Like I said, dire times call for dire humor. Or maybe it wasn't a joke; some strange things have happened around here lately.

Anyway, in a spray painted update, dated 9/24, it says: "Welcome back, y'all. Grin & bear it."

Ain't that the truth? I mean, what are the other choices?

BREAKOUT PLAYS: Two cabaret musical comedies developed at Le Chat Noir by composer Harry Mayronne and writer-performers Ricky Graham and Roy Haylock may soon appear in New York and Houston.

Mayronne, who is in New York, reports he is planning to open "The Black & White Blues," the revue about restaurants and the waitering game, at Sophia's at the Edison Hotel in November.

And lawyer-producer Patrick Lee is working at producing "Hollywood Heaven" as a holiday show in November-December at STAGES in Houston, starring Graham and Haylock.

'NATIVE TONGUES' BENEFITS: Carl Walker, the director of All Kinds of Theatre, says that he is offering all of the "Native Tongues" monologues, gratis, to any theater in the country which wants to use them for benefit readings.

"I'm also continuing to work by e-mail with playwright Jim Fitzmorris on our stage adaptation of Chris Wiltz's book on Norma Wallace, 'The Last Madam,' " Walker said.

Contacted on the road, Fitzmorris said that the Cincinnati League of Theaters is having a benefit reading of the play's first act and that he was en route to Kentucky, where he is confident the famed Actor's Theatre of Louisville will give it a reading as well.

"Then, in October, I'll be a visiting scholar at Columbia University at the invitation of (playwright) Anne Bogart and we can get some readings going there," he said.

SOCIAL SCENE

New Orleanians have stories to tell from Texas

By Nell Nolan
Society columnist

"The stories I could tell you, you wouldn't believe," said New Orleans advertising-public relations exec Peter Mayer, about his evacuation odyssey. "From New Orleans, I went to Laurel, Miss., then to Tunica, Miss., then across Arkansas, to Houston, then (because of Rita) to California and then back to Houston." Whew! For the time being, Pete is ensconced in his son's pool house in Houston, where his creature comforts are being realized: "I'm eating well."

He added "People have been wonderful. In fact, at Cassitty's Cafe in Cleveland, Texas, and after a lovely meal, the owner wouldn't let me pay. He said I'd been through enough."

Concerning his return to New Orleans, Pete says he very optimistic about the long-term future of the city. He finished with, "I'm looking forward to going home."

Also in Houston, Julie Wise (Mrs. Marshall) Oreck said, "It's been traumatic for everyone. It's like a jigsaw puzzle." Marshall and Tom Oreck have set up temporary offices (with generators and mobile homes) in Dallas; David Oreck is in Poplarville, Miss.; and Julie's in Houston with her and Marshall's teenage daughters, Zoe and Sophie, who've enrolled in Houston schools. Julie also reported on the Houston presence of her mother, Carol Wise and Roswell Weil, as well as that of Pam and Frank Friedler and Pam's parents, Mary and Arthur Davis.

Julie praised the work of the Jewish Federation. "It's been great helping to coordinate everyone," she said.

Sue and Harold Singer spent a while in Houston — and found "the people so accommodating" — but have just returned to the Crescent City, where, she says, she's doing a lot of cooking and housing some close kith and kin. "I'm offering good food and cheer."

Bruce Waltzer, who was honored recently by the Forum for Equality in New Orleans, and his wife, retired Judge Miriam (also a former Forum honoree), are in Dallas with several generations of their family, including their daughter and son-in-law, Lainie and Tad Breaux, whose baby, Zachary, was born six days before Katrina hit and had to be left in the Crescent City for neonatal care until he was reunited with his parents; and son Joel Waltzer and wife Toni and their Noah and Elias.

"We're all here in Dallas," said Bruce, who praised Angel Flights and Jewish Federation for help with newborn Zachary. He continued, saying the extensive family was likely to stay in Dallas for the nine months of the school year, and concluded, "People in Dallas have been opening their hearts to us."

Another Hornets exec resigns

McDougall had held the position for 6 ½ months

By John Reid
Staff writer

OKLAHOMA CITY — Chief marketing officer Tim McDougall, hired by the Hornets in February to increase the team's flagging ticket sales, has left the team, becoming the second Hornets executive to resign within a week.

McDougall's departure, after only 6 1/2 months with the organization, was confirmed Friday by team president Paul Mott, who†did not specify the reason for the resignation. McDougall could not be reached for comment.

Last Saturday, Allan Bristow resigned as general manager, citing health concerns.

Mott said the team is going†through a difficult†transition period for some of its employees, prompted by the teamís temporary relocation to Oklahoma City for the season as a result of damage to New Orleans Arena from Hurricane Katrina.

"During this time of great change and uncertainty, there have been a number of people who have not opted to come to Oklahoma City," Mott said. "Some who couldn't bring themselves to leave Louisiana in a time of great need. Others had family and things that made the decision to come to Oklahoma City very hard.

"All of us in life have our own issues to deal with - good, bad or challenging. With the aftermath of Katrina, the impact of Hurricane Rita, this has been a life-altering experience of major proportions as I've ever known."

Mott did not say if the team's relocation to Oklahoma City had anything to do with McDougall's resignation. McDougall lived with his NASHVILLE, TENN. — Despite the talk from Tigertown, there is nothing normal about this week.

In fact, it's abnormal.

Yes, No. 11 LSU (2-1) did enjoy a normal flight home Saturday after the usual laugher at Mississippi State and began preparations for its next opponent on a ho-hum Sunday. Monday went according to script. Tuesday was typical. On Wednesday, Coach Les Miles upped the tempo of practice, letting it crescendo at 5:30 p.m. so that the players could ease down Thursday and Friday.

Wave's challenge is to keep ball vs. Houston

Tulane sees time of possession as key

By Fred Robinson

LAFAYETTE — Tulane's game Saturday against Houston has all the makings of a showdown.

It has Tulane's defense, ranked second in the nation, going against Houston's high-powered offense, No. 1 in Conference USA.

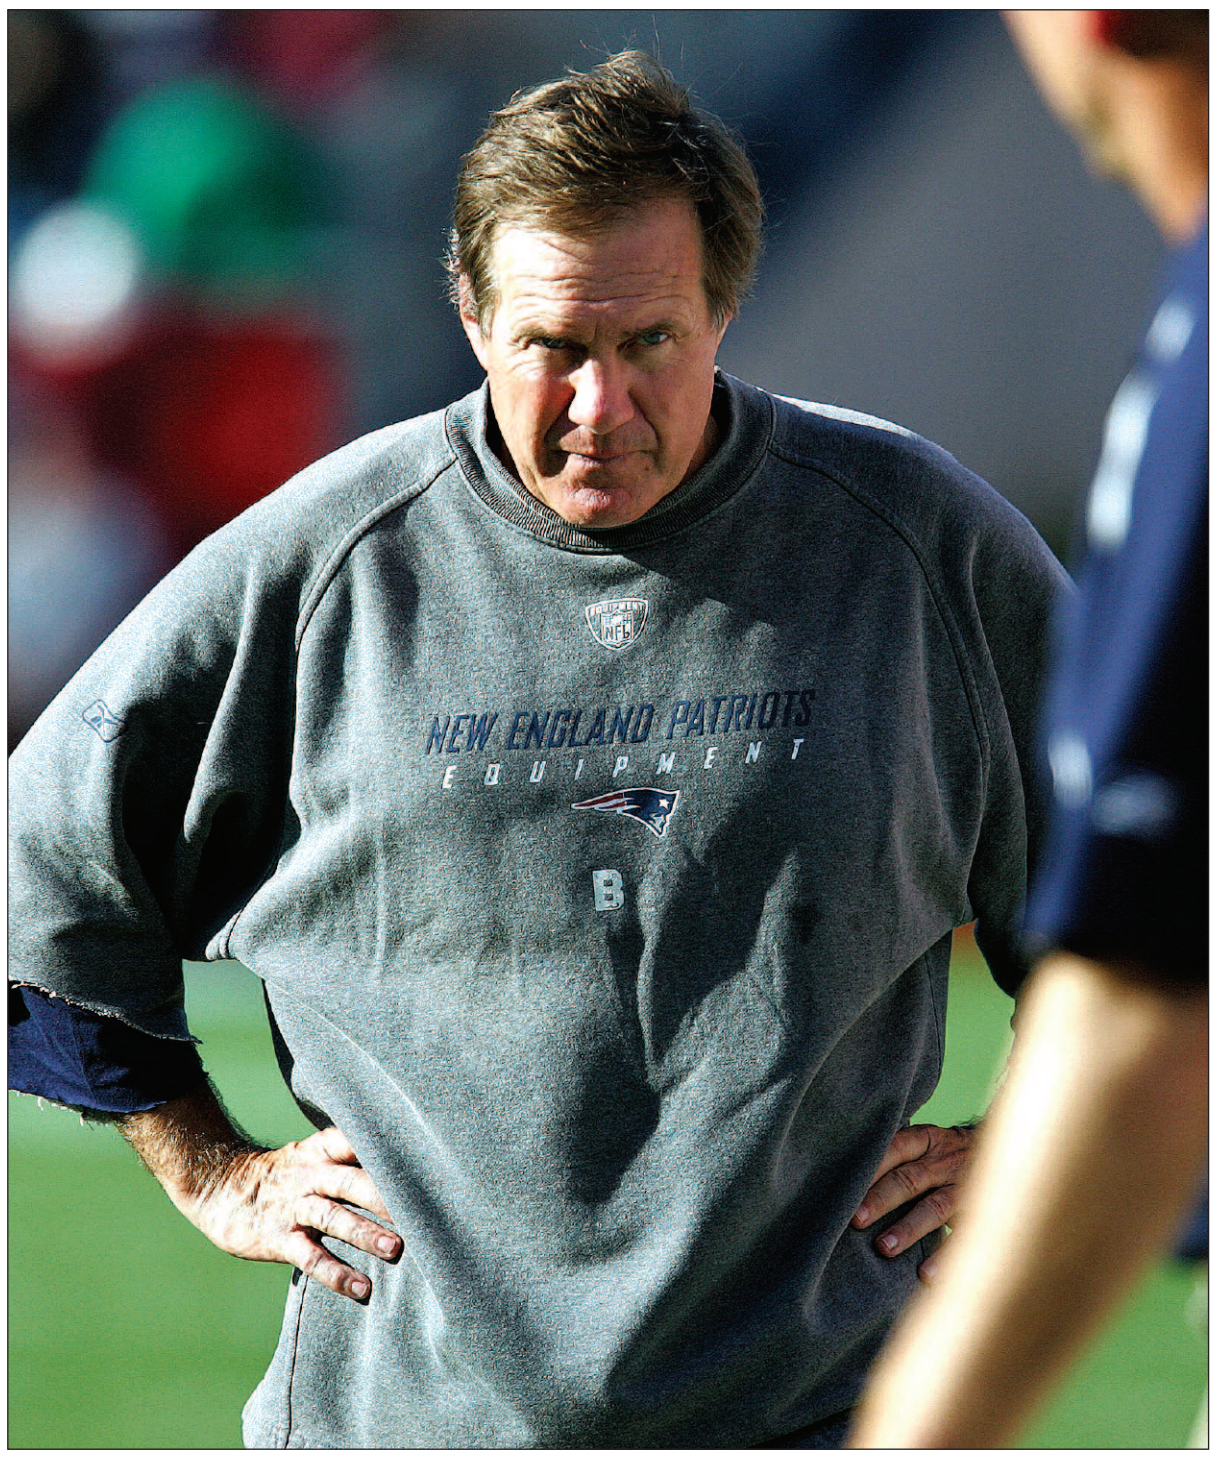
But, the matchup that cannot be overlooked when the two meet at Cajun Field, is Tulane's offense versus the Cougars' defense, ranked 99th in the nation.



In two of Tulane's three games this season, the Green Wave offense dominated time of possession. The Wave held the ball for nearly 16 minutes more than its opponents in the first two games.

Last week in its victory over Southeastern Louisiana, Tulane lost the time-of-possession battle by almost 12 minutes. Keeping Houston's offense off the field as much as possible is a must, and to do that, Tulane must return to being a ballhawk.

"We just have to execute," Green Wave offensive coordinator Frank Scelfo said. "The main thing is, at the end of every one of those drives, we've got to get points. We've got to get

New England Patriots coach Bill Belichick has seen his team go from being one of the best defensive teams in the NFL to one that gave up 41 points against San Diego last week.

New England appears to be mortal this season with a 2-2 record, but is it too soon to write off the two-time defending champs?

By Brian Allee-Walsh
Staff writer

There seems to be sufficient reason for Beantown sports fans to panic these days.

The Boston Red Sox find themselves down two games to none against the Chicago White Sox in the best-of-five American League Division Series, and the twice-defending Super Bowl champion New England Patriots appear to be vulnerable.

Vulnerable as in 2-2 and coming off a surprising 41-17 loss to the San Diego Chargers that ended the Patriotsí 21-game home winning streak.

With a road game coming Sunday against Michael Vick and the Atlanta Falcons, the Patriots are in danger of losing consecutive games for the first time since December 2002, a span of 39 games.

"They came in here and beat us in all phases," Patriots linebacker Monty Beisel said. "They had us up against the ropes all day, and they left here with a KO."

So why has Bill Belichickís team suddenly developed a glass jaw?

For the simple answer, one only needs to look at the injury list and players no longer on the team.

The team's three leading tacklers in 2004 are not on the field - safety Rodney Harrison (a season-ending knee injury) and linebackers Ted Johnson (retired) and Tedy Bruschi (on the league's physically unable to perform list). Additionally, veteran running back/return specialist Kevin Faulk (foot) and tackle Matt Light (ankle) are sidelined indefinitely.

As the Patriots won three Super Bowl titles in the past four years, they stayed relatively healthy, especially with their group of core players. And when a hole has needed to be plugged, Belichick seems to have found a solution.

On Monday, a headline in the Providence Journal warned of pending trouble: "Fasten Your Seatbelts, Patriots Fans, and Brace for Some Turbulence."

"I can't tell you how the other 12 (games) are going to turn out," Belichick told reporters. "I donít think you know. I don't think anybody knows. I donít think it really matters. At this point, it's a one-game season and it's Atlanta."

One Patriots insider pointed to the teamís inability to stop the Chargers' running game. San Diego rushed for 183 yards, in-

Red Sox won't defend title

Chicago ends 88-year drought

By Jimmy Golen
AP sports writer

BOSTON — The White Sox swept away the champion Red Sox, and now they'll try to purge the memory of the notorious Black Sox.

Orlando Hernandez delivered a vintage performance out of the bullpen and Paul Konerko hit a tiebreaking homer as Chicago defeated Boston 5-3 Friday to sweep the defending World Series champs out of the playoffs and win a postseason series for the first time since Shoeless Joe Jackson's team won it in 1917.

Two years later, some of Jackson's "Black Sox" took payoffs from gamblers to throw the Series. Eight men were out, banned from baseball for life.

Boston had hoped for its first repeat championships since 1915-16, but for the second time in three years its season ended thanks to a Tim Wakefield knuckleball that went over a left-field wall.

The Red Sox cut the deficit to 4-3 when Manny Ramirez led off the sixth inning with his second homer, then they loaded the bases - still with none out. But Hernandez got pinch-hitter Jason Varitek and Game 2 goat Tony Graffanino to pop up to the infield, then Johnny Damon struck out on a check swing to end the inning.

Graffanino, whose error before Tadahito Iguchi's three-run homer was the difference in a 5-4 loss on Wednesday night, fouled off four pitches with two strikes; Damon also worked the count full, but Hernandez got him on a pitch in the dirt.

El Duque shut out the Red Sox on one hit over three innings, and Juan Uribe's suicide squeeze made the score 5-3 in the ninth. Rookie closer Bobby Jenks got three outs to save it for winner Freddy Garcia.

The White Sox lost in the '19 and '59 Series and the '83, '93 and 2000 playoffs. With the three-game sweep, they are the first team to advance to the second round of the playoffs.

Chicago took a 2-0 lead in the third with four consecutive hits off Wakefield - doubles by Uribe and Scott Podsednik and singles by Iguchi and Jermaine Dye.

cluding 134 and two touchdowns on 25 carries by All-Pro LaDainian Tomlinson.

A year ago, the Patriots were 4-0 with wins against Indianapolis (27-24), Arizona (23-12), Buffalo (31-17) and Miami (24-10). The first four games on this season's schedule appeared to be more difficult - against Oakland (W, 30-20), Carolina (L, 27-17), Pittsburgh (W, 23-20) and San Diego (L, 41-17).

By comparison, the 2005 Patriots have scored 18 fewer points and yielded 41 more than at this stage a year ago. This seasonís team is averaging 56 fewer rushing yards and 50 more passing yards per game.

"What theyíve done is remarkable," Chargers coach Marty Schottenheimer said. "But at what point do you keep responding when you have to keep putting in new players? They've done it wonderfully over the last four years, but there comes a time where it has to catch up with you. Even with a team as great as this one."

With 12 games remaining, few are counting the Patriots out of the AFC championship hunt, although Carolina and San Diego exposed a few flaws.

Besides the six games in the AFC East, the Patriots will visit Atlanta (3-1) and Denver (3-1) the next two weeks and later face Indianapolis (4-0), New Orleans (2-2), at Kansas City (2-2) and Tampa Bay (4-0). Those six teams have a combined 18-6 record, a .750 winning percentage.

"Tom Brady is healthy, isnít he?" Buccaneers personnel executive Doug Williams asked. "If they find somebody adequate to replace Light, then they still have Brady, Corey Dillon and two of the best tight ends in the league (Daniel Graham and Christian Fauria) on offense. And they're going to play defense under Belichick. So you can't throw dirt on New England at 2-2, not now, even though a lot of folks would like to.

"It's too early, way too early. ... There ainít no way in the world you can write them off."

Former Saints and Colts coach Jim Mora, now an analyst for the NFL Network and Fox Sports radio, said the Patriots are not a Super Bowl-caliber team but are still capable of making noise in the playoffs.

"They've lost two games, so everybody asks what's wrong with New England?" Mora said. "They're not super-human, even though they have played like it the last few years. Itís hard to sustain the winning edge like theyíve had over the last few years. Injuries happen, you lose people, you lose coaches (coordinators Romeo Crennel and Charlie Weis); maybe you get a little complacent.

"But to keep winning and winning and winning is hard to do in the National Football League, because it is so competitive. Everybody is gunning for you. There's no mercy in the NFL. There is no pity. Everybody has to contend with injuries, some more than others.

"But I don't think it's time to panic. The Patriots are still a good football team and they'll be in the hunt."

Horn questionable for Packers game

Vick probable; Martz is back

From staff, wire reports

Saints receiver Joe Horn was limited during practice again Friday and remains questionable for Sundayís game at Green Bay with a hamstring injury.

Horn fully participated in Wednesday's practice and said he planned to play against the Packers, but his status seems no better than 50-50 right now.

Three Saints have not practiced all week and probably wonít play ñ safety Mel Mitchell (hamstring), linebacker James Allen (hamstring) and linebacker T.J. Slaughter (groin). Guard Kendyl Jacox (ankle) returned to practice Friday and is expected to start against the Packers.

Green Bay has been inundated by injuries. Tailback Ahman Green (knee/quadriceps) has not practiced all week and looks unlikely to play. He would be replaced by Najeh Davenport. Starting left offensive tackle Chad Clifton (ankle) practided Friday for the first time all week, taking 50 percent of the snaps. Backup safety Earl Little (hamstring) has not practiced all week and probably wonít play.

VICK HAS LIMITED WORKOUT: Atlanta quarterback Michael Vick was limited during practice but is listed as probable for the Falcons' game against New England.

Backup Matt Schaub took nearly all the snaps during the workout; Vick was limited mainly to running and agility drills. He missed practice Wednesday and Thursday.

Vick sprained the medial collateral ligament in his right knee during last weekendís 30-10 victory over Minnesota. Schaub played the final 2 Ω quarters for the Falcons (3-1).

MARTZ RETURNS: Coach Mike Martz returned to practice Friday, ready to put the attention back on the St. Louis Ramsí next game instead of his heart condition.

Martz, 54, missed two days while undergoing tests for a bacterial infection of a heart valve. He said earlier this week that team doctors believe he has endocarditis.

"I appreciate everybody's concern and Iím not trying to minimize this, I'm really not, but everything's fine," Martz said. "Now it's time to focus on this team and winning a game. Really, I'm not trying to minimize it or be a John Wayne or anything else like that, it just is what it is."

The Rams (2-2) play the Seattle Seahawks (2-2) on Sunday.

CHIEFS LINEMAN IMPROVING: The agent for Kevin Sampson, the Kansas City Chiefs offensive lineman hospitalized Thursday night after suffering what was believed to be a seizure, told ESPN.com that tests have revealed no reason for the incident. Agent Joe Linta said he expects his client to be released in the next 24-48 hours.

"He looks fine," Linta said. "I'm not a doctor, but at this point I see no reason he won't be back in Kansas City on Monday and practicing again next week."

The Chiefs have an open date this weekend.

Linta said doctors have run tests on Sampson, including a neurological battery and cardiac exams, and turned up nothing. He said more tests are pending.

Linta, a second-year pro and a seventh-round choice in the 2004 draft, is in intensive care and is listed in stable condition.

"Kevin is asthmatic, which I didnít even know," Linta said. "He said he was suffering flu-like symptoms and was dehydrated, but I donít know if any of that is related to what happened. They're still trying to get to the bottom of it."

AROUND THE LEAGUE: Randy McMichael signed a four-year extension worth a reported $18 million with the Miami Dolphins. McMichael is the Dolphinsí leading receiver this season with 15 catches for 150 yards and three touchdowns. . . . Jets quarterback Chad Pennington underwent arthroscopic surgery on his right shoulder, and the team is optimistic he will be ready for the 2006 season.

The surgery was performed Thursday by orthopedist Dr. James Andrews in Birmingham, Ala., the team said. Andrews repaired a small rotator cuff tear, the anterior capsule and labrum. Pennington will begin rehabilitation immediately. . . . The Jacksonville Jaguars acquired linebacker Jamie Winborn from the San Francisco 49ers for an undisclosed draft pick. Winborn started two of the 49ersí three games this season and had 13 tackles and a pass deflection. The Jaguars released defensive tackle Martin Chase, a former Saint, to make room for Winborn. . . . Bills defensive tackle Ron Edwards will probably miss the rest of the season after having surgery on his injured right shoulder this week, Coach Mike Mularkey said. The Bills havenít placed him on injured reserve. Edwards was hurt in the first half of Buffalo's 19-7 loss to the Saints on Sunday and didnít return. Tim Anderson and Justin Bannan are expected to replace Edwards. . . . Seattle Seahawks coach Mike Holmgren said injured wide receivers Bobby Engram (cracked ribs) and Darrell Jackson (bone bruise in right knee) will not play at St. Louis on Sunday.

Sports scene without Dome

AP FILE PHOTO

The Sugar Bowl will be played in Atlanta because of damage inflicted by Hurricane Katrina to the Louisiana Superdome.

Sugar Bowl — gone to Atlanta.

Bayou Classic — gone to Houston.

New Orleans Bowl — gone to Lafayette.

Tulane — gone to a different place every week.

Friday's announcement that the Sugar Bowl would be played in the Georgia Dome brought home the depressing point that there will be no college football played in New Orleans in 2005.

The last year that happened was 1897 when Tulane didn't field a team.

But what about the 2006 season?

If the Superdome is open for business again, things will be back to normal, or as normal as things can be post-Hurricane Katrina.

But if not, and we wonít know that answer for some time, all four entities will have big decisions to make.

The Sugar Bowlís option is the clearest — play at LSU with most of the fans staying in New Orleans, where hotel rooms are expected to be plentiful again. While the logistics aren't ideal, they can be worked out.

The Sugar Bowl's biggest concern is that Superdome renovations don't extend through 2007 as well because January 2008 is when New Orleans is to be the site of the national championship game, plus the 'regular' Sugar Bowl under the BCS' new double-hosting system.

If the Sugar Bowl loses its place in line in the BCS rotation, it would never be regained. And the Bowl would drop to a second-tier status.

The Bayou Classic is a little trickier. Houston will offer many of the amenities Grambling and Southern fans have enjoyed in New Orleans, and the city no doubt try to make the move permanent.

If that game is played at LSU, with fans staying in New Orleans, Baton Rouge or remaining at home, it would be difficult to maintain the spirit of the weekend, a time when the external activities are more eagerly anticipated by many than the game itself.

In the end, political pressure to return the game to Louisiana should prevail. But it might not leave the majority of fans happy.

The New Orleans Bowl should find a hospitable venue in Lafayette, which is much more in scale with the event.

If the Sports Foundation is determined to bring the game back to New Orleans, Tad Gormley would be the site, assuming itís playable.

But Gormley lacks the amenities even a modest bowl needs. Lafayette would get the bowl for another year then.

Which brings us to Tulane.

The Green Wave has gotten by playing one or two games a year at Gormley. But that has been a novelty whose appeal has been waning.

Even in its pre-Katrina state, Gormley was not a suitable Division I-A stadium, at least not for an entire season.

If it upgraded Gormley, Tulane would be putting money into a venue that:

A. It doesn't own.

B. Isn't on or even near its campus.

C. It would have to share with high schools.

D. It would be using for only one year.

Plus damage to Tulane's other athletic facilities puts the idea of the school building its own stadium further on the backburner.

Regardless, Tulane would seemingly have no other choice than to tough it out at Gormley.

Funny, Tom Benson used to complain how outdated the Superdome was and more than a few agreed with him.

But, boy, everybody sure does miss it now.

Nicholls State to open conference play vs. S.F. Austin

Colonels hope to unleash running game

By Bob Fortus
Staff writer

To Nicholls State players, the season starts today.

"We're looking at this week, going into this week, 0-0,'' Colonels fullback Broderick Cole said. "Conference starts. Our goal is to win the conference, get the ring and make the playoffs."

The Colonels (1-2) play Stephen F. Austin (3-1) in a Southland Conference opener today at Nacogdoches, Texas. Kickoff is at 2 p.m.

Nicholls State is coming off a 26-13 loss last week at North Dakota State.

Hurricane Katrina eliminated one game from Nicholls State's schedule. Hurricane Rita eliminated another. Because of the hurricanes, the Colonels missed about 15 days of practice.

But the record book won't make note of situations related to the storms, Cole said. It will list only results.

"This year and in years to come, a win is a win, and a loss is a loss," he said. "It won't be due to Hurricane Katrina."

The running game is the key to how Nicholls State fares.

In the Colonels' triple-option offense, most plays start with quarterback Yale Vannoy putting the ball in Cole's stomach. Cole, a 237-pound fullback from West Jefferson High, is the first option. He has carried 46 times for 213 yards and two touchdowns this season.

"He's a big part of our attack," Coach Jay Thomas said.

Last year, Cole started every game as a freshman, rushing for 501 yards on 121 carries and was selected Southland freshman of the year. He also was chosen Nicholls State freshman athlete of the year.

The second option is for Vannoy to pull the ball back and give it to another one of the team's talented running backs, such as Joseph Tobias, who rushed for 97 yards on 13 carries against North Dakota State. Zach Morgan and Anthony Harris are other productive Nicholls State runners. Or, Vannoy might keep the ball.

The Colonels rank second in Division I-AA in rushing, averaging 350.67 yards per game. But North Dakota State, then ranked No. 13 in the Sport's Network I-AA poll, held them to a season-low 249 yards rushing.

After trailing 17-0 at halftime, the Colonels put together 80- and 94-yard scoring drives to cut the deficit to 17-13. They had chances to draw closer before North Dakota State pulled away late.

"Early in the game, we never could get the field position flipped around," Thomas said. "When you're playing a good football team, you really can't give up the real estate like that."

Thomas said Hurricane Rita seemed to cause greater distractions to the team than Hurricane Katrina did.

"The first storm, we were coming right out of camp," he said. "It was easier to overcome.

"We were just getting into a routine. Then bam, there's another storm."

After the scheduled opener Sept. 3 against Utah State was canceled because of Katrina, the Colonels opened a week later at Indiana. Rushing for 408 yards, they nearly upset the Hoosiers but lost on a touchdown in the final minute, 35-31.

Nicholls State beat Division II Cheney University 54-0 the next week. Rita then wiped out a game scheduled for Sept. 24 against Western Carolina.

"You usually get better as you go along," Thomas said. "Normally now, you've played five games."

Little things need correcting, Thomas said. Special teams have suffered because of the postponements.

"0It's just pieces and parts," Thomas said. "It's not really one person or one player. It's everything together right now."

Said Cole: "I don't think I've ever been satisfied with how I play."

Stephen F. Austin, hasn't played since beating Southern Utah 40-17 two weeks ago.

The Lumberjacks average 453 yards per game, 301 passing.

Quarterback Zeke Dixon has completed 69 of 139 passes for 1,064 yards and 10 touchdowns, with six interceptions. Freshman running back Damian Perkins has carried 66 times for 281 yards and three touchdowns.

MISSISSIPPI VALLEY STATE AT GRAMBLING STATE (1:30 p.m. in Grambling): Tigers quarterback Bruce Eugene, a former Cohen High School player, was selected SWAC offensive player of the week for his performance last week in a 50-7 rout of Prairie View A&M.

Eugene completed 34 of 50 passes for a school record 618 yards. His seven touchdown passes increased his career total to 95, also a school record. Henry Tolbert caught nine passes for 175 yards and two touchdowns. George Piggott caught six passes for 148 yards and a touchdown.

The Tigers (2-1, 2-0 SWAC) have won consecutive games since losing their opener to Washington State. Eugene leads the SWAC in passing yards per game (363.3).

The Delta Devils (2-2, 2-2) were off last week. Their quarterback, Aries Nelson, ranks third in the conference in passing yards per game (297.5).

ALABAMA A&M AT SOUTHERN (6:30 p.m. in Baton Rouge, Cox Sports TV tape-delayed to Sunday): The Jaguars (1-2, 1-2 SWAC), tied with Grambling for the SWAC lead in scoring offense (33.7 points per game), play host to the team leading the conference in scoring defense.

The Bulldogs (3-2, 1-2) have allowed an average of 17.6 points per game.

Southern quarterback J.C. Lewis passed for 302 yards and five touchdowns, two to James Vernon, but was sacked seven times in a 45-35 loss last week to Alabama State. Tonight, the Jaguars' rebuilt offensive line will try to protect Lewis from Alabama A&M's Kevin Lockhart, who leads the SWAC in sacks with five.

The Bulldogs had won consecutive games before losing last week to Texas Southern, 17-7.

LOUISIANA-MONROE AT ARKANSAS (6 p.m. in Little Rock, Ark.): The Indians (2-3, 2-0 Sun Belt) go into this game with the Razorbacks having won their past two games.

ULM beat Arkansas State 31-27 last week on quarterback Steven Jyles' two-yard run with 36 seconds left. The touchdown capped a 68-yard drive in six plays. Jyles also completed 16 of 31 passes for 261 yards and two touchdowns. He's the ULM career leader in total offense with 8,701 yards.

Arkansas (1-3, 0-2 SEC), which hasn't played since losing 24-13 at Alabama two weeks ago, ranks fourth in Division I-A in rushing with an average of 277.8 yards per game. De'Arrius Howard is the team's leader rusher, having carried 47 times for 279 yards.

Arkansas linebacker Sam Olajubutu has made 53 tackles.

HAWAII AT LOUISIANA TECH (6 p.m. in Ruston, ESPN Regional/Cox Sports TV): After starting the season with non-conference losses to Florida and Kansas, the Bulldogs (1-2, 1-0 Western Athletic Conference) opened conference play last week with a 34-14 rout of New Mexico State.

Louisiana Tech's first-team defense shut out the Aggies, who scored twice in the final 1:05 against reserves. Bulldogs quarterback Matt Kubik was solid, completing 17 of 28 passes for 173 yards without an interception. Running back Mark Dillard carried 14 times for 64 yards and one touchdown.

The Rainbows (1-3, 1-1) had a chance to tie the score late in a WAC game last week against Boise State, but the Broncos blocked an extra-point attempt and returned the ball for two points to cap the scoring in their 44-41 victory.

Hawaii relies on the passing of Colt Brennan, who threw for four touchdowns and 426 yards against Boise State. For the season, he's 107-of-158 for 1,242 yards and 10 touchdowns, with three interceptions.

NORTHWESTERN STATE AT SAM HOUSTON STATE (2 p.m. in Huntsville, Texas): This Southland Conference opener matches the teams that shared the conference title last year.

Both teams are 1-2 and will be playing for the first time in three weeks. Last week was a scheduled off week for both teams, and their games scheduled for Sept. 24 were canceled because of Hurricane Rita.

Northwestern State hasn't played since losing at Louisiana-Lafayette, 49-28, on Sept. 17. The Demons lost six turnovers, including five fumbles, in that game and gave up 544 yards. Northwestern State has committed 37 penalties and lost 14 turnovers in its three games.

Sam Houston State hasn't played since losing at Texas Tech, 80-21. Phillip Daugherty, a transfer from Texas Tech, will make his first start at quarterback for the Bearkats.

TEXAS SOUTHERN VS. MCNEESE STATE (3 p.m. in Natchitoches): Hurricane Katrina wiped out one game from McNeese's schedule, and Rita knocked out two games. So the Cowboys (1-1) arranged this game instead of taking a scheduled off week.

Because of damage from Rita, the McNeese State campus in Lake Charles is expected to remain closed for several weeks. The Cowboys, who had missed more than two weeks of practice, resumed practice this week at Southeastern Louisiana University. Northwestern State University provided the game site.

McNeese hasn't played since losing to Southern Mississippi 48-20 on Sept. 17. Cowboys free safety Lawrence Darby, from Covington High, made 15 tackles and intercepted two passes in that game.

Texas Southern (1-2, 1-2 SWAC) snapped a 16-game losing streak by beating Alabama A&M last week. The Tigers' Kyle Watson averaged 42.2 yards on 10 punts in that game and put four punts inside the 20-yard line.

LSU (2-1, 1-1) VS. VANDERBILT (4-1, 2-0)

THE VITALS

Kickoff: 6 p.m. Dudley Field, Nashville, Tenn.

Coaches: LSU, Les Miles (30-22, 2-1, fifth season overall, first at LSU); Vanderbilt, Bobby Johnson (70-66 overall, 10-30, second year at Vanderbilt).

TV/Radio: ESPN2/870-AM.

INJURIES

LSU: Guard Pete Dyakowski (foot) is out; guard Brett Helms (knee) questionable; receiver Craig Davis (foot) questionable; center Rudy Niswanger (ankle) probable.

Vanderbilt: Fullback Steven Bright (knee) questionable; guard Mac Pyle (knee) questionable; safety Kelechi Ohanaja (knee) probable.

KEEP AN EYE ON

LSU DT Claude Wroten

Wroten has been quietly dominating inside with the help of fellow tackle Kyle Williams, who draws most of the attention from opponents. Wroten had two of LSU's seven sacks last week and has been difficult for each LSU opponent to block. Whether or not he can put pressure on Vanderbilt quarterback Jay Cutler will determine what kind of game Cutler has. If Cutler has time, he can pick LSU apart. And he has the moxie to burn the Tigers when they blitz, so pressure from the LSU front four is crucial.

GAMEPLAN

Offensively, LSU has a chance to make some big plays with its skill-position players. LSU might stretch the field with its wide receivers to create those opportunities. Expect to see more of the bubble screen to open up the running game, but LSU must take advantage of its athletic superiority to combat a sound, experienced defensive unit. Defensively, LSU will see much of the same as it has the past three games. Cutler will throw quickly to negate the pass rush and, as a fifth-year senior, he has the smarts to make plays in tight situations. Defensive backs will have to keep tight coverage and force Cutler to hold the ball. Vanderbilt will first test the Tigers' run defense, ranked No. 2 in the SEC and No. 9 in the nation. And, with Cutler, the Tigers must always be on guard for the option play.

KEY MATCHUP

Vanderbilt LB Moses Osemwegie vs. the LSU offense:

Osemwegie (6 feet, 230 pounds) is the physical and spiritual leader of the Vanderbilt defense and is capable as a pass rusher, on run defense and in coverage. He was a first-team All-SEC linebacker last year and has shown no dropoff. He had 13 tackles last week, 11 solo, and leads all defensive players in the conference with 46 tackles. He has two sacks and two forced fumbles. "Heís really a physical player, real athletic and a big playmaker for them," Miles said. LSU blockers will have to find him first.

BY THE NUMBERS

13 — total points by Vanderbilt in the schoolsí past three meetings; 1982 — Last year Vanderbilt had a winning record and played in a bowl game; 2 — Vanderbilt receiver Erik Davis' ranking in receptions and yards per game in the SEC; 9 — Sacks by LSU in three games; 7 — Sacks allowed by Vanderbilt in five games; 40 — Starts for Vanderbilt senior QB Jay Cutler, out of a possible 41.

ODDS AND ENDS

LSU will open the season with three road games out of four for the first time since 1993. ... Vanderbilt running back coach Kenny Carter coached at LSU in the 1999 season. ... Vanderbilt will recognize the 50th anniversary of the 1955 Commodores team that defeated Auburn in the Gator Bowl.

EYE OF THE BEHOLDER

Beautiful weather — football weather — is expected in Nashville for the latest of LSU's infrequent visits to Music City. Forecasts are predicting temperatures around 55 degrees at kickoff. But, regardless of how nice the conditions, any LSU fan who has made the trip would have to be wary.

LSU has a 9-5 edge in games at Nashville, but something goofy often happens when LSU visits the Commodores.

The last visit — in 1997 — was nearly a nightmare for the Tigers and head coach Gerry DiNardo. LSU led 7-0 when Vandy scored in the final minute. The Commodores were then penalized twice for delay of game prior to the conversion. Eventually, Vandy kicked for the tie and LSUís Kenny Mixon blocked the kick, preserving the victory. A loss would have been hard for DiNardo to take. Three years previous, he left Vandy for LSU after pledging he would stay. Vanderbilt sued, trying to get DiNardo to pay back part of his salary. The two sides eventually settled. That game also marked the last time Cecil Collins played for LSU. He suffered a broken leg in the second quarter and was booted off the team the following summer for off-field transgressions. In 1990, LSU appeared to win the game on a desperation pass into the end zone from Chad Loup to Todd Kinchen. But Kinchen was called for offensive pass interference to end the game. The loss cost the Tigers a winning record and greased the skids for then-coach Mike Archer, who was fired with two games remaining.

In 1937, Vandy defeated LSU 7-0 to stop a 23-game winning streak, but it was how they did it that was unusual ñ the hidden ball trick. As the Vandy offense swept to the left, quarterback Dutch Reinschmidt placed the ball on the ground and continued left as if he had it. Tackle Greer Ricketson picked it up and ran the other way for a 50-yard touchdown.

FROM THE COACH'S MOUTH

"If there was a routine, it would be getting in a plane and playing on the road. We've only had one home game." — LSU coach Les Miles

Jim Kleinpeter

Too early for LSU to be thinking about Gators

LSU, from C-6

um - but what about the question asked of defensive tackle Kyle Williams on Monday afternoon?

Explain this: Do you think they were looking ahead, maybe, to you guys this weekend?

"They" meaning the Vanderbilt Commodores.

But the question wasn't only relevant, it was appropriate.

"I think so," Williams said of Vandy's lone loss to Middle Tennessee State last Saturday night. "I think they got caught up in us coming to town and being an ESPN game."

A blocked field goal away from perfection, Vanderbilt (4-1) is still tied for top honors in the SEC East and an upset away from its best start since 1950, two years before Miles was born.

Coach Bobby Johnson's Commodores are two wins away from bowl eligibility and possibly their first postseason appearance since 1982, when the iconic Whit Taylor quarterbacked Vanderbilt to a loss in the Hall of Fame Bowl.

"I've really not addressed too much history," Johnson said. "We're not worried about what Vanderbilt's done in the past. We're trying to do what weíre doing this year. We got off to a great start, and we just want to keep it going for us, for our team."

Credit Vanderbilt senior quarterback Jay Cutler for the early-season subdued hype, and look for him to chip away at the LSU secondary if Bo Peliniís scheme mirrors the zone coverage that Rick Clausen picked apart. Expect a bunch of three-step drops, quick passes, lots of patience, lots of wise decisions and the occasional scramble - a facet missing from Clausen's repertoire.

Through five games, Cutler has thrown for less than 250 yards only once (245 in the loss) and sports a slightly better than 2/1 touchdown/interception ratio. Last season Vanderbilt trailed LSU 10-7 last fall until Cutler suffered a game-ending injury early in the third quarter of the Tigers' 24-7 escape.

"He's a veteran guy," Miles said. "He's been in the offense for a good, long time, understands where heís going with the ball and has a quick release. Everybody respects whatís happening there and he does a great job functioning that offense."

Last year in Tiger Stadium, Cutler compiled as many rushing attempts - including a 1-yard touchdown - as completed passes, and he should flash the quarterback option. Evidenced by the injury suffered, Cutler doesnít shy from contact.

"Our whole defense is based on stopping him first," LSU linebacker Kenneth Hollis said. "If we play our right style of defense and the corners are coming and pressing and the linebackers are reading their keys, it will be a good game."

Of course, LSU finds itself in similar precarious crossroads as Vanderbilt last week. Looming just beyond this supposedly easy win is a CBS afternoon date with Urban Meyer and Florida. Given that LSU canít afford another conference loss if it hopes to play in the SEC championship game at the Georgia Dome in December, Williams can't find any excuse for an oversight.

"Being around this conference, you know that just about anybody can beat you at any time," Williams said. "I was there when a Kentucky wasn't that good and we had to beat them on the very last play of the game. You have to focus in this conference, no matter who you're playing."

Wave needs to get rushing

points and give them a long field to work off of if we don't score."

While the stats from Houston's offense and Tulane's defense are the ones that really stick out, Scelfo knows the Green Wave's offense will have a good opportunity to exploit a defense that hasn't had much success this season. Besides being ranked 99th in the nation in total defense, the Cougars are 66th against the run (148.2) and 108th against the pass (297.2). It is a setup for the Wave's offense to have a big game.

After three games, Tulane, which sits atop the C-USA West Division (1-0) standings, ranks 37th in the NCAA in passing.

But Green Wave quarterback Lester Ricard said the passing game will not be as important as getting the running game going. Last week, the Wave had just 28 yards rushing.

"We've got to have a big-time ball-control game," Ricard said. "We have to run the football really well in order to keep their offense off the field. They have some excellent athletes on offense."

Houston's offense begins with its quarterback, junior Kevin Kolb, who leads the league in total offense and is third in passing yards. The Cougars also have a running threat in Ryan Gilbert, second in the conference with a 90.2-yards-per-game average.

Kolb and Gilbert make it essential that Tulane's offense comes up with a solid performance after last week's disappointing showing.

Tulane linebacker Antonio Mason tackles Southeastern Louisiana receiver Josh Taylor in the Green Waveís 28-21 win last week.

"I think it's more than just keeping Houston's offense off the field," said Tulane center Joe Traina. "It's more of keeping our defense off the field. When they're fresh and rested, they're as good as anybody in the country.

"So, if we're able to control the ball, control the game on the offensive side of the ball, then when our defense does get on the field, we're able to dominate."

Tulane leads the conference in average time of possession (33:37); Houston is fifth (30:36).

"Yeah, you know how I feel about that stat," Scelfo said.

The Wave will have to keep drives going against Houston, something it didn't accomplish against Southeastern. Tulane was 7-of-19 on third-down conversions.

Green Wave coach Chris Scelfo, whose team finished 93rd in the nation in defense last year, says he isn't counting on one area to make the difference against the Cougars.

"You have to win two out of three phases. You've got to win defense and special teams, offense and defense, offense and special teams," Scelfo said. "It's all important. We've got to be more efficient on offense this week than we were last week. And, defensively, we can't stay on the field as long as we did last week. And we can't have mistakes in the kicking game."

TULANE (2-1, 1-0) VS. HOUSTON (2-2, 1-1)

THE VITALS

Kickoff: 5 p.m. Cajun Field in Lafayette.

Coaches: Tulane, Chris Scelfo (33-41, seventh season); Houston, Art Briles (12-16, third season).

TV/Radio: i network (formally PAX Network)/ no radio in New Orleans; north shore 104.7-FM; and Baton Rouge 1210-AM.

KEEP AN EYE ON

TULANE'S OFFENSIVE LINE: Last Saturday, three starters spent time nursing injuries on the sideline. The three were the only three seniors: left tackle Chris McGee, left guard Matt Traina and center Joe Traina. They are expected to play against Houston, but are still battling pain. Because the trio has started since freshman year, the backups have little experience. And right guard Michael Parenton and right tackle Derek Rogers are in their first full season as starters.

GAMEPLAN

Tulane must establish its rushing game. The Wave knows it; the Cougars know it. Last week against Southeastern Louisiana, Tulane mustered 28 net rushing yards ñ less than the number of carries Tulane had the previous week at Southern Methodist (47). The offensive line must play more focused, but the running backs need to be patient. If Matt Forte runs for 26 yards again, Tulane will probably lose.

And Tulane must do a better job containing Houston in the first half. Or, at least recent history says so. In the past two games, both Houston victories, the Cougars have outscored the Wave 52-7 in the first half.

KEY MATCHUP

CHRIS SCELFO VS. ART BRILES: Coach Briles has had Tulaneís number the past two years. As a rookie coach in 2003, Briles came into New Orleans and defeated Scelfoís Wave 45-42. In 2004, Houston finished with a 3-8 record but managed to dominate Tulane, 24-3. Scelfo, Tulane's veteran coach, will get a third crack at Briles this week. It will be intriguing to see how Scelfo and his coordinators respond to Brilesí tricky and proven offensive scheme.

BY THE NUMBERS

3 — Tulane is playing its third home game in its third home site (Shreveport and Baton Rouge). ... Tulaneís three senior linebackers are the team's top three tacklers — Anthony Cannon (29), Antonio Mason (19) and Brandon Spincer (16). 1 — Houston quarterback Kevin Kolb needs just one touchdown pass to move into third place on the school's career touchdowns list with 47. He would then trail Andre Ware (75) and David Klingler (91).

ODDS AND ENDS

Houston running back Ryan Gilbert has made the most of his 48 carries, rushing for 361 yards. The 90.2 yards per game is second in Conference USA. Tulane running back Matt Forte is sixth (59.7). ... Tulane is 6-for-8 on fourth down this season. Opponents are 0-for-3. ... Houston's cornerback tandem is ranked No. 1-2 in passes defended. Willie Gatson leads C-USA with nine breakups. Ricky Wilson is second with five breakups and two interceptions.

FROM THE COACH'S MOUTH

"Their quarterback is one of the best in the league." — Tulane coach Chris Scelfo on Houston's Kevin Kolb.

Sugar will retain some New Orleans spice

Game in Georgia Dome to be New Orleans-style show

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

The 2006 Sugar Bowl is headed to Atlanta for a year, but it will retain a New Orleans flavor ñ perhaps complete with a Mardi Gras parade.

That was one of the points driven home Friday in Atlanta as official announcement was made that this seasonís game will be played at the Georgia Dome because of Hurricane Katrina-caused damage to the Superdome.

"We want to put on the best possible New Orleans-style show that's part of the best Sugar Bowl we've ever produced," said bowl president Mark Romig. "We'd love to include a parade and benefit concert to give everyone a sense of what the Sugar Bowl and New Orleans are all about."

Romig made a second point: The game will return to Louisiana in 2007, either in the Superdome, or, if repairs are not completed, at LSU's Tiger Stadium.

"We are resolved to play the 73rd Sugar Bowl in Louisiana," he said. "And we plan to make it better than ever"

But first there are the nuts and bolts issues of transferring the game to Atlanta in less than three months.

Sugar Bowl executive director Paul Hoolahan said two staffers will move into newly acquired office space by next week to start organizing the Jan. 2 game.

But the Sugar Bowl staffers won't be doing it alone.

Officials from the Georgia Dome, the Atlanta Convention and Visitors Bureau, the Atlanta City Council, the SEC and the Peach Bowl were at Friday's press conference, with Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue.

"You have humbled us by entrusting us with one of your most valuable assets from New Orleans and Louisiana," Perdue said to Romig and Hoolahan. "And I can tell you today that the state of Georgia, Atlanta, the Georgia Dome and the all of the fans of the SEC will not let you down.

"We're going to treat you like kinfolk and give you all we can." Hoolahan said that kind of support will be needed as many of the normal functions of the Sugar Bowl staff have to be carried out by local organizations.

"We've got to plug in all the resources available to us," he said. "Our priority is the game, but there are events around the game that have to be taken care of as well.

"Our title sponsor (Nokia) and all of the people here in Atlanta will be putting our shoulders to the wheel to make this work.î

One important item is the redistribution of tickets. Hoolahan said that those already holding tickets will be offered the option of retaining them or receiving a refund for this year or having them credited for next year's game.

About 15 percent of the 72,000 tickets are held by people in Louisiana.

The special circumstances of the game will very much be in evidence, Romig said.

Besides the proposed parade and concert, there will be other relief fund raisers connected with the game. And Atlanta hotels, which will benefit from a large influx of fans during a normal low-occupancy period, will donate 10 percent of their revenue to relief as well.

"We were really overwhelmed by the support we've seen," Romig said. "I don't think anybodyís ever been given a standing ovation at a press conference, but that's what they did for Paul and me."

This year's Sugar Bowl will match the SEC champion, if that team is not playing for the BCS championship in the Rose Bowl, against an at-large opponent.

SEC commissioner Mike Slive said he had no worries about fans from the SEC champion being reluctant to return to Atlanta less than a month after the SEC championship game, which also is played in the Georgia Dome.

"What this tragedy has taught us is to be very flexible," he said. "If our champion is not in the Rose Bowl, its fans will be very happy to be playing in Atlanta."

The vote to play in Atlanta by the Sugar Bowl committeeís board of directors came earlier this week after bowl officials had explored the possibility of playing the game at LSU with fans staying in New Orleans.

The lack of hotel rooms in New Orleans was the determining factor. A normal Sugar Bowl has fans occupying upward of 32,000 rooms. Less than a third of that number would have been available in New Orleans.

Still, Romig said, the decision was not easy.

"I think, from a logistical standpoint, that everyone realized the challenge we faced trying to stay in Louisiana," he said. "But that didn't make it any less emotional.

"This was a very historic decision. But everyone realizes how important the franchise the Sugar Bowl holds is, and we had the responsibility not to put it jeopardy."

Iverson eager to get to work for Cheeks

All-Star guard says 'It's just been fun'

From wire reports

Allen Iverson loves practice so much he wants to arrive early.

"I can't remember the last time I actually wanted to come in real early," Iverson, a former MVP, said Friday in Durham, N.C. "It's been great, man. Everybody's responding well. Everybody's trying to learn and get better."

Iverson said he has a new outlook now that former All-Star guard Maurice Cheeks is coaching the 76ers. The atmosphere at training camp at Duke is fun and relaxed, and Iverson attributes that to Cheeks.

"This was a dream for me, ever since Coach (Larry) Brown left," Iverson said. "I wanted Maurice Cheeks to be the coach, and now itís finally here. It's just different for me. I feel like in the 10 years that Iíve been playing, the atmosphere should have always been like it is. I should have always wanted to come to work every day and not play hard or go after people because I was upset about something.'

Iverson, who once asked, "How can I make my teammates better by practicing?" said he has discovered that he can make a difference with his workouts.

"When everybody sees that Iím working and ready to get at it, I guess it makes it that much easier for them to get involved with everything going on," Iverson said.

Last season, Iverson complained that he had little input under Coach Jim O'Brien. Iverson said the 76ers failed to develop an identity and rarely made adjustments, including a resistance to zone defense.

Cheeks' positive attitude isnít new to Iverson. Cheeks was an assistant under Brown when Iverson led the 76ers to the NBA Finals in 2001.

"Everybody's not here uptight," Iverson said. ìItís just been fun so far.î

O"Brien also didn't believe in getting Chris Webber more involved once the All-Star forward was acquired in February. Cheeks has raved about the way Iverson and Webber have worked together.

Iverson said he has noticed a difference in Webberís attitude.

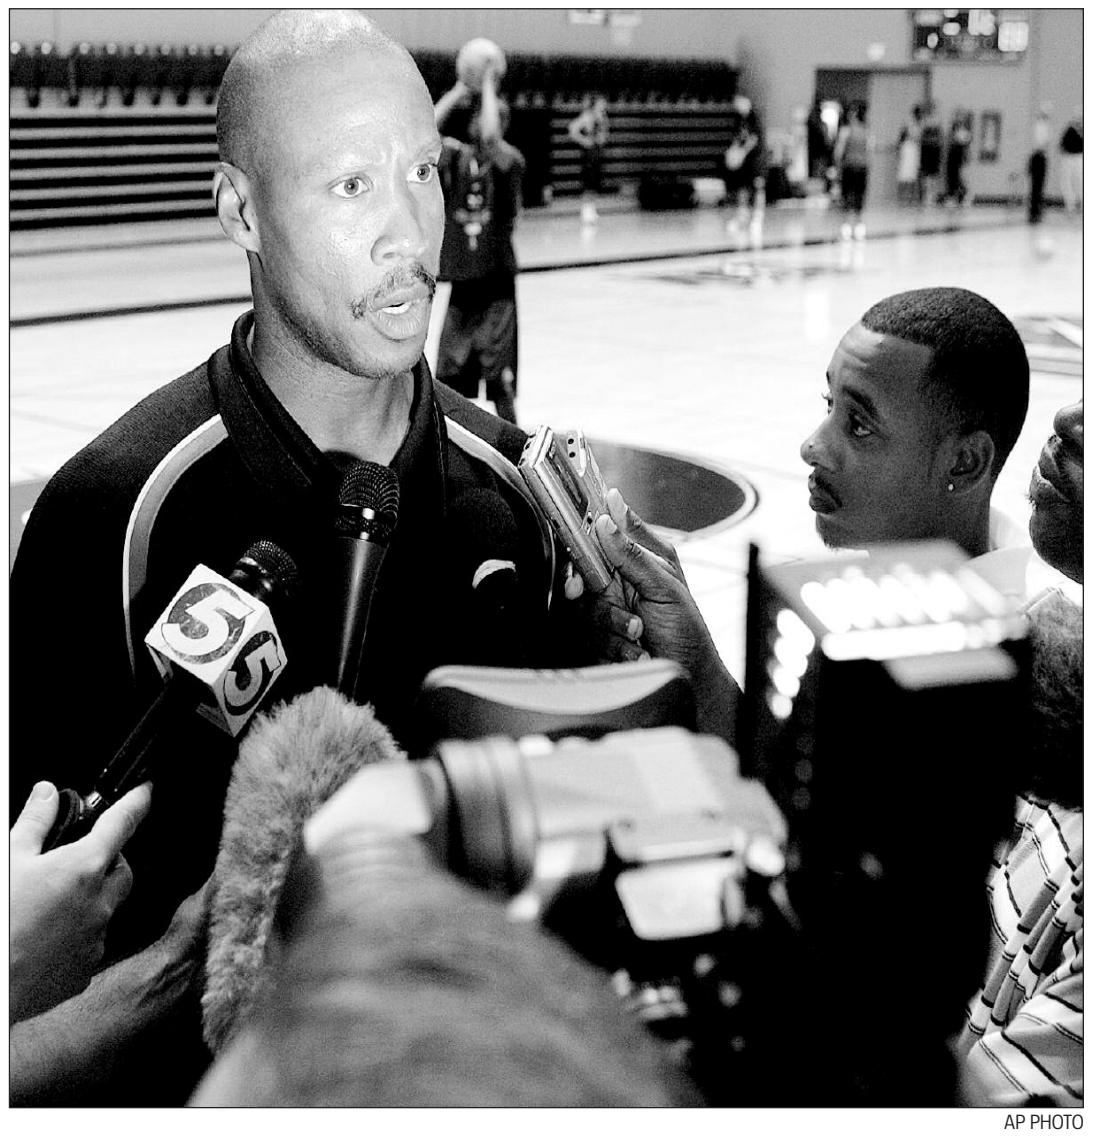
"He's been doing everything to make us better and make himself better," Iverson said. "We're just trying to put it together on the court right here in training camp. Hopefully when we leave here, we'll have some type of chemistry."

Cheeks gave Webber the day off Friday, but a day earlier he credited the first-year coach with making a dramatic difference.

"I want what Mo has, and thatís a championship," Webber said. "I admire what heís done and I thank him for the communication and just being a man first and a coach second. If you're a good man, it's easy to be a good coach."

"It's important that guys want to come to work," Cheeks said. "I want them to enjoy coming here. It's where weíre going to be for eight or nine months."

PACER GETS PROBATION: Anthony Johnson of the Indiana Pacers was sentenced to a year of probation at Rochester Hills, Mich., after pleading no contest to a misdemeanor assault charge for his role in one of the worst brawls in U.S. sports history.



He was also ordered to perform 100 hours of community service, directed to attend counseling and fined $250.

Teammates Ron Artest, Jermaine O'Neal, David Harrison and Stephen Jackson received similar sentences last month for their participation in the Nov. 19 fighting that broke out during a game with the Detroit Pistons at The Palace of Auburn Hills.

A no-contest plea in Michigan is not an admission of guilt but is treated as such for sentencing.

Several fans also were charged in the brawl that started after Detroit Pistons center Ben Wallace shoved Artest following a hard foul.

After the players were separated, Artest was doused with a beverage and rushed into the stands after the man he thought had thrown the drink. Some teammates joined him in the stands and clashed with fans on the court. Artest was suspended for the rest of the season, Jackson for 30 games, O'Neal for 25 and Johnson for five. The league did not suspend Harrison. An arbitrator later reduced O'Neal's suspension to 15 games, and it was upheld in federal court.

Hornets to present options for season-ticket holders

E-mails from team are set to begin

By John Reid
Staff writer

OKLAHOMA CITY — Starting next week, the Hornets plan to contact New Orleans-area season-ticket holders who made deposits before Hurricane Katrina forced the team to temporarily relocate to Oklahoma City.

Hornets president Paul Mott said the team's computers and servers, which contained sales records before the storm hit, are again operational.

"What we're going to be doing is putting together an e-mail communication for everybody that we have an address for," Mott said. "Obviously someone who doesn't have an e-mail address can contact our number in Oklahoma City, or they can write us through Hornets.com.

"We would like to get contact information from them, and we would like to be able to reach out and talk to as many, if not all, of our season-ticket holders."

Mott said the franchise will begin contacting season-ticket holders by mid-week. They will have the option of getting a refund, keeping their money in the account as a deposit for the 2006-07 return of the Hornets to New Orleans or using a portion of it to purchase tickets for the six games scheduled for LSU's Pete Maravich Assembly Center in Baton Rouge.

Those games are Dec. 16 against the Phoenix Suns, Jan. 13 against the Sacramento Kings, Jan. 18 against the Memphis Grizzlies, March 8 against the Los Angeles Lakers, March 18 against the Denver Nuggets and March 21 against the Los Angeles Clippers.

The Hornets will play a preseason game Oct. 25 against the Shaquille O'Neal-led Miami Heat in Baton Rouge.

"Of course, if there are people who need to get that money refunded, then we will work to get that done," Mott said. "For those in Louisiana, especially in Baton Rouge, we're going to offer a pre-sale opportunity for the Baton Rouge games. In our communication with them, we will explain what we are proposing."

BACK TO WORK: After sitting out three days of practice because of a groin pull, guard J.R. Smith is expected to practice today. Smith said he was injured while working out in Houston with former NBA coach John Lucas a few days before the Hornets reported to training camp at Southern Nazarene University.

SORE KNEE: Top draft pick Chris Paul had a large ice bag on his left knee after Friday's practice but said the knee is only sore. He said it wasn't going to keep him from practicing. Paul practiced with no limitations.

NO QUICK CUTS: Last season, Coach Byron Scott made his first wave of training-camp cuts before the opening week ended. He's not going to be so quick this time.

"I want to give these guys a chance to play in a couple of games," Scott said. "A lot of guys, even young guys, sometimes are not practice players. They come and give you effort and things like that, but they really drive on being in game situations. All 17 guys that we have here right now, I'm happy with them."

The Hornets begin their preseason schedule Thursday night against the Nuggets at the Pepsi Center in Denver.

OVERWEIGHT? Backup center Chris Andersen said he is a few pounds overweight, but Scott disagrees. "He feels that he's just a little too heavy right now, (but) a lot of that is just muscle. I don't feel he's overweight," Scott said. "But one thing about Birdman is that he's going to continue to run and work and all of those things to feel better."

wife, Beth, and son, Max, in New Orleans before the storm.

He came to the Hornets after spending four seasons as vice president of marketing with the Houston Rockets, Houston Comets (WNBA) and the Toyota Center, and was responsible for the supervision of marketing and promotions, media relations, broadcasting and community relations.

Under McDougall's direction, the Hornets' entire sales operations underwent a makeover, prompting the closure of all their†regional ticket offices in Baton Rouge, Biloxi, Miss., Mandeville and Houma.

He recently had been in charge of the team's media relations department. When the Hornets moved into a temporary office at the Toyota Center, home of the Rockets, a few days after Katrina struck the Gulf Coast, McDougall and Mott spearheaded the transition team, which included Kristy McKearn, vice president of business operations.

Long before Hurricane Katrina the Hornets had been in upheaval mainly because of a high employee turnover rate, which included several top management positions.

Some of the resignations†included Jack Capella, executive vice president/chief operating officer; Harold Kaufman, vice president of public relations, who had been with the franchise since its inception in 1988; and Todd Santino, vice president of sponsorship sales.

Owner George Shinn also bought out partner Ray Wooldridge earlier this year, prompting another period of upheaval.

McDougall was hired in February, becoming the organization's third marketing chief since its relocation to New Orleans in 2002. McDougall replaced John Lee, who was senior vice president of marketing/sales for four months before resigning.

"It's going to be challenging, but you do the best you can," Mott said. "You work closely with and support emotionally those that are trying to hang in and do it with you. But this is a tremendous challenge, no question about it."

Tim Hinchey, recently hired as senior vice president of corporate development, will oversee marketing, branding and ticket sales, Mott said.

AUTO RACING

A DIFFERENT KIND OF CHASE: The Chase for the Nextel Cup championship is different this year. Last year in the inaugural run, the playoff atmosphere was intense. So far in 2005, the focus is more on retaliation, rules and wrecks than on winning the title. In the opener of the 10-race Chase, Robby Gordon and Kasey Kahne overshadowed the 10 championship contenders with outbursts and even tried to retaliate with their cars after being knocked into the wall. A week later at Dover, contender Jimmie Johnson and teammate Kyle Busch finished 1-2. Several of their opponents charged that their Chevrolets were running with their rear ends too high, but NASCAR gave the cars a few moments to settle in the postrace inspection and both passed. NASCAR said all the parts and pieces used in their rear shock absorbers met standards, but a notice was sent a week later saying those shocks would no longer be allowed. Last Sunday at Talladega was the final race of the season where horsepower-sapping carburetor restrictor plates were used. Multicar crashes damaged the chances of five of the 10 Chase competitors, and Johnson acknowledged he ignited one of the big wrecks. The Banquet 400 at Kansas Speedway on Sunday is the fourth of the final 10 races. Tony Stewart leads Ryan Newman by four points, with Rusty Wallace, Johnson, Greg Biffle, Carl Edwards, Matt Kenseth and Jeremy Mayfield all within 112 points of the leader. A year ago, Johnson got off to a tough start in the Chase, falling far off the pace when he crashed at Talladega and Kansas. But that turned a week later at Lowe's Motor Speedway in Concord, N.C., where he won for the first of three straight visits to Victory Lane and four of the final six. Johnson has noticed a difference this year. "I see that the teams are a little more relaxed in the first few races,î he said. "Last year, everybody felt that the champion was going to be the team that made it clean through the final 10. This year I think the teams are a little bit smarter and everybody has realized that last year everybody had problems. Now as we get toward the halfway point in the Chase, the intensity level is going to ramp up and catch up for everybody.î Stewart has been the hottest driver in the Cup series since June. He has 14 top-10 finishes, including all five of his wins, in his past 15 races. "The same thing that got you in the Chase is the same thing that's going to win you the Chase,î he said. "You've got to be consistent and you've got to be up front each week. That's the same thing that got us 10 in the Chase in the first place.î

BOXING

CORRALES, CASTILLO MEET AGAIN: Someday when they're finished with one another, Diego Corrales hopes he and Jose Luis Castillo can sit down, have a beer and talk about their place in boxing history. They've already got plenty to discuss. Their first fight was one for the ages, even before Corrales got off the canvas twice in the 10th round to stop Castillo. They meet again for the lightweight title in Las Vegas on Saturday night, barely five months after they gave each other the kind of beating that shortens and sometimes ends careers. Once again, both vow not to give an inch to the other. "This is a war of attrition. This is the final battle,î Corrales said. "I am here, and I will die in that ring before I give up what I have.î What Corrales has is more than just the WBC 135-pound title he won from Castillo on May 8. At 28, he has become a throwback fighter who could have boxed Castillo from the outside but decided instead to go toe-to-toe with him because it was the manly thing to do. "I love what happened,î Corrales said. "I always wanted my war, and I got it. You always wonder if you have it in you to do it. I was glad to see I did.î The Mexican challenger says he wasn't at his best the first time around, but will have no excuses in the scheduled 12-round fight that is expected to draw 15,000 fans to the UNLV campus arena. "I think it is going to be a much, much better fight than the last one,î Castillo said.

HORSE RACING

AFLEET ALEX MAKING PROGRESS: Afleet Alex took another huge stride in his comeback with a solid half-mile workout Friday at Belmont Park. With regular rider Jeremy Rose aboard, the Preakness and Belmont Stakes winner breezed a half-mile in 46.02 seconds, the fastest work of 42 horses at the same distance. Last week Afleet Alex had his first timed workout - five furlongs in 59.85 - since being sidelined with a hairline fracture of his left-front canon bone July 21. The 3-year-old colt had surgery six days later. "He hasn't come back completely yet, but he's on his way back,î trainer Tim Ritchey said. "He's an amazing horse, and amazing horses can do amazing things. Everything so far has gone to plan.î The plan is to get to the $4 million Breeders' Cup Classic at Belmont on Oct. 29. Ritchey most likely will run Afleet Alex in next Friday's seven-furlong Perryville Stakes at Keeneland in Lexington, Ky. It would be the colt's first race since winning the Belmont on June 11. Afleet Alex won the Preakness despite nearly falling to his knees when bumped by Scrappy T at the top of the stretch. Afleet Alex has won eight of 12 career starts for earnings of $2,765,800.

SHE SAYS IT BEST WINS: She Says It Best took the lead at the start and was not headed in winning the Darley Alcibiades Stakes on opening day at Keeneland. The 2-year-old daughter of Stormy Atlantic won for the fourth time in six starts, and trainer Vickie Foley said the next stop will be the Breeders' Cup Juvenile Fillies on Oct. 29 at Belmont Park. She Says It Best, a 10-1 shot, covered the 1 1/16 miles in 1:49.07 on a track listed as fast despite persistent light drizzle. The filly won by 2 1/2 lengths over 2-1 favorite Ex Caelis. She Says It Best paid $21.40. In the Sycamore Breeders' Cup, the 9-year-old gelding Rochester - making his fifth straight appearance in the 1 1/2-mile event - won it for the third time. He beat Dreadnaught by 3 3/4 lengths and paid $14.60.

TENNIS

DEMENTIEVA KNOCKS OFF CLIJSTERS: Elena Dementieva ended Kim Clijsters' bid for the top ranking, beating the U.S. Open champion 6-3, 3-6, 6-2 in the quarterfinals of the Porsche Grand Prix in Filderstadt, Germany. Clijsters would have unseated Maria Sharapova at No. 1 by winning the tournament, but instead was dealt her second loss in 29 matches by eighth-ranked Dementieva. Clijsters has the tour's best record (60-7) and has won eight titles this year. "This was the best match I ever played,î said Dementieva, who lost two Grand Slam finals in 2004. "For me, Kim is the best player in the world - this will give me confidence for the future.î Top-seeded Lindsay Davenport, trying to win the event for the third time, beat 12th-ranked Anastasia Myskina 6-2, 3-6, 6-1. In the semifinals, she faces Daniela Hantuchova, who topped Flavia Pennetta 6-3, 6-4. Dementieva will face fourth-ranked Amelie Mauresmo, who beat ninth-ranked Nadia Petrova 2-6 6-2, 6-4.

SERENA PULLS OUT OF TOURNEYS: Serena Williams has pulled out of her last two scheduled tournaments of the season in hopes of being healthy for 2006. Williams, who won the Australian Open this year for her seventh Grand Slam title, will miss the event in Zurich, Switzerland, next week, and the Philadelphia tournament that begins Oct. 31. She's been hampered by left ankle and knee problems for months and played 28 matches in 2005, going 21-7.

OLYMPICS

BASEBALL TO PUSH FOR REINSTATEMENT: Three months after being cut from the 2012 Olympics, baseball found out Friday how close the vote was - very close. Baseball lost its place in the Olympics by three votes, international federation president Aldo Notari told The Associated Press. The result - 54-50 against, with 53 votes in favor needed to remain - was tight enough for the sport to push for a vote of reinstatement in February. "We have a duty to get back in the Olympics,î Notari said. The International Olympic Committee voted in July to cut softball and baseball after the 2008 Beijing Games, the first sports removed from the program since polo in 1936. The vote totals were kept secret at the time, but the softball and baseball federations later asked the IOC for the figures. The vote count for softball was released in late August. The sport fell one vote short of making the cut - 52-52, with one abstention.

FIGURE SKATING

ST. PAUL CHOSEN 2008 SITE: St. Paul will host the U.S. Figure Skating Championships in 2008, returning the event to the Twin Cities for the first time in 17 years. St. Paul was chosen over Colorado Springs, Colo., and Providence, R.I., for the nationals, which will be held Jan. 20-27, 2008, at the 18,064-seat Xcel Energy Center. This season's nationals, which also are the Olympic trials, will be in St. Louis from Jan. 7-15. The 2007 nationals will be in Spokane, Wash., from Jan. 21-28.

PREP VOLLEYBALL

BLENK HOLDS OFF RIDGEWOOD: Amelia Hendrickson had 12 kills and Megan Barbee had 16 assists to lead Blenk to a 25-13, 25-19, 22-25, 25-19 non-district victory against visiting Ridgewood on Thursday. Barbee and Britney Rouse each had five aces, and Kimmy Allemand and Krystal Ciulla each added seven kills for Blenk (2-0). Lauren Mayer had 21 kills, and Lauren Eorgsted had 29 assists to pace Ridgewood (1-3).

IMMACULATA GETS SPLIT: Brigette Saucheaux had 27 assists, and Kayla Rauschkolb, Katie Winters and Lauren Hartman combined for 21 kills to help Immaculata salvage a split of a Thursday doubleheader with a 25-11, 25-23, 25-13 non-district victory at West Jefferson. Rauschkolb had nine kills, and Winters and Hartman had six each. Ashley Darda added four aces, and Marcy Mobley had three digs for Immaculata (1-1). In the first match, Saucheaux had 25 assists and Meagan Williams six kills in a 25-21, 25-11, 21-25, 25-8 non-district loss to East St. John. Winters, Rauschkolb and Hartman each had five

The Chicago White Sox celebrate after finishing a three-game sweep of the Boston Red Sox on Friday night.

White Sox are first team to advance

WHITE SOX, from C-6

Boston's David Ortiz and Ramirez hit consecutive homers in the fourth to tie the score, then Garcia escaped in the fifth after Damon doubled with two outs and Edgar Renteria walked. With Ortiz on deck, pitching coach Don Cooper came out to the mound to settle his pitcher.

Ortiz swung at the first pitch and hit it hard to straightaway center field, but Aaron Rowand gathered it in a few steps in front of the wall, about 400 feet from home plate.

The Red Sox didn't homer in the first two games, but Chicago hit six - five in a 14-2 win in the opener - to take a 2-0 lead in the best-of-five series. Ramirez hit his 19th and 20th career postseason home runs, passing Reggie Jackson and Mickey Mantle and second only to Bernie Williams (22); in Mantle's time, there was no league championship series and Jackson played in the era before wild-card teams.

The Red Sox had won eight of their past nine games when facing elimination, rallying from an 0-2 deficit against the Oakland Athletics in the first round of the 2003 playoffs and then defeating the Yankees in four straight last year en route to their first World Series title since 1918.

Young and old powering Braves

From wire reports

ATLANTA — Not long after Brian McCann was called up from the minors, John Smoltz took the rookie catcher under his wing.

Their relationship paid off big for the Atlanta Braves on Thursday in the NL playoffs.

Smoltz picked up where he left off in 1999, throwing seven strong innings against Houston to reclaim exclusive rights to the title of baseball's winningest postseason pitcher.

The offense was provided by his personal catcher. McCann hit a three-run homer on his first postseason swing - off Roger Clemens.

The Braves pulled away for a 7-1 victory, pulling even in the best-of-five series at one game apiece. Game 3 is today Houston.

Roy Oswalt, 20-12 with a 2.94 ERA this season, will face Atlanta's Jorge Sosa, 13-3 with a 2.55 ERA. It will be Sosa's first postseason start.

Atlanta manager Bobby Cox said a special bond developed between 38-year-old Smoltz, the only player who's been with the Braves throughout their run of 14 consecutive divisions titles, and 21-year-old McCann, who began the season at Double-A Mississippi.

"Smoltzie told me from the get-go, 'Give me McCann,' " Cox said. "John sort of adopting him really made his year."

Smoltz chuckled at the generation gap.

"He took a picture with me when he was seven years old," Smoltz said. "Now he's catching for me in the biggest series of his life."

In his first October start since the 1999 World Series, Smoltz improved to 7-0 in the division series and 15-4 in the postseason, one day after Houston's Andy Pettitte earned his 14th postseason victory in a series-opening victory over the Braves.

Atlanta trailed 1-0 when McCann stepped to the plate in the second inning with two on and two out, facing a pitcher who made his major league debut for the Boston Red Sox in 1984, less than three months after McCann was born. With Smoltz on deck, Clemens missed with his first two pitches, then left a fastball over the plate. McCann connected with a 409-foot drive that ricocheted into the Braves' bullpen in right field for a 3-1 lead.

"A very hittable pitch," Clemens said. "When a guy's at this level, it doesn't matter if he's 21 or 41. He's going to hit that."

McCann also joined Clemens, 43, in a more obscure record: biggest age gap between a pitcher and a batter who hit a postseason homer - 21 years and 200 days, according to the Elias Sports Bureau.

Griffey and Giambi returned in style

Veterans selected NL, AL comeback Players of the Year

The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Cincinnati's Ken Griffey Jr. was voted the NL Comeback Player of the Year by fans, and the New York Yankees' Jason Giambi was given the AL honor.

Griffey, 35, proved he's still one of the best when healthy, batting .301 with 35 homers and 92 RBIs this season following four years of injuries.

"I didn't really think about trying to prove to anybody that I could still play this game," Griffey said. "It was more or less proving to myself that I could still go out and compete at a high level and help the team win.

"I felt if I couldn't do that I would just go home and not waste anybody's time. That's one of the things about me, I'm not going to waste anybody's time and go out there and just collect a check. That will never be me."

The award was voted on for the first time by fans on MLB.com.

Giambi, the New York Yankees 34-year-old first baseman, hit .271 with 32 homers and 87 RBIs, and led the AL with a .440 on-base percentage and 108 walks. He also was eighth in the league with a .535 slugging percentage.

Beset by a twisted ankle, a stomach virus, a strained groin, a respiratory infection, an intestinal parasite and a benign pituitary tumor, Giambi hit .208 with 12 homers and 40 RBIs in 2004. He was so weak at the end of the season he wasn't included in New York's postseason roster.

"I am truly humbled by this award," Giambi said in a statement.

"I wanted nothing more than to prove to you and the people of New York that I could face adversity and come back to be the player I once was," Giambi said.

MINNESOTA MAKING MOVES: Designated hitter Matthew LeCroy was among three players taken off Minnesota's 40-man roster.

LeCroy, a popular teammate who batted .260 with 17 home runs and 50 RBIs in 304 at-bats this year, has spent his entire career with the Twins. Over parts of six major league seasons, LeCroy has batted .263 with 58 homers and 209 RBIs in 430 games.

Also outrighted to Triple-A Rochester were outfielder Jason Tyner and third baseman Glenn Williams.

Minnesota general manager Terry Ryan also declined the $8.5 million option on the contract of right-hander Joe Mays and confirmed that third-base coach Al Newman has accepted a job with the Arizona Diamondbacks as a professional scout.

MOHR TESTING MARKET: Colorado Rockies outfielder Dustan Mohr opted for free agency after refusing an assignment to Triple-A Colorado Springs. The Rockies had declined an option for next season.

Mohr, 29, hit .214 with 38 RBIs in 98 games this season. His career-high 17 home runs was third on the team. Mohr previously played for Minnesota and San Francisco. He has a career .252 average with 46 home runs and 151 RBIs in 476 major league games.

Montgomerie leads tight field at American Express

Daly, Howell 1 back; Tiger heads pack at 5-under 135

From wire reports

Colin Montgomerie and John Daly would seem to have little in common except for their names atop the leaderboard at the American Express Championship.

Montgomerie plots his way around the golf course, and although Friday was a battle with jet lag, he scrambled well enough for a 1-under 69 at Harding Park in San Francisco that left him one shot clear of Daly and David Howell. Tiger Woods and five others are another shot behind. Montgomerie is at 7-under-par 133.

Daly swings for the fences, and he drove the green on a par 4 for the second straight day, this one on the 336-yard 16th as Woods was lining up a birdie putt ahead of him.

Montgomerie and Daly will be in the final group today of this World Golf Championship, along with Howell, connected by their tee time and a desire to bounce back from tough times.

"Both of us have had plenty of divorces, so we can always talk about that," Daly joked after his 67. "I've had a lot more than he has."

The reference was to Montgomerie's very public divorce last year, which he said contributed to a plunge in the world rankings, to No. 83.

Daly has gone through all that and more: three divorces, two stints in alcohol rehab, one PGA Tour suspension and two major championships.

"You get lonely," Daly said. "I've been through it a lot, and I know what he went through. It's great to see him come back. I'm sure he would love to get a win on U.S. soil. My hat's off to him."

Montgomerie is recovering nicely, winning last week on the European tour for the first time in 19 months. He was four shots worse Friday than in his opening round, yet he said he felt even better about his chance to win for the first time in the United States. He turned a big mess into a little one on the 18th by making a 4-footer for bogey that put him at 133.

"Overall, that's as good a round of golf as it was yesterday," Montgomerie said. "It was more of a battle today. I didn't get off to the flying start I did yesterday, so it was tougher, very much tougher. I'm as glad with that round today as I was yesterday, so I'm still in contention."

So are two dozen other players.

Harding Park, a municipal course with a $16 million makeover, has proven to be a worthy test through two rounds. It allows for good scores, dishes out bogeys with the slightest mistake and has kept anyone from running away from the field.

Thirteen players are within three shots of the lead, and 29 players are within five shots of the lead. Former LSU standout David Toms was at 136 after a 68.

Another contender is Woods, who was wild off the tee at times, but not on the 344-yard seventh hole, when he noticed the tees about 25 yards up. He ripped his driver through the fog and knew it was good when he heard a gallery standing six-deep behind the green roar. The ball landed softly on the green 12 feet away to set up an eagle, and when he birdied the par-5 10th, he was tied for the lead.

But there were too many mistakes. He missed the green with a lob wedge and a 9-iron - and he settled for a 68 that left him at 135 with a large group that includes Mark Calcavecchia (68), Jim Furyk (67) and 23-year-old rookie Sean O'Hair (67).

"I turned a really good round into an OK round," Woods said. "Today I thought was my opportunity to do what Monty did yesterday. I made quite a few mistakes."

TEWELL LEADS SUSPENDED FIRST ROUND: Doug Tewell was one of nine players to complete the first round of the rain-delayed Greater Hickory Classic, and his 2-under 70 got him the clubhouse lead at Conover, N.C.

Gil Morgan and Don Pooley are one hole from knocking Tewell out of the top spot when play resumes this morning in the Champions Tour event. The second round is to immediately follow.

Morgan and Pooley were 4 under through 17 holes when play was stopped after daylong showers eventually overwhelmed the fairways at Rock Barn Golf & Spa.

Keith Fergus (14 holes), John Bland (12 holes) and Wayne Levi (10 holes) were also 4 under when played was called.

LITTLE LEADS: Stuart Little birdied three of the last four holes in a 4-under-par 67 and shared the lead with Michael Kirk after two rounds of the Abama Open de Canarias in Tenerife, Canary Islands.

Little birdied Nos. 15-17 to get to 7-under 135 in the PGA European Tour event. Kirk birdied two of his last three for a 66, leaving him and Little one stroke ahead of Titch Moore (68) and Stephen Scahill (66), who overcame a bogey at 16 with an eagle-3 on the 509-yard

Aside from reluctant Rosie, a neighbor's puppy, 3-year-old Ava Buras has few friends her size in the French Quarter. Though the Quarter is springing back to life, much of the city is barely inhabitable even for adults, making many residents reluctant to bring their children home yet.

By Brian Thevenot

At the Royal Street Grocery in the French Quarter, a 3-year-old a bundle of zeal draped in black curls reigns as hostess and entertainer at her father's store, climbing on laps, singing pop songs, asking nosy questions.

Ava Frances Buras is a rare child in a nearly childless city.

The tyke has retained a sunny disposition even after Hurricane Katrina deluged New Orleans and the family spent three uncomfortable and nerve-wracking days inside the store, said Robert Buras, her father. Yet even as Ava basked in the attention of adult customers last week, she yearned for the company of her peers.

"There's Rosa and Pooh Bear and Angelo and Matthew; there's Grace and that kid from the shoe store," the child said, naming off all the friends she played with before Katrina. "Angelo came to visit me, but not my other friends."

Instead, she fills her days babysitting Choochamonga, a cat rescued from Mid-City. A

Second-guessing is not the focus for Broussard

But others question his Katrina Week motives

By Bob Ross
East Jefferson bureau

With Category 5 Hurricane Katrina bearing down on the southeast Louisiana coastline on Aug. 28, Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard ordered the operators of the parish's huge diesel drainage pumps out of their stations and evacuated to Washington Parish.

Two days later, as parts of Jefferson Parish lay rotting in Katrina's floodwater, Broussard announced that displaced residents quickly would be given a chance to return to the primitive conditions — no electricity, water or sewer service — to survey their damage, collect items they needed and leave.

By the end of Katrina Week, Broussard had gone on national television and broken down sobbing as he told the emotional story of an employee's mother who had died while waiting to be rescued, a gripping tale but one that turned out to be greatly exaggerated.

Aaron Broussard
Parish president criticized over Jeff re-entry plan

At this early stage in the evolving history of government's response to Hurricane Katrina, these are among the enduring images of Broussard, a career politician who, after Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco and New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, occupied the Katrina spotlight as much as or more than any public official, earning him criticism in some quarters and praise in others.

"As a whole, I think he did exactly what the citizens of the parish expected: to take control and take a leadership position in getting us through the disaster," said former Parish President Tim Coulon, now a lobbyist for the Adams and Reese law firm and chairman of the Superdome Commission. "Of course, many of those decisions were very spontaneous and might lead to second-guessing."

The decision to evacuate pump station operators on the day before Katrina struck, and not to return them to their posts for more than 24 hours, did not originate with Broussard. In fact, he was following a "doomsday plan" developed during Coulon's 1996-2003 administration, when Broussard was Parish Council chairman.

ONCE MAJESTIC, CITY PARK NOW TATTERED AND TORN

John Hopper pushed open the battered French doors and walked inside City Park's antique carousel, a ghostly reminder of what New Orleans used to be.

The flying horses sat pristine and motionless on their brass posts, as if waiting for a throng of children to burst in for a ride. But surrounding the hand-painted creatures were signs of the devastation that will keep the carousel and much of the rest of City Park closed for months: buckled and moldy wooden floors, stained glass windows shattered on the floor.

"It's just sad," said Hopper, one of the park's few remaining employees. "So sad."

The damaged carousel is just a piece of it. The damage to City Park from Hurricane Katrina is simply staggering, the worst in the 150-year history of New Orleans' pre-eminent green space.

Not only were hundreds of trees torn from their roots and stripped bare by Katrina's roaring winds. But more than 90 percent of the 1,300-acre playground was flooded when concrete floodwalls along the 17th Street and London Avenue canals failed, sending water streaming into the city's midsection. Forty percent of the park stayed under brackish water for more than two weeks, Hopper said.

Families fractured by Katrina still looking, hoping

Even after weeks, many remain lost

By John Pope
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Shoulders hunched against the early morning chill, Carlos Bernard sat outside the River Center on Friday and ticked off on his fingers the siblings he hasn't heard from since Hurricane Katrina blasted through New Orleans.

"There's my sister Julia, my sister Catherine, my brother Ricardo and my brother Gerard," he said. "I'm worried."

Bernard was hardly alone in his anguish. In nearly every group outside the cavernous shelter, there was at least one person who wanted not only such tangible items as food and a place to live, but also the intangible comfort of knowing how their loved ones fared in the storm.

Getting information about the thousands of missing people is not easy. There is no central registry of the missing. And a recent list of Louisiana fatalities included the names of only 74 of 988.

The state health department and the American Red Cross have set up toll-free telephone lines to try to reunite friends and families, but the lists are not the same. Consequently, people who have been evacuated to distant shelters often have no way of knowing whether friends and relatives are safe in shelters and, if so, where.

For instance, Monique Cavasher is trying to help her husband, Raymond Montgomery, find his mother, Gloria Bagley, who fled New Orleans as Katrina approached. But Cavasher and Montgomery don't know what happened to Bagley after Hurricane Rita blew ashore near the Texas-Louisiana line.

"She's somewhere in Texas, but that's a big state," Cavasher said, hopping from one foot to another to keep warm. "He hasn't heard anything. He's been on the Internet, but she's not listed anywhere. He wants to find out that she's OK and let her know that he's OK."

Angela Cillman is wondering what happened to her young sons, Raymond 12, and Lloyd, 13. Katrina hit while she was serving time in Orleans Parish Prison for begging.

"I haven't gotten in contact with them since the storm," she said, her voice breaking. "I want to know where they're at."

The sheer geographic scope of the places where people fled makes tracking them difficult, said Russell Dynes, founder of the Disaster Research Center at the University of Delaware.

Even though the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks had many more fatalities — nearly 3,000, compared with almost 1,000 Louisiana deaths so far from Katrina — everyone knew where the dead and missing could be found: in the World Trade Center, the Pentagon or the jets that slammed into them and a Pennsylvania field.

No one who lost anyone that day ran into the problems Carlos Bernard has encountered in trying to find his brother Ricardo and others.

"He could be in Ohio," he said. "I know some people who have gone to Utah, some to Ohio, some to Atlanta, some to Houston and some to Arkansas."

Dynes said the situation is unique: "We really haven't had a situation like this."

To try to help people learn what has happened to relatives and friends, the state Department of Health and Hospitals and the American Red Cross have set up free databases.

The health department's toll-free number is 1 (866) 326-9393. Callers are interviewed briefly about the people they're seeking, and the information is compared with lists of people who signed up when they entered hurricane shelters around Louisiana, department spokeswoman Melissa Walker said.

Even though the line originally was designed to let people find out whether relatives had died, "We can help them if the person they're looking for is living," Walker said.

The Red Cross service is available at www.familylinks.icrc.org/katrina and just inside the River Center's main entrance from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. at 275 River Road in downtown Baton Rouge.

People who are looking for missing individuals are registered and put on the database, too, so the people they were seeking can find them if they go online, Red Cross spokeswoman Pam Kyllo said.

Although the Red Cross doesn't keep track of the number of matches it makes, its record is "pretty good," she said.

"Even one success is a great success," Kyllo said. "Seeing the smiles on faces is wonderful."

"We even found a dog," Kyllo said. "Some people are by themselves, and that's the only thing they have left."

FEMA fraud doesn't pay

Two arrested can't use $2,000 checks

By Jenny Hurwitz and Bruce Hamilton
Staff writers

When John Dugan filed a false claim for FEMA money back in September, he never considered the consequences.

"I just thought if I could get it, I could get a break at least once in my life," said Dugan, who planned to use the $2,000 check intended for Hurricane Katrina victims to fix his car and pay off other outstanding debts. "That was kind of a break, when I got that money."

Instead, he was arrested on fraud charges and now is awaiting an Oct. 21 court appearance in U.S. District Court in Baton Rouge.

"Whatever you do in the dark comes to light anyway," he said Saturday, from his living room in Baton Rouge. "You can't get away with anything."

Dugan was one of two people in the Baton Rouge area arrested and charged with making false claims for relief money from the Federal Emergency Management Agency last week, according to U.S. Attorney David Dugas, who serves the middle district of Louisiana.

The indictments were announced at a news conference in New Orleans on Saturday with U.S. District Attorney Jim Letten, the head prosecutor in the eastern District of Louisiana.

"You don't want to expose yourself to the possibility of becoming a federal felon for that amount of money," Letten said, referring to the $2,000 checks FEMA has been distributing. "If people are contemplating fraud, they need to know: We will prosecute them. If they think this amount is too small for the feds to go after, it's not."

Dugas and Letten emphasized they have "zero tolerance" for fraud. "If you know of any fraud activity, please report it," Dugas said. Anyone who is thinking "maybe I can take advantage: Stop," he said.

Dugan, 19, of Baton Rouge, and Ursula Johnson, 33, of Baker, both were indicted on fraud charges, Dugas said. A warrant on a similar charge has been issued for Ruby Lollis, 36, also of Baton Rouge.

The U.S. Attorney's office said Dugan filed the relief form through a FEMA Web site. Saturday, he admitted he knowingly filed out false information on or around Sept.20, claiming he lived in New Orleans, and received a

Bush to dine in N.O. Monday

He'll talk rebuilding with Nagin and panel

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — President Bush and his wife, Laura, are scheduled to visit New Orleans on Monday night for a private dinner with local officials and civic leaders to discuss options for rebuilding the region, a White House spokesman confirmed Saturday.

The guest list and the site for the dinner were not disclosed.

The visit would mark the president's seventh trip to the Gulf Coast since Hurricanes Katrina and Rita struck the area in August and September. The appearance will come six weeks to the day after Hurricane Katrina struck land in Louisiana, flooding much of the city and forcing hundreds of thousands to evacuate.

With tax revenue wiped out, along with many businesses and homes, hopes for a speedy redevelopment of New Orleans and other devastated southern Louisiana communities depend almost entirely on federal largess.

President Bush
Visit will be his seventh to the Gulf Coast since Hurricane Katrina

Bush has said that local leaders should decide how the region is rebuilt and restored.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin has appointed 17 business and civic leaders to help develop rebuilding plans, and members of the panel are expected to be on hand for the dinner, along with the mayor.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco and other state officials have been urging Bush to honor his commitment for the nation's largest-ever redevelopment effort, and say it needs to include financing to rebuild a significantly upgraded levee system, and a system of tax credits, grants and low-cost loans to encourage businesses to return and lure new ones to the area.

The government's slow response to help the thousands of people trapped by the floods or stranded in oppressive conditions at the Superdome and the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center drew criticism from both Democrats and Republicans and ended with the ouster of Bush's Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown. Bush admitted that the initial federal response was unacceptable.

Bush won praise for a nationally televised speech he delivered Sept. 15 from Jackson Square, in which he promised that the federal government would pay for most of what he said would one of the largest redevelopment efforts the world has ever seen.

But last week, his administration, along with House GOP leaders, were criticized for denying Louisiana governmental entities that borrow federal money to keep key employees on the payroll the ability, given past disaster loan recipients, to seek forgiveness of those loans.

check in the mail a week and a half later.

Johnson allegedly filed a false claim in her brother's name, forged her brother's signature, and claimed she lived at an aunt's address in New Orleans. She could not be reached for comment Saturday.

Both received and deposited their checks, the prosecutor said.

According to a criminal affidavit, Lollis applied for relief assistance using a false Social Security number and Baton Rouge address. Interviewed by a Department of Homeland Security agent, she allegedly admitted she had not been displaced by the hurricane, federal prosecutors said.

The maximum penalty for the fraud charge is five years in prison and a $250,000 fine, but such steep penalties are rare unless defendants have extensive criminal records.

Facing a possible prison sentence and a fine, Dugan said he regrets his decision and acknowledges that his actions were wrong. He never spent the FEMA money, he said, and he hopes to return it and face a lesser sentence.

"I'm just deeply sorry. I got the money so easily, and people are still struggling to get theirs," he said. "I just hope people in New Orleans can forgive me."

WAITING TO COME HOME

Editor's note: Thousands of New Orleans children were displaced by Hurricane Katrina and are attending schools in other communities. Juliet Meeks, a sophomore at Ben Franklin High School who lost her home in Lakeview and is attending Grady High School in Atlanta, created an online survey to gather journal entries from her friends at Franklin and other schools. Here is a sampling:

By Juliet Meeks
Special to the Times-Picayune

It's still hard to believe this has happened to our city. My house, my school, my life has been taken away from me and everyone I know.

Buildings in our city have been devastated, lives have been lost. It's too tragic to even try to think about it all at once. I miss my city, I miss my friends, I miss my school, I miss my world.

All I want right now is to go home as soon as possible, and that will most likely be in January to either start my second semester at the school I love, or if that isn't possible, then a different school in New Orleans.

Atlanta is a nice place, but honestly, for me it doesn't even compare to New Orleans, even after Hurricane Katrina. New Orleans is a great city. The people are special, the history is special, the lifestyle is special and none of that can be taken away by a hurricane.

Almost every one of my friends is moving back except for the few who can't because of their parents' jobs, and even then they still want to move back. Yes, my home has been flooded, along with my neighborhood and many others (which was preventable and should have been) but I'll move on. I've always wanted to live Uptown anyway.

As hard as it is to find a positive aspect of this hurricane after what it's done to our people and our life, there is one: a chance for improvement. I just really love this city and I completely support it.

It wouldn't be right for everyone to just "give up" on New Orleans. This is not the kind of city you give up on. New Orleans is the best place in the world and my only true home. All I can say is, I'm waiting to go home and I won't feel complete until I can.

Ashley Robins, 17

Neighborhood and school: Lakefront New Orleans; senior at Ben Franklin
Current school and home: McKinley High School, Baton Rouge
Katrina has caused a terrible mess in my personal life. My job, my school, and my friends are all temporarily, or perhaps permanently, gone. I don't even know yet. I visited New Orleans nearly three weeks after Katrina, and everything looked like death. You could smell mold everywhere, and the only life I saw were a few crows and some Army men. Everything is brown and wet. My "new" life isn't exactly satisfactory. Though I'm grateful for a place to stay, Baton Rouge couldn't hold a candle to New Orleans. I want to go home. My new school isn't nearly as academically advanced as my old one, and I haven't exactly made any new friends here. I plan on getting back to New Orleans as soon as possible.

Mallory Gannon, 16

Neighborhood and school: Lakeview; De La Salle.
Current school and home: Springfield High School, Springfield.
We saw my house from satellite pictures on the Internet and the water was up to my roof. I am now in Springfield. This town has a population of 395 people, which is extremely small to me. I am not used to my high school being really small either. Everyone is really nice and I've made friends, though I miss my New Orleans friends a lot! I know that we are living here for the rest of the school year. We're not sure if we're ever moving back, or we may move back the first day of the summer. We don't know anything yet.

Izzy Durante, 15

Neighborhood and school: Uptown New Orleans, Ben Franklin.
Current school and home: McKinley High School, Baton Rouge.
I was blessed. My house got a little water on the floors. The insulation is ruined underneath my house, but that is about it. I feel so out of my normal state of mind. One day everything was going perfectly and a week later, I'm going to another school, not knowing where half of my friends are. I still think I am in a bad dream, waiting to wake up and go back to my life. I plan to return to Franklin the day it reopens. Everyone has been nice at my new school. It's so different though, nothing like Franklin.

Rhodes Murphy, 14

Neighborhood and school: Mid-City, Ben Franklin
Current school and home: Freedom High School; Tampa, Fla.
Like I'm sure many other kids already have done too, I've relocated to another school, city and state. It seems though, the farther away I get from New Orleans the more desperate I become to get back. I'm sure that my house is fine, but we can't even get into the city. With the levees breaking, the push factors are starting to outweigh the pull. Not that I don't want to go home, but it's really not my decision. When people are forced to completely move their lives, they tend to stay wherever they're getting paid. My mom has found a new job in Tampa, a higher-paying job at that. It may be months before we could even think about going home ... maybe even years?

Andrea Parker, 13

Neighborhood and school: Uptown, Ben Franklin
Current school and home: Zachary High School; Zachary
I was born in New Orleans. Until we evacuated for Hurricane Katrina, I always had lived Uptown. My feelings toward Hurricane Katrina are mixed as to when, or if, I want go back to New Orleans. But I hope New Orleans is not going to change drastically. If it does change, I hope it is for the better! New Orleans is my home and I love it.

Margaret Zehner, 15

Neighborhood and school: Old Metairie; Academy of the Sacred Heart, New Orleans.
Current school and home: Academy of the Sacred Heart Grand Coteau; Breaux Bridge.
Although Katrina had little effect on my house, it had a major effect on me and my city. I have been separated from the majority of my friends, who are now scattered throughout the country. I know that most of them are definitely coming back despite what we saw on the news. It was shocking to me how New Orleans looked on the news, and I was scared to go back to see what Katrina had done to my neighborhood. I was one of the lucky ones. Right now I am living with a host family in Breaux Bridge. ... Everyone here is nice and all, but it still isn't home. I am planning on returning to my house to live ... every weekend until my school reopens in New Orleans, which I hope will be soon.

Xan Baird, 14

Neighborhood and school: Uptown New Orleans; Ben Franklin.
Current school and home: None yet, but in process of moving to Lafayette. Presently in Memphis, Tenn.
Well basically, this all sucks. Memphis isn't horrible, but it's not New Orleans. Hopefully, there will be some people I know in Lafayette. My house is mostly OK — it was up about 4 feet — but the back is pretty much dead. I plan to go back as soon as I can, but it'll probably be about a year because my brother's school got hit pretty bad. Also they have been taught in French their whole life, so it's hard to find a school for them.

Talbot Schmidt, 14

Neighborhood and school: Lakefront New Orleans; Jesuit.
Current school and home: Enrolled at Rummel High School after returning from Destin, Fla.
I think that Hurricane Katrina, though it caused a lot of damage, won't keep a lot of people from coming back, because there aren't many other places like New Orleans. Even in Destin, a peaceful city on the beach, I haven't wanted to be in New Orleans more. My family is definitely moving back, and plan to rebuild our house and return to our normal lives.

Experts say risks to kids decreasing

young couple entered the store with their infant, and Ava bounced over, showering the baby with attention.

"You like babies, huh? You don't see too many babies these last few weeks?" asked Joe Dean, as Ava tickled his son, 3-month-old Dexter Dean, and spun the mobile of brightly colored plastic trinkets attached to his stroller.

Ava's bright eyes at the sight of a child spoke volumes about the new social landscape of the city. People between the ages of 20 and 50, most of them male, many from out of town, often strapped with guns or tools, dominate the dry neighborhoods. That will change, but families with children likely will be among the last to return and many may stay away for good.

The almost complete lack of suitable schools, medical care, day care and, of course, playmates, along with the fear of toxins and other hazards, will change the city's complexion for perhaps years to come, displaced parents, children and school and health officials said.

"The obvious absence of the little voices is what really gets to you," said Pastor Dwight Ramsey, standing in front of his empty, flood-damaged church at the corner of Canal Street and Jefferson Davis Parkway. Ramsey has been able to contact only a tiny percentage of the families belonging to First United Methodist Church and wonders how many will return. He wonders, too, what will become of about 400 students at the International School of Louisiana, a public charter school his churched had housed.

Leslie Jacobs, a member of the state school board who lives in New Orleans, said she expects only about 10,000 students will attend the city's public schools this year, and only 20,000 the next – down from nearly 60,000 before the storm. While single people and childless couples may opt to brave the Wild West-style landscape, families, particularly poor ones, will struggle to put together school, work and affordable housing. And the lack of housing, medical care, social services and other support systems will keep away the city's older citizens as well.

"It's the three-legged stool of life, and almost no one can get all three right now," she said. "Some people might not have lost their house, but they lost their job. Others might have their job, but lost their house. ... And there's going to be a feeding frenzy on real estate in the dry areas."

The flood wiped out neighborhoods with the high concentration of young families, leaving dry areas with more singles and senior citizens than children. The flood spared only the narrow, crescent-shaped curve of land along the Mississippi River, from the edge of the Industrial Canal in the Bywater to the Riverbend area of Uptown, but swamped more family-friendly neighborhoods – rich, poor and in-between – such as Lakeview, eastern New Orleans, Gentilly and the Lower 9th Ward.

"Residential family areas on the east bank, black and white, were decimated," Jacobs said. "And if you're getting pregnant or have a newborn baby, now is not the time to be in New Orleans."

Dean and the mother of his newborn, Charlotte Patrick, brought their baby to the city only for a day trip, leaving at nightfall for a her mother's Baton Rouge home. As they strolled through the French Quarter with Dexter, they felt the glare of disapproving stares.

"People are looking at us funny because we have a baby here," Joe Dean said. "But he's had more shots than we've had."

The mother and father still wrestle with how soon to return, even though their Uptown home is dry and sustained only moderate wind damage. "He wants to, but I'm not so big on it," Patrick said. "It's just so desolate. It's not ready yet."

Jon Smith, owner of Cork and Bottle wine shop and the father of an 8-month-old, echoed others in saying he and his wife want to get back soon, but have to put concerns of their child first.

The flood left polluted residue climbing up the homes and businesses of Mid-City, where he lives and works. A former triathlete, Smith religiously monitored the fecal coliform levels in Lake Ponchartrain, where he swam to train.

"We don't think any of the flood residue will be toxic, but to see some of the levels they had in that water" after the storm, he said, "It was like, 'My God, that's unreal.' "

The city announced Thursday that tap water on the east bank of the Mississippi River, west of the Industrial Canal, is now safe to drink. Before, the entire east bank had been under a boil order.

Sewage-tainted water in areas where children might play is another concern, said Jimmy Guidry, state health officer with the Department of Health and Hospitals.

"If a child has a cut, that could get infected," he said. "But that (the risk) is decreasing over time."

Children, especially babies and those with compromised immune systems, could also get infections from direct contact with mold and dust, Guidry said. But for most children, minor respiratory irritation will be the most serious consequence.

Guidry, who tracks child deaths and injuries in the state, said most come from injuries that occur in the absence of parental supervision. After the storm, that supervision becomes much more critical.

"You have to be observing them. They don't have an adult mind to make decisions," he said. "Coming back to areas hit by a storm like this, the things we're seeing in emergency rooms are injuries from electrical wire, broken glass, hanging glass that might fall, tree limbs that are weak, housing structures that are weak."

Even after concerns about water subside, the Smiths will need to see the essential services they once relied on rebuilt. That includes hospitals and convenient day care.

"We need the infrastructure to raise a young child," he said. "Now that he's started to crawl, what happens if he reaches up, pulls something off the coffee table and bonks his head? Which hospital do you go to? And what's the grocery store situation? It's hard enough to raise a child when everything's clicking."

Whether and when parents return are factors in the decisions of doctors, home health care professionals and others looking to rebuild their businesses and find jobs, said Sandra Adams, director of the Maternal and Child Health Coalition and the Louisiana Chapter of the American Academy of Pediatricians.

Hospital care for serious sickness and injuries of children is already available, she said, at places like Ochsner Foundation Hospital and, by Monday, a reopened Children's Hospital. Other primary care options, such as pediatricians and home health specialists, along with care for special needs children, will take much longer to rebuild.

"We estimate that 40 pediatricians had their offices severely damaged" in New Orleans, Adams said. "In order for them to build a new building and reconstruct their businesses, they're going to have to have some indication that the patient population is there. It's a chicken-and-egg thing. Do you put the services in before the children get back, or wait until the children get back to put the services in?"

The state Department of Social Services, which handles child abuse investigations, foster care and adoptions, also has almost no presence now in the city, a department spokeswoman said. Its New Orleans office was destroyed, and it's unclear when it will be rebuilt, particularly given the lack of children to serve right now, said spokeswoman Nanette White.

'It has to get better'

In Houston, schooling is the main concern for Lillian Lewis. Two of her four children had been enrolled in New Orleans public schools, one at Jean Gordon, another at Lake Area Middle. Another son attended St. Augustine Catholic High School, and another attended a publicly subsidized Catholic preschool.

The public schools of Houston, she said, seem like nirvana by comparison to public schools in New Orleans. "The schools here are immaculate, I love it," she said. "Some of the things they (my children) are studying, they're a little behind, but they're adjusting."

Having seen the often squalid conditions of New Orleans public schools, Lewis started photographing Houston schools to have a model to share when she returns, perhaps in a year.

"Every last school I walked into, the floors were clean, the halls are clean and they kids aren't hanging out. My (high school) kid was late one day – and I got a call. It's beautiful," she said.

Still, she and her family want to return – hopefully to a smaller but better school system. She likes the plans to convert many of the city's public schools into charter institutions, a move that would shift power to principals and school communities to run schools essentially as they pleased.

"What we're doing right now is horrible, so we need to try something new," she said. "It has to get better because it can't get any worse."

Still, Lewis and her family insist that Houston will never be home. Her 13-year-old daughter, Misha, went through crying bouts each morning before school, missing her home and her friends and her role as a cheerleader and student council member at Lake Area Middle.

"I told her we're going to get through this as a family," she said. "We're just waiting right now, because it's better for the children. They can go to the mall, the movies, make new friends, and they can have pen pals when go home."

'An "X" on our house'

Not all parents are so sure.

Meghan Tracie, mother of 5-year Julia Matherne, also took off to Houston, where she has stayed most of the time, at her sister's house. Now she and her daughter are living with another sister in Metairie.

Julia has struggled, she said. Sometimes she understands that home, and all her toys including her birthday presents, are no more. Other times she asks her mom when they're going home.

"But it's too dangerous, and there's an 'X' on our house," the child said, referring to the markings of rescue workers after they checked houses for survivors and bodies. "There's no Children's Museum, and all my toys are gone – everything's ruined."

Julia said sometimes she feels "sad and angry." She can't say who or what is the target of her anger.

"Are you angry at the storm? You're not angry at God, are you?" her mother asked, as the two sat outside a restaurant.

"No, I'm not angry at God," the child said.

"Good," Tracie said.

In exile in Houston, sometimes Julia has played well with her cousins; other times there has been tension. "They're too 'followy' – they follow me around," Julia said. "And one of them spilled milk on me and I was crying."

Her mother, 28, has had her own crying bouts, nearly every day in that awful first week after the storm. She couldn't figure it out at first – it was just stuff, you can get more stuff, she told herself – but she came to realize her grief came from the loss of a familiar and lovely lifestyle.

"I was crying for my town, my life and my friends – that's what I want back," she said. "I can live without a sofa and a TV and a leather jacket, and she can live without toys."

But give up buying 50 pounds of crawfish at Kajun's? Relaxing at Coffee & Company, where that same old lady always needs a reminder it's whole milk, not skim? Walking the galleries of Royal Street with Julia on Sundays?

Yet Houston held promise, Tracie said. It offered normalcy, if displacement, along with a new job in the same industry, food distribution – at twice the salary. How could she refuse?

Tracie took it. After she checked on her house, she drove to Baton Rouge to pick up Julia, planning to drive to Houston to start work.

Then came another crying bout, in the car, driving around Baton Rouge with Julia. She asked her daughter what she wanted.

"Do you want to live in New Orleans, even though it's bad, or go back to Houston?"

"New Orleans," the child responded.

Houston was out.

"I just couldn't do it," Tracie said. "My family's mad at me for not taking it, but I just can't be happy in Houston. The second thing I did after I checked the house was to go to the cemetery and see the graves of my mother, my grandmother, and my great grandmother, to make sure they hadn't floated away. This is home. This is where my history is. This is where my family is."

