Photographs and memories

Favorite books, photographs and works of art may not be lost forever

If you want to rescue books, photos, art and textiles from your hurricane-ravaged home, it's critical to start salvage efforts right away, says Historic New Orleans Collection head preparatory Steve Sweet, who is in charge of protecting the HNOC's priceless historical objects. It may be too late to save objects that have been exposed to water or humidity for weeks.

"A lot of people are going to lose a lot of things, no way around it," Sweet said. "You can save an object, but it's not going to be the way it was."

To aid those hoping to save their own precious items after Hurricane Katrina, Sweet has added disaster recovery links to www.hnoc.org. Here are some of his tips:

SEEK EXPERT ADVICE. "The most important thing to know is, if it's a valuable thing, you've got to get it to a conservator," Sweet said. Novice efforts can ruin something a conservator might save. The HNOC Web site has a link to conservators, but the museum is not allowed to recommend specialists, Sweet said.

DRY BOOKS SLOWLY. "If it's wet and you can't get to it, put it in waxed paper and put it in your freezer," he says. "Keep it frozen, which will preserve it until you can work on it." Interleaf wet books every few pages with blotter paper or plain newsprint (from an art supply store) or paper towels. Keep changing the paper to soak up water. To dry the book further, set it up on its spine and have a fan blowing in the room, although not directly on the book, so the air circulates. "When the book gets kind of dry, when it feels a little cold but most of the moisture is out of there, lay it down, put more paper in it, then put a weight on it," Sweet said. "The book will want to expand and will never get back to its normal shape."

HANDLE PHOTOS CAREFULLY. The most important thing to remember about photos is not to touch the image or emulsion. Family photographs on resin-coated paper (those from the 1970s until digital photography) can probably be lightly rinsed in fresh water and saved, dried flat with the emulsion side up. Put blotter paper or paper towels underneath to soak up moisture. Keep changing the paper. Photos will curl, but a picture framer, photo studio or conservator can flatten them in a press. If the photograph has been sitting in water for some time, don't touch it. Use a piece of sturdy cardboard to scoop it up gently from underneath and place it on cardboard. Bring it to a conservator as soon as possible. If a photo is framed and sticking to the glass, don't try to remove it. Take off the frame and let it dry with the glass side down on the counter, and bring it to a conservator.

HANDLE ARTWORK EVEN MORE CAREFULLY. Pastels or works with soluble ink are problematic, but intaglios or lithographs might be saved. As with photographs, remove the frame, but if the artwork is stuck to the glass, do not try to remove it. Dry face-up with blotter paper underneath, changing the paper to absorb moisture. Paintings should be removed from the frame, but not the stretcher and allowed to dry. "Do not apply heat or put it in the oven to flatten it out, which will ruin it," Sweet said.

CLASS OF 2006 Lost year

such a fun senior year. But people I have gone to school with for 12 years are now spread throughout the country. I don't get to be with some of my closest and best friends which makes this experience even harder."

Helping ease her separation anxiety is the presence of her friend and classmate Maria Castellon, who she persuaded to join her at Ole Miss. Like Heidi, Maria was overcome with sadness when she realized that she probably wouldn't be returning to Country Day. Although boarding school was an option, the chance to be with one of her friends sealed her decision to enroll in college.

"When I started my senior year, I had no idea that I would be going to college in about 10 days," Maria said. "Fortunately, I am having the time of my life. The people here in Oxford are so nice. They make everyone feel welcome and are trying to make all of us evacuees happy."

Chris Acosta is more angry than sad that he won't be returning to Andrew Jackson High School in Chalmette for his senior year. In addition to Ring Day and prom, this was the year he had hoped to help his wrestling team win a state title. He is continuing to wrestle, but at a high school in Murfreesboro, Tenn., where he has had a difficult transition.

It's bad enough that he lost his home along with his best friend, who was killed a few days before the storm when he lost control of his car following a back-to-school tubing trip in Tickfaw. Without the security of his school, he says, he is lost.

"I don't have my friends for support and I've lost the bonds that I made with my teachers over the years," he said. "Between my best friend's car crash and the hurricane, there is not much I can do to salvage my senior year. It's ruined."

As nice and supportive as his new classmates and teachers have been, Grey Keetch said there is no comparison between Bishop England High School in Charleston, S.C. and his old school, Holy Cross, where he has been enrolled since seventh grade.

"Graduating from Holy Cross is something that I've been working toward," he said. "I knew everyone in my grade on a personal level. I was looking forward to prom and to the football season and to my swim season. I was looking forward to my senior trip. We had one scheduled in the middle of the year to Disney World."

Grey, captain of the Holy Cross swim team, is trying to make the best of his new surroundings. Among other things, he has joined the swim team and has competed in three meets. "The competition is a little easier," he said. "I've been getting firsts in all my events."

Rebecca Gonzales, a senior at St. Mary's Dominican High School, can't help but worry about her future. Back home in Metairie after evacuating to Birmingham, Ala., and then Tallulah, La., she has been out of school since the storm struck and is holding out hope that she will be able to return to school in early October.

As things stand now, she will be attending a transitional school at Archbishop Rummel, an all-boys Catholic school that will be accepting girls as part of an Archdiocese of New Orleans plan to get students back in school as soon as possible. The school will probably bring in trailers to accommodate the influx of students, and will reduce the holiday schedule to make up for lost time.

"I'm more worried than usual," she said. "There is so much to do to get ready for college — teacher recommendations, scholarship applications, all that kind of stuff."

Benjamin Franklin High School senior Rebekka Veith doesn't like to speak in clichés, but Katrina has made one especially fitting. "You don't know what you have until it's gone," she said. "I didn't realize how much I loved my school until I couldn't attend it anymore."

Her good friend Callie Barlow agreed. "My friends and I used to always complain about the workload and the teachers at Franklin, but now I miss it more than ever."

Callie now attends Highland Park High School in Dallas, and Rebekka is a student at Runnels School, a private school in Baton Rouge. Last weekend, the two traveled to Houston for a mini-reunion involving Franklin students now living in Baton Rouge, Houston and Dallas.

"It was the most fun I've had in a month," said Callie. "We couldn't stop smiling and laughing. We were all just so happy to actually be together."

Although they are making new friends at their new schools, they pray that Franklin is able to open its doors in January. That's where they began their high school career and that's where they want to end it.

"My new school has been accommodating but it can't compare to the place I've invested such hard work and passion in for the past three years," Veith said.

"If Franklin reopens in January, I would return — even if it meant I had to swim to school every day."

ROBERTS STARTLED BY THE SUFFERING

other, 'Where are the helicopters dropping pallets of water? Where are the trucks bringing crates of MREs?'" he said. "It was heartbreaking to see these people, so many of them with young children, babies, the elderly.

"They were left there, cast away with no ability to fend for themselves. To think I saw scenes like that in America is just stunning to me."

At I-10 and Elysian Fields, Roberts and his crew met a woman who'd been dropped there after being rescued from her nearby flooded home.

"She was with her husband, had been married to the fellow for 53 years," said Roberts. "They'd spent all of their lives together. She had been pretty much frantically trying to flag down every emergency vehicle going by. Nobody would even stop and talk to her."

The husband died late on the Tuesday night after Katrina.

"Died at her feet," said Roberts. "The next afternoon, Wednesday afternoon, when I met her, the husband was still there at her feet.

"Someone had tried to do the dignified thing and had covered up the body. The only advice she'd gotten ... was when a police car stopped and someone said, 'If the body starts to smell, move it down the interstate.'"

Roberts and his crew returned to the intersection two days later.

"She had been picked up but the body was still there," he said. "Her husband for 53 years. Imagine the pain she was going through."

On the same day, on the same overpass, Roberts met a man in his mid-60s who'd had recent knee-replacement surgery.

"The scar on his knee was pretty much an open wound," said Roberts. "He'd been wading through the fetid water. Who knows what could've gotten into it."

Still, he was better off than his 97-year-old mother, who couldn't walk without assistance. They'd been on the overpass for a day and half with no food or water.

"The poor fellow broke down," said Roberts, "He said, 'Don't treat us like dogs. Don't treat us like dogs.'

"Those images will haunt me forever."

There are others.

Chief White House correspondent for CBS News since 1999, Roberts is considered one of the contenders for "The CBS Evening News" anchor chair vacated by Dan Rather in March.

'CBS Evening News' anchor John Roberts hit the streets of New Orleans in a boat the day after Hurricane Katrina. 'To think I saw scenes like that in America is just stunning to me,' he says.

As potential heir to Rather's chair, who else would CBS send to New Orleans but John Roberts?

Several others, actually, but Roberts served as on-site "Evening News" co-anchor when the news was at its worst.

"It was impossible to not tell a compelling story," he said. "To a large degree, journalists have to be very clinical, almost like being a doctor. But when you get into such a heart-wrenching scene, you become human.

"It was important not to wear your heart on your sleeve, but after seeing people suffering so badly in the greatest country in the world ... There was a complete and utter failure to look after these people."

here to Days Inn and talked to us. You know what's so hard? I told her every morning I would wake up, open my door, get my Times-Picayune and make my coffee. Those are the things you do in the morning. It's a ceremony for me. Very important.

"I miss The Times-Picayune. I saw the newspaper on TV once. They were showing it on the screen. I felt so sentimental. Hard to explain.

"When I was talking about missing my Times-Picayune, she was talking about missing her kitchen. I didn't want to compare my Times-Picayune with her kitchen. How can you compare The Times-Picayune with somebody's kitchen?"

His life in St. Louis so far has been as pleasant as possible under the circumstances, Imsirovic says. Several times a week, local churches provide dinner for the evacuees at Days Inn. With the help of local relief organizations, he has secured a job driving a shuttle for the President Casino.

And he has landed an apartment as well, which he will move into as soon as Catholic Charities comes up with the promised furniture.

"People in St. Louis are very nice to us," he says. "They provide us with housing, food. I saw many people want to help us. Many people."

But all the help doesn't allay the anxiety and loneliness — or the boredom.

"To be bored is the hardest thing," he says. "From the time I wake up, all the time I am watching TV and I am looking at CNN and I am waiting for somebody to say New Orleans is alive again. You wait, wait, wait and wait.

"I am going to return to New Orleans as soon as possible, as soon as I have some work. New Orleans is my home.

"Maybe there are some places to go out in St. Louis but I don't know of them. I don't know people here. St. Louis might be a great town, but it's not my town."

MONDAY MORNING QB

Alabama makes statement in victory over Florida

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

'Bama's back.

And that's a good thing.

You can have a pennant race without the Yankees being a factor, but it's just not as interesting.

Same thing goes for Alabama. The SEC is a lot more intriguing when the Crimson Tide is in the hunt.

And that 'Bama is after Saturday's 31-3 rout of Florida that may be the most stunning result of the year.

It was if the pent-up frustration of five years of coaching changes, probation, lawsuits, injuries and other assorted insults was released in one afternoon at Bryant-Denny Stadium.

Lots of schools claim their fans are the most passionate. If 'Bama's aren't No. 1, they're right at the top.

If you don't believe that, read "Rammer Jammer Yellow Hammer," Warren St. John's hilarious account of spending a season hanging out with those who drive their RVs to every game.

You have to be more than a little nuts to put off emergency gall bladder surgery to make it to the Outback Bowl by kickoff.

That level of energy permeated the stadium Saturday and the players responded.

"We got tired of hearing everyone saying that we were going to lose, that we couldn't hold a stick to those guys," Alabama junior linebacker Juwan Simpson said.

That wasn't the case from the get-go.

Brodie Croyle and Tyrone Prothro connected on an 87-yard touchdown pass on the Tide's first offensive snap.

Another quick touchdown came after Chris Harris caught the first interception of a Chris Leak pass this season. The Gators never recovered.

But this wasn't just a bad day at the office for the Gators. Alabama was faster, stronger, hungrier and better prepared.

The better prepared part is important.

As big as the victory was for the team, it also was a one-week validation for Alabama coach Mike Shula.

No coach could have taken over a job in more unfavorable conditions than Shula did in the spring of 2003.

Dennis Franchione had vacated the premises after two years because he couldn't take the pressure. Mike Price's term had ended before he coached a single game after his misadventure in a Pensacola strip club.

Thanks to probation, the program had lost 21 scholarships.

And Shula was considered primarily the beneficiary of a famous last name. His credentials as an Alabama quarterback in the mid-1980s and 14 years an NFL assistant didn't seem to matter.

Plus, no Alabama coach can ever escape the shadow of Bear Bryant. Shula is the sixth coach since Bryant retired in 1982, but to Alabama fans, no matter how many degrees of separation exist, the Bear always will be an unreachable standard of excellence.

Going 10-15 in his first two seasons with no significant victories had Shula on many hot seats lists, but as Shula said so well, he was on the hot seat from Day One.

Now he's 15-15 with victories this season against living legend Steve Spurrier and budding legend Urban Meyer.

How far Shula and the Tide can take it from here remains to be seen. Saturday's elation was tempered by the loss for the season of Prothro, the team's outstanding receiver and return man, to a broken leg.

But for today at least, Alabama is ranked No. 7 and may just be the top team in the SEC.

"The polls have a chance for us to get where we want to go," Shula said Sunday. "You just keep having success week in and week out and the good things keep building on each other."

For Alabama fans, that can only mean having a shot at a 13th national championship. But even the rabid among them has to acknowledge that there's a ton of football to be played between now and the Rose Bowl.

Still, in a year when four of the top 10 winning programs of all time – Penn State, Nebraska, Notre Dame and Alabama – all started the season unranked and are now a combined 18-1, it's fun to think about.

POLL WATCHING

Idaho had five points in last week's inaugural Harris Interactive College Football Poll, an embarrassment for the newest component of the BCS formula because they were 0-4. It defeated Utah State, 27-13, but received no points in this week's balloting.

Neither did Arizona, Illinois or Syracuse, all sub-.500 teams who received votes last week.

LSU, ranked fifth in the Harris Poll last week and fourth in the USA Today coaches' poll that also is part of the BCS formula, was hurt much more by losing to Tennessee on Monday than beating Mississippi State on Saturday.

The Tigers fell to 11th in the coaches poll and 12th in the Harris poll.

Southern California, Texas and Virginia Tech remained the top three teams in both polls. Georgia is fourth in the coaches poll and fifth in the Harris, while Florida State is fourth in the Harris and fifth in the coaches.

Alabama made the biggest gain in both polls. The Crimson Tide's 37-3 victory against Florida advanced 'Bama from 15th to No. 8 in the Harris Poll and from No. 16 to No. 10 in the coaches.

The first release of the BCS standings, which includes six computer rankings, will be made after this week's games.

SUGAR BOWL UPDATE

The Sugar Bowl took another step toward moving this season's game to Atlanta when executive director Paul Hoolahan and senior associate director Jeff Hundley checked out facilities there last week with Georgia Dome, Peach Bowl and local tourism officials.

"They were very hospitable," Hoolahan said. "They offered a lot of support and showed us that they have the capacity to do the job."

Hoolahan also said playing the game at LSU with most of the fans housed in New Orleans is a possibility, but the lack of hotel rooms is making that difficult.

Hoolahan also said that regardless of where the game is played, those already with tickets will have a refund option with the ability to repurchase them when the game is returned to New Orleans.

The Sugar Bowl's executive committee will meet via conference call no later than Wednesday with an announcement expected by Friday.

SATURDAY NIGHT LIGHTS

▶ Vanderbilt's unbeaten dreams ended when Middle Tennessee State's Jeremiah Weaver blocked a 36-yard field-goal attempt at the game's end to preserve the Blue Raiders' 17-15 victory. Vanderbilt, which hosts LSU on Saturday, was seeking its first 5-0 start since 1943. It was the Blue Raiders' third straight win against Vanderbilt.

▶ Louisiana Tech gave New Mexico State a rude welcome to the WAC, beating the Aggies 34-14 to drop Hal Mumme's team to 0-5. New Mexico State did not score until the final 1:05.

EXTRA POINTS

Not football, but worth mentioning. Oklahoma fans haven't forgotten former Sooners basketball standout and St. Augustine product Hollis Price. They not only provided a home for Price's grandfather, George Carraby and 17 family members in Houston after they were forced from their 9th Ward neighborhood following Hurricane Katrina, but they also sent a 53-foot trailer with household goods and clothes.

LEWIS VOTE

Ted Lewis is a member of the Harris Interactive College Football Poll.

Here is his vote for this week: 1. USC; 2. Texas; 3. Virginia Tech; 4. Ohio State; 5. Alabama; 6. Georgia; 7. Tennessee; 8. Florida State; 9. Notre Dame; 10. LSU; 11. Florida; 12. Miami; 13. Wisconsin; 14. Arizona State; 15. Michigan; 16. Michigan State; 17. California; 18. UCLA; 19, Auburn, 20. Boston College; 21. Penn State; 22. Texas Tech; 23. Minnesota; 24. Louisville; 25. Oregon.

In one drive, Miles displays his blueprint

Without flash, Tigers overwhelmed MSU with 13-play march

By William Kalec
Staff writer

STARKVILLE, MISS. — Once word of the grass-stained, eight-minute Van Gogh of a drive reaches John Sheldon in Northeast Ohio, Les Miles' old high school line coach is sure to flash a smile as wide as the momentous drive was long.

You can have frilly Xavier Carter reverses. Take those calculated touchdown tosses to Dwayne Bowe. Sheldon, a tough guy from a tougher Rust Belt town, isn't interested.

Man, give him that unappreciated smash-mouth masterpiece worthy of display behind a ring of velvet ropes. Thirteen glorious plays, scanning 80 yards as half a quarter expired - all of it efficient and yet unfit for highlights.

Nothing fancy. Nothing cute. Nothing tricky. Nothing Sheldon would ever disapprove of teaching the sons of mill workers and other Elyria blue-collars. Just a bunch of O's pushing around a bunch of X's, draining their confidence and spirit.

For those puzzled as to what exactly athletic director Skip Bertman saw beyond Les Miles' résumé when he hired the four-year head coach to replace Nick Saban, take a look at LSU's initial possession of the second half against Mississippi State. Don't let Miles' fashion quirks (seriously, can we stop talking about the dang headset) distract you from acknowledging his infectious toughness and will.

Ahead by a deceptively secure 17-7, the Tigers finally shook Saban's shadow and began mirroring the square-jaw disposition of the new guy in the white hat. Right then, Miles put his muddy fingerprint on the program.

The play-by-play reads like scripture from the Book of Schembechler - pure poetry to Sheldon and Miles – Eighty yards in 13 plays, 8:02 elapsed.

JaMarcus Russell complete to Skyler Green, five yards,

Joseph Addai rush for 15 yards,

Russell complete to Addai, minus one yard,

Addai rush for 12 yards,

Beautiful, huh? Let's jump ahead to the last stage.

Addai rush for 1 yard,

Shyrone Carey rush for 8 yards,

Carey rush for 3 yards,

Carey rush for 5 yards

Addai rush for 5 yards

Addai rush for 3 yards

Jacob Hester for 1 yard, touchdown, LSU 23, MSU 7.

"That drive was the drive that virtually won the game," Miles said Sunday. "It set the tempo for the second half."

Stepping into a situation with uniquely elevated expectations and inheriting a season unlike any other, that drive Miles spoke of was so dominant and pristine, it could be a turning-point moment - the kind of sequence Miles beleaguers-turned-boosters might identify as a season-altering sequence, should LSU find itself spending early December in Atlanta.

Everything clicked.

"They weren't going to be denied this game," Miles said.

Fault human nature and LSU fans' tendency to dissect the bad, instead of praise the positives, for the lack of credit Miles and assistant coach Stacy Searels have received for their work with the offensive line, the core of the drive.

Much like Saban was an overachieving defensive back whose moxie rubbed off and stuck to his more gifted players, Miles' gritty demeanor as a two-time letterman at Michigan is slowly being absorbed by his bigger, quicker prodigies, specifically the backups who've filled in for bruised starters.

"We need to understand those drives possess the characteristics that will take our opponents out of the game," Miles said.

Shaky win may be just what Wave needed

Tulane coaches now have players' focus for Houston

By Fred Robinson
Staff writer

RUSTON – Tulane coach Chris Scelfo has said many times that he has never met a bad win. That isn't always the case with fans, who won't be dwelling on the positive after the Green Wave beat Southeastern Louisiana on Saturday.

The faithful expected the Green Wave, with the No. 1-ranked defense in the nation, to mash poor little SLU, a Division I-AA opponent. That was a no-no. Don't they remember their team being pushed to overtime with Northwestern State just two years ago?

Although the coaches and fans will spend at least part of the week realizing the Green Wave left Baton Rouge with an unconvincing 28-21 victory, both need to keep the big picture in mind.

Following a decent effort in its first game against Mississippi State and a solid performance last week against Southern Methodist, Tulane's shaky performance against SLU may have been exactly what the Wave needed.

Did Tulane really need to go into this week's Conference USA game against Houston following a huge blowout over a Division I-AA team?

"You know, a win is a win, but playing like that can't be happening to this team," senior linebacker Anthony Cannon said. "I said ever since the spring that this defense is something special. You can't take anything away from SLU; they had a great quarterback who's a scrambler, and he was able to make plays on the run."

Fact is, Tulane's going to face much better quarterbacks and much better offenses during the next couple of weeks.

It would have been good for Tulane to look sharp and use backups most of the second half while rolling to an easy victory, but Saturday's poor showing will give the coaches a reason to get players refocused for Houston.

At the start of fall practice, Scelfo made this observation. He said there isn't one team on the schedule Tulane couldn't beat, and not one team that it couldn't lose to. Against SLU, the Wave dodged a bullet.

OFFENSE – C

In the end, it got the job done, but the offense wasn't close to playing up to its potential. Some of that may have been due to the offensive line being banged up a bit and playing without its top lineman, left tackle Chris McGee, for most of the game. But playing without McGee is something the Wave had better learn to do quickly. His sprained left ankle likely will bother him the rest of the season.

With running back Matt Forte unable to find holes, a lot of pressure was placed on Tulane's passing game. It was probably the way junior quarterback Lester Ricard wanted it. Having signed with LSU out of Amite High, and spending his redshirt season with the Tigers before transferring to Tulane in 2003, he was getting to play his first game in Tiger Stadium.

But after completing his first eight passes and leading the Wave to a 12-play, 66-yard scoring drive, Ricard was inconsistent the rest of the game. As Ricard goes, so does Tulane's offense, and against SLU he stumbled too much. Several times he forced passes into double coverage, and he threw two interceptions. In spite of the inconsistency, he connected on a couple of big passes late in the game and finished with 324 passing yards, his second-highest total in 12 games.

DEFENSE – C+

The Wave held the opponent scoreless in the first half for the third straight week. But it seemed to relax too much in the second half and didn't make the necessary adjustments to stop SLU's passing game and the running of Lions quarterback Trey Willie.

Willie's line gave him enough time to find open receivers in the third and fourth quarters. That was the time Tulane's defensive line was expected to start overwhelming the Lions' offensive front. It didn't happen.

Although the defense allowed 309 yards and some big plays, which definitely dropped that No. 1 ranking, it had some shining moments. It stopped the Lions in the red zone, and on a fourth-and-five from Tulane's 30, the defense squashed an SLU drive that could have given the Lions a 21-20 lead.

SPECIAL TEAMS – D

Had it not been for Izzy Route's dazzling returns, a 97-yard kickoff return for a the go-ahead touchdown early in the fourth quarter and a 58-yard punt return that was called back because of an illegal block, this would have been a disastrous day for the Wave.

The Wave had breakdowns in the line that allowed SLU to block a pair of Chris Beckman punts, and a critical extra-point attempt was blocked that kept it from taking a seven-point lead.

Route had seven returns for 155 yards, Beckman averaged 42 yards on six punts and the special teams blocked a field-goal attempt by SLU. Still, this is the weakest area for the Wave. The Wave is lacking a kicker who can kick the ball deep on kickoffs, and consistency on field-goal and extra-point attempts.

Most Orleans schools staying shut

Enrollment is open for Algiers locations

The New Orleans public school system does not intend to open any campuses on the city's east bank this school year, the president of its governing board, the Rev. Torin Sanders, said Monday.

New Orleans public schools Uptown and elsewhere may be in good condition, but it's unlikely they could open soon, he said. If the east bank schools opened in January or later, students attending them would not receive enough instructional time, he said.

Last month, State Superintendent of Education Cecil Picard said engineers and architects who visited New Orleans public schools concluded at least seven Uptown schools are in good condition.

Sanders said Mayor Ray Nagin "wants us to be cautious and not have too many people using the city at one time." Sanders said it's unclear whether city services would be ready in time for a Nov. 1 opening of Uptown schools. The mayor, he said, wants things done in stages.

"We have the city and the School Board working with each other," Sanders said.

At least two private schools have opened in New Orleans and eight public schools are scheduled to open in a few weeks.

All of the schools are in Algiers.

St. Andrew the Apostle, 3131 Eton Street, welcomed roughly 700 students Monday, said the Rev. William Maestri, a spokesman for the Archdiocese of New Orleans. He estimated 400 attended opening day at Holy Name of Mary School at 502 Olivier St.

Tammany also back in the classroom

Louisiana's top-performing public school system and one of its largest systems both returned to the classroom from the five-week hurricane hiatus Monday to find some students missing and some new ones in their places.

St. Tammany Parish schools, the highest-ranked public system in the state, had no attendance total but said they registered almost 1,800 new students whom Hurricane Katrina displaced from heavily damaged schools elsewhere. That's an increase of 5 percent from St. Tammany's pre-Katrina enrollment of about 37,000.

Jefferson Parish, Louisiana's second largest school system by enrollment after still-closed Orleans, reported almost 30,000 students, less

TO OUR READERS

The Times-Picayune will resume production of the newspaper at its Howard Avenue plant in New Orleans within the next two weeks, publisher Ashton Phelps Jr. announced Monday.

In addition, Phelps said the newspaper would invite back all employees who stayed in contact with the newspaper during the period after Hurricane Katrina.

"The evacuation of New Orleans and the disruption of essential city services as a result of Hurricane Katrina caused us to move our operations for several weeks to Baton Rouge, Mobile and Houma," Phelps said. "We sincerely appreciate the patience of our subscribers and our advertisers during that period."

About 250 Times-Picayune employees evacuated the building in the back of newspaper delivery trucks on Aug. 30, the day after Hurricane Katrina hit, as water rose around the building.

While water did not enter the building, at 3800 Howard Ave., lack of electricity, water service and access to the building has delayed its reopening.

A group of reporters returned later that day to the city to report on Katrina's aftermath, while others published the newspaper online on NOLA.com, the paper's affiliated Web site, for two days at the Houma Courier, a New York Times newspaper. Still others began setting up a temporary base of operations in Baton Rouge. The paper's staff also assisted in providing NOLA.com with information for its round-the-clock weblog coverage of Katrina and its aftermath.

The Times-Picayune was printed for two weeks at the Courier and later at the Mobile Register, which like the Times-Picayune is owned by Advance Publications Inc.

Phelps said he was pleased that so many people were able to access news and advertising in The Times-Picayune and on NOLA.com.

"We would like to express our profound gratitude and pride to those Times-Picayune employees who, at a time of unimaginable personal and professional stress, worked tirelessly to ensure that their newspaper would continue to publish," Phelps said.

"We have invited back to work all our employees who have stayed in touch with their department heads or supervisors during the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina," he said. "We look forward to being back at home and playing a part in the rebuilding of the New Orleans area."

"It represents a huge step forward for the New Orleans recovery," Tom Curley, president and CEO of The Associated Press, wrote to Phelps. "It also makes an incredible statement about the vision and values of you, the Newhouses and Advance (owners of The Times-Picayune)... As you have shown, our country needs New Orleans and its Times-Picayune."

Pile of mud may be clue to levee failure

Two engineers say the clubhouse, above, was heaved upward in the London Avenue Canal levee break.

A child's clubhouse, built about 25 years ago by a civil engineer for his son, provides another clue pointing to possible design or construction flaws in the structural failures that breached two canal floodwalls and inundated the city during Hurricane Katrina.

Engineer Gus Cantrell, 60, and son Daniel Cantrell, 33 – now a structural engineer himself – returned to the family's Pratt Drive house last week for the first time since Katrina struck. They discovered the old clubhouse sitting a few feet from its original location next to the London Avenue Canal levee – on top of a pile of mud and silty sand about 8 feet high.

The Cantrells believe that extreme pressure from high water pushed soil under the base of the floodwall away from the canal and upward in an arc, something known as a heave. That appears to have raised a mound of earth into the back

SBA slow to the rescue of business owners

Heavy paperwork, inspections bog loan evaluations

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — More than a month after Hurricane Katrina decimated thousands of Gulf Coast businesses, the U.S. Small Business Administration has approved just 14 low-interest loans that could help companies rebuild, including three to companies in the hardest-hit state, Louisiana.

With more than 3,000 applications awaiting action, top officials in the federal agency blamed the slow response on logistical problems caused by the hurricane. But, unlike other federal agencies, the Small Business Administration has done little to streamline the application requirements for people who evacuated ahead of the Aug. 29 storm.

Governor hopes tax breaks will jump-start N.O. recovery

But where they'll take effect unclear

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Generous federal income tax breaks form the centerpiece of Gov. Kathleen Blanco's initiatives to lure people and businesses back to the storm-ravaged areas of New Orleans, according to documents and interviews with members of her administration.

The governor is suggesting a multiyear "tax holiday" for individuals, a house reconstruction tax break of as much as $50,000 and significant changes in accounting rules.

Among the more novel features of the proposed breaks is that people in some cases could sell the tax credits to third parties. For example, banks or tax-credit brokers could be allowed to purchase the credits and take the tax break themselves, while providing upfront cash to storm victims.

But a critical term in the proposals remains undefined: In what areas will people or businesses have to live or operate to be eligible for the break?

Blanco met Thursday with a group of selected business and community leaders from around the state to discuss her hurricane recovery plans. She gave them an outline of her proposals for tax legislation, mainly on the federal level, designed to attract people and companies to the New Orleans area, including new residents and peoplee who evacuated.

The discussions are expected to continue with feedback from the business group. Most of the proposals do not require new bureaucracies or large sums of money to be spent. Rather, as tax code changes, the federal government would simply receive less revenue from people and businesses in the New Orleans area.

The New Orleans area experienced a major diaspora of its population because of Katrina. Even businesses that are inclined to move back are questioning whether they can find the employees to fill their ranks and whether those employees can find housing.

Blanco's tax-break proposals are aimed directly at that concern. The proposals need the support of the Louisiana congressional delegation to succeed in Congress, and Blanco has been working most closely with Sens. Mary Landrieu and David Vitter on new legislation.

Several of the federal tax benefits would apply to people in the "Hurricane Katrina impact area," but the administration has not determined what that area would be, the governor's spokeswoman said Monday. The governor's declarations for a state of emergency have not noted particular parishes.

For example, homeowners in that still-undefined area would be eligible for a federal tax credit of up to 35 percent of construction costs, up to a maximum of $50,000, if they repair a home or build a new one. People who were displaced but who did not own a home would get a tax credit of $20,000 per family if they came back to the "Katrina impact area."

Many people who would be eligible for the various tax credits would not have a large enough tax bill in a single year to take full advantage of the breaks, and so some of the proposals would let people and businesses take the breaks over several years.

An "individual tax holiday" proposal is aimed especially at people who are involved in deciding whether their businesses will return to New Orleans, according to administration documents. It would grant a 50 percent tax holiday through 2010 for earned income, which would include wages, service income and some other forms of earnings, such as income from rental payments.

THE BLANCO INITIATIVES

Gov. Kathleen Blanco is supporting a multifaceted plan for state recovery from hurricanes Katrina and Rita, much of it requiring action from Congress. Here are some highlights of initiatives taken or being considered:

LEADERSHIP

Advisers: The governor has formed an independent group of about 40 business, higher education and community leaders.
Consultant: Blanco tapped the international management consulting group McKinsey & Co. to guide and evaluate the state's recovery effort, on a pro bono basis.
Auditor: The administration is looking for an auditing firm experienced in catastrophe recovery to monitor massive spending programs.
Administration revamp: Blanco has reorganized her administration into eight recovery teams to develop plans of action on the state level and to coordinate with leaders on the local level, covering the economy, education, environment, family services, fiscal stability, health, housing and transportation, and infrastructure. Each state agency has reorganized to focus on storm recovery.

LEGISLATION

State: Blanco plans to call special legislative sessions in late October and January to deal with major revenue changes in the state budget and other storm-related issues.
Federal: The governor is pressing for major levee and coastal restoration projects, housing relief, massive rebuilding aid for state and local public services affected by the storms and incentives to businesses and individuals to return to the damaged areas.

MAJOR PROGRAMS

Hurricane recovery bonds: The governor wants legislation for $30 billion in tax-exempt bonds in the state to finance construction and rehabilitation of real estate, including residential, commercial and rental properties.
Louisiana business development fund: Federal assistance would provide $10 billion in grants to small businesses that return to the affected areas.
Medicaid: Blanco wants full federal financing for Medicaid services for evacuees. She supports several plans by congressional leaders to make this happen.
Gulf Opportunity Zone: Blanco supports President Bush's proposal as a way to bring south Louisiana citizens back and encourage private investment and reconstruction.
Louisiana Disaster Recovery Foundation: Blanco established this foundation to support long-term family restoration and recovery using a network of charities and nonprofit groups.

SPECIFIC INITIATIVES

Home construction credit: This would create a tax credit of 35 percent of construction costs or $50,000, whichever is less, for any resident of the Katrina impact area who rebuilds or repairs a home. The credit could be transferred, or sold, to any purchaser.
Displaced persons credit: For those who do not qualify for the home construction credit, this plan would give a $20,000 tax credit per family for re-establishing residence in the Katrina impact area.
Relocation tax credit: This measure would create a full tax credit for expenses incurred in relocating an individual or business back to the general location affected by Katrina by 2007. This credit would be transferable.
Individual tax holiday: Individuals working in the Katrina impact area would be subject to a 50 percent federal income tax holiday through 2010. It would apply to wages, service income, rental income and other income derived from management or marketing activities conducted on behalf of a business.
Worker opportunity tax credit: This would create a credit for businesses for 80 percent of qualified wages earned in the Katrina impact area through 2010, limited to the first $40,000 of wages per employee.
Small business interruption tax credit: A one-time credit of $1,000 per employee up to $100,000 would apply to businesses that relocate to the Katrina impact area.
Economic growth credit: This would authorize a 15 percent tax credit for capital invested in businesses in targeted high-growth, high-wage sectors in the Katrina impact area through 2008.
Tax changes: A variety of initiatives would help businesses by changing the tax rules on depreciation, expanding tax benefits when accounting for net operating losses and other measures.
Hurricane recovery new markets tax credit: This would offer a federal income tax credit for those making equity investments in the impact area.

Tropical storm aims for the Mexican Gulf coast

By Miguel Hernandez
Associated Press writer

VERACRUZ, MEXICO — Mexico's state oil monopoly said Monday it evacuated 270 workers from five platforms in the Gulf of Mexico as Tropical Storm Stan swirled toward Veracruz state's coastline.

It was unclear how the evacuations would affect production at Petroleos Mexicanos, the world's third-biggest oil producer and a major supplier to the United States. The company pumps about 3.4 million barrels a day of crude, exporting about half of it.

On land, Mexico issued a hurricane warning for much of the Gulf coast, from Cabo Rojo southward to Punta el Lagarto. Veracruz state prepared dozens of shelters and warned citizens of the approaching storm, which was expected to hit land late today or early Wednesday.

Veracruz closed its busy port, and the region's many anglers began pulling their boats from the water.

The storm was 265 miles northeast of Veracruz on Monday afternoon, with maximum sustained winds of 55 mph. It was expected to become a hurricane late Monday or early today, according to the National Hurricane Center in Miami.

CORRECTIONS AND CLARIFICATIONS

Synagogue is open: A wire service article in Monday's edition stated incorrectly that Touro Synagogue, 4238 St. Charles Ave., would not be holding services during the High Holy Days because of hurricane damage. In fact, services resume today with a Rosh Hashanah observance at 11 a.m.

Investigation opens into possible inmate abuse

Beatings, racial slurs alleged after Katrina

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Department of Justice has started a preliminary investigation into allegations that inmates transferred from Jefferson Parish lockups after Hurricane Katrina were victims of beatings and racial slurs, an agency spokesman said Monday.

Spokesman Eric Holland said that if the preliminary probe indicates that the allegations have validity, the Justice Department would open a more comprehensive probe.

Jamie Fellner, director of U.S. programs at Human Rights Watch, which monitors prison conditions, said volunteer lawyers who questioned inmates bused to a former youth detention facility in Jena, found serious allegations of abuse that were so consistent that he believes they are credible.

Among the allegations compiled by the lawyers: Inmates were beaten while shackled, and some were forced to lie on their knees for three to five hours at a time; some were forced to hold their faces against walls that had been sprayed with mace; and some were forced to wipe their faces and hair with vomit. Some of the guards, according to the complaints, used racial slurs when addressing African-American inmates.

"I've been doing prison monitoring for many years, and the consistency of the complaints indicates that there was a serious problem at Jena," Fellner said. "Just about every inmate who was interviewed said they saw someone else abused, or were abused themselves."

As many as 500 inmates were held at Jena after the hurricane.

Pam Laborde, spokeswoman for the Louisiana Department of Public Safety and Corrections, said a preliminary state investigation found "nothing that would substantiate a lot of these claims." She said that two senior correction officials from the Louisiana State Penitentiary in Angola are investigating, and the department is committed to getting to the truth when serious allegations are made.

She said there were two "incidents" at Jena that resulted in inmates being transferred from the facility. The first occurred Sept. 1, when some inmates refused to get into their beds for a mandatory bed count, complaining that they had not gotten an opportunity for outdoor exercise, she said.

Eleven inmates who refused the orders were removed from the dorm and restrained with flex cuffs in holding cells and then transferred to a correctional facility in Houma, Laborde said

The second event occurred a day later, when some inmates began yelling and beating on glass doors with their fists, demanding access to phones and cigarettes, Laborde said. She said the facility was classified as no-smoking, and that there were no phones at the facility, which was shut down as a juvenile detention facility five years ago. It took two weeks to get working phones into the facility, she said.

About 50 inmates were removed after the second incident, Laborde said. She said no one was injured during either incident.

Fellner said the inability of inmates to make phone calls was frustrating because many were worried about the safety of their families after the hurricane. She said many of the inmates were awaiting bail on relatively minor charges or were scheduled for release on minor convictions, but were stymied when Hurricane Katrina shut down the judicial process in Louisiana.

Fellner also is asking the Justice Department to examine what happened to all the inmates at Orleans Parish jails. In a report released last week, Human Rights Watch said that as many as 300 prisoners haven't been accounted for.

Orleans Parish Criminal Sheriff Marlin Gusman said none of the city's 6,000 inmates died or were abandoned during the storm. Human Rights Watch said some inmates were abandoned in their cells as floodwaters rose up to their necks.

Many listed as missing may not be after all

Center not always told when families reunite

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — About 2,500 people are still listed as missing or unaccounted for more than a month after Hurricane Katrina struck the Gulf Coast.

But fortunately, the numbers are misleading, according to Larry Upchurch, deputy director of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children. Upchurch said he is confident the vast majority of people on the list – most of them children – have been reunited or at least been in contact with their loved ones, although officials haven't been notified.

Some no doubt died in the hurricane, but Upchurch expects that number to be a relatively small proportion of the "missing" list of 2,500.

"There's a tendency when people are reunited not always to report that to the center or other officials," Upchurch said.

Of the original 4,500 missing cases reported to the center, about 2,000 have been resolved, usually with the discovery that the missing child or adult was with a parent or relative.

One encouraging statistic is that the number of Louisiana children who have turned up at shelters or other locations with no idea where their parents or caregivers are has dropped from the hundreds to one.

Tyler
Four-year-old's family is missing; she was found at Convention Center

The National Center says it still can't find the parents or guardians for Tyler, a 4-year-old girl found alone at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center on Aug. 31. Authorities say they don't know her last name, or date of birth, making the effort to find her parents or guardians all the more difficult.

Tyler, described as 3 feet, 1 inch tall with black hair and black eyes, grasped the hand of a stranger at the Convention Center and that man kept her with his family until all were evacuated to a shelter. If officials cannot find her family, she'll be placed in foster care.

Even on Sunday, more than a month after the hurricane struck, 20 new cases of missing people were reported to the Hurricane Katrina data base, (800) THE-LOST.

Most believed that their relatives were safe, but had lost track of them when they moved out of temporary shelter and into other housing, Upchurch said.

Upchurch, a retired FBI agent, said he has 20 investigators working in Louisiana trying to help families get back together.

In some instances, he said, it's just a matter of helping a parent or other relative learn whether children or others displaced by the hurricane are safe. In instances where there are questions about visitation rights, callers aren't told the location of the children. They are told only that they are safe, assuming officials know where they are, but little more, Upchurch said.

Wooley: Most insurance firms can withstand storms

But higher premiums are likely in future

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Higher homeowner insurance premiums are almost certain in the near future, but most of the state's insurance companies should be able to weather the deluge of homeowner claims spawned by Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita, state Insurance Commissioner Robert Wooley told a joint House-Senate committee Monday.

"Basically, there will be increases (in premiums); there will be increases countrywide," not just along the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast, he said.

The testimony came during the initial meeting of a joint House-Senate committee looking into long-term planning and recovery efforts. Sen. Walter Boasso, R-Chalmette, said the panel will break into subcommittees that travel the state seeking input on the best ways to help the state recover. The panel will make some preliminary recommendations on legislation for an expected special legislative session this month.

Wooley said that as it stands, most insurance companies will remain solvent, though a few smaller companies may not be able to survive.

That could change, he said, if Congress enacts retroactive legislation that would require insurers to pay for claims in excess of what was covered by the policies and paid for by original premiums.

Sen. Ben Nevers, D-Bogalusa, asked Wooley if he could assure people who have to rebuild their homes that insurance will be available for them. Wooley said he could not make that guarantee, nor could his office order private insurance companies to write new policies in an area. He said homeowners probably could still get insurance from the state-run, high-risk program.

Wooley also said lawmakers should consider enacting a uniform statewide building code to ensure there are uniform standards for the elevation of buildings and their ability to withstand high winds. Now, building codes are enacted by local governments and vary from city to city or parish to parish.

Earlier during Monday's session, Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu told the joint meeting that state parks should be used as sites for evacuees to live temporarily. Landrieu said the federal government also should provide security, day-care services and transportation to and from work and school for displaced people forced to live in the parks for prolonged periods.

"Basically, there will be increases (in premiums); there will be increases countrywide," not just along the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast.

ROBERT WOOLEY
State insurance commissioner, speaking to a joint House- Senate committee

He said the Federal Emergency Management Agency wants to use the sites but does not want to sign a contract with the state for the amenities.

He said the cabins and trailer connections at the parks housed about 4,000 people in the days immediately following Katrina's landfall. That number has now dipped to about 3,500.

Landrieu told the committee that his office will not allow FEMA to bulldoze property to clear the way for more trailers -- a move that could permanently destroy the value of the scenic parks.

"We want to negotiate a contract (with FEMA) that will assure the esthetic setting of our state parks," department Secretary Angele Davis said. "We are not anticipating changes to the state parks" in the long run.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco told members of the steering committee of the House Special Committee on Disaster Planning, Crisis Management, Recovery and Long-Term Revitalization, and the executive committee of the Senate Select Committee on Disaster Planning, Crisis Management, Recovery and Long-Term Revitalization, that recovery efforts will need "a unified effort for the task ahead of us ... to rebuild coastal Louisiana from the Texas border to the Mississippi border."

She said she has met with New Orleans-area business leaders who are "as committed to restoring Louisiana as I am. ... The task is large but not too large for a unified Louisiana."

Evacuees may get to vote at special precinct sites

Temporary polls are possible out of state

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Louisiana voters could vote in special out-of-state voting precincts under a plan suggested by Secretary of State Al Ater. Ater said he probably will ask a special session of the Legislature to give him the authority to open such out-of-state precincts if large clusters of Louisiana voters are living in those areas and still want to vote in Louisiana elections.

Ater told a special House-Senate panel looking at long-term revitalization and recovery from Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita that there are more than 300,000 voters who are now out of their normal precincts and "dispersed all throughout America."

He said his office is working with the American Red Cross and the Federal Emergency Management Agency to identify which voters are in state and which ones are out of state.

Ater specifically addressed the New Orleans elections in February. He said for in state voters, members of his office may have to travel to those areas in the state and encourage voters to vote absentee by mail. If voters register in another parish, they would not be able to vote in their home elections.

For voters out of state, Ater said he would like to open temporary polling for the citywide races.

"We have the technology to assure voting (at distant locations) without a hint of fraud," Ater said. "We want to make sure that is not one person in America who is a citizen of New Orleans who will not be able to vote."

Ater said his plan would apply to all elections in which Louisiana residents are dispersed, not just for the New Orleans races next year.

"We are developing a plan to try to reach and find everyone," he said. "Through no fault of their own, they are now living in Los Angeles or Minnesota, but that should not preclude them from participating in elections in Louisiana. . . .We are putting together a plan that reaches every voter no matter where they are."

He said his office sustained $2.5 million in losses in election machines and equipment from the two hurricanes. He said that 90 of the 892 voting machines in Orleans Parish were ruined, four of 735 in Jefferson were destroyed, and all 125 in St. Bernard were "total losses."

He said none in Plaquemines Parish was damaged because they were not stored in low-lying areas.

Blanco repeats plea for worker base pay

Request requires regulation change

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Saying that some parishes and towns struck by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita have lost their tax base and "are on the verge of financial collapse," Gov. Kathleen Blanco repeated her request Monday to President Bush to change federal regulations so that local governments can use emergency dollars from Washington to pay base salaries of essential workers.

Blanco wants base pay for police, sheriff's deputies, firefighters and other public sector employees, in addition to the overtime pay that the federal government provides to local governments after a catastrophe.

A spokeswoman for Bush said the administration is looking into the matter but does not have a timetable for when a decision might be made. White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card spoke with Blanco on Monday. A spokeswoman for the governor said the two had a productive conversation.

Blanco met Monday at the state Capitol with about 50 representatives from towns across south Louisiana and at least 15 parishes, including several that suffered relatively light damage from the hurricanes but have borne costs of hosting evacuees from the storm-damaged areas.

"This is a unique situation, and that's why we're asking for a unique response," Blanco said.

The Stafford Act guides the spending policies of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. After Hurricane Andrew swept through Florida and Louisiana in 1992, the Clinton administration changed the regulations under the act so that the federal government could continue to provide overtime pay to local governments after a catastrophe, but not base pay, said Mark Merritt, a senior vice president with James Lee Witt Associates, which is advising Blanco on FEMA matters.

To change the regulation, Congress does not have to alter the Stafford Act, Merritt said. But, if the normal procedure for changing regulations is followed, federal agencies and members of Congress would have to sign off on the regulatory changes, a time-consuming process, Merritt said.

Blanco wrote Bush on Sept. 23 asking him to override the regulations. The governor did not pin a dollar figure on the amount of money needed. She said the salary relief should not be made in a blanket manner. Federal officials should assess each local government situation to determine if the need is justified, she said.

Tangipahoa Parish Sheriff Daniel Edwards said most sheriffs across the state rely on property taxes, the bulk of which are paid out of mortgage company escrow accounts at the beginning of the year. So by September, the sheriffs departments have little money left to handle a major adjustment to their budgets, he said.

St. Bernard Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez said the parish has about 30 days — or about "two more paydays" — before it runs out of money for public sector salaries. He said the Sheriff's Office already had laid off 100 people and the parish had laid off 120 workers.

AP PHOTO

At a news conference in Gov. Kathleen Blanco's office at the state Capitol, St. Bernard Parish President Henry 'Junior' Rodriguez says that without federal assistance, the parish will have no money for payroll by the end of this month.

"We're not up here asking for welfare; we're asking for some help to survive," Rodriguez said.

He said living conditions in the parish are poor. "You can't light a light bulb in St. Bernard," he said, referring to the power outage. With no gas stations and no stores, it is clear that the tax base has vanished along with the people and businesses, he said.

Rodriguez estimated the parish will need three years' worth of revenue to stay afloat financially until the area can recover. The recovery will be slow because about 80 percent of the homes in the parish will have to be torn down, he said. The pre-Katrina annual parish budget was $57 million, not including law enforcement, he said.

The governor's administration is examining the Stafford Act to make suggestions for changes that might be affected by disasters in the future.

Members of Louisiana's congressional delegation have been looking for financing alternatives to solve the problem.

Two strokes took woman's speech

By Janet McConnaughey
Associated Press writer

NEW ORLEANS — A woman who went unidentified for nearly a month at a New Orleans-area hospital was a paralyzed former singer whose family had been putting up posters asking people to help find her, a hospital spokeswoman said.

Joan Magee, 62, speechless and paralyzed from two strokes, and her husband, guitarist Shelton Magee, were separated after they were rescued from the 9th Ward floods and brought to the Superdome.

A notice posted for Joan Magee on one lost-person Web site said they were separated around Aug. 29, the day Katrina hit New Orleans and a breached levee flooded the 9th Ward.

Ochsner Clinic Foundation social worker Karla Davis had said the woman was brought to Ochsner hospital Aug. 30.

Shelton Magee, who had cared for his wife at their home, never gave up faith that she would be returned to him. Hospital spokeswoman Amiee Goforth said he told her, " 'God wouldn't have let me bring my wife out of all of that and then take her away from me. I knew she was alive.' "

Shelton Magee said both had performed with a group called the Foundation Band in the Crazy Quarter club, Goforth said Monday. That club no longer exists.

In addition to Shelton Magee's notice on the Internet, other relatives had posted fliers across New Orleans, Goforth said.

Joan Magee was identified after television stations across Louisiana showed her photograph, Davis said.

"Her mother-in-law, who lives in Slidell, recognized her. She called Ochsner and said `I know who that lady is. She's my daughter-in-law,'" Goforth said.

She was identified Friday, and her husband, who had evacuated to Chicago and was staying with a brother, arrived at the hospital on Sunday.

"She'd been crying since the storm, and when he walked in she stopped," Goforth said.

One researcher's plan: Fight storms with storms

Weather modification the distant goal

By Guy Gugliotta
The Washington Post

Moshe Alamaro has a modest proposal. Get a fleet of ocean barges and mount 10 or 20 jet engines — tails up — on each one. Fill the barges with aviation fuel and tow them into the path of a hurricane. Light the jets.

If everything goes as planned, the jets will trigger small tropical storms, "like backfires," Alamaro says, marginally lowering the surface ocean temperature and depriving the real hurricane of energy as it gets closer to shore.

Less energy means less power, and less power can turn tigers like hurricanes Katrina and Rita into relative pussycats.

It is not clear how much support Alamaro has for his concept, which he defines as a "salient" that outdistances conventional thinking "by leaps and springs." But his zeal highlights the increased interest of scientists and laypeople alike in finding something — anything — to avoid another 2005.

A solution, unfortunately, does not loom on the horizon. Improved weather forecasting and the advent of satellite imagery have made the paths and dimensions of hurricanes much more predictable, but greater knowledge, while helpful, does not solve the problem. Hurricanes, as old boxers might say, are like fighting Sugar Ray Robinson: You know you're going to get hit, but there's still nothing you can do about it.

"I will go out on a limb and say, eventually, we will accomplish this," said Kerry Emanuel, an atmospheric scientist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. But by "this," Emanuel means "disaster avoidance, rather than weather control."

The trick is to introduce a "perturbation" in a hurricane — a variation in moisture, wind speed, temperature or pressure — so that the hurricane weakens or veers out to sea. The strategy uses the principle that a small, early change in a complex "chaotic" system such as a hurricane can have large, and benign, effects later on.

Alamaro's "free jet" plan is designed to create a temperature perturbation. He said he could test the concept — in a remote part of the Pacific and in the hurricane off-season — for about $10 million, by using junker jet engines from mothballed B-52s in Arizona.

"We have the jets and the barge, but we don't have knowledge about the effects and we don't have the knowledge about hurricanes," Alamaro said in a telephone interview. "A test would entice the necessary studies to make it feasible."

"I hate to sound pessimistic, but Moshe's strategy requires many orders of magnitude of energy more than what he's talking about, and the backfires would have to be almost as strong as the hurricane itself. I think, unfortunately, it falls into the category of nutty ideas."

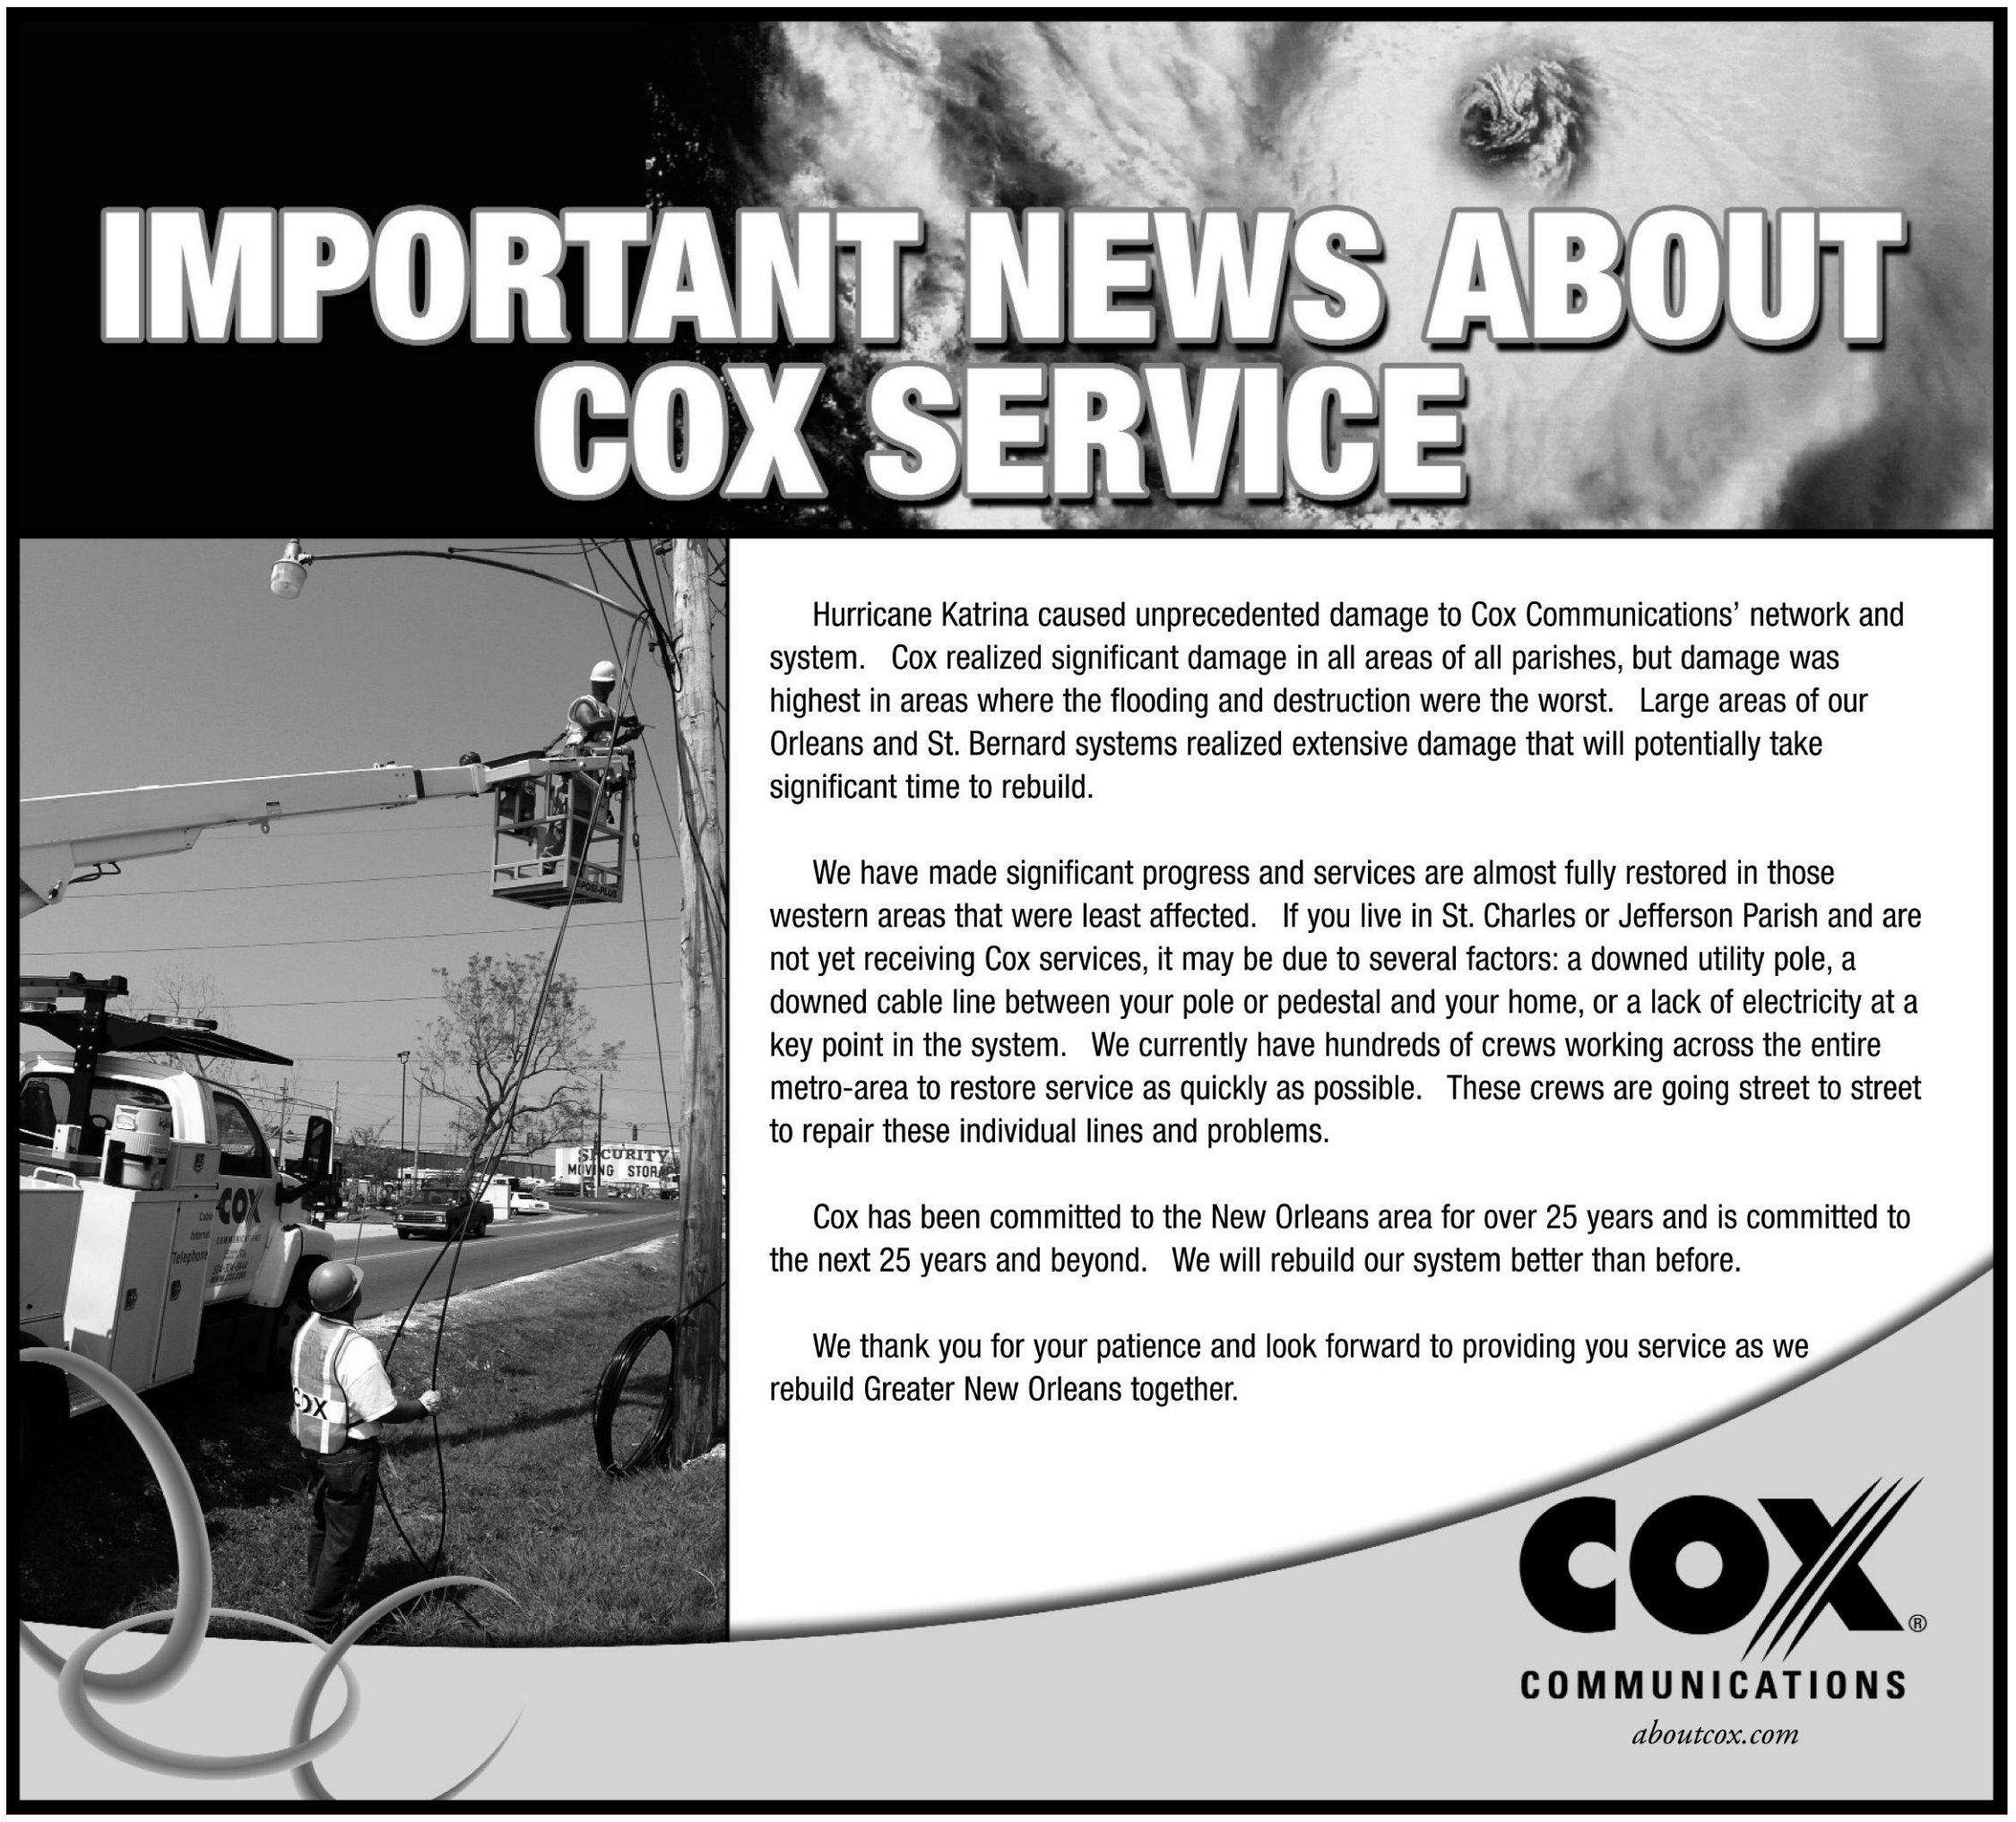
KERRY EMANUEL
an atmospheric scientist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Perhaps. Alamaro, a research affiliate at the Harvard-MIT Division of Health Sciences & Technology, outlined his strategy at this year's annual meeting of the Weather Modification Association, amid "a lot of commotion."

This, in part, was because atmospheric scientists are skittish, Alamaro said: "They know that weather modification would give an unbelievable boost to atmospheric science, but they don't want to support it because of the stigma that it is some sort of black art."



This is true, said Greg Glenn, a civilian who studies weather modification at Florida's Eglin Air Force Base, and who is interested in enlisting Alamaro in a hurricane-mitigation project: "This isn't going to go away as junk science," he said. Glenn is not as interested in Alamaro's free jets as in an idea promoted by Emanuel: spraying a "monolayer film" on the ocean in front of a hurricane to inhibit the storm's ability to pick up heat energy and moisture from the sea surface.

And Emanuel, a top U.S. atmospheric scientist, is not an Alamaro fan: "I hate to sound pessimistic, but Moshe's strategy requires many orders of magnitude of energy more than what he's talking about, and the backfires would have to be almost as strong as the hurricane itself," Emanuel said. "I think, unfortunately, it falls into the category of nutty ideas."

Regardless of the method, most atmospheric scientists would probably agree that manipulating hurricanes is not only an uncertain scientific undertaking but a potential catastrophe in several ways, if intended results are not achieved.

If scientists promise to save New Orleans and fail, they will be sued. Or if they hit Mississippi instead, they will be sued. If they promise to save New Orleans and hit Mexico, they will create an international incident. "Who takes the blame?" Emanuel asked. "It's a horrific political problem."

No easy transition for Katrina students

New towns make learning daunting

By Bill Kaczor
Associated Press writer

DESTIN, FLA. — One child displaced by Hurricane Katrina burst into tears several times and told a classmate "They're gone" during the first few days at his new school, even though his family and friends had survived without injury.

Another evacuee student at Destin Middle School was unfazed, keeping a stiff upper lip even though he knew his uncle had drowned in the Aug. 29 storm and two other relatives were missing back in Mississippi.

There's nothing unusual about either boy's reaction, and that's why schools must exercise maximum flexibility to help the thousands of children displaced by Katrina cope with bad memories and new surroundings, said Ted Feinberg, assistant executive director of the National Association of School Psychologists.

"The grieving process takes many different forms," he said from the association's Bethesda, Md., headquarters. "There's no right or wrong way to grieve."

The children are grieving because all have faced some kind of loss, but the effects might not show up immediately, Feinberg said. And there's no difference whether they are rich or poor, black or white, he added.

"These kids are coming in with a very significant amount of emotional baggage, and they are going to need time to express their feelings," he said. "Over time, people's physical capacity to tolerate this kind of stress becomes less and less and systems break down."

Guidance counselors and school psychologists are on alert and ready to respond at Destin Middle if Katrina children display signs of emotional instability, principal Sherri Houp said.

Her school also brought in grief counselors from Covenant Hospice in nearby Niceville to meet with more than 100 evacuee children from Louisiana and Mississippi.

"For them, this is in a way a death because they've lost a way of life," said Mary Jo Hardin, a children's specialist with the hospice, "They need some kind of sense of normalcy."

Hardin said there needs to be a balance, though, between the needs to "get some things out" and put Katrina in the past. "If you dwell on it, you're not going to be able to move on," she said.

Not bringing it up

Kyla Scelzi, a language arts teacher at Destin Middle, said she discusses the hurricane only if the children bring it up to avoid provoking more tears. She recalled the crying boy who told another child: "They're gone, everything's gone. They're all dead."

"It wasn't anything affecting him personally," Scelzi said. "Just watching the news and seeing how many thousands of people they had projected to be dead, to him it was almost 'Those are my friends and that's my family.'"

Christopher Davison, also a language arts teacher at Destin Middle, also said he never brings up the hurricane because he wants to get the children back into a normal routine.

"They're going to get enough reminders of this when they go home and Mom and Dad are trying to figure out how they are going to pay bills, where he's going to get a job and those kinds of things," Davison said.

Feinberg said that's an understandable response by teachers who see getting on with the academic agenda as therapeutic, but it might be too much, too soon for some children.

"Kids need time and need the opportunity to deal with these issues whether it's through talking it out or arts and crafts or some other mechanism to allow them to let go of this stuff," Feinberg said.

'It's just not home'

Twelve-year-old Megan O'Neill, a seventh-grader from New Orleans, said the children at Destin Middle have welcomed her, but "It's just not home. You can't feel at home."

"I like it, but I want to go back to my old school because all my friends are there," said seventh-grader Kayla Stutts, 12, of Metairie. "Here I have nobody."

Children who have gone through such trauma often have a hard time concentrating on school work, Feinberg said. Twelve-year-old Alexis Talley, a sixth-grader, said that's what happened to her since coming to Destin Middle from Metairie.

"You can't study because you're always thinking about what's wrong with your house," she said. Her home had five feet of water, a hole in the roof and mold on the walls.

"At home I'm an A-honors student," said 13-year-old Taylor Way, an eighth-grader from the New Orleans area, who says she doesn't bother to study any more. "Here, it's just like 'whatever.'"

Taylor said some local children seem to be saying "I don't like having you people."

Damaged schools set up shop on other campuses

than two-thirds its former student population of 51,000. Jefferson officials did not know how many registered from other systems, but they said they expect enrollment to climb quickly as more families return home from hurricane evacuations and more families from devastated Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes move to Jefferson.

Educators worked hard to make the transition a smooth one.

Inside a sunlight hallway of George Cox Elementary School in Gretna, a bulletin board reads, "Katrina, Katrina, go away. Come and learn today." Filled with color pictures of Katrina's destructive toll on the building — shattered windows, uprooted trees and soaked classrooms — the board serves as a message of hope for the children now cruising the halls of the cleaned and largely repaired school, Principal Scott Steckler said.

"This is a metaphor for life for the children," he said.

Indeed, waves of recovery, normalcy and hope swept through Jefferson Parish public schools for the first time since Katrina scattered families across the country, shuttered the schools and tossed the system's finances and enrollment into uncertainty.

Excitement and angst

Jefferson is the largest school system in the New Orleans region to reopen, progress that parish leaders say bodes well for the parish's overall recovery. Substantiating school leaders' hopes that Jefferson will become an educational refuge for students throughout the region, they said hundreds of Monday's students were new pupils from Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes.

One was fifth-grader Raja Harrison, who formerly attended Martin Behrman Elementary in Algiers. Sitting on a couch in Steckler's office, she laughed and giggled as she talked warmly about her new school.

"I'm excited to be back at schools because I love school," the 10-year-old said, lamenting only the school-provided free lunch. "I was kind of scared that I would not meet any friends, but it's been good so far, except for the lasagna."

The reaction wasn't quite as cozy from Brione Williams, a new freshman at John Ehret High School in Marrero, who had started the 2005-06 year in August at John F. Kennedy High School in New Orleans.

"It makes me nervous, meeting new friends," said Williams, whose voice barely topped a whisper while sitting in line to have her picture taken for school identification. When asked what she missed about Kennedy, she replied, "Everything."

Second-grader Jessica Washington, left, has a gift for her new classmate, Sophie Vagianos, at Airline Park Elementary School. Hurricane Katrina forced Sophie from her school in New Orleans.

Sharing space

Seventy-six of Jefferson's 79 schools that opened reported a total of 27,122 returning students.

"I think this is a very fluid situation," said Patricia Mendoza, principal of Terrytown Elementary School, which was too damaged to open and is sharing the campus of Geraldine Boudreaux Elementary School. "Every month will bring something different."

Three other conventional elementary schools in Jefferson remain closed because of damage and are also sharing campuses with other schools.

In St. Tammany, classes resumed at all but four schools damaged by Katrina: Salmen High, St. Tammany Junior High, Brock Elementary and Slidell Pathways, all in Slidell. Those students will platoon at other schools or, in the case of Brock, attend classes alongside children at another elementary school.

At Ehret, the state's largest high school before the storm with about 2,600 students, about 50 percent of students returned – much to the delight of Principal Clothilde Cobert.

"I was excited to just see the kids get off the bus," said Colbert, praising the system's efforts to resume operation quickly. "When the schools open, it helps the whole community recover."

The homecoming had a party feel at Airline Park Elementary School in Metairie. The day started there with an assembly that featured a reading from a storybook about a character that survived a hurricane, a slideshow set to Louis Armstrong's "What a Wonderful World" with pictures of local landmarks and a second-line out of the cafeteria to return to class, complete with teachers draping beads around children's necks.

"I missed all my friends," said 10-year-old Brandan Dugan, an Airline student. "I only had a sister to play with. She's 7. It's better to play with friends."

Students there also took part in the classic assignment of writing essays about their "vacation" from school.

"My family and I went to nine different states," wrote a fifth-grade boy. "I can't wait to go home in my own bed," a second-grade boy scrawled.

National attention

Despite some busing-related glitches, Superintendent Diane Roussel said the reopening went smoothly and is pivotal to the region's recovery because it lets thousands of parents return and tend to their homes and businesses.

"I'm encouraged," she said about the system's post-Katrina debut. "It's looking really good. I thought everybody put forth maximum effort."

The system's reopening, which had the atmosphere of the first day of school that many students experienced exactly a week before Katrina struck, attracted news media attention from around the country. CNN, MSNBC, CBS News and others bombarded Roussel and classrooms at Airline Park.

The attention seemed welcomed by principals, relieved and encouraged by the return to work.

"Good schools will bring people back in a heartbeat," Estelle Elementary School Principal Jackie Daniillidis said.

Registering her second-grade son at Estelle after weeks in Atlanta, Natasha Williams, whose Gretna house was destroyed, said her son was itching to get back to the books. Williams called Jefferson's reopening "a blessing."

"They helped me with my son, and he's happy," she said.

For Steckler, the hugs from returning Cox students made his day.

"I couldn't wait for this day, and I now I know why," he said. "Today, I escaped Katrina."

Christine Harvey of the St. Tammany bureau contributed to this report.

eighth grade.

New Orleans public schools slated to open Nov. 1 include six schools for students in grades prekindergarten through eighth grade and two high schools, Sanders said. All will be open enrollment, meaning students who live anywhere in the city may attend the schools.

The high schools, grades 9-12, include:

- O.P. Walker High, 2832 Gen. Meyer Ave.
- Edna Karr Magnet, 3332 Huntlee Drive.

The elementary schools, prekindergarten through eighth grade, include:

- Eisenhower Elementary, 3700 Tall Pines Drive.
- Fischer Elementary, 1801 L.B. Landry Ave.
- Habans Elementary, 3819 Herschel St.
- Harte Elementary, 5300 Berkley Drive.
- Henderson Middle School, 1912 L.B. Landry Ave.
- McDonogh No. 32, 800 Dearmas St.

Parents can enroll students by calling (877) 771-5800, said Lelia McCullum, an administrator with the instructional technology department. Or those with an Internet connection can visit www.nops.k12.la.us and press the link that states "If you are a parent of a NOPS student, click here to fill in an online form to indicate your intent to return your child to NOPS."

Sanders said Monday that, according to a plan from acting Superintendent Ora Watson, only New Orleans public schools on the West Bank will operate during the 2005-06 school year. The holiday schedule will be abbreviated and the school year will end in June rather than May, he said.

The schools can accommodate at least 8,000 students, Sanders said.

Consequently, some returning New Orleanians may have to rely on private schools or schools outside the parish to educate their children.

Unlike the public school system, the archdiocese is considering opening schools on the city's east bank if it can get them ready by January, Maestri said, adding that he eagerly awaits information about the status of water service, sanitation and electricity.

The archdiocese continues to assess the damage to its east bank schools, he said. If any can be ready by January and city services are ready, "we are prepared to open," Maestri said.

"We'd eliminate holidays, extend the day and go into the summer," he continued.

The archdiocese may know by mid-October whether it will open any Catholic schools on the city's east bank, Maestri said.

In addition to the Catholic and public schools in the New Orleans, there are at least eight institutions that are members of the Independent School Association of the Southwest: Academy of the Sacred Heart, Louise S. McGehee, Isidore Newman, St. Andrew's Episcopal School, St. George's Episcopal School, St. Paul's Episcopal School, Stuart Hall School for Boys and Trinity Episcopal. Geoffrey Butler, executive director of the association, could not be reached for comment regarding the status of those schools.

There are also five charter schools in New Orleans, which are public schools that operate outside the purview of the School Board. Decisions on when those schools may reopen are pending.

Leslie Williams can be reached at (225) 215-0897.

Dillard aims for January return

University to set up on Tulane's campus

By The Associated Press

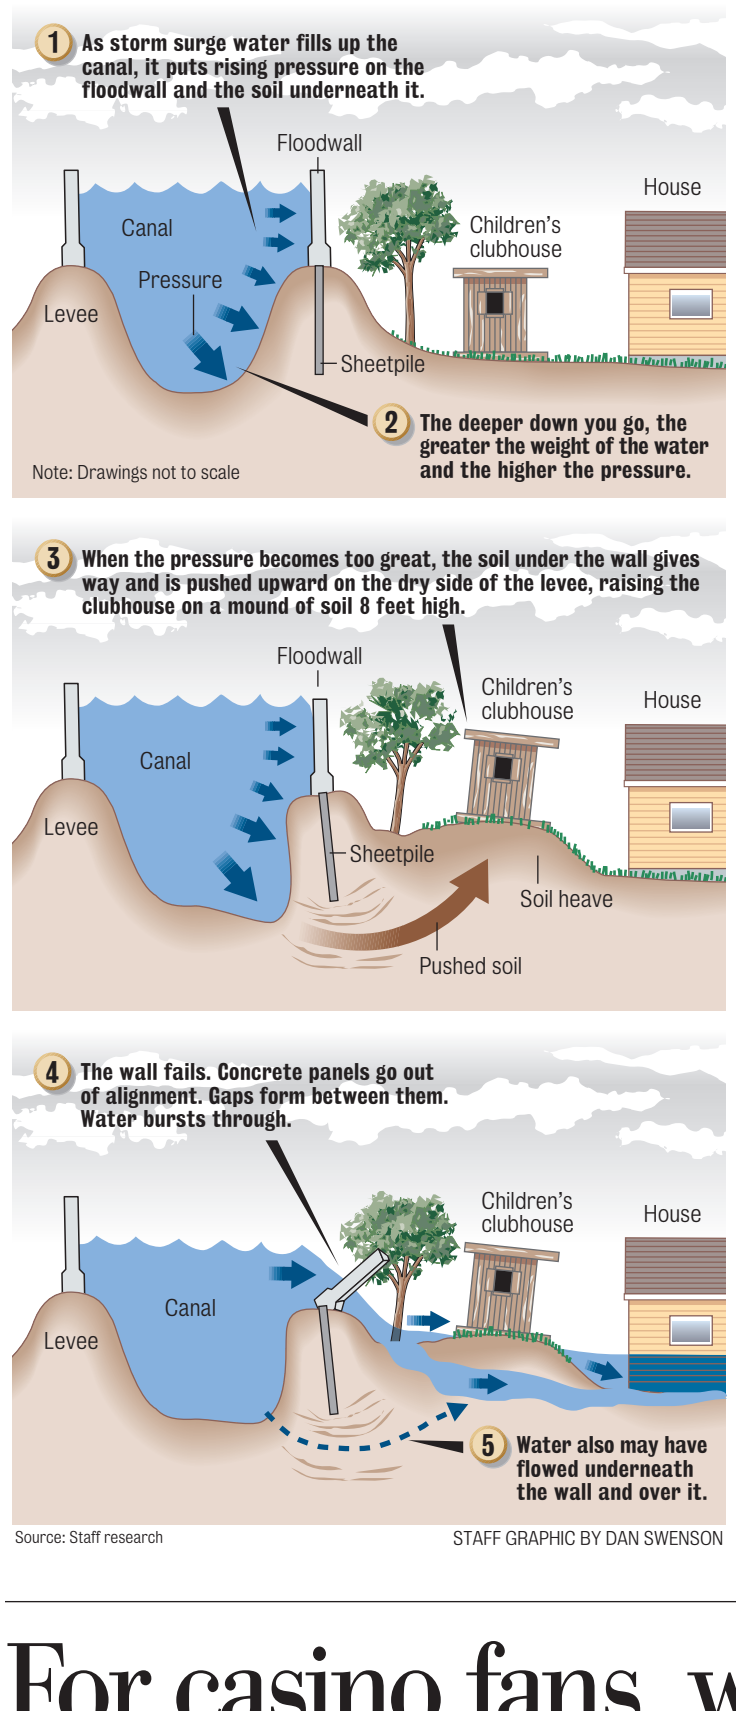
NEW ORLEANS — Dillard University will resume classes on Tulane University's campus as early as January while Dillard's campus undergoes extensive repairs.

Both universities were damaged by the floods after Hurricane Katrina, but Tulane is near the high edge of the bowl-shaped city, while Dillard's campus is near the center.

Tulane, which already has announced plans to reopen in January for its spring semester, had offered the space to Dillard, a 135-year-old historically black university. The schools worked together to bring Dillard back to New Orleans, Dillard President Marvalene Hughes said.

A news release said Dillard had considered several sites in Louisiana and in adjacent states.



"With the Tulane offer in New Orleans, it has been ensured that Dillard University will maintain its separate identity and heritage as a historically black university, re-establish its learning-centered community of students, faculty and staff and reclaim its legacy of 135 years in the city," it said.

The availability of classrooms, laboratories, auditoriums and administrative space helped shape the decision, the statement said.

Hughes said, "Dillard has two immediate goals: One, to prepare for our move back to campus as quickly as possible, with the safety and security of all of our students, faculty and staff as a paramount concern; and, two, to participate in the economic redevelopment of New Orleans."

SOIL HEAVE: A NEW BREACH THEORY

A father-son pair of engineers believe that the London Avenue Canal levee failed behind their house because of something called a soil heave. Water may have pushed soil under the levee floodwall and upward into their back yard under a children's clubhouse. The destabilized wall failed and the area behind it flooded.

yard under the clubhouse. The wooden clubhouse's base is now even with the edge of the house's roof, Daniel Cantrell said.

"Once that happened, the wall would have been compromised, not have been able to support itself," he said.

That is different from initial theories offered by the Army Corps of Engineers that the floodwalls were topped by storm surge and raises more questions about design and construction.

James Michael Duncan, a professor of geotechnical engineering at Virginia Tech, said that the description of what happened sounded like a "deep-seated structural failure" in which the soil under the structure moves and the structure built into it fails. One way to visualize it, he said, would be to think of a cross-section of the wall and the soil around it in a circle.

"Imagine what's inside the circle rotating. Outside of the wall, with the high water on it, it's pushing in and down," he said. "On the inside of the wall soil comes up as on the outside it goes down."

The position of the clubhouse suggests that the wall failed because of some form of human error, the Cantrells say.

Corps officials have suggested the storm surge may have simply overwhelmed the wall, flowing over the top and eroding the dry side. "The theory put out by the Corps was that it had been overtopped and it scoured out the soil ... and the wall would have keeled over at the knee," Cantrell said. "That would not have resulted in what we have. It's a textbook case of heave. The clubhouse is perfectly level, high and dry."

A similar heave may have occurred at the breach in the 17th Street canal, where soil also appears to have been pushed forward and upward.

A Corps of Engineers spokesman said that investigators probing the levee breaches probably would look at the possibility of soil heaves. Teams of engineers from the Corps, the American Society of Civil Engineers and the National Science Foundation are surveying the levee breaches this week, collecting evidence.

"They are going to look at everything and try to make a determination," spokesman Alan Dooley said. "The Corps is a learning organization. We'd like to learn everything we can."

The Cantrells' clubhouse is virtually undamaged. It was built sturdily, Gus Cantrell said, because he wanted to demonstrate good building techniques to his son. A flimsier backyard shed was pushed all the way across the street.

"We climbed over the debris to the clubhouse, which had two padlocks on it. Neither had been corroded," Daniel Cantrell said. "In the clubhouse, we found my son's bike – he's 5. It was hanging in there, no rust, no corrosion, no dirt, it had not gotten wet. There was a chest containing my grandfather's tools. They were in fine shape. It appears that the structure had not gotten wet at all."

That suggests the heave occurred first, precipitating the wall's failure. The floodwall did not completely collapse, but the concrete panels were knocked askew, with gaps between them. Once the wall destabilized, water could have flowed through the wall and possibly underneath it too. It flowed around the raised clubhouse and a patch of green grass next to it – the only live vegetation left on the property.

Once the wall broke, water appears to have blasted through it. The French doors on the Cantrell house were ripped off. Water coursed through the house and blew out the walls on two sides. Furniture was carried away.

"There was a china cabinet that took 10 men and a mule to move," Gus Cantrell said. "It's gone."

Cantrell, who retired in July from the University of New Orleans, where he worked as the director of the physical plant, said he was grateful he evacuated.

"If my wife and I had been home and not decided to leave, we would both be dead," he said. "There is no way we would have survived."

Gus Cantrell and his wife are now staying at Daniel's home in Houston. He said he has lived in Houston for 4½ years and did not plan to return to live in New Orleans. Gus Cantrell said that based on what he saw in his backyard, he believes the Corps bears some responsibility for the breaches.

"My regret is that I didn't look at that floodwall and say, what am I going to do when that wall comes down?" he said. "I didn't think about that. I trusted the Corps of Engineers."

With waters on the rise, corps races to fix levees

High tides, heavy rains expected in next few days

From staff reports

Anticipating heavy rains on Thursday and rising water levels in Lake Pontchartrain this week, the Army Corps of Engineers was working Monday to finish sealing up the ends of the London Avenue and 17th Street canals.

As it did before Rita, the corps is closing off the canals to prevent water levels from rising on both canals when winds from the east and a coming full moon bring in tides off the lake during the next few days.

With the London Avenue Canal sealed off and the final steel pilings being driven into the 17th Street Canal at the bridge late in the afternoon, Army Col. Duane P. Gapinski, commander of the corps' dewatering task force, said closing off the canals will give workers more time to mend the breaches in both canals with crushed rock and sandbags. The breaches are currently mended up to 6 feet and will be up to 10 feet by Thursday when heavy rains are expected, he said.

Though the Industrial Canal is too wide to seal off, Gapinski said the levee should be up to 10 feet by Thursday, enough to keep rising water from flooding the Lower 9th Ward again.

For casino fans, where there's a will, there's a wager

Gamblers forced to find inland alternatives

By Brendan Farrington
Associated Press writer

VICKSBURG, MISS. — For years, Wayne Hardin and his friends have made the trip from greater Atlanta to the Mississippi coast for gambling and golf. But now that Hurricane Katrina has shuttered those casinos, he and other gamblers have found new locations to place their wagers.

"Vicksburg is a very nice town," said Hardin, reflecting on his group's newfound discovery of this inland casino town, along the Mississippi River. One of the nicest things about it, Hardin noted, was that he'd pocketed a couple of thousand dollars at the Isle of Capri casino's blackjack tables.

While the coastal casinos are losing $3.3 million in gaming revenue each day, gamblers aren't sitting on their money. Much of it is going to casinos in Vicksburg — between New Orleans and Memphis, Tenn., along Mississippi's western border — and the state's other casinos in Greenville, Natchez, Tunica and Philadelphia.

For those who want to gamble, it's not like they have many other options.

Katrina, which shut down casinos along the Mississippi coast, also closed New Orleans' downtown casino and three riverboat casinos in the area. Hurricane Rita shut down Lake Charles' six casinos and an Indian reservation casino nearby. Louisiana and Mississippi are the only two deep South states with Las Vegas-style casinos; the closest alternative would be Missouri's riverboat casinos.

So while conventions usually drawn to the shuttered casinos seek alternatives in places like Las Vegas, smaller groups of gamblers are heading to inland Mississippi casinos closer to home.

"Recreational gamblers or retirees will take any room, whenever you have it," said Kim Tullos, general manager for the Isle of Capri's Vicksburg casino.

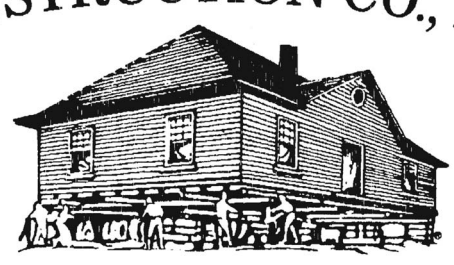
Until Katrina, Tullos said her hotel rooms usually filled only on weekends. But now weeknights are also being booked weeks in advance. And there are more guests than usual from Alabama, Florida and Louisiana.

The Las Vegas Convention and Visitors Authority said it has no data indicating individual visitors that may be going there instead of the Gulf Coast casinos. But it's been contacted by 65 groups that had events scheduled for New Orleans and Mississippi that now want to book Las Vegas.

The least damaged of the Gulf casinos, the Imperial Palace, probably won't have gambling for another three months, said Steve Richer, executive director of the Mississippi Gulf Coast Convention & Visitors Bureau. But it could be years before others reopen.

The timing could depend, in part, on a decision by the Mississippi Legislature, meeting this week to debate whether casino operators should be allowed to rebuild on land.

For now, many of the buses that used to transport gamblers to the Gulf are changing direction.



"We really thought that everything was lost, at least through the end of the year," said Donna Johnson of Trinity Tour and Travel. "The charter buses are regrouping. They're coming in leaps and bounds. We're continuing to book and every day it looks a little bit more promising. If people keep traveling, they can save us."

In Tunica, which rivals the Gulf Coast in the number of casinos and money gambled, scores of groups are rebooking trips scheduled for Biloxi and Gulfport.

"We've just been in reaction mode here handling the calls," said Anne Coggins, sales manager for meetings and conventions at the Tunica Convention & Visitors Bureau. "If people are willing to adjust some dates, we're doing our best to get them plugged in ... They're desperate to book."

But business has not picked up for everybody. Good Time Tours of Pensacola, Fla., which ran 10 buses a day to Biloxi before the storm, is starting to sell off some of its fleet. The company is now running buses to Vicksburg and other Mississippi casino towns.

Jindal: Use ZIP codes to assess damage

SBA, from A-1

To get a low-interest business loan, applicants must fill out as many as six forms, report their month-by-month business revenue for the past three years and submit to an inspection of their shop by a government "loss verifier" who must eyeball the property, even if it's in a region where residents are not yet allowed back.

"We've heard from a lot of small businesses eager to open up again but worried about the paperwork and delays," Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, said. "If we smother people in paperwork, some of the businesses the SBA is trying to help may not be there."

Jindal said he plans to meet today with SBA officials and local business people in Baton Rouge and Mandeville to try to expedite the application process.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco estimates that about a third of the private businesses in the state were disrupted by hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Katrina alone damaged about 68,000 small businesses with annual revenues of less than $5 million, the governor said.

SBA offers small-business owners 30-year loans of as much as $1.5 million with an attractive 4 percent interest rate. In the three states hardest hit by Katrina, 3,100 business owners have applied. As of Monday, the agency said three have been approved in Louisiana, five in Mississippi and six in Alabama for a total outlay by the SBA of $538,900.

Fourteen times as many applications have been rejected as approved.

An official with the SBA, which promotes itself as "America's Disaster Resource," said the devastation of back-to-back hurricanes along the Gulf Coast and especially the flooding have hindered inspectors from evaluating the property that business owners hope to rebuild.

"We are going as fast as we can. We understand the need," said Loan Program Director Herb Mitchell. "A lot of places, we just haven't been able to gain access."

Jindal questioned the need to conduct in-person inspections at all. He said the agency could gauge the general level of damage to a business by its ZIP code because that is the standard public officials such as the mayor of New Orleans are using to allow people back into their neighborhoods.

"It's obvious that in some of these neighborhoods, if you look at the ZIP code, you know there has been significant damage," Jindal said.

Within a week of Hurricane Katrina, the federal government announced it was waiving normal Medicaid application requirements for hurricane evacuees. It was a recognition by federal officials that storm evacuees were unlikely to have all of the paperwork they typically need to qualify for the government health insurance program.

The Small Business Administration has worked out an arrangement with the Internal Revenue Service to provide tax information that applicants might not have with them. But Mitchell said he didn't have the authority to waive legal requirements for qualifying and closing on a government loan.

Those helping business owners fill out the applications say there are plenty of hurdles to clear. The biggest challenge, they say, is the requirement to report three years' worth of revenue on a month-to-month basis. Most small business owners who evacuated didn't bring with them a full set of business records. If they had accountants, they too might be digging out from under storm damage.

Tony Martinez, director of the Small Business Development Center in Baton Rouge, said his office has submitted 30 applications on behalf of business owners and that the SBA hasn't finished reviewing any of them. One, he said, was for a business in Baton Rouge, far from the worst storm damage, whose owner filed an application three days after Katrina.

Martinez said he was told by a regional SBA official that the agency is giving top priority to homeowners who apply for low-interest loans and that the turnaround time on business loans will average 90 days.

"The loan officers said the home (loan) applications take priority. I was told as much," Martinez said. "I can give you a loan to rebuild your house, but what will you do in the meantime? To me they should have equal priority."

SBA said its "target" to approve loans is 30 days. A spokeswoman also denied that home loan applications are getting handled more quickly.

"They are being considered as they come in," SBA spokeswoman Carol Chastang said.

Bush names Harriet Miers to Supreme Court

Trial lawyer has never been a judge

By Fred Barbash, Peter Baker and Michael Fletcher
The Washington Post

President Bush named White House Counsel Harriet Miers, 60, to be associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court today.

Miers, who was Bush's personal attorney in Texas, was the first woman elected president of the Texas Bar Association and was a partner at the Texas law firm of Locke Liddell & Sapp before coming to Washington to work in the Bush administration.

The announcement came just two hours before Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. formally took his seat as chief justice of the United States on the high court's opening day of the 2005 term.

Miers would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, generally considered the decisive swing vote on many close issues.

If confirmed by the Senate, Miers would be a rare appointee with no experience as a judge at any level. Initial searches of news archives also suggested that Miers has not been an outspoken advocate for or against any particular issue.

Reaction from Democrats was noncommittal but not negative, mostly because of who she isn't (a prominent conservative judge similar to some on the White House short list) than who she is.

Vermont Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, the top Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, said Miers has been a Bush loyalist and that "it is important to know whether she would enter this key post with the judicial independence necessary when the Supreme Court considers issues of interest to this administration."

But White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters that both Republican and Democratic senators suggested Miers by name to the president.

One Democrat who appeared pleased by the choice was Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

"I like Harriet Miers," said Reid, who had voted against Roberts, in a statement. "In my view, the Supreme Court would benefit from the addition of a justice who has real experience as a practicing lawyer."

Later when meeting with Miers at the Capitol, Reid noted that 39 other people have been appointed to the Supreme Court without having experience as a judge. He praised her experience as a trial lawyer, an occupation he shares with her.

"So anyone with that background makes me feel good — someone who has been in a courtroom, tried cases, answered interrogatories, done all those things that lawyers need to do," Reid said.

Reaction from some non-elected conservatives, particularly on blogs, was less positive. David Frum, in National Review Online, said the president missed an opportunity. "The Miers nomination," he wrote, "is an unforced error. Unlike the Roberts's nomination, which confirmed the previous balance on the Court, the O'Connor resignation offered an opportunity to change the balance."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (D-Pa.) said he "did not think" Miers had taken positions on many of the critical issues before the court. "One of the things that I talked to her about," he said after a private meeting today, "was the complexity of a Supreme Court nomination hearing because of there are a lot of complicated issues."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he was "excited" and "pleased" with the nomination. "She's a woman who understands judicial restraint," he said.

Frist promised a "thorough, disciplined" confirmation process. He suggested the Senate could vote on her nomination before Thanksgiving, although Specter said he was not yet sure of the timetable.

Among the non-judges appointed to the Supreme Court in modern history are the late William H. Rehnquist, who was a top Justice Department official in the Nixon administration, and Abe Fortas, an influential Washington attorney and close adviser to Lyndon B. Johnson, who nominated him to the high court in 1965.

Bush portrayed Miers as a "pioneer" in the legal profession who broke down gender barriers in the law. She would become the third woman to have served on the Supreme Court, following O'Connor and Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

"Harriet's greatest inspiration was her mother, who taught her the difference between right and wrong and instilled in Harriet the conviction that she could do anything she set her mind to," said Bush.

"Inspired by the confidence, Harriet became a pioneer in the field of law, breaking down barriers to women that remain even after a generation — remain a generation after President Reagan appointed Justice O'Connor to the Supreme Court."

Miers was active in a 1992 battle in the American Bar Association, arguing vehemently but unsuccessfully against a resolution supporting abortion rights. News reports at the time did not quote her on the merits of Roe v. Wade , the 1973 decision legalizing abortion, but rather on what she considered the inappropriateness of the ABA taking a position.

She does have some political experience. In 1989, she was elected to a two-year term as an at-large candidate on the Dallas City Council. She chose not to run for reelection when her term expired.

Miers served as general counsel for the transition team of Governor-elect Bush in 1994, according to a White House biography of Miers released this morning.

"She is single and very close to her family: Two brothers and her mother live in Dallas and a third brother lives in Houston," said the White House biography.

Her low-key but high-precision style has been particularly valued in a White House where discipline in publicly articulating policy and loyalty to the president are highly valued.

Miers came with Bush to the White House in 2001 as staff secretary, the person who screens all the documents that cross the president's desk.

She was promoted to deputy chief of staff before Bush named her counsel after his reelection in November. She succeeded Alberto R. Gonzales, another longtime Bush confidant, who was elevated to attorney general.

"Harriet Miers is a trusted adviser on whom I have long relied for straightforward advice," Bush said at the time. "Harriet has the keen judgment and discerning intellect necessary to be an outstanding counsel."

When he was governor of Texas, Bush once called her "a pit bull in size 6 shoes" for her cool but dogged determination.

Working with her staff of 13 lawyers, and in cooperation with the Justice Department, Miers's office provides guidance on issues from the legal parameters for the war on terrorism to presidential speeches. Her office also takes the lead in vetting and recommending candidates for the federal judiciary, all the way up to the Supreme Court.

The office also has played a pivotal role in recommending federal appeals court candidates to Bush. Senate Democrats blocked 10 of the president's 34 appeals court nominees during his first term, saying they were too extreme in their conservatism. That prompted Senate Republicans to threaten to change the rules to disallow filibusters of judicial candidates.

Born and raised in Dallas, Miers, 60, is a graduate of Southern Methodist University, where she majored in mathematics. She went on to law school at SMU, earning her law degree in 1970 and going on to clerk for a federal judge in Dallas. In an era when there were few female lawyers, Miers set out for the top.

According to published reports, she was the first woman hired by Locke Purnell Boren Laney & Neely, a Dallas firm whose history extends to the 1890s. She went on to become a top commercial litigator whose clients included Microsoft and the Walt Disney Co.

Miers was active in professional organizations and eventually was elected head of the Dallas and Texas bar associations, where she was known for encouraging members to do pro bono work.

She met Bush in the 1980s and was drafted to work as counsel for his 1994 gubernatorial campaign. In 1995, he appointed her to the Texas Lottery Commission.

Roberts is all business his first day on the bench

Bush welcomes new chief justice

By Darlene Superville
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — John Roberts, who argued more than three dozen cases before the Supreme Court as an appellate court lawyer, got to see a new side on Monday.

He took his seat — a leather chair, actually — as chief justice.

On opening day of the court's 2005-06 term, Roberts welcomed new lawyers to the Supreme Court bar and presided over arguments in two cases. He put on eyeglasses to read from the sheaf of papers in front of him, removed them to survey the packed courtroom and sipped from a silver cup.

Crisp and businesslike, Roberts, 50, listened intently, at times with chin in hand.

It was a younger and more robust version of his mentor, the late William H. Rehnquist, who died last month of cancer at age 80 after 33 years on the high court, including 19 as chief justice.

But unlike his predecessor, who had adorned each sleeve of his robe with a set of four gold stripes after being inspired by a costume in a comic opera, Roberts wore a plain black judicial robe.

Before taking his place in the chief justice's center chair, Roberts was welcomed during a special sitting of the nine-member Supreme Court. President Bush, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Solicitor General Paul Clement, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and other senators, Roberts' wife, Jane, also a lawyer, and the Roberts' two children attended, among others.

Gonzales, wearing a formal morning coat with tails, brought Roberts' commission — a poster-sized, ivory-colored document that Bush signed stating his intent to nominate Roberts to be chief justice. It was unrolled and read aloud before Justice John Paul Stevens, the most senior justice, administered the oath to Roberts in a repeat of his swearing-in at the White House on Thursday.

Stevens, 85, then wished his much-younger boss "a long and happy career in our common calling."

After the brief ceremony, the pair — in suits rather than their judicial robes — posed for pictures on the Supreme Court steps before Roberts motioned for his waiting family to join him.

Jack Roberts, 4, an active boy who manages to steal his father's limelight when they appear together in public, gazed at the long flight of steps before him as if he wanted to make a run for them.

His mother seemed to catch on and gripped his hand before letting him go to run, arms open wide, to Roberts, who scooped him up into a big hug. Roberts then hugged daughter Josie, 5, before exchanging a kiss with his wife and posing for news photographers.

"We love you Judge Roberts. We are praying for you and your family," shouted someone from the crowd that gathered in front of the court and had been singing until he appeared.

Investigators: Passengers slid to one side before boat flipped

Survivors give differing accounts

By Chris Carola
Associated Press writer

LAKE GEORGE, N.Y. — The passengers aboard a tour boat that capsized on Lake George, killing 20 people, were sitting on long benches and slid sharply to one side of the vessel just before it flipped over, authorities said Monday.

Wayne Bennett, State Police superintendent, said that investigators do not know what initially caused the Ethan Allen to tip. But he said passengers either slid or were thrown to one side of the boat after it began lurching.

"And that, of course, would automatically mean an even bigger shift of weight," Bennett said.

The captain of the 40-foot glass-enclosed boat told authorities it was hit by waves from at least one other vessel and turned over as he tried to steer out of them, authorities said earlier Monday. The boat flipped so fast that none of the 47 passengers _ all senior citizens, most of them from Michigan _ could put on a life jacket.

There was no immediate confirmation that another boat that could have churned up waves was in the area, and survivors gave investigators differing versions of what happened before the boat went down in calm, sunny weather, authorities said.

Eight people were hospitalized with shortness of breath, broken bones and other injuries.

On Monday afternoon, crews using inflatable bags raised the sunken vessel 70 feet to the surface. They planned to pump it out and tow it to shore. National Transportation Safety Board investigators will then examine the wreck.

Mark Rosenker, NTSB acting chairman, said investigators would focus on such things as the history of the boat, the pilot's record, whether the boat had enough crew members and whether the number of passengers played a role in the accident.

"It's much too early to determine what happened out on that lake," Rosenker said.

The boat's captain, Richard Paris, was the only crew member aboard, but state rules allow for just one crewman for up to 50 passengers. Also, New York state regulations require that life jackets be made available for every person on a boat, but people do not have to wear them.

Earlier in the day, Bennett said the seats were not secured to deck. Later, State Police said that was incorrect.

Rep. John Sweeney, R.-N.Y., said investigators are looking at whether there was too much weight on board the boat, even though the vessel was just below its capacity of 50 people. He said the Coast Guard assumes a weight of 150 pounds per person in calculating a vessel's capacity, an assumption he said may have been off the mark.

Gov. George Pataki said licenses for two other boats operated by the Ethan Allen's owner, Shoreline Cruises, have been suspended while the investigation continues. He and others, however, said people should not draw any conclusions about the operator.

"I do not believe there is any criminal culpability on any of the parties we have spoken with," said Sheriff Larry Cleveland.

A survivor, 76-year-old old Jeane Siler of Trenton, Mich., said that she saw a wake coming and that the boat turned into it. She said she stood up and was either thrown or jumped into the water, where she found herself surrounded by other passengers. She suffered broken bones in her spine, a broken finger and bumps on her head.

Virgil Chambers, executive director of the National Safe Boating Council, an organization for recreational boaters, said investigators would probably examine how weight was distributed within the boat.

"If all the people were on one side, maybe to look at something, and if the operator were to take the boat over a wave at a particular angle, it could cause the boat to roll," Chambers said.

Chambers said he also expected investigators to look into whether there were any modifications to the craft, such as the addition of a canopy, that might have made the boat less stable.

The captain was not tested for drugs or alcohol after the accident. The sheriff said he had no legal grounds for administering such a test. Also, the sheriff said Paris had a state license, rather than a Coast Guard one, which would have required a test for drugs or alcohol.

THE WAR IN IRAQ

U.S. continues sweep in insurgent stronghold

Assassination attempt on Iraqi oil minister fails

By Mohammed Barakat
Associated Press writer

QAIM, IRAQ — With snipers on rooftops and helicopters hovering overhead, U.S. forces clashed with insurgent fighters Monday while searching homes in a town near the Syrian border.

In Baghdad, Iraq's oil minister narrowly escaped an assassination attempt when a bomb hit his motorcade.

While U.S. forces pushed ahead with their offensive farther west, fighting erupted in the capital of Iraq's Anbar province, with masked militants attacking an Iraqi patrol and sparking a gunbattle in the streets of Ramadi.

Oil Minister Ibrahim Bahr al-Uloum was headed out of the capital to attend the opening of a rebuilt refinery to the north when the roadside bomb hit his seven-car motorcade Monday morning, killing three of his bodyguards, the ministry said. Bahr al-Uloum was unhurt.

The assassination attempt came a week after a car bomb at a checkpoint near the Oil Ministry killed at least three ministry employees and seven police officers.

Iraq has the world's third-largest known oil reserves, but the industry has been crippled by war, sanctions during Saddam Hussein's rule and the anti-U.S. insurgency. Oil production remains limited, curbed by decaying infrastructure and frequent militant attacks on pipelines and refineries.

The violence came less than two weeks before a national referendum on a new constitution. Al-Qaida in Iraq and other groups in the Sunni-led insurgency have launched a wave of violence to wreck the Oct. 15 vote, killing at least 207 people in the past eight days, including 16 U.S. forces.

Bahr al-Uloum vowed that the insurgents would fail and that Iraqis will approve the new constitution. "All Iraqis are looking forward to saying 'yes' to the constitution ... By doing so Iraq will usher in a new stage," he said after the attack.

But leaders of Iraq's Sunni Arab minority have rejected the constitution and are trying to defeat it at the polls, saying it will tear the country apart into Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish fiefdoms, the Sunnis being the weakest.

The U.S. offensive near the western border aims to sweep out al-Qaida in Iraq insurgents who have made the area a stronghold and used it to bring foreign fighters in from Syria.

The sweep, codenamed Operation Iron Fist, began Saturday in the village of Sadah and has spread to Karabilah and Rumana.

U.S. helicopters fired rockets at targets in Rumana, where a roadside bomb blew up near an American armored vehicle, sending up a plume of black smoke, witnesses said, but no U.S. casualties were reported.

In Karabilah, troops searched house to house for militants, apparently meeting stiffer resistance than in Sadah, which most fighters fled before the U.S. troops moved in.

Marine snipers fired from rooftops and U.S. helicopters flew overhead as the advance was slowed for about an hour by insurgent fire, a CNN journalist embedded with the Marines said.

No U.S. troops have been killed or seriously injured in the offensive, the military said.

But an American soldier died of wounds suffered from indirect fire Saturday in Ramadi, the military said Monday. The death raised to 1,936 the number of U.S. military members who have died since the Iraq war began in 2003.

The U.S. military also dismissed as "patently false" a claim by al-Qaida in Iraq that its insurgents had captured two U.S. Marines in the fighting, even as the group issued a claim that it had killed them.

Al-Qaida in Iraq issued a Web statement Sunday saying a 24-hour deadline it set for U.S. and Iraqi authorities to release female Sunni prisoners had ended and that its fighters "implemented the law of God on the two infidel captives," referring to their execution. Neither the claim of the abduction Sunday nor the latest claim included any details or photos of the alleged captives, which such Web statements usually carry.

SHEILA STROUP

City of silence greets musician

Spencer Bohren came home two weeks ago to get his passport.

The blues musician and his wife, Marilyn, drove into New Orleans before dawn. "Metairie was lit up, but when we turned to go into the city, it was totally dark," he said. "It just took our breath away. It was like looking across a cornfield or the ocean or something."

On Esplanade Avenue, they saw cars crashed into houses, dodged abandoned buses, breathed in the wreckage of their city, a city that had always been filled with music.

"It was just so silent. I think that disturbed us more than the darkness.

There were no birds singing, no dogs barking, certainly no musicians playing," Spencer said.