"I want to raise my daughter here. I want to grow up loving this city like I do."

'It's weird'

Older children have different issues, though no less emotional.

Ridley Richards, a 15-year-old son of two Uptown artists, attended Holy Cross for two days before the storm hit. He evacuated to a relative's home in Eunice and briefly attended school there, but has moved back to his Magazine Street home and plans to enroll at either Riverdale or Grace King in East Jefferson.

But he said there aren't many teen-agers living in New Orleans these days.

"I know one girl who is about my age and that's it," he said. "It's weird. I really don't do a lot, I just sit around all day. There's not really a lot to do."

Richards said most of his friends have said they plan to finish the school year wherever they are, though others want to come back in January if their schools reopen.

He was visited this weekend by his friend Zach Maier, 14, a Ben Franklin student who is living in Coppell, Texas, a suburb of Dallas. Maier said he'll be back permanently next summer, but plans to come home often in the meantime because "I don't really have anybody to hang out with there."

Maura Beyer, 15, a former student at Dominican High School, can't complain about how she has been treated in her new home in Newton, Mass., and her new school, Newton North. "The people are nice. They sure ask a lot of questions, though," and Beyer said her New Orleans manner of speaking marks her as a walking curiosity.

School in Houston gives N.O. students some stability

Charter school group provides structured class environment

By Tara Young
Staff writer

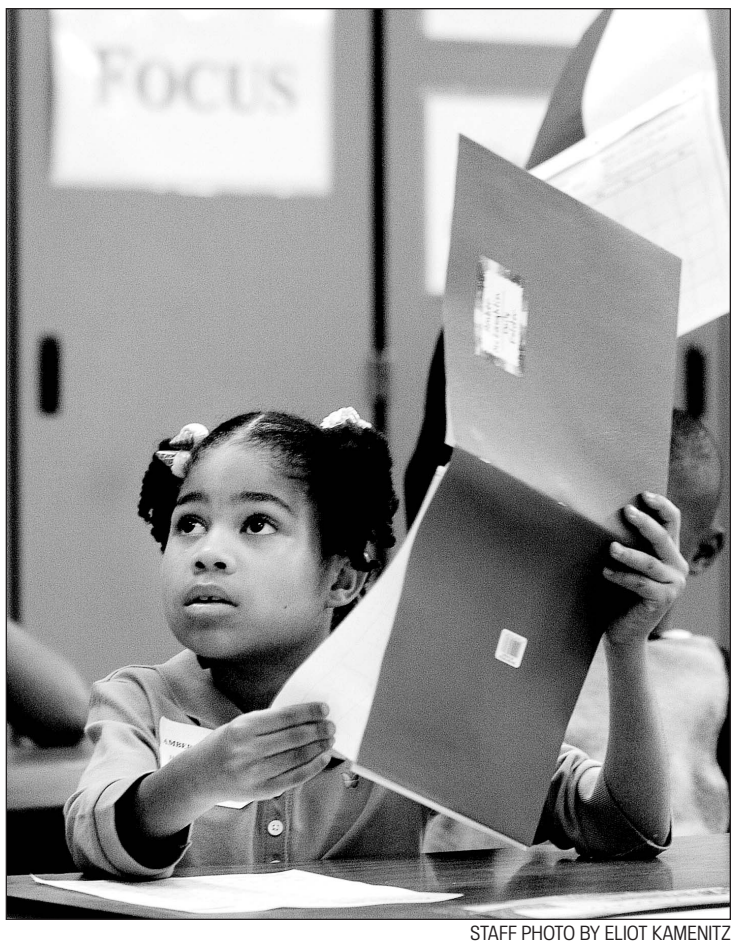
HOUSTON — After six weeks of chaos that began when he watched water rise around his home in the St. Bernard public housing complex, 13-year-old Richard Davis finally has some stability in his life.

Davis, an eighth-grader, joined 200 other students, primarily displaced from New Orleans, who started school this week under the umbrella of New Orleans West College Prep in Houston.

The first of its kind in the nation, the school is using Teach for America educators who were assigned to New Orleans to teach displaced students. Thirty-three teachers were hired to teach as many as 525 students. More than 200 students have registered so far. The school will be open until May.

The school day is divided into three 100-minute sessions from 9 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. School officials are using buses from the Houston school system to bring the New Orleans students to the site.

Many students are sifting through the faces of their new classmates hoping to find a lost friend or any news of home.



"There are so many of my kids who don't know if their friends are alive," said Towana Pierre-Floyd, a teacher at the school.

The site is being run by the nationally recognized Knowledge is Power Program, responsible for opening 47 charter schools nationwide in troubled inner-city communities with the goal of preparing underprivileged students for college.

Gary Robichaux, who was principal of KIPP: Phillips Preparatory, a newly converted charter school for eighth-graders next to the St. Bernard public housing complex, was tapped to lead the Houston school after Katrina flooded his New Orleans facility.

Robichaux, who brought his staff with him, said preparing the Houston school was a labor of love.

"There's a lot of energy here," he said. "This is like a dream teaching staff."

Amber McLaughlin looks over her new daily calendar. She started school this week with New Orleans teachers under the umbrella of New Orleans West College Prep in Houston.

Robichaux said he came to Houston and began working with KIPP officials to open a school after his students started e-mailing him after the storm. He flew to Houston and saw many of them at the Astrodome, and he thought a special school was needed in Houston to help them adjust and cope.

Since Katrina, nearly 20,000 students have been registered in Houston-area schools. There are 5,300 Louisiana students alone registered in the Houston Independent School District, the nation's seventh largest school district.

Creating a school for New Orleans students seemed appropriate, said Mike Feinberg, cofounder of KIPP and superintendent of a group of charter schools in Texas, who received permission from Houston and Texas officials to open the facility at a shuttered inner-city school once called Douglass Elementary.

The state of Texas has agreed to pay upwards of $5,000 for each student at the school. A nonprofit organization has committed to contributing an additional $2,000 for each student registered. With monies for breakfast, lunch and snacks included, Feinberg said, his organization has received about $9,000 total for each student.

The median age for teachers on the staff is 24. Although many of the faculty members have lost their homes and some are still living in hotels in Houston, they're all smiles. They believe that having weathered the storm ultimately will make them better teachers for their students.

Pierre-Floyd, a seventh-grade reading teacher, is a Howard University graduate and a New Orleans native. A participant in the Teach for America program, Pierre-Floyd said she hadn't been teaching even two weeks at Abramson High School when Hurricane Katrina forced her to flee with her husband and young son.

Essential services must be rebuilt

CHILDREN, from A-6

"Do you know they don't say satsuma here? They have clementines. And they think it's so weird when I say 'y'all,' " she said. "They ask so many questions, the weirdest questions. They ask me if I've ever seen snow. Then I had to have an interview, on the TV news here, then with the school newspaper and then the yearbook."

Reminders of home are conspicuously absent. The people, she said, "are friendly and outgoing, but I think they're not as exciting as New Orleans people. They're kind of boring."

Beyer, who said she will return whenever Dominican reopens – she hopes for the spring semester – and her scattered friends light up the Internet with email and instant messages and text messages to their cell phones, trying to stay connected.

"I probably sent 400 text messages that first week," said Beyer's friend Mary Grace Tifft, 15, daughter of Criminal District Court Judge Camille Buras, whose brother owns Royal Street Grocery.

At first, some friends said they were never coming back, Tifft said, but now many have turned their aspirations homeward. She is now attending Rummel High School in Jefferson Parish now, in platoon schedule to ease overcrowding, from 1:30 to 6:30 p.m.

"It's different going to a school with guys," she said, outside her uncle's store. "You have to worry about what you look like in the morning, or, well, afternoon."

A few minutes later, inside the French Quarter Grocery, the visiting baby continued to delight Ava Frances Buras. But his parents decided they couldn't wait 45 minutes until cooks fired up the grill for dinner and decided to get back to Baton Rouge before nightfall.

"You're leaving?" the child said plaintively. "But, but, what about your sandwich? Don't you want a sandwich?"

As the couple headed for the door, Ava sprinted after them, begging.

"Wait! Wait! Wait! I want to see the baby again!" she said.

She rubbed Dexter's head one more time, then pouted as the stroller rolled away.

SCHOOL, from A-7

The teacher said she came to New Orleans to give back to her community and jumped at the chance to come to Houston.

The students are surprised about how structured the school is compared with the ones they left behind in New Orleans. From the first day, they have been indoctrinated in the KIPP way of doing things.

There's no running or talking in the halls. There are specific times scheduled for escorted restroom breaks, depending on grade levels. And when a teacher speaks, all eyes should be on the instructor, students were told during a "culture session."

During one session, students who spoke to other students while instructors addressed the class were taken from the room.

Once outside, teachers and administrators counseled them and asked them to explain their behavior. For many, teachers said, it was the first time they had been held accountable for their actions.

Educators said they will not allow students to use Katrina as an excuse to lose academic focus. If anything, they say, the tragedy will serve as the catalyst leading them to brighter futures.

"If we do that, we've actually managed to find a silver lining in this situation," Feinberg said. "Between 2010 and 2018, I want to see them all graduate from high school and go to college."

It's just the kind of attitude, and school, that Angela Banks of New Orleans was looking for.

Banks couldn't stop smiling after dropping her third-grade daughter and second-grade son off at the school. She sat in on their classes and toured the facility, which far surpassed the school they left behind in New Orleans.

"I love the school," Banks said. "They are taking time out with the kids. I think that's good. It's encouraging."

And the school has given eighth-grader Davis hope that he will return home to New Orleans one day.

Davis, whose family has found an apartment in Houston, said he welcomes the structure the school has restored to his life.

"I was excited," he said, remembering when his mother told him the school was opening. "They're strict, but it's helpful. If it wasn't strict, everybody would be running around and nothing would be done."

BROUSSARD, from A-1

Coulon said the plan calls for pump operators to be evacuated for an approaching Category 5 storm. The plan does not spell out where they are to be taken, he said.

Even as critics now blame the lack of pumping for much of the flooding, particularly in Metairie and Kenner, Broussard stands by the decision to remove the operators and potentially save their lives.

"You could easily be sentencing someone to death by staying at their post," Broussard said in an interview last week. "That is illogical, unreasonable, and we will never do that."

Had the pump operators remained in their stations during Katrina, Broussard said, its storm surge would have rushed from Lake Pontchartrain back through the stations, anyway, and still flooded parts of East Jefferson. And, he said, by the time the pump operators returned the night of Aug. 29, they found many of the stations were damaged and inoperable.

"I did not create this plan, but this plan has logic," he said.

That logic is lost on Jackie Madden, a neighborhood activist who lives in the Palm Vista subdivision in Metairie.

"My concern is why have the pumps here if people are going to leave, and why bring them 60 miles away?" she said.

Broussard conceded the plan might need tweaking. He said he will consider other evacuation sites, closer to the pump stations than Washington Parish, for pump operators so that they can return more quickly after the worst of a hurricane has passed.

Others suggest more drastic changes.

East Jefferson Levee District officials say it's time to consider whether their employees should run all the pumping stations on the east bank of the Mississippi River, so operators don't leave the area. In Kenner, city officials are planning to ask the parish to train their own employees to work the pumps in the city.

Re-entry worked smoothly

In contrast to the evacuation decision, the decision to let evacuees back into Jefferson Parish one week after the storm was entirely Broussard's. And it was roundly panned — in the beginning.

"I was absolutely a salmon swimming upstream on this one," Broussard said. "There was opposition from my top administration, law enforcement and even council members, but I refused to back down."

The concern, said a State Police spokesman, Lt. Lawrence McLeary, was for the safety of the Jefferson residents who could find themselves hurt in a car wreck or stranded in a parish without working traffic signals and basic government, medical and retail services.

"There was debris in the roadway and the possibility of injury was there, and with all that debris there was no hospital or 911 service," he said.

Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard speaks on 'Meet the Press' last month.

GETTY IMAGES

Other officials worried that motorists would run out of gasoline in long lines of traffic, and that the congestion might interfere with emergency and utility workers.

"I didn't want people being trapped in Jefferson Parish without these services," Parish Council member John Young said.

Broussard held firm, convinced that National Guard members and parish workers could clear major roads of debris and that letting residents "peek and turn" was crucial to their own recovery.

"People had to learn their lives were altered in a dramatic way," he said.

And so the return began Sept. 5, despite the critics, with Broussard explaining Jefferson was basically under martial law and he was the only marshal in town.

"I am not an analysis paralysis guy," he said. "I'm an action guy. If you manage a crisis by committee you are hopelessly inept in reacting to the needs of the citizens.

"I was willing to take the bull by the horns."

These days, McLeary and Young concede that the return went smoothly.

"In retrospect, it worked out a lot better than many of us thought it could," Young said.

Facts wrong on national TV

Six days after Katrina hit, Broussard grabbed the national spotlight again, during an interview on the "Meet the Press" television show. Sobbing uncontrollably, he told moderator Tim Russert about the death of emergency manager Tommy Rodrigue's mother in a St. Bernard Parish nursing home.

"The guy who runs this building I'm in, emergency management, he's responsible for everything. His mother was trapped in a St. Bernard nursing home and every day she called him and said, 'Are you coming, son? Is somebody coming?' And he said, 'Yeah, mama. Somebody's coming to get you. Somebody's coming to get you on Tuesday. Somebody's coming to get you on Wednesday. Somebody's coming to get you on Thursday. Somebody's coming to get you on Friday. And she drowned Friday night. She drowned Friday night."

The spectacle capped days of local complaints about Washington's sluggish response to the Katrina, and, as The New York Times reported the next day: "The administration's problems in the crisis seemed to crystallize" with Broussard's TV appearance. Broussard's breakdown also earned a full-page portrait in Vanity Fair magazine's November issue.

But he got the facts wrong.

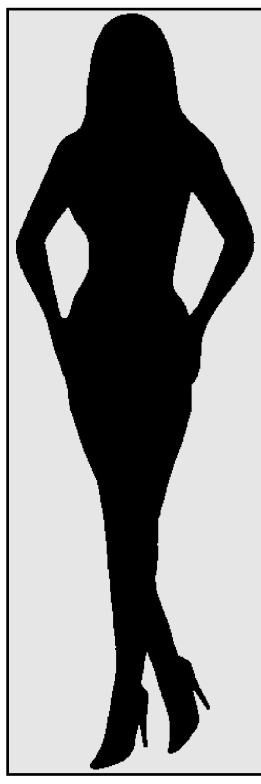
Eva Rodrigue, 92, did die, along with 33 other people, in St. Rita's Nursing Home in Chalmette. But she did not die on the Friday of Katrina Week, rather much earlier in the week, perhaps Monday, the very day Katrina struck, her son said. She did not have the series of conversations with her son that the parish president described two days later.

Broussard said this week it was on that Friday that he learned about the death, from staffers whom Rodrigue had told. And while he talked to Rodrigue that night, forcing his employee to take time off to grieve and have some personal time, the two did not discuss the details of what happened to Rodrigue's mother.

Still, the death stuck in Broussard's mind: Here was a man charged with safeguarding a parish of almost 500,000 people, and he could not rescue his own mother. And as he talked about abandonment during the "Meet the Press" interview, the thought of Eva Rodrigue came into his head.

"Absolutely I was told she was asking for him. Absolutely I was told by my employees," Broussard said recently. "I could care less if someone thinks I got the facts of Tommy's mother's death wrong. I only care about what Tommy thinks."

Rodrigue said he understands the strain under which Broussard was working during Katrina Week.



He said he told co-workers that he was calling the nursing home before the storm to find out it was not evacuating everyone.

"Somebody may have taken that information and it just go messed up," he said. "(People) have to understand the environment we were operating in. This place was crawling with people."

For his part, Broussard refuses to question individual actions from that hectic and defining week for Jefferson Parish. Not now. Not when there is still so much to do to rebuild the parish.

"I did not have a personal agenda in any of the decisions I made," he said. "History will be the judge."

HURRICANE AFTERMATH

Stadium sat under water for days

STAFF PHOTO BY SUSAN POAG

There are bright spots at the park. The Botanical Garden, which includes the Pavilion of Two Sisters conservatory, came through relatively unscathed, as did the New Orleans Museum of Art and the Besthoff Sculpture Garden.

CITY PARK, from A-1

As a result, about 1,000 trees have been toppled, and another thousand are expected to perish by next spring. All three golf greens, once peppered with motorized carts and men in knickers, are dead, poisoned by salty floodwaters and then suffocated under a thick layer of muck.

The rosebushes in the botanical garden are lifeless; the amusement park rides static because of waterlogged motors.

Even the park's miniature red trains, which have carried generations of children through the meandering landscape of live oaks and lagoons, were knocked out by the flood, said the park's director, Bob Becker.

"We were on the verge of greatness," Becker said. "This has set us back 70 years."

With City Park almost completely dependent on revenue from its attractions, Becker said, he had no choice but to furlough all but 11 of the park's 260 full-time, part-time and seasonal workers immediately after the storm.

For now, there is enough money to pay the remaining staff until the end of the year. After that, the park could be totally abandoned, he said.

"We would all just walk away," he said. "How horrible would that be, in the middle of a city that is trying to rebuild?"

To try to avoid that scenario, Becker has submitted a proposal to the Federal Emergency Management Agency offering sections of the park as potential sites for trailers where residents and park workers could live while they rebuild. He is also talking with the Army Corps of Engineers about building a transfer station on park land. Debris would be dumped there, reduced and then shipped to a landfill. Both ideas offer the prospect of badly needed rental income.

"At least that might allow us to hire some people back," Becker said.

Hopper, the park's development director, is also soliciting donations from foundations and other charitable organizations, while trying to piece together what once was an army of volunteers.

But long term, both men say, the best hope for the park is a massive infusion of federal money, similar to the millions from the Works Progress Administration that were used to develop the park in the 1930s.

The Adams & Reese law firm has agreed to represent the park for free through its Washington, D.C., lobbying arm, Becker said.

"The city is broke. The state is broke," he said. "The feds are the only ones who have the money to do the job."

Becker said the bedraggled park needs to do more than rebuild what was lost; it also needs to make critical improvements to its attractions and operating staff, as outlined in a 13-year master plan approved this year by the park's board.

Unlike Audubon Park, City Park receives virtually no public operating funds and has been criticized in the past for high grass, littered grounds and other chronic maintenance shortfalls.

The master plan was adopted not only to address those concerns, but to upgrade a park that hadn't seen a significant investment in public money since 20,000 WPA workers spent four years during the Great Depression creating many of its signature spaces.

The bottom line is that City Park's revitalization is a key to making the reconstruction of New Orleans successful and to improving quality of life in a city that now, more than ever, needs beautiful green spaces, Becker said.

"The federal government saved this park 70 years ago," he said. "There is another opportunity here."

Revenue dries up

City Park's problems are twofold. First, it has lost of almost all its operating revenue, to the tune of $10.6 million a year. That's critical, because the park receives only $200,000 annually in tax support for operations, making it an anomaly in a country where most communities publicly fund their major parks. As long as the park is out of commission, none of that money can be recouped, Becker said.

Secondly, the park sustained almost $43 million in damage. With virtually no rainy day fund, it can't afford to patch roofs and cut Sheetrock, let alone pay for more extensive repairs, Becker said.

FEMA is providing some help. So far, contractors have cleared most roads in the park, and they are removing dead trees, a service that will save the park millions of dollars. But there are plenty of other problems the park can't begin to address without additional assistance, Becker said.

Virtually every building in City Park was damaged or destroyed, including the administration building with all of its computers, records and archives. The park lost its entire fleet of vehicles, including mowers, bucket trucks and backhoes. Even grass cutting is not within the park's present range of abilities, Becker said.

The North, East and West golf courses were completely ruined, as was the clubhouse, which sat for weeks under several feet of water.

And City Park's premiere stadium, Tad Gormley, was a lake for weeks. The goalposts, bent to the east, serve as reminders of Katrina's ferocity. Dead fish still littered the parking lot last week.

But the most extensive damage was to the park's 14,000-tree forest, likely to be reduced by 2,000 in the spring when waterlogged root systems add another thousand dead trees to those blown over by the storm.

Fortunately, many of the park's oldest live oaks -- including the entire majestic grove along City Park Avenue — appear to have survived the hurricane.

"The big boys did OK," Hopper said. "They were built for the job."

But scores of pines, water oaks, magnolias, cypress and crape myrtles weren't so lucky. In a cypress grove along Marconi Drive, about 40 trees were toppled, Hopper said. Most of the crape myrtles that lined Filmore Avenue were blown over.

Museum, garden OK

There are some bright spots, though.

The New Orleans Museum of Art — considered one of the most important museums in the South — was virtually unscathed. Damage to the Sydney and Walda Besthoff Sculpture Garden, which opened in 2003, was limited to ruined landscaping and the toppling of a single sculpture: Kenneth Snelson's "Virlane Tower," which stood in a lagoon.

Most of the park's architectural features, including the Peristyle, Popp Bandstand and Popp Fountain, appeared intact during a tour Oct. 2. The park's fountains and statuary also were still standing, many of them creations of the esteemed Enrique Alferez.

dren, were beat up but salvageable. Mother Goose still hung from her tree limb. Pinocchio sat perched atop his wide-mouthed whale.

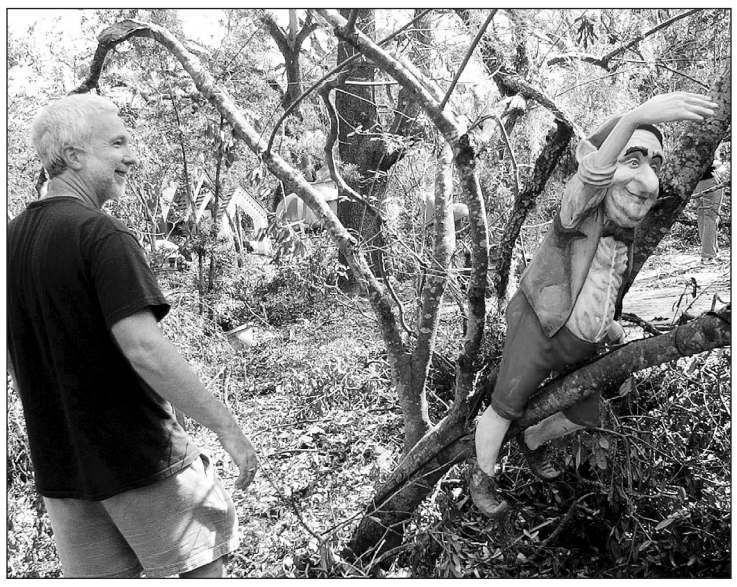
Even the Botanical Garden, which had extensive damage, showed signs of hope, with magenta and lavender lilies sprouting in the lily pond, and sprigs of grass beginning to grow from under the brown matted lawns.

"Nature is a resilient female," Becker said. "You can see her coming back everywhere."

The problem is the sheer magnitude of the challenge ahead. One mile wide and three miles long, the park is one of the nation's largest tracts of urban greenery, stretching from the city's midsection to the residential neighborhoods that line the lakefront. It is also known for its diversity of attractions, from horse stables to nature trails to its annual Celebration in the Oaks Christmas light display.

Rebuilding could take years, Becker said.

But it's possible some parts of the park could make an early comeback. A strip of land that stretches from the museum toward City Park Avenue somehow escaped floodwaters, leaving several tennis courts and the children's playground relatively unharmed. The nearby casino building also appears repairable, though it was extensively looted and sustained wind and rain damage on the second floor. On Oct. 2, the concession area still reeked of rotten food.



Becker said that whatever the obstacles, local, state and federal leaders must join forces to find ways to resurrect the park. Just like the food and the music, City Park is New Orleans, its past, its present and its future, he said.

"Can you imagine New York City without Central Park?" he said. "The same holds true here."

Man charged with firing at rescue helicopter

5 others booked with gun crimes

By Bruce Hamilton
Staff writer

A man accused of firing at a rescue helicopter in Algiers after Hurricane Katrina is among six people recently indicted by a federal grand jury on gun charges, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said Saturday.

U.S. Attorney David Dugas also announced two Baton Rouge area residents have been arrested and charged with making false claims for relief money from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. He said an arrest warrant has been issued for another Baton Rouge resident on fraud charges.

Dugas and Letten made their announcements outside the Hale Boggs federal courthouse, where they were joined by acting New Orleans Police Superintendent Warren Riley and a special agent from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

The six new indictments were handed down Friday by a grand jury empaneled at the federal courthouse in Houma. The jury charged Wendell Bailey, 20, with being a felon in possession of a firearm as well as firing upon a military aircraft Sept. 5.

ATF agents who witnessed gunfire from an Algiers apartment saw two people leave the building. The agents overheard the suspects saying of the shooting, "They won't be back now." Then, according to the U.S. attorney's office, the agents saw Bailey, who later emerged when they called him out.

A .22 caliber Rhomm revolver and a .32 caliber Smith & Wesson were retrieved from under a mattress as well as a box of 9 mm ammunition.

Bailey has a previous conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute.

The grand jury charged four other New Orleans residents with felony records with illegally possessing a firearm: Benjamin Guidroz, Henry Press, James Turner and Darren Marquez. Paul Gleeson was charged with possession of a firearm by an illegal immigrant.

If convicted, all five face maximum penalties of 10 years in prison.

They were arrested separately between Sept. 8 and 27.

- Guidroz was arrested by police after a Sept. 8 traffic stop; officers stopped a car driving fast on four flat tires near St. Claude Avenue and Frenchmen Street. Police say Guidroz was armed with a .38 caliber revolver.
- Press was arrested by deputy U.S. marshals conducting "welfare checks" Sept. 9 in the 2500 block of Barracks Street. Army soldiers alerted the marshals that Press had gone to his house to retrieve items and never left. A .40 caliber Ruger pistol and four ammunition magazines were seized from his home, the U.S. attorney's office said.
- Turner was arrested in a Sept. 19 traffic stop by police in a restricted section of the city. A .45 caliber pistol was retrieved from his glove compartment.
- Police arrested Marquez in a Sept. 27 traffic stop, also in a restricted area, and recovered a .38 caliber semiautomatic from his pickup.
- Gleeson was arrested Sept. 16 when police responded to an assault call in the 500 block of Belleville Street. The complainant told detectives that Gleeson had driven into the yard of his house and started chasing him with a hatchet.

After Gleeson was arrested, he allegedly told police he had a gun in his house; a .44 caliber Smith & Wesson was found, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

"ATF will not tolerate criminals with guns in our community," ATF Special Agent in Charge Mark Chait said in a written statement. "They will be arrested and prosecuted at every opportunity."

Robert Browning, assistant special agent in charge, said ATF agents arrested a New Orleans resident in another state Friday night who had guns stolen from a firearms store in the city. ATF employees are reviewing records as local retailers try to create an accurate inventory of their weapons, he said.

A few hundred guns were looted in New Orleans after the hurricane, Browning said.

Letten said the weapons charges show that federal prosecutors are aggressively pursuing criminal activity in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Riley agreed.

"It shows our criminal justice system, while not operating at 100 percent, is still up and running and getting better every day," he said.

Federal, private entities urged to work together

St. Tammany officials want more cooperation and less waiting

By Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

The efforts of federal inspectors and private insurance adjusters should be coordinated to expedite the rebuilding of homes, businesses and lives wrecked by major storms and other natural disasters, local and state officials insisted Friday.

In the wake of escalating complaints from officials in the Slidell and Pearl River areas, Rep. A.G. Crowe, R-Slidell, called for congressional action to eliminate or alleviate disputes, bureaucratic chokepoints and duplication of effort.

The call came during a meeting of a newly formed panel of north shore representatives who earlier in the day toured areas of southeast St. Tammany Parish devastated by Hurricane Katrina.

Slidell Mayor Ben Morris, Pearl River Mayor James Lavigne and others said they're bewildered and angry over the glacial pace of Federal Emergency Management Agency relief efforts in Katrina's grim aftermath.

Lavigne said he can't get a straight answer — only buck-passing and conflicting statements — from anyone in the FEMA bureaucracy at a time when "our little town is hurting" for financial aid and other assistance.

"I'd like to get one person who would tell me one way or the other whether we're going to get our money by next week or what," he told the House subcommittee, chaired by Rep. Pete Schneider, R-Slidell.

Lavigne and others said the confusion persists over what percentage — 100, 75, 60 — of the storm-recovery money already spent by local and parish governments will be reimbursed and when.

One key reason for the reimbursement slowdown is that the state auditor must double-check and triple-check local claims because of Louisiana's reputation for political and financial corruption, Crowe said.

That image has been especially magnified by the national news media in the post-Katrina era, resulting in the unfortunate but understandable wariness of auditors to sign off quickly on reimbursement claims, he said.

And, Crowe said, the disputes over what is and isn't covered by insurance policies held by local governments and homeowners is further aggravated by the complicated regulations of the federal agencies that step in after a disaster.

Morris said he's been "yelling and screaming for the last month and a few days about the federal response" to the needs of his city, the most populous in the parish.

City employees and the utility companies have rebuilt most of Slidell's crucial water, sewerage and electrical infrastructure in less time than he would have thought possible after the hurricane struck Aug. 29, Morris said.

"The real problem we have is housing, temporary housing, for about 4,000 homes" in Slidell alone, he said. "We're in a critical situation right now. ... There are people out there with their lives in the ditch."

He also took another swipe at the Army Corps of Engineers, whose subcontractors replaced local contractors the city chose through an emergency bids process for removing the mountains of curbside storm debris.

The city-hired contractor was on the job only a few days before the corps took over the project, albeit with city approval. Since then, Morris complained, "not one inch of anything has been cleaned in three weeks."

Meanwhile, parish government hired its own contractors, and about 1.2 million cubic yards of the estimated 6 million in the unincorporated areas had been picked up by Friday, according to parish officials.

Slidell officials estimate that at least 1 million cubic yards of storm debris — tree chunks, large limbs, ruined appliances and the like — are piled up in the city and will take at least three months and probably longer to remove.

There's a significant financial difference between the two arrangements. While the cost to Slidell is essentially zero, the parish will have to come up with 25 percent of its total unless that "local match" is waived by the corps.

Schneider's subcommittee of the House Special Committee on Disaster Planning, Crisis Management, Recovery and Long-term Revitalization plans additional hearings in St. Tammany, Washington and Tangipahoa parishes.

Black mayors push for long-term help

Needs won't dry up with waters, they say

By Harry R. Weber
Associated Press writer

ATLANTA — The nation's black mayors want to know what happens when relief agencies leave the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast.

At a meeting Saturday, they voiced concern about how to deal with the long-term housing and employment needs of residents affected by hurricanes Katrina and Rita, especially those who don't plan to return home.

"What do they do afterward?" asked Jack Ellis, the mayor of Macon, Ga. "Do they go out and beg with a tin can? Only the federal government can do this work."

The two-dozen black mayors from across the country who attended the National Conference of Black Mayors board meeting at a hotel near the Atlanta airport discussed ways to raise money to help rebuild damaged homes and place evacuees who lost their jobs in new jobs.

Some agreed with Ellis that the mayors need to push the federal government to provide long-term money and manpower to the relief effort. Others, however, said the local governments need to work together to address the problem.

"This disaster certainly took the covers off what's been racial and economic disparity," said Robert Bowser, the mayor of East Orange, N.J., which has opened up housing for evacuees who want to relocate there. "We want to help our brothers and sisters in the South by doing what we can."

The president of the group, Inglewood, Calif., Mayor Roosevelt Dorn, said the black mayors are calling upon the federal government to use his group as a conduit to cities to help get long-term aid to hurricane victims. He said the group will be looking to tap relief funds in that effort.

Most agreed the big problem is where to house victims for the months and years ahead, particularly those who have relocated to small communities in the South that have seen their limited resources drained in the six weeks since Katrina came ashore.

Mayor James Perkins of Selma, Ala., said his community has seen hurricane evacuees from as far away as Texas show up in recent weeks looking for homes and jobs. He said the community will need help if it is to care for those people long-term.

"I don't know about you, but I hear this big sucking sound coming from our budget," Perkins said. "It's been a drain on our resources."

George Grace, the mayor of St. Gabriel, where a temporary morgue was set up for those who died in the hurricanes, said the black mayors should push for more money to go toward finding people permanent housing rather than temporary housing.

"After the media goes home, after FEMA goes home, after the Red Cross goes home, we are left with the problem," Grace said.

Some of the black mayors had harsh words for the Federal Emergency Management Agency and its response to the disaster.

"They had no command structure," said Larry Bryant, the mayor of Forrest City, Ark. "It was like they were newborn babies. They didn't know how to walk or how to talk."

He said that if anything good comes from the disaster it is that it opened people's eyes to the government's level of preparedness for major hurricanes.

John White, the mayor of Ames, Texas, about 40 miles west of Beaumont, which was hit hard by Rita, said FEMA needs to deal more directly with local communities affected by hurricanes.

"We couldn't get help to get generators," White said.

But some at the meeting said the finger-pointing is counterproductive.

"Local, state and federal governments dropped the ball. You can't blame one," said Milton Tutwiler, the mayor of Winstonville, Miss. "We have to figure out how to rebuild and where to house people. It's not just black folks, but white folks and Asian folks."

Tutwiler added, "I don't think anyone was prepared for this thing."

Mapping Katrina's surge will help prepare for future storms

Levels noted across 90,000 square miles

By Brendan Farrington
Associated Press writer

GULFPORT, MISS. — A small piece of duct tape stuck 9 ½ feet above the ground marks the spot on a gutted brick house where Hurricane Katrina's storm surge gushed a month earlier.

As a backhoe scoops up a massive pile of torn-up drywall, furniture and soggy carpets in front of the home, Gary Bryan and two other surveyors examine the spot.

They're one of several crews hired by the government to painstakingly map flood levels from Louisiana to Florida. Across 90,000 square miles, crews are tracking down hundreds of markings posted by earlier teams right after the storm. They record their location and elevation.

Their goal is to create an atlas. Emergency planners want to learn not only what happened during Katrina, but to prepare for what might happen with future storms. How high might the water surge next time?

The house where the crew found one of the markers is a half-mile from the Gulf of Mexico. But it's near Bernard Bayou, which rose when the hurricane roared onto land Aug. 29.

"I'm from Florida. We had three eyes come pretty close to us and we didn't even get teased compared to this," Bryan said, comparing Katrina's wrath to the hurricanes that smashed last year through his home state.

Surge is the water a hurricane pushes up as it approaches shore. A number of factors contribute to its size: wind strength, air pressure, the size of a storm's eye, the distance hurricane force winds extend from the center, the speed at which it comes ashore and the angle at which it hits.

So a Category 4 hurricane, if it's especially slow and large, can have a much larger surge than a stronger Category 5 storm. The Gulf Coast is more vulnerable to a high surge than the Atlantic coast because of its shallow continental shelf. Waters rise more easily when there's less of it to push.

A mistake many people made in deciding to ride out Hurricane Katrina, a Category 4 storm, was thinking it wouldn't be as bad as Hurricane Camille, a Category 5 storm that struck the same area 36 years ago.

"This storm was much larger than Camille," said Pat Fitzpatrick, a research professor at Mississippi State University's GeoResources Institute. "What people need to realize is they need to pay attention to the size of the storm and not just the intensity."

Hurricane force winds extended 125 miles from Katrina's center, compared with 60 miles for Camille, he said. Also, Katrina's eye was 32 miles wide even though a storm of its intensity normally has an eye that is 10 miles wide.

Scientists know much more about surge today than they did in 1969 when Camille hit. They can predict with reasonable accuracy what the surge will be. But the unpredictable nature of storms makes it difficult to say far in advance which areas will be flooded and how much higher the wind-whipped waves on top of the surge will be.

For example, Hurricane Ivan last year was predicted to hit west of Mobile, Ala. If it had, it would have sent 12 feet of storm surge into the area and 4 feet over the Pensacola area. But just hours before landfall, it shifted and hit east of the city. It spared Mobile, but sent a 10-foot surge over the Florida Panhandle, said Stephen Baig, a storm surge expert at the National Hurricane Center in Miami.

In the case of Katrina, estimates have ranged from a 35-foot surge in Waveland to at least 15 feet along the entire Mississippi coast, which demolished scores of buildings near the gulf and led to extensive inland flooding. Areas were covered in water that never before were known to flood.

"There's a lot of talk about what the surge was and, 'We measured it at this,' but nobody knows those real numbers," said Baig. "People could well have observed a 30-foot raised level of water with a 25- to 28-foot surge being part of it."

Scientists hope public officials and residents will learn from Katrina that storm surge can be dangerous, destructive and unpredictable.

Gertrude Taylor said her husband is one of those people who made the Camille comparison and persuaded her to ride out Katrina in their Gulfport home.

"He's from the coast. He said he ain't worried about it. He said we're going to stick it out," said Taylor.

She said she realized they were both crazy for staying when nearby homes were being ripped from foundations.

"I jumped out of the bed and got under it. It seemed like the whole house was rocking."

Katrina offers flood of lessons

Social scientists flock to region

By Matthew Hay Brown
The Baltimore Sun

HOUSTON — For all the suffering caused by Hurricane Katrina, the upheaval wrought by the storm is producing unusually rich research opportunities for academics and scientists.

Researchers from throughout the United States have descended on the Gulf Coast to explore topics as disparate as communications among victims and first responders, use of family networks in sheltering the displaced, and the provisions made for pets during disasters.

Social scientists are scrambling to put together research-grant proposals, said Vincent Gawronski, an assistant professor of political science at Birmingham-Southern College in Alabama. Their interests include everything from the psychological and political effects on Katrina's victims, to how communities are absorbing these newcomers.

"Of course, they will all be welcomed with open arms in communities and homes around the country during the emergency phase of the disaster," Gawronski said. "But what will happen down the road? What will be the social strains and stresses?"

Gawronski has teamed with Richard Olson of Florida International University to examine media coverage of the catastrophe.

"Disasters provide all sorts of opportunity to do interesting research from all sorts of different perspectives," he said.

If that's true of disasters generally, Katrina has opened access to information unique in U.S. history. The near-total evacuation of a major city is unprecedented, as is the sudden dispersal of as many as 1 million Americans to all corners of the country.

That outflow compares with the dislocations that followed the Civil War, the migration of black Southerners to the North at the beginning of the 20th century, and the exodus of farmers and laborers from the Dust Bowl during the Great Depression.

But this time, the flight unfolded in days, not years. With history in the making, analysts are getting to work learning what they can.

"These kinds of crises represent more or less natural laboratories, situations where, because of their difference from everyday life, give you an opportunity to see the inner workings of society, of groups, of organizations," said retired University of Southern California sociologist Robert Stallings, president of the research committee on disasters of the International Sociological Association.

When Katrina victims began arriving in Houston, John Barnshaw hurried down to meet them.

As a Ph.D. candidate in sociology at the University of Delaware, Barnshaw studies inequality among races, classes and genders. Hurricane Katrina provided an unprecedented opportunity for research.

A graduate assistant at Delaware's Disaster Research Center, Barnshaw spent four days at the Reliant Park shelter complex in Houston interviewing more than 40 evacuees about how they were making decisions to either return to the Gulf Court or resettle elsewhere.

Barnshaw's project is one of 20 funded so far through a quick-response-grant program at the University of Colorado. The funding enabled him to reach Reliant Park while it still held thousands of people.

"They offer an opportunity for researchers to get in there and collect highly perishable data," Barnshaw said.

The Natural Hazards Center, based at the Institute of Behavioral Science at the University of Colorado, has been issuing immediate grants of National Science Foundation money to speed researchers into the field.

Hillary Potter of the University of Colorado is pursuing a project titled "Reframing Crime: Race, Gender, Class, Criminality and Enforcement of Laws in a Natural Disaster." Lauren Barsky of the University of Delaware is examining "Disaster Realities in the Aftermath of Hurricane Katrina: Revisiting the Looting Myth."

"This is information that would be lost, memories that would change over time," said Greg Guibert, program manager at the Natural Hazards Center. In addition to the 20 grants already issued, he said, another 10 proposals are being reviewed for approval.

Guibert said several of the researchers are from areas affected by the storm.

"So this is a very difficult time for them," he said. "But this is information that needs to be captured."

Gawronski said the lessons of Katrina can broaden understanding of everyday life.

"Disasters provide a window for looking at all sorts of things within a society because they lay bare underlying weaknesses and strengths in institutions, in the social fabric, even in the psychological makeup of a community," he said. "You can see so many things so quickly. It's just a revelatory event."

Despite the pain, city draws residents home

How does a city die?

In the dead air of our cell phones, my sister and I let the question fade into ellipses, finding refuge from the pain in silence. I have to go. I'm on my way home to New Orleans, or as close as I will get. The road trip from Tampa used to cover 700 miles in just about nine hours. Now, Hurricane Katrina has rearranged the roads and shifted the direction of lives. So it will take nearly a day.

It's not an easy thing to run toward heartbreak. My father waits in a hospital in Opelousas, La., a sickly man nearly finished off by the trauma of a protracted evacuation. My sister-in-law's parents are missing. I don't know the fates of countless friends. We expect that nearly every home my family owns or occupies is done with.

Nephews and cousins and friends and in-laws were last seen stubbornly holding out here, trapped in a hotel there, lost amid the dazed masses in the Superdome and Convention Center.

I don't mean to be ungrateful for the people who I know are alive, nor am I unmindful of the souls — How many? Hundreds? Thousands? — who have died in the wind and waters. It's just hard to see past the dense urgency of now and the shattered vision of tomorrow.

"How does a city die?" I ask my sister. But the question reaches into my chest and pulls angrily at my heart, demanding an answer from the journalist that I am. From the black man. From the brother, uncle, cousin, friend and father.

From a son of New Orleans.

Getting out in time

"Hi. You leaving?"

These stories all begin the same way. The phone rings and an out-of-town sibling quickly gets to the point. Since the nine of us have variously occupied or abandoned Missouri, Washington, D.C., New York, New Jersey, Philadelphia, parts of Louisiana and so much of Florida, somebody always watches over New Orleans. Somebody always calls.

Jeanne had Daddy. She and my stepmother, Vertner, would meet with Patrick's family and they would caravan to Lisa's house in Opelousas. My brother Eric had a rental and would take Liz and their two boys to Jackson, Miss., to stay with strangers. I reached Patrick's wife, Cheryl, on the Saturday before Katrina. The phone lines were already jammed. The family evacuation was all but done.

Disaster could come now.

It took seven hours for the family caravan to reach the pecan grove Lisa and her husband own in Opelousas, a trip that doesn't take half as much time when you're not emptying out a city. Pneumonia was brewing in my father's chest and he would be rushed to the hospital on Monday as Katrina exhaled her devastating breath at the Gulf Coast.

No one told my father then that the trip killed his dog. Sassy had grown old and feeble like her master, and Vertner found their blonde cocker spaniel taking her last gasps under a camellia tree. So they buried her near the horse pasture. As floodwaters drowned my father's neighborhood 150 miles away, the doctors at Opelousas General asked what to do in the event his heart stopped.

"He can't die now," Vertner said to me. "Where would we bury him?"

"Do you hear that music?"

Brother gave me a puzzled look, inasmuch as nobody was singing and we hadn't stopped talking long enough to turn on the radio. The oldest son, he's named after my father — Verdun Paul Woods Jr. — but we've never called him anything but Brother. We'd hooked up in Tallahassee — I drove from Tampa,

Soundtrack of the storm is frightening and sad

he drove from Jacksonville — to make the circuitous trip north to go south.

The music I heard in my head had an epic sound, with lots of trumpets, trombones, maybe violins and French horns. You hear it in every disaster movie, building to crescendo as stunned victims take in the full measure of a catastrophe.

I started hearing the music in Dothan, Ala., which is not exactly on the way from here to there. As Katrina raged north, she'd wedged an oil platform under a key bridge in Mobile, Ala., wiped out the Mississippi coast from Pascagoula to Pearlington and shattered the span of Interstate 10 that crosses Lake Pontchartrain into New Orleans. So the only way to get where we were going was to angle up through Georgia and Alabama, go west to Jackson and a rendezvous with my brother Eric, then head down toward what was left of home.

I heard the music faintly when I saw the Louisiana "Sportsman's Paradise" license plate in a gas station on Highway 84 and listened to a woman with a distinct New Orleans drawl tell her child why the ATM wouldn't work for them ("Sugah, I think the water got into our bank"). By the time we reached the Wal-Mart Supercenter on Montgomery Highway to buy food and clothes for family, the music was blaring so loudly my head hurt.

The food shelves in this huge store were under siege nearly a week after the storm had passed. Maybe the people were panicked by impending shortages. Maybe, like the family in the gas station, they were running from my hometown. Maybe, like us, they were stocking up to help someone who had been hit.

Keith Woods and his brother, Verdun Paul Woods Jr., known as Brother, made the difficult drive from Florida to the ruins of home in Louisiana.

We stopped in Jackson to give Eric and Liz food, water, money, encouragement. Just before we left, Liz asked if, when we found a place with electricity, we would post the names of her parents and her sister on the Internet. She hadn't heard from them in seven days.

"It doesn't look good," I told Brother.

The music came back.

Always about race

"Are you a looter or a finder?"

I read the subject line and knew what was in the e-mail. A wave of messages had rolled in on Katrina's heels linking to the†same two pictures: A black man pulling a garbage bag full of loot, a white woman towing bread and other food behind her. The black man, one photo caption says, is a looter. The white woman, the other says, found the food she's pulling through the water. Television and print journalists had gotten swept up in the apocalyptic story of a city sinking into anarchy, and now they'd turned on themselves. Wasn't this evidence, many journalists wanted to know, of the media's bigotry?

The argument raged in my inbox. I deleted each one as it arrived.

It was Tuesday. Cheryl's 94-year-old grandmother (they called her Mama Dear) was trapped in her house, awash in rising, putrid water. Fats Domino was missing. People were dying in attics, on rooftops, on the roadsides and in the Superdome. What the hell did I care whether somebody messed up a caption?

That week, Slate's Jack Shafer wrote with glib, liberal superiority that the fear of being called racists cowed white journalists so much that they ignored the most obvious element of the story: that the people who stayed and were now, by the thousands, in harm's way, were overwhelmingly black. Thus, many journalists, their unexamined discomfort with the story's images outed by the widely circulated column, leapt upon the opportunity to add the race of New Orleans' victims to their stories.

I wondered if some even felt relieved to have permission finally to state the obvious.

I wish they'd waited for the water to go down low enough for the white people of St. Bernard Parish to start their sorrowful westward sojourn. I wish they'd waited until the Gulf of Mexico had retreated enough to reveal the devastation in Lower Plaquemines Parish and release the bodies of the white people drowned in Buras, Port Sulphur and Boothville and Venice — people who, just like the black people in New Orleans, stayed because they had no options or because they believed this storm, too, would turn, or because they were unwise or because they believed in God but not in Armageddon.

I wish they'd waited until they heard the white president of Washington Parish crying on the radio as he pleaded for help that hadn't come. I wish they'd seen the white president of Jefferson Parish crying on television because he thought help came too late. I wish they could have seen the white faces of poverty in the Superdome or along the Mississippi Gulf Coast as clearly as they could see the blackness of poor folks in the 9th Ward or the blackness of the mayor who leads New Orleans. Then, maybe, they'd understand how little of this was about race and how much was about a more insidious, long-standing, unconscionable malfeasance of government officials who must have felt secret glee as our eyes diverted from their criminal incompetence.

I know rage and racial suspicion. Every time I've cried since the end of August, those tears have been laced with the poisonous fear that we live in such a country where you can die of heat or hunger, drowning or dehydration — on national television — and no one will come to help if your skin is not white.

But I know more. I saw the white people waiting, hurting, dying. I knew they were there even when I didn't see them. I knew that America had also failed them.

As Brother and I neared Baton Rouge, a white woman called in to a radio station from Bogalusa, a devastated victim of Katrina in Washington Parish, just north of the city. They're crying racism in New Orleans, she told the host.

"Now the black people are going to get all the help and we won't get nothing," she said. "So I think we should set up a charity for white people."

Lost and found

"Did you hear about Mama Dear?"

Lisa is on the other end of the phone, and I can't listen anymore. My father looks like death. My city is empty. It has been too much.

Our trip to Louisiana was mostly symbolic and bordered on an inconvenience for Lisa and her husband, who had other things to do than rescue her older brothers each time we got lost in the back roads of Opelousas. Everything we did to help fell short of finished. Everything we bought or donated felt pitifully inadequate. A week after the storm struck we celebrated Lisa's birthday, kissed my father goodbye, then headed home.

We drove back through Mississippi on the once-impassable Interstate 59. Katrina had come this way. In the darkness, the roadside landscape looked like it had been stomped by giants. A mile south of Poplarville, the trees on either side of the Interstate, many teetering dangerously above us, had been snapped in two, their pine essence hemorrhaging into the night air. On the other side of the highway, dozens of military jeeps, utility trucks and ambulances spoke solemnly of what they expected to find as they convoyed south.

For miles, we were the only ones on I-59. There were no road signs, no electricity, nothing to point the way home but headlights and memory. The music was back now — soft, saxophone sad, a dirge befitting the birthplace of jazz.

Slowly though, as the dead bobbed to the surface in New Orleans, the living emerged elsewhere. My uncles, aunts and cousins were with family in Houston, San Antonio and Baton Rouge. My friend Mario was in Franklin, La. One of my sister-in-law's brothers was in Arkansas, another in North Carolina. Two cousins had gone to Atlanta. Liz's parents and sister were alive in Baton Rouge. The missing reporter surfaced in Gulfport. Fats Domino was pulled from his yellow and black shotgun double in the sodden Lower 9th Ward.

Hope had survived.

Now, Lisa is on the phone, reminding me that this story is not over.

Mama Dear is dead.

She died on Sept. 14, Patrick's birthday. Her 7th Ward house had survived Katrina, but when the levees broke, the water rushed in, and it was nearly two days later that firefighters in a boat plucked her from there. They took her to the nearby Interstate 10 ramp, where she lay on an air mattress for 12 sweltering hours. An ambulance came on the third day and took her to the tarmac of Louis Armstrong airport, where doctors and nurses practiced medicine in the open air, their old and sick patients stacked on luggage carts. She was there for another 12 hours before an airplane came to take her to Houston.

What age and disease couldn't accomplish in 94 years, foolhardiness, dehydration and incompetence did in 16 days.

They buried her in a crypt in Houston just as cars began to flood Texas roads in panicked retreat from Hurricane Rita. She won't stay there, though. They'll bring her back home sometime after the madness recedes and the soldiers go away and, I suppose, when there are enough people around to lay her casket at her husband's side in New Orleans.

How does a city die?

How can it die when cars stream stubbornly back? Some surely come only to carry bleary-eyed family home to pick through the muck of their lives on the way to somewhere else. Some come only to lead a funeral cortege to grieve at the cemetery. But others will stay to rebuild, to pick up the sticks and bricks and trees and, in a few weeks, when it's All Souls Day, to tidy the graves they build above the ground in New Orleans so that no amount of water can totally erase the past upon which my hometown has always built its future.

Theoretical storm could swamp city

By Larry McShane
Associated Press writer

NEW YORK — It's coming, with skyscraper-rattling winds and a 30-foot storm surge that threatens to submerge Wall Street, flood the subways and turn Coney Island into a water park.

And when it arrives, more than 3 million New Yorkers — more than six times the population of New Orleans — could be forced to evacuate by the first major hurricane to hit the city since 1938.

A killer storm in the nation's largest city, with flooding in all five boroughs, inaccessible highways and airports, and enormous traffic jams, would require an unprecedented response. After the summer of Katrina and Rita, New Yorkers are wondering if the city could handle such a challenge.

"The plan now is full of technical and other management flaws," said state Assemblyman Richard Brodsky, who chairs a committee investigating the city's planned response. "There's a basic bottom line: We are incredibly vulnerable, and our leaders are patting us on the head saying, 'There, there. Trust us.' "

A recent WNBC-TV/Marist Poll indicated that 62 percent of New Yorkers felt it was not possible to evacuate their neighborhoods.

Not true, city emergency officials say. New York is ready to respond to hurricane risks, and the city dispatched staffers to New Orleans and Texas in hopes of learning from Katrina and Rita.

"There's a lot of criticism and public debate, but our plan is workable and we're prepared," said Jarrod Bernstein, spokesman for New York City's Office of Emergency Management.

The Long Island Express

A major hurricane barrels into New York City about once every 90 years. The most recent big blow came with the 1938 Long Island Express, which killed 700 people, about 600 in New England, and left 63,000 people homeless.

"If it happened before, it will happen again," said hurricane expert Nicholas Coch, a Queens College professor of coastal geology.

The city's current response plan for a Category 4 storm, which would bring 155-mph winds, would handle 3.3 million evacuees and provide shelter for as many as 800,000 displaced people, Bernstein said.

But the OEM estimated it would take nearly 18 hours to evacuate just 1 million people.

Coch mentioned another rarely discussed factor: A Northern hurricane moves typically at 34 mph, about triple the speed of a Southern storm. Though that could mean less rainfall, it would also mean less time to react.

A big blast would come with a storm surge of 30 feet, turning the water into "a giant bulldozer sweeping away everything in its path," according to OEM's "Hurricanes and New York City."

In fact, an 1821 hurricane lifted the tide 13 feet in an hour, with the East and Hudson rivers converging over lower Manhattan as far north as Canal Street.

A sitting duck

In today's downtown, the FDR Drive, One Police Plaza and City Hall are all in the flood zone for a major hurricane making landfall just south of the city. Wall Street would be under water. The South Street Seaport would become more sea, less port.

To avert traffic jams, officials would evacuate from the coasts inward and use mass transportation as much as possible.

Unlike New Orleans, the city has no land below sea level. But it is particularly vulnerable because of its location: tucked in a bend between the New Jersey and Long Island coastlines, at a right angle to incoming storms. That could turn even a Category 2 hurricane into a major nightmare.

Brodsky is critical of OEM's plan to move evacuees in two shifts. Initially, evacuees would travel to one of 23 reception centers across the five boroughs. Only then would they board a bus or van for transportation to an evacuation center.

And that is if New Yorkers even show up. Convincing them about the dangers of a hurricane on the Hudson is a major part of the process.

"Most New Yorkers," Coch said, "think hurricanes only occur in places with palm trees."

Miss. will pay fishers to rehabilitate state oyster reefs

By The Associated Press

BILOXI, MISS. — The Mississippi Department of Marine Resources will pay oyster fishers to help remove debris and rehabilitate oyster reefs heavily damaged by Hurricane Katrina on Aug. 29.

The DMR will use money it received last year after Hurricane Ivan to pay fishers for the oyster reefs project. No project costs were announced.

DMR officials said they hope the money will be of some help to fishers who are now struggling after losing at least one complete oyster season, which typically runs from September to April or May.

"This is a short-term solution to a long-term problem," DMR spokesman Joe Jewell said. "I don't know how long it will take before we run out of money."

As of Tuesday, more than 30 fishers had called to sign up for the project and officials expect more.Jewell said DMR wants to work with Mississippi oyster harvesters who have held an oyster license within the last two years and will pay a daily wage per boat for an eight-hour day.

Initial assessments of the oyster reefs indicated heavy scouring where the rapidly retreating storm surge cut gullies and dropped building debris.

Investigators found very few live oysters. Though officials are not anticipating opening the season this year, they are cautiously optimistic about the resurgence of the oyster industry.

"Oysters have a tremendous ability to reproduce," said Dale Diaz, a DMR official. "A few oysters can quickly make a lot of oysters."

BUILDING HOPE™ together.

AIRLINE HIGHWAY & SLIDELL LOCATIONS NOW OPEN

The devastation wreaked by Hurricane Katrina is almost beyond comprehension. We know first hand how it has impacted the lives of everyone along the Gulf Coast and well inland in Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. Hundreds of our associates were impacted, some losing everything they own. Yet, their resiliency is a shining example of the spirit we have witnessed throughout the region.

We have re-opened our stores and are working tirelessly to ensure a steady supply of building materials and tools. Our owners have also stepped forward and donated hundreds of thousands of dollars to hurricane Katrina relief efforts, matching the contributions from fans, volunteers, tournament staff, and PGA TOUR Players during the 84 Lumber Classic, held in mid-September in southwestern Pennsylvania.

The road back will be long, and at times seem endless; however, 84 Lumber is committed to helping the region rebuild through a steady supply of quality building materials and by continuing to be active in generating funds for Hurricane Katrina Relief through our Building Hope initiative.

ROBERT ALLEN, University of California at Berkeley professor

After 10 years, black nation within a nation to gather again

Millions More Movement to march on Washington

By Jonathan Tilove
Newhouse News Service

WASHINGTON – In 1995, the racially polarized reaction to the O.J. Simpson murder trial verdict presaged the enormous gathering on the National Mall for the Million Man March. Ten years later, Hurricane Katrina and its stark reminder of the distinctly different conditions many black people endure have set the stage for the Millions More Movement and its commemorative march on the mall Oct. 15.

Simpson, Katrina and the continuing history of black mass gatherings are reminders of how time and circumstance have produced a collective identity, forged by crisis, that still sets black America apart. More than anything else, the gatherings in 1995 and again this year are a way to recognize that nation within a nation.

"It's a coming together of who we are, affirming blackness and black culture, and affirming that African-Americans have survived in this society, despite a long history of oppression and hardship," said Robert Allen, professor of African-American studies at the University of California at Berkeley. "It's about building community and bringing together a very broad spectrum of the African-American community."

Who would have imagined in 1963, when the Rev. Martin Luther King's March on Washington brought 250,000 people to the mall to demand an end to legal segregation, that three decades later a march called by Louis Farrakhan of the black nationalist Nation of Islam would draw a far larger crowd and that it would be composed almost exclusively of African-American men around an agenda of introspection and atonement?

The 1995 event was by far the largest African-American public gathering in history. Another decade later, black Americans again plan to assemble on the mall to express the unity of a people who, as Farrakhan puts it, are "slipping further behind."

A strong collective identity is central to the African-American psyche and shows no signs of dimming with time, said University of Chicago political scientist Michael Dawson, an expert on black political opinion. No group in America is as politically cohesive.

"One of the themes throughout African-American history, going back to before the Civil War, is many African-Americans viewing themselves as a nation, or a nationality, within the borders of the United States," Dawson said.

And why not?

Schools are more segregated than a decade ago, according to the Harvard Civil Rights Project. The rise of the black middle class has been accompanied by the rise of the black suburb. "Ghetto" has a throwback air about it, but well describes deeply poor black neighborhoods like the Lower 9th Ward, where black English rules and African-influenced first names mark that this is not Jacob-and-Emily America. Prison is a rite of passage for many black men.

The enormous gap between black and white wealth has grown, as black people actually lost wealth between 1996 and 2002, according to the Pew Hispanic Center.

"We're talking about nearly 40 million (black) people in this country. Forty million people in a land who don't have serious power or economics. It's obscene," said Haki Madhubuti, a Chicago poet, publisher and educator who with Maulana Karenga edited the commemorative volume "Million Man March/Day of Absence."

Black people get their information from the usual sources, but also from black media, at the barbershop, in church, or, as in a recent case, at a shelter for Katrina evacuees in Charlotte, N.C., where Farrakhan said he had "heard from a very reliable source" that a levee in a New Orleans "may have been blown up, so that the water would destroy the black part of town, and where the whites lived, it would be dry." Is that reckless, paranoid demagoguery or reasonable suspicion, given all that's come before?

Ten years ago it was the image of black people reacting with delight to the acquittal of Simpson that shocked many white people. How, they wondered, could so many black people watch the same events unfold and react so differently to the outcome?

Then came Katrina.

According to a survey conducted by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press of 1,000 adults, including an oversample of African-Americans, interviewed Sept. 6 and 7, 66 percent of black people, but only 17 percent of white people, thought the government would have responded faster if most of the hurricane's victims had been white. For 71 percent of black people, but only 32 percent of white people, Katrina proved that racial inequality was still a major problem.

"The racism that I saw in New Orleans, the do-nothing attitude in the treatment of those who were there, it takes me back to the early days of racism," said Joseph Dulin, principal of an Ann Arbor, Mich., alternative high school. "People who say it wasn't anything racist, well, you have to have been a victim to feel these things, to know these things."

According to the Pew survey, 22 percent of white people said they had a close friend or relative directly affected by Katrina. Forty-three percent of black people said they had that first-hand connection.

"Katrina is to black people what 9/11 was to white people," said Raymond Winbush, director of the Institute for Urban Research at Morgan State University in Baltimore, who compares the Oct. 15 march to a national organizational meeting in the wake of a great tragedy. "This is going to be another watershed moment in black American history."

The Million Man March inspired countless acts of community building by those who went home determined to do more for their people. Dulin returned to Ann Arbor and founded National African American Parent Involvement Day. Richard Shorter of West Orange, N.J., started the Boys to Men mentorship program at St. Mark's AME Church in East Orange.

But then and now, some were disappointed that the 1995 event asked more of black men than of America.

John Bracey Jr. was a 22-year-old organizer with the Congress of Racial Equality in Chicago when he went to the 1963 March on Washington. He is now a scholar of black nationalism at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

"Why would you go all that way to Washington to blame everything on yourself?" Bracey recalled asking students who made the trek in 1995. Of this month's event, he said, "Someone is supposed to nail 10 theses on the White House door."

In fact, the Millions More Movement has a 10-point agenda under the headings of unity, spiritual values, education, economic development, political power, reparations, the prison-industrial complex, health, artistic/cultural development and peace.

Farrakhan, though, has proved a mercurial leader. In the years since the Million Man March, he has pursued alliances with the fringe white political leader Lyndon LaRouche, with Sun Myung Moon and his conservative Unification Church, and with the Libyan President Moammar Gadhafi.

Still, his position outside the mainstream, as a man uncompromised by having to make accommodations with white America, may help him rally black Americans under the banner of racial solidarity.

"What we're talking about with modern black nationalism is a feeling or spirit or group identity, that because of skin color, because of background, black people are undervalued or oppressed," said William Van Deburg, a professor of Afro-American studies at the University of Wisconsin in Madison and the author of "Modern Black Nationalism." This march, like the last one, is about "affirming blackness."

And beyond that?

"What's become more obvious to me is that we're not a monolithic group of people," said Shorter, the real estate appraiser from West Orange, N.J. "I'm tired of Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton and the Congressional Black Caucus. I ain't into federal programs.

"What's that gotten us in New Orleans and Newark and East Orange and Milwaukee?"

Some Senate Demos defend Miers from GOP flak

Still, that doesn't mean they'll vote for high court nominee

By Jesse J. Holland
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON – Some Senate Democrats are jumping in the middle of a Republican fray to defend Harriet Miers from conservative criticism that she isn't qualified to serve on the Supreme Court.

That doesn't mean Democrats will vote to approve President Bush's longtime confidante for the high court or give her an easy time at a Senate confirmation hearing.

Behind the scenes, a half-dozen aides to Senate Democrats - speaking on condition of anonymity to protect their jobs - admit that they are enjoying watching the GOP's right wing beat up the president. None will say whether their bosses feel the same way - or might be insincere when they heap praise on Miers and call her critics unfair.

"All the trashing is coming from the right wing of the Republican Party," Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, said in a conference call with reporters. "I really think it's despicable what they're doing."

Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, D-Md., accused critics of Miers' nomination of being "incredibly sexist."

"They're saying a woman who was one of the first to head up a major law firm with over 400 lawyers doesn't have intellectual heft," Mikulski said. "I find this a double standard."

More unusual is the outright praise from some Democrats for the person who would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate vote on abortion, affirmative action and other close rulings.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., right, walks out of his office with U.S. Supreme Court nominee Harriet Miers on Capitol Hill in Washington on Monday. Galling to many conservatives is that Reid recommended that Bush nominate Miers and has praised her several times since then.

"I like what I hear so far," said Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark.

Many conservatives don't. Several columnists have derided Bush's decision, and some groups have called on the president to withdraw her name. Bush insists that Miers is worthy, citing her 35-year legal career and her service in city and state government as well as the White House.

"When she goes before the Senate, I am confident that all Americans will see what I see every day: Harriet Miers is a woman of intelligence, strength and conviction," the president said Saturday in his weekly radio address. "And when she is confirmed by the Senate, I am confident that she will leave a lasting mark on the Supreme Court and will be a justice who makes all Americans proud."

There are 55 Republicans, 44 Democrats and one independent senator, Jim Jeffords of Vermont. If six conservative Republicans vote against Miers, a united Democratic caucus along with Jeffords could defeat her nomination.

Galling to many conservatives is that Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada recommended that Bush nominate Miers and has praised her several times since then, without promising to vote for her.

The White House enlisted many conservative leaders to testify that Miers would be a reliable vote. Sen. Patrick Leahy, the Senate Judiciary Committee's senior Democrat, tried to counter that assurance when he asserted that Miers pledged to be independent when they discussed her nomination.

"I said, 'Would you disavow people who send out assurances that they know how you're going to vote?' She said, 'Absolutely,'" said Leahy. "She said, 'I will be my own person, I will be independent. Nobody has the authority or right or ability to tell how I'm going to vote.'"

Democrats are preparing to blanket the White House with document requests to help flesh out Miers' judicial philosophy. However, her work there falls under executive privilege or lawyer-client privilege.

Bush aides have anticipated such requests. While Miers will answer senators' questions, the White House will not provide "confidential deliberative documents" relating to work for the president, spokesman Scott McClellan said.

Democrats are aligning themselves with demands by conservatives that Miers be forthcoming at her confirmation hearings. Last month, the court's new chief justice, John Roberts, had solid support from conservatives when he declined to answer many questions from Democrats. This time, Democrats hope Miers will feel pressured to be more open.

"The idea that Americans shouldn't know what the judicial philosophy of the nominee to this powerful, powerful position is, is wearing thin with the American people, whether they be liberal, conservative or moderate," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

Most Americans bound for vast waist land

Study shows we get fatter over long haul

By Alex Dominguez
Associated Press writer

BALTIMORE — Just when we thought we couldn't get any fatter, a new study that followed Americans for three decades suggests that over the long haul, 9 out of 10 men and 7 out of 10 women will become overweight.

Even if you are one of the lucky few who made it to middle age without getting fat, don't congratulate yourself — keep watching that waistline.

Half of the men and women in the study who had made it well into adulthood without a weight problem ultimately became overweight. A third of those women and a quarter of the men became obese.

"You cannot become complacent, because you are at risk of becoming overweight," said Ramachandran Vasan, an associate professor of medicine at Boston University and the study's lead author.

He and other researchers studied data gathered from 4,000 white adults over 30 years. Participants were between the ages of 30 and 59 at the start, and were examined every four years. By the end of the study, more than 1 in 3 had become obese.

The study defined obesity as a body mass index, which is a commonly used height and weight comparison, of more than 30.

The findings, published Tuesday in the Annals of Internal Medicine, show obesity may be a greater problem than indicated by studies that look at a cross-section of the population at one point in time. Those so-called "snapshots" of obesity have found about 6 in 10 are overweight and about 1 in 3 are obese, Vasan said.

The findings also re-emphasize that people must continually watch their weight, Vasan said.

The research subjects were the children of participants in the long-running and often-cited Framingham Heart Study, which has been following the health of generations of Massachusetts residents.

Dr. Elizabeth Nabel, director of the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute, which supported the study, said the findings show "we could have an even more serious degree of overweight and obesity over the next few decades."

Susan Bartlett, an assistant professor of medicine and an obesity researcher at the Johns Hopkins School of Medicine, said the study was one of the first to look at the risk of becoming overweight.

"The results are pretty sobering, really," said Bartlett, who was not involved in the research.

While the health risks of being obese are much more severe than being overweight, those who are overweight are much more likely to go on to become obese, Bartlett said.

The study shows Americans live in an "environment in which it's hard not to become overweight or obese. Unless people actively work against that, that's what's most likely to happen to them."

Obesity raises the risk of heart disease, some cancers, diabetes and arthritis, and being overweight raises blood pressure and cholesterol, which in turn can raise the risk of heart disease.

The number of deaths linked to obesity has been heavily debated. Earlier this year the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention said obesity caused only about 25,814 deaths annually in the United States — far fewer than the 365,000 deaths the agency had earlier reported. Other scientists have disagreed with the revised conclusion, while organizations representing the food and restaurant industry think weight-related ills have been overstated.

As for the Framingham study, Mark Vander Weg, a Mayo Clinic psychologist who researches obesity but was not involved in the study, said it is one of a few to track a group of individuals over an extended period.

"What's particularly concerning is that these results actually may underestimate the risk of becoming overweight or obese among the general population" because minorities, who are at increased risk for obesity, were not included in the study, Vander Weg said.

Recent trends also suggest that people now coming into middle age may be even more likely to become overweight or obese than those who were studied, Vander Weg said.

While more studies that include more diverse populations are needed, he said, the results "add to a growing body of evidence that makes it increasingly apparent that more effective prevention and treatment strategies are urgently needed."

Kidney donation swap shows promise in study

Recipients line up friends to donate

By Carla K. Johnson
Associated Press writer

CHICAGO — Researchers are reporting a high success rate for a novel kidney swap program that proponents say could someday ease the shortage of transplant organs in the United States.

Most kidney transplants use organs taken from cadavers. But doctors prefer using organs from live donors, because the success rates are higher.

In a live-donor practice used increasingly in the United States over the past few years, a patient who needs a kidney is matched with a compatible stranger; in return, the patient must line up a friend or relative willing to donate an organ to a stranger, too.

The practice is particularly useful in cases in which a kidney patient's friends or relatives are willing to donate an organ to their loved one but are not a suitable match.

In the first U.S. success-rate study of what are called "kidney paired donations," Johns Hopkins University researchers tracked 22 patients who received kidneys from living strangers.

Of the 22 transplants, only one failed, because of clotting problems unrelated to organ rejection. That patient eventually received a kidney from a dead donor. Four patients also had treatable immune-system reactions. There were no deaths.

The patients were followed, on average, for 13 months, although two were followed only one month.

The success rates were comparable to other live-donor transplant rates, said study co-author Dr. Robert Montgomery, director of Johns Hopkins' Comprehensive Transplant Center. The university's kidney-swap program began in 2001.

The study appears in today's Journal of the American Medical Association.

More than 63,000 U.S. patients are awaiting a kidney transplant, according to the United Network for Organ Sharing. In 2004, 3,897 patients died while waiting for a kidney.

Though the kidney swap idea has been around almost 20 years, only 64 U.S. patients have received a kidney transplant through a paired exchange, according to UNOS.

But "the momentum is increasing for a national program," Montgomery said. At a conference in March, he and other specialists gathered in Chicago to develop a blueprint for a national paired organ exchange.

Proponents hope a nationwide system could help relieve the organ shortage and cut costs by getting people off dialysis.

But such swaps involve logistical and ethical problems.

Dr. Lainie Ross of the University of Chicago, who with her colleagues wrote a paper in 1997 laying out the ethical guidelines followed by Johns Hopkins, praised the research but said there are still unknowns, such as how the donor and recipient will fare emotionally.

A 2004 Korean study also saw successful kidney transplants using the swap strategy.

Robot vehicles rumble across desert

Driverless technology tested on the sand

By Alicia Chang
AP science writer

PRIMM, NEV. — A customized Volkswagen SUV created by Stanford University on Saturday became the first driverless vehicle to cross the finish line of a $2 million Pentagon-sponsored robot race across the rugged Mojave Desert.

The race announcer did not immediately declare a winner because 22 out of the 23 robots left the starting line at staggered times at dawn, racing against the clock rather than each other. As the Volkswagen robot dubbed "Stanley" crossed the finish line, a group of Stanford engineers and scientists erupted into cheers.

Four other robots remained on the course.

Last year's much-hyped inaugural robot race ended without a winner when all the self-navigating vehicles broke down shortly after leaving the starting gate. Sandstorm, a customized Humvee by Carnegie Mellon University, chugged the farthest at 7 1/2 miles.

Of the 23 robots that competed Saturday, 15 vehicles failed to navigate the entire 132-mile course, but most still managed to beat Sandstorm's mileage last year.

The Pentagon's Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, or DARPA, plans to award $2 million to the first vehicle to cover the race in less than 10 hours. The taxpayer-funded race was intended to spur innovation and development of remote control-free robots that could be used in the battlefield.

Stanley finished the course in less than 7 1/2 hours.

The unmanned vehicles must use their computer brains and sensing devices to follow a programmed route and avoid hitting obstacles that may doom their chances.

Vehicles have to drive on rough, winding desert roads and dry lake beds filled with overhanging brush and man-made obstacles. The machines also must traverse a narrow 1.3-mile mountain pass with a steep drop-off and go through three tunnels designed to knock out their GPS signals.

This year's field was more competitive. Even before Saturday's race, many teams tested their vehicles in parts of the Southwest desert under race-like conditions including some that practiced on last year's course from Barstow, Calif., to Primm.

The vehicles were tricked out with the latest sensors, lasers, cameras and radar that feed information to several onboard computers. This helps vehicles make intelligent decisions such as distinguishing a dangerous boulder from a tumbleweed and calculating whether a chasm is too deep to cross.

Cornell University's military light strike vehicle traveled about 20 miles when it failed to cross a bridge. Team members were trying to figure out what went wrong.

"We're at a loss," said Ephrahim Garcia, a Cornell mechanical engineer. "It's a disappointment."

The so-called Grand Challenge race is part of the Pentagon's effort to cut the risk of casualties by fulfilling a congressional mandate to have a third of all military ground vehicles unmanned by 2015.

The military currently has a small fleet of autonomous ground vehicles stationed in Iraq and Afghanistan, but the machines are remotely controlled by a soldier who usually rides in the same convoy. The Pentagon wants to eliminate the human factor and use self-thinking robotic vehicles to ferry supplies in war zones.

Iraq strategy helping insurgency, some say

Analysts say attacks likely to continue

By Tyler Marshall and Louise Roug
Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON — Senior U.S. officials have begun to question a key presumption of American strategy in Iraq: that establishing democracy there can erode and ultimately eradicate the insurgency that grips the country.

The expectation that political progress would bring stability has been fundamental to the Bush administration's approach to rebuilding Iraq, as well as a central theme of White House rhetoric to convince the American public that its policy in Iraq remains on course.

But within the past two months, U.S. analysts with access to classified intelligence data have started to challenge this precept, noting what they termed a "significant and disturbing disconnect" between apparent advances on the political front and any progress in reducing insurgent attacks.

Now, with Saturday's constitutional referendum looming as an event more likely to divide than unify the country, others within the Bush administration have concluded that the quest for democracy in Iraq, at least in its current form, actually could strengthen the insurgency.

The commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, Army Gen. George Casey, has acknowledged that such a scenario was possible, while officials elsewhere in the administration, all of whom declined to be identified because of the subject's sensitivity, said they shared similar concerns about the referendum.

Iraq's Sunni Arabs, who are thought to make up the core of the nation's insurgency, are bitterly opposed to a constitution drafted mainly by the country's majority Shiite Muslim sect and ethnic Kurds. Yet by all indications, they will fail to muster enough "no" votes to defeat it.

"It could make people on the fence a little more angry or (make them) come off the fence," said a senior U.S. official who requested anonymity.

A growing number of experts outside the Bush administration and in Iraq say they agree with such assessments.

"If the constitution passes in a nonamicable way, the violence will increase," said Ali Dabbagh, an Iraqi National Assembly member considered close to Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari.

The White House consistently has linked the building of democracy in Iraq and in the broader Middle East with the defeat of the insurgency there.

President Bush repeated that assertion Thursday in a major policy address to the National Endowment for Democracy in Washington, declaring: "If the peoples of that region (the Middle East) are permitted to choose their own destiny and advance by their own energy and by their participation as free men and women, then the extremists will be marginalized and the flow of violent radicalism to the rest of the world will slow and eventually end."

Vice President Dick Cheney has put it more succinctly. "I think ... we will, in fact, succeed in getting democracy established in Iraq, and I think when we do, that will be the end of the insurgency," he said in a CNN interview in June.

Those comments echo a belief put forward earlier this year by the Pentagon that U.S. forces could not defeat the insurgency through military might alone, but that success depended on redeploying troops to protect the nascent democratic process. That process, commanders said, together with military force, eventually would smother the violence.

Despite what Bush on Thursday called "incredible political progress" in Iraq since Saddam Hussein's fall two years ago, the Iraqi insurgency has grown in strength and sophistication. From about 5,000 largely disaffected Saddam loyalists using leftover Iraqi army equipment in late 2003, it has mushroomed into a disparate yet potent force of as many as 20,000 equipped with explosives capable of knocking out even heavily armored U.S. military vehicles.

"The surface political process has stumbled forward, but the insurgency came up and kind of stayed that way," said one U.S. government analyst with access to classified intelligence reports. The analysts, who spoke on condition of anonymity while discussing intelligence information, indicated that initial evidence of the disconnect first began to surface in the spring — following Iraq's first national elections Jan. 30 — and gradually has hardened since.

Doubts about such a central pillar of the administration's Iraq policy come at an awkward time for the White House, with opinion polls indicating eroding public confidence in both in Bush as a leader and about his handling of the Iraq war. In recent days, Bush, Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have tried to shore up public support for staying in Iraq.

But Middle East experts say they have found little correlation between Iraq's emerging democracy and the strength of the insurgency.

"The democratic process as it has worked so far has certainly done nothing to undermine the insurgency," said Nathan Brown, a scholar on Middle East political reform at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington.

Robert Malley, one of the authors of a report issued in September by the International Crisis Group that concluded approval of the constitution could make things worse, called the administration's Iraq policy "a case study of pinning too much hope on an electoral process without doing so much of the other work."

Success in Iraq "is not about democracy or nondemocracy, it's about reaching consensus on a political pact that all parties agree to," said Malley, a onetime special assistant to former President Clinton for Arab-Israeli affairs. "If they don't agree, the political process won't help."

U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad reportedly is trying to broker 11th-hour changes in the draft to ease Sunni concerns, but even if he succeeds, the impact of such a concession would not be immediately clear, analysts said.

A Western diplomat in Baghdad who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the diplomatic sensitivity said that a government unable to provide its people with basic services such as security, electricity, potable water and jobs also commands little loyalty.

With the divisive constitutional referendum only a week away, the first of several of Saddam's trials due to begin later this month and the prospect that December elections will produce a Shiite-dominated Parliament, events in the coming months could act only to further distance Sunni Arabs from Iraq's emerging democratic state, analysts believe.

Sunnis, largely excluded from crucial negotiations on the constitution that took place this summer, see the draft as a document rigged against their interests.

They fear, for example, that blunt language outlawing Saddam's Sunni-dominated Baathist Party could be used to block Sunni public sector employment.

Iraq heightens security as referendum nears

Two U.S. soldiers killed in fighting

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Iraq announced a curfew, weapons ban, border closings and other security measures Saturday to clamp down ahead of next weekend's key constitutional referendum and prevent insurgent attacks. Sunni Arabs geared up their campaign to defeat the measure at the polls.

Two U.S. soldiers were killed in fighting in western Iraq, bringing to eight the number of American casualties in a series of offensives the military has launched to put down militants before the Oct. 15 vote.

In Baghdad, a suicide attacker detonated a car full of explosives at two police vehicles forming a checkpoint, killing at least five police officers and wounding 20 people, including six civilians.

It was the sort of attack Iraqi security forces are hoping to avert with a ban on using vehicles on voting day — a step taken during parliamentary elections in January. Sunni-led insurgents have vowed to wreck the referendum with a wave of attacks.

"We will protect those who say yes and those who say no," Interior Minister Bayan Jabr told reporters in Baghdad. "We have countermeasures against all terrorist actions, and you will see tens of thousands of Iraqi security forces deployed in Baghdad and the provinces."

On Thursday — two days ahead of the vote — a nationwide nighttime curfew will begin and nobody will be able to carry weapons in public, even if they're licensed, Jabr said. On Friday evening, police will bar travel between provinces. International borders, airports and ports also will be closed, but Jabr did not say when that step would begin.

He acknowledged problems with security in Iraq's western province of Anbar, the heartland of the insurgency. In the provincial capital of Ramadi, only 1,000 of the city's 6,500-member police force were willing to come to work, Jabr said. He said help from powerful local tribes was needed to protect polling stations, and the Iraqi military would have to be responsible for security.

The referendum has divided Iraqis, with leaders of the Shiite Muslim majority and Kurds supporting the constitution and Sunni Arabs opposing it, saying it will fragment Iraq. Sunnis can defeat the charter if they garner a two-thirds "no" vote in any three of Iraq's 18 provinces.

A delegation from the Arab League arrived Saturday in Iraq to lay the groundwork for an Iraqi "reconciliation conference" it hopes to hold after the vote. It was the first time the pan-Arab organization has tried to take a direct role in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

"The situation is so tense there is a threat looming in the air about civil war that could erupt at any moment, although some people would say that it is already there," Arab League Secretary-General Amr Moussa warned in an interview with British Broadcasting Corp. radio on Saturday.

But the organization has gotten a cold reception from some Shiite leaders in the government, resentful over what they see as the predominantly Sunni league's bias in favor of the minority in Iraq.

Meanwhile, all sides were stepping up their campaigns for and against the constitution. Leaders of the top Sunni political factions met in Baghdad to plan how to rally their followers in the "no" vote.

In Tikrit, Saddam Hussein's hometown, the Iraqi Islamic Party passed out copies of the constitution to worshippers at a Sunni mosque and urged them to go to the polls to reject it.

In western Iraq, U.S. troops continued their four-day-old Operation River Gate, a sweep of several towns along the Euphrates River valley, one of two offensives launched last week in Anbar province against insurgents.

The two U.S. soldiers were killed Friday by small-arms fire near the town of Haqlaniyah during the River Bend operation.

Six other U.S. service members have been killed in past days in River Bend and the second operation, Iron Fist, which ended Thursday night further upriver near the Syrian border. At least 1,952 U.S. service members have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Gaza border security negotiations progress

Palestinians pushing for prisoners' release

By Josef Federman
Associated Press writer

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Palestinians were moving toward agreement on new security arrangements for Gaza's border with Egypt, officials from both sides said Saturday, a deal that could allow Palestinian residents of the coastal strip relatively free movement for the first time.

The signs of progress came days before Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas were to meet for the first time since Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip.

Also Saturday, the Palestinians broke ground on their first major development project in Gaza since the withdrawal: a $100 million complex that will provide housing for 25,000 people. The development, financed by the United Arab Emirates, was being built on the former Jewish settlement of Morag and was expected to take two years to complete.

A border deal would mark a significant breakthrough. Before completing its withdrawal last month, Israel closed the Rafah border terminal, Gaza's main gateway to the outside world. The Palestinians say reopening the border is vital for Gaza's devastated economy.

A deal to reopen the terminal will have to address Israel's security concerns. Israel, which used to operate Rafah, fears that militants and weapons will reach Gaza more easily without Israeli inspectors.

This concern was underscored in the days following the Israeli withdrawal. Border control broke down and thousands of Palestinians crossed freely in and out of Egypt without any security checks. With few exceptions, Palestinians have been barred from traveling to Egypt since order was restored.

Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom also said Saturday that Egypt is not doing enough to stop the flow of weapons into Gaza and that anti-tank rockets and shoulder-held missiles have reached the area.

"There is no doubt that the situation has improved, compared to the first days, but we still see a relatively free movement (of weapons)," he told Israel Radio.

Egypt and Israel negotiated a security arrangement, including the deployment of 750 Egyptian border guards, ahead of the Gaza pullout.

Under a compromise proposal brokered by international mediator James Wolfensohn, Palestinian travelers and exports leaving Gaza would go through Rafah, with foreign inspectors supervising the traffic.

Incoming goods would be rerouted through Kerem Shalom, an Israeli-run inspection point in the area where Gaza, Egypt and Israel converge.

Wolfensohn briefed Abbas on the negotiations Friday and told him Israel agreed in principle to the presence of European inspectors, said a Palestinian official who participated in the talks.

Wolfensohn told Abbas he hopes to wrap up a Rafah deal by the end of the Muslim fasting month of Ramadan in early November, the Palestinian official said. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he wasn't authorized to talk to the media.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said Wolfensohn last week led a meeting of Israeli and Palestinian officials who set up subcommittees on customs and security. "We are going in a positive direction," he said.

A senior Israeli official said Israel is open to the idea of foreign monitors on the border and the Wolfensohn plan is "one of the options" under consideration. Israel wants to have access to the terminal's computers to monitor who is entering and leaving Gaza, the official said.

Sharon was to meet with top officials today to finalize the Israeli position on the border issue before meeting with Abbas, the official said, declining to be identified because of government rules.

Abbas and Sharon were expected to meet Tuesday, but the date wasn't certain. Both sides have said it's better not to hold the meeting at all than to have it fail.

Despite progress on the border issue, the two sides appeared deadlocked on other areas. The Palestinians were pushing for the release of some of the more than 7,000 Palestinian prisoners held by Israel and an Israeli troop withdrawal from West Bank towns.

Israel wants Abbas to take tougher action against militant groups. Abbas has refused to use force to disarm the groups, preferring instead to negotiate with them, though he recently imposed a ban on public displays of weapons in Gaza. Militants repeatedly have flouted the ban.

How long Latin America will be Catholic?

Protestants make inroads

By Nicole Winfield
Associated Press writer

VATICAN CITY — A senior Brazilian cardinal on Saturday lamented the rapid growth of Protestant movements in Latin America and wondered aloud how much longer the continent could be called Roman Catholic.

The comments by Cardinal Claudio Hummes to the Synod of Bishops reflected increasing concern in the church about the competition for souls in Latin America and Africa.

Hummes cited Brazilian government and church statistics that found that Brazil's Catholics, who represented about 90 percent of the country's population during the 1962-65 Second Vatican Council, had fallen to 83 percent in 1991 and 67 percent today.

At the same time, for every Catholic priest in Brazil, there are now two Protestant ministers, he said, according to a summary of his remarks released by the Vatican.

"We ask ourselves with anxiety: How much longer will Brazil be a Catholic country?" Hummes said. "Many indications say the same is true for all of Latin America, and also here we ask ourselves: How long will Latin America be a Catholic continent?"

Pope Benedict XVI has spoken out on a few occasions about the threats to the Catholic faith posed by Protestant groups, including on the first day of the conclave that elected him pope.

During a homily April 18 in which he denounced the "dictatorship of relativism" in the world, he cited the groups as well as Marxism, liberalism, atheism and agnosticism as threats to the fundamental truths of the church.

More recently, in a speech to priests in northern Italy, the pope lamented that Protestants were attracting Africans looking for religion beyond their traditional faiths and "present themselves as the best, the simplest and the most accommodating form of Christianity."

During Saturday's discussions, several bishops also spoke of the plight of Christians living in some Muslim countries. Monsignor Berhaneyesus Demerew Souraphiel of Ethiopia drew applause after he urged bishops in Muslim countries to pay particular care to Christian migrants who leave their homes in search of work.

"They are forced to go to these Muslim countries because of the poverty of their own countries, and because the doors of other Christian countries are closed to them," he said.

The Oct. 2-23 synod continues on Monday.

Land mine in Afghanistan kills U.S. soldier on patrol

Toll in nation reaches 200 since invasion

By Daniel Cooney
Associated Press writer

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — A U.S. soldier was killed after stepping on a land mine while patrolling in southern Afghanistan, the military said Saturday, bringing to 200 the number of American troops slain here since the Taliban was ousted in 2001.

The soldier was part of an offensive patrol in a part of Helmand province that has been wracked by rebel violence recently, a military statement said.

U.S. military spokeswoman Sgt. Marina Evans said it was not immediately known whether the mine had been recently laid and was meant as an attack on the patrol or whether it was one of thousands of mines left over from a quarter-century of war.

"It's a sad day any time a comrade dies in this ongoing struggle," Brig. Gen. Jack Sterling, a deputy commander of the U.S.-led coalition, said in the statement.

"The pain of the loss is tempered only by the knowledge that his efforts and sacrifice have brought closer the day when the growing democracy in Afghanistan removes the terrorists from this country forever," he said. "While we mourn this loss, we will continue to work to ensure that Afghanistan remains a stable democracy."

The soldier's name was withheld pending notification of the next of kin.

This year has been the deadliest yet for the 21,000-strong U.S.-led coalition force. Fighting escalated sharply ahead of Sept. 18 parliamentary elections, with more than 1,300 people killed including hundreds of Taliban-led militants during the past seven months.

The vote itself passed off relatively peacefully despite Taliban threats of violence.

Thousands left dead in rubble of Pakistani quake

Tremors also rattle India, Afghanistan

By Christopher Torchia
Associated Press writer

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN — A huge earthquake triggered landslides, toppled an apartment building and flattened villages of mud-brick homes Saturday, killing thousands across a mountainous swath touching Pakistan, India and Afghanistan. The worst damage was in Pakistan, where the dead included 250 girls crushed at a school and 200 soldiers on duty in the Himalayas.

The casualty toll from the 7.6-magnitude tremor stood at more than 3,000 by early today and was rising as rescuers struggled to dig people from the wreckage, their work made more difficult as rain and hail turned dirt and debris into sticky muck.

For hours, aftershocks rattled an area stretching from Afghanistan across northern Pakistan into India's portion of the disputed Himalayan region of Kashmir. Hospitals moved quake victims onto lawns, fearing that tremors could cause more damage.

The earthquake, which struck just before 9 a.m., caused buildings to sway for about a minute in the capitals of Afghanistan, Pakistan and India, an area some 625 miles across. Panicked people ran from homes and offices, and communications were cut to many areas.

Most of the devastation occurred in the mountains of northern Pakistan. The U.S. Geological Survey said the quake was centered about 60 miles northeast of the capital, Islamabad, in the forested mountains of Pakistani Kashmir.

"It is a national tragedy," said Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, Pakistan's chief army spokesman. "This is the worst earthquake in recent times."

In Mansehra, a shop owner named Haji Fazal Ilahi stood vigil over the body of his 14-year-old daughter, which lay under a sheet on a hospital mattress. He said his wife, another daughter and a brother also died when the family's house fell.

"I could see rocks and homes tumbling down the mountains," said Ilahi, who was driving to his village of Garlat when the quake struck. "When I reached my village, there was nothing left of my home."

India's government offered condolences and assistance to Pakistan, a longtime rival with which it has been pursuing peace efforts after fighting three wars since independence from British rule in 1947, two of them over Kashmir.

"While parts of India have also suffered from this unexpected natural disaster, we are prepared to extend any assistance with rescue and relief which you may deem appropriate," Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh said in a message to Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf.

India reported at least 250 people killed and 800 injured when the quake collapsed 2,700 houses and other buildings in Jammu-Kashmir state. Most of the deaths occurred in the border towns of Uri, Tangdar and Punch and in the city of Srinagar, said B.B. Vyas, the state's divisional commissioner.

Telephone lines were down. Some bridges developed cracks, but traffic was reported to be passing over them.

A senior Pakistani army officer said 200 soldiers were killed by debris and landslides in Pakistan's portion of Kashmir. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to journalists.

About 1,000 civilians died in that region, said Sardar Mohammed Anwar, the top government official in the area.

"This is my conservative guess, and the death toll could be much higher," Anwar told Pakistan's Aaj television station, adding that most homes in Muzaffarabad, the area's capital, were damaged, and schools and hospitals collapsed.

The death toll was at least 1,600 in Pakistan's North West Frontier Province, said Akram Durani, the province's top elected official.

Ataullah Khan Wazir, police chief in the northwestern district of Mansehra, said authorities there pulled the bodies of 250 students from the wreckage of an all-girls school in the village of Ghari Habibibullah. About 500 students were injured, he said.

Dozens of children were feared killed in other schools.

Mansehra, about 90 miles northwest of the capital, was believed to be a hotbed of Islamic militant activity during the time the Taliban religious militia ruled neighboring Afghanistan. Al-Qaida operatives trained suicide squads at a camp there, Afghan and Pakistani sources told The Associated Press in 2002.

Afghanistan appeared to suffer the least damage. In its east, an 11-year-old girl was crushed to death when a wall in her home collapsed, police official Gafar Khan said.

A U.S. military spokesman, Lt. Col. Jerry O'Hara, said the quake was felt at Bagram, the main American base in Afghanistan, but he had no reports of damage at bases around the country.

The United Nations said it was working with Pakistan, Afghanistan and India on an emergency response to the quake.

President Bush offered condolences, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the United States was ready to help.

"At this difficult time, the United States stands with its friends in Pakistan and India, just as they stood with us and offered assistance after Hurricane Katrina," Rice said in a statement.

In Pakistan, Musharraf and Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz ordered the military to extend "all-out help" to quake-hit areas and appealed to the nation to stay calm.

Helicopters and C-130 transport planes took troops and supplies to damaged areas, but landslides and rain hindered rescue efforts.

The only serious damage reported in Pakistan's capital was the collapse of a 10-story apartment building, where at least 10 people were killed and 126 were injured. Hospital doctors said the dead included an Egyptian diplomat, and the Japanese Foreign Ministry in Tokyo said two Japanese were killed.

A man named Rehmatullah who lived near the apartment building said the dust enveloped the wreckage.

"I rushed down, and for some time you could not see anything because of the dust. Then we began to look for people in the rubble," he said. "We pulled out one man by cutting off his legs."

"It was like hell," added Nauman Ali, who lives in a nearby building. "I was tossed up in my bed, and the ceiling fan struck against the roof."

Aided by two large cranes, hundreds of police and soldiers helped remove chunks of concrete, one of which was splattered with blood. One rescue worker said he heard faint cries from people trapped in the rubble.

In Abbotabad, north of Islamabad, dozens of injured quake victims and other patients lay on the lawn of the city hospital as staff with loudspeakers appealed to the public for food and other relief supplies.

One of the injured was an 8-year-old boy, Qadeer, whose father, a farmer named Jehangir, said the only buildings left standing in their village were a mosque and a school. Qadeer lay unconscious, his right leg heavily bandaged.

Rescuers work at the site of a collapsed 10-story apartment building Saturday after a severe earthquake in Islamabad, Pakistan. Dozens of people were feared trapped in the rubble of the building. A magnitude 7.6 earthquake rocked parts of India, Pakistan and Afghanistan on Saturday.

Police drop photos of suspects over Bali

Fugitives sought in terror bombings

By Mike Casey
Associated Press writer

BALI, INDONESIA — Police took to the air Saturday to press the search for the suspected masterminds of the Bali terror bombings, using a helicopter to scatter pictures of the fugitives on another island where at least one of the pair was thought to be hiding.

Although they expressed confidence in the first days after the Oct. 1 bombings, Indonesian investigators have not announced a major breakthrough. They have yet to identify the attackers, even after having newspapers publish grisly pictures of the bombers' severed heads.

The manhunt focused on two of Southeast Asia's most-sought fugitives, Noordin Mohamed Top and Azahari bin Husin, who are alleged to be the leaders of Jemaah Islamiyah, a terror group that wants to establish an Islamic state across the region. Authorities say it has links to Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida network.

The men are suspected of planning the suicide attack on three packed restaurants on Bali, which killed 23 people, including the bombers, and wounded about 100. They also have been blamed for a bombing that killed 202 in Bali three years ago and other attacks in Indonesia, which is the world's most populous Muslim nation.

Noordin, nicknamed "Moneyman," is thought to be a smooth-talking recruiter and fund-raiser for the terror group. His close aide, Azahari, has been dubbed "Demolition Man" for his reputed expertise in explosives.

Police said they raided one of Noordin's hideouts before sunrise Friday but he had slipped away just hours before they stormed the home in central Java province's Purwantoro district.

On Saturday, a helicopter flew low over the nearby city of Solo and released 10,000 fliers with photographs of Noordin and Azahari and a warning that they are "dangerous terrorists."

"We hope this can help people recognize them and be aware of them," said Solo police Maj. Agus Mulyono.

The two fugitives, both Malaysians, have dodged police for years, hiding out in this nation of 220 million people that sprawls over more than 10,000 islands that stretch across 3,000 miles.

"They are probably changing their appearance every second," said the national police spokesman, Brig. Gen. Sunarko Ardanto. "That's why we need the support from the public."

Other leads being pursued included a phone call made by the wife of another top terror suspect, Zulkarnaen, who goes by one name, said central Java's police chief, Maj. Gen. Chairul Rasyid. The woman called a number in Bali just days before the attack and police were tracing the call, he said.

The police chief also said investigators thought they were close to identifying two of the three suicide bombers. Police hope figuring out who the bombers were will help them hunt down the attack's planners and perhaps give them a better understanding of Jemaah Islamiyah.

On Bali, about 100 surfers gathered for a memorial Saturday at a beach close to two of the seaside cafes that were bombed. They paddled out to sea, formed a circle, locked arms and threw necklaces of white flowers into the water.

"I hope the terrorists will think, feel and recognize what they did. I'm really upset," said Made Adiputra, 25, an Indonesian professional surfer. "I'm really sad. It's really awful to kill innocent people like that."

Crowds gaped at the wrecked restaurants Saturday as police lines were taken down and some nearby shops reopened.

With the second terror assault on the resort in three years, Balinese officials face a tough task of convincing foreign visitors that the island is a safe destination. The tourism industry is responsible for 85 percent of Bali's $1.5 billion annual economy.

Despite harsh laws, some gay Arabs come out

Still, arrest, torture are common

By Donna Abu-Nasr
Associated Press writer

BEIRUT, LEBANON — When Ahmad Mahfouz told his mother he is gay, she took him to a psychiatrist, thinking he had a disease that could be cured by antidepressants.

When that didn't work, she urged him to date a woman. He ignored her advice. "So now, whenever she sees me, she beats me with anything she can lay her hands on: a metal hanger, leather belt, her shoes."

The 19-year-old college student, a Lebanese Muslim, is unusual in his candor and willingness to be identified, though not photographed. But more Arabs are coming out as gays, or at least coming to terms with their sexuality, even though in some countries they face laws that can land them in jail, and extremists who beat them up because Islam condemns homosexuality.

On top of that, homosexuality is widely seen as a disease spread by the United States and Israel to corrupt Arabs and undermine their religious faith.

In Lebanon, gays can find refuge at the cramped, one-room office of Helem, which says it's the first Arab nongovernmental organization openly fighting for their rights. Helem was set up last year despite a vaguely worded law that punishes "unnatural sexual intercourse" with up to one year in jail.

Lebanon, with its mixed population of Muslims and Christians, has a history of religious pluralism and exposure to the West. But elsewhere, homosexuals are on their own.

Egyptian authorities use criminal articles against debauchery and prostitution to prosecute gays. They have entrapped, arrested and tortured hundreds of men thought to be gay, says a report by New York-based Human Rights Watch.

It says police agents snare gay men through Internet personal ads, and that at least 179 men have been prosecuted for debauchery since the start of 2001. Hundreds of others have been harassed, arrested and often tortured but not charged, it says.

Among them are 52 men rounded up in 2001 in a police raid on a boat-restaurant on the Nile and accused of taking part in a gay sex party. A court acquitted 29, 16 were convicted and freed pending their appeal, and a few were jailed for a year.

French President Jacques Chirac has expressed concern to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak about the treatment of gays, but the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights, the country's largest rights group, says homosexuality is so detested in Egypt that it cannot speak out against prosecutions of gay men.

A recent Egyptian news report posted by Al-Arabiya TV on its Web site described a Kuwaiti gay wedding party in Cairo and triggered hundreds of blistering messages. Some of them said insurgents in Iraq should be killing gays instead of innocent Iraqis.

Many claimed the United States and Israel were promoting homosexuality to strip Arab men of their manhood. Only a handful urged tolerance of homosexuality.

Whether the wedding took place is not clear. The story was detailed but didn't identify the hotel, and Egypt's attorney general, Maher Abdel Wahid, issued a statement saying no complaint was received and no investigation was ordered.

Saudi Arabia, which enforces a puritan Islamic code, also keeps gays under pressure, according to Human Rights Watch.

On March 10, it said, authorities detained more than 100 men at a party in the city of Jiddah, sentencing many of them in closed trials without legal counsel to up to two years in prison and 2,000 lashes, usually meted out 50 at a time depending on medical examinations.

Human Rights Watch said the offenses weren't spelled out, but a Saudi news report claimed the men allegedly were "dancing and 'behaving like women.'"

Last year another Saudi daily, the English-language Arab News, said 50 men were arrested for allegedly attending a gay wedding in the holy Muslim city of Medina.

Dalal al-Bizri, a Cairo-based Lebanese sociologist, says gays are more reviled than drug addicts "because homosexuality is seen as being exported to the region by a country whose armies and fleets have struck Arabs: the United States."

"It's also seen as a threat to an insecure Arab machismo that has been politically impotent and feels humiliated by its inability to do much for the Palestinians or Iraqis," she said.

In the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Palestinian vigilantes at one point were treating gays as unforgivingly as they do informers and drug or gun dealers.

This has even led to cases of Palestinian gays finding sanctuary in Israel, where homosexuality is tolerated.

Gay Palestinians have said it's easier to find common ground with Israeli counterparts because both can relate to being oppressed.

In June 2001, a handful of Palestinians joined thousands of Israelis in Israel's Gay Pride Day.

Homophobia forces many Arab gays to lead a double life, marrying and having children while secretly pursuing gay relationships.

But others, like Mahfouz in Lebanon, refuse to play along.

A slim man with dark hair, he says he is looking for a new place to live to escape his mother's wrath, her efforts to take away his cell phone, and her attempts to stop him from listening to music she believes made him gay.

"Until I leave, I am trying to placate her by pretending to date. The woman is a lesbian friend but my mother doesn't know it," he said with a smile.

Bilal Sharaf el-Din, a 21-year-old Lebanese studying information technology, said he has told friends and sisters, but not his mother, that he's gay. Shafar el-Din, a Muslim, said he knows homosexuality is a sin in Islam but that humans shouldn't be the judges.

"It should be done up there," he said, pointing to the sky. "Until the time comes, I will enjoy myself."

There have been no recent prosecutions of gays in Lebanon, but men have been beaten up for looking effeminate or fired for being gay, said Georges Azzi, a Christian and a gay who is the only paid employee at Helem, the rights center.

He said his group tries to raise awareness by speaking at colleges. There are more gay-friendly bars, and in May the International Day Against Homophobia was observed for the first time in Lebanon.

Helem marked the occasion with a gathering of about 200 people, straight and gay, at a seaside Beirut hotel. It screened "I exist," a documentary on homosexuals of Mideast background living in the United States, and distributed buttons and pamphlets with the slogan, "You drink coffee, I prefer tea. Does that mean one of us is abnormal?"

Helem also launched "Barra" (Out), billed as the first Arab gay magazine.

Lebanon even has male belly dancers. One of them is a slim, 23-year-old bisexual who identifies himself only as Teddy, his stage name.

Teddy says his insistence on leading a "normal life" has come at a price: "People look at me as if I have descended from Mars."

With elegant black pony tail, mascaraed lashes, pouty lips and manicured nails, he said demand for his dancing is strong, though. "Sometimes, at nightclubs, people spit at me or throw drinking glasses. I don't respond because I don't want to make an issue out of it."

Flood victims dig for dead

Mudslides kill more than 600 in Central America

By Mark Stevenson
Associated Press writer

SANTIAGO ATITLAN, GUATEMALA — Dozens of Mayan Indians used hand tools to dig through hardening mud on Saturday, searching for bodies under a landslide that swallowed a Guatemalan neighborhood and pushed the regionwide death toll from a week of pounding rains to 613.

Hardest hit was the lakeside town of Santiago Atitlan, where the side of a volcano collapsed, killing at least 208 people. Officials said the victims were among 508 people killed and another 337 missing in Guatemala.

The rest of the other 105 deaths were scattered throughout El Salvador, Mexico, Nicaragua, Honduras and Costa Rica.

The mud-spattered body of 3-year-old Mari Taxachoy Tzina was pulled Saturday from the home where she died. Her father, Gaspar, buried her in a common grave at the local cemetery.

"That's my wife, my two daughters, my son — I'm only missing one more son," he said, explaining how he had buried almost his entire family.

"You always think about saving your family, but I couldn't," said Gaspar, a laborer who returned from work in Guatemala City to find his house gone, replaced by a blank face of mud.

Guatemala has borne the brunt of heavy rains exacerbated by Hurricane Stan, which made landfall Tuesday on the Mexican Gulf Coast before quickly weakening to a tropical depression.

Governments in Central America and Mexico were still struggling Saturday to reach isolated areas devastated by flooding and landslides. Many roads had yet to be cleared.

On the banks of Lake Atitlan, a popular tourist destination, dozens of Mayan Indians swarmed over a vast bed of caked mud that covered trees and houses, looking for those still missing after Wednesday's landslide.

Primitive wooden coffins piled up in the cemetery, waiting for bodies. Villagers held sprigs of native herbs to ward off odors as they dug mass graves for bodies that likely would be buried without names.

"Entire families have disappeared," said Diego Sojuel, of the Santiago Atitlan municipal aid committee. "In some cases, there is no one that can identify the cadavers. And in other cases, it is because of the state of decomposition that we are going to have to bury them without names."

Tourists worked alongside local residents digging trenches 10-feet deep through mud strewn with bits of tin roofing, clothing, papers and bedding.

Chris Needham, 24, of London paused to wonder aloud whether some areas might eventually have to be declared a burial ground.

"That's people's families under there," he said. "They're not going to stop digging. I wouldn't stop."

Guatemalan officials organized an air-rescue squad of their own helicopters as well as those lent by the United States and neighboring Mexico, but bad weather has limited flights.

Colombia announced Saturday it will fly in 10 tons of food, cleaning materials and first-aid equipment to help victims in Central America and Mexico.

In Mexico, President Vicente Fox visited devastated southern Chiapas state and delivered aid to hundreds living in shelters. Some victims said they still had not heard from missing family members.

"I want them to look for my brother, Leonardo Maldonado, who is 27. He lives with us, but he went to work and I haven't heard anything from him," said Maria del Carmen, an evacuee.

In Guatemala, government workers have used heavy machinery to clear fallen trees and earth from the InterAmerican Highway. The country's important Pacific coast highway remained impassable, however, after raging rivers destroyed five bridges.

The disaster started gradually in communities ringing Lake Atitlan, where creeks and rivers began spilling their banks on Wednesday as rains soaked cornfields that climb steep, deforested hillsides.

Martin Ramirez Tacaxoy, 41, a farmer, said his sister came by to wake him up to tell him the nearby river was rising.

But because the continuing rains had been so gentle, many other people went back to sleep until the wall of earth came.

"It was a roar, it was like an earthquake," said Ramirez Tacaxoy, who pulled out three of his neighbors, some severally wounded from mud that had buried them, in some cases up to their necks. "Some people on the edges where able to grab hold of coffee trees, and we pulled them out. But many remained underneath."

Survivors struggled to describe the thunderous roar of the mud that buried entire families.

"I saw it coming. I leaned up against the wall," Pablo Gaspar, 16, a firewood collector, said, gasping on his hospital bed after being rescued from the muck. "Then the wall collapsed on me."

He lost six family members, including both his parents.

A woman is helped into a navy helicopter to be evacuated from a river Saturday in southern Mexico. Raging flood waters cut off large areas of Central America and southern Mexico, hurting efforts to rescue victims of mudslides that have killed more than 600 people.

Nothing's static for station

Natalia Gonzalez says she loves a challenge. It's a good thing she does. She became executive director of WRBH, 88.3 FM, on Sept. 1, three days after Hurricane Katrina knocked the station's transmitter off its foundation.

"Our primary transmitting building in Chalmette was devastated," she said. "It's going to take about $350,000 to get us back up to full capacity."

Still, Natalia is feeling optimistic as Radio for the Blind and Print Handicapped, the first station of its kind in the country, begins its 23rd year.

For one thing, she got a $20,000 grant from the Corporation for Public Broadcasting to buy a small transmitter, and for another, she got an offer she couldn't refuse.

"When the National Guard came in and said, 'We want to help you,' I took it as a sign from God we were supposed to come back," she said.

Opportunity knocks

Natalia was working at the station at 3606 Magazine St. on Tuesday when there was a knock at the door and a National Guardsman made the proposal: The Guard would help the station get up and running again if they could use it to do daily public service announcements to let people know what improvements are being made in different neighborhoods as residents move back into the city.

"I was like, 'Come on in. You betcha. This is great,'" Natalia said. So the National Guard will install the new transmitter on a tower in the nonprofit station's backyard, and WRBH will be soon be back in the business of turning the written word into the spoken word.

Because of the smaller transmitter, it won't be able to broadcast from Bay St. Louis to Baton Rouge like it did before Katrina, but it will provide a vital service for New Orleanians.

"It will be mostly within the city limits, but that's a start," Natalia said. "I'm hoping to be back on the air by Thursday."

Back to life

I was glad to hear it. The wonderful little radio station that runs on volunteers, loyal supporters and faith is an important asset to New Orleans.

"It won't be 24 hours a day at first," Natalia said. "We'll read the newspaper, some magazines, and start a good book for people to listen to while they're cleaning up."

The amount of time the station will be on the air will be determined by the number of readers Natalia can locate. She is eager to hear from volunteers and concerned about those she hasn't been able to find since the hurricane.

"We have a cast of characters who are near and dear to our hearts, and I'm really worried about some of them," she said.

She has already recruited some new readers, including members of the National Guard and her husband, Guy. And she can't wait to get WRBH back on the air.

"I'm really excited about it," she said. "New Orleans needs some CPR right now, and we can play a vital role in bringing it back to life."

Gambling plan a roll of the dice, some say

Announcement was a surprise to many

By Frank Donze
Staff writer

Mayor Ray Nagin's radical proposal to make more casino gambling in New Orleans a key component of the city's post-Katrina economic strategy got a chilly reception Saturday from several local officials, who questioned the timing and viability of an idea they said appears to have come out of nowhere.

Nagin caught much of the city's political establishment off guard Friday afternoon when he recommended the creation of a downtown gambling district that would allow more than a half-dozen large hotels to open gambling halls that would compete with the giant Harrah's casino at the foot of Canal Street.

"I'm not sure where this came from," said state Sen. Ed Murray, D-New Orleans, a Nagin legislative floor leader who said he learned of the casino initiative only hours before the mayor's announcement.

"But I definitely don't think this is the right time to discuss this. Gambling is a very, very divisive issue. And right now we need to spend all our time reaching consensus on how to rebuild our infrastructure, bring our people back home and offer incentives to businesses to get them up and running."

Before a discussion of more gambling begins, Murray said, city and state leaders must first sit down with

In addition to the Lower 9th Ward and Lakeview, another New Orleans community was devastated by Hurricane Katrina and subsequent floodwater: public housing.

The majority of New Orleans' public housing complexes, home to about 38,000 residents, were wrecked by varying degrees by Hurricane Katrina. B.W. Cooper and St. Bernard took on several feet of water. But even Iberville, near the French Quarter, is strewn and ruined with debris.

As public housing residents returned home in the past week, they found the complexes unlivable. While discussions about the future of the developments were under way in Baton Rouge and Washington, D.C., many of the residents have made their opinion known

Property tax relief is on the way

But how much is still undecided

By Matt Scallan and Gordon Russell
Staff writers

Property owners hit by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita will see some tax relief this year, but it's still unclear how much.

The state Tax Commission recommends that property affected by the storms be assessed at full value for the first eight months of the year, and perhaps a lesser value for the period after Katrina struck Aug. 29. But the elected assessors in the New Orleans area say that formula would put too much of a financial burden on homeowners.

"I'm inclined to have the damage reflected (in full) on the 2005 rolls in order to protect the property owner," Jefferson Assessor Lawrence Chehardy said.

Plaquemines Assessor Robert Gravolet said the normal rules of tax collection should not apply in the wake of a catastrophe such as Katrina.

Relief workers arrested in separate incidents

By Manuel Torres
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

St. Bernard Parish authorities say they have broken a theft ring and recovered at least $100,000 worth of goods taken from three Louisiana parishes and in Mississippi.

Officials said they also have arrested a Red Cross volunteer from South Carolina on charges of looting as well as a four-man crew hired to clean a bank flooded by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, after they tried to make it out of the parish with more than $2,000 in wrinkled bills and coins they found in the muddy bank. In a fourth case, two people were charged with stealing 10 bulletproof vests from a Chalmette business where sheriff's detectives have set temporary operations.

Did you hear the one about the 4,500-pound, 21-foot crocodile swimming through the flooded streets of New Orleans?

That's an urban myth. But a 3-foot long alligator in a Lakeview pool is the real deal, as displaced resident Warren Pope discovered Thursday when he returned home.

Pope, 43, arrived at his now-ruined, one-story brick home on St. Anthony Avenue to salvage some items when workers clearing debris from Hurricane Katrina told him, "Be careful, there's a gator back there." He walked into his back yard and found U.S. Humane Society rescuers trying to seize the swimming reptile.

"I came back here and they had a crowd of people," he said Friday, standing beside the stinky, muck-filled pool. Pope, a

This serval was taken to the Birmingham Zoo because of budget cutbacks at the Audubon Center for the Research of Endangered Species forced by Hurricane Katrina. s

Two endangered cranes were killed, and thousands of trees were felled by Hurricane Katrina at the Audubon Nature Institute's endangered species research center, but the wooded enclave in Algiers weathered the storm without other serious damage.

In some ways, nature may have helped protect it, center Director Betsy Dresser said.

The dense bottomland hardwood forest surrounding the center acted as a cushion against the storm's winds, she said.

Radar images show the hurricane's eye may have passed over the center. "I think the trees really buffered the buildings," Dresser said.

The Audubon Center for Research of Endangered Species, which has received international publicity for its work on animal cloning, housed about 350 animals as the storm approached, including lions, rare African antelopes and eight endangered whooping cranes, most of which rode out Katrina at the facility.

Of the center's 57 staff members, only eight, including Dresser, remained on duty Aug. 28, the day before Katrina hit, and they all evacuated that day, she said.

"They were saying it was a Category 5 storm," Dresser said.

"There was no way we could leave people here," she said. "I never thought I would totally evacuate everyone."

Dresser, however, said there were no plans to evacuate the animals. "It's hard to find places to evacuate them all to, and when you get threatened by these storms several times a year, you just can't do it," she said.

A domestic cat pregnant with the clone of a rare African sand cat was evacuated to the St. Louis Zoo, where its kitten was born dead.

"We don't know if it was the stress" of being moved, she said, "but you have to make those judgment calls and do the best you can."

Workers decided not to leave animals closed in several underground ammunition bunkers leftover from a World War II supply depot on the site, a plan that was once considered an option. Dresser and her staff weren't sure how soon they would be able to return, and they thought the animals would do better outside with plenty of food and water, she said.

"The animals did fine," she said.

The fenced enclosures for 40 endangered Mississippi sandhill cranes and eight whooping cranes contained dense natural vegetation that provided the birds with cover.

Another 19 Mississippi sandhill crane chicks, destined for placement in a national crane refuge in Mississippi, were left indoors.

One sandhill crane and one whooping crane apparently got tangled in fencing and died, but other animals, including 32 African eland; four bongos, a type of antelope; and a colony of 150 domestic cats used in the center's reproductive research, were unscathed.

Among Dresser's worries were seven lions.

"I didn't sleep," she said. "It's not knowing if they're all dead, or if there are lions out all over the place."

Relief came a couple of days after the storm.

Dresser arranged for animal keepers Jeff Vaccaro and Kelly Trimble to travel by helicopter from McComb, Miss., to the center. They landed on the Mississippi River levee Aug. 31 at dusk, she said.

"They made a beeline for the commissary," she said, which stored supplies and a gun and was the only facility they could reach through the fallen trees.

The next morning, a second helicopter picked up keepers Larry Drewett and Megan Lauber in Houma, and dropped them off after making an aerial survey that showed the lion house was intact.

Dresser said the four keepers immediately began clearing a path through the storm debris to the animals.

The center remained unreachable by road for two weeks because of downed trees and power lines, but it had at least a week's worth of food and water for animals and people, as well as a small generator, tree-clearing equipment and an emergency satellite telephone.

"That (phone) was a lifesaver," Dresser said. It allowed her to get twice-a-day updates from the keepers.

She said she also talked with other Audubon officials and zoos around the country in a daily conference call.

"Zoos and aquariums around the country were just wonderful," she said.

The president of the Houston Zoo enlisted the head of Shell Oil Co. to send more food and water by helicopter for the animals and workers halfway through the ordeal, she said.

"I think our keepers were about to cry when they saw the helicopters come in with all the supplies."

Since the storm, both the Audubon Zoo and the Audubon Aquarium of the Americas have closed, and revenue has stopped, Dresser said.

The research center has laid off 12 workers, and some animals have been temporarily transferred to other zoos to lighten the center's load. But Dresser had only praise for the center's staff.

"They did a phenomenal job," she said. "It showed me … the dedication and commitment they have."

Assessors want to use post-storm value for year

adjust the assessments and put as minimal a tax on the taxpayers, based on our assessment of their damages," Gravolet said.

Katrina wiped clean much of lower Plaquemines Parish. Gravolet said his hope is that affected taxpayers "would pay on the land and maybe a portion of their building, a slab or something. If they sign a homestead exemption, for all practical purposes they would probably pay nothing, which would be justified in most people's opinion."

The storm arrived at an awkward time in the property tax cycle. State law requires that tax rolls be opened for public inspection for 15 days ending on Sept. 15, in order for assessors to field complaints and consider adjustments before certifying the rolls as official later in the year. But most of the New Orleans area was under an evacuation order at the time, and Chehardy said state law does not address what happens during such an event.

"I think the law needs to be changed so that in the event of a disaster declaration, it's spelled out what should be done," he said.

State officials have given assessors in hurricane-affected parishes a 120-day extension to certify the tax rolls. But St. Tammany Assessor Patricia Schwarz Core said her office will have a tough time meeting that deadline.

"We're going to have a lot of people coming in to challenge their assessments," she said. "There are areas of Slidell that have been practically totaled."

Under normal circumstances, property taxes are due Dec. 31. But after the tax rolls are adjusted to reflect changes caused by Katrina and Rita, they must be reopened for public inspection and property owners must be given a chance to appeal the valuations – a process that could push the completion of the tax rolls into early next year. Assessors say residents seeking to change their property valuations should be prepared to document their damage.

Meanwhile, easing the tax burden on residents means squeezing off revenue for government services such as courts, police and fire protection, and code enforcement.

"I think the governments are just going to have to tighten their belts," Core said.

Assessors in coastal parishes have dealt with catastrophic storm damage before, a notable example being the May 8-9, 1995, flood. But they say a spring flood is easier to handle than a late summer hurricane because there is more time to adjust the tax rolls to account for the damage.

"In '95, we just asked people to document their damage, and we reduced their assessment by that amount," St. Charles Assessor Clyde "Rock" Gisclair said. "This time, it's harder to do that because it happened at the end of the tax year."

Adjusting the tax rolls for damage is a monumental task on a tight schedule. Chehardy said his deputies are canvassing the streets, but losses aren't always obvious from curbside, especially when they result from roof damage, rather than flooding.

"Those people are going to have to come in and show us what their damages were," Chehardy said.

Gravolet said last year's property taxes brought in about $38 million to Plaquemines. He said he wasn't ready to hazard a guess about this year's amount.

But Core said assessors in the affected parishes are united in their view that properties should be assessed for the full year at their post-Katrina value.

"How are these people going to pay these bills?" she asked. "A lot of them have lost their jobs as well as their homes. I think that if we give them some breathing room, they are going rebuild bigger and better. But if we hit them with a big tax bill, they're just going to stay in Florida or Texas."

retired New Orleans police sergeant, had watched as the alligator slipped through workers' noose-like snares.

The rescuers had brought a dog cage to house the gator. When they failed to catch him, they left pet food piled on a floating raft. Pope said he has no idea how the alligator wound up in his back yard.

"I'm telling you, it's not a pet," he said.

Pope marveled at the scene: A fallen tree's crown obscured the front edges of the pool, and a line with attached buoys lay partially sunken in the greenish, opaque water. The gator surfaced, got startled, and quickly submerged.

"I was swimming in this pool the Saturday night before Katrina," Pope said. "I feel like I'm looking for Nessie."

Noel Kinler, a Department of Wildlife and Fisheries biologist who leads the DWF's alligator management program, said it's normal to find displaced gators after a flood.

"Obviously, we've got gators all around New Orleans," he said. "It's not unlikely at all that one would show up."

The department has had recent reports of nuisance gators in the area of Pointe a la Hache, Buras and Venice, he said. The DWF program traps and releases gators that turn up in residential areas.

In the immediate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, rumors of marine creatures in the metropolitan area were rampant. On. Aug. 30, the Palm Beach Post reported Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard "told residents that at least one 3-foot shark had been spotted," though it's unclear who saw it.

A hoax that circulated on the Internet reported a 21-foot crocodile had been killed by Army troops and placed in the freezer of the "Azur hotel." Its stomach contents were to be analyzed, said the e-mail, which included frightening photos of the toothy monster.

But as rumor-busting Web site Snopes.com reported, the massive, 80-year-old crocodile had been caught in the Republic of Congo on July 6, 2003. The photos were authentic; the reports had been altered.

Pope, who now drives a taxi for United Cab Co., evacuated Aug. 28 and spent two weeks away, staying in Alexandria, Little Rock, Ark., and Asheville, N.C. He returned about three weeks after Katrina hit, borrowed a boat he found at the nearby University of New Orleans, and checked on his house.

"It looked like a swamp," he said. About 6.5 feet of floodwater still stood around his home at the time. "I didn't even know where I was."

Pope left again and stayed outside Gatlinburg, Tenn. When he returned to his house at 6049 St. Anthony on Wednesday, he didn't look in the back yard. "I looked at the house, got disgusted and left," he said.

The flood damaged much of his home and his possessions, but he maintained his sense of humor. Looking around the dead, mud-caked grass, he said, "On the plus side, I don't have to mow the lawn for a few weeks."

He and his girlfriend have been staying at her apartment in Metairie. He hasn't named his new tenant, whom he would like to evict. "I'd like to get him out," he said. "He's got to be hungry."

Parish checkpoint helped detectives

said the detectives' busy week began Tuesday, when they began unraveling a criminal ring that eventually led authorities to $100,000 worth of vehicles, welding equipment, jet skis, a gun and other goods thought to have been stolen from St. Bernard, Orleans and Tammany parishes and from locations in Mississippi.

Maj. John Doran, chief of detectives for the St. Bernard Parish Sheriff's Office, said the arrests were made after a detective working a checkpoint on Paris Road became suspicious of two Walker men trying to exit the parish in separate vehicles, one pulling a trailer with a four-wheel all-terrain vehicle.

Doran said one of the men fled when deputies questioned him, but he was caught. Deputies then discovered the all-terrain vehicle had been stolen in St. Bernard and booked Tony Licciardi, 31, and John Fontenot, 21, with looting and simple burglary, Doran said.

Doran said both men had entered the parish pretending to be contract workers for the Federal Emergency Management Agency and bearing old St. Bernard Parish drivers licenses.

Upon further questioning, the men led detectives to others authorities say were involved in the ring. Eventually, in conjunction with the FBI, officials said they recovered most of the stolen goods at a trailer park near Picayune, Miss. A resident there, Marvin Kritzmann Jr., 30, was arrested as a principle to looting and burglary, Doran said.

An arrest warrant was issued for Danny Brown, 35, formerly of St. Bernard Parish but most recently living in the Picayune area, Doran said. Warrants also were issued for Brown's brother, Oscar Brown, and Marvin

'Do we rebuild as is, or do we do something different?'

HOUSING, from B-1

by packing up and leaving for good.

"Never," said Rashad Brooks, 29, inside what was once home to his fiancée and three small children inside the B.W. Cooper apartments. "I'm through with New Orleans. Too much corruption and too much politics. We're moving to Houston."

The Housing Authority of New Orleans, which relocated to Houston after the storm, says it is assessing damage and has transplanted thousands of its New Orleans tenants to Texas. And federal officials said the first priority is to decide exactly how to rebuild public housing in New Orleans.

"The big question is: Do we rebuild as is, or do we do something different?" said Alphonso Jackson, secretary of the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, which took over management of HANO three years ago.

Mayor Ray Nagin said he'd like to see public housing complexes rebuilt and "de-densified," with tenants comprising a mixture of income levels, along the lines of the rebuilt St. Thomas complex. He said he has gotten positive signals from Jackson.

"In talking with the secretary, he's basically committed to me that we're going to take a look at just about every project that was on the drawing board and try and accelerate it," Nagin said.

Donna White, a HUD spokeswoman, said that teams of HANO staffers and consultants to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency are in the process of inspecting the various complexes to determine whether they're safe to inhabit.

Residents are not allowed to enter the developments until it's deemed safe, she said.

Options for rebuilding

White said that it was too early to give a full assessment of the damage to the various complexes, although all 10 received some damage, she said. But she said that Florida and Desire, both recently redeveloped and both located in the devastated Lower 9th Ward, both sustained "severe" damage from floodwater and wind.

Jackson caused a stir when he recently told the Houston Chronicle that he wasn't sure the Lower Ninth Ward should be rebuilt. Jackson, who is black, also said New Orleans was "not going to be as black as it was for a long time, if ever again."

The comments were interpreted by some as a suggestion that much of New Orleans' public housing — which was home to between 5 percent and 10 percent of the city's residents, nearly all of them black — would be torn down.

Others weren't so subtle.

Days after the deadly storm, 10-term Congressman Richard Baker, R-Baton Rouge, was overheard telling lobbyists in Washington, D.C., "We finally cleaned up public housing," adding that, "We couldn't do it, but God did."

Baker later said he was misquoted, and that he meant that the complexes needed fixing.

In an interview with The Times-Picayune, Jackson said no decisions like that have been made — even for the Lower 9th. In fact, he suggested that those areas may indeed return.

"The question for the 9th Ward is: Should we rebuild the same way we did last time?" Jackson said. "Or should we rebuild at a higher level?"

Public housing in New Orleans was already in the midst of a huge transition. New Orleans had hit a stride in tearing down the relics of bricked, densely populated complexes and replacing them with "mixed-income" neighborhoods, such as the flagship example River Garden, which sits where the St. Thomas complex once did, complete with a new Wal-Mart off Tchoupitoulas Street. Major changes were also happening at the former Desire complex.

The federal government recently invested $70 million in redeveloping the Desire public housing complex in the Lower 9th Ward. 'It was beautiful, but it's gone now,' said Alphonso Jackson, secretary of the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. 'What do we do there?'

"We put $70 million into Desire," Jackson said. "It was beautiful, but it's gone now. What do we do there? How do we do Iberville? Lafitte? Do we take those down and rebuild them? Are we going to integrate public housing into the fabric of the city, which we didn't do the first time?"

Surveying the damage

Now the brand new Desire complex - renamed Abundance Square - sits in utter desolation. A desert of drying, cracked sludge covered the lawns and streets, but not a soul was present Friday afternoon. Several of the units were obviously vacant before the storm. The only sound echoing through the once manicured lawns was the rustling of twisted window blinds.

But thousands of New Orleans families still called the traditional public housing — such as Cooper, off Earhart Boulevard; Iberville, which borders the French Quarter and housed a number of hotel and restaurant workers; and C.J. Peete, in Central City — home.

And as Uptown and French Quarter residents came back to survey the damage, so did the residents of the public housing complexes.

Over at Cooper, Brooks returned and said his last memories of his neighborhood will be the harrowing seven days his family, including his fiancée's wheelchair-bound father, spent trapped in their flooded apartment building.

They slept on the third-floor fire escape or near the open windows because of the heat. They shook flashlights at rescuers to no avail. They watched the water rise and swallow up cars.

A police officer with a canoe finally rescued them, Brooks said, after they watched helicopters pass them by for days.

At the Lafitte complex, in Mid-City, Rose Taylor's family helped her move out of her apartment on Friday. After five years at the complex, Taylor, 43, said she and her two teenage daughters are happier in Irving, Texas.

"They got a good school system out in Texas," she said, as her relatives nodded in agreement.

'What's to come back for?'

After riding out the storm at the St. Bernard complex and evacuating by boat, then spending a month at the Holiday Inn in Houston, the Phillips family also returned Friday to pack up their things into the back of a Budget rental truck. Kimani and Terrance Phillips wore yellow plastic gloves and face masks, just like their mother, Lynette Phillips, and her boyfriend, Dewayne Clark, as they cleaned up.

Apartment E was where Kimani, 12, and his 16-year-old brother, Terrance, had lived since birth. The brothers' first task on Friday was burying their golden retriever, Kobe, in a HANO Dumpster. They found him dead on the living room rug, which they used to wrap up the carcass.

"What's to come back for?" Terrance asked, surveying the St. Bernard complex from the back of his family's rental truck. "It's quiet. Ain't nobody coming back."

His younger brother agreed.

"I miss my project," Kimani said. "The 7th Ward. I miss my hometown. I don't want to come back. I didn't want to leave until she came, Katrina."

Barbara Cager, 52, also returned on Friday. Cager, who has been staying in a Baton Rouge hotel, said she would like to return to New Orleans, but not exactly to the St. Bernard.

"I think this should have been torn down a long time ago," Cager said of the housing complex. "Too much crime."

For those like Cager who want to return, the future of low-income housing may be in trailer parks, provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The first of which, outside of Baton Rouge in rural Baker, is in the process of filling up. As of Saturday, only 43 families had occupied some of the 573 trailers available, though FEMA said it has a list of 400 families ready to move in. In Louisiana, an additional 1,740 trailers have been set up at other locations across the state, with 786 occupied.

Looking to Congress

To a large degree, what Jackson and HUD do about public housing will depend on Congress, which appropriates money to the department. It's likely that the agency will receive a massive infusion of cash: In the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, for instance, between $3 billion and $4 billion was inserted into HUD's budget to help rebuild lower Manhattan.

The money was spent in a variety of ways: $700 million went into a commercial revitalization program, while another large sum was spent on creating affordable housing.

HUD officials said they expect Congress to authorize a similar rebuilding plan for New Orleans, although they did not speculate on the size of the appropriation.

It will be up to local government officials — who must hold public hearings — to come up with a spending plan.

"President Clinton ... we were talking, and he was telling me about a school model in North Carolina where they have great success," Nagin said. "One thing they did is mixed kids of different income levels. And the poor kids performed as well as everybody else. And I think with New Orleans going forward, that model works. Let's not concentrate all poor, all rich."

But for now, public housing residents must find someplace to live, and for many of them, that someplace is not New Orleans.

On Gibson Street, Nick Lewis, 29, said goodbye to his childhood home, the St. Bernard complex.

"That's a wrap right here," Lewis said, as his neighbor continued to pack up his things. "This is it."

representatives of Harrah's, the former Bally's casino on the lakefront and the Fairgrounds, which has horse racing and is approved for slot machines under its new owner, Churchill Downs. Murray said all three entities "have made substantial investments in our community."

City Councilman Jay Batt said while he is willing to give Nagin an opportunity to sell the idea, he is not inclined to support it.

"The devil is in the details," Batt said. "But at first glance it would concern me greatly because I think multiple casinos might have the effect of damaging the character and culture of our city."

Batt said his biggest worry is that many locals, particularly the poor, would "put all their money back into these casinos." Batt noted that in the Bahamas, residents are prohibited by law from gambling in the island nation's three casinos.

"There are other ways to rebuild our city," he said. "This could be a recipe for disaster."

Councilman Eddie Sapir, who has criticized Nagin for failing to keep the legislative branch of city government informed since Katrina devastated the city six weeks ago, said he learned of the mayor's plan from the evening news.

"No one with the administration made any mention whatsoever about this to me," Sapir said, even though he sat through an all-day informational session with Nagin staffers on Thursday at City Hall.

"I really can't say what I think because I don't know much about it," Sapir said.

A Harrah's spokeswoman said her company also received no advance notice of Nagin's proposal.

"We certainly would have preferred that the mayor talk to us before he went to the press given that we have the exclusive right to operate a land-based casino in New Orleans," said Jan Jones, senior vice president for governmental relations and communications for Harrah's Entertainment.

If the agreement giving Harrah's monopoly status is violated, the company would no longer have to pay the $60 million-plus in taxes it remits to the state annually.

While Jones said Harrah's is willing to discuss the idea of multiple casinos, she said it is premature to talk about what kind of concessions the company might seek. "We think everyone needs to give thoughtful consideration to making the right decision, not just a decision," she said.

On Friday, Nagin described his proposal as an outside of the box plan designed to spark the city's shattered economy.

Under the plan, only hotels with at least 500 rooms would be eligible to build casinos. Hotels that converted to casinos would have to offer all forms of gambling, not just slots, and would have to agree to pay wages of at least $8 an hour, plus health insurance and benefits.

In a city that already offers slots, video poker, lotteries and horse racing, Nagin has said he doesn't see how more casinos would drastically alter the city's image.

Lambert Boissiere Jr., a former state senator and City Council member who played a key role in opening the downtown casino during his City Hall tenure, said he found it curious that Nagin would lay out his vision for an expansion of gambling even before a blue ribbon mayoral commission charged with mapping out a plan for rebuilding New Orleans holds its first meeting.

"It certainly looks like he's setting the commission's agenda," said Boissiere, who was recently elected 1st City Court constable.

"The mayor may be jumping the gun. I thought he wanted this committee to come up with its own recommendations," Boissiere said. "It seems contradictory to give them this assignment and then before they even sit in a room together, you suggest this."

Boissiere said the city must be careful not to scare away other businesses, including those interested in the burgeoning medical research sector, that might be interested in taking part in the rebuilding of New Orleans.

Bernard Charbonnet, a member of the New Orleans Dock Board, said the city's decision to pursue any new industry must take into consideration the city's working poor.

'We have to be careful not to revert to what we had before with our tourism-driven economy, which was essentially a servant class," Charbonnet said, noting the large percentage of the city's population that works for the low-paying service industry.

"That has to be a big part of any discussion we have about jump starting our economy."

Keith Butler, an investment banker and New Orleans native who now splits his time between his hometown and New York City, said he is willing, for now, to give Nagin the benefit of the doubt.

"I think the mayor is showing leadership" Butler said. "And I also think he is sending a signal to his commission about the fast tempo he'd like to see things done. This can be done fairly quickly and he's suggesting that he'd like this done quicker rather than slower."

If Nagin's plan moves forward, Butler said it would make sense for the city to replicate the jobs profile used in Las Vegas.

'There are more rungs to the salary ladder in a hotel that has a casino than a stand-alone hotel," Butler said.

"Also, under the system of neighborhood (riverboat) casinos we have here, that focuses largely on residents, there is no big money coming into the community. As I understand the mayor's plan, it would focus on tourists."

More arrests made Thursday, Friday

THEFT, from B-2

Kritzmann Sr., both of Mississippi, Doran said.

The week's second looting case came Thursday, Cannizaro said, when deputies patrolling a Chalmette neighborhood stopped a vehicle driven by Red Cross volunteer Marcus Wood, 38, of South Carolina. Cannizaro said Wood said he was in the area delivering meals, but a female passenger, whose identity is not being released, told deputies that Wood had been entering homes and taking property.

Wood was booked with looting, though Cannizaro said deputies did not recover any stolen property in Wood's vehicle.

More arrests were made Friday, when deputies stopped the vehicle of a North Carolina work crew along a parish highway. The four men had been cleaning the building of a Regions Bank branch at the intersection of St. Claude and Friscoville avenues, Cannizaro said. In a search of the car, deputies said they found a bag with more than $2,000 in bills and coins that the workers had recovered in the bank.

Booked with theft were Juan Guzman Cota, 21, Jesus Antonio Rubiro, Emeteryu Solano Brakamonte, 45, and Fermin Serelo, 34, all from the Winston-Salem area.

The same day, deputies arrested two men accused of stealing 10 bulletproof vests from Associated Terminals in Chalmette, where detectives have been operating since Katrina hit, Doran said.

Thai Richard, 26, of Lockport, was booked with possession of stolen property and Jacob Lagman, 19, of Chalmette, was booked with theft. Both were Associated Terminals employees, authorities said.

From the pews, different takes on religion and casinos

Mississippi recovery opens up debate

By Matt Apuzzo
Associated Press writer

BILOXI, MISS. — In the churches that minister in the shadows of Biloxi's tattered casinos, religious opposition to gambling is colliding with the region's economic reality.

Mississippi is considering allowing its coastal casinos to rebuild on land, a move that would help repair the state's $2.7 billion gambling industry following Hurricane Katrina. But while pastors and politicians in the state capital haggle over slots and sinning, many in the pews here have a pressing concern: survival.

"We have a lot of casino workers here and we don't take a stand. It's all about jobs," said Ersell Mason, a deacon at the Lighthouse Apostolic Holiness Church, the remains of which sit just up the street from many of the region's casinos. "God wants you to come to him and be a Christian. You can still do your job and come to him."

Some state lawmakers made God a player in the debate last week over the legislation that would allow the coastal casinos, currently restricted to barges, to creep 800 feet on shore. Supporters say that would give them more stability in storms, but opponents worry it would be a foothold for inland gaming.

State Rep. Deryk Parker, a Democrat whose Lucedale district is more than an hour northeast of the coast, held up a hand-lettered sign during hearings last week reading "casino" with the letters "sin" written in red.

"Ladies and gentlemen, this is my Mississippi, too," he said. "And I don't want that type of reputation for my state, for me or my children."

The House narrowly passed the legislation last week; debate on the bill is expected to resume Monday afternoon in the Senate. It would expand a 1990 state law that authorized casinos while restricting them to the waters of the Gulf of Mexico or the Mississippi River.

With a membership that includes about 25 percent of the state's population, the Mississippi Baptist Convention is one of the most powerful anti-casino forces in the state. About 50 Baptist pastors from across the Mississippi converged last week on the Capitol in Jackson, urging legislators not to allow casinos on land.

That message was repeated Sunday at the First Baptist Church in Gulfport, which normally holds services just blocks from the casinos but had to move to the local high school after the hurricane.

D. Saxon, 77, of Gulfport, said he wanted to see gambling eliminated from the community. But he acknowledged that many in the church survived off the casinos, either by working for them or by working in related industries that benefit from the tourism.

"As long as it's legal, it's an honest living," said Saxon.

Fellow church-goer Tommy Truhett said the region would find other, better work if the casinos left.

"The answer to our problems is not the gambling. The answer to our problem is not the politicians," Truhett said. "The Lord is the answer."

At the Vietnamese Martyrs Church in Biloxi's Point Cadet neighborhood, where nearly half the Catholic parishioners work in the casinos, the answer is different.

"Casinos, that gives us jobs," said Jackie Trieu, whose daughter started work at a casino just days before the storm. "If they rebuild, it's going to give everybody jobs again."

Her 21-year-old daughter, Angela, said it's unfair to bring God into the debate in Jackson.

"I don't think they should have a say," she said. "They have jobs up there. They're not down here."

Waveland's wiped-out workers still on job

'I think we've cried all we can'

By Holbrook Mohr
Associated Press writer

WAVELAND, MISS. — Police Chief James Varnell and a dozen officers clung to a bush outside the police station when Hurricane Katrina pushed in a wall of water that swept away patrol cars like they were toys.

"We lost everything," Varnell said.

Like many towns along the Gulf Coast, Waveland had no way to respond after Hurricane Katrina because the storm had swept away all its vehicles: police patrol cars, fire engines and heavy equipment.

Firefighters had no body bags, no way to transport the dead, and nowhere to take them. They had to search for victims on foot and resorted to using bicycles.

"We went from two stations with all new equipment to nothing in eight hours," Waveland Fire Chief David Garcia said.

Even a month after the storm, Garcia shares the bay of his fire station with the mayor's office, which set up shop at two small tables.

"You have to laugh at it," Garcia said, pointing to a sign on one of the desks that said mayor's office and city hall. "I think we've cried all we can."

A spokesman for the National Association of Police Organizations, John Terrill, said every coastal town in Mississippi lost vehicles, along with most parishes around New Orleans.

"Especially in New Orleans, Gulfport and Waveland, these guys are on the job and they're living in cars because they have nothing left," Terrill said. "But they are still out their helping people, and that really shows the character of these people in uniform."

Officials in Biloxi say about a third of its police fleet, or 17 cars, was either destroyed or damaged. The city lost two pumper trucks that were in service, two spares and five staff vehicles.

Pascagoula lost a "substantial number" of its police cruisers, but officials have not yet put a number on it, police Capt. Jamie Hunter said.

One Pascagoula officer pulled his police motorcycle into the department's lobby so dispatchers would have a radio after their emergency generator was destroyed.

Varnell, who now runs his police department from the parking lot of the station, said guns, computers and even uniforms were lost. All but three of his 27 employees, including himself, lost their homes.

"But we did what we had to do," he said.

"WE BUILD A BETTER MORTGAGE"

A worker sweeps up at Beau Rivage in Biloxi. Hurricane Katrina sent a 27-foot wave crashing through the heart of the $800 million hotel and casino. Repairs may take up to 16 months to complete.

Casino 'family' coping together

Beau Rivage workers share woes

By Vicki Smith
Associated Press Writer

BILOXI, MISS. — Mike Davis wipes the sweat from his brow, replaces his ball cap and steps into the shade of a tent in the parking lot of the once lavish Beau Rivage Casino. It's only 10 a.m., but the sun is beating down, the pavement heating up.

Davis, who was an executive here before Hurricane Katrina, scans the chairs, sees a woman sitting alone, asks how she is.

"Sit down," she invites. These days, everyone wants to share their story. It's a connection, part of the healing. When people say they need two minutes, they really need 10.

The woman is the wife of a security guard Davis has never met. But leaning in close, he peers into the screen of her digital camera. She wants to show him the 300-year-old oak the hurricane blew into her driveway, to tell him about the wind, the rain, the mud.

"I'm so sorry. I wish there was something I could say," he says. "At least we're still here."

Davis lost nearly everything in his home on Heron Bayou in Ocean Springs, but he can't bear to spend the day cleaning it. Here, he can be of use. Here, he can flash a smile, offer a hug, point someone to the right relief tent.

"As soon as we opened up, it meant something," he says. "We were doing something to heal our community."

A community is how he and others see the casino crew, before and since the storm.

Some 3,400 people worked at the Beau Rivage, the posh sister to The Bellagio in Las Vegas and the biggest of 13 casino properties on the coast. Katrina sent a 27-foot wave crashing through the heart of the $800 million Beau, putting them all out of work in one awful moment.

MGM Mirage, the owner, committed to rebuilding the Beau Rivage a week after the storm. It's paying employees for 90 days and helping them find work. While other casinos stand dark and empty, the Beau is alive with hundreds of people coming for paychecks and medical care, towels and toiletries _ or just a chance to visit.

"We talked about bringing in grief counselors, but after the first day or so, we realized we could get through it together," Davis says. "We were a close community before, and this has just made us closer."

Relations within the community have changed, though. Davis was once assistant director of convention sales, a 38-year-old, clean-shaven executive who moussed his hair, dressed in a suit and spent his mornings in an air-conditioned office calling clients. Now, he wears a goatee and sunglasses with his T-shirt and shorts.

He fetches a bottle of water for an overheated housekeeper, then Saltines for an older woman feeling queasy. He loads cases of water onto a dolly for a woman who used to make the coffee.

They are people he would never meet, never speak to, never wait on. But that was before Katrina, the storm that, at least for a while, made class irrelevant: Rich and poor alike were left without power, telephones and running water. Everyone had to scramble for food, for gas, for help.

"I'm out here sweating every day, trying to get everything going, and the people who are ordinarily here sweating all day are strolling in all cool at 9:30," Davis says. "I think it's the coolest thing in the world."

At first, he didn't know how many co-workers had survived Katrina, but each day he sees another face and his world grows a little bigger.

Davis wanders off to the job opportunity tent, figuring he needs to show his face so he can be rehired a year from now, or whenever the casino reopens. But in less than two minutes, he's rushing off to help someone else.

"I don't know if I'm getting paid or not getting paid. But it doesn't matter," he says. "It's therapeutic."

The Beau Rivage is paying 120 people to write relief checks for the American Red Cross. Besides giving the charity a much-needed source of labor, this arrangement shortens lines for the casino workers and others on the receiving end.

One such person, an elderly man in a polo shirt and woven hat, sits down across from Sherry O'Brien, who was, until the storm, a blackjack dealer on the graveyard shift.

She checks the cheat sheet she has scrawled on the linen tablecloth _ $360 for one person, $665 for a family of two, and so on _ and writes him a check for the proper amount.

"I'm doing something to help. And it really does," she says. "This is something concrete."

O'Brien turned 41 on Sept. 1, three days after Katrina. Everyone forgot her birthday.

She grows sad thinking about it, then shakes herself back to reality. Though many friends and several relatives lost their homes in the storm, O'Brien's Biloxi apartment was unscathed.

It's a bit crowded now for her and 12-year-old son, Blake. Her pregnant 20-year-old daughter, Ashley, has moved in, along with fiance Chris Gruich, their dog Jack and squirrel Chino. Overnight, the housing market vanished, and the young couple couldn't find a place to rent.

"I've lived here all my life, and all the historic buildings I've known all my life are just gone. The Gulfport I've always known, it's going to be starting all over," O'Brien says. "It's just so sad to see some people leaving to start new lives, and you wonder if they're ever going to come back."

Sometimes, she thinks, she hasn't suffered enough. She listens to strangers' stories and tries to be vague when asked how she fared.

Writing checks eases the guilt.

"Everything's changing," she says, thinking about the $53,000 a year she made dealing cards and the $8 an hour she now earns. "I have to learn to live on a whole different budget. But we'll make it.

"Sometimes you just realize how short life is," she says. "You should go home every day and hug your children because you just don't know what's going to happen."

Tonight, she will take her children to their favorite Mexican restaurant, among the first in Gulfport to reopen. They will wait a while to be seated, surrounded by workers who have come to rebuild the coast, then Ashley will order her usual _ queso dip and an enchilada burrito, no beef. It is a treat no one takes for granted anymore.

"This is a life-changing event for all of us," O'Brien says.

She feels the magnitude most of all when she's driving, seeing the scale of the destruction.

That's also when it hits Mike Davis.

It's afternoon now, and he has been picking his way along the Biloxi beachfront in his Toyota 4-Runner.

There are not words for what lies in ruins: The Broadwater Hotel, where he first worked after high school. The shell of The President casino, now resting a half-mile from its site on the wrong side of the street. Battered Beauvoir, the estate of Confederate President Jefferson Davis.

He's joined now by Alice El-Hamaki, ordinarily the Beau Rivage director of housekeeping. The drive shakes them, and after getting out of the truck, they hug _ and together they cry.

El-Hamaki remembers a game she played with her daughter, counting motels with the name "inn" between Biloxi and her home in Bay St. Louis. There were about 20, she recalls. Now, there are none.

"I wasn't prepared for that driving down the beach," Davis says. "I expected the debris, but there's not a house, a business that's still standing for miles."

After helping set up a Red Cross distribution center outside a damaged movie theater, sweeping broken glass while others erect tents, Davis is back in the truck _ and soon snarled in knots of traffic on Interstate 10 to Ocean Springs. Ordinarily, it is a 20-minute drive. Today, it takes 90.

His old self would have been tense. Even angry. But lines have become a way of life.

Finally, Davis is home. He walks into his house to find friends have ripped out the soggy drywall. The water-logged ceiling sags, and in some spots it has collapsed. It looks better, he thinks.

The first two days here were far worse. Davis and wife, Dina, were cleaning out their office when they discovered scrapbooks and photo albums, left behind when they fled the storm, were ruined. So was the baby book for 6-year-old son Trevor.

"You don't have to lose your entire home to be devastated," Davis says.

Tonight, as they will every night for the next few months, Davis and his wife will sleep in an old, borrowed bed at their best friends' home. Trevor sleeps in the same room, on a futon.

"Work is easy to go to," Davis says. "This is hard because this is real."

Family regrets leaving elderly relative behind

Nursing home patient dies after evacuation

By Gillian Flaccus
Associated Press writer

NEW ORLEANS — As Hurricane Katrina swirled toward land, Viola King fretted about her 100-year-old mother, helpless and bedridden at the Lafon Nursing Home.

She agonized for days. Should she bring her mom along on an 18-hour drive to Houston? Or should she leave her at the home, in New Orleans, where the staff said they would move fragile patients to safety on the second floor?

She opted to leave Rosalie Daste where she was. But a day after Katrina passed, a levee broke near the home in the eastern part of the city, and King immediately regretted her decision.

She watched from afar as floodwaters swamped the city. She imagined her mother sitting quietly in a corner as the water rose. She pictured her waiting patiently, confused about why no one came to change her diaper, scared because King wasn't there to feed her dinner.

More than anything else, King said, she was upset that her mother might think she was alone.

"She might have been off somewhere in a corner, because she was not the kind of person who would demand attention," King said. "I was afraid that she would just sit there and go unfed."

King kept a sleepless vigil in Houston, overwhelmed by feelings of powerlessness and guilt and remorse at the decision she had made — emotions that plague her still, more than a month later.

The plight of the elderly is among the most disturbing stories to emerge from the wreckage of Katrina. At least 140 elderly patients in New Orleans nursing homes and hospitals died in the storm and its aftermath; dozens more who were living independently may have perished.

In some cases, elderly patients too sick to move were abandoned by caretakers too frantic to save them. In others, older residents were stranded for days in floodwaters with no food and water. Those who were rescued often were deposited alone in shelters or faraway hospitals with no identification or medical records.

In the chaos of the storm's aftermath, their horrified relatives watched from afar. There was no way of knowing what had happened to their loved ones.

In Houston, Viola King was riveted by televised scenes of hurricane victims plucked from roofs by helicopters or hacked out of attics. The family searched the news for signs of a rescue at Lafon; they imagined Daste suffering on the second floor of the home as the temperature rose and drinking water ran out.

Desperate for news and frantic to alert officials to the patients trapped at Lafon, Daste's family worked around the clock for three days, posting inquiries on Web sites and calling repeatedly on phone lines that didn't work.

Then, there was relief. The patients had been rescued by buses.

The family's jubilance did not last long. Daste's granddaughter, Jelynne LeBlanc Burley, an assistant city manager in San Antonio, Texas, spent all night on the phone trying to find her, only to learn that her grandmother hadn't made it on the first bus — and the second bus turned around after the driver was spooked by a large explosion.

Finally, the great news: Daste was alive. She had been evacuated on another bus and airlifted to a hospital somewhere in the Southeast.

With no contact from Lafon, the family called hospitals in seven cities in six states, at one point keeping a nurse in Nashville on the line for 4 1/2 hours as she tried to help them. They dispatched Daste's great-grandson to military bases around Houston where C-130 planes landed; they had heard that Daste had been flown out on a C-130.

"No one contacted us, and we weren't able to reach any state agency or any official of any kind," King said. "I cannot describe in words the kind of frustration and anxiety we felt."

Rosalie Daste wasn't always so helpless. For most of her long life, she was the touchstone for three generations, pushing and pulling her children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren along until they met her impossibly high standards.

She had the equivalent of an eighth-grade education and worked a series of menial jobs as a cafeteria worker and a maid at Gulf States Energy, now Entergy.

But when her husband died in 1950, Daste took over his Baton Rouge grocery store and managed eight rental properties — including a 16-apartment complex and a coin-operated laundry — while raising four children alone.

No one in Daste's family ever wanted to put her in a nursing home. But as she aged, the world began to close in on her.

She watched three of her four children — two daughters and one son — die before her. Then her bones began giving out: She fractured a hip, then her pelvis, then a vertebra.

About four years ago, she began to forget family names. She would leave the stove on.

At first, King tried to let her live independently, moving her into an apartment next door to where she lived with King's mother-in-law. Then King herself moved in and alternated weeks lifting and feeding her mother with a 24-hour hired nurse.

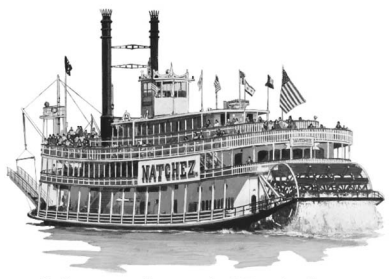
In 2001, the burden was too much. King checked her mother into Lafon, a Catholic facility.

The home where King put her mother is now a wreck.

Twenty-two bodies were found there as the waters pulled back, the spots marked with red spray paint. Some were wrapped in sheets in the chapel; others were sprawled in hallways, near elevators and in community rooms. Some relatives still haven't found the remains of patients who died there.

State Attorney General Charles Foti has launched an investigation into the deaths at Lafon.

Rosalie Daste was not among those who perished at Lafon. Marcia Galatas, a granddaughter, finally tracked her to St. Francis Medical Center in Monroe two weeks after Katrina.



Daste was dying. She had water in her lungs, she was in kidney failure caused by severe dehydration and she had a bacterial infection in her blood.

King and Galatas drove through the night from Houston, arriving at her bedside around noon on Labor Day. What they saw shocked them: Daste was covered in bruises, her veins bulged and the skin had been torn from her elbows.

She died eight hours later.

King isn't sure Daste knew her daughter and granddaughter were there. She hopes so.

"I apologized to her first, and I asked for her forgiveness. She held my hand and seemed to respond to my presence," King said.

'Brightest' evacuees weigh options

Creative minds finding opportunities elsewhere

By Rebecca Mowbray
Business writer

Like many displaced New Orleanians, Sheryl Smith and her husband, Clint, have some big decisions ahead of them.

Sheryl Smith, a lifelong New Orleanian now in Houston, wanted to return home, but her house on St. Roch Avenue fared poorly in the floodwaters of Hurricane Katrina. Clint Smith, a lawyer for a small technology company in New Orleans, also hoped to return home. They miss the rituals of life in New Orleans: going to Mass, finding pickled meat in the red beans, shopping at neighborhood markets.

"There are all those little things, those really uniquely New Orleans things," she said.

In the meantime, they feel their roots starting to sink into Houston. Sheryl Smith, an anesthesiologist, has received several job offers. Her three children, who attended Lusher and Ben Franklin schools in New Orleans, ended up at a prestigious international school in Houston, where they're mingling with children of oil executives and diplomats from all over the world. Her kids, all soccer players, were fascinated to discover that Homecoming at the international school revolves around a soccer game. And they've been quick to make friends: When Hurricane Rita threatened, a family from the school invited the Smiths to evacuate with them to their ranch in Texas' Hill Country.

Sheryl Smith still hopes to return home with her children after the school year, but she admits that no decision has been made. "For right this second, I don't have an immediate plan to return home," she said. "I'm just hoping that we'll just bide our time and it will be revealed to us what path we'll take."

Those with skills can move

Although a fair amount of attention has been given to the notion that many of the city's poorer residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina may not return, some believe that people like the Smiths and other bright, entrepreneurial, creative people may not return either. No one knows, of course, because nothing quite like Katrina has happened before in the United States, but generally, those with the most education and resources tend to be the most mobile.

"It's usually the best and the brightest (who relocate)," said William H. Frey, a visiting scholar at the Brookings Institution and demographer at the University of Michigan Population Studies Center who has studied population trends in Louisiana. "The people with the education and more skills and more national networks, they might be more likely to take opportunities elsewhere."

To be sure, thousands of New Orleanians of all backgrounds want nothing more than to come back to the city as soon as possible. And the fact that many have deep roots in the city makes it more likely that those professionals will return. Meanwhile, there may be an influx of risk-takers who spy opportunity in the rebuilding of New Orleans, giving the city a fresh jolt of people with entrepreneurial skills.

But for now, many New Orleanians are caught between not knowing what awaits them back at home and tempting new opportunities for work and for their children's education. Some professionals say they have been getting warm welcomes in the communities where they've landed. Academics and scientists have received offers of research space at other universities, where jobs may eventually open. Cities such as San Francisco and Boulder, Colo., have been courting musicians, according to WWOZ general manager David Freedman. And schools such as the Santa Fe Art Institute, Yale University and Williams College have offered artists studio space or teaching opportunities while New Orleans is shut down, according to Lynda Frese, an art professor at University of Louisiana in Lafayette.

Big worry for city

The potential for a post-Katrina "brain-drain" is a major concern for local business leaders.

"It's a huge concern. It occupies almost every meeting I'm in all day long," said Mark Drennen, head of Greater New Orleans Inc., of the risk of losing the city's professional class. "We absolutely cannot afford to lose any of those people.

"Those are the people we need to grow our economy. Those are the people who will be creating jobs for everybody."

Drennen said that in an effort to get people back, GNO Inc. is trying to get Congress to appropriate money for bridge loans to help local business people stay solvent until they can get their Small Business Administration disaster loans or collect on business interruption insurance. GNO Inc. is also trying to get trailers for small businesses so they can house their workers.

Richard Bachmann, chairman and chief executive of the New Orleans-based Energy Partners Limited, worries that the longer companies and their workers stay away from New Orleans, the more likely it is that they'll settle elsewhere. "It's just all too easy to stay in Houston," Bachmann said.

Marion LaNasa, director of communications for Lockheed Martin Space Systems Michoud Operations, says about 400 workers have returned to New Orleans, and the company plans to bring back the remaining 1,600 as soon as conditions are ripe. Until then, those engineers, skilled technicians and other employees have been temporarily placed at other Lockheed Martin facilities in Texas and Alabama, but with housing and water still a problem in New Orleans, there is a risk that the longer people are away, the more likely they'll stay.

"It's certainly a risk to any business in New Orleans," LaNasa said. "In the case of Lockheed Martin, the work is here and the work remains. The question is, how quickly can we get the workforce to migrate back to the New Orleans area and find housing to support their families?"

Stiff competition

Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, whose office has been working on developing the "cultural economy" based on Louisiana music, food and the arts, has said he thinks that some displaced New Orleanians will discover attractive things about the communities in which they've landed, but they'll also realize that most places lack the soul of New Orleans. To make sure Louisiana wins people back, the state needs to act quickly and seize the opportunities to fix long-standing problems in the rebuilding effort, like the schools.

"At the end of the day, we're competing for citizens," Landrieu said in a recent interview.

But some, such as public relations and marketing consultant Julie Sardie, have already made the decision not to come back. Sardie's home on Park Island is fine, but the storm swept away any projects or political campaigns for her to work on. Fortunately, an engineering firm for which she'd previously done work, MWH, offered her a job two days after the storm in its government relations practice.

"Everything I was doing was related to stuff in New Orleans, so I had nothing to represent. I had to think quickly," Sardie said. "I really don't have a reason to be in New Orleans right now."

Sardie's two adult children and their families have moved to Dallas and Vermont because of work and school opportunities, and she said that many of her friends also think they might not come back.

"My peers, a lot of them are moving on," Sardie said. "They get their kids in school. They really don't want to uproot their kids. I've heard a lot of people saying, 'I'm not going back.' "

Still, Sardie said, it's hard being away. "Sometimes, I'm completely overwhelmed trying to get around Houston. How do you go from being the 'Princess of Pampy's' to 'Nobody knows your name?' " Sardie said, referring to the Broad Street restaurant where she was a regular.

Others, such as Lakeview residents Laura Sampson and her husband, John Schewe, lost their home and their business. They say no matter how much they want to come back to New Orleans, they don't think they can. They're staying at a friend's condominium at the beach to put together and sell a self-study course in massage that they designed, but they're considering moving to Georgia or Tennessee.

Choice of jobs

"We really don't know if we can make our living (in New Orleans). I know that a lot of my clients have been displaced, and we don't know if they come back if they'll have the disposable income for massage," Sampson said.

"It's so hard because we just loved our lives in New Orleans. We felt like we were where we wanted to be. To feel like giving all of that up, it's gut-wrenching," she added.

John Vollenweider says doesn't want to make any rash decisions about his family's future. Vollenweider, who works in business banking at Hibernia Corp., is working at Hibernia's McKinney, Texas, office at least through the end of the year. His daughters have enrolled in Catholic schools in the area, and his wife, a teacher in the archdiocese school system, feels that she'd have her choice of jobs, at higher pay, in the fast-growing Dallas-Plano area.

Vollenweider's house in Kenner suffered some flood damage during Katrina, as it did during the May 1995 floods, and he said he is tired of evacuating from hurricanes. His office on Clearview Parkway was damaged, and he said he thinks that several co-workers won't return.

Meanwhile, he's noticed that housing in Texas is affordable, there are no potholes on the roads, and there are lots of parks. Area business leaders have been welcoming, even offering to help spouses find jobs. Vollenweider plans to come back to Louisiana to fix his house, but he doesn't know what will happen from there.

"You get out and you see what's available and you see what you can do with your life. There's a lot of opportunities," Vollenweider said. "It's very tempting."

Insurers' mobile units aid those with claims

Good, bad luck is at 'tent city'

By Jeffrey Meitrodt
Staff writer

Anthony Marengo went to the disaster relief center in Chalmette to pick up five bags of ice Thursday morning, but the hurricane victim left with an unexpected pledge worth $280,000 from his insurance company.

"It shocked me," said Marengo, a plumber whose two-story house in Meraux was wrecked by Katrina. "We're running some water lines down in Toca and needed some ice, so I came over here. But when I saw there wasn't anyone in line at State Farm, I decided to find out what was going on with my claim."

State Farm is one of four insurance companies with trailers at the disaster relief center, which opened Monday in the parking lot of a Wal-Mart store on East Judge Perez Drive. Other tenants include the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the Red Cross and the Pastors Relief Council, which is serving two hot meals a day and handing out ice and boxes of food to hurricane survivors.

The center, or "tent city" in hurricane lingo, is drawing hundreds of former St. Bernard residents each day. Some come to look for friends they haven't seen in more than a month. For others, the visit is strictly business.

Marengo arrived at 9 a.m., about an hour after the place came to life. Fifteen minutes after taking a seat under State Farm's tent, Marengo was on the phone with his adjuster, who quickly determined that Marengo is among the thousands of homeowners whose properties were destroyed by flood water. After getting Marengo's current address in Zachary, the adjuster promised to send a check worth $280,000 – the maximum amount of coverage Marengo had under his flood insurance policy.

Though he will still have to meet with the adjuster to discuss missing shingles and other wind damage, Marengo is amazed he could close out his flood-insurance claim without anyone from State Farm visiting his home, which was inundated with eight feet of water.

After a slow start, the insurance industry has cranked up the money machine. At State Farm, which paid out about $500 million in Katrina-related claims in the first month after the catastrophic storm, the insurer is now writing checks worth about $100 million a day, according to Bill Gourgues, a claim team manager who is running the operation in Chalmette. With 33 percent of the homeowners' market, State Farm is the largest residential insurer in Louisiana.

Representatives of Allstate, the state's second largest residential insurer, declined to provide claims data on the storm. But company spokesman Mike Trevino said the process of paying policyholders has ramped up considerably in the last week or so.

For insurers, Katrina has been a logistical nightmare. Under standard procedure, companies can't pay a claim until an adjuster has visited a customer's property. But access to the most heavily damaged parts of the New Orleans area has been sharply restricted, making it impossible for most policyholders to get their money and move on with their lives.

To address the problem, FEMA – which oversees the federal flood insurance program – announced Sept. 20 that it would dispense with many of its usual requirements in order to speed the arrival of big checks to storm victims. Instead of requiring a site visit, FEMA authorized insurance companies to pay off claims on properties "where it is readily apparent that flood damage covered by the policy will exceed the amount of insurance purchased."

Though flood insurance is backed by the federal government, it is sold by insurance companies, which are also responsible for handling claims.

To determine which properties qualify for the expedited process, insurers were told to review aerial photographs, flood data and policyholder information. FEMA said the process could be used for homes that "have been washed off their foundations, affected for long periods by standing water or when only pilings or a slab remain."

In St. Bernard Parish, that covers most of the 24,000 homes that were damaged by Katrina, according to state and local officials.

After touring several hundred homes this week, an Allstate representative said he was appalled by the devastation. "I didn't see any homes that weren't totally destroyed," said Paul Tracey, a field operations manager for the company.

To make it easier for policyholders to file or check on their claims, insurers have set up dozens of mobile response units, usually in the parking lot of a big retailer such as Home Depot or Wal-Mart. The Chalmette operation, however, is one of the few in which more than one insurance company is represented.

STAFF PHOTOS BY CHRIS GRANGER

Anthony Marengo, 46, of Meraux talks with State Farm insurance adjuster Tim Andrew, right, at a disaster relief center in the parking lot of a Wal-Mart store on East Judge Perez Drive in Chalmette. At the makeshift center, Marengo was promised a check worth $280,000 – the maximum amount of coverage Marengo had under his flood insurance policy

St. Bernard Parish Councilman Mark Madary said local officials got the idea for the center after visiting a similar operation in Mississippi.

"It's like a Wal-Mart,'' Madary said. "You want people to be able to do everything in one location. It takes the stress out of driving around the town."

The most popular tent is run by FEMA, where the average wait for a face-to-face meeting with a representative ran about 45 minutes this week. Most of the conversations involved the Small Business Administration's disaster-loan program, which provides up to $240,000 for homeowners affected by the storm.

When she got to the center Thursday morning, Frances Reilly hoped she wouldn't have to fill out an application for an SBA loan. But after meeting with a representative from Allstate, Reilly said she had no choice.

"Allstate is screwing us," said Reilly, whose Chalmette home was destroyed by flood water. "I'm not buying homeowners' insurance again. It's not worth the paper it's written on."

Reilly said flooding caused most of the damage to her property, which was hit with 6 feet of water. But she said Katrina's winds also tore off part of her roof, wrecked her fence and ripped loose a 52-foot patio cover.

Though an Allstate adjuster agreed to max out her flood insurance policy and cut her a check for $105,000 to cover her losses, Reilly said the company balked when she asked for additional help under her homeowner's policy. Reilly said she will need an additional $100,000 to cover her actual losses.

"They're telling us that it's all flood," Reilly said. "All they're going to give us is a $4,000 roof. That's it. No contents or nothing. It's just disgusting."

While her husband picked up lunch from the Red Cross van in the parking lot, Reilly waited in line at the FEMA tent, filling out a loan application. She said she'll need the money if she ever hopes to rebuild.

Allstate representatives declined to comment specifically on Reilly's claim, but they have repeatedly told state officials that they simply can't pay for Katrina-related damages if they are not caused by wind. They said that's the purpose of flood insurance, which is governed by rules established by the federal government.

Residents of St. Bernard Parish pick up ice and boxes of food from at a disaster relief center in Chalmette, called "tent city" in hurricane lingo. Insurance companies, FEMA, the Red Cross and Pastors Relief Council are all staging in the parking lot.

For many policyholders in St. Bernard Parish, those distinctions don't come home until they visit the disaster relief center. Some leave crying. Others are jubilant just to hook up with their adjuster.

"Our biggest problem right now is communication," said Bossier City adjuster Charlie Urban, who is running Allstate's operation in Chalmette. "It's practically impossible to get a call through down here, so they come to us and we connect them with their adjuster. We're basically facilitating communication."

Urban said the assignment can be stressful.

"They're in a state of shock," he said of the company's policyholders. "They're wondering where they're going to go from here, where they're going to live. It's a terrible situation."

The Superdome roof was mangled by Hurricane Katrina, and the interior was damaged during its days as a shelter after the storm.

Rehab the Dome with storms in mind

Katrina demonstrated the need to upgrade the Superdome. If the Dome is going to be used as a hurricane shelter, it must be rebuilt to serve as one.

By raising the playing surface of the Dome to the plaza-level concourse, the Dome floor would be 15 to 20 feet higher than street-surface level. The new plaza would become all club seating, the much smaller loge area would be converted to all suites. By raising the playing field, terrace seating would be much closer to the action and therefore more sellable to the public. The Dome is a free-standing structure; the interior can be gutted and completely reconfigured for football-only seating. As for the lower "basement," let your imagination run wild as to what could be done with that vast open space.

Even if Dome capacity is reduced, so what? Are we going to build for a Super Bowl we might get once every decade, if we are lucky? Instead, let's aim for better and closer seating for the fans, more suites for Tom Benson and almost no chance of rising floodwaters over the new ground floor. Rebuild the Dome roof to handle the 150 mph winds, if at all possible, and chalk it up to hurricane mitigation. Construct an elevated connection to Interstate 10 to handle emergency and transport vehicles.

If the city is looking forward to rail service to Baton Rouge, would it not make sense to utilize the railroad tracks that have a back-door connection to the Dome and the New Orleans Arena? Does anyone believe that Louisiana can now afford a new open air facility with retractable roof? Maybe in 2025, but until then, the Dome may have to be home.

Why no rush to open schools?

Despite the fact that Jefferson and St. Tammy parish schools are already open, and state Superintendent of Education Cecil Picard says at minimum seven Uptown schools are in good condition, no east bank New Orleans public schools are scheduled to reopen. While the good news is that some Algiers schools might open in November, it will be more than a month after the neighboring Algiers Catholic schools open for their students.

Since there is no plan in place to rehire teachers at those West Bank schools, how long will it be before top teachers follow their students to surrounding parishes?

I wonder if this is being done to save money or to keep the poor from returning to New Orleans – or is it just plain incompetence?

Head for the hills

Let's not do what does not make sense. Rehabitation of the 9th Ward, St. Bernard Parish, parts of Lakeview and anyplace else that was substantially under water and will always be at risk does not make sense.

There are many high and dry, beautiful and almost empty parishes in Louisiana just waiting for habitation. We can be sure that many parishes would welcome new business, talent, our rich culture, etc. Sure, it won't be like the old neighborhood, but the old neighborhood will never be the same again. We need to tell people to accept it, get over it and get moving.

Look ahead to a better future. Do not plan to spend hundreds of billions of dollars on coastal restoration. Move inland. We need to be safe and not sorry for wrong and costly decisions.

Moving to the high ground makes more sense than expensive dikes, canals and pumping stations.

Texas moves in on workers

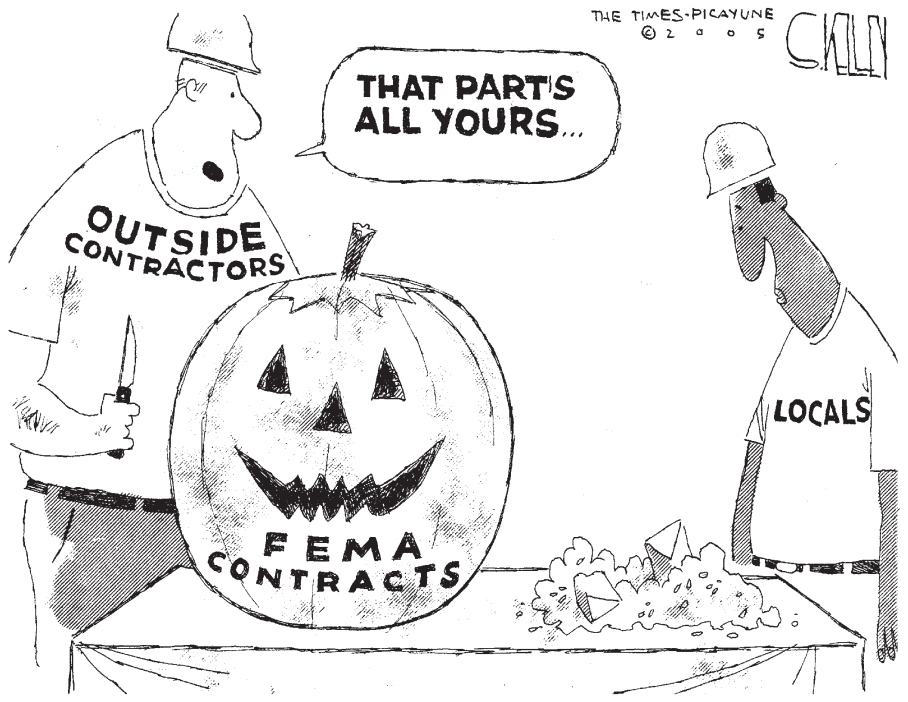
We are working hard to "Jump Start Jefferson" with businesses leading the way. We are working with out-of-state FEMA and parish contractors to "Keep Jefferson Clean."

But at the same time we are jamming the roadways with illegal signs and posters advertising who is open and who is not, and Houston is luring our displaced workers with job fairs and a truly organized employment recruitment effort.



Jefferson Parish uses wire signs; Houston uses job fairs. When the workers are gone permanently, our parish president will really have something to cry about: an eroded tax base. Where is the effort by the region's Chamber of Commerce? Where is JEDCO?

What is being done to organize and counter Houston's effort? Where is the economic leadership?

Probably waiting for the next Mardi Gras parade.

OUR OPINIONS

Building a new New Orleans

The city of New Orleans is reeling. Hurricane Katrina emptied it for more than a month: no people, no commerce. Six weeks after the storm, it is just beginning to sputter back to life. In essence, this is a city that must be rebuilt from scratch.

There could be no more dire situation for a mayor to face.

But Mayor Ray Nagin's vision of a downtown casino district running along the city's prime business corridor and one of its most-storied streets is a dreadful idea. This is not what the new New Orleans should be.

The mayor admitted Friday that he is desperate to kick-start the city's economy, and his proposal certainly smacks of desperation. New Orleans has too much to offer to sell itself for a quick buck to the gambling industry.

True, the old New Orleans – the city that charmed every visitor with its matchless food and music, the city that shared its bounty with the rest of the nation – seems irretrievable at the moment. How do we get from a city awash in muck and debris back to our place as the jewel of the Mississippi River? How do we rebuild a city after three-fourths of it has been full of water for days on end, when our people are scattered across the nation?

We will do it with thoughtfulness and creativity. We will do it by focusing on the city's strengths and figuring out what sort of economy would be good for the future of New Orleans. We will do it by rebuilding our universities and our port. We will do it by finding entrepreneurs and visionaries who will create smart jobs with good paychecks. We will do it by tapping into the abundance of talent among our own people. We will do it with the generosity of the federal government, although that help seems awfully slow in coming.

Ray Nagin was elected mayor because he promised a fresh take on the city's long-standing problems. He was a successful businessman, and he exuded creativity and energy. He talked Friday about the need to think "outside the box," but his casino plan is a tired old idea, not the inventive thinking we expect of Mayor Nagin.

This is not a finicky city. New Orleans has always had a bawdy side. But there is a difference between being the City that Care Forgot and Las Vegas South. Mayor Nagin argues that no amount of gambling and its tacky trappings will turn New Orleans into a new Las Vegas. New Orleans' distinctive culture, cuisine and history will keep it true to itself, he says.

That is precisely what is wrong with his idea. Putting a half dozen casinos along Poydras and Canal streets is a betrayal of all that is unique about New Orleans. Tourists came to the city in droves because of its incomparable personality. They came because they could feel the influence of 300 years of history.

There are practical problems with Mayor Nagin's casino idea. State law allows only one land-based casino in New Orleans, and Harrah's pays the state a minimum of $60 million a year for the privilege of that license. If Gov. Kathleen Blanco and the Legislature were to entertain the mayor's idea, they would put that hefty paycheck at risk.

They shouldn't take that route, but not merely because of contractual concerns. They shouldn't go along with Mayor Nagin because this is an awful idea.

New Orleans is hurting. There are whole neighborhoods in ruins, there are thousands of people who have no home to come home to any time soon. Despite all that, the city is still there underneath the mess. The talent still exists. The history still exists. The powerful river that reaches into the heart of this nation still exists.

Don't sell us short, Mr. Mayor. Find a better way to recreate New Orleans.

It's called a fast track

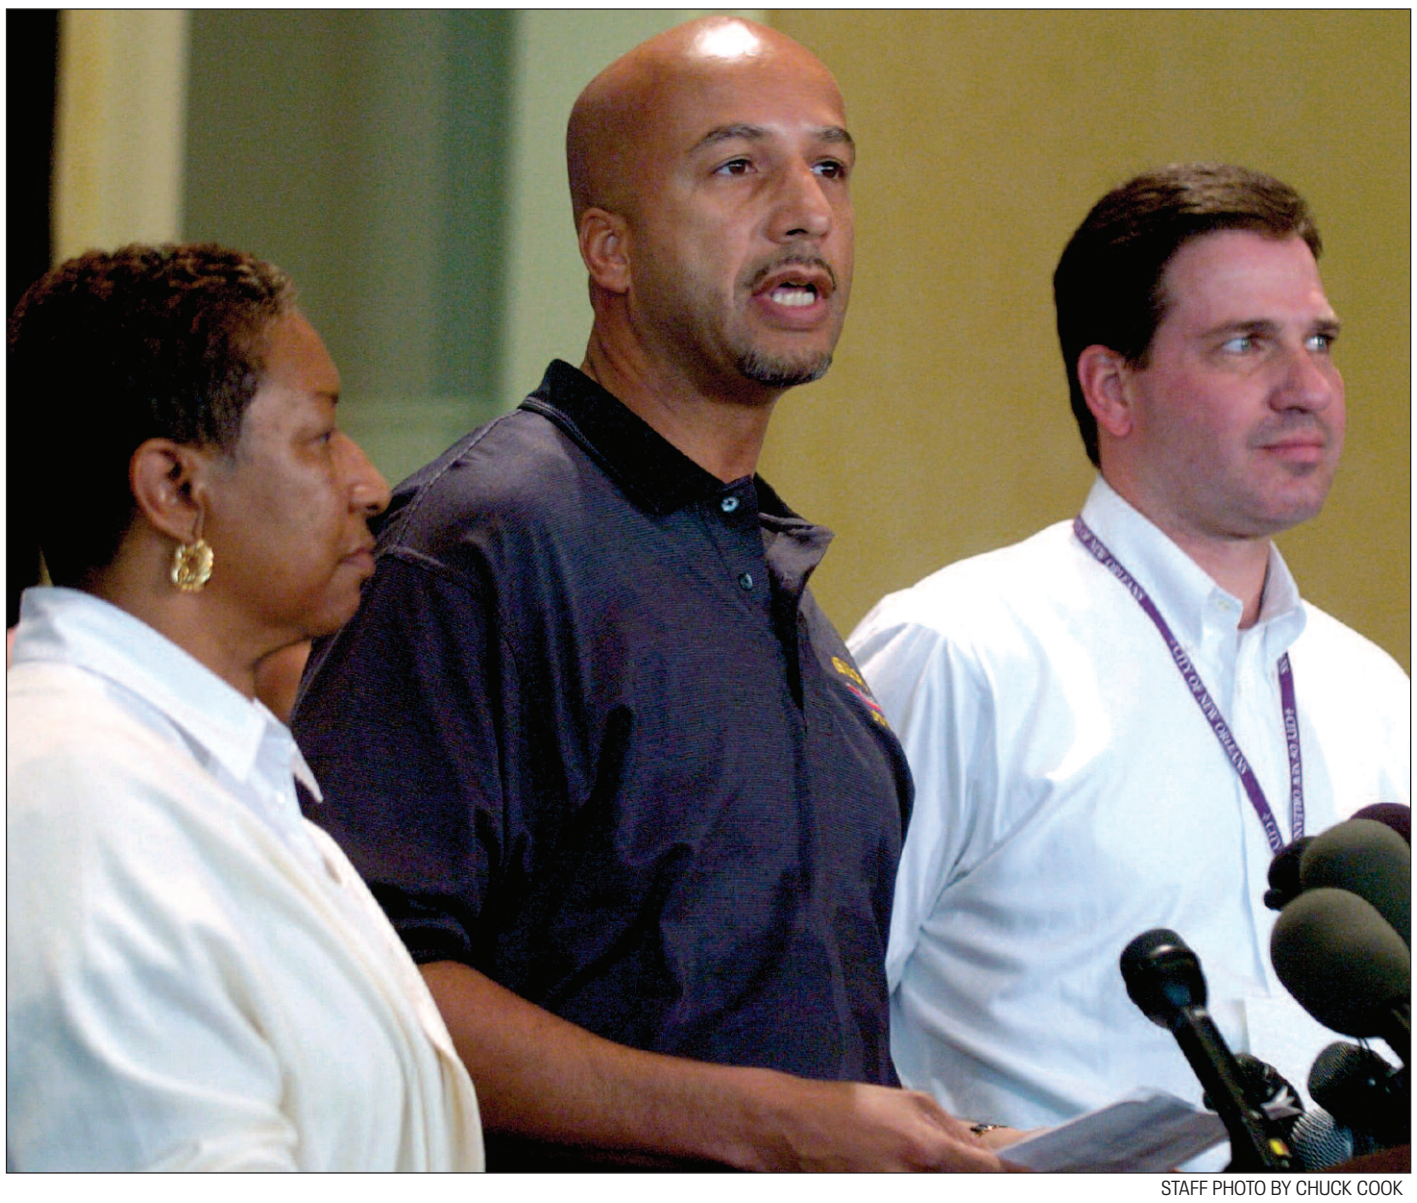
Anyone whose life or property depends on the integrity of a levee system would agree that the Army Corps of Engineers needs to find out what went wrong during Hurricane Katrina, but the pace of that investigation needs to match the urgency of the repair schedule.

Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, chief engineer for the corps, told a Senate hearing Thursday that the probe will take a "short period of months." When the 2006 hurricane season is less than eight months away, though, and the investigation has to be complete before repairs can begin, "short" does not describe "months."

Sen. David Vitter expressed understandable frustration with the delay. "The timetable is inadequate. That is a disastrously unambitious schedule – I'm tired of living by the old corps schedule."



What Sen. Vitter wants to see is something far more ambitious: the levees repaired to pre-Katrina levels before June and a system that can stand up to a Category 5 storm by the time hurricane season starts.

He's right to insist on something stronger than the old levee system, which was designed for a slow-moving Category 3 storm. If such a feat could be accomplished before June 1 turns up on the calendar, it would hasten our economic, physical and psychological recovery.

Local officials were already disappointed that the corps had committed only to rebuilding the levees to their pre-Katrina state. To hear, now, that even that goal might not be met is beyond frustrating. It's frightening.

Any schedule that risks leaving the metro area unprotected by June 1 is unacceptable. The corps needs to do whatever is necessary to ensure that the investigation is wrapped up quickly and that levee repairs are finished in time.

WAITING FOR THE BUCKS TO ROLL IN

JAMES GILL

We have a "once in a 300- or 400-year opportunity" to make a bunch of money, according to Mayor Ray Nagin, although how he measures the timeline is not clear, Bienville not having established New Orleans until 1718.

Still, Nagin should be right. So much money will be flowing into the city from government and private donations that posterity could trace its prosperity to Katrina's free-spending aftermath. The feds have so far allocated $62.3 billion to the relief effort, and much more has been requested, while the efforts of former Presidents George Bush and Bill Clinton, for instance, will raise a bunch more.

But reconstruction wouldn't be reconstruction without the carpetbaggers, who evidently still have a better eye for the main chance than the locals.

Of contracts worth $1.5 billion handed out by the Federal Emergency Management Agency in the rush immediately after the storm, about 80 percent were either no-bid or so vaguely worded that it was virtually impossible to determine whether they had been honored. Acting FEMA Director David Paulison told a Senate committee that many of the contracts would be canceled and put out on bid, but it is obvious that Katrina has meant a lot of easy money for corporations with friends in high places.

No corporation has more friends in high places than Halliburton, of course, which was not too stretched in Iraq, or too embarrassed by accusations of profiteering there, to take on lucrative contracts for post-Katrina rebuilding. Disasters, natural or man-made, seem to be mother's milk to Halliburton and other corporations with political ties.

Nagin made his prediction of an economic boom at a seminar for local small business owners, not all of whom were impressed. They complained of being frozen out and facing ruin while invaders from all over the country make a killing.

The same theme emerged at the Senate committee hearing, where Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., took Paulison to task for giving Louisiana companies the cold shoulder and also wondered why firefighters volunteering to help the recovery were required to undergo several days of sensitivity training first. Well, you wouldn't want to be rescued by a brute with no manners, would you?

Down in New Orleans, meanwhile, Nagin gave the impression that he could use a little sensitivity training himself, declaring that Louisiana residents should be given preference over "Mexican workers."

Kathleen Blanco, vowing to pressure the feds into hiring more locals, said that of the recovery contracts so far awarded, 44 percent, accounting for 31 percent of the price tag, went to Louisiana companies.

That's a lot of moolah, and it is obvious that by no means can every small Louisiana business be facing bankruptcy. Outside the city the recovery has already lined many pockets. "Anyone in the supply business from Gonzales to Baton Rouge is doing very well," one seminar participant reported.

The recovery job is too huge to be done without importing expertise and labor from other states, and there should be plenty of work to go around. According to Nagin, every year for the next 10 some $10 billion will be spent on recovery,bringing "an opportunity to create wealth not only for yourself but for your children and your children's children."

A lot of those desperate businessmen present seemed to fear that unless they get a break soon, it will be other people's children and grandchildren who inherit the loot. The current generation of locals needs the feds to pick up the pace.

So far, the Small Business Administration has received 1.6 million disaster loan applications and has managed to approve nine in Louisiana. "These numbers must change," Blanco said, and nobody was inclined to contradict.

At this rate some of our guys will be waiting another 300 or 400 years.

WE'RE UP, AND WE'RE DOWN

STEPHANIE GRACE

To hear Mayor Ray Nagin tell it late last week, the post-Katrina prognosis for his city is pretty darn promising.

New Orleans is sitting on "a once in a 300- or 400-year opportunity" to rebuild and ultimately prosper, an ebullient Nagin told a gathering of local business owners trying to get a piece of the massive federally funded reconstruction.

"You are sitting in a city and a region where we will probably spend a minimum of $10 billion a year for the next 10 years," he said. "You are in a position to create wealth not only for yourself but for your children and your children's children."

That was Thursday.

Two days earlier, the same mayor of the same devastated city was in a very different mood, as he announced, "with great sadness," his plan to fire half the municipal work force. The layoffs are "pretty permanent," he said, and even more could come later.

The problem, Nagin said Tuesday, is that the city has no revenue stream to speak of, and doesn't expect the spigot to reopen any time soon.

He didn't elaborate, but he didn't need to, because the state of the three pillars of municipal funding is starkly obvious. Sales tax has dried up. Property tax revenue will be late in coming and much reduced, once thousands of ruined homes are reassessed at their post-storm values. And hotel/motel taxes are way down, with the vast majority of rooms still out of service, and others rented by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which is exempt from the tax.

Nagin has railed against mixed messages coming from the city, state and federal government about the quality of the drinking water – which was finally certified by the state in much of the east bank Friday – calling it "schizophrenia." But as his own wild mood swings last week show, there's a lot of that going around.

Drive around New Orleans, and you see two cities. One resembles a less-congested version of its old self – livelier each day, lit up by night and slowly filling with people ready to get back to business. The other remains utterly foreign, with sad-eyed mourners in protective gear and rented trucks arriving each morning but departing by dark, leaving an eerie, pitch-black landscape behind.

Talk to New Orleanians who've moved back, as well as those who are still deciding whether and when to do so, and the topic invariably turns to just how they're supposed to feel about, well, everything.

The questions are at once global and intensely personal:

Will businesses, even the ones that want to stay in New Orleans, be able to function if there's no place for their workers to live?

Can we count on the cavalry, as Nagin put it, to stick around? Or has donor fatigue already set in up in Washington?

Has President Bush finally stopped dropping in for those staged, numbingly routine photo ops?

Which favorite corner haunts will reopen, and which old friends will be around to share a toast when they do?

How can we resume our lives, as Nagin has urged us to do, if we can't put our kids in school?

How is a city full of night owls supposed to function under a curfew, anyway?

And is it really, truly OK to drink the water?

It's hard to spend any time at all in New Orleans these days without finding yourself veering between hope and suspicion, ease and discomfort, and of course, joy and despair. There have been many terrible days, as Tuesday surely was for Nagin and those 3,000 employees on the block. But in some places, for some people, there have been more and more good days, too.

Considering where we all were a month ago, that's not such a bad way to live – at least until we can manage to get our equilibrium back.

What were they thinking?

THOMAS L. FRIEDMAN

When the definitive history of the Iraq war is written, future historians will surely want to ask Saddam Hussein and George W. Bush each one big question.

To Saddam, the question would be: What were you thinking? If you had no weapons of mass destruction, why did you keep acting as though you did? For Bush, the question would be: What were you thinking? If you bet your whole presidency on succeeding in Iraq, why did you let Donald Rumsfeld run the war with just enough troops to lose? Why didn't you establish security inside Iraq and along its borders? How could you ever have thought this would be easy?

The answer to these questions can be found in what was America's greatest intelligence failure in Iraq – and that was not about weapons of mass destruction.

Let me explain. While visiting the Iraqi port of Umm Qasr last week, I spent a morning watching the commanders of the Iraqi navy hold a staff meeting, while their British and U.S. advisers looked on. On the one hand, you felt as if they were doing a pretty good imitation of a British command briefing. On the other hand, the slightly ragged quality left you feeling that if you pulled the British and U.S. advisers out tomorrow, the whole Iraqi navy would collapse. The human capital and institutional foundation are simply not there yet. "How these guys ever fought the Iranians for eight years, I will never know," a British trainer remarked to me.

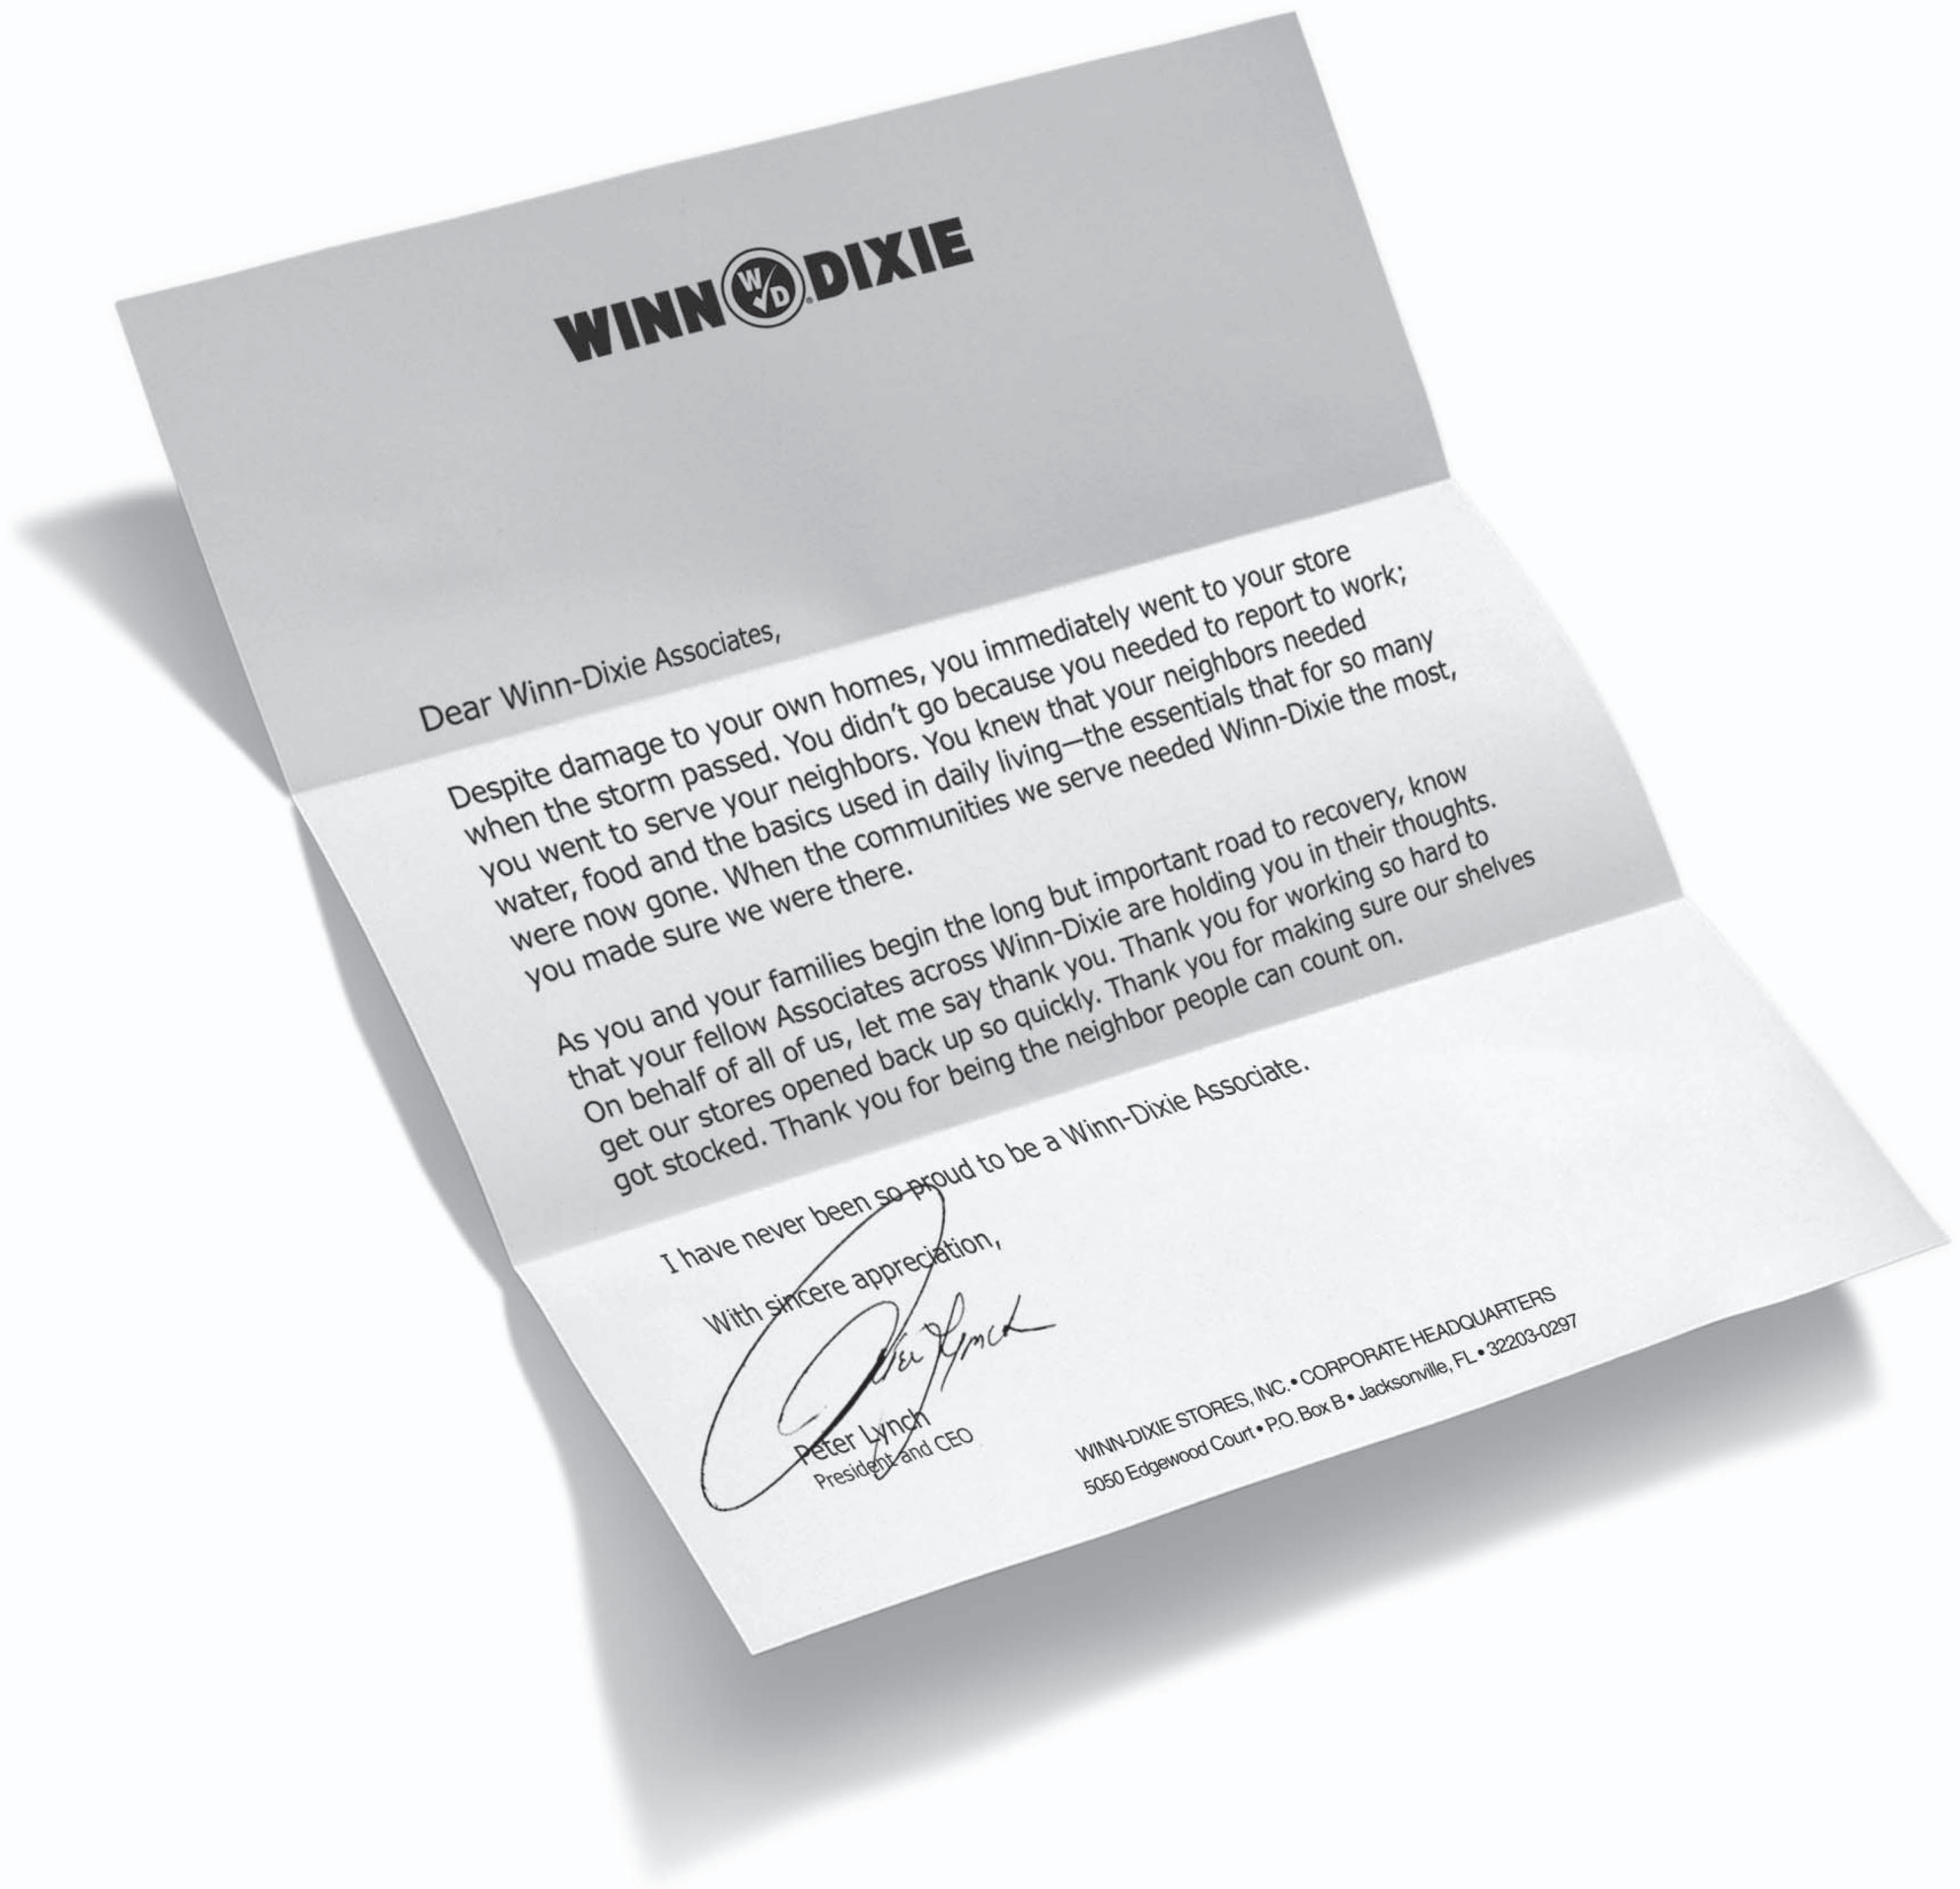
After that staff meeting, a British Royal Navy officer who was escorting me suggested that we go to Basra to see the flea market there. He said I could find anything I wanted, because so many Iraqis have had to hock basic household goods – stereos, refrigerators, air-conditioners, cars – to survive the last decade under Saddam.

Message: Failing to find weapons of mass destruction was a big intelligence failure. But the even bigger failure – the one that is the source of all our troubles today – was the failure to understand just how devastated Iraq's society, economy and institutions had become – after eight years of war with Iran, a crushing defeat in Gulf War I and then a decade of U.N. sanctions.

But I think Saddam knew how busted and bankrupt his country and army were. Therefore, he never wanted to completely erase the impression that he had weapons of mass destruction. Saddam lived in a den of wolves. The hint of weapons of mass destruction was his only deterrent shield left against his neighbors, his enemies at home and the West. (This was alluded to in the Duelfer weapons report.) So he tried to allow just enough U.N. inspections to clear him, while playing just enough cat and mouse with the United Nations to leave the impression that he still had something dangerous in the closet.

The Bush team, and the CIA, not only failed to learn that Saddam had no weapons of mass destruction, they failed to appreciate how devastated Iraqi society really was. The Bush team, listening largely to exiles who had not lived in Iraq for years, thought that there were much more of an Iraqi middle class and more institutions than actually existed. So Bush thought taking over Iraq would be easy. That is the only way I can explain his behavior.

This intelligence failure about Iraqi society is what is killing us today. Because what really happened after the U.S. invasion is that what little Iraqi state existed just fell apart in our hands, like a broken vase. And then Rummy let the shards get looted. So yes, when the Bush team says rebuilding Iraq is like rebuilding Germany, it's half right. It is like rebuilding Germany, but not post-World War II Germany. It is like rebuilding medieval, pre-modern Germany – the Germany of clans and feudal fiefs, before there was a state.



As this column has long insisted, we are not doing nation-building in Iraq. We are doing nation-creating. It is hugely important, but hugely difficult. I can only assume the CIA didn't know how broken Iraq was, because if the president knew and still put in so few troops, it was criminal.

Sadly, what Iraq desperately needs most from the U.S. today are aid workers, State Department advisers and technical experts from every agency of the government who can help rebuild Iraq's human capital. But people are afraid to go. And who can blame them? We have never established basic public order there, because we never had enough troops.

The president's speech on terrorism Thursday was excellent. He made clear, better than ever, why winning in Iraq is so important to the wider struggle against Islamo-fascism. But it only makes me that much angrier that he fought this war as though it would be easy – never asking for any sacrifice, any military draft, any tax increases or any gasoline tax – and that he tolerated so much incompetence along the way.

DAVE WALKER
On the Air

A reluctant oracle of the post-Katrinapocalyptic airwaves, Garland Robinette would rather be back in his Uptown home, painting and tending to his late-in-life family.

Instead, the WWL AM-870 afternoon talk host has become a galvanic moderator of intense civic debate about New Orleans' recovery, an evangelical firebrand for competence preaching to listeners who've seemingly grown comfortable with corruption.

The arrayed stations of the United Radio Broadcasters of New Orleans are his forum.

The cross-talk is provided by the usual-suspect news sources and hundreds of angry, ruined, displaced, confused, tired callers.

Listening in are uncountable thousands of evacuees, literally powerless stay-behinds and interested expatriates around the world.

"Garland is the soul of WWL right now . . . he's at the epicenter of recovery from Katrina."
DIANE NEWMAN
WWL program director

Robinette narrated Katrina's offensive on the city as the wind blew out WWL's studio windows.

On Sept. 1, he was on the microphone again when besieged New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin called in to make his angry, desperate plea for relief aid.

Lately, Robinette has been snapping at call-in politicians who've overestimated his tolerance for Louisiana politics-as-usual when New Orleans' utter existence seems to be stake.

Settling business-insurance uncertainty — "I think it's a gigantic bomb waiting to go off," he says — has been another topical cause.

MY STORM STORY

Hurricane Katrina: In their own words

WE left New Orleans on Sunday before the hurricane and I was grabbing everything I wanted to keep. I didn't know if I would be able to come back and get my things. I thought about my jewelry and I said, 'Let me grab my jewelry box.' Then I grabbed my baby's jewelry box, too.

"My favorite thing is my tennis bracelet. I just got it at a jewelry show at the Convention Center. It's not real diamonds but it's real silver. Then I have my necklace. It's two C's back-to-back and it stands for Chanel. I bought that out at Lakeside at one of those little booths in the middle. And the pearls my sister gave me.

"I'm so glad I brought my baby's jewelry box. Every day she wakes up and she goes through it. She's 4.

"My sister, she stays here in St. Louis. We all came here — 13 people in that one house. That lasted about two weeks. It was crowded, chaotic, you had no privacy. But mealtimes were nice. Everybody would get together and cook. I cooked stuffed bell peppers, my mom cooked some gumbo.

"I'm at the Days' Inn now. About twice a week, people bring dinner for us — different organizations. Once these other people from an organization gave us a brown paper bag and they had a whole room full of groceries and everybody was making a bag of groceries.

"I definitely plan to go back to New Orleans. I hope it's like it was before. I don't think they're going to have all the same people there. A lot of people are going to stay where they're at.

"Poor people live different in New Orleans than they do here. If you go into Hollygrove or Pigeontown, you go back there and it looks horrible. It's way worse than here. It looks like the 1930s.

"Here . . . the houses are in better shape. The people are in better shape financially than poor people in New Orleans. They don't seem as poor. That bothers me. It should be the same everywhere.

"But I don't want to stay here. I want to go home. I miss home. I miss my friends. I miss my crawfish."

Brobson Lutz did a little bit of everything for French Quarter residents after Katrina

Back when the western territories of this country were first being settled, people got their news from telegraph offices, overnight stagecoach stops, general stores and . . . saloons.

Fast-forward from the Wild West to the devastation, confusion and chaos of days-after-Katrina New Orleans.

With communication lines down, cell phones worthless, no power to the TV set, no newspaper delivery — except via Web site — those in the area of the French Quarter found information about the medical support they were looking far from a couple of French Quarter bars, Molly's at the Market and Johnny White's Sports Bar.

"That's where people were getting information — from the bartenders," said Dr. Brobson Lutz, the former city health officer and now an appointed badge-carrying assistant coroner. "They've always been the group leaders down there."

"We treated about every cut, laceration and puncture down here in the Quarter, Treme and the Bywater."
DR. BROBSON LUTZ

So they directed those in need of medical attention to Dumaine Street, where a group of volunteers from California, the Bi-County EMS Services, had set up four or five units including a disaster command van in the street. Many street people had moved into Johnny White's and the word spread about the California operation.

Molly's, said Lutz, was dispensing information but was closing at 6 p.m. As for Johnny White's, he said, "I don't think they have a key — they couldn't close."

The owner of the EMS service, Kelly Bumpus, had bought a home in the 900 block of Dumaine Street a couple of years ago, said Lutz, who found the first aid operation because he lives in the 1000 block.

"We treated about every cut, laceration and puncture down here in the Quarter, Treme and the Bywater," Lutz said. "They heard about it from the bars — that's where they were getting their info."

Ironically, he said, FEMA had contracted for a first aid station in the ballroom of the Royal Orleans, but nobody knew about it. When he went over there to check it out, Lutz said, "I had to use my badge to get in."

Not exactly an advertisement for assistance.

"If you want to provide first aid, you have to have visibility. This clinic was holed up inside the Royal Orleans, a nice air conditioned clinic — but nobody knew they were there," he said.

Meanwhile, the Dumaine

"Garland is the soul of WWL right now," said Diane Newman, WWL program director. "He could be a man who's semi-retired, painting pictures, just worrying about his wife and little girl. Instead, he's at the epicenter of recovery from Katrina."

• • • • • •

A janitor-turned-broadcaster-turned-corporate-PR-guy-turned-semi-retired-fine-artist, Robinette took the WWL job a few months ago as a favor to old friend David Tyree, who'd been diagnosed with a recurrence of prostate cancer.

But then Katrina — and WWL's giant signal, which grows to a national footprint at night — made Robinette a lightning rod above New Orleans' fractured electronic-media landscape.

"When I was in television, you kind of looked at radio as something over there," he said. "Small, not very powerful and pretty much an entertainment vehicle. That was about it.

"It's become something where, I'll mention something about the Bush administration and we'll get a call from Washington. I'll mention something about the governor and we'll get a call from the governor. I ask the mayor on the air to please give us a call and we get a call.

"TV didn't work that way. On TV, you can't say to a city councilman, 'Come on, that's bull - - - - politics, and you and I both know it."

Thanks to WWL's Internet stream of the URBONO signal, listeners around the world know it, too.

Robinette now gets listener feedback, via e mail, from Australia and Germany.

"To call it a bizarre situation is an understatement," Robinette said. "It's like asking somebody my age, ready for the retirement home and right on the verge of senility, 'Incidentally, you can talk to the world.' "

The weight of the work, its importance to listeners huddled throughout the parishes of south Louisiana all the way to, say, New South Wales, doesn't escape him.

"I don't open the microphone without being scared," he said.

• • • • • • • • • • •

Robinette wasn't frightened by Katrina's pass through New Orleans, however much the day resembled a scene from science-fiction cinema.

"Windows were popping out while I was on the air," he said. "The ceiling was beginning to vibrate and the doors were bulging. It was the strangest broadcast I've ever done in my life, and I've done some strange ones.

"Somebody handed me a piece of paper showing the storm bending to the east. I thought, 'Wow, we're lucky again.' We certainly got some bad wind damage. It certainly did feel like a close one, but boy were we lucky and home free.

"It didn't ever feel like a moment in history. It did feel dramatic. I don't think I've ever been in a building that was literally exploding before."

And yet . . .

"I spent some time in a place called Vietnam that would make this look pretty calm," said Robinette, twice awarded the Purple Heart. "It didn't seem to me to be real spooky."

"I spent some time in a place called Vietnam that would make this look pretty calm."

What was spooky came the next morning, when it became evident that floodwater was filling the city.

A respected environmental reporter during his days as Angela Hill's co-anchor/husband at WWL-TV, Robinette immediately recognized the implications of knee-high water on LaSalle Street, which the night before had been dry.

He'd done so many stories about the levees being topped by storm surge from The Big One, so many scary reports about impending doom in the sinking city, so many segments about vanishing wetlands, that assignment editors and talk producers and news directors long ago started mocking his pitches to do more.

"I certainly didn't realize the magnitude of the tragedy until I saw the water," he said. "When I saw the water, I thought, 'Oh, my God. Everything that they laughed at me for is coming true.' "

When anyone official says the severity of the Katrina aftereffects were a surprise, Robinette starts to simmer.

"They're lying," he said. "They're lying through their teeth. We knew about that storm for 35 years.

"It makes me so mad I can't see straight. It's like standing and yelling 'Fire!' for 15 minutes and then having people saying, 'I didn't know I was on fire.' "

• • • • • • • • • • •

Robinette escaped the burning, flooding city, but kept working, first from Jefferson Parish, later Baton Rouge.

When nothing at home had improved by Sept. 1 and the cable-news footage resembled a horror show, the level of suffering in the wasted city seemed to be worsening.

"I hate to admit it, but I got very, very angry in the aftermath of the storm, probably much more so than I should have been," he said. "I did several rants, criticizing specific people and specific things.

"All of a sudden, my producer said, 'The mayor is on the line.' "

The next few minutes of airtime, an exhausted excoriation of relief efforts by Nagin that ended with both men struggling to control their emotions, have been replayed and downloaded and transcribed and transmitted around the world.

Also replayed in memory by many who heard it live.

"I think it was the horrors he had seen, where he'd been, what he had been going through," Robinette said. "It might've been one of those moments in time, sharing the same wavelength. Once he started, I guess my anger combined with his and kind of escalated.

"I'm just a little old radio guy, but when they write the history of Katrina, I think Mayor Nagin's angry message was the turning point of us getting help."

Still, Robinette today would rather the unforgettable exchange had ended differently.

"I'm at the point now where it don't matter," said Nagin then, his rage nearly vented. "People are dying. They don't have homes. They don't have jobs.

"The city of New Orleans will never be the same."

There was dead air, more than a dozen seconds of it.

Anguish bleeding from his voice, Robinette broke the quiet.

"We're both pretty speechless here," Robinette said. "I don't know what to say."

"I've got to go," Nagin said.

Winds blew out the windows of WWL-AM's studio and offices the morning of Aug. 29. 'I don't think I've ever been in a building that was exploding before,' talk-show host Garland Robinette said.

"Keep in touch," Robinette said. "Keep in touch."

Robinette wishes he'd held his composure just a few seconds longer.

"It felt embarrassing, to tell you the truth," he said. "To break down and cry in front of millions of people . . . didn't feel real good. It didn't feel like a particularly proud moment.

"If I could do it over again, obviously that's the part I would clip off."

• • • • • • • • • • •

The clip file for Robinette shows he left WWL-TV in 1990 to buff the corporate image of the New Orleans mining giant Freeport-McMoRan Inc., a company he'd dogged as a reporter.

He spun off his department into a standalone public relations firm, Planit Communications Inc., in 1993.

Most of the Robinette references in The Times-Picayune over the past decade are art-gallery listings.

The avocation, which started with doodles on his WWL-TV scripts, eventually became a passion. His specialty became portraits.

Then came the May announcement about him becoming Tyree's permanent replacement.

"It was simply a favor to a friend who had cancer," Robinette said. "I thought I'd warm his chair until he got back."

Tyree died Sept. 12 in Alva, Okla., to where he'd moved to be near family.

Robinette hadn't talked to Tyree since Katrina hit, but was not surprised by the news that, according to his relatives, Tyree had followed the Katrina tragedy closely via cable TV.

"During all this catastrophe, I think you lose sight of somebody battling for their life," Robinette said. "Everything else starts to consume you."

• • • • • • • • • • •

Robinette, 62, and his wife, Nancy, have an 8-year-old daughter.

Their home survived Katrina with very little damage.

"Not a shingle out of place," he said. "No floodwater, nothing.

"Isn't that ironic? A house that wasn't touched by Katrina that's not worth anything."

You'd think Robinette would be singing the same tune as the radio personalities who read the scripted "We'll be back!" promos that perpetually air on United Radio broadcasts.

But no. Robinette's airtime is a no-cheerleading zone.

"It doesn't much matter whether it's untouched or not," he said of his house. "There's nothing to go home to.

"I'm right in the middle of this thing. It's bizarre and I don't know what to make of it.

"I was very happy being an anonymous artist. I was extremely involved with my daughter and my wife. I have the best family in the history of the world.

"I yearn, like we all do, for what I had six weeks ago."

TRIP TIPS

Airfare sales

Delta has reduced fares on domestic sale; tickets must be bought at least seven days in advance of travel and by Tuesday; all trips must be completed by Nov. 17. You must spend at least three nights away or travel over a Saturday night; best fares are for travel Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Saturdays.

According to www.smarterliving.com, the top rated Singapore Airlines started an international airfare sale for flights to Asia and Europe; departures are from Los Angeles, New York, and San Francisco. Buy tickets by Oct. 14 for travel that begins by Nov. 20 and is completed by Nov. 30. A site called www.bookingbuddy.com claims there are lower fares on Icelandair from New York to Frankfurt and on Malaysia Airlines for Los Angeles to Taipei.

American Airlines has started a Hawaii sale for travel through Dec. 15, with cheapest fares on Mondays through Thursdays. In this case, as in all other sales, competing airlines have matched the rates. As of press time, there was no set deadline for purchase.

North Carolina leaves

While temperatures are FINALLY dipping below the 90s in southern Louisiana, the first shades of fall are touching up the leaves in Western North Carolina. It's about a 12-hour drive from the New Orleans area, and it may be tough to find a hotel room, but it can't be as difficult as it's been in Baton Rouge the past month. Check out the fall color report and activities from the mountains to the coast at www.visitnc.com or call (866) 653-2837. For the week's fall fishing activities, go to www.visitnc.com/fallfish.asp or call (888) 234-7462.