And when the sun rose, they looked around and saw that everything looked dead.

"It just hurts. You don't live in New Orleans without a commitment, and part of the payoff is the beautiful foliage," he said.

Everything changed

They stayed only long enough to gather up a few belongings that hadn't been swamped.

"The thing I really needed was my passport so I can perform at some hurricane benefits in Switzerland and France this month," Spencer, 55, said.

One item they had grabbed when they first evacuated was their computer, which has kept them in touch with musicians Spencer has known and performed with over the years.

"We got hundreds of e-mails from around the world — people wanting to donate stuff, wanting to help," he said.

When they left New Orleans for the second time, they didn't talk much.

Spencer thought about how everything had changed: Their home in Esplanade Ridge was filled with creepy mold; their son Tucker was enrolled in a high school in St. Louis, his friends from Ben Franklin scattered across the country; and Marilyn was sitting in Missouri instead of teaching at Holy Rosary Academy.

Then she broke the silence, summing up in four words what so many people are feeling.

"I miss my life," she said.

Only one true home

Spencer is not a native New Orleanian. He grew up in Wyoming and traveled around the country, playing folk, gospel and blues music.

In spite of what he calls his "gypsy streak," he spent much of the '70s in the Crescent City, playing in the French Quarter and at Tipitina's. And in 1997, when they came back for a visit, he and Marilyn decided to stay.

"We never felt at home until we got to New Orleans," he said.

He is feeling homeless now, and everywhere he goes to perform, people want to talk about Katrina and what it did to his city.

During a radio interview in Kansas City, he almost started crying.

"I was talking about how there's something in New Orleans that you can't touch, but it touches you deeply. And then I just lost it," he said.

He wants to come back, and he wants New Orleans to be the way it was: a place that's never silent, a place where music feeds your soul and you never go hungry.

The evidence of Carol Perkins' plight is scattered on her front lawn. Her sofas, waterlogged and mildewing, are interspersed with her other household possessions that were ruined when Hurricane Rita soaked the inside of her Lafitte home with 2 feet of water more than a week ago.

The federal government denied her application for help on Saturday. Puzzled, she said she tried to reach the Federal Emergency Management Agency by phone to no avail.

"We'll bounce back," Perkins said. "We've done if before. We come from a long line of hunters and trappers. I just hope they don't screw me on the insurance."

Not far away, three caskets from a small cemetery rested in the parking lot of American Legion Post No. 344 hall on Jean Lafitte Boulevard next to Bruce Kuhn Sr.'s home.

"You know it's bad when the dead want to get out," Kuhn said with a chuckle.

A sense of humor was about the only thing he had left while waiting for federal help, hopefully, in the form of a mobile home parked near his house to live in while he makes repairs.

"Until they declare you a disaster area, there ain't nothing they can do for you," said Kuhn, a commercial fisher who said the industry has been "shot" by the hurricanes. "I told them, 'I got three feet of water in my house, so why hasn't this been a disaster area?' I ain't the only one. I ain't the only one."

On Monday, 10 days after Rita's tidal surge flooded Lafitte, Barataria and Crown Point, forcing hundreds of residents from their flooded homes, FEMA declared lower Jefferson and Plaquemines Parish disaster areas. The declaration means displaced residents would be eligible for temporary housing, said Jefferson Parish Councilman Chris Roberts, who represents the area.

"They were very slow," he said, adding that parish officials are still assessing the damage. "It's a very, very frustrating process."

Kenner's suspended chief administrative officer, Cedric Floyd, who is accused in a criminal complaint of hoarding hurricane relief goods at his house, had the backing of Mayor Phil Capitano "to distribute food and supplies at any time and at any location," according to a Capitano affidavit obtained Monday by The Times-Picayune.

Hundreds of motorists trying to reach a relocated Red Cross distribution center at Pelican Park near Mandeville were turned away early Monday, leading to a flurry of rumors that the agency had canceled plans to keep giving out $300-per-person debit cards.

But the people were denied entrance because by 8 a.m., the 1,000-vehicle parking lot at the park's Castine Center was full, State Police Sgt. Randy Fandal said. He was among several state troopers and sheriff's deputies who handled traffic at the recreation complex at 6 a.m.

With the Lower 9th Ward in ruin and without the people who once lived there, the Lastie and Banks families drove into their neighborhood Monday to see and save what they could after Hurricane Katrina.

On North Robertson and Lamanche streets, Chester Lastie Jr., 63, and his son, Darren, 39, walked around the family compound of houses now on dry land.

"I'm blessed — blessed to be alive," Darren Lastie said while rummaging through the flood-damaged Bobcat, bulldozer and excavator that once

High Holy Days begin with faithful scattered

By Bruce Nolan

Like many of their ancient forbears, New Orleans Jews on Monday night began celebrating the High Holy Days in a kind of forced exile, driven from their homes by calamity – this one natural, not political.

By some estimates 3,000 to 5,000 Jews, a quarter to nearly half of New Orleans' Jewish population, found themselves in Houston on Monday to begin the celebration of Rosh Hashanah.

The next-largest contingent appeared to be in Baton Rouge, another haven for New Orleanians who fled Hurricane Katrina.

Rosh Hashanah opens a 10-day period of reflection and renewal ending on Oct. 13, the solemn Day of Atonement, Yom Kippur.

na, which downed trees and damaged weaker structures. However, Rita's surge wreaked more destruction, as is evident now from the mounds of crumpled drywall, appliances and furniture dragged from homes to the edge of streets.

Jean Lafitte town officials said FEMA representatives arrived at Town Hall on Monday morning – in response to Hurricane Katrina, which caused scattered wind damage to homes and other structures. American Red Cross, Salvation Army and Army Corps of Engineers officials also were in the area.

Still frustrated residents trying to figure out the next step after Rita said they were glad to be home.

Outside his family home of more than 50 years, Purnell Adams thumbed through an art book that featured his late uncle, Lafitte folk artist James P. Scott.

"I ain't throwing this away," said Adams, a commercial fisher whose job is in limbo because of the storms. "This is mine. It has always been mine. I wish I would have taken this with me."

His sister, Vera Adams, looked over his shoulder. "How do you dry this?" she said.

Like her brother, she faces the Herculean task of cleaning her Barataria home.

"I'm glad to be home," she said. "There's no place like home, and I'm not leaving."

Unlike a huge park federal officials have created outside Baton Rouge for displaced residents, Roberts said the parish wants FEMA to supply mobile homes as temporary housing that residents can park on their properties.

"That's the preference in Jefferson Parish," he said. "That's what we're pushing for."

Jefferson Parish residents displaced by Rita should call the Citizens Affairs Office at (504) 736-8703, Roberts said.

tivities that the Police Department considers to be a crime.

Police booked Floyd on Sept. 23 with malfeasance in office after officers searched his house and found truckloads of new clothing, tools and cases of food and medicine. Police said Floyd had diverted the supplies from a city-sponsored distribution center for Hurricane Katrina victims.

Floyd said he was storing the goods to give them to Mark Mitchell, pastor of New Hope Community Church. Both men said they had been planning to meet up so Mitchell could pick up the supplies.

Capitano's affidavit says Floyd managed the distribution center at 2500 Williams Boulevard but "had the authority to distribute foods and supplies at any time and at any location."

"We asked him if he would to try and get as much of that stuff to the different churches as we could," Capitano said Monday. "We wanted him to move those supplies to the churches. We figured that by putting it at the churches, it would bring it closer to where people were."

Nonetheless, after police searched Floyd's house, Capitano placed him on leave without pay until the charge is resolved in court.

"We've suspended him, and until the justice system runs its course he will be suspended," Capitano said.

Jefferson Parish District Attorney Paul Connick Jr. said his office hasn't received a formal report from the Police Department so he wouldn't comment on the affidavit.

Capt. Steve Caraway, a Police Department spokesman, said he would not comment on the affidavit because he hasn't seen it. He said the Police Department hasn't finished the investigation because members have not yet interviewed Capitano.

"We've been trying to meet with the mayor since last week," Caraway said.

Floyd would not comment on the case, and his attorney could not be reached.

N.O. congregations meet where they are

HOLY, from B-1

As sunset fell Monday, marking the close of the old and the arrival of a new year in the Jewish calendar, most of the metropolitan area's synagogues appeared to be closed for the traditional ceremony that celebrates the beginning of Rosh Hashanah.

One exception was Northshore Jewish Congregation in Mandeville, where a service was planned for Monday night.

But this morning promised a return to religious life for Jews in New Orleans: The Jewish community said it would observe holy day services in an unusual communal service in New Orleans, at 11 a.m. at Touro Synagogue.

Touro's service this morning is hosted by and for the entire Jewish community, said Rabbi Robert Loewy of Metairie's Congregation Gates of Prayer, who was helping to coordinate it.

Monday night's observances were to be mostly out of town.

Loewy was to lead a Rosh Hashanah service at Rice University for New Orleanians in Houston; Rabbi Andrew Busch, the new leader of Touro Synagogue, was to lead one at a Unitarian church in Baton Rouge; and Rabbi Ed Cohn of Temple Sinai was to lead another in Baton Rouge.

Congregation Shir Chadash, a conservative congregation based in Metairie, was to observe the day in Houston, Loewy said.

Moreover, it appeared that more congregations in the area would be able to have services as the High Holy Days wore on.

Loewy said a significant fraction of his Jefferson Parish congregation would observe Yom Kippur in their water-damaged temple.

"It'll be chairs on a bare concrete floor, but we'll be there," he said.

This morning's service at Touro was expected to attract hundreds of observant Jews from Jefferson Parish, as well as Jewish National Guard and relief workers who have been asking whether any New Orleans service might be available, Busch said.

Touro is unusual in New Orleans in that it has something like a basement. Although rising water did not reach the synagogue, its basement flooded from a drainage backup, said Mark Rubenstein, the congregation's executive director. For that reason this morning's service might be held in the synagogue's chapel, he said.

The service will be led by Busch, who moved to New Orleans a few months ago from suburban Philadelphia and took over July 1 from retired Rabbi David Goldstein.

Busch spent part of Monday inspecting his newly purchased, damaged house Uptown, then was to return to Baton Rouge for the evening service.

Today and over the next few days, he said, he would emphasize the need for community and solidarity in the face of the crisis.

"We've got to worry about ourselves, yes, but we have to take care of others as well," he said. "The Jewish community is part and parcel of New Orleans at large; we have to be as concerned about the very poor as ourselves."

In the same way that Katrina shredded lives and personal plans, it also shredded the carefully prepared sermon series many rabbis labored over for weeks.

But some once-secondary elements seem even more relevant, even compelling now. Loewy said he knows he'll spend time focusing on hope.

"You have to spend your life focusing on your values, what's truly important to you. Then you focus your life around reaching those goals," he said.

St. Tammany president calls for FEMA apology

Development of site for trailers is at issue

By Charlie Chapple
St. Tammany bureau

An angry St. Tammany Parish President Kevin Davis on Monday demanded a public apology from FEMA officials and called on the agency to fire a spokeswoman who alleged that Davis tried to get FEMA to hire a construction company the agency claims he owns, to develop property "to which he has personal ties," for a large temporary-housing site near Slidell.

The allegations, attributed to agency spokeswoman Nicol Andrews, were posted on CNN's Web site Sunday night in an apparent response to an interview done by Davis with the national television news network earlier in the day.

The comments made by Andrews to CNN are totally false, Davis said. And if FEMA officials do not issue a public and formal apology, the parish may sever relations with the agency, Davis said during a briefing with other local officials.

James McIntyre, a FEMA spokesman in Baton Rouge, said the agency is not publicly discussing Davis' demand. "The issue is being worked with Mr. Davis," McIntyre said.

Davis said he was "flabbergasted" when he read Andrews' comments. "I said to myself: What is this?" Davis said. "I don't even own a construction company."

The construction company and property belong to Slidell-area businessmen Robert Torres, Davis said. Although Torres is a friend and political supporter, Davis said he has no ties to the company or the property at Lakeshore Estates, south of Slidell, which can accommodate up to 1,200 temporary trailer homes for hurricane victims.

Davis said he was only trying to expedite the securing of local housing sites for the thousands of parish residents who desperately need temporary homes.

The site in Lakeshore Estates has electricity, sewerage and water and can be quickly converted into a temporary housing site. Torres' construction company was ready to get the site prepared, he said, and FEMA wouldn't have to wait until it secured an outside company to do the work.

Davis, like other officials in the region, has been critical of FEMA and its response to the recovery effort. The parish president especially has been critical of agency efforts to provide temporary housing in St. Tammany. Last week, Davis said publicly that he might lead a caravan of local residents, with pickup trucks and trailer hitches, to FEMA holding sites for the temporary homes and bring some back to St. Tammany.

"Sometimes, you have to do something like that to get their attention," Davis said last week. "It seems like that's the only way you can get them to do anything."

During Sunday's interview with CNN's Wolf Blitzer, David commended FEMA field workers and those at the top of the agency. But he said FEMA's middle management creates bureaucratic logjams that prevent or slow down help from reaching those who need it.

"I wasn't mean, upset or angry" during the interview, Davis said Monday. "I was just telling it like it is…Then I read these false statements they made about me. That made me angry…Don't they verify their facts?"

Meanwhile this weekend, 300 trailers were brought by FEMA into St. Tammany and are being stored at Lakeshore Estates.

earned him a living.

With thousands of houses beyond repair, it's the perfect time for this father and son to be in the demolition business, but their equipment lay rusting.

After spending days trying to save the business from looters right after the storm, the Lasties were rescued and now have returned.

They are sleeping "on the street" along St. Claude Avenue on the downtown side of the Industrial Canal at night and return to the Lower 9th Ward each morning in a just-purchased 1989 Dodge truck, packed with new generators.

Already battered by Katrina in August, the Lower 9th Ward flooded again during Hurricane Rita less than a month later.

"My main goal is to get the equipment up and running so we can make some money and rebuild the city at the same time," Darren Lastie said.

"I'm really ready to retire, but it looks like I might have to work," said Chester Lastie, who wound up spending two days in his attic after Katrina, before chopping through the roof to be rescued.

Also caught by the rushing water that flooded his neighborhood after the Industrial Canal levee broke, Darren Lastie was rescued from the second floor of a neighbor's home after a harrowing ordeal.

"I was caught and found myself swimming," he said. "I swam over to the Bobcat, and that went under. So I swam to my sister's Mardi Gras truck float, then that went under. So I swam to a neighbor's house and stayed upstairs."

Though he eventually was rescued, no one showed up for days — and at one point, he was convinced he would have to find a way out of the house. He caught sight of a tire floating by.

"I caught it with an extension cord and a coat hanger," he said.

"It's still tied up there, and I've been laughing about that."

Several blocks away, Jason Banks, 45, walked in remaining knee-high floodwater to his house on Tricou Street while his wife, Lisa, sat in the insurance adjuster's van with the Massachusetts plate, hoping that if he could save only one thing it would be the wedding ring she set high in a closet because she didn't want to lose it in a hotel or hurricane shelter.

But her husband did not return smiling.

"It's gone," Banks told his wife. "We couldn't even get in. There's nothing to be saved."

Banks, who owns Java Copy Zone on Baronne Street, promised her they would return "whenever the water dries."

as hordes of vehicles showed up, blocking U.S. 190.

Ken Williams, a Covington spokesman for the Red Cross, said the Castine Center will be the new western St. Tammany distribution center for the debit cards, opening from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. weekdays and on Sunday. Williams said he did not know how long the distribution center would remain open, but Fandal said Red Cross volunteers on the scene told him Monday that they would be at the location for at least two weeks.

Park Director Kathy Foley said Red Cross officials contacted her Friday about shifting the operation from the Paul Spitzfaden Community Center on East Causeway Approach in Mandeville to Pelican Park, which is just east of the city.

"They said there was such a crush of people it was disrupting businesses on East Causeway . . . and causing such extreme traffic congestion on East Causeway and U.S. 190 they needed a new location," Foley said.

She said she OK'd the Red Cross request only if it agreed not to distribute on Saturday. "That way, we get our youth activities up and running and have a full Saturday of recreational sports and plenty of parking for parents and children in our various youth leagues," she said.

Fandal said motorists are being asked to not stack up on U.S. 190.

"We have a long Pelican Drive off the highway, and we can count as they come in and we will keep them moving to the parking lot," he said. "When we count 1,000 cars each day, we will shut it down . . . If a motorist sees the closed sign, just keep moving."

Foley said the wait Monday to get inside the Castine Center was about five hours. "We encourage people to bring folding chairs and umbrellas, and cold bottled water will be provided. We can get 800 people at a time inside the air-conditioned Castine Center," she said.

The first on-site distribution of the $300 debit cards in western St. Tammany began Wednesday at Donahue-Favret Contractors. The next day it moved next door to the community center, where about 3,000 people daily were given cards after waiting in line for one to nearly four hours.

But overwhelmed Mandeville police struggled to keep the process orderly and keep traffic moving and protect scores of recipients darting across East Causeway each day. By Sunday's giveaway, vehicles began stacking up on the west shoulder of U.S. 190 almost to the entrance of the Police Department.

Foley said by the time the parking lot capacity was reached Monday at the Castine Center, more than 3,000 people were in line.

The west St. Tammany distribution has been set up so motorists park and stand in line.

In Slidell, a distribution center was established Wednesday at the former factory outlet mall near Interstate 10 and Old Spanish Trail. That center has a drive-through process, in which those eligible in each car get debit cards after passing three checkpoints.

On Monday, Slidell police said that some residents have filed double claims at the Red Cross distribution center and they will be prosecuted for fraud.

In some cases, a man would receive a maximum of $1,200 in debit cards for himself and his wife and children. The next day, the wife would show up seeking $1,200 in aid for the same family, said Police Department spokesman Capt. Rob Callahan.

"Individuals and families living in the storm-affected area are entitled to one card for each victim in the household up to four cards. And they cannot apply using the two hurricanes to get double cards," Callahan said.

He said those committing fraud will be identified because all applications are cross-referenced using names, Social Security number and address. Callahan did not say how many cases of fraud are suspected so far.

The American Red Cross plans to open a drive-through relief center Wednesday in Kenner where disaster victims may sign up for money.

People will receive applications to fill out in their vehicles at the center, which will be in an employee parking lot at Louis Armstrong International Airport, City Hall spokeswoman Karen Boudrie said.

People are asked to bring two forms of identification, such as a driver's license and a utility bill. Parents may take Social Security cards or another identification for their children because aid is based on the number of people in a household, Red Cross spokesman Ken Williams said.

The center will be open Wednesday from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. and others days until the need subsides, Williams said.

Red Cross officials can see only 1,000 cars per day at the center, and any additional cars will be turned away, Boudrie said. However, more than one household may arrive in a car, Williams said.

No meals will be served at the center, so people should bring drinks and snacks in anticipation of a wait, Boudrie said.

"Please bring some things for you and your family to eat," she said.

To reach the center, people heading west on Airline Drive should pass the airport's main entrance and turn right at the next traffic light, before the railroad overpass. People heading east on Airline from the St. Rose area should come down the overpass and turn left at the light, before the airport's main entrance.

The street is called Service Road B. It is not marked with a street sign but is scheduled to have Red Cross signs pointing out where to go.

Lower Plaquemines residents frustrated

By Manuel Torres
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

For Plaquemines Parish resident Joanne Evans, unhappy returns are becoming routine.

Three times in the past five weeks, Evans has tried to go back to Port Sulphur in lower Plaquemines to see what hurricanes Katrina and Rita left of her hometown, one of several communities in the sliver of the parish that sticks into the Gulf of Mexico and got flooded by the two storms. Every time, including on Monday, Evans has gotten the same response.

"Can't get to it. They say it's still flooded," she said. "Everybody is coming back except us."

As residents in other hard-hit areas in New Orleans and in St. Bernard Parish return to pick up the pieces, Evans and many others in lower Plaquemines have to sit it out as crews work to close more than 18 breaches Katrina and Rita left in the marsh levees.

"A lot of people are frustrated," Parish President Benny Rousselle said Monday as he surveyed a map showing the gaps.

But he said the end may be near. The Army Corps of Engineers, using helicopters to drop giant sandbags into the levee openings, may complete the job as soon as today. Then, Rousselle said, parish pumps can begin draining up to three feet of water covering the communities, a process he said should be completed in three to four days.

"We're working to try to reopen this area," he said. "Rita set us back."

All areas of the parish's west bank below Port Sulphur flooded during Katrina on Aug. 29, as did most of the east bank, when the storm topped levees and caused several breaches. Just as officials had completed temporary repairs and were starting to drain the waters, Rita's surge reflooded the area Sept. 25.

The second storm also created new breaches and flooded areas Katrina had spared, such as Myrtle Grove. Only Belle Chasse and Jesuit Bend, in the northernmost portions of Plaquemines, stayed dry both times.

Officials are battling six levee gaps on the east bank, split between the communities of Braithwaite and Scarsdale. East bank areas south of those communities are dry.

On the west bank, however, crews are trying to plug about a dozen breaches, extending from Myrtle Grove south to Sunrise. Some areas have drained on their own, though, mostly between City Price and Port Sulphur.

But all residents are stopped at Myrtle Grove, where more than three feet of water covered Louisiana 23 at high tide Monday.

Rousselle said that as soon as the water is drained, officials will announce a re-entry plan.

For Evans, it can't come soon enough.

"I'll be back," she said, heading back to her haven in Hammond.

Traffic court reopens in Metairie, Gretna

Officials ease rules regarding no-shows

By Matt Scallan
East Jefferson bureau

In what surely is an unwelcome sign of normalcy for some, traffic court in Jefferson Parish is back in business.

First and Second Parish courts opened Monday for the first time in five weeks, and court officials urged drivers who missed court dates because of hurricane evacuations to stop by to resolve pending cases.

"We're asking people to just come in, or if they can't come in to call us," said Judge Rebecca Olivier of First Parish Court.

Even people with outstanding warrants won't be arrested if they try to resolve their issues, said Judge Stephen Grefer of Second Parish Court.

"We've instructed our staff to work with people," he said. "We want to help anyone who is trying to do the right thing."

The district attorney's office has assigned assistants to stay in court all day to handle traffic matters, unlike the normal routine in which traffic is limited to the evening schedule.

Parish courts handle traffic and misdemeanor cases, which include first- and second-offense drunken driving, shoplifting and battery cases, as well as small civil matters.

The buildings that house First Parish Court in Metairie and Second Parish Court in Gretna suffered some storm damage. But no information in the computer systems has been lost, court administrators said.

More than 30 people waited in line Monday at Second Parish Court. Gilbert Higgerson of Bridge City, who hoped to deal with a citation for running a stop sign, leaned against a column in the building's lobby near a sign that said "Contempt Department." He wore an expression that said he wished he were somewhere else.

"It looks like everybody went to lunch at the same time," he grumbled. "They should let them go in shifts."

Still, traffic was light in both courts. Grefer said no more than 10 of the 120 people scheduled for Monday's docket showed up.

"That's not really surprising, given the number of people who have evacuated," he said.

Under normal circumstances, arrest warrants would be issued for the no-shows. But considering the havoc wreaked by two hurricanes, Grefer said, the court is being more flexible. First Parish Court Administrator Bea Parisi said her staff reprogrammed the court's computers to eliminate its normal commands to sic law enforcement agencies on no-shows.

"There are procedures in place, but we're overriding some of that because of the circumstances," she said.

That doesn't mean that the court will be so understanding forever, Olivier said.

"Anyone has a case before us really needs to come in as soon as they can," she said.

Harvey man is shot by Gretna police officer

Victim was reaching under vehicle's seat

West Bank bureau

A Gretna police officer fatally shot a Harvey man early Sunday after the man appeared to reach for something underneath the driver's seat of his sports utility vehicle, police said Monday.

Officers later found a pellet pistol under the seat, Gretna Police Chief Arthur Lawson said in a prepared statement.

Michael Don Manis Jr., 25, of 3420 Louise St., was shot "several times" about 3:15 a.m. on the railroad tracks at Gretna Boulevard and Belle Chasse Highway, where his 2001 Jeep Cherokee was stopped, Lawson said. Manis was pronounced dead at West Jefferson Medical Center.

The police officer who shot Manis and another police officer at the scene, were not identified. Gretna police are investigating the shooting and the case will be turned over to the Jefferson Parish district attorney's office, Lawson said.

The Jeep was stopped at the intersection through several sequences of the traffic light, Lawson said. Officers who investigated found its engine on and the transmission in gear. Manis was apparently asleep, and officers made numerous attempts to wake him, the chief said.

When Manis woke, he "became belligerent and combative and disregarded the officers' commands to exit the vehicle," Lawson said.

Manis "continued to reach under the front seats of the vehicle in an attempt to pull something from under the front seat," the chief said. An officer, fearing for his safety and that of the other officer and witnesses at the scene, fired five shots, Lawson said. The pellet pistol was a replica of a .45-caliber handgun, the chief said.

Water in Beaumont now safe to drink

By The Associated Press

BEAUMONT, TEXAS — The water in Beaumont is safe to drink, even if it is discolored, local officials said Monday, as southeast Texas sputtered back to life nine days after Hurricane Rita slammed into the region.

Residents of Beaumont can return to the city to check the damage on their homes, but the city wants residents out of town by 7 p.m. because water, sewer and electrical services may not be on. Residents who stay must observe a 7 p.m. to 7 a.m. curfew, said city spokeswoman Carman Apple. That curfew extends around the region.

Crews continued working to restore power to some of the city's vital services, such as police, fire, hospitals and the county jail.

Entergy Texas said on Monday it still has more than 150,000 customers without electricity. In Louisiana, the power company said at least 61,900 remained powerless. At its peak, Rita left about 330,000 Entergy customers without power.

"Just because we got one-half in the first week doesn't mean the second half will be done in the next week," Joe Domino, utility president and chief executive, told The Beaumont Enterprise in its Sunday editions. "We are now working our way to customers with significant damage. It will be several weeks before all are restored."

Getting through a day in Beaumont is still a bit tricky. Apple said "a tremendous amount of debris" still litters the roadways. Most traffic signals don't work, a malfunction that's caused minor accidents around town.

While it's OK to drink the water, officials warned that the discoloration could stick to clothes.

Residents in Nederland, Port Neches, Groves and Port Arthur are still required to boil their water because of water systems that remain on emergency generator power.

Police have received a few reports of property taken from homes and a few people were caught taking alcohol and tobacco from convenience stores, but Apple said looting has not been a major problem.

Also Monday, the Texas Public Utility Commission decided to waive deposit fees for victims of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita who need new telephone and electrical service in Texas.

Forecaster predicts high hurricane activity in Oct.

By The Associated Press

FORT COLLINS, COLO. - Hurricane researcher William Gray on Monday forecast two hurricanes, one of them one major, for the rest of October, nearly double the long-term average for the month.

Gray and fellow researcher Philip Klotzbach of Colorado State University said the likelihood of a major hurricane crossing the U.S. coastline is 15 percent, more than double the long-term average of 6 percent.

"Unfortunately, the very active season we have seen to this point is not yet over," Gray said.

Gray and Klotzbach said the likelihood of a named storm hitting the U.S. coast in October is 49 percent, compared with an average of 29 percent from 1950 to 2000. The probability of a hurricane making landfall in the U.S. is 21 percent, compared with the long-term average of 15 percent, they said.

Through the end of September, the 2005 season has had nine hurricanes, five of them major, and 17 named storms. The 50-year average is 5.9 hurricanes, 2.3 of them major, and 9.6 named storms for an entire season.

Three of this year's major hurricanes, Dennis, Katrina and Rita, made landfall. Ophelia hit the North Carolina coast as a Category 1 hurricane, although its eye remained just offshore.

Gray and Klotzbach said factors behind this year's active season include warmer-than-average Atlantic Ocean surface temperatures and lower-than-normal sea level pressures, lower-than-average vertical wind shears and moister conditions in the lower and middle atmosphere.

They said they do not attribute the active season to human-induced global warming. Instead, they cited "long-period natural climate alterations that historical and paleo-climate records show to have occurred many times in the past."

Deaths of dogs leave owners angry and hurt

Animals were found in St. Bernard schools

By Sandra Barbier
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

With Hurricane Katrina moving toward south Louisiana, Carol Hamm said, her husband left their name and address on the wall of a former St. Bernard Parish school building where they placed four family pets, urging rescuers to save the animals.

But the request was not answered. In fact, Hamm said, she later learned that the pets had been shot and killed.

Hamm, who evacuated to Temple, Texas, said the dogs included a Labrador retriever named Angel Girl, a Siberian husky-German shepherd mix named Bullet, her mother-in-law's mixed Chihuahua and dachshund named Daisy, and her son's pit bull, Honey.

"It really hurt ... I was angry," Hamm said, when she first saw a report about the dogs on a television news program. They were among 10 dogs parish officials said were found dead in the former school building next to P.G.T. Beauregard Middle School. Five out of six other dogs left at another school also were found dead.

The St. Bernard Parish Sheriff's Office and state authorities are investigating the animal killings.

Hamm said she and several family members were rescued from the roof of their flooded house, but her husband stayed behind to ride in another boat with the four pets. He took them to the second floor of the old Beauregard school building while the family went to a shelter at St. Bernard High School, she said.

"He had tied them up. They were all together. He left plenty of food and water," she said.

The family later learned that the animals had been killed, as had animals left at Sebastien Roy Middle School in eastern St. Bernard Parish.

Capt. Brian Clark of the state Department of Wildlife and Fisheries said there was evidence that some dogs had been shot at both schools, although he was not able to tell whether all the dogs had died from gunshots. There were spent shell casings from a variety of gun types, including a shotgun and a 9mm handgun.

Clark said he has been asked by the St. Bernard Sheriff's Office and the state attorney general's office to look into the shootings. While he has collected some evidence from the schools, most is still there. "I don't have the means to secure that type of evidence," he said.

Attorney general's office spokeswoman Kris Wartelle said the inquiry hasn't risen yet to the level of a formal investigation.

"We've made some inquiries," Wartelle said Monday. "I know the animal rescue people documented a lot of what was going on."

Jefferson Parish resident Marilyn McGee and her husband took photographs of the dogs last week. McGee said she planned to give the photos to the attorney general's office. She was the first to report the incident after she went in search of a service dog reportedly left at Beauregard by its hearing-impaired owner. McGee said she and her husband discovered the dogs in several rooms. She said it was obvious they had been shot.

The dogs at Sebastien Roy Elementary School in Reggio had been left by their owner in the school gym with plenty of food and water, but they were found dead in rooms in another part of the building, without any food or water, McGee said.

"I feel there's a dangerous person lurking out there," McGee said. "If they would harm animals in this way, I'd hate to think what they'd do to a person."

ASPCA attorney Stacy Wolf said the organization is following the investigation, although it has not filed a formal complaint. "I'm glad (authorities) are taking it seriously," she said. "It's a disturbing and atrocious thing."

Plaquemines books two with stealing nursery's plants

From staff reports

Two people were booked with looting in Plaquemines Parish on Monday after they were found taking plants and tree-care equipment from a Belle Chasse nursery, the Plaquemines Parish Sheriff's Office said.

Westwego neighbors Mark Pate, 33, 625 Avenue H, and Diane Spieler, 57, 627 Avenue H, were booked with looting the Southern Gateway Nursery, said John Marie, spokesman for the Plaquemines Sheriff's Office.

Marie said a friend of the nursery owner's was driving by the business Monday when he saw the pair loading plants and tools into the back of a vehicle. The owner's friend then held the couple at gunpoint, Marie said, before deputies arrived. They discovered the couple had taken a dozen plants and tools out of the nursery and the owner, contacted by deputies, verified he had not authorized anybody to remove the items.

The arrests raised to nine the number of people charged with looting in Plaquemines Parish since Katrina struck Aug. 29, Marie said.

WILSON

Jean Elizabeth Morgan Wilson died in her home on September 30, 2005, surrounded by her family. She was 89 years of age. Funeral Services will be at Osborn Funeral Home on Tuesday, October 4, at 10:00am with Chaplain Rosemary Lafargue of Hospice of Shreveport/Bossier officiating, assisted by one of Mrs. Wilson's sons. Visitation will be held at the Osborn Funeral Home on Monday, October 3 from 6:00 to 9:00pm. Burial will follow at Forest Park Cemetery. Jean Elizabeth Morgan was born in Greeley, Colorado on May 21, 1916, along with her identical twin sister, Julia Ann Morgan. She attended Greeley High School and the University of Colorado at Boulder. She married Arthur J. Wilson, Jr. (Art) on the 13th August, 1937, which was a Friday (so obviously they were not superstitious), and they were married for almost 58 years before Art's death in 1995. Jean was city girl and Art was a farmer, so she had a lot to learn about farm life, but she took it all in stride. In December 1953 the Wilson clan, which then consisted of the parents and three sons, Arthur J. III, John Morgan, and William Wayne, moved to a farm south of Shreveport near the small town of Forbing. They lived there for about six years before they sold the farm and moved to Shreveport. Jean worked for many years for Southwestern Wholesale Dry Goods Company. The boys attended Byrd High School and either Louisiana Tech or LSU. Her sons are all professionals, Arthur J. (Jim) an engineer and Colonel US Air Force retired, John an attourney practicing in New Orleans and Bill a missionary minister working with foreign students at the University of Arizona in Tucson. They all served in the US Armed Forces; Jean and Art believed all young men should spend some time serving their country. Jean is survived by her twin sister, Julia Ann Morgan Weidner of Shreveport, Colonel (retired) Arthur James Wilson III and wife Hedy of Smith Mountain Lake in Southwestern Virginia, John Morgan Wilson and wife Edie of New Orleans, the Reverend William Wayne Wilson and wife Donna of Tucson, Arizona, and seven grandchildren: Dr. Gina W. Hook, M.D. of Fort Wayne, Indiana, Arthur J. IV of Port Allen, Louisiana, David Morgan of Boston, Massachusetts, Edward Reynolds of New York City, Mary Anne Spears of Tucson, Arizona, Deborah Gidney of Tucson, Arizona and Jonathan of Tucson, Arizona. There are fifteen great-grandchildren; Austin James, Andrew Mark, Claire Constance Hook, Ethan Hamilton Hook, Kemper Davis and Rowan Declar (twins), Cyrus Nowroozi, Kelsey Elizabeth Spears, Caitlin Marie Spears, Trevor Benjamin Spears, Emma Louise Spears, Matthew James Gidney, Sarah Elizabeth Gidney, Christiana Diane Gidney and Kaylee Elisabeth. The family extends its sincerest thanks and appreciation to Mrs. Wilson's physicians, Dr. Robert J. Massingill, M.D. and Dr. Rick Michael, M.D. and to all of the dedicated and loving care-givers at Hospice of Shreveport/Bossier. In lieu of flowers the family would appreciate a memorial gift to Hospice of Shreveport/Bossier, 3303 Knight Street, Suite 115, Shreveport, LA 71105

From a thankful Wave fan

I would like to thank Skip Bertman and the LSU athletic administration for hosting the Tulane-Southeastern football game this past weekend. While it was bizarre sitting on the 50 yard-line in Tiger Stadium cheering for the Green Wave, it was a thrill to play so close to home and to play outdoors. The LSU stadium staff went out of their way to help us feel at home. I'm certain Tammy Nunez's article Sunday in no way reflects the feelings of the majority of us at the game. Ms. Nunez dwelled upon the foibles of a 21-year-old who was concerned more about his bourbon than the football game, rather than highlighting the 10,000 or so Tulane die-hards who were grateful to have a place to play so near New Orleans.

Tulane fans show lack of class

Re: "Tigers den not comfortable for Wave fans," Sports, Oct. 2. I must admit, I'm not surprised by the Tulane fans' attitude because I grew up surrounded by it. It's just a shame that it has been thrown in the face of a gesture of good will. During a time when neighbors are helping each other, the ingratitude and utter idiocy of Tulane fan Colby Omner's comments bring out the true colors of Tulane faithful. Mr. Omner ranted about his "disgust" at having to watch Tulane play a home game in that "den of evil," Tiger Stadium. Shame on you, Colby! I'll bet your sister (an LSU student) doesn't agree with your tasteless and inappropriate comments.

Mr. Omner also says that "The least they could have done is have the decency to let us paint Tulane in the end zone." The decency of LSU extended well beyond some nasty blue and green paint in the end zone. Skip Bertman and the LSU athletic department went above and beyond the call of duty in helping Tulane play its homecoming game closer to home than Shreveport, and this is the thanks that Tulane fans such as Colby and David Melius (you should have stayed in the parking lot) show.

Let's face it; the decision wasn't made for the revenue that the game brought in. Unless, of course, Tulane guaranteed that it would pay for all the empty seats. Might I suggest that the next time Tulane needs a place to play a home game, it check with NORD. I am sure that there is a neighborhood playground with a few hundred portable bleacher seats to hold the ungrateful Wave supporters.

Panel is a wasted opportunity

The mayor's commission of 17 to rebuild New Orleans is supposed to represent the city's diversity? I didn't know that New Orleans was overwhelmingly male and that big businessmen made up more than half the population. I didn't know that New Orleans had zero small-business owners and virtually no nonprofit organizations. I didn't know that it had no religious leaders from the Jewish community.

No matter that there will be 200 committee members serving with this commission. Mayor Ray Nagin has clearly sent the message that he has no regard for the many voices of those who are the heart and soul of the city. Unfortunately, Mayor Nagin squandered the opportunity to bring the community together in an open dialogue about who should represent New Orleans. There would never have been unanimity, but there would have been communication and a sense that the ordinary person's voice could be heard. Now the window has closed on that possibility, and the city and its people are the poorer for it.

Insights from the outdoors writer

The article by outdoors writer Bob Marshall was one of the best evaluations of our situation that I have seen. It should have been on the front page and not buried in the sports section, as it points out the unsavory pork-barrel attitude of our long-term politicians.

My sincere congratulations to Bob Marshall for his insight.

Mass transit for commuters is crucial

It is critical that the economic opportunities created by the rebuilding of New Orleans are accessible to all of the citizens of New Orleans, regardless of their income and education. This access extends beyond employment. All citizens need security from flooding, access to recreation and transportation that enables them to work.

Population growth should follow economic growth. We need to accept that New Orleans will initially have a smaller population. I think the economy should draw people into the city and allow New Orleans to grow in a planned way. Mass transportation to outlying communities such as the north shore and Baton Rouge will allow access without forcing people to live in the city. This may be one of several ways of making public land where private residential areas used to be. I lived for a few years in the Netherlands, a country that has achieved a balance of commercial needs, transportation and flood protection in one of the most densely populated countries in the world. Citizens participate in how their communities are run and insist on consensus. There are high expectations and accountability for public officials. It is critical that the agendas of the government and business communities do not overwhelm the needs of the people living in New Orleans.

Let schools start later in the day

Re: "Jefferson schools to reopen with longer days," Metro, Oct. 2.The plan to have Jefferson Parish students attend school an extra hour seems poorly thought out. First, it appears from the numbers available on the BESE Web site that more than 50 percent of displaced children attended school elsewhere for the month of September. Second, the concern about young children attending after dark seems far-fetched. Even on the winter solstice, the sunset is after 5 p.m. Third, what do the bus drivers say about starting their day before 5 a.m.?

I have a high-school student who is currently picked up by bus at 6:15 a.m. The only time there would be daylight at 5:15, the new bus time, would be in the summer. Every study of teenagers suggests they would benefit from a later, not an earlier, school day. And, a later end time for all schools would more closely coincide with parents' work schedules. I hope a well-thought-out and reasonable accommodation can be made if it is really necessary to add an hour to the school day.

OUR OPINIONS

Task force mania

Rebuilding after the ravages of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita will be a task of almost unimaginable complexity. Even the relatively concrete problems, such as where to put all the garbage left behind by the hurricanes, would seem like Herculean tasks under different circumstances. Working out tougher, more abstract issues — what to rebuild where, how to get the economy restarted again — will take lots of brainpower.

For that reason, at least, the proliferation of post-hurricane task forces is easy to understand. Decisions about the future of New Orleans area communities and Louisiana as a whole need to be informed by citizen participation. For that reason, Gov. Kathleen Blanco and New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin have each enlisted the help of prominent business people, civic leaders, academics and government officials.

But while putting together one task force makes sense in the face of a catastrophe of unprecedented dimensions, it's hard to imagine that a plethora of competing task forces will bring about a coherent plan for rebuilding the metro area and the state.

Last week, Gov. Blanco formed a team of advisers that includes a number of prominent New Orleans area residents. Among the members are Xavier University President Norman Francis, restaurateur Ralph Brennan, bank executives Alden McDonald and King Milling and state Sen. Walter Boasso, a no-nonsense lawmaker whose district includes the badly stricken St. Bernard Parish. The goal of the group will be to get the state's damaged economy moving again.

The next day, Mayor Nagin named 17 people to the task force he had previously vowed to create. It will be chaired by health care executive Mel Lagarde and community activist Barbara Major and will also include City Council President Oliver Thomas, real estate developer Joe Canizaro, jazzman Wynton Marsalis and Archbishop Alfred Hughes. There's a considerable overlap between the mayor's panel and the governor's; Mr. McDonald, Entergy New Orleans President Dan Packer, Regional Transit Authority Chairman Jimmy Reiss and shipyard executive Donald "Boysie" Bollinger will serve on both.

There's no doubt that the individuals on these panels have a wealth of relevant experience, and their involvement will no doubt be helpful to the recovery effort.

But now that the City Council has approved plans for a task force of its own, one has to wonder: How many task forces can state and local government agencies empanel without confusing the public and stepping on each other's toes?

The council set up an 11-member group last week but did not name its members. The council probably will need, over time, to consider changes to policies on zoning, permits, utility regulation and other matters that the council handles on a regular basis. But the resolution authorizing the blue-ribbon panel also assigns it a broader mission: to figure out how the council can use its authority "to facilitate the city's post-hurricane recovery efforts for the greater good of the city." Oh, is that all?

It's hardly obvious that New Orleans alone needs two task forces, especially since some of the thorniest problems created by the hurricane aren't restricted to any one community. Hurricane Katrina led to the flooding of vast areas of Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes, and Hurricane Rita brought more flooding in some of the same neighborhoods. Tens of thousands of homes, possibly hundreds of thousands, have been taken out of the housing market altogether. This will have significant implications for housing and transportation planning even in those parishes that escaped major damage.

Setting up yet another task force to deal with issues of metrowide importance would be silly, but now is time for existing institutions such as the Regional Planning Commission to prove their worth.

The cynical view of task forces, of course, is that they're a convenient way for reluctant politicians to avoid committing themselves to actual policy changes. When Gov. Blanco first took office, she wanted to identify ways to modernize and improve the health care system, so she called together a long list of luminaries from across the health care field. That panel had hours of intelligent debate, and one of the best ideas that percolated out of it was the need to provide long-term care for elderly and disabled people in settings other than nursing homes. That notion made sense, but it offended some politically powerful interests. So almost two years later, the state has made little progress toward the task force's goal.

The City Council doesn't need a task force. There are too many study commissions as it is. We may be stuck with them, though. If we are, they need to deliberate swiftly, and they need to deliberate openly.

Ultimately, responsibility for turning the panels' recommendations into specific reconstruction plans will fall to our elected leadership, and these officials won't have the luxury of punting on hard decisions. Which buildings, if any, should be bulldozed? What, if anything, should be built in their place? How do we persuade former residents to return and out-of-towners to come settle in the metro area?

These are difficult questions. And more task forces aren't likely to lead to better answers.

OTHER OPINIONS

Denial makes everyone's job more difficult

JARVIS DEBERRY

You may have noticed that "failures at all levels of government" is fast becoming a catch phrase. It was launched by the federal government in attempt to simultaneously admit fault and blame New Orleans and Louisiana officials. Journalists, pundits and self-identified experts have picked up on the phrase, too. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's most glaring error, the common thinking goes, was his failure to evacuate the city in advance of the storm.

I'm not here to shield the mayor from criticism, but the blithe comments do aggravate. I don't know how any major metropolitan area can be emptied out in less than 48 hours, much less New Orleans, which has a single interstate highway and a public transportation system prized not for its efficiency but its quaintness.

The comments also imply that all the people who drowned or were airlifted from their rooftops were trapped by poverty. That was certainly true for many. Too many.

But let's be honest. Most of us know of people who had the transportation, who had the money, who had friends who would have gladly taken them in, and they still chose not to evacuate. Not only that, but they looked down their noses at the people they saw preparing to leave.

I don't mean to suggest that the people who refused to leave outnumbered those who couldn't leave. But I do know that there were plenty who had options but stayed. And that some of them had to be fished out just like those trapped by circumstance.

The city of New Orleans is in multiple ways a feat of engineering. The Mississippi River would have eventually flowed away from the city and taken a different path to the Gulf of Mexico had the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers not built the Old River Control Structure at the Atchafalaya River/Mississippi River split. The city would have already been flooded by water from the Mississippi and Lake Pontchartrain multiple times if not for the levees built up around it. Water from the sky has nowhere to drain, so it has to be pumped out. The creation of the city in this spot reflects the belief that human beings can prevail against nature.

Many city residents seemed to have adopted the same attitude on a micro level. How many people did we hear refuse to evacuate with the boast, "I rode out Betsy"? A woman quoted in The Times-Picayune told a reporter that she was rescued from her rooftop after Hurricane Betsy and 40 years later was rescued from a rooftop after Hurricane Katrina. She promised that there would never be a third time.

I wondered why there had been a second. Why would someone with such a traumatic hurricane experience stay around for a repeat?

The mayor has said he welcomes analysis and feedback for his performance during this crisis. As we oblige him, we ought to admit that human psychology – in particular our amazing ability to deny that danger will ever befall us – made the government's job more difficult.

Even those who did leave wouldn't let themselves think it was going to be this bad. "Two or three days." Many people have told me that that's how long they expected to be away from their homes. Which is odd. When Tropical Storm Cindy blew through New Orleans Aug. 4, I was among those people who went more than four days without power. At one point Hurricane Katrina was a Category 5 aimed at New Orleans, yet evacuees convinced themselves that it wasn't going to be that bad.

If the people who left town were telling themselves that, imagine what was being said by the people who were staying. Maybe they were telling themselves that the storm would turn because that is what they always do.

In a way, they were right. Just not right enough. Katrina did turn. But not so much that New Orleans was spared.

In order for an evacuation to be truly effective, the people must be convinced that their lives will be imperiled if they stay. Too many New Orleanians weren't convinced. I don't think that's a failure of government. I think it's proof that many of us were in denial.

In the shadow of a canal, life is uncertain

DENNIS PERSICA

When my house on Athis Street got six inches of water in the 1995 flood, I came up with what I thought was a pretty clever theory about water damage. I would tell people how for every few extra inches the water could have risen then, I would have lost another "layer" of my world.

At six inches, the bottom row of books was lost, the bottom drawer of clothes in a dresser, the bottom shelf in a pantry. Had the water gotten 12 inches high, I would have lost another shelf's worth of books, more pantry contents, more clothes. The motors of things like refrigerators, washers and dryers would have been threatened.

A few inches more and the computer printer sitting on a low stand would have been lost too; maybe parts of the stereo system.

Looking back on it now, I realize my prattling sounded more like crazy Kramer in that episode of "Seinfeld" when he wanted to live his life in "levels," with all of his furniture replaced by shelving.

But if 1995 formulated in my mind what might be called the Special Theory of Storm Damage, then Hurricane Katrina brought about a more unified, overarching General Theory. Roughly it is this: Eight feet of water in your house pretty much wipes out everything.

In 2004, I managed to move from Athis, and though my new house was only a mile away and still in the same ZIP code, the tree-lined neighborhood was nicer, and it was closer to Lake Pontchartrain.

If you look at a post-Katrina aerial shot of the London Avenue Canal, you'll see a place where the floodwall seems to bend. Actually, it broke right there, and right across the street is my house. I can only assume that it was a wall of water that blew out the front panel of windows, rushed through the house and then knocked out a set of windowed double doors that led to my back yard, taking with them the iron security bars that were supposed to protect me from intruders.

All of my stuff is strewn about my yard and my neighbors' yards under mounds of mud. The ground-level deck in my yard apparently floated to rooftop level while furniture and other things from inside washed out through the spot where the double doors used to be and into the back yard. Then when the floodwaters receded, the deck came down on my belongings, holding them in place until I could get the time to go through them.

I've been to my neighborhood three times now. My first time through, I thought of that phrase from T.S. Eliot's "The Waste Land."

"Unreal city," he wrote. And that's the way it seemed, driving along Pontchartrain Boulevard, down Harrison and Paris avenues, where the city has turned brown from all the vegetation that drowned in poisoned floodwaters. Closer to the London Avenue Canal, mud mixed with lake sand and silt is piled up in gray mounds along the sides of the streets. As of Sunday there still was water leaking from the canal, puddling on Pratt Drive at hubcap level. But two lidless storm sewers seem to be keeping the water from going higher, and I'm told the leak from the canal is intentional and controlled.

As I tried to salvage things from my house, the drapes in nearby homes waved in the breeze through blown-out windows and walls. At first I mistook the motion for people inside, my neighbors doing the same thing I was doing, moving about their houses trying to see what they could bring out. But it was wishful thinking. I was the only human being moving around in this ghost town.

I was especially worried about my neighbor Jay. As my kids and I headed out of the neighborhood about 2:30 p.m. on the Sunday Katrina bore down on us, his SUV was the only car still left in the block. I was afraid he had tried to tough it out.

But my first time back in the neighborhood, I noticed the marks that the searchers leave behind showed that no one had died inside that house. Jay's SUV was gone too; another good but not conclusive sign that he'd escaped. My house has those markings too, as well as an orange X on the attic stairway, an eerie indicator of how thorough the search was.

It also has a new marker now, a red sticker from the city inspector saying it is uninhabitable. No surprise there, what with no front window or back door, a layer of mud throughout the house and insects flitting around like they sense the presence of rotting food – or worse. I'm not sure what the sticker actually means to my future there, nor what the regulators have in mind for a neighborhood so close to a major canal.

Until I rebuild, if I will be allowed to rebuild, I have a rental house in Terrytown, far from the tree-lined streets, Lake Pontchartrain and the floodwall – a fragile barrier, it turned out – that rises high above the rooftops of my neighborhood.

Too many voices blur the message

The mayor and the governor hugged and made up last week.

You might have missed it, but it was a nice moment. It happened just as Mayor Ray Nagin was introducing his appointees to a commission charged with creating a master plan "that rebuilds New Orleans culturally, socially, economically and uniquely for every citizen."

The day before, you might recall, Gov. Kathleen Blanco had appointed her own rebuilding commission, including some of the very same business and community leaders.

No conflict at all, the two leaders said at Nagin's Friday press conference – and these two have been publicly at odds many times since Hurricane Katrina. Blanco, whose unexpected drop-by clearly surprised the mayor, told Nagin that she hopes storm-struck communities across Louisiana will set up similar groups.

"We'll work as a big team," Blanco said.

Again, a nice thought, given that the city's and state's very futures are at stake. But I wouldn't put my money on it.

Let's start with the obvious reasons.

There's the long history of personal and professional strain between Blanco and Nagin, dating back to his decision to endorse her Republican opponent in 2003, and stretching into the post-Katrina area. There are longstanding state-versus-city tensions, particularly when it comes to spending money. And there are the deep differences between the two leaders' decision-making and management styles. Blanco is fond of forming committees and commissions, while Nagin's more a lone-wolf, go-with-his-gut type.

Beyond all that is the very real and vital question of who gets to make the big decisions that will dictate what New Orleans is to be when this is all over.

Blanco and Nagin aren't the only ones in the mix. The City Council is poised to appoint its own advisory committee, separate from the mayor's. Artists, architects and legislators are forming their own groups. Individuals with vested interests, such as developer Pres Kabacoff, are making the rounds, getting their ideas on the table via the local, national and international media.

And some old faces have turned up at the table. Last week, none other than Marc Morial, the former New Orleans mayor now serving as national president of the Urban League, stormed back onto the scene. Surrounded by family and political allies from the good old days, Morial was making his first public appearance in Louisiana – in Baton Rouge, mind you, not New Orleans – since it became clear how aggressively U.S. Attorney Jim Letten is pursuing allegations of public corruption at City Hall on Morial's watch.

The ex-mayor offered a thinly veiled criticism of Nagin and Blanco, pointing out that Mississippi had shown the keepers of the Washington purse strings a relatively united front, having already formed one commission and held a post-Katrina special session.

And, by endorsing what he termed a "right of return," Morial also jumped right into some of the most sensitive issues at stake for any of the great thinkers in charge: which neighborhoods can be rebuilt, and, more centrally, how to retain the city's distinctive and delicate racial, ethnic and cultural balance.

That brings us back to who gets to decide, and how those decisions will be made.

By virtue of the city's strong-mayor form of government, Nagin's committee may speak the loudest, but it will have lots of competition. There's a real risk of balkanization here, with too many factions competing, rather than working together.

Morial may well have his own agenda, but he's dead right about one thing: The city and state have the best chance of holding onto the sympathies of the outside world if they speak with a common voice.

In other words, let's hope that Blanco stops by to hug Nagin – and vice versa – a little more often. It can only help.

Katrina puts the hurt on WTC hotel project

Market viability among developers' concerns

By Greg Thomas
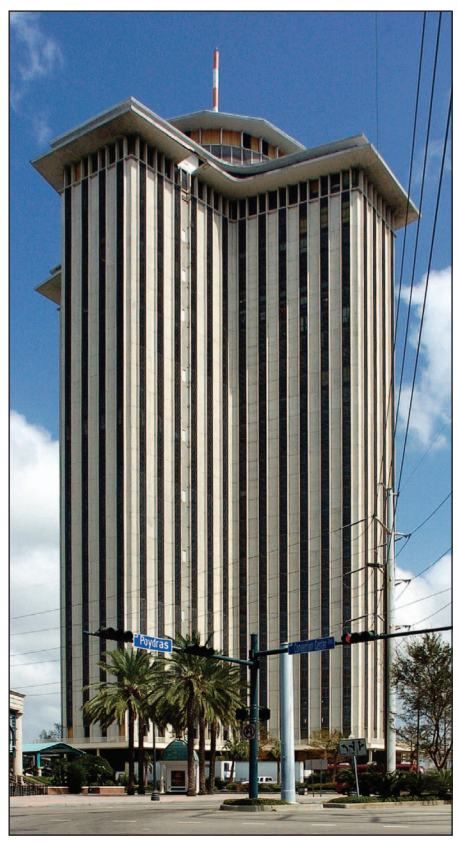
Real estate writer

Hurricane Katrina dealt a serious blow to long-stalled plans to convert part of the World Trade Center building at the foot of Canal Street into a hotel.



The storm blew out nearly 200 windows, turning the offices that were left exposed "upside down," said Richard Allen, managing administrator of the World Trade Center of New Orleans Inc., the nonprofit trade organization that built the 33-story structure. The storm also destroyed lounges on the building's 31st and 33rd floors, but the building suffered surprisingly little moisture intrusion.

Damage to the World Trade Center isn't the only hurdle faced by developers of the proposed 563-room, $190 million Westin Hotel, who are doing business as WTC Development LLP. In the wake of the massive storm, Lane Sisung, son of lead developer Larry Sisung, wonders whether or not there will still be a market for hotel rooms in New Orleans.

Sisung said that John Keeling of PKF Consulting in Houston, the consultant on the project, will have to re-evaluate the project's projected occupancy and room rates.

Furthermore, uncertainty about the local market raises questions about whether financing for the project – which was almost lined up before the storm – will still move forward.

"Financing was going excellent," Sisung said. "We had it lined up and now this."

Before Katrina, developers were poised to begin work on a 563-room, $190 million hotel project in the World Trade Center.

But Sisung said the development team is not giving up on pursuing conventional financing.

"We're in the same position as everyone else in other downtown development projects," Sisung said. It likely will take months before a plan for the project is put together.

"I don't think anyone is going to know what to do until the city reopens," he said. "This is just another punch thrown at the project … and we'll just keep on fighting," Sisung said.

The hotel project, first announced in 1998, has faced a series of setbacks. An earlier round of private financing for the project fell apart in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. And in June, the Louisiana Supreme Court found that a controversial tax-increment financing plan behind the project was unconstitutional.

Allen said that the WTC board of directors will try to meet Thursday to determine whether to use insurance money to repair the building or to simply use the building as an investment by giving it to developers with expectations of repayment once and if the hotel is ever completed. The trade group already is owed nearly $5 million by developers for pre-hotel construction costs.

Meanwhile Ray Wooldridge, former part-owner of the New Orleans Hornets, was unavailable for comment on whether or not he will rebuild the two nightclubs he operates in the building. Katrina's winds blew out every window in Attitude 33, the 33rd-floor lounge Wooldridge recently refurbished. The storm also destroyed Ray's on the River, the 31st-floor jazz club Wooldridge's company -- Big Play Entertainment LLC — spent $3.8 million creating. Wooldridge also has expressed interest in becoming a player in the development of the hotel, an infusion of equity that would be welcomed under the right circumstances, developers have said.

Manufacturing sector unfazed by Katrina

But price index rises, along with inflation fears

By Eileen Alt Powell
AP Business writer

NEW YORK — The nation's manufacturing sector shook off the impact of Hurricane Katrina and expanded robustly during September, but prices for raw materials surged, raising the specter of higher inflation and interest rates.

The Institute for Supply Management said Monday its manufacturing index advanced to 59.4 percent in September from 53.6 percent the month before, for the industrial sector's 28th consecutive month of growth. It was the highest reading since the gauge hit 59.6 percent in August 2004 and well above the 54 percent reading that analysts had expected.

A reading above 50 indicates the sector is expanding; below 50 indicates manufacturing activity is shrinking.

But manufacturers reported another sharp jump in prices last month as higher crude oil costs and transportation bottlenecks caused by the recent hurricanes boosted their costs for materials and energy. The price index rose to 78 percent in September, a 15.5 percentage point rise from 62.5 percent in August, the institute said. The price index had jumped 14 percentage points the month before.

Norbert Ore, chair of the institute's business survey committee, said the September report was heavily influenced by Katrina, which struck the Gulf Coast Aug. 29. He said, for example, that a good part of the rise in new orders appeared to be manufacturers scrambling for alternate suppliers after regular sources were shut down by the storm.

This, he said, was "event-driven demand" as opposed to improved order books amid a strengthening business cycle.

Ore also said the surge in prices appeared tied to Katrina and its aftermath.

"When manufacturers are forced to go to that second or third supplier, they're off contract," he said, meaning that companies may have to pay a premium for needed raw materials.

Mark Vitner, senior economist with Wachovia Securities in Charlotte, N.C., said that with consumer demand softening, "it's more likely corporate profits are going to come under pressure rather than (consumer) prices."

Still, Vitner expects the Federal Reserve to continue raising interest rates at its November and December meetings.

"Hurricane relief is pumping billions of dollars into the system, meaning fiscal policy is more stimulative," Vitner said. "If monetary policy were to remain accommodative ... that's a recipe for inflation in 2006, and the Fed doesn't want that to happen."

Focused on the price index, Wall Street gave back early gains to trade mixed. The Dow Jones industrial index bore the brunt of investors' concern, falling 32.10, or 0.3 percent, to 10,536.60 in the afternoon after advancing nearly 40 points in early trading.

Fuel tank fires up work at Michoud

Plant slowly coming back to life in N.O.

By Keith Darcé
Business writer

The spacecraft plant in eastern New Orleans crawled to life Monday as a space shuttle external fuel tank slowly rolled from the barge that carried it from Florida to a building at the Michoud Assembly Facility, where workers will begin preparing it for the next shuttle flight.

The moment marked a milestone in the National Aeronautics and Space Administration plant that employed about 2,000 workers before Hurricane Katrina and supplied the largest number of high-technology jobs in the city.

"That's very encouraging," said Tommy Kurtz, senior vice president of Greater New Orleans Inc., the region's economic development organization. "It shows that even in an actual catastrophe, a large plant can be up and running again," he said.

With many businesses in the region struggling to reopen after Katrina, major manufacturers such as Michoud are quickly becoming the backbone of the area's economic recovery.

The tank left NASA's Kennedy Space Center six weeks ago on the barge but was quickly anchored to avoid what was then Tropical Storm Katrina, which had formed off Florida's central Atlantic coast.

The five-day trip around the tip of Florida and across the eastern Gulf of Mexico was further delayed as Katrina made a beeline for the central Gulf Coast.

The tank finally arrived at Michoud on Sunday.

NASA's investigation into nagging problems with tank foam insulation has been on hold for nearly a month because of Katrina and damage caused by the storm at Michoud.

The shuttle fleet has been grounded since July, when foam once again broke from a tank after liftoff. The same problem contributed to the shuttle Columbia's destruction more than two and a half years ago.

Now that the tank has been delivered, engineers with NASA and Michoud's operator, Lockheed Martin Space Systems, will begin dissecting sections of foam from areas on the tank that broke free during the last shuttle flight in July. Eventually, sections of the tank's foam will be redesigned and the tank may be used for the next shuttle launch, which probably won't occur before May.

Meanwhile, many repairs are to be made at the Michoud plant.

About 15 gaping holes dot the Vertical Assembly Building where tanks are stood on end. Pieces of the building's concrete roof collapsed during the storm and fell onto a shuttle tank being held in one of its bays. Engineers will X-ray that tank to determine whether it sustained structural damage.

Other buildings got similar roof damage, including Building 118, where tanks go for final work before being delivered. Water poured through holes in that building onto a tank. Workers vacuumed the water away from the tank's insulation foam exterior after the storm.

So far, only about 400 Michoud workers have returned to the plant, split evenly among production workers and office staff, said Mike Javery, vice president of operations for Lockheed and head of the plant's storm recovery program.

Two hundred more Michoud engineers are working at NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center in Huntsville, Ala., Javery said.

Nearly half of the plant's work force could be back on duty in New Orleans by early November, he said.

But Michoud remains months away from returning to anything resembling normalcy. To reach that point, Javery said, utility and city services in hard-hit eastern New Orleans will have to be fully restored. And that won't be easy, given the damage sustained by the area's infrastructure.

In the meantime, Lockheed Martin and NASA are looking for ways to restore at least partial services to the plant. One possibility is drilling a water well on the site, Javery said.

Housing for workers is another major barrier, as it is for many other companies in the region. NASA is trying to secure large passenger ferries normally used by the military that would be docked along the Intercoastal Waterway to serve as temporary housing for as many as 900 workers, excluding their families, Javery said.

Another option being explored with Federal Emergency Management Agency officials is erecting temporary trailer cities for hundreds of Michoud workers on both sides of Lake Pontchartrain, he said.

Not everyone will return to Michoud, Javery said. He estimated that about half of Michoud workers either lost their homes in the New Orleans area or won't be able to reoccupy them anytime soon.

Workers who return probably will face less pressure to meet production schedules and more flexibility for dealing with personal problems brought on by Katrina, Javery said.

"The wrong thing to do right now would be to push employees," he said. "You have to believe in teamwork. (Managers) have to serve more in a coaching role than we did in the past.

"There will be days when an employee has to be home with his family to meet adjusters or see a doctor, and we will have to understand that," he said.

Live! From New York! It's Katrina!

'Saturday Night Live' finds plenty of fodder for hurricane comedy

Horatio Sanz filled in for Tina Fey as 'Weekend Update' co-anchor on the season premiere of 'Saturday Night Live.'

By Dave Walker
TV columnist

Late-night talk show hosts had barely begun staggering back to work after the 9/11 attacks, most returning with dead-serious monologues addressing the horror, when "Saturday Night Live" signaled it was OK to lighten up a little.

The opening segment of the venerable sketch-comedy series' 2001 season featured New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani — a newly emerged hero in the wake of the attacks — standing amid a tableau of New York City firefighters and police officers.

Noting that "SNL" was one of "our great New York City institutions," Giuliani said that having the show on the air signaled that the city was "open for business."

Lorne Michaels, "SNL" creator and executive producer, thanked Giuliani but wondered if it was too early for the country to start laughing again.

"Can we be funny?" he asked.

Answered Giuliani, in one of the great ice-breakers of all time: "Why start now?"

Hosted by Steve Carell ("The Daily Show," "The 40 Year Old Virgin"), "SNL" opened its new season Saturday on a resonant note.

The episode was loaded with Hurricane Katrina references, which mostly targeted the media and public officialdom, starting at the top.

In the show-opening sketch, Will Forte played George W. Bush reluctantly conducting a news conference, at which the president recounted his post-storm visits to the ravaged gulf.

"I've handed out fresh water to people who needed water," he said. "I did this without my suit jacket on."

The main Katrina sketch starred Seth Meyers as CNN's Anderson Cooper reporting live on a celebrity house-raising event in Jefferson Parish.

Finesse Mitchell played New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, who celebrated the "overwhelming show of support from the whole country, especially the entertainment community."

Among the celebrity construction crew were Tony Danza, Sharon Stone and Al Pacino (all impersonated by "SNL" players),

LAFAYETTE — And just why, again, is this man smiling?

This man, head of emergency planning for Charity Hospital, whose house in Lakeview drowned while he spent six days at work in bureaucratic hell, watching "all we'd planned for fall apart"?

And why this couple, who work for New Orleans' House of Blues, whose everything-in-this-world Katrina washed away?

And this woman, a pediatric nurse at Tulane-Lakeside Hospital, whose Metairie house went underwater while she worked through the nights lofting sick babies into helicopters by the light of a doctor's headlights?

Well, really.

"How can you not smile out here?" asked Orleanian Mike DeAgano at the Festivals Acadiens in Girard Park. The recent two-day celebration of Cajun music, food and culture, in its 31st year, bore the banner "250 Ans et Toujours Grand Debout (250 Years and Still Standing Tall)" to commemorate the Acadians' Grand Dèrangement, their expulsion by the British from Nova Scotia starting in 1755.

"We know a little bit about forced migrations around here," says main stage impresario Barry Ancelet, an author, folklorist and professor of Francophone studies at the University of Louisiana-Lafayette who has been amplifying appreciation of Cajun music and culture for more

MY STORM STORY

Hurricane Katrina: In their own words

"I've always loved New Orleans. It's the place where I grew up. My father and my grandfather grew up there, too. I left in 1978 to go to college but I go back and forth a lot and I've always had a strong link to the city.

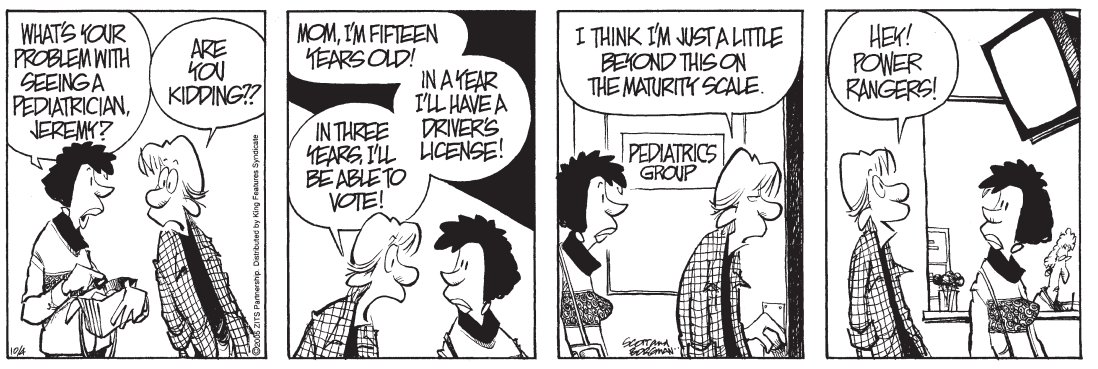
"Now, in a crisis like this, I am suddenly aware of what a profound value there is having grown up in New Orleans. It's such a human city. That's what I'm aware of now. And I'm aware of how precious that quality is.

"The New Orleans expatriate community has been in a mad whir of e-mailing. All these people I went to high school with — all these people I went to kindergarten with — we all started e-mailing. 'How is so-and-so's mother doing? Did she go to her in-law's house?' You'd get information about one person and you'd send it to everybody else. I've gotten reconnected with all kinds of people I haven't seen in years.

"This whole experience gave me a strong feeling that I want to be connected to New Orleans and not in some sentimental, oh-wasn't-it-lovely kind of way. I want to know New Orleans is there. Not a storybook New Orleans or a Disneyland version of it. I want to know it's there for the people who live there.

"The spirit of the expatriate community is a strong bond. We've all left New Orleans for professional or personal reasons. But we try to replicate that kind of community outside New Orleans that we loved so much inside New Orleans.

"I remember once I went to visit my aunt in Mid-City and I was supposed to meet somebody at Canal Place, so I called a cab. The trip probably took 20 minutes and the cab driver is visiting with me the way people in New Orleans always visit. And we're chatting and carrying on. And it dawned on me when I got out of that cab: You know something? This cab driver knows more about me in 20 minutes than the people I've lived around in Connecticut for the last 15 years.



"The hurricane has made me realize how valuable the slower elements of life are and how much I miss that."

"Everyone dances, even grandmére and grandpére, no matter what the difficulties they must bear. There may be only a couple of fiddles to play for the crowd, there may be only four candles for light, placed on wooden arms attached to the walls; nothing but long wooden benches to sit on and only exceptionally a few bottles of tafia diluted with water for refreshment; no matter, everyone dances."

than 30 years. "When bad things happen in this culture, the Acadians learn from their history. When something like this comes along, the old stuff comes roaring out.

"In their new frontier, the French settlers learned to depend only on their own efforts," says Ancelet, pointing to his as well as ULL professor Carl Brasseaux's research on the subject. "And the Cajuns, heirs of this fierce sense of independence, have continued to rely on their own strategies for survival in Louisiana."

The response to crisis or tragedy is the same: Cajuns turn to each other.

"When something bad happens, you group together," he says, "talk about things, network the community's resources. Ramasseries, for example, gathered members of the community to bring in a sick neighbor's crop. Today, somebody's roof blows off, you get together to fix it. Somebody's sick, you have a benefit dance, you send some cooked food. This is what you do — the only thing you know to do.

"We responded that way to Katrina — as we did in 1927, after Audrey, Hilda, Betsy, all of them. Thousands here culled their closets. Every remotely mobile makeshift cooking contraption was mobilized to barbecue and boil and grill and fry food until the MREs began to arrive."

But Cajuns do not persevere on hard work and generosity alone.

"You have to dance, to sing, tell stories, play music, as a socially-affirming event," Ancelet says. "And we've known this for a long time."

Two weeks ago at Banding Together, an outdoor Cajun/zydeco Red Cross benefit with heavyweight headliners including Michael Doucet and Zachary Richard, Ancelet told the crowd that some people may have questioned the wisdom of a rousing concert "at a time like this." He reminded them that "the first thing our ancestors did when they got here was jump off the boats and start dancing on the dock."

Ancelet admitted that, "We also initially questioned whether it was responsible to hold this festival in the face of this tragedy." But then he came to his senses.

"This year," he said, "I've come to see Festivals Acadiens as a giant benefit dance. There were thousands here who needed a break."

Ancelet makes it clear to a visitor that he heartily disapproves of hurricane parties that take place before a hurricane hits. Those, he says, are for "idiots." After a hurricane is the time.

"Then you can generate help," he says. "That's what we're about."

• • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • •

Around 11 a.m. opening day, the crowd is delightfully slim. In the small Heritage Stage tent ("Dedicated to Rufus Thibodeaux and Harry Hypolite"), slide guitar virtuoso Sonny Landreth is chatting with the 150 or so people who fill the place to capacity. New Orleans artist and guitar/dulcimer player Amzie Adams is there too, recalling "how the Cajuns got here: They were refugees, like us."

Across the way, close to the tent manned by the Krewe des Canailles (roughly, mischief-makers), it's a fais-do-do, straw-hatted old-timers in folding chairs claiming the shady spots around the oak trees, families plopped under tarps (yes! like the Jazzfest That Was), eating boudin and crawfish sausage po-boys and Gator-on-a-Stick and listening to main-stage performer Kevin Naquin, leader of the Ossun Playboys, announce a turn by "Mr. Paul Frugè on the pipes!"

The young people will come "once everyone gets awake — around noon," a festival worker says.

The early birds had heard Barry Ancelet offer a rousing bienvenu and a "This is for you, New Orleans!," and pitch the purchase of "les T-shirts" for the cause.

"Katrina took a shot, and we're still here," he tells them. "But you gotta wonder if Fats Domino is ever going to play 'Let the Four Winds Blow' again."

Shouts of "aiiieeeeeeeeee!" ring out as friends run into friends. Somebody says "This is the first time I've laughed since that Sunday."

• • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • •

In the shade of the main stage, Tim Butcher, the Charity emergency management director, says he had decided, "If I had a pulse today, I was going to be at this festival." He warns that this conversation will be over the minute Balfa Toujours starts to play, "and I'm going to have to dance."

He talks about thinking for the first couple of days after the storm that the city, state and federal emergency structure he had helped work on for three years "might actually work." By Wednesday, "it had fallen apart completely." On Thursday, he started the begging, calling every official to be found, "but the very top chain of command had broken down." They ran out of food. Then the diesel fuel to run the generators to save the preemies and the criticals. All told, he slept "about six hours."

And then Butcher, this very large man, starts to cry. Not bitter tears, not sad. Thankful ones, flowing with the recollection that, "Every single person from the CEO to the housekeepers was a hero. Not one complained." When the helicopters and the armed boats finally came, "everybody, regardless of his job, grabbed patients and got them on, got them out."

"In the history of the Cajun people there's always been hardship, always been loss," says Butcher, a Lafayette native who's now living in Butte LaRose. "Whether it was the people who came through Le Grand Dèrangement or yellow fever or hurricanes, one thing that remains is the music and the spirit of the people. That's allowed them to come back, to be happy."

And then the family Balfa comes on, and Butcher begins to dance. Hard. Kicking up dust with his friend Sandra Robertson from Atlanta. And laughing.

• • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • •

"This is the heart and soul of Louisiana, this right here," announces Charles "Chopper" Brady, the House of Blues production manager just-married to Andrea Gorman by Justice of the Peace Barbara Broussard, of the town of Broussard, at the park's gazebo on a cypress pond.

Committed to marrying eventually, the couple had bumped up the wedding date only two days earlier, when Brady went to get a copy of his birth certificate and realized the place gave out marriage licenses, too.

Before a small cluster of friends and family, on a day the temperature hit 100 degrees, saxophonist Dickie Landry played "Hear Comes the Bride" on a harmonica he'd just bought at a garage sale. The bride, with dark eyes and curls and looking for all the world like Longfellow's Evangeline must have, wore a swirling skirt and camisole.

"We are head-strong: this is NOT going to kill the people of Louisiana," the groom had told a visitor before the ceremony. One big reason, says Brady, who lost two houses in Gentilly: "You hear the bad stories — mostly false — and then you go to a place called Comeaux's on Kaliste Saloom Road and the gas prices aren't high at all and I thank the guy for understanding and he chases me down and gives me my $20 back."

• • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • •

One of the weekend's more poignant moments might have come Saturday on the main stage when Terry Huval and Jambalaya brought out Bruce Daigrepont and his band as unscripted "special guests."

Daigrepont, of Metairie, has been a mainstay on the Cajun music scene in New Orleans since 1980 - in fact, back in the early '80s, Daigrepont and Allen Fontenot represented the sum total of the Cajun music scene in New Orleans — and for many years he has catered to local Cajun dancers, moreso than the tourists, with his regular fais do-do at Tipitina's.

Clad this day in a black Tip's T-shirt, Daigrepont and his mates ripped into several songs, interspersed with a heartfelt dialogue about the band's recent travails. Like so many New Orleans-based musicians, Daigrepont and his band find themselves suddenly out of work (if not homeless and out of work), and his appreciation for this opportunity to play music again was genuine.

Later, after crowd favorites Steve Riley and the Mamou Playboys wrap up "Ardoin Medley," they segue into "Marie Mouri (Marie Has Died)," a poem written by a slave in St. Martinville that the band found in the Breaux Bridge library and set to music by guitarist Sam Broussard. The beginning sounds almost like a dirge, sad bagpipes-on-the-bayou. But then things pick up.

There's an address to the New Orleans people, telling them how the Cajuns will bring them back, with jobs, with anything they need. How the band will be back as well — with a Maple Leaf gig planned for the first weekend in October.

As the white buckets for the Acadiana Arts Council's Project HEAL (Helping Employ Artists Locally) pass from hand to hand, Heritage Stage producer Patrick Mould, a Baton Rouge chef who moved to Lafayette to make room for New Orleans friends until they rebuild, echoes the talk of "not being able to imagine Louisiana without New Orleans," of "the dishwashers, the hostesses, the thousands who lost jobs in the hospitality and other industries." He promises, again: "We are here."

A little while later, close to quitting time, a hard rain starts to fall, but the people stay put. It's not enough to shut this party down.

As their ancestors did 250 years ago, as their new friends do today, they keep dancing.

Ray Romano (played by Carell) and Aaron Neville (played by Horatio Sanz, sporting massive prosthetic arms).

Darrell Hammond closed the sketch by playing Fox News Channel correspondent Geraldo Rivera horning in on Cooper's shot, then stealing Cooper's van.

An inevitable fake commercial for "Girls Gone Wild — Katrina" promoted a fake tape to benefit the rebuilding of Bourbon Street. Asked the fake narrator: "Isn't it time you did something to help the victims of these hurricanes?"

On the fake "Weekend Update" newscast, anchor Amy Poehler led the rundown with an item about new revelations of Iraqi prisoner abuse.

"Sen. John McCain said that continued mistreatment of Iraqi prisoners is hurting the nation's image," she said.

The graphic changed from McCain to hurricane victims in New Orleans.

"Also hurting the nation's image — letting people drown when it rains," said Poehler.

A picture of Kathleen Blanco appeared over the shoulder of anchor Sanz, subbing for new mom Tina Fey, as he read:

"While appearing before a Senate committee investigating the Katrina disaster, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco said, 'We are looking forward, not backwards.' At which point she was hit from behind by a hurricane."

The funniest segment of the night was a coffee-urn reunion between "SNL" alum Mike Myers ("Wayne's World," "Austin Powers: The Spy Who Shagged Me") and musical guest Kanye West, who'd freelanced an anti-Bush diatribe, with Myers standing dumb-struck at his side, during the Sept. 2, hurricane-relief benefit concert televised by various NBC broadcast and cable entities.

In Saturday's sketch, West asked Myers how he'd been since their controversial telethon moment, during which West charged, "George Bush doesn't care about black people."

"I got a lot of calls about it," said Myers, cringing. "Mostly from the FBI and the IRS."

Myers, a Canadian, added that he'd also been stripped of his American citizenship and that he was pretty sure his phone was tapped and that he was being followed.

"So everything's going good for you," said West. "Party on, Wayne."

Saints try something new — a day off

Haslett welcomes opportunity to rest

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — The Saints got a nice emotional boost from their first victory in three weeks Sunday. At least, Coach Jim Haslett thinks they did.

For the first time in what seems like ages, the team was able to squeeze in a relaxing, refreshing day off.

"I haven't seen everybody because I gave them a 'Victory Monday,' " Haslett said of one of the routine perks that came from a 19-7 victory over the Buffalo Bills. "I know they're fired up about having a day off."

It wasn't just a day away from the practice field. The Saints have had a handful of breaks in the schedule in the past month.

But this was the first time they didn't spend that off day searching for apartments, renting furniture or signing their kids up for school.

Even better, they didn't spend this Monday fighting off jet lag. After four straight weeks of lengthy plane trips, the Saints stayed in San Antonio this past weekend to beat the Bills on their "home turf" at the Alamodome, where the Saints have set up their practices, offices, meeting rooms, locker room and weight room.

"I tell you it was nice," Haslett said. "We've been working out of this building, so it was kind of nice to come to a place where everything was intact. You get up and get a workout in in the morning. It was kind of nice to drive into the stadium, go to your own office, sit at your own locker."

The Saints (2-2) have to get back on a plane Saturday and fly to Green Bay. But for a change, the Packers might be the wearier of the two teams. Green Bay hosted Carolina on Monday night, giving the Packers a short week to prepare for the Saints.

The Saints had been looking forward to their Alamodome opener, mostly for such creature comforts. But they were pleasantly surprised at how much of a difference the home crowd made on the field as well.

The players were eating it up, motioning to the OKLAHOMA CITY — A few days before Allan Bristow resigned as the Hornets' general manager, he and backup center Chris Andersen spoke at length about the upcoming season.

Not once, Andersen said, did Bristow mention he was thinking about leaving the franchise because of health concerns.

"We sat and talked for awhile," Andersen said during the Hornets' media event Monday at the Ford Center. "So it was kind of unexpected after I found out. When I came in this morning and Jeff Bower (promoted to replace Bristow) was speaking, I was looking around for Allan."

Like Andersen, most of the Hornets' players were surprised by the news of

Two area schools may lose basketball standouts

Rummel's Lewis, Curtis' Paris could remain in Houston

By Bill Bumgarner

Two of the top high-school basketball players in Jefferson Parish find themselves in similar situations heading into the 2005-06 season.

Dwight Lewis, a 6-foot-6 Class 5A All-State forward from Rummel, evacuated to the Houston area for Hurricane Katrina and has enrolled at John Taylor High in Katy,Texas, where he'll likely remain this season, Raiders' coach Steve Alfonso said.

"He's staying in a rental house with his parents and his grandparents," Alfonso said. "I think he is going to stay where he is."

"There is always the chance he may be back in January. But we've picked up some kids from Jesuit and other schools, and we are going to coach the heck of out those."
STEVE ALFONSO
Raiders' coach

Alfonso, who is commuting daily to Rummel from Abita Springs because his Chalmette home was demolished by the storm, still remains upbeat, despite losing a senior who averaged 25 points per game. "There is always the chance he may be back in January," Alfonso said. "But we've picked up some kids from Jesuit and other schools, and we are going to coach the heck of out those."

Alfonso said that Lewis, who committed to Kansas and then had a change of heart, has narrowed his collegiate choices to Miami, Oklahoma and Southern California.

At John Curtis, Patriots coach Mike Krajcer remains hopeful that All-Metro guard Biko Paris will return soon. Paris, a junior who averaged 29 points last season, has been attending Cypress Community Christian School in Missouri City, just north of Houston.

"The big problem will be finding him and his family a place to live," Krajcer said. "Some of his relatives had to walk through chest deep water to get away. But I talked to his parents Wednesday, and they

BATON ROUGE — Took a while — October to be exact — but LSU coach Les Miles finally gets to settle in and script a normal Sunday to Saturday routine.

Trust it's a big deal, even if Miles can't calculate the precise significance.

"Honestly, I look forward to a regular week," Miles said at his weekly press conference. "I look forward to Monday, Tuesday, getting a couple practices in a row with the team and then count on a game on Saturday and look to a normal travel schedule and look forward to a normal home schedule, eventually.

Last season, probably, the result would have been a loss. And, truth be told, that likely would've been the case almost every year before that — six in all — that Chris Scelfo has been Tulane's football coach.

But somehow, two Tulane punts and an extra point being blocked and throwing an interception were only major inconveniences for the Green Wave, not crippling blows. Somehow, playing as flat as a pancake the better part of three quarters made for a struggle, but the Wave overcame it.

So, if you didn't believe there is depth and backbone to this Green Wave team, which is 2-1 after taking a 28-21 victory over Southeastern Louisiana on Saturday, now might be a good time to start.

Bryant holds no grudge against Jackson

Lakers guard: He's the coach, I'm the player

From wire reports

Kobe Bryant welcomed Phil Jackson back with open arms Monday.

Honest.

The way Bryant spoke about his former and current coach with the Los Angeles Lakers, one would hardly know the two had problems in the past.

"We both know what we need to do. We're both determined to make it happen," Bryant told reporters at the team's media day - shortly before the Lakers left for a 10-day training camp in Honolulu. They'll play their first two preseason games Oct. 11-12 against Golden State.

"He taught me how to play the game. He's the coach, I'm the player," Bryant said. "We don't think we're going to have any problems."

Golden State Warriors Baron Davis, left, and Jason Richardson share a laugh during Media Day on Monday. NBA training camps open today around the country.

Differences cropped up several times during Jackson's previous five years as coach of the Lakers, and Jackson had critical words for Bryant in a book he wrote documenting the 2003-04 season - Jackson's last year in his first go-round with the team.

"It doesn't bother me at all. Do I hold any hard feelings? Not at all," Bryant said. "Life is to short to sit around and hold grudges. I don't hold any whatsoever."

EX-HORNET SIGNS WITH SIXERS: Forward Lee Nailon signed with the Philadelphia 76ers after averaging a career-high 14.2 points last season with the Hornets.

The 6-foot-9, 238-pound free agent will be joining his sixth NBA team.

The former TCU player has averaged 8.9 points and 3.1 rebounds in five seasons with Charlotte-New Orleans, New York, Atlanta, Orlando and Cleveland. He averaged 4.4 rebounds in 68 games last season for the Hornets.

The 76ers also signed free agents Steve Castleberry, Olu Famutimi, Herve Lamizana, James Thomas and Ime Udoka.

STOUDEMIRE SIGNS EXTENSION: Amare Stoudemire, who jumped from high school to stardom in the NBA, signed a five-year contract extension with the Phoenix Suns worth about $73 million.

The extension kicks in after this season and has an opt-out clause after the 2009-10 season.

He signed the contract a month shy of his 23rd birthday as the Suns gathered for media day preceding the start of their training camp in Tucson, Ariz., today.

The 6-foot-10, 245-pound power forward played out of position at center and dominated opponents last season for the high-scoring Suns.

Shinn: We are New Orleans' team

By John Reid
Staff writer

OKLAHOMA CITY — When the Hornets took their team photo before Monday's media day at the Ford Center, they wore their teal road uniforms with ìNew Orleansî labeled across the front of the jerseys.

"We are New Orleans ' team and that's it," Hornets owner George Shinn said. "If any politician here in Oklahoma City or anybody else says this is something other than temporary, they are a liar."

But Shinn has been trying to drum up enough support for his team in Oklahoma City to sell out the 19,675-seat Ford Center for the 35 games to be played there this season for his Hurricane Katrina-displaced team.

"One reason why I'm pushing this thing so hard in Oklahoma City and trying to make it work here to let the people have hope here they can get a franchise," Shinn said. "Not my franchise, but a franchise. I'm selling like hell. If we were in New Orleans, I wouldn't have near the expenses that I'm going to have being up here.

"I've got a lot of expenses, so I've got to put on the best sales shoes I can to pay my bills. If I sell this arena out, I will be very close to taking care of the expenses, which are heavier now because of the storm. I'm not going to turn loose on this, I'm in a vice and I've got to push hard."

Shinn said the advantages he has now playing in Oklahoma City as opposed to playing in New Orleans is that the level of income among residents is higher, which increases his potential for more season tickets to be sold. Another difference, Shinn said, is that his team is the only show in town in Oklahoma City. In New Orleans, he has to compete with the Saints for the opening two months of the season.

"Let's say that we play here this whole season and we sell out every game, a lot of people here are probably going to think, why would we go back? But we're going to go back," he said.

The Hornets have an option to return to Oklahoma City next season. Shinn said he plans to continue to monitor the recovery efforts in New Orleans.

"When New Orleans comes back, we're coming back," he said.

TRADE REQUEST: Veteran forward George Lynch said Monday that he wants the Hornets to trade him. Last season, Lynch played limited minutes for most of the season, despite playing in 44 games.

Lynch underwent surgery last Wednesday to remove scar tissue in both of his heels. He is expected to be out four to six weeks, missing the Hornets' entire training camp and preseason games.

"I know I'm an older veteran player and I wasn't happy with my play last year and I'm sure Coach Scott wasn't happy with it," Lynch said. "At this stage in my career, I'm trying to go where I can play and get on a winning team. They're trying to rebuild and I understand that. I'm trying to compete and play. I can help a team and it may not be this team and I totally understand that. When I'm healthy, I'm planning on competing. I don't think I'm going to be here."

Hornets coach Byron Scott said they unsuccessfully tried to trade Lynch this past summer. General Manager Jeff Bower said he plans to meet with Lynch before deciding what steps to take.

BACK TO WORK: The Hornets open training camp today at Southern Nazarene University in Bethany, Okla., located outside of Oklahoma City. Scott said he's aware some players, such as P.J. Brown, had their offseason workout schedules disrupted by Hurricane Katrina, so he's going to give them time to work themselves in shape during camp.

Scott says he will seek advice from Bristow

HORNETS, from C-5

Bristow's sudden departure on Saturday, three days before the Hornets' training camp was set to begin.

"I was definitely shocked," veteran forward P.J. Brown said. "I picked up the paper yesterday morning and read about it. I hadn't heard anything, so I was completely surprised."

Although Bristow had served as general manager since June 2004, 11 of the 15 players currently under contract with the team were obtained by him either through trades, the draft or free agency.

Bristow also played a role in the Hornets inviting Troy Bell, Sean Banks and Alex Garcia to training camp. Both Banks and Bell got high evaluation marks by Bristow while playing on the Hornets' summer league team that competed in Las Vegas last July.

A team source said Bristow sought a new contract, but he resigned before management made a decision. Bristow could not be reached for comment Monday, having left Oklahoma City this past weekend for his off-season home near Naples, Fla.

It had been a busy offseason for Bristow, which started immediately after last season with preparations for the draft.

The Hornets selected point guard Chris Paul with their first-round selection and former LSU player Brandon Bass in the second round. In free agency, Bristow made an attempt to sign Bobby Simmons, who was considered the top small forward available. But Simmons eventually signed with the Milwaukee Bucks, and the Hornets then shifted their focus on strengthening the shooting guard spot by signing European star Arvydas Macijaukas.

"Allan definitely did an unbelievable job," Hornets coach Byron Scott said. "He did indicate to me (a few days before) what was going on and that he was going to resign. I knew he had some problems handling stress.

"Allan is so passionate about what he does. But I had no idea before he told me that he was going to resign. It's a little disappointing because Allan and I formed an unbelievable friendship and great working relationship. But I also understand that, if you're doing it for health reasons, you are doing the best thing you have to do for yourself. I'm still going to stay in contact with him because he's still my friend."

For this season, the Hornets will keep the same working arrangement in their basketball operations department as the team had under Bristow. Decisions will be made collectively under Bower's direction, with input coming from Scott and Willis Reed, vice president of basketball operations.

Scott said team president Paul Mott has made it a priority that the basketball operations staff meet with him regularly.

"I knew there was some health issues with Allan, but I'm disappointed that he's not here," Reed said. "I thought he did a nice job. He and Jeff did a nice job under a very difficult situation last year. When you draft kids and put a team together, you want to see that team stay and work together, but I guess with his health issues that was it."

Reed said he had no interest in seeking the job and recommended to Mott that Bower be considered after it became apparent the team wanted to fill the vacancy from within the organization.

"Jeff should be the one to handle it because he was the (director of player personnel)," Reed said.

On his first official day working as general manager Monday, Bower had almost the same number of interview requests as some of the Hornets' top players.

"The biggest thing is that I have to go back on my experiences such as working for Bob Bass for eight years and working for Allan for one year," Bower said. "There are a ton of challenges, but being able to eliminate any off-the-court issues is something we need to stay on top of."

Sources say VooDoo players to join K.C.

But they can return to N.O. after season

By Jim Derry

The 13 displaced members of the New Orleans VooDoo will have a place to play next season.

The Arena Football League will announce today that Kansas City has been awarded an expansion franchise, and that the VooDoo players under contract will become members of that team, league sources said Monday.

Ten of the 13 players are under one-year contracts, and they will be allowed to return to New Orleans if they so choose after the 2006 season. Three players — quarterback Andy Kelly and linemen B.J. Cohen and Mike Landry — signed two-year deals in June that run through the 2007 season. But those three players will be allowed to sign with either Kansas City or New Orleans during the 30-day period following the season in which a player may only sign with his own club.

The 10 players under one-year deals are wide receiver/linebackers James Jordan and Tremaine Neal, wide receiver/defensive back Calvin Spears, fullback/linebacker Dawan Moss, defensive specialists Chris Pointer and Cliff Green and linemen Brook Miller, Hans Olsen, Aaron Hamilton and Dan Rumishek.

Fullback Dan Curran, who is on the refused-to-report list, and lineman Brian Poli-Dixon, who is on the exempt list, also will be listed on the roster of the Kansas City franchise, which will be placed in the Southern Division and play at Kemper Arena, for the upcoming season.

West Jefferson makes its first official road trip of this hurricane-plagued season Friday night at Assumption for its District 5-5A opener.

The Buccaneers' first unofficial road trip took place Wednesday when assistant coaches Malter Scobel and Matt Burmaster traveled to New Iberia, Alexandria and Baton Rouge to gather three West Jefferson players who had no way to return home.

Senior linebackers Clarence Fultz and Ivan Weber were two key additions. The third, sophomore running back Tevin Conway, quickly proved his worth with a 56-yard scoring run in a 100-yard rushing performance in Saturday's 34-3 season-opening victory against Salmen.

"This is all about the kids," said West Jefferson coach Hank Tierney.

"They all want to play. We felt like we owed it to them to make sure they had that chance. They worked so hard in our offseason program, and this was going to be our staff's first senior class. Our big thing is commitment. That's what we preach to our kids. That's what we ask of them.

"We just felt like we had an obligation to them to play, especially the seniors, after all that they have given us."

Similar resolve is present at all nine Jefferson Parish public high schools as they resume play this weekend after a four-week layoff. Jefferson schools re-opened Monday, and this is the second week of practice for most programs.

West Jefferson, Ehret, Higgins and Fisher will play their second games of the season, and Bonnabel, Cox, East Jefferson, King and Riverdale will kick off their five-game schedules.

All nine teams are operating with rosters approximately one-half to one-third the size of what they were before Hurricane Katrina. West Jefferson dressed 42 players, one-half of its original 84-man roster, against Salmen. Higgins had 34 players in uniform and Ehret 30 .

Numbers alone, however, belie the true value of being back.

"The kids have been good about all of this," said East Jefferson coach Henry Rando. "There's been a lot of excitement and enthusiasm. I know I'm excited about being back. We felt like we were going to have a good team. I feel good about the kids that we have, although we've had to hustle a few."

"You've got to hand it to these coaches," said Jefferson Parish Public Schools athletic director Manny Barocco. "They have made this (resumption of the season) happen. I'm sure it's good therapy for them rather than sitting around doing nothing. It's good therapy for the community, as well."

"I don't look at our numbers as a negative,'' said Ehret coach Billy North. "I think it's a positive, given all of the things that we've been through. I think the numbers we have is a great thing. We're all right.

We're prepared. We've got MRE's (Meals Ready to Eat). It's time to stop bellyaching and having people feel sorry for us. It's time to start playing and getting back. Crying time is over."

Curtis resumed classes this week.

NOTES: Mandeville's volleyball team and the Brother Martin cross-country team won Saturday in Baton Rouge.

Mandeville, which won its first two district games last week, won the St. Joseph's Academy Tournament, beating Sacred Heart in the final.

Led by individual winner Andy Florek, Brother Martin captured the St. Joseph's Academy Invitational meet at the Highland Park course.

The Skippers (7-1) defeated Sacred Heart 25-16, 25-22 in the championship.

"In the final we played some of the best ball we have played in a long time," Mandeville coach Jody Walker said.

The only team the Skippers lost to in the tournament was reigning Division I champion St. Joseph's. The Skippers lost 23-25, 25-21, 7-15 in a rematch of last year's state tournament final.

Mandeville bounced back with a 25-19, 28-30, 18-16 victory against Episcopal of Baton Rouge, then defeated Assumption in the semifinals 25-20, 25-22.

Florek ran the three-mile course in 15 minutes, 57 seconds. Brother Martin won the meet with 56 points, followed by Catholic-Baton Rouge (69) and Episcopal-Baton Rouge (75). ...

Rummel and Curtis are looking to fill open dates in basketball. Coaches interested should call Krajcer at 261-8216 or Alfonso at 583-7893. Rummel also is looking for an opening in a Christmas tournament.

Vick expected to start against New England

MRI shows right knee not seriously injured

From wire reports

Michael Vick is expected to start against New England this week after an MRI confirmed Monday that he did not seriously injure his right knee Sunday in Atlanta's victory over Minnesota.

"It confirmed that it was just a mild sprain of his MCL, and he is day-to-day," Coach Jim Mora said. "That ought to put that to rest for at least two or three minutes from now when someone asks another question about it."

Vick was injured when Minnesota rookie defensive end Erasmus James knocked him to the ground and fell on his leg in the second quarter of Atlanta's 30-10 win.

Matt Schaub replaced Vick and played the rest of the game. The Falcons had a two-touchdown lead when Vick walked slowly off the field with a slight limp.

"Just because I got injured doesn't mean that my confidence level is going to go down," Vick said. "The same thing happened to me against Seattle, and I came back and had one of my best games against Buffalo. Injury doesn't scare me."

Atlanta Falcons quarterback Michael Vick is expected to play this week against New England.

Vick tweaked his left hamstring at Seattle in Week 2 and left the game on each of the final two drives. The Falcons lost 21-18, but Vick played all four quarters in an eight-point win at Buffalo the following week.

McCOWN LEADS CARDINALS: Before an NFL-record 103,467 fans at Azteca Stadium in Mexico City, Josh McCown passed for a career-high 385 yards and two touchdowns and Neil Rackers kicked a career-best six field goals Sunday night as Arizona defeated the San Francisco 49ers 31-14 in the league's first regular-season game outside the United States.

Derek Smith and Derrick Johnson scored on fumble recoveries for San Francisco (1-3) in the first quarter, with Smith scoring on the game's first play and Johnson returning his 78 yards.

The crowd topped the previous NFL record for a regular-season game, when 102,368 fans saw the Los Angeles Rams play the 49ers at the L.A. Coliseum on Nov. 10, 1957.

Meanwhile, cornerback Antrell Rolle, Arizona's first-round draft pick this year, will likely miss the rest of the season because of a left knee injury. Rolle had arthroscopic surgery Monday.

REPORT: ROGERS TO BE SUSPENDED: Detroit Lions receiver Charles Rogers will be suspended for four games for violating the NFL's substance abuse policy, ESPN reported Monday night.

Unless Rogers appeals, the suspension could be announced this week, ESPN reported, citing sources.

In three games this season, Rogers has caught five passes for 77 yards.

RAMS LOSE TIGHT END: St. Louis tight end Roland Williams will miss the rest of the season with a knee injury.

Cam Cleeland, who played for the Rams in 2004 and 2003 and with the Saints before that, may return. He was expected in St. Louis by Tuesday, but Coach Mike Martz wasn't certain if Cleeland would be ready for Sunday's home game against Seattle.

"I'd love to have him back on this team. I know what he can do. He can make a lot of plays for us," Martz said.

ETC.: Raiders center Jake Grove underwent arthroscopic surgery on his right knee and will likely miss three to four weeks. Grove tore cartilage in his knee in the third quarter of Sunday's 19-13 win against Dallas. . . . Chargers left guard Toniu Fonoti will have further surgery on his broken right hand is expected to be out two to three more weeks.

Mitchell likely won't play at Green Bay

Saints safety has left hamstring injury

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — Injuries continue to pile up for the Saints after Sunday's 19-7 victory over the Buffalo Bills.

The most serious appears to be safety Mel Mitchell's left hamstring injury. Coach Jim Haslett did not put a timetable on the injury, but he said Mitchell probably won't be available for Sunday's game at Green Bay.

That leaves the Saints hamstrung at the position, which also lost veteran starter Jay Bellamy to a season-ending torn rotator cuff a week earlier.

The Saints now have three healthy safeties on their roster: veterans Dwight Smith and Steve Gleason, and rookie Josh Bullocks. Haslett said he plans to use one of his cornerbacks at the position as well, but did not name the player.

The Saints have four healthy cornerbacks right now (Mike McKenzie, Jason Craft, Fred Thomas and Fred Booker). Starting cornerback Fakhir Brown has missed the past three games with a knee injury. Haslett said Brown worked out a little bit Monday but remains questionable for Sunday's game.

Receiver Joe Horn (hamstring) and guard Jermane Mayberry also worked out Monday and remain questionable after missing the game against Buffalo.

The Saints did not practice Monday, but injured players came in for treatment.

Also listed as questionable with injuries sustained against Buffalo are linebacker James Allen (hamstring), linebacker T.J. Slaughter (groin) and guard Kendyl Jacox (knee and ankle).

THE BEST EVER? Haslett said Monday afternoon that he planned to stick around the coaching offices in the Alamodome to watch Monday night's game between Green Bay and Carolina.

Though the Packers entered the game with an 0-3 record, Haslett said he won't take the game-planning lightly when it comes to Green Bay quarterback Brett Favre, whom he called, "the greatest player to ever play the game."

"The guy's got championship rings, and he gives that team a chance to win every time he steps on the field," Haslett said. "If he's not, I don't know who is."

TICKET UPDATE: The Saints had 2,200 tickets remaining Monday for their Oct. 16 game against the Atlanta Falcons at the Alamodome, the hottest seller of any of their home games this season.

They are expected to draw a large crowd in Baton Rouge when they host former LSU coach Nick Saban and the Miami Dolphins on Oct. 30. But so far, the Saints have sold just more than 20,000 tickets to that game.

Ticket sales for the games at Tiger Stadium are expected to increase now that the Saints have a fully staffed office up and running in Baton Rouge. Most of the sales staff was operating in San Antonio before the Saints' first game at the Alamodome on Sunday.

For tickets to games in either city, fans can go through Ticketmaster or the Saints' Web site at www.neworleanssaints.com. For San Antonio tickets, they can also call the Saints at (210) 208-9520. And for Baton Rouge tickets, they can call the Saints at (225) 927-8626 or drop by the Baton Rouge offices at 9613 Interline, Suite C.

ETC.: Haslett said he had never seen so many missed tackles on one play as he did on the 82-yard kickoff return by Buffalo's Terrence McGee at the end of the first half Sunday, which ended in a touchdown-saving trip-up by the Saints' Thomas. Though the coach didn't reveal the exact number of misses on the play, he did say that one player missed three tackles.

crowd and feeding off the energy. And the Bills had trouble with the noise from the more than 58,000 fans in attendance, which helped Buffalo's offense get called for three pre-snap penalties.

The Saints, who had been plagued by penalties in their previous road games, committed just one pre-snap penalty and had only four penalties total.

"The kickoff, when all the flashes (from cameras) went off, I thought we were in the Super Bowl. It kind of gave you chills," said Haslett, who estimated that it was a good mix of San Antonio fans and those who had made the trip from Louisiana and Mississippi, based on the people he saw and spoke to at the stadium. "Our players really were excited about having a home-field crowd. You could really see it in the way they warmed up, the way they were into it. They were excited about coming out for the opening kickoff."

Jesus Guerra plays the trumpet as part of a pre-game party outside the Alamodome before the Saints played the Buffalo Bills on Sunday.

This past week has signaled a return to normalcy for the Saints — as much as could be expected, anyway. And the team hopes that will carry over into the next 12 games, two of which will be played in San Antonio, four in Baton Rouge and six more on the road.

Haslett said he has relaxed some of his rules and policies this past month, such as fining players for showing up late for treatment in the morning, since they don't know their way around yet and have so much else to deal with.

Haslett said he's sure the players appreciate it, because there is a distinct sense that they are "all in this together."

But the coach also made it clear that the team won't be making any excuses. When asked if he thinks the lenient rules have been working, the coach responded, "I don't know. We're 2-2. We're just an average team right now."

Braves in the series: Giles, Chipper Jones andLangerhans each hit better than .400 against Houston, and Atlanta hit .310 with 10 homers in the six games. NL home run leader Andruw Jones had only one of those homers; Langerhans had three of his eight against the Astros.
Astros rotation: Andy Pettitte (17-9, 2.39); Roger Clemens (13-8, 1.87 ERA); Roy Oswalt (20-12, 2.94); Brandon Backe (10-8, 4.76)

Astros in the series: Bench players Mike Lamb (.333) and Orlando Palmeiro (.500) have fared well, but the Astros hit .175 against Atlanta pitching.
Outlook: The Astros had too much pitching for Atlanta last season, and have added Andy Pettitte into that mix. But they also had too much Carlos Beltran and Jeff Kent Houston still has the pitching to win a short series, but maybe not enough hitting. Braves in five.

RED SOX VS. WHITE SOX

Game 1: Tuesday at Chicago, 3 p.m. ESPN
Game 2: Wednesday at Chicago, 6 p.m. ESPN
Game 3: Friday at Boston, 3 p.m. ESPN2
Game 4: Saturday at Boston, if necessary, TBA

Pierzynski, C (.257, 18 HR, 56 RBIs); Joe Crede, 3B (.252, 22 HR, 62 RBIs); Juan Uribe, SS (.252, 16 HR, 71 RBIs)
White Sox in the series: Konerko hit .429 with four homers and 27 total bases in the seven games. Rowand hit .360 with three homers. Podsednik hit .391 with a .440 OBP. Garland (5.25 ERA) and Buehrle (22 hits in 13 innings, 6.23 ERA) were ineffective against Boston.
Red Sox rotation: Matt Clement (13-6, 4.57); Curt Schilling (8-8, 5.69 ERA); David Wells (15-7, 4.45); Tim Wakefield (16-12, 4.15)
Red Sox bullpen: CL Mike Timlin (13 of 20 saves, 2.24 ERA); Jonathan Popelbon (3-1, 2.65); Mike Myers (3-1, 3.13)
Red Sox lineup: Johnny Damon, CF (.316, 18 SB); Edgar Renteria, SS (.276, 8 HR, 70 RBIs); David Ortiz, DH (.300, 47 HR, 148 RBIs); Manny Ramirez, LF (.292, 45 HR, 144 RBIs); Trot Nixon, RF (.275, 13 HR, 67 RBIs); Kevin Millar, 1B (.272, 9 HR, 50 RBIs); Jason Varitek, C (.281, 22 HR, 70 RBIs); Bill Mueller, 3B (.295, 10 HR, 62 RBIs); Tony Graffanino, 2B(.309, 7 HR, 38 RBIs)
Red Sox in the series: Ortiz hit .321 with three homers and eight RBIs in the seven games. Varitek caught five of the games and hit .350with three homers. Damon (.221) and Millar (.236) struggled. Schilling (5.98 ERA) had a difficult time. Wakefield (4.15) had the team's best ERA in the series.
Outlook: The White Sox have power throughout the lineup, and a lot of depth. Both bullpens are questionable; Jenks is unproven, and the Boston bullpen has been bad all season, blowing 17 save opportunities. The White Sox's rotation has been more consistent than Boston's. But it's tough to count Boston out after its gutty performance in last year's playoff. White Sox in four.

Angels rotation: Bartolo Colon (21-8, 3.48 ERA); Jarrod Washburn (8-8, 3.20); John Lackey (14-5, 3.44); Paul Byrd (12-11, 3.74)
Angels bullpen: CL Francisco Rodriguez (45 of 50 saves, 2.67 ERA); Scot Shields (10-11, 2.75); Brendan Donnelly (9-3, 3.72)
Angels lineup: Darin Erstad, 1B (.273, 10 SB); Chone Figgins, 2B (..290, 62 SB); Vladimir Guerrero, RF (.317, 32 HR, 108 RBIs); Garrett Anderson, LF (.283, 17 HR,96 RBIs); Steve Finley, CF (.222, 12 HR, 54 RBIs); Orlando Cabrera, SS (.257, 8 HR, 57 RBIs); Adam Kennedy, 2B (.300, 2 HR, 37 RBIs); Benjie Molina, C (.295, 15 HR, 69 RBIs); Jeff DaVanon, DH (.231, 2 HR, 15 RBIs)
Angels in the series: Washburn (2.35) and Lackey (2.53) shined. Surprisingly, Colon (seven homers in 10 innings, 8.44 ERA) was a disappointment against the Yanks. Figgins hit .487 with a .535 OBP and stole six bases. Guerrero drove in 13 in the 10 games.
Yankees rotation: Mike Mussina (13-8, 4.41); Randy Johnson (17-8, 3.79 ERA); Shawn Chacon (7-3, 2.85); Aaron Small (10-0, 3.20)
Yankees bullpen: CL Mariano Rivera (43 of 47 saves, 1.38 ERA); Tom Gordon (5-4, 2.57); Tanyon Sturtze (5-3, 4.73); Chien-Ming Wang (8-5, 4.02)
Yankees lineup: Derek Jeter, SS (.309, 19 HR, 70 RBIs); Alex Rodriguez, 3B (.321, 48 HR, 130 RBIs); Jason Giambi, 1B (.271, 32 HR, 87 RBIs); Gary Sheffield, DH (.291, 34 HR, 123 RBIs); Hideki Matsui, LF (.305, 23 HR, 116 RBIs); Jorge Posada, C (.261, 19 HR, 71 RBIs); Matt Lawton, RF (.255, 13 HR, 53 RBIs); Bernie Williams, CF (.249, 12 HR, 64 RBIs); Robinson Cano, 2B (.297, 14 HR, 62 RBIs)
Yankees in the series: A-Rod hit .390 with five homers in the 10 games, Giambi .400 with six homers. Jeter hit .368. On the negative side, Posada hit .061, Williams.200 and Matsui.225. Chacon pitched six scoreless innings in his only start, and Mussina was effective (3.80) in three starts, but won only one.
Outlook: Yankees hit 17 homers in the 10 meetings with the Angels. IfColon can't beat N.Y. (he allowed seven of those homers in two starts), the Angels have little chance. But Angels manager Mike Scioscia has made three playoff appearances in four seasons. TheAngels' rotation is probably better, given that the Yankees had nine pitchers with nine or more starts. Angels in five.