Gulf Shores

Gulf Shores and Orange Beach were spared the heavy damage of Katrina, according to the Alabama Gulf Coast Convention & Visitors Bureau Web site, www.gulfshores.com/crisis. There are hotels, houses and apartments ready and waiting for those who want to escape to the beach. Call (800) 745-7263.

Fly the dwindling skies

Louis Armstrong International is open for business, but flights are few and ticket refunds can be tricky

By Millie Ball
Travel editor

IT'S not like a long-planned trip to California was at the top of a displaced New Orleanian's mind a couple of weeks ago. But when he checked on his 7 a.m. Continental flight to Oakland, Calif. the Monday before his Thursday trip, he discovered there was no such flight anymore out of Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport.

At least a Thibodaux resident was notified by e-mail from Southwest that his nonstop flight to Nashville for this weekend's LSU/Vanderbilt game had been canceled. And once he and his wife reworked their trip by flying to another city and changing planes, they realized they'd better check flights for their upcoming trip to Italy. Good thing they did.

In each of these cases, the result was a lot of time fiddling with flight schedules on the Internet, and even more time on the phone - on hold, mainly - and talking to airline agents. The good news for both travelers was there were no penalties, just frustration and, in the case of the domestic flights, longer layovers. The European trip actually ended up with better connections. You never know.

At least the situation is improving. A government relief worker said that in the early days after Katrina, the few flights into New Orleans and Baton Rouge were overbooked. "People were just showing up and hoping they'd get on the plane. The airlines were offering bonuses to give up seats, and it seemed like half the passengers didn't have seats."

The reason is simple. The week before Hurricane Katrina, there were 174 daily flights into and out of New Orleans, said Michelle Duffourc, public relations manager for Louis Armstrong airport. By Nov. 9, there should be 26.

The situation changes all the time, of course, but here's what the New Orleans flight roster was at midweek; when available, we've also added each airline's refund or exchange policies for tickets from (or to) New Orleans purchased before Aug. 27.

CONTINENTAL: four daily round trip flights to Houston International and one to Newark.

NORTHWEST: two daily to Memphis, Detroit and Minneapolis/St. Paul.

AMERICAN: two daily flights to Dallas/Fort Worth. Those who bought tickets but no longer plan to travel from or to New Orleans before Oct. 31 can obtain a refund or apply the value of a ticket to a flight to another city; an additional fare may be applied, but there will be no change fee. Those who have tickets for travel Nov. 1 to July 21, 2006 can receive a refund in the form of a voucher for future travel; however, a refund is possible if the flight was canceled.

SOUTHWEST: The carrier that normally has more flights in and out of New Orleans than any other airline currently has just two round trip flights to Houston Hobby airport. All reservations made before the storm for flights through Jan. 9, 2006 were canceled and are not being reinstated. Customers who have paid reservations can request a refund or apply the money towards a future flight. Go to www.southwest.com or call (800) 435-9792.

DELTA: four flights to and from Atlanta, and one to Cincinnati. Passengers may be eligible for refunds for flights booked by Aug. 27 for travel through Oct. 31 on Delta, Delta Song, Delta Connection and Delta code flights. Even if a flight is not canceled, passengers can make a one-time change without a penalty fee for flights through Oct. 31. Tickets must be re-issued by that date. Customers flying to or from New Orleans or Gulfport, Miss., can fly to or from any other airport used by Delta in Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi or Texas, with no fare adjustments or penalties before Oct. 31.

JETBLUE: one daily flight to and from New York City's JFK. Customers who have existing reservations for travel to or from New Orleans may rebook without change fees or fare differences; travel must begin within one year of the date of cancellation. Online changes are subject to a $20 change fee and any additional fare increases. Customers who request a refund will be given a full refund for any New Orleans reservation through the end of the current JetBlue schedule.

UNITED: daily flights to and from Chicago O'Hare and Denver; scheduled to add a daily flight to and from Washington Dulles on Oct. 31. Those who hold tickets for flights through Oct. 31 can request a refund or re-route themselves to another city, which may be subject to a higher fare; penalty restrictions will be waived. For pre-booked travel Nov. 1 to Jan. 5, 2006, it's possible to change plans for the same or a new destination without penalty, although there may be a higher fare.

AIRTRAN: one round trip to Atlanta.

USAIRWAYS: daily flights to and from Philadelphia, Charlotte, N.C., and Washington Reagan starting Nov. 9. Passengers with tickets that were issued before Katrina for travel through Nov. 8 can change the tickets without a fee. If the flight has been canceled, would-be passengers can apply for a refund. Changes must be made by Nov. 8, but travel can take place up to a year from the date the original ticket was issued. Those who were traveling to or from New Orleans can change their cities of origin and/or destination.

To retrieve the latest information from the airport about arrivals and departures of daily flights, check www.flymsy.com.

BEWARE THE $645 PARKING SPACE

Owners of cars parked in the airport lots before Aug. 29 would do well to retrieve them since they're being charged the normal rates of $15 a day in short-term parking and $10 in long-term parking.

To put that into perspective: If you parked in the short-term lot to get out of town the day before the storm hit and return home today retrieve it, you'll have to pay the parking lot attendant $645 to get out of the lot.

If there are extenuating circumstances why an owner cannot retrieve a car, e-mail fparker@parking.com.

BOOKS

'Great cities always recover'

A new book about the Great California Earthquake of 1906 offers hope for victims of the Great Hurricane of 2005

By Susan Larson
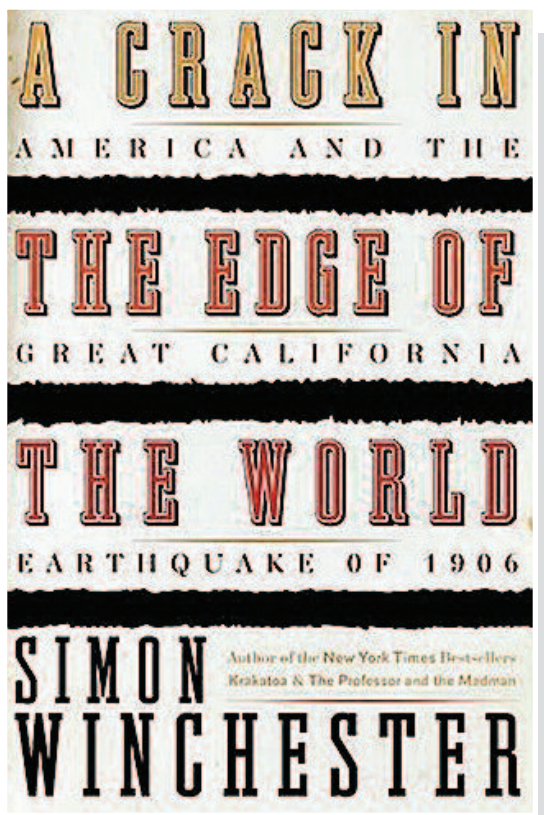
Book editor

In times of trouble, nothing is more diverting — or instructive — than tales of another, different disaster. So it is with Simon Winchester's "A Crack in the Edge of the World: America and the Great California Earthquake of 1906" (HarperCollins, $27.95). Winchester, who has made the slow march of geological time itself the impetus for a page-turning breeze, is at his best in this most recent work, which has lessons for New Orleans in this post-Katrina period.

He begins with Neil Armstrong's 1969 walk on the moon, a salutary event that gave mankind a new view of the planet, "a view that in time compelled humankind to take stock." So it is with the New Geology, which views the planet as a whole. Remember the Gaia hypothesis? Taking the large, planetary view, Winchester guides us through the geology of the event, explicating plate tectonics, from the calderas of Iceland over to the San Andreas Fault, such a lovely and dangerous place to live, right up to the Alaska pipeline and the Denali Fault.

The clash of geology and the urban setting that took place April 18, 1906, was dramatic. Winchester draws on San Francisco's rich history, and the cast of characters is fascinating: the Big Four, the men who created much of the city's destiny, Collis Huntington, Leland Stanford, Mark Hopkins and Charles Crocker; 4-year-old Ansel Adams, who fell down and broke his nose during the quake; already well-known photographer Arnold Genthe, who would borrow a camera and begin shooting immediately; even the actor John Barrymore, who was in town when the quake hit, as was the singer Enrico Caruso.



Chronicling the cataclysmic 8.5-magnitude quake itself, Winchester describes how people were stunned in the silence that followed, and spoke to each other in whispers, while some fell to their knees in the streets. Harvard psychologist William James, for one, was "delighted to be there," and Winchester describes how some "thought themselves lucky to be enfolded in an event of truly historic significance."

But the destruction was humbling: 28,818 buildings were destroyed, estimates of the dead rose from 500 to more than 3,000 over the years; 225,000 of the city's 400,000 citizens became homeless.

Of the dreadful aftermath, Winchester writes, there was more than enough tragedy to go around: fires that broke out across the city; political upheavals; insurance scandals; urban planning debates; the racist fallout for the beleaguered Chinese population; the beginnings of the Pentecostal movement, inspired by the belief that the quake was God's vengeance on a sinful city; the fascinating lack of art inspired by the event; the rush to rebuild and the chance for civic greatness "swiftly and thoughtlessly passed up."

But, as Winchester writes, the city came back, for cities exist where they do for reasons — reasons that spring from the human heart as well as the marketplace.

"Trials of any kind — war, pestilence, natural or human violence, with wholesale death or total physical destruction, or both, being the hardest of all — may slow that growth or cause some other setback; but such things are just setbacks, and before long the city returns to its old self, ready to see what more fate can hurl at it, to challenge and strengthen and temper the will to survive. It may not always entirely regain its pre-disaster status — San Francisco had to cede much to Los Angeles, for example. But generally, so far as their respective quiddities are concerned, great cities always recover."

Like New Orleanians in 2005, San Franciscans of nearly a century ago felt the very earth shift beneath their feet. But, as Winchester reminds us in his lovely prose, "all that humans do, and everywhere that humans inhabit, is for the moment only."

Holy Days and hobnobbing in Houston

By Nell Nolan
Society columnist

"It was such a wonderful dinner with all the foods we grew up with," said Orleanian-in-Houston Roselle Ungar about a special gathering for Rosh Hashana. The meal, which was set up as a private dinner with tablecloths and fresh flowers, as well as traditional dishes, was hosted by Houstonian Ziggy Gruber at his spot, Kenny & Ziggy Delicatessen. He closed the restaurant for the event.

Among the New Orleanians present were Roselle and husband Stanley Ungar, Eric and Jayne Stillman and children, and Matt and Sherri Tarr with their kids. Ziggy sat at the head of the table and, according to Roselle, entertained them as they relished all the dishes associated with the Jewish New Year. Several of the menu items were chopped liver, chicken soup with kreplach, and stuffed cabbage rolls.

"He was so generous," continued Roselle, who explained that the tie-in was the Jewish Federation of New Orleans and that of Houston.

As for a return to the Crescent City, Roselle mentioned that Stanley was commuting and that they are planning to return by Oct. 19. "We'll be so glad to go home," she added.

In another location, but still in Houston, Diane Franco established just that.

"I'm walking into my parents' home," she said, using her cell phone and referring to the temporary Houston digs of Bill and Jane Goldring, her mom and dad. Diane and husband Alan had gone to Houston for a bar mitzvah prior to Katrina and have stayed. "We thought we would be away for just a few days," she said. She, too, talked about some commuting and finished with, "We would like to be back in New Orleans as soon as we can. We will come out of this strong."

Arlene Barron was on the move, too, when I contacted her. (She and Paul were driving.) As concerns the Jewish Community Centers in New Orleans, she said that the Uptown/St. Charles Avenue center would open in a couple of weeks.

"When people start returning to New Orleans" she said, "they will need a relief from their stress, a place to work out." She added that the JCC is "eager to get back to serving the community." As for husband Paul Barron, Arlene said that's he's been working with Tulane President Scott Cowen "to get the university up and running." Dr. Cowen and much of the Tulane force have been set up in Houston, too.

"We wish we were home," bemoaned temporary-Houstonian Carol Asher, whose New Orleans home had 3 feet of water. "But we were among the lucky ones, everyone's OK," she said about herself and husband Harold. They will move to Covington around the middle of October and then plan their eventual return to the city. "New Orleans is our home and now is the time to commit."

Also in Houston are Pam and Jack Lyles, whose 155-year-old St. Charles Avenue home in the Garden District was open last December for the Holiday Home Tour of the Preservation Resource Center. They stayed through Katrina and "the house was fine," but left during the mandatory evacuation.

Jack is originally from Houston and the couple have lived in that Texas city, which became their immediate destination when they evacuated. In one car there were family members and five animals. Their son, Taylor, who normally matriculates at Newman (which is slated to reopen on Jan. 3, 2006), is now at St. John's in Houston. Then, it's a return to the Crescent City.

"We're going back to New Orleans," said Pam, adding that, although her husband's business, Mardi Gras Motors LLC, was ruined, they wanted to return and help the city "get back on its feet."

"It's going to be a long haul in New Orleans," she observed, "and there will be another whole focus and commitment when we go back."

Doctor tends to heart of city

LIND, from C-1

Street operation was busy, even operating a respirator by generator for a lung disease patient and finding substitution meds for a troubled Vietnam veteran living in Bywater.

Lutz is what you might call —in the realm of the Vieux Carre's quirky and eccentric denizens — a distinguished French Quarter character, a devotee of Galatoire's, Antoine's and the delicacies at the Royal Street Grocery Store deli at St. Ann and Royal.

He's originally from Athens, Ala., but is, after all these years, as New Orleans as you can get, a familiar and friendly voice on the airwaves, debunking health rumors and providing insights to many medical questions, especially infectious diseases.

How he wound up in the Crescent City is another story, however.

In his senior year in high school, he and a couple of classmates "got on the Hummingbird train out of north Alabama and came to New Orleans." At the Union Passenger Terminal, they got a cab and told the driver "to take us to the finest hotel in New Orleans."

"He took one look at us," Lutz recalled, "and brought us straight to the Lafayette Hotel, a fleabag flophouse." The year was 1965 and they came just in time for Hurricane Betsy. "We went through Betsy in the bar at the Lafayette Hotel," he said.

After graduation, he went to Vanderbilt where he graduated in pre-med and chemistry before coming to Tulane Medical School in 1969.

His first encounter with medical misinformation came during another well-documented storm, Camille, which ravaged the Gulf Coast that same year. There was a new head of the public health school, Lutz said, and he was convinced that an outbreak of typhoid fever was going to occur in Mississippi.

So off they went to inoculate everyone. It has long since been proved that there is no correlation between outbreaks of typhoid fever and cholera following a hurricane. "All we did was give a lot of cleanup workers a lot of sore arms," he said. "There is absolutely no increase in typhoid fever or cholera following a storm."

It's just another urban myth, of which there are no shortages, he said.

"There are a tremendous amount of rumors," he said, about what to do and what not to do, health-wise." But to get really sick, he said, "You'd have to drink water that's been contaminated by sewage, and I think most people wouldn't drink out of the Mississippi after a hurricane."

Lutz also said he generally recommends that people follow the advice of public officials but "unfortunately, they don't always give good advice."

When one health official started talking about cholera and typhoid fever, "I knew we were in trouble," he said. "Because it usually starts with poisonous snakes and snakebites, and alligators — concerns about them eating people. Even Aaron Broussard was seeing great white sharks in Metairie — I'm pretty sure that's what I heard.

"It probably was a garfish."

Lutz went home to Alabama for a couple of days when the water pressure disappeared, fearful of fire. But he couldn't stay there. He came back to his home, to help and assist others in the Quarter area — an area he sees changing.

"I see the Quarter coming back to what it was before the war — a residential neighborhood of 20,000, not the 2,000 it is today.

"From the standpoint of repopulation, I would be very surprised if more than 200,000 people came back - more likely 150,000. There isn't the infrastructure to support a greater population. I see New Orleans as really being an adult city for the next few years, like the French Quarter has been for years. People with grade school kids are going to be scarce."

That, of course, is one man's opinion - but one who has seen a lot and talked to a lot of people and fully understands it will take some time for conventions and tourism to return.

"The French Quarter is and always will be the heart that pumps the blood of this city," he said. "And now it will be more a place for Orleanians to live than to come and party."

Texas finally beats Sooners

Brown ends skid in Red River Rivalry

From wire reports

DALLAS — The game was over, the "Eyes of Texas" had been sung and Vince Young still was on the run.

The Texas Longhorns finally had beaten the Oklahoma Sooners - stuck it to 'em, 45-12 - and more than 30,000 people wearing burnt orange were on their feet turning five years of frustration into sheer joy. Young had as much to celebrate as anyone, so he whipped up a few more cheers by going along the stands slapping hands and posing for pictures.

"We wanted them to feel everything we were feeling," Young said. "It was a great moment for all of us."

Young showed the Sooners how much he's developed since their last meeting, throwing three touchdown passes and guiding the No. 2 Longhorns to a victory with so many meaningful implications.

It starts with Texas (5-0, 2-0 Big 12) shattering its longest losing streak in this 100-game series since the 1950s, and it means the Longhorns have cleared a huge hurdle in pursuit of their first national championship since 1969.

Young redeemed himself for last year's shutout and continued a winning streak he's been building ever since. Although that 12-game run includes beating Michigan in the Rose Bowl and winning at Ohio State, this one means the most to Coach Mack Brown because it ends the year-round question of when he'll beat Oklahoma. Doing it with aggressive play-calling helps his image, too.

"We've had a tough time in this series. I'm not proud of that, and I feel responsible for that," Brown said. "To see the kids out on the field with the fans, the interaction after the game, is something you feel really good about."

The Sooners (2-3, 1-1) looked nothing like the clubs that drummed the Longhorns by a combined scored of 189-54 the past five years. Then again, they're not.

Oklahoma has only six starters back and came into this game unranked for the first time since its last loss to Texas, in 1999. Star running back Adrian Peterson, who gained 225 yards against the Longhorns last year, was limited to three early carries for 10 yards because of a sprained ankle.

KILN, MISS. — Monday night, the Kiln faithful pour into the Broke Spoke bar to watch football.

Though phone service is difficult, if not impossible, to find and people still are cleaning up homes ravaged by Hurricane Katrina and some are living in tents, one of the Kiln's favorite sons, Brett Favre, is playing. That is enough.

So much of the Kiln shows up to cheer.

Brett gives them, as he always does, everything he has. It is not enough. The Packers lose to the Carolina Panthers 32-29, falling to 0-4. A fourth-quarter comeback, one of Favre's specialties, falls short with a fourth-down pass.

The Kiln exhales a tired breath when the ball hits the ground.

Can't seem to win anything right now. Can't seem to get up. Can't seem to clean up. Can't seem to come back all the way. In a word, the Kiln can't.

But you can't find anyone who says the Kiln, or Brett Favre, won't be back one day.

It's Tuesday at noon.

Steve Haas plops a beefy arm onto the old wooden bar. He asks a visitor, "What'll you have?"

It's dark and cool inside the wood-frame old bar located in the middle of the Kiln. The large room is lit only by fluorescent bulbs above the pool tables. Kenny Chesney sings about friends dying too early in life in a new video that is playing

Ugly victory would suit Saints

Only meaningful stat is in win column

By Mike Triplett
Staff Writer

GREEN BAY, WIS. — The Green Bay Packers have lost their past three games by a total of six points — a trend the Saints would be more than happy to continue this afternoon at Lambeau Field.

The Saints (2-2) would be perfectly content to win by one point, just as they were content with a three-point victory at Carolina in Week 1 and a mundane 19-7 victory over Buffalo last week.

SAINTS at PACKERS
noon today
TV/Radio: Fox; 870-AM

Entering this season with more of a "slow and steady wins the race" attitude under new offensive coordinator Mike Sheppard, the Saints showed remarkable patience in the Buffalo victory, nursing a six-point lead into the fourth quarter without feeling pressure to make the quick strike.

"I think the philosophy is more just win, you know. Not how we win. And I think for the first time since I've been here, it hasn't been one of those, ëWe need to score 40 points," said offensive tackle Wayne Gandy, who came to the Saints from Pittsburgh as a free agent in 2003. "I came from somewhere where it was more like we're doing now. Then when I first got here, it was like, ... As fast as you can get in the end zone, let's go.' And to win 21-17, even a win, it would always be, ... Well, we've got to do better.'

"And now it's like, we won 19-7, it's a win. Nobody cares what the score is. After 10 wins, nobody's going to be like, ... Well, you only won by two points.' We're going to be sitting here celebrating because we're in the playoffs."

The Saints' must-score philosophy had more to do with their defense than their offense. After the 2000 season, the Saints' defense became a deficiency, ranking in the bottom half of the league the past four years, including last in 2004.

Scott says rebuilding job not done

But he expects team to show improvement

By John Reid
Staff writer

OKLAHOMA CITY — Despite having talented point guard Chris Paul and more athletic players capable of executing his offense, Hornets coach Byron Scott isn't predicting a playoff run for his team this season.

But he said if this season turns out to be anything like last season when they finished at 18-64, it would be considered unacceptable by his standards.

"If we win 23 games, then we didn't do what we were supposed to do as a basketball team and I didn't do what I was supposed to do as a basketball coach," Scott said. "I don't have to win 35 games, but I feel we have to improve.

"Nineteen or 20 wins this season are not enough. Are we setting our goals higher? Yes, we are. If we win 33 games, we think it would be a successful season. Right now, we're farther along than we were at the end of the season, I think we're better on both ends of the court right now than we were at the end of the season."

Maybe that's why owner George Shinn continues to make a concerted push to sell season tickets for the 35 games to be played at the 19,675-seat Ford Center. He has been telling many of those potential fans, who will be seeing NBA basketball for the first time, that once they come, they'll want to come back.

Perhaps, it would be hard for Shinn to keep saying that if the Hornets fared as they did last season when they lost 30 of their 41 home games.

But Scott isn't worried about having higher expectations, not after what he's seen so far from his players after the first week of training camp at Southern Nazarene University. At last year's camp, the Hornets generated more news off the court than on it. Former point guard Baron Davis had already demanded to be traded through his agent before camp started, and he was upset for months about a new team policy that banned his personal trainer from visiting the practice facility.

WORLD OF SPORTS

AUTO RACING

KENSETH SETS RECORD: Matt Kenseth set a track qualifying record in winning the pole for the Banquet 400 in Kansas City, and is hoping it will put him in position to win today and get back into the race for the Chase for the Nextel Cup championship. Kenseth is seventh in the standings, 111 points behind leader Tony Stewart. Kenseth won the last time he won the pole. The 2003 Winston Cup champion, whose uneventful title run led NASCAR to overhaul its title format, won Aug. 26 at Bristol, his only victory of the season. This is his third career pole. "We had a good car lately, and it's been a lot of fun to drive them," said Kenseth, who ran a lap of 180.856 mph in his Ford on Saturday. "We haven't had good cars until last couple of months." The top five qualifiers all broke Jimmie Johnson's track record of 180.373 mph, set in 2003. No other title contenders made it into the first two rows, and only half of the Chase field will start in the top 10. Carl Edwards, sixth in the standings, will start fifth. Greg Biffle, sitting fifth, will start eight. Stewart will start ninth, and defending champion Kurt Busch, 10th in the standings, qualified 10th.

NASCAR WANTS TEAM LIMITS: NASCAR plans to limit the number of teams a car owner will be able to field in the Nextel Cup series, chairman Brian France said. "We're going to make some adjustments in policy to balance the playing field a little better and really go after new ownership in the industry, really benefit and help the teams like the Wood Brothers, the Pettys, Cal Wells, independent teams that are finding themselves in ever increasing difficulties to compete," France said. He said the limit would be phased in during the next few seasons. "It won't happen tomorrow," France said. "But it would phase down from five to four to some other number." All of the top teams in NASCAR are multicar teams, with Roush Racing and Hendrick Motorsports leading the way with five and four cars. The benefits of running more than one car are clear: additional tests under current testing limits, information sharing among the teams, multiple sponsorships that provide great resources, and sometimes on-track cooperation among teammates.

RAIN STIFLES GP: Rain soaked the track at the Japanese Grand Prix in Suzuka, Japan, leaving world champion Fernando Alonso and other top drivers at the back of the grid for today's Formula One race. The morning run was hampered by overnight rain, although conditions improved by the time qualifying started. But with 10 minutes left, heavy rain returned for the last four starters - Alsonso, seven-time world champion Michael Schumacher, Kimi Raikkonen and Juan Pablo Montoya. The four drivers have won 16 of the 17 races this season.

GOLF

AROUND THE WORLD: John Bickerton shot a 2-under 69 to take a one-stroke lead over Stuart Little after the third round of the Abama Open de Canarias in Tenerife, Canary Islands. Bickerton was at 7-under 206 after beginning the day two shots behind Little (72).

NFL

AROUND THE LEAGUE: Pittsburgh Steelers backup quarterback Tommy Maddox strained his right calf in practice and is doubtful for Monday night's game at San Diego. Charlie Batch who has played only a few downs the past three years, is expected to be Ben Roethlisberger's backup for the first of the Steelers' three Monday night games. Jerome Bettis, the No. 5 rusher in NFL history, could play for the first time since injuring a calf during the third of the Steelers' four exhibition games. . . . The Chicago Bears signed kicker Robbie Gould and placed linebacker Joe Odom on injured reserve. Starter Doug Brien, a former Saint, has struggled this season, missing three of four field-goal attempts.

BASEBALL

WASHINGTON AWAITS CALL: Members of the Oakland Athletics coaching staff have yet to be called in for interviews for the team's managerial vacancy. Third-base coach Ron Washington, a native of New Orleans, has an interview scheduled Tuesday with the Florida Marlins for their manager job, open since Jack McKeon stepped down. Washington said he also expects to be a candidate for the job vacated by Lou Piniella in Tampa Bay once the Devil Rays hire a general manager. Washington, whose entire family was displaced from New Orleans by Hurricane Katrina, said Saturday that A's general manager Billy Beane vowed at the end of the season to interview the Oakland staff if things didn't work out with third-year manager Ken Macha.

Saints defense has improved this season

SAINTS, from C-1

But this year, the Saints defense has been stingy in spurts, especially in the second half of games — though the results have been skewed by the Saints' two penalty-and turnover-ridden losses.

Getting back into their groove last Sunday, the Saints held an opponent to fewer than 10 points for just the fourth time since 2000.

They held Buffalo to 67 yards passing — the lowest total since Saints coach Jim Haslett took over in 2000.

"I think if we play with a lead, we're a much better team," said Haslett, who agreed with Gandy's outlook on the team's past philosophy. "I think it's because we didn't think we were very good on defense, and we thought we needed to score a lot of points. And consequently, our offensive coordinator (Mike McCarthy) wanted to score a lot. And we thought that was a way to win games.

"But now we think we're better on defense, and we think we have a better chance of winning if we control the ball and keep the defense off the field."

A large part of the Saints' philosophy stems from wanting to take advantage of tailback Deuce McAllister — arguably their most valued weapon.

McAllister had his first 100-yard game of the season against Buffalo, running for 83 of his 130 yards in the fourth quarter.

"We know if we take our time and everybody executes, one play at a time, we're a heck of an offense," McAllister said. "It's when you rush things that you don't do what you normally do."

By emphasizing the run, the Saints have somewhat de-emphasized the passing game. But that, too, has been a way of maximizing quarterback Aaron Brooks' skills.

In the Saints' two victories this year, Brooks threw for just 192 yards and 172 yards, respectively. But he threw zero interceptions (compared to five in the two losses this year) and led them on a game-winning two-minute drive at the end of the Carolina game.

By not being asked to hit the home run, Brooks has been able to follow the adage, "Take what the defense gives you."

At Carolina, he completed six passes to tight end Ernie Conwell for 71 yards. Against Buffalo, Brooks ran seven times for 33 yards — including a four-yard touchdown scamper that he checked to on a called pass play.

"He sees the hole, he takes it," Haslett said, saying Brooks' read on the touchdown was a result of the repetition of plays in the Saints' simpler, abbreviated playbook this season. "It's repetitive plays. The quarterback and the offense feel much better with what we're doing."

The Saints offense has been more patient and methodical, looking to create third-and-short situations and put together long offensive drives, rather than trying for long passes and falling into third-and-long.

In both victories, the Saints won the time of possession battle, despite gaining just 291 yards against Carolina and 333 yards against the Bills.

Against Buffalo, the Saints gained a perfectly-balanced 167 yards passing and 166 yards rushing.

Gandy said the idea is not to intentionally lessen Brooks' role but to stop "making him feel like he has to win the game all by himself."

And Gandy said Brooks has no problem sacrificing numbers for victories.

"I think that in Aaron's seven or eight years in the league, he's had those two or three seasons where he's put up big numbers that show, ... Hey, I can throw the ball.' And I think now in his career, winning is the ultimate measure of success.

"I'm quite sure he would take 210 yards and a Super Bowl ring."

Battered Kiln vows to rebuild

on the bar's three televisions.

The only customer, a man wearing a red-and-white local trucking company hat, two or three days of stubble, smoking a nub of a Marlboro, plays video poker in a cubicle in the corner of the bar.

The smoke drifts out of the cubicle into the larger room like one of the many dogs that walk through the Kiln unattended.

It's lunchtime, but no one but Haas and a couple of others are home.

The big sign, BROKE SPOKE, written in large black letters on top of a Confederate flag, is back in its place on the front of the place where people have written names and their addresses all over the outside wall. The sign was blown into the woods beyond the bar by Katrina. But Haas, who rode out the storm in Florida, came back after two days, found it and nailed it back into place. The bar was closed a week while Haas waited for electricity.

"We're getting back to normal," says Haas, whose famous friend, Brett Favre, is the catalyst for the bar's popularity and notoriety. Haas has known Favre since he was in the fifth grade.

Normal is a matter of perspective, one imagines. Outside the bar, two women are lying on sleeping bags inside a large tent beneath the shade of a massive oak.

Since he returned to this town of 2,000 or so, Haas has been cooking and serving a free meal in the evenings. He has to go to the Picayune Wal-Mart or the Gulfport Sam's Club to get supplies, but he does it willingly.

"It ain't no big deal," he says. "There was never a doubt that things are going to come back around here. No one around here will ever lay down. They'll work hard until it does come back."

No quit in them

Mark Smith, a local contractor, says people are just waiting to get going.

"The people around here are just waiting for insurance people. They're hurting, they're starving. They can't hire anyone like us to get the trees off their roofs because they're scared to move things. We can't go out and start work. That's our biggest problem.

"Hey, we've done a lot of work for free. The amount of work is unbelievable. I worked (Hurricane) Ivan last year, and it was a thunderstorm compared to this. They better hope to God they never see anything like this again."

Outside the Broke Spoke, normal is fleeting, tempting. In sparkling sunshine, a fire truck races down Highway 43, howling as it zips past the few cars stopped at the red light in the center of town. The fire truck, however, is from Fairfax, Va., having come to help the Kiln get back in operation.

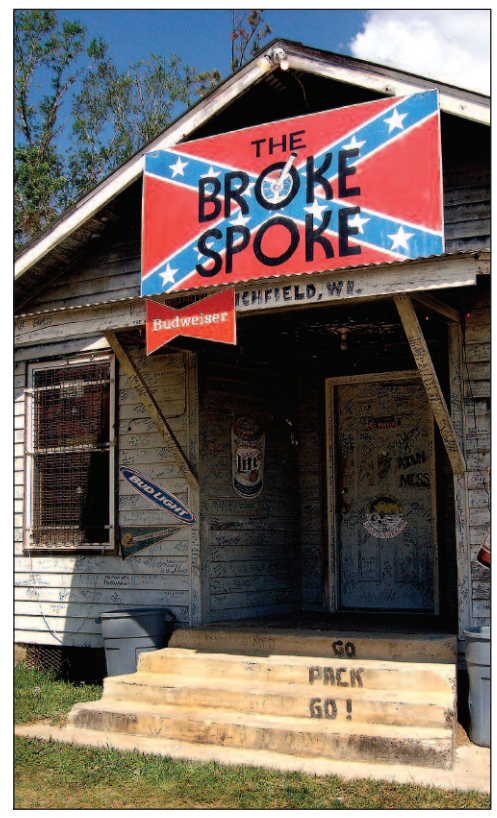
Across the four-way stop from the bar, at Dolly's Quik Stop, they're feeding a long line of hungry contractors, electrical company workers and persons tired and dusty. Dolly's, which closed but two days before opening with no gas but lots of cold beer, serves delicacies like Hannah's Pigs Feet, and behind the counter there are what are advertised as "new Boudin Balls."

A large roach skitters across the floor of the diner/service station, and flies are dancing on and off the spaghetti meat sauce, but the customers are wolfing down the food. Indeed, the corn dogs are brown-crispy outside and juicy inside.

"Z" Bilbo and her husband, Thomas, are eating lunch at one of the booths. They've been in the Kiln nearly all their lives. They say they've followed Brett "somewhat."

Thomas sips coffee from a white cup next to an ashtray filled with butts. He reflects on what he has seen. "Things look pretty normal around here now. You can have a cup of coffee and some air conditioning. But go down this road here to Waveland or go down to Jourdan River Shores, and they had 18 feet of water in their homes. It's coming back. Sure it is."

The Kiln almost feels like fate is piling on the Packers, who are off to the worst start of Favre's career going into today's game against the Saints. "It's terrible, terrible," Haas says. "But at least the Saints have won a couple, so we can fall back on them. We pull for both teams."



Eliott Neceise watched the Monday night game using rabbit ears on his TV set to get a local station. He had to find them from a closet because he was used to cable TV, and cable doesn't exist here yet.

"It's coming back around here, but it's slow, very slow," Neceise says of the Kiln. Neceise says the Kiln is kind of like the Packers on Monday night. "They started slow, but they came back. It wasn't a win, but it was respectable."

Packers coach Mike Sherman says the reason the Monday night game was respectable was primarily Favre, who threw four touchdown passes. "He brought us back to within a field goal, and we had a makeshift offensive line and people blocking their butts off for him, trying to get that win, and it just didn't happen. But I think the team has responded to him the same this year as they have in the past."

No one connected to the Packers said they believe there is any quit in Favre, no matter the start, no matter what has happened to his family or the Kiln.

Sherman says, in fact, that when adversity comes to his quarterback, the team responds well.

Steve Haas, owner of the Broke Spoke bar, says: 'We're getting back to normal.'

"There's no question," Sherman says. "The greatest example of his effect on his teammates is we play that Monday night (in 2003) against Oakland right after his dad passed away and how that team responded to that adversity, the situation he found himself in, playing a game right after finding out your dad passed away. The team responds very positively to him when he's in need."

"He's the leader of the pack," says Packers wide receiver Donald Driver. "If he has a positive attitude, I think everybody in the locker room will have a positive attitude. We all stick together."

They stick together in the Kiln, too.

See, the Kiln is inching closer to recovery. Little attention is being paid to cutting grass, but they're closer to getting the debris out of the way.

Outside Dolly's, which features a huge mural of a Green Bay Packers helmet and the words "Kiln Mississippi Packers" on a wall to the side of the building, there's a sheet of plywood nailed to two posts. Five telephones are perched on each side of the plywood, with telephone cords running from the bottom of the phones. Those are about the only land lines in the area.

You want to make a call around here, you come to the makeshift South Central Bell telephone office in the parking lot. Even cell phones have been hit-and-miss. Immediately after the storm, many people in the county gathered at the foot of the old Highway 90 Bay Bridge because, for some reason, that was the only place you could get a signal. It was like a scene out of the movie "War of the Worlds." The first thing to go was the phone service. Cell phones are operating now, Dolly's customers say.

The Hancock Bank, which proudly opened in 2000, is operating, though the strip mall it is located in absorbed heavy damage. Sheet metal from roofs is put off in a corner like an offending child.

Three miles down Highways 43/603 at Hancock North Central High School, the statue of Brett Favre, outside Brett Favre Field, is fine. It's still heaving touchdown passes. The school, which is fighting back as slowly as the town it is near, is the place Favre played quarterback for his father. It was a staging area for distribution of goods to the needy in mid-September, and emergency vehicles are still at the school.

The Hawks played their first football game, a 42-6 loss to the Gulf Coast's top-rated team, Ocean Springs, on Sept. 30. They lost nearly a third of their team because of Katrina, including seven starters. They're playing a seven-game schedule, with 25 junior-high players filling out the roster.

It could have been worse. Just a mile from the school, at Stennis International Airport, Katrina turned a hangar into sheet-metal Swiss cheese. The estimated cost of repair for the airport is $1.4 million, which has been approved by the federal government.

Up Highway 603, Bruno's Bar, with the spray-painted rebel flag on the concrete-block wall out front, is closed as is the Cajun Connection, a seafood restaurant nearby. At the end of that road, at the very entrance to the Kiln, the post that holds the sign that says "Welcome to the Kiln, home of Brett Favre," broke. The sign rests next to the post. Down, but not out.

More despair

Ironically, this was supposed to be a more tranquil season for Favre, who at the age of 35 certainly can see retirement coming fairly soon, though he denies that the Packers' start will have anything to do with that decision.

In the past couple of years, along with his father's death, Favre's wife, Deanna, who rode out the storm at the couple's ranch in Hattiesburg, Miss., with their two children, was diagnosed with breast cancer. She successfully underwent treatment. Pain and worry have been constant companions in Favre's house.

"He's had adversity in his life before this season," Sherman said, "and this is just another chapter in the book, so to speak, and a big chapter obviously. He's holding up quite well, as he usually does. He's almost hardened by it, because of so many things that have happened to him. He almost handles it too well."

Sherman told Favre to forget the team's workouts in Green Bay in the offseason and go home and come back ready to "knock down the door."

The door was blown down Aug. 29 when Katrina came calling.

A harrowing night

The city's most famous residents aren't to be seen this day. Ten miles or so from Dolly's, Favre's mother, Bonita, and her family are cleaning up, down Irving Favre road, named after Brett's father.

"They're at home," Haas says, "because they lost everything. They have a lot of do."

A family of three comes by a visitor, stopping politely to ask if they can help. They say they're heading into the compound and will bring Bonita out. They never do.

A half-mile from the entrance to the compound is a field littered with tents, 14 of them. The road out to the Favre compound is a testimony to the power of the storm. Storm surge and the incredible winds attacked house after house. Some are sticks of wood, families' lives spoken of by chunks of garbage. Everyone has a tarp. Everyone has a sign, most with their addresses painted on them. The strip mall across from the entrance to the compound that was filled with a gourmet coffee house, a sign of unique progress in this old town, is heavily damaged.

Some signs tell visitors they will be shot if they are found looting.

Favre's family rode out Katrina in a terrifying day and night at the family compound, located behind a large black security fence. The family home was built in 1950 and rode out monster hurricane Camille in 1969. They figured they were safe.

The compound features a two-story pool house that serves as an office for Brett's brother Jeff. It was built on a hill about 25 feet above the Rotten Bayou to the west and Mill Creek to the east.

Those waters flow together and wedge into the Jourdan River near town. That river and the surge from the Gulf was what flooded much of the subdivisions on Highway 43.

Bonita and her 87-year-old mother, Izella "Meemaw" French, had to seek refuge in the attic of the home when the floodwaters from the storm suddenly invaded. Within five or 10 minutes, Kiln residents say, the water was onto everyone. Favre's mother scrambled up stairs much like the former Southern Mississippi quarterback has run from pass rushers all these years ... with abandon.

Bonita told a Houston TV station that she risked her life to save a trophy case filled with Brett's memorabilia near the entrance to her home as the water rose in her house. She says she managed to clear the bottom two shelves but didn't get the rest.

After two days, she finally got in contact with her son by hailing the TV truck and borrowing their satellite phone to make a call to Brett. At one point the family had only the clothes they were wearing when the storm hit.

Sports aids comeback

In the Kiln, they're tough folks, they tell you without much prompting.

Customers pile into Dolly's wearing no shirts and skin the color and consistency of leather.

They're coming back, they maintain.

Brett has been instrumental in relief efforts for his home county since Katrina, pouring resources and money into the work. Favre friend and business associate Clark Henegan helped drive a truck from Madison, Wis., with supplies. The 18-wheeler had chainsaws, generators, diapers, baby formula, work gloves and boots, canned food and dog food, all donated through Favre's Web site, www.brettfavre.com.

Favre's 4ward Foundation in Hattiesburg helped ensure 30 semis were sent during the month of September. Cash totaling $198,000 was provided. The Packers also worked hard, collecting donations as part of the NFL's Hurricane Relief Weekend, during which the Saints played the New York Giants in the Meadowlands.

A friend of Haas, who had a second Broke Spoke in Green Bay for five years, also brought plenty of help to the area.

"Sports is helping bring people back," Haas says. "We were packed Monday night, and we'll be packed (today). After the football game, we'll put it on the car racing and watch that. We'll enjoy it all day."

Both Haas and Smith say the Kiln is part Packers fans, part Saints fans and all rebuilding.

The Favre family left the Kiln for Green Bay on Saturday to help the Packers host a Katrina relief effort. Brett's brothers Scott and Jeff, sister Brandi, Bonita and Deanna signed copies of the book, "Favre," at the Lambeau Field Atrium. The book is published by Rugged Land Books.

In the Kiln, that's highly appropriate.

Packers' exec's heart still with New Orleanians

Jones spearheaded fundraising effort in Wisconsin

By Brian Allee-Walsh
NFL Columnist

GREEN BAY, WIS. — Although he's 18 years removed from the Big Easy, the river still runs deep for John Jones, the designated successor to Green Bay Packers president/CEO Bob Harlan when Harlan retires following the 2006 season.

These are difficult times for J.J., a friend and former Times-Picayune colleague. His football team is winless through the first quarter of the season, and Hurricane Katrina has left his hometown battered, bruised and slowly recovering in intensive care.

Though Sunday games don't equate with personal tragedy, each can exact a toll on the human spirit.

"We're 0-4 but we're only a game and a half out of first place (in the NFC North),'' Jones said. "That's what we're playing for. We've got five division games in our last 12, so we are still very much in the division race. We certainly think we're a better ball club than our record shows. But until we prove it on the field, we don't make excuses. We've got to win a football game."

Like most of us who evacuated New Orleans for safe havens, Jones watched the events of Aug. 29 unfold on cable and network television. Like most he went to bed that night believing the city had escaped Katrina's wrath, only to learn the next morning that breaches in the city's levee system were causing widespread flooding.

"I could only watch about five minutes at a time,'' said Jones, whose family home near the intersection of St. Charles and Jackson Avenue served as an annual gathering for revelers on Fat Tuesday. "It was so overwhelming to see the city destroyed the way it was destroyed.

"It was eery seeing the overhead scenes from helicopters, and then recognizing neighborhoods by the tops of trees or street lights or intersections. It was difficult to comprehend for anyone who had grown up in New Orleans to see those neighborhoods underwater. I've always known the city to be a survivor in so many of these storms. But once the levees went, I think everyone knew what that meant."

In the days and weeks following Katrina, Jones helped spearhead a relief effort under the Packers' good name. The community of Green Bay initially raised $100,000, a figure that was matched at the team's home opener in Week 2 against the Cleveland Browns.

Packers' quarterback Brett Favre and his family also felt Katrina's fury, losing homes and lifelong belongings in Kiln, Miss., and along the Mississippi Gulf Coast. Jones estimates that the Brett Favre 4-ward Foundation already has contributed more than $500,000 to Red Cross relief efforts.

In other words, the Packer Nation feels our pain.

"In Green Bay, there's an emotional connection to New Orleans because of Super Bowl XXXI and the way Packers fans were welcomed in New Orleans," Jones said. "Because of the way our people enjoyed themselves and the way the city made us feel so welcomed, and then winning the game there, I think the attachment to the Superdome and those memories played a part in the donations we were able to raise on game day.

"Everyone I had spoken to had already made a contribution to the Red Cross before our game day came up. Still, so many folks stepped forward. It's a great statement about Green Bay and how Green Bay cares about New Orleans."

The Packers and Favre hope to make a statement on the field today - that recent reports of their demise are premature. Jones points to the NFC North standings, where Chicago and Detroit share the lead with 1-2 records, a half-game ahead of Minnesota at 1-3.

With five of their last 12 games coming against the Bears, Lions and Vikings, the Packers haven't given up hope of winning the division and advancing to the playoffs.

"Everyone's thoughts and prayers are with New Orleans, and I'm sure that team will feel a special warmth from Packers fans when they come on the field because of the recent circumstances,'' Jones said. "I think everybody in Green Bay and the Packer community has a very special spot in their hearts for the Saints, owner Tom Benson, their front office, Coach Jim Haslett and his players and what they're going through. They've been so resilient, so strong under such tough conditions.

"I know I have a great deal of respect for the organization and the people working there. But once the ball's kicked off, we're playing to win."

Proving once again that you can take the boy out of New Orleans but you can't take New Orleans out of the boy, Jones has his own Monday tradition in Green Bay during the NFL season.

"Like red beans and rice, the Saints' score is one of the first things I look for each Monday," Jones said. "Just knowing what the organization is going through and how much it must mean to the people of New Orleans and Louisiana, the Saints are always with me. When the Saints started playing in '67, that was one of the biggest events I can remember for New Orleans. There's such an emotional attachment that Saints fans have for their team. I think it will always be that way."

SAINTS WOULD RATHER NOT FACE WINLESS PACKERS

WEEK 5 NFL PICKS

SAINTS - PLUS 3 - AT GREEN BAY: Hell hath no fury like an 0-4 Packers team at home, or something like that. This game could define the Packers' season, one way or the other. The Saints would have been better off if Green Bay had rallied to beat Carolina on Monday night. Packers 26, Saints 24.

TENNESSEE - PLUS 3 - AT HOUSTON: Unless the Texans picked up an offensive line during the open week, the Titans should contain quarterback David Carr and running game. The Texans will remain winless unless the team feels the pain of owner Bob McNair, who lost his city's bid to secure Super Bowl XLIV. Titans 19, Texans 13.

CHICAGO - PLUS 3 - AT CLEVELAND: These teams are expected to be jockeying for position for two of the top 10 picks in the 2006 NFL draft. Too bad they're not playing baseball. . . . White Sox 9, Indians 4 (heading to the ninth).

TAMPA BAY - MINUS 3 - AT NEW YORK JETS: Jets' coach Herman Edwards hands the ball to 42-year-old quarterback Vinny Testaverde and makes the sign of the cross. It seems like a potential ambush for the undefeated Bucs, who have it going their way under Jon Gruden. Buccaneers 23, Jets 16.

SEATTLE - PLUS 3 - AT ST. LOUIS: A battle between NFC West coleaders in a division that could have a champion with an 8-8 record. Rams quarterback Marc Bulger might throw 60 times. Seahawks likely will be without wide receivers Bobby Engram and Darrell Jackson. Rams 29, Seahawks 23.

NEW ENGLAND - PLUS 3 - AT ATLANTA: Toughest game of the week to pick. The Patriots are smarting from a whipping against San Diego and haven't lost back-to-back games since December 2002. Michael Vick comes in with a bum knee. But the Patriots are banged up on both offense and defense and may not have defensive end Richard Seymour. Flip a coin. Patriots 24, Falcons 23.

MIAMI - PLUS 2 - AT BUFFALO: Quarterback Kelly Holcomb takes over the Bills' offense that has scored just two touchdowns in the past 14 quarters. Yawn! Dolphins' defense smothers Willis McGahee, and Gus Frerotte does just enough. Fish 24, Bills 9.

BALTIMORE - PLUS 1 - AT DETROIT: The question is, will either of these teams score? In other words, first team to 10 wins. The Lions have amassed 36 points in three games; the Ravens 30. Give the edge to the Ravens, but I'm not sure why. Ravens 12, Lions 9.

INDIANAPOLIS - MINUS 14 - AT SAN FRANCISCO: Let's see, rookie quarterback Alex Smith, starting for the first time, goes head-up against Peyton Manning, who finally got on a roll last week. The defenseless 49ers do not defend the forward pass very well, which suggests this could be a walk by the bay for Manning and wide receiver Marvin Harrison. Colts 31, 49ers 16.

CAROLINA - MINUS 3 - AT ARIZONA: Arizona returned home from Mexico City with its first win and few reported cases of Montezuma's Revenge. Panthers' quarterback Jake Delhomme slices and dices the home team in front of an estimated 35,000 fans at Sun Devils Stadium, a third of the crowd at their game against the 49ers south of the border. Panthers 30, Cardinals 17.

PHILADELPHIA - MINUS 3 - AT DALLAS: Eagles are rolling under quarterback Donovan McNabb. Cowboys are stinging from a disturbing loss to the Raiders in the Black Hole. Philly takes over sole possession of the division lead with win and Redskins loss. Eagles 23, Cowboys 16.

WASHINGTON - PLUS 7 - AT DENVER: There were few prognosticators at the start of the season who thought this game might actually be meaningful. The Broncos are playing well under Jake Plummer, who will have his hands full against the good Washington defense. Redskins' running back Clinton Portis fails to exact revenge against his former teammates. Broncos 24, Washington 16.

CINCINNATI - PLUS 3 - AT JACKSONVILLE (SUNDAY NIGHT): Lots of folks like the Jaguars in primetime. Quarterback Byron Leftwich seems overdue for a big game, especially at home. But I'm going to ride the Marvin Lewis train for another week. Cincy stays undefeated. Bengals 20, Jaguars 16.

PITTSBURGH - PLUS 3 - AT SAN DIEGO (MONDAY NIGHT): Great primetime matchup, a preview of the playoffs, perhaps. The Chargers are coming off a confidence-building road victory at New England; the Steelers had the week off after losing at home to the Patriots. Chargers 20, Steelers 16.

BYE WEEK: Kansas City, Oakland, New York Giants, Minnesota.

LAST WEEK: 10-4, straight up; 8-6, against the spread.

SAINTS AT PACKERS

Kickoff: Noon at Lambeau Field, Green Bay, Wis.
Coaches: Saints Jim Haslett (44-40 sixth season, all with Saints); Packers Mike Sherman (53-31, sixth season, all with Packers)
TV: FOX Radio: 870-AM

KEEP AN EYE ON

BRETT FAVRE: Forget for a moment the Packers quarterback ranks among the best to ever play the game, and that he may be nearing the end of his storied career. Favre, who turns 36 Monday, has been worth watching on a game-by-game basis throughout his 15-year career. True to form, the free-wheeling playmaker is tied for second in the NFL with nine touchdown passes this year and tied for second in the league with eight interceptions.

The Saints have shown total respect for Favre all week despite his team's struggles this season, stressing they need to keep after him until the whistle blows on every play, because he's not afraid to throw across his body, on the run, or on his heels. They also stressed the need to keep their intensity level high the entire game, because Favre is one of the most dangerous fourth-quarter QBs in NFL history.

In three career games against the Saints (two victories, one loss), Favre has completed 68 of 106 passes for 728 yards with seven touchdowns, one interception and a passer rating of 102.2.

MIKE MCKENZIE: The Saints cornerback spent his first five seasons in Green Bay before forcing a trade to New Orleans last October after a lengthy holdout. Needless to say, McKenzie won't be the most popular player on the field today when he makes his return to Lambeau Field.

GAMEPLAN

The Packers running game is woeful, and the Saints need to take advantage. Green Bay ranks 28th in the NFL with 73.8 rushing yards per game. And Pro Bowl tailback Ahman Green is expected to miss today's game with knee and quadriceps injuries. The Packers' problems started in the offseason, when they lost standout linemen Mike Wahle and Marco Rivera via free agency. Fullback William Henderson has struggled this year, losing playing time as a result. Then, this past Monday night at Carolina, starting center Mike Flanagan (hernia) and left tackle Chad Clifton (ankle) went down with injuries. Clifton may return to the lineup after practicing some for the first time this week on Friday, but the Saints would love to shut down the run and apply some pressure to Favre. When Favre does throw the ball into coverage, as he is willing to do to allow his receivers to make plays, the Saints defensive backs need to make big plays.

KEY MATCHUP

SAINTS RUN GAME VS. PACKERS NT GRADY JACKSON
Jackson, the massive former Saint, is the Packers' best space-eating run stopper, but the Saints can wear him down if they stick to the run game as they did last week against Buffalo. Last week, Saints tailback Deuce McAllister gained 83 of his 130 yards in the fourth quarter. The Saints' interior linemen are a bit banged up, but guards Kendyl Jacox (ankle) and Jermane Mayberry (shoulder) should both be in the starting lineup.

BY THE NUMBERS

The Saints are making their first trip to Lambeau Field since 1989. Since then, the teams have played three times in the Superdome, with the Saints winning their last meeting in 2002, 35-20. Ö The Packers have lost their past three games this season by a total of six points. Ö The Saints defense ranks sixth in the NFL against the pass this year, allowing 178.8 yards per game. Ö Saints quarterback Aaron Brooks has started 75 consecutive games, including the playoffs, since 2000. Brooks joined the Saints that year after being traded from the Packers, who drafted him in the fourth round in 1999.

FROM THE COACH'S MOUTH

"They're not an 0-4 team. Not with that quarterback. That quarterback's explosive enough to win every game. That's not an 0-4 team. We're treating it like it's a team that we saw last year. It's a playoff team and they won a lot of games over the last four years. We're going to deal with it that way." — Saints coach Jim Haslett on facing the winless Packers.

Snyder injured, Smith returns to practice

Hornets forward listed day-to-day

By John Reid
Staff writer

OKLAHOMA CITY — Hornets forward Kirk Snyder pulled his right hamstring during Saturday's practice and is listed as day-to-day.

Snyder shot free throws after he received treatment from the team's medical staff. But Coach Byron Scott said Snyder was scheduled to receive more treatment following practice. Snyder had been excelling in camp, showing quickness to get to the basket and score.

Meanwhile, after sitting out the past four days of camp because of a groin pull, second-year guard J.R. Smith returned to practice.

"I thought I did pretty good for the first day back," Smith said. "I hadn't played in a week, and today I missed some easy shots that I know I should make. There were points on the court where I used to get to quickly, but I couldn't do it today. Give me a couple of days, and I'll be all right."

SHORTENED TIME: Scott shortened practice by 30 minutes as a reward for the teamís hard work. The Hornets have practiced for nearly three hours each day until Saturday.

"I knew today they were going to be a little tired," Scott said. "The one thing I don't want is when you are tired, you can lose your focus and get hurt. I felt at that time we had done enough on both ends of the court, so I gave them a break."

TOP BATTLE: The best battle in camp, according to Scott, is at point guard between top draft pick Chris Paul and Speedy Claxton. Paul is projected to be the starter and Claxton is in the final year of his contract. Claxton was acquired in a February trade from Golden State in exchange for Baron Davis.

"Chris and Speedy get after it every day and they've got so much respect for each other," Scott said. "It's great competition, and all it's going to do is make both guys better."

Another competitive battle has been between Rasual Butler and Bostjan Nachbar, who are competing for the starting small forward spot. Butler was acquired in an August trade from the Miami Heat.

FINDING HOMES: When the Hornets started training camp last Tuesday, all of the players were housed in a hotel and they were transported to Southern Nazarene University by bus for practice. Since then, several players have found either houses or apartments.

Hornets say they're more focused this season

HORNETS, from C-5

Unlike then, the players now mostly talk about how they performed on certain drills after practice and what restaurant they're going to meet at for dinner.

"Everybody is just more focused," second-year guard J.R. Smith. "We've got more guys who want to be here, learn and play in this offense. So that just makes it a lot easier."

Unlike last year, Scott does not have to spend most of his time trying to develop minor-league caliber players into respectable NBA backups. It was a regular occurrence at last yearís camp.

Although 13 of the 17 players in camp have less than three years experience in the NBA, the majority of them are talented.

Forward Kirk Snyder, obtained in an August trade from the Utah Jazz, has been exceptional at scoring off the fast break. Forward David West hasn't been timid to take shots, something he did often during last year's injury-riddled season. Backup center Chris Andersen is physically stronger, which has made him more effective in the post. And Paul, the teamís top draft pick, has shown no sign of difficulty learning the offense.

"Guys understand what he wants and everybody came in decent shape," West said. "This year we want to put ourselves early in position to get some wins. All we can do is keep learning and developing."

Most of the players wonít say how many victories theyíll get this season, but they havenít forgotten their (Southwest) division is considered the toughest in the league with defending NBA champion San Antonio, the Dallas Mavericks, Houston Rockets and Memphis Grizzlies, who all made the playoffs last season.

"We're more comfortable with everything," veteran forward P.J. Brown said. "Last year we had to learn a new system and new philosophy. Now we know what he wants and he knows us a lot better. So I think everything is smoother this year."

Although General Manager Jeff Bower thinks it's too early to predict victories, he has been impressed with what he's seen so far.

"I think the expectations of Scott was experienced by the players last year and they learned what was expected and they have met those so far," Bower said. "We've got a very professional group here who has something to prove. First and foremost, I see a great teacher in Byron, who has an understanding of what success is all about and has been there."

Whether that means 30 to 35 victories remain uncertain. But Scott said his rebuilding job is not completed yet.

"We pretty much know right now that we're going to be in the lottery again, and that's fine, we got Chris out of the lottery," Scott said. "We got J.R. Smith, luckily drop down to us (in the 2004 draft), and we added Kirk in a trade, who was supposed to be in the top 10 (in the 2004 draft).

"So we got three first-round picks and we're going to add another one (2006 draft). That's a part of rebuilding, sometimes you have to do it through the draft. If you can get lucky and get a great free agent, the rebuilding goes along quicker."

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL PLAYOFFS

Yanks, Angels washed out

Game 4 rescheduled, to be played today

By Ronald Blum
AP sports writer

NEW YORK — Even Chone Figgins couldn't have splashed his way through this.

The white tarpaulin over the Yankee Stadium infield billowed in the wind Saturday and a steady rain fell. More than 3½ hours before it was scheduled to start, Game 4 of the AL playoff series between the Los Angeles Angels and the New York Yankees was postponed.

Major League Baseball and the Fox network reset the game for tonight. If the Yankees win and force Game 5, that one would be Monday afternoon or evening in Anaheim, Calif., a quick turnaround for teams fighting to gain a berth against the Chicago White Sox in the AL Championship Series.

"It's out of our control," Angels manager Mike Scioscia said. "We'll play at midnight if they tell us to play at midnight. We'll be ready."

A New York victory would tie the best-of-five series 2-2, forcing the teams to fly across the country in the middle of the night. Players would not get to sleep until 5 a.m. PDT or so, about 12-14 hours before they would have to play a fifth game. A day game Sunday would have eased the travel, but television networks prefer to have games between large-market teams in prime time.

"Is it unfair? In a sense, yes," Yankees bench coach Joe Girardi said. "But I think we all know why we're doing it that way, and that's part of what makes this game tick. It's what keeps salaries up."

Baseball officials spoke with Fox and Game 4, at first rescheduled for 8:15 p.m., was moved up to 7:55 p.m. Commissioner Bud Selig declined comment.

"I've got my hands full here," he said before any questions could be asked.

Los Angeles took a 2-1 series lead with an 11-7 victory in the rain Friday night, beating up on Randy Johnson and getting another great defensive play from Figgins, whose diving catch of Gary Sheffield's liner to center saved one or two runs and blunted New York's comeback from a 5-0 deficit. After the Yankees went ahead 6-5, Anaheim rallied for two runs in the next inning, with Figgins hitting a go-ahead single.

Scioscia decided to stick with Jarrod Washburn as his Game 4 starter and leave 21-game winner Bartolo Colon for Game 5 if it's needed. Colon planned to return to California later Saturday to get rest.

"Our confidence in Jarrod is high," Scioscia said. "Bart can use an extra day. It's been a long season for a lot of guys. We're going to have Bart and back him up with John Lackey if we need him in Game 5."

The Yankees will start Shawn Chacon in Game 4. Mike Mussina, who beat Colon in Tuesday's opener, remained in California and would start Game 5.

"We left Mike Borzello with him, who is our bullpen catcher," Yankees manager Joe Torre said. "They have been doing regular workouts. Mike is very responsible, I think you all know that. So I'm not really concerned about the fact that he'll be ready to pitch."

A day off probably benefits the Angels more than the Yankees. Relievers Brendan Donnelly (14 pitches), Scot Shields (36), Kelvim Escobar (26) and Francisco Rodriguez (13) all were used in Game 3.

"This day off is big for us," Scioscia said. "We have to be able to shorten a game against the Yankees, and the only way to do that is to have Scot Shields and Donnelly, and Kelvim Escobar and Rodriguez where they need to be."

Johnson, chased after 62 pitches and booed lustily by the Yankee Stadium fans, could wind up in the bullpen for a Game 5, and perhaps even for Game 4. His 1 1-3 innings for Arizona in Game 7 of the 2001 World Series helped end the Yankees' string of three consecutive World Series titles.

The 42-year-old left-hander was dressed in a suit instead of sweats and jeans Saturday, ready for the Yankees' coat-and-tie dress code in case another trip to the West Coast was necessary.

"I think I could pitch today if I had to," he said. "It's part of my job to help this team win, isn't it? If the opportunity comes along, they say: `Can you pitch?' then I'm going to say, `Yeah.' I mean, I've never turned the ball down."

After being given a $48 million, three-year deal by the Yankees to win big games and getting blown out Friday, he was asked whether he would embrace the chance to pitch in relief.

Blessed - "ADJECTIVE: highly favored or fortunate; characterized by happiness and good fortune."

Prior to Hurricane Katrina, "blessed" was an often used word. Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.

Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. This is a very limited opportunity, and availability is restricted.

We have employment opportunities available in the Sales Department, including management availabilities.

Sales Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 7pm

Late touchdown lifts Destrehan past Ehret

By Mike Strom
Staff writer

Destrehan scored two touchdowns in the fourth quarter, including the game-winner by quarterback Jai Eugene on an eight-yard run with three seconds remaining, to get past Ehret 21-14 in a District 5-5A game Friday in Destrehan.

Playing on the road with a severely depleted roster caused by the evacuation of Hurricane Katrina five weeks ago and having practiced only two weeks, Ehret pushed Destrehan to the max.

Destrehan (5-0) was forced to score two fourth-quarter touchdowns and twice benefited from good fortune in preserving the state's No. 4 ranking in Class 5A.

Eugene scored the winning touchdown on a dash up the middle, and Travis Brignac kicked his third extra point to help the Wildcats avoid overtime. The winning drive of 35 yards was set up when Ehret's Clarence Ussin was hit by a punt and Wildcats linebacker Robert Roy recovered the loose ball with 34 seconds remaining.

Ehret (1-1) was snake bit earlier in the final period when Chris Mitchell's one-yard quarterback sneak for an apparent touchdown was negated by Coach Billy North's call for a timeout as the 25-second clock wound down to the final ticks. The Patriots got the play off and Mitchell scored what would have been his third rushing touchdown at the 4:23 mark that could have given the Patriots a 21-7 advantage.

"It was bad luck," North said. "We called time because we thought the clock was running out. It still was a great football game. Destrehan is a great team, and they made some plays at the end. They deserve credit. I was really proud of our kids, the way they came back, the way they've practiced. I'm proud that they're home."

Destrehan dominated the second half, particularly on the ground, gaining 150 of its 215 rushing yards to shake loose from a tie at 7 at halftime. Raynor Derkins carried 23 times for 114 yards, and Jermyl Lawrence added 34 yards on six carries, including a 17-yard run that produced tie at 14 with 8:07 remaining.

Lawrence's touchdown culminated a 15-play, 98-yard drive that followed Ehret's ill-fated timeout at the goal line. The scored allowed Destrehan to overcome four turnovers, including three lost fumbles.

Mitchell's running and passing accounted for 194 of Ehret's 211 yards, but the Patriots managed 78 yards in the second half. Mitchell ran 25 times for 84 yards and completed eight of 14 passes for 110 yards. Mitchell had one second-half completion, for five yards.

"I didn't think it was going to be that close, but I've got to give them credit," said Derkins. "We battled and we had to fight to win. Thank the Lord."

"I saw them last week (in a 15-14 victory against Higgins), and I knew they were athletic," said Destrehan coach Steve Robicheaux. "My hat's off to Billy North and his staff. They played down to the very last minute. Truthfully, I didn't expect it to be like this."

Strong second half propels Rebels

By Pierce W. Huff
Staff writer

A mistake-prone St. James team, ranked fourth in Class 2A, made for a happy homecoming for the Riverside Rebels on Friday.

Riverside took advantage of five turnovers (three fumbles and two interceptions), one nine-yard punt and caused a safety in a 29-19 victory against St. James in both team's District 10-2A opener.

It was the teams' first meeting since St. James defeated Riverside 27-14 in 2003.

The Rebels (4-1, 1-0) led 9-7 at halftime and clinched the victory by scoring 20 points in the second half off of miscues by St. James (3-2, 0-1).

Riverside increased its lead to 15-7 in the third quarter when senior Collin Yeargin intercepted a pass by Phillips and returned it 50 yards for a touchdown. But the Rebels were penalized for illegal procedure on the extra-point kick, and then Jordan Poirrier missed wide left on the second attempt.

Riverside running back Jarid Caesar made the score 22-7 when he ran up the middle for a one-yard touchdown. Ceasar's run came two plays after Benny Gomez intercepted a pass by Phillips and returned it 40 yards to the St. James' five-yard line.

Caesar had a one-yard touchdown run up the middle to make the score 29-7 in the third quarter. The score came three plays after a nine-yard punt by the Wildcats' Terry Isom.

But St. James' Jason Zenon returned the ensuing kickoff 90 yards for a touchdown to make the score 29-13.

Wildcats running back Luther Ambrose had a one-yard touchdown run up the middle to make the score 29-19 with 6:48 remaining. The run capped an eight-play, 46-yard scoring drive. Ambrose was held to no gain on a run for the two-point conversion.

Riverside led 7-0 in the first half when St. James tied the score when running back Juarelle Narcisse ran up the middle for a one-yard touchdown run in the first quarter.

The Wildcats had a chance to take the lead after an eight-yard punt by Riverside's Cavin Richmond on the previous possession. But the possession ended when Riverside's Jade Falgoust recovered a St. James fumble on an option play at the Rebels' 16-yard line with 10:51 remaining in the first half.

Bulldogs rally with touchdown, interception

By Tammy Nunez
Staff writer

Not much went right early for Fontainebleau on Friday night in a District 4-5A game against Covington at Jack Salter Stadium.

But one drive and one interception meant everything in a fourth quarter riddled by interceptions, fumbles, rotating quarterbacks and penalties.

With the Bulldogs clinging to a one-point lead, Fontainebleau's Blake Leblanc intercepted a pass by Kayman Gassen, one of four Covington quarterbacks, with 42.2 seconds remaining to seal Fontainebleau's 13-12 victory that kept the Bulldogs (2-0, 2-0) undefeated.

The stage was set on the only successful Fontainebleau drive of the second half. The Bulldogs put together a nine-play, 76-yard drive that lasted four minutes to take a one-point lead that held up thanks to Leblanc's interception. Daniel Cassisa scored his second touchdown of the night - on a three-yard run - to tie the score at 12 with 3:26 left. Alex DeFrank kicked the extra point for the 13-12 edge. The kick was key after a point-after attempt was blocked earlier.

Despite all of Covington's yards through the air and on the ground and favorable field position all night, the Lions couldn't manage a touchdown. The Lions (0-2, 0-2) haven't scored a touchdown all season and used four field goals by Stephen Mire to stay ahead most of the game.

Mire hit a 25-yard, go-ahead field goal with 1.7 seconds left in the first half to give Covington a 9-6 lead. Mire's fourth field goal — a 24-yarder with 7:59 left in the fourth quarter - gave the Lions a 12-6 edge.

Covington starting quarterback Michael Steele threw for 123 yards, but was intercepted three times in the second half.

Wildcats end losing streak vs. Hahnville

By Lori Lyons
Staff writer

This time, there was no test for cardiac patients, no last-second miracle play. This time, East St. John overcame a couple of early mistakes to take a 35-20 victory over Hahnville on Friday night in Reserve.

It was the first victory for the Wildcats (4-1, 1-0) against Hahnville since 1999, and the first for Coach Larry Dauterive since his arrival in Wildcat land in 2000.

And he got this one thanks to Johnny Owen, a transfer from Brother Martin in the wake of†Hurricane Katrina.

Owen ran for 254 yards and three touchdowns on 25 carries. Alternating series with Stanley Jackson in the first half, Owen scored his first two touchdowns on runs of††four and seven yards. His third was an 80-yard sprint. By halftime, Owen had rushed for 105 yards. The Wildcats ran for 391 yards and finished with 471 total.

East St. John's defense played a big part in the victory. Hahnville was held to 53 yards rushing and 11first downs. Quarterback Early James threw for 211 yards, completing 18 of 49 passes, with two interceptions.

But the Wildcats had to overcome a couple of miscues early — two fumbles inside the Tigers' five-yard line and a missed 26-yard field goal kept East St. John in the first quarter.

East St. John drove right down the field on its first possession, but on first-and-goal at the seven, Stanley Jackson fumbled as he crossed the goal line, and Hahnville's Kemon Jacobs recovered.

On their second possession, the Wildcats again drove right down the field. On third-and-two at the Hahnville five, Owen was hit behind the line and fumbled. Jacobs again recovered.

But Hahnville could not convert either turnover into points. And East St. John did much better on its fourth possession. The Wildcats drove 74 yards on eight plays, and this time finished the job. On first-and-goal from the four, Owen sprinted around left end for the touchdown less than a minute into the second quarter.

Thanks to a short field following a Hahnville punt, East St. John went up 14-0 with 4:17 left in the half.

The Wildcats took four plays to drive 43 yards, with Owen scoring from the seven.

Bulldogs have little trouble with Spartans

By Billy Turner
Staff writer

The hardships just keep coming for Salmen.

The Spartans were more than 30 minutes late for Friday night's game at the Pound in Lutcher because they found themselves in heavy traffic leaving New Orleans. This came after they had lost much of the season and all their equipment in recent weeks to Hurricane Katrina.

Then the Spartans got to play Lutcher.

More hardships ensued. Lutcher took a 30-point halftime lead on the way to a 44-21 victory against overmatched Salmen.

The teams meet again in two weeks at Northshore High School, where Salmen students are attending school.

Salmen ran 39 first-half plays to Lutcher's 16, but still trailed big as the Bulldogs averaged more than 14 yards per play.

Lutcher scored first, on a 26-yard run by Rashad Webster, but Salmen ñ which has only 27 players ñ came back to tie it on an 11-yard run by freshman Ben Humber, the Spartans' first touchdown of the season. They lost last week to West Jeff 34-3.

But that was it.

Lutcher scored on an interception return by Chaddrick Adams of 40 yards, on a 62-yard run by quarterback Khymest Williams, one of six quarterbacks the Bulldogs played, and on two touchdown passes from recent transfer Blaine Gauthreaux. Gauthreaux threw one touchdown pass to Juan R, Johnson of 59 yards on his first play and then hit Williams with a 28-yard scoring pass with eight seconds left in the first half.

Lutcher gained 237 yards in the first half. Salmen's Danny Zimmerman, a transfer from Jesuit, was 1-of-13 for two yards with two interceptions in the first half.

Missed opportunities doom Mandeville

By Jim Derry
Staff writer

Mandeville's home opener came five weeks later than originally planned. In Friday's game against Ponchatoula, it looked as if they wanted to wait another week.

The Skippers squandered numerous opportunities and their quarterbacks threw five interceptions, and Ponchatoula held on for a 12-2 District 4-5A victory at Skipper Stadium.

Mandeville (0-2, 0-2) started the game with an 11-play, 65-yard drive that stalled at the Wave 19, and a missed field goal attempt turned the ball over to Ponchatoula (2-1, 2-0).

On their final possession of the first half, the Skippers drove to the Wave 1. But with eight seconds remaining and no timeouts, they tried an off-tackle play to Johnny Priola, his only run of the night. He was stopped at the line of scrimmage as the clock ran out with Ponchatoula holding a 6-0 lead.

The Wave's only score of the half came on a 37-yard interception return by Nakeyial Traxler late in the second quarter.

Not much changed for Mandeville in the second half. After having to punt on its first two drives, the Skippers started the fourth quarter with another excellent chance to score after Blake Fleming recovered a Prentiss Bovia fumble at the Wave 22-yard-line. But three plays later, Sean Baham threw his third interception of the game.

FRIDAY'S ROUNDUP

Hammond nips Panthers; Curtis wins

From staff reports

HAMMOND 27, NORTHSHORE 22: The Panthers inability to tackle Hammond running back Matt Betts proved to be the difference in Friday's District 4-5A game in Slidell. Betts' 33-yard pass reception followed by his one-yard touchdown run with a minute remaining lifted Hammond (1-2, 1-1) and extended Northshore's (0-2, 0-2) losing streak to 14 games.

JOHN CURTIS 27, CHOCTAWHATCHEE (Fla.) 21: Joe McKnight caught a touchdown pass and broke up a fourth-down pass late in the fourth quarter to lead the Patriots to victory Friday in Fort Walton Beach, Fla. McKnight's pass breakup came as Choctawhatchee (2-4) faced fourth-and-10 at the Curtis 15 with one minute remaining.

SHAW 28, WALKER 14: Tailback Daniel Borne rushed for 219 yards on 27 carries, and quarterback Darold Hughes passed for 113 yards and ran for a touchdown as the Eagles won their season opener in Walker on Friday. Borne scored three touchdowns in the first half on runs of eight, four and six yards; he had 162 yards in the first half.

WEST JEFFERSON 39, ASSUMPTION 36: Running back Kevin Grant ran for 222 yards and three touchdowns as the Buccaneers (2-0, 1-0) won their District 5-5A opener. Grant had touchdown runs of two, 41 and 38 yards and scored on a 13-yard touchdown pass from Ryan Jackson.

ST. CHARLES 37, DONALDSONVILLE 6: Comets running back Chris Jones rushed for 144 yards and three touchdowns as third-ranked (Class 2A) St. Charles (5-0, 1-0) easily defeated fifth-ranked Donaldsonville in the District 10-2A opener for both teams. St. Charles led 14-6 at the half on two touchdowns by Jones. Casey Robottom added a 23-yard touchdown run in the third quarter.

WEST ST. JOHN 44, WHITE CASTLE 2: Rams quarterback Olajuwon Hall threw for two touchdowns, and Jaron Howard rushed for 133 yards on nine carries as West St. John (1-4, 1-0) broke a four-game losing streak in the District 9-1A opener for both teams.

KENTWOOD 58, NORTHLAKE CHRISTIAN 0: The Kangaroos (3-1, 1-0) totaled 373 yards in winning their District 7-1A opener against Northlake (0-2, 0-1) in Kentwood. Kangaroos quarterback Alfred McKnight accounted for four touchdowns.

ETC.: Cabrini will play basketball this season and is in need of approximately 10 playing dates in the month of November and December, Coach Tony Labella said. The Crescents, 34-7 last season after winning the Class 4A state championship in 2004, also have openings for their Dec. 12-15 tournament, Labella said. For information, call Labella at (504) 231-0651 or (225) 766-6663.

Shockley, Bulldogs upend Volunteers

Georgia continues mastery at Neyland Stadium

By Elizabeth A. Davis
AP sports writer

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. – D.J. Shockley and No. 5 Georgia stayed undefeated and on course for a trip to the Southeastern Conference championship.

Starting for the first time against a top-10 team, Shockley went 16-of-27 for 207 yards and ran 11 times for 51 yards as the Bulldogs won for the third straight time in Neyland Stadium, beating No. 8 Tennessee 27-14 on Saturday.

An erratic season continued for the Volunteers (3-2, 2-2), and their offense showed more ineptness with two costly fumbles.

Georgia (5-0, 3-0) led 13-0 in the third quarter after Brannan Southerland's 1-yard touchdown run and two field goals by Brandon Coutu.

Tennessee needed help from its defense to avoid a shutout.

Jonathan Wade set up the Vols' first touchdown when he intercepted Shockley and returned it 34 yards to the Georgia 1 in the third quarter. Rick Clausen sneaked over the pile to score on the first play, giving the Vols the momentum. But it didn't last long.

Shockley fumbled on Georgia's next series in Tennessee territory, but the Vols turned it over again. Tra Battle recovered Josh Briscoe's fumble, but the Bulldogs failed to score on the ensuing possession.

Tennessee got it back at its 1 and had to punt. Thomas Flowers returned it 54 yards for a touchdown with 8:50 to go.

Thomas Brown added an 18-yard touchdown run with 1:44 left to pad Georgia's lead. The Vols scored their second touchdown as time expired, a 24-yard pass from Clausen to Robert Meachem.

The Bulldogs got a boost in the SEC East standings when Florida lost to Alabama last week, and Georgia has a favorable schedule to win the division. The Bulldogs' most difficult remaining league games are against Florida later this month and at home against Auburn in November.

And Shockley helped alleviated any fear Georgia fans had about his ability to adequately replace four-year starter David Greene.

Tennessee came into the game with the SEC's top rush defense, but this time the Bulldogs' defense was better. The Vols were held to 48 yards on the ground. Gerald Riggs had 52 yards rushing on 19 carries.

The Bulldogs had 405 yards of total offense.

Clausen, already hampered by a sore left Achilles' tendon, could not pull off the kind of rally he led at LSU, but coach Phillip Fulmer didn't let backup Erik Ainge play.

Clausen was 21-of-36 for 310 yards and had two turnovers in the first half.

DeMario Minter intercepted Clausen's pass at the goal line and stopped an eight-play drive.

Clausen fumbled on the Vols' following drive as he was chased by Darrius Swain, who was credited with the force and recovery.

Lackluster Southern Cal pushes past Arizona

Ore, Hokies maul Thundering Herd

From wire reports

Another lackluster start for No. 1 Southern California ended up in a victory that took more time than expected.

LenDale White scored four touchdowns, rushed for 179 yards and USC beat visiting Arizona 42-21 Saturday for its 27th consecutive victory.

Playing at the Coliseum for the second time this season, the Trojans (5-0, 3-0 Pac-10) also won their school-record 23rd home game.

Dwayne Jarrett added two touchdowns for the Trojans, who hit the road again for their next two games, including next week at Notre Dame.

White and Reggie Bush, who had 110 yards, each ran for 100-plus yards for the third consecutive game. Steve Smith added seven catches for 134 yards.

After rallying from an 18-point halftime deficit at Arizona State and a 13-point first-half deficit at Oregon the last two weeks, the Trojans again looked stagnant early against the Wildcats (1-4, 0-2).

No. 3 VIRGINIA TECH 41 vs. MARSHALL 14: Branden Ore rushed for 146 yards and a touchdown for the Hokies.

Virginia Tech (6-0) led 14-7 at halftime, but got a 19-yard field goal from Brandon Pace, a 15-yard fumble return by Vince Hall and a 48-yard scoring pass from Marcus Vick to David Clowney in a span of 3:29 of the third quarter to lead 31-7.

Vick finished 11-for-16 for 163 yards. He also threw an interception, his second this season, on a ball that glanced off Josh Morgan's hands to Chris Royal. Ahmad Bradshaw had 99 yards on 22 carries to lead Marshall (2-3).

No. 4 FLORIDA STATE 41 vs. WAKE FOREST 24: Drew Weatherford threw for 351 yards and three touchdowns as the Seminoles blew open a close game with three quick scores in the final quarter.

Florida State (5-0, 3-0 ACC) rolled up 585 yards and 27 first downs, but its nationally ranked defense struggled against the pesky Demon Deacons. Wake Forest (2-4, 1-2) closed to 20-17 on a 31-yard touchdown run by Chris Barclay, who finished with 125 yards.

But the Seminoles scored three touchdowns in the next 9 minutes to take a 41-17 lead. Weatherford completed 20 of 31 passes and also scored on a 1-yard run.

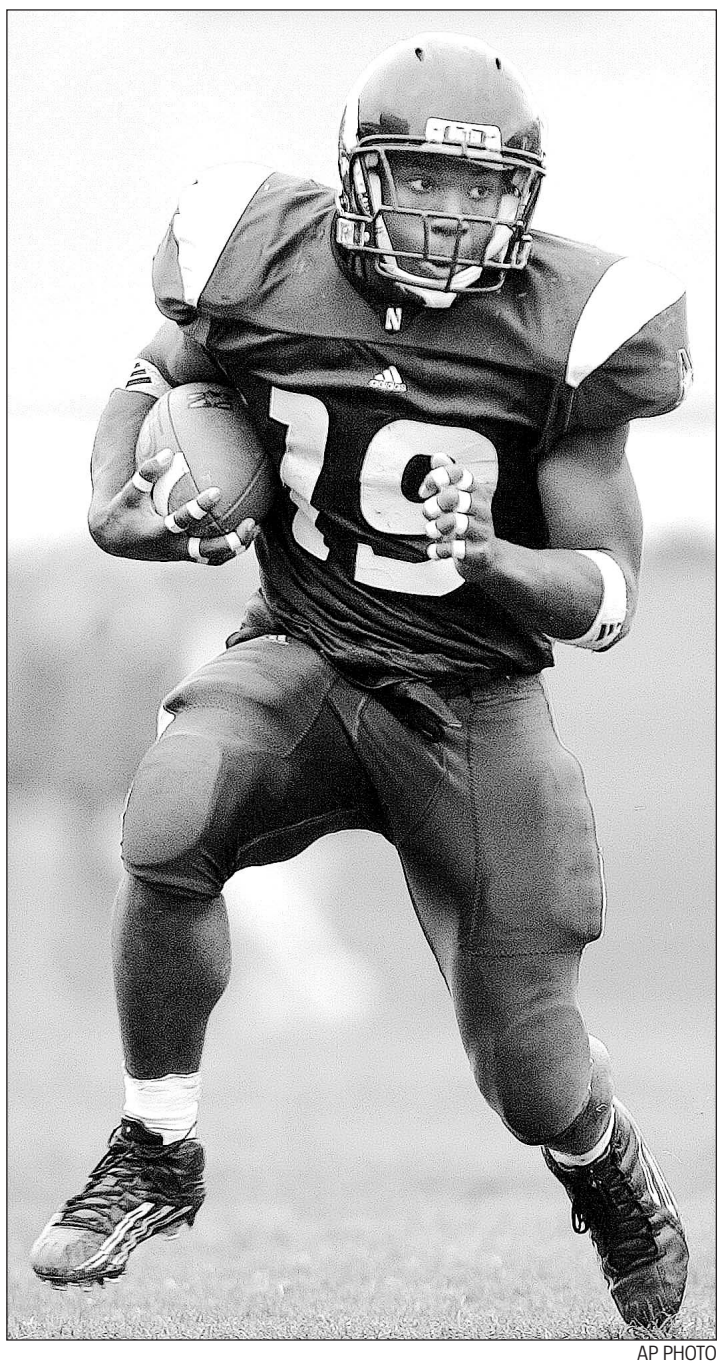
No. 9 MIAMI 52 vs. DUKE 7: Kyle Wright threw for three touchdowns in a 5-minute span of the second quarter, helping the Hurricanes shake off a slow start.

Tyrone Moss ran for 82 yards and a pair of touchdowns - his third multi-score game in four weeks - for Miami, which established season-highs for points and yards. Ryan Moore made a career-high seven catches for 87 yards and a touchdown for Miami (4-1, 2-1 ACC), winners of four straight.

Wright completed 18 of 31 passes for 255 yards, with three touchdowns and two interceptions before being replaced midway through the third quarter by Kirby Freeman, who threw for 47 yards and the first two touchdowns of his career.

No. 13 FLORIDA 35 vs. MISSISSIPPI STATE 9: Dallas Baker had a career-high 123 yards receiving and a touchdown, and Florida rebounded from its first loss of the season.

The Gators also avenged last year's 38-31 defeat in Starkville, one of the most embarrassing losses in school history that cost Coach Ron Zook his job. Florida (5-1, 3-1 SEC) showed some improvement following last week's loss to Alabama, but continued a trend of offensive inconsistency.



Chris Leak finished 18-of-33 for 244 yards with a touchdown and two interceptions. The defense finished with six sacks, three turnovers and two safeties against the Bulldogs (2-4, 0-4).

NORTHWESTERN 51 vs. No. 14 WISCONSIN 48: Freshman Tyrell Sutton ran for 244 yards and three touchdowns, and Reggie McPherson's interception sealed the victory.

Northwestern scored on seven straight possessions and finished with 674 yards of offense.

Brett Basanez completed 26 of 36 passes for 361 yards and three touchdowns for the Wildcats. Sutton's 1-yard run in the third quarter put Northwestern (3-2, 1-1 Big Ten) ahead for good, 23-17, and his 62-yarder late in the fourth made it 51-34.

Wisconsin's Brian Calhoun became the first Badger with more than 100 yards rushing and receiving in a game, carrying 23 times for 122 and catching 11 passes for 128.

AP PHOTO

Northwestern running back Tyrell Sutton ran for 244 yards and three touchdowns, leading the Wildcats to a 51-48 upset over 14th-ranked Wisconsin.

John Stocco was 24-of-31 for 326 yards and four touchdowns with two interceptions for Wisconsin (5-1, 2-1).

No. 18 BOSTON COLLEGE 28 vs. VIRGINIA 17: Quinton Porter threw for 301 yards and two touchdowns, and linebacker/fullback Brian Toal scored on a pair of 1-yard dives.

Porter, who missed the last two games with a sprained right ankle, finished 25-of-37 for the Eagles (5-1, 2-1 Atlantic Coast Conference). Toal, who plays fullback on short-yardage situations, has five touchdown runs this season.

The Eagles won despite missing three field goals, being penalized 11 times for 111 yards and losing defensive end Mathias Kiwanuka, who was ejected in the third quarter for punching a Virginia lineman. Marques Hagans led Virginia (3-2, 1-2), going 21-of-35 for 195 yards and two touchdowns.

MINNESOTA 23 at No. 21 MICHIGAN 20: Jason Giannini kicked a 30-yard field goal with 1 second left, helping Minnesota snap a 16-game losing streak to the Wolverines.

On third-and-10 from the Minnesota 26, Gary Russell ran 61 yards to set up the winning kick for the Gophers (5-1, 2-1 Big Ten).

Michigan (3-3, 1-2) is off to its worst start since also having a 3-3 record in 1990. Garrett Rivas had two chances to break the 20-20 tie for the Wolverines, but he missed a 42-yard field goal late in the third quarter and a 34-yard kick early in the fourth.

Nicholls State loses in OT

From wire reports

Jerome Brooks scored the winning two-yard touchdown run in overtime as Stephen F. Austin overcame a 14-point deficit in the fourth quarter to beat Nicholls State 27-21 Saturday in Nacogdoches, Texas.

Brooks put SFA (4-1, 1-0 Southland) ran 23 yards on the play before the winning score. Nicholls State (1-3, 0-1) had the first possession in overtime, but Alex Romero missed a 35-yard field-goal attempt.

Zeke Dixon was 20-of-37 for 217 yards and three touchdowns for the Lumberjacks, who trailed 21-7 in the fourth quarter before SFA forced overtime when Dixon found Tyrol Williams for an 18-yard touchdown with 32 seconds remaining.

Chance Dennis caught nine passes for 92 yards and a touchdown. Louie Runnels caught one pass, a 25-yard touchdown in the first quarter.

Broderick Cole led Nicholls State with 95 yards rushing and three touchdowns, including a 45-yard burst in the third quarter. The Colonels attempted three passes and completed none.

Anthony Harris added 97 yards on 11 carries for Nicholls State, which scored three touchdowns in a span of less than eight minutes in the second half.

Brooks finished with 37 yards on seven carries.

For ecosystems, the catastrophe is temporary

By Bob Marshall
Outdoors editor

Hurricanes, ecologists tell us, are natural events and man-made disasters.

The native residents, the plants and critters, of the ecosystems which hurricanes churn through have adapted to these visits over tens of thousands of years. Humans never have. We try to fight nature's raw power with our intellect, constructing levees and "storm-proof" buildings. We always lose. Then we call it a "natural disaster."

If you hold on to those thoughts while continuing to read, your Sunday won't seem so gloomy.

That's because the state Department of Wildlife and Fisheries, an agency staffed with natural scientists trying to manage wild resources for settled humans, made some serious progress last week tallying the cost to humans of the recent natural visits by hurricanes Katrina and Rita. The bottom lines are not pretty. Katrina and Rita are long gone, but the impacts of their passing will stay with the outdoors community for many years.

Some of those impacts include:

▶ The almost total destruction of the coastal fishing infrastructure, including roads, marinas, docks, fuel stations, bait houses, lodges and other accommodations. The hit to the state's economy is in excess of $300 million from the recreational industry alone. Charlie Smith, the executive director of the Louisiana Charter Boat Association, says 550 of the 600 guides are out of business. The state has asked FEMA for $19 million to help that sector of the fishery. Damage to the commercial fishery — oysters, shrimp, and more — will cost the state another $2 billion. Some segments of that struggling industry may never come back.

▶ Coastal wildlife habitat was pummeled so severely, the DWF has closed rabbit and deer seasons from the Pearl to the Sabine rivers.

▶ Coastal wetlands suffered a severe loss of vegetation for wintering waterfowl. Agricultural fields in southwest Louisiana that attract ducks and geese have been flooded with saltwater for more than a week, and may be useless to birds. Seasons will not be canceled, but biologists doubt birds arriving at traditional wintering grounds will stay for very long.

▶ Barrier islands important to protecting fragile interior marshes from storm surges have been sheared to the water line, or below. Many coastal restoration projects and wildlife projects on coastal management areas have been severely damaged.

▶ Federal and state agencies still are waiting for low tides to get an accurate measure of coastal marsh losses, but preliminary estimates are not good. St. Bernard suffered "significant" erosion of salt marshes and destruction of large sections of fresh and brackish marshes in the outflow area of the Caernarvon Freshwater Diversion Project. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service estimated marsh losses on its refuges along the Mississippi River delta and the Lake Pontchartrain Basin to be around 150,000 acres.

▶ Storm tides that pushed into freshwater habitat surrounding western Lake Pontchartrain and the Lake Maurepas basin have resulted in large areas of low oxygen, causing fish kills and damaging aquatic plants. The Blind, Amite and Tickfaw rivers have been impacted. Similar losses are anticipated in southwestern Louisiana.

▶ The DWF has suffered a stiff blow to its finances. Agency officials say lost revenue from lower hunting- and fishing-license sales will take a $12 million to $14 million bite out of its $98 million budget, which is totally self-generated. Further losses can be expected from downed timber on DWF lands (about $30 million), and loss of oil and gas royalties from wells closed on agency lands. DWF Secretary Dwight Landreneau said the agency will do some general "belt-tightening" and doesn't anticipate layoffs or program cuts for now. However, the agency's future solvency will depend largely on how much disaster aid it can get from FEMA.

It was gloomy news for us humans. But John Roussel, DWF assistant secretary for fisheries, put it in perspective.

"These resources will recover, I'm confident of that," he said. "They always do after storms like this. It's just pretty tough on the people who rely on these things while we're waiting for them to come back."

It can be a downright disaster — for us. But it's only temporary.

Finding fish easier than finding a launch in St. Tammany

After hurricane, accessibilty an issue

By Andrew Canulette
Staff writer

Like thousands of south Louisiana anglers, Edwin Bedford wasn't certain what effect Hurricane Katrina would have on the local fishery.

But unlike many of those fishermen, Bedford didn't care to wait until Sept. 30 to find out. That was the date state agencies, including the Department of Environmental Quality and the Department of Wildlife and Fisheries, beckoned anglers to the water with official word that the quality of Lake Pontchartrain and its estuaries was sound.

Bedford appreciated the information, but it was something he already knew.

Itching to return to his boat and his favorite pastime, the Mandeville resident called fisheries agents a few days before Hurricane Rita threatened the Gulf Coast. He liked what they told him, and was just as happy with what he and his girlfriend caught - 17 speckled trout and eight redfish - along the north shore of the lake near Goose Point.

"There was not one red flag to throw up," Bedford said. "So I felt OK going out to catch fish. (The water) was a little murky, but it wasn't bad. The Thursday before Rita, it was pretty clean."

Subsequent trips into the lake have produced a mixed bag. The day before Rita hit, he was skunked. Last week, he caught six nice specks near Green Point. Bedford said he's hoping for better things as south Louisiana heads into what routinely is one of the best times to catch large specks.

"I can see it being a very good fishing season," he said. "There's a lot of water, a lot of salt. And when the weather cools off, it can only get that much better."

But the enthusiasm among north shore anglers is tempered when they discuss accessibility to the fish. Once one of the most vital access points to the area fisheries, St. Tammany Parish — south Slidell especially — was one of the areas hardest hit by Katrina. Launches and marinas were destroyed, many bait-and-tackle stores still have any existing windows shuttered and boats remain scattered along roadsides.

Bedford was able to access the lake via the public launch on Mandeville's lakefront, the usual starting and finishing point for his outings. It's one of the few operating launches in St. Tammany post-Katrina.

LDWF biologist Harry Blanchet said there are two parts to a fishery — the fish, of course, but also the infrastructure that supports the industry. It's the latter of the two that concerns him.

"I know quite a few recreational and commercial fishermen," Blanchet said. "And they're just chomping at the bit to get back out there. (But finding) fuel, launches, just a few extra minutes when they actually can go do something (has been difficult.)"

Mandeville mayor Eddie Price, an avid outdoorsman, said less than a half-dozen boats per day have used the launch since the storm. That hasn't stopped the conversation among a growing number of local anglers who are eager to wet a line.

"I can see it being a very good fishing season. There's a lot of water, a lot of salt. And when the weather cools off, it can only get that much better."
EDWIN BEDFORD
South Louisiana angler

"I'm one of them," Price said. "I'm going kind of stir crazy. Most weekends, I'm fishing if I have time. Or I'm in a duck blind, deer hunting, whatever. But yeah, people have been ready to get out on the water. I've been hearing that."

Finding a spot to launch is a tricky proposition on the north shore right now. After finding an established spot, special attention must be paid to the debris tossed into the water by the storm. Anyone attempting to use an available launch should bring supplies (gasoline, artificial lures, food, water, etc.) with them to the site with the exception of the Marina del Ray launches near Madisonville.

Following is a rundown of several St. Tammany Parish launches and their current status:

▶ Tite's Place, U.S. 11 south of Slidell.

Little remains of this decades-old launching spot. A small skiff that was once for rent is submerged in a canal. An oxygen canister for one of Tite's bait tanks floats nearby, and sheet metal that was once an overhang near the launch rattles in the wind. The launch itself is littered with debris.

Owners could not be reached for comment on the possibility of reopening.

▶ Rigolets Marina, U.S. 90 south of Slidell

Owner Lester Ralph said a friend caught redfish off the dock of his marina a few days ago. But Ralph has more pressing concerns than angling right now.

The marina, which provides access to Lake Pontchartrain, Lake Borgne and Lake Catherine and the Biloxi Marsh, is in massive disrepair. The bait and seafood store was gutted by wind and storm surge, and a nearby pavilion lost large chunks of floorboard. The wharves are covered with collapsed lumber and marsh grass.

Ralph said he hopes to have his business operational by Jan. 1. Meanwhile, a launch has been cleared and is free for public use. That launch is located to the right as you enter the marina. Ralph cautioned to be aware of debris in the water.

Supplies are not available.

▶ Salt Bayou, just off Louisiana 433 south of Slidell

Once home to the popular Salt Bayou Lounge and its nearby launch, parts of Salt Bayou Road were being used as staging areas for a South Carolina electrical company last week.

▶ Slidell public launch

Slidell chief of staff Reinhard Dearing said this launch in Heritage Park in Olde Towne was damaged, though there has been some usage. Supplies are not available.

▶ Lake Road launch, Lacombe

This launch, which is operated by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, is open to the public, said Byron Fortier, supervisory park ranger for the Southeast Louisiana Refuges system.

"I don't think that's a problem (using the launch)," Fortier said. "The refuge (Big Branch Marsh NWR) isn't closed, it's just the wooded portions that are closed. If you want to go out into the marshes, you can use the launch."

Supplies are not available. Glockner's, a Lake Road business which once sold staple items for anglers, was destroyed by Katrina.

▶ Cane Bayou launch, east of Mandeville on U.S. 190

This popular access point for kayaking anglers is closed because of excess debris, Price said. A local paddling group has offered to clean the site.

▶ Mandeville public launch

Open for use. Bring supplies.

▶ Mandeville fishing pier

The pier that was completed earlier this year was gashed by Katrina. Walkways were scuttled, floorboards fell and part of the pier collapsed. Nearby Sunset Park, which allows access to the pier, is also closed.

"It probably won't be six months until that's open," Price said. "But we'll reestablish the pier. That's one project that will not be put on hold."

▶ Marina del Ray, Louisiana 22 near Madisonville

An employee at this marina just east of the Tchefuncte River said both concrete backdowns are in operation. Cost is $5 per launch.

Marina del Ray also has fuel, ice, food and drinks for sale. The facility is open from 8:30 a.m.-5 p.m. seven days a week.

Call (985) 845-4474 for more information.

▶ Madisonville public launch

This launch is closed. A bridge on Louisiana 1077 leading to the ramp has been closed since Katrina.

Fourteen months after Hurricane Charley, more than 1,000 Floridians still live in trailers, a situation Louisiana hopes is not repeated here

'FEMA VILLAGE'

By Laura Maggi
Staff writer

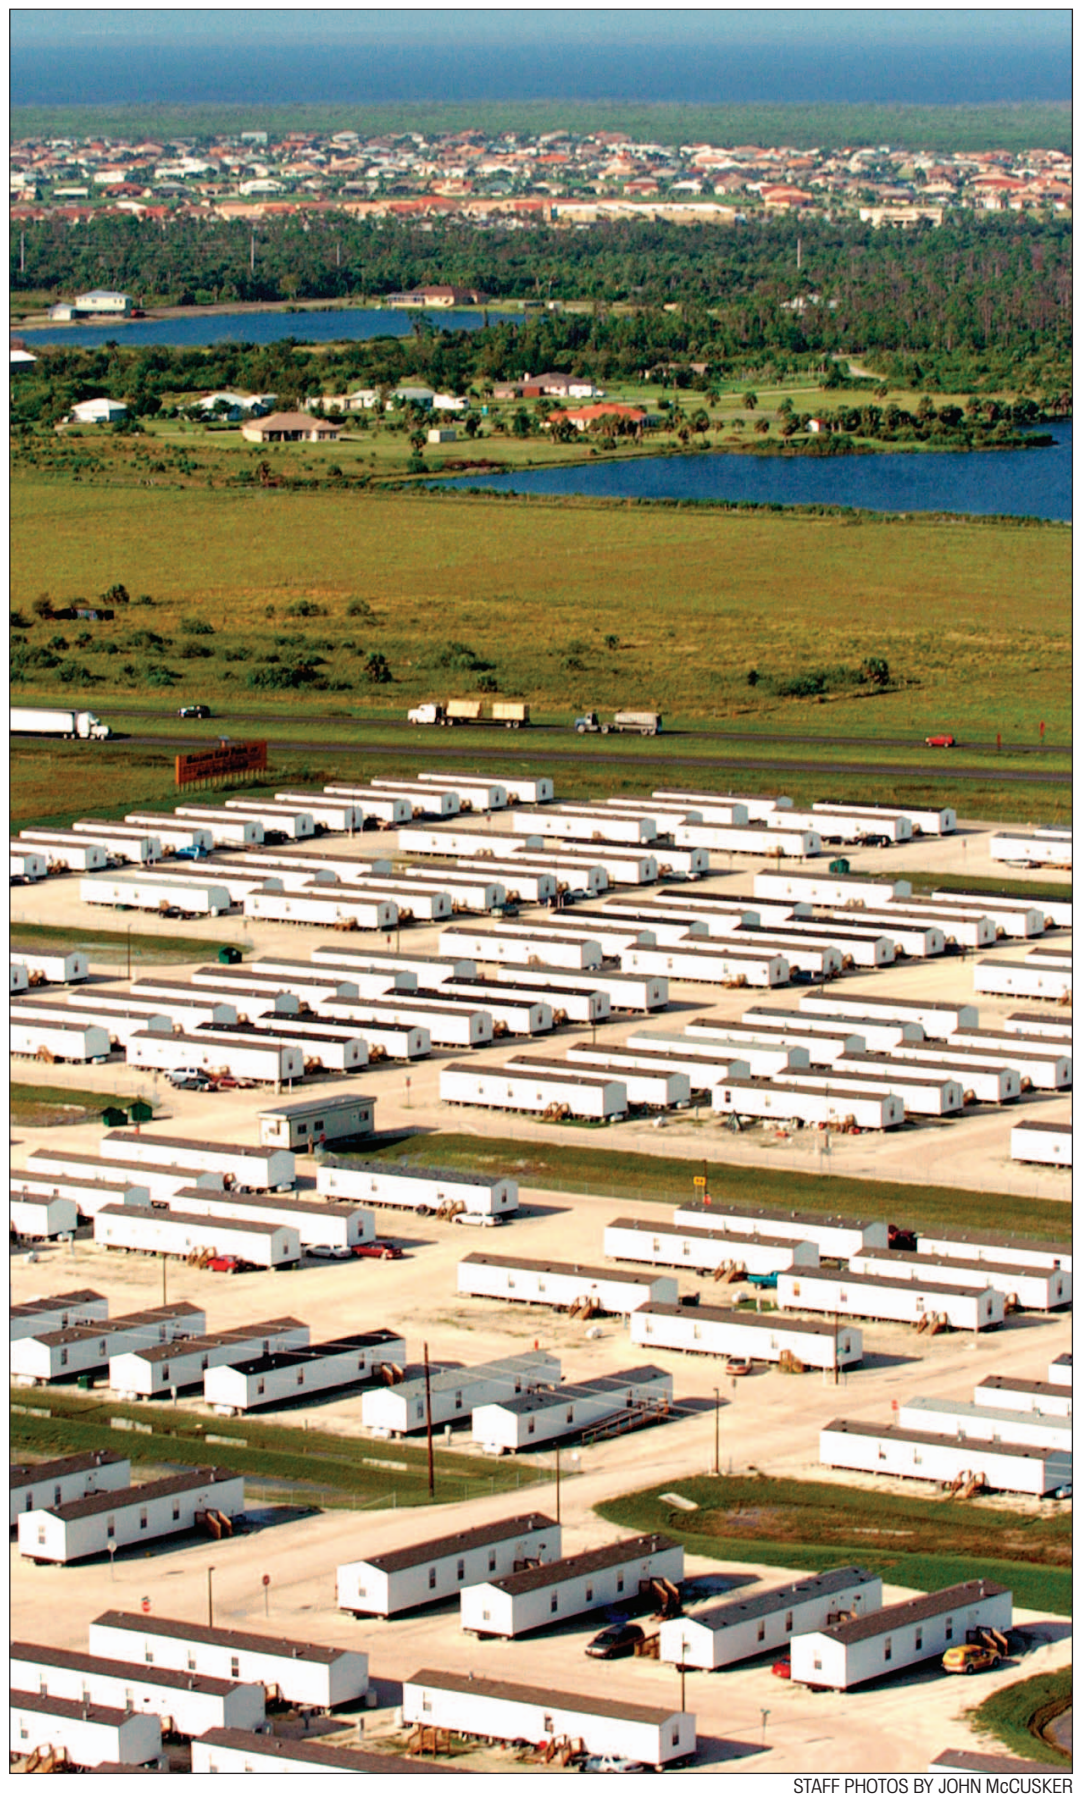
CHARLOTTE COUNTY, FLA. — The gritty, gray sand gets into everything. It swirls around the rows upon rows of identical white trailers whenever a car drives by or a breeze blows in off the Gulf. There are no trees and not much grass, although weeds have pushed up through the gravel beneath the roughly 500 mobile homes that comprise what locals call "FEMA Village."

The trailers have been a haven for many who lost their homes when Hurricane Charley made an unexpected turn and blasted through this sleepy nook of southwest Florida more than a year ago.

But the encampment – tucked between Interstate 75 and the county jail near the small town of Punta Gorda, miles from stores and other amenities – also shows what can go wrong when the federal government quickly sets up temporary housing for a large group of people who don't have any place else to go and won't for a very long time.

STAFF MAP

"They put us out in the middle of nowhere," said Lynn Casagrande, whose four children constantly track the ubiquitous gray dust into their three-bedroom mobile home.



With more than 1,000 people still living in the mobile homes 14 months later, Charlotte County offers a few lessons about what Louisiana officials and residents might expect as the state sets up similar parks to deal with the aftermath of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

While initially grateful to have roofs over their heads, Casagrande and other residents now express growing frustration over living in close quarters in a remote location that makes it hard for people without cars to get to a job or run basic errands. Crime is a nagging problem, with complaints about drug-dealing, petty thefts and fights.

"Nobody likes walking through here at night," said Daniel Peak, a 15-year-old resident who said he and a few of his friends have been beaten up by older men at the park. The Federal Emergency Management Agency eventually set up a security post at the gate to the park, which some residents said made them feel safer and others complained just made it harder for friends and family to visit.

Residents talk hopefully about moving out of the village, but for many who have been at the trailer park since last fall, there is no place else to go. The park has decreased in size in recent months, as more financially stable residents have moved out, with the number of mobile homes shrinking from about 550 to

After only 40 days, the 911 tapes already read like historical artifacts, each summary matter-of-factly capturing slivers of the horror and havoc wrought by Katrina in the first few hours and days after the storm.

But as the search for victims wraps up the next couple of days, the backlist of emergency calls that went unanswered has become the critical paper trail to whatever grim remains are yet to be discovered.

"Nine people trapped in house. No food or water."

"Mother with children: 5, 3 and infant."

"You're looking at calls from people in every possible crisis and every one has its own story behind it. It's pretty eerie to consider what these people must have been going through," said Louisiana state trooper Mark Fontenot before he set out Sunday for another day of breaking down doors and slogging through ruined houses.

Before leaving Troop B headquarters in Kenner, Fontenot looked over the computerized printout with his partner David Flauss. As Sunday's work started, they were down to the last few dozen calls, most of them

Former resident gets St. Bernard moving

He delivers cars to parish police

By Sandra Barbier
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

Ask Brent Smith where he's from, and he'll tell you, "I'm from Chalmette," even though he has lived outside Chicago for the past 10 years.

As he watched Hurricane Katrina stagger St. Bernard Parish during the past five weeks, Smith, 44, had to take action. He called a former classmate at Chalmette High School, state Sen. Walter Boasso, R-Arabi, and St. Bernard Parish Sheriff Jack Stephens.

He asked a simple question: "What do you need?""

And this week he delivered: six police cars, two pickup trucks and two sport utility vehicles, along with radios, lights and sirens.

Donated by the McHenry, Ill., County Sheriff's Office and Sheriff Keith Nygren, the cars were just what Stephens had ordered.

The St. Bernard Parish Sheriff's Office lost 111 of its 136 patrol units in the hurricane, Stephens said. Not that the cars were missed in the initial aftermath: "The first six days, we used nothing but boats," Stephens said.

But since then, they have been sorely missed, and now, Stephens said, "activity is starting to pick up," with more arrests for looting and burglary.

The Sheriff's Office received cars from California authorities and the DEA is sending others, but the most important thing about the units donated from Illinois is that they are ready to roll, Stephens said.

STAFF PHOTO BY CHRIS GRANGER

Chalmette native Brent Smith, left, brings in an 18-wheeler loaded with vehicles last week to donate to resource-strapped St. Bernard Parish. Smith, who lives in Illinois, gathered contributions from people in the Chicago area. 'They saw this was my roots,' Smith said of the donors. 'Their hearts went out to the victims of the hurricane.'

"It's on the ground. It's got light bars ready. … I can attach magnetic emblems" on the doors," he said Wednesday, after accepting the donation. "I hope they will be on the street tomorrow."

Stephens also received two Chevrolet Blazers, and the St. Bernard Parish Fire Department was given two pickup trucks.

Members of St. Bernard Parish's 34th Judicial District Court Bar Association raised $4,500 to pay to transport the vehicles to Chalmette.