Despite mistakes, Wave gets needed victory

DESHAZIER, from C-5

the way Tulane played Saturday afternoon, it could have lost to an LHSAA team.

But it didn't. The Wave — which has the distinction of being the first home team to win in LSU's Tiger Stadium this season — conjured an escape. It wasn't nearly as clean or mesmerizing as anything Houdini would've come up with, but might've made the illusionist proud just the same.

"I don't think our focus was there, and that's my fault," Scelfo said. "I've got to do a better job."

What he might have done differently, though, is perplexing.

Playing in Baton Rouge will be as close as Tulane gets to playing in New Orleans this season, which means last weekend was a chance for many of the players and coaches to visit the city.

To see the destruction.

To get a whiff of the stench left in its wake.

To visit homes that now may be unlivable.

To wonder what might have been if Hurricane Katrina hadn't blown through and blown up any grand plans there might have been of producing victory after victory in front of an appreciative home crowd.

Fact is, Scelfo just about had to take his team and coaches to New Orleans, if for no other reason than to remind them of what a privilege it is to be playing football and how thankful they all should be just to be alive.

But, no doubt, it took an emotional toll.

"I think driving in the city, coaches going to see their houses, seeing the destruction, going back to New Orleans, the emotions of it . . ." Scelfo said. "(But) I felt we could overcome that.

"(But) I just don't think our focus was there. And that's directly attributable to me. I may have taken too much for granted."

Maybe his team was a little guilty of taking the Lions for granted, too. After opening the game with a 12-play, 66-yard drive that resulted in a touchdown, the Wave might have considered Southeastern easy pickings.

Then the Lions started blocking kicks, intercepted a pass and began sending what appeared to be 15 rushers, from every conceivable direction, at Tulane quarterback Lester Ricard on passing downs. And before anyone knew it, a blowout became a slugfest, Southeastern giving as well as it got, sometimes better.

"We made a lot of mistakes that were game-changers, but we managed to win" Scelfo said. "And Southeastern made us make a lot of those mistakes.

"Man on man, they were just whipping us."

But not on the scoreboard, which, ultimately, is the only place where the whipping matters. There, Tulane finished with a seven-point advantage, courtesy of a couple of fourth-quarter whoppers — a 97-yard kickoff return for a touchdown by Izzy Route, and a 74-yard scoring pass from Ricard to Bubba Terranova.

"We made some mistakes and found a way to win," Scelfo said. "That hasn't happened on a lot of Saturdays."

Not on his watch, or anyone else's at Tulane.

Which makes you think that maybe, like Scelfo has said and repeated and stressed at every opportunity, there's some depth and backbone to this team, elements that might have been lacking in past editions or, certainly, weren't as evident.

"When guys had to make plays," he said, "they made them."

And that's a vision many of us want to get used to.

Tulane shows big-play ability

But Scelfo still not satisfied with offensive execution

By Fred Robinson
Staff writer

RUSTON — One week after calling out his offense for not producing enough big plays, Tulane coach Chris Scelfo was handed a slew of them, making a huge difference in the outcome of Saturday's game over Southeastern Louisiana at Tiger Stadium.

Scelfo said the offense came through with seven big plays in the 28-21 victory, including a 74-yard touchdown pass from Lester Ricard to senior wideout Bubba Terranova late in the fourth quarter. And there was a key fourth-down conversion on the Wave's opening possession. Three plays later, Tulane scored its first touchdown.

Punter Chris Beckman threw for a two-point conversion when the Wave faked the extra-point kick against Southeastern. Beckman also completed a 27-yard pass on a fake punt in Tulane's season-opening loss to Mississippi State.

"The fake kick on the extra point put us up by two (touchdowns). That was a big, big play," Scelfo said.

"Third-and-10 to Bubba, and the third-and-16 to (freshman Brian) King, those were big plays."

King's reception led to a touchdown.

Scelfo's glowing remarks, however, were few. Even the couple of conversions on critical downs couldn't get Scelfo to ignore the generally poor showing by Tulane's offense.

"I'm very disappointed in the way our offense has performed so far," Scelfo said. "Mistakes, we're not making as many, but we're just not executing very well. We're not putting our kids in situations where we can execute. When we do, we're good. When we don't, we're not very good."

Tulane's offense entered the game against SLU averaging 22.5 points, 21.5 first downs and 325 yards per game. On Saturday, the Wave exceeded its scoring average and had 352 total yards. Of Ricard's 24 completions, 12 were for 10 yards or more.

But there were areas in which the team failed, Scelfo said. Most noticeable was the team's 28 rushing yards. Then there were the five first downs in the second half. Adding to the misery was the defense's inability to get off the field in the final two quarters.

"We've got to find some answers on offense," Scelfo said. "We've got to get our running game going. We can make all the excuses we want, but we've got to run the football. If we don't do a better job of running the football, it's going to be a long year on offense.

"I thought (SLU's defense) outplayed our offense. They had a sense of purpose on Saturday and our offense didn't. That begins with me and the offensive coaches. I don't know whether our offense thought we were going to go in there and steamroll them or what. We've got to be more mature than that."

Not once last season did an opponent hold the Wave 's running game in check the way Southeastern did. Tulane averaged just 1.3 yards per rush.

After running 44 plays in the first half, Tulane was limited to 27 in the second half while SLU ran 53 plays in the second half and held a 12-5 edge in first downs.

"That's why the game wound up being as close as it was," Scelfo said. "You don't get three more shots, then your defense gets run down and your (offensive) opportunities get condensed."

Said defensive coordinator Eric Schumann: "We played a lot of plays in the second half."

The game ended with Southeastern scoring a touchdown, something that irritated Scelfo just as much as the inconsistency on offense and his team having two punts blocked.

"Defensively, I'm disappointed in that last drive," Scelfo said. "I think they kind of let down a bit. To let them go 88 yards is disappointing to me. We had missed tackles and blown coverages, something that we can't let happen."

Marshall game in Mobile

Tulane football will play its Oct. 29 home game in Mobile, Ala., a school source has confirmed. The Green Wave will host Marshall at Ladd-Peebles Stadium at 6 p.m., the first Conference USA meeting between the two teams. The city of Mobile previously offered its stadium for Tulane's Oct. 14 game against UTEP.

This will be Tulane's first home game outside the state of Louisiana. The 2-1 Wave has played in Shreveport and Baton Rouge and will play Saturday in Lafayette and the next Friday in Ruston. The Green Wave is based in Ruston this season, taking classes at Louisiana Tech.

The Marshall game is the fifth Tulane home game of the season. The final home game, Nov. 19 against Tulsa, does not have a site scheduled.

LSU special teams 'a real plus'

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — In a season full of displacement and distraction, LSU has struggled for consistency, but one area of the Tigers play has been near flawless.

LSU, which dropped to No. 11 in the Associated Press poll, got another good game from its special teams, even though the Tigers missed an extra-point attempt. Mississippi State's average starting field position was its 18-yard line. LSU downed three punts inside the Bulldogs' 10 and tackled Mississippi State return men inside the 20 four times, three of those inside the 15. The Bulldogs had no punt return yardage and averaged 15.4 yards on kickoff returns.

"It's continuing to be a real plus for us," LSU coach Les Miles said. "Minus an extra point, most of the afternoon our teams were dominant."

Those numbers bolstered the Tigers' previous performances. LSU leads the SEC and is No. 4 in the nation in net punting at 40.1 yards and tops in the SEC in kickoff coverage.

LSU's Skyler Green leads the SEC and is 11th in the nation in punt returns, with a 16.8-yard average.

Green earned SEC special teams player of the week honors with a 15.4 average on five punt returns. He also had a 30-yard kickoff return.

TV NEWS: The LSU-Florida game Oct. 15 in Tiger Stadium will kickoff at 2:30 p.m. as the second part of a CBS doubleheader, the school learned Monday. CBS will televise either Alabama at Ole Miss or Georgia at Vanderbilt at 11 a.m. The other game will be picked up by ESPN2.

INJURIES: Miles said guard Pete Dyakowski is probably out this week with a foot injury. Guard Brett Helms (knee) is questionable, but probably will practice this week. Miles said he isn't sure if wide receiver Craig Davis (foot) will practice but that center Rudy Niswanger, who injured an ankle Saturday, would be back. Miles said linebacker E.J. Kuale, who broke his ankle in practice five weeks ago, will "do a little more today, but I'm not sure to what extent."

STAT ADJUSTMENT: Quarterback JaMarcus Russell was credited with another completion in Saturday's game when a previously ruled lateral to Green was changed to a pass. That gave Russell 21 completions in 24 attempts for 206 yards, a percentage of .875. That mark is a school record for an SEC game when throwing at least 20 passes. Alan Risher, who was 21-of-26 against Ole Miss in 1981, held the previous mark. Green's reception gave him nine for 64 yards and tied his career high for receptions.

UNCRAMPED: Miles said cramps were not a problem for his team Saturday, despite the high humidity. Several LSU players suffered with cramps against Tennessee, but they paid better attention to drinking fluids.

"We pounded them with hydration talk," Miles said. "We encouraged them to understand. The training staff did a great job pushing liquids. There's a combination of play, the length of the game and liquid intake that comes with experience. It's an experience you have to have." Miles said only one player, punter Chris Jackson, had cramps Saturday.

PERRILLOUX WATCH: Backup quarterback Matt Flynn played much of the fourth quarter, but freshman Ryan Perrilloux didn't take a snap. Miles was not definitive on Perrilloux's role for the season. "We're going to see how things go from this point forward," he said. "We've got decisions that we're going to have to make."

Miles relishes return to routine

certain. I don't know that I can necessarily describe it or define it."

Four weeks into the infant stages of the Les Miles Era and only now does LSU's remaining three-fourths of 2005 appear concrete. Tentatively, that is. Because thus far LSU had its opener postponed, its next game moved from the Central to Pacific Time Zone, and a Monday night SEC opener creating an abrupt turnaround for the Mississippi State tilt.

And that's ignoring the emotion and physical extremes associated with JaMarcus Russell remembering to pick up Fats Domino's prescriptions after practice and Skyler Green reverting to his long-forgotten Tetris skills, figuring out how to fit 20 displaced loved ones in a two-bedroom college apartment — just a couple of Katrina-related anecdotes.

"Every week there's been a change," Miles said. "Every week has been a little awkward. The meeting times on certain days are different for the fact the game was canceled or the game was postponed or it's moved forward Ö The fatigue through the week — you enjoy the fact that you taper down at the end of the week. The opportunity to taper down last week came very quickly and came on the heels of a pretty exhausting Monday.

"I think everybody is looking to get beyond that unusual regiment."

Miles has experience in dealing with these rare scheduling potholes in his 25 years in coaching, although obviously nothing that prepared him for his inaugural September in Baton Rouge. Like every other Division I-A school, Oklahoma State had its weekend game following the 9/11 attacks postponed and, in 1991, when serving as an assistant coach at Michigan, the Minnesota Twins advanced to the World Series. The unexpected postseason home game created a conflict with the Metrodome's Saturday schedule causing the Wolverines-Golden Gophers game to be moved to Friday night.

"Your body responds to certain things," offensive tackle Andrew Whitworth said. "Our bodies will be on a rhythm of playing games every Saturday, getting prepared to feel well for that Saturday and mentally being prepared for that Saturday. It'll be something that week-by-week gets more important."

Reverting to the six-days-till-Saturday norm not only allows the Tigers coaching staff to control the physical intensity knob, turning it up early and down later as kickoff approaches, but also permits players to let their emotions rise steadily. Against Tennessee, LSU went through essentially two Wednesday practices — normally one of the tougher days — and had to sit and watch another college football Saturday pass on their televisions.

"Everyone got drained," Kyle Williams said. "There were so many things that came into play with the Tennessee game with emotions and being hot and getting excited. You'd be surprised how tired you can get just because you're excited Ö I felt as tired after the first quarter — now the first quarter was long — than I have in a while. Didn't feel like I caught my breath until halftime."

Barring unforeseeable circumstances, LSU has just one more familiar hiccup remaining — a common Friday afternoon finale against Arkansas on Nov. 25. Until then, the Tigers are booked for the next seven Saturdays.

"Our guys understood the very unusual nature of the schedule — what's happened — and how we were, like others, asked to adjust," Miles said. "And those adjustments are not necessarily friendly to the legs, or friendly to the schedule, or friendly to preparation or friendly to have an edge and take it into the game."

COLLEGES

XAVIER PLAYER CLEARED TO PLAY: The NCAA has approved Cincinnati's request to allow Division I transfer Ronald Allen to play this basketball season rather than sit out the academic year, the university said Friday. Allen, a 6-foot-9 junior, attended Xavier, but enrolled at Cincinnati at the beginning of the fall quarter after Hurricane Katrina forced the evacuation of New Orleans. Allen was a backup center last season, averaging 4.9 points and 2.4 rebounds in 19 games. Xavier released Allen from his scholarship. He will have two seasons of eligibility remaining.

UNO ATHLETICS GETS COOKING: Louisiana-Lafayette will serve as the opening venue for the UNO's "Get New Orleans Cookin' Again" fundraiser. The event will be held prior to the Cajuns' game against Florida Atlantic on Thursday, and will feature representatives from UNO athletics serving jambalaya during pregame tailgating to help support the Privateer Hurricane Relief Fund. Game time is 7 p.m. The game will be broadcast on ESPN Plus in markets around the Southeast. The campaign will raise money for the UNO student-athletes and revitalize a New Orleans business, which were affected by Hurricane Katrina. Paul Preau, owner of Ad Gas Outdoor Cooking Products of New Orleans, will serve as the head chef of the campaign. For information, please call John Barranco at (225) 261-7919 or e-mail him at jbarranc@uno.edu.

VICK APOLOGIZES FOR GESTURE: Virginia Tech quarterback Marcus Vick apologized for making an obscene gesture to fans during Tech's 31-17 win Saturday at West Virginia. Early in the third quarter, the younger brother of Atlanta Falcons quarterback Michael Vick was caught on camera quickly extending his middle finger toward the stands after he was run out of bounds.

"I apologize for letting my emotions get the best of me Saturday," Vick said in a statement issued Sunday by Virginia Tech. "What I did was wrong and I am sorry. My goal is to be a leader of this team and do things the right way." Vick said he would have no further comment. "In the heat of the moment, he made a mistake," said Billy Hite, an associate head coach for the Hokies. "Marcus knows he can't react like that."

Tennessee quarterback Rick Clausen hurt his Achilles' tendon in the Volunteers 27-10 victory Saturday against Mississippi. But Clausen, who wore a walking boot Monday, is expected to play this week against Georgia.

CLAUSEN EXPECTED TO START: Tennessee quarterback Rick Clausen wore a walking boot to protect his left Achilles' tendon, but expects to play against Georgia. Clausen was elevated to starter after leading the No. 8 Volunteers in a second-half comeback at LSU a week ago. He played the entire way in Tennessee's 27-10 win over Mississippi this past Saturday. Clausen said his Achilles' tendinitis developed last year, and it flared against LSU. Coach Phillip Fulmer said Clausen was going to be fine. Tennessee (3-1, 2-1 Southeastern Conference) hosts fifth-ranked Georgia (4-0, 2-0) on Saturday in a key East Division game.

"I'm going to get a lot of treatment this week, as many times as possible, to get the soreness out," Clausen said. Clausen dislocated two fingers on his right (nonthrowing) hand this season.

TENNIS

THREE AMERICANS ADVANCE: Jan-Michael Gambill defeated Peter Wessels 6-2, 5-7, 6-3 to lead three American men into the second round of the Japan Open in Tokyo. Gambill was joined by Eric Taino and Kevin Kim. Taino defeated Tasuku Iwami 7-6 (9), 6-4, and Kim downed Denis Gremelmayr 6-2, 7-6 (3). The 16 seeded men received byes into the second round. Among the women, seventh-seeded Shinobu Asagoe defeated Maria Vento-Kabchi 6-3, 6-3. In other women's matches, Saori Obata defeated Martina Sucha 6-1, 6-0; Henrieta Nagyova topped Tathiana Garbin 6-7 (7), 6-1, 6-2; and Rika Fujiwara ousted Sybille Bammer in a walkover. Nicolas Lapentti defeated Takahiro Ittogi 6-0, 6-1.

DAVYDENKO IN ROUND 2: Top-seeded Nikolay Davydenko beat Ricardo Mello 6-3, 6-1 and third-seeded Ivan Ljubicic downed Jose Acasuso 7-6 (2), 6-3 in the first round of the Open de Moselle.

Also, fifth-seeded Robin Soderling beat Tomas Zib 7-6 (5), 6-4 and No. 4 Dominik Hrbaty beat Thierry Ascione 6-3, 6-4. In an upset, Agustin Calleri ousted eighth-seeded Nicolas Massu 7-5, 7-5. Davydenko, a French Open semifinalist this year, is chasing his second ATP title of 2005 after winning at St. Poelten, Austria, in May. Ljubicic, who is yet to win an ATP title, is 38-18. He has lost four finals - three to Roger Federer at Doha, Rotterdam and Dubai, and to Joachim Johansson at Marseille.

CLIJSTERS POISED TO REGAIN RANKING: Daniela Hantuchova beat Meghann Shaughnessy 6-4, 6-0 at the Porsche Grand Prix in Filderstadt, Germany, where Kim Clijsters is in position to regain the No. 1 ranking. Clijsters, ranked No. 2, and top-seeded Lindsay Davenport will close within a few points of Maria Sharapova's top ranking with a strong showing. Sharapova is injured and pulled out of the indoor tournament, which features four of the world's top five players. Hantuchova, who reached the Filderstadt final in 2002 and was ranked fifth in 2003, has broken out of a slump and is back to No. 20. The WTA said Clijsters most likely will pass Sharapova if she beats fourth-ranked Amelie Mauresmo and eighth-ranked Elena Dementieva on the way to reaching the final. Clijsters, the tour's hottest player, won the U.S. Open and is 26-1 since a fourth-round loss to Davenport at Wimbledon.

The top ranking has changed hands six times at the event, which traditionally boasts one of the tour's strongest fields.

N.O. fires 3,000 city workers

And that could be just the start, Nagin says

By James Varney and Frank Donze
Staff writers

In a frank acknowledgement of New Orleans' bleak economic condition, Mayor Ray Nagin dispensed pink slips to half the city's work force Tuesday and conceded that additional layoffs could loom.

The firing of 3,000 workers, some of whom almost certainly lost their homes to Katrina, comes as the city's $13 million monthly sales tax revenue has shrunk to zero. Intense negotiations for loans from state and federal agencies have proved fruitless so far, and a $50 million line of credit from private lenders remains sketchy, Nagin said.

"We are just not able to put together the financing necessary to maintain staffing at City Hall at its current level. We have no revenue stream, and the prospect of getting revenue streams is pretty dicey."
MAYOR RAY NAGIN

The bad news was slightly mitigated with an upbeat assessment from Nagin about the improving quality of city water. Nagin said he hopes that within a week or so, possibly as early as this weekend, east bank tap water will be certified as potable. West Bank water already is.

Tuesday's news conference was dominated, however, by questions about the layoffs.

"We are just not able to put together the financing necessary to maintain staffing at City Hall at its current level," Nagin said. "We have no revenue stream, and the prospect of getting revenue streams is pretty dicey. I think we can limp along for another month or two, but beyond two months we'll have to see."

Nagin said he will then determine if "we'll have to make another tough call."

He said his administration hopes to nail down the $50 million line of credit in the next 30 days.

The mayor estimated the cutbacks would save the city $5 million to $8 million a month, although he warned, "We will probably have to do some more belt-tightening."

Workers deemed essential, such as police officers, firefighters and emergency medical personnel, will not be affected. It was unclear how the layoffs will impact the mayor's own staff, and Nagin sidestepped a question about

Fast-food restaurants hungry for workers

One store offering $6,000 'signing bonus'

By Keith Darcé
Business writer

A cutthroat, post-hurricane labor market has sent wages skyrocketing in the fast-food industry and prompted some of the New Orleans region's biggest chains to offer workers thousands of dollars in signing bonuses, perks typically associated with higher-paying white-collar jobs.

Burger King recruiters have been visiting federal disaster recovery centers and newly reopened high schools offering a $6,000 bonus, paid in monthly installments, to anyone promising to work full-time at a metropolitan New Orleans restaurant for at least a year. New part-time workers are being offered $3,000 bonuses.

Popeyes Chicken & Biscuits has increased hourly pay for cashiers and cooks from just over the federal minimum wage of $5.15 to more than $8, a jump of more than 50 percent.

"I've been in the (fast-food restaurant) business for 30 years, and I've never seen anything like this," said Glen Helton, president and chief operating officer of Strategic Restaurant Acquisition Corp., the California company that owns the 54 Burger King stores in metropolitan New Orleans.

Strategic Restaurant has reopened about half of its stores and is ready to open 13 more, but it can't until it hires about 500 more workers, Helton said.

Almost overnight, Hurricane Katrina transformed the bottom reaches of the region's economy from an employer's market where low-wage earners had few options for advancement to a worker's market where job opportunities,

The first time I came back to New Orleans after Katrina, I'll admit that the whole specter shook me to my core. After spending eight days reporting in the city, my hands were shaking and I had lost about 10 pounds. It was time to take a break.

As I drove to Baton Rouge to catch a flight, I pulled off at the first interstate exchange with any life to it – LaPlace – and went to the McDonald's and got a Big Mac, a fish sandwich, large fries and a large coke.

Delivery, however, is another story

Michelle Hunter

As power, water, telephone and Internet service slowly return to the east bank of New Orleans, so, too, does the mail.

Residents and business owners from Uptown, the Carrollton area and portions of the Central Business District and the French Quarter may begin collecting their old mail today at two conventional post offices and a temporary trailer city near New Orleans Arena, the U.S. Postal Service said Tuesday. It hopes to make similar arrangements for the rest of the east bank by next week.

Even without full street delivery, the pickup arrangements represent a breakthrough for the Postal Service after five weeks of stockpiling mail for most of the New Orleans region first in Houston and Dallas, then in Baton Rouge, then back in Houston. During that time, first Katrina then Rita blasted the Louisiana coast, largely emptying many parishes.

"The two hurricanes put us behind the eight ball," New Orleans postmaster Alan Cousin said.

Strict rules cordon off Medicaid for displaced

Effort to relax guidelines stalls

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — More than half of the hurricane evacuees in Louisiana who have sought help from Medicaid to cover their medical bills have been rejected because of strict eligibility guidelines that keep out even some people far below the poverty line.

The more than 6,000 people who have been turned down for coverage since the Aug. 29 storm have been caught in a political dispute about whether eligibility should be relaxed in the wake of hurricanes Katrina and Rita and if so, who should pay for the added health-care costs: the state or federal government?

"At this point, we have no choice but to deny those people," Ruth Kennedy, Louisiana's Medicaid director, said Tuesday.

Kennedy said the state health department is holding on to the rejected applications in case a congressional logjam is broken that frees up money to pay the extra cost.

Louisiana's Medicaid eligibility rules, which are established by the state Legislature, are among the strictest in the country. People between the ages of 19 and 64 without dependent children can qualify only if they have incomes of less than 13 percent of the federal poverty line, or $174 per month. That hard-to-meet standard has contributed to a high rejection rate since Katrina hit the state, forcing hundreds of thousands of people from their homes throughout southeastern Louisiana.

Kennedy said 55 percent of the applicants have been rejected, although she cautioned that the number is a conservation estimate. It only counts people who were in shelters or applied for the program in state Medicaid offices. It doesn't include people who might have been living with family and friends when they applied.

Sens. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, and Max Baucus, D-Mont., have been pushing legislation to loosen Medicaid eligibility rules for hurricane victims, with the federal government footing the bill. Their legislation would cover health expenses for five months at a cost of about $9 billion.

But the effort has bogged down in the Senate where fiscal conservatives have balked at the hefty price tag. It also is opposed by the Bush administration, which said it is overly broad — possibly enrolling people unaffected by the storm — and unnecessary because states, including Louisiana, can get federal permission through Medicaid waivers to loosen eligibility rules. Eight states, including Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi and Alabama, have already gotten waivers.

The Bush administration has described the Medicaid waiver process as a quick fix for people in need.

"By doing the waiver, it is something we can do now to make those funds available now," Christina Pearson, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

But Kennedy and others say the federal waiver would only ease eligibility rules marginally, while leaving Louisiana with a sizeable medical bill it can't afford to pay.

Under the waiver, people with children and with incomes below 100 percent of the federal poverty line -- $19,350 for a family of four -- would be covered by Medicaid for five months. Those with disabilities would be excluded unless their condition is so severe it has kept them out of work for a year or more, she said.

The waivers also shift the cost to the states. If Louisiana got a waiver to ease its eligibility guidelines, it would be on the hook for 30 percent of the extra medical costs at a time when state revenue is shrinking because of the storm.

"It will be an issue, even to continue the Medicaid program at pre-Katrina enrollment levels," Kennedy said.

Evacuation shelters have various levels of medical care. A survey by the Kaiser Family Foundation of 680 evacuees, most from Louisiana, at shelters in Houston in mid-September found a mixed record. Twenty-nine percent said they were having trouble getting the prescription drugs they needed. Twenty-one percent said they weren't getting treatment for injuries they suffered in the hurricane.

A more substantial problem will come when they leave shelters and find themselves in need of medical care. Many low-income people in New Orleans used to get treatment at the publicly supported Charity Hospital, but it was flooded and remains closed. Without the public hospital, many hurricane victims have no other means of paying their medical bills.

When the Kaiser Foundation survey asked evacuees whether they had health insurance, 52 percent said no.

State urged to review emergency plans

By Jan Moller

BATON ROUGE — The state should take a more active role in reviewing the emergency evacuation plans of nursing homes and hospitals in hurricane-prone areas, Attorney General Charles Foti said this week.

Foti's comments came as his agency continues its criminal investigation of 13 nursing homes and six hospitals where patients died after their owners did not evacuate in advance of Hurricane Katrina. At least 100 patients died during and after the storm in facilities that did not evacuate, though it's unclear how many of those deaths are directly tied to the storm and its aftermath.

Although health care facilities are required to have an emergency evacuation plan on file, outlining where patients will be taken in case of an emergency and how they will get there, the state does not keep a copy of those plans. The only copies are maintained by local emergency operations centers.

"We want a copy to be kept" with the state, Foti told a joint House-Senate committee looking into post-hurricane recovery efforts. He said health care facilities also should be required to keep backup copies of patients' records so they will be available to doctors and nurses after patients are moved.

The Legislature could take up the matter this month, when it's expected to meet for the first of two special sessions to deal with

Irked landlords can't oust missing tenants

All evictions on hold until October 25

By Jan Moller
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — With thousands of New Orleans-area renters displaced by Hurricane Katrina, frustration is growing among landlords seeking access to their properties and trying to track down tenants who've been missing since the storm.

"The No. 1 complaint I have (since Katrina) is from the landlords in my area," said Rep. Henry "Tank" Powell, R-Ponchatoula, who said the owners are frustrated by their inability to survey their damaged properties until they reach a resolution with their tenants.

Their efforts are complicated by a pair of executive orders from Gov. Kathleen Blanco suspending all legal deadlines until Oct. 25, meaning that all legal evictions are on hold until then.

But Louisiana Supreme Court Justice Catherine "Kitty" Kimball, testifying Tuesday before the Legislative Audit Advisory Committee, said there have been just as many complaints from tenants who have returned to their rented homes after the storm to find their belongings on the street.

Kimball said it will be up to the Legislature, not the courts, to make any changes to existing law. "I think that's going to be your baby," Kimball said.

Constable Lambert Boissiere of the First City Court in New Orleans said six landlords filed eviction procedures when the court reopened Monday at its temporary headquarters in Gonzales. But none of them can be carried out until Blanco's executive order is lifted, he said.

Even when the order expires, Katrina will continue to pose unusual hurdles. Under normal circumstances, eviction notices are posted on a tenant's front door. But that doesn't provide enough due process to tenants who evacuated during the storm.

Boissiere said he wants to set up a temporary system in which the constable's office would catalogue and store furniture and other possessions of evicted tenants, while working with the Federal Emergency Management Agency to find them.

But setting up such a system will require federal financing, as well as an agreement with FEMA to help the constable's office track down missing tenants.

"Any absence of that, you're going to have chaos," Boissiere said.

Union leader says electricians treated 'like 2nd-class citizens'

By Leslie Williams
Staff writer

The Louisiana AFL-CIO, ACORN of Louisiana, the NAACP of Baton Rouge and the Service Employees International Union announced Tuesday they are joining forces to form New Orleans Opportunities for Action and Hope to "ensure that as Louisiana rebuilds, the poverty that preceded Katrina is not recreated."

The organization was created to encourage employers and others to hire workers from Louisiana, especially from areas battered by Hurricanes Rita and Katrina, organization officials said.

During the announcement Tuesday, some union members decried the treatment they've already received. Robert "Tiger" Hammond, business manger for Local No. 130 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, said 75 electricians from New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Lake Charles were hired a few weeks ago at the Naval Air Station in Belle Chasse to wire the "tent city" there.

Hammond said they were recently let go in favor of workers from Texas.

"After the job was about 60 percent complete, BE&K of Birmingham, Ala., told us the company no longer needed our services," Hammond said. The company replaced the Louisiana workers with workers with less pay and no benefits, he said.

Bill Rigby, a vice president for BE&K, said the union workers "did good work," but were let go because their services were no longer needed.

Rigby said his company brought in "some of our own electricians" from Texas and elsewhere to "augment" the union work force. As a consequence, the "backlog of work fell off, and we no longer needed their help," he said.

But Hammond and others viewed it differently.

"Local people are being treated like second-class citizens in our own communities," said Hammond, who has sent a letter of complaint to the corporate offices of BE&K.

W. Roland Goetzman, a Baton Rouge resident formerly of New Orleans, was one of the 75 union workers.

"I'm a longtime resident of Louisiana," Goetzman said. "I'm a veteran. I am P.O.'d about them bringing these people from out of state that are not going to pay any taxes and they're going to take the money out of the state."

State Reps. Juan A LaFonta and Austin J. Badon Jr., both Democrats from New Orleans, attended the NOAH gathering to show their support for the cause.

In all, the coalition represents more than 151,000 people fighting for "priority job placement and training" for Louisiana residents, good wages, and immediate and long-term affordable housing.

issues related to Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita.

Kris Wartelle, Foti's spokeswoman, declined to provide a list of the facilities being investigated. She confirmed that investigators from the agency's Medicaid Fraud Control Unit are looking into the deaths of at least 22 people at Lafon Nursing Home of the Holy Family in eastern New Orleans.

Additionally, Tenet Healthcare Corp. issued a statement on its Web site saying prosecutors have seized "records and other material" from Memorial Medical Center in connection with 34 patients who died there before they could be evacuated. The company said it thinks 24 of those patients died in a separately owned nursing home on the hospital's campus operated by LifeCare Holdings.

The most high-profile case involves St. Rita's Nursing Home in Violet, whose owners have been charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide in connection with residents who died in Katrina's aftermath. Authorities in St. Bernard Parish have said the home's owners turned away two offers to have buses evacuate the residents before the storm.

According to published reports, only about one-third of the 60 nursing homes in the area hardest-hit by Katrina evacuated before the storm. Wartelle said it's not clear when the investigations will wrap up or whether more charges will be filed.

Former Health and Hospitals Secretary David Hood said the health agency tried to improve its oversight of evacuation plans after several residents died while being evacuated from nursing homes in advance of Hurricane George in 1998. Among the changes he instituted was requiring state regulators to review the plans during their regular inspection surveys, Hood said.

"To what extent it's been carried out since then I really couldn't tell you," Hood said "Obviously there's some problems with it."

Building code issue moved to back burner

Safety, architect groups raise alarm over delay

By Mark Schleifstein
Staff writer

In the wake of destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina, the Louisiana Legislature may consider adopting a mandatory statewide building code for the first time, but it won't be until after the first of the year, Insurance Commissioner Robert Wooley said Tuesday.

Wooley said officials with Gov. Kathleen Blanco's administration and legislators confirmed Tuesday morning that legislation establishing a statewide building code tailored to address building failures caused by wind and flooding from Katrina will not be included in the call for an October special session.

Instead, it might be considered during a January special session, he said.

The announcement was made at a meeting of the Uniform Building Code Task Force, a group set up by the Legislature last year to address concerns that the lack of residential and commercial building codes in many coastal Louisiana parishes was a major factor in the decisions by insurance companies not to do business in the state.

The decision to wait until the first of the year to address the problem is bad news, Louisiana American Institute of Architects President Trula Remson said.

"It seems to me that's an urgent issue," Remson said. "Building codes come into play during those times when you are building, and we are building now."

Jeff Burton, building code manager with the Florida-based Institute of Business and Home Safety, a national advocate for more stringent building codes, agreed.

"I think the concern is that there's rebuilding that's going on," he said. "Our mission being to protect lives and property through more resistant construction, it's our concern that this construction may be going on at the same low level of protection as before."

Burton presented a four-point plan to the task force that would help the state strengthen local building codes and their enforcement.

"It seems to me that's an urgent issue. Building codes come into play during those times when you are building, and we are building now."

TRULA REMSON
Louisiana American Institute of Architects president

The group recommends adoption of the 2003 versions of the International Building Code and International Residential Code. Louisiana parishes are allowed to adopt the 2000 version of the International Building Code, which regulates construction of commercial buildings, but there's no requirement that parishes adopt the code and there's also no state-approved residential construction code. State law also prohibits parishes from adopting codes that are more stringent than the state-approved code, so they could not adopt the 2003 version.

Burton also asked the group to consider adopting a new international existing building code when it is completed, possibly later this year. That code would set standards for retrofitting existing homes and commercial buildings to withstand higher winds and water damage.

The safety group's plan also would include training and certification requirements for building code officials and building inspectors, training for builders to familiarize them with the new code and strengthened wind and flooding standards, and similar training for architects and engineers.

The entire process would take about five years to implement, he said.

Burton's group was one of the key organizations participating in the rewriting of Florida's building code after Hurricane Andrew destroyed south Dade County in 1992.

Andrew's winds exposed problems with the Miami-Dade County enforcement of what were then the nation's most stringent building codes, as side-by-side subdivisions experienced wildly different levels of destruction.

Marc Levitan, director of the Louisiana State University Hurricane Center, also presented a study indicating that much of the wind damage believed caused by Katrina could have been avoided by adoption of stronger residential building codes.

Using a wind damage model based on National Hurricane Center estimates of Katrina's winds at landfall, Levitan estimated the number of residential structures with wind and wind-driven rain damage from Katrina to be near 273,000, or 16 percent of the total building stock in Louisiana.

Levitan recommended that any statewide building code require improvements in protection of building openings and the attachment of roof sheathing and that it include a requirement to use hurricane straps or clips to attach roofs and hold down walls, and secondary moisture protection, such as taping joints between roofing sections, to reduce mold and mildew problems in the aftermath of storms.

Wooley and Levitan said they've already been approached by insurance executives concerned about the lack of more stringent building codes in the state.

"In the meeting today, the vice president of a major national insurance firm said he flew over from Florida to see what was going to be done," Levitan said. "He told me, 'We're evaluating if we're going to sell coverage in the Louisiana market, and one of the key things we're looking at is if Louisiana adopts a statewide building code.' "

Committee wants housing answers

Power, water are big issues for N.O.

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Officials must focus on providing housing and services such as water and electricity to get more people to move back to New Orleans and to remain there, a legislative committee dealing with the city's recovery said Tuesday.

The Joint House-Senate Committee on Disaster Planning, Crisis Management, Recovery and Long Term Revitalization's Subcommittee on New Orleans said it wants answers from power companies, the New Orleans Sewerage & Water Board and other entities on when all of the city's neighborhoods will have clean water and electricity.

"The thing I hear more than anything is housing," said Sen. Diana Bajoie, D-New Orleans, who co-chairs the panel along with Rep. Charmaine Marchand, D-New Orleans. "You have the issue of jobs and getting contracts to clean the city up and rebuild it, and these are all pieces of the pie. But where are people going to live?"

The committee took no action, but said it wants to hear from city officials and power company executives when it meets Oct. 18 in New Orleans.

Bajoie said she also would like to bring in the leaders of contracting companies who have been hired by the federal government to help clean up New Orleans to find out why more local companies and individuals have not been hired for the rebuilding effort.

"You all need to look at safety issues" regarding crime in New Orleans, said Rep. Charles Lancaster, R-Metairie. He said he knows of someone who returned to New Orleans to begin cleaning up a home near Tulane University only to have it looted, despite a dusk-to-dawn curfew.

Bajoie said there also is a problem of looting in her Central City neighborhood and wants the New Orleans Police Department to tell the panel what it is doing to curb those incidents.

Bajoie said the committee will make recommendations for legislation to be considered at a special session expected to be held later this month, as well come up with as longer-term solutions to be addressed at its general session in March.

Rep. Alex Heaton, D-New Orleans, said the people of New Orleans also need to hear from Entergy officials about restoration of power.

He said he represents a district that covers both sides of South Carrollton Avenue. Constituents on one side of the thoroughfare cannot understand why homes across the street from them have power and they do not.

Rep. Karen Carter, D-New Orleans, said that although tourism is vital to the city's recovery, hotel and restaurant operators may not get workers back because of their relatively low pay.

She said she would like to hear from the hospitality industry why pay scales are not more competitive.

She said former residents who were making $7 an hour and are now "in Houston with a child in a school that is arguably better (than one in New Orleans), with a mass transit system that is arguably better, why should they come back?"

Rep. Edwin Murray, D-New Orleans, said the panel also should look into why more New Orleans workers or companies are not being hired for debris removal and reconstruction work. "We must have local companies involved in the rebuilding," he said.

Airport prepares for crash landing

Cash may dry up in about 60 days

By Matt Scallan
Kenner bureau

Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport will run out of cash in about 60 days, and without help it will plan to default on its loans, an airport official told members of Congress on Tuesday.

The airport's $70 million annual operating budget depends largely on landing fees and rent from airlines and concessions revenue from passengers – both depressed since Hurricane Katrina struck Aug. 29.

"We're down to about 10 percent of our normal revenue," Mario Rodriguez, the airport's deputy director for planning and development, told members of the House Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure, who met at the airport.

"What I'm seeing here is folks from other areas that are not impacted saying, 'I'm a host city and I'm inconvenienced. Now here is my 10-year wish list that I've been working on for the last 15 months and I want all this stuff taken care of.' And I think that's wrong."
RAY NAGIN, New Orleans mayor

Rodriguez said the airport needs about $90 million in the next 28 months to remain solvent, in addition to about $50 million to repair damages from Hurricane Katrina.

Members of the congressional committee offered no response to his statement. In September, U.S. Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta delivered $15.2 million to make initial repairs to the airport.

Though Armstrong re-opened to commercial passenger traffic two weeks ago, only 24 flights are scheduled to arrive today, compared with an average of 174 flights before Katrina.

Air traffic is slowly growing, but much depends on the comeback of New Orleans' tourism and convention industry. Rodriguez said he expects traffic to rise to 30 percent to 40 percent of normal in 2006 and to 70 percent in 2007.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin also spoke at the meeting and urged Congress to apportion Katrina financial aid based on the amount of damage suffered by each community, using factors such as the number of people displaced or the number of buildings flooded.

"Make sure it goes to the areas most affected," he said. "What I'm seeing here is folks from other areas that are not impacted saying, 'I'm a host city and I'm inconvenienced. Now here is my 10-year wish list that I've been working on for the last 15 months and I want all this stuff taken care of.'

"And I think that's wrong."

Nagin said his wish list includes tax incentives to reward people who rebuild businesses in New Orleans and hire local residents, as well as a high-speed light rail system linking New Orleans and Baton Rouge that could be used for evacuation purposes.

Blanco names Norman Francis chair of new foundation

Group to coordinate storm relief efforts

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Xavier University President Norman Francis on Tuesday was named chairman of a foundation designed to coordinate relief efforts for victims of hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco also announced Emmett Carson as interim chief executive officer of the Louisiana Disaster Recovery Foundation as well as 10 members of the foundation's board .

"The task of assisting with family restoration is a monumental one and will require the combined knowledge of and reach of this special group of leaders who have proven knowledge of Louisiana and a history of community service," Blanco said.

Blanco spokesman Roderick Hawkins said the 10 members of the foundation board range form members of the clergy to accountants.

He called the appointments "a first round of board selections" but did not say how many more members will be named to the board or when they all would be in place.

In naming Francis, Blanco called the university president "a leader with impeccable credentials who represents interests broad and wide."

She said that accepting the new task "when there are so many demands on his time and energy speaks volumes about Dr. Francis' character and concern for his fellow Louisianians."

Carson, president and chief executive officer of the National Council of Foundation, has agreed to serve as a loaned executive and interim chief executive officer of the new Louisiana foundation.

Blanco's first round of board appointees include: Brenda Birkett, dean of the business school at McNeese State University in Lake Charles; Renae Conley, chief executive officer of Entergy Corp. in New Orleans; the Rev. Hampton Davis, an executive at Notre Dame Seminary in New Orleans; Berwick Duval II, a Houma lawyer; Linetta Gilbert, program officer of the Ford Foundation of New York City; Bill Henning, chief executive officer of Cameron Communications in Sulphur; Sibal Holt of Baton Rouge, retired president of the state AFL-CIO; the Rev. Fred Luter, senior pastor of the Franklin Avenue Baptist Church in New Orleans; R. King Milling, president of Whitney Bank; and John Redd III, an accountant from Lafayette.

The state foundation was formed to attract funds to a central disaster relief effort that works with non-profit groups to help those in need.

Donations to the Louisiana Disaster Recovery Foundation can be made by calling 1-877-HELPLA1 or 1-877-435-7521 and pledging a donation on a credit or debit card. Donations can also be made online at www.louisianahelp.org; and checks may be written to the foundation and mailed to Post Office Box 94095, Baton Rouge, La., 70804-9095.

Pumps expected to dry Terrebonne

HOUMA (AP) — Portable pumps from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers should accelerate the draining of Terrebonne Parish.

Workers have plugged major holes in the parish's levees, and about 20 pumps arrived in Terrebonne over the weekend to speed efforts to pump water from low-lying areas, said Jeff Richie, project engineer with the Corps' New Orleans district.

With the extra pumps, Terrebonne could be relieved of floodwater in days.

As in New Orleans, workers first had to close gaps in the levee systems before draining much of the water.

"Our mission was to get levees to where they were sealed off enough to pump," Richie said.

HURRICANE AFTERMATH

"The reality is this city will not be the same for a while. We're not saying bring New Orleans back today."

MAYOR RAY NAGIN

'Army of workers' tries to restore water

CITY, from A-1

whether he would accept a pay cut.

"I'm homeless already, so let's just put the dagger all the way in," he joked before adding that he was more inclined to wait until February's elections to see if voters want to hand him "the ultimate pay cut."

'It's tough. It's really tough.'

The layoffs were expected but nonetheless flew in the face of Nagin's recent efforts to paint New Orleans as a city slowly regaining its footing. For several days now, the mayor has showcased his "Bring New Orleans Back" panel, the improving security situation, a re-entry timetable, and the scattered restoration of power. Tuesday, however, the economic wallop packed by Katrina was thrown into sharp relief and raised new questions about what kind of city will emerge from the wreckage.

"The reality is this city will not be the same for a while," Nagin said. "We're not saying bring New Orleans back today."

Nagin staffers were unable to provide a breakdown Tuesday of how the layoffs will impact individual city agencies. But Chief Administrative Officer Brenda Hatfield said besides the public safety sector, the areas that will largely be spared include the Sewerage & Water Board, health and building inspectors needed to get commerce up and running and sanitation workers who work for a private contractor.

Though the police and fire departments will be spared, even those agencies will see reductions in their administrative staffs, Hatfield said.

Nagin said city workers singled out for layoffs will receive their last paychecks Oct. 14 and Oct. 21, depending on which pay cycle they're in. He asked city employees who have been issued vehicles, cell phones or other equipment to return the property immediately.

As for the prospects of rehiring anyone down the road, Nagin said he thinks the layoffs are "pretty permanent."

Asked if it was hard for him to tell people with low-paying jobs who have lost their homes that they no longer have jobs, Nagin said, "It's tough. It's really tough."

But he said he is buoyed by reports that many relocated city workers are earning higher salaries in their new locations. "Hopefully, they have landed on their feet," he said.

Nagin said the city is not contemplating bankruptcy at this time, adding that the strained city budget could get temporary relief if the Legislature accepts a recommendation by state Treasurer John Kennedy and agrees to assume City Hall's debt service.

Making some headway

Although water on the east bank remains undrinkable, some neighborhoods are piled high with garbage and debris, and the return of residents is just a trickle, Nagin insisted there are signs everywhere that the landscape is improving.

For example, he predicted there would be a marked increase in the number of crews and trucks removing trash and trees from city streets, announced a more aggressive program to provide temporary shelter for residents, and urged state and federal agencies to join the water board in certifying the water as fit to drink.

He labeled as "schizophrenia" the mixed messages coming from state and federal health officials about the quality of the city's drinking water. Nagin said the water board is testing the water daily at the treatment plant and that "it exceeds standards." But the water is being corrupted as it runs through the city's delivery system, severely damaged in some places. Nagin said an "army of workers" is making significant progress on repairs to water pipes.

Until the water has been cleared to drink, a milestone Nagin hopes to see in about a week, he said he won't be comfortable bringing children back to the city.

On Tuesday, administration officials also identified several areas where temporary housing trailers can be erected for 711 families. Though not all those locations were made public and more are expected to be lined up soon, Nagin said the available locations include Louis Armstrong International Airport, Touro Infirmary, Algiers and a Winn-Dixie parking lot Uptown.

He added that trailers soon will be available to residents who want to park the mobile homes in driveways while their homes are repaired or rebuilt.

Rather than fret about a lack of traffic jams resulting from people returning to the city – a sign that perhaps the repopulation will not be as strong or as quick as he had hoped – Nagin praised the pace. He said it was because things had gone so smoothly, adding that he is expanding his "look and leave" policy to all sections of the city except the still soggy Lower 9th Ward.

Wages jump at local fast-food outlets

restaurants are struggling to assemble enough workers to reopen stores in Jefferson Parish and parts of New Orleans that escaped devastating floods.

Many evacuated workers have resettled in other cities or can't return because their homes were ruined.

Strategic Restaurant, which had a pre-storm work force of about 2,700 in the metro area, has lost about 1,271 front-line workers and 65 managers from the local market, Helton said. Many workers who are willing to return to their old jobs aren't able to come home yet, he said.

To make matters worse, competition has exploded for the unskilled and low-skilled workers favored by the fast-food industry. Every employer operating in the wake of Hurricane Katrina is chasing after the same pool of workers, he said.

"Now the job market includes anybody doing relief work at $15 an hour. ... Everyone is looking for general laborers, and they are drawing from our normal work force," Helton said.

The changes promise to put larger amounts of money into the wallets and purses of the region's working poor.

Before the storm, a fast-food restaurant employee could expect to earn just over the federal minimum wage of $5.15 as a part-time worker. That would result in take-home pay of $8,000 to $12,000 a year.

STAFF PHOTO BY MICHAEL DeMOCKER

Like many businesses, the Winn-Dixie supermarket at the Marrero Shopping Center is hiring. Many people who evacuated because of Hurricane Katrina have settled in other cities, driving wages in the New Orleans area sharply higher for unskilled and low-skilled employees.

Now, that same employee can make as much as $8.50 an hour and work a full-time schedule with regular amounts of overtime hours each week. Retention and referral bonuses for bringing in new workers can raise the worker's yearly income above $20,000.

The higher wages should stick even after the initial post-storm hiring frenzy stabilizes, because the local labor pool will likely remain tight for years to come, said Z.R. Pasby, regional director of operations for Popeyes.

Helton agreed. "I think (wages) will level off, but it will never be a minimum-wage market again," he said.

But those wage gains could be eroded if rising pay rates and other factors create inflation in the region and lead to higher costs for food, housing, utilities and other necessities.

So far, Burger King and Popeyes stores have resisted passing on their higher labor costs to customers by raising prices.

"A Whopper cost $2.39 before the storm and $2.39 after the storm," Helton said.

But that could change down the road, especially if fuel prices continue to rise and if higher wages in the area put more disposable income in the pockets of customers, the fast-food managers said.

"Someone has to foot the bill," Pasby said.

Pace of mail service frustrates many

MAIL, from A-1

The Postal Service said its Uptown Station at 2000 Louisiana Ave. and Carrollton Station at 3400 S. Carrollton Ave. will be open weekdays and Saturdays from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Mail addressed to the 70115 ZIP code will be available at the Uptown Station, and mail addressed to the 70125 area will be at the Carrollton Station, only for pickup. Post office boxes at the stations also will start receiving mail.

Because so many New Orleans letter carriers were displaced by post-Katrina flooding, street delivery on the east bank is out of the question for now, said Anthony Ruda, the Postal Service's Louisiana district manager.

Mail destined for ZIP codes 70112 and 70113 will be distributed weekdays and Saturdays from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. at one of seven trailers set up in the parking lot between New Orleans Arena and the New Orleans Shopping Center parking garage on Girod Street, Cousin said.

By Tuesday, Cousin said, postal workers hope to make available mail at the same site for ZIP codes 70130, 70116 and 70119. All customers with post office boxes at the New Orleans main office, 701 Loyola Ave., may check mail Thursday at special boxes set up in the same trailers.

Mounds of mail

As more trailers are erected on the site, other New Orleans ZIP codes will be added, postal officials said. The staggered availability is designed to go along with Mayor Ray Nagin's re-entry plan for residents and business owners.

"We wanted to open up as the city opens up," said Cousins, who estimates that more than 6 1/2 million pieces of mail from the past month have been waiting to be delivered to the New Orleans area.

That's nowhere near the amount of mail normally processed in a five-week period by the main post office, which handled mail for Jefferson, Orleans, Plaquemines, St. Bernard, St. Charles and St. Tammany parishes, as well for parts of Mississippi, Alabama and Florida, Ruda said. The main office, which took on water in its basement, processed an average of six million to eight million letters per day.

Shortly after the storm, Ruda said, most business stopped sending bulk mail, the advertisements and credit card offers that made up almost 50 percent of the deliveries. Magazines and other periodicals have also been held. And many banks and billing institutions did not send out statements during September, he said.

For now, only first-class letters and packages will be delivered into the New Orleans region.

"A lot of people think there's got to be warehouses and warehouses of mail right now," Ruda said. "That's not the case. There's just not a lot of mail coming in."

On the way

A good bit of the mail that was waiting to be delivered in September is already arriving in mailboxes.

At least partial street delivery has been returned to Algiers and Jefferson Parish.

Residents of Plaquemines Parish can retrieve mail from a mobile post office at 9419 Louisiana 23 in Belle Chasse. St. Bernard mail is expected to be available at a similar mobile unit in Covington next week, Ruda said.

Though some residents have been happy to see letter carriers back on the streets, others have been grumbling about sluggish delivery and forwarded mail that has yet to arrive despite their completing change-of-address forms weeks ago.

Gail Lassere of Gretna had her mail forwarded to her sister's house in Conroe, Texas, when she and her husband hit the road to flee Katrina. But more than four weeks later, her sister hasn't received a single item for Lassere.

"I'm still looking for my mail," Lassere said while standing in line at the Gretna post office on Gretna Boulevard. "I don't know if I'll find some here or if it's just in Never Never Land."

Ruda said all change-of-address forms are being processed and that the mail has been forwarded. But postal officials said the storms and the unusually high demand for mail service have slowed delivery.

After Katrina, all New Orleans area mail was routed to Houston and Dallas, where it was processed and forwarding requests were handled, Ruda said. Though a change-of-address request usually takes seven to 10 days, the surge of requests after the storm pushed things back to about three weeks.

Then, Hurricane Rita forced the Postal Service to evacuate the stockpiled mail to Baton Rouge, where it sat until it was safe to be sent back to Houston.

Postal staff shortages all over mean fewer employees to sort mail and make deliveries, said Kim Handy, a letter carrier at the Gretna post office, where the staff was still short at least 20 people Monday. Thus, street delivery routes must be juggled, and residents may receive mail once every few days instead of six days per week.

But the mail is being delivered, Handy assured.

"The key," she said, "is to be patient."

Collective memories bond us together

ROSE, from A-1

that – I pulled off and went to the McDonald's there and got a Big Mac and a large coke to sustain me for the rest of the drive, my own personal take on "Supersize Me."

After a brief respite with my wife and kids in Maryland, I returned to the city for more.

The second time I left New Orleans, last week, Armstrong Airport was open and again my hands shook as I drove away from town, but when I settled into my airplane seat as we went aloft, my troubles, too, stayed behind on the ground.

I looked down over the region as we rose and – maybe you've seen pictures of this – the sea of blue color beneath me was nothing less than awe-inspiring.

At first I had this vision that I was flying over Beverly Hills until I realized all that blue beneath me was not swimming pools but roof tarps and coverings. It is the color that bonds us in these times, maybe even more than that weird purple hue that Rex, LSU and K&B made us love.

The Blue Roof Town. Man, there's a great country song in there somewhere.

There are a lot of heartache songs in this whole ordeal, no doubt assisted by the syncopative double-whammy of Rita/Katrina. Somewhere, right now, someone is writing a song that will make Tim McGraw a million dollars; I just hope that someone is from New Orleans.

On my most recent trip back to New Orleans, earlier this week, I was waiting for my connection in Memphis and listened while the gate agent called the names of standby travelers to come forward: "Passenger Cheramie. Passenger Bettincourt...."

The gate agent's Tennessee drawl mauled these names but it was a wondrous thing, to hear these beautiful French names being called and to know that our people were coming home.

Settling into their seats, almost everyone turned to the stranger next to them and asked: "Have you seen it yet?"

It. That is our home. That is our place.

Such a haunting quietude consumed the plane as we descended over Lake Pontchartrain. You could tell that most of the people on the plane were coming home for the first time, and instead of the usual world-weary travelers burying their noses in paperbacks or trying to catch a last wink of sleep, everyone craned for looks out the windows to see what "it" looks like now.

It felt like a plane full of kids on their first flights, like they had never seen such a vista from the air before. And, of course, they hadn't.

I wanted to pipe up: Man, you should have seen it a month ago; it was so much worse. Or maybe tell them all: It's not as bad as you think it's going to be.

Or I thought I could harness more practical advice from recent experience and tell them: Whatever you do, DO NOT open your refrigerator. Ever. Again.

But, even though I have one of those profoundly annoying personal compulsions of talking to (at?) strangers all the time – particularly at inappropriate moments – I found myself lingering on some advice whose providence I have long forgotten (and seldom followed), but which seemed so apt for this anguished moment: "If you cannot improve upon the silence, do not speak."

Words of wisdom, to be sure. At a time like this, a flow of platitudes from a self-absorbed dilettante veteran of the War of 2005 – a dilettante with shaky hands, no less – is not what anybody needs to hear.

So I kept my mouth shut and let the passengers' heads wrap around what was about to happen to them when they got out of the plane and drove to their homes for the first time.

For some, it will be a foul-smelling but mildly comic discovery that they forgot to empty their Diaper Genie before they left. For a friend of mine who accompanied his mother to their home off Paris Road in St. Bernard Parish over the weekend, it was the discovery of two tenants in the rental side of her shotgun double – two tenants who had been dead for 33 days.

Wrap your head around that.

For those who return to the area and those who do not and those who never left, these are our collective memories now, our marks of distinction and suffering, small stuff like Aunt Ida's meatloaf sitting in your fridge for five weeks or big stuff like dead people on the other side of your living room wall.

Like our blue tarp rooftops, these are the bonds that we share forever. They are the bonds that will hold us together.

State investigates water sent into N.O.

It could be tainted by oil-field tankers

By James Varney
Staff writer

Louisiana officials are investigating the possibility that contractors are peddling undrinkable water to people in New Orleans, but it remains unclear whether consumers are being duped.

The Department of Health and Hospitals said Tuesday that water is being moved in unclean trucks and is investigating the possibility that some people are forging federal and state paperwork certifying the water as potable, agency spokesman Bob Johannessen said.

Officials are concerned that the water, in most cases certified potable at the source in East Jefferson, West Jefferson, Algiers or Baton Rouge, is being carried to New Orleans not in food-grade stainless steel tankers, but in tankers that normally transport oil field waste chemicals. The compounds are known as "VOCs," or volatile organic chemicals.

No one disputes that the tankers are not designed to carry drinkable water, or that the water is not drinkable upon delivery in New Orleans. The question, then, is whether the water is billed as potable by the either carrier or the buyer.

The main purchasers of the bad water are hotels in the Central Business District, Johannessen said.

"They're coming from really icky trucks," said Karen Irion, Louisiana's drinking water administrator. "Why would the hotels be bothering to take that when they can already get non-potable water from the city?"

Louisiana officials are concerned that some water sent to New Orleans is being trucked in tankers that normally carry oil-field waste.

At the Sheraton Hotel on Canal Street, signs were posted at the reception area and in the elevators saying that the water is not fit to drink. At the nearby J.W. Marriott Hotel, receptionists declined to comment about how they are handling the water situation, although some guests said they got a flier at check-in informing them the water was not drinkable.

Marriott officials could not be reached for comment.

"I personally don't see where we're doing anything to jeopardize people's health," said Dan King, the Sheraton's manager.

"For some reason they think we are selling it as potable," King said. "But we're not. No one here has billed it that way."

King, several Marriott representatives and a handful of contractors attended a Department of Health and Hospitals meeting Tuesday.

"They kept saying the water doesn't meet the codes, and I said, 'I know it doesn't,' " King said. "It's kind of an emergency situation, and we're just using it to flush the toilets and just to take care of the aid workers who are staying here. I live here, too."

King said the issue could be resolved this weekend when the Sheraton, which is not connected to the New Orleans Sewerage & Water Board, reconnects with the city's system when it is declared safe.

The company crating the water to New Orleans was identified by the state as Eagle Construction and Environmental Services, a subcontractor operating out of Gonzales. An Eagle representative could not be reached for comment late Tuesday afternoon.

Many evacuated students in schools out of town

services have already been restored, anticipated delays in returning those services to the east bank could delay reopenings of undamaged schools there until January, officials said.

Fearing that students who start school in January might not receive enough instructional time, board President Torin Sanders reiterated Tuesday that it is unlikely any east bank public schools will reopen this school year.

According to a plan from interim Superintendent Ora Watson, Sanders said, only New Orleans public schools on the West Bank will operate during the 2005-06 school year, which would end in June rather than May.

Meg Casper, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Education, noted that many evacuated students have enrolled in other districts, where they will receive first-semester instruction, preparing them for a second semester in Orleans Parish Public Schools.

Picard said Tuesday he is open to the prospect of opening some east bank schools in January, or whenever officials determine the city is safe for children and it's possible to open schools.

Nagin agreed. "I want to get the water certified (by health officials), which will hopefully be this weekend, then I will be much more comfortable bringing back children," he said at a news conference Tuesday.

Watson, however, said Nagin recently told her "he would not be comfortable with our opening schools outside of the West Bank until he was assured that the waste management controls in place were sufficient," adding that water treatment facilities were still in need of much work.

Casper said she expects the issue to come up at Friday's School Board meeting.

Bill Roberti, the district's chief restructuring officer and an employee of Alvarez & Marsal, the turnaround firm charged with righting the district's finances, said the company was also exploring opening east bank schools shortly after the December holidays.

"We will continue to work with the mayor and the School Board moving forward to determine which schools will open," he said. "Right now, it is still possible that some Uptown schools could open in January, and the mayor indicated that he is completely open to that."

School Board Vice President Lourdes Moran said she also supports reopening east bank schools this academic year.

"It's the administration job to have a plan of action for November and January," she said. "If New Orleans Public Schools are to be successful, we must stop being shortsighted."

Nagin also said he doesn't want students to return to the "deplorable conditions" that existed in some schools before the storm and encouraged district officials and the board to take advantage of this opportunity to improve the system.

"My only push back to the School Board would be, 'Take this opportunity to fix yourself,' " he said.

School system employees and parents of students are asked to call (877)771-5800 if they are planning to return to New Orleans. The number of West Bank schools that open in November will be determined by the level of interest. Enrollment has yet to begin and will be open to children throughout the city.

$34.4 billion in property claims expected in Katrina

By Eileen Alt Powell
AP business writer

NEW YORK - Hurricane Katrina is likely to result in at least $34.4 billion in personal and commercial property loss claims, according to the first publicly released survey of the nation's insurers.

ISO's Property Claim Services Unit said Tuesday that the preliminary estimate of damages to homes and businesses in six states would make Katrina the most costly U.S. natural disaster ever, surpassing the inflation-adjusted $20.8 billion in losses from Hurricane Andrew in 1992.

Several risk assessment companies earlier released projections of insured losses from Katrina, with totals ranging from $14 billion to $60 billion.

The ISO's tally includes anticipated insurance industry losses for personal and commercial property, including boats and vehicles, business interruption coverage and additional living expenses. Reported damaged to insured onshore oil facilities are included, ISO officials said.

The estimates exclude losses to utilities, agriculture, aircraft, offshore drilling platforms and property insured under the federal flood insurance program.

Also Tuesday, the Securities and Exchange Commission said it was easing rules for insurance companies to raise capital, responding to concern that the billions of dollars of losses from Katrina and Hurricane Rita could make it harder for the insurers to pay victims' claims.

The losses could drain capital and cash from the companies. In relaxing the rules for them to tap into the capital markets, the SEC "recognized that the risk is out there for the industry," said Keith Buckley, a group managing director at Wall Street credit agency Fitch Ratings.

ISO, an insurance risk and data firm based in Jersey City, N.J., said that policyholders in the six affected states _ Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Tennessee and Georgia _ were expected to file more than 1.6 million claims for damage to personal and commercial property, automobiles, boats and yachts.

"The personal property loss claims include nearly 75,000 boats and yachts in the affected states, with an estimated insured value of slightly under $2 billion," the ISO report said.

The report said that Louisiana, the state hardest hit when Katrina made landfall on Aug. 29, was expected to produce 900,000 claims for some $22.6 billion in losses.

It gave these estimates for the neighboring states: Mississippi, 490,000 claims for $9.8 billion; Alabama, 123,000 claims for $1.3 billion; Florida, 110,000 claims for $468 million; Tennessee, 8,400 claims for $46.1 million; and Georgia, 3,300 claims for $22.2 million.

The report said that insurers were still assessing losses, noting that access to some badly damaged areas in Louisiana was complicated by flooding.

From staff reports

Pasado's Safe Haven, a Washington state humane organization, is offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the person who shot and killed 14 dogs in St. Bernard Parish.

Mark Steinway, a humane investigator and co-founder of the group, said the dogs were found at a school and a former school building in the parish.

Officials with the state Department of Wildlife and Fisheries and the St. Bernard Sheriff's Office are investigating the incident.

Blessed - "ADJECTIVE: highly favored or fortunate; characterized by happiness and good fortune."

Prior to Hurricane Katrina, "blessed" was an often used word. Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.

Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. This is a very limited opportunity, and availability is restricted.

We have employment opportunities available in the Sales Department, including management availabilities.

NASA official says workers may have damaged foam

Insulation problem grounds fleet

By Marcia Dunn
AP aerospace writer

CAPE CANAVERAL, FLA. — Workers may have accidentally cut or crushed the section of foam that broke off Discovery's fuel tank during its launch two months ago — a mishap that threatened the safety of the astronauts and grounded the shuttle fleet.

That is the leading theory for the cause behind the loss of foam insulation that cast a cloud over NASA's return to space, said Wayne Hale, the newly appointed manager of the space shuttle program.

In a wide-ranging interview with The Associated Press on Tuesday, Hale said the shuttle will not fly again until the foam insulation problem is resolved — no sooner than spring.

He also said repair work has been set back because of Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita. The storms dealt "a severe blow" to resuming shuttle flights and caused NASA to lose three months of work, he said.

In a memo written soon after Katrina slammed two shuttle facilities on the Gulf Coast, Hale speculated that the space shuttles might be grounded until next fall. He has since backed off that view and noted that progress has been made in understanding the foam problem and getting the Michoud Assembly Facility in New Orleans, which manufactures the tanks, back into limited operation.

"We're working a spring kind of launch date, but we haven't established one," he said. May is the most likely target.

To NASA's horror, a 1-pound, 3-foot chunk of insulating foam peeled away from Discovery's external fuel tank during liftoff in late July. It was the same kind of problem that doomed Columbia in 2003, and it occurred despite 2½ years of improvements and assurances that this was the safest tank ever built.

What probably happened is that during modifications to the tank at Michoud, technicians inadvertently damaged the section that ended up coming off, while working on nearby areas, Hale said. "This foam, which normally is not touched after it's applied, clearly was touched," he said.

Workers using plastic knives to remove nearby foam may have made small cuts in the section that tore away, allowing air to condense in the crevices against the tank, full of supercold fuel, Hale said. Another possibility, he said, is that workers leaned against the piece of foam that broke off, fracturing it. Yet another theory is that the foam cracked because of normal thermal stresses.

A spokesman for Lockheed Martin Corp., which builds the tanks at Michoud, said inadvertent worker damage is one of the potential causes being investigated. "We're committed to supporting NASA and the space shuttle program," spokesman Harry Wadsworth said.

DeLay conspiracy charge relies on little-used law

No such cases in 20 years, lawyer says

By Kelley Shannon
Associated Press writer

AUSTIN, TEXAS — A little-used Texas law could decide the future of Rep. Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader who is charged with conspiracy and money laundering in an alleged campaign-finance scheme.

Grand jurors looking into 2002 campaign contributions indicted DeLay on Monday for the second time in less than a week. House rules required him to step down from his leadership post pending the outcome of the case.

"I have not seen a criminal conspiracy case in Texas for a long, long time," said Austin-based defense attorney Ray Bass, who is not involved in the DeLay case. "In the last 20 years, I can't even think of one."

Rather than relying on conspiracy charges, Texas prosecutors often use an alternative law known as the state's "parties statute," which allows them to accuse or implicate groups of people who allegedly participated in a crime together, Bass said.

The use of the rarely invoked conspiracy law suggests that prosecutors are getting "very inventive" in their case against DeLay, Bass said.

DeLay was first charged with conspiracy to violate the state election code, which bans the direct use of corporate money for political campaigns.

His lawyers filed court papers Monday attacking that charge on technical grounds. Hours later, a new grand jury brought an indictment against DeLay that included one count of conspiracy to launder money and one count of money laundering.

Under Texas law, a conspiracy occurs if someone agrees with one or more other people to commit a felony, and if someone in the group performs an overt act to carry out that plan. The agreement can be inferred, Bass said.

State prosecutions rarely rely on conspiracy, said George Dix, a law professor at the University of Texas. The indictment claims DeLay's political committee, Texans for a Republican Majority, accepted corporate contributions and then sent $190,000 to the Republican National Committee with a list of seven Texas state House candidates that should receive contributions. The committee then allegedly issued checks to the candidates for a total of $190,000.

Prosecutors have argued that was a violation of the state's ban on the use of corporate money in local election campaigns.

DeLay defense attorney Dick DeGuerin believes the new indictment replaces the first. But District Attorney Ronnie Earle, in a statement released Tuesday, said prosecutors would press ahead with all three charges, and the final decision would be resolved by a judge.

DeLay is scheduled to appear in court Oct. 21.

Energy consumers are in for shock

Gas, electric bills to climb high, fast

By Mary Judice
Business writer

Residents soon will receive gas and electric bills that are near-record highs because of the spiking price of natural gas.

Natural gas prices already were high after a cold winter and hot summer, but prices took off in the past month after wells, pipelines and other infrastructure went down across the Gulf of Mexico after hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Natural gas prices had risen 33 percent since May, to $9.79 per thousand cubic feet before the storms hit in August and September and have hit record highs of $14.80 in the past week.

Energy traders predicted home heating bills this winter could be at least 50 percent higher than last year. Customers will see these increases as early as this month.

An Entergy New Orleans customer who uses a modest 2,000 cubic feet of gas this month, or 20 ccf as it appears on the bill, will pay a record $45.66, excluding taxes. An electric customer in New Orleans who uses 1,000 kilowatt hours will pay $122.57 for October, which is the highest bill in two years.

Entergy customers in Algiers and elsewhere in southeast Louisiana will pay $101 for 1,000 kilowatt hours for October.

Entergy New Orleans residential customers this month will pay a record $16.68 per thousand cubic feet for gas that shows up as a "fuel adjustment charge," up from $7.81 last October. The customer's cost is higher than the commodity cost because it includes the cost of transportation.

A utility bill consists of a customer charge, which is set by regulators and includes a profit for the utility company, and the fuel adjustment charge, which fluctuates with fuel costs and does not include a profit for the utility.

Other local utilities were unable to provide figures. However, escalating gas prices are expected to increase utility bills everywhere.

Many Entergy New Orleans customers are receiving bills for electricity and gas used before Hurricane Katrina, which hit Aug. 29. Many Entergy customers in New Orleans will not be billed for service in September when the city was under a mandatory evacuation order. However, the October bills, not yet out, will include the higher prices.

The Energy Information Administration expects residential customers to pay an average of $16.08 per thousand cubic feet of gas for fuel adjustments during the last three months of the year, which is 42 percent higher than the average $11.30 paid during the final quarter of 2004.

"We are looking at prices dramatically higher than a year ago in some cases," said Peter Beutel, president of Cameron Hanover, an energy risk management firm in New Canaan, Conn. He said wholesale prices are significantly higher than the 50 percent to 100 percent price increases being discussed for residential customers.

Entergy usually prepares a price forecast for residential customers but has not done so this year. Given the uncertainty of its customer base in New Orleans and low energy use in September, the utility has actually sold 50 percent of its natural gas hedge contracts and has sold a portion of its purchased power agreements, which would have provided cheaper coal and nuclear power, said Amy Stallings, spokeswoman for Entergy New Orleans.

Gas prices have risen dramatically during the summer, said Phil Flynn, vice president and senior market analyst at Alaron Trading in Chicago, reaching a high of almost $15 in late September. In May prices were as low as $6.03 per thousand cubic feet.

He said the market gets squeezed each year as use increases but offshore drilling is restricted.

As of Monday, 75 percent of the gas normally produced by wells in the Gulf was still shut down, or about 10 billion cubic feet of gas. The federal waters of the Gulf produce 21 percent of the nation's natural gas.

City must refocus its energy

Many of my friends are walking around angry that the Federal Emergency Management Agency is no longer distributing the $2,000 in emergency funds that was promised to Hurricane Katrina victims after the storm.

Other friends are struggling to come to grips emotionally with the difficulty of rebuilding homes and lives.

Others, who lived in the areas that were hardest hit, are wondering whether they will be allowed to repair or rebuild in their old neighborhoods.

The concerns loom so large that you can hardly blame folks for focusing on their individual problems rather than concentrating on the larger issues that will affect the rebuilding of our city.

But we need to keep the big picture in mind.

Making it affordable

The Alliance for Affordable Energy has always been a big-picture organization and, true to form, it has compiled a list of principles that should guide our steps forward.

Its most practical ideas relate to building energy-efficient homes, smart planning and the use of alternative energy sources.

"We have a very poor community," said Linda Stone, the organization's executive director. "Everyone needs to have an energy-efficient home so we can reduce the demands on energy and be more affordable."

In recent decades, developers across the country have created communities in which residential and commercial areas are so segregated that you need a car to go almost anywhere. Various issues, including the skyrocketing price of gas, make such an approach unwise.

If acres and acres of New Orleans are to be rebuilt, as Mayor Ray Nagin and others have suggested, we should create neighborhoods in which businesses are in close proximity to the residents they will serve.

A city in danger

As difficult as it will be to incorporate those concerns into our rebuilding efforts, the Alliance makes some other suggestions that are far broader in implication and far more difficult to implement.

"Long before Katrina, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change identified New Orleans as the North American city most endangered by global warming," the organization says in a recent news release. "Both sea level rise and higher ocean temperatures are caused by the warming of our atmosphere."

These conditions contribute to the intensity of hurricanes. For that reason, our state needs to be a leader in combating climate change.

Because the barrier islands in the Gulf of Mexico play a crucial role in minimizing the impact of hurricanes, rebuilding our coast is crucial to our future security.

The Alliance for Affordable Energy plans to hold a series of community workshops to discuss these issues. The first is planned for Oct. 8th in Baton Rouge at the Parish Hall of First United Methodist Church at 930 North Blvd. from 9 a.m. to noon. For information, go to www.all4energy.org or call (210) 885-6879.

Clinton finds 9th Ward sobering

Crowd's input on spending sought

By Bruce Hamilton
Staff writer

About 48 evacuees warmly cheered former President Bill Clinton on Tuesday at L.B. Landry High School in Algiers, where he told the invited crowd, "My heart goes out to you."

Clinton visited the magnet school turned FEMA Disaster Recovery Center to discuss how to spend an estimated $100 million collected through the Bush Clinton Katrina Fund. He called that amount "peanuts" in comparison to federally appropriated relief.

Clinton was accompanied to the school cafeteria by Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, where he briefly met other state and local officials such as New Orleans Councilwoman Jacquelyn Brechtel Clarkson and Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, who introduced him to the crowd.

Wearing blue jeans and a golf shirt, Clinton asked the evacuees to discuss how to allocate the fund's donations, which he said are aimed at needs not covered by federal money.

"We want to get it to people directly who need it as quickly as we can," he said, adding that his visit was in part a fact-finding mission, "to find out how folks are doing after Katrina."

He had toured the 9th Ward, where "we saw things I never thought I'd see," Clinton said. He was amazed, he said, to see Fats Domino's name still on his house. "That was about the only thing I saw that was untouched."

A woman wearing a "Burn K-Doe Burn" T-shirt addressed Clinton first, telling him she wanted to welcome him to New Orleans. She then put strands of beads around his neck.

Another man asked how local residents can participate in a rebuilding effort that seems domi-

The old Ursuline Convent, a French Quarter landmark, may have taken a hit, but it still stands

STAFF PHOTOS BY ELLIS LUCIA

Monsignor Crosby Kern checks the condition Tuesday of rare poetry and photos in an archive room at the old Ursuline Convent in the French Quarter. He said many documents were taken to Baton Rouge before the storm.

In the attic of the old Ursuline Convent, blue light shines through a tarp onto some of the oldest cypress beams in the Mississippi River Valley, and bricks lie shattered on the floor near a broken water main. Two stories below, spots of mold stain a wall.

Despite the damage by Hurricane Katrina to the French Quarter landmark, generally thought to be the oldest building in the Mississippi Valley, Monsignor Crosby Kern smiled as he showed off the 253-year-old structure and boasted that it survived yet another New Orleans disaster.

The convent at Chartres Street and Ursulines Aveune – the second structure built at the site, three decades after French nuns started a school there – carries a long history of its former occupants praying to Our Lady of Prompt Succor to spare it and the city from destruction.

The list of impending calamities includes the night of Jan. 7, 1815, when nuns prayed on the eve of the Battle of New Orleans, and the night in 1788 when a fire ravaged the city and destroyed the Church of St. Louis, one of the nearby cathedral's many predecessors.

St. Bernard schools down, not out

Superintendent vows to rebuild system

By Sandra Barbier
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

Each of its schools is severely damaged, the district is running out of money, and its employees and students are scattered across Louisiana and the nation, but the head of St. Bernard Parish public schools vows the system will be rebuilt.

St. Bernard school Superintendent Doris Voitier said the district plans to provide educational services to students in a temporary location as soon as families begin moving back to the devastated parish. Voitier said much of the plan depends on how fast electric, water and sewer services can be restored.

"We will be looking for trailers for temporary housing and for school facilities," Voitier

Unauthorized razing of battered structure chills preservationists

By Gordon Russell

Given the vast wreckage wrought by Hurricane Katrina, knocking down one damaged building might seem like pretty small potatoes.

But recent demolition of the former Naval Brigade Hall, at 823 Camp St. in the Warehouse District, has preservationists alarmed. The building, which dates to 1903 and for a time housed the Grunewald Music School, was one of the city's more significant jazz landmarks, and preservationists fear that the manner in which it was torn down – without any review

Franklin wants to be charter school

Officials hoping to reopen in January

From staff reports

In a push to reopen the school in January, the board of directors of the Benjamin Franklin High School Association voted unanimously Tuesday to apply to the Orleans Parish School Board to become a charter school.

Franklin, the college preparatory public school located on the lakefront campus of the University of New Orleans, is the second high-performing New Orleans public school to seek charter status, which would put it outside of the control of the parish school system.

Lusher School already has won approval of its charter from said. She said the first site might be a school with grades kindergarten through 12.

School district finance manager David Fernandez said officials hope money to operate the school will be provided under the state's education financing program, the Minimum Foundation Program.

The district's 15 schools were swamped after Hurricane Katrina sent floodwaters over local levees Aug. 29. Parts of the parish were swamped a second time weeks later when Hurricane Rita, which came ashore in southwestern Louisiana, delivered a glancing blow to the area and pushed a storm surge through a breached levee.

St. Bernard was the only parish to lose the use of all its school buildings. Officials are still assessing the damages, Fernandez said.

Schools "are in pretty bad shape," Voitier said.

At Arabi Elementary, one of the schools closest to a levee failure that caused massive flooding, a brick and steel gymnasium was obliterated except for the four corners of the building.

"It looks like an open pavilion," Voitier said. The foundation of Chalmette Middle School was badly damaged, and a tornado apparently struck Joe Davies Elementary School in Meraux, she said.

"We are the only school system and parish with 100 percent devastation," Voitier said.

Voitier and several members of her staff have been working out of offices at the state Department of Education in Baton Rouge, where they've been helping students make transitions to other schools and to employees and retired workers hold on to their health insurance benefits.

"We have major funding problems," including no local tax revenue, Voitier said Friday.

School officials, meanwhile, have been mailing records to schools across the country for students who moved to other states. Officials saved St. Bernard Parish school records by duplicating data two days before the storm hit and safeguarding it in St. John the Baptist Parish, Voitier said.

Another priority is maintaining health insurance for school system employees and retired employees, she said. The school district pays $1 million in insurance premiums monthly. Benefits are covered until the end of October, but "we are looking to the state for help after that," Voitier said.

School system employees have been encouraged to take jobs elsewhere. "We have told our employees to take care of their families," Voitier said.

Nevertheless, she said, "I see us coming back," although it may not as large a system as it was before Hurricane Katrina.

On a brighter note, the parish's public schools have graduated seven high school seniors since Katrina swamped the parish.

Those were students who already had enough course credits to meet state graduation requirements, Voitier said.

St. Bernard's mail bound for Covington

By Richard Boyd
St. Tammany bureau

Jeanine Pellegrini, exiled to Mandeville after her Chalmette home was swept away by Hurricane Katrina, came to the Covington Post Office Tuesday expecting to retrieve a bushel basket full of mail.

She walked away empty-handed but was surprisingly upbeat. "At least I got some accurate information," she said.

She was told that regular and delayed residential and business mail for St. Bernard Parish residents will be available for pickup at the Covington Post Office in about 10 days. It will be dispersed from trailers being set up behind the post office on North Columbia Street just off U.S. 190.

Pellegrini was among a long line of displaced St. Bernard residents who came from all over expecting to pick up mail stacking up since the hurricane devastated their parish.

But all that has been available since Friday are monthly Social Security and SSI checks and some checks from the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"There was some confusion; some misinformation and a lot of disappointed people. But they were cordial and nice even if they were frustrated,'' said Wendy Frederick, a displaced letter carrier from the St. Bernard community post office now living in Baton Rouge and commuting since Monday to the Covington Post Office.

Several St. Bernard postal employees have taken over a corner of the lobby of the Covington post office. Dangling from the top of a service counter are hand-lettered signs for the post office locations formerly operating in St. Bernard. Behind those names, in boxes, there are scores of checks ready for pickup — but no regular mail yet.

The checks are being disbursed on weekdays from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. The same hours will apply when the St. Bernard mail operation begins from the trailers.

Dance hall, jazz school were once housed at site

process – could be a sign of growing peril to New Orleans' architectural heritage as the city rebuilds.

City officials say it was a mistake that won't happen again.

Jazz historian Jack Stewart called the hall "a double-dip" jazz landmark. At the turn of the century, it was an incubator of early ragtime music. In its later incarnation as a school, it was a place of learning and teaching for several well-known jazz musicians.

Demolition of the hall occurred Monday, a few hours after city inspectors placed a sign on the building declaring it unsafe for habitation. The work was done by a group of out-of-town firefighters – led, witnesses say, by a contingent from Chicago – who used a device known as "the strong arm" that is capable of spraying water and knocking over walls simultaneously.

Though the hall was not on fire, "they began to spray water on the building, and then after a while they began to bang on the roof, pushing through the roof from the top," said neighbor Lee Madere, who watched and protested as the building went down. "They were showing how it could break through roofs.

"My wife said, 'Look, we save historic structures here, we don't destroy them for demonstration purposes. After a while they began to knock the brick walls down and pull the façade off and demolish the structure. At that time, I said, 'Guys, that's a historic structure, you can't do this.' They said, 'We have to do it for safety.'"

City officials said they did not authorize the action.

"It has come to our attention that some of our mutual aid firefighters, in their enthusiasm to assist the New Orleans Fire Department, used a piece of equipment called the strong arm to demolish a storm-damaged building," Mayor Ray Nagin's press office said in a statement. "They were unaware of the proper procedures and the 'chain of command' necessary to accomplish this task. Steps have been taken by the New Orleans Fire Department to ensure that this will not happen again."

Training exercise

Neighbors who witnessed the demolition, as well as the building's owner, Roland von Kurnatowski, acknowledged the building had suffered significant damage from Katrina's winds; the third floor had collapsed, spilling bricks onto Camp Street. But the first floor was basically intact, they said, and its unusually thick walls were still plumb.

Larry Freeman of Ferrara Fire Apparatus Inc., which provided the equipment, described the "controlled demolition" as a training exercise for the Chicago Fire Department, which had sent a contingent of firefighters to New Orleans to help with fire protection.

Freeman claimed he received permission from city officials to tear the building down, though he did not say specifically who authorized it.

"The structure was condemned by the city of New Orleans," Freeman said. "There was no way to rebuild that structure."

In fact, city officials say they only marked the building as uninhabitable. The notice posted last week, similar to those on hundreds of thousands of other buildings damaged by the storm, reads: "This structure is unsafe and its use or occupancy has been prohibited by the building official."

Mike Centineo, the city's director of safety and permits, said the stickers do not call for automatic demolition. "We are simply trying to protect people alerting them to the fact that the building is unsafe in its present state. Demolition will be determined on a case-by-case basis."

Now a pile of bricks and timbers stands where a part of New Orleans' jazz legacy was forged.

Rich with history

That's too bad, said Stewart, because the naval hall had architectural as well as cultural importance. It was designed and built by Julius Koch, whose son, Richard, went on to co-found Koch & Wilson, a major architectural and restoration firm, Stewart said.

Stewart described its style as "Edwardian, quasi-military," with crenellation on the top and hooded decorative elements over the windows.

And it was full of stories.

"It was a very active hall; they had dances and music there," Stewart said, noting that William Braun, a ragtime composer and violinist, was the director of the hall's band.

An its later incarnation, the school served as a training ground for a number of prominent jazz musicians. The school was also notable for its tendency to ignore Jim Crow, then the law of the land.

"On the second floor were the white students, and the third floor was for black students," Stewart said. "But it was a limited budget operation so they didn't have enough teachers to teach every kind of instrument to both groups. So if the black teachers had a question for one kind of instrument, the white teacher went upstairs, and vice versa.

Von Kurnatowski bought the property in January and was in the process of converting it and four adjacent structures into condos, some of which had been presold.

'A bit arbitrary'

Von Kurnatowski said the building was "compromised" by the storm, but he added: "To find out they went ahead and did it seems a bit arbitrary to me. We figured we would figure out what to do when things got more sane. Next thing I know, they tore it down."

Some preservationists were less forgiving.

"You don't have the right to do a demonstration on a property that is not on fire," said Meg Lousteau of the Louisiana Landmarks Society.

"I'm very saddened that we've lost such an important piece of jazz history, seemingly without a permit or the owner's approval," Lousteau added. "Just because we're in the midst of a disaster, I don't think people should be taking it upon themselves to decide which buildings need to be destroyed."

Papers moved ahead of storm

in the window, and it faced the fire, and it stopped," Kern said of a small statue of the nuns' patron saint.

During Katrina, a chimney toppled onto the convent's roof and shattered a water main. Water poured down through the building for eight hours, soaking a few walls and many of the ancient cypress beams.

Speaking from the largest room on the convent's first floor – the nuns' original classroom and once home to the state legislature in the 1830s – Kern pointed to the moldy black and brown spots on one wall that will have to be cut out.

"All of this, it came from the attic all the way down," said Kern, who is in charge of the building as part of his duties as rector of nearby St. Louis Cathedral. "It's sad."

But an inlaid table used to support the bodies of New Orleans bishops before burial remained unharmed under a glass enclosure.

A spiral staircase from the original convent – one of the building's jewels – suffered no damage. Its cypress steps are still uneven underfoot, and its French colonial iron railing still curves delicately to the second floor.

Kern said that none of the historic items in the convent's archives on the second floor were damaged.

He said many documents were taken to Baton Rouge before the storm.

Others that stayed in sealed vaults were untouched by the water break but were in danger of mildewing if power wasn't restored to the climate controls, a fate they escaped.

Lusher charter moves forward

CHARTER, from B-1

the School Board, though the charter application must still be ratified by state education officials. Lusher School officials also hope to reopen in January.

In a news release announcing the charter application, Duris Holmes, president of the Franklin parents association, said school officials and its support organizations are "committed to assisting with the rebuilding of the city of New Orleans by reopening its doors as soon as possible so that students and their families will be encouraged to return to the city and resume their productive roles in our society."

The announcement came a day after School Board President Torin Sanders said no public schools on the east bank of the city would reopen during the 2005-06 school year. He said beginning the school year in January would not provide enough instructional time for students.

Other school officials Tuesday disagreed with Sanders, saying that some schools on the city's east bank could open by January if they could be made safe and secure for students by that time.

Under the charter application, Franklin would partner with UNO to continue to offer a college preparatory education to students who meet admission requirements, according to the press release.

"Because of the impact that Katrina had within Orleans Parish on the homes and residences of Franklin students, it is anticipated that students registered as of Aug. 29, 2005, will be permitted to enroll in January 2006 and remain enrolled through their graduation regardless of their parish of residence. Any student who was accepted for enrollment in Franklin for the 2005-2006 school year but chose to attend another high school and is unable to continue his/her education at that school due to the effects of Katrina may also enroll at Franklin in January 2006," according to the release.

Tammany cheers FEMA house trailers

By Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

A rare and hearty round of applause greeted the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Tuesday as house trailers began rolling from a staging area south of Slidell to hurricane-flooded and battered houses in eastern St. Tammany Parish.

"We're back in business," Parish President Kevin Davis told the daily gathering of municipal, parish, state, federal and other officials coordinating the massive post-Katrina restoration effort.

Early Tuesday, FEMA representative Scott Nelson said, 22 of the 300 trailers that arrived Sunday were being moved "as we speak" to the undisclosed locations for those who had qualified for the agency's temporary housing program.

The houses must have available water, sewerage and electrical hookups for the trailers. If they go on land the applicant doesn't own, he or she must obtain permission from the owner.

Nelson and FEMA official Roger Ingram urged those who haven't already registered either for the rental assistance or temporary housing program to do so by calling (800) 621-3362 or by going to www.fema.com on the Internet.

Evacuees or others displaced by the Aug. 29 hurricane that devastated the New Orleans area also may go to one of two FEMA Disaster Recovery Centers in Slidell or Covington.

"That (registration) is going to be crucial to the process," Nelson said. He warned, however, that people can qualify only for rental aid or trailers, not both.

By late afternoon, FEMA information officers were unable to say whether any additional trailers had been relocated from the Lakeshore Estates site south of Slidell during the day or how many were expected to be moved today.

Meanwhile, another 125 mobile homes are waiting to be hooked up at a trailer park owned by Slidell area businessman Chris Jean off Interstate 59 near Pearl River. Those trailers aren't expected to be moved.

It was unclear Tuesday to whom they would be assigned.

Davis has asked FEMA to provide at least 20,000 trailers and other types of mobile housing for the hurricane homeless during the recovery and rebuilding process.

Fund addresses gaps in federal relief

CLINTON, from B-1

nated by "folks that's not from New Orleans."

"I think more of it should be done locally," Clinton responded, but he added that federal funding would be directed according to state plans. He said there would be a better opportunity to "give people a fair shake over the long term."

Reporters were ushered from the room shortly after the question-and-answer session began. Mayor Ray Nagin was then escorted into the cafeteria.

Earlier Tuesday, Clinton met with scores of evacuees at River Center in Baton Rouge and took a tour of the convention center-turned-shelter. "I got a lot of really good ideas" from the evacuees at the capital, he said.

Clinton planned to spend the night in downtown New Orleans. He is scheduled to meet with relief workers at Picadilly Cafeteria in Metairie this morning before heading to Gulfport, Miss., and Bayou La Batre, Ala.

Created by former Presidents Bush and Clinton, the Bush Clinton Katrina Fund is a nonpartisan fund established to assist victims of Hurricane Katrina by addressing unmet needs and gaps in current funding. Clinton said the online application is simple and should be completed by one person, or advocate, per family.

East Jefferson looking to fix pumping plan

Evacuated workers were not at posts

By Sheila Grissett
East Jefferson bureau

Saying he thinks some flooding in East Jefferson after Hurricane Katrina was due to pump stations that were not running, East Jefferson Levee District President Pat Bossetta said Tuesday that he's ready to explore the feasibility of assuming operation of parish drainage pumps.

Jefferson Parish, which is responsible for operating the pump stations, enacted its "doomsday" plan shortly before Katrina made landfall Aug. 29. Under that two-year-old plan, designed to protect the lives of parish employees when a major hurricane is forecast to make a direct hit on the New Orleans region, Parish President Aaron Broussard's administration evacuated pump operators and other essential personnel to shelters north of Lake Pontchartrain.

Bossetta is among a growing number of officials who think dozens of neighborhoods and commercial districts north of Interstate 10, from the St. Charles Parish line in Kenner to about Bonnabel Boulevard in Metairie, flooded only because no one was operating the pumps designed to reduce or eliminate flooding.

"Maybe the pumping stations need to come under our jurisdiction," Bossetta said Tuesday during his agency's first post-Katrina board meeting. "Maybe our guys need to be trained to turn them on. The water in East Jefferson didn't come over the levee. The problem with water in East Jefferson came through the pumping stations and into the canals," he said.

The Broussard administration declined additional comment Tuesday, but officials previously have said the evacuations were necessary to save lives. Parish spokeswoman Jacquie Bauer said parish emergency services director Walter Maestri is expected to make Katrina-related remarks to the Jefferson Parish Council, which has scheduled a special meeting today to process emergency contracts related to the storms.

As essential personnel, Bossetta said, pump station operators should be required to stay at their posts during emergencies or, at the very least, be housed somewhere within the parish so that they can quickly return to the pump stations once a hurricane passes.

In Kenner, city officials Thursday are expected to pass a resolution asking their parish counterparts to cross-train essential Kenner employees to operate the pumps, "so we will never again be 100 percent dependent on the parish staff to turn on the pumps," Kenner chief of staff Phil Ramon said.

Katrina-related destruction on the north shore reportedly kept some evacuated pump station operators from getting back to their stations until 24 hours after the storm passed.

Much of Old Metairie, Airline Highway and the neighborhoods in between flooded after a breach on the Orleans Parish side of the 17th Street Canal inundated the city, then flowed north and west into the easternmost sections of Jefferson Parish.

But engineers agree it wasn't the 17th Street Canal that flooded Kenner and the rest of Metairie. State Department of Transportation and Development engineer Michael Stack, the department's liaison with southeast Louisiana levee districts, said he wasn't familiar enough with Jefferson Parish pump stations to know what kind of system the facilities have in place to stop backflow, which would occur if rising lake water forced itself into giant discharge pipes and ran into the canals.

In fact, Stack said he doesn't know whether the flooding occurred because of backflow, the collection of rainwater not being pumped out, or a combination of the two. Stack's responsibility is the design and maintenance of levees in southeast Louisiana parishes, not their drainage systems. But he agreed that it wasn't water from the 17th Street Canal that flooded Kenner, and the west and central portions of Metairie.

Jeff Council to OK emergency spending

Money covers cleanup, supply distribution

East Jefferson bureau

The Jefferson Parish Council will hold a special meeting today to approve $3.8 million in emergency expenses incurred after Hurricane Katrina.

The meeting is scheduled for 10 a.m. in the General Government Building at 200 Derbigny St. in Gretna.

The council will vote on three resolutions to approve contracts and to authorize payment of invoices for contracts Parish President Aaron Broussard previously approved.

The parish disbursed the largest sum to Certified Cleaning and Restoration of Metairie, which charged $3.2 million for cleanup of the Joseph S. Yenni building, the parish government's headquarters on the east bank.

The parish also owes $456,700 to LMD for fuel and $90,000 to Feed the Relief, a charity set up by the professional golfer Kelly Gibson, for expenses related to Operation Life Line Depot, the system set up by the parish to distribute food, water and medical supplies to parish employees and the public.

110-year-old home succumbs to fire

Hurricanes had spared Audubon Place house

By Jeff Duncan
Staff writer

STAFF PHOTO BY MATT ROSE

Firefighters battle a blaze Tuesday that consumed Dr. Michael Hayman's three-story home in Audubon Place.

Dr. Michael Hayman thought he'd emerged unscathed from the double-whammy of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

His 110-year-old home in historic Audubon Place next to Tulane University lost a few shingles and received only minor water damage.

"We felt very fortunate," said Hayman, a radiation oncologist at East Jefferson Medical Center.

Then Hayman took a phone call from a member of the Audubon Place Commission while having lunch Tuesday with his son in Philadelphia. His house was on fire.

"At first they told me that it was my house, then they said it was a neighbor's house," Hayman said by cell phone from the Philadelphia airport while frantically trying to find a flight home. "I still feel like it's somebody else's house. I guess I'm in denial."

Capt. Terry Hardy of the New Orleans Fire Department said 82 firefighters from 20 units fought the three-alarm blaze. He said the fire was reported at 11:23 a.m., and the first unit was on the scene at 11:27 a.m. By the time firefighters arrived, the fire had engulfed much of the first and second floors along the back of the house. It quickly spread throughout the house and to the third floor.

"When we arrived, the front door was locked and we had to kick it in," Hardy said. "We worked on the interior of the house, but the fire spread quickly and we had to pull out."

Firefighters managed to save the surrounding homes in the historic neighborhood, one of the oldest gated communities in the South. No injuries were reported.

The cause of the fire is still under investigation. An ATF agent at the scene told Hayman over the phone that neighbors had reported power surges in the area. He said some neighbors also reported hearing a loud bang before the fire was noticed. Hardy said power was restored to the block Sunday.

Hayman, 57, said he and his wife, Marina, have lived in the three-story wood-frame home for 13 years. The couple's most prized possessions were a rare collection of Russian icons, artwork from the 1800s, family portraits and antiques, some dating to the 1700s.

Electricity restored at Grand Isle School

But water service still intermittent

By Joe Darby
West Bank bureau

Stuck in darkness for more than five weeks after Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita, and left to fend for itself after hordes of volunteers evaporated along with media attention in the storms' aftermath, Grand Isle took a step toward sufficiency Tuesday when electricity was restored to its only school.

The Grand Isle School will reopen Thursday, but Jefferson Parish public school officials said they don't know how many of its 200 students in kindergarten through 12th grade will return after most of the community's homes were heavily damaged.

Still, the return of electricity will do much to help Grand Isle rebuild, Mayor David Camardelle said. About 80 percent to 90 percent of residents have come home to check their property, and about 150 people have stayed.

Recovery was progressing, but Hurricane Rita slowed the process, Camardelle said.

Entergy spokeswoman Becky Watson acknowledged that Hurricane Rita had delayed restoration of service. She said it has taken five weeks to rebuild the Grand Isle substation, which "was totally demolished."

Within two or three days, the utility hopes to return service to 50 percent to 60 percent of its 2,500 customers, she said.

Many buildings sustained heavy damage, including to the meters, and must be checked by an electrician before the power can be turned on, she said.

Camardelle said 60 percent to 70 percent of the remaining buildings have water service, although it is intermittent.

A National Guardsman from Oregon clears trees and debris from North Galvez Street last month in New Orleans.

Nonresidents saved the city

I read the article concerning the New Orleans City Council and its argument about whether to maintain the residency requirement for police officers. I was appalled. Did not hundreds of military personnel come into the city and rescue, transport and feed the residents there? Were these men and women from New Orleans or did they live there? It seems their actions have taken the old argument, "If they don't live there, they don't care" and made it a moot issue. To quote Gen. Russel Honore, "They are stuck on stupid."

With God, you never know

I am amazed at the presumption of those who "know" that Hurricane Katrina was God's judgment on the Gulf Coast and perplexed by the sureness of those who "know" it wasn't. As a minister of the last 15 years in metro New Orleans, it seems to me a wiser course to say: "It might be; we surely deserve it. So let us seek the Lord."

When Hurricane Betsy went through this area in 1965, I was a local seminarian and pastor of the Baptist church in Paradis. A friend from Alabama who was ministering in my church that week drove down U.S. 90, dead certain that Betsy was God's judgment on the juke joints on that strip. I recall thinking that, if so, God needed to improve his aim, because a lot of good people were also being hurt. And yet, I held my peace because anyone who reads the Scriptures knows the Lord God is not shy about judgment.

Patient, yes, infinitely patient. But eventually, he judges. Is that what's happening here? It could be. We deserve it. Let us seek the Lord.

Companies are working hard to rebuild

Your Oct. 1 editorial, "Lines of communication," was off the mark.

Instead of criticizing companies like Cox Communications and BellSouth, which are spending millions of dollars each week since Hurricane Katrina to restore services, The Times-Picayune should be celebrating the example both are setting to quickly rebuild our metro area. It is exactly this kind of confidence and investment that will brighten New Orleans' future, accelerate employment and help rebuild our local economy.

Ironically, we paid to run an ad in the same edition of The Times-Picayune, describing where damage was worst and where restoration will take longest, and where service to many of our customers has already been restored. This ad was in addition to numerous efforts we are undertaking to keep our customers informed, including near-daily media updates on the United Broadcasters/WWL radio station, broadcast and print advertising and a mobile hurricane recovery information center, in addition to our regularly updated Web site info and customer-line phone messaging.

The Times-Picayune should enthusiastically embrace how profoundly New Orleans needs local businesses to take the lead in restoring our badly damaged metropolitan area infrastructure and should acknowledge some of the companies who are working hard to do just that.

Short-changed by FEMA

Re: "FEMA not giving $2,000 checks to victims anymore," Oct. 1

FEMA contractors are doing a great job of picking up debris in western St. Tammany Parish, but FEMA's now-ended program to distribute the president's promised $2,000 to each family adversely impacted by Hurricane Katrina was a travesty marked by ineptitude, arbitrariness and shocking inefficiency.

In my case, for example, I filed online within a few days of the president's announcement, but FEMA denied my application because I had the foresight to buy homeowner's insurance. Don't most homeowners? Never mind that, as with most homeowner's policies, there is a substantial deductible and that $2,000 wouldn't have begun to cover my uninsured losses. Never mind that most people I know who did get the $2,000 emergency relief also had homeowner's policies. Was I too honest?

Your story contained even more egregious examples of FEMA dysfunction, including their ludicrously arbitrary shut-down of the program without warning. The bureaucrats involved in running this program ought to be ashamed.

Lakeview's problems run deeper than flood

The future of Lakeview will be dictated not only by what happens from ground zero to 10 feet about sea level, but by what happens underground as well.

Even on a good day before Hurricane Katrina, water bubbled up from the streets. The sewer lines that were blocked or had collapsed were on a "list for repairs." Drainage was haphazard because the subsurface system had collapsed years ago, taking with it our streets and front yards.

Lakeview may be emotionally vibrant, but it is physically dead. It is silent. It is toxic.

The silence over what must be done to bring it back is deafening.

OUR OPINIONS

Getting real on residency

In the best of worlds, all police officers would live in the communities they serve, and a rule requiring them to do so would not have the effect of driving potential recruits away.

But the situation in New Orleans lately has been anything but ideal. In practice, the residency requirement for city police officers may well have hindered recruitment efforts. As the city's crime rate crept up in recent years and the department struggled to meet its staffing goals, the residency policy got harder to defend.

Now that the flooding after Hurricane Katrina has removed vast areas of the city from the housing market, the City Council ought to shelve the rule officially.

A rule requiring officers to live in New Orleans has been in effect for years, but the city began enforcing it in earnest during former Mayor Marc Morial's administration. Proponents maintained that officers' presence in the city during their off hours makes New Orleans more secure, that officers who live and shop in the city shore up the tax base and that resident officers are more attuned to what's going on than those who leave town when their shifts are over. These arguments have some merit.

When the Morial administration began stressing the residency rule in 1995, proponents also worried – with good reason – about the potential for antagonism between the Police Department, which then had a white majority, in a city with a majority-black population. In that regard, the residency rule has done its job. The department is now a majority-black force.

Whatever its benefits, though, the rule has also put up barriers to recruitment. Housing prices have grown much faster than officers' salaries, and when Katrina struck, there was a scarcity of decent, affordable homes in the city. Moreover, the ever-deepening woes of the Orleans Parish public school system cannot have reassured officers and potential recruits with school-age children.

The policy, in short, weighed heavily on newer recruits with young families and relatively modest salaries. No wonder a 2004 study indicated that a majority of black officers as well as white officers opposed the residency rule.

It's unclear whether the hurricane changed officers' views about the issue. More than 200 officers are suspected of deserting their posts after the hurricane. City Councilwoman Cynthia Hedge Morrell, who is the mother of a police officer and supports the residency rule, suggested at a council meeting last week that the department needs to determine how many nonresident officers were among the deserters. That information would be useful, but it may also be unknowable; some officers live outside the city surreptitiously but claim a New Orleans address.

Regardless, the department will need to hire new officers at some point, perhaps in the near future. Right now the effect of the hurricane on the housing market is anyone's guess, but recruits may have difficulty finding homes. While some residents of areas that stayed dry may opt not to return, thousands upon thousands of houses elsewhere in the city have been rendered unlivable.

Unfortunately, some defenders of the residency rule don't yet seem to grasp what New Orleans is up against. Councilwoman Renee Gill Pratt suggested that, as federal money pours into the city, potential police recruits "will want to come to New Orleans because they know we'll have a bigger and better city." Let's hope Ms. Pratt is correct. But wishful thinking will not keep the Police Department staffed.

City Councilman Jay Batt may have made a tactical mistake last week when he raised the volatile issue at the end of a long, arduous council meeting. Mr. Batt, who has submitted an ordinance that would temporarily waive the residency rule, told other council members that he will push for a vote next week.

The debate heated up quickly. Three council members vehemently opposed changing the rule. Mr. Batt raised his voice. City Council President Oliver Thomas, who in the past has been open to a debate on the issue, tried to table the discussion because emotions were running so high.

It's a shame the meeting took such a turn, because Mr. Batt is correct on the merits of the issue.

Some demands are not negotiable: The city needs officers with honesty, integrity and a commitment to protecting all New Orleans residents. But a city with a vastly diminished housing stock – and, for now, without a working school system – is in a poor position to tell officers where they can and cannot live.

Don't count on good luck

After Hurricane Katrina devastated much of the metro area, the West Bank looked like a safe haven. Strong winds brought trees down everywhere, but most of the populated areas on the west side of the Mississippi River stayed dry.

Under different circumstances, though, the West Bank might have flooded, too. That ought to trouble state and local emergency-management agencies.

While Hurricane Katrina led to breaches in levees in New Orleans, it was Hurricane Rita that posed a major threat to the West Bank. The hurricane pushed so much water up from the Gulf of Mexico into the Harvey Canal on Sept. 24 that major flooding of Harvey, Gretna and Algiers was entirely possible.

Fortunately, crews spent hours plugging spots where water had begun to seep through levees, and the levees ultimately held. But while disaster was avoided for now, conditions far worse than those created by Rita could recur during any hurricane season.

The $340 million West Bank Hurricane Protection Project is already under way, and it should provide more security for West Bank residents worried about future flooding. Still, the havoc that enveloped the metro area after Katrina struck should lead to a rethinking of the entire metro area's levee system. The year's most notorious storm ultimately spared most of the West Bank from flooding, but the area's vulnerabilities should figure in any post-Katrina deliberations about how to improve that system in the future.

OTHER OPINIONS

Storm victims face misery by design

PAUL KRUGMAN

Federal aid to victims of Hurricane Katrina already is faltering on two crucial fronts: health care and housing. Incompetence is part of the problem, but deeper political issues also play a crucial role.

Start with health care, where conservative senators, generally believed to be acting on behalf of the White House, have blocked bipartisan legislation that would provide all low-income victims of Katrina with health coverage under Medicaid.

In a letter urging Senate leaders to reject the bill, Mike Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, warned that it would create "a new Medicaid entitlement." He asserted that victims can be taken care of by Medicaid "waivers," which basically amount to giving refugees the health benefits, if any, that they would have been entitled to in their home states — and no more.

As the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities points out, many needy victims won't qualify for aid. For example, Medicaid doesn't cover childless adults of working age. In fact, surveys show that many destitute survivors of Katrina are being denied Medicaid, and some are going without medicines they need.

Local hospitals and doctors often will treat Katrina victims even if they can't pay. But this means that communities that have welcomed Katrina refugees will, in effect, be financially punished for their generosity — something local officials will remember in future crises. (The administration has offered vague, unconvincing assurances that it will do something to compensate medical caregivers. It has offered much more concrete assurances that it will reimburse religious groups that provide aid.)

What about housing? These days, both conservatives and liberals agree that public housing projects are a bad idea, and that housing vouchers — which help the poor pay rent — are much better. In the aftermath of the 1994 earthquake in California, special housing vouchers issued to victims worked very well.

But the administration has chosen, instead, to focus its efforts on the creation of public housing in the form of trailer parks, which have been slow to take shape, will almost surely be more expensive than a voucher program and may create long-term refugee ghettos. Even Newt Gingrich calls this "extraordinarily bad policy" that "violates every conservative principle."

What's going on here? The crucial point is that President Bush has been forced by events into short-term actions that conflict with his long-term goals. His mission in office is to dismantle or at least shrink the federal social safety net, yet he must, as a matter of political necessity, provide aid to Katrina's victims. His problem is how to do that without legitimizing the very role of government he opposes.

This dilemma explains the administration's opposition to Medicaid coverage for all Katrina refugees. How can it provide that coverage without undermining its ongoing efforts to reduce the Medicaid rolls? More broadly, if it accepts the principle that all hurricane victims are entitled to medical care, people might start asking why the same isn't true of all American citizens — a line of thought that points toward a system of universal health insurance, which is anathema to conservatives.