But it wasn't just vehicles that Smith gathered.

A 1978 graduate of Chalmette High School and heavy equipment operator, he organized a drive outside the International Union of Operating Engineers' Local 150 near his hometown. People dropped off enough supplies, including water, bleach, clothes and generators, to fill five semi-trailers.

The trailers are poised for shipment from Chicago, Smith said.

To get the police cars, he said, he went to a National Rifle Association banquet that friends were hosting. "I bought two tables," then passed out about 300 wish lists of supplies and equipment from friends and officials in St. Bernard.

He said he sought publicity from the community newspaper, which had featured him in a story two years ago after he killed a 12-foot alligator on a trip back to Chalmette.

"They called it the Bayou Battle," he said, so he christened his own Katrina relief effort the "Bayou Battle."

"They saw this was my roots," Smith said. "Their hearts went out to the victims of the hurricane."

Smith said he is hoping to collect more donations, especially surplus vehicles, from McHenry County Board Chairman Ken Koehler.

"He's been hustling that whole area," Boasso said.

Boasso also has done some hustling, gathering trucks and two airplanes full of supplies and equipment from citizens and businesses. The Bayer Co. is sending a truck full of products, including diabetic glucometers, and the Timberland shoe company sent a truckload of shoes, he said.

Boasso said he is working with the Greater New Orleans Foundation and the Kiwanis Foundation to get donations from major charitable foundations. The goal is to raise $100 million to rebuild St. Bernard Parish, he said.

For Smith, his biggest supporters were his wife and children, his in-laws and his wife's grandmother, who staffed the donation site every weekend. "A 90-year-old lady was out there helping me," he said.

Smith was on hand Wednesday as the vehicles arrived at Boasso's trucking and container yard in Chalmette. There were smiles all around during the reunion.

Firefighter Shaun Murphy, another Chalmette High classmate of Smith's, grabbed Smith in a big hug. "You came back home," he said.

No need to fear: Flu shots will be here

Supply plentiful, but old, young, ill will get first crack

By John Pope
Staff writer

In a year brimming with enough calamities to break even the staunchest Louisianian, health officials have some good news: There will be no flu-shot shortage this year.

Unlike last year, when panic gripped the United States after contamination deprived the country of nearly half its expected supply, no glitches are expected in the system that provides the inoculations to millions of Americans.

The four manufacturers under contract to provide vaccines are expected to deliver as many as 90 million doses, which should be more than enough for the people who get immunized each year, said Lola Russell, a spokeswoman for the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Louisiana's Office of Public Health is expecting about 120,000 doses, which will go to nursing homes and to parish health units for people who are most susceptible to flu and its complications, said Dr. Frank Welch, medical director of the agency's immunization program.

Doctors in private practice and privately run clinics order their own; those numbers are not included in the amount sent to states, he said.

Despite the apparent abundance, state and federal health departments are asking Americans to keep their sleeves rolled down until the most vulnerable citizens — the very young, the very old, the chronically ill and people who are around them — can get the shots first.

It is important to vaccinate as many people in these groups as possible because they are most susceptible not only to influenza but also to potentially fatal complications such as pneumonia, Russell said.

This grace period lasts until Oct. 24, the start of the nationwide vaccination campaign, she said.

That date was picked to give people at greatest risk enough time to get their shots before administering the vaccines to the general population, Russell said.

Shots given at shelters

In addition to people in these groups, about 15,000 people in hurricane shelters across Louisiana were given flu shots because of the high probability that the disease could spread quickly in crowded quarters, Welch said.

"Our approach to shelters was phenomenally successful," said Welch, whose staff was joined in that immunization

Half of losses fall through insurance cracks

Disasters force many to dig deep into pockets

By Bruce Taylor Seeman
Newhouse News Service

In late 1997, the people of Grand Forks, N.D., received a gift from the people of Reading, Pa.: 2,500 winter coats, plus $4,500 cash for hats, gloves and snow pants.

The donation went unnoticed across most of the waterlogged Northern Plains, still recovering from spring floods that killed 11 and destroyed hundreds of homes and businesses.

But it's the kind of assistance, experts say, that is absolutely vital given the unavoidable truth about natural disasters: Often about half of total losses are not covered by insurance.

In Grand Forks, for example, where only about 20 percent of homeowners carried flood insurance, uninsured losses ranged from entire homes to the city water system.

"People certainly got assistance, but it wasn't enough to rebuild and repair their homes," said Barbara Kramer, a social worker who helped run a mental health program after the Grand Forks disaster. "They had to dive into their saving and their kids' college savings. Some had to put off their retirements."

Total price tags on disasters have risen in recent years. Some of that might be blamed on fiercer hurricanes along with the increasing number of people living in places vulnerable to extreme weather, analysts say.

According to Munich Re, a German reinsurance company, insurance companies paid more than $91 billion in losses from weather-related natural disasters in the 1990s, nearly four times the weather-related claims distributed in the 1980s. And last year's hurricane season was a record-setter: four massive storms that caused $45 billion in damage.

"We're placing ourselves in harm's way more," said Beverly Cigler, a public policy and administration professor at Pennsylvania State University. "The more people who live on coast lines, in canyons in California, on fault lines, the more it's going to cost you."

Disaster recovery costs have also risen because developers cleared forests and wetlands that act to soften violent weather, and because growth in high-risk areas has created more infrastructure to damage — new roads, bridges, sewage systems and other costly infrastructure, Cigler said.

Insurance gap looms

The double-whammy of hurricanes Katrina and Rita will set a new record for disaster costs. Total loss estimates from Katrina alone range from $100 billion to $125 billion. Between $40 billion and $60 billion of that total will be covered by insurance, according to Risk Management Solutions of Newark, Cal.

But what are the uninsured losses, how are they absorbed, and what have communities done to buffer themselves in case Mother Nature delivers another sucker punch?

When misfortune strikes, it doesn't take long for a homeowner or business operator to calculate uninsured losses. The task is more difficult on a large scale. In a disaster, uninsured losses are typically not tracked and can take many forms.

A waterlogged store without flood insurance incurs uninsured losses. So does a homeowner who carries a $150,000 policy on a $200,000 house that burned in a firestorm. A store shut down during a disaster cleanup might absorb losses through missed business. A city with inadequate insurance may get stuck fixing damaged schools or bridges.

After the Jan. 17, 1994, Northridge earthquake, many homeowners discovered their policies were not enough to fix their homes, lets alone the extras. "Earthquake policies are generally for a house and its contents," said David Unnewehr, a senior research manager for the American Insurance Association. "If you have a swimming pool or out buildings, they are not covered."

The 10-second, pre-dawn tremblor that rocked Los Angeles was horrific — 61 dead and more than 1,500 seriously hurt. A magnitude 6.7 quake, it was not the "big one" that some feared, but it created enormous challenges. Freeways were flattened. Buildings collapsed. Utility pipes were severed. About 450,000 homes and 7,000 businesses were damaged.

Ballooning costs

With earthquakes, much of the damage is hidden within walls. The price tag on Northridge, originally estimated between $1 billion and $2 billion, multiplied over time to $40 billion. Of that, about two-thirds was not covered. The Small Business Administration processed about 125,000 low-interest business and home loans worth about $4.1 billion. Grants from FEMA and other federal agencies softened losses further, but not completely.

California officials said the catastrophe revealed a huge vulnerability: only about 13 percent of victims had earthquake insurance. Some said it was too expensive. Others didn't know they lived over a fault line. Even the insurance industry was caught off guard.

"The insurance companies said, 'Wait a minute: This earthquake comes from a fault no one knew about? OK. We're done. No more of these policies,'" said Nancy Kincaid, a spokeswoman for the California Earthquake Authority.

A year after the earthquake, more than 250 people had filed lawsuits, accusing insurance companies of delaying payments and leaving people uninsured. Many insurers stopped offering policies.

As a remedy, the state created the earthquake authority, which collaborates with private insurers and typically offers insurance policies with 15 percent deductibles. The policies don't provide for total loss coverage, but Kincaid said 730,000 Californians have signed up.

The changed insurance system has recast the insurance expectations. Before the quake, Kincaid said, policies were expected to cover everything, including "swimming pools, your gazebo, your grandmothers's china." But the state-sponsored system is "catastrophic insurance, to keep you from being in a tent city, or an Astrodome."

A problem in past storms

Other disasters have highlighted the pain of uninsured losses.

Among the four hurricanes that blasted the U.S. last summer — Jeanne, Ivan, Frances, Charley — total economic losses range from $6.9 billion to $15 billion. Including federal flood insurance, all had uninsured losses of 40 percent or more, according to data provided by the Insurance Information Institute and the National Oceanic & Atmospheric Administration.

For Hurricane Andrew, the nation's costliest catastrophe before Katrina, more than half of the total price tag of $35.6 billion was uninsured. That storm forced 11 insurance companies out of business and inspired the state of Florida to get into the insurance business. Today, about 775,000 Floridians, mostly coastal property owners, get high-cost coverage through the state-run Citizens Property Insurance Corp.

At root of the problem was an insurance industry shift: After Hurricane Andrew and other disasters, most insurers stopped providing full coverage of homes — "guaranteed replacement" — and switched to providing coverage to a pre-specified amount — called "enhanced replacement."

Some who lost their homes faced much higher premiums or no company willing to insure their home. Some homeowners sued. State officials, after receiving 859 complaints, collected more than $14 million for homeowners via mediation and other methods, the state reported.

State legislators passed laws aimed at protecting consumers, including requirements that insurers explain premium increases and warn consumers at least 20 days before canceling a policy.

Vaccines handed out at crowded shelters

FLU SHOTS, from A-2

drive by people from churches, CDC, the U.S. Public Health Service, the American Red Cross and Louisiana State University.

The vaccine is being manufactured by Sanofi Pasteur Inc., GlaxoSmithKline, Chiron and Medimmune.

The first three companies produce injectable vaccines containing killed flu virus; Medimmune makes a spray with a live virus that has been safely weakened. Shots are approved for anyone who can receive the vaccine, but the mist is recommended for healthy 5- to 49-year-olds.

All vaccines have the same goal: to trigger the immune system to produce antibodies in response to the virus in the shot.

This takes about two weeks, Russell said.

The vaccine's effectiveness may last longer than a year, she said, but people should get flu shots annually because the vaccine's composition changes from year to year, based on what scientists think will be the dominant strains during the next flu season.

Won't make you ill

Because the viruses in the shots are inactive, people cannot contract flu from an injection. However, the CDC recommends that people not be immunized if they are highly allergic to eggs, in which the flu-shot viruses are grown; if they had an acute reaction to a flu shot; or if they have a history of Guillain-Barre syndrome, an illness characterized by fever, nerve damage and muscle weakness.

Concern about Guillain-Barre arose in 1976, when the swine-flu vaccine was associated with developing the condition. A study showed the risk to be about 1 in a million, according to the CDC.

Side effects of a flu shot can include soreness, redness or swelling around the shot site; low fever; and aches.

People who are urged to be immunized include those 65 or older; people with chronic illnesses and those who live or work near them; all children 6 months to 23 months old; people with respiratory problems; and women who will be pregnant during flu season.

Flu is caused by a virus that infects the respiratory tract. Symptoms include fever, headache, fatigue, a dry cough, a runny or stuffy nose and muscle aches. Some prescriptions are available, but they must be taken within two days of the onset of symptoms.

Season of sickness

Although flu cases in Louisiana have been reported as early as summer, the season in the United States starts in autumn and lasts into spring, with a peak from late December through March.

It is impossible to get an exact count of flu cases because they can be reported only by doctors and not everyone seeks medical treatment.

The CDC estimates that 15 million to 60 million Americans get the flu each year. Of that number, the agency estimates that about 200,000 people are hospitalized and about 36,000 Americans die of flu and its complications.

Closure is sought for all 911 calls

STAFF PHOTO BY JENNIFER ZDON

Louisiana state troopers David Flauss, Sam Capaci and Mark Fontenot, from left, search for the name of a tenant whom a caller believed might have been trapped in a home on Friscoville.

SEARCH, from A-1

from the hardest-hit areas of devastated St. Bernard Parish:

"Needs medicine. Diabetic. High Blood Pressure."

"Trapped in bedroom. Water up to neck."

In normal times, Fontenot and Flauss are narcotics detectives. Now they are part of the last dwindling group of first responders assigned to what had been a massive, round-the-clock search-and-rescue operation.

In the first five days after the storm, the Coast Guard, Department of Wildlife and Fisheries and a flotilla of fishers and leisure boaters rescued thousands of people from rooftops, attics and floodwaters. With the arrival of FEMA, the military and outside police agencies, the second phase was a methodically mapped-out, house-by-house canvass.

About three weeks ago, with rescuers finding fewer and fewer survivors, the job became less urgent, but in many ways more solemn. The search participants dwindled down to the Louisiana State Police and a large contingent of police officers from various parts of New Jersey.

Between the two agencies, officers pinpointed the location of more than 150 bodies, many of them in houses that already had been subjected to an initial search.

Sgt. John Ryan, a trooper from Toms River, N.J., compared the devastation to what he saw in Manhattan after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11. He said that responding to calls from the 911 list, even those more than a month old, was one of the most important things he's ever done.

"When you find a body you can't help thinking about what this person had to go through before they died. It's tough to put it in words," Ryan said. "But we were determined to answer all of the calls ….After everything we went through with 9/11, I think all of us in New Jersey understand how important it is to respond to these calls."

In the past few weeks, the search based on 911 calls has continued to painstakingly add to the state's body count, which topped 1,000 Friday.

Fontenot and Flauss were praying they didn't add to the total Sunday.

"Believe me, it doesn't break our hearts to go inside these houses and find absolutely nothing," Fontenot said. "Our squad hasn't had that many bodies, but we have had a few. One is enough to make you stop in your tracks."

Before heading to St. Bernard, Fontenot and Flauss stop to deliver food and water to a holdout in Treme, a diabetic 67-year-old man living in his brother's empty house. The troopers found Raulston Johnson at the St. Philip Street house more than a week ago, after he was flooded out of his Gentilly home, then got fed up with staying at an evacuation shelter in Houston.

"I'd just as soon sit here," Johnson said, gratefully accepting a case of water and box of meals-ready-to-eat from Fontenot, Flauss and two other troopers.

With Johnson in good shape, the troopers passed the police checkpoint into St. Bernard Parish and began deciding which houses to hit first.

The task is especially tough for Fontenot and Flauss, both of whom lived in St. Bernard Parish and lost everything. But between the two, they seem to know every street.

The 911 printouts they are using have been culled from an original list of 14,374 calls that automatically rolled over to the State Police headquarters in Baton Rouge when local emergency services were cut off by the hurricane, Sgt. Mark Sheridan said.

About half the calls are from relatives and friends checking on loved ones, Sheridan said. The other half are from the victims themselves, many of them elderly, infirm or people who were simply caught by fast-rising water.

"We're trying to bring closure to every single 911 call. It means a lot to say that every call was investigated and cleared," Sheridan said.

"It's sort of a sacred duty in law enforcement."

The first stop for Fontenot and Flauss is 1117 Friscoville in Arabi.

"Trapped on roof ... supposed to be sending helicopter."

The men donned their protective gloves, boots and facemasks. The front door was open, so they let themselves in. Inside the mother-in-law apartment, they find evidence of a survivor: a couple of used MRE packages, a hole sawed through the ceiling and into the attic, the rusted saw lying on the mud-caked floor.

After checking each room and finding them empty, Flauss checks off the 911 entry as "Cleared/Entered."

The next stop is based on a call from someone in the Philippines checking on a person at 101 Center St.

"No contact since storm."

The address doesn't exist, so they move on. They check another house at 1819 Center St. People cleaning out debris from a house next door assure them that the woman who lived there made it out safely.

Next, they go to 1956 Benjamin St., a street near the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet where a storm surge lifted dozens of houses from their foundations and moved them around like Monopoly game pieces.

"Trapped on roof. Melissa, Michael and one child. Water rising."

After bashing through the front door, the troopers are find the all-too familiar stench of mold and decay and the sight of waterlogged debris. In this house, like so many others nearby, the ruins are all jammed to one side of the house, pushed there by the powerful flood currents. The back of the house was emptied so thoroughly of furniture, the ceiling that crashed down is lying flatly and neatly on the floor.

At Melissa and Michael's house, the evidence is telltale. Hole in the ceiling. Hole in the roof. Long coiled rope next to the hole.

The next few houses lead to the similar results: massive heartache, but thankfully no bodies. On the floor of one house is a stack of large binders with a ruined football card collection. In the bedroom of another, a dead perch.

The troopers, through the muffled tones of protective masks, point out the most amazing discoveries. But at another house on Benjamin Street, they find something that leaves them speechless.

A ceramic Virgin Mary lawn statue has, somehow, perched itself in the rafters of the house's attic. The troopers retrieve the statue, virtually unscarred, and place it gently on a countertop.

Tax breaks could be big lure, some say

RETURN, from A-1

they are seeing firsthand why so many businesses long ago migrated to Texas.

Among the Houston attractions, they say, are a business-focused environment, safer streets, better schools and, not least on the list, no state personal income tax.

Business leaders would like to see some of those things high on the list of priorities for a retooled New Orleans.

"If New Orleans passes on this opportunity to improve itself, then we're not going to be a company headquartered in New Orleans. I guess that's our bottom line," said Dean Taylor, chairman and chief executive officer of Tidewater Inc., an offshore energy shipping service now operating out of Houston but in theory still based on Poydras Street.

Just four days after Hurricane Katrina erased the people and businesses from New Orleans, the Houston media already was recording stories about Crescent City companies deciding to move their operations to Texas permanently. For New Orleans' corporate boosters, it was an old theme with a painful new twist.

Even the person who chairs the business retention committee for Greater New Orleans Inc., which is the area's leading economic development group, was displaced to Houston. Bill Herrington, a Hibernia National Bank executive, took the daunting committee assignment before Katrina.

"If there was a problem before, it's a much bigger problem now," Herrington said. "I can assure you there are wealthy individuals who have relocated to Texas. Now that they're there, why would they go back?"

Richard Bachmann, chairman and chief executive of Energy Partners, an oil and gas exploration and production company that until Katrina was based on St. Charles Avenue, said businesses need the basics of infrastructure – effective levees, water supply, power, roads, police and fire protection – to even consider operating in New Orleans again.

"Nobody's coming back to the city if we haven't solved the basic issues," Bachmann said. "We can all drink bottled water, but we don't want to take showers in water if it glows."

Leveling the playing field

While business leaders are looking for a strong signal from authorities in the near future that those matters will be taken care of, government officials must also take action to create a competitive local and state tax and regulatory environment, he said.

"This state is not competitive in terms of costs of doing business in the state," Bachmann said. "And that's got to be on the agenda too."

Herrington and others are hoping government policies post-Katrina will align with a new way of thinking about creating jobs and wealth in Louisiana. Although Hibernia has committed to returning to its New Orleans headquarters, some of the bank's client base is in doubt, and Herrington has contact daily with people making decisions about whether to return.

"Wealth creates wealth," Herrington said, echoing a sentiment shared by a number of top New Orleans business executives in Houston last week.

As Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco and city and parish officials in the New Orleans area press for state and federal government recovery programs, they should keep their eye on the goal of luring business decision-makers and successful people in the private sector who have money to invest in business ventures and jobs, the executives said.

The New Orleans region is bound to get a boost of business activity as billions of federal dollars flow into the region for rebuilding projects. But for business and people to repopulate the area for the long term, incentives should be created to make Louisiana at least as attractive as Texas is financially to company chiefs, including personal and corporate tax laws, said Chris Dicharry, a partner with the Kean Miller law and consulting firm who has worked on business recruitment initiatives.

Spending money to rebuild the city and creating a host of government-backed low-cost financing programs for businesses are necessary steps that state and federal authorities ought to take, Herrington said.

But that's not enough, because "financing doesn't drive an economy," Herrington said. "There has to be something else to drive that. If you have a vibrant economy, the financing is going to follow."

Proposed tax breaks hailed

U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, has expressed similar concerns and wants to see legislation that would create a dramatically lower tax bill for people who choose to move to the New Orleans area. Rather than depending too much on mammoth spending programs to spur rebirth of the city, which will have an impact over a few years, government tax breaks and other financial incentives would generate longer-term growth by appealing to the entrepreneurial spirit of people across the country willing to make a move and a long-term commitment to New Orleans, he said.

Among the programs favored by Herrington is a Blanco proposal for a 50-percent federal income-tax holiday for five years for people who work in the Katrina impact area.

Jay Lapeyre, president of Laitram LLC, a New Orleans-based manufacturer of food processing equipment currently in Houston, said such incentives hold other advantages.

"If New Orleans passes on this opportunity to improve itself, then we're not going to be a company headquartered in New Orleans. I guess that's our bottom line."

DEAN TAYLOR
chairman and chief executive officer of Tidewater Inc.

"The incentives don't fall prey to the political problem of corruption the way subsidies do," Lapeyre said.

Tax incentives would seem less like a Louisiana money grab, said Mike Dumas, chief financial officer of the New Orleans ocean transport company Intermarine LLC, temporarily working out of Houston.

The state's first major congressional initiative for a recovery package, orchestrated by Sens. Mary Landrieu and David Vitter, was a $250 billion proposal that was well-intentioned, Dumas said, but "just the way it came across was that it was just a grab by Louisiana politicians." As a result, Louisiana's credibility was hurt – some editorial writers called it the "Louisiana Looters Bill" – and from now on "everything's going to be viewed with a lot of skepticism" in Washington, he said.

Intermarine had 45 people in its New Orleans office before Katrina, and "we'd love to be able to take them all back at the end of the day," Dumas said. "Whether we'll be able to do that is still up for discussion. We're trying to keep them motivated to stay with the company."

If tax incentives would help those people hang on to some of the money they earn, then the employees might be more willing to accept the risks of going back to New Orleans.

"We're not asking for any kind of a handout," Dumas said. "Really what we're asking for is to be able to hang on to more of what we do make, (and) then we can turn that over to the community, to make more investments."

Greg Rusovich, president of Transoceanic Shipping, an international company that moved back to its main location in Kenner after the storm, said he is very concerned about the drain of wealth and brains from New Orleans.

"If employers come back and wealth comes back, then that wealth will stimulate more growth," Rusovich said. "It will stimulate more people to come back."

Businesses dislocated from New Orleans are watching to see how infrastructure will be rebuilt and how the new incentives to create wealth will be structured, Taylor said. But they won't wait and watch much longer before making important decisions.

"We're going to know pretty early on, I think, whether it's going to be an effective process or not," Taylor said.

Some still tentative about coming back

Martha Carr
Staff writer

It's been more than a week since Mayor Ray Nagin reopened New Orleans to residents in the city's least-affected neighborhoods, hoping many would jump at the chance to return to their homes for good.

But by the look of things Sunday, lots of locals apparently are staying where they are for now, despite the fact that tap water has been deemed drinkable and electricity is being restored to many neighborhoods.

First kept away by grim reports of dangerous floodwaters, a tainted water warning and chaos in the streets, many residents are now saying they are unwilling to resettle in the city until more power is restored, schools reopen and vital businesses, such as groceries and pharmacies, are back up and running.

Others say they are more than a little concerned about Nagin's recent proposal to create a downtown gambling district, a move that could influence their decision whether to return.

"The mayor needs to put the citizens first, not the tourism industry," said Leo Collins as he climbed over a mound of debris in his flooded home in the 1800 block of Dante Street. "He's trying to generate money, but if people aren't here, you have no city. As for the gambling, it will only bring more violence and corruption."

Karl Flair is among the city's few residents who can return anytime. His home in the 1100 block of Fern Street didn't flood, and the power is on. All the house really needs is a good cleaning.

But Flair said he and his wife have gotten comfortable in the motor home where they are living in Hammond. It's close to his wife's job, there's no traffic, and it's debris-free. For those reasons, they've decided to take their time moving back.

"Life is just simple where we are now," Karl said as he shoveled dead leaves off the curb. "We will come back. It just may be a few weeks."

Other, more pioneering, types moved back to their homes this weekend, with plans to see what the coming days and weeks bring. Mike Waters and his partner Brian Broussard sipped wine on the steps of their Bayou St. John-area apartment Sunday, celebrating the first day back with power.

Right now, they have few neighbors. But they are hopeful that more residents will join them soon.

"Every day we see more and more activity," Waters said.

As for the trash and debris that litters their block, Waters said, "We'll just have to suck it up. If you live here, you can't walk around with a mask on your face forever."

French Quarter residents Jamie Dell'Apa and Mary Milewski are also giving things a try. The couple moved back to their Creole townhouse on St. Ann Street this week, and say they – like so many – can't imagine life in any other place. Still, they'll have to see how things go.

"We figured that we had to come back to the house, repair the damage, and see its value after that," said Jamie, who has lived in the Quarter for seven years. "After we are on the ground for a while, we can decide if it's worth staying or leaving."

Blessed - "ADJECTIVE: highly favored or fortunate; characterized by happiness and good fortune."

Prior to Hurricane Katrina, "blessed" was an often used word. Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.

Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. This is a very limited opportunity, and availability is restricted.

We have employment opportunities available in the Sales Department, including management availabilities.

Sales Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 7pm
Service Hours: Mon - Fri 7:30am - 6pm • Sat 7:30-4

We are committed to rebuilding Jefferson Parish and Southeast Louisiana. We need your support. Together, we will prevail and have a better place to live and work than before Hurricane Katrina.

As you read this, Ray Brandt Toyota, its employees and families, and the residents of Southeast Louisiana all have something in common; we are truly "blessed".

Coastal La. gets look at Rita damage

Most structures were blown away

By Doug Simpson
Associated Press writer

HOLLY BEACH — The little house at the beach had been in Louella Touchet's family since 1975, a weekend getaway for swimming, fishing and crabbing.

She returned Saturday to find it gone, blown down and washed inland by Hurricane Rita.

"Well, we have 30 years of good memories," she said, gazing over the mushy, wet sand where the home once stood.

Homeowners in Holly Beach and other coastal Louisiana towns returned for the first time since the storm hit more than two weeks ago, bringing winds of more than 100 mph and floods up to 9 feet. Some of the worst damage occurred in Cameron Parish, where Holly Beach and other small towns overlook the Gulf of Mexico.

Holly Beach was a town of about 400 houses _ most of them modest vacation homes _ none of which were left standing after the storm. Some concrete foundations remain, along with mangled steel girders, crushed cars and pickups, stray toilets, bent bicycles and other debris.

James Cox, a sheriff's deputy, bought his home here 10 years ago and had been one of the community's dozen or so permanent residents since. His wood-framed, three-bedroom house is now gone; the storm left behind a handful of items heavy enough to resist the waves, he said.

"I found just a few things, my barbecue pit, power tools, welding table, my dad's lawn mower," he said.

Nearly all the area's residents evacuated, authorities said. Freddy Richard, Cameron Parish's chief of emergency preparedness, said he knew of one man who rode out the storm in the parish courthouse, one of the few structures left standing. The man was unharmed.

The high evacuation rate was due partly to the strong memories of those old enough to recall Hurricane Audrey, which struck in 1957 with a 13-foot storm surge and gusts of up to 180 mph that flattened Cameron, Holly Beach and other towns. Some 390 died in Louisiana.

Hurricane Rita struck early Sept. 24, about 15 miles west of here, along the Texas state line, with top sustained winds of 120 mph. Nobody was killed in Louisiana.

John Richard, 82, said Audrey was worse — it pushed all the splintered debris inland, leaving little in Holly Beach to clean up. His family rebuilt, but Rita has destroyed the replacement, leaving the concrete slab, a sink, a bent shower pipe and not much more.

Parish officials now are enforcing a 6 p.m. to 6 a.m. curfew. Residents are allowed to clean up their homes and stay overnight if they have supplies, but those caught on the streets during the curfew are ticketed, Richard said. Less than 30 percent of the homes left standing in the area had electricity Saturday, and none did in the coastal towns, according to Entergy Corp.

Despite the destruction, most who returned Saturday said they would put up some kind of home on the coast again.

Robert Romero's rental property in Johnson Bayou remained standing, but had been so full of floodwater that it will have to be torn down and rebuilt. He said his red brick house next door would cost $70,000 to clean.

Romero said he gave no thought to moving somewhere away from the threat of hurricanes. He'll live in hotels or with family in Texas until he can dry out the walls and kill the mold.

"You want to go to California and fight earthquakes? You want to go to Oklahoma and fight tornados? No. This is our home," Romero said.

Many said they would restore their demolished property, but in a different way — with a mobile home that can be towed off when a storm threatens.

"I'll get me a big RV and a big truck and move it on out when something like this is going to happen," Cox said.

Job seekers in luck across Gulf Coast

Restaurants and hotels especially short-handed

By Brett Martel
Associated Press writer

The message is clear on storefront marquees, brightly colored banners and the handwritten signs taped by merchants inside windows across New Orleans: Businesses reopening after Hurricane Katrina have a surplus of jobs, and not enough workers to fill them.

The shortage is obvious at the city's fanciest hotels, where a lack of staff means maid service is offered just once a week. It is just as glaring at fast-food restaurants, where long lines of cars snake through parking lots because most have only enough workers to operate drive-through windows. It's virtually impossible to pass through any functioning part of town without seeing "Now Hiring" posted somewhere.

And the demand for workers is similarly dire on the Mississippi coast.

"Two months ago, if you were looking for a job, it probably wasn't that easy," said Darren Aucoin, manager of a Shoe Carnival store in Gretna, which saw minimal flooding and was relatively quick to get power and water back. "Now if you can't find a job, you're not trying."

Burger King, which first reopened its New Orleans restaurants by busing kitchen crews about 80 miles from Baton Rouge, has now taken the unprecedented step of offering $6,000 bonuses to hourly employees agreeing to work full-time for at least a year in the metropolitan area.

Most of the people who've been able to return to New Orleans have been either wealthy or in the middle class, in part because their neighborhoods were damaged the least — leaving a hole for business owners who depend on unskilled labor.

"The service industry and unskilled-labor jobs are the ones really in demand, and the people in that category have not come back," said John Trapani, a professor and vice dean at Tulane University's business school. "There will be a shortage of labor until population starts to return, and who knows what percentage is going to return and when?"

The demand by service businesses for workers is set against a parallel demand for people to work in hurricane clean-up. Some employers have turned to immigrant workers from Central and South America to fill those jobs.

But with thousands of people from Mississippi and New Orleans scattered across the country, scores of more ordinary jobs remain open.

All along Highway 49 in Gulfport, Miss. are signs advertising jobs. Most are variations on this theme: "Now hiring for all positions."

One of those looking for workers is Rolf Howard, the general manager at Applebee's, which is operating with half its normal staff despite seeing its sales more than double since the storm.

Howard was able to reopen a week after Katrina. But many of his employees have relocated and can't return because there was no place to live. To fill in behind them, Howard says, he can no longer afford to be picky.

"We're not even being superselective. We can't afford to. We are literally hiring every day."

In New Orleans, a large "Now Hiring" banner hung in Shoe Carnival's storefront window. And Aucoin said he had increased staff by nearly double from pre-storm levels because of a spike in sales with some shoppers replacing shoes destroyed in the floodwaters.

He declined to say how much better business was, but said he understood why. Residents in areas where power and water are back have returned faster than most stores could reopen, leaving those first few that were up and running flooded with customers looking to replace household items or simply to get out of the house for some shopping therapy.

"It really is a great opportunity for businesses that can open to take advantage of this before the city gets back into economic equilibrium," Trapani said.

A Best Buy electronics store had a line of customers out the door earlier this week. A large banner read, "Now hiring at all locations." The store had set up a computer station a few feet inside the front door for applicants.

Kelly Cahill, controller at the Arden Cahill Academy in Gretna, said the private school put many of its regular employees' families to work as they tried to clean up in time to reopen for students this month.

"We've had anybody's boyfriend or husband, anybody that wanted to come by — basically anybody that needed work, we gave a job to for cleanup," she said.

The few restaurants open have been packed. They've had to shorten operating hours because of curfews but still have to lengthen servers' shifts because there aren't enough employees to do a complete shift change in a given day.

"We're pulling 12-hour shifts," said Nicole Blais, a server at Houston's in suburban Metairie. She was brought in from a New Orleans location that hasn't been able to reopen. "When they reopened they only had a couple servers back, so they started hiring, but whatever people they didn't have to train they were desperate for."

Houston's is still hiring, she said, and with the restaurant always jammed, the money's been good for people like her who rely on tips.

In downtown New Orleans, hospitality industry workers are in short supply, especially in the hotels that now are trying to house as many relief workers and contractors as they can.

Pressure will mount on businesses to increase lower-level wages to entice hourly workers back, Trapani said. They'll also have to help employees address immediate housing needs, and some already have.

'There is a legitimate and real frustration out there'

CONTRACTORS, from A-1

with an e-mail to FEMA. As instructed, he wrote "LA vendor" in the subject line. He got no response. Then he called. And called. More than a month after Katrina, Bent said he still hasn't heard anything from the agency. In the meantime, FEMA has contracted for more than $700 million in travel trailers — with more than 99 percent of the business going to companies outside Louisiana.

Federal officials from President Bush on down have talked about the importance of hiring contractors in the hurricane disaster region to help boost an economy that was decimated by the storm. But, in large part, it hasn't happened.

Of the 140 contracts FEMA awarded through Oct. 3 for such things as travel trailers, prefabricated homes, satellite phones, computers and even mosquito control, just two went to Louisiana companies. The pair of contracts accounted for less than half of 1 percent of the $1.6 billion total.

"The business is going to Florida, Indiana, Georgia," Bent said. "How were they hurt by the hurricane? They weren't, but they'll profit from it. That's not right."

Local firms complain that they are being frozen out because FEMA is putting a premium on past relationships.

Federal officials acknowledge that as they race to respond to disasters, they frequently turn to private firms they have worked with before, those that have been screened for financial stability and those that have a proven track record. Small, local companies with few connections often end up being shut out.

The largest retail contract for travel trailers went to an Indiana company whose general manager said connections probably played a role in getting the work. Tom Stinnett Holiday RVs in Clarksville, Ind., secured a $37 million contract about two weeks after Katrina. The company has been in business since 1956 and is one of the largest RV retailers in the nation.

In addition, General Manager Dave Knable said that the company's sales manager had the ear of FEMA contracting agents from having worked with the agency before. The sales manager was able to e-mail proposals to key FEMA officials when other, less-connected firms were forced to fax in their pitches.

"I guess that helped us get a leg up on others," Knable said.

Local firms frozen out of the federal contracting took some solace in comments Thursday by acting FEMA Director David Paulison, who told a Senate committee that he would rebid the noncompetitive contracts awarded since the storm struck the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29. But Paulison was vague on the details and it wasn't clear whether it would apply to all orders already placed, some which have already been delivered.

At the committee hearing, Paulison was also questioned about why local workers were being displaced by out-of-towners. Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said he had been informed that 75 Louisiana electricians employed at the Naval Air Station in Belle Chasse were told that their jobs are being eliminated now that the work is being switched to Kellogg Brown & Root, a subsidiary of the Texas-based Halliburton Corp. Levin also said that maintenance workers at the New Orleans Superdome, who were paid $15 an hour with benefits, are losing their jobs to "out-of-state workers who agree to work for $12 an hour with no benefits."

Paulison promised to look into it, saying that FEMA is "working diligently to get most of these contracts down to the local workers."

One Louisiana company has found itself in the thick of the post-Katrina work. Soon after the storm, the Baton Rouge-based Shaw Group landed two contracts worth up to $100 million each with FEMA and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. The agreements cover a wide variety of duties ranging from roof repairs to pumping the floodwaters out of New Orleans and fixing the breached levees.

Neither of the contracts was competitively bid. A Shaw Group spokesman said the company got the work because of its long-standing business relationship with FEMA dating back to Hurricane Andrew in 1992.

"We've performed for them," Shaw spokesman Chris Sammons said. "We're a known quantity."

Shaw says it has gone out of its way to hire local talent. Eighty percent of its subcontractors are Louisiana businesses, 62 percent are small firms and nearly 30 percent of the small businesses are women-owned, African-American-owned or other "disadvantaged" enterprises, Sammons said. Those figures are a stark contrast to FEMA's own minority-hiring track record.

About 1.5 percent of the $1.6 billion in FEMA contracts has gone to minority- or women-owned businesses, records show, despite federal guidelines calling for at least 5 percent. Efforts to reach FEMA about the discrepancy were unsuccessful.

Bill Lott, an African-American business owner with a 25-year-old construction firm Triple L Management in Shreveport, said he has been unsuccessful even getting an audience with FEMA officials to pitch his ideas. He has proposed building one-, two- and three-bedroom modular homes for hurricane evacuees that could be placed on their lots while they rebuild.

"We need to talk to someone who can make a decision," said Lott, who has done work for the federal government, but not FEMA. "I just don't have the horsepower to get in front of the right people."

In the immediate aftermath of the storm, the largest contracts were awarded for removing the shattered homes, cars and other debris Katrina left. The Army Corps of Engineers gave four contracts worth up to $500 million each with an option for $500 million more. Two went to Florida companies and one each was given to companies in Minnesota and California. All had pre-existing contracts with the agency.

The contracts specified that preference for subcontractors should be given to firms in the areas hit hardest by the hurricane. That is happening, but would-be subcontractors say the payoff isn't very profitable.

Mike Moreno, chairman and CEO of the New Iberia-based Dynamic Industries, has been trying to get a piece of the debris-removal business. But, he said, the prime contractors are hiring multiple layers of subcontractors, all taking a slice of the profit. By the time a firm is hired to physically cart off the debris, he said, there's little money to be made.

"They are making a significant amount of money and subcontracting the work to three or four different companies for $15 a cubic yard. Then they are subcontracting. Now it's $7 a cubic yard for the guy who is actually doing the work," Moreno said. "I could pay the subs $10 a cubic yard and would charge $12. The government would save money and the subcontractors would earn some."

Concerned that Louisiana is losing out on economic development opportunities, Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, filed a bill last week that would mandate that at least 30 percent of the contracts be awarded to local, small businesses.

"There is a legitimate and real frustration out there," Jindal said. "We can either help businesses get back as soon as possible or we will be spending that much more money in direct assistance later."

Bent, the owner of RV Rendezvous in Metairie, said he was still grappling with the frustration of FEMA not returning his calls when the phone rang two weeks ago with bad news of a different sort.

It was an RV dealer in Florida who had just won a multimillion-dollar contract from the federal agency. The dealer wanted to know whether Bent could spare workers to help prepare a new fleet of trailers for delivery in Louisiana.

"I couldn't believe it. That took a lot of guts," Bent said. "Everyone in this area has lost half their staff to the hurricane ... It just kills me that we had to suffer everything we did with Katrina and now nobody is even attempting to call us to get a piece of the pie."

ANYTHING BUT TEMPORARY

about 460. Some of those trailers have been shipped to the Gulf Coast for victims of Katrina and Rita.

It's mostly the low- to moderate-income residents who have been left behind as the Charlotte County area experienced an unprecedented building boom, pushing many of the rents out of reach.

Many expect something similar to happen in the New Orleans area, where tens of thousands of homes may have to be bulldozed or significantly renovated because of flood damage, removing a lot of low-cost housing from the market.

FEMA has set up a rental-assistance program for victims of Hurricane Katrina, but for many evacuees in Louisiana this won't be helpful because of the limited availability of rental housing in much of the state.

Homeowners with enough space and the proper infrastructure can get a trailer from FEMA to set up on their own property while they fix up their houses. But for renters or those who don't meet the requirements, the state and federal governments are turning to the concept of setting up trailer communities similar to the one near Punta Gorda.

One local official had this recommendation for Louisiana: Think small.

"It has to be smaller," said Bob Hebert, the recovery director for the county, echoing a recommendation of many FEMA Village residents who said their new home lacks any sense of real community.

Transportation also will be a key, Hebert said. With a population of just 160,000, Charlotte County does not have a public transportation system, leaving low-income trailer park residents who lost their cars in the storm with few options. As important, Hebert said, the state should be pushing FEMA to place people as close to possible to their original communities, so they can help rebuild businesses, homes and churches.

FEMA and state officials say their top priority is getting as many people as possible into better living conditions, noting that there were about 23,000 people in shelters in Louisiana late last week, while countless others are crammed into hotel rooms and the homes of relatives or friends.

And while there are problems with the Florida trailer village, James McIntyre, a spokesman for the federal agency, said the troubles are not much different than what occurs in any community.

"They had no more issues there than any other small development would have," he said.

While smaller would be better, Gov. Kathleen Blanco wants to respect the wishes of parish officials from the area hit by Hurricane Katrina who are trying to get as many people home as possible, said Kim Hunter Reed, the governor's policy director. Many of the planned locations for trailer communities will have 200 or fewer units, although a few local governments have asked for parks that can hold more people, she said.

Cody Adair runs to his mother, Tammy, at the FEMA camp in Punta Gorda, Fla., after attending school. Initially happy to have shelter, camp residents now are frustrated over their situation.

Finding places for the parks has not been easy as some communities have expressed concern about being able to support more refugees. The sites also must be equipped with basic infrastructure for sewer, water and electricity. Those pressures seem to push government toward bigger parks in more remote areas.

New Orleans families began to move last week from Baton Rouge-area shelters to a collection of 573 travel trailers set up in Baker, a town about 10 miles north of the capital city. After spending weeks in shelters living in close contact with strangers, evacuees rejoiced at their new situation, happy to finally have some semblance of privacy.

But the populating of the Baker site was going more slowly than expected, with 100 families placed there as of Saturday, according to McIntyre. He blamed the slow pace in part on the fact that some families who had been slated to move could not be located, sometimes because the parents were working during the day.

But he acknowledged that some evacuees who have been living in shelters for more than a month want to wait for temporary housing to be built closer to their homes in the New Orleans area.

As with the site near Punta Gorda, the Baker location is out of the way, a good distance from the parts of Baton Rouge that are more likely to have jobs for evacuees. It also is more than 80 miles from their homes in New Orleans. As more of these sites are set up – there are currently 786 occupied trailers across the state – some could be in even more distant locations.

"That is why the governor said from day one: These need to be communities with wrap-around services," Reed said. These services, which the state would help FEMA provide to each trailer park, include helping people find employment, job training and counseling to deal with the trauma of losing their homes and possessions in the storms.

In Baker, bus service is limited, particularly at night and on the weekends. Dwight Brashear, general manager of the Capital Area Transit System, said there are plans to expand the number of buses that go by the site. The system is prepared to expand service to any of the areas where FEMA sets up in Baton Rouge, such as an expected park near the city's airport.

Officials with social services agencies in Charlotte County said providing hurricane victims with such help is essential, but said they have had a tough time reaching the residents of FEMA Village who they know need assistance.

"We are not allowed in there," said Ana Romillo, executive director of the Charlotte County Homeless Coalition. She said nonprofit groups want to go door-to-door to offer services, but FEMA's security policy requires them to be invited by a resident.

Romillo said organizations such as hers could provide valuable assistance helping low-income residents figure out budgets so they could save money to pay for deposits on rental property that would get them out of the temporary housing.

FEMA provides disaster victims with 18 months of housing assistance, which has caused some Charlotte County residents to panic as the deadline looms in February, she said. County officials say they do not expect

Rescuers struggle to reach quake victims

20,000 death toll expected to rise

By Sadaqat Jan
Associated Press writer

MUZAFFARABAD, PAKISTAN — Rescuers struggled to reach remote, mountainous areas Sunday after Pakistan's worst-ever earthquake wiped out entire villages, buried roads in rubble and knocked out electricity and water supplies. The death toll stood at 20,000 and was expected to rise.

In this devastated Himalayan city, wounded covered by shawls lay in the street, and villagers used sledgehammers to break through the rubble of flattened schools and homes seeking survivors.

The quake collapsed the city's Islamabad Public School. Soldiers with white cloth tied around their mouths and noses pulled a small girl's dust-covered body from the ruins, while the body of a boy remained pinned between heavy slabs of concrete.

The United Nations said more than 2.5 million people need shelter after the magnitude-7.6 earthquake along the Pakistan-India border. The Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Relief said it urgently needed 200,000 winterized tents.

President Gen. Pervez Musharraf complained of a shortage of helicopters needed to ferry in relief workers, food and medical supplies, and appealed for international help.

In Washington, President Bush said eight U.S. military choppers were being moved to help in rescue efforts, and he promised financial assistance. India, which has fought three wars with Pakistan, also offered assistance, as did Israel, which has no relations with the Muslim nation.

"We are handling the worst disaster in Pakistan's history," chief army spokesman Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan said.

The quake was felt across a wide swath of South Asia from central Afghanistan to western Bangladesh. It swayed buildings in the capitals of three nations, with the damage spanning at least 250 miles from Jalalabad in Afghanistan to Srinagar in northern Indian territory. In Islamabad, a 10-story building collapsed, killing at least 24 people.

Late Sunday, helmeted rescuers found a survivor after hearing his cries for help. The thin man in a blue shirt, looking dazed, emerged on his own with little help and stood in front of a crowd of cheering onlookers. One rescuer patted his head, and the man waved and pumped his fist in the air.

Pakistan said the death toll ranged between 20,000 and 30,000. India reported more than 600 dead, and Afghanistan said four were killed.

"We have enough manpower but we need financial support ... to cope with the tragedy," Musharraf said in Rawalpindi, according to the state-run news agency Associated Press of Pakistan.

He also appealed for medicine and tents.

Musharraf told the British Broadcasting Corp. he knew of as many as 20,000 people killed, and Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz told CNN about 43,000 people were injured.

Musharraf said the only way to reach many far-flung areas was by helicopter because roads were impassable.

"Our helicopter resources are limited," he told the BBC. "We need massive cargo helicopter support."

Most of the devastation occurred in northern Pakistan. The U.S. Geological Survey said the quake was centered about 60 miles northeast of the capital, Islamabad, in the forested mountains of Pakistani Kashmir.

"I have been informed by my department that more than 30,000 people have died in Kashmir," Tariq Mahmmod, communications minister for the Himalayan region, told The Associated Press.

Troops "have not started relief work in remote villages where people are still buried in the rubble, and in some areas nobody is present to organize funerals for the dead," he said.

The USGS said there were at least 25 aftershocks within 24 hours, including a 6.2-magnitude temblor.

Dozens of villages were cut off from rescuers by quake-induced landslides. Relatives desperate to find their loved ones dug through flattened homes and schools with bare hands.

In Muzaffarabad, a city of 600,000 that is the capital of Pakistani Kashmir, residents said they faced food and gasoline shortages. There was no electricity, and people collected water from a mountain stream.

"People are relying on local fruit, and they have little food to eat. I went out to get bread, and could only get a couple of apples," carpet seller Gul Khan said.

Interior Minister Aftab Khan Sherpao said 11,000 people in Muzaffarabad were killed.

At least 250 pupils were feared trapped at the Islamabad Public School, and dozens of villagers, some with sledgehammers, pulled at debris and carried away bodies. Several bright backpacks dotted the rubble. Nearby, a man cried over a child's body.

"The communication infrastructure and systems are down and we can't get help to us, that should be the priority," principal Mushtaq Ahmed Kahn said.

Hundreds of people waited at bus stations, hoping to leave. The body of a man lay on a roadside, and a family pushed a body in a cart.

The military hospital collapsed, and residents said there were bodies inside. Doctors set up a makeshift clinic in a park.

"The situation is very bad. Surgeries are being conducted on soccer fields. There are not enough doctors," Ozgur Bozoglu, a member of a Turkish search-and-rescue team, GEA, told Turkey's NTV television.

Helicopters and C-130 transport planes took troops and supplies to damaged areas Sunday. When confronted by urgent appeals from villagers, Musharraf responded, "For heaven's sake, bear with us."

Bush said he spoke with Musharraf and "told him that we want to help in any way we can."

"Thousands of people have died, thousands are wounded, and the United States of America wants to help," Bush said from the Oval Office.

Aziz said the American helicopters would be drawn from coalition military operations in neighboring Afghanistan.

But Maj. Andrew Elmes, spokesman for NATO's 11,000-strong force, said it was outside the mission's mandate to operate beyond Afghanistan.

The United Nations, Britain, Russia, China, Turkey, Japan and Germany offered assistance. An eight-member U.N. team of top disaster coordination officials arrived in Islamabad on Sunday.

Aziz said the Pakistani death toll was 19,396 dead, and it was expected to rise.

Officials said Balakot, in the North West Frontier Province about 60 miles north of Islamabad, was one of the hardest-hit areas. Near the ruins of one collapsed school, at least a dozen bodies lay in the streets. More than 200 pupils were feared trapped inside the rubble of a four-story school.

Dozens of villagers pulled at the debris and carried away bodies. Faizan Farooq, a 19-year-old student, said he had heard children under the rubble crying for help immediately after Saturday's disaster.

"Now there's no sign of life," he said Sunday. "We can't do this without the army's help. Nobody has come here to help us."

There was no sign of government help in Balakot. The quake leveled the town's main bazaar, crushing shoppers and strewing gas cylinders, bricks, tomatoes and onions on the streets.

Residents carried bodies on wooden planks. The corpses of four children, aged between 4 and 6, lay under a sheet of corrugated iron.

On the Indian side of the border, at least 54 soldiers were killed when their bunkers collapsed, said Col. H. Juneja, an Indian army spokesman.

The death toll in India exceeded 650 Sunday.

Most of the deaths were in the Jammu-Kashmir border towns of Uri, Tangdar and Punch and Srinagar.

Hundreds of angry villagers blocked area roads, protesting the slow pace of rescue efforts.

'FEMA VILLAGE', from A-11

FEMA to abruptly end the agency's involvement with the park, but wonder whether they eventually will have to take over and help residents find other housing.

A FEMA Village spokeswoman said agency staff who do monthly checks on the residents offer guidance on finding new housing. And county agencies will begin to hold "resource days" nearby to help residents get the assistance they need, Hebert said.

Even with state and local agencies trying to provide services, it will take a good deal of effort to make the closely packed travel trailers in Baker into a real community, the Florida mobile home residents said.

The county installed two small playgrounds in FEMA Village, each including a plastic jungle-gym and a picnic table, but many families do not let their younger children play there because the spots have become teenage hangouts with a rough and sometimes threatening atmosphere.

"They have a lot of fights," said Casagrande, who lives next to one of the social hotspots. "My TV is 10 feet from my bed, but I can't hear it over the noise."

For their part, teenagers don't have much to do except gather at the playgrounds. There aren't many social or recreational opportunities nearby, and the alternative is biding time in the mobile homes.

Generational friction seems almost inevitable. Elderly residents in particular complain that the young people play their music too loud, especially considering that the thin-walled mobile homes are set about 10 yards apart.

For families, the three-bedroom mobile homes were a huge step up from the travel trailers – similar to those in Baker – they initially lived in for a couple months after Charley hit in mid-August of last year.

"My daughter became claustrophobic," said Sarah Cahill, who lived in a 30-foot-long trailer with her three children and husband for a few months until they were able to move into the mobile home last November.

McIntyre said the overarching plan is to build out mobile homes for evacuees while the trailer sites are being set up, so that they can eventually be moved. "Travel trailers were always meant to be interim housing until we can get more permanent solutions," he said.

If the New Orleans rental market follows the same pattern as Charlotte County after Hurricane Charley, evacuees could find that temporary housing isn't going to be that temporary.

About half of the housing units in the area were damaged by the storm, including 10,000 that were destroyed, said Loraine Helber, housing coordinator for the county.

The scarcity of apartments initially drove up the rents, which local housing officials said typically have doubled or tripled from previous levels. Much of the public housing demolished in the storm has yet to be rebuilt, with the first units expected to be ready for occupants in about a year.

In Florida, the housing shortage has been exacerbated by retirees who come from their homes in the north to spend their winters in the Punta Gorda area, with its historic district by the water and lush landscaped lawns. Private developers have been targeting that market, not concentrating on rebuilding more affordable multi-family apartment buildings, Helber said.

Local officials in Charlotte County said the extra time needed to offer incentives to private developers to get into the affordable market has kept housing prices high, although they have come down somewhat from their initial spike.

Some residents of the FEMA park have been able to save money because they don't have to pay rent for the trailers and are only required to cover the cost of utilities. Cahill's family has worked out a deal to purchase a trailer from the federal agency, which they hope to soon move to a nearby lot they have rented.

But other residents haven't had as much success.

"To me, this is mine right now," said Diana Hardemon, a single mother of three who was almost evicted because her water was turned off after she quit her job because she didn't have anyone to watch her children.

Since being hired by Cahill's husband, who works as a handyman, she has been trying to put money aside to get a new place, but it has been difficult. "It is very hard to save money when you are a single parent … and your kids need things constantly," Hardemon said.

Before the hurricane, Casagrande said her family was much more stable: working-class, but with two incomes.

But the succession of hurricanes that struck Florida late last summer drove Casagrande's then-husband to the brink and he left the state, although he eventually came back when their 4-year-old son was hit by a car at the trailer park during the spring. The boy has begun to walk again after spending the summer in a wheelchair, she said.

Casagrande said the stress from the hurricane ruined her marriage, although she and her ex-husband are on amicable terms and he helps with the family's precarious finances. She is not working and has been unable to save money to get out on her own, noting that her former landlord doubled the rent after fixing up the house she had rented for years.

While they would like to get out of FEMA Village, it just isn't possible right now. "I have no place to go with my kids," she said.

Landslide areas are declared cemeteries

Hundreds are buried under feet of mud in Guatemala

By Mark Stevenson
Associated Press writer

GUATEMALA CITY — Dozens of foreign tourists fled devastated lakeside Mayan towns on foot and by helicopter Sunday as Guatemalan officials said they would abandon communities buried by landslides and declare them mass graveyards.

Villagers who had swarmed over the vast mudslides with shovels and axes digging for hundreds of missing gave up the effort Sunday, five days after Hurricane Stan made landfall on the Gulf of Mexico coast, bringing torrential rains before weakening to a tropical depression.

More than 640 people died and hundreds more were missing across Central America and southern Mexico after a week of rains. In hardest-hit Guatemala, 519 bodies had been recovered and reburied. Some 338 were listed as missing.

"Panabaj will no longer exist," said Mayor Diego Esquina, referring to the Mayan lakeside hamlet in Guatemala covered by a half-mile-wide mudflow as much as 15 to 20 feet deep. "We are asking that it be declared a cemetery. We are tired. We no longer know where to dig."

A man who tried to recover his belongings from his flooded house is rescued after he went into the Coatan river in Chiapas, Mexico. Raging floodwaters have cut off large areas of Central America, hampering rescue efforts.

Esquina said bodies were now so rotted that identification was impossible. He said about 250 people were missing in Panabaj. Only 77 bodies were recovered, he said.

Promised dogs trained to detect bodies failed to arrive in time, and "we don't even know where to dig anymore," Esquina said.

Vice President Eduardo Stein said steps were being taken to give towns "legal permission to declare the buried areas" as hallowed ground.

Attention turned to aiding thousands of hungry or injured survivors as helicopters, including U.S. Blackhawks and Chinooks, fanned out across Guatemala to evacuate the wounded and bring supplies to more than 100 communities still cut off by mudslides and flooding.

As some foreign tourists worked shoulder-to-shoulder with Mayans in traditional cotton blouses and broad sashes to dig for missing victims, others hiked around mud-choked roads or boarded government helicopters in the second day of evacuations from the area around Lake Atitlan.

Helicopters went to the nearby town of San Andres Senetabaj to fly out an estimated 20 Scandinavians trapped since mudslides cut off the area several days ago. About 50 more tourists were hiking out of the lakeside town of Panajachel.

"We got about 400 (tourists) out last night, and were expecting more today," said Solomon Reyes of Guatemala's Tourism Ministry.

In some areas the arrival of the Guatemalan military only complicated matters. Villagers in Panabaj refused to allow in the army because of memories of a 1990 massacre there during the country's 36-year civil war.

But U.S. military helicopters from Joint Task Force Bravo based at Soto Cano Air Base in Honduras joined the rescue efforts with a half-dozen Blackhawk helicopters and one Chinook transport helicopter, running flights through dense clouds and heavy fog.

"We're still in search-and-rescue mode," said Army Maj. Bob Schmidt. "We're in the saving-life-and-limb thought process."

The U.S. craft delivered some medical supplies and personnel and evacuated children needing medical care.

In El Salvador, authorities reported 71 deaths from the rains, after two people were swept away by floodwaters in San Salvador on Saturday.

The rest of the dead were scattered throughout Nicaragua, Honduras, Costa Rica and southern Mexico.

Mexican President Vicente Fox visited devastated Chiapas state Sunday as floodwaters began to recede.

"The important thing is that the worst is over," Fox said. "Now comes the reconstruction."

Searching an ache that doesn't ease

In 1995, Antoinette Rudolph made a pact with God. Her son Jeffrey had just been in a motorcycle accident. The doctors gave him 72 hours to live.

"She prayed that if the Lord would just let her see him open his eyes again, she would care for him, no matter how he came back to her,"recalled Catherine Rudolph, Jeffrey's sister.

God and Antoinette Rudolph kept their respective ends of the bargain.

The accident left Jeffrey with paralysis on one side and substantial brain damage. But he was alive and his mother cared for him as she had promised.

Then in the confusion of Hurricane Katrina, mother and son got separated. "The night of the storm my brother and my dad were at home. My mother was ill. She was in the hospital," Catherine Rudolph said. "The Coast Guard had to get them out of the house.

"They were brought to the Superdome in New Orleans. From there they were brought to the Astrodome, where my dad got sick."

Into thin air

In Houston, the doctors tended to Joseph, the patriarch of the Rudolph family, in a makeshift examination room in the Astrodome. "When they pulled the curtains, Jeffrey disappeared. They brought my Dad over to the nursing home, and we haven't heard from or seen Jeffrey since."

As a result of his accident, Jeffrey, 29, is not able to communicate even basic information. "He is limited to certain things he knows," his sister said. "He knows his name. He knows his family name. He knows his birthday. He can't tell you his address or his phone number."

Even in the best of times, finding a lost loved one is difficult. But the Rudolphs are facing some extraordinary circumstances. Mrs. Rudolph was airlifted from Charity Hospital to a facility in Fort Worth.

Catherine was relocated to Burleson, Texas. Mr. Rudolph is in a nursing home in Houston.

It takes six hours to drive to Houston from Burleson.

But the police there seem to have more important things to do than search for a missing man. The people running the Astrodome are no longer posting photos and descriptions of the missing.

"Every one of the Houston police that we gave fliers to, they put them back in our hands," Rudolph said. "They said, 'No, we didn't see him,' and gave them back. When we went back to the Astrodome, all the pictures of the missing people are down." The family has called the Red Cross, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and the Salvation Army. No one has called them back.

Keep on going

I met the Rudolphs as they drove around New Orleans a week ago in the vain hope that Jeffrey might have made his way back home.

The family was handing out fliers with Jeffrey's picture and the family's contact information.

"All we are doing is praying and hoping and wishing," Catherine said.

New Orleans police are taped beating man, 64

AP PHOTO

Robert Davis, center, gets punched and pulled Saturday night on Conti Street near Bourbon Street. Davis was booked on charges of public intoxication, resisting arrest, battery on a police officer and public intimidation. Three of the five officers involved are New Orleans officers, and two others appeared to be federal officers.

AP producer also punched on film

From staff and wire reports

Two New Orleans police officers repeatedly punched a 64-year-old man accused of public intoxication, and another city officer assaulted an Associated Press Television News producer as a cameraman taped the confrontations.

At a news conference Sunday night, Capt. Marlon DeFillo said three officers have been suspended without pay and and charged with simple battery of Davis, of the 3100 block of Metropolitan Avenue.

He said there was an additional charge of battery on the AP producer, Rich Matthews.

"We have great concern with what we saw this morning," Defillo said after he and about a dozen other high-ranking police department officials watched the APTN footage Sunday. "It's a troubling tape, no doubt about it."

The suspended officers are all from the 8th district: Robert EVangelist, a three-year veteran; Lance Schilling, an eight-year veteran and Stewart Smith, who is a three-year veteran.

The APTN tape shows an officer hitting the man at least four times in the head Saturday night as he stood outside a bar near Bourbon Street. The suspect, Robert Davis, appeared to resist, twisting and flailing as he was dragged to the ground by four officers. One of the four then kneed Davis and punched him twice. Davis was face-down on the sidewalk with blood streaming

Students help teacher repair battered home

'I pretty much put myself in his shoes'

By John-John Williams IV
River Parishes bureau

Usually John Ellis, a 19-year veteran earth science teacher at East St. John High School in Reserve, captivates students with dazzling helium explosions and witty banter. But recently the tables turned and eight of Ellis' students took the role of educator and gave him a lesson in giving.

When the students heard that Ellis' Metairie home had suffered 2 feet of water damage, they grabbed gloves and boots and sprang into action to help repair it.

"I pretty much put myself in his shoes," said senior Ricky Dixon, who immediately volunteered to help clean Ellis' home. "The same thing could have happened to me."

The students spent several hours over two weekends removing waterlogged carpet and drywall from Ellis' home so that a contractor could begin work.

"It was uninhabitable," Ellis explained. "I needed to clean it out so that the contractor could

SAD TO SAY GOODBYE

But chef's jazz funeral a symbol of hope after heartache

By Brett Anderson
Staff writer

New Orleans said farewell to one of its favorite sons in a way only New Orleans can.

And the goodbye, to many, symbolized a way to welcome back the unique city's soul and character that they believe will fuel its rebuilding in the wake of disaster and call its displaced denizens home.

The first second-line in New Orleans since Hurricane Katrina began on Sunday with a prayer. The message that followed was a sign of the times.

"For the press, just to be clear," shouted Todd Higgins, one of several Black Men of Labor members who donned gold printed shirts to lead the second-line and, as it happened, serve as cultural translators for the media members who appeared to outnumber regular participants.

"This is a funeral procession," Higgins continued, "and there is a clear distinction between a funeral procession and a parade."

With that, the notebook and camera-toting reporters fell back en masse, and the Hot 8 Brass Band blew the first mournful notes of "Just A Closer Walk with Thee" in honor of chef Austin Leslie. The celebrated face of Creole soul food died of a heart attack last week in Atlanta following an arduous evacuation from his flooded Gentilly home.

Many tenants, landlords at odds after the storm

By Matt Scallan
East Jefferson bureau

Lolita Bellott has tenant trouble in a duplex she owns in Kenner.

"One of my tenants isn't paying the rent. Now she tells me that I should get the money from FEMA," she said. "Why should I go to FEMA? She's the one who's living there."

Bellott is one of hundreds of landlords who have been besieging justices of the peace in Jefferson Parish, who adjudicate most eviction cases, after Hurricane Katrina.

"My phone never stops ringing. My answering machine is full," said Justice of the Peace Steve Mortillaro, whose office on Conlin Street was badly damaged by the storm.

Katrina created a catastrophic domino effect in the housing market that has resulted in a severe shortage of rental properties. Tens of thousands of

Drivers find business slow, but gratifying

By Coleman Warner

Telltale signs of Hurricane Katrina's recent visit were hard to miss in the Vieux Carre early Saturday afternoon. National Guard soldiers gathered near the Mint and workers on ladders tacked tarp sheets to a few roofs. The always-open Café du Monde was shuttered. Damaged awnings hung over sidewalks at crazy angles.

But the Quarter continued to recover. The rotting-garbage stench had faded and people tapped on laptop computers outside an espresso bar along Decatur Street. Doors of art shops were open wide, a young girl performed on her violin and, at down his arm and into the gutter.

Meanwhile, a fifth officer ordered APTN producer Rich Matthews and the cameraman to stop recording. When Matthews held up his credentials and explained he was working, the officer grabbed the producer, leaned him backward over a car, jabbed him in the stomach and unleashed a profanity-laced tirade.

"I've been here for six weeks trying to keep ... alive ... Go home!" shouted the officer, who later identified himself as S.M. Smith.

DeFillo said "the videotape was the key in determining our course of action ... when you have video it takes away that question mark."

The decision to suspend the officers was made by acting superintendent Warren Riley who is en route from Houston to attend to personal business and in consultation with public integrity chief Ronnie Swain and acting chief of operations, Steve Niholas.

On the battery of the producer, DeFillo said, "Maybe he was under stress. Maybe he reached the point were he was at a breaking point. It's not normal for a police officer to react that way with a member of the news media."Ninety-nine percent of officers are going about their jobs as they ought to. There's no excuse for officers not to maintain his standards ... We recognize the public's demand for accountability."

"We came to the consensus that the actions of the officers did not conform to our training and to our rules and regulations."

The assaults come as the department, long plagued by allegations of brutality and corruption, struggles with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina and the resignation last month of Police Superintendent Eddie Compass.

He could not answer why the officers were doing this.

"They tried to apprehend the suspect with verbal commands, then pepper spray, neither of which worked. And they resulted to force."

Other officers at scene corroborated need for use of force, said, calling the specific force head-punching.

Police said Davis, 64, of New Orleans, was booked on public intoxication, resisting arrest, battery on a police officer and public intimidation. He was treated at a hospital and released into police custody.

"The incidents taped by our cameraman are extremely troubling," said Mike Silverman, AP's managing editor. "We are heartened that the police department is taking them seriously and promising a thorough investigation."

Davis, who is black, was subdued at the intersection of Conti and Bourbon streets. Three of the officers appeared to be white, and the other is light-skinned. The officer who hit Matthews is white. Defillo said race was not an issue.

Three of the five officers, including Smith, are New Orleans officers, and two others appeared to be federal officers. Numerous agencies have sent police to help with patrols in the aftermath of Katrina.

Under normal circumstances, it takes unusually offensive behavior to trigger an arrest on Bourbon Street. But New Orleans police have been working under stressful conditions since the hurricane.

Officers slept in their cars and worked 24-hour shifts after the storm. Three-quarters lost their homes and their families are scattered across the country.

"Our police officers are working under some very trying times," Defillo said. "So it's a difficult time, but it doesn't excuse what our jobs are supposed to be."

Chef built career on fried chicken, peppers

LESLIE, from B-1

The second-line commenced at 2:30 p.m. from Pampy's Creole Kitchen on North Broad Street, the 7th Ward restaurant where Leslie most recently churned out his famous fried chicken, stuffed bell peppers and oysters Rockefeller before Katrina closed it.

"What's this?" asked owner Stan "Pampy" Barre. He was staring down at what appeared to be a memorial: three thin tree branches entwined over a corroded liquor flask in front of the flood-ravaged restaurant's front door.

"Whatever it is, it's got to be for Austin."

Including media, the second-line was still small, numbering roughly 50 people, but the noise was more than enough to capture the attention of the few residents who met the ensemble when it made its turn at North Dorgenois Street.

A construction crew stood atop a forklift at the corner of Aubry Street as marchers danced to "I'll Fly Away" amid scum-dusted cars and downed trees.

"This is New Orleans, baby," Gralen B. Banks announced into the cameras. "You're looking at it."

Felix Rainey, Leslie's stepson, was standing nearby, clutching the program from Leslie's funeral, which was held on Friday in Atlanta.

"Everybody from New Orleans in Atlanta was dancing in the street," he said of the Atlanta service, where a similar jazz funeral was held. "My mama's going to bring Austin's ashes into New Orleans from Atlanta when it's time. Then we'll have a big second-line. This is only an appetizer."

STAFF PHOTOS BY CHRIS GRANGER

Fred Johnson holds up a photo of chef Austin Leslie as the Black Men of Labor and Hot 8 band second-line through the streets of New Orleans.

Its members scattered throughout the country by the hurricane, The Hot 8 made do with seven musicians on Sunday. "We got one trumpet player who couldn't make it, and another one on the road with another band," said trombone player Jerreau Fornett.

"This makes you forget the city is shut down," said snare drummer Dinerral Shavers. "If you don't pay attention to the houses, you'd never know."

The Hot 8 was playing "Hey Pocky Way" as the procession made the turn on Laharpe Street, past a tilted sycamore tree, the words "1 Dead" spray-painted on its trunk.

"I don't believe it, but I'm seeing it," Daniel Jackson said into his cell phone.

He was sitting in a trailer in front of his sister's battered house in the 2400 block of Laharpe.

"You know what this makes me feel?" Jackson said after hanging up. "Like this is going to be something."

The procession paused again on North Robertson Street, at the former site of Chez Helene. A slab of concrete is all that remains of the restaurant where Leslie first gained national recognition in the 1970s and '80s.

A memorial to chef Austin Leslie pops up at Laharpe and North Robertson streets.

The chef's popularity, as well as the restaurant's, was such that both served as the inspiration for "Frank's Place," a network television show that ran for one season in 1987.

"I was on the vice squad when we used to come here," Barre said. He was standing in front of the barren lot, clutching a photo of Leslie wearing his signature captain's hat. "We used to order Number 9s: fried chicken, stuffed peppers, and potato salad. I grew up on Number 9s."

Barre predicted that the second-line's impact would dwarf its size.

"CBS is going to put this on the evening news," he said. "I hope all those displaced New Orleanians see this, get goose bumps and come home."

Postcard symbol of French Quarter is back

BUGGIES, from B-1

Jackson Square's edge, an artist tried to interest a couple of state troopers — one from Louisiana, another from New York — in his oil-on-canvas pieces.

Then, a few yards away, came a familiar refrain: A buggy driver cajoling passers-by, offering a ride and breezy history lesson.

"Hey guys, want to go?"

"No, we're just walking."

"Have a great day!"

Business is a long far from good, but the mule buggies are on the streets. Their return prompted Quarter veterans to step onto second-floor balconies or out of their shops and applaud. A postcard symbol is back.

"It perks up your spirits to see the mules out there," said Dennis Gemelli, 56, one of a handful of drivers for Royal Carriages who returned to his buggy seat at midday Friday. "It's obviously been slow ... but it's gratifying. It's mainly relief workers, getting a historical perspective on the city they're helping to rebuild."

Melvin 'Prime Time' Landor accentuates the French Quarter's positives for his passengers as he and his mule, Lizzie, wheel past refrigerators discarded after Hurricane Katrina. Up front beside Landor on Saturday was Tonya Smith, a relief worker from Savannah, Ga., who was to leave New Orleans on Sunday.

Royal Carriages is just one of four carriage operations holding city permits for hauling visitors around the Quarter, but it is the oldest and largest, and was the first to return after Katrina to the staging point next to the Jackson Square gardens.

During the treacherous days immediately after the hurricane, four Royal Carriages workers kept 37 mules fed and watered at the company's stable in the Faubourg Marigny, as flood waters lapped at the door and soldiers demanded that the workers evacuate. The animals ultimately were moved to a Covington farm where the company in normal times sends its mules to recuperate from their street labors, said company owner James Lauga Jr., grandson of the man who launched Royal Carriages in 1941.

Now the company is trying to regain its high-profile place in the tourism district, fielding just 10 to 15 of its usual contingent of 36 drivers, offering discounts and operating during reduced hours on weekends.

In its first day back in business, Royal Carriages had pulled in roughly 50 customers, far less than the several hundred it typically would draw on a breezy, sunny October day. The business will lose money for a while, Lauga said Saturday as he waited beside the buggy staging area.

"We came out yesterday for the first day, tried to put some commonplace items back in the Quarter," he said. "We're taking anything we can get at this point, just to be visible."

Many drivers are dispersed so far they can't get to work, Lauga said. Those on hand can blend their own storm tales with snippets of New Orleans history. Lucila Madden, 40, took part on a flatboat rescue operation near the Lakefront, one that collected dozens of people, including 14 nuns. The eastern New Orleans home of Melvin "Prime Time" Landor, 57, a buggy driver for more than three decades, was lost to the flood. Lauga got more than four feet of storm-surge water in his Slidell home.

"We're all kind of displaced at this point, but this does a lot of good for us, I tell you what, just being out here," Lauga said as Landor sized up a rare passing family, offering to take their baby along for free.

A woman in the group vetoed the idea; they strolled toward the artist.

But within moments Landor had coaxed one visitor into a buggy seat, then another. He didn't wait for a full load, guiding the mule gently into a Decatur Street unhurried by car traffic, talking all the while: "To our left is the Moonwalk, it was built in 1976 and it was named after our former mayor, Moon Landrieu ..."

come in. When the students heard that I was going to get a crew to do the cleanup, they volunteered."

For two Sundays the group ripped out rugs, drywall and other ruined items. The crew met in LaPlace and by 8 a.m. the group was in full gear. They barely stopped for sandwiches and chips at noon.

"Instead of just stopping for lunch the kids swooped in and grabbed a handful," Ellis said. "These guys all worked like Trojans."

The group broke up the hard labor with the occasional practical joke.

"They were clowning," said senior Taja Cooks. "Warren Prout (another student) kept throwing Sheetrock on our side."

Ellis, 56, worked with the crew until his foot began to swell.

"Diabetes is a bear," he said.

Richard Mackenzie, a sophomore, said he volunteered because he was aware of Ellis' condition.

"He's disabled," MacKenzie said. "I knew he couldn't do it all by himself."

Originally junior Kwovadus Ford's family warned him against working on the house because of the threat of infected water. However, Ford said, he received a tetanus shot and forged ahead. Before the students stepped in, hopes of moving back into the Metairie house anytime soon were pretty bleak for Ellis, his wife, Judy, and their dog, a red, white and black Pembroke Welsh Corgi named Maggie, he said.

The three are living with a co-worker because of a lack of housing in St. John the Baptist Parish, which has been flooded with thousands of displaced residents.

The Ellises have spent endless hours searching for a FEMA trailer, with no success. But the student's work considerably sped up the repair process, he said. Ellis recently said that his house would be ready by Christmas, if not Thanksgiving.

"It was mind-boggling," Ellis said. "I just adore these kids. They are just so special. These are the future leaders of the world. I'm so proud of them."

And while the students were willing to work for free, Ellis insisted on paying each worker $20 an hour with his FEMA relief money.

"They worked every penny of it," Ellis said. "They told me they would have done it for free. You could feel the love in the room."

By the end of one workday, everyone was covered in all types of debris and soaked with water.

"It was a mess," Dixon said. "It was fun though."

His co-laborers echoed Dixon's sentiments.

"I felt good," said sophomore Warren Prout. "I knew I did something good and helped out."

John Elllis watches Kwovadus Ford help rejuvenate his home. 'When the students heard that I was going to get a crew to do the cleanup, they volunteered,' Ellis said. He paid them anyway.

Ellis was overcome with emotion.

"You could tell they had done a good day's work," said Ellis, who still tears up when he talks about his students. "I almost started crying. They kept saying, 'Mr. Ellis, it's going to be OK.' That was so cool."

Historic Miss. coast buildings are in ruins

Walter Anderson's enclave now rubble

By Holbrook Mohr
Associated Press writer

BILOXI, MISS. — The beachfront cottage where Jefferson Davis wrote his memoirs stood for a century and a half in the shade of towering oak trees, but Hurricane Katrina reduced it to rubble in just a few hours.

Like nearly all historical homes on Mississippi's Gulf Coast, the cottages at Beauvoir were swept away by Katrina's winds and storm surge.

"It's a horrifying site," said Todd Sanders, a coordinator with the Mississippi Department of Archives and History. "It's hard for me to put into words."

The main house at Beauvoir, built in 1852, survived the storm better than most buildings. A blue tarp covered a hole in the roof, and the house itself has been gutted, but Sanders believes it can be saved.

Other famous homes on the coast, with their large columns and wraparound porches, are simply no longer there.

"Businessmen from New Orleans and upcountry planters always built the finest homes," Sanders said. "They built these estates along the water, (and) now they're gone. Beauvoir, the Longfellow House and a couple of others are the only antebellum houses that remain on the coast."

The Longfellow House was built in 1850 and remains largely intact on Beach Boulevard in Pascagoula. The home, which took its name from a local legend that Henry Wadsworth Longfellow once stayed there, now towers over the bare foundations where neighboring homes once stood.

"Businessmen from New Orleans and upcountry planters always built the finest homes. They built these estates along the water, (and) now they're gone. Beauvoir, the Longfellow House and a couple of others are the only antebellum houses that remain on the coast."
TODD SANDERS
Coordinator with the Mississippi Department of Archives and History.

Homes such as Beauvoir and the Longfellow House can be saved if the restoration process is swift enough to stabilize the structures before they are further deteriorated by the elements, Mississippi Heritage Trust director David Preziosi said.

But it will be up to local leaders and property owners whether the homes that were destroyed are rebuilt.

"We've lost a great deal of our cultural history," Preziosi said. "Even if you rebuild one, you lose an actual piece of history."

A dozen miles west of Biloxi, down a tree-lined gravel road in Ocean Springs, the family of late artist Walter Anderson sifted through what's left of two homes built in the 1830s. The artist's son, John Anderson, wiped his brow and said, "There's nothing left."

At least 16 buildings were destroyed at the Shearwater artist community made famous by his father's nature works, including Shearwater Pottery's showroom and a vault that housed most of the painter's work.

"You expect to see something, boards or something. But there's nothing there," he said in a soft voice.

Blue tarps covered what was left of the Sullivan House, designed by renowned architects Louis Sullivan and Frank Lloyd Wright. Only two of the original four structures remained after the storm, but the wood shell of those _ painted nearly the same hazy blue as the nearby Gulf _ has been heavily damaged.

An uprooted tree and scattered debris is all that's left on the site of the Dantzler House, which once faced the Gulf of Mexico with wide porches and tall white columns. It was home to a Mardi Gras museum.

"It sort of erases a part of the past," Preziosi said. "You no longer have that visual history."

The Brielmaier House, built in 1895 and home to the Biloxi Visitor's Center, was known for its Victorian woodwork and arched lattices before Hurricane Katrina leveled it.

And the Pleasant Reed House, built by a freed slave around 1887, once gave a glimpse into the lives of a black family in early 20th-century Biloxi. Now, nothing remains but the chimney.

"A lot of the collections in the house were moved before the storm, but the actual house is gone," Preziosi said. "Even if you rebuild one just like it, it's not his house. It's not the one he built."

Preziosi said the Pleasant Reed House would likely be rebuilt, but it's hard to know if any other homes would be resurrected. In the meantime, preservationists are wondering how Katrina will change the way the past is viewed.

"It's making us look at the way we can preserve the history of the coast," Sanders said. "We've lost major character-defining buildings. These were buildings that defined the community."

Bayou fishers floundering in cycle of idleness in Ala.

Boats sit around; plants unable to process catch

By Bob Johnson
Associated Press writer

BAYOU LA BATRE, ALA. — Connie Johnson, captain of the shrimp boat "Empty Pockets," stood on the dock with his crew, wishing there was a way to get back out to sea.

He said the boat's name seems appropriate now that they've been wiped out by Hurricane Katrina.

"We're shrimpers, and we can't do anything. We're just sitting here broke and we can't make a dollar," Johnson said.

Johnson's plight is repeated all across the once-thriving seafood industry on the Alabama coast, where fishers are frustrated by a double-whammy: Most of them are grounded, and flooded-out processing plants are closed.

Fishers can't get into the ocean to catch fish, shrimp and other sea delicacies because they have no money to buy fuel and because fishing will be mostly impossible until the water is cleared of debris from the storm.

If the boats do start catching fish and shrimp, there's no place to take the catch because all of Bayou La Batre's more than 50 seafood processing plants were shut down by Katrina. The plants are struggling to find needed equipment to get open, but owners say there will be no reason to open if there's no seafood to process.

It's left most people in the industry that's the town's lifeblood wondering how to break the cycle and start fishing again.

"We've got young'uns to feed. We had two feet of water in our houses. So how can we make the money to fix our houses if there's nothing to do?" said Stephanie Ladner, wife of commercial fisherman Keith Ladner. "People want to fish so they can eat."

She said she has been cleaning beach rental houses to make money while her husband's boat has been grounded.

Bayou La Batre Mayor Stan Wright told former President Clinton last week that the town's seafood industry was already hurting before Katrina, mostly because of competition from foreign imports and low prices.

"But Katrina just put the icing on the cake," Wright told the former president, who was on the Alabama coast looking for ways to distribute $100 million in privately raised hurricane relief.

The seafood plants, most on the edge of the bayou that meanders through town, were buried under a sea of water and mud by Katrina.

"We lost everything — the boilers, the ice machines, all of the refrigeration. This is the worst we've ever had it," said 77-year-old Corrine Cain, who along with husband, Norwood Cain, 75, is co-owner of Waterfront Seafood. She said the roof of the two-story building was all that was showing at the worst of the flooding caused by Katrina.

But the Cains, who are living in a trailer outside their flooded home, are not giving up and are determined they will soon be unloading shrimp again at the seafood plant they founded in 1965.

"I knew we weren't going anywhere when I first saw what happened and the mud was everywhere and the furniture was all turned upside down. We're here to stay. In a month, we'll be going full blast," Norwood Cain said.

Down the bayou, at Sea Pearl Seafood Co., manager Leon Ladnier said he hopes to have the plant, which has 70 employees, back up and running by the end of this week. But he said one problem is finding the parts needed to operate a seafood plant, since all the town's plants are trying to replace the same equipment. He also said reopening the plant depends on the shrimpers and fishermen being able to get back to work.

"Fuel is so high and right now if they go out and get a catch, there's nowhere to unload it," Ladnier said.

Fishers and shrimpers say the debris must be cleaned up before they can use their nets to get a good catch.

"You can't get shrimp with so much garbage out there. You'd tear your nets up," Johnson said.

Some boats have been hired to go out and clean up debris dumped out to sea by Katrina, but Johnson is upset that his crew has not gotten a fair share of that work.

Johnson took Empty Pockets upstream and tied it up to escape Katrina's fury. Other boats were not so lucky. Dozens of shrimp boats and other vessels still sit on dry land in the woods on one side of the bayou, where they were blown in floodwaters during the storm.

But Eric Poole, who describes himself as one of the last commercial gill fishermen on the coast, has his small boat ready to go, if only there was a seafood business to serve.

"There's nowhere to go. There's no one to fish for. All of the fish houses got blown away. The price of gas has gone up. The price of equipment has gone up," said Poole, who was staying near his boat in case there were fish to be caught or if he was needed for debris clearing.

Poole said despite the storm, high fuel prices and other problems, he will keep on fishing.

"This is more or less a traditional thing for us," he said, pointing to a handful of fishermen standing near their boats. "We've all done this all of our lives. It's what we've always done. It's an honorable tradition. It's in the Bible."

Tropical Storm Vince forms in far eastern Atlantic Ocean

Season is second busiest on record

By John Pain
Associated Press Writer

This season has been one of the deadliest and costliest in the U.S. in the last century. Hurricane Katrina killed more than 1,100 people on the Gulf Coast and is expected to cause more than $34 billion in insured losses.

MIAMI — Tropical Storm Vince formed Sunday in the far eastern Atlantic, making this hurricane season the second busiest on record, forecasters said.

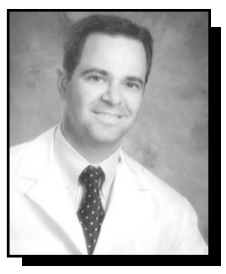
The 20th named storm of the season formed between the Azores and the Canary Islands in waters that are cooler than what is typically needed for a tropical storm, said Chris Sisko, a meteorologist at the National Hurricane Center in Miami.

But the storm, which had top sustained winds of about 50 mph, posed no threat to land. That's because it wasn't expected to survive for long due to the cooler waters and other weather systems in the area, Sisko said. Water temperatures are about 73 to 75 degrees, below the 80 degrees usually needed for a tropical storm.

Forecasters said this appears to be the farthest east and north that a tropical storm has formed in recorded history in the Atlantic.

"Vince is a very odd one," Sisko said.

Only one other Atlantic season had more tropical storms and hurricanes since record keeping began in 1851 — there were 21 in 1933.



The hurricane season began June 1 and ends Nov. 30. After Vince, only one name is left for storms this season — Wilma. After that, storms are named after letters in the Greek alphabet. That has never happened before in more than 50 years of regularly naming storms.

This season has been one of the deadliest and costliest in the U.S. in the last century. Hurricane Katrina killed more than 1,100 people on the Gulf Coast and is expected to cause more than $34 billion in insured losses.

At 10 a.m. CDT, Vince's center was located about 515 miles east-southeast of the Azores and about 140 miles northwest of the Madeira Islands. It was moving northeast at about 5 mph.

Dallas firm donates outfits by truckloads for teachers

Ann LaBorde, executive director of personnel and legal services for the St. John the Baptist Parish public school district, helped set up a clothing donation site at Lake Pontchartrain Elementary School in LaPlace. LaBorde's daughter's architecture firm in Dallas has sent truckloads of work clothes to the site.

Donated clothes a perfect fit for displaced workers

By John-John Williams IV
River Parishes bureau

Dressed in a multicolored purple, gold and brown blouse and a three-quarter-length brown skirt, East St. John High School teacher Karen Gipson was styling one recent day.

At first glance you wouldn't know that Gipson, a newly minted St. John the Baptist Parish English and language arts teacher, lost virtually everything as a result of Hurricane Katrina. And up until two weeks ago, the former Orleans Parish public school teacher's job status was bleak at best.

Gipson's New Orleans home took on five feet of water, and her clothes and most of her other belongings were lost forever. So, when Gipson, a former teacher at Martin Luther King Jr. Middle School, was hired at East St. John, she was in serious need of work clothes.

"It's so nice that we could get these clothes. I like to look nice. You have to look nice for these students so they have something to look up to."

KAREN GIPSON
East St. John High School teacher

"We lost everything," Gipson said. "We are virtually homeless."

But thanks to the kindness of strangers several hundred miles away in a Dallas architecture firm, Gipson didn't have to worry long about being able to afford suitable work clothes.

A donated-clothing distribution site, at Lake Pontchartrain Elementary School in LaPlace, is the brainchild of Ann LaBorde, executive director of personnel and legal services for the district, who worked out a plan to assist displaced teachers such as Gipson. LaBorde's daughter Yvette Hightower, who works for the architecture firm of Mark Humphries and Partners, asked how her company could assist with the Hurricane Katrina relief effort; the firm agreed to donate clothes.

Soon, shipments of boxes and truckloads of clothes began to arrive.

"They are nice clothes," said LaBorde, whose parents once worked in the retail industry. "I've got Dillard's, Macy's and Nautica-brand clothing. They are architects. …They wear nice clothes."

LaBorde said that the clothes keep coming in.

"I just got five boxes today," LaBorde said one day last week.

Brenda Sermersky, vice president of the PTO at Lake Pontchartrain Elementary, said there are plans to move the clothes into a bigger room because of the increase in donated items. But she said there was still a need for more.

"We're helping everybody," she said.

LaBorde said the district has hired more than 30 displaced people since Katrina. Many of these employees have come to the district with the clothes on their backs and whatever they were able to grab in a hurry, she said.

Gipson went to the distribution site last week and retrieved two bags of clothes for herself and her 80-year-old mother, Yvonne Charles, who also evacuated.

Gipson said she still has to pay bills despite the fact that she was not receiving a check from Orleans Parish while school is not in session. She said she has no extra money for new clothes.

"It's so nice that we could get these clothes," she said. "I like to look nice. You have to look nice for these students so they have something to look up to."

Gipson said she is extremely grateful to the architecture firm's employees.

"It's really a blessing," she said. "They didn't have to do it. That took a big load off of me."

With fungus among us, cleaning up is tricky

Big Easy residents wrestle with mold

By Bruce Hamilton
Staff writer

At eye level, the dining room of David Olivier's Uptown duplex is pristine.

Ornate, antique teacups perch on a wooden shelf encircling the room. But just a few feet below the shelf, the blue walls are tattooed with mold.

Although Olivier's two-story house is elevated, floodwaters rose to about 8 feet at 2730 Gen. Pershing St., so his Arts and Crafts home steeped in 3 feet of water until it receded. The result is rampant fungus.

Mold infiltrated his home's heating ducts, attacked its plaster and drywall, and savaged heirlooms that have been in his family for 150 years.

"It's absolutely, 100 percent overwhelming," said Olivier, a software developer. His tenant had warned him about the damage, but he didn't grasp the extent of his mold infestation until he saw it himself.

"It's an incremental awareness of the scope of the problem," he said. "It gets bigger and bigger."

Many residents in and around New Orleans have a similar problem. Assessing and dealing with mold infestations can be a complicated, intimidating and potentially hazardous process.

Olivier enlisted the help of a professional, certified industrial hygienist, Bill Sothern, who visited several neighborhoods this week to offer free advice and to film various types of mold damage to produce a "how-to" DVD.

Sothern, who wrote mold remediation guidelines for the New York City Department of Housing Preservation and Development, brought workers from an east Harlem Catholic charity, Little Sisters of the Assumption Family Health Service.

One of the charity's environmental workers, Ray Lopez, stripped plaster from Olivier's living room, exposing the lathe beneath, as a cameraman filmed and as Sothern explained the best way to handle his infestation.

"It was very helpful," Olivier said later. "I feel like I'm taking the precautions."

Sothern is offering a two-hour training session and discussion on do-it-yourself mold assessment and remediation Saturday at 10 a.m. at Watson Memorial Teaching Ministries, 4400 St. Charles Ave. at Napoleon Avenue.

He will discuss health issues, what protective equipment and tools to use and how to safely remove mold. He will advise residents about when it's safe to reoccupy a home as well as how to rebuild and deal with contractors.

"This is really a public service," said Sothern, who will use information from the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals as a reference. Some of that information is available for download at www.dhh.louisiana.gov.

Sothern said mold remediation work should be performed by professionals when the infestation covers a large area, such as more than 100 square feet.

He recommended that residents who plan to do their own remediation buy a HEPA-filtered, half-face respirator mask. A typical model is available at hardware stores for about $30.

Sothern said Sheetrock, or any paper-faced gypsum wallboard, should not be used in rebuilding your home because the mold that grows on it is potentially dangerous.

"It's just a recipe for the next mold disaster," he said. Other, slightly more expensive building materials - such as wallboards with fiberglass matte - will deter mold better, Sothern said.

When shopping for remediation contractors, he said, find one that meets Louisiana's licensing requirements. "There should be a written scope of work," he said, in which the contractor describes what will be done on a room-to-room, step-by-step basis.

It's also important the contractor establish a plan to protect the premises, the occupants and the workers, Sothern said. "Have the job inspected by the third party," he said; the inspector should not be the same person who did the work.

Sothern's company, Microecologies, has been working with the Little Sisters of the Assumption charity on community service for about 10 years, he said.

Together, they produced a DVD, "Learning About Mold," featuring homes in East Harlem.

Using footage gleaned from several local houses, including one-story, concrete slab homes in eastern New Orleans, they plan to produce a similar film for local residents.

Pay your rent, tenants are advised

houses and apartments in the New Orleans area were damaged or destroyed in the storm, making livable rental property a scarce commodity as workers involved in the recovery and people whose homes were damaged search for shelter. At the same time, hundreds of thousands of residents have been thrown out of work, leaving many without the means to pay rent.

However, evictions in Louisiana are on hold until Oct. 25 by order of Gov. Kathleen Blanco. The order has spurred criticism from some landlords who contend they cannot get access to the property. Tenants have also complained that some landlords have evicted them in an effort to get more money for their rental units.

Mortillaro, who represents most of Metairie, and Kevin Centanni, a justice of the peace who represents parts of Kenner, River Ridge and western Metairie, have advice for both landlords and tenants.

For the landlords: Secure your property from further damage, and try to contact your tenants.

For tenants: Pay your rent.

"There's a rumor out there that people don't have to pay rent because of the storm, but if the property is inhabitable, they owe the money."

KEVIN CENTANNI,
justice of the peace

Once landlords are free to move forward with evictions, tenants who haven't paid the rent they owe could find their belongings out on the street less than a week later.

"There's a rumor out there that people don't have to pay rent because of the storm, but if the property is inhabitable, they owe the money," Centanni said.

Meanwhile, some owners of heavily damaged apartments say they're having difficulty persuading residents to leave.

Walter Morton, whose Quail Run apartment complex in Kenner suffered severe damage during Katrina, said several tenants remain in the 60-unit complex despite the damage. Morton said he's offered the tenants their deposits back if they leave so he can begin repairing the complex.

"I can't kick them out, but I can't guarantee them a safe place to live," he said. "I'm getting the contact information for the ones who leave so I can invite them back when we're finished refurbishing."

A landlord who hasn't been paid can file suit to evict a tenant in justice court. The justice of the peace can order that a "three-day notice" of a hearing be served on the tenant or nailed to the door of the rented property.

If the Justice of the Peace finds in favor of the landlord, the tenant's belongings can be moved into the street 24 hours later.

Centanni and Mortillaro say they expect a flood of eviction suits from landlords where tenants have left the area and aren't paying rent, or who have lost their jobs and can't pay, or simply have nowhere else to go.

"I'm telling everyone to document everything," he said.

Amazed at entitlement mentality

I am flabbergasted at C.B. Forgotston's allegations against Mayor Ray Nagin that the mayor discriminated against white people by not letting them return to their Lakeview neighborhood sooner.

In the rebuilding of New Orleans, C.B. Forgotston is just the type of New Orleanian who need not return. If New Orleans is to emerge as a "world class city" as I hear it being described, racism and allegations of racism at every turn must be eliminated.

How dare Mr. Forgotston charge our mayor with such an outrageous accusation when people in the other hardest-hit areas were not allowed to return as well?

I realize the people of Lakeview are a large tax base for New Orleans, and I realize their frustration of wanting to return home. However, Hurricane Katrina became the great equalizer in our city.

I am simply disgusted by the fact that people in New Orleans have always tried to throw their weight around to get what they want based upon their wealth. What makes people like C.B. Forgotston feel they are more important than the people of New Orleans East or the Lower 9th Ward?

Until today I had long forgotten about C.B. Forgotston, and I would like to keep it that way. My sentiments are the same as the mayor's: Shame on you.

Buy local to rebuild

Since opening my retail store in 2003, I have been much more aware of the value of doing business with other locally owned businesses. Now that we are experiencing the biggest crisis of our lives, I have pledged to do business only with local merchants — at least until our community is economically healthy.

I have nothing against the chain stores and chain restaurants, but we need to keep the money here in this community. So, if I have to I will drive a little farther and pay a little more. And in most cases, I will receive better, more personalized service for my trouble.

I challenge all local business owners to make a similar pledge to buy local and ask that the general population do the same.

Sculpting a new city

New Orleans has major significance among American cities as a cultural wellhead. The United States must not lose this.

In response to The Times-Picayune's "Task force mania" piece, Mayor Ray Nagin needs to start with seven people on an initial operating committee. When operating committees have more than seven members they become dysfunctional. The committee's task would be to select members for a larger committee of 30 or so.

These initial seven are critical. They should include no more than one business leader. If you want a redevelopment plan that is invested with cultural values, you don't turn it over to lawyers and businessmen. You want people who know something about culture.

You need at least one environmentalist. The rest should be drawn from people of outstanding achievement as artists (painters, sculptors, musicians, writers), architects, city planners, leaders of cultural institutions, scientists, academics, medical practitioners — mostly people who do the actual work, rather than administrators.

The initial seven would then select these same kinds of people for the larger committee, into which they would merge. What's needed here is for the businesspeople and the politically connected to do their thing and get the money. But cultural and aesthetic formulations should be left to those who are qualified to make them.

Finally, the suffering of black communities must be redressed in the attempt to apply intelligent design to New Orleans' future. Without them her culture would be stripped naked.

Don't borrow Orleans' problems

Jim Ferrera of Marrero must surely be drinking some of the tainted water flowing from Orleans Parish taps. That would explain the delusion he is under when he says that Jefferson and St. Bernard residents would be better off by joining up with Orleans to form one parish.

Perhaps then we could all enjoy the privileges associated with being Orleans Parish residents. We could have civic "leaders" who leave thousands stranded in a flooded city while hundreds of buses sit idle, thereby endangering citizens, not to mention losing the use of all the buses.

As Orleans residents, we could enjoy the excitement of looting and shooting (or of being shot and having our homes looted). We wouldn't have to worry about being arrested for looting, because some of the police would be right alongside us, maybe even helping us to carry out some of the heavier items. We could claim that we were looting because we needed food and water, although most places that were looted had no food items.

Or maybe Mr. Ferrera thinks that our lives would be better if our kids could attend Orleans Parish schools, which consistently rank at the bottom of the scholastic scale in virtually every category.

If Mr. Ferrera wants to improve Orleans Parish, he should move there and improve it from the inside. Don't allow Orleans Parish problems to cross the river into Jefferson Parish.

Employment goes missing

I am hearing the media and politicians speculating that the greater New Orleans area may not get back its huge population of underprivileged, poverty-stricken people.

Every day I talk to doctors, attorneys, nurses, engineers and other professionals at the higher end of the salary range who are moving away due to employment opportunities that no longer exist here.

Wake up, New Orleans! We are losing our tax base and a lot of money that will now go into someone else's economy.

If this trend keeps up, all we are going to have left is a huge underprivileged population, whether the evacuees return or not, with no tax base to support them or the city.

OUR OPINIONS

Time to make a move

In post-Katrina New Orleans, public officials either need to come up with creative solutions to the monumental problems the city faces — or they need to get out of the way.

Orleans Parish School Board President Torin Sanders and interim Superintendent Ora Watson clearly are in the latter category. Their reaction to the storm was to give in to the mess left behind and give up on opening any east bank campuses this school year.

They came to this conclusion despite the fact that seven schools on the east bank are in good condition.

Mr. Sanders' explanation was nonsensical. For one thing, he claimed that if schools couldn't open until January, children would not spend enough time in class to make a difference. But students from city schools are in school elsewhere right now, and they will have done a semester of class work by the time they return to the city for the second half of the school year.

For another, Mr. Sanders argued that Mayor Ray Nagin didn't want the schools to try to open because of concerns about water and sanitation. That can't be right. Mayor Nagin has been urging residents and businesses to return to the city to begin to rebuild. The mayor certainly realizes that functioning schools are essential to the revival of the city.

In reaction to the can't-do attitude of Mr. Sanders and Ms. Watson, some parents and public officials on the West Bank asked to break away and form a charter system. The school system was planning to open eight West Bank schools Nov. 1, but who can blame parents for doubting the system's ability to succeed. The School Board approved the request Friday afternoon for all 13 schools on the West Bank.

The system's myriad failings were well documented long before Hurricane Katrina hit. Payroll was chronically late and frequently wrong, and system officials frittered away or lost millions of dollars. The School Board, which was elected to reform the system, couldn't seem to get past political concerns and their own egos.

Outside financial managers brought in by the state to clean up the mess had barely begun their work when Katrina struck.

The charter school proposal for the West Bank is an intriguing idea. It may be that the hurricane will force the dramatic reinvention of city schools, which seemed unlikely to ever happen under normal circumstances.

Even though the state had begun the takeover of some of the city's 73 failing schools, only a handful had been turned over to charter groups.

There are some pieces of the West Bank plan that are worrisome, though.

For one, School Board member Lourdes Moran, who is one of the leaders of the movement, crafted the plan so that the School Board will act as the charter board temporarily. She also said that she is willing to include the teachers' union in the charter discussions.

That sounds like trouble. The whole point of charter schools is to sever the constraints placed by the traditional powers in the school system. If the School Board and the union are players in the charter system, what hope is there for a fresh approach?

Even so, the notion of breaking this unwieldy, unresponsive school system into smaller pieces — and to have parents decide what they want these schools to be — is a good one.

The school system is unwilling and probably unable to get schools open on the east bank. The board — or the state — ought to be willing to approve more charter schools to give parents other options.

The board of directors of Benjamin Franklin High School Association voted unanimously last week to apply for charter status. Their hope is to open in January.

The School Board already has approved the creation of a Lusher kindergarten-through eighth-grade charter school, which has the financial backing of Tulane University. The plan is to open that campus in January.

That gives the east bank one school at this point. One school is not nearly enough. And school system leaders, as clueless as some of them are, ought to be able to understand that.

D isn't for delete

Wouldn't it be great if word processing programs didn't limit themselves to checking spelling and grammar but also let the writer know when they're being self-involved, mean-spirited and completely out of line?

If that were the case, perhaps Lakeview resident and government watchdog C.B. Forgotston would have had the sense to delete his irate e-mail message to Mayor Ray Nagin instead of sending it.

Mr. Forgotston accused the mayor of discrimination against white New Orleanians in his re-entry plan for the city because it did not include Lakeview, which Mr. Forgotston described as "the largest, mostly white middle-class area of the city of New Orleans." He contended that keeping Lakeview residents from coming home was tantamount to hanging a "WHITES NOT WANTED" sign over Interstate 10.

That's ridiculous, of course. The mayor's re-entry plan, which allows people to return to areas that did not flood such as Algiers, Uptown, the French Quarter and the Central Business District, has opened the doors to people of all races. Lakeview's demographics are not the issue; its geography is. The area was severely damaged by Katrina's floodwaters, and residents who have returned are finding little left to salvage.

This isn't the first time the mayor's been accused of discrimination following the storm, although previous criticism suggested he was hatching a recovery plan that would keep poor African-Americans from ever coming home.

In his response, Mayor Nagin said racist comments have been the worst part of the hurricane's aftermath. "If the city is repopulated with small-minded, racist-thinking and -speaking blacks, whites and Hispanics, then we are all in deep trouble," he wrote.

He's right. This empty city needs to get its people back, but we shouldn't make any room at all for hate.

Rethinking America's schoolhouses

Coming construction boom offers schools opportunity

RONALD E. BOGLE

Hurricanes Katrina and Rita uprooted thousands of pupils and severely damaged hundreds of Gulf Coast schools. Before the storms, $30 billion was expected to be spent nationwide this year on school construction. Much more is needed now.

The challenge is to invest it wisely.

We have a unique opportunity and obligation to rethink the classic American schoolhouse, to design and build schools for the educational needs of the 21st century. Some 55 million students, teachers and, increasingly, community residents spend some part of their waking hours in schools. The facilities affect learning, health, safety, self-esteem and the well-being of all using them.

Recent studies document the effect of deteriorating or badly designed schools on students and teachers alike. Outdated classroom configurations, noise, extreme heat or cold, lack of natural lighting and poor air quality all negatively influence teachers' ability to teach and students' ability to learn.

We need to incorporate new ideas in teaching and learning in how we design schools. We need to make information on quality school design and construction widely available. And we need to better engage all involved on how schools affect communities.

I served for several years on the Oklahoma City Public Schools board. I learned firsthand how tough it is to find the latest thinking in design, understand how architecture can serve the learning process, see examples of best practices, evaluate financing options and gather all the critical facts needed to guide projects of this magnitude.

My experience helped inspire the American Architectural Foundation's initiative, Great Schools by Design. It aims to improve the quality of America's schools by promoting good design, encouraging collaboration in the design process and providing leading-edge resources to local leaders.

As the communities of the Gulf Coast region and others across the country think about new or renovated schools they should:

▶ Design schools that retain and reflect the culture of the community they serve and support lasting community involvement;

▶ Build flexible classroom configurations to allow for smaller class sizes and multi-use

▶ Maximize natural lighting and natural ventilation

▶ Integrate technology throughout the school to support advanced teaching and learning and improve school safety

▶ Create spaces that incorporate outdoor environments, bringing the "outside" in to teach about the environment and sustainability

▶ Develop a dialogue process that involves all community and school stakeholders in the planning.

The educational facilities we design today are expected to last 50 or more years. While the Gulf Coast region has immediate needs for schools, it is important that we take the time to plan, design and construct these facilities to serve the unique needs of each community.

A "one-size-fits-all solution" is a sure recipe for failure. A failure we cannot afford in New Orleans, Los Angeles, New York, Philadelphia, Washington or in any of the many cities needing significant investment in educational facilities.

Not much has changed in a decade

LEONARD PITTS

Ten years later, more than 65 percent of our children are still born out of wedlock.

Ten years later, we are still five times more likely to die of homicide.

Ten years later, still fewer than half of us own our homes.

Ten years later, we still marry less, go to jail more and die sooner.

Ten years later, the promises we made that crisp Monday in October lie fallow and unredeemed.

On Sunday, it will be a decade since African-American men descended on the Mall in Washington, 400,000 strong according to the National Park Service. An independent agency retained by ABC Television said a minimum of 837,000 of us were actually there. But in the end, the event is defined not by hard numbers, but by a metaphorical one: one million.

Ten years later, two things strike me about the Million Man March. The first is a sense that we black men and our countrymen seemed to be talking about two different marches. We kept hearing that we were going to Washington to support the notorious Jew-baiter Louis Farrakhan and to attack America for its mistreatment of us. We kept saying we were going to attack our own mistreatment of our women, children and selves. And, that though Farrakhan organized the march, many of us joined it not because of him, but in spite of him. The conversation we wanted to have was bigger and more important than this regrettable man.

The second thing that strikes me is the optimism we felt. We stood in a crowd of us, generation be-bop, generation do-wop and generation hip-hop, gathered to slap backs and shake hands, to hug and laugh and be, shoulder to shoulder and man to man, serenaded by the heartbeats of African drums. On a podium far away, speakers spoke, but they were not the show. The show was us, standing there on what felt like the pivot point of change.

Yet 10 years later, here we are, still damned by numbers. Because change is not something you talk into existence. Change takes action.

Credit where it is due: Some of us did go back to our communities and work to change them. But too many of us, it seems, just went back.

And yes, I know about cops and courts, about the loan officer at the bank and the hiring man downtown and I know about the lies too many white people tell themselves, including the one that goes, "liberty and justice for all." I know about the truths some people won't, can't, face because to do so is to cut too close to their most cherished conceits and necessary self-deceptions.

But I also know that much of what is needed to fix our communities requires no white person's consent:

Get educated.

Seek a career, not a job.

Don't make children you can't support.

Understand that support means money.

Understand that support means more than money.

Marry the woman.

Model manhood for your children.

AP PHOTO

Louis Farrakhan organized the Million Man March 10 years ago, when he was photographed on Capitol Hill, above. But many of those who joined in did so not because of him, but in spite of him.

Save some money.

Buy a home.

Build a life.

Easier said than done? Yes, very much so. A guarantee of happily ever after? No such guarantee exists nor ever will.

Yet I persist in believing that for African America, changing the world lies in the embrace of these and other old-school dictums. And that revolution can be as simple as having dinner as a family, checking homework and going to church on Sunday.

I thought we understood that as we gathered under that autumnal sun. I thought this was what we meant when we hugged and laughed and made promises to the future.

But 10 years later, the future is here and it is hard to glimpse even the bare outlines of change.

There used to be a song that said, "Brother's gonna work it out." Ten years later, another autumnal sun. And we are waiting on brother, still.

NICHOLAS D. KRISTOF

Walking the talk

A year ago, a group of Swarthmore students decided to take on an unusual extracurricular activity: stopping genocide.

Mark Hanis, one of the students, is Jewish, and all four of his grandparents survived the Holocaust. He was troubled by the way generations of Americans acquiesced in one genocide after another — only to apologize afterward and pledge "Never Again."

So Hanis and fellow students started to raise money to help provide security to stop the slaughter in the Darfur region of western Sudan. In particular, they wanted to help pay for African Union peacekeepers.

Their Genocide Intervention Fund has now raised $250,000 and is about to hand over the first installment to the leaders of the African Union. The money may be used to pay for female African police officers to protect Darfur women from being raped.

The Genocide Intervention Fund now has an all-star cast, including the backing of former White House officials, generals and celebrities like Mia Farrow and Don Cheadle. Its spokeswoman, a Rwandan genocide survivor who is now a Swarthmore sophomore, introduced Bill Clinton at a student conference. It has opened a Washington office and is lobbying for the bipartisan Darfur Peace and Accountability Act, which calls for sanctions on Sudan and a no-fly zone.

"We do lobby days, where we arrange for people to come to Washington to meet their congressional offices and say, 'I've put $20 down to protect the people of Darfur. What are you doing?' " said Hanis, who graduated recently.

So far more than 100 colleges have raised money for the fund (www.genocideinterventionfund.org), and universities have become the center of the movement to stop the slaughter. A group started at Georgetown, STAND (Students Taking Action Now: Darfur), has chapters nationwide and across Canada, and Harvard led a divestment effort by having its endowment sell stock in companies that support the Sudanese government.

In the long term, the organizers hope to encourage more education about genocide in American schools — California and a few other states have passed laws that public schools must include education about genocide — and bolster an early warning system so that the world will respond to atrocities more promptly.

"We're getting smarter at this," Hanis said. "We're building a permanent political constituency against genocide." He paused and added soberly: "Of course, there are lives lost every day."

So while President Bush is proving wimpish on genocide, the response of many ordinary Americans like Hanis has been inspiring. Aside from students, the leaders in the effort include Jewish and Armenian groups — the word genocide has special resonance for both — and religious groups.

In Dallas, Temple Emanu-El started Dolls for Darfur, which has made thousands of tiny paper dolls representing the victims of Darfur. It has sent them to senators and is preparing "advocacy kits" to help people lobby for a sterner American response to the genocide (see dollsfordarfur.org).

Then there are the big-hearted folks at Ginghamsburg Church, a large Methodist church in Tipp City, Ohio. After the pastor, Mike Slaughter, read about atrocities in Darfur, he decided to ask the congregation to spend only half as much on Christmas presents last year as they planned and to donate the rest to victims in Darfur.

The result, along with other fund-raising efforts, was $327,000 in donations; the congregation is planning the same campaign this Christmas. The money is being used to keep children alive and safe in South Darfur.

"We recognize that this is only a pittance in the face of the entire crisis in Darfur," says Karen Smith, director of operations for the church. "However, if we can successfully engage other churches across the U.S. in this call so that they issue the same challenge to their constituents, the impact could truly be God-sized."

During the Holocaust, when Franklin D. Roosevelt was as uninterested in genocide as George W. Bush is today, Arthur Koestler referred to those who demanded action as "the screamers." Today, Hanis, Smith and others like them are "the screamers," and if it weren't for them the death toll in Darfur would be even higher. Countless thousands of survivors sitting in refugee camps owe their lives to screams coming from places like Swarthmore or Ginghamsburg.

So out of the miasma of horror that is Darfur, something uplifting is taking place. Ordinary Americans are finding creative ways to respond to the slaughter, so that they personally inject meaning into those traditionally hollow words: Never again.

Favre, Green Bay pack it on listless Saints in overwhelming 52-3 defeat

Saints center LeCharles Bentley can't bear to watch as Packers linebacker Nick Barnett returns an interception 95 yards for a touchdown during the fourth quarter Sunday. New Orleans turned over the ball five times as Green Bay rattled off 52 consecutive points.

GREEN BAY, WIS. — Sunday's 52-3 loss to the Green Bay Packers was almost unmatched in Saints history, second only to a 62-7 defeat against Atlanta at Tulane Stadium on Sept. 16, 1973.

And yet, there was something all too familiar about it.

The Saints (2-3) have lost three games in four weeks ñ each more spectacular than the last, but all of them following the same blueprint: Turnovers and penalties equal total disaster.

"It came down to this. We had (11) penalties, five turnovers, two missed field goals, dropped balls, missed tackles and bad coverage. So it doesn't get any worse than that," Saints coach Jim Haslett said after the debacle finally ended. "We were just bad today. Green Bay played really well. I thought Brett (Favre) was outstanding.

"We just self-destructed. We were awful."

The Saints are single-handedly keeping the NFC North Division respectable this year. Two weeks ago, they traveled to Minnesota and were blown out by the then-winless Vikings.

This week, it was an 0-4 Green Bay team lying in wait.

After losing their past three games by a total of six points, the Packers were due. But no one is this due.

"We knew they were going to be hungry. So were we," Saints center LeCharles Bentley said. "But I guess they wanted it a little more than we did."

Packers linebacker Nick Barnett evades the tackle attempt of Saints running back Antowain Smith in the fourth quarter. Barnett intercepted backup Todd Bouman, the second of two the Packers returned for touchdowns. Cornerback Al Harris intercepted Aaron Brooks in the first quarter, returning the ball 22 yards for the score.

In their three losses, the Saints have combined for 38 penalties and 15 turnovers.

They seemed to have corrected the mental mistakes and sloppy play during an efficient 19-7 victory against Buffalo last week.

But in retrospect, that game looks more like a Band-aid on a bullet hole.

The frustration was evident in the Saints' postgame locker room.

"Inconsistent. You're an inconsistent ballteam as a whole. Each individual," Saints tailback Deuce McAllister said after gaining 31 yards on 11 carries and leaving the game in the third quarter with a minor knee injury. "You would hope you would only have a day like that. You can't have games like that. We've got to stop it. We're too good of a ballteam to play that way."

The rest of the Saints were just as flummoxed after this game, the disbelief evident. Especially since

Tulane performance had familiar aroma

Offense inept, defense shoddy in showing of season's past

By Fred Robinson
Staff writer

RUSTON — Tulane coach Chris Scelfo stood outside of Louisiana-Lafayette's athletic building following his team's 35-14 defeat to Houston on Saturday night, shepherding his players through the doors leading to the team's locker room.

Shortly after a few players passed through the double steel doors, he said: "Don't start taking your stuff off."

At first, it sounded as if he was so upset with their performance that he was going to give them a tongue-lashing and then put them on the buses for a three-hour ride back to Ruston without the opportunity to shower and change clothes.

In a way, it would have been fitting. The ride would have been a real stinker, which is the only way to describe the Green Wave's inept offense and the way the defense played in the second half.

After being held by Tulane to 105 yards and four first downs in the first half, Houston played better during the final 30 minutes to finish with 440 yards, exactly twice as many yards as the Green Wave. The Wave's offense never responded.

So, what adjustments did Houston make at halftime that baffled the Wave in the third and fourth quarters?

Scelfo said: "Not a thing. They didn't do anything different than what we'd seen on tape. They just made the plays."

It's one thing for an opponent to make plays, but Tulane helped Houston with shoddy tackling, especially in the second half. It was reminiscent of past seasons.

"(Houston) did a great job. They're a real physical team,and we missed too many tackles," defensive coordinator Eric Schumann said. "We had one third-and-long situation where we had (about) 15 missed tackles on the play. They kicked our butts, that's all."

Analysis

OFFENSE – F

This offense is looking more and more like the one that started the 2004 season. With quarterback Lester Ricard having almost a season of playing time and working all summer with this year's group of receivers, much, much more was expected of the Wave's passing game.

In the past two games, however, Ricard has completed 36 of 82 passes. That's a 43.9 percent completion rate from a player who believes he should be completing at least 60 percent of his attempts.

With Ricard failing to complete passes and keep drives going, the Wave will not consistently run the ball effectively. It ran the ball well in the first half, with Matt Forte and Jovon Jackson combining for 127 yards. The Wave didn't get anything going on the ground in the second half and finished with 120 rushing yards. If Tulane's passing game doesn't click, chances are the running game won't, either. And that means Tulane won't win many games this year.

DEFENSE – F

There's no debating the Wave played well in the first half, but without first-half statistics to review, not even Tulane players would be able to recall what they did the first 30 minutes of the game. During the final two quarters, this team was tackling as if this were 1999 (Scelfo's first season), when it allowed an average of 36 points a game.

"I don't know what it is," senior linebacker Anthony Cannon said, referring to how the defense has played in the second half.

In three of its four games, the defense has not played well in the second half. Tulane has given up 59 of its 87 points in the second half.

In the second half of those games, the Wave has allowed too many big plays. Houston was able to bunch its big plays. Houston had the ball for 10 minutes, 13 seconds in the third quarter and produced seven plays that totaled 182 yards. It would be hard for the Wave to win any games allowing that many big plays during four quarters.

"It should have never happened," Schumann said. "We kept telling them it's going to happen; we knew it was going to happen. We just didn't execute on three of those plays - two jump balls and a screen play. Then we opened the barn door."

SPECIAL TEAMS – C

In its two games leading up to Houston, Tulane's special teams created opportunities. Against Houston, they were not a factor. The Wave's longest return was 28 yards, and the longest return allowed was 31 yards. With Izzy Route spraining an ankle on the opening kickoff, Tulane had to depend on Sean Lucas, who hasn't recovered from a bruised quad muscle, and backup Ray Boudreaux to get the job done.

Chris Beckman had a good game punting in spite of a 31-yarder in the second half. His 53-yard punt more than offset four kicks in the 30s and left him with a 40.3-yard average on seven punts.

McCann, Roussell run Higgins past Cox

From staff reports

Cox made its varsity debut Saturday night and learned two valuable lessons from Higgins: stopping the run and being able to run the ball is essential to be successful.

The Cougars did neither particularly well; the Hurricanes excelled at both in a 22-0 non-district victory in front of a crowd of 2,000 at Hoss Memtsas Stadium.

Higgins (1-1) gained all 254 of its yards rushing, and only six of 50 plays produced negative yardage. The Hurricanes averaged 5.5 yards per carry, with Corey McCann and Michael Roussell combining for 175 rushing yards and all the Hurricanes' touchdowns.

"I thought we played tough," Higgins coach Wayne Meyers said. "Both teams played tough. Basically, we ran the ball better and our defense played well."

McCann carried 21 times for 111 yards and had scoring runs of one and 20 yards. Roussell, who played offense and defense, produced 64 yards on 11 carries, and had a 14-yard scoring run. The versatile senior also stopped two Cox scoring threats with a forced fumble and interception, the latter his third in two games.

Higgins limited Cox to 83 rushing yards and 157 yards total. The Cougars had 18 rushing yards in a first half that Higgins controlled throughout in taking a 14-0 halftime lead. Cox also had zero passing yards in the second half and finished with four fumbles, losing three, to total four turnovers.

RIDGEWOOD 32, RIVERDALE 8: Quarterback Daniel Villifranco ran for two touchdowns and Joe Copura had two scoring runs to lead the Eagles in the opener for both teams Saturday night.

Villifranco scored on runs of 28 and 25 yards. Copura ran 29 and 18 yards for touchdowns.

Riverdale's touchdown came when quarterback Nick Durr passed 15 yards to William Lee.

VOLLEYBALL

RIDGEWOOD DEF. IMMACULATA 25–23, 25–22, 25–17: Lauren Mayer recorded 17 kills, 14 digs and five blocks to lead the Eagles to a non-district victory over Immaculata on Saturday. HIGGINS 25–11, 25–17, 25–14: Brigette Faucheaux had 32 assists, and Lauren Hartman and Kayla Rauschkolb recorded 10 and nine kills to lead Immaculata to a non-district victory on Saturday. Marcy Mobley had 10 digs and Hartman and Katie Winters had four and three aces for Immaculata. Higgins (0-2) was led by Kayla Comardelle, who had 10 assists.

Miles' style different, but gains acceptance among Tigers

Fans should not live in past; Saban not returning

By William Kalec
Staff writer

NASHVILLE, TENN. — A few thoughts and observations now that No. 10-ranked LSU has finally crawled through four games of an equally sluggish/unbelievable season:

▶ Les Miles is not Nick Saban. And that's neither good or bad - just different. While fans bemoan that Miles' practices are a tad more lax and that the guy observes rather than interjects, letting his assistants do their jobs instead of butting into drills, try coaxing a Tiger to say a discouraging word about the guy. Get over his retired stringy headset and his poofy white cap, how he doesn't look like a tough coach. Joe Paterno wears glasses thicker than the Yellow Pages dipped in pine tar. Steve Spurrier sports a visor and Bobby Bowden a straw hat. So give the guy a break and quit romanticizing about the Saban Years. Saban isn't coming back to Tiger Stadium, people. Oh wait, he is, when the Dolphins play the Saints. Never mind.

▶ Bo Pelini is not Saban, either, but man he's doing a really good impression - stunt-double worthy. If Vanderbilt quarterback Jay Cutler had a nickel for every uncontested, unrushed attempt LSU afforded to the All-SEC performer Saturday night, he'd be broke. Sack totals are increasing weekly as these Saban holdovers grow more comfortable in Pelini's turnover-inducing scheme. Miles admitted on Sunday defenders are performing intricacies absent from the September tape. Ever since Arizona State toyed with the Tigers' heavy-zone coverage, Pelini has gradually relied on and seems to trust his superior athletes in man-to-man coverage, allowing for more blitz packages and logically, more pressure.

Analysis

▶ The philosophy regarding the role of LSU's starting quarterback is slowly morphing. Way back when Matt Mauck ran this offense, all the Tigers expected from the man under center was someone competent enough not to screw things up. Don't throw a crucial interception or botch a handoff. Everyone else around the quarterback would win the game as long as he didn't lose it. But considering JaMarcus Russell's exponential growth, LSU is relying on big plays from its quarterback. The sophomore from Mobile, Ala., saved the Arizona State game with a flick of the right wrist and ended the competitive aspect of the Mississippi State and Vanderbilt contests with third and fourth quarter touchdown passes, respectively.

▶ With that said, wonder if freshman Ryan Perrilloux wishes he would have stuck to his word and signed with Texas? Throughout the process, Texas quarterback Vince Young reiterated his plan to bolt for the NFL after this season, meaning Perrilloux could've redshirted and had four years, if necessary, all to himself.

▶ It's about time for an old fashioned Saturday Night in Death Valley, don't you think? Way overdue. The Tiger Nation should have plenty of pent-up, um, spirit if ESPN picks up the Oct. 22 game against Auburn.

▶ There must be a correlation between the Tigers' inconsistencies offensively, especially the loads of penalties piling up, and the helter-skelter flow of this season. As crazy as it sounds, this team desperately needed that North Texas dress rehearsal (apologies to the New Orleans Bowl staples, but it's true).

Miles said the only way to coach through these problems is addressing them constantly in film study and practice.

▶ Joseph Addai's carries per game are steadily increasing as the senior proves to Miles and the coaching staff he's more than capable to carry the ball 25 to 30 times if called upon.

▶ LSU in the BCS national title game? It's not impossible. Currently, there are nine undefeated teams from major conferences (USC, Texas, Virginia Tech, Florida State, Alabama, Georgia, Penn State, UCLA and Texas Tech), leading some talking heads to fast-forward and toss out predictions on who will be this year's "Auburn" - an unblemished squad squeezed out of Pasadena. What these all-knowing on-airs are forgetting is that every one of those undefeateds besides Penn State still has an undefeated remaining on their schedule, meaning half this group is going to be automatically slashed. Among one-loss teams, LSU is the second-highest ranked in the coaches' poll (one-third of the BCS formula), staring up at 4-1 Miami.

Astros' Burke ends marathon

His home run sends Houston to NLCS against St. Louis

By Stephen Hawkins
AP sports writer

HOUSTON — Roger Clemens and the Houston Astros gave a whole new meaning to word "longevity."

The 43-year-old Rocket came out of the bullpen to rescue the Astros and Chris Burke ended the longest postseason game in baseball history with a home run in the 18th inning, lifting Houston over the Atlanta Braves 7-6 Sunday and into the NL championship series.

The Braves took a five-run lead into the eighth, and were poised to send this first-round series back to Atlanta for a decisive Game 5 on Monday night. Instead, Lance Berkman hit a grand slam in the eighth and Brad Ausmus tied it with a two-out homer in the ninth barely beyond center field Andruw Jones' outstretched glove.

Then, at 6-all, the Braves and Astros began the real endurance test that wound up lasting five hours, 50 minutes.

With Clemens pitching three innings in his first relief appearance since 1984 - and this time atoning for a poor start in Game 2 - the Astros advanced to play the St. Louis Cardinals in the NLCS starting Wednesday night at Busch Stadium.

It will be the first NLCS rematch since Pittsburgh and Atlanta played in 1991-92. Last October, the Cardinals beat Clemens in Game 7, denying the Astros their first World Series appearance.

CARDINALS COMPLETE SWEEP: Chris Carpenter stood soaked with champagne in the St. Louis clubhouse as he reeled off everything the Cardinals are doing right this postseason.

They jumped to big leads in all three first-round games against San Diego. Carpenter and the other starters were superb and the bullpen sealed it each time. The defense turned enough double plays that the Padres never found any kind of offensive groove.

St. Louis quickly moved past overmatched San Diego, advancing to the NL championship series for the second consecutive season and fourth time in six years after finishing a division series sweep Saturday night.

"We've got a great club," Carpenter said during a brief break from dousings. "We've got to continue to play the way we've been playing in this series to continue to move on. We've got some quality guys here. We played quality games. We went out and swung the bats early."

This St. Louis team has long considered itself a World Series contender, especially hungry for another shot at winning it all after being swept by the Boston Red Sox for the championship last October.

Only two members of the Cardinals have rings: Reggie Sanders with the Arizona Diamondbacks in 2001 and David Eckstein in 2002 with the Angels.

Both played key roles in Saturday's 7-4 win at Petco Park, where the Padres and their sellout crowd had little chance of slowing the Cardinals. St. Louis has carried the success from its major league-best 100-62 regular-season record right into the next phase.

The 37-year-old Sanders, in the postseason for the fifth time in six years, set an NLDS record with 10 RBIs. He hit a grand slam and drove in an NLDS-record six runs in an 8-5 Game 1 victory, then added two-run doubles in each of the next two games.

Afterward, his teammates chanted "MVP! MVP!" and "Reggie! Reggie!" through the clubhouse.

"In a short series, that's kind of what you look for," Manager Tony La Russa said. "You get a hot hitter or two, a hot pitcher or two, you swing the games. He was big in each game. I don't think he had a meaningless RBI. ... One of the things we believe about our club is that we have a bunch of guys that are prime-timers. They're not afraid to take big at-bats. He's one of them."

Eckstein, who stands all of 5-foot-7 and weighs only 165 pounds, hit a two-run homer that just cleared the left-field fence in the second - his first career postseason home run in 22 games.

Sanders' bases-loaded, two-run double came four batters later, and just like that the Cardinals had taken a 5-0 lead and knocked former teammate Woody Williams out of the game after 1 2-3 innings and 53 pitches.

"It was very important for us to go out there and set the tone early and find a way to get a win," Eckstein said. "Every game can change momentum. Especially after we had that lead, you definitely don't want to lose that lead because in that situation you could end up all of a sudden they come back, then it's a whole new ballgame tomorrow."

While St. Louis players calmly walked off the field as if having just completed a regular-season series sweep, the Cardinals let loose in the visitor's clubhouse a few minutes later with a crazy party. Some players got bubbly poured down the back of their uniform pants.

They figured they'd earned the chance for a wild, albeit brief, celebration. Everybody involved insisted it wouldn't last long before the Cardinals would return to getting ready for the NLCS.

"I think we all know what we need to do and it's just having a little fun while we're getting there," second baseman Mark Grudzielanek said.

The Cardinals never trailed in the first round, and now they will have home-field advantage for the NLCS, though the way they are playing it hardly seems to matter.

Carpenter will go in Game 1 after pitching six shutout innings in the opener against San Diego. Mark Mulder, the Game 2 winner, is still nursing a bruised left biceps he sustained on a line drive by Joe Randa and it's unclear when he will pitch.

La Russa acknowledged he started thinking about the next round before Saturday's game, brainstorming how he would set the rotation depending on the opponent.

"I was thinking it was too superstitious to think about it, but now we can," La Russa said.

The Cardinals certainly appear to have the talent for another run at a ring. They can beat opponents with pitching, defense, home runs and hit-and-runs.

What did they prove with their first-round sweep?

"That we're a good team," Grudzielanek said with a grin. "It's a great experience for anybody to be involved in something like this. It just doesn't come around too often. Fortunately we have an opportunity to get back where we were last year, and that's our mission."

Burden now lifted, Texas has clearer path

Longhorns' victory over Oklahoma helps solidify ranking

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

At 6 feet 7 and 325 pounds, offensive tackle Jonathan Scott of Texas is not one to be messed with.

But we respectfully disagree with his assessment of the burden lifted by the Longhorns' 45-12 victory against Oklahoma on Saturday, ending their five-year losing streak against the Sooners.

"That chip on our shoulders is finally gone," Scott said.

Chip?

That was an 800-pound Texas-sized pasture pie.

And not just for Longhorns coach Mack Brown, but for the Texas seniors as well, because they faced the ignominy of being the third consecutive class to depart without defeating their Red River rivals.

"I thought of my teammates who never beat Oklahoma," senior linebacker Aaron Harris said. "I didn't want to leave like that."

So now he won't.

And for Texas, undefeated after the Oklahoma game for the first time since 1983, the path is clear to Pasadena and the Rose Bowl for this season's BCS championship game.

Although the Longhorns are a distant second to Southern California in the Harris and USA Today polls that make up two-thirds of the BCS standings formula, they are solidly entrenched in the No. 2 spot. Unless voting patterns change, and even if there are any shortcomings the Longhorns might have in the computers (playing Rice and Louisiana-Lafayette hurts them there), it would be almost impossible for them to be bumped out of the title game should they continue their winning ways.

"We can go further now," Harris said. "We can control our own destiny."

Of course, nothing is a given. This week, Texas plays host to Colorado (4-1), fresh off a 41-20 victory against Texas A&M. On Oct. 22, undefeated Texas Tech goes to Austin.

But nobody this side of USC looks as good as the Longhorns.

Quarterback Vincent Young polished his Heisman Trophy credentials with a 241-yard, three-touchdown passing day, freshman running back Jamaal Charles ran for 114 yards, 80 of them on a first-quarter touchdown run.

The Texas defense limited the Sooners to 171 yards, using effective alignments that pummeled redshirt freshman quarterback Rhett Bomar.

That shouldn't have been surprising. Texas was a 13-point favorite, and Oklahoma had lost twice before Saturday. When you are that superior in talent, you are supposed to win.

"Today was something we needed to fix," Brown said. "I thought we had the better team, and usually the better team wins unless they mess it up."

That was the knock on Texas. Oklahoma seemed to present as much of a mental as a physical block to the Longhorns for the past five years.

But this Texas team ñ and staff ñ was downright loose in the days leading up to the game.

Brown, whom former Longhorns running back Cedric Benson said basically played not to lose against Oklahoma, danced in the locker room with the team a couple of times and came out with a game plan that was aggressive on both sides of the ball.

"I told the guys, "Enjoy being Texas football players,' Brown said.

"Let's not back away. Don't feel the pressure. Enjoy it."

The Longhorns did just that, winding up with the most points they've ever scored against the Sooners, tying their largest margin of victory in the 100-game series.

POLL WATCHING: Texas' victory impressed voters in the two BCS polls. The second-ranked Longhorns went from four to nine first-place votes in the Harris Interactive poll and from two to four in the USA Today coaches poll.

That kept the Longhorns far behind USC, but widened their lead over No. 3 Virginia Tech.

LSU's victory against Vanderbilt improved the Tigers' standings in both polls. The Tigers went from No. 12 to No. 10 in the Harris poll and from 10th to eighth in the coaches poll.

Florida, which LSU meets Saturday at Tiger Stadium, is 12th in the Harris Poll and 13th in the coaches.

In the Associated Press rankings this week, LSU is 10th and Florida 11th.

Lewis Ballot ñ Ted Lewis is a voter on the Harris Interactive poll. Here is his ballot for this week: 1. Southern California; 2. Texas; 3. Virginia Tech; 4. Alabama; 5. Georgia; 6. Notre Dame; 7. Penn State; 8. Florida State; 9. LSU; 10. Miami; 11. Florida; 12. UCLA; 13. Ohio State; 14. Tennessee; 15. Boston College; 16. Texas Tech; 17. Auburn; 18. Michigan State; 19. Minnesota; 20. Oregon; 21. California; 22. Louisville; 23. Wisconsin; 24. Colorado; 25. TCU

HANCOCK TO THE RESCUE: How do you fix the BCS?

Hire a basketball man, naturally.

Bill Hancock, longtime coordinator for the NCAA Men's Basketball Tournament, will be chosen the BCS' first full-time administrator early this week.

Hancock's duties will be coordinating the two polls plus the computer rankings that make up the standings formula, being the media contact person and other administrative duties. Previously, those duties fell to the media relations director for the conference, whose commissioner was the BCS coordinator, currently Kevin Weiberg of the Big 12.

Policy-making will remain in the hands of the commissioners.

Hancock is not without football experience. He began in the Oklahoma sports information department in 1971, the year of the Sooners' legendary No. 1 vs. No. 2 game against Nebraska, and for five years before joining the NCAA he was the media relations director of the Big Eight.

Hancock's employment by the BCS probably will end his association with the NCAA.

SPOILED SPORTS AWARD: Five policemen prevented Georgia cornerback Tim Jennings from planting his school flag at the 50-yard line at Neyland Stadium following the Bulldogs' victory against Tennessee. "Where were they last year?" asked Jennings, referring to the Vols' doing the same thing after their 2004 victory at Georgia. ... Act Like You've Been There Before Award: Even if You Haven't. When Baylor broke its 37-game losing streak in Big 12 road games with a 23-13 victory at Iowa State, instead of going into any kind of flag-planting celebration the Bears shook hands with their defeated opponents and walked off the field. ...Indiana quarterback Blake Powers needed less than half a season to break the school record for touchdown passes in a season, throwing four in the Hoosiers' 36-13 victory against Illinois to raise his total to 18 in five games. ... Stat of the Week: After struggling to a 14-7 halftime lead against Marshall, third-ranked Virginia Tech outgained Marshall 200-1 in the third quarter en route to a 41-14 victory. ... Top-ranked USC rolled up 724 yards against Arizona, but that's still 250 shy of the team record ñ 978 in an 80-0 victory against Pamona in 1925. Miracle Play of the Week: SMU's Jerad Romo hit Bobby Chase for a 31-yard touchdown pass as time expired to give the Mustangs a 28-27 victory against UAB. The victory broke a 14-game road losing streak. ... Accomplishment of the Week: Northwestern College in St. Paul, Minn., played and won two games Saturday. The Eagles started the day by defeating Trinity Bible College, 59-0, and then traveled six miles to Macalester College where they won, 47-14. The double-dip was created because Northwestern, a Division III school, was having problems filling its 10-game schedule.

COACH'S CORNER: "I wanted to run out the clock. But I had a hunch. You guys ever have hunches? I turned to our running backs coach, Vic Adamle, and said, "We haven't broken one all day.' "

Hodge suspended one year for substance abuse

Started every game this season

By Brian Allee-Walsh
Staff writer

GREEN BAY, WIS. — CBS Sports reported Sunday evening that Saints linebacker Sedrick Hodge will be suspended for one year as a repeat offender in the NFL's substance abuse policy.

Saints officials were not immediately available to respond to the report as they were traveling back from Sunday's game in Green Bay, Wis.

Hodge, 27, missed the first four games of last season for violating the policy. The fourth-year veteran has started every game for the Saints at the strongside linebacker position this year, including Sunday's loss to the Packers.

Hodge's replacement would be James Allen, who actually entered this season as the starter before battling knee and hamstring injuries. Allen missed Sunday's game because of the hamstring injury.

Next on the depth chart after Allen is second-year backup Terrence Melton.

DEUCE'S BUM KNEE: Saints running back Deuce McAllister's injury added to the insult of Sunday's embarrassing 52-3 loss to the Green Bay Packers at Lambeau Field.

McAllister limped off the field with approximately seven minutes remaining in the third quarter after twisting his right knee at the end of a screen pass.

X-rays taken at the stadium were negative, and an MRI exam is scheduled today in San Antonio.

"I'll be all right," said McAllister, who rushed 11 times for 31 yards. "My foot got caught in the ground, and I felt something in my knee. If it had been a closer game, I think I could have put a brace on it and gone out and played.

"If I had to play a game tomorrow, I'd probably be questionable. But I plan to play Sunday, unless it's something worse than it already is."

WORDS TO LIVE BY: In 10 words or less, Saints players and coaches were asked to explain Sunday's debacle that featured five turnovers and 11 penalties.

"We were on the bad end of the whoopin' stick,'' running back Aaron Stecker said

"We started out bad and never recovered,'' wide receiver Donte' Stallworth said.

"We started falling apart early, then it snowballed, and then it got out of control," tight end Ernie Conwell said.

"We were just plain bad,'' said left defensive end Charles Grant, who was replaced in the starting lineup by Will Smith after reporting late to a meeting during the week.

"We took a step back today," cornerback Mike McKenzie said.

Saints coach Jim Haslett, perhaps, summed it up best: "We were awful."

PERSONNEL REPORT: Az-Zahir Hakim started for wide receiver Joe Horn, who missed his second consecutive game with an injured hamstring. Hakim caught a game-high five passes for 108 yards, all in the first half. "I could have played, but I wouldn't have been as effective as the other guys who were out there," Horn said. "But I'll come back next Sunday (against Atlanta) come hell or high water."

INJURY UPDATE: Saints quarterback Aaron Brooks left the game with 8:40 remaining in the third quarter in favor of Todd Bouman. Television showed Brooks standing on the sideline with his right hand wrapped in ice. "He's healthy," Haslett said. "There's nothing wrong with him. It was 42-3. I'd have taken everybody out if we had a chance. It was an opportunity for Todd to get some playing time.'' Starting cornerback Fakhir Brown missed his fourth consecutive game with a bruised knee.

DID YOU KNOW? The Packers went three-and-out on their opening possession, the first time this season a Saints' opponent did not score a touchdown on its first possession. Also, the Saints scored on their first possession for just the second time since the final game of the 2003 season. John Carney kicked a 33-yard field goal for a 3-0 lead, and later missed two attempts from 43 yards. "On the first one, I hit it well, and it was between the uprights for 40 yards," Carney said. "On the second one, I over-corrected to the right, but the wind didn't push it."

RUSHING ROULETTE: The Packers scored their first two rushing touchdowns of the season, both by Najeh Davenport. Davenport also turned in the team's longest run of the season, a 24-yarder in the second quarter. He gained the final 18 yards on the run after breaking free from safety Dwight Smith's grasp.

GONE BUT NOT FORGOTTEN: Davenport left the game in the second quarter with a broken ankle, according to reports. He left the game with 54 yards on 12 carries and a career-best two touchdowns.

THE NAME GAME: In the first quarter, Green Bay linebacker PARIS Lenon broke up a pass intended for Saints tight end Zachary HILTON.

BY THE NUMBERS: 2 — Interceptions by Packers cornerback Al Harris in the first quarter. He returned the first one 22 yards for a touchdown. Both passes were intended for Stallworth, who caught one pass for six yards. Plus-29 — The Packers' point differential after five games (1-4). Minus-68 — The Saints' point differential after five games (2-3).

WORTH REPEATING: "It has nothing to do with dropped balls or missed tackles. We can do that anywhere.'' — Haslett, when asked if Sunday's performance was linked to his team's exiled situation in San Antonio.

Packers QB celebrates birthday day early with victory

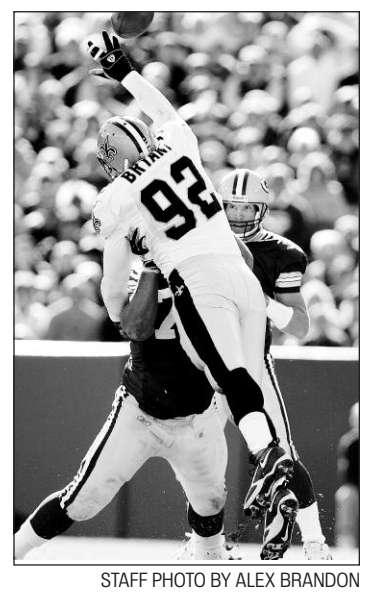
GREEN BAY, WIS. — For months, Green Bay Packers quarterback Brett Favre has hinted that he might retire after the season, his 15th in the NFL.

Based on Sunday's near-flawless performance at sun-splashed Lambeau Field, team officials might consider signing their unparalleled leader and captain to a new lucrative contract.

The native of Kiln, Miss., completed 19 of 27 passes for 215 yards and three touchdowns to post a 130.9 passer rating in the Packers' 52-3 victory against the hapless Saints.

Favre, who celebrates his 36th birthday today, threw scoring passes of 25 yards and one yard to wide receiver Robert Ferguson and tight end David Martin in the second quarter and 26 yards to tight end Donald Lee in the third quarter before turning over the game to rookie backup Aaron Rodgers in the fourth quarter.



"I thought Brett was outstanding,'' Saints coach Jim Haslett said. "I don't think he's ever, ever looked his age, whatever it is. I've said it before: I think he's the greatest player to play the game and I believe that. I know he's the greatest competitor, and he proved it today."

With a sellout crowd of 70,580 looking on, Favre picked apart a Saints defense that always seemed one step behind in its pass rush and pass coverage. His only apparent hiccup came on the Packers' second play from scrimmage when he botched a handoff to running back Najeh Davenport, which he recovered at the Green Bay 20.

"They had a great game plan," Saints cornerback Fred Thomas said. "They started him out hitting short passes, and he warmed up to it. Then, he started making the deep throws and they made a lot of plays. It seems like everything they did today worked."

"He was impressive,'' said Saints cornerback Mike McKenzie, who played five seasons with Favre in Green Bay.

"Brett was phenomenal,'' Rodgers said. "The day before his 36th birthday, he looked like a 22-year-old out there."

The Saints' Tony Bryant blocks a pass by Packers quarterback Brett Favre, one of his few miscues in Green Bay's 52-3 rout of New Orleans on Sunday.

The Packers (1-4) snapped a four-game losing streak, their longest losing streak since 1988.

"I know we're not 52-3 better than the Saints but I also know we're better than 0-4,'' Favre said. "That's the first time I've ever played in a game where we've scored 50 points. Who would have guessed it?"

The Packers had been competitive in all four losses, losing by a combined 20 points, only six in the last three games. But 0-4 had them last in the NFC North where Detroit holds sole possession of first with a 2-2 record.

"People are trying to write (Favre) off," Saints left tackle Wayne Gandy said. "When he was younger he had good players around him. But as you get older, you can't ask a 35-year-old man to win games by himself. He needs a little more running game and a little stingier defense. But I don't see him retiring just yet."

Saints running back Aaron Stecker said Sunday's performance indicates Favre still can play the game at a very high level.

"I went to high school in Green Bay and watched Brett Favre play," Stecker said. "Today he looked like the player I grew up watching. It doesn't matter what he says or does, as long as he's on the field, they've got a chance. He's capable of making things happen.

"It was like watching the Brett Favre of old."

SAINTS, from C-1

the Saints started the game rather well.

They forced Green Bay's offense into a three-and-out to open the game. Then the Saints' offense marched down and scored on its opening possession for just the second time since 2003 ñ taking a 3-0 lead.

Then Favre took over.

He marched his team downfield for a touchdown and a 7-3 lead. Then two plays and two penalties later, Saints quarterback Aaron Brooks threw an ill-advised pass that was intercepted by cornerback Al Harris in the left flat.

Harris returned the interception 22 yards for a touchdown.

"Sometimes you never know until you get out there on the football field," Brooks said. "I thought we came in with a great attitude, thought we were going to beat this team while they were down. But obviously that didn't happen. So we just have to move on."

As for that first interception, Brooks said, "The guy made a great play. Whether that was the changing point of the game, hey, we had times to go back down there and answer but we didn't."

Harris intercepted another pass by Brooks on the Saints' next possession ñ a deep ball that Donte' Stallworth could have broken up ñ that led to another Packers' touchdown drive.

Brooks finished 9-of-22 for 146 yards with no touchdowns and two interceptions. He was replaced in the third quarter by Todd Bouman with the Packers leading 42-3.

THE BIG LOSS

Largest margins of Saints losses since they joined the NFL in 1967.

| Score | Margin | Year |
|---|---|---|
| Falcons 62, Saints 7 | 55 points | 1973 |
| Packers 52, Saints 3 | 49 points | 2005 |
| Vikings 45, Saints 3 | 42 points | 1988 |
| 49ers 40, Saints 0 | 40 points | 1973 |

Brooks was seen on the sideline with ice on his throwing hand, but he said it was nothing more than a "little bruise" and he wasn't even listed among the postgame injuries.

Bouman hardly created a quarterback controversy, fumbling once and throwing an interception - which was returned 95 yards for a touchdown by linebacker Nick Barnett in the fourth quarter.

"We took a step back today, we got our (Ö) kicked," said Saints cornerback Mike McKenzie, a former Packer who was making his return to Lambeau Field. "We didn't bring our A game, they did."

The Saints' secondary had been one of this team's strong suits heading into the game, ranking sixth in the NFL against the pass.

But Favre looked as crisp as ever, finding small spaces in zone coverages and leading his receivers a step ahead of the defensive backs. Favre finished 19-of-27 for 215 yards and three touchdowns.

"Favre was just on his game. It was like he was perfect," Saints cornerback Jason Craft said. "One of those things where it seemed like every pass he threw, it was on the money. He was consistent, that's for sure. He made the right throws, the right plays.

"I don't think he made any dumb passes today. You know sometimes he likes to push the ball up in there sometimes or whatever. But I think every choice that he made was the right choice."

The Saints actually outgained Green Bay 192 yards to 191 in the first half ñ despite trailing 35-3 at the break.

New Orleans committed 10 penalties and Carney missed two field-goal attempts before halftime.

The Saints' penalties were spread out among the offense, defense and special teams, but it was a particularly tough day for the offensive line. Four of the five starters were flagged for holding or false-start penalties in the first half.

"Once that starts, it shouldn't be that hard to get things turned around," guard Kendyl Jacox said of the snowball effect that has plagued the Saints. "Unfortunately it was today. We need to regroup and come back for Atlanta."

The good news for the Saints is that they have a chance to even their record and stay unbeaten in their division when they host the Falcons in San Antonio on Sunday.

The upside of inconsistency is that a big win can help erase a spectacular loss.

"Every game that we've lost, we've somehow, someway found ways to beat ourselves. We put ourselves in bad situations," Bentley said. "That being said, we've somehow, someway got to find a way to fix it."

Saints helping their opponents make history

FINNEY, from C-1

some kind of juggernaut after placing a large hickey on the head of a team that didn't show up.

This was the kind of performance, under ordinary circumstances, that would get a head coach fired, keeping in mind Hurricane Katrina had a way of changing the rules.

What happened in Green Bay was Jim Haslett's 2-2 Saints played like a bunch of disorganized deadbeats against an opponent burdened with all kinds of problems.

The Packers were without their best running back.

They have a young offensive line, even younger receivers, suspect cornerbacks, and a defense that kept surrendering big plays.

What they also have, of course, is the supreme warrior, a quarterback, his vintage years behind him, who can rally the troops as well as anyone who has played the game.

You knew Brett Favre would have the winless Packers ready.

But you hoped Haslett would do the same for the Saints.

What Green Bay did was expose all the warts in a team that has learned how to lose.

And Sunday the Saints lost in an accustomed fashion.

No discipline.

No leadership.

Nothing, really.

Nothing, that is, after a field goal drive and a quick 3-0 lead.

That's when the first of 10 first-half flags began falling (facemask, 15 yards) to give a Packers' touchdown drive life.

That's when the flags continued to fall (holding, holding again) and then, there was Brooks, with Donte' Stallworth waiting for the football, completing a pass to Al Harris to set the rout in motion.

These were the mental-zombie Saints.

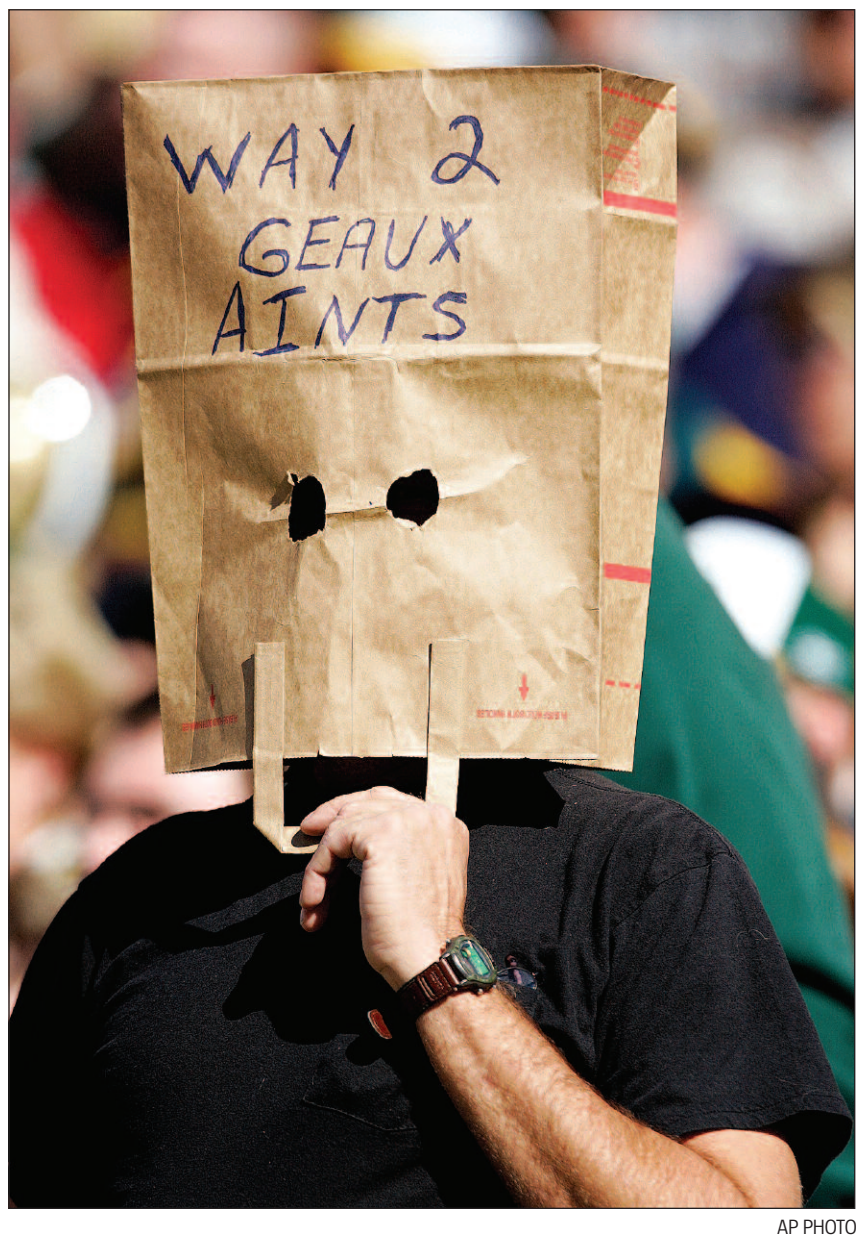
These were the Haslett-Brooks-mistake-ridden Saints who didn't allow the Brett Favre Packers to break a sweat as the home team broke out of a winless season.

This was the kind of game that left senior citizen Favre, making his 230th consecutive start, thinking back to his days in NFL diapers.

The last time the Packers scored 35 points in a first half, Favre was starting his 10th game in a Green Bay uniform.

So, yes, in their own way, Jim Haslett's Saints are still making history — for their opponents.

And you know what the sad thing is for perhaps the leading underachievers in the NFC South?



The Saints took their pathetic dive on a Sunday that told you the division was up for grabs.

Bucs lose. Falcons lose. And Michael Vick's hurting.

Come next Sunday, the Falcons visit San Antonio, where the Saints will be spending the week nursing what?

Wounded pride?

If you watched the sorriest of performances by paid professionals, you know there was none, no wounded pride, in 52-3.

SAINTS REPORT CARD

Staff writers Brian Allee-Walsh and Mike Triplett

OFFENSE

Aside from their opening series when John Carney converted a 33-yard field goal for a short-lived 3-0 lead, the Saints' offense seemed out of sync and uninspired. Quarterback Aaron Brooks struggled, completing nine of 22 passes for 146 yards, with two interceptions. Green Bay cornerback Al Harris returned one interception 22 yards for a touchdown in the first quarter. Brooks finished with a 25.9 passer rating. His replacement - Todd Bouman - didn't fare much better. He completed five of 13 passes for 177 yards (a rating of 14.6), with one interception returned for a touchdown and one lost fumble resulting in a field goal. Once the game turned one-sided, in the second quarter, Saints offensive coordinator Mike Sheppard essentially had to abandon the running game. Consequently, Deuce McAllister rushed 11 times for 31 yards before exiting the game in the third quarter with a sprained right knee.

Grade: F.

DEFENSE

If you simply look at yards surrendered, the Packers only managed to get 309. But they scored 52 points on 56 plays from scrimmage and averaged 5.5 yards per play. The pass rush was non-existent (no sacks, very few hurries), thus enabling Packers quarterback Brett Favre to sit back and pick apart the Saints' secondary with relative ease. Favre posted a 130.9 passer rating, completing 19 of 27 passes for 215 yards and three touchdowns. Cornerback Jason Craft twice got beat for touchdowns and gave up a 51-yard completion to Robert Ferguson, a play on which Craft was called for pass interference. The sooner cornerback Fakhir Brown comes off the injury report, the better off the Saints' pass defense should be.

Grade: F.

COACHING

Praise or criticism - each begins at the top, starting with Coach Jim Haslett. The Saints appeared to be ill-prepared to play a winless team that was coming off an emotional 32-29 loss to the Carolina Panthers on Monday night. Veteran left tackle Wayne Gandy called it a "trap game," meaning the Saints should have known they would be walking into a potential ambush. Five turnovers resulted in 31 points, and 11 penalties produced minus-107 yards. All in all, a woeful job of preparation.

Grade: F.

SPECIAL TEAMS

They were hardly the reason the Saints lost, but they can hardly be let off the hook after this debacle. Two of the Saints' first-half penalties came during kickoff returns. And Saints kicker John Carney missed two field-goal attempts of 43 yards in the second quarter. The Saints' coverage units did a fine job, but the Saints did not make any significant kick returns ñ even though the Packers gave them plenty of chances, kicking off nine times. Ö One major bright spot: no fumbles.

Patriots' Brady, Vinatieri deny Falcons an upset

Jets deal Buccaneers first loss of season; Panthers rally late

Atlanta quarterback Matt Schaub, subbing for the injured Michael Vick, threw for 298 yards in the Falcons' 31-28 loss to New England.

The Atlanta Falcons kept coming back, even without quarterback Michael Vick, but Tom Brady and the New England Patriots weren't about to lose two in a row.

Brady threw for 350 yards and three touchdowns before Adam Vinatieri kicked a 29-yard field goal with 17 seconds left to lead injury-plagued New England past the host Falcons 31-28 on Sunday. The Falcons (3-2) play the Saints (2-3) at noon Sunday in the Alamodome in San Antonio.

"We put a lot into this one," Brady said. "We've had doubters for a long time. We're just going to keep coming out and doing the hard things every week."

Matt Schaub filled in admirably for Vick, matching Brady with three touchdown passes while rallying the Falcons from deficits of 14-0 and 28-13 against the defending Super Bowl champions.

Atlanta tied the score at 28 when Schaub threw a 14-yard scoring pass to Dez White with 3:52 remaining, then went to Brian Finneran for a 2-point conversion.

New England (3-2) was coming off a dismal performance, losing to San Diego at home 41-17 and facing the possibility of its first losing streak since 2002.

But, with the Patriots backed up at their 26 on second-and-20, Atlanta cornerback Allen Rossum was called for pass interference on Deion Branch ñ the last of a stretch of four penalties in four plays that gave New England a first down at the Falcons' 44.

Patrick Pass, replacing injured Corey Dillon, broke off a 15-yard gain that set up the 19th game-winning kick of Vinatieri's career.

Vick, who has a strained ligament in his right knee, wasn't active. He watched from the sideline, dressed out in a visor and gray sweatshirt.

"He wasn't ready to play," Coach Jim Mora said. "It was an easy decision. When a player is not ready to play, you are not going to put him out there in harm's way. This team felt confident we could perform with Matt Schaub, and I think we proved that to be true."

Schaub, a second-year player from Virginia, completed 18 of 34 passes for 298 yards and didn't have any turnovers. Finneran caught five passes for 103 yards.

But the Falcons' defense couldn't slow Brady, who was 22-of-27. Branch, MVP of last season's Super Bowl, had eight catches for 107 yards. Tight end Daniel Graham had 119 yards on five receptions, including a 45-yard touchdown.

Bethel Johnson caught a 55-yard touchdown pass, and Ben Watson went 33 yards with Brady's other scoring throw.

Dillon rushed for 106 yards before he went to the locker room with an undisclosed injury late in the game. Pass rushed for 34 yards, including the first touchdown of his career in the first quarter.

FALCONS LOSE LB: Atlanta linebacker Edgerton Hartwell might be lost for the season because of a foot injury, Mora said.

Mora said backup cornerback Chris Cash also might be out for the season because of an arm injury. Mora said he would be surprised if either player returns this season.

"When they take them into the locker room right way, it doesn't look good," Mora said. "I would say that they are both probably done unless we get divine intervention."

Hartwell was carted off the field in the opening seconds of the fourth quarter with a right foot injury. He started all four games this season.

JETS 14 vs. BUCS 12: Vinny Testaverde finished 13-of-19 for 163 yards, and Curtis Martin rushed for his first two touchdowns of the season as New York (2-3) gave visiting Tampa Bay its first loss of the season.

"My goal was to get the guys to believe in me, so we can get the season turned around," said Testaverde, who joined the Jets to substitute for injured Chad Pennington and Jay Fiedler. "I think they believe in me. I believe in them."

"He made a couple of good throws for a guy who has been home eating potato chips," Bucs cornerback Ronde Barber said.

Tampa Bay played without running back Carnell "Cadillac" Williams, out with foot and hamstring injuries, and stalled on offense. Michael Pittman, who filled in for Williams, finished with 13 carries for 46 yards, and Brian Griese was 27-of-42 for 226 yards with an interception.

The Jets had three sacks and limited Tampa Bay to 285 yards on 71 plays.

Tampa Bay was 2-of-14 on third down and also committed 12 penalties for 87 yards. Matt Bryant was the lone bright spot with four field goals (35, 36, 43, 30).

"They got after us early," Bucs coach Jon Gruden said. "We had sacks in our first five or six passes. That will knock any quarterback out of rhythm."

Still, the Bucs had a chance in the end. They forced the Jets to punt with one minute remaining but ran out of time trying to get into field goal range.

PANTHERS 24 at CARDINALS 20: Jake Delhomme threw two touchdown passes to Steve Smith, one for 65 yards in the first half and a four-yarder with 6:54 to go, to give Carolina (3-2) a come-from-behind victory over Arizona (1-4).

Delhomme completed 18 of 29 passes for 243 yards and two scores. He was intercepted once.

Arizona, leading 20-10 after three quarters, had the ball twice after Carolina's go-ahead score.

The Cardinals drove to the Panthers 33, but Marlon McCree intercepted Josh McCown in the end zone for the second time in the game. The Cardinals' last shot ended when McCown scrambled on fourth-and-10 but came up inches short at the Panthers' 49.

McCown completed 29 of 46 for 394 yards, two touchdowns and three interceptions.

Cowboys strike quickly to overrun Eagles

Redskins lose first; Holcomb leads Bills past Miami

Miami Dolphins coach Nick Saban reacts after the Dolphins fumbled late in the fourth quarter of Sunday's game against the Buffalo Bills. The Bills won 20-14.

Drew Bledsoe and the Dallas Cowboys jumped on the Philadelphia Eagles with two early touchdowns and turned that spark into a 33-10 victory Sunday at Irving, Texas.

The Cowboys led 17-0 before the Eagles had a first down and 27-3 at halftime, having scored on five of six possessions.

Bledsoe finished 24-of-35 for 289 yards and three touchdowns, with Terry Glenn catching the first two scoring passes. Glenn had seven catches for 118 yards. Julius Jones gained 72 yards but didn't play the second half because of an apparent ankle injury. Rookie Tyson Thompson gained 75 yards in his place as Dallas (3-2) went conservative with the game under control.

The Eagles, who came in with the league's best offense and top passing attack, were held to 129 total yards, 110 passing. Their touchdown came on an 80-yard fumble return by cornerback Sheldon Brown.

Donovan McNabb, playing with injuries to his abdomen, chest and groin, was 13-of-26 for 131 yards and four sacks for Philadelphia (3-2). Terrell Owens had five catches for 50 yards.

BRONCOS 21 vs. REDSKINS 19: Denver (4-1) thwarted a 2-point conversion attempt with 1:09 left, preserving a victory against Washington (3-1).

Mark Brunell's 11-yard touchdown pass to Chris Cooley drew the Redskins to 21-19. But his pass for two points was incomplete. Brunell finished 30-for-53 for 322 yards and two touchdowns.

Tatum Bell rushed 12 times for 127 yards and two touchdowns for the Broncos, including a 55-yarder. Clinton Portis led the Redskins with 103 yards on 20 carries.

Denver led 21-10 after three quarters. Nick Novak's 35-yard field goal closed Washington to 21-13 with 6:25 to go.

BILLS 20 vs. DOLPHINS 14: With Buffalo on the verge of squandering a 17-point lead, Nate Clements stripped Miami running back Ronnie Brown of the ball, securing the victory.

The turnover, Miami's fifth of the game, came with 1:37 left and with the Dolphins threatening inside the Bills' 30.

The Bills (2-3) snapped a three-game losing streak and gave Kelly Holcomb a win in the veteran backup's first start of the season in place of J.P. Losman.

Holcomb completed 11 of his first 15 attempts and led scoring drives on Buffalo's first three possessions. He finished 20-of-26 for 169 yards and a touchdown.

The Dolphins (2-2), coming off a bye week, committed a franchise-record 18 penalties for 108 yards.

COLTS 28 at 49ERS 3: Edgerrin James rushed for 105 yards and a touchdown, and Indianapolis (5-0) intercepted four passes by No. 1 draft pick Alex Smith to defeat San Francisco (1-4).

Peyton Manning went 23-of-31 for 255 yards and one score, with two interceptions, for Indianapolis. The Colts scored two fourth-quarter touchdowns, on James' 4-yard run and Troy Walters' 18-yard reception, to take command. Cato June returned an interception 24 yards for a score in the second quarter, and Dominic Rhodes rushed for an early touchdown.

Smith went 9-of-23 for 74 yards and committed five turnovers. He was sacked five times.

SEAHAWKS 37 at RAMS 31: Joe Jurevicius, vaulted to the top of Seattle's depth chart because of injuries, had a career-best nine catches for 137 yards and a touchdown, and Shaun Alexander ran for a pair of scores in a victory over St. Louis (2-3).

The Seahawks ñ playing without receivers Darrell Jackson and Bobby Engram ñ moved into first place in the NFC West. Seattle (3-2) ended a four-game losing streak against the Rams that included a first-round playoff loss last season.

Steven Jackson had 79 yards rushing and a touchdown and 62 yards receiving for the Rams. Chris Johnson returned the opening kickoff 99 yards for a Rams touchdown, the team's first runback in five seasons.

LIONS 35 vs. RAVENS 17: Kevin Jones scored two first-quarter touchdowns, and Detroit (2-2) beat Baltimore (1-3), helped in part by the Ravens' 21 penalties ñ one short of the NFL record ñ and two ejections.

Dre' Bly had two interceptions and recovered a fumble for the Lions.

Baltimore lost defensive end/linebacker Terrell Suggs and safety B.J. Ward because of ejections late in the third quarter.

The Lions never trailed and turned the game into a rout by outscoring the Ravens 21-7 in the second half.

BROWNS 20 vs. BEARS 10: Trent Dilfer connected with wide receiver Antonio Bryant for two touchdowns in a 38-second span late in the fourth quarter as Cleveland (2-2) rallied to top sputtering Chicago (1-3).

With the Browns trailing 10-6, Dilfer threw to Bryant for a 33-yard touchdown with 3:02 left. After Bears rookie quarterback Kyle Orton's fumble was recovered by Chris Crocker, Dilfer found Bryant on the same route in the left corner, this time for a 28-yard touchdown pass that put the Browns ahead by 10 points with 2:24 remaining.

Orton went 16-for-26 for 117 yards. Chicago running back Thomas Jones rushed for 137 yards on 24 carries, but he left midway through the fourth quarter with an injured right knee.

Dilfer, who had two interceptions in the first half, finished 22-for-34 for 218 yards.

TITANS 34 at TEXANS 20: Steve McNair threw for 220 yards and two touchdowns and ran for a touchdown to lead Tennessee (2-3) over Houston (0-4).

McNair surpassed 25,000 career passing yards passing, and the win was the 100th for Titans coach Jeff Fisher.

Kris Brown kicked four field goals for Houston, which has no takeaways this season.

COLLEGES

TULANE SHUTS OUT USM: Junior midfielder Jackie Obert scored in the 35th minute and rookie goalkeeper Kathryn Alario posted a career-best seven saves as the Tulane women's soccer team shut out Conference USA foe Southern Miss 1-0 at the Aggie Soccer Stadium in College Station, Texas.

The win was the first for the Green Wave (1-6, 1-3) in 2005. Southern Miss fell to 3-5, 0-3. "Jackie Obert was our player of the game," Tulane coach Betsy Anderson said. "Whether it was playing defense on corners, in the middle third of the field or putting the ball in the back of the net, she won everything in the air today."

WILDCATS TOP TIGERS: The LSU volleyball team lost is second consecutive match, falling 30-22, 22-30, 30-27, 30-24, to Kentucky at Memorial Coliseum in Lexington, Ky. The Tigers (13-4, 3-3 SEC) have played 17 consecutive road matches. The Wildcats improved to 11-5, 4-2.

GOLF

WOODS WINS AMERICAN EXPRESS: Tiger Woods made up two shots over the final three holes Sunday to force a playoff, then won the American Express Championships on the second extra hole when John Daly three-putted for bogey from 15 feet on the 16th, badly pulling his three-foot par putt. Woods closed with a 2-under 68 on Sunday at Lake Merced in San Francisco, and won the American Express Championship for the fourth time in six starts. He extended his dominance in these World Golf Championships, winning his 10th in 19 events. It was his sixth victory of the year. Daly shot 69 and had two chances to win. He missed a 16-foot birdie putt on the 18th hole in regulation, then had a birdie putt from 15 feet on the second extra hole that just grazed the left side of the cup.

BICKERTON WINS BY FIVE STROKES: John Bickerton won the Abama Open de Canarias, shooting a 3-under 68 to beat Stuart Little and Michael Kirk by five strokes in Tenerife, Canary Islands. Bickerton finished with a 10-under 274 total at the 6,857-yard Abama Golf Club course. "It feels fantastic, awesome," Bickerton said. "It's been a long time coming and I've been very worried about my place on Tour." Bickerton has finished second five times on the European Tour since 1993 and had been in danger of losing his European Tour card. Little, who finished in second for the first time in his career, shot a 72, while Kirk finished the final round with a 69.

TENNIS

DAVENPORT WINS NO. 50: Lindsay Davenport earned up her 50th career title Sunday with a 6-2, 6-4 victory against Amelie Mauresmo in Filderstadt, Germany. The American became the 10th player to reach that milestone, relying on her big serve for her 10th straight win against Mauresmo.

"I was really, really excited to get 50 titles and get it so quickly," the 29-year-old Davenport said after winning her fifth title of the year at the $650,000 tournament.

KRAJICECK WINS FIRST TITLE: Dutch teenager Michaella Krajicek won her first career WTA title, beating Uzbekistan's Akgul Amanmuradova 6-0, 4-6, 6-3 in the final of the Tashkent Open in Uzbekistan.

"I'm really happy to win my first WTA title," said Krajicek, sister of the 1996 Wimbledon champion Richard Krajicek. "It was a tough week - of five matches here I've won three in three sets,"

LJUBICIC WINS CHAMPIONSHIP: Third-seeded Ivan Ljubicic of Croatia beat sixth-seeded Gael Monfils of France 7-6 (7), 6-0 to win the Open de Moselle in Metz, France. Ljubicic won his first final of the year after losing his previous four - three to Roger Federer at Doha, Rotterdam and Dubai, and one to Joachim Johansson at Marseille.

Moodie wins Japan Open

South Africa's Wesley Moodie recovered from an unsteady start to claim the Japan Open title with a 1-6, 7-6 (7), 6-4 win over fifth-seeded Mario Ancic of Croatia in Tokyo.

HOCKEY

GRETZKY WINS HOME DEBUT: A couple of losses didn't ruin Wayne Gretzky's sense of humor. "To get my first ... it's nice," Gretzky said of his initial NHL coaching victory. "Scotty Bowman's record (1,244 wins) is pretty safe." The Phoenix Coyotes rallied for a 2-1 victory over the Minnesota Wild on Saturday night. Gretzky, the NHL's career leading scorer, waited three games as a coach to celebrate a victory, something that seemed to come naturally during a 20-year playing career that included four Stanley Cups championships with Edmonton.

PAYCHECKS DOCKED FOR ESCROW: The first paycheck NHL players receive this season will be cut by 12 percent so that money can be placed into escrow. Players haven't been paid in 16 months, dating to the end of the regular season before the lockout. As stated in the new collective bargaining agreement, player salaries can't take up more than 54 percent of league revenues. An escrow fund was put in place to ensure that owners would get their share of the pot should salaries exceed the allowed percentage. All 13 checks that players get this season will be docked for escrow but the percentage will change. The NHL and the players' association will recalculate the percentage three more times this season, the next being in late November. The 12 percent, which accounts for 713 players, is based on a $1.8 billion revenue estimate for the season, which is probably low. Revenues were $2.1 billion during the 2003-04 season, and that figure was based on a smaller definition of revenue than the hockey-related revenue definition of the new agreement.

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL

EX-BLUE JAYS ANNOUNCER DIES: Tom Cheek, who called every game in the history of the Toronto Blue Jays until last year, died of brain cancer Sunday. He was 66. Cheek, who died at his home in Oldsmar, Fla., was best known for his streak, which ended at 27 1/2 seasons on June 3, 2004, because of his father's death. He called 4,306 consecutive regular-season games, plus 41 more in the postseason, since the Blue Jays began playing in 1977.

A'S GM TO INTERVIEW COACHES: Oakland general manager Billy Beane will interview two members of the Athletics' coaching staff this week for the team's managerial vacancy. Bullpen coach Bob Geren, considered a front-runner to replace Ken Macha, will meet with Beane on Tuesday in Phoenix. Third-base coach Ron Washington will follow Wednesday, also in Phoenix, where the A's have their minor league complex and hold spring training. The team hasn't said who else might be candidates to replace Macha, who failed to come to terms on a new contract with the A's after proposals were exchanged last week. He left Oakland after seven years with the club, the last three as manager. Macha was scheduled to interview with the Pittsburgh Pirates on Sunday as they look for Lloyd McClendon's replacement. Macha lives in the Pittsburgh area and would be a convenient hire, though the Pirates plan to speak to former Dodgers manager Jim Tracy today and he appears to be the leader.

BOXING

CORRALES READY FOR ROUND 3: Diego Corrales had barely picked himself off the canvas and plans were already under way for a third fight with Jose Luis Castillo. In the ring Saturday night, Corrales' promoter asked his fighter if he wanted the fight right away or if he wanted to wait a few fights instead. "Immediately," Corrales replied. Corrales could have been excused if he wasn't thinking of fighting Castillo again so soon. He had just been stopped in the fourth round by a vicious left hook that quickly finished off what had been expected to be a battle of attrition. The punch made short work of a highly anticipated rematch of the classic first fight between the two boxers, a battle won by Corrales when he got off the canvas twice in the dramatic 10th round to stop Castillo. There would be no dramatics for Corrales this time. Castillo never gave him a chance to continue fighting with a punch so devastating that Corrales crumpled to the canvas before getting up still in a daze as he was counted out by referee Joe Cortez. As he landed the big left hook, Castillo immediately raised his arms in triumph. "I knew he wasn't getting up," Castillo said. "I told everybody I was going to knock him out by the seventh round."

TODAY: PARENTS AND CHILDREN

Cry me a hurricane

The stress of Katrina can be especially hard on children. It's up to parents to recognize signs of post-traumatic stress and serve as role models of emotional recovery.

By Barri Bronston
Staff writer

"Well, I'm back home again. . . but now I'm starting to think that I should move away for good! Why can't things go back to normal? I'm trying to be positive, but how can I when all these negative things are happening? Someone comment to help me see a positive point to all of this."

That recent entry on Live Journal, a popular blogging site for teens, illustrates the sense of hopelessness and frustration that children of all ages could soon be experiencing — if they haven't already — in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

It's what Dr. Doug Walker, a child psychologist with Mercy Family Center, refers to as the "third wave of trauma," what happens to kids as they begin returning home following weeks or months of displacement.

"The first wave was the hurricane itself, and the second wave was relocation process," Walker said from his office in Mandeville. "The third wave is the return to life here.

"This is when we really expect more of the post-traumatic stress reaction to occur. Many of these kids are expecting to walk in their schools and have their friends there, their friends in the neighborhood, and it's not going to necessarily be the way it was or what they expected."

Travelin' man

By car or by plane, moving in and out of New Orleans can be a trip

I'm somewhat consumed by the topic of travel because I've done so much of it lately, hopping from one bankrupt airline to the next in an effort to see my relocated family in Maryland as much as possible.

If you're from New Orleans, the likelihood of running into someone you know at even the most random of American airports has dramatically increased since the storm. So many of us seem to be on the move, coming home, leaving home, visiting family, looking for a lost dog, looking for a job . . . but where is everyone going?

While changing planes in Memphis recently, I eavesdropped on a guy who was boarding my New Orleans-bound plane. Since he talked so loudly on his cell phone, I considered it to be fair game for columnizing.

So many of us seem to be on the move, coming home, leaving home, visiting family, looking for a lost dog, looking for a job . . . but where is everyone going?

Anyway, I don't want to get too far into this particular point, but let's just say this guy was not your run-of-the-mill stud muffin; not a guy you're going to see on the cast of "The Bachelor," for instance.

In fact, he was round. And there's nothing all that wrong with being round; it's a personal choice and I'm not going to judge here. And he was also considerably older than me so we're talking borderline AARP zone here.

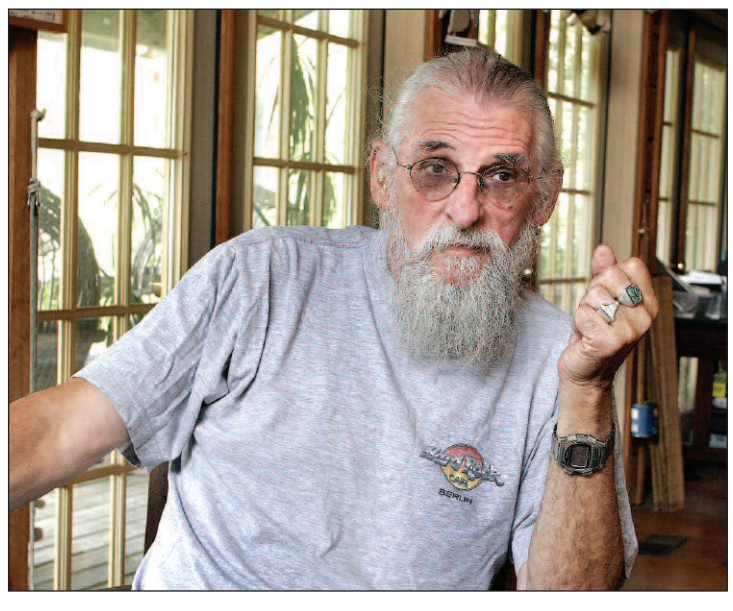
And what he was saying into the phone was that he could make $20 an hour in New Orleans hauling trees and debris and then: "All I have to do is pass the physical."

Mind you, the point of this is not to make fun of this guy. The point is: If you have two arms and two legs — or let's just say you've got three out of four — it appears that there's work for you in New Orleans if you want it.

As long as you can pass the physical.

I am so sick of airports. At Reagan National in Washington, I plugged my computer into the wall to power it up so I could write on the flight and it was still in my suitcase and I walked away for a second to chat with a friend.

By the time I returned — and we're talking four minutes here — a gate attendant had been notified by an edgy passenger about this and they were pondering the situation and I was no doubt about to be responsible for shutting down all domestic air travel for the day until I sheepishly claimed possession of this menacing tableau.



I do admit — now, looking back on it — that the power cord running into the suitcase might have looked a little suspicious. I think I'll power the thing up at home before I leave next time. Or maybe just sleep on the plane.

HOME: 30-foot yacht, the Calabash, docked in Pass Christian, Miss.

HAVEN: Oxford, Miss.

"I'VE owned this boat for 26 years. She was very much our home, since this is the only thing we owned outright in this world. She was our weekend home, our summer home, my permanent home in a sense.

"I lived 16 years in the Caribbean, 11 years in St. Lucia, where I met (my wife) Paula. She was a Peace Corps volunteer in Grenada.

"In 1986 we powered the boat up the Inland Waterway (from Miami) and across Lake Okeechobee. I saw parts of America few people have seen, going through the Everglades by water. We went up to Pass Christian, made inquiries at the bait shop, and were told to find an empty slip. I thought, I've found a very nice place.

"If I had used my intelligence (before Katrina), the only way I could have saved her was to have sunk her. This was her fourth hurricane. After Ivan, she was one of the few boats floating.

"This time, (when we returned after the hurricane) the marina was empty. We went to Trinity Episcopal, about a half mile away, and there were bits of boats everywhere. So I know my boat has not survived.

"I can think of her exactly as she was when I left her. I've lived in different parts of the world, never accumulated much. She was the nicest handling boat I've ever had. She forgave a lot of my sins."

Cry me a hurricane

'If you can't help yourself, how can you help your children?'

STRESS, from C-7

Post-traumatic stress can manifest itself weeks, months, even years after a traumatic event, be it war, terrorism or a natural disaster such as a hurricane. Survivors often have persistent, frightening thoughts, memories and sometimes flashbacks of the ordeal - often on anniversaries - causing anxiety, nightmares, irritability and depression.

For kids, the extent of the trauma will vary from child to child and age group to age group. Those who spent time in the Superdome, were rescued from their homes or saw dead bodies during their escape, for example, will be at greater risk than those who evacuated before the storm and watched its impact on TV. But experts warn that even those children are at risk of developing traumatic stress.

For teens, the red flags include declining performance in school, substance abuse, sleep problems and withdrawal from family and friends. School-age children may also experience sleep problems, demonstrate aggressive behavior and develop fears of a repeated disaster.

Preschoolers could regress to earlier behavior such as thumb-sucking, bedwetting and extreme clinginess, and they may be more afraid of being alone. Even toddlers and infants can suffer from post-traumatic stress.

"They become more irritable, more clingy or more standoffish," said Dr. Mark Sands, a child psychiatrist with Mercy Family Center's Metairie office. "They are difficult to soothe."

Parents must set an example

Sands says children take their cues from their parents, which means that despite their own sense of loss and grief, they must remain calm and refrain from voicing their fears in their children's presence. Similarly, they should make sure their children aren't around when they're on the phone venting about the storm.

"The important thing is for parents to cope," said Sands, who has temporarily relocated to Houston. "They need to put themselves at the top of the list in making sure they get the help they need."

The dynamic is analogous to the oxygen masks that must be worn when an airline cabin decompresses: First apply your own mask, then attend to your children.

"If you can't help yourself," Sands said, "how can you help your children?"

Sands says he has seen the impact of the hurricane on his own teen-age children. Although they got out of town before the storm struck, the relocation process — being away from friends, attending new schools and living with relatives — was stressful even before the second evacuation for Hurricane Rita. It's no wonder, he says, that his children just want to go home.

"They're adapting, but it is taking a lot more energy than I think anyone realized," Sands said. "They're worried about their communities, their friends, some of whom have nowhere to go back to. They're worried about things as basic as whether their favorite restaurants or coffee shops will still be open."

Such anxiety is to be expected among adolescents and could potentially impact other aspects of their lives, including school.

"They may not have the emotional energy to put into school," he said, "and as parents we have to say, 'It's OK. Do your best. There's a lot that you're having to cope with.' "

In the days immediately after the hurricane, Sands was part of a team of mental-health professionals who provided counseling services to children at the Astrodome. He said those children may find their stress intensifying over time rather than diminishing. Separation anxiety can be expected along with extreme mood swings and unusually rebellious behavior.

"We're coming into that period of time where we'll begin to see more depression," he said. "That's why it's important that parents set aside time where they can talk to their kids about what's on their mind. They really need to know that their parents are listening to them."

Guidance counselors can help

Schools also have a responsibility to be on top of their students' emotional health, experts say. Sands and Walker, along with Dr. Joy Osofsky, a professor and psychologist at Louisiana State University Health Sciences Center, are part of a team of mental-health professionals working with the state Department of Education and the state Department of Health and Hospitals to minimize the impact of the hurricane on children.

Their proposal calls for school-based social workers, counselors and psychologists to monitor children's mental health, administer screenings for depression and other illnesses and provide on-site therapy for children and their families.

As part of that therapy, children should be allowed to tell their stories if they want to, Osofsky said.

"They have to deal with grief and the loss of losing so much that was meaningful to them," Osofsky said. "There may continue to be disruptions in their neighborhoods. In the case of St. Bernard Parish, there isn't even a community to go back to. What we really need to do is anticipate that this will be hard for children and help them work through their traumatic experience."

There is an abundance of research to back up what Osofsky and other mental health experts believe will be a long-term recovery. A study of 550 school-age children who survived Hurricane Andrew, which devastated Homestead, Fla., in 1992, found that a third of children had moderate to severe levels of post-traumatic stress disorder a year after the hurricane.

Another study assessed 442 children three months after Andrew and found that 27 percent had moderate levels of post-traumatic stress disorder and 29 percent had severe symptoms. Based on that study, state officials estimate that more than half of the 200,000 children and teens displaced by Hurricane Katrina will have moderate to very severe post traumatic stress symptoms, from clinginess and tantrums among young children to defiant and delinquent behavior among older children.

No child is immune

Even children whose homes and families are intact can experience emotional problems, Walker said.

"Guilt is a big one that I've heard from the people I've spoken with," he said. "They realize that their house is OK, but Johnny's wasn't. Or they realize that their dad has a job, but Susie's dad doesn't and now they have to leave."

Walker said parents play a crucial role in the healing process, which means everything from giving your children extra hugs to encouraging them to draw pictures or write about their feelings if they don't want to talk about them.

It also means setting clear limits for "acting out" or reckless behavior, Sands said. "They need to be reassured that they're safe, but they also need structure and expectations and limits."

As parents work to get their kids back on track, they should continue to monitor their exposure to the television news, which through replays can give children the impression that the hurricane is happening — or has happened — again, said social worker Barbara LeBlanc, director of The Parenting Center at Children's Hospital.

Parents should also use good judgment in gauging how much to share with children about the family home.

"At some point," LeBlanc said, "they need to know what they lost."

HELPING KIDS COPE

Common post-traumatic behaviors and what parents can do

FOR PARENTS OF PRESCHOOLERS

Helplessness and passivity: Provide comfort, rest, food, water and opportunities for play and drawing. Reassure your child that you and other grown-ups will protect them. Give more hugs, hand holding or time in your lap.

General fearfulness: Be calm and try not to voice your own fears in front of your child. Reiterate that you aren't leaving him and that you can protect him. If you do have to leave, reassure him that you will be back.

Confusion about the danger being over: Shield your child from the news, which can make it seem like the hurricane is happening all over again. Continue to explain that the storm has passed.

Reluctance to talk: Put common feelings of children — such as anger, sadness and worry — into words. ("Children can feel really sad when their home is damaged.") Do not force conversation, but let them know they can talk to you at any time.

Sleep problems: Spend extra quiet time together at bedtime. Tell a favorite story with a comforting theme. Let your child sleep with a dim light on, or sleep with you for a limited time.

Regressive behavior, such as thumb sucking or bedwetting: Remain neutral or matter-of-fact as these may continue a while after the disaster.

Confusion about death: Give age-appropriate consistent explanation that does not give false hopes about the reality of death. Don't minimize their feelings over a loss of a pet or special toy. Help them say goodbye by drawing a happy memory, lighting a candle or saying a prayer.

FOR PARENTS OF SCHOOL-AGE CHILDREN

Confusion about what happened: Give clear explanations whenever your child asks. Avoid scary details and correct any false information.

Feelings of being responsible: Provide opportunities for children to voice their concerns to you. Offer reassurance and tell them why it was not their fault.

Fears of recurrence of the event and reactions to reminders: Shield children from media coverage that can trigger fears of the disaster happening again. Reassure your child, as often as necessary, that he is safe.

Retelling the event or playing out the event over and over: Allow your child to talk and act out these reactions. Let her know that this is normal. Encourage positive problem-solving in play or drawing.

Sleep problems: Let your child tell you about a bad dream he may have had. Explain that bad dreams are normal and that they will go away. Do not ask your child to go into too many details of the bad dream.

Concerns about the safety of themselves and others: Create a "worry box" for children to deposit their written worries and concerns. Set a time to look them over and come up with answers to the worries.

Altered behavior such as aggressiveness or restless behavior: Encourage your child to engage in recreational activities and exercise as an outlet for feelings and frustration.

Somatic complaints such as headaches and stomach aches: Find out if there is a medical reason, and if not, provide comfort and assurance that this is normal. But don't give these non-medical complaints too much attention, as this may increase them.

Concern for other victims and families: Encourage constructive activities on behalf of others but do not burden with undo responsibility.

FOR PARENTS OF ADOLESCENTS

Detachment, shame and guilt: Provide a safe time to discuss with your teen the events and their feelings. Emphasize that these feelings are common, and correct excessive self-blame with realistic explanations of what actually could have been done.

Self-consciousness: Help teens understand that their feelings of vulnerability and fear of being labeled abnormal are common. Encourage relationships with family and peers for needed support.

Acting out behavior, such as use of alcohol and drugs, experimentation with sex or accident-prone behavior: Make sure teens know that acting out behavior is a dangerous way to express strong feelings such as anger over what happened. Limit access to alcohol and drugs and talk about the danger of high-risk sexual activity.

Fears of recurrence and reactions to reminders: Clarify the difference between the event and the reminders that occur after it. Explain to teens that media coverage of the disaster can trigger fears of it happening again.

Abrupt shifts from interpersonal relationships: Explain that the strain on relationships is normal. Emphasize the need for support from family and friends during the recovery period. Encourage tolerance for different family members' courses to recovery.

Radical changes in attitude: Explain that changes in people's attitudes after a disaster are common, but will return to normal over time.

Wanting premature entrance into adulthood, such as quitting school or getting married: Encourage postponing major life decisions. Explore other ways to make your teen feel more in control.

Concern for other victims and families: Encourage constructive activities on behalf of others, but do not burden with undo responsibility. Help teens to identify projects that are age-appropriate and meaningful such as clearing rubble from school grounds.

Don't ever evacuate with me

ROSE, from C-7

My first Katrina-induced travel was, of course, the evacuation. I marvel to this day how my magnificently chaotic family of five managed to straighten up our house, pack our bags, secure our home and belongings and be on the road on three hours notice — and have the clothes that we threw together in such a hurry sustain us for more than two weeks.

I suppose a Category 5 hurricane rearing up your backside is a compelling incentive for effective time management.

In our mundane Pre-K life, it would usually take us four or five agonizing days to (over)pack for a simple long weekend at the beach and on the first night, someone (me) was always bound to complain that they (I) forgot some key element of wardrobe so essential to my relaxation that the vacation was now ruined in its absence.

You think leisure traveling with me is a pain? If you really want some jollies, you should try hurricane evacuating with me to some crack hotel in Vicksburg - the kind of place where the tub in bathroom has a series of yellow-brown cigarette burns along the edge. Those are family memories for a lifetime; like telling your kids they can't take off their shoes even when they're inside.

"No, James! Put down that dirty needle!"

(If you only knew how little I was exaggerating here.)

And who smokes in the tub anyway? I guess people who stay in crack hotels, I don't know.

But now my children are safe and sound in the very leafy and upscale Chevy Chase, Md. When I was visiting last weekend, there was an aluminum foil display in the newly converted playroom in my parents' house and I asked my wife what it was and she informed me that it was my daughter's science project for her Brownie troop.

"What are they doing?" I asked.

"They're growing mold," my wife said.

Growing mold. If my New Orleans daughter doesn't get the blue ribbon for that project — the state prize, in fact — then there is no justice in this world.

RETURN TO NEW ORLEANS

The Times-Picayune returned to its plant on Howard Avenue in New Orleans Monday, almost six weeks after the floodwaters of Hurricane Katrina forced the company to evacuate the building on Aug. 30, the day after the storm.

Today's edition of the paper was printed on the hometown presses, following four weeks of printing at its sister paper, the Mobile Press-Register, and two weeks immediately after Katrina at the New York Times-owned Courier in Houma.

"We're thrilled to be back where we belong," said Publisher Ashton Phelps Jr. "We thank our readers and advertisers for their patience in the aftermath of the hurricane. We want our return to send a strong message that we believe in the rebuilding and the resurgence of the New Orleans metropolitan area and that we're part of that effort."

Some 240 employees of the newspaper left the building in the back of newspaper delivery trucks on the morning after the hurricane, as water from the 17th Street Canal breach rose around the plant. The paper left a team of editors, reporters and photographers in the city while other employees drove to Baton Rouge and established a temporary base there.

This week they returned to a fully functioning and thoroughly cleaned Howard Avenue facility.

Emphasizing that no safe place exists in Jefferson Parish during a storm stronger than Category 3, parish officials on Monday defended their reasoning and detailed their timeline for evacuating some 1,100 essential employees, including more than 200 critical pump station workers, as Hurricane Katrina bore down on southeast Louisiana.

"It's not safe putting them in this parish; we don't have anything that can withstand a (Category) 4 or 5."
Jefferson Parish President AARON BROUSSARD, on where to put pump operators

Aware of residents' growing anger over street flooding that occurred while pump stations parishwide sat vacant for 24 to 36 hours on Aug. 28-29, top directors for Parish President Aaron Broussard said they aimed to protect employees' lives over property when they shipped workers, along with 700 parish vehicles, more than 100 miles north to Mount Hermon, La., near the Mississippi border.

The blue ribbon committee charged with crafting a strategy to resurrect New Orleans got a brutal reality check Monday when its members learned that six weeks into the recovery from Hurricane Katrina, the city continues to face daunting obstacles, from bureaucratic inertia in the Federal Emergency Management Agency to the absence of workers to provide basic services like garbage collection.

Meeting publicly for the first time, Mayor Ray Nagin's "Bring Back New Orleans Commission" listened soberly as administration officials painted a grim picture of a devastated city.

Illustrating how far the city has to go, the Nagin administration announced at the meeting that the city will begin enforcing a midnight curfew, including in the French Quarter, where the late-night partying that resumed weeks ago was marred Saturday night by the brutal beating of an elderly man. Law enforcement agents have been suspended without pay pending an investigation of the incident, which was captured on camera.

"The city is just not ready for that level of activity," Terry Ebbert, Nagin's homeland security director told the committee, which met in the Sheraton Hotel on Canal Street.

While Nagin has hailed signs of recent progress like the return of drinkable tap water to much of the city, his staff told the commission that New Orleans can provide the highest level of trauma care at only one location: a military hospital inside the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center. That hospital is scheduled to close at the end of Jeff Bloom couldn't believe it until he saw it with his own eyes.

After weeks of watching television footage about the massive floodwaters that had engulfed Lakeview, Bloom, a local sports agent, felt sure his one-story brick ranch house in the nearby East Lakeshore subdivision was destroyed.

A neighbor had told him otherwise, but the news reports were too powerful. He had to see it.

As Bloom drove through Lakeview toward his home in the 800 block of Amethyst Street last week, his hopes sank with every passing house. Doorways had water marks halfway up. Yellowish-brown film covered cars. Every tree, every lawn, was dead.

He turned onto his street.

"This is a miracle," he said. "It's like we are on an island out here."

Bloom's lawn was green, his house untouched by floodwaters. Neighbors were raking leaves and putting out refrigerators. The sky was azure blue. Birds chirped.

Demand for Medicaid expected to increase

Without federal aid, cuts may be needed

By Jan Moller
Capital Bureau

BATON ROUGE — An additional 60,000 people could become eligible for Louisiana's Medicaid program in the next six months as residents deal with the devastation caused by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, further straining the state's health-care budget, Health and Hospitals Secretary Fred Cerise said Monday.

Testifying before a special House-Senate committee looking into the storms' impact on state government, Cerise said the Medicaid program could face a shortfall of more than $800 million in the current budget. Unless the federal government provides some relief, the state could be forced to cut the program by up to 40 percent to keep it in balance, Cerise said.

The $5.3 billion Medicaid program finances health care for nearly 1 million indigent and disabled people in Louisiana, with the cost shared between the state and federal government. Because the program is open to anyone who qualifies by income or disability, enrollment is expected to jump sharply as hundreds of thousands of people have lost their jobs due to the storm.

In addition to paying for evacuees in Louisiana, the state also is expected to pay other states for the costs they incur for providing health care to evacuees.

A bill proposed by U.S. Sens. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, and Max Baucus, D-Mont., calls for the federal government to pay 100 percent of the Medicaid costs for hurricane evacuees. But that legislation is bottled up on Capitol Hill. "That bill is not moving, and every day we wait the problem gets worse," Cerise said.

Cerise said the health department is working with the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services to get a waiver that would give the state flexibility and set up a special pool of money to pay hospitals for some of the care they deliver to the uninsured after Katrina.

Because the Medicaid program is open to anyone who qualifies by income or disability, enrollment is expected to jump sharply as hundreds of thousands of people have lost their jobs.

Cerise's comments came on the six-week anniversary of Katrina, as state lawmakers grew increasingly impatient with the pace of the recovery effort and what they believe is misinformation being provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Sen. Ben Nevers, D-Bogalusa, said he has attended three FEMA briefings where local government officials have been told that federal financial assistance would be quickly forthcoming. "I'm here to tell you that's just not happening," Nevers said.

Andy Kopplin, Gov. Kathleen Blanco's chief of staff and top adviser on storm recovery, acknowledged that communication has been a major problem, especially at the federal level. "The notion of truth in advertising is in short supply," Kopplin said.

Rep. Kenneth Odinet, D-Arabi, said he's been trying for weeks to make contact with his insurance company. "This is week six. I've got water coming through the roof of one of my houses. They won't even come out to look," Odinet said. "Next week, week seven, I'm going to file suit."

State agency seeks power to halve workers' hours

Goal is to avoid layoffs in expected budget pinch

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Citing "unprecedented situations as a result of Hurricane Katrina," state Civil Service officials said Monday that they are proposing that state agencies have the power to reduce employees' work hours from 80 hours to 40 hours over a two-week pay period.

"This is a layoff-avoidance measure," Anne Soileau, acting director of state Civil Service, told the Senate Committee on Senate and Governmental Affairs. "This will keep people on the payroll and get work done."

Soileau said the authority now exists to cut employees work hours by 16 hours in a two-week period, but because of pending financial problems created for state departments by Katrina and Hurricane Rita, the commission is proposing a 40-hour reduction.

The panel did not act on the proposal.

Soileau said the emergency measure will be voted on by the State Civil Service Commission when it meets Nov. 2.

There are about 28,000 state workers in the 11-parish area affected by Katrina and an additional 18,000 state workers in Rita's disaster zone, according to Anne Soileau, acting director of state Civil Service.

The state is facing at least a $1 billion shortfall in revenue as a result of Katrina's hit on the New Orleans area and more as a result of Rita's damage in southwestern Louisiana.

Soileau said there are about 28,000 state workers in the 11-parish area affected by Katrina and an additional 18,000 state workers in Rita's disaster zone. She told the panel she did not know what it would cost to avoid the reduction in hours or possible layoffs.

Soileau said the proposal would be good for one year but the commission could extend it. Soileau said the only state employees who would be exempt are public elementary and secondary school teachers.

She said 629 state workers have been furloughed because their whereabouts are unknown. In addition, she said 200 have been furloughed at New Orleans City Park with 12 called back to work.

A furlough "buys an agency time" and allows the employee to be called back to work, she said. An employee that is laid off must find other work.

"This is one tool the agencies can use to avoid layoffs and keep people on the payroll" at half salary, Soileau said.

Sen. Jay Dardenne, R-Baton Rouge, said the option is not good but it still makes the employee with reduced hours and pay eligible for retirement and health care benefits.

Soileau said each agency would decide how to implement the proposal.

"It is ugly, but it is absolutely necessary," said Sen. Reggie Dupre, D-Montegut, alluding to budget cuts the state is expected to make in coming months.

Many moving out of shelters in La.

But plenty still have nowhere to go

By Laura Maggi
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — New Orleans evacuees who were forced out of their homes when Hurricane Katrina struck six weeks ago have been leaving state shelters in droves, with many people returning to the metropolitan area, state officials said Monday.

There are currently 18,000 people in shelters in Louisiana, down from 27,000 early last week, according to statistics provided by the state. While that is still a large number of people who need help finding temporary housing, it is significantly less than the almost 60,000 people in state shelters at the beginning of September.

"People are returning home to start rebuilding."
LISA WOODRUFF-WHITE
deputy secretary of the state Department of Social Services

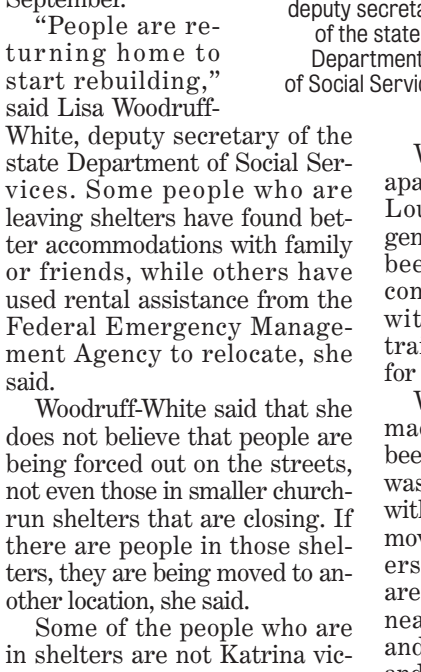
"People are returning home to start rebuilding," said Lisa Woodruff-White, deputy secretary of the state Department of Social Services. Some people who are leaving shelters have found better accommodations with family or friends, while others have used rental assistance from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to relocate, she said.

Woodruff-White said that she does not believe that people are being forced out on the streets, not even those in smaller church-run shelters that are closing. If there are people in those shelters, they are being moved to another location, she said.

Some of the people who are in shelters are not Katrina victims, but were displaced because of Hurricane Rita, which forced many people in southwest Louisiana out of their homes.

At Progressive Baptist Church in Lafayette, there are still 125 people living in a shelter from both hurricanes, said Yolanda Benoit, who is helping spearhead the church's recovery relief efforts. At one point there were as many as 200 people at the shelter, but some have found apartments in the Lafayette area, while more have returned to the dry parts of the New Orleans region, officials said.

"(There are people who) had to go home because of jobs," said Benoit, who added that the church intends to keep the facility open until people find other accommodations.



President Bush had set a goal for all people living in shelters from Hurricane Katrina to be moved to more private housing by Saturday. But it does not appear that the deadline will be met, "unless something drastic happens," Woodruff-White said. Along with the people in shelters inside Louisiana, 12,000 more people are living in shelters outside of the state.

With the lack of available apartments and hotel rooms in Louisiana, the Federal Emergency Management Agency has been moving to put up trailer communities around the state with mobile homes or travel trailers that can house people for 18 months.

While progress is being made, setting up the sites has been slow going. One large park was opened last week in Baker, with roughly 390 families so far moving into the 573 travel trailers, officials said. Other sites are in the works, including one near the Baton Rouge airport and in St. Tammany, Jefferson and Plaquemines Parishes.

Many homeowners whose homes were destroyed will be able to get a trailer to place on their property while they rebuild.

Terrebonne sees chance to get levees

Rally pushes need for Morganza project

By Manuel Roig-Franzia
The Washington Post

HOUMA — Louisiana's boot has a hole. This footwear-shaped state's southeastern coast is ringed by hurricane levees, except here in Terrebonne Parish, where Houma, the largest city in the region outside metropolitan New Orleans, is an important center of Cajun culture.

For decades, that hole in Louisiana's hurricane defenses — defenses already proven fallible during Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita — has irked leaders of this parish of boom-and-bust oil cycles that also happens to produce one of every five pounds of seafood in the state. But the big storms that bedeviled New Orleans are suddenly seen as an opportunity — a big opportunity — for Terrebonne.

During the scramble for post-hurricane money, no place in Louisiana is making a more impassioned plea for help than Terrebonne, which is trying to get its own levee constructed. While others in Louisiana are relying on big-name politicians — and are now smarting at the caustic reaction in Washington to the $250 billion aid package proposed by the state's congressional delegation — Terrebonne is pulsing with a popular uprising, complete with a showman's flourishes.

The showman is a wavy-haired Cajun named Martin Folse, a onetime media prodigy who bought his television station, KJUN, 21 years ago when he was 24, who writes country music songs and whose imagination once conjured a B-horror flick: "Nutriaman: Terror in the Swamp." To separate his parish from the much-maligned requests for alligator farm money and sugar cane research that were lumped in with pleas for levee repair and construction, Folse got creative, and moved fast.

There was the rally that drew 3,800 angry, chanting demonstrators from flooded bayou towns to the convention center in this town, a one-hour drive southwest of New Orleans. There were the quickie lyrics and the even quicker recording of an anthem: "There's a movement on the bayou tonight/Down in Point aux Chenes and Island Road to the right/It's time for action/On the bayou tonight." Next comes the bus convoy to Capitol Hill and, perhaps, a jambalaya cookout and rally at the entrance to President Bush's Crawford, Texas, ranch.

"If we don't seize the opportunity now, we may never ever get the chance again," Folse said. "It's time for the feds to quit treating us like a bunch of uneducated stepchildren."

Folse's obsession — everyone's obsession here, it seems — is the Morganza to the Gulf of Mexico project, a levee that would loop over 72 miles of lower Terrebonne Parish. The levee is supposed to avert a catastrophe that has yet to happen. Katrina swung east of Houma and Rita swung west of it. Rita still devastated the little Terrebonne Parish bayou towns south of Houma — places such as Chauvin, Bayou Dularge and Dulac — but the glancing blow spared Houma, where local emergency officials estimate a direct hit could kill thousands.

The Morganza levee has been a dream for decades. Terrebonne Parish has no hurricane levee, even though Houma, a city of 32,000, anchors a parish of about 100,000 people. Other parishes got levees over the years — Orleans, Plaquemines and St. Bernard among them — but Terrebonne has remained naked. Terrebonne has been begging for the levee and has participated in countless studies with federal officials to justify it. Residents have grown more and more angry because they have never been able to seal the deal.

At Folse's rally, Cajun shrimp boat captains and housewives sat for hours on camping chairs in dusky humidity outside Houma's civic center, listening to one another scream. They waved signs Folse had printed that read "TFA," short for Time for Action, an activist group he invented on the fly while anchoring the newscast on KJUN the day after Rita. Folse turned into a crusader — and threw off any pretense of journalistic objectivity — when one of his producers showed him footage of a man wading through waist-high water. It was the same man Folse's station had filmed doing the same thing during a tropical storm two years earlier.

"We need your help — not Band-Aids — we need levees," Ernest Naquin, the 76-year-old commander of a Veterans of Foreign Wars post in the fishing town of Montegut, bellowed into a microphone held by Folse during the rally.

The Ernest Naquins of the world have already begun paying for their levee, even though there's no guarantee they'll get it. Terrebonne Parish started collecting a quarter-cent sales tax to pay for its share of the levee 2 1/2 years ago. It has banked about $12 million, Levee Board President Tony Alford said proudly. But there's one little problem: Their levee will cost about $1.7 billion. They're only $1.688 billion short.

"We're to a point where it's life-or-death," Alford said. "But it seems to fall on deaf ears."

What's unique about the Morganza to the Gulf project is that almost everyone seems to say it's needed. The project is essentially a hit, aside from a few objections from environmentalists—many of which have been addressed by revolutionary "leaky levee" design features that use dozens of gates to let water and marsh creatures flow in and out. Even the Coalition to Restore Coastal Louisiana, a frequent critic of levee proposals, is enthusiastically on board, calling it a possible "harbinger of the future."

"Morganza is a test," said Mark Davis, the coalition's executive director. "We have a chance to do this in a way that has never been done before."

WASHINGTON POST PHOTOS BY MICHEL DuCILLE

Residents recently rallied in support of the Morganza to the Gulf of Mexico project, a levee that would loop over 72 miles of lower Terrebonne.

A sign in Houma expresses the frustration of Terrebonne Parish residents who say the federal government has not been giving them the help they need to build hurricane protection levees.

Lobbyists dominate Katrina reconstruction planning

Utilities, canal project get boost in relief bill

By Alan C. Miller and Ken Silverstein
Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON — Lobbyists representing transportation, energy and other special interests dominated panels that advised Louisiana's U.S. senators crafting legislation to rebuild the storm-damaged Gulf Coast, records and interviews show.

The Louisiana Katrina Reconstruction Act — introduced last month by Sens. Mary Landrieu, a Democrat, and David Vitter, a Republican — included billions of dollars in business for clients of those lobbyists and a total price tag estimated as high as $250 billion.

One advisory panel member who discovered that most of his fellow panelists were lobbyists called the resulting legislation 'a huge injusticeî to the state.

"I was basically shocked,'' said Ivor van Heerden, director of a hurricane public health research center at Louisiana State University. "What do lobbyists know about a plan for the reconstruction and restoration of Louisiana?"

Van Heerden is the first participant in any of the senators' working groups to provide such a detailed and scathing account of the process and its outcome. He said he was shut out after he voiced his concerns.

The result, he said, was a lost opportunity "to come up with something innovative, something the people of Louisiana and the nation could really endorse."

Among the lobby-supported interests with a stake in the relief and recovery bill:

▶ Energy utilities, Entergy Corp. and Cleco Corp. lobbyists consulted with the senators' staffs. Five days before the bill was introduced, Cleco retained the lobbying services of Lynnel Ruckert, Vitter's former deputy campaign manager and the wife of his chief of staff.

In an unusual assist to private utilities, the recovery bill includes $2.5 billion to help Louisiana companies such as Entergy of New Orleans and Cleco of Pineville restore and rebuild their electricity systems and recover losses from sustained power outages.

▶ Supporters of a controversial industrial canal project serving the Port of New Orleans. Among those serving on advisory panels were two officials of Jones Walker, a New Orleans firm that lobbies in Washington for the canal project. One of those officials was Paul Cambon, an ex-aide to former House Speaker Bob Livingston, R-La., whose Livingston Group also is a lobbyist for the canal.

The recovery bill asks Congress to give "priority consideration" to the Army Corps of Engineers' project that would build a lock along the canal at a cost of $748 million.

▶ Highway advocates. Among those on a transportation working group were lobbyists for highway projects seeking financing, including one from a company headed by former Sen. J. Bennett Johnston, D-La.

In the bill, four Louisiana highways considered evacuation and energy supply routes would receive construction, maintenance and repair work worth $7 billion. At least two of those projects were represented by lobbyists on the working group.

The bill already has been widely criticized as excessive and opportunistic. Its price tag exceeds the high end of estimated costs of the storm and does not include the $60 billion in emergency aid already approved.

Landrieu and Vitter defend the bill as a necessary response to the region's devastation. The bill's supporters say that Louisiana is crucial to America's energy industry and that the state's ports handle 20 percent of all U.S. imports and exports each day.

"Key economic sectors took a big hit from the storm,'' said Landrieu spokesman Adam Sharp. "Standing up the region's economy will help stand up the American economy."

Sharp also said the recovery bill's final cost would be closer to $200 billion, not the estimated high of $250 billion.

Aides said the lobbyists were among those who made recommendations, but they did not draft the legislation. Lawmakers also consulted with a range of local and state officials and community and business leaders in the Gulf Coast region, the aides said.

"The lobbyists and the entities they represent tend to be among the most experienced experts available who have direct real-world knowledge of the situation on the ground,'' Sharp said. "They are advocating for a position and for a client, but usually from a vantage point of expertise that can be very beneficial to us."

Vitter's office did not return numerous calls seeking comment.

Johnston, the former senator whose clients include hard-hit New Orleans and Jefferson Parish, said the participation of lobbyists in the working groups was appropriate.

"There is no conflict of interest,'' said Johnston, a former Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee chairman. "We represent areas that were impacted, and the needs of those areas need to be brought to the fore."

But the House's rejection Friday of a bill that would provide $750 million in federal loans to cities wracked by Hurricane Katrina suggested growing resistance to expensive reconstruction plans.

Keith Ashdown of Taxpayers for Common Sense, a Washington watchdog group, said lobbyists are trying to exploit the catastrophic hurricane.

"They are using Katrina to get funding they haven't been able to get in the past," he said. "You want to help the region, but the bill they put together has a lot of projects that aren't needed. This is congressional looting at its worst."

The working groups were set up by the senators' staffs to advise the lawmakers on a variety of topics, including housing, education and health care. After an initial meeting at a Senate office, the participants consulted via conference calls and provided recommendations.

Jan Schoonmaker, a lobbyist for New Orleans educational, health care and other interests, said most members were "part of the Louisiana family'' in Washington.

The flood-control working group on which Van Heerden served was made up largely of Washington lobbyists with strong Louisiana ties but was headed by John Barry, the author of an acclaimed history of the great Mississippi flood of 1927.

Van Heerden had overseen Louisiana's coastal restoration program as an official in the state's Department of Natural Resources and has done hurricane research at Louisiana State University since 1997. In Katrina's aftermath, the public health center he directs has been engaged in such efforts as determining how and why the flooding occurred and conducting damage assessments.

Van Heerden said he participated in the working group as an individual, not as a representative of the university.

He said he was particularly outspoken about his recommendations to limit the role of the Army Corps of Engineers. It was responsible for the levees that Van Heerden said failed to keep the floodwaters out of New Orleans.

"We hadn't restored the coast and all we had was second-rate levees," he said.

He suggested the creation of a politically independent agency along the lines of the Tennessee Valley Authority to spearhead the restoration and reconstruction, but he said the lobbyists opposed the idea.

Blessed - "ADJECTIVE: highly favored or fortunate; characterized by happiness and good fortune."

Prior to Hurricane Katrina, "blessed" was an often used word. Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.

Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. This is a very limited opportunity, and availability is restricted.

We have employment opportunities available in the Sales Department, including management availabilities.

Sales Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 7pm
Service Hours: Mon - Fri 7:30am - 6pm • Sat 7:30-4

We are committed to rebuilding Jefferson Parish and Southeast Louisiana. We need your support. Together, we will prevail and have a better place to live and work than before Hurricane Katrina.

Violence surges ahead of Iraqi referendum

Pre-vote onslaught kills U.S. soldier

By Thomas Wagner
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Insurgents launched a new salvo of attacks five days ahead of a crucial constitutional referendum, killing at least 18 Iraqis and a U.S. soldier Monday with suicide car bombs, roadside explosives and drive-by shootings, police said.

Five mortar shells were fired at a hotel in the southern city of Hillah where a U.S. regional embassy office is based, with one round hitting the building and leaving a large hole in a wall, police said. No casualties were reported.

Gunmen also opened fire on a convoy of cars carrying members of an Arab League delegation that is visiting Iraq, but no one was hurt, police said.

The attacks came as Shiite and Kurdish officials continued to negotiate with Sunni Arab leaders over last-minute additions to the constitution, trying to win Sunni support ahead of Saturday's referendum. U.S. officials were acting as mediators.

But the sides appeared to remain far apart over basic issues, including the federalism that Shiites and Kurds insist on, and copies of the draft constitution already are being distributed to the public across the country.

U.S. and Iraqi officials see the referendum as an important step in the country's democratic reforms and the eventual withdrawal of U.S.-led coalition forces.

But many minority Sunnis plan to vote "no," fearing the document would create two oil-rich and nearly autonomous regions — a Kurdish one in the north and a Shiite one in the south — and leave most Sunnis isolated in central and western Iraq.

That was clear in the northern city of Mosul on Monday when about 600 Sunni politicians, tribal leaders and clerics met and urged Iraqis to reject the constitution, saying it would partition the country along secular lines. "Our rejection of the constitution is motivated by our desire for a united Iraq, not because we are Sunnis," they said in a statement.

Sunni-led insurgent groups have demanded a boycott in the vote and were launching attacks across the country, killing hundreds of Iraqis in the past two weeks.

Sunnis can defeat the charter if they get a two-thirds "no" vote in any three of Iraq's 18 provinces, and they have the potential to make that threshold in four provinces. But turnout is key, because they must outweigh Shiite and Kurdish populations in some of those areas.

On Sunday, militants killed 13 Iraqis, including a Shiite teacher who was dragged out of his classroom and shot to death at a college in the town of Samarra, north of Baghdad.

In the past 15 days, at least 338 people have been killed across Iraq, including nine American soldiers who died in a series of offensives the U.S. military has been waging in western Iraq to try to knock al-Qaida militants and other insurgents off balance and prevent attacks during the referendum on the constitution.

In Monday's worst attack, a suicide car bomb exploded near a U.S.-Iraqi checkpoint leading into the highly fortified Green Zone, where Iraq's parliament and the U.S. Embassy are located. The blast killed a U.S. soldier, three Iraqi policemen and three civilians, U.S. and Iraqi officials said.

Teacher Riyadh Qassim heard the blast from his nearby elementary school.

"A car bomb exploded. We ran out of school and saw two cars engulfed in flames, one of them a police car. Some of the policemen were in a panic," he said in an interview with Associated Press Television News.

The American death brought to 1,954 the number of U.S. service members who have died since the beginning of the war in 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

At least two other suicide attackers detonated car bombs within an hour of the lethal attack, wounding four Iraqi police officers, police said. At about the same time, a suicide car bomb went off in Khaldiyah, about 75 miles west of Baghdad, but there were no immediate reports of casualties.

Four policemen were also killed in shootings in Baghdad.

In Kirkuk, a city 180 miles north of the capital, four Iraqi soldiers were killed in two separate roadside bomb attacks, police said. Farther to the north, two Sunni Arab political leaders, an Iraqi soldier and an Iraqi police officer died in separate drive-by shootings in Mosul, officials said.

In the attack on the 10-member Arab League delegation, gunmen in four vehicles pulled alongside the diplomats' cars on a highway in Baghdad and started shooting, said police Maj. Mousa Abdul-Karem. The convoy was driving toward a western neighborhood of Baghdad for a meeting with the Muslim Scholars Association, an Arab Sunni Muslim group.

The delegation arrived last weekend to lay the groundwork for an Iraqi "reconciliation conference" it hopes to hold after the referendum. It was the first time the pan-Arab organization has tried to take a direct role in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

It was not immediately clear who launched the attack.

In cities, towns and villages across Iraq, 5 million copies of the official text of the constitution were being distributed to voters to consider before the polls.

But all sides were still debating last-minute changes in a bid to swing some Sunnis to a "yes" vote. Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani continued to meet Monday with Sunni Arab leaders to try to convince them about the changes, officials from all sides said.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "has a central role in the talks," said Kurdish legislator Mahmoud Othman, but he would not say whether the envoy was actually attending the meetings. U.S. officials could not be reached for comment but have confirmed in recent weeks that Khalilzad was involved in discussions about last-minute "tweaks" to the charter.

When Iraqi negotiators completed the draft constitution late last month, Sunni Arabs refused to endorse it. Some complained the negotiating process had been rushed under pressure from Washington to stick to the tight timetable that had been set for Iraq's political process.

Bomber in Afghanistan kills former militia commander

U.S. soldier killed, 3 hurt in firefights

By Noor Khan
Associated Press writer

KANDAHAR, AFGHANISTAN — A suspected Taliban militant detonated explosives strapped to himself, killing a former militia commander and two others Monday in a southern Afghan city, while a second suicide bomber was thwarted when he blew himself up as he fled police.

Firefights in the country's east, meanwhile, killed a U.S. soldier and wounded three others, while an American special forces helicopter was destroyed by fire as it made a hard landing during an offensive. All aboard escaped unhurt.

The violence came amid a reinvigorated insurgency by Taliban-led rebels that has killed more than 1,300 people in the past half year and highlighted the threat still facing Afghanistan as it slowly moves toward democracy.

The two suicide bombings brought the number of such assaults in the past two weeks to five, four of them in the former Taliban stronghold of Kandahar. Suicide attacks have been far less frequent here than in Iraq, although Afghan officials have warned of plots to mimic the tactics of militants in the Mideast.