As for the administration's odd insistence on providing public housing instead of relying on the market, The Los Angeles Times reports that Department of Housing and Urban Development officials initially announced plans to issue rent vouchers, then backed off after meeting with White House aides. As the article notes, the administration has "repeatedly sought to cut or limit" the existing housing voucher program.

This suggests that what administration officials fear isn't that housing vouchers would fail, but that they would succeed — and that this success would undermine the administration's ongoing efforts to cut back housing aid.

So here's the key to understanding post-Katrina policy: Bush can't avoid helping Katrina's victims, but he doesn't want to legitimize institutions that help the needy, like the housing voucher program. As a result, his administration refuses to use those institutions, even when they are the best way to help victims. More generally, the administration is trying to treat Katrina's victims as harshly as the political realities allow, so as not to create a precedent for other aid efforts.

As the misery of the hurricane's survivors goes on, remember this: To a large extent, they are miserable by design.

Two states, two ways to get paid

JOHN MAGINNIS

For storm-stricken Louisiana and Mississippi, the road to recovery goes straight through Washington, where Congress writes the checks. Yet the two Washington delegations have taken different on-ramps to the appropriations superhighway, and Louisiana's is marked "wrong way."

Mississippi's congressmen decided not to introduce a stand-alone bill spelling out that state's needs. Instead, they are working behind the scenes with the Bush administration and committee chairs to include their projects in the several spending bills or one omnibus measure that will work its way through the Congress over the next months.

The Louisiana delegation should have followed suit, but instead took its own path, which is being labeled, unfortunately, the Louisiana way.

Louisiana's two senators co-sponsored a jaw-dropping, budget-busting $250 billion spending request (on top of the $62.3 billion already passed by Congress), which runs the gamut of flood protection, navigation improvements, highway construction, business subsidies, economic development grants and expanded programs for healthcare, law enforcement, education and social services.

The wish list was assembled with significant input from an array of lobbyists representing shipping firms, utility companies and other corporate interests. The legislation was barely filed last week before the sponsors said there would be add-ons to cover the devastation caused by Hurricane Rita. Let's say, round it up to $300 billion.

Sens. Mary Landrieu and David Vitter said they did not expect every item to be fully financed, but that the bill represents a starting point in the discussion of relief and recovery.

Indeed, that got the discussion started. The Washington Post compared the state's senators to "looters who seize six televisions when their homes have room for only two."

"Brazen doesn't begin to describe it," railed Taxpayers for Common Sense, adding that the state delegation is "using Katrina as an excuse to resurrect a laundry list of pork projects."

Conservative talk show hosts fulminated over the line items, such as $50 billion in open-ended community block grants to local governments, $40 billion over 10 years for Army Corps of Engineers projects to be chosen by a Louisiana-dominated commission, $5 billion to increase transportation capacity in cities like Baton Rouge swollen by evacuees, $750 million for incentives to get teachers to return to their schools, $400 million for mental health and substance-abuse services for Katrina victims, $175 million for export-related training and assistance for companies seeking international markets, $160 million to build the "federal city" complex of military and governmental offices in Algiers, $25 million for a sugar-cane research lab, $8 million for alligator farms and on and on.

The bill presented commentators with just the opening they sought to tee off on Louisiana's reputation for excess and corruption. However noble the lawmakers' intentions or unfair the criticism, that the Louisiana bill evoked such vilification from The Washington Post on the left to Rush Limbaugh on the right suggests that our congressional brain trust did not think this one the whole way through.

A spokesman for Landrieu defended the wish list as a "record" of the state's needs, which is best stated all at once instead of piecemeal. He further noted it is important to finance economic development projects beyond mere relief measures in order that the recovery be sustained.

Those points are valid, but they do not justify the laundry-list strategy of the Louisiana bill. By lumping all the projects and programs together, the state missed the opportunity to stress those priorities that distinguish Louisiana's needs from Mississippi's, that is, the completion and upgrade of the southeast Louisiana hurricane levee protection system and restoration of the eroding coast. That's the proper focus of a stand-alone bill.

As for infrastructure and program assistance needs relevant to both states, our delegation should make the case to be treated as fairly as Mississippi, whose delegation has more seniority and clout, including chairmanship of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Landrieu's aide points out that, given Mississippi's power advantage, the Louisiana delegation needs to work harder. Try working smarter.

There's no need to steal

Our critics — watchdogs, pundits and members of Congress — say our demands for federal help to recover from Katrina are excessive and that politicians and their cronies will trouser a bunch of the money anyway.

Don't they see the connection? If we weren't going to steal some of the money, we wouldn't need so much.

There is, however, no graft item in the $250 billion grab devised by Sens. Mary Landrieu and David Vitter. You have to be a little subtle in such matters.

Not really. Nobody will accuse Landrieu and Vitter of nefarious intent. It is not their fault that our reputation as the world capital of corruption casts a shadow on any big money bill.

Plenty of other states breed their fair share of thieves, but our politicians have never been known for subtlety, and the populace has sometimes seemed to take a perverse pride in their venality, so it is taken for granted that hurricane relief will enrich the unworthy.

To an extent, it will, as it would anywhere. It is impossible to pump billions of dollars into any state and ensure that it is all allocated legitimately. The rogues will always put a few past even the most anal money manager.

But the public mood has changed. Louisiana may have taken crooked politicians for granted when times were good, but, now, anyone creaming off disaster money is liable to be strung up from the nearest lamppost. Maybe, one of the features of the reborn New Orleans will be a new level of integrity.

It would be unwise to bet on it, however, and it is hardly surprising that Vitter and Landrieu have been accused of trying to pull a fast one. Of course, they are. If they succeeded in raking in the full $250 billion, it is likely that nobody would be more surprised than they.

They have left plenty of room for compromise. Even, say, 70 percent of what they are seeking would be a bonanza for Louisiana, and Congress could congratulate itself on saving a fortune.

And paring down this list looks like child's play. Vitter and Landrieu suggest their bills represent a starting point for negotiations, and it would appear that many of their requests have been included only to give their colleagues some easy targets. There is no obvious reason, for instance, for federal taxpayers to subsidize alligator farms, sugar cane research and substance abuse as part of a hurricane relief effort.

The Vitter and Landrieu bills look very much like the work of lobbyists, and there is a good reason for that. Not only was their working group dominated by lobbyists, but three of them were former aides to House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee Chairman Don Young, R-Alaska, Washington's current king of pork.

The official line is that our senators are not asking for this money just for Louisiana but as a favor for the nation. We are "the anchor of America's Energy Coast," our ports handle 20 percent of the import and export trade and we provide 40 percent of the nation's seafood, Landrieu pointed out in a column republished in this newspaper a couple of days ago. Federal parsimony is also partially responsible for the weak hurricane defenses that led to the flooding, she wrote.

But the nation is going to have to pay dearly for the favor. The $40 billion requested for the Corps of Engineers, for instance, is 10 times its current annual budget nationwide. That should be enough to give us a decent levee system, though.

Within those levees everyone seems likely to share in the wealth. There is even a $50 billion allocation for open-ended grants. So much legal money would be sloshing around that there'd hardly be a need to steal.

It makes a lot of sense for Landrieu and Vitter to get their requests in while public sympathy is still in full spate and President Bush is looking for ways to boost his popularity and atone for the feeble initial response to Katrina. Bush's untax-and-spend approach is perfect for the occasion, at least from our point of view.

Whatever we wrest from the feds had better come soon, however. Otherwise, there may not be enough people here to hold their hands out.

Red Cross calls security in aid center flap

Kenner site was test for general public

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

Red Cross officials called for security to handle two incidents Tuesday in which people confronted volunteers after they were told a relief center giving out debit cards was only handling Kenner city employees.

It was "nothing we felt threatened with," said Denise Metzinger, a Red Cross volunteer from Kansas, who called the incidents "minor."

A drive-through assistance center for the general public will open today at 9 a.m. in a parking lot at Louis Armstrong International Airport.

Red Cross officials ran out of the debit cards Tuesday, so people who sign up for help today will fill out an application for assistance and receive a check by in the mail, Red Cross spokesman Ken Williams said.

The check can be cashed at any Hibernia bank without charge, Williams said. "They will get a check mailed to whatever address they want it mailed to, rather than a client card," Williams said. He said all Red Cross sites will now give out the checks.

After people sign up, checks will be mailed within 24 to 72 hours, Williams said.

"They can list the address where they're staying or do general delivery at a particular post office," he said.

The Red Cross Center set up for Kenner employees in the Lions Club building across from City Hall was open Tuesday from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. By 3:15 p.m., the center had seen 257 people and given away $224,025 in debit cards, Williams said. Each resident who qualifies will receive about $350 per person in their household, Williams said.

At the Lions Club building, "very few people had to wait," Metzinger said, adding that the longest wait to see a volunteer was only about 10 minutes and a total of 20 minutes to get a debit card.

She said volunteers turned away some people who weren't Kenner employees but came by because they had heard about the center from a friend or by passing by.

"Most of them were very understanding," she said. She said the Red Cross set up the center for city employees and their families by partnering with Kenner Mayor Phil Capitano.

The Red Cross first tried to serve first responders with the financial assistance, she said, and the Kenner City Hall center is part of an effort to serve large groups. She said educational groups and the New Orleans Airport Authority could be future groups served en masse.

Capitano's chief of staff, Phil Ramon, called the city employee center a "dry run" for the center that will open today for the general population near the airport.

"It was an opportunity to allow the Red Cross to train their employees, their new volunteers, as well as benefit city workers who would have to take off and could have slowed down city operations," Ramon said. "It's a win-win for everyone."

But at least one hurricane victim said she thought it was unfair that Kenner employees didn't have to stand in line.

"That's a shame," said Loyce Ceaser, who lives in LaPlace. Ceaser waited for hours to get assistance at a relief center in Slidell and planned to come to Kenner today to ask about the availability of additional assistance. "Everybody else had to get in line and wait 8, 9, 10 hours," she said.

The center will open at 9 a.m., but if financial relief centers on the north shore are any indication, "people are going to try and line up from midnight on, and we have not located a way to try and dissuade people from doing that," Williams said.

Williams said people who live in the ZIP codes that were most affected by the hurricane will get financial assistance. If they live in a ZIP code on the periphery, their property must be assessed, he said.

Also, he said people who have already gotten the financial assistance for hardships caused by Hurricane Katrina will not get assistance for Hurricane Rita.

The center will be daily starting today from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. and remain open until the need subsides, Williams said.

To reach the center, people heading west on Airline Drive should pass the airport's main entrance and turn right at the next traffic light, before the railroad overpass. People heading east on Airline from the St. Rose area should come down the overpass and turn left at the light before the airport's main entrance.

The street is called Service Road B. It is not marked with a street sign but is scheduled to have Red Cross signs pointing out where to go.

Caretaker of the convent

FOR DECADES, a professional photographer documented the private lives of a cloistered order of New Orleans nuns. Since Hurricane Katrina forced their departure, David Spielman has a new mission: keeping an eye on their place until the Poor Clares come home.

ANGUS LIND

Before Hurricane Katrina hit, photographer David Spielman had spent more than 30 years working on a photo essay about the Poor Clare nuns, the dwindling Catholic cloistered order that dwells in the convent on Henry Clay Avenue and Magazine Street.

"They are my family," he said. "There are only eight of them left, the youngest is in her mid-50s, I'm guessing, and the average age is probably late 70s. When they're gone, they're gone."

The Poor Clares, Spielman said, had originally planned to stay through the storm. But when they lost water pressure and there was chaos in the Uptown area, Spielman went to them and begged them to evacuate. He told them there was "a lot of bad stuff going on."

"They invited me into their house meeting," he said. "It was the first time a male was ever invited."

He convinced them to evacuate. They packed up in three cars and went to a sister convent in Brenham, Texas, east of Austin.

What Spielman saw in their faces and eyes was memorable. And sad. "You could feel that they were thinking they might never get to come back here," he said. "A cloistered order of nuns and in some cases this was the only place they've ever lived."

Before they left, he was told: "Our house is your house." They asked him to stay at the convent.

New collection of Ernest Gaines' stories and essays are salve for a Southern soul

BOOKS

By Susan Larson
Book editor

Of the great Louisiana literary voices, one of the deepest and strongest belongs to Ernest Gaines. Born and raised on False River near New Roads, Gaines has lovingly chronicled the lives of working class African-Americans in Louisiana. Growing up in "the quarters" in the '40s, he served as a scribe for his elders, writing their letters, telling their stories, perfect training for the fiction writer he would eventually become. His work has brought well-deserved honors: a John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation Fellowship, a National Book Critics Circle Award, the Chevalier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres from France. In 2004, "A Lesson Before Dying" was selected for the One book/One New Orleans reading initiative.

In 'Mozart and Leadbelly: Stories and Essays' (Alfred A. Knopf, $22.95), we get a glimpse of the man behind the work, as well as a welcome selection of five stories and six essays (many delivered as public addresses), previously written but now available to the greater reading public for the first time.

Editors Marcia Gaudet and Darrell Bourque, Gaines' colleagues at the University of Louisiana at Lafayette, penned an insightful introduction that offers an

New Orleanians facing the mammoth task of rebuilding their shattered homes might find inspiration (or at least fair warning) in the following movies available for rent on DVD.

THE MONEY PIT (PG, 1986)

Tom Hanks and Shelley Long get in over their heads when they try to restore a hopelessly dilapidated house. Richard Benjamin directs an uneven comedy, co-starring Alexander Godunov, Maureen Stapleton, Joe Mantegna and Yakov Smirnoff.

UNDER THE TUSCAN SUN (PG-13, 2003)

On a whim, a recent divorcee buys a run-down villa in Tuscany and rebuilds her life as she restores her new home. Diane Lane stars in Audrey Wells' adaptation of Frances Mayes' memoir. It's difficult to say which is more beautiful: the incandescent Lane or the golden Italian countryside. In one of the funniest moments, Sandra Oh learns why one should never connect a toilet to the hot water line. Raoul Bova and Lindsay Duncan co-star.

A LOVE SONG FOR BOBBY LONG (R, 2004)

Headstrong Scarlett Johansson inherits a New Orleans shotgun house already occupied by two alcoholic masters of deferred maintenance: disgraced literature professor John Travolta and protege Gabriel Macht. As the home is brought back to life, so are its occupants. Shainee Gabel directs an adaptation of the novel by Ronald Everett Capps, whose son — singer-songwriter Grayson Capps — can be heard on the soundtrack. Dane Rhodes and Carol Sutton are among the local faces in a movie filmed in the Crescent City.

Truth is what Ernest Gaines writes

appreciation ofthe man as well as the work. The collection is essentially a lengthy literary conversation with Gaines, and a genial and wide-ranging conversationalist he can be, discoursing on such varied topics as photography, teaching writing, his love of music, and the people and places who have made him the man he is.

In the essays, we get a sense of the man behind the work. Gaines describes his upbringing in a loving, if at times stern, community; his love for his aunt, Augusteen Jefferson, who never walked but who insured his stability and safety; the difficult personal truths he has learned about the writing life; and the genesis of two of his best known novels, "The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman" and "A Lesson Before Dying."

In the moving "Miss Jane and I," he writes of his exile in California, where he had gone to pursue educational opportunities and to reunite with his mother and stepfather in 1948. In words that seem unbearably poignant in the light of the exodus following Hurricane Katrina, Gaines describes his intense longing for home and his dream of recreating it in his work:

"I wanted to smell that Louisiana earth, feel that Louisiana sun, sit under the shade of one of those Louisiana oaks, search for pecans in that Louisiana grass in one of those Louisiana yards next to one of those Louisiana bayous, not far from a Louisiana river. I wanted to see on paper those Louisiana black children walking to school on cold days while yellow Louisiana buses passed them by. I wanted to see on paper those black parents going to work before the sun came up and coming back home to look after their children after the sun went down. I wanted to see on paper the true reason why those black fathers left home — not because they were trifling or shiftless, but because they were tired of putting up with certain conditions. I wanted to see on paper the small country churches (schools during the week) and I wanted to hear those simple religious songs, those simple prayers — that true devotion . . . and I wanted to hear that Louisiana dialect — that combination of English, Creole, Cajun, black. For me there's no more beautiful sound anywhere — unless, of course, you take exceptional pride in 'proper' French or 'proper' English. I wanted to read about the true relationship between whites and blacks — about the people I had known."

In novel after novel, story after story, Gaines has captured that Louisiana of his life and his imagination. "Truth to me," he writes "is what people like Miss Jane remember." Truth, to me, is what Ernest Gaines writes.

Of the five stories in this collection, "Christ Walked Down Market Street" is perhaps the most remarkable. Set in San Francisco, and written while Gaines was a visiting professor in Houston, it predates "The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman," and was inspired by Isaac Bashevis Singer's "The Spinoza of Market Street." Spoken in the voice of a street person trying to recapture a brief vision of Christ, this story reminds the reader of the spark of divinity within all of us.

Other stories, set in Louisiana, include Gaines' first story, "The Turtles," about a young boy's sexual initiation; "Boy in the Double-Breasted Suit" and "My Grandpa and the Haint," about a young boy's glimpses of very adult relationships; and "Mary Louise," an early working of elements that would appear in Gaines' first novel, "Catherine Carmier."

In the title essay, Gaines writes of cultural context and the way it is informed by many voices.

"A lady friend of mine in Washington, D.C., once told me that she knew a young African American male who would always get on the elevator whistling a tune of Mozart. I, too, like Mozart; I like Haydn, Bach, Brahms, Schubert, Chopin. I like Pictures at an Exhibition by Mussorgsky, A Lark Ascending by Ralph Vaughn Williams — I like them all. And though Mozart and Haydn can soothe my brain while I write, neither can tell me about the Great Flood of '27 as Bessie Smith or Big Bill Broonzy can. And neither can describe Louisiana State Prison at Angola as Leadbelly can. And neither can tell me what it means to be bonded out of jail and put on a plantation to work out your time as Lightnin' Hopkins can. William Faulkner writes over one hundred pages describing the Great Flood of '27 in his story 'Old Man.' Bessie Smith gives us as true a picture in twelve lines. I am not putting Faulkner down; Faulkner is one of my favorite writers, and what Southern writer has not been influenced by him in the past 50 years? What I am saying to that young man who found it desirable to whistle Mozart in the elevator is that there is some value in whistling Bessie Smith or Leadbelly."

That same value — and it is a great one — is to be found in reading the work of Ernest Gaines. Like Bessie Smith and Leadbelly, he tells the truth of the human spirit — suffering in pain, uplifted by grace, rising to glory.

Caretaker of the convent

"WHEN I go through that gate, I know I'm safe."

LIND, from C-1

"We want to make you an honorary sister," one of them said.

"A half-sister or a step-sister?" Spielman asked.

"No, a full sister," came the reply.

"They are witty, articulate, intelligent, genteel, and extremely kind," he said. "They are a praying order — they don't teach. If you have intentions or wishes for people, you can ask them to pray."

They gave Spielman the key to the convent. He checked in with two National Guard units in the area to let them know that he was there and what was going on, and he checks in with those units and the nuns in Texas daily.

"When I go through that gate after I run, I know I'm safe," he said. "There is such a calm there. I go into the chapel. I have a candle lit for them. I ring the bell. That's to tell God that they are not there right now, they're someplace else — but they are not gone.

"They have been just the best. I wouldn't do anything to betray their trust."

Spielman, who converted to Catholicism in 2000, runs a generator a few hours a day to keep his refrigerator cool and to run his oscillating fan. But sleep has not come easy. And it only lasts a few hours.

"I sweat all night long. I sleep on top of the sheets and I sweat even with the fan. I feel something on my face and I don't know whether it's a bug or a bead of sweat."

He's been around Uptown and downtown and over to the Gulf Coast, one time flying with the California Highway Patrol in a helicopter. "It's an area of destruction the size of Great Britain," he said.

Spielman said with his photos he's trying to give more of a perspective of the loss.

"I want my photos to say something. One was of a gargantuan oak tree that had fallen. It made a three-story house on Prytania Street look diminutive. Three hundred years of history gone, just like that, and anyone who lives in a home that size anywhere in the world will sense the enormity of it.

"There are so many icons we adore that are gone, just gone," he said. "Waveland was obliterated. We'll be oblivious to it until we drive up and say, 'Oh my God, Katrina took it.' Our area is forever and ever changed. When we come back, we may be a city of 125,000 or 150,000 people.

"It's so eerie," he said. "There are no lights on — none. You get to see this incredible set of stars we've never seen before in the city because the ambient light is so great. You don't hear any ACs humming, no buses on Magazine or streetcars on St. Charles — all you hear are birds and wind."

Spielman is an avid runner who hit a milestone in 2003 of running for 10 years without missing a day.

The 55-year-old's home course is Audubon Park, where his typical five-mile pre-dawn run past centuries-old oak trees is his ritual. And when his work as a freelance photographer takes him on the road, even around the world, he runs wherever he is, always mindful of his streak.

STAFF PHOTOS BY CHRIS GRANGER

David Spielman walks through the gardens at the Poor Clare convent, where a pine tree knocked a statue off its pedestal. TOP: Spielman writes an entry in his daily diary at home, where he records his impressions of New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina.

"I ran the day after the storm came through," he said. "You couldn't go more than 10 yards without having to stop or dodge a limb." He's now up to more than 4,250 days without missing a run, but who's counting?

The native Oklahoman has been running in Audubon Park for 32 years. During his daily runs, he said, the moon guides him around the park and the moonbeams dance off the water of the lagoons.

"I've always considered that the park was mine," he said. "It's such a special and beautiful place. Now it's singularly mine because I'm the only one running. I've always joked that Ron Forman may be in charge of the park but I run the park."

After he talks to the nuns and the Guardsmen, "I go through a vast majority of my day without saying a word."

Despite the hardships, including a steady diet of peanut butter, Spielman feels he's done the right thing.

"I wouldn't change it for the world," he said. "I'm always looking to test myself — my running streak, my freelance work. This is another test and it's a religious and spiritual test. This draws upon all your core values. You have to be incredibly patient, you have to be cautious, and you have to believe in rituals."

For him, the rituals now include lighting the candles, ringing the bell, and making sure that, in some small way, the Poor Clares' convent comes to life every day during their absence.

"It's why we are on this earth, for stuff like this," Spielman said. "Everybody can do the other stuff."

More tips for mending your broken home

Adjuster advice

Five things to consider before meeting your insurance adjuster

1. YOU MAY HAVE MORE THAN ONE POLICY. Your homeowner's insurance policy covers fire, windstorm, hail, riots and explosions — but not damage from floodwater. For that you must have a flood policy issued by the government's National Flood Insurance Program. When you call your insurance agency to file a claim, you will be assigned an adjuster for each policy you own. You will need to meet with an adjuster from the company issuing the homeowner's policy if you think you have damage from wind, such as water from broken windows or holes in the roof. The adjuster who handles your flood insurance also handles damage from rising water. NFIP limits coverage to $250,000 per residential structure and $100,000 for contents, although private companies also offer excess flood protection policies. (If you don't have your flood policy details, call the NFIP general information line at 800-427-4661 or visit www.fema.gov/nfip/ on the Web.

2. HAVE THE FOLLOWING IN HAND WHEN YOU CALL YOUR INSURANCE AGENT.

- The names of the companies that issued your homeowner's insurance policy as well as your flood policy (many agents sell policies from multiple companies).
- Your policy number(s).
- A phone number and e-mail address where you can be reached.

If you are in temporary housing, make sure there is a point of contact for your agent. Ask the adjuster(s) for a time frame on when an inspection of your house is likely, so that you can make plans. If an adjuster for each policy has not contacted you within a few days, call back.

3. BE PATIENT. NFIP claims from Hurricane Katrina have already reached 150,000, compared to 74,000 claims for four hurricanes in 2004. So get in line: Most adjusters are handling 200 or more cases at the moment. Because of the numbers, the NFIP is making some concessions for Katrina victims. The proof-of-loss claim, a legal sworn statement verifying losses that normally is due within 60 days, has been waived for 12 months. Also, the NFIP may pay some claims without requiring site visits. The agency is using water depth charts, aerial imagery and other data to determine what properties obviously were damaged up to or over the insured amount. For example, if your house was washed off its foundation, or stood for weeks in deep water, you may receive the maximum benefit allowed by your policy without having to meet an adjuster at the house. Finally, flood insurance adjusters are being instructed to help policyholders develop leaner content lists: Serial and model numbers for appliances are not needed, and a list of contents by major grouping can be submitted, rather than a comprehensive list.

4. DOCUMENT BEFORE YOU DISCARD. Photograph water in the house, damaged property, structural damage and the like; in this case, that photo really is worth the proverbial thousand words. Make a list of damaged or lost items and gather receipts if you have them (a comprehensive contents list is not necessary at this time). For mold remediation purposes, anything wet can be removed immediately, but it's a good idea to cut and save swatches from carpeting, curtains, chairs and the like before tossing them. Photograph damaged walls before removing sheetrock panels or punching holes in them to allow insulation to start drying.

5. WHEN YOU MEET THE ADJUSTER, show up on time (you'd be surprised how may people make appointments and don't keep them) and take with you a good attitude and a list — along with receipts — of any out-of-pocket relocation expenses. These can be submitted for reimbursement (the amount depends on your policy). If you get a contractor's estimate on repairs, make a copy of that for the adjuster as well. Remember that the adjuster is there to help you through the process: Ask questions, stay in touch and follow instructions on necessary forms, content lists, documentation and the like. Most of the time, only one site visit is necessary to determine what needs to be done to complete the claim.

Rookie point guard Chris Paul came prepared for Coach Byron Scott's grueling training camp and did well on his first day.

Paul, Hornets put to test as camp opens

Scott takes it easy on team after Katrina

By John Reid
Staff writer

OKLAHOMA CITY — Hornets top draft pick Chris Paul was warned by teammates that he needed to stay in shape in the offseason if he hoped to survive the rigorous training camp Coach Byron Scott conducts.

That was good advice, Paul found out at the start of Tuesday's opening training-camp practice.

Scott had the team sprinting, backpedaling and moving around the baseline in a defensive stance with their hands raised for 20 minutes nonstop. Before practiced ended, Scott made his players run sprints again.

Paul got through it, but he looked exhausted after the drill ended.

"At Wake Forest, you had preseason conditioning, and that's one thing you don't have in the NBA," said Paul, a former star point guard for the Demon Deacons who was selected by the Hornets as the fourth overall pick in this year's draft.

"In college, (conditioning is) totally separate from practice. You're on the track or on the football field two or three weeks before practice starts. This now is pretty much conditioning and practice at the same time."

Scott said he could have made Tuesday's practice much harder, but he took in consideration the workout schedules of some players, such as veteran forward P.J. Brown, might have been disrupted because of Hurricane Katrina. But starting today, he promised there will be no scaling back.

"I thought (Paul) did well," Scott said, adding that he was pleased with his players' conditioning and the way they practiced.

Salmen football coach Jerry Leonard, right, got emotional when he saw his team take the field after Hurricane Katrina, but he has been his usual, intense self at practice lately.

Salmen pride proves to be an inspiration

Spartans football team lifting spirits

By Marty Mule'

There was intensity at Monday's practice for the Salmen High School football team, something expected from one of the state's top programs.

"You missed that block!"

"You should have had that tackle!"

"Wrong cut!"

But everything else was different, almost out of place. Here was Salmen working out in the morning instead of the afternoon. The practice was across town at Northshore High School. And the players were wearing gear obtained from the generosity of others as far away as Fort Dodge, Kan.

This is life now for Salmen's football team and for its entire student body.

Salmen High's buildings were devastated by Hurricane Katrina and are out of commission. Salmen students are now platooned at Northshore, where, oddly enough, the Spartans were supposed to begin the football season a month ago against their rival, and where

OPPORTUNITY'S OBSTACLE

Texas coach Mack Brown has a reputation for failing to win big games, as evidenced by a five-game losing streak to rival Oklahoma. But the Longhorns enter Saturday's Red River Rivalry as 14-point favorites, the largest spread in the series since 1970.

Texas seems primed to end a five-year losing streak against Oklahoma

Brian Bosworth, the noted thespian, intellect and former Oklahoma linebacker, has his own take on why the Sooners have beaten the Texas Longhorns five consecutive times going into the 100th edition of the Red River Rivalry on Saturday at Dallas' venerable Cotton Bowl.

"I think Mack's inside Mack's head," said The Boz, who was playing at Oklahoma during Texas coach Mack Brown's one year (1984) on the Sooners' staff. "I've seen how he reacts in certain situations. There's a hurdle that he has to overcome. I don't think he believes in the players he has around them."

Chicago Bears rookie running back Cedric Benson, who played four years at Texas, sees it much the same way, saying during an ESPN radio interview that "without a doubt" the Texas coaches approached the Oklahoma game trying not to lose more than planning to win.

Pressure is on for Longhorns' Brown

PETER FINNEY

When he was head coach of the Tulane Green Wave - that would be the seasons of 1985, '86 and '87 - a young Mack Brown welcomed the "Big Game" chant: Beat LSU.

Brown would fail three times, but his Greenies did come close in '87, when they took the heavily favored Tigers to the wire, losing 41-36 in the Superdome.

How tiny that big-game loss seems now, this week, come Saturday, when Coach Brown's Texas Longhorns take on the Oklahoma Sooners.

So how BIG is this one for the Texas coach?

Bigger than big.

Huger than huge.

Is Brown, for example, under more pressure than Joe Torre?

Not even close. Torre's New York Yankees have won the "big one" many times.

Brown is still searching for some kind of championship to call his own, and that can only come about by demolishing his No. 1 demon.

SCOUTING REPORT

SAINTS (2-2) at GREEN BAY PACKERS (0-4)

By Brian Allee-Walsh
Staff writer

The venerable Green Bay Packers appear to have hit rock bottom.

Entering the first week of October, the Packers (0-4) are off to their worst start in 17 years and join the Houston Texans (0-3) as the NFL's only winless teams.

Green Bay's dismal start serves as a snapshot of the NFC North, where Chicago and Detroit share the division lead with 1-2 records, a half-game ahead of the Minnesota Vikings (1-3).

The Vikings have the only victory outside the division, a 33-16 pasting of the Saints in Week 3.

Packers officials, and quarterback Brett Favre, appear to be in denial, perhaps reflecting on last season when the team started 1-4 and rebounded to win nine of their last 11 games to win the NFC North with a 10-6 record.

But the franchise is clearly rebuilding under first-year General Manager Ted Thompson and Coach Mike Sherman, who received a two-year contract extension but surrendered his GM duties during the offseason. Although the Packers have won three consecutive division championships for only the fourth time in team history, Sherman could be on a short leash, according to team insiders.

The team's 53-man roster features 11 first-year players, including nine draft picks.

The Packers also sustained a handful of injuries in Monday night's 32-29 loss to Carolina. The most serious injury involved rookie wide receiver/kick returner Terrence Murphy, who remained in a Charlotte hospital Tuesday night after taking a helmet-to-helmet hit on Monday.

Left tackle Chad Clifton, running back Ahman Green, center Mike Flanagan and linebacker Na'il Diggs also sustained injuries against Carolina and their status for Sunday's game is unknown.

Tight end Bubba Franks, who has missed the past two games with a knee injury, is questionable. .

LAST MEETING: The Saints defeated the Packers 35-20 at the Superdome on Sept. 15, 2002. Wide receiver Joe Horn had six catches for 120 yards to become the first player in franchise history to open a season with consecutive 100-yard receiving games.

PACKERS ON OFFENSE

Although Favre led the Packers to within a field goal of sending the game into overtime Monday, the offense has struggled. Favre finally is showing his age after 14 grueling NFL seasons. Green, who left the game early in the third quarter after rushing 14 times for 36 yards, appears to have lost a step. Favre is feeling Javon-

WORLD OF SPORTS

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL

LEYLAND REPLACES TRAMMELL: The Detroit Tigers hired Jim Leyland on Tuesday as their manager to replace Alan Trammell, fired a day earlier after three seasons. Leyland, 60, won a World Series championship with the Florida Marlins in 1997, and has not managed since 1999 with Colorado. He was a two-time NL Manager of the Year with Pittsburgh, where he won three division titles. "That passion that Jim Leyland has had throughout his career is back within him to manage," Tigers president and general manager Dave Dombrowski said. "The decision to name one of the top managers in the game of baseball in recent time, to bring him back to this organization, is a very big day for our franchise." Leyland's first 18 years in professional baseball were in the Tigers' farm system, six as a catcher, one as a coach and 11 as a manager. Leyland was beaten out for Philadelphia's managerial job by Charlie Manuel last winter. He has said he wanted to manage again close to his Pittsburgh home, which is about a five-hour drive from Detroit.

HART RESIGNS: John Hart stepped down as general manager of the Texas Rangers after a four-year stint in which he couldn't duplicate the success he had in Cleveland. Hart's resignation came two days after the Rangers finished 79-83, their third losing season in four years under Hart and their fifth since winning their last AL West title in 1999. Hart, whose teams won six division titles in his last seven years in Cleveland ending in 2001, will be replaced by assistant general manager Jon Daniels, who will become the youngest general manager in baseball at 28. Hart will remain a team consultant.

ALMANZAR SUSPENDED: Texas Rangers reliever Carlos Almanzar has been suspended for the first 10 games of next season for violating baseballís steroids policy. Almanzar is the 10th major-league player banned 10 days this year under the sport's new policy, and the second Texas pitcher.

AUTO RACING

JOHNSON TAKES BLAME: Jimmie Johnson acknowledged he was at fault for an eight-car crash at Talladega Superspeedway that scuttled at least one other driver's championship hopes. Johnson had denied responsibility immediately after Sunday's accident, which cost both himself and Mark Martin valuable ground in the race for the Nextel Cup title. After watching tape of the accident that occurred 20 laps into the race, Johnson said he realized he ran into the back of leader Elliott Sadler to start the wreck. "I feel bad, I don't know what else I can say," Johnson said. "I started a wreck and took out a lot of good cars. That was the last thing I intended to do, and I feel horrible for it. So I'm taking the responsibility. I needed to see the video to really understand what took place."

COLLEGES

LSU UPDATE: LSU senior center Rudy Niswanger is among 184 football players who have been selected semifinalists for the Draddy Trophy, the National Football Foundation and College Hall of Fame announced. Niswanger, in his second year as a starter on the LSU offensive line, recently graduated with a 4.0 grade point average in pre-medicine. Niswanger earned First-Team Academic All-America honors last season. The Draddy Trophy honors the best pkayer in the country for his combined academic success, football performance and exemplary community leadership. . . . The LSU softball team did not allow a run in four games in the Fall Collegiate Classic this weekend at Tiger Park, outscoring its opponents 42-0. LSU beat East Mississippi Junior College 10-0, Mississippi Gulf Coast Community College 12-0, LSU-Eunice 9-0 and SLU 11-0.

TULANE UPDATE: Tickets to Saturdayís Conference USA game between Tulane and Houston at Cajun Field in Lafayette are on sale through all Ticketmaster outlets, and season-ticket holders can pick up tickets for Saturdayís game in Lafayette, Tulane ticket manager Dan Holden announced. Kickoff is at 5 p.m. . . . Junior Kyle Ritchie shot a two-under par 70 and the Green Wave saved their best round for last and finished seventh at the Memphis Intercollegiate at the par-72, 7,249-yard Colonial Country Club. The Green Wave shot a team-best 290 on Tuesday. The Green Wave slid three spots after heading to the clubhouse yesterday in fourth place. Ritchie, who had a par 144 on the first day, finished tied for third. . . . Despite one goal each from juniors Jill Sharp and Jackie Obert, the Tulane women's soccer team fell 3-2 to UAB in Birmingham. UAB (5-5-1) held a 20-9 edge on shots. Tulane fell to 0-5 and 0-2 in C-USA.

UNO UPDATE: University of New Orleans men's golfer Adam Collins fired a two-under 142 over the first two rounds of the Louisiana-Monroe/Fred Marx Invitational to tie for first with two other golfers, and the Privateers shot a one-over to lead the event after the first day of the 54-hole tournament being held at Bayou Desiard Country Club. Collins shot rounds of 70 and 72 and is tied with ULM's Daniel Keeton and Nicholls State's Donny Schmitt for the individual lead.

USM KICKER ARRESTED: Southern Mississippi kicker Darren McCaleb faces a charge of simple assault stemming from an incident involving a female student in Hattiesburg, Miss., police said. McCaleb will appear in Forrest County Justice Court on Nov. 1 to enter a plea. He was arrested Sept. 18 after the incident, which took place along fraternity row, university Police Chief Robert Hopkins said. Citing privacy issues, Hopkins declined to release the report and the woman's name. He also refused to provide specifics. If convicted, McCaleb could be fined up to $500 and face six months in jail.

Panthers survive Favre, Packers

Carolina leads big, has to hold on for win

From wire reports

Carolina was building a comfortable lead against the Green Bay Packers, but Panthers coach John Fox didn't dare let his team back down. Not with Brett Favre in the game.

Favre didn't disappoint, throwing four touchdown passes and nearly rallying the Packers out of a 19-point hole.

So the Panthers don't view this win as a near-collapse. They prefer to look at Monday night's 32-29 victory as success at overcoming the Favre factor.

"At halftime, I kind of knew what kind of a game it was going to be for them offensively. ... They were going to throw it a lot," Fox said Tuesday. "You give them a little momentum, and he's pretty special."

Because of Favre, the Panthers (2-2) sweated out a game they should have wrapped up at halftime.

Unlike their losses to New Orleans and Miami, the Panthers were sharp at the opening kickoff and pounced on the struggling Packers (0-4) by forcing a Favre fumble on the third play of the game. Carolina scored three plays later for a quick 7-0 lead.

The Panthers continued to roll, shutting down Packers' running back Ahman Green and Green Bays' running game and forcing Favre to do everything himself. With an inexperienced supporting cast, Favre struggled to do it alone and ended up throwing an interception that the Panthers converted into another touchdown and a 26-7 halftime lead.

It was then that Fox issued his warning: Favre was going to go down fighting.

"I've seen him do it too many times," Fox said. "It's something that we cautioned ourselves about. We expected it to be a tough battle."

It went all the way down to the wire, with Favre needing to convert on fourth-and-three with 1:04 remaining. Favre passed to Donald Driver past the first down line, but Chris Gamble knocked it out of his hands, and it fell incomplete.

Favre nearly stole the victory and finished 28-of-47 for 303 yards and four touchdowns. But that's what opposing teams have come to expect from Favre, a future Hall of Famer.

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL PLAYOFFS

Chicago overpowers Red Sox

Five home runs lift White Sox to Game 1 rout

AP PHOTO

The Chicago White Sox's A.J. Pierzynski, center, is congratulated by Carl Everett, left, and Aaron Rowand after his three-run homer in the first inning against the Boston Red Sox in Game 1 of the American League Division Series on Tuesday.

CHICAGO — The winning socks came from the White Sox. Now maybe it's their turn to end a long championship drought.

A.J. Pierzynski homered twice, Paul Konerko, Juan Uribe and Scott Podsednik also homered, and Chicago scored five times in the first inning Tuesday en route to a 14-2 rout of the World Series-champion Red Sox in their playoff opener.

Jose Contreras pitched effectively into the eighth inning, ending Boston's eight-game postseason winning streak that carried the team to its first title in 86 years last season.

The White Sox hope to end a drought that's even longer, since the days of Shoeless Joe Jackson and their most recent World Series crown in 1917, the last time they won any playoff series at all.

One sign in the stands summed up hopes on the South Side:

"2004: Their Sox. 2005: Our Sox."

Then again, Boston has done fine overcoming October deficits. The Red Sox rallied from three games down to beat the New York Yankees in the AL championship series last year before sweeping St. Louis in the World Series for their first title since 1918.

Game 2 in the best-of-five series is Wednesday at U.S. Cellular Field, with Chicago's Mark Buehrle facing Boston's David Wells.

The White Sox got their first playoff victory since 1993 with a stunning display of power.

Pierzynski's three-run homer off Matt Clement capped Chicago's first-inning outburst. Konerko added a solo shot in the third and Uribe a two-run drive to finish Clement in the fourth.

Podsednik, Chicago's speedy leadoff hitter who didn't have a homer all season, hit a three-run shot off Jeremi Gonzalez in the sixth. Pierzynski connected again in the eighth.

Contreras, who was 2-4 with an 11.67 ERA in his career against the Red Sox, allowed eight hits and two runs in 7 2-3 innings in his first playoff start.

Clement, who lost three of his final five regular-season starts, struggled with his control at the outset, hitting Podsednik and Jermaine Dye.

Podsednik stole third and after Konerko sent a long drive to left that was foul, he put the White Sox ahead with an RBI grounder to third.

Carl Everett followed with a single before Aaron Rowand sent an RBI single over shortstop for a 2-0 lead. Pierzynski, a veteran of playoff games with Minnesota, lined his three-run homer to left-center.

Trot Nixon singled in the fourth and, after Jason Varitek dropped down a bunt for another hit, Chicago third baseman Joe Crede kicked the ball as he was trying to pick it up and both runners advanced on the error.

Contreras, who tied teammate Freddy Garcia with an AL-leading 20 wild pitches this season, threw another as Nixon scored. Kevin Millar followed with a double to right and the Red Sox were seemingly back in the game at 6-2.

But Chicago second baseman Tadahito Ighuchi made a heads-up play on Bill Mueller's grounder, making a rare throw from second to third to cut down Millar and douse the rally.

After Pierzynski doubled to start the fourth, Uribe drove a pitch over the fence in left, giving the White Sox a six-run cushion and finishing Clement's day after just 3⅓ innings.

TODAY'S SCHEDULE

All games on ESPN

- Houston at Atlanta, 3 p.m.
- Boston at Chicago, 6 p.m
- N.Y. Yankees vs. Los Angeles at Anaheim, 9 p.m.

Favre showing his age

SAINTS, from C-5

Walker's (torn ACL) absence in the passing game, and losing starting guards Mike Wahl (Carolina) and Marco Rivera (Dallas) has adversely impacted the offense. Injuries to Clifton and Flanagan might force Sherman to revamp the offensive line for Sunday's game. The Packers are hoping to get Franks back this week. If not, look for Sherman to bolster the roster with a wide receiver via free agency or the team's practice squad. Wide receiver Donald Driver has been the lone bright spot on offense. Wide receiver Robert Ferguson continues to struggle catching the ball.

PACKERS ON DEFENSE

As a whole, the unit is devoid of playmakers. It is solid against the run and suspect against the pass. The defensive line features an eight-man rotation, six of the players are bare minimum wage players. Defensive end Kabeer Gbaja-Biamila, a.k.a. "KGB," had two sacks Monday night and has at least 10 sacks in four consecutive seasons. Although an excellent pass rusher, Gbaja-Biamila is somewhat of a liability against the run. Look for Defensive Coordinator Jim Bates to move KGB inside or outside to take advantage of the best matchup against the Saints. The Packers are somewhat predictable on defense. They seldom blitz and largely play Cover 2 with their cornerbacks and safeties. Cornerbacks Al Harris and Ahmad "Batman" Carroll play aggressive, but each are prone to commit penalties, especially Carroll, a first-round pick in 2004 from Arkansas. Safeties Nick Collins, a second-round pick in April, and Mark Roman (LSU) are susceptible to the deep ball. Diggs, who missed training camp and the first two games with a knee injury, is questionable after reinjuring himself against Carolina.

PACKERS ON SPECIAL TEAMS

Place-kicker Ryan Longwell is reliable from 40-yards in, and he is approaching the 1,000-point mark for his career. Punter/holder B.J. Sander botched a snap on a missed extra-point attempt in a 17-16 loss against Tampa Bay in Week 3. Punt returner Antonio Chatman is adequate but nothing special. Murphy doubles as the team's kick returner but a change will be forthcoming because of his injury.

BY THE NUMBERS: 1 — Times the Saints have played the Packers in a regular-season game at Lambeau Field. The Packers won there 35-34 in 1989. Five of the past six games between the teams have been played at the Superdome.

FYI: Favre, a native of Kiln, Miss., turns 36 Monday.

WORTH REPEATING: "It's so hard right now being 0-4. I've never been 0-4 in my life." — Packers' middle linebacker Nick Barnett.

Sanders' six RBIs give Cards early edge

By R.B. Fallstrom

ST. LOUIS — Reggie Sanders, Chris Carpenter and the St. Louis Cardinals looked every bit like the best team in baseball, even with a shaky ending.

San Diego played as poorly as its record suggests for most of the day. And with ace pitcher Jake Peavy out for the postseason with a broken rib, the Padres might be overmatched.

Sanders hit a grand slam and set an NL division series record with six RBIs, Carpenter pitched six scoreless innings before being replaced as a precaution and the Cardinals built a big lead and held off the Padres 8-5 Tuesday in Game 1.

"It's huge," Sanders said. "Let alone getting one RBI in a week, you get six in one day - and especially under postseason pressure. It's a great day. But it's not over, we've got a long way to go."

Facing a team that won the West despite an 82-80 record, the Cardinals- who led the majors with 100 victories - opened an 8-0 cushion in the fifth inning against Peavy. He was taken to a hospital after lasting only 4⅓ innings.

An MRI showed one broken rib on his right side and the possibility of a second break. A Padres spokesman said the injury would take four to six weeks to heal.

"He felt something on his right side," manager Bruce Bochy said. "He said he felt it during the course of the game."

Even without Peavy, the pesky Padres scored once in the seventh, once in the eighth and then got back into it in the ninth. San Diego scored three times and loaded the bases with two outs before closer Jason Isringhausen struck out Ramon Hernandez.

"We're playing a tough team," Sanders said. "As you can see, they fought to the last out."

Mark Mulder will oppose San Diego's Pedro Astacio on Thursday in Game 2 of the best-of-five series.

Jim Edmonds helped St. Louis with a home run, double and single. Eric Young had a pinch-hit homer in the eighth for San Diego and an RBI groundout in the ninth.

Manager Tony La Russa's team won for the fifth time in six NLDS openers. That includes a victory in 1996 when the Cardinals swept the Padres.

Sanders was on pace for the first 30-homer, 30-steal season of his career before missing 54 games after breaking his right leg in an outfield collision with Edmonds in mid-July.

Oklahoma playing better after tough start

TEXAS, from C-5

Certainly the Longhorns, dominant against just about everybody else during Brown's tenure (their 73 victories in his seven-plus seasons at Texas are more than anyone else in the same span), have not been at their best against the Sooners of late.

"We know there are questions about Oklahoma, and that's fair," Brown said. "We haven't played very well or coached very well on that day."

Indeed.

Two of the past five games wound up in humiliating blowouts - 63-14 in 2000 and 65-13 in 2003.

Last year, Oklahoma won 12-0, handing Texas its first shutout in 24 years.

The Longhorns haven't lost in their 11 games since, including a victory against Michigan in the Rose Bowl to finish last season and one at Ohio State this season.

However, all of the success is overshadowed by the fact that Texas has yet to beat Oklahoma this millennium, Small wonder frustrated Texas fans have taken to wearing "Reverse the Curse" ornaments.

But maybe the real reason is much simpler. At least, former Oklahoma coach Barry Switzer sees it that way.

"Coaching staffs don't get intimidated," he said. "They know going into the game if they've got the best team or not, even though it may not always come out that way. The last few years, Mack has known that he's had the short stick. But he's got the longer stick this time."

That he does.

Texas has bountiful blue-chip talent, big-time playmakers and is brimming with confidence plus motivation.

Chief among them in talent and leadership is quarterback Vincent Young.

"He has absolutely no fear of failure. None," Brown said. "I think that's carried over to the team. They will embrace this week instead of being scared of it."

That's the way Young was talking Monday.

"I'm just burning to get out there and make some noise and answer all the people who think Texas might go out there and be uptight," he said.

The Longhorns are 4-0 following last Saturday's 51-20 victory at Missouri, a solid No. 2 behind Southern California in the rankings.

But that will all come crashing down if they don't win Saturday, not to mention the burden of having to deal with yet another loss to the Sooners.

"It you want to be the No. 1 team, you have to make a statement every week and shock the world," senior defensive tackle Rod Wright said. "People are questioning if this team is going to win this game. I'm thinking, 'How will the world feel if they turn on ESPN and see Texas go out and totally dominate OU?' That will make a statement that the No. 2 team in the country is trying to get to No. 1."

Part of the Longhorns' confidence comes from the fact that this Oklahoma team has not measured up to the powerhouses who have played for the national championship three times in the past five years.

The Sooners (2-2) are unranked for the first time since 1999. Gone are eight of their nine first-team All-Big 12 picks from a year ago, and they rank 11th in the conference in scoring defense and total defense.

"They've got a long way to go," Switzer said. "You can't replace that kind of talent in one year."

Texas knows it, too.

Asked if Texas "smells blood in the water," Longhorns offensive tackle Justin Griffin admitted, "It would be hard not to."

Or as a Dallas columnist wrote Tuesday, Texas has no excuses this time.

Still, Oklahoma is a formidable challenge.

After losing two of their first three games, including a shocking home defeat to TCU, the Sooners used an open date to regroup and last week scored an impressive 43-21 victory against Kansas State.

The Oklahoma players, accustomed to winning, were clearly juiced by the victory.

"Man, it was so exciting," senior co-captain Davin Joseph said. "We always knew we had it, and we felt like we had finally turned the corner and are hitting our stride. It's great that we finally started clicking as a group and getting the chemistry going in time for Texas."

To Oklahoma coach Bob Stoops, it wasn't just that the Sooners won, it was how they won.

"We're getting closer and closer to where we should be," he said. "We're playing smarter, and we're playing harder. When you shore up, have fewer mental breakdowns and reduce your negative offensive plays, you really have a chance to improve."

Brown sees it, too.

"Bob has done an amazing job getting his kids back together," he said. "They used that week off to get themselves back to being the Oklahoma teams we're used to - quick, tough and aggressive."

Plus, Oklahoma has the results of the past five years in its favor.

"It gives us the confidence that we match up well against them, and we understand what they like to do," Stoops said. "Our players have a sense of that."

Still, Texas is a 14-point favorite, the biggest spread in the game since 1970.

And for Brown, that just makes for more pressure.

"The problem for Mac is getting it done," Switzer said. "He's supposed to win, and by more than he was before the season began. If he can't get it done this time, it's really going to eat away at him. I always want Oklahoma to win, but I'm rooting for Mack, too."

Bama, Shula now in driver's seat

FINNEY, from C-5

For a football-crazed state, it's been a frustrating ride.

Inside Texas, the only thing as big, or bigger, than the Dallas Cowboys are the Longhorns.

Mack rides into town to revive a sinking program and, what do you know, in his first two seasons, he beat the Sooners.

What happened next was the problem.

As Brown kept on bringing in quality recruiting classes, as the 'Horns became perennial Big 12 contenders, they could do most anything except beat Oklahoma.

The Sooners have won five consecutive Red River Shootouts.

They won the last one by shutting out the 'Horns (12-0), the first time a Texas team was blanked in what seemed like a thousand years.

The previous year, Texas managed to score 13 points. But Oklahoma scored 65.

Now, at last, in this bitter rivalry, the tables appear to have turned 180 degrees.

Oklahoma opened the season by losing to TCU, 17-10, some say in the biggest upset of the college season.

And the Sooners would later go out to UCLA and get blitzed, 41-24.

Meanwhile, the Longhorns were going to Columbus, Ohio, and perhaps registering the finest victory of Brown's career, 25-22, over Ohio State.

A big game?

Yes.

But, for Brown, big games come in all sizes. Yes, Ohio State is a better football team than Oklahoma. But Ohio State does not live across the state line. The Buckeyes have not beaten the Longhorns five in a row.

This time, the Longhorns are No. 2.

This time, the Sooners are out of the top 25.

This time, the Longhorns have a Heisman candidate in quarterback Vince Young.

This time, the Sooners have no one.

This time, the Longhorns are favored by 13 points.

One point of caution: The 2-2 Sooners played their best game so far last week in whipping Kansas State, 43-21.

After the game, Bob Stoops, coach of the Okies, had the knife out. "We match up pretty well against Texas. Our players have some life. This is a huge game in the Big 12 South.??

A huge game?

Stoops likes this kind of talk during Texas week.

He knows where the pressure lies.

On the back of the coach of the Texas Longhorns.

Meanwhile, an old coach who has won his share of big ones, Joe Paterno, has gotten Penn State off to a 4-0 start.

And a far younger coach, Alabama's Mike Shula, came up with the biggest victory of his career, a 31-3 trouncing of Florida that suddenly made the Tide, not LSU, favored in the SEC West.

It was a bittersweet win, if only because Bama lost standout receiver Ty Prothro for the season with a broken leg. They'll be second-guessing Shula for having Prothro in the game in the fourth quarter as they did last year when quarterback Brodie Croyle was still on the field in the third quarter with his team leading East Carolina, 31-0. At that time, Croyle suffered a season-ending injury, proving that sometimes you can win big and lose big.

Groin pull knocks Smith out of first day

By John Reid
Staff writer

OKLAHOMA CITY — Hornets shooting guard J.R. Smith came away with a slightly pulled groin injury during Tuesday's opening day of training camp at Southern Nazarene University.

As a precaution, Hornets coach Byron Scott said Smith likely will sit out the next three or four days to receive treatment.

Smith is a projected starter, but he is expected to be pushed in training camp by former European star Arvydas Macijauskas, who already has shown he's one of the team's top perimeter shooters.

AT HOME: Veteran forward George Lynch, who on Monday requested the team to trade him, was not at practice Tuesday. Lynch is expected to miss training camp and the preseason because of a heel injury. Hornets spokesman Scott Hall said Lynch went to Dallas, his offseason home, to do rehabilitation work.

IN SHAPE: Forward Kirk Snyder showed Tuesday that he might be the Hornets' best conditioned player. During a sprinting drill near the end of practice, he lapped some teammates. The Hornets obtained Snyder from the Utah Jazz in August as part of a five-team, 13-player deal.

"My job is to stay in shape," Snyder said. "The biggest thing for me is showing what I can do on the defensive end. That's where I want to make my focus."

DISTRACTION FREE: Veteran forward P.J. Brown said it was great to begin the first day of training camp without a major distraction, although former general manager Allan Bristow abruptly resigned last Saturday, citing health concerns.