The first suicide bomber Monday struck outside the Kandahar home of Agha Shah, a former militia commander who was allied with the U.S.-backed Northern Alliance, which swept the Taliban from power in late 2001, Kandahar Gov. Asadullah Khalid said.

The blast killed Shah, a supporter of President Hamid Karzai, as well as two civilian passers-by and wounded eight people, the governor said.

Khalid said the bomber's head had been recovered and he appeared to be an Arab and was believed to be a Taliban member.

The second bombing came two hours later. Police received an intelligence report that an attacker was approaching a U.S. military base in the city. Afghan officers rushed to the area, prompting the assailant to run away before he detonated the explosives strapped to his body, Khalid said.

No one besides the bomber was hurt in the blast about a half mile from the U.S. base.

The bombings came a day after another suicide attack in Kandahar injured four British government officials. The deadliest suicide attack in the past two weeks was outside an army training center in the capital, Kabul, and killed nine people.

Meanwhile, a remote-controlled bomb exploded in a small village in western Afghanistan, wounding 13 Afghans. The blast was believed to be an attempt to kill a winning candidate in last month's legislative elections, said local police chief Sufullah, who uses only one name.

The U.S. military released a statement about an attack Sunday on its troops conducting an offensive in eastern Paktika province that killed the U.S. soldier and wounded another.

The death brought to 201 the number of U.S. troops killed in and around Afghanistan since U.S.-led forces invaded in late 2001 to oust the Taliban for harboring al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

In a second firefight, in eastern Kunar province, militants attacked a patrol, wounding two U.S. troops Monday, a separate military statement said.

Also in Kunar, a U.S. special forces Chinook helicopter caught fire and was destroyed after an engine malfunctioned and it made a hard landing during an operation last Thursday, officials said. All onboard escaped unhurt.

The accident occurred in the same region where a similar MH-47 copter was shot down in June, killing all 16 special forces troops on board, military spokeswoman Lt. Col. Catherine Reardon said.

The latest crash was the fourth this year involving Chinooks, large troop-carrying helicopters that have proved essential in battling the insurgency in remote, largely inaccessible parts of Afghanistan.

Death toll rises for reservists in Iraq

Citizen soldiers' role in combat increases

By Robert Burns
AP military writer

WASHINGTON — The National Guard and Reserves are suffering a strikingly higher share of U.S. casualties in Iraq, their portion of total American military deaths nearly doubling since last year.

Reservists have accounted for one-quarter of all U.S. deaths since the Iraq war began, but the proportion has grown over time. It was 10 percent for the five weeks it took to topple Baghdad in the spring of 2003, and 20 percent for 2004 as a whole.

The trend accelerated this year. For the first nine months of 2005, reservists accounted for 36 percent of U.S. deaths, and for August and September it was 56 percent, according to Pentagon figures.

The Army National Guard, Army Reserve and Marine Corps Reserve accounted for more than half of all U.S. deaths in August and in September — the first time that has happened in consecutive months. The only other month in which it even approached 50 percent was June 2004.

Casualties in Iraq have shifted toward citizen soldiers as their combat role has grown to historic levels. National Guard officials say their soldiers have been sent into combat in Iraq in numbers not previously seen in modern times — far more than were sent to Vietnam, where active-duty troops did the vast majority of the fighting.

Charles Krohn, a former Army deputy chief of public affairs, said the reservists are taking up the slack for the highly stressed active-duty Army.

"Decisions made years earlier made going to war in any significant way impossible without Guard and Reserve participation. But I can't imagine anyone postulated the situation we face today: We don't seem very anxious to bring back the draft, and we can't get enough volunteers for a war that is not universally popular," Krohn said.

Forty-five percent of all Guard and Reserve deaths since the start of the war — 220 of the 487 total — occurred in the first nine months of 2005, according to Pentagon figures. The deadliest month was August, when 49 Guard and Reserve members died.

The mounting casualties among reservists in Iraq have been overshadowed by the attention focused on a rising overall U.S. death toll, now approaching 2,000. It complicates recruiting for the National Guard and Reserve, which often attract people who think of the military reservists' role as something other than front-line combat.

Gone are the days when the National Guard and Reserve served mainly as "rear-area" support, far from the front-line fighting.

In Iraq the front line is everywhere: on rural roads where Guard and Reserve soldiers drive supply trucks, at urban checkpoints, in remote villages and at major supply bases. Some units also have been attached to active-duty units with the specific mission of conducting offensive operations.

The casualties have contributed to what has been the most challenging time for the Guard and Reserve since the military became an all-volunteer force in 1973. In addition to fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan and helping keep the peace in the Balkans, the Guard in particular was called to action in large numbers for rescue and relief from hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

At one point this year more than half of the combat forces in Iraq were National Guard.

"That's a first," said Army Maj. Les Melnyk, historian for the Pentagon office that manages the Army and Air National Guard. "The Guard can't claim that (level of combat) for World War II or World War I: the other major wars we fought in. Never more than 50 percent of the combat forces were Guard."

At present, of the approximately 152,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, about half are reservists: 49,000 Army National Guard, 22,000 Army Reserve and 4,000 Marine Reserve, according to figures provided by those organizations.

The trend is almost certain to be reversed next year, when the active-duty Army is scheduled to make a proportionally larger contribution to the overall force. The number of National Guard brigades in Iraq, for example, is scheduled to drop next year from seven to two.

Since the Vietnam era, the military has given the Guard and Reserve more vital support functions such as military police and engineers, so that any major conflict would involve more than just the active-duty force. Thus it was inevitable that a sizable portion of the force in Iraq would be Guard and Reserve; what has made the Iraq experience so different is the large numbers of reservists getting killed and wounded.

At least 300 soldiers of the National Guard, 78 of the Army Reserve and 93 of the Marine Corps Reserve have died in the Iraq conflict. The Navy Reserve has lost 13, the Air Force Reserve three and the Air National Guard one. Together that is one-quarter of the total U.S death toll, which stood at 1,947 on Monday, by the Pentagon's count.

Lt. Gen. James Lovelace, the Army's deputy chief of staff for operations, said in an interview that the increased reliance on the Guard and Reserve in 2005 was deliberately planned to allow active-duty units such as the 3rd Infantry Division and the 101st Airborne Division to complete a reorganization before they returned to Iraq.

"It bought us the time we needed," Lovelace said.

Survivors emerge after days in rubble

But supplies slow to arrive after deadly quake

By Sadaqat Jan
Associated Press writer

MUZAFFARABAD, PAKISTAN — Shopkeepers clashed with looters Monday, and hungry families huddled under tents while waiting for relief supplies after Pakistan's worst earthquake razed entire villages and buried roads in rubble. Death toll estimates ranged from 20,000 to 30,000.

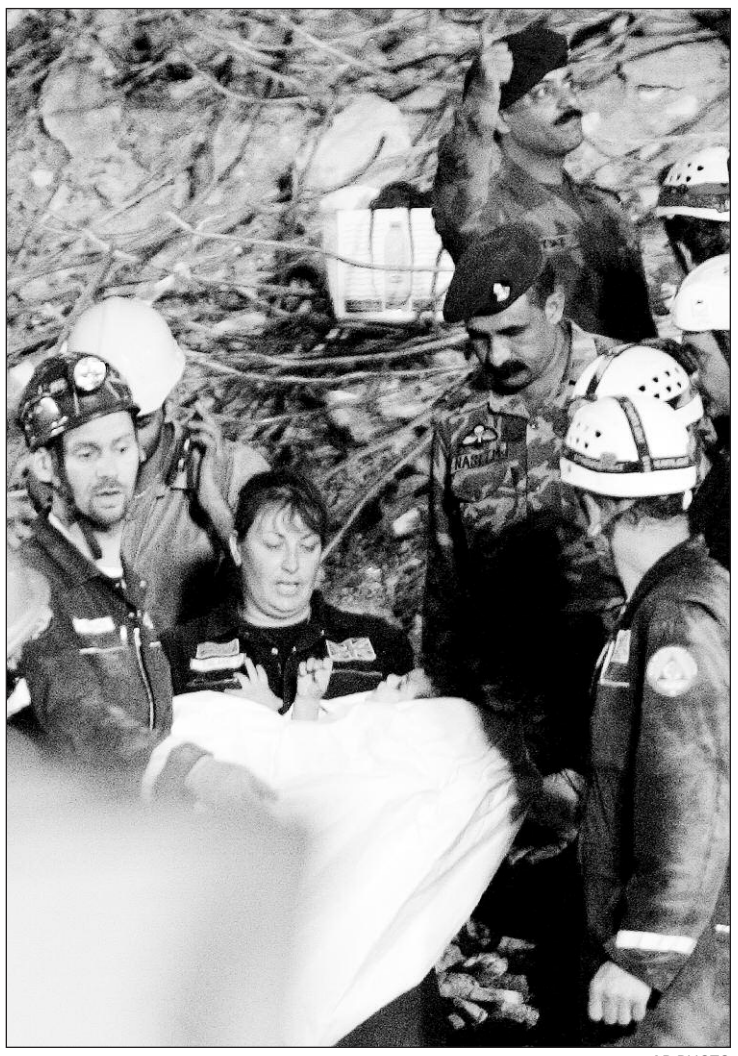
British rescuers unearthed a man trapped in rubble for 54 hours, residents using their bare hands and crowbars freed two girls buried in a school for more than two days, and a woman and child were pulled to safety from a wrecked apartment building after 62 hours.

Setting aside decades-old rivalries, Pakistan said it would accept earthquake aid from India, and a top rebel commander reportedly ordered the suspension of violence in earthquake-hit areas of Indian Kashmir. Authorities in New Delhi promised delivery "on a very urgent basis."

Eight U.S. military helicopters from Afghanistan arrived in Islamabad with provisions, and Washington pledged up to $50 million in relief and reconstruction aid, U.S. Ambassador Ryan Crocker said.

"The magnitude of this disaster is utterly overwhelming," Crocker said. "We have under way the beginning of a very major relief effort."

The United Nations said more than 2.5 million people were left homeless by Saturday's magnitude-7.6 quake, and doctors warned of an outbreak of disease unless more relief arrives soon. The hardest-hit area was the Himalayan region of Kashmir, which is divided between Pakistan and India.



With landslides blocking roads to many of the worst-hit areas, Pakistan's army airlifted food, water and medicine into the disaster zone. International relief efforts cranked into action, and an American plane full of relief supplies landed at an air base near Pakistan's capital Monday.

Most of the dead were in Pakistan's mountainous north. India reported at least 865 deaths, but Home Secretary V.K. Duggal said it was not expected to rise much higher. Afghanistan reported four deaths.

Rivalry on hold

With the situation dire, Pakistan set aside politics and said it would accept relief aid for earthquake victims from India — backing away from earlier refusals. The nuclear-armed neighbors have been bitter rivals since gaining independence from Britain in 1947, fighting three wars, but they have taken steps to improve relations since last year.

India will send tents, food and medicine and other aid, Foreign Secretary Shyam Saran said in the capital, New Delhi.

A rescuer, center, carries a 2-year-old boy from the wreckage of the Margala Towers on Monday in Islamabad, Pakistan. As the search for survivors and recovery of bodies progresses, officials put the death toll from Saturday's earthquake in South Asia at 20,000 to 30,000 people.

In another apparent gesture of good will, the chief commander of the largest Kashmiri rebel group, the Hezb-ul-Mujahedeen, reportedly ordered a suspension of violence in devastated areas of India-controlled Kashmir.

"We have directed our cadres to halt their operations in the affected areas," the private Kashmir News Service quoted Syed Salah-ud-Din as saying. The report could not be independently confirmed.

Hezb-ul-Mujahedeen is one of more than a dozen rebel groups fighting since 1989 for Kashmir's independence from India or its merger with Pakistan.

On Sunday night, suspected Islamic militants killed 10 people, including four Hindus in quake-hit villages whose throats were slit, said senior police superintendent J.P. Singh.

In Balakot, a badly hit town in North West Frontier Province, townspeople broke through concrete to rescue two girls from a shattered school. Several men brushed dust from the clothes of one girl and gave her water.

Looting breaks out

In the shattered streets of Muzaffarabad, where at least 11,000 people died, an Associated Press reporter saw shopkeepers scuffle with looters. They beat each other with sticks and threw stones, and some people suffered head wounds. No police were nearby.

Residents of Muzaffarabad, the capital of Pakistan-controlled Kashmir, said looters also targeted deserted homes. Survivors lacked food and water, and there was little sign of any official coordination of relief in the devastated city of 600,000.

"Bodies are scattered in the city," said Masood-ur Rehman, the assistant commissioner of the city. "We are helpless."

An eight-member team of British rescuers using a dog, drills, chain saws and crowbars pulled a 20-year-old tailor to safety, 54 hours after a two-story building collapsed over him and dozens of others.

The man, Tariq, was wide-eyed and covered in dust when he emerged, and he begged for water.

"I haven't eaten in three days, but I'm not hungry," said Tariq, who had an injured leg and was carried away on a door. He had been trapped beneath concrete and wooden beams, and a dead body lay on both sides of him.

In the capital of Islamabad, a woman and a child who were trapped for 62 hours in the rubble of an apartment building were pulled to safety Monday night, a witness said.

The survivors were brought out to the cheers of rescuers who have been working around the clock since the earthquake struck, said Asim Shafik, a witness who lives in the area and has assisted in rescue efforts.

He said teams were working to free another child and that voices had been heard in the rubble of the upscale Margalla Towers complex, raising hopes that more people could be rescued. At least two dozen people died in the building.

Hunger takes hold

About 2,000 people huddled around campfires through the cold night on a soccer field on the city's university campus, where most buildings collapsed and hundreds were feared buried in classrooms and dormitories. Soldiers burrowed into the concrete with shovels and iron bars.

"I don't think anybody is alive in this pile of rubble," rescue worker Uzair Khan said. "But we have not lost hope."

On the field, Mohammed Ullah Khan, 50, said a few biscuits handed out by relief workers was all he had eaten for three days. His wife, who suffered a fractured leg, was wrapped in a yellow quilt beside him.

Their three-story home collapsed in the quake. His family of 10 survived because they were on the top floor, which crashed to the ground.

"My children are now on a hillside, under the open sky, with nothing to eat," he said.

A doctor, Iqbal Khan, said there was a serious risk of diseases such as diarrhea and pneumonia if drinking water and other relief supplies do not arrive quickly.

"These people feel as if there is no one to take care of them," he said.

The city had no electricity, and people collected water from a mountain stream. Shops and the city's military hospital had collapsed.

On a street near the city center, people dug holes into three or four collapsed shops and dragged out rice and other groceries.

"We haven't eaten anything for two or three days," said a 20-year-old man who declined to identify himself as he ferreted away stolen goods. "We are desperate and hungry."

U.S. pledges help

Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf said Sunday the earthquake was the country's worst on record and appealed for urgent help, particularly cargo helicopters to reach remote areas.

"We are doing whatever is humanly possible," he said. "There should not be any blame game. We are trying to reach all those areas where people need our help."

President Bush on Sunday promised cash and said he had told Musharraf "we want to help in any way we can."

Eight U.S. military helicopters touched down in a whoosh of dust from coalition bases from neighboring Afghanistan, diverted from action in the war on terrorism.

"There is a great need here with the damage and the destruction that has been done by this earthquake, and it's very important for the U.S. government and the U.S. military in Afghanistan to provide assistance to them," military spokesman Col. James Yonts said.

Other international aid and rescue workers flowed in. Planes arrived from Turkey, Britain, Japan and the United Arab Emirates. Russia, China and Germany also offered assistance.

Pakistan's information minister, Sheikh Rashid Ahmed, said the death toll was more than 20,000. The top elected official in the region, Sardar Sikandar Hayat, said more than 25,000 people had died and there were "countless" injured.

The province's communications minister, Tariq Mahmood, put the toll at more than 30,000.

The quake was felt across a wide swath of South Asia, with damage spanning at least 250 miles, from Jalalabad in Afghanistan to Srinagar in northern Indian territory.

Nobel winner says U.S. can't shun nuclear threat

Game theorist wins prize for economics

By Stephen Manning
Associated Press writer

COLLEGE PARK, MD. — The way people interact and calculate the motives of others can explain the nuclear aspirations of some smaller countries, why terrorists wouldn't unleash smallpox and how people quit smoking, said Thomas Schelling, 2005 winner of the Nobel Prize for economics.

The University of Maryland professor was cited Monday by the Swedish Royal Academy of Sciences for his work on "game theory," a way of studying interactions that concludes that the behavior of an individual, group or country is dependent on the behavior of others.

Schelling's work is perhaps best known for explaining the tenuous nuclear deterrence of the Cold War. He theorized that an unspoken "taboo" existed in both the United States and Soviet Union against using nuclear weapons, with each understanding a nuclear war would lead to mutual destruction.

While the Soviet Union no longer exists, the United States still finds itself dealing with deterrence from smaller nations seeking nuclear weapons or those with small stockpiles. The United States will have to take the power of those weapons into account when negotiating with countries such as Iran and North Korea, he said.

"It will be unusual to be deterred by small countries," Schelling said Monday.

He shares the award with fellow game theorist Robert Aumann of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. He said the two knew each other, but that they didn't collaborate on scholarly work. Schelling described himself as a "consumer of game theory" more than an author of the idea.

Schelling said he had heard rumors for several years that he would win the prize, but wasn't expecting the call from Sweden early Monday morning. In 1994, several other game theorists had won Nobel in economics, including Princeton University mathematician John F. Nash, subject of the movie "A Beautiful Mind."

Schelling appeared later in front of a crowded auditorium at the University of Maryland to several standing ovations. Appearing spry at age 84, he holds an emeritus position at the school.

Schelling first saw how nations interact during the five years he spent in Europe and the Truman White House following World War II. There he helped coordinate aid to nations as part of the Marshal Plan, the postwar reconstruction of Europe.

He went on to receive a doctorate in economics from Harvard University and taught at Harvard for 31 years. Nearing retirement, he was offered a post at the University of Maryland's school of public policy in 1990.

While his background is in economics, Schelling's interests took him far beyond his academic discipline. He applied game theory to such diverse topics as climate change, the behavior of crowds, racial segregation and organized crime.

For six years he headed Harvard's Institute for the Study of Smoking Behavior and Policy. A one-time smoker himself, Schelling tried three times before he successfully quit. He studied the motivations and techniques that people and groups used to end smoking habits.

"I observed a long time ago that the way people tried to manage or control their own behaviors are very much the way they try to manage and control someone else's behavior," he said.

Michael Spence, winner of the 2001 Nobel Prize in economics, said Schelling is "a very original mind" who used game theory in ways that others had not imagined. Schelling was Spence's thesis adviser at Harvard.

"He thinks about things that other people didn't know how to think about," Spence said.

That includes the threat posed by smallpox in the hands of Islamic terrorists. Schelling recently served on a National Academy of Sciences panel that studied the threat of smallpox.

He said terrorists would face the same dilemma of mutual assured destruction that was present during the Cold War. If they released smallpox in a western country, the fast-moving disease could easily spread back to the Muslim world, harming those who the terrorists are trying to impress, he said.

"Anyone who appreciates what a smallpox attack would lead to globally might be largely deterred," he said.

On the Orleans Avenue neutral ground across from the American Can apartments, a sign on a discarded couch serves as a reminder to returning residents.

Signs of the times

Graffiti on boarded-up windows has been a reliable form of communication throughout the Hurricane Katrina ordeal. Now, as residents return to Mid-City near City Park and Bayou St. John, their mood can be read in their homemade signs. Spray-painted across plywood and piles of trash are expressions of hope, humor, yearning and practicality.

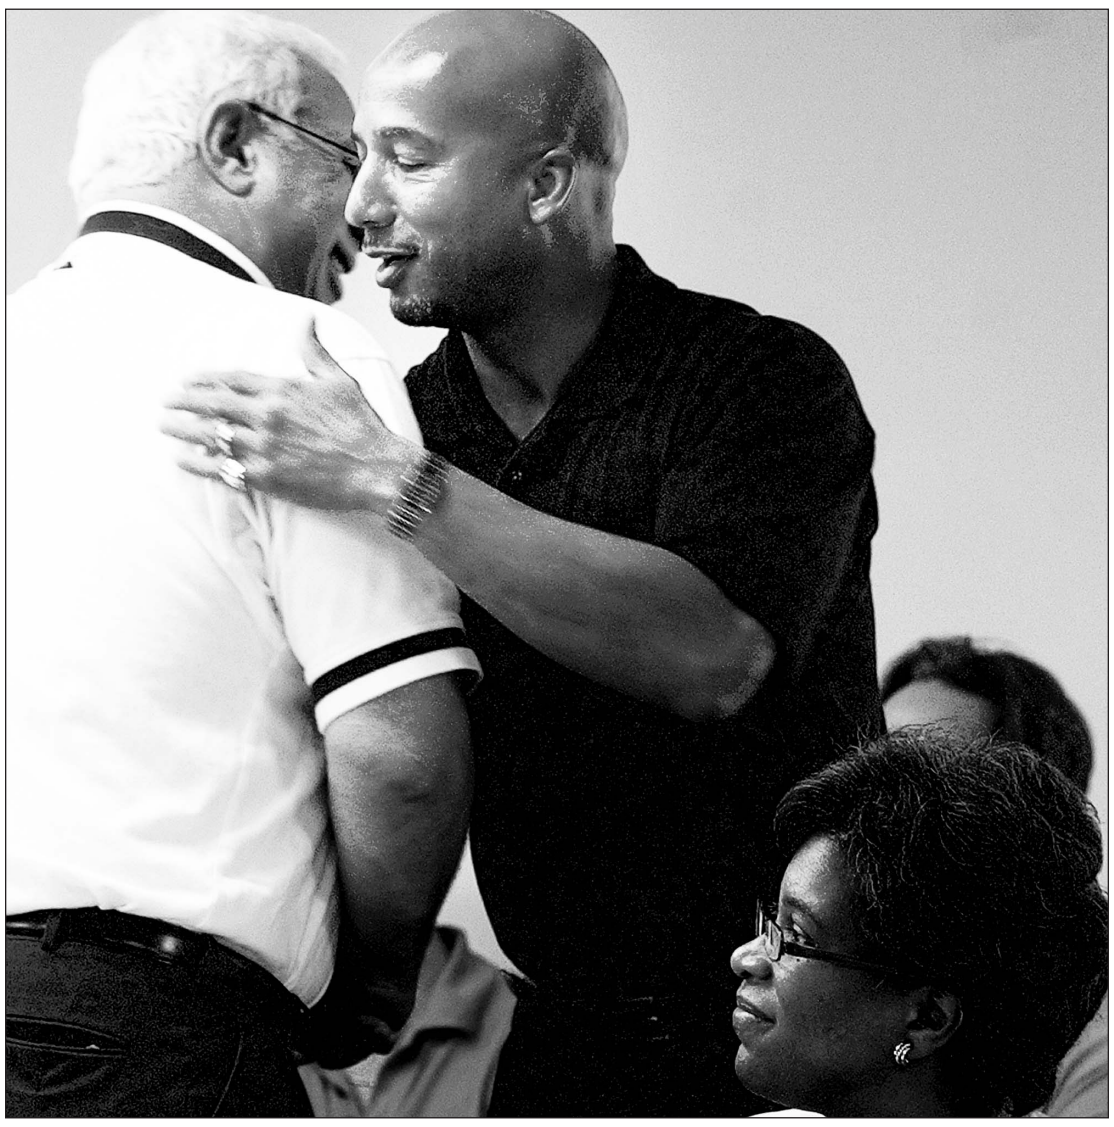
A boarded-up door on Moss Street is transformed into a piece of expressionist art.

A jack-o'-lantern and a note speak of hope for better times ahead on the 800 block of Wilson Drive.



ABOVE, St. Joseph, the patron saint of carpenters who works against doubt and hesitation, is called on to aid in the recovery process in a message painted across Terranova's grocery store on Esplanade Avenue.

Tulane University President Scott Cowen, left, greets Mayor Ray Nagin on Monday before a meeting of the mayor's Bring Back New Orleans Commission in the Sheraton Hotel. The panel took a sobering look at the city's status, including low morale at the Police Department and a lack of money for the justice system.

Garbage pickup sporadic at best

REBUILD, from A-1

the month. Officials said they will seek an extension.

Meanwhile, police morale suffers as officers are forced to live aboard cruise ships separated from their loved ones.

"It is a department under a great deal of stress," Ebbert said. "We have got to get them back with their families ... get them back in a normal rhythm."

Police officials estimate that 80 percent of the force might be homeless and that four of the eight district headquarters were damaged, as was the training academy and the shooting range. The crime lab was destroyed, he said.

He said the city doesn't have money to continue supporting the operations of the district attorney, the criminal sheriff, the clerk of criminal court and the criminal courts.

"We have no criminal justice system functioning today," Ebbert said.

Hunting for housing

Alberta Pate, the city's top housing official, said her office is trying to locate temporary housing for officers on several vacant tracts, including one of the golf courses at City Park.

Committee members also were told that red tape is complicating efforts to find housing for evacuees while plenty of jobs go unfilled.

Boysie Bollinger, the shipbuilding magnate drafted by Nagin to serve on the committee, said Avondale Shipyards has tried to bring back locals to fill 1,000 job vacancies but has run into nettlesome regulations. Bollinger said workers who sign up for employee-only temporary housing in trailers supplied by FEMA quickly find out that by taking advantage of the benefit, their families lose their housing stipends.

"We need to bring some common sense to the process," said a frustrated Don Hutchinson, Nagin's top economic development aide.

Hutchinson said the administration's efforts to work through the FEMA regulations are often stymied by the city's inability to get straight answers from an agency inclined to pass requests up the chain of command.

"We have to get input into this process if not control," said Mel Lagarde, the health-care executive who is co-chairman of the commission. "This is not going to work."

Regular garbage pickup has resumed in the French Quarter, where the bulk of the city's commercial activity is taking place, but pickup is spotty at best elsewhere as the city's contractor, Waste Management, struggles to find workers.

City attorney Sherry Landry said the city might have to turn to the Army Corps of Engineers for help, but as of now, there are no collection dates for the rest of the city.

Casino plan criticized

For nearly four hours, the advisory committee struggled to find its footing, with members visibly overwhelmed by the task at hand. By meeting's end, the group had decided on a subcommittee structure and had agreed to work with the Urban Land Institute, a national nonprofit based in Washington, D.C., to create a blueprint for the city's redevelopment.

The meeting came just days after Nagin proposed a controversial plan to create a downtown gambling district, part of a package of proposals designed to attract much-needed cash into the city.

Critics of the plan have attacked the mayor for announcing the initiative before the commission's first meeting, saying Nagin was trying to set the agenda before the panel had a chance to debate ideas.

While the gambling proposal was not a major topic of discussion, some panel members expressed discomfort with the mayor's proposal to expand casino gambling by allowing large hotels to open gambling halls on their premises.

"I do have concern that we initially focus on gaming," Archbishop Alfred Hughes told Nagin. "It sends the wrong message."

Adding that the city's rebirth must focus on assets like its art, music and architecture, Hughes said "We don't need to appeal to the lesser instincts."

Nagin apologized for not alerting committee members about details of the casino concept ahead of time, but said his plan – outlined in a letter he sent last week to Gov. Kathleen Blanco – was designed to put the issue on the table before the governor calls a special legislative session next month. Nagin also said the news media largely ignored his other suggestions, including his quest for incentives to spark development of the port and the medical research sector.

Getting organized

The commission formed seven subcommittees, covering education, economic development, infrastructure, city urban planning, administration and government efficiencies, culture and health and social services. Members said they will try in the coming days to develop list of organizations with a stake in the seven areas and will appoint other community members to those committees.

Fourteen of the commission's 17 members attended the meeting. Not attending were Entergy New Orleans president Dan Packer and Liberty Bank and Trust CEO Alden McDonald. Jazz musician Wynton Marsalis, who is averse to air travel, participated by phone.

The commission, which plans to meet weekly for at least a month, will reconvene on Monday.

Katrina victims sent north starting to get a little chilly

Some don't know about harsh winters

By Nahal Toosi
Associated Press writer

NEW YORK — Le'Ton Jackson packed a few T-shirts and jeans before heading north to escape Hurricane Katrina's wrath. Her weekend plans turned into a weeks-long stay, and pretty soon it dawned on her: New York's winter is on the way, and she might actually need a coat.

"I already caught a cold," said the 26-year-old New Orleans resident. "It was horrible!"

For the first time in their lives, some Katrina victims from the Deep South are buying winter jackets and watching the leaves change. Many have never seen snow.

June Jarvis, 50, moved from Pearlington, Miss., to a Navy housing complex in Middletown, R.I. She knows the light jacket that served her well during the Mississippi winter will not offer much protection in New England.

She said snow might be fun "for maybe a week. And after that week, that's it. It's going to be too cold."

Relief organizations say they are taking account of the winter needs of Katrina victims who relocated to cooler climates. For the most part, that means making hurricane victims aware of such things as clothing drives and heating bill subsidies. The heating bill programs are especially crucial because home-heating costs are expected to rise dramatically this winter, thanks in part to the damage caused by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

In some cold-weather states — snow has begun falling and temperatures have already dropped into the 20s and 30s in parts of the Midwest — some evacuees plan to take advantage of the seasonal delights.

Sabrina Washington, 28, has been staying at a motel in the Detroit suburb of Sterling Heights, Mich., since fleeing New Orleans with her mother and three children. She plans to visit orchards and cider mills before the first snow falls.

"Everybody's talking about the snow," she said. "I can't wait to see it. I've experienced snow before, visiting my sister in Texas, and I have some winter clothes. But I don't know how cold it's going to get here."

Linda Van Woert of Durand, Mich., a farming community 70 miles northwest of Detroit, said her son and daughter-in-law from Louisiana spent the past few weeks with her. Van Woert said the Northern climate was not an issue for her son, a Durand native, but it was for her Louisiana-born daughter-in-law.

"There were days when it dropped below 70," Van Woert said with a laugh. "She was hauling out winter coats. She was cold all the time. She said, `I don't know how we're going to survive.' I said, `Honey, this is nothing.'"

Kirk Woods, 42, said the farthest north he had been before leaving New Orleans was Atlanta. Now he is in Ashland, Mass., where he has been shopping for winter gear.

"I'm looking at the leaves," he said. "It's amazing to me. In New Orleans, you get two colors: green and dirty brown." In New England, "I see pretty yellows, a little burgundy color, light green."

Skin cancer treatment shows some promise

Tailor-made vaccine extends patients' lifespan

By Paul Elias
AP biotechnology writer

A biotechnology company developing a novel, personalized cancer treatment said Monday the vaccine showed promise in a small segment of patients with advanced skin cancer.

Antigenics Inc.'s announcement was made before the stock markets opened and the New York-based company's share price rose 67 cents to close at $5.68 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Antigenics executives and Wall Street analysts warned that the announcement Monday was based only on preliminary results gleaned from between 60 and 80 patients involved in larger, advanced experiment involving 322 patients worldwide.

The company's vaccine Oncophage didn't improve the life expectancy of the group when taken as a whole and the company said it will now focus on the segment that the drug showed promise in.

The results showed that patients with cancer less widespread than the rest of the group members who received the experimental vaccine Oncophage lived an average of about 21 months each, 50 percent longer than expected.

"It's encouraging," said Needham & Co. Inc. analyst Mark Monane. "But it's all very preliminary."

Monane estimates that about 1,400 new patients a year could benefit from Oncophage if the preliminary results hold up. Company executives said sales could reach $200 million annually.

But any regulatory approval is at least three years away, Monane said.

The beneficial results aren't "statistically significant" and can't be used for marketing approval from the Food and Drug Administration. Instead the company will have to conduct another large-scale experiment focused exclusively on the patient population that the drug showed promised on.

"While these results aren't statistically significant, we believe that the improved survival benefit observed with Oncophage signals a meaningful clinical benefit."

"While these results aren't statistically significant, we believe that the improved survival benefit observed with Oncophage signals a meaningful clinical benefit," said Renu Gupta, who is in charge of the company's research.

Oncophage is a cancer vaccine that aims to trick patients' immune system to attack the disease, a concept researchers hope will yield treatments with fewer side effects than the toxic chemotherapy now used.

Oncophage is tailor-made from tissue collected from each patient's cancerous tumors removed by cancer doctors.

Vince weakens to tropical storm

Only 1 name left on list for season

By John Pain
Associated Press writer

MIAMI — Less than a day after making this hurricane season the second-busiest on record, the former Hurricane Vince began to break up Monday over the cooler waters of the far eastern Atlantic, forecasters said.

Vince weakened to a tropical storm with top sustained winds near 40 mph in the evening, down from 60 mph earlier in the day, forecasters at the National Hurricane Center said. Vince was the 11th hurricane of the season, and the 20th named storm.

Vince's eye had disintegrated, and the storm was expected to dissipate into a frontal system by Monday night in even cooler waters, forecasters said. Wind shear also was tearing Vince apart.

At 4 p.m. CDT, the storm was centered about 170 miles west-southwest of the southwestern tip of Portugal. It was moving east-northeast at about 25 mph, a speed that would take it over Portugal by this morning, according to the hurricane center.

Vince formed Sunday between the Azores and the Canary Islands in waters that are up to 7 degrees cooler than the 80 degrees typically needed for a tropical storm, said Chris Sisko, a meteorologist at the hurricane center.

Only one other Atlantic season had more tropical storms and hurricanes since record keeping began in 1851 — 1933, when there were 21. The most hurricanes to form in a season were 12 in 1969.

The six-month season ends Nov. 30. While conditions for hurricane development get less favorable late in the season, about every other year a hurricane forms in November, hurricane specialist Richard Knabb said.

"People should be aware that the hurricane season doesn't end till November and we could get more activity," Knabb said.

Wilma is the only name left for storms this season. After that, storms are named after letters in the Greek alphabet — which has never happened in more than 50 years of regularly naming storms.

This season has been one of the deadliest and costliest in the United States in the last century. Hurricane Katrina killed more than 1,100 people on the Gulf Coast and is expected to cause more than $34 billion in insured losses.

SEALs dive into campaign to recruit new members

Elite group hunts terrorists

By Seth Hettena
Associated Press writer

CORONADO, CALIF. — The Navy SEALs prefer to operate in the shadows, but the Pentagon's need to increase the ranks of the elite terrorist-hunting commando force is prompting an unusually splashy recruiting effort.

Navy SEAL Mitchell Hall, who won a Bronze Star in 2001 in Afghanistan, hopes to use the upcoming Ironman Triathlon in Hawaii to spread the word about the need for more recruits.

The competition will make the 31-year-old chief petty officer a spokesman for the community of self-described quiet professionals and put him in front of the cameras he spent years avoiding.

The change in recruiting methods comes amid the Pentagon's increasing reliance on special operations and the call for a 15 percent increase in SEALs over the next several years.

The SEALs have a legendary reputation as an elite, highly skilled fighting force, but it is hard to find candidates with the necessary physical conditioning.

Just to get a chance to try out, SEAL recruits must swim 500 yards, then breeze through a series of push-ups, sit-ups and pull-ups and run 1.5 miles, all within strict time limits. This year, 500 of the 823 SEAL recruits — or 60 percent — failed the test in the first days of boot camp.

"We can't survive on that any longer," said Master Chief Petty Officer Andy Tafelski, 51, who has a key role in the recruiting effort. "The pipeline has to become more efficient."

For the SEALs, who consider themselves the best of the best, lowering their standards is out of the question.

Hall, 31, will be competing in the Oct. 15 Ironman — a 2.4-mile swim, a 112-mile bike ride and a 26.2-mile marathon — wearing a blue jersey emblazoned with a Navy SEAL insignia. He won the Navy SEAL's Superfrog Triathalon in September and now his goal is to finish among the top 100 in Hawaii's Ironman.

"When I'm out there at hour five or whatever it is, and I feel like I'm hurting pretty bad, I've had experience with the same things doing activities in the SEALs," he said.

To boost the SEALs' ranks, the Navy is also working with recruiters to begin testing potential SEALs before they get to boot camp and making sure they have the physical skills. Mentors will work with those who qualify to prepare them for what comes next.

Every SEAL must finish one of the world's toughest entrance exams, a six-month training program that typically weeds out three of every four candidates.

The Navy also is creating a SEAL rating, a formal job description, that should allow candidates to more quickly begin formal SEAL training. Previously, SEALs — the name stands for Sea, Air, Land — had to attend school to learn traditional jobs held by Navy sailors.

Driving the changes is the need to add 400 men by fiscal 2008, bringing the total number of SEALs from 2,600 to about 3,000. Special operations units in the Army and Air Force also are planning to increase their ranks, and U.S. Special Operations Command is offering bonuses of up to $150,000 to keep the most experienced operators from bolting to the more lucrative private sector.

The SEALs are looking to the fill the grueling Basic Underwater Demolition/SEAL training program at Coronado, outside San Diego, to its full capacity of 850 students, something that has never happened, Tafelski said.

HURRICANE AFTERMATH

Islands of green dot a sea of brown

OASIS, from A-1

"It was a huge sense of relief," he said.

But Bloom's little oasis is not without its own set of problems. While his home is intact, it sits on the edge of miles of ruins, with virtually all of the abutting Lakefront and Lakeview communities in shambles.

Residents of these survivor streets must decide whether to move home for good, or like their neighbors who were flooded, relocate until the larger community begins returning to life. Right now, Bloom is not sure what he will do.

"Getting around all this debris, dealing with a city with areas that will be inoperable for so long. Could I do it? Sure," he said. "Do I want to? I don't know."

It's a strange phenomenon only now revealing itself as residents in the most devastated areas of New Orleans are allowed to return. Tiny slivers of property in parts of the city, most hugging levees or located on high ridges, oddly survived Katrina's floodwaters, while their larger communities did not.

In the East and West Lakeshore subdivisions, homeowners who live on or near Lakeshore Parkway, as well as on Amethyst and Topaz streets, returned home to green lawns and dry floors. Many lucky enough to avoid serious wind or rain damage are already making preparations to return for good.

Dan Armstrong and Ed Picou said not returning to their red brick Louisiana colonial in the East Lakeshore subdivision never crossed their minds. They've lived there for 10 years. Armstrong, a real estate agent who specialized in Lakeview properties, said he knows life may be a bit uncomfortable for a while, but he's willing to stick it out once power is restored.

"I'm going to miss Robert's market, the cleaners and the dentist," Armstrong said. "But we'll deal with that."

Others have much more complicated scenarios. Take David and Stephanie Myers, who were in the middle of building their 8,000-square-foot dream home on Lakeshore Parkway in West Lakeshore. The house was virtually unscathed. But David Myers' medical practice suffered major physical damage, as did the couple's home in Mid-City, and his clients have fled.

"We were six months away from moving in," he said. "Now we are uncertain if we can even afford to finish it."

A stymied medical practice aside, Myers, an internist, said subcontractors who were lined up to work on the new house aren't available or are raising their prices. The couple also face major repairs to their existing home. Yet they want to complete the new house in what was once one of the city's most desirable neighborhoods, even if it means living amid miles of construction for the foreseeable future.

"If I can financially do it, and from a logistical perspective do it, we want to live there. Absolutely, 100 percent, we want to do it," David Myers said.

On other unflooded streets, Katrina left more sobering signs.

Next to Bloom's house, a "For Sale" message is spray-painted across boarded windows.

Rob Michel, who owns a house on Amethyst, said fears about crime had him and his wife contemplating a move before the storm. Now, faced with the prospect of raising two small children in a city that is largely a disaster zone, their minds are made up.

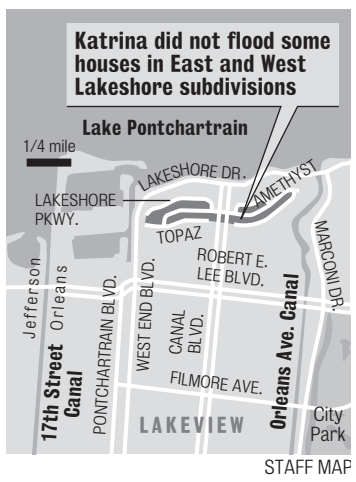
"The debris, the dust, the whole crippling of the city, that concerned us," he said. "We just needed to get some normalcy."

Raymond Kleinpeter has found normalcy right where it has been for 17 years, on his own little plot of ground. On Wednesday, the retired phone company officer, clad in a white T-shirt and straw hat, rhythmically swept leaves in front of his 1950s white brick ranch house on Topaz Street in East Lakeshore.

Like many whose property survived the storm untouched, Kleinpeter says he feels guilty he was spared when so many others weren't. That's why he's decided to open his home to relatives and friends in need of temporary housing while they rebuild their lives.

"This is a test for me, to be sure I'll be generous and share," he said.

Kleinpeter said his homeowner's insurance company mailed him a $3,000 check after the storm to help with expenses. When the adjuster showed up last week, Kleinpeter handed him back the check, not a dime spent.



"I almost kissed him," he said.

It's all about moving forward, he said. Making a good neighborhood better. Making a great city greater.

"If I get a chance, I might even cut my grass today," he chuckled.

"We worked as a team to get through the challenges of Hurricane Katrina. We supported each other...when one of us had a more difficult moment, another was strong and intervened. Our patients were so thankful for the care that Ochsner provided...and said it would never be forgotten."

‘It’s not just a matter of walking in and turning a switch with one guy’

Officials admitted, however, that the sheer distance to the Washington Parish schools where most workers weathered Katrina, coupled with a virtual communications blackout among evacuees and 11 top Jefferson administrators who stayed at the Emergency Operations Center in Marrero, have made them consider tweaking their “doomsday” plan, possibly to send staff westward if another storm were to approach on or near Katrina’s path.

“It’s not safe putting them in this parish; we don’t have anything that can withstand a (Category) 4 or 5,” Broussard said Monday during a three-hour meeting with The Times-Picayune. “But is the north shore the best perfect spot to put these pump operators? ... We’ve got to find higher ground to the west.”

Broussard’s top aide, Tim Whitmer, said parish officials also have thrown open their handbook for disaster planning and have considered suggestions such as training workers of Jefferson’s municipalities to man parish pump stations. Some Kenner officials, reeling in light of major street flooding there, volunteered last week to learn to operate the stations and to stay in Jefferson during dangerous storms.

However, Whitmer and directors of Jefferson’s public works, drainage and pump stations departments said reopening a pump station, especially during a time of massive flooding and gale winds, is not a simple task.

Mistakes by inexperienced personnel, they said, could hamper relief efforts and cause damage to equipment that would cost hundreds of thousands of dollars and take many years to repair.

“It’s not just a matter of walking in and turning a switch with one guy,” Whitmer said, adding that the parish’s largest stations are manned by as many as 25 workers, some charged with clearing grates with rakes and hoes.

Was flooding worse?

Further, officials said, they have begun studyingwhether the evacuation of personnel from 20 manned pump stations around 7 p.m. on Aug. 28, the day before Katrina’s landfall, exacerbated flooding in any part of the parish.

“Our belief is that there was not additional flooding because there were people not there,” said Greg Buisson, a political consultant to Broussard who spoke Monday on behalf of the parish president’s administration. “We’re probing deeper to see if that is, in fact, not true.”

In the weeks following Katrina, Broussard has touted with vehemence his decision to pull pump workers away from their stations as hurricane bands intensified across the parish. Forcing the workers, who earn “laborers” wages, to maintain their posts would have amounted to a “death sentence,” he said Monday.

Broussard said his final judgment was triggered by a mid-afternoon phone call Aug. 28 from National Hurricane Center Director Max Mayfield to Walter Maestri, Jefferson’s emergency management chief.

Maxfield warned Maestri that Katrina’s path had shifted west, toward the New Orleans area, Maestri said. The information set into motion Jefferson’s “doomsday” plan, created in 1998 in the wake of Hurricane Georges.

By 3 p.m., about 900 employees from public works departments, including streets, drainage and recreation, were heading toward Mount Hermon, chosen because it was north of the inundation basin below Interstate 12. Meanwhile, the 11 top administrators, including Broussard, remained at the emergency operations center. “We put life jackets on the fourth floor of the EOC and tethered boats to the roof,” said Maestri, who was among the holdouts.

Top officials also sent a directive to pump station personnel. “We told them: ‘Pump everything down. Get as much of the water out of without sucking in the walls of the canals,’ ” Maestri said. Public Works Department Director Jose Gonzalez said water levels in most canals were reduced to 8 feet or 8½ feet, the most shallow depth possible without damaging infrastructure.

Pumps cannot be left running without workers in the stations, he added.

Broussard and Maestri said they never considered assigning essential employees, including the pump operators, to ride out the storm at three Jefferson hospitals — West Jefferson Medical Center, East Jefferson General Hospital or Ochsner Clinic Foundation — that operated without pause during Katrina.

‘That’s not the plan’

First, parish workers did not meet triage criteria established by the Jefferson Parish Medical Society, which allows entry to those facilities only by critically ill patients for whom evacuation travel would be deadly, Maestri said. More importantly, though, the hospitals were not built to withstand serious hurricanes and therefore were not set as evacuation sites. “That’s not the plan,” Maestri said.

Further, “safe houses” capable of weathering a Category 5 storm were not available at any pump station, making it impossible to leave pump operators in place, he said. Because of limited federal financing, construction of the steel dwellings was only 35 percent complete at five parish pump stations, all on the West Bank, when Katrina struck.

When they returned to Jefferson after 7 p.m. on Aug. 29, employees found pump stations in varying states, public works directors said. All sites suffered some damage; two lost their roofs. Officials still were compiling a chronology Monday of when pumps restarted after Katrina and whether antiquated valve systems at some stations actually functioned better than compressed air systems to keep the lake from spilling into Metairie.

Broussard said, however, that the task is not as high a priority as restarting Jefferson’s economy and that the whole truth probably will come out as a result of lawsuits expected to be lodged by flood victims.

“This is going to unfold in a TV drama-like,” Broussard said. “If we’ve left anything out, subpoenas will get the rest.”

SHEILA STROUP

Hope springs eternal for mother bird

Monday morning, Stroup and I were sharing the paper.

"This is too depressing. Give me another section," he said.

I handed him the Metro page with the story of New Orleans police officers beating up on a couple of guys, and he gave me the sports section with the story of the Green Bay Packers beating up on the Saints.

"Packers 52, Saints 3," it said, above the giant headline "CREAMED."

I have to say it felt good to be getting back to normal.

We haven't watched the Saints this season because a tree fell on our satellite dish during Katrina and nobody at DirecTV seems to care. I am starting to think this is a good thing.

We listened to the game on WWL-AM until early in the second quarter.

Then Stroup took a nap, and I tore blank pages out of my daily planner.

I haven't done a lot of planning lately.

Best-laid plans

We did have plans for the weekend. Our daughter Shannon came home Saturday to get her winter clothes, so our plan was to 1) eat shrimp po-boys at Vasquez for lunch and 2) eat Mom's barbecue shrimp at home for dinner.

The Stroups have our priorities, and for Shannon eating shrimp is at the top of the list.

"Your barbecue shrimp better be good," she said, when she called on Friday night. She was bringing her boyfriend, Blaine, home with her for the first time, and she wanted to impress him.

She was supposed to move back to Louisiana from Auburn, Ala., and start a new job in Mandeville the day after Labor Day, but Katrina blew that plan away, at least for now. She spent a week in August getting settled in what used to be my mom's house in Covington, and then everything changed.

Now, she's working at a veterinary clinic in Greensboro, N.C., and instead of living 15 minutes from us, she's 14 hours away.

Goodbye ... for now

Shannon has always made fun of my columns about the Stroup children leaving home. She calls them "Mom's 'little birds are leaving the nest' columns."

The first time I wrote one was when she and her brother, Keegan, left for college. I think I compared them to the purple martins outside my kitchen window who flew away in August.

I vowed not to write one of them this time. And yet... Shannon was the one of our three kids who bought the NFL Sunday package just so she could watch the Saints play, the one who brought her college friends home for Mardi Gras, the one who always said she'd come back to Louisiana to live someday. So this change in plans is taking some getting used to, that's all.

She and Blaine left Sunday afternoon. Her bicycle was on the rack on top of her Mazda, and the car was piled high with sweaters and blankets and our heaviest down comforter. She saved room for the leftover shrimp.

"I probably won't get home again 'til spring," she said, when she hugged me goodbye.

I hugged her back, happy at the thought. Little birds always come back in spring.

FBI investigating beating in Quarter

Three N.O. officers have been suspended

By Michael Perlstein
Staff writer

The FBI has opened up a civil rights investigation into the actions of three New Orleans police officers and two FBI agents who were involved in the bloody beating of a 64-year-old man accused of being drunk in the French Quarter on Saturday night.

The confrontation was captured by at least two people with video cameras, providing graphic visual evidence to a national audience that has been glued to coverage of Hurricane Katrina and the storm's chaotic aftermath. The footage also captured one of the officers, Stewart Smith, accosting an Associated Press producer as his cameraman filmed the confrontation.

The police officers involved — Smith, Robert Evangelist and Lance Schilling — were suspended without pay and charged with simple battery. The FBI agents, who have not been identified, were part of a detail assigned to assist local police in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, FBI spokesman John Rook said.

Rook said the local FBI office, operating in Baton Rouge because of damage to its Lakefront headquarters, has not suspended the agents. But the local office has joined the NOPD's Public Integrity Bureau in an investigation of the beating, he said.

In addition, the civil rights division of the U.S. Justice Department in Washington, D.C., is reviewing the actions of both the officers and the federal agents.

"I don't know those two agents, but an investigation is under way to determine if civil rights violations occurred, and that goes for everyone involved, of course," Rook said. "It will be investigated fully."

The officers, all assigned to the 8th Police District, were trying to apprehend Robert Davis, a local man who lost his house to flooding, on a suspicion of public intoxication. The Associated Press footage shows one of the officers hitting Smith on the head several times as he stood outside a bar on Conti Street near the well-lit and heavily trafficked Bourbon Street.

Louisiana fisheries expect $2 billion in losses

Infrastructure ruined; perceptions tainted

By Matthew Brown
West Bank bureau

Retail losses to the fishing industry following hurricanes Rita and Katrina are expected to top $2 billion in the next year, a staggering 73 percent of the industry's total annual value, the state Department of Wildlife and Fisheries said Monday.

Combined, the two storms spared no corner of Louisiana's $2.8 billion recreational and commercial fishing industry, from shrimp fleets shattered and sunk to wild crawfish bayous inundated with saltwater.

Fishing communities that escaped Katrina's pounding of southeast Louisiana – the eye of the storm came ashore at Buras with 140 mph winds and massive storm surges — were hit hard by Rita, which slammed into the southwest with heavy rains and winds topping 120 mph. In central Louisiana, particularly Terrebonne and St. Mary parishes, many docks and marinas were hit twice by the storms' outer bands.

"In essence, the impacts Calcasieu and Cameron parishes experienced with Rita were very similar to what Plaquemines and St. Bernard experienced with Katrina," said John Roussel, assistant secretary for fisheries in the Department of Wildlife and Fisheries. "There was total infrastructure destruction, significant flooding of all those fishing communities in those areas. They're going to have to rebuild everything."

Louisiana accounts for about 75 percent of fish products harvested in the Gulf of Mexico and is the nation's second-largest seafood producer, behind only Alaska.

St. Bernard Parish sketches out demolition processes

'Some properties have decided their own fate'

By Karen Turni Bazile
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

St. Bernard Parish officials said Monday that the government will pay to demolish any structure that sustained more than 50 percent damage during Hurricane Katrina, as St. Bernard became one of the first parishes to outline rough parameters for determining which properties will be razed.

Officials said no home will be torn down without the owner's consent, unless the owner does not respond to parish communications or fails to repair a derelict property.

But severely damaged properties, which officials estimate include at least half of the parish's 26,700 homes, will likely have to be torn down. Owners who wish to save those homes would be required to make extensive changes to make them structurally sound, said Mike Hunnicutt, director of St. Bernard's Department of Community Development, usually making rebuilding more expensive than tearing a home down and building anew.

"Any home can be rebuilt. It's just to what extent and how much money you are looking to put into a particular restoration project to make this dwelling livable," Hunnicutt said. "Property owners will have a say in deciding the fate of their homes, but some properties have decided their own fate."

A team of 25 volunteer inspectors from California arrived Monday and will begin fanning through the parish this week to inspect every home and business to determine the extent of structural damage caused by Katrina. The storm flooded the parish wall to wall, and thousands of homes sat in 8 feet of water or more for weeks.

February elections to go ahead

204 of 442 precincts out of commission

By Frank Donze and Ed Anderson
Staff writers

The 2006 election season in New Orleans should be in full bloom, with billboards sprouting all over town, candidates pressing the flesh and campaign operatives feverishly plotting strategies.

But Hurricane Katrina largely has emptied the city of potential voters, and many public officials wonder whether holding the scheduled Feb. 4 elections for mayor, City Council and a host of parochial positions – from criminal sheriff to all seven assessors – is feasible.

Ultimately, the decision on whether to have elections in New Orleans next year will fall to Gov. Kathleen Blanco, who already has postponed September balloting in Jefferson Parish and October voting in New Orleans and Lake Charles because of disruptions from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

But Secretary of State Al Ater and Orleans Parish Criminal District Court Clerk Kimberly Williamson Butler told lawmakers Monday that that some extraordinary measures may have to be taken but that the elections will be held.

"It is a scheduled election," Ater told members of the Senate Committee on Senate and Governmental Affairs. "It will be held until we see it cannot be held."

Butler said the election could not be held if it were scheduled for today, but she said she thinks there is "sufficient time to make it happen. I don't see anything that could prevent us from having an election" in February.

Butler said that 204 of the city's 442 voting precincts – mainly in the 7th, 8th and 9th Wards – have been destroyed or knocked out of commission. She said that she has not heard from many of the 2,300 election commissioners that the state election code requires New Orleans to have for citywide balloting.

"You can't have an election if half of your precincts are gone," said Sen. Charles Jones, D-Monroe, chairman of the committee. "You can't have an election if half of your commissioners are gone."

Butler said she is working with Ater on possible legislation for an expected November special session to waive the requirements that the city have the full complement of 2,300 commis-

State fisheries turn to U.S. for assistance

SEAFOOD, from B-1

The storms' heaviest toll is expected to be borne by the shrimp industry, with losses projected at $920 million for the next year. In an industry already on the skids due to high fuel prices and competition from cheaper foreign imports, that could push some fishers over the brink, said Kurt Guidry, an economist with the Louisiana State University AgCenter who has been tracking the storms' impacts.

"Add the damages caused by hurricanes Rita and Katrina, and it's conceivable we could lose some of those shrimp producers," Guidry said.

Projected losses among other fisheries over the next 12 months include:

▶$421 million for recreational fishing, which in recent years has been the fast-growing sector of the industry as many commercial fishers turned to more-lucrative jobs as guides.

▶$354 million for saltwater fisheries, including the menhaden industry and long-line vessels that target tuna and amberjack.

▶$169 million for oysters, a figure expected to recur next year because oyster reefs take two years to recover.

▶$150 million for crabs, another industry under increasing competition from imports.

▶$33 million for wild crawfish, primarily in the Atchafalaya basin.

▶$20 million for freshwater fish.

As fishers attempt to rebound, Roussel said they should expect little financial assistance from the state given that sales and income taxes have dropped precipitously in the wake of the storms. Instead, Louisiana has requested $440 million for fisheries from the federal government, an amount largely covered by a U.S. Congress disaster relief bill co-sponsored by U.S. senators Mary Landrieu, D-New Orleans, and David Vitter, R-Metairie.

That bill includes appropriations ranging from $150 million for boats and infrastructure to $35 million for new marketing initiatives.

Proponents say the marketing cash is crucial to restoring Louisiana seafood's reputation, battered by images of fouled floodwaters being pumped out of New Orleans and into surrounding waters and estuaries. Initial tests indicate fish in those waters do not pose a threat to humans and more results are expected this week.

"Our first battle and biggest concern has been to overcome the perception that the water quality is not safe," said Ewell Smith, executive director of the Louisiana Seafood Promotion and Marketing Board. "Long-term, the longer we're out of the market, the harder it's going to be to rebuild our market share."

'We are going to rebuild bigger and better'

DEMOLITION, from B-1

and building officials. Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez said it's important to get the inspections done as soon as possible.

"The quicker they get this issue resolved, the quicker we can begin the demolishing so people can rebuild and come back," Rodriguez said.

Rodriguez said the gargantuan rebuilding effort will also let officials correct some problems in a parish that developed largely with little or no planning.

"We are going to rebuild bigger and better, and we are going to have more green space. We are going to learn from our mistakes of the past," he said.

Hunnicutt said that generally speaking, homes that sustained high levels of water for about a week will most likely be targeted for demolition. For the most part, that involves neighborhoods north of Judge Perez Drive.

But even in those cases, homeowners adamant on rebuilding may be able to do so.

For people who don't want their home demolished, Hunnicutt said, parish administrators will work to help them determine what they must do to make their properties structurally sound. People already gutting and cleaning their homes should take photographs during every step and contact the parish for required permits before beginning any electrical work, he said.

For owners who want their homes demolished, the parish will do so and the Federal Emergency Management Agency will foot the bill, as long as the property's damage reaches half the structure or half its pre-Katrina value.

After structures are demolished, the slabs will be evaluated. If a slab is determined to be significantly damaged, officials will recommend that it be removed as well.

All demolitions will require permission from the property owner, but officials said the parish will demolish homes if owners are negligent in responding to exhaustive attempts to reach them and if the homes are damaged beyond repair.

Once property owners have completed retrieving the items they want from their homes, and they have decided they want their homes demolished, they should submit a letter of permission to parish government and proof that there is no mortgage or lien on the property, Hunnicutt said.

Hunnicutt said the parish next week will post a form letter of permission in the parish Web site, www.sbpg.net. The form will also be available at the parish government complex in Chalmette, which should be back in service in about a week.

Hunnicutt said inspectors are only evaluating properties for structural issues and won't be entering the homes, for the most part. They will be inspecting from opened doors and windows to determine the extent of damage. Owners do not need to be present.

Although the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency is doing its own contamination assessments, Rodriguez said the agency so far has not said it intends to "red flag" any areas and prohibit them from being rebuilt.

Rodriguez said residents concerned their property may have been contaminated by an oil spill from the Murphy Oil refinery in Meraux should contact the company's claim center at 1 (877) 511-1006.

ST. BERNARD PARISH'S DEMOLITION PROCESS QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Who will decide whether my home is to be demolished?

Parish officials said that in most cases property owners will decide. Building inspectors will evaluate each property and report to the Parish Council and administrators, who will recommend to the owner whether the property should be demolished. All demolition will require permission from the property owner, unless an owner is negligent in responding to attempts to reach the owner. Owners will not have to wait for the inspection to start rebuilding, but must obtain necessary permits.

How will officials decide whether to recommend that a building be demolished?

Inspectors will evaluate the structural integrity of a property and will recommend demolition for cases in which damage affects more than 50 percent of the structure or when estimated repairs would cost more than 50 percent of the property's pre-Katrina value. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency will examine homes for hazardous substances and contamination. The parish's recommendation will not consider the EPA report, but officials will make it available to homeowners.

Who will pay to demolish my property?

If the inspector's report recommends demolition and the owner concurs, the property will be demolished at no cost to the owner. Parish contractors, paid by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, will do the job. The slab will then be evaluated and if significantly damaged, the slab will be also removed with the house.

Do I need to wait for an inspection before I start cleaning and gutting my property?

No.

I want to repair my home even if the government thinks I should demolish it. What do I do?

You need to obtain building permits from the parish, and all repairs must follow current building standards and guarantee the structural safety of the building. You should take pictures of every step of work during reconstruction. If the property was affected by the oil spill at Murphy Oil, you should coordinate any rebuilding activities with the company's claim center at (877) 511-1006.

sioners or to allow out-of-parish commissioners to be hired.

She said she is also looking into the possibility of using auditoriums and the New Orleans Arena to house multiple precincts if homes or public buildings cannot be used in February.

The secretary of state's office said various innovations are being considered, including the possibility of bringing voting machines to places such as Baton Rouge, Houston and Atlanta, now home to large numbers of New Orleans evacuees; allowing registered voters in far-off places to vote by mail; or some combination of the two, spokeswoman Jennifer Marusak said.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, who intends to seek a second four-year term, says any discussion of postponing elections is premature. Nagin said his administration is prepared to propose a "revolutionary" electronic voting system that would allow New Orleans evacuees scattered across the nation to cast absentee ballots.

"We've been talking about this for two or three years," he said. "The technology is there."

Tampering with the election timetable could send the wrong message to locals contemplating a return home, Nagin said.

"I think that it's very important that we stay as close to our normal behavior as possible," he said

Other City Hall officials are not so sure a community still struggling to turn on lights and deliver drinkable water is ready to stage citywide elections.

"We can't even connect families together," said City Councilwoman Cynthia Hedge Morrell, whose district includes many neighborhoods that were nearly wiped out by Katrina. "So how do we find people to vote?"

While she said she is open to any proposal to keep elections on schedule, Morrell said she is skeptical of the process's fairness to incumbents, challengers or voters, who would be hard-pressed to make fair assessments of the candidates.

"How would you conduct an election?" she asked. "Are you just going to put names on a ballot and mail them out?

"Where do you discuss the issues? Who would finance a campaign? How could you as a challenger finance a campaign that's going to have to go countrywide? It would almost be like a presidential campaign."

As she did in deciding to postpone the fall elections, Blanco is expected to rely on the advice of lawmakers and the secretary of state, who plans to hold a series of public hearings in Baton Rouge and possibly New Orleans in the coming weeks to discuss how to proceed.

Ater said he is working on a plan for submission to lawmakers at the November special session that would waive the requirement that first-time voters cast ballots in person and not with an absentee ballot as a way to accommodate voters dispersed across the nation.

Ater also said he wants to do a mass-mailing, that could cost $500,000 to $1 million, to track down the estimated 400,000 registered voters who fled the state – about 300,000 from New Orleans alone.

He said his office is working with the American Red Cross and the Federal Emergency Management Agency to build a database of displaced voters to inform them of their rights under Louisiana election while they live out of state, and warn them that if they register in their new state of residence they will lose voting rights in Louisiana.

"If there are five voters in Boise, Idaho, I want to find them," Ater said.

Bringing voting machines outside the state needs legislative approval. That method, Marusak said, likely would be limited to cities in the Southeast.

"I don't think we'll be taking machines to Sacramento," she said.

Even then, the federal government will need to endorse whatever innovations are used to reach voters.

Under the 1965 Voting Rights Act, the Justice Department must review changes in election procedures for several hundred districts in nine states, including Orleans Parish, to ensure they don't diminish minority voting representation.

Even balloting that takes place in New Orleans will have to be reviewed, because many precincts in areas that were destroyed will have to be consolidated and polling places that no longer exist will have to be relocated.

city over the weekend to check on his properties, said the man was searching for cigarettes when he was arrested and repeatedly punched in the head by police.

had not been drinking before he was beaten and taken into custody Saturday night, said attorney Joseph Bruno. The lawyer's comments contradict police reports that allege Davis was publicly intoxicated.

"I didn't do anything. I was going to get a pack of cigarettes and taking my evening constitutional," Davis said.

Bruno said his client did not resist police.

"I don't think that when a person is getting beat up there's a whole lot of thought. It's survival. You don't have a whole lot of time to think when you're being pummeled," Bruno said.

The footage shows Davis bleeding profusely from an apparent head wound. It also shows an officer using his foot to keep a handcuffed Davis face-down on the sidewalk as he tries to roll over on to his side.

Veteran New Orleans civil rights attorney Mary Howell, who has evacuated to Missouri, said she saw the video on national TV news and "it just made me sick."

"This is horrifying and it's sickening," Howell said. "Aside from the beating itself, the other thing that was shocking to me was the officer keeping him face-down when he's in obvious distress and trying to turn on his side so he could breathe more easily. That's the classic position for asphyxia. Those officers are lucky he didn't die."

Howell said she has contacted the Justice Department to file her own civil rights complaint about the beating.

While officials and citizens alike expressed outrage over the videotape, Lt. David Benelli, president of the Police Association of New Orleans, said it would be unfair to the officers to jump to conclusions based on the video alone.

"I saw the videotape just like everybody else on TV, and some of the actions on the videotape may be alarming," Benelli said. "But I know that a videotape shows only one segment of an event and only from one angle. Before anybody rushes to judgment, the entire incident from start to finish needs to be investigated by talking to all the witnesses, all the participants and make a rational decision on whether there were any violations."

Benelli said the officers were PANO members and will be represented by the association's attorneys. The officers were released by a judge on their recognizance Sunday.

Orleans prisoners released from jail

From Staff Reports

About 750 Orleans Parish Prison inmates serving time or awaiting trial on city charges when Hurricane Katrina hit had been released as of Friday from the state or parish jails where they were moved after the storm, according to the state Department of Corrections.

They were among 935 inmates evacuated from the New Orleans jail, Corrections spokeswoman Pam Laborde said Monday.

Corrections officials cleared 750 for freedom after background checks showed no outstanding warrants for them, Laborde said. The other Orleans inmates remain in custody because there is "some kind of hold order" on them, she said.

Children's Hospital is calm, but ready

Undamaged facility has light traffic as it fully reopens

By Bruce Hamilton
Staff writer

The cafeteria served red beans and rice, staff members welcomed one another back, parents pushed strollers down the corridors and doctors cared for patients at Children's Hospital on Monday.

"I'm just so happy to be back home," said Dr. Renee Gardner, an oncologist and hematologist at Children's Hospital, the first New Orleans hospital to reopen with full services.

Among the surgeries performed Monday, Gardner did a lumbar puncture on a 14-year-old patient. Doctors also repaired a cleft lip on a 3-month-old baby. The emergency room has served about 12 patients with ailments including a sprained foot, high blood pressure and an abscess.

"We're glad they're open," said Uptown resident Pamela Martin, who brought in her daughter Ashley, 21, to have her eyes examined.

Martin said her son Christopher, 18, is asthmatic and had to use a neighbor's electricity Sunday night for his treatment. "We will be coming back," she said.

The hospital evacuated about 100 patients after Hurricane Katrina struck, said Cathleen Randon, director of public affairs. Many were airlifted to hospitals in Baton Rouge and Lafayette. The hospital has set up clinics in both cities to serve those patients.

Some support staff has been working to restore the hospital's systems since its electricity was restored about three weeks ago, she said.

The hospital called back about half of its 1,700 employees, Randon said, with plans to bring more back in phases depending on its patient load.

The building, situated on Henry Clay Avenue near Audubon Park on land several feet above sea level, was undamaged in the hurricane, Randon said. A brief tour around the operating room, emergency room and outpatient clinic area showed its interior immaculate.

The hospital's halls were not bustling Monday, but nurses and doctors were prepared. "We're ready. We just need patients," said Dr. Donald Smith outside the operating room.

None of the hospital's 201 beds were being used, but Randon said the hospital plans to serve about half its usual number of patients within the next six months.

Although Touro Infirmary's emergency room is open, Children's Hospital can accommodate adults, though they are typically referred or transferred to East Jefferson General or Ochsner hospitals.

Some of the patients at the hospital Monday were displaced residents. Lakeview couple Paul and Sherell St. Julien brought their ailing daughter Gianna, 7, from the Sensation, the Carnival Cruise Line ship where they are staying.

Johnnetta Russell brought her son from Hammond, where they have been staying since they evacuated Aug. 28. Ernest Russell, 11, has aplastic anemia and needed blood and platelets. He wore a mask and talked playfully with nurses while they waited; they planned to return to Hammond. Russell said she was surprised the hospital was open and that nothing there seemed to have changed. "It was the same," she said.

Jefferson district court, clerk's office reopens today

Judges will reset dates for hearings

West Bank bureau

More than six weeks after closing because of Hurricane Katrina, the 24th Judicial District Court and the Jefferson Parish Clerk of Court's office will reopen today.

While jury trials have been postponed until January, judges will be in courtrooms today and are expected to be resetting new hearing dates.

Since the court officially closed Aug. 29, judges and magistrates have worked in a rotating schedule, setting bonds, reviewing probable cause affidavits, holding first-appearance hearings and hearing emergency matters.

Petitions and other legal documents received by mail since the court closed will be "clocked in," or stamped as filed today, Clerk of Court Jon Gegenheimer said Monday.

"Let's hope there's a rush," he said. "That would be an indication that commerce is revving up." By order of Gov. Kathleen Blanco, the statute of limitations is suspended until Oct. 24, he said.

Courts were closed Monday because of Columbus Day, a preset holiday, though clerks were called in to work to prepare for today's reopening, Gegenheimer said.

The 5th Circuit Court of Appeal and First Parish Court and Second Parish Court reopened Oct. 3. The state Supreme Court will reopen Oct. 25.

Feds may redo St. John apartments

Units would provide shelter for victims

By Allen Powell II
River Parishes bureau

In what could be one of the few bright spots in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, several vacant and dilapidated public housing units in Reserve may receive a facelift and new tenants thanks to a new federal initiative throughout Louisiana.

About 27 uninhabitable apartments at the St. John the Baptist Parish Housing Authority's Reserve Oaks development are being considered for renovation by the federal Department of Housing and Urban Development and the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said Joe Johnson, the executive director of the housing authority.

The renovations would provide temporary housing for individuals displaced by Katrina and are part of a project to rehabilitate abut 200 to 300 vacant housing units throughout the state for use by hurricane victims, said Charles Williams, the director of the joint housing solutions center for HUD.

Williams said that HUD already has received a waiver to allow anyone with a need for housing, regardless of income, to move into public housing because of the disaster.

Johnson said FEMA and HUD contacted the housing authority in September about using its complexes which include one-, two-, three- and four-bedroom apartments to house individuals who were living in public housing in New Orleans, receiving Section Eight housing vouchers or were just displaced by the storm. In addition, there's a possibility of placing 10 travel trailers.

Johnson said all new residents would be subject to background checks and drug screenings before they moved into the Reserve complex. In addition, Johnson has proposed adding additional security to the housing complex to deal with any potential problems during and after the possible renovations. He said there is a possibility that FEMA contractors may employ some of the complex's residents

Williams said some evacuees could move into units throughout the state by the end of this week, although Johnson said he has not heard about the plans for St. John.

Since Johnson took over the housing authority about a year ago, the agency has been working to renovate vacant units in its complexes in Reserve, LaPlace, Garyville and Edgard to reduce the number of parish residents stuck on the authority's waiting list and prevent vandalism.

Authorities say the vacant units are magnets for fires, and the housing authority has been plagued by arsons at its complexes in recent years.

However, the cost of renovating the units — about $5,000 to $10,000 per apartment — has slowed the rehabilitation effort, especially in St. John where the authority is in debt. Johnson has tried to use some of the authority's staff to do minor repairs such as fixing broken windows, installing bathroom fixtures and painting, but many of the units require major work. Consequently, 70 of the authority's 300 total units are still vacant and uninhabitable, including 50 at the Reserve complex alone, Johnson said. He noted that the housing authority was seeking a $200,000 loan from HUD to do renovations.

But, Williams said that HUD has received new financing as a result of the disaster, which should facilitate many of the renovations and eliminate any burden for individual authorities.

Johnson is estimating that the housing authority could save $300,000 if the renovations are handled by the federal government, despite the fact that FEMA can only spend a maximum of $16,000 to renovate any one unit.

"Whatever they do that is less for us to do," Johnson said. "As you know Reserve's been sitting there for a while …The concentration we have (of vacant units) is out there in Reserve. To me it's a gift for them to come in and do that many units."

Plaquemines residents can return for belongings

Contractors ready to demolish homes

By Sandra Barbier
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

Residents of the twice-flooded communities of Braithwaite and Scarsdale in Plaquemines Parish should be able to return to their homes to survey damage in a couple of days, parish officials said Monday.

The last of seven levee breaks in the parish's east bank protection system was filled in Monday, Plaquemines Parish Director of Operations Lonnie Greco said, allowing crews to begin draining floodwaters that rushed in during Hurricane Rita two weeks ago.

"We are pumping. We will have the water out," he said.

With the breaches closed, the Scarsdale Pumping Station is draining water at a rate of 1 million gallons a minute, Greco said.

Water remained in the Braithwaite and Scarsdale areas, but had receded into yards and streets in much of the area, Greco said.

Officials reopened most areas of lower Plaquemines on Friday for the first time since Katrina devastated the fishing communities on Aug. 29. But returning residents are not allowed to stay overnight, Plaquemines Parish Sheriff's Col. Charles Guey said.

There still is no electricity, water service or sewerage anywhere in the parish's east bank and below Jesuit Bend in the west bank.

Nonetheless, officials Monday urged west bank residents to return and retrieve any belongings they want to save, as well as to sign right-of-entry forms that will allow the parish to demolish houses that washed onto levees and streets in the devastated southern end of the parish.

"We have contractors ready to move through . . . but we don't want to give them right of entry" until residents have removed personal belongings, Plaquemines Parish President Benny Rousselle said.

"What (residents) need to do is start coming down and looking through the debris," he said.

Houses need to be removed so that both the Mississippi River levee and the levees along the bay side of the parish can be repaired, he said.

Rousselle said he does not want to cause residents the same grief as that suffered by people on the Mississippi Gulf Coast, where authorities removed houses from highways before their owners could salvage their belongings. But he said deadline will be issued soon for those homeowners with homes on the public rights of way.

Right-of-entry forms are available at the Belle Chasse Auditorium, the Plaquemines Parish Council Building in Belle Chasse and on the parish Web site, www.plaquemines-parish.com, under "Current Hurricane Recovery Information."

Only Plaquemines residents and individuals with parish passes can enter the lower portions of the parish and they must leave before dusk, Guey said.

The area is under a dawn-to-dusk curfew.

Roads on the west bank of the parish are now open from Belle Chasse to Venice, although some water remains on Louisiana 23 in the Myrtle Grove area, and traffic must detour from onto U.S. 11 at the Empire Bridge. The detour ends at Cazazu Drive in Buras, Guey said.

Greco said private drainage pumps belonging to Citrus Lands are gradually removing floodwater at Myrtle Grove.

But he said the last breach at Scarsdale, 22 feet deep and 450 feet wide, was the worst among more than 15 breaches officials had to battle across the parish.

Also, Plaquemines Parish schools continued preparing to reopen Oct. 17, with all but about 120 of the district's 840 employees reporting to work on Monday, school Superintendent Jim Hoyle said.

So far, 2,221 of the district's former 5,200 students have filed intent forms saying they plan to return.

Treasure Chest casino reopens in Kenner

Cash-starved city, customers pleased

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

Frustrated with waiting for the insurance adjuster to call and with the post-Katrina stink at his River Ridge home, John Calandro Sr. went looking for fun Monday. He wasn't alone.

Calandro was one of more than 100 people waiting eagerly when the Treasure Chest casino in Kenner reopened at noon for the first time in six weeks.

"I'm tired of being in that house," Calandro said.

"You can repeat that," said another customer, Jack Paternostro of Kenner.

The clanging of slot machines is music to the ears of Kenner officials. Since Hurricane Katrina struck Aug. 29, Kenner has missed out on $18,101 per day in casino revenue, according to the Casino Association of Louisiana. Kenner receives $2.50 for each passenger entering the casino, as well as 2 percent of net gaming proceeds.

"Just this morning, it was so quiet," said spokesman Rob Stillwell of Boyd Gaming, which owns Treasure Chest.

Stilwell said 400 of the gambling boat's 1,031 employees were back at work on two of the casino's three gambling floors.

"We fully expect at some point to call all of our employees back to work," he said.

There weren't enough employees – or probably enough customer interest at this point – to staff the third floor, with its high-limit table games, Stillwell said.

"It's a matter of employees working right now," Stillwell said. Slot attendants and cocktail waitresses are in particularly high demand.

The casino opened on a noon-to-2 a.m. schedule, rather than its pre-Katrina 24-hour-a-day timetable. Stillwell said Boyd Gaming has no estimate of when the staffing levels or customer need will dictate returning to full capacity.

"We don't really know what to expect here," he said.

But if the diehards at the casino Monday are any indicator – have you heard about the hurricane evacuee who won $1.6 million at the slots at Evangeline Downs in Lafayette? – there is quite a customer need.

Mary Lecourt of Kenner, who likes to play penny slots, is glad to be back at what she jokingly refers to her "second home."

"We come here all the time," Lecourt said as she shuffled in the front door as fast as the crowd moved. "We're glad to have something to do."

Calandro said he hopes to be distracted from the loneliness of sitting at home listening to hurricane coverage on the television. His daughter moved to Dallas after her home in New Orleans' Lakeview area flooded.

"I'm not used to being by myself," he said.

Hospitality industry also caught off guard

CASINO, from B-8

land-based gaming in Orleans Parish," Campbell said. "We have been very careful to make sure that any proposed legislation does not result in a breach of the contract by the state."

John Payne, regional president for Harrah's Entertainment, said his company is open to exploring ideas that could help the city. "We want to see the city come back, and we're willing to listen to proposals and ideas," he said. "We want to work with local and state officials to get the city back on its feet."

Payne said Harrah's hasn't thought of potential lines of negotiations, such as whether Harrah's would be willing to give up its land-based casino monopoly in Orleans Parish in exchange for the freedom to operate more hotel rooms or for Harrah's Lake Charles riverboats to be rebuilt on land. "We haven't thought that far ahead," Payne said.

Although Harrah's New Orleans has been closed since the storm, the company voluntarily has been paying its $164,000 a day in state taxes and its about $1 million a month in rent to the city. Payne said Harrah's will reopen as soon as city water, sewer and safety services are ready to handle customers.

Riverboat group skeptical

Duty said his riverboat association was blindsided by Nagin's proposal. Any talk of adding casinos in Orleans Parish should be part of a wider, more thoughtful discussion about casino regulation, taxes and business around the state, Duty said.

"I'm not sure this is the right tool for the situation," Duty said. "If you're not supporting the industry that you have, why would you think the state would support an expansion of that industry?"

Churchill Downs Inc., which plans to install slot machines at the Fair Grounds, said it would like to learn more about Nagin's proposal. Meanwhile, the hospitality industry was also caught off guard.

Stephen Perry, president of the convention and visitors bureau, said his group has not taken a position on Nagin's idea but that the proposal is likely to be controversial among the group's members. "We were surprised at the announcement, because it requires a very complex business calculation. It has an awful lot of hurdles at the state level," he said.

Reactions from hotels that would benefit from the proposal have been lukewarm. Dan King, general manager of the Sheraton, notes that Harrah's has been an excellent partner for the hotels in recent years. While Starwood, the Sheraton's parent company, used to be in the casino business many years ago, its role is now limited to managing hotels attached to casinos, not the casinos themselves, in places like Las Vegas and the Bahamas. If Nagin's proposal were to pass, the Sheraton would hire an outside casino company to manage it.

'More pressing needs'

But the biggest concern, King said, is whether hotel casinos would alter New Orleans' attractiveness as a destination. "We want to make sure that we maintain our uniqueness," King said. "It needs a lot of study before it moves forward."

Mark Sanders, general manager of the Marriott, said other issues are more pressing, such as restoring flights to the Louis Armstrong International Airport, getting the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center opened, creating a marketing campaign for New Orleans, finding money for the New Orleans Metropolitan Convention and Visitors Bureau and cleaning up trash around the city.

Cars stand half-submerged in the floodwaters of eastern New Orleans Sept. 10.

Tie sales tax to address

Buy a car and you pay sales tax based on where you live. The Legislature needs to pass an Emergency Displaced Citizen Sales Tax. If one makes a purchase over a certain amount, regardless of where it's purchased, the sales tax (or a portion thereof) is due to the parish or city of the purchaser or final customer, as, for example, with building materials.

Citizens of New Orleans, such as myself, need things we simply can't buy in Orleans Parish. Other areas should not receive a windfall in increased sales tax revenue simply because they weren't hit as hard. And with the computer systems used by stores today this should not be a problem. Many stores already ask for one's ZIP code for marketing purposes. I'm not advocating taking something from another parish; I'm asking that they not take from us from New Orleans. This is a regional problem and we need regional solutions.

Same old brutal New Orleans

I had really looked forward to being here while we build the new New Orleans. I was ready to rip out the plaster of my fiancee's mother's flooded home and help put up new drywall. I was ready to help my friend Mike clean the muck off his floor and replace the TV the looters took from his living room. I was ready to help rebuild New Orleans until I saw that damn video. Now, I just want to move to Colorado or Virginia or somewhere where I don't have to worry about crooked cops.

The thugs don't scare me all that much. I grew up around them, and I once lived next door to a few of them. It's the crooked cops that scare me most. They scared me before Katrina, and they have me very scared after Katrina. Supposedly, Katrina cleaned out the thugs, but the crooked cops remain.

As long as the crooked cops remain, there won't be any new New Orleans, just the same old BS. And, since I have decided I don't want to live around that anymore, I guess I need to start looking for a job somewhere where the cops aren't crooked. And, here is the thing, I am a Caucasian, with a job in an office and a home in the suburbs, but still the crooked cops scare me the most.

Sickened by video violence

What I've seen on TV about the New Orleans cops beating that 64-year-old man was one of the most sickening events I have ever seen. There is no way that can be justified. I hope the mayor and the chief of police realize that is the reason they don't get cooperation from the public, this is the reason some people are afraid of police.

Chief Warren Riley said that this kind of activity is done by a small percentage of his officers. We the people believe the opposite. We the people are tired of the police administrators making excuses. Their department is corrupt from top to bottom. That is the reason why I don't go into that city, I am afraid of crime from the punks in blue.

It's obvious that there is a very fine line between a cop and a crook, very fine. We the people demand these bullies in blue be fired and sent to jail like all criminals. This is not an attack on the few good cops, because I know they are also sickened by this. Unfortunately, they are a small percentage.

Let's rebuild as a region

New Orleans has a golden opportunity in its post-hurricane rebuilding effort; and so, too, do the cities of Pensacola, Fla.; Mobile and Biloxi, Ala.; Lake Charles; and Beaumont and Galveston, Texas. The 2005 hurricane season affected virtually every city, town and community from Apalachicola, Fla., to Houston. The president has offered the financial wherewithal to rebuild all of these communities. The trouble is that no elected official, especially those of Louisiana and New Orleans, can see the big picture. Together, the golden opportunity is to regionalize into one mega-metropolis.

Geographically, New Orleans is dead-center between Houston and Apalachicola. Picture if you will, a bicycle wheel with a hub and spokes. Now picture a mega-tropolis, New Orleans is the hub and Galveston, Beaumont, Lake Charles, Lafayette, Gulfport, Biloxi, Mobile and Pensacola (to name a few) are at the spokes. All roads lead to New Orleans, and to get the wheel moving add high-speed rail, high-speed travel and high-speed communications.

While FEMA is in each and every one of these communities rebuilding, why build individually? Why don't the communities group together and build as one? We could all profit. Together the northern Gulf Coast is rich in natural resources. Each city, town, village would remain intact like the neighborhoods of New York City. The benefits of rebuilding one community are greater then rebuilding individual towns.

New Orleans will rise again

During the dark days following Katrina, I felt most encouraged and uplifted when I received The Times-Picayune. That skinny little paper was proof to me that New Orleans lived and, like the phoenix, would rise again.

The words of Sheila Stroup, Angus Lind and Chris Rose served as inspiration and also provided a much-needed source of smiles.

Thank you, Houma and Mobile, for printing our paper — and thank you, Times-Picayune, for refusing to die.

Caught on tape

The videotape of 64-year-old Robert Davis being beaten by police outside a French Quarter bar would be sickening to watch no matter when it was shot, but police misbehavior is even more jarring now, when returning New Orleanians are counting on their police force to protect them and keep order.

Three New Orleans Police Department officers and two federal officers arrested Mr. Davis Saturday night for public intoxication, resisting arrest, battery on a police officer and public intimidation.

But no matter how drunk or disorderly Mr. Davis might have been, it's hard to fathom why police thought five officers were needed to subdue him. An inebriated bar patron isn't unusual in the French Quarter, and police ought to be able to handle such suspects without meting out the kind of violence that Mr. Davis suffered.

The video, shot by an Associated Press Television News cameraman, shows one officer striking Mr. Davis in the head at least four times; four other officers wrestled him to the ground, where another officer kneed him and hit him twice. Another officer ordered Associated Press producer Rich Matthews and the camera operator to stop recording, then grabbed Mr. Matthews, leaned him over a car and jabbed him in the stomach.

Thank goodness the camera kept rolling, despite threats and manhandling. The fact that the beating was recorded on tape removed any doubt about what happened and ensured that the NOPD would respond.

Acting Police Superintendent Warren Riley decided that the three NOPD officers — Robert Evangelist, Lance Schilling and Stewart Smith, all from the 8th district — should be suspended without pay, according to Capt. Marlon DeFillo. They were also charged with simple battery on Mr. Davis, in addition to a charge of battery on Mr. Matthews.

It's good that Superintendent Riley acted decisively and sternly with these officers. The Police Department has been plagued by rogue cops for some time. Officers have been arrested for rape, kidnapping, shoplifting and conspiracy to commit armed robbery over the last two years. During the immediate aftermath of Katrina, some officers engaged in looting and others deserted their posts. Cops that act more like criminals than law enforcement officials obviously need to go, but officers who can't control themselves or fulfill their duties are a detriment, too, and one that a recovering city can't afford.

This incident is reminiscent of tourist Levon Jones' death at the hands of bouncers who put a chokehold on him outside Razzo Bar & Patio last New Year's Eve. His death prompted the New Orleans City Council to pass an ordinance banning chokeholds and forbidding bouncers to maintain custody of suspects once police arrive. The reasoning was that police would use better judgment about use of force, and that certainly ought to be the case.

Capt. DeFillo pointed out that police officers are working under trying conditions right now, although he hastened to add that difficult times don't excuse bad behavior. They certainly don't. In fact, with the stress that civilians and police alike have suffered and will continue to endure in the weeks and months ahead, it's even more important for law enforcement officials to keep cool heads.

Holding pattern

Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport is caught in the same vicious circle that's affecting the entire metropolitan area: a lack of tourists and conventioneers means too few flights and a drastic reduction in revenue, but too few flights will also hamper the return of tourists and conventioneers and the revenue they bring.

The airport is operating at 10 percent of normal revenue, and unless there's an infusion of money, it's facing insolvency. Mario Rodriguez, the airport's deputy director for planning and development, told members of the House Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure that the airport needs $90 million in revenue over the next 28 months to stay in business and another $50 million for hurricane-related repairs.

The airport is standing in a long line of public facilities in the metro area that are seeking help from the federal government, and maybe that's why the congressional committee members who met there were mum when Mr. Rodriguez started talking about money. But even though the line is long, the airport must not be shoved to the back of it. The truth is, this area can't recover without it.

Tourism is critical to the New Orleans economy, and coaxing people back after Katrina will be a challenge. Even though our major tourist attractions are intact, people won't come if they can't eat at world-class restaurants, enjoy a vibrant cultural scene and be assured that there are enough people working in tourism-related jobs to make their stay comfortable. If all those pieces fall into place, visitors still won't return if it's hard to get in and out of New Orleans by air. They'll find other, easier destinations.

The damage won't be limited to tourism, either. Local businesses that want to stay put and rebuild will be hurt if they can't get people to meetings with out-of-town clients and customers. Driving to Baton Rouge or even Jackson, Miss., to catch a flight isn't a viable long-term option, and the hassles of getting in and out might make some people decide they can't stay here.

Money to fix the damage and keep the airport in business won't mean that droves of passengers will suddenly materialize. Mr. Rodriguez predicted that the traffic will be 30 percent to 40 percent of pre-Katrina levels next year and 70 percent in 2007. But without help, it's hard to see how the airport will make that progress. We can't have a city that's grounded, with only members of Congress able to fly in and out with ease.

A streetcar rolls down Canal Street on June 16. Mayor Ray Nagin has proposed allowing hotels on Canal to operate casinos.

Quick-fix casino plan avoids city's real woes

I would say there he goes again, but that doesn't begin to cover it.

So now Mayor Ray Nagin, self-styled idea man, wants to turn the Central Business District into a strip, with giant casino hotels up and down Canal and Poydras streets.

It's a plan born not of hope but of desperation, the mayor fully admits — and it comes across that way, as the brainchild of a man who looked across his shattered city's landscape and didn't see much of anything to build on. Even the city's signature industry, tourism, is in huge trouble, with the Superdome and Convention Center now suddenly international symbols of desperation and dysfunction, not hospitality and fun.

STEPHANIE GRACE

Without drastic action, Nagin warned as he announced his idea, "we're going to limp along for the next three to five years."

What he didn't mention is that the city was hobbled well before Katrina struck. The economy was so out of whack that it was utterly dependent on the low-paying tourism jobs, and now it looks like many of those are gone too.

So now, along with a more sensible but utterly overshadowed scheme to draw new customers to the port, the mayor has decided to try to undo decades of poor planning, shortsighted decisions and downright crookery — on the fly.

The model appears to be Mississippi's profitable but now devastated Gulf Coast gambling strip, which thrived under the type of free-market competition that Nagin now proposes, and which will soon be rebuilt with insurance money. The motive is clearly to get up and running before that state's casinos move inland, as they've already received permission to do.

But although new casinos in existing hotels can surely be constructed quickly, swift political action is another matter entirely.

There's a long list of practical reasons why Nagin's idea won't be an easy sell, starting with Harrah's contract to operate the only land-based casino in New Orleans. It guarantees at least $60 million a year to the state — and allows the company to skip taxes altogether if they lose exclusivity. Then there's the state requirement that any expansion of gambling be subject to voter referendum.

Beyond that is the real question of political will.

While Mississippi came to terms long ago with letting casinos drive so much of its economy, Louisiana never did. Gov. Kathleen Blanco is just one official on record, pre-Katrina, as categorically opposed to expansion of gambling. Although she has promised to consider Nagin's idea, she knows perfectly well that social conservatives such as Sen. David Vitter (who has not commented on the proposal) are always ready to pounce on any hint of wavering.

About the only public official who seems taken with the idea is state Senate Finance Committee chairman Francis Heitmeier, who floated the concept to the Louisiana Political Fax Weekly even before Nagin dropped his bombshell.

But the reaction from other members of the city's delegation was hardly enthusiastic. State Sen. Ed Murray, normally one of Nagin's floor leaders, said he definitely doesn't think now is the time to discuss an expansion of gambling, when leaders are trying desperately to find consensus on more basic and immediate needs.

"Gambling is a very, very divisive issue," Murray pointed out, as if anyone needed to.

For all the many problems with Nagin's approach, though, there's the seed of something good. The mayor's condition for granting hotels casinos would be that they pay their workers a living wage, or at least a salary that exceeds the minimum wage.

That would be a change for the better for a tourism industry that has long left way too many of its workers in poverty.

The fact is that New Orleans has been dangling incentives such as tax breaks and the right to open high-margin gambling halls before the industry for years now. And nary a public official has had the guts to question the arrangement, for risk of scaring businesses away.

It's almost as if the city's cheap labor pool was the only economic development advantage it had to offer.

That's the bottom line of a desperation that dates back to well before anyone learned to hate the name Katrina, and no instant Vegas, feasible or not, is going to cure it.

What the city needs now is what it's always needed: a hard-nosed, coordinated attempt to offer better schools, to create an educated workforce that can attract better opportunities. And it needs its leaders to stop looking for a quick fix, and finally get down to business.

Will the president deliver on promise to rebuild?

Ever since President Bush promised to rebuild the Gulf Coast in "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen," many people have asked how he plans to pay for that effort. But looking at what has (and hasn't) happened since he gave that speech, I'm starting to wonder whether they're asking the right question. How sure are we that large-scale federal aid for post-Katrina reconstruction will really materialize?

Bear with me while I make the case for doubting whether Bush will make good on his promise.

First, Bush already has a record of trying to renege on pledges to a stricken city. After Sept. 11 he made big promises to New York. But as soon as his bullhorn moment was past, officials began trying to wriggle out of his pledge.

By early 2002, his budget director was accusing New York's elected representatives, who wanted to know what had happened to the promised aid, of engaging in a "money-grubbing game." It's not clear how much federal help the city has actually received.

With that precedent in mind, consider this: Congress has just gone on recess. By the time it returns, seven weeks will have passed since the levees broke. And the administration has spent much of that time blocking efforts to aid Katrina's victims.

I'm not sure why the news media haven't made more of the White House role in stalling a bipartisan bill that would have extended Medicaid coverage to all low-income hurricane victims — some of whom, according to surveys, can't afford needed medicine.

The White House has also insisted that disaster loans to local governments, many of which no longer have a tax base, be made with the cruel and unusual provision that these loans cannot be forgiven.

Since the administration is already nickel-and-diming Katrina's victims, it's a good bet that it will do the same with reconstruction — that is, if reconstruction ever gets started.

PAUL KRUGMAN

Nobody thinks that reconstruction should already be under way. But what's striking to me is that there are no visible signs that the administration has even begun developing a plan. No reconstruction czar has been appointed; no commission has been named. There have been no public hearings. And as far as we can tell, nobody is in charge.

Last month The New York Times reported that Karl Rove had been placed in charge of post-Katrina reconstruction. But last week Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, denied that Rove — who has become a lot less visible lately, as speculation swirls about possible indictments in the Valerie Plame case — was ever running reconstruction. So who is in charge? "The president," McClellan said.

Finally, if we assume that Bush remains hostile to domestic spending that might threaten his tax cuts — and there's no reason to assume otherwise — foot-dragging on post-Katrina reconstruction is a natural political strategy.

I've been reading "Off Center," an important new book by Jacob Hacker and Paul Pierson, political scientists at Yale and Berkeley respectively. Their goal is to explain how Republicans, who face a generally moderate electorate and have won recent national elections by "the slimmest of margins," have nonetheless been able to advance a radical rightist agenda.

One of their "new rules for radicals" is: "Don't just do something, stand there." Frontal assaults on popular government programs tend to fail, as Bush learned in his hapless attempt to sell Social Security privatization. But as Hacker and Pierson point out, "Sometimes decisions not to act can be a powerful means of reshaping the role of government."

For example, the public strongly supports a higher minimum wage, but conservatives have nonetheless managed to cut that wage in real terms by not raising it in the face of inflation.

Right now, the public strongly supports a major reconstruction effort, so that's what Bush had to promise. But as the TV cameras focus on other places and other issues, will the administration pay a heavy political price for a reconstruction that starts slowly and gradually peters out? The New York experience suggests that it won't.

Of course, I may be overanalyzing. Maybe the administration isn't deliberately dragging its feet on reconstruction. Maybe its lack of movement, like its immobility in the days after Katrina struck, reflects nothing more than out-of-touch leadership and a lack of competence.

Paul Krugman writes for The New York Times.

Picturing joy in life's sorrow

There's a photo of Kasonye Doyle and her mother, Linda, hanging in the front room of the house on 1541 Florence Ave. in Jackson, Miss. It is the late 1970s. The mother is pretty. Kasonye, a toddler, is pretty, too. The mother's smile is bright and shining. The baby seems completely tickled. You imagine the person behind the camera squeaking a rubber toy or shaking a rattle right and Kasonye obligingly grinning as the shutter is clicked.

After I spent Saturday and Sunday listening to Doyle's story, I wondered if the photo didn't show one of the last times her family experienced that kind of easy, uncomplicated happiness. Not long after the photo was taken, her mother would give birth to her sister Kasandra, whom they would later find out was deaf and mute. Nor did she start walking on schedule. That's when the family discovered that she had been born with cerebral palsy. In 1991, on Ash Wednesday morning, Linda Doyle's murdered body was found in the 1500 block of Lowerline Street.

Thanks to rising floodwaters from Hurricane Katrina, the picture hanging on the wall of the house in Jackson is the only photo the 31-year-old Kasonye Doyle has of her mother. Actually, it's the only photo she has of anybody.

The Tuesday after Hurricane Katrina — or was it that Wednesday? Doyle doesn't remember exactly — the Coast Guard rescued her, her children and her fiancé from a four-plex at the intersection of Milan and South Miro streets, a place she'd moved her family into just three weeks before the storm. They hadn't had the money to leave before the storm hit and chose not to go to the Superdome. They lived on the second floor, so they'd assumed they'd be OK. But as the storm raged that Monday morning the windows in her boys' bedroom and her bedroom blew out. After that, parts of the roof and ceiling fell in. Then Tuesday they looked out and saw that the water was not only high, but rising.

Leaving via helicopter meant leaving with nothing. The mother-daughter photo was brought out weeks later when Doyle insisted that a relative go back to get it. It was the single-most important thing she owned, and she had hung it prominently in the front room.

It's the only thing in the house that predates the storm. "Everything I have now came from somebody else," she said.

She doesn't know where her sister and her 1-year-old nephew are. Doyle suspects that the 26-year-old Kasandra Doyle was with a group of friends, all of them deaf and mute, in the 4600 block of Lafaye Street when Katrina hit. She can't be sure because the last time she had any contact with her sister was the weekend before the storm.

Though Kasandra's entire circle of friends was deaf and mute, she was the only one who had mobility issues, Doyle said. She's supposed to wear leg braces, but never does, and so drags both of her legs when she walks. She's also seven months pregnant. Kasandra graduated from the Louisiana School for the Deaf in Baton Rouge and uses American Sign Language to communicate. She uses a pen and paper to communicate with those who don't know sign language, Doyle said.

If I had had a life as hard as Doyle's, I don't know that I could have told my story as breezily as she told hers. Maybe she's still in shock over all the things that have happened since the end of August and hasn't allowed herself to think the worst when it comes to her sister's safety. Or maybe losing one's mother to murder makes all subsequent trials seem easy by comparison. For whatever reason, she seemed oddly joyful the two times I sat down with her.

Even as Doyle was describing her harrowing rescue, she had the smile of a person who still can't quite believe she made it through it all.

She's afraid of heights. And so she originally declined to be lifted up by the helicopter. "I was like, 'Leave me.' " But then she said a prayer: "Lord, guide me up this ladder." She closed her eyes, and soon somebody from the Coast Guard was hugging her.

At the moment she's making her home in Jackson. She hasn't found a job yet. She doesn't have transportation. But she has that photo. Wherever it hangs is where she wants to be.

Ralph Brennan out of Convention Center post

Entrepreneur Reuther will be named to seat

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Ralph Brennan, one of the most famous names in the New Orleans restaurant business, said Monday that Gov. Kathleen Blanco has asked him to step down as president of the board that oversees the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, a position he has held since 1996.

Brennan said an aide to Blanco, who has the authority to make appointments to the board, recently informed him of the governor's decision.

Brennan said he was told that New Orleans hospitality entrepreneur Warren Reuther would be given the seat.

Contacted Monday, Reuther said he knew his name was one of several submitted as candidates for the position, but that he had not spoken with the governor about it and did not know if a decision had been made.

A spokeswoman for the convention center said that officials there were unaware of the change. A spokeswoman for the governor's office said no official document had been filed to note the change.

Brennan said he was told nothing negative about his performance. He said replacing board members is a routine matter, particularly under a change of administration. He said he would like to remain on the board, but did not know whether that was the governor's desire.

The Convention Center experienced tremendous growth under Brennan, including the expansion of Phase III, which made the facility 1 kilometer long.

"It's been a good run," Brennan said of his time leading the board.

Plans for a Phase IV expansion were progressing until a contractor filed suit disputing the Convention Center's choice of builder for the work. The expansion was held up for more than a year until the dispute was resolved, and even then the Legislature had to take action to let the center's board adjust the contract price for construction costs because of inflation.

The expansion and its financing, which was based on hotel room taxes, in now in question after Hurricane Katrina.

Reuther is a co-owner of the Ambassador Hotel on Tchoupitoulas Street, a 165-room hotel that sustained little damage from Hurricane Katrina and has been open since Sept. 19. He also is a part owner of Hospitality Enterprises, one of the largest tourism-related service businesses in the city, although he has been in a legal dispute over control of the company with family members.

Brennan has been working to get his restaurants back on line after Katrina. His Red Fish Grill and Bacco's restaurants, both in the French Quarter, have been open about two weeks. Mr. B's, also in the French Quarter, was flooded in its basement and probably will not reopen for six months, Brennan said.

Ralph's on the Park and Café Adelaide in the Loew's Hotel are in good shape and should open soon, he said. Commander's Palace, the famous Creole Garden District restaurant primarily run by other family members, probably will open the first of next year, he said.

The Ernest N. Morial Exhibition Hall Authority has positions for 12 appointed board members, nine appointed by the governor and three by the New Orleans mayor. Don Hubbard, owner of Hubbard Mansion bed and breakfast on St. Charles Avenue, was appointed to the board Aug. 10, the first appointment Blanco has made to the Exhibition Hall Authority since she took office.

Rotten meat and other items are taken away from New Orleans Cold Storage warehouse. Some 52 million pounds of chicken rotted when the freezers failed after Hurricane Katrina cut power.

Don't you dare complain about cleaning one fridge

Chicken parts molder in N.O. warehouse

By Jaquetta White
Business writer

If you thought that putrid pot roast moldering in the back of your freezer was bad, Mark Blanchard has 52 million reasons why you're not as bad off as you might think.

Make that 52 million pounds. Of rotting chicken.

That's what Blanchard has in three warehouses in New Orleans. As executive vice president of New Orleans Cold Storage, it's his job to oversee the cleanup and dumping of all those chicken parts – leg quarters to be precise — that, had they not been stuck in a warehouse when the power went out six weeks ago, would have been on their way to Africa, or Russia or South America.

Hundreds of thousands of area homeowners, who lost power and whose refrigerators sat rotting for weeks, have a little idea what Blanchard's task is like. His job stinks, in more ways than one.

More than a month after Hurricane Katrina turned what used to be row after row of 35-foot-high frozen towers of palletized leg quarters into an immense mound of unimaginable foulness, the mess still has not been cleaned up.

Blanchard blames the slow process on bureaucratic red tape.

New Orleans Cold Storage and Warehouse Co. Ltd. is a 122-year-old company that freezes and ships chicken parts to countries around the world. The company is based in New Orleans and has warehouses on Alvar Street, Airline Highway and Jourdan Road. The latter, its newest facility, held about 32 million pounds of chicken when power to the warehouse, which acts as a massive freezer set to 10 degrees below zero, went out. The other two held about 10 million pounds each.

In the days after the Aug. 29 storm, when the chicken began to thaw and then spoil, the USDA and FDA condemned it. Because the cold storage company was not equipped to dispose of the hazardous waste, the Army Corps of Engineers under the direction of the Federal Emergency Management Agency contracted an Illinois company, Onyx Environmental Services, to do so, Blanchard said.

The process has been slow. Only about 40 percent of the chicken at the Jourdan Road warehouse has been trucked away to a landfill. The leg quarters in the Alvar and Airline warehouses are still there.

"A month post-hurricane and it's still not out," Blanchard said. "It is an extreme health hazard."

Blanchard said several Louisiana companies have offered to move the rotten meat, but the Army Corps has not accepted any of those offers and Onyx continues to chip away at the job.

"These are experts. They are supposed to be professionals," he said. "But the pace is very slow."

Neither the Army Corps nor Onyx returned calls seeking comments.

Blanchard said the slow removal is hindering his efforts to restart business. The company had planned to reopen in November, using the Alvar Street warehouse as its main warehouse until repairs could be made to the Jourdan Road facility, which sustained the most damage.

Cold Storage has laid off 80 employees, but Blanchard said he plans to hire them back when the warehouses get cleaned up and the company can get back to work.

"We're very anxious to get our people back to work," he said. "But all of this is out of our control."

Meanwhile, the facilities continue to torment anyone in a one-mile radius. To say that it stinks is an understatement, Blanchard said. Flies are pretty much the only thing the smell does not keep out.

"When I was there about 10 days ago with some people from the port, two of them immediately threw up when we opened the door," Blanchard said. "You cannot imagine the smell."

Deck seems stacked against casino idea

Harrah's monopoly, riverboat opposition create 'uphill battle'

By Rebecca Mowbray
Business writer

For Mayor Ray Nagin's vision of putting casinos at large downtown hotels to become a reality, the state would need to overcome significant political opposition, overhaul its land-based casino rules and negotiate with Harrah's Entertainment Inc., the operator of the existing land-based casino, local gaming industry observers said.

None of those are easy, industry representatives agree. For starters, Gov. Kathleen Blanco is against gambling. Riverboats and racetracks are likely to oppose the measure. The tourism industry that is the intended beneficiary of the proposal is ambivalent. And statewide casino regulations would need to be overhauled – at the peril of losing Harrah's tax money.

"I think it's an uphill battle all the way," said Wade Duty, executive director of the Casino Association of Louisiana, a riverboat lobbying group.

In a surprise announcement Friday, Nagin proposed allowing hotels on Canal and Poydras streets with more than 500 rooms to operate slot machines, table games and video poker machines to stimulate the city's economy.

Seven downtown hotels appear to be eligible: The Hyatt Regency New Orleans, the Sheraton New Orleans Hotel, the Hilton New Orleans Riverside, the New Orleans Marriott, the Astor Crowne Plaza, the Ritz-Carlton New Orleans and the Park Plaza New Orleans, formerly known as the Radisson. The Fairmont New Orleans and the Hotel Monteleone have enough rooms, but they are not on the proposed streets; others, such as the 494-room J.W. Marriott Hotel New Orleans, have the right location but are just shy of the room requirement.

Nagin's idea would gut Louisiana's existing system for casino regulation. The possibility of seven new casinos of unknown size would turn the system of limited casino licenses on its head and would require that the state re-structure the rules that govern its sole land-based casino, Harrah's New Orleans.

The Legislature would need to pass a law amending the statute that created one land-based casino at the site of the former Rivergate Convention Center in New Orleans and awarded it monopoly casino rights in Orleans Parish, said John Campbell Jr., a special assistant attorney general for land-based gaming issues. The casino operating contract between Harrah's and the state would need to be amended to reflect the changes, and that contract would need to be approved by the Joint Legislative Committee on Budget, Campbell said.

It's also possible that any such change would require a referendum in Orleans Parish. Legislation that expands gambling, such as the law that allowed for slot machines at the Fair Grounds Race Course, often contains provisions requiring voter approval.

Harrah's holds cards

But all of that would start with a high-stakes negotiation with Harrah's to give up its monopoly casino rights. If Harrah's and the state could not reach agreement, Harrah's could argue that the state violated its exclusivity rights, a penalty that could let the Canal Street casino get out of paying its minimum of $60 million a year in taxes to the state, Campbell said.

The casino contract was amended when the former Bally's riverboat went dockside and when the Fair Grounds was granted rights to get slot machines without triggering the no-tax provision for Harrah's. In both cases, there was an incentive for Harrah's to negotiate because it needed to mollify potential opposition to its 2001 state tax cut.

"Both parties would have to consent to and enter into an agreement to allow additional

Hurricane damage hampers shipyards

Northrop Grumman could lose $1 billion

By Keith Darcé
Business writer

Hurricane damage to Northrop Grumman Corp.'s big military shipyards at Avondale and in Pascagoula, Miss., will cost the Los Angeles defense contractor as much as $1 billion and will reduce earnings this year by as much as 45 cents a share, the company said Monday.

With 12,500 of the yards' combined 19,800 employees back on the job, Northrop said work delays on contracts for building destroyers, amphibious assault vessels, Coast Guard patrol boats and other ships will reduce 2005 earnings by 8 cents a share from pre-storm expectations. The company will absorb more earnings charges — from 30 cents to 35 cents a share — in the final two quarters of 2005 to compensate for higher contract costs mostly resulting from Hurricane Katrina.

Northrop, which operates other defense businesses in addition to the shipyards, now expects 2005 earnings from all of its operations to total $3.55 to $3.65 per share, compared with pre-storm predictions of $3.90 to $4 per share. Revenue for the year is expected to be $30.5 billion to $31 billion, down from pre-storm amounts of $31 billion to $31.5 billion.

The storm, which hit the central Gulf Coast six weeks ago and shut down both yards, sent a 6-foot storm surge over the Mississippi plant and scattered the company's workers across the country. The Avondale yard reopened two weeks later, but with only 12 percent of the plant's normal work force.

Some work at the harder-hit Mississippi yard, formerly known as Ingalls, has been moved to the Avondale plant, but it is unclear how long those production shifts will remain.

Managers at both factories have struggled to locate their workers, find temporary housing for those whose homes were destroyed or damaged, and provide transportation to and from work.

It could take the yards a year to return to full ship production levels, said Northrop Chief Financial Officer Wes Bush during a teleconference with stock analysts Monday morning. He said the work delays occurring in 2005 should be made up in 2006 and 2007.

'It's tough' as Saints lose ace running back for rest of season with torn ACL

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — If nothing else this season, the Saints should at least discover their threshold for adversity.

On the heels of the second-worst loss in franchise history, the team learned Monday morning that tailback Deuce McAllister will miss the remainder of the season with a torn anterior cruciate ligament in his right knee.

McAllister planned to seek a second opinion Monday, then send the results of his MRI exam to knee specialist Dr. James Andrews for a third opinion. But the outlook appears bleak.

McAllister declined to talk until Wednesday, but before heading into the team's training room Monday afternoon, he said, "It's not what I expected."

The injury occurred midway through the third quarter of the Saints' 52-3 loss at Green Bay on Sunday. McAllister said after the game that his foot got caught in the turf as he was tackled following a two-yard pass completion.

He thought he could have stayed in the game if needed and expected to be back in the lineup this Sunday against Atlanta.

"I felt sorry for Deuce, more than anything. But I have confidence in this team. We've overcome a lot the last couple years and the last couple months. This is just another uphill battle."
JIM HASLETT
Saints coach

Instead, the Saints (2-3) will fight through this already-challenging season without arguably their most valuable player.

"Wow. It's tough, man. It's tough," quarterback Aaron Brooks said not long after hearing the news in a morning team meeting. "We had big plans for him this year. We wanted him to carry the load. We wanted him to get as many touches that he could handle and help this football team out. For him to go down, that's the last thing we all expected.

"The way we were struggling, we were hoping we were going to get out of this funk with him. Now that he's not going to be able to be with us, we've got to find a way to deal without him."

McAllister, 26, became the highest-paid player in Saints history less than three months ago, signing an eight-year, $50.1 million contract on the eve of training camp.

Then two weeks into the season, he became the team's all-time leading rusher, passing George Rogers' career mark of 4,267 yards.

The one saving grace is that the Saints are fairly deep at tailback, with nine-year veteran Antowain Smith and six-year veteran Aaron Stecker ready to share the load.

Saints coach Jim Haslett said the team likely will sign another running back, but it won't likely be a big name. There aren't any free agents on the market better than Smith and Stecker.

The Saints could possibly elevate un-drafted

The one player the Saints could least afford to lose, they lost.

Running back Deuce McAllister is gone and, perhaps with him, whatever realistic hopes many harbored for the Saints slinking into the playoffs.

Torn right ACL, done for the year and, if history is any barometer, not the same caliber of runner until 2007. Which means the bad — a 2-3 record after Sunday's historically pathetic 52-3 drubbing in Green Bay — just got a hell of a lot worse.

Granted, no man is an island in a team sport. An argument could be made for the value of others, though it'd be a pretty weak one to make in favor of any of the Saints after Sunday's flogging.

But McAllister isn't just the Saints' best-paid player. He's the team's best-playing player and its most valuable player. And all those BATON ROUGE — On Sunday — traditionally reserved for rest and recuperation —Florida coach Urban Meyer fired the shot heard 'round the SEC, sparking a verbal confrontation aimed at fellow conference newbie Les Miles.

OK, that's a bit over the top. More like a verbal confrontation of calculated kindness.

Meyer did get in the first words, a heavy barrage of olive branches that would make any team blush, babbling on and on about LSU's talent like he was trying to land a job on Miles' staff instead of escaping Tiger Stadium still within a game of the SEC East lead. The harshest rhetoric used sounded borrowed from the Hallmark rack.

Mr. Miles, your rebuttal?

RUSTON — Tulane offensive coordinator Frank Scelfo believes quarterbacks get too much credit and too much blame.

But in Tulane's offense, one that even Green Wave coach Chris Scelfo admits is quarterback driven, that may not be the case. Just how well quarterback Lester Ricard plays has a significant bearing on how successful the offense performs.

After Tulane's first four games, both Scelfos are willing to concede the obvious: Ricard must improve.

In the Wave's past two games, Ricard has not played near expectations. He helped Tulane to a 28-21 victory over Southeastern Louisiana, but didn't much right in the team's 35-14 Conference USA loss Saturday, completing 12 of 32 passes.

"We've got to be more consistent on offense, and it starts with the quarterback," Chris Scelfo said. "I thought our offensive line played well, and I thought our receivers played well. We've got a quarterback system and our quarterback has to play better."

During the past two weeks, Ricard has thrown four touchdown passes and averaged 220.5 yards a game, but his completion percentage after four games this season (51.5) has dropped from last

Claxton pointedly isn't giving up

Guard is competing with top pick Paul

By John Reid
Staff writer

OKLAHOMA CITY — Hornets point guard Speedy Claxton is once again battling, trying his best to outperform top draft pick Chris Paul in a competition that Coach Byron Scott calls the most intense in training camp.

Paul was projected to be the starter almost immediately after the Hornets selected him as the No. 4 overall pick in the NBA draft in June. But Claxton, entering his fifth season in the league, came ready to compete for the starting job, especially after last year's starter, Dan Dickau, was traded to the Boston Celtics for a second-round draft pick before camp began.

Though Claxton hasn't campaigned for the job, he's trying to make a push for it in training camp. Paul still appears to have the edge, but not by much as the Hornets enter their second week of camp.

Both Claxton and Paul have displayed quickness. But Paul has been more skillful at making shots while the defense is converging on him. Both have been playmakers, often handling the ball under pressure before passing to teammates.

"Speedy goes after him, and Chris goes after Speedy," Scott said. "If they both get better from it, we obviously get better as a basketball team."

It's not the first time Claxton, who was slightly injured Monday but isn't expected to miss any practice time, has had to push himself because of stiff competition. He's had a problem moving to the top of the depth chart, though. When he played for the San Antonio Spurs in 2002-03, Claxton was in a battle with Tony Parker, who, at the time, was in his second year with the team.

Parker kept his starting job, averaged 15.2 points and was one of the stars in the Spurs' playoff run that ended with the team securing its second NBA championship since 1999 by defeating the New Jersey Nets, who were coached by Scott.

Claxton sparked the Spurs off the bench, averaging 6.2 points in the series. But he lost valuable time during the regular season when he missed 48 games with a severely dislocated right shoulder that eventually required surgery.

"Since Day One, even in high school, I've had to prove myself," Claxton said. "I think people in this league know I can play, it's just that I've got to get my full chance to show it."

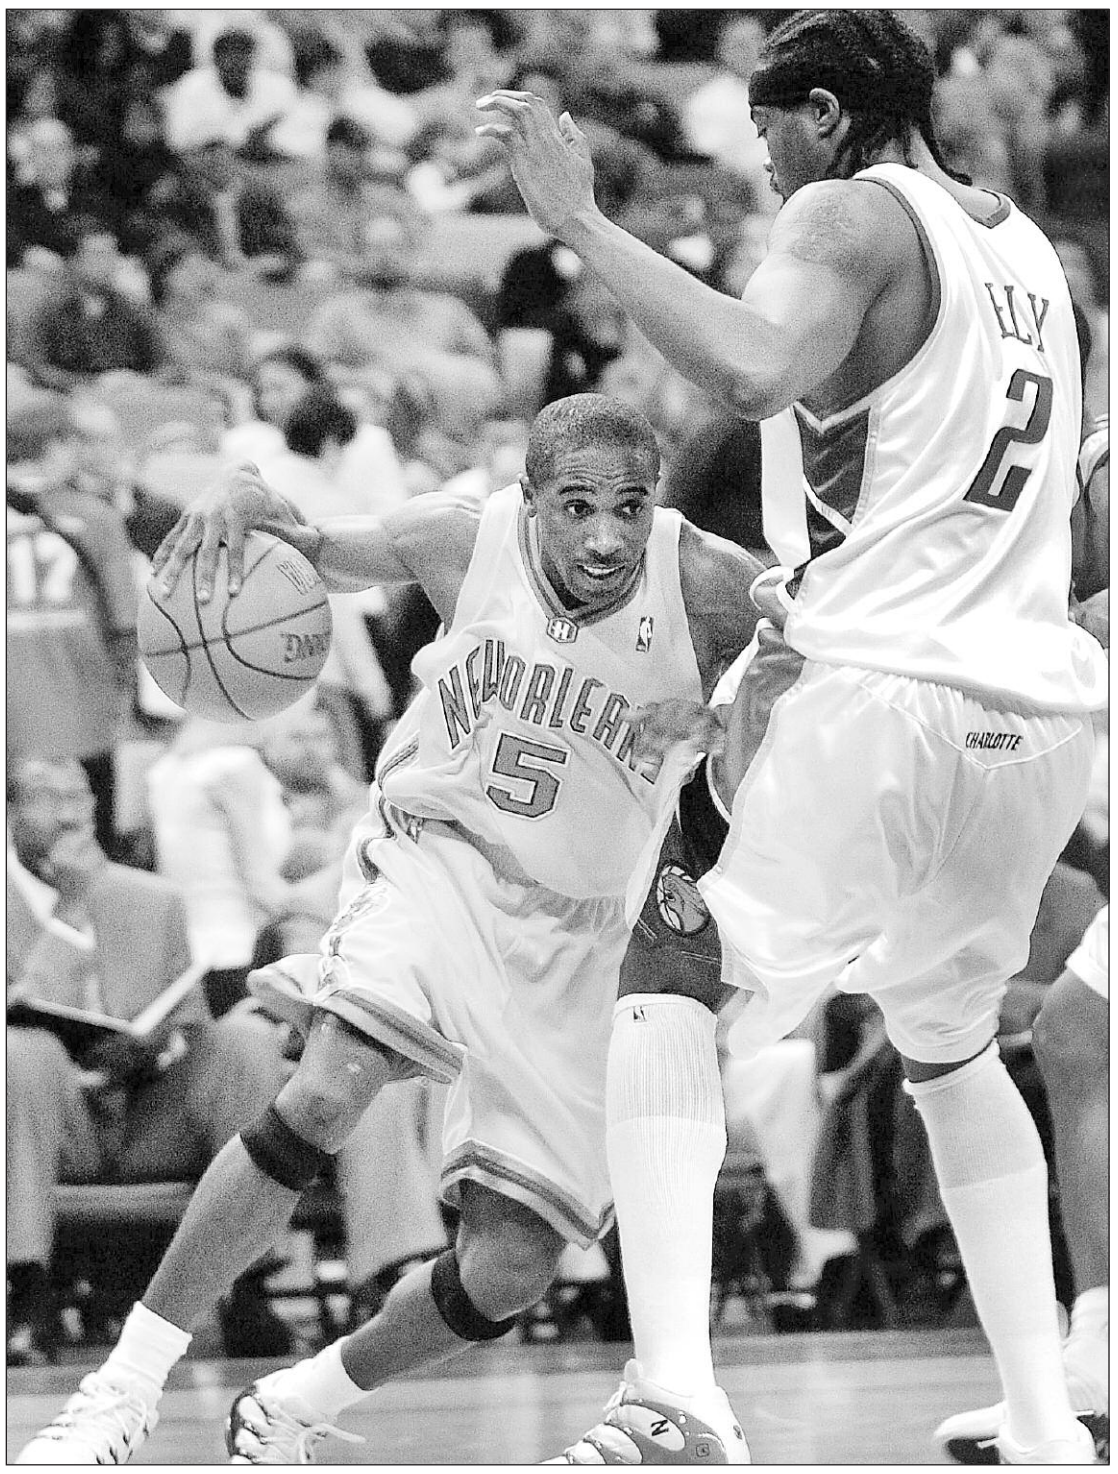
Claxton, a former college star at Hofstra, was the 20th pick in the first round of the 2000 draft by the Philadelphia 76ers. He then missed the entire season with a knee injury.

He has been traded three times and has played for four teams in five seasons. He's all the Hornets have to show for their February deal that sent former point guard Baron Davis to the Golden State Warriors.

Claxton said he was stunned by the trade because he had posted career highs with a 13.1 scoring average and 6.1 assists per game, and had started 44 of 46 games for the Warriors.

"I was having the best season of my career, and to still get traded, basically I said, 'What else can I do?' " said Claxton, who becomes a free agent at the end of this season.

With New Orleans last season, Claxton played in 16 games, started three, and averaged 6.8 points and shot 37.3 percent, the lowest in his career. The only highlight games were when he scored 16 points against the Spurs in March and 18 against the Miami Heat near the end of the season.



"It was more difficult than people know," Claxton said. "I just felt like my game had deteriorated when I got here. I know the people of New Orleans didn't get a chance to see my real game."

In the summer, Claxton worked constantly on improving his conditioning, taking yoga classes and lifting weights regularly.

Though 5 feet 11, 170 pounds, Claxton is showing that he can get through a pick and use his body to keep someone from going around him.

In Friday's practice when Paul caught an inbound pass near midcourt, Claxton immediately rose in front to keep him from going outside.

"He is a great player, and he brings a whole lot of competition," Paul said. "He has experience, speed, and he just knows the game. We're just trying to make each other better."

Nets guard McInnis suffers back injury

Warriors rookie has broken hand

From wire reports

New Jersey Nets guard Jeff McInnis will miss an undetermined amount of time with a back injury.

McInnis was injured when he dived for a loose ball during practice Saturday evening. He continued to practice, but woke up in pain Sunday and was taken to Hackensack University Medical Center.

"I couldn't even walk yesterday," McInnis said after missing practice Monday. "There's some improvement, but I'm still in a lot of pain."

McInnis said he wouldn't be able to play in the Nets' preseason opener Tuesday night against Indiana.

McInnis averaged 12.8 points and 5.1 assists with Cleveland last season, and has career averages of 10.6 points and 4.6 assists in eight seasons with Denver, Washington, the Los Angeles Clippers, Portland and Cleveland.

AUERBACH GOES HOME: Boston Celtics patriarch Red Auerbach returned to his home Friday as his health continues to improve, The Boston Herald and ESPN.com reported Monday. "I still can't walk by myself yet," Auerbach told the paper. "I have to walk with a walker. But I'll get there."

Auerbach, 88, has been in and out of the hospital the past month for tests and a successful surgical procedure. Last month, he was in intensive care for an unspecified ailment.

"The coach is doing very well, and we're all extremely happy," Celtics public relations spokesman Jeff Twiss told the paper. "I've been keeping in touch with the coach and letting him know how things are going with the team."

Auerbach, who has spent the past 55 seasons with the Celtics, had health problems before his latest hospitalization. In June, he was not feeling well enough to attend the Celtics' annual draft party. The next month, he was unable to attend his week-long summer basketball camp, which has been in operation for more than four decades.

DIOGU BREAKS HAND: Golden State rookie forward Ike Diogu has a broken bone in his left hand and will miss the Warriors' first two exhibition games.

Diogu, the ninth pick from Arizona State, was injured during practice in Hawaii on Sunday. Golden State will face the Los Angeles Lakers on Tuesday and Wednesday in Honolulu before returning to California, when Diogu will be re-evaluated.

Butler jumps ahead in battle at small forward

Nachbar's experience in Scott's system is an advantage

By John Reid
Staff writer

OKLAHOMA CITY — Hornets coach Byron Scott put his team through a 45-minute scrimmage Monday, and forward Rasual Butler stood out.

"Rasual was just on fire and played extremely well," Scott said. "He was off the charts posting up and making jump shots."

Butler was obtained in an August trade from the Miami Heat and is battling Bostjan Nachbar for the starting small forward spot. It appears Butler has the edge after the first week of camp. But Scott said both players could likely play an equal amount once the regular season starts next month.

Butler continues to show he can make mid-range shots, and Nachbar has taken advantage of his knowledge of Scott's offense. Nachbar, obtained last December in a trade from the Houston Rockets for shooting guad David Wesley, played in 55 games for the Hornets and averaged 8.1 points last season.

"I'm not worried about that spot," Scott said. "Both of them are athletic and they can score in double figures, and that's going to help us."

In the scrimmage, the veterans were matched against the newcomers. The veterans prevailed 46-38. Center Jamaal Magloire, playing with the veterans, was effective in the post against backup center Maciej Lampe. Point guard Chris Paul ran the offense well and forward David West continues to show improvement as an offensive threat, hitting an open jumper from 18 feet near the end of the scrimmage.

"I thought he (West) played well on both ends of the court," Scott said. "He's having a real good training camp."

J.R. Smith, P.J. Brown, Magloire, Butler and Paul are working with the first team. Brown is getting some limited work at center, and backup Chris Andersen is working at center and power forward.

STILL OUT: Forward Kirk Snyder sat out Monday's scrimmage because of a hamstring injury. Scott said he doesn't want to rush him back. If Snyder is held out Tuesday and Wednesday, he likely would not play against the Denver Nuggets in Thursday's preseason opener at Denver, Scott said. Snyder has been sidelined since Saturday.

PRESEASON SCHEDULE: The Hornets will play eight preseason games, starting Thursday night in Denver. The remaining games are Saturday night at St. Petersburg, Fla., against the Orlando Magic; Oct. 18 against the Atlanta Hawks in Little Rock, Ark.; Oct. 20 against the San Antonio Spurs at Bossier City; Oct. 23 against the Denver Nuggets in Oklahoma City; Oct. 25 against the Miami Heat at LSU's Pete Maravich Assembly Center in Baton Rouge; Oct. 27 against the Houston Rockets in Oklahoma City; and Oct. 28 against the Atlanta Hawks in Columbus, Ga.

American cities must show united front to bid

USOC chairman says city, state, federal officials must cooperate

From wire reports

No American city will bid for the 2016 Olympics unless there is a clear partnership between city, state and federal officials, and the public sector, U.S. Olympic Committee chairman Peter Ueberroth said Monday.

Though Ueberroth initially said the USOC was looking "less favorably" on a U.S. bid, he said one still is possible.

"We want to bid, very definitely," he said at the 2006 U.S. Olympic team media summit. "(But) if you're going to win, we need to have every single person of our country lined up. If we go in ragtag, we're not going to win.

"We don't want to enter and not win," Ueberroth said. "We don't want cities spending an awful lot of money and not have a full chance to be victorious."

The USOC learned a lot from New York's failed bid for the 2012 Olympics, Ueberroth said. While the city's bid had the backing of mayor Michael Bloomberg and U.S. Sen. Hillary Clinton, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and French president Jacques Chirac actually showed up in Singapore for the International Olympic Committee vote.

London was awarded the 2012 Games.

State leaders in New York also rejected a plan for a stadium in Manhattan about a month before the vote.

"The international game has changed for bidding cities," Ueberroth said. "The thing that is going to be most important is there's a federal state-private sector-city coordinated effort before anybody gets out of the blocks. That's what is needed.

"You can't just have a city step up and show their skills, and not get full support from the state, not get full support from the private sector, not get full support from the federal government," Ueberroth added. "It's really a joint bid."

Though Los Angeles, Chicago and San Francisco have already expressed an interest in bidding for the 2016 Games, Ueberroth urged them to slow down. USOC officials want to meet with city leaders, make sure they understand the process and gauge the seriousness of their interest before going forward.

The site of the 2016 Olympics won't be determined until the summer of 2009.

"Cities can do what they want," Ueberroth said. "We've asked them not to spend money. Don't get consultants. Don't get logos. Let's get serious about what you're going to embark on."

Trouble in Turin

Turin Olympics officials expressed alarm Monday over a government proposal to cut $19.43 million from the budget for the Winter Games just four months before they open.

The reduction is part of $26.59 billion in spending cuts and revenue-raising measures designed to bring Italy's budget deficit within limits set by the European Union. The measures must be passed by the end of the year.

Italian Olympic Committee president Gianni Petrucci said he was "surprised and worried" over the possible cuts.

"I had the feeling that everyone, from the government to the opposition, was in agreement over the importance of the Olympics," Petrucci told Corriere della Sera. "A cut like this so soon before the games start does not permit adjustments to the schedule."

Turin organizers believed they had overcome persistent budget problems in June, when premier Silvio Berlusconi signed an agreement to cover $157.87 million for the games.

The deal allows funds to go to the organizing committee of the games through Sviluppo Italia, an agency linked to the Economy Ministry that promotes business development and investment.

TOROC deputy CEO Luciano Barra stressed that the proposed measures still must be approved by parliament.

Sviluppo Italia president Massimo Caputi told Corriere that the proposed reduction includes money allocated for a $7.29 million publicity campaign to boost sluggish domestic ticket sales. The campaign was slated to begin within a few days.

Fuel, electricity, bathrooms for athletes and other minor projects also risk being canceled, Caputi said.

The overall cost of the Feb. 10-26 Olympics is estimated at more than $3.64 billion.

If a U.S. city is going to try to be like Beijing and host the Olympics again in the future, the city and state has to do a better job of working together, says U.S. Olympic Committee chairman Peter Ueberroth.

LSU, Florida raising the flag on penalties

Game features two most penalized teams in the SEC

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — If Saturday's LSU-Florida game hadn't been moved to 2:30 p.m. for television, it might have spilled over into the wee hours of Sunday morning.

Aside from the TV timeouts and the barrage of passes expected between the Gators and Tigers, the game pits the two most penalized teams in the Southeastern Conference.

LSU is far and away the leader, averaging 88.5 yards per game, coming off a 14 for 133 yards effort against Vanderbilt. Florida leads the conference in total penalty yardage with 408 to LSU's 354, but the Gators have played six games to LSU's four. Three other teams in the SEC that have played six games have less penalty yardage than the Tigers.

Opponents have accepted 48 Florida penalties and LSU has 42 for a 10.5 average per game.

LSU coach Les Miles said, while the number is alarming, some penalties are taken with the flow of the game.

"We'll show them those penalties (on tape) and talk to them. Penalties that come with great effort on blocks down field, there's a lot of positive there. We can change their technique or where they put their hands, small things.

"Some penalties, you can accept. You don't want to coach the aggressiveness out of them."

SATURDAY NIGHT LIVE: LSU will play its first Saturday night game in Tiger Stadium this season when Auburn comes to town Oct. 22. Kickoff has been set for 6:45 p.m., and the game will be shown on either ESPN or ESPN2. That decision will be made Sunday.

PLAYER OF THE WEEK: LSU quarterback JaMarcus Russell was selected SEC Offensive Player of the Week for his performance against Vanderbilt. Russell completed 21 of 32 passes for 285 yards, two touchdowns and one interception. He also passed for a two-point conversion.

INJURIES: Miles said he expects guard Brett Helms to play this week. Helms has missed the past two games with a knee injury. Miles also said center Ryan Miller likely would miss this week and guard Pete Dyakowski was "a week away or longer." Wide receiver Craig Davis also is expected to return after suffering a concussion in the first half against Vanderbilt. Rudy Niswanger, who injured an ankle against Mississippi State, played nearly the whole game against Vanderbilt. Doug Planchard, who is currently listed as a tight end, is the third center.

Linebacker E.J. Kuale, who broke his ankle during fall camp, ran some last week, and Miles said he might dress out for the Florida game.

SPLIT SQUAD: Unlike Tennessee, which flew to Baton Rouge on game day because of a shortage of hotel rooms, Florida will fly in Friday. The Gators have 30 rooms in Baton Rouge and 30 in Lafayette. Players and coaches will stay in Baton Rouge and the rest of the traveling party in Lafayette. "We may have to triple up in some of the rooms to maximize space and avoid too many trips back and forth between the two," said Greg McGarrity, Florida senior associate athletic director for internal affairs. Florida also has cut the size of its traveling party from 145 to about 120, McGarrity said.

MIA: Through the first three games, senior Shyrone Carey was the second running back off the bench. But Carey did not play Saturday at Vanderbilt. Miles said Carey wasn't hurt, but was a victim of the game plan. "He could have played and will play in the future," Miles said.

Price, Time Inc. settle lawsuit

Temple coach calls it quits

From wire reports

Texas-El Paso football coach Mike Price said he felt vindicated after a settlement was reached with Time Inc. over a Sports Illustrated article recounting a night of drinking at a topless bar in Florida.

"I'm one happy man right now," Price said Monday. "I can't tell you how much I appreciated my wife, Joyce, and my family's loyalty and love. Without their strength, encouragement and support, I don't know if I would have made it."

Price sued the magazine for $20 million, claiming he was defamed and slandered by a story detailing his actions the night he visited a topless bar in Pensacola, Fla., in April 2003 while head coach at Alabama.

He acknowledged being heavily intoxicated, but denied allegations of sex at his hotel that the magazine reported. Alabama fired Price a few days before the article was published.

When asked about that night at the strip club, he paused Monday and said, "I definitely would have made a different decision that one night, no question. That was a bad night."

Price said he couldn't discuss details of the settlement, reached late Friday. In a statement, the publisher did not disclose terms but said the suit was "amicably resolved."

"Mr. Price asserts that certain events were falsely reported in the story. Sports Illustrated continues to stand behind its story," the Time Inc. statement said. Time Inc. owns Sports Illustrated.

Rick McCabe, a spokesman for Time Inc., said the settlement also resolved Price's claims against reporter Don Yaeger, who wrote the article and still works for the magazine.

The lawsuit developed into a fight over the magazine's right to protect confidential sources used in the report. The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in July that Alabama law did not protect Sports Illustrated from identifying a confidential source whose identity was sought by Price's attorney, Steven Heninger of Birmingham, Ala. The court said the law specifically protected newspapers and broadcast news reports, but not magazines.

McCabe declined comment on whether the magazine, or Yaeger, had turned over the names of sources used in the story.

In a phone interview Monday, Heninger said Lori "Destiny" Boudreaux, a dancer at the Pensacola bar where Price was drinking, gave a sworn affidavit saying she was Yaeger's confidential source. The affidavit was not part of the 11th circuit's record when it ruled, he said.

Heninger said her account to the magazine was based on hearsay and not direct knowledge of what happened in Price's hotel room.

"She was never in the room. No sex. She merely told Yeager there were two people there. That's all they had," he said.

Heninger also issued the following statement through Price: "We have won every legal battle at every corner. We think we have vindicated his name. Two and a half years ago we said we would, and we think we have."

TEMPLE'S WALLACE OUT: After eight losing seasons of not winning more than four games, Bobby Wallace said Monday he will leave at the end of the year when his contract expires.

"What we've been through, the transition we've been through, has taken a toll on me and my family," Wallace said. "It hasn't been easy."

The Owls have been outscored 297-63 and have lost five of their games by at least 25 points.

Since Wallace took over in 1998, Temple was booted from the Big East, switched home stadiums and is playing its first year as an independent before joining the Mid-American Conference in 2007.

The Owls are winless in six games this year. Their last winning season was 1990, and they haven't played a bowl game since 1979.

"Losing will wear on you, and we've lost a lot of games," Wallace said.

Wallace said he made the decision now to give Temple a jump on finding a new coach.

MICHIGAN PLAYER LAMENTS 'LOAFING': About 110,000 people at Michigan Stadium knew Minnesota wasn't going to throw when Gary Russell ran 61 yards to set up the Gophers' winning field goal. Why didn't the Wolverines stop him?

"After watching it, we had some guys kind of loafing," cornerback Leon Hall said Monday, two days after Minnesota's 23-20 win. "The guys that were loafing, they know. I'm sure they're down on themselves about it."

Some teammates and Coach Lloyd Carr disagreed with Hall's assessment of the pivotal play, explaining that a cornerback and a linebacker got blocked and a safety took a bad angle.

"If there would have been anybody loafing there, we wouldn't have run them down," Carr said.

The Wolverines kept Russell from scoring. But his run set up a kick that gave the Gophers their first 3-3 record since 1990.

secondary. On offense, they're very efficient. They do a good job of managing the clock. They run the ball, throw it and keep possession well. Chris Leak is a tremendous quarterback. Certainly, we look forward to playing them at home."

Everything out of their mouths this week should be tackboard retardant, neither coach willing to sacrifice any advantage in a made-for-network-TV interdivisional game the M&M boys desperately need for similar reasons. Lose here and Atlanta is no longer on either program's December itinerary, not to mention any tangled web of scenarios that might catapult the Tigers or Gators to the Rose Bowl a month later.

But beyond that, this is a foundation game for the winning outsider coach - a chance to gain favor with their merciless constituencies clinging to browning scraps of recent yesteryears achieved under beloved former coaches.

Blowouts of Vanderbilt and Mississippi State didn't completely erase skepticism of Miles' credentials to run a top-10 program that stemmed from a hard-to-forget, harder-to-forgive, crumbling against Tennessee. Florida is Miles' second chance at making a first impression in front of 92,000 spectators thirsting for a redeeming victory over a perennial power.

"Playing a game at home," center Rudy Niswanger said, "it's definitely is the right venue for us to finally get in our stadium and take it back."

Meyer hasn't received a free pass, either. Brought in to make the scoreboard read TILT, his heralded offensive system posted 19 total points vs. ranked SEC opponents and was completely exposed in a loss at Alabama. Without a Spurrier-style personality to excuse him from the predictable adjustment process, Florida fans are questioning the validity of Meyer's scheme succeeding outside the MAC and Mountain West.

Miles, of course, spoke of Meyer's attack with sliced-bread enthusiasm. He even required the football support staff to dig in the crates so that his coaches could examine the offensive footprints Meyer left behind during his still-young career.

"We looked at all of his Utah stuff and even looked at schools that ran like offenses or just had a similar style," Miles said. "I think we had a pretty good scouting report before we got to this point."

After a brief scroll through his personal Rolodex of college offense, LSU defensive tackle Kyle Williams said Meyer's often-imitated, seldom-duplicated system shares some traits with the looks Arkansas provided, using Matt Jones' athletic ability in a heavy pass-option mix.

"Coach Meyer has great offenses that put up a lot of points, so we have to be prepared," Williams said. "We know this offense can explode on you so we have to be ready to play every down for 60 minutes or it will come back and bite us."

season (61.9). And that was after a 2004 start that is beginning to resemble the Wave's first four games this season.

Before suffering a broken bone in his right wrist and missing the final two games of the 2004 season, Ricard was on top of his game. He passed for more than 1,100 yards in his final 14 quarters.

Expectations of Ricard picking up where he left off haven't been met.

"We were hoping that would happen, too," Scelfo said. "But we have some new starters in the receiving group and you don't just pick it back up. (Last Saturday) was just one game. We've got seven left and we're going to take them one at a time.

"Lester's our guy. He's got to keep working and believing in himself. I think he's pressing a little bit. He just needs to get out there and play."

Ricard is having a hard time believing he's not playing better. Although he didn't play a full season in 2004, he worked hard with the new receivers during spring drills, and during the summer before fall practice began.

"It has been a surprise," Ricard said. "As good an offseason as I had — spring and in two-a-days — it's been shocking for me not to come out and be completing 75 percent of my passes. I'm a little disappointed right now."

Through four games, Ricard has thrown for 833 yards. In the Houston game, he completed two of nine third-down passes and was replaced after Tulane failed to get a first down on its first two possessions of the second half. Backup quarterback Scott Elliott, a redshirt freshman, replaced Ricard for the Wave's next two possessions.

"It's been a roller-coaster season, and we're only four games into it," Ricard said. "I think things are going to get better because I will not allow those things to happen again."

What was also bothering Ricard were the four passes deflected by Houston's defensive line. He also had a couple of passes deflected against Southeastern Louisiana.

"I don't know what was happening there," Ricard said. "I'd look one way then turn and throw the other way. I think our line was doing such a good job that they'd just stop rushing and put their hands up."

The poor play of Ricard stuck out, but it wasn't the only area that led to disappointment. Scelfo said the defense let the game get out of hand during the third quarter with some poor tackling.

"Defensively, we had 28 missed tackles," Scelfo said. "You can't win a game like that."

Eric Schumann, Tulane's defensive coordinator, said he thought it was the most missed tackles Tulane's defense has had in a game since he took over before the 2002 season.

"It was the tackling that was so disappointing," Schumann said. "We did some good things, but we just had too many missed tackles."

Comets preparing to host Curtis in District 10-2A tilt

Patriots originally scheduled to be the home team

By Lori Lyons
River Parishes bureau

When St. Charles Catholic coach Frank Monica first started preparing for his team's District 10-2A showdown with John Curtis before the season, he thought it would be an away game.

Hurricane Katrina has changed that. St. Charles will host the Patriots on Friday night at 7 at Thomas J. Dupuy Memorial Stadium in LaPlace. The game originally was scheduled for Thursday at Muss Bertolino.

Monica said Patriots coach J.T. Curtis agreed to move the game because much of Jefferson Parish is still in a state of flux following the storm.

"He said the field (at Bertolino) was fine," Monica said. "Nothing wrong with it. But he wasn't sure about the scoreboard and the clock. Plus, (Bertolino) is being used as a staging area for much of the storm related relief in the area, so he agreed to come here."

No one anticipated that, when these two teams did meet, the Patriots — last year's Class 4A state champions — would have a 1-1 record.

The Patriots lost their season-opener to East St. John 16-6 on Sept. 30 and defeated Choctawhatchee, Fla. 27-21 last week.

St. Charles is undefeated and opened district play last week by defeating Donaldsonville, which entered the game 4-0, by a score of 37-6.

Monica said while he's happy to have the home-field advantage for Friday's game, he wouldn't mind traveling.

"Sometimes, we play better on the road than we do at home," Monica said. "Our fans like to travel."

The St. Charles-Curtis game highlights the heaviest week of action this prep season. A total of 23 metro area games are scheduled to play this week, the most since Katrina hit.

Rummel will debut Saturday against Grace King at Joe Yenni Stadium at 7 p.m.

In District 5-5A, Hahnville, which lost its league opener to East St. John last week, travels to Hoss Memtsas Stadium to play West Jefferson at 7 on Friday night. West Jefferson is 1-0 in 5-5A after defeating Assumption 39-36 last week.

Haslett felt 'helpless' as Packers routed Saints

Coach says errors were plentiful, but correctable

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — Saints coach Jim Haslett said he wasn't surprised to learn that Sunday's 52-3 loss at Green Bay was the most lopsided of his coaching career.

"Oh, yeah. I felt helpless, probably like everybody else,"Haslett said Monday.

The tape review wasn't much prettier, but for better or worse he couldn't pinpoint one area of the team that was a major concern. Everyone played their part in this mess.

"If you look at each player individually, out of 55 plays, two were bad. But everyone had two bad plays,"Haslett said, pointing out some missed coverages by safeties, cornerbacks and linebackers, missed tackles across the board, penalties by the offensive line, dropped passes by the receivers and poor throws by the quarterback, among other mishaps.

"The offense self-destructed,"Haslett said. "On top of that, Brett Favre was on top of his game, and Green Bay played extremely well."

The Saints continued to struggle with mental errors and lack of focus — they committed 11 more penalties and five more turnovers for a team that ranks worst in the NFL with a minus-10 turnover differential this season.

But Haslett refused to use the team's harrowing experience of the past six weeks as an excuse. If anything, the coach said, the team had settled into a comfort zone in the past couple of weeks, and he saw no indication that such a performance was coming in practice.

When told that some national broadcasters shrugged off the loss by saying the Saints were bound to have days like this, Haslett said, "I hope not. That was enough for a lifetime."

"I don't think this has anything to do with the situation we're in,"he said. "We didn't play well."

Haslett insisted that the problems, though abundant, are correctable. He said he did not see the players give up in the second half. And the effort was there early on, even if the performance and accuracy weren't.

The coach didn't promise any major personnel or scheme changes. The major need is for a better mental focus from everyone across the board.

It is expected to help that the Saints are facing the division-rival Atlanta Falcons in San Antonio on Sunday, with a chance to even their record at 3-3, and raise their division record to 2-0.

"If you're a grown man and you like winning, it's all about your pride,"defensive end Charles Grant said. "When you're out on the field, you represent not only you, but the organization, your family, friends, the people who care about you. You have to pull yourself together."

HODGE'S STATUS UNKNOWN: No one confirmed or denied a report that linebacker Sedrick Hodge will be suspended for one year as a repeat offender of the NFL's substance abuse policy.

The league handles player suspensions, and the team cannot comment on a player's status. But for now, Hodge remains with the Saints, "until he doesn't show up,"Haslett said.

Hodge's agent, Brian Mackler, declined comment but did not refute the story, which was reported Sunday on CBS Sports. The NFL did not return messages seeking comment.

Hodge, 27, was suspended for the first four games of last season for violating the league's policy. He lost his starting job late last season to James Allen but has started every game this year while Allen has suffered from knee and hamstring injuries.

"Sedrick's playing real well, probably the best he's played since he's been here,"Haslett said. "If it did happen, yeah, it would be a blow. I read the media reports, but I'm not sure if that's accurate."

INJURY UPDATE: In addition to Deuce McAllister's season-ending knee injury, offensive linemen Jammal Brown and Kendyl Jacox also suffered ankle injuries during Sunday's loss at Green Bay. They are both questionable for this week's game against Atlanta.

Also listed as questionable: receiver Joe Horn (hamstring), linebacker James Allen (knee), linebacker T.J. Slaughter (groin), safety Mel Mitchell (hamstring) and tight end Shad Meier (knee).

TICKET UPDATE: The Saints have sold more than 30,000 tickets for their Oct. 30 date with the Miami Dolphins, with nearly 50,000 tickets remaining for the first of four games the team will play in Baton Rouge this season.

There are slightly more than 1,800 tickets remaining for this Sunday's game against Atlanta in the Alamodome. Tickets for both games are available through the team or through Ticketmaster.

rookie Keith Joseph from their practice squad.

"(McAllister) is a great football player, and he's a heck of a human being," Haslett said. "I felt sorry for Deuce, more than anything. But I have confidence in this team. We've overcome a lot the last couple years and the last couple months. This is just another uphill battle.

"Our guys will be able to handle it, and we'll be fine."

McAllister's is the third season-ending injury for the Saints, who lost return specialist Michael Lewis in Week 2 and safety Jay Bellamy in Week 3.

Haslett recalled his first season with the Saints in 2000, when he lost three key players to season-ending injuries in the preseason, then lost tailback Ricky Williams to a broken ankle in Week 10 and quarterback Jeff Blake to a broken foot in Week 11.

The Saints went on to win their only playoff game in franchise history that year.

"At that time we played really well on defense, and the offensive line played really well. So that's what we're going to have to do," Haslett said. "I'm not saying it's going to be the same scenario, but I think any time you lose a great player like Deuce, everybody around him has to elevate their game."

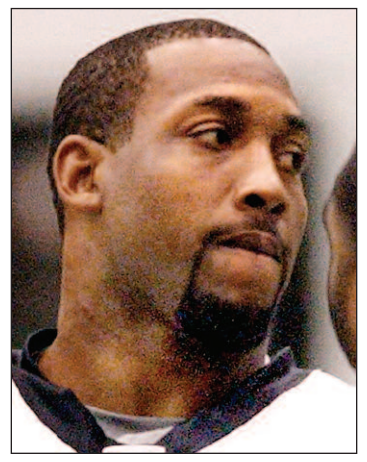
The Saints signed Smith to a one-year contract in April. The 33-year-old back has more than 6,000 career rushing yards, including two seasons over 1,100 yards, with Buffalo in 1998 and New England in 2001. He won two Super Bowl rings with the Patriots before signing as a backup with the Tennessee Titans last season.

Stecker, 29, has started five games in his career, but three were with the Saints last season after McAllister injured his ankle, including a 106-yard effort at St. Louis.

Smith probably will start out as the primary back — especially since Stecker is coming off a recent ankle injury. But the two have very different styles and probably will be used in different packages.

"Our offense is mainly going downhill, going right at them, and Antowain is that type of running back," the 5-foot-10, 213-pound Stecker said, "whereas I'm a change-of-pace guy, I can go to the outside a little more."

The 6-2, 232-pound Smith put it a little more humbly, saying, "He's the quicker, more elusive back. Myself, I can't dodge too many people."



Coaches lauded Smith for an impressive training camp performance, and Smith was pleased with his output. But, he said, "The time is now."

"The main thing is we just have to come together as a team and pick up the slack in different areas and carry the load and continue on," Smith said. "And hopefully we can still go out there and continue to run the same plays as if Deuce was in the game."

Part of the reason McAllister earned such a large contract was because of his leadership — which players said was evident during a speech he gave in Monday's morning meeting.

Brooks said McAllister told his teammates he was looking forward to seeing them go back out and prove the things they can do on the football field.

"He stepped up there and he didn't talk anything about himself," Stecker said. "He just said we've got to play better. He didn't mention anything about being out and we have to pick it up for him. He just said that we're a better team than we showed on Sunday. And we've got to go out there and prove it every week."

McAllister's injury may be breaking point

who tell you different don't have a firm grasp of their football senses.

McAllister has been front and center in the minuscule offensive production that the team has mustered this season, pounded to a pulp because help from the passing game has been almost nonexistent, directed toward invisible openings again and again in the name of establishing a running game.

Without him, you wonder what the Saints' direction will be and how well the team will fare. Because the team wasn't experiencing much success even with Deuce.

Do the Saints really want to put the ball in the hands, and the burden on the shoulders, of quarterback Aaron Brooks, who has about as much talent as you could hope for in anyone playing the position but this season has played the worst football of his up-and-down Saints career?

Will they bother trying to do the same things running the ball with Aaron Stecker and Antowain Smith as they did with Deuce, despite the obvious drop-off in ability?

Can the team rely on the defense to keep it close, though early indications are that the defensive stand at the end of last season was an exception, not the rule?

When the answer to every question seems to be no, that's an indication of the expectation for the rest of the season.

The season, unforgiving, will march on. Pitiless opponents, who began marking their calendars with W's where the Saints' name falls after watching New Orleans shrivel up against the Packers, are even more emboldened today. Because to think the Saints will rally around the injury and pick up the pace is a tad optimistic; apparently, they leave much to be desired in the rally-and-pick-up department.

So, of the good to be gleaned from this, the largest slice is this: At least Deuce got paid before he blew out his knee. At least he was able to cash in on his status as an elite player and classy face of the franchise before the setback occurred.

Because pro football, as we know, is a ruthless business. Despite McAllister's contributions to the franchise on and off the field — this season, he became the all-time leading rusher in franchise history and is second in career rushing touchdowns, with 38 — he'd have had to settle for peanuts this offseason if he hadn't been able to swing a new deal with the Saints last offseason.

Problem is, at the end of the day, we still must revert to thinking about the season at hand, one that looked messy after Sunday and appears to be a complete wreck now. The team appeared listless and lifeless against a winless team with the best player on the roster in uniform. So it certainly is capable of deflating, drifting away and landing with a thud against some of the better remaining teams, including against Atlanta on Sunday.

The one player the Saints could least afford to lose, they lost.

Everything else might not be far behind.

Martz takes indefinite leave

Rams coach back in hospital to clear infection near heart

From wire reports

Mike Martz is out indefinitely as coach of the St. Louis Rams while he recovers from a bacterial infection near his heart.

Martz, who has been ill for more than a month and missed two practices last week while undergoing tests, was on the sideline for the Rams' 37-31 loss to the Seattle Seahawks on Sunday.

The 54-year-old coach announced last week that he was being examined for endocarditis, a bacterial infection of the lining of the heart or a heart valve. Martz said at the time that his condition had worsened, and he began taking antibiotics Friday.

Assistant head coach Joe Vitt will lead the team in Martz's absence. Players learned of Martz's status Monday afternoon, but none would comment.

Rams president John Shaw said in a statement Monday that Martz would be admitted to a hospital to continue his treatment.

Martz spoke with a raspy voice but sounded optimistic about his health after Sunday's game. Still, he said he should have allowed offensive coordinator Steve Fairchild to run the team.

"I wasn't myself this week, the game plan wasn't clear for me," Martz said. "It's over with now, but I just feel what happened to me has affected this team, and that breaks my heart."

Endocarditis affects 10,000 to 20,000 Americans each year and in some cases can require open-heart surgery, according to Dr. Arthur Labovitz, director of cardiology at the Saint Louis University School of Medicine.

Martz was first hospitalized Sept. 30 with what was thought to be a sinus infection. He coached two days later during a 44-24 loss to the New York Giants.

Now in his sixth season, Martz is 56-36 including the postseason. The Rams have missed the playoffs once in his tenure (2002) and reached the Super Bowl after the 2001 season, losing 20-17 to New England.

Heart problems have affected relatively young coaches before in the high-stress atmosphere of the NFL. Dan Reeves had a heart procedure while coaching Denver in his mid-40s. During the 1998 season, he underwent quadruple bypass surgery at age 54 but returned to the sidelines less than four weeks later to coach the Atlanta Falcons to the Super Bowl.

Dallas' Bill Parcells has had several heart procedures and cited health problems when he quit the New York Giants after winning his second Super Bowl with them at age 49 in 1991. He has since coached New England and the New York Jets as well as the Cowboys.

In 1988, Chicago coach Mike Ditka suffered a heart attack at the age of 49 and missed one game.

BILLS: Kelly Holcomb, who quarterbacked Buffalo to a victory over Miami, could return to the bench next week in favor of former Tulane standout J.P. Losman, said Bills coach Mike Mularkey.

"I'm going to leave it as it is," Mularkey said, adding he believes the lack of an announcement will keep the New York Jets, his next opponent, guessing. "We think it is an advantage as a team, when you have two different types of quarterbacks, to play it out as long as we can," Mularkey said. "I think it's an advantage regardless of what other people think."

Holcomb, an 11-year veteran, went 20-of-26 for 169 yards passing in his first start of the season. He efficiently led a short-passing attack to help Buffalo (2-3) snap a three-game skid and spark an offense that scored 29 points in its previous 14 quarters.

FALCONS: Coach Jim Mora said it's too early to predict quarterback Michael Vick's status for Sunday's game against the Saints in San Antonio. Vick missed last Sunday's game against the Patriots with a sprained knee.

I've got to believe Mike will make progress," Mora said Monday. "We'll see. We should have a good feel Wednesday."

Backup Matt Schaub passed for 298 yards and three touchdowns - season highs for the team - without an interception in a 31-28 loss to New England.

LIONS: Defensive back R.W. McQuarters could be switched to offense to help the Lions' injury and suspension-depleted receivers corps.

With Charles Rogers suspended and four wide receivers sustaining injuries in Sunday's 35-17 victory over the Ravens, Detroit's nickel back volunteered to fill in.

"He said during the game that he'd go in, and he just grabbed me in the hall and said he was still ready," Lions coach Steve Mariucci said Monday.

McQuarters played both positions at Oklahoma State, but hasn't played offense in the NFL.

JETS: Running back Derrick Blaylock is expected to miss six to eight weeks with a broken foot instead of the entire season.

BENGALS: Cincinnati activated defensive end Duane Clemons, a week after he returned from a four-game suspension for violating the NFL's substance abuse policy.

Clemons will be available for Sunday's game at Tennessee. To open a spot for Clemons on the 53-man roster, the Bengals waived second-year center Larry Turner.

He has spent a lifetime photographing the natural beauty of Louisiana's wetlands. But Katrina has made C.C. LOCKWOOD more determined than ever to capture in vivid colors the loss of the state's disappearing coastline.

Four days after Hurricane Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast, Louisiana wildlife photographer C.C. Lockwood was pulling his 37-foot rafting boat off the Colorado River in the Grand Canyon when someone showed him a newspaper.

"When I saw the aerial shot of the Superdome with water all around it. I didn't even have to read the headline. I knew a hurricane had hit," says Lockwood, whose book "Marsh Mission: Capturing the Vanishing Wetlands" (LSU Press, $39.95), began to land in bookstores about the same time New Orleanians were reeling from the landing of Katrina.

When Lockwood began his Colorado rafting trip, Katrina didn't even have a name, much less a destination. But the book's epilogue is prescient: "South Louisiana is home to two million spicy, fun-loving people who have brought to the world a culture rich with good food, lively music and friendly lifestyle. Perhaps the most important function of our vanishing coastline is the protection it gives this rich culture and bountiful land against hurricane tidal surge."

The book is a record, in pictures by Lockwood and paintings by Baton Rouge artist Rhea Gary, of a year spent in the Atchafalaya Swamp. The photographer had hoped his art and the year-long mission aboard the Wetland Wanderer houseboat with his schoolteacher wife,

As Hurricane Katrina approached the Louisiana coast, the main mission for WDSU's news director was keeping his staff safe.

Anzio Williams, hired just late last year, admonished his reporters against showy coverage heroics.

"People blowing in the wind, hanging on poles and stuff," Williams said. "I said, 'Guys, we're not doing it.'

"They want to be live out in the storm. Being live in the storm isn't the most important thing. It's coming back alive."

But as his news staff dispersed to locations around the city, then into a remarkable multi-city news operation piping nonstop coverage to a regional network of affiliates and onto the Internet, Williams' fears of reporters putting themselves in peril seemed to be realized.

Two reporters and a cameraman went missing for days.

The haves and the hads

New Orleanians come together in spite of a storm that divided our ranks

I have returned to New Orleans three times since Katrina.

I have recounted in this column — perhaps in too much detail — the effects of the first two trips; the emotional and physical debilitations that mounted upon me before departing, both times in near-collapse.

On this count, I am not alone. I have seen many scars — both physical and psychological — on the people I have encountered over the past six weeks.

My neighbor Jena stayed through the storm, locked down in the psych ward of the hospital where she works — or worked, it's unclear now. She was evacuated that Friday, four days after the storm.

According to friends, she didn't speak for several days after getting out. She fell silent. She fell off the planet. God knows what she saw.

When she appeared in the neighborhood late last week, it was to retrieve some clothes before departing for Europe for two weeks to air out. Upon arrival, she discovered her living room ceiling had collapsed. She shrugged. She was her old affable self, but she said she doesn't know if she's ever coming back.

And that is the status of so many.

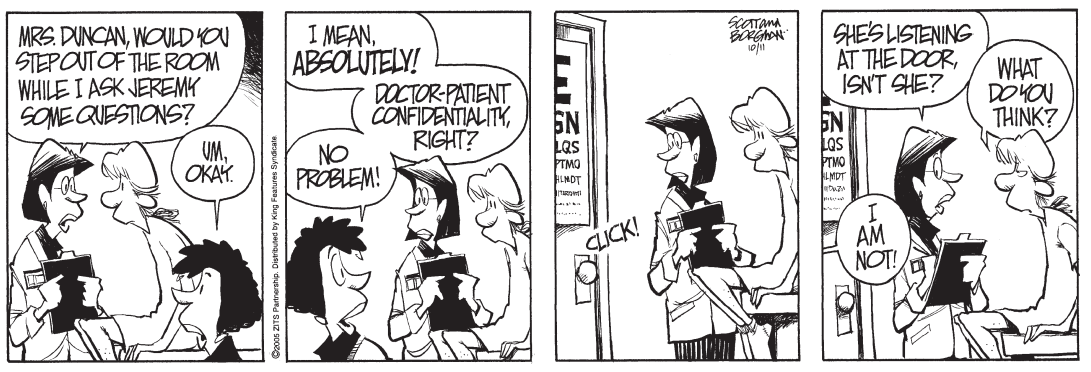
To say that everyone has "issues" right now is to say that Congress has "discord" or the Saints are "rebuilding."

Anxiety and sorrow seem to be our current natural states. The lines at the prescription pick-up windows at local pharmacies are longer than those at gas stations now.

Everyone's just trying to cope.

But the differences between us can be so stark sometimes; you can't tell by just looking at someone. For instance, my job, my house and my family survived all of this relatively intact and sometimes I'll be sitting next to a colleague from the paper after work and my cell phone rings.

It is some long distance well-wisher on the line — maybe a college buddy or something — who wants to know how I made out and I tell him no storm damage, we're gonna be fine, blah, blah, blah — and then I realize that the guy I'm sitting next to, a friend and colleague for years, lost everything in all of this and is hearing my phone call.



It would be easy to get survivor guilt in this, but that doesn't get you anything or anywhere. But there is an undeniable line drawn in our community ranks now. We are either the haves or the have-nots. Or, more precisely, the haves and the hads.

And we are now living and working side-by-side and once when I announced that my daughter has asked me to bring all her Barbies with me next time I visit my family in Maryland I realized the guy next to me — his kid has no Barbies.

Marsh missionary

C.C., from C-5

Sue, would hammer home what statistics had not — that the erosion of coastal wetlands is a national tragedy.

Lockwood soon saw for himself how Katrina compounded that tragedy. He quickly departed Colorado and flew home to Louisiana, using connections to set-up airplane and helicopter fly-overs of New Orleans and Plaquemines Parish.

"The most shocking view was from a Black Hawk (helicopter) over southwest Louisiana," Lockwood said. "Before us was a big lake, a giant lake. The marsh was now a part of the Gulf."

Lockwood knows the wetlands like a kid knows his sandbox, having photographed them for decades. (His book on the Atchafalaya Basin, "Atchafalaya: America's Largest River Basin Swamp," was published in 1980.) When reporters come to visit him, he says, they usually want to see "the destruction, the sinking marsh." To which Lockwood always responds: "I can't show you what's gone because it's gone."

Everything Lockwood locks into photographs is in danger of being washed away or has been washed away. But it wasn't so much the precious remaining miles of marshland that caught Lockwood's attention in the post-Katrina plane rides as the absence of people on the ground, and what their displacement portended.

"I love the culture and the friendliness of south Louisiana people as much as I love the wildlife," he says. "The 'Marsh Mission' wasn't about saving the marsh for the marsh (but) wanting to save the marsh for the people who live there.

"If we had the marsh we had 150 years ago, we would have had 1,900 more square miles of marsh to slow down the surge," Lockwood explains. "The area pretty well withstood the winds. The flood came further, faster and higher because the marsh wasn't there to slow it down."

After Lockwood had thoroughly explored the city by air, he then set foot on it, spending a day and night in the French Quarter two weeks after the storm. There life had started to make rustling sounds again.

"The city may not be as big because it is so hard to protect. But we don't need a Dallas here. We need it to come back as New Orleans," Lockwood says.

He knows that restoring the state's hurricane barriers will take time, just as nature took time to diminish them.

"Over 6,000 years, the Mississippi snaked its way like a drunken garden hose to build 8,000 square miles of wetlands. So we can't expect our manmade projects to rebuild it overnight," he said. "But we need to get started. And sometime in the future, the additional marsh we help rebuild will be more protection for future storms."

PHOTOS COURTESY OF C.C. LOCKWOOD

A thunderstorm brews over Lake Salvador in Lafourche Parish, one of the areas with the most rapid coastal erosion in Louisiana.

And while technical plans to return sediment to marsh sounds like science and bureaucracy, the emotional element is now all too clear.

When Lockwood recently gave a photographic slide presentation of the "Marsh Mission" at the Louisiana Resource Center for Educators in Baton Rouge, he spoke about the marsh's role in flood control, economic development, tourism, oil infrastructure, shipping, navigation. And culture. All the words had been spoken before, but on this night, a teacher watching the presentation started to cry.

"She had lost her house and her job," Lockwood says.

What was a slide show about the disappearing wetlands was her life flashing before her eyes.

WDSU reporters braved the elements

WALKER, from C-5

Katrina's attack on the region inside the Louisiana Superdome, and offered some of the first live reports of that structure's roof failure — faced danger enough.

The chaos of Katrina's early hours and days were quiet hell for Williams.

"For me, it was, 'How do we continue to bring people information and continue to try to manage resources and manage people from different cities?' " he said. "But also I'm thinking about where these guys are.

"They would literally die doing what they do, and they almost did."

• • • • • •

On Katrina Sunday, WDSU's anchor team was dispatched to WAPT-TV, a WDSU corporate sister station in Jackson, Miss.

Traffic delays en route caused a slight coverage glitch — the news team at Orlando station WESH-TV, another WDSU corporate sibling, appeared on WDSU's New Orleans signal for part of Sunday night — but that would be the least of the station's worries in coming days.

WDSU reporting crews were distributed in various locations around town that Williams believed beforehand to be safe havens, including the Superdome, Ochsner Foundation Hospital on Jefferson Highway and Jefferson Parish's emergency operations center.

Heath Allen and videographer Tom Fitzgerald were sent to St. Bernard Parish, where they established a base of operations inside the parish's government's EOC.

There, Katrina herself was comparatively uneventful.

"We really weren't all that concerned," Allen said. "It was just a wind storm. We were faring pretty well. As a matter of fact, a couple of times that night I went out and sat in the live truck to get away from the crowd. Every once in a while I'd do a phoner to update the anchors.

"It didn't seem that bad early on."

Power stayed on till 5 a.m Monday. At mid-morning, Allen and Fitzgerald were able to work outside, and they walked over to a nearby Wal-Mart to get some wind footage.

"I looked at my watch," Allen said. "It was 9:35 in the morning. Tom was taking pictures. Great pictures, too. There was probably 5, 6, 8 inches of water in the road."

Then Allen noticed a little water "creeping up on curb" and "bubbling up in a grate."

The men headed back to their base.

"It took a few minutes," he said. "The wind was blowing. I stopped and said, 'Let's do some kind of stand-up.' "

By the time they arrived at the EOC, water was already covering car doors in the parking lot.

In a few more minutes it had made the exterior doors of the EOC impossible to open.

"People on the inside tried to open them," Allen said. "At about that time, the doors caved in under the pressure. The water picked me up and flew me into the building and set me down.

"It was like God saying, 'Let me get that door for you.' "

En route to the building's second floor, Allen got a glimpse of the WDSU live truck being completely submerged.

"At that point, everybody was kind of standing with their jaws open," Allen said. "We all just kind of stood there looking out the windows. Everything was under water as far as you could see in every direction. The only thing you could see were rooftops.

"We did the obligatory interviews and such and took pictures, and everybody was just like, 'Yeeow.' "

At some point in the frenzy, Allen had been able to quickly contact his news director.

"He gets me on the two-way and says, 'The water's rising fast. There's a wall of water coming through here. We're going up to the second floor,' " said Williams of Allen's Katrina-Monday communication from the field. "Then I don't hear from him for another 36 hours."

• • • • • •

Richard Angelico reported throughout the pre-Katrina weekend then returned to his Mid-City home.

"Anzio said, 'Go home and stay with your wife and report back to work tomorrow,' " Angelico said. "That's what we did. We had prepared for the storm like most families did. We had lots of water, ice, food, stuff like that."

Williams thought Angelico had taken refuge in a hospital with his wife, Diane, a longtime University Hospital employee who was actually due to report for emergency service at Charity, but not until after the storm.

Katrina's passage was "pretty scary," Angelico said. "That was the strongest hurricane I'd ever weathered. It battered the house. The ceiling fans and chandeliers were moving back and forth like pendulums. I hadn't seen that before."

When the wind stopped, Angelico's street was flooded, a typical circumstance in his neighborhood after many hard rains.

"The water in the street was still and quiet," he said. "At some point it started to get a current and run, like a rapids almost."

And it rose, though not enough to flood inside the raised 1906 house.

But the Angelicos and their tenant were stranded.

• • • • • •

As soon as it was safe, Allen and Fitzgerald found a boat — manned by St. Bernard water-company employees — and headed out on a rescue run.

"We pulled people off of rooftops for awhile," Allen said. "We pulled this one couple off. It was an old man and his wife. She was just beat up, hanging on for dear life . . . scraped up from the shingles.

"Another dude was standing on his roof with a dog and a raccoon — one, two, three. The water company guys said, 'You gotta leave your dog.' He said, 'It ain't my dog. I'm leaving.' We took him back over to Chalmette High School.

"Those boys from the water company, they were terrific. They were out the instant the wind died down."

With their vehicles submerged and isolated by the spreading disaster scene around them — "No cell, no nothing," Allen said, "that was the hardest part" — there was no way to get their reportage on the air, at least not immediately.

Still, the reporting continued.

"It's what you do," Allen said. "The story is right there in front of you. You could look out the window and see a story of such magnitude that you had to tell the story no matter when it finally got out."

There were ample provisions at their second-story base, though Allen said he has no idea how subsistence was achieved.

"Loaves and fishes, pal," he said with a laugh. "Nobody knows where the food came from. The first night it was hot dogs and chili from the National Guard folks. The next night, we got back and somebody was cooking red beans and rice. We were climbing through the window on the second floor in the dark and somebody was serving red beans and rice."

By the second day, parish officials began to move their base of operations. Allen and Fitzgerald found their way to a helicopter and made their way via chopper to Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport.

Allen was able to get a cell signal and make contact with his wife, who had relocated to safe territory before Katrina. She contacted WDSU.

The men then climbed aboard a news helicopter imported from Orlando's WESH-TV and flew along the Gulf all the way to Pensacola.

"I ordered the helicopter to take them as far east as possible, take them to Florida," Williams said. "I knew that if it dropped them anywhere close they would be right back in the city."

• • • • • •

By Wednesday, the sounds of nighttime gunfire in his neighborhood prompted Angelico to sleep in a chair in his living room with a pistol in each hand.

By the Thursday after the storm, it was time to get out.

"So we all made the decision, me, my wife, our tenant and some friends, to leave," Angelico said. "I said, 'There's no upside to staying here. The water's not going to go down.'

"I said, 'We've got to go. We have to leave the dogs behind.' "

Angelico's wife, an SPCA volunteer, was caring for five dogs. There were also a few cats.

"It was heartbreaking," he said. "Your pets become like family members. It was a very, very difficult to do."

The group worked its way via canoe to Lindy Boggs Medical Center on Jefferson Davis Parkway, where helicopters were ferrying evacuees to safety.

From there they were airlifted to the staging area at Causeway and Interstate-10, where buses were shipping evacuees to parts unknown.

"That was just an absolute melee," Angelico said. "Everybody in uniform was walking around drinking Cokes and coffee. It didn't look like anybody was in charge."

Angelico's wife finally got a cell signal, and reached a relative in Lafayette who said another relative was already inbound to get them.

The person on the other end of the phone said, "Under no circumstance get on a bus."

About an hour later, deliverance pulled up in a pickup truck.

Angelico, his wife "and about five of our neighbors" escaped to a family rendezvous spot in Gonzalez.

There, a nephew asked: "Uncle Richard, where are your dogs?"

Angelico explained that he'd had to leave them behind.

"I said, 'Not only that, but there are two neighbors we had to leave behind, too,' " he said. "One had fallen and broken some ribs, the other had a mild stroke and couldn't make it through the water."

"Uncle Richard, I'll go get 'em," said the nephew, Marine Corp. Ross Craft of Lafayette, a sharpshooter on leave from duty in Iraq.

"Son, there's no way to get through that water to our house, and there's no way to get out," said Angelico.

"I'll get 'em, Uncle Richard," Craft said.

As recounted by Angelico, the resulting sub-saga — involving Craft, another pick-up truckload of evacuees (including the rescue cargo of the Angelico menagerie, two partially disabled neighbors plus five neighbor chihuahuas and two parrots) and a middle-of-the-night shootout with looters in the wilds of City Park — will someday make an excellent action-adventure film.

Angelico went to Lafayette for the night but got a call from Craft at about 4 a.m.

Mission accomplished.

"When I got to Gonzales, he was standing silhouetted against the dawn smoking a cigarette," Angelico said. "I couldn't believe my eyes. Somehow he got the truck through the water and ... rescued our friends we had to leave behind and our animals. It was just amazing. It was like Superman."

In Lafayette, Angelico learned that he was listed as missing on the corporate Web site of WDSU parent Hearst-Argyle Television, then made contact with corporate headquarters.

"I told them where we were, that we were alive and that everything was fine," he said. "Everything wasn't fine. But it was as fine as it was going to get."

• • • • • •

Angelico was shortly reporting for WDSU in Baton Rouge, from where he'd ultimately swing into western Louisiana to report on the aftermath of Hurricane Rita.

Allen, meanwhile, has spent almost all of his post-Katrina work time based out of WDSU's New Orleans bureau — actually the station's Central Business District headquarters, which has also served as a base for NBC broadcast and cable network crews.

"You'd have to drag me out of here kicking and screaming with my nails scraping on the sidewalk," Allen said. "This is where you have to be, I think.

"I didn't and don't want to go anywhere else."

Williams said he's had to force many of his staffers, Allen chief among them, to take days off during the post-Katrina scramble.

At least he knows where to find him.

"Those were some emotional times, and times I'll never forget," Williams said. "Getting the first word that (Allen and Fitzgerald) were OK, getting the first word that they were in a helicopter and coming back, learning that Richie was OK . . .

"My priority has been to take care of my people. I know that if I take care of the people, they will take care of the product, the daily mission of news-gathering.

"It was probably a good two days where I felt like I had failed — failed at protecting my people."

Mourning the stuff of our lives

ROSE, from C-5

No Winnie the Pooh sheets. No bicycles. He doesn't have his wedding photo album or his family videos or his record collection or his computer hard drive or his Jazzfest posters.

Yeah, it's just stuff, but it's the stuff of our lives. Our past.

My past is intact; his is gone. And you can't help him. What am I suppose to do: offer a picture of my wife and I from our honeymoon, like those pictures that are already in the frame when you buy them at Pottery Barn?

Here's a happy memory. It's not yours, but go with it.

It's weird. I don't know if there's ever been a social restructuring like this before, an awkwardness between friends and family and co-workers. The haves and the hads, the lucky and the resigned, the depressed and the defeated.

Amazingly, many of my friends who lost everything but are still hanging around seem better adjusted than many whose possessions survived intact. Maybe it helps when there are tens of thousands sharing your pain. That kind of takes the "woe is me" element out of play.

Woe is us.

But, back to where I started here: I am out of town right now but this time, when I left, it was without tears in my eyes and shaky hands and a lost and dire sense of place and purpose.

Last week, each day an old neighbor showed back up on my block, cleaned out all the mess and moved back in. And every night, most of us sat out on my front stoop and solved the problems of the world and amid all the horror of all of this, there seems so much hope underneath.

"The pizza joint on the corner is open!" someone will say and we'll all high-five like normality is restored.

Of course, we've always been a delusional lot in New Orleans. Let me guess: You still think the Saints have a shot at the playoffs, don't you?

OK, maybe I'm stretching the analogy too far.

But the point is, here we are — a lot of us, at least — and not a damn one of us knows what the future holds but I know more people who live on my block now than I did before the storm and we're all out dragging each others' rotten-ass refrigerators to the curb and no one in the car behind me has honked once when I've stopped in the road to yell to a friend I see walking down the street for the first time because, well, really: Where is there to hurry to?

But more than that, it's a time for unforced civility. Everyone around here is always yelling: "Welcome home!" And strangers keep saying to each other: "Good luck," and you can tell they mean it this time like never before.

I mean, that's the reality, right? Luck, a few billion dollars, higher levees and a new quarterback are really all we need and we're right back on track around here.

Saints were lowlight of big sports weekend

For at least one team whose name will go unmentioned, it was a lost weekend, something that had to do with a final score of 52-3.

For the world of sports, it was anything but.

On the golf course, two of the biggest draws in the game were going at it in sudden death — but John Daly missed a three-foot putt and handed another championship to Tiger Woods, his sixth of the year.

On the baseball field, at Minute Maid Park in Houston, the Astros and Braves played a game that lasted 350 minutes, 10 minutes short of six hours, the longest in postseason history, before a guy you'd never heard of ended it with a home run in the bottom of the 18th, sending the Astros on to battle the St. Louis Cardinals for the National League pennant.

The Astros needed a grand slam in the eighth and a tying homer with two out in the ninth to keep playing, after which they needed a couple of relief innings from ex-Yankee Roger Clemens.

At the same time, the Yankees were managing to stay alive against the Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim, with the World Series network offering a silent prayer for New York success.

Meanwhile, on the football field, it was Geritol time, for a college coach and an NFL quarterback.

Joe Paterno, who's pushing 79, watched his Penn Staters upset No. 6 Ohio State on Saturday, and Sunday, Vinny Testaverde, who'll be 42 next month, had an old hand in the Jets handing Tampa Bay its first loss of the season.

Both stories were packed with warm, fuzzy sidebars.

Paterno has been head coach of the Nittany Lions for 39 years. He refused to be pushed into retirement when the program fell on hard times. On Saturday, along with 110,000 fans in Happy Valley, Joe watched the Buckeyes fall 17-10.

Also, Penn State went to 6-0 and climb to No. 8 in The Associated Press rankings.

Can Penn State climb higher? Who knows? This week Michigan could end the climb. For the moment, though, Paterno has proven a coach can adjust to advancing age by listening to younger assistants, and also by recruiting blue-chippers he is not afraid to play as freshmen.

When Penn State and Alabama were in town for a long-ago Sugar Bowl (Bear Bryant's Crimson Tide made a goal-line stand to win the game and the national championship), Bryant said: "Joe and I are the same in one way. We're both stubborn. We're different in another. He'll be coaching long after I'm gone." A golden prediction, it turned out.

As for Vinny Testaverde, he had no idea he'd be in uniform this year. But injuries happen as the oft-injured Vinny knows well. Testaverde, who happens to live 15 minutes from the Jets' training facility, was preparing to take his kids to school a week ago when the phone rang. The Jets had lost starter Chad Pennington and backup Jay Fiedler and were desperate.

Would an ex-Jet help? Yes.

On Sunday, the first player taken in the 1987 draft had modest stats (13-for-19 for 163 yards and one interception), but he didn't make any serious mistakes, and with the defense playing lights out, he moved the chains enough to help nudge his team into a 14-12 lead.

Whereupon, Vinny's moment of truth arrived.

In the final two minutes, with the Jets trying to run out the clock, Testaverde faced a third-and-four at his 31-yard line.

At which time, he produced his best throw of the afternoon, a 17-yarder he threaded between two defenders for a game-saving first down.

Can Vinny do it again?

Who knows?

"If my offensive line allows me to get hit only three times a game," said a quarterback now into his 19th professional season, "I'm going to play a long time."

Thankful Astros ready for Cardinals

After historic victory Houston rests, prepares for NLCS rematch

By Stephen Hawkins
AP Sports Writer

HOUSTON — Sure, the Houston Astros had a plan in case Roger Clemens needed relief: Now pitching for the first time in his big league career, outfielder Jason Lane.

Fortunately for the Astros, and Lane, they didn't have to go that route. Instead, they'll head to St. Louis with their rotation fully rested for the NL championship series. Andy Pettitte is lined up to start Game 1 Wednesday night.

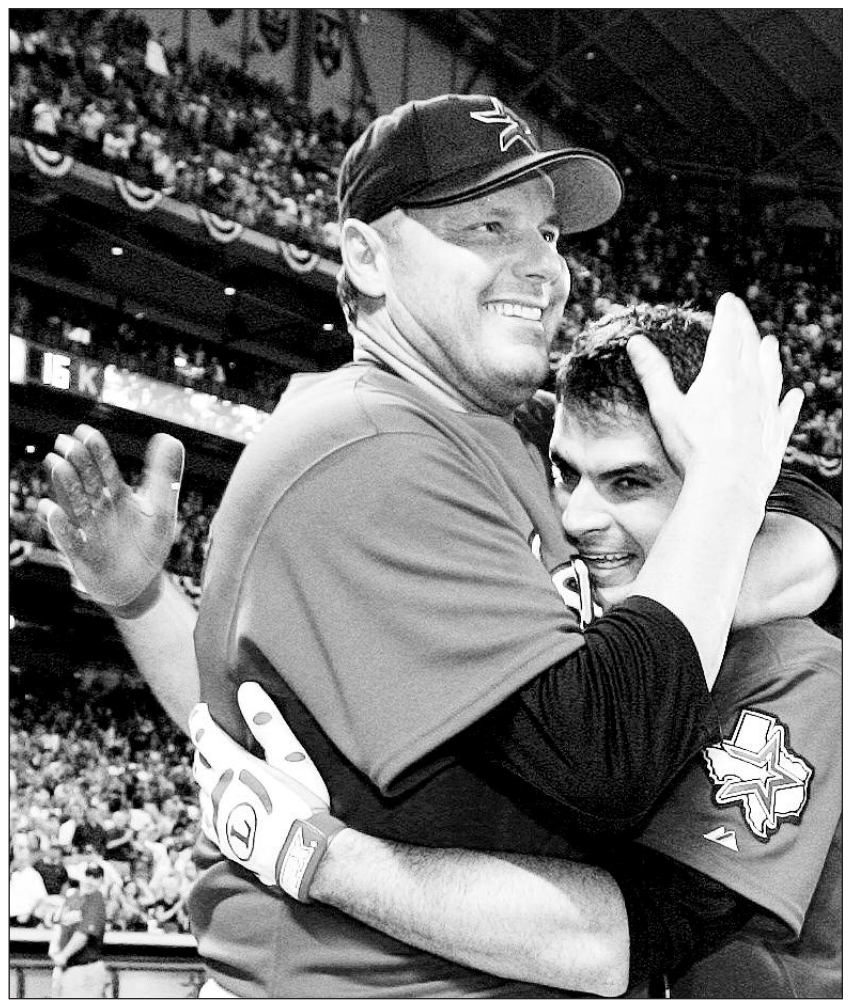
All thanks to Clemens and Chris Burke. Clemens pitched three scoreless innings in his first relief appearance since 1984, and Burke homered in the 18th to end the longest postseason game ever and lift the Astros over Atlanta 7-6 Sunday.

"Rocket might have thrown 10, 20 innings," Houston manager Phil Garner said. "I think he was prepared to do whatever it took. And that's the way the man is. I've never seen anybody like him. He's amazing."

The Game 4 victory clinched the first-round series, and it took five hours, 50 minutes and eight Astros pitchers to win it.

"I wasn't thinking instant classic," Houston third baseman Morgan Ensberg said. "I was thinking it was a grind-out dogfight that we had to figure out someway to come out on top."

Rather than traveling for a decisive Game 5 in Atlanta, the Astros got some much-needed rest Monday. Garner gave his club the day off.



Next up is a rematch with St. Louis. The Cardinals won the NLCS in seven games last October to deny the Astros their first World Series appearance.

"We finally have another opportunity with the Cardinals. We have a shot," Houston second baseman Craig Biggio said. "You only get a few chances like this in your career."

Garner used every player on his 25-man playoff roster Sunday except Pettitte and Roy Oswalt.

Oswalt won Saturday night in Game 3, which ended just 14 hours before the series-ending marathon started, and Pettitte would have been needed for a game Monday.

The Astros still have Clemens and 20-game winner Oswalt for Games 2 and 3 in the NLCS. The only thing unclear was if the Rocket's 44 pitches on two days' rest would change the order.

AP PHOTO

Houston's Roger Clemens, left, gives a hug to Chris Burke following the Astros' 7-6 victory over Atlanta on Sunday. The Astros will be rested when they face the St. Louis Cardinals in the NLCS, beginning Wednesday.

Pitching in a relief role for the first time since he was a rookie, Clemens atoned for his poor Game 2 start. He struck out four of the 11 batters he faced and allowed just one hit.

If the game had dragged on longer, Garner was ready to use Lane, who last pitched in a game in 1999 for Southern California. And Clemens, who before throwing a pitch entered the game in the 15th in the first pinch-hitting appearance of his career, might have stayed in the game.

"I'm sure they could hide me in the outfield. Why not?" Clemens said.

The Astros are in the playoffs for the ninth time. The closest they came to the World Series was last season, when Clemens had an early lead in the seventh game of the NLCS against the Cardinals.

It didn't seem like the Astros would get another playoff chance this season when they were 15-30 in May. But Houston went 74-43 the rest of the way, clinched the NL wild card outright by winning on the final day of the regular season, and became the first team since the 1914 Boston Braves to make the playoffs after being 15 games under .500 in the same season.

"There's no doubt about it, this year has been the most special year," said Biggio, 39, who has spent all of his career in Houston and is on his sixth playoff club.

The series-clinching marathon victory over the Braves was just a microcosm of the entire season. The Astros got down big early, battled back and won at the very end.

Atlanta led 6-1 in the eighth inning Sunday before Lance Berkman, who Burke ran for two innings later, hit a grand slam. The Astros tied the game on Brad Ausmus' two-out homer in the ninth.

"It's been a grind for us for a long time," Ensberg said. "We've been playing playoff baseball since April."

And they're still playing in October.

At least Chicago finds some support

By Jim Litke

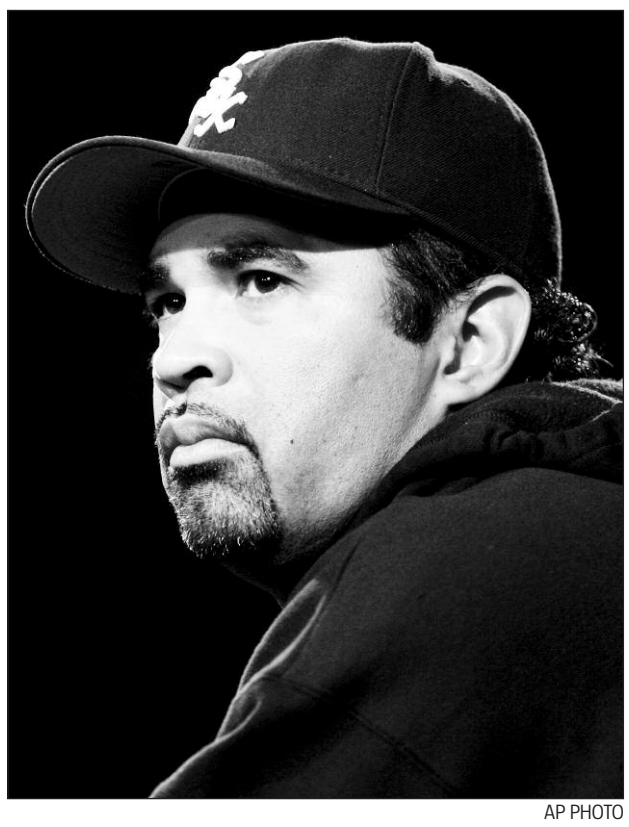
CHICAGO — Anybody looking for the White Sox Nation is going to need more than a map.

For one thing, the team barely owns its own neighborhood.



For another, the White Sox don't offer enough tradition, romance, celebrities or even anguish for most tortured souls to latch onto. With the Red Sox shedding their lovable loser tag a year ago, the Cubs have that market cornered in Chicago.

And third, even if there is such a thing as a White Sox nation, it's probably Venezuela. It's one of the few countries south of the city limits where: a.) baseball is bigger than futbol; and b.) the Cuban national team isn't the hands-down favorite.

"Oh, yeah," White Sox manager Ozzie Guillen said. "Venezuela definitely loves us."

Guillen explains this is so largely because of native sons Chico Carrasquel, who became the first Latin American All-Star in major league history while playing shortstop for the White Sox in the early 1950s, and Luis Aparicio, who took over the position, made an even bigger splash, and gave every Venezuelan kid who ever lingered on a diamond something to aspire to.

Guillen also is a hit back home. Because no sooner had the former shortstop and first Venezuelan to become a big-league manager clinched the American League Central title than he received a call from President Hugo Chavez.

Chicago White Sox manager Ozzie Guillen, who left Venezuela to become a big-league manager, says his home country loves his team.

"I would say I was honored," Guillen recalled about his appearance a week ago Sunday on Chavez's national radio show. "Not too many people like the president. I do. My mom will kill me, but it's an honor to talk to the president."

The team drew 2,343,833 fans this season, the fourth-largest attendance in franchise history and the biggest since 1993. Two decades ago, that kind of number was good enough for the White Sox to score annual attendance victories over the crosstown Cubs. But decisions may have reversed that trend.

Shortly after buying the team in 1981 from Bill Veeck, a limited partnership headed by Jerry Reinsdorf and Eddie Einhorn put some of their games on WGN's just-launched superstation. Unhappy with the ratings and cash flow, the duo decided to sell the team's games on a pay subscription channel called SportsVision. A month later, Harry Caray, the White Sox's popular announcer, switched allegiances and joined the Cubs.

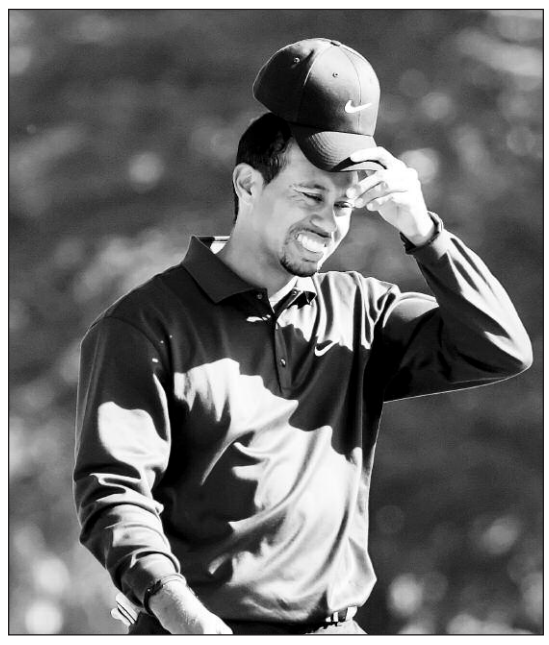
"I would lose my people - cab drivers, bartenders and others," Caray was quoted at the time, "who can't afford cable TV."

The White Sox then lost fans in droves. Cubs games were carried across the country and beyond.

White Sox fans back home felt embittered and the ones who moved away felt cut off. In an article on Slate.com in August, Mike DeBonis, senior editor of the Washington City Paper, captured the feeling.

"But if they do win it all, there won't be hundreds of books and special-edition DVDs that exhaustively document the final moments of anguish and misery on Chicago's South Side," DeBonis wrote. "When the sports world's most mundane epic losing streak ends, it will go quietly."

The club had a chance to turn things around with the construction of a new ballpark in 1990. With Reinsdorf threatening to leave town, an 11th-hour legislative deal got the stadium built. But the ballpark is cold and lacking in charm.



"It's been pretty comfortable here in the shadow of every other loser in baseball. And if they win, there won't be some mammoth catharsis as we slough off our losing reputation. Which is fine, too," DeBonis concluded. "Unlike Red Sox or Cubs fans, we won't have to re-evaluate our relationship with our longtime losers. Our Sox can just go on winning. Or losing. Whatever."

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL

PHILLIES FIRE WADE: Ed Wade was fired as general manager of the Philadelphia Phillies on Monday after failing to get them into the playoffs in eight years on the job. "This was a very difficult decision. No one works harder than Ed," president David Montgomery said in a statement. "At the same time, we have not been able to achieve the goals we have set for the Phillies. As a result, I believe we have reached a point where a change is necessary." Philadelphia finished 88-74, one game behind NL wild-card winner Houston. The Phillies haven't reached the playoffs since 1993, and have won one championship (1980) in the franchise's 123-year history. Wade, 49, has two years remaining on his contract, and it's unknown if he will remain in the organization.

AROUND THE MAJORS: Relievers Ben Weber and Chris Booker and second baseman D'Angelo Jimenez left the Cincinnati Reds as free agents, rather than accept outright assignments to the minors, and the club announced that first base coach Randy Whisler won't return next season. . . . Detroit Tigers pitcher Gary Knotts was released, and pitcher Sean Douglass claimed off waivers by the Cleveland Indians.

Tiger Woods has earned $12,977,000 in World Golf Championships events, more than all but 35 golfers have earned in their entire PGA careers.

GOLF

TIGER STILL RULES WORLD: The World Golf Championships were created to bring together the best players from around the globe. They have turned into an annuity for the world's No. 1 player. Tiger Woods' playoff victory over John Daly in the American Express Championship was Woods' 10th world title since this series began in 1999. He has finished out of the top 10 twice in 19 starts, both of them early exits from the Match Play Championship. The $1.3 million check Sunday brought his career earnings in the World Golf Championships to $12,977,000, more money than all but 35 players have made in their PGA Tour careers. "I've worked really hard to get to this point, to a point where I can compete," Woods said. "Each and every week, I feel as if I just play my game, I should have a chance come the back nine, and that's where you want to get to."

MORE GOLF: Ellendale Country Club in Houma will host a tournament Oct. 18, to raise money to assist PGA golf professionals and superintendents in the PGA Gulf States Section impacted by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. The PGA estimates that as many as 200 of its members were impacted, director of golf Rob Bradley said. The event will feature a four-person shamble, with gross and net divisions. A $200 minimum donation per person is required. To register, contact the Ellendale Golf Shop at (985) 876-4394. . . . The AJGA's 12th annual Robert Trent Jones Golf Trail Junior in Mobile, Ala., will be played Oct. 7-10. The Srixon Qualifier will be rescheduled. The Audubon Golf Trail Top 100 Presented by Hilton New Orleans Riverside, scheduled for Sept. 30-Oct. 2, was cancelled. All those entered in the Audubon event, and those that withdraw from the Mobile event, will be granted refunds.

HORSE RACING

AFLEET ALEX OUT OF CUP: Afleet Alex won't run in the Breeders' Cup Classic. Trainer Tim Ritchey and veterinarian Patricia Hogan said the Preakness and Belmont Stakes winner's leg injury is not fully healed and he won't be ready for the Breeders' Cup on Oct. 29. "The horse is doing very well clinically and has progressed remarkably well. Ö We feel it is in Alex's best interests to miss the Breeders' Cup races," Ritchey and Hogan said in a joint statement on Afleet Alex's Web site. "Unfortunately, the timing is just a little too close to demand the enormous athletic effort that would be required to race at that elite level of competition. Although perhaps a disappointment for racing, it is only a temporary one. The prognosis remains excellent for a return to Alex's elite level of competition." Afleet Alex was sidelined with a fractured left-front canon bone July 21. Surgery was performed less than a week later, and a screw was inserted in the bone. In the past two weeks, Afleet Alex had two solid workouts at Belmont Park and Ritchey was optimistic the horse could return to the races this weekend, and then run in the Classic with Horse of the Year honors up for grabs. "All involved with Alex agreed that if that was to be a possibility, then the healing process was to have been completed 100 percent for this to be considered. After the recent works, Alex was radiographed again, and although it is very subtle, it is evident that bone is still in the end stages of the healing process. We are 99 percent there, but for this horse we require 100 percent." Afleet Alex has won eight of 12 career starts for earnings of $2,765,800 for Cash Is King Stable.

A punch by Pongsaklek in the second round left a cut just above the right eye of Naito, whose bleeding caused the fight to end at 2 minutes, 38 seconds of the seventh.

Grieving family awaits body

Ninth Ward resident Dorothy Holloman's relatives think she would have enjoyed her funeral service on Oct. 1 in New Roads.

Her cousin from Lake Charles, Sonya Green, sang "Precious Lord," the favorite gospel hymn of the 68-year-old victim of Hurricane Katrina. Most of the 300 mourners, including members of her 1956 high school graduating class, wept as an organist squeezed out a sorrowful version of "Amazing Grace." The Rev. Robert Tanner of the New Tree of Life Baptist Church in New Orleans eulogized about the veteran cab driver's "good life."

Only one detail of the solemn farewell troubled Yolanda Barbarin, Holloman's eldest daughter from Harvey.

"There was no body in the casket," said Barbarin, who initiated the recovery of her mother's body from Holloman's home at 2520 Tupelo St., coordinated the funeral arrangements and fretted as her mother's corpse was hauled away to the huge morgue full of Katrina victims in St. Gabriel managed by the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals.

WASHINGTON — Even before last week's public spat between Sens. Mary Landrieu and David Vitter over whether to go along with the GOP's insistence that Gulf Coast communities pay back federal loans, there were signs the Louisiana delegation's united front in pursuit of Hurricane Katrina relief was shaky.

The cracks began when Democrat Landrieu and Republican Vitter announced their $250 billion bill to rebuild Louisiana, but then each filed separate versions, with Landrieu's listing her as the prime sponsor and Vitter's listing him in that category.

Underscoring his pledge to rebuild the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina, President Bush wrapped up his eighth trip to the storm-wracked region Tuesday by hammering nails in Covington and meeting with federal representatives on the West Bank.

Bush's flurry of visits follows initial criticism of the federal relief effort as woefully tardy and inept. Since then, however, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and other local officials have avoided attacks on Washington or the White House, and their comments Tuesday

BATON ROUGE — One of the largest hurricane evacuation shelters in the state will close by the end of the week, with many evacuees from the New Orleans area being moved to travel trailers set up in a small town north of Baton Rouge, officials said Tuesday.

New Orleans residents who fled Hurricane Katrina have been staying at Baton Rouge's River Center for the past six weeks, with about 470 people still there, down from nearly 6,000 just after the storm hit on Aug. 29. The number of people at the center has dropped dramatically in recent days as families move to the trailer site in Baker.

Because the River Center hosts many revenue-generating events that come through Baton Rouge, the city government has asked that the shelter be shut down, said Alisa Feldman, a Red Cross spokeswoman for the center. While addressing a legislative panel Tuesday, Baton Rouge Mayor Kip Holden said the convention center wasn't designed to be used as a long-term shelter.

STAFF PHOTO BY BRETT DUKE

People who are now in shelters are being offered homes in a trailer village in Baker being set up by Federal Emergency Management Agency workers.

"We have to transition back into what the center was designed for," Holden said, adding that it had lost at least $100,000 in revenue and will need about $600,000 in repairs because of wear and tear and some deliberate damages "by a few of the people" staying there.

According to the state Department of Social Services, about 2,400 people are in shelters in Baton Rouge, and a total of about 13,000 are housed throughout the state.

Excluding some newly opened shelters welcoming back people displaced by Hurricane Rita in September, some shelters in the state will close in the next few days, said Kim Hunter Reed, the governor's aide on hurricane relief housing.

Some private schools may reopen

But public schools on city's east bank will stay closed

By Mark Waller
Staff writer

Five private schools on the east bank of New Orleans plan to reopen in the next few weeks, a move some of their leaders describe as fulfilling a civic responsibility to help the city rebound from Hurricane Katrina, even as some public school officials have argued against restarting their east bank schools any time before the summer of 2006.

The Rev. William Maestri, superintendent of Archdiocese of New Orleans schools, said St. Louis Cathedral Academy in the French Quarter will reopen Monday and De La Salle High School will welcome students back to its Uptown campus Tuesday. St. George's Episcopal School and Louise S. McGehee School resume classes Oct. 24, and Academy of the Sacred Heart expects to come back Nov. 7.

Eleven more Catholic schools are ready to return as soon as electricity and other services are restored, Maestri said.

"We don't have education going on in Orleans Parish," Maestri said, expressing frustration and anger with public officials. "Why aren't we having this discussion? Why aren't we having this action to get this going? I'm tired of talking about what's not opening and what's not working. Why isn't there more attention being paid to success rather than failure?"

Maestri said parents from storm-closed public schools should be granted tuition vouchers with taxpayer money to attend Catholic schools. The archdiocese has long made a priority of voucher programs, and Maestri said Catholic education leaders now are pushing them again with local, state and federal authorities, this time in the context of the Katrina disaster, but with little response.

Earlier this month, Torin Sanders, president of the Orleans Parish School Board, said no east bank public schools would reopen for the 2005-06

Storm takes toll on children

Experts say talking can help kids cope

By Valerie Bauman
Associated Press writer

JACKSON, MISS. — Brooke Anderson tries not to think about the storm that wrecked her hometown of Gulfport, Miss.

Now living in Jackson with her father, the 11-year-old went a week without a shower or clean water to brush her teeth after Hurricane Katrina. She went to bed scared each night, trying to sleep in the oppressive heat.

"It makes me very mad when I think about it, because I'm mad we had to go through this," Brooke said. "And I'm mad that Katrina wrecked my town."

Thousands of children such as Brooke are still sorting through their feelings more than a month after Katrina hit, trying to make sense of the tragedy as they get settled in unfamiliar cities and strange new homes.

It's not uncommon for children to struggle with negative thoughts and memories for months or even years after a disaster, said Robert Sevier, a psychologist from Hattiesburg.

"It's just going to be a time of transition," Sevier said. "And I think parents should expect that this is not going to resolve itself overnight."

Annette La Greca, a professor of psychology and pediatrics at the University of Miami, said it's hardest for children whose lives were threatened or for those who at least believed that they were in danger.

La Greca, who wrote a guide for helping children deal with the psychological effects of a hurricane, conducted a study after Hurricane Andrew in 1992. Of the 500 to 600 children La Greca evaluated, 90 percent reported that they were still reliving the experience three months later.

Reliving the event — having constant, intrusive thoughts, or bad dreams — can be one symptom of post-traumatic stress disorder. Other symptoms include a sense of numbness, or avoidance, feeling distant from an event or avoiding anything having to do with it.

But most children will not suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder, said Robin Gurwitch, a psychologist in Oklahoma City who is a member of the American Psychology Association disaster response network.

"It does not mean they will not have difficulty, it does not mean they will not need help, but the good news is that most children are not likely to develop PTSD," Gurwitch said.

More likely is for children to develop other symptoms of anxiety and stress, Sevier said.

For some children, settling into a new school also can be stressful, particularly as the months pass and they realize they may never go home.

The next obstacle for children will be the approaching holiday season. For families that lost everything, providing the same kind of Thanksgiving dinner or holiday gifts may be impossible.

Parents and teachers can help by giving children a comforting daily routine and by talking to them about the hurricane. Children respond well to a parent who keeps a positive outlook, La Greca said.

Trailered workers to get FEMA checks

Shipbuilder says Bush assured him

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Louisiana shipbuilder Donald "Boysie" Bollinger said Tuesday he has received assurances from President Bush that the federal government will provide trailers on company work sites for employees displaced by Hurricane Katrina without costing the workers' families their government-subsidized rental checks.

As a way of reviving the storm-shattered local economy, the Federal Emergency Management Agency had been providing travel trailers to businesses throughout southeastern Louisiana to house workers close to their jobs. But employees complained that if they moved into the trailers, their families would be unable to collect the $2,358 housing voucher that FEMA has promised to hurricane evacuees.

Bollinger, a Republican Party activist and prominent Louisiana businessman, said the restriction "destroyed the whole intent of the program" because it discouraged employees from going back to work.

With Bush in New Orleans for a dinner Monday night with local politicians and business leaders, Bollinger said he decided to take up the matter directly with the president. He said Bush told him the FEMA policy was "incorrect" and would be fixed.

"If it's the head of household living in the trailer, it shouldn't be held against a family trying to establish a productive life," Bollinger said the president told him. "I got it from the highest authority."

FEMA officials said they were preparing to make an announcement about the program, but had not firmed up the details as of late Tuesday. A spokeswoman called the situation "fluid."

Working with the Louisiana Department of Economic Development, FEMA has placed about 6,000 workers in temporary trailers at their job sites. It was up to the companies to supply electricity, water and sewage hookups.

Large energy and chemical companies got first priority. Bollinger said his shipbuilding operation got 70 trailers, which have been set up at four sites in metropolitan New Orleans. The program proved so popular that hundreds of companies of all sizes signed up to enroll.

"I have a lot of people who want to come back," said Sam Lee, director of human resources at Sav-A-Center. "But they are saying I don't have a place to live. Talk to any retailer in the New Orleans area, and they will tell you the same thing: I can't get my people back."

Louisiana business owners and economic development officials said FEMA canceled the business trailer program Sept. 30 out of concern that only businesses supplying "essential services" should be given trailers to house employees. Daniel Craig, FEMA's director of the recovery division, said preference should be given to educational and medical facilities, utilities and public-works operations, according to a report in the Wall Street Journal, which obtained an internal memo.

The decision infuriated some local business leaders, who see the program as a key to rebuilding the local economy that has been decimated in the storm and is now struggling to rebuild.

"This is the one thing that could really help," said Pete Chocheles, who works with the Jefferson Parish Economic Development Commission.

Business owners expressed guarded relief as news spread that the program will be revived.

Peter Gambel, vice president of National Fruit Flavor, said that if the program pans out, it will be an important incentive to getting workers back to his syrup-manufacturing business in Elmwood Business Park. Gambel already has applied for six FEMA trailers.

"We are very excited about the prospect," he said.

Black ministers say they're locked out by Red Cross

Group is starting own relief organization

By Jenny Jarvie
Los Angeles Times

ATLANTA — When the Rev. Timothy McDonald arrived at a Red Cross shelter to serve baked chicken, collard greens and macaroni and cheese to evacuees, a Red Cross volunteer told him they could not accept his food.

McDonald, shocked and disappointed, approached a man who was serving food and asked him what group he was with.

"I'm with God," the man said.

"So am I," McDonald replied. "What organization are you with?"

"We're with the Southern Baptists," the man said, explaining that the Southern Baptist Convention has a partnership with the American Red Cross. McDonald's First Iconium Baptist Church, a modest black church in East Atlanta, does not.

"That's the reason they didn't want my chicken," said McDonald, pounding his fist on the pulpit. He is chairman of African American Ministers in Action, an advocacy group representing 5,000 clergy in 20 states.

McDonald's story, told at a forum on race last week in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, illustrated a rising concern. A veteran activist and community leader, McDonald expected to have a big role in the hurricane relief effort. Instead, he said, he has been locked out of the process, except as a critic.

Efforts to aid the evacuees in Atlanta have been harshly criticized in this city, which prides itself on its civil rights legacy. An estimated 50,000 hurricane evacuees have settled in the city, at least temporarily, and black ministers have rebuked government agencies and Red Cross chapters for failing to respond adequately. Many of the ministers, convinced that mainstream aid agencies will not work with them, are creating their own organizations.

Nearly 200 black ministers and community activists sat in First Iconium's pews one day last week for a hastily assembled town hall meeting.

"Unless those of us who are committed to truth and justice speak, there will be nothing but greed that prevails," said McDonald, 51. "We have been called for something like this."

McDonald then took his critique of hurricane relief on the road. At a meeting two days later hosted by Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., he pressed the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Red Cross to increase partnerships with black churches to provide services.

McDonald, who is on the board of the Red Cross' Metropolitan Atlanta chapter, says he does not know a single black church that has an arrangement with the Red Cross. As he has struggled to meet FEMA and Red Cross officials, he said, he has gradually realized that he is an outsider despite his connections.

"Black ministers have not been allowed in the door," he said. "Our eyes have been opened, too."

The Rev. Darryl Winston, pastor of the Church of Greater Works in south Atlanta and president of the Greater American Ministerial Association, said many in his community have offered to volunteer with the Red Cross but have not been contacted by the organization. "The Red Cross has the money," he said, "but the Red Cross simply does not have the grass-roots connections."

Winston has linked up with other pastors to establish a new relief organization, underwritten by church budgets, called Faith and Community Based Response to Emergency Disasters.

A spokesman for the Red Cross acknowledged that the organization needs to build its presence in poor black neighborhoods.

"This is something that has opened a lot of people's eyes," said Bill Reynolds, spokesman for the Red Cross' Metropolitan Atlanta Chapter. "There should be Red Cross resources right there in those communities. But it goes both ways. This is a great lesson that should be learned by everyone, not just the Red Cross."

A spokeswoman for FEMA, which does not contract directly with nonprofit organizations, said the agency is still attempting to educate people about its role.

Some black civic leaders are urging pastors to build a presence within mainstream organizations.

"We need to be part of anything that has millions of dollars and spends it in our community," said William Lucy, founder and president of the Coalition of Black Trade Unionists. Lucy, who worked alongside the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. to organize striking sanitation workers in Memphis, Tenn., is on the board of governors of the American Red Cross.

Portion of U.S. 90 to open in Miss.

Restoration dug up debris and gators

By The Associated Press

BILOXI, MISS. — Mississippi transportation officials expect the first phase of restoration of U.S. 90 to be complete Tuesday.

The eastbound lanes will be available for traffic, although municipalities are expected to continue to restrict the highway's use to emergency, recovery and debris-removal vehicles.

David Seyfarth, an engineer for the Mississippi Department of Transportation, said drainage has been the biggest problem.

He said getting sand out of the drainage system is the least of the problems. He said high-powered vacuum trucks and pressurized sewer hogs blow 2,000 pounds per square inch of water to rinse out the drain pipes.

"It's just taking longer than we anticipated," Seyfarth said of the U.S. 90 work. "But nobody knew how long it was going to take going in."

Seyfarth said workers have also found sinks, toilets and carpet — and alligators. He said the alligators have been up to 7 ½ feet.

There was also a tree.

"I don't know how that got there," Seyfarth said.

Three contracts have been awarded for the emergency work.

The first phase has been aimed at getting at least asphalt everywhere along those two lanes, along with rudimentary traffic signals. The westbound lanes are expected to be done Oct. 25.

Complete rehabilitation of U.S. 90 will probably tie in with the completion of the two bridges in July 2007. The Mississippi Transportation Department plans to use ground-penetrating radar to help find voids in the underlying roadbed that could cause future problems, Seyfarth said.

FEMA to rebid four large contracts

Few deals went to minority or local businesses

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Under fire for awarding large noncompetitive hurricane recovery contracts that included few local or minority-owned businesses, the Federal Emergency Management Agency announced Tuesday it will rebid four large jobs.

David Paulison, director of the disaster agency, said special consideration will be given to applicants from areas hardest hit by Hurricane Katrina as well as to disadvantaged businesses.

"In the immediate response phase for Hurricane Katrina, our priority was to get relief quickly to those in need," Paulison said.

As of Oct. 3, two of 140 contracts awarded by FEMA had gone to Louisiana-based firms. Together, they accounted for less than one half of 1 percent of the $1.6 billion in contracts that had been awarded since the Aug. 29 storm. Minority-owned businesses accounted for 1.5 percent of the total.

Local companies struggling to stay in business after the hurricane complained they were being shut out of the massive recovery operation while work was going to large, out-of-state firms.

In the immediate aftermath of the storm, FEMA awarded contracts worth as much as $100 million each to four large engineering and construction companies to set up disaster recovery centers, haul and install temporary housing, and perform other logistical duties. Fluor Corp., CH2M Hill, Bechtel Corp. and the Shaw Group landed the contracts without competition. They will be eligible to bid on a new round of contracts to provide technical assistance in future disasters, but the current work will be rebid, Paulison said.

Small companies or those run by minorities or women, or those businesses classified as "disadvantaged" by the Small Business Administration, will be eligible to bid. In the selection process, according to FEMA, preference will be given to firms in Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi.

It's unclear how many contracts will be awarded or what they will be worth. Details are expected to be available in about a week at the Web site www.fedbizopps.gov.

Also Tuesday, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez announced the creation of a centralized hurricane information center to help small and minority-owned businesses navigate the often-complex federal contracting bureaucracy. The center, which can be contacted at www.RebuildingtheGulfCoast.gov or 1(888) 4USADOC, will not award contracts; it will only answer questions and register businesses for contracting opportunities.

At a gathering of minority-owned business representatives in Washington, Gutierrez said the Gulf region had a record of minority hiring lower than the national average before Katrina struck. He declined to say what the administration's minority-hiring target would be for the hurricane recovery effort.

"We have an opportunity here to increase the participation of minority businesses from where it was before the hurricane," Gutierrez said. "We are focused on making the future a lot better than the past."

Louisiana group studies levee failure

Team hopes to speak with nearby residents

By Mark Schleifstein
Staff writer

Louisiana is fielding its own team of engineers and research scientists to conduct an investigation into levee failures that flooded New Orleans when Hurricane Katrina hit, the state Department of Transportation and Development announced Tuesday.

The team will be led by Ivor van Heerden, an associate professor of civil and environmental engineering at LSU who questioned initial Army Corps of Engineers statements that the 17th Street and London Avenue canal breaches were caused by water topping the levee walls.

Van Heerden's theory that the pressure of floodwaters within the canals somehow caused the walls to buckle has gained credence over the past two weeks as three other forensic investigative teams sponsored by the Army Corps of Engineers, American Society of Civil Engineers and National Science Foundation have inspected the breaks and other stretches of levees surrounding the New Orleans area.

Van Heerden said none of the other teams include Louisiana representatives and that the new team will help ensure that the state's interests are represented during the levee break investigation.

"That takes into account that probably 100,000 homes have been lost to flooding and more than a thousand citizens have lost their lives," he said.

Van Heerden said his group already has been contacted by a number of people living near the failed walls who are providing details about what they saw and heard during and after the storm. He said he's also searching for people living near the levee walls who have clocks that were stopped by floodwaters, which he said would help determine when the levees failed.

The team is asking the corps for a variety of documents, including preconstruction and as-built plans; construction contracts; inspection reports; and correspondence concerning the Pittman Construction Co., which documents show built the 17th Street Canal levee wall.

The group also will use computer models to re-create the way storm surge may have caused the walls to fail. Van Heerden and fellow team member Hassan Mashriqui of the LSU Hurricane Center provided storm surge modeling results to state and federal emergency planners in advance of the storm that showed water would top levees in St. Bernard Parish, eastern New Orleans, parts of the Lower 9th Ward and parts of St. Charles and Jefferson parishes. Van Heerden's prestorm models did not show water topping the 17th Street and London Avenue canals.

Joining van Heerden on the state team will be:

▶ Radhey S. Sharma, associate professor in geotechnical and geo-environmental engineering at LSU.

▶ G. Paul Kemp, director of the LSU Natural Systems Modeling Group and associate professor in the LSU School of the Coast and Environment.

▶ Mashriqui, assistant professor of research, LSU Hurricane Center.

▶ Wes Shrum, director of graduate students, LSU sociology department.

▶ S. Ahmet Binselam, manager of the New Orleans Geographic Information Systems, LSU Center for the Study of Public Health Impacts of Hurricanes.

▶ Three independent engineers to be hired by the transportation department.

People who live near the levee walls and have clocks that were stopped by floodwaters or have other information about the levee failures are asked to call the team at (225)578-0268.

6 accused of stealing aid

By The Associated Press

TITUSVILLE, FLA. — Police arrested four people and were searching for two other suspects who allegedly posed as displaced Louisiana residents at a Florida hotel and together stole at least $9,000 intended for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Gertrude Mazion, 44; Mary Walker, 59; Sylvia Trice, 44; and April Smith, 34, all of Titusville, were charged Monday with felony possession of fictitious identification, scheming to defraud, cheating and grand theft.

Police said they were searching for David Bovian, 50, and Trinka Daniels, 29.

Police investigating an unrelated case recognized the suspects' names on a hotel registry because each previously had been arrested in Titusville, police spokesman Warren Van Vuren said.

First pain, then gain for storm-hit Florida

Land prices doubled for some after Ivan

By Gilbert M. Gaul
The Washington Post

PENSACOLA BEACH, FLA. — The last thing Buck Lee expected after Hurricane Ivan gutted this narrow sliver of paradise in 2004 was a land rush. Yet, only weeks after the bruising storm leveled hundreds of vacation homes on the sugar-sand beaches, a flotilla of speculators appeared.

"I couldn't believe it," said Lee, a former county commissioner who helps run the island government. "People from all over America were driving around here with their windows down and their checkbooks out, offering to buy houses on the spot."

In a season of monster hurricanes that have wreaked so much death and destruction, Pensacola Beach offers a lesson in why coastal resorts often come out of a storm more prosperous than ever, helped along by federal subsidies and tax breaks that are available no matter how many times the same area gets hit.

Although Pensacola Beach escaped Hurricane Katrina's worst, four other storms battered the town in the past year, destroying 450 homes. A year after Ivan, piles of debris still line narrow, sand-filled streets. Collapsed homes dot the Gulf of Mexico and Santa Rosa Sound. Tangles of iron and concrete are all that remain of some hotels.

Property values, though, continue to defy expectations. Lots that sold for $1 million before Ivan now garner $2 million. "You would think after seeing all of the damage, who would want to live here?" said Lee, steering his yellow Hummer past a handmade sign advertising a lot for $1.8 million.

Hurricanes, it turns out, can act as a perverse force for redevelopment along the nation's barrier islands and coasts. In a beach town, they often weed out older, less valuable properties, encouraging investors to build bigger and more expensive homes and hotels. That pushes up property values overall.

100,000 evacuees expected to stay put in Baton Rouge

Better storm plans needed, mayor says

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — At least 100,000 displaced Hurricane Katrina victims probably will become permanent residents of East Baton Rouge Parish, Mayor-President Kip Holden said Tuesday.

Holden, who met with a joint legislative committee looking into the fallout from hurricanes Rita and Katrina, said previous projections that 50,000 evacuees would remain in Baton Rouge were conservative.

"We know, based on traffic counts, that we have 225,000 more vehicles on the roads (daily) now than we had before," Holden said. "We think that at least half will stay."