Before last season's training camp in New Orleans, former star point guard Baron Davis said the franchise didn't do enough in free agency to improve, and he made a trade request through his agent. The Hornets eventually traded Davis in February to the Golden State Warriors for Speedy Claxton.

"'Right now, it's all about basketball and taking care of business," Brown said. "We're trying to be as good of a team that we can be with no distractions. That's the way it should be."

GLAD TO BE BACK: Point guard Alex Garcia, who had a season-ending knee injury last December, has recovered and is aiming to make the roster. He was signed last week, along with free agents Troy Bell, a point guard, and Sean Banks, a forward.

"It's definitely a new year for me," Garcia said. "To get back, I worked every day for three or four hours a day over the past six months."

WHAT'S AHEAD: Scott said several new players picked up things quickly with his offensive system during Tuesday's practice. But Scott said they all have plenty of work ahead.

"We have a lot of things that we want to put in, a lot of things we want to do and a lot of things we want to accomplish, so there are not going to be a lot of days off," Scott said. "There will be days that we take it easy on the guys, and easy is going to be two hours. Other than that, we are going to go the full three hours and sometimes a little bit more."

Chicago trades center Curry to Knicks

From wire reports

Eddy Curry refused to take a DNA test to determine if he has a serious heart problem, so the Chicago Bulls cut ties with the center and sent him to the New York Knicks.

The Bulls also dealt veteran center Antonio Davis to the Knicks for forwards Tim Thomas, Michael Sweetney and Jermaine Jackson on Monday night. Several draft picks were also involved in the trade, according to an Eastern Conference executive who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Bulls general manager John Paxson had warned 10 days earlier that a showdown with Curry was looming, and he didn't hide his frustration Monday.

"All we can say right now is we traded Eddy to the Knicks," Bulls public relations director Sebrina Brewster said.

Knicks spokesman Jonathan Supranowitz said the team declined comment on Paxson's announcement.

The Bulls had insisted that Curry take a DNA test to determine whether he's susceptible to a potentially fatal heart problem. Curry, who missed the final 13 games of the regular season and the playoffs after experiencing an irregular heartbeat, balked, saying it violated his privacy.

Curry has been diagnosed with having a benign arrhythmia.

Several prominent cardiologists cleared him to play, but Barry Maron, a world-renowned specialist in hypertrophic cardiomyopathy, suggested the DNA test.

"Think about what's at stake here," Alan Milstein, Curry's attorney, told the Associated Press recently. "As far as DNA testing, we're just at the beginning of that universe. Pretty soon, though, we'll know whether someone is predisposed to cancer, alcoholism, obesity, baldness and who knows what else.

"Hand that information to an employer," he added, "and imagine the implications. If the NBA were to get away with it, what about everyone else in this country looking for a job."

RAPTORS DEAL ALSTON: The Toronto Raptors traded temperamental point guard Rafer Alston to Houston for guard Mike James.

Alston was involved in several scrapes last season. He threatened to quit the team and the NBA after a Dec. 3 game in Boston and was suspended by the Raptors for two games for conduct detrimental to the club after he walked out during practice.

BOBCATS WILL LET KOPONO GO: Charlotte will not match the Miami Heat's offer sheet for restricted free-agent forward Jason Kapono.

TRAIL BLAZERS SIGN CLANCY: Portland signed forward Sam Clancy to a one-year contract.

Butler familiar with intense workouts

HORNETS, from C-5

Scott has high expectations for Paul, who is expected to be the starting point guard when the Hornets open the regular season Nov. 1 against the Sacramento Kings at the Ford Center in Oklahoma City. During Monday's Media Day, Scott hinted that Paul could be the league's Rookie of the Year this season.

Yet, Paul isn't even sure he'll win the battle for the starting job against Speedy Claxton, Troy Bell and Alex Garcia.

"I want to play, but I do not feel like I have job security," Paul said. "I'm competing against great players, and I'm just trying to show Coach that I'm a leader and I'm going to play as hard as I can."

J.R. Smith, who went through an extensive adjustment period as a rookie during the first two months of the season last year, was impressed by the way Paul handled his first day of work.

Paul and Smith are friends, and they started discussing what to expect from training camp in July when they were teammates on the Hornets' summer league team that competed in Las Vegas.

"I told him everything he needed to know about all the drills," Smith said. "But he looked like a pro out there."

Like Paul, seven other players went through their first training-camp practice under Scott. Second-round draft pick and former LSU player Brandon Bass said it definitely was intense.

"College was hard, but it was nothing like this," Bass said. "Everybody just tried to get through the first day. Coach Scott really emphasis details and doing every drill correctly. I got ready for camp by working out three days a week."

Rasual Butler, who was acquired by the Hornets from the Miami Heat in a five-team, 13-player trade in August, said Scott's camp reminded him of his rookie season with the Heat when Pat Riley was his coach. Riley also was Scott's coach when he played for the Los Angeles Lakers in the 1980s.

"They both think that discipline and conditioning are something very important," Butler said. "It was tough today, but I was able to get through it because of my experience of having already been through a similar training camp."

Athletes deserve season to remember

SALMEN, from C-5

the football team now practices in the morning before going to class in the afternoon.

The team, with high expectations before the season, now has 32 players, fewer than half of the 70 who reported in August. The rest of the players are scattered across the country. Some of the current Salmen players still aren't living in their homes; their families aren't whole again yet.

The existence of Salmen football this season was in doubt because the Spartans' equipment was destroyed by flooding, and even if the school could field a team, there was almost no one left to play. Salmen's district, 10-4A, was decimated; none of Salmen's opponents are able to compete.

"But it was important for us to play," said Coach Jerry Leonard, who created a makeshift schedule and found equipment.

Having a football season was not just important for the team. The fact the Spartans, the most successful program in St. Tammany Parish with three state championships and 14 district titles in the past 16 years, are still playing is almost symbolic. South Slidell, the hardest hit area of the north shore, is where Salmen is located. Salmen football, long a source of pride in the area, may be able to provide an emotional lift, coaches and Salmen administrators said.

When Salmen opened its season Saturday — a month after its scheduled start — it was a triumph even though the result was a 34-3 loss to West Jefferson. Leonard admits he had tears in his eyes when his team ran through the chute.

"These kids have been through so much, and it means so much to them and the school to have them playing again, it got a little emotional."

Monday morning, intensity and Leonard's trademark search for perfection were the hallmarks of the Spartans practice.

"The time for warm and fuzzy is over," he said. "Right now we've got to get ready to play football.'

Monday afternoon, Salmen began school at Northshore High. About a third of the school's population of 1,000 made it back for the first day.

Rumors were rife in post-Katrina St. Tammany that Salmen was so damaged it might never reopen.

"No one ever said that," said Mike Leland, Salmen's athletic director. "But obviously things were bad. Some of these kids had a sense they were losing their school."

So having football has been a source of inspiration for all Salmen students.

As much as anyone, Mike Peterson, the principal at Northshore, gets an assist for keeping the Spartans' program breathing. Peterson let the Salmen officials know he would do whatever he could to help. "He's been a major benefactor," Leland said.

Although Salmen is competing again, there is no mistaking the fact this is not the same highly rated team that the Spartans were pre-Katrina. All-around star player Ryan Eden and quarterback Derrick Sander are playing in Ohio. Others are scattered from Texas to Florida. Some will be back, others won't.

The Spartans who are back, though, are special, said Leonard, who has given them a singular designation. Salmen will wear gold jerseys all season. Traditionally, the Spartans wear black or white. The official Spartan colors are black and gold, but no other Spartans team in the three-and-a-half decades of the program has worn gold jerseys.

"This is a special group," Leonard said. "They've lived through a life-altering experience, but they've come back. I wanted to do something to set them apart from every other Salmen team. I want them to be remembered. They deserve it."

As does the school and the community, he said.

Scelfo hopes to counter fatigue

Wave coach cuts practice, prepares for long season

By Fred Robinson
Staff writer

RUSTON — In Tulane's first practice following three weeks of road games, two of which it was considered the home team, Green Wave coach Chris Scelfo said it is time to start easing up and preparing for the long haul.

Saying his team is beginning to show signs of tiring, Scelfo cut Tuesday's workout by about 15 minutes. He said he would do the same for today's practice and follow that routine the rest of the season.

"I think it's taken a toll,"Scelfo said, referring to the team's bus rides the past three weeks. "We're going to cut back on practice today and (Wednesday). What we miss in assignments and repetition, I think we'll make up in freshness."

Scelfo said the sluggish performance by the Green Wave in its 28-21 victory over Southeastern Louisiana convinced him the reduction is needed. The team will be traveling again this weekend, going to Lafayette on Friday where it will play host to Houston on Saturday evening.

"Last Saturday, I thought our team was tired," Scelfo said. "It came out and really played well early, and kind of ran out of gas. I've never driven 5½ hours home after a homecoming game. I had trouble, and that's me. So I know the kids are tired. Our football team has been through a lot, and I think it showed up Saturday."

The freshness will come in handy. The Wave, which doesn't have an open week during the next two months, begins a four-game Conference USA stretch, including its next two games against Houston and Texas-El Paso. The Miners and the Cougars were picked to finish first and second in C-USA's West Division in the league's preseason poll.

Tulane was picked third.

BACK IN SHAPE: Going through knee surgery for the second consecutive year during fall drills only slowed down Bubba Terranova.

Terranova, the only senior wide receiver, had the biggest game of his career against SLU. He caught four passes for 120 yards, including one for a 74-yard touchdown.

"He's always been a guy you can count on,"offensive coordinator Frank Scelfo said. "(SLU) gave us an opportunity to get him the ball. He has great hands, runs a great route and is always assignment-sure."

Terranova's career-best would have been better had it not been for a holding call on the Green Wave's second possession of the third quarter. A 29-yard reception was nullified.

TREASURE HUNT: Like so many people affected by Hurricane Katrina, returning home last week prior to the game against SLU wasn't pleasant for defensive coordinator Eric Schumann or linebacker coach Garrett Chachere.

"It looked like a giant went in there and made a big mess of things,"said Chachere, who lives close to the London Avenue canal.

Schumann, who lives in Arabi, said his apartment ceiling had fallen to the floor. He was able to find his watch and ring from the Green Wave's 2002 ConAgra Hawaii Bowl victory, but his most-valued possessions were not found.

"Last Saturday, I thought our team was tired. It came out and really played well early, and kind of ran out of gas. I've never driven 5½ hours home after a homecoming game. I had trouble, and that's me. So I know the kids are tired. Our football team has been through a lot, and I think it showed up Saturday."

A gold watch and 1978 ring presented to him by former Alabama coach Paul "Bear"Bryant are missing.

"You always have hope before going in,"Schumann said. "I knew we had water, but you hoped there was only five feet of water."

D-line leading charge for LSU

By Jim Kleinpeter

BATON ROUGE — Note to all the LSU fans who long for an improved defense: Stop scouring the secondary and look a little closer to the ball.

If any part of the LSU defense asserted itself in Saturday's victory against Mississippi State, it was the front four — or eight if you want to count the non-starters.

Even before the Bulldogs top rusher, Jerious Norwood, left the game with a mild concussion, LSU's defensive line had set the tone for the game.

Mississippi State was held to 56 yards rushing, 36 of which came in the last quarter. Norwood finished with seven carries for nine yards. The seven†sacks by LSU were all by linemen, and the constant pressure forced several incompletions.

Defensive tackle Kyle Williams said it's not just the line play. He said fans should expect to see incremental improvement each week.

"Everything defensively kind of took a step forward this week," Williams said. "ÖThings are starting to click a little more, and you can especially see it in the games. The Arizona state game was bad. The Tennessee game was good then bad, and then the last week we played pretty good all game."

The line stood out among them all. Defensive tackle Claude Wroten had a team-high seven tackles, two of which were sacks, and end Melvin Oliver had six tackles and two sacks. Ends Ryan Willis and Chase Pittman and tackle Glenn Dorsey had one sack each.

Linebacker Cameron Vaughn and the LSU defense showed marked improvement this past Saturday, yielding a touchdown to Mississippi State.

LSU's pass rush was effective in the opener at Arizona State but showed some improvement against Tennessee.

"I think it's just the idea that we're coming after them a little more regularly," said LSU coach Les Miles. "I think we're putting more pressure on them, and the guys up front expect themselves to get to the quarterback and understand how important that is for the team."

Williams said the first two opponents were more wary of LSU's pressure and placed a great deal of strategic importance on keeping the quarterback protected.

"Tennessee and Arizona State squeezed the protection a lot and left backs in to chip on our rushers," he said. "We were still able to get to them some during the Tennessee game, though we didn't get many sacks. Mississippi State decided they were going to run their offense to the death.

"A team that tries to block us with five offensive linemen against our four, we're going to be able to get good pressure."

Williams said he didn't know what to expect from the Vanderbilt game plan. The Commodores have two seniors on the offensive line, and quarterback Jay Cutler, the SEC leader in passing yards per game, isn't easy to bring down. Besides his scrambling and running ability, Cutler is 6 feet 4 and 225 pounds. In five games, he's been sacked seven times.

"He will hold the ball; he will take a hit to be able to get rid of the ball," Williams said. "We have to work hard on getting to him and containing him, because he can run. He's got real good pocket presence, real calm in the pocket."

ROUGH CAREER: Norwood is fifth on State's career rushing chart, but no thanks to LSU. After Saturday's performance, he finished his four games against LSU with 25 carries for 17 yards — and one giant headache.

DROUGHT: Vanderbilt hasn't appeared on ESPN or ESPN2 since 1999, when the Commodores lost to Kentucky, 19-17.

Flooded homes need wiring inspected

Electricity 'more than likely' can be restored soon

By Leslie Williams
Staff writer

New Orleanians returning to homes flooded by Hurricane Katrina must have their homes inspected by a licensed electrician before power can be restored, a spokeswoman for Entergy New Orleans said Wednesday as residents returned to areas soaked by the Aug. 29 storm.

The wiring may have been compromised in flooded homes and at homes where water entered through damaged roofs, Amy Stallings said. If service were restored to homes with damaged wiring, fires could result, she said.

After a home has been inspected, the electrician's work must be reviewed by the city's Department of Safety and Permits. Either the department or electrician then has to notify Entergy that it's safe to provide power to the home, she said.

"Power can be restored to an individual home," Stallings said.

Unlike the unflooded parts of the city where the lights came on in an entire block or a neighborhood, she said, "it's house by house."

Tax base drying up with floodwaters

That puts assessors in unique position

By Gordon Russell
Staff writer

If there's a silver lining for those who lost their homes to Hurricane Katrina, it's that tax bills on decimated properties in all likelihood will be small to nonexistent next year.

Of course, the sudden collapse of the revenue stream that flows from property tax is not at all good news for the governments that depend on it, particularly at a time when sales-tax revenue, the biggest source of money for most municipalities and parishes, have shriveled to a pittance in the storm's wake.

After a news conference Tuesday in which New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin announced the city was laying off about half its 6,000 employees, Finance Director Reggie Zeno explained that the city's sales-tax revenue had fallen from about $13 million per month to almost nothing. The layoffs were expected

For three days, Maurice Brown waded through the dirty floodwaters of Violet, helping stranded neighbors as he made his way out of the parish. He eventually found a ferry to higher ground and a bus, that, as luck would have it, took him to the Houston Astrodome.

Three weeks later, he has a new future in Houston, complete with a new apartment and an active job hunt.

"I'm not going back to Louisiana until everything is straight," said Brown, who is now looking for a job as a carpenter's assistant. "I'll be here two years, maybe permanently if things turn out right. God gave us a fresh start here."

But Donyeln Howard, 39, who drove out of New Orleans in her truck and eventually found her way to the Cajun Dome in Lafayette, has been in shelters since Sept. 8. Howard is living with her 70-year-old mother, 20 relatives and about 900 other evacuees. She has three changes of clothes, a Ford pickup, a sore back from sleeping on a cot and a single FEMA check.

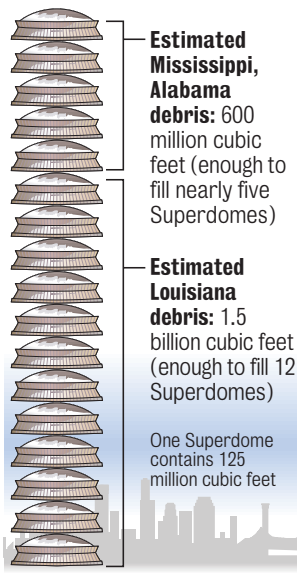
They line up every morning along Marconi Drive, a staging area better known for the huge Endymion floats that assemble there before the super krewe rolls on the Saturday before Mardi Gras.

But these vehicles — hundreds of hauling trucks from all over the nation — are here for a less jolly purpose: waiting their turn to participate in post-Katrina debris-removal, an operation of truly epic proportions.

"This is my first time doing it. The guy I work for, he wanted to try it, see how it is," Jamell Yates, 31, a hauling company worker from the Atlanta area, said Monday as he waited for his truck to reach a check-in stand between a collapsed building on the Delgado campus and splintered oaks in City Park. "He said we won't be able to go home for at least 35 to 45 days. He said we will go home for Thanksgiving, though."

Others scoff at that timeline. They expect to be pulling tree limbs and construction debris out of New Orleans neighborhoods for 18 months to two years, especially if government agencies authorize the demolition of thousands of homes in the most flood-damaged sections.



Brand Stallings, a 38-year-old debris hauler from Greenwood, Ark., didn't flinch at the notion of spending two years,

Nagin pushes package of tax incentives

He hopes breaks will rebuild city

By Frank Donze
Staff writer

As he tries to reassemble a shattered city, Mayor Ray Nagin says New Orleans is not looking for a "handout" from the federal government, only a "hand-up."

But a closer look at the wish list that Nagin has submitted to President Bush shows that he's asking for quite a handful, from a state-of-the-art light rail system linking New Orleans and Baton Rouge to a new and improved flood protection network equipped to handle a Category 5 hurricane.

But the centerpiece of the mayor's request for aid is a package of tax incentives designed to fuel the repopulation of a city that, five weeks after Hurricane Katrina forced an unprecedented mass evacuation, is now home to about 75,000 residents.

Under the proposal, which Nagin outlined last week as he introduced a 17-member blue ribbon commission charged with mapping a strategy to rebuild the city, anyone who lives and works in New Orleans would be eligible for a 50 percent federal tax credit on total taxable wages. The mayor said he wants a cap of $50,000 for individuals and $100,000 for couples who file joint income tax returns.

The program, which Nagin has dubbed the Katrina Tax and Jobs Incentive Zone, also would offer a break for companies that operate in the city now or decide to locate in New Orleans in the future.

The plan would afford all New Orleans-based businesses a 50 percent federal income tax credit on their total payroll for employees who live and work in the city. That credit would be capped annually at their total tax liability, which means a business would not be able to save more than it owes in taxes.

Under his plan, Nagin said, the tax credit could not be transferred to a third party or credited to a prior or future year.

"The most you could get is a zero federal tax environment in any one year," he said.

Nagin said he wants the tax breaks to remain in place for seven years, or until New Orleans' population reaches its pre-Katrina level, whichever comes first. The most recent census figures pegged the city's population before the storm at 469,000.

The message to the president and Congress, Nagin said, is "Help us create the right environment, and we'll take it from there.

"We don't want to be an undue burden on the federal government, but we do think that we contribute to this nation. We contribute mightily to this nation and we deserve to be treated accordingly."

And when it comes to direct assistance to reconstruct the city's infrastructure, Nagin said he is seeking the White House's commitment for a formula that provides New Orleans with its fair share.

Nagin said he wants an "allocation of federal dollars that is based upon citizens being displaced and/or businesses or residents that were flooded or destroyed compared to the totals in each affected state," whether it is Louisiana, Mississippi or Texas. "Let's not divert very needed funds from the areas that are most affected."

Nagin's proposed tax incentives are similar to those included in a plan unveiled this week by Gov. Kathleen Blanco to lure people and businesses back to storm-ravaged areas of Louisiana.

But there are significant differences.

For example, Blanco's ideas include the option to sell the tax credits to a third party, who then could provide upfront cash to storm victims.

And while Nagin's plan is specific to New Orleans, the governor has not defined which areas of the state would be eligible for the breaks.

In most cases, the changes will need the support of Louisiana's congressional delegation. Both Blanco and Nagin have been working closely with U.S. Sens. Mary Landrieu and David Vitter on their respective plans.

As for any direct help from City Hall for the business community, Nagin said it's not going to happen any time soon.

"If you're talking money, the city's broke," he said. "So that's pretty much out."

Nagin said his administration is available to offer assistance on how to access money through the state and the federal government, but that local tax breaks are out of the question.

"We don't have any tax revenue so how can we give tax breaks?" he asked. "The city's in a reconstruction mode just like the businesses. And we'd love to help them, and we're going to try to work with them to come up with whatever incentives we can afford. But right now we can't afford much."

Nagin said he understands the frustration that business owners must feel as they struggle to get back on their feet. But he is asking them to be patient.

"We're going to try to rebuild this city as fast as possible," he said. "And we hope they're going to be flexible enough to understand that we are in a rebuild mode and this is not normal conditions."

Some N.O. water could soon get OK

Certification key to bringing residents back

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — The state health department expects to begin this week certifying the water in some areas on New Orleans' east bank as safe to drink, Mayor Ray Nagin and agency officials said Wednesday.

One of the major challenges confronting the city's effort to bring back residents has been the questionable condition of the tap water, which officials have warned is not yet drinkable on the east bank of the city and may not even be safe for contact.

But Nagin, appearing at the state Capitol to speak with state lawmakers, and a spokesman for the Department of Health and Hospitals said they are hopeful that clean water certifications for some neighborhoods will be issued as early as today.

Only some areas of the city would have clean water, and the health agency would designate which areas. More areas would be certified in phases as water pipes are fixed and more testing is done. Water on most of the West Bank already is certified as clean for drinking, and well as in many areas of Jefferson Parish.

Information on drinking water in the New Orleans metro area is available by checking the state health agency's Web site at www.dhhemergencynews.com.

Monique Harden, a director of the public interest group Advocates for Environmental Human Rights, said she is concerned that the city's drinking water supply is compromised by breaks in water mains and pipes, and that any clean water certifications need to take that in consideration.

The state health agency said its certifications would be based on the quality of the water at the tap, not just at the water plants.

Razing of N.O. public hospitals urged

Buildings sustained millions in damage

By The Associated Press

BATON ROUGE — The two public hospitals in New Orleans — Charity and University — should be torn down because damage from Hurricane Katrina left them "dangerous, dangerous places," the director of Louisiana's charity hospital system said Wednesday.

"The Big Charity and University Hospital buildings were issued their 'death warrant' by Katrina and the cataclysmic floods it spawned," Donald Smithburg told the Louisiana State University Board of Supervisors.

"Even before the storms, these old facilities were on the ropes," he said, noting that Charity was built in the 1930s and University in the 1960s.

LSU officials had been pushing to replace the outdated facilities before the hurricane hit. Two weeks ago, they went to Washington to plead their case for federal money to build new facilities.

The LSU Board must approve any demolition or rebuilding plans.

Charity, a distinctive 20-story Art Deco hospital, opened in 1939, four years after Huey P. Long was killed, and once was the nation's second-largest hospital, with nearly 2,700 beds.

"They're moving toward implementing a plan they've been talking about for some years, for a new Level 1 trauma and adjacent 450-bed hospital, as well as clinics throughout New Orleans," said Charles Zewe, spokesman for the LSU system.

LSU also wants to replace Earl K. Long Hospital, the public hospital in Baton Rouge, with a new 450-bed hospital.

There's no word yet on when the LSU Board might be asked to approve such plans, Zewe said.

In the meantime, medical needs are being handled in a MASH-type unit at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center. A second is about to go up in a parking lot across the street from University Hospital. "We hope by Christmas to have as many as 200 beds in that facility," Zewe said.

An LSU news release sent out Wednesday called the 1,000-bed Navy hospital ship Comfort "Floating Charity," although a military spokesman had said earlier in the day that it might soon be heading back from New Orleans to Baltimore, its home port.

"The Comfort has not been very busy because not many people are in the city," Zewe said. "Our people anticipate it'll get a lot busier."

He said the Navy said it would stay for at least two weeks.

Smithburg, chief executive officer of the LSU Health Care Services Division, said flooding and wind did more than $340 million in damage at Charity Hospital, and another $105 million at University Hospital.

The two hospitals usually treat more than 500,000 patients a year.

Smithburg said they may not look much worse than before the flood, but it's deceiving. "The buildings have unsafe air to breathe, pervasive mold growing, and mechanical systems that were completely destroyed by the storm," he said.

He said they don't have the environmental, structural or mechanical capacity needed for modern health care.

"We are going to build newer, more modern facilities that will withstand the test of time. They will withstand the next storm, and the one after that," Smithburg said. "Charity and University have anchored the health care system of southern Louisiana for over 100 years. We believe they should be replaced quickly to ensure they provide health care for the next 100 years and beyond."

Charity Hospital is also among hospitals being investigated by the state attorney general because patients died there during the storm.

Attorney General Charles Foti is looking into whether six hospitals and 13 nursing homes mishandled evacuations of patients, abandoned them during Katrina or euthanized people to spare them further pain when rescuers didn't arrive.

At least 140 elderly patients in New Orleans nursing homes and hospitals died in the storm and its aftermath; dozens more who were living independently may have perished.

WAR IN IRAQ

N.O. soldier killed in attack on base in Iraq

Sergeant's post hit by 'indirect fire'

A New Orleans soldier has been killed in the line of duty in Iraq, the Department of Defense announced Wednesday.

Staff Sgt. Jens E. Schelbert, 31, died in Ar Ramadi, Iraq, on Oct. 1, when his operating base was attacked by enemy forces using "indirect fire," a Department of Defense news release said.

Schelbert was assigned to the 2nd Battalion, 69th Armor Regiment, 3rd Brigade, 3rd Infantry Division, Fort Benning, Ga.

Further details were not available late Wednesday.

Amtrak to resume service from N.O.

Routes include Memphis, Chicago, Atlanta, N.Y.

Amtrak plans to resume train service from New Orleans on Sunday, the first rail passenger service since Hurricane Katrina hit the region.

The City of New Orleans will begin running again to Memphis and Chicago, while the Crescent will resume its route to Atlanta and New York, Amtrak said Wednesday.

Amtrak said service on the Sunset Limited, a three-day-a-week train from Orlando, Fla., to Los Angeles will remain suspended. Amtrak said service would be resumed later on that route to Beaumont, Texas, and Houston, but eastern service will not begin until at least 2006 because of extensive damage to tracks and bridges owned by CSX Transportation.

Jackson wants cleanup done by local workers

He's got buses to pick up evacuees

By The Associated Press

The Rev. Jesse Jackson, decrying what he claims is a lack of local labor taking part in hurricane cleanup efforts, said Wednesday that he plans to bus evacuated residents back to New Orleans.

Jackson said the federal response to the hurricane has enabled large government contractors to win no-bid contracts that could instead be serviced by local residents who now are unemployed and living in shelters around the country.

"We're talking about cleanup, debris removal, driving trucks, driving bulldozers — these are skills within the realm of people who are being victimized by this crisis," he said.

Jackson said emergency workers and contractors have inundated the city, and displaced residents living on military bases and in hotels around the nation could use similar accommodations in and around their native city.

Jackson said a caravan of buses will leave Sunday or Monday from Chicago to pick up men and women during stops in St. Louis, Memphis and Jackson, Miss., before heading to New Orleans. He said his Rainbow/PUSH Coalition will work with officials from New Orleans to help the residents get job training and work repairing their city. He had no specific estimate of how many people or buses would be used.

Sally Forman, spokeswoman for Mayor Ray Nagin, said she could not immediately comment on Jackson's plan because her office had not been told about it.

Tropical Storm Tammy threatens Fla. coast

It's unlikely to reach hurricane strength

By Ron Word
Associated Press writer

JACKSONVILLE, FLA. — Tropical Storm Tammy churned off the north Florida coast on Wednesday, packing winds of 45 mph, dumping heavy rain in spots and cranking out waves up to 4 feet high, forecasters said.

A tropical storm warning was issued from Flagler Beach, north of Daytona Beach, to South Carolina's Santee River. The warning means tropical storm conditions were expected within 24 hours.

Tammy was centered about 20 miles northeast of Daytona Beach at 2 p.m. and was moving north-northwest at 14 mph. It was expected to continue moving parallel to Florida's east coast while gradually slowing its forward motion.

Robbie Berg, a meteorologist at the National Hurricane Center in Miami, said that because Tammy will spend so little time over water, it is unlikely that it will reach hurricane strength of 74 mph. He said it was hard to forecast where Tammy would make landfall because "one slight variation in its track could bring it onshore."

Seven hurricanes have brushed past or hit Florida in the past 14 months, including three this year.

Truck drivers 'are chasing these storms'

working 12 hours a day, in one of the dirtiest storm-recovery tasks.

"I'll take 20 years of it if the money's good," he said.

Plenty of money will be spent in this debris-hauling program directed by the Army Corps of Engineers. But just how much will be made by equipment operators and laborers who have descended on Orleans Parish —more than 1,000 by some estimates, in several hundred vehicles — is a matter of conjecture, linked to the size and expense of individual trucks and the productivity of their crews. A driver or chainsaw operator may earn $250 or more a day, a flag-holder $100 to $150 a day, workers say, while far more may be earned by owners of trucks and other heavy moving equipment.

But Rodney Thompson, a hauler from West Monroe, cautioned that some of those who invested heavily in new rigs before coming to New Orleans face a risk of losing money if they can't keep costs down or don't earn as much as expected.

"I'll stay until I start losing money," he said.

The haulers serve as frontline cleanup forces for Tennessee-based Phillips & Jordan, a disaster-recovery company hired by the corps to remove Katrina's New Orleans debris under a contract that could pay as much as $500 million, according to news reports. Phillips & Jordan has in turn hired four companies in the New Orleans region to take a direct role in running a cleanup operation. Over time, the operations will move in stages through removal of downed trees and limbs, construction debris and, ultimately, ruined buildings that must be demolished, according to Rookie Tadlock, a supervisor with one of the four local companies, Durr Construction in Harahan.

Tadlock said there has been no difficulty finding enough haulers to perform a cleanup task that he expects his company to be involved in for "six months to a year, maybe longer."

Word spread quickly around the country about the chance to make money in the wake of the disaster, he said. "Man, these people are chasing these storms," Tadlock said. "Every day, we've had about two miles of trucks line up, waiting to get checked in."

Some of the truck drivers say they have slept in their cabs, taking no chance on losing their place in line at the staging area. Dozens of campers parked on the Marconi neutral ground and in Delgado parking lots, without authorization from the community college, according to its chancellor, suggest there will be an encampment of haulers and other disaster operators at the site for some time. Other haulers said they return each night to campers parked at various locations outside Orleans Parish.

The Delgado campus along Marconi buzzed with activity Monday as haulers ate hot dogs and hamburgers served up under a large tent or underwent medical screenings before they were issued work tags. A sign posted outside one trailer said: "Step 2 Medical Interview, must be clean-shaven before you start process (mustache only)."

William Verhine, 31, a debris hauler from Albertville, Ala., who gained experience helping to clean up south Florida after Hurricane Andrew in 1992, said he wants to be a player in New Orleans' recovery.

"These people have nothing left down here, (I want to) come in and help people," he said. "I don't think anybody's seen anything like this before in their life — hopefully never will again."

But Thompson said that while a few of the visiting workers are concerned about New Orleans residents, "99 percent of them are here for the money. That's about it … very few people (haulers) here are from here."

Haulers say they are closely monitored by corps officials or contractors to ensure they wear masks, use flag operators and take other safety measures at cleanup sites. One corps safety officer at Delgado, Sam Crispin, said the agency's message to workers is straightforward: "You came here safe, you're going to go home safe, you're not going to hurt the public while you're here."

A few miles from the Marconi staging area, a line of big trucks loaded with downed limbs snaked along the wide neutral ground near the intersection of Pontchartrain Boulevard and Harrison Avenue early Monday afternoon, adding to what had already become a mound of debris some 35 feet high. Tractors rearranged debris at the site, one of three temporary dumps set up to move New Orleans' massive cleanup effort forward.

The temporary dump and newly constructed gravel parking lots for the hauling trucks overlie what had been a serene and grassy stretch once favored by strollers and dog-walkers. It is faced across the avenue by rows of vacant homes, their doors blown open, floodlines reaching 8 and 9 feet high.

Varying fates await the mountain of debris being collected at the three temporary dumps. Some of the fallen trees and branches will be chipped on site, some hauled to landfills, some burned – though open burning is not an option at the Pontchartrain Boulevard dump, according to Don Cleary, a construction representative with the corps.

This is just the preliminary phase, Cleary said.

Blessed - "ADJECTIVE: highly favored or fortunate; characterized by happiness and good fortune."
Prior to Hurricane Katrina, "blessed" was an often used word. Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.
Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. This is a very limited opportunity, and availability is restricted.
We have employment opportunities available in the Sales Department, including management availabilities.

28,000 still in state's shelters

SHELTERS, from A-1

"There is no way to plan a future in Lafayette," said Howard, who lost her eastern New Orleans apartment and her Chalmette clothing business to Hurricane Katrina. "They don't have housing to offer us. The hotels are full. Some people have means of transportation; some of us don't."

Less than two weeks before President Bush's Oct. 15 deadline to empty all storm shelters, more than 28,000 people remain warehoused in the state's shelters.

Houston, by contrast, emptied its shelters of 28,000 people within three weeks.

State and federal officials in Louisiana and Houston point to two major differences that have kept people in Louisiana shelters while those in Texas have moved: the availability of housing and Houston officials' determination to place evacuees in that available housing.

"In Houston, they have plenty of housing stock," said James McIntire, a Federal Emergency Management Agency spokesman. "The delay in Baton Rouge, Lafayette and other Louisiana communities is due to the (lack of) availability of housing stock."

Apartments, hotel rooms and homes are filled up throughout Louisiana, forcing the state and FEMA to turn to parks of travel trailers that are being set up throughout the state. The first such park will open this week in Baker, just outside Baton Rouge.

But until those parks are set up, the evacuees remain shoulder-to-shoulder in places such as Bossier City, Baton Rouge and Lafayette.

Thinking ahead

Houston officials say keeping evacuees in the shelters was not an option.

As buses of evacuees from the Superdome and elsewhere made their way into Houston, three shelters were set up at Reliant City, a complex of arenas and stadiums including the Astrodome. Evacuees could find housing and register their children for school. At the nearby George R. Brown Convention Center, they could get hearing aids and eyeglasses made within an hour. Both sites had pharmacies, job-placement centers, job fairs and day care. Everything was free.

Yet as the first bus rolled, Houston officials were looking for ways to move the evacuees out.

Hurricane Katrina evacuees were expected to stay a minimum of six months. But that was never the plan for Lt. Joe Leonard of the U.S. Coast Guard, who headed the shelter effort in Houston.

"We were not going to be there six months," Leonard said. "There's better things to do than spend six months in the Astrodome. Three weeks was enough."

A Joint Katrina Housing Task Force was quickly established, comprising city and federal officials and even representatives of the Housing Authority of New Orleans to help assist those residents already receiving federal housing assistance. Houston Mayor Bill White and Harris County Judge Robert Eckels launched a networking effort to help find places for residents to stay in Houston and surrounding areas.

And when those options didn't work, officials at the Reliant Center directed evacuees to Continental Airlines, which was giving people free tickets anywhere in the United States.

"We found problems at every turn. But we were also able to resolve them," said Margaret O'Brien-Molina, a Red Cross spokeswoman.

As the days passed, the officials got more forceful about getting the evacuees out of the shelters. Letters were left on the evacuees' cots saying that it would only be a matter of time before the Reliant Arena would close.

One by one, shelters were closed in Reliant City. Carrollton resident Eddie Johnson was moved out of the Astrodome into Reliant.

"The hospitality in the beginning was so nice," he said. "I guess they're getting tired of us."

Johnson eventually found himself an apartment in Houston.

'We were cattle'

In Louisiana, though, many evacuees who departed ahead of the storm and drove out of town with family and friends found themselves bumped from shelter to shelter. Some were turned away. Others who couldn't get help from FEMA or Red Cross left to find help elsewhere; some went to Texas.

"There's nothing going on to help people in Louisiana right now," said Linda Jeffers, a New Orleans evacuee who lived in Houston shelters before receiving a free plane ticket to Florida as a solution to her homelessness.

After Katie C. Jones heard that others had found help in Houston, she left Baton Rouge and went there for help.

In early September, Jones stood in line with hundreds of people waiting for Red Cross assistance at a Houston church. She'd been waiting for hours, but she was confident that she would be helped.

"I'm here with my seven grandchildren," Jones said. "I ran out of money. I have been to three shelters. I was in a shelter, and I couldn't get any help. That's why I left River Center in Baton Rouge."

Leonard Johnson said he and his family had no choice but to live at shelters in the Leesville area after Hurricane Katrina. He eventually left the shelter for a home in Alexandria because of lack of accommodations.

"We were cattle and they were the herdsmen," Johnson said.

Not all in Louisiana shelters are complaining about the roof over their heads. Those who hope to return to New Orleans or those who have nothing to return to are simply happy to have someplace to stay.

Herbert Johnson, 59, who fled his home on Fourth Street in New Orleans before Hurricane Katrina, hasn't left the Cajun Dome except a brief interlude when the shelter was evacuated for Rita. The truck driver, who is in Lafayette with his wife, Dorothy Johnson, said he had no insurance for his belongings.

"Everybody wants to be at the Cajun Dome," he said, as a hustler sold him a $2 pack of cigarettes. "You eat 24 hours a day. That's what I like about it."

Destination unknown

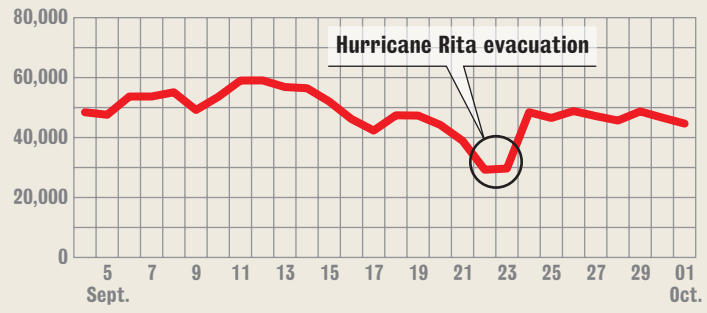
Johnson's time is limited. As in Houston, shelters across the state are beginning to shut down. In the past two weeks, many smaller shelters with 200 people or less, such as those in churches, have been closing down. Until just recently, there were still 40,000 people in shelters across the state.

It's not clear where those people have gone.

Some have gone to hotel rooms, which still house 400,000 evacuees. Although the Red Cross and FEMA announced earlier that they would end a program paying for the 141,300 rooms, they said Wednesday that they would extend the program indefinitely.



Louisiana officials say one reason people have been in shelters for so long is that FEMA was slow to recognize the magnitude of the housing shortage, said Jerry Jones, state facilities director.

Jones said the state has offered up 53,000 acres of state land that could be developed into trailer communities. The

58% of homes still lack power

ELECTRICITY, from A-1

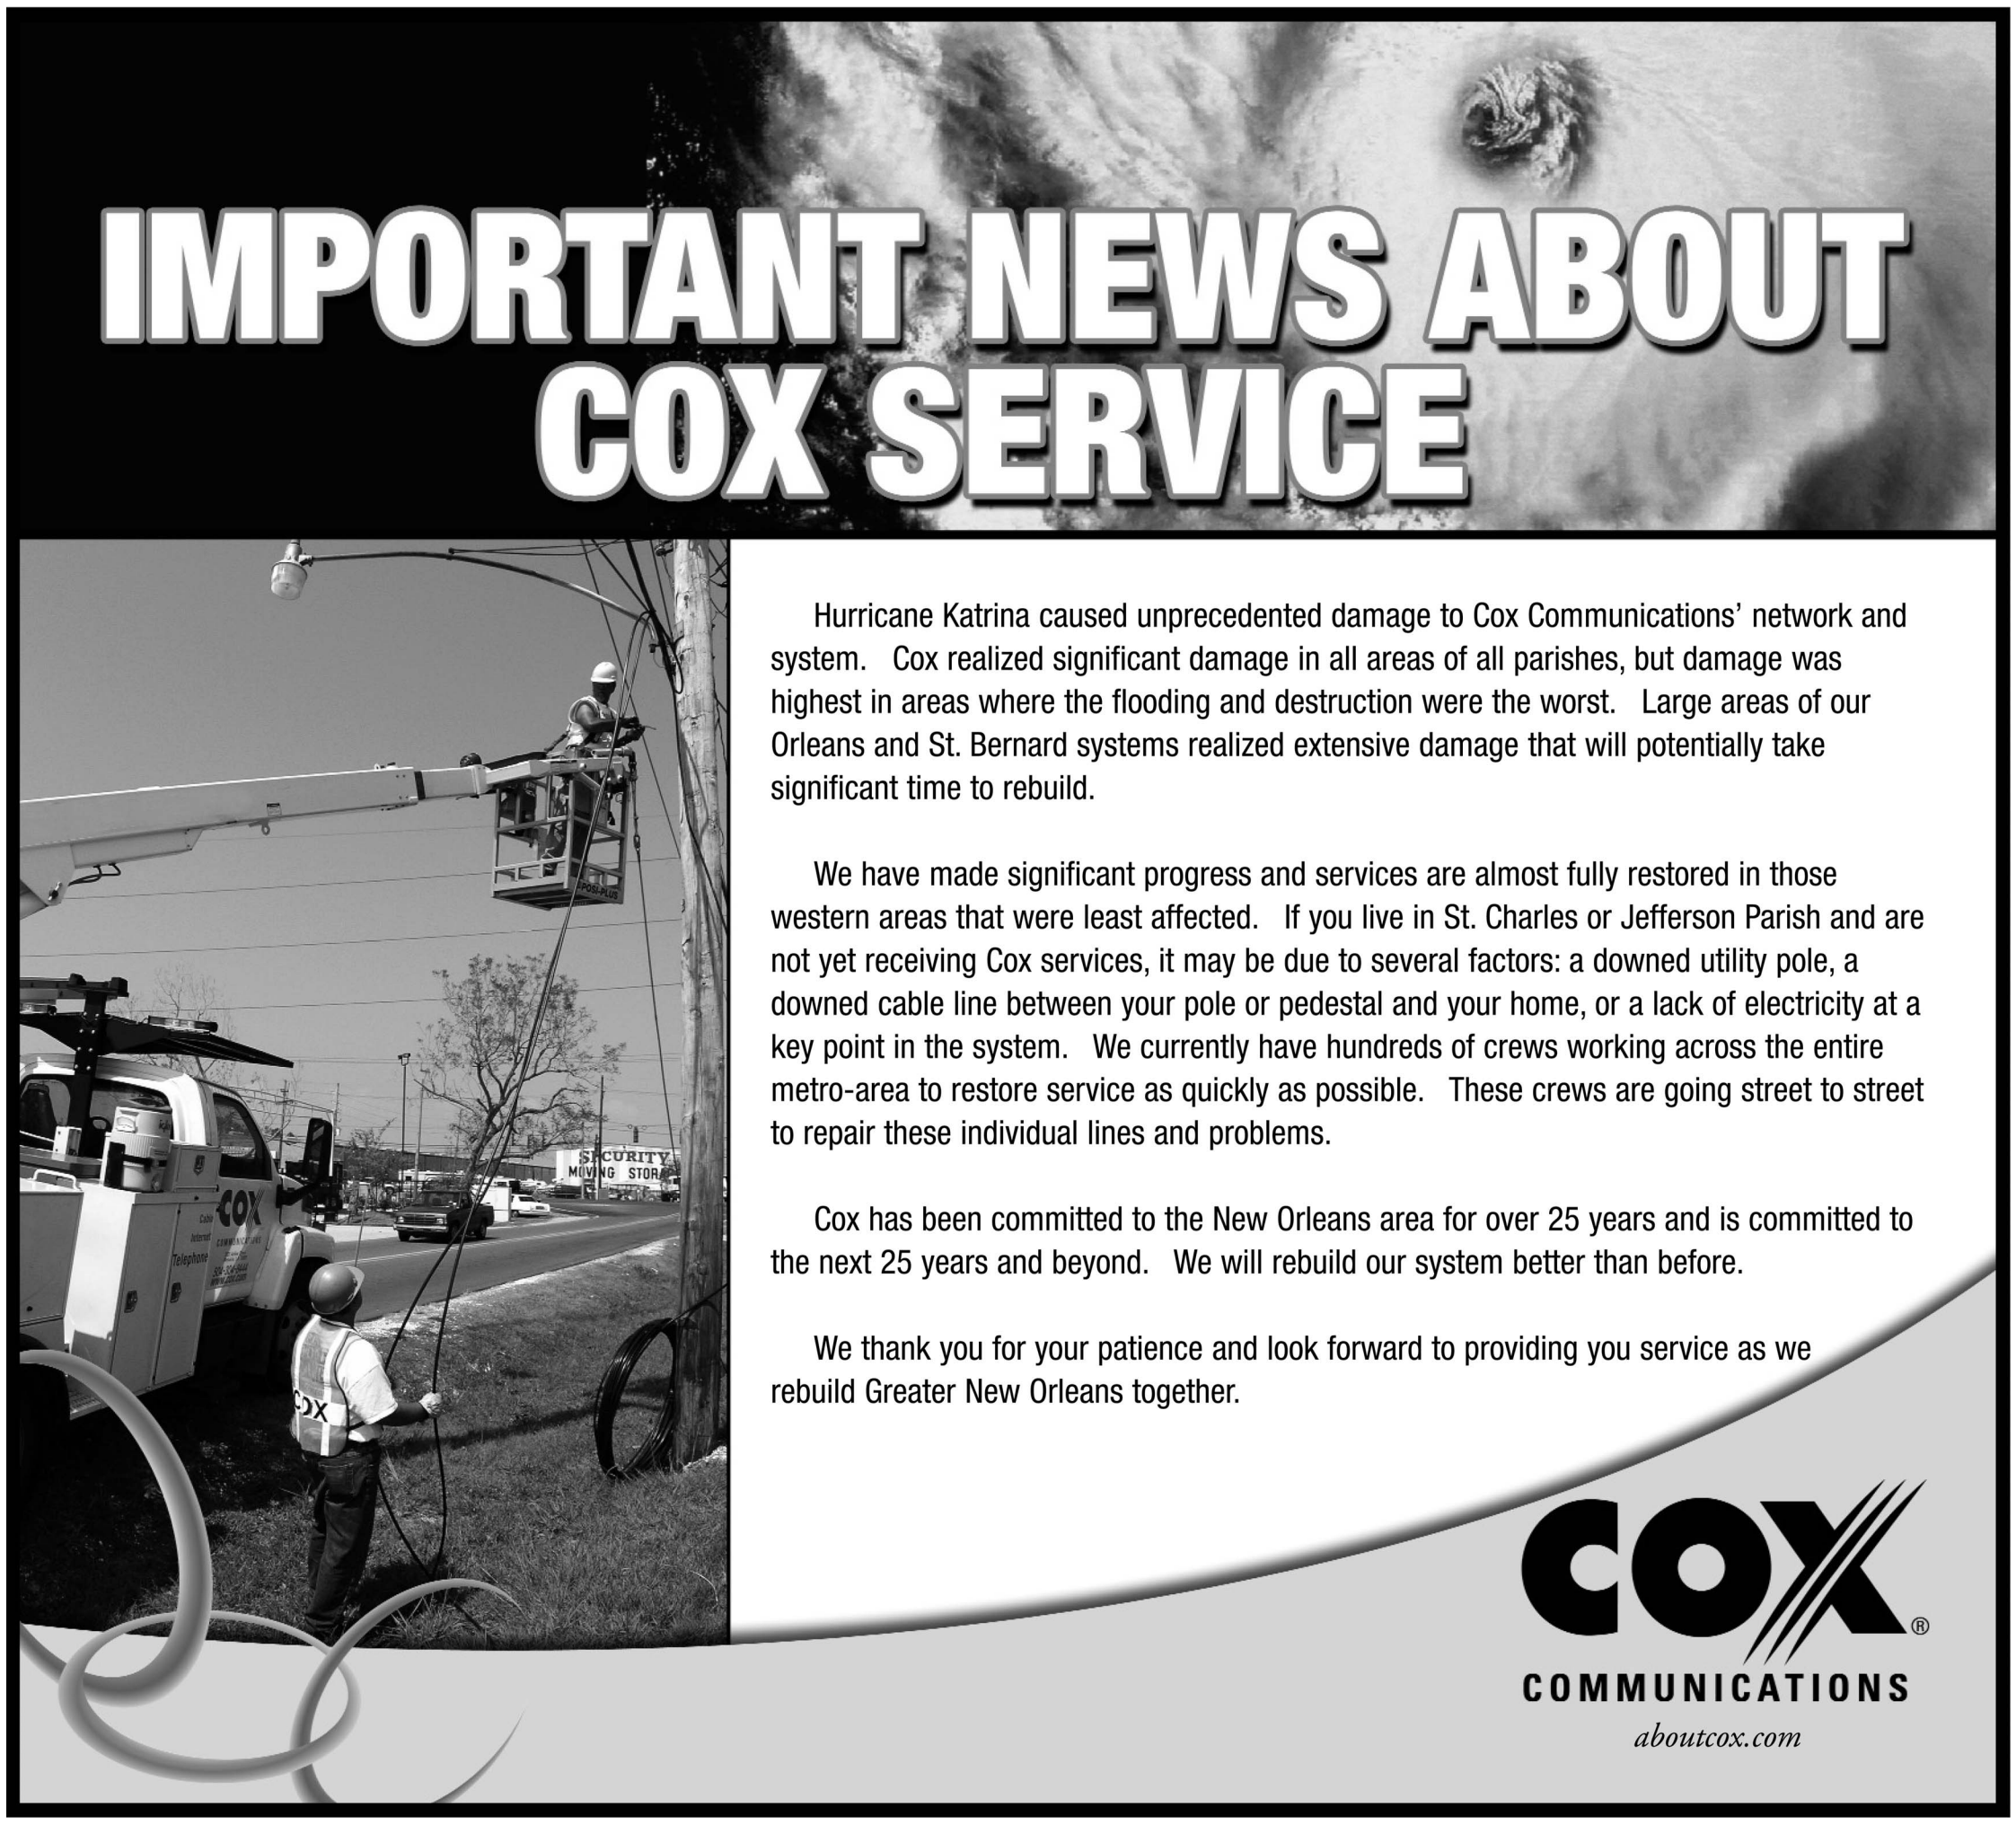
Customers "more than likely" will be able to receive power shortly after completing the inspection process, but in some places workers have yet to repair the system's infrastructure, so restoration will take longer, Stallings said.

About 58 percent of Entergy's 190,000 electric customers in New Orleans were without service Wednesday. Stallings said she does not know how many customers are without service because they have not completed the inspection process, but many have no service because their homes were severely damaged.



Information on repairs in individual neighborhoods can be found at www.entergy.com/content/Corp/EmergencyCtr/NOLA_detail_content.asp.

Electrical service was restored recently to a block in Audubon Place near Tulane University and not long afterward, a home in that block was engulfed in flames. Although the cause of the fire is under investigation, an unidentified agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives said neighbors had reported power surges in the area.

Stallings said Wednesday, "There is no indication that a power surge caused the fire."

In addition to electricians, some Entergy customers will need to hire licensed plumbers, whose work also will need to be approved by the city's Department of Safety and Permits.

Plumbers, she said, should be hired if gas appliances have come into contact with floodwaters or if flooding or structural damage to a home may have "compromised the integrity of gas lines."

Hurricane Katrina caused unprecedented damage to Cox Communications' network and system. Cox realized significant damage in all areas of all parishes, but damage was highest in areas where the flooding and destruction were the worst. Large areas of our Orleans and St. Bernard systems realized extensive damage that will potentially take significant time to rebuild.

We have made significant progress and services are almost fully restored in those western areas that were least affected. If you live in St. Charles or Jefferson Parish and are not yet receiving Cox services, it may be due to several factors: a downed utility pole, a downed cable line between your pole or pedestal and your home, or a lack of electricity at a key point in the system. We currently have hundreds of crews working across the entire metro-area to restore service as quickly as possible. These crews are going street to street to repair these individual lines and problems.

Cox has been committed to the New Orleans area for over 25 years and is committed to the next 25 years and beyond. We will rebuild our system better than before.

We thank you for your patience and look forward to providing you service as we rebuild Greater New Orleans together.

No taxation without habitation

ASSESS, from A-1

to save the city as much as $8 million a month.

Zeno called property tax revenue "next year's problem." But it could be a big problem indeed.

Much of the heart of the city's tax base, from eastern New Orleans to Gentilly to Lakeview, has been decimated by floodwaters. And a provision in Louisiana law requires assessors to reappraise all property that has been "overflowed" by water.

The state Tax Commission, the Legislature, the assessors and local government officials are trying to figure out a solution to the resulting problems; New Orleans officials, the Tax Commission and the city's seven assessors plan to meet in Baton Rouge on Friday at 1:30 p.m.

The goal is to somehow balance two imperatives: that local government secure the money it needs to operate, and that properties be valued fairly.

"Everyone is cognizant of the need for revenue," said Elizabeth Guglielmo, chairwoman of the Tax Commission. "But it must be weighed with the obligation that there be a fair assessment of property."

No small task

Those considerations aside, there's also a massive logistical hurdle facing assessors: how to revalue tens of thousands of properties in a few weeks or months. The task is complicated by the fact that mass appraisal techniques, whereby assessors figure per-square-foot prices for various neighborhoods, may prove useless in some areas. Instead, assessors will have to visit many properties individually, particularly in areas that were damaged but not devastated, to see what shape they're in.

"We want to see what the assessors tell us," Guglielmo said. "Do they have their rolls? Do they have staff to get the rolls out? Can a roll be filed that doesn't reflect the storm damage?"

Already, the tax process has been pushed back to give everyone time to regroup.

On Sept. 23, Gov. Kathleen Blanco signed an executive order that suspended for 120 days a variety of obligations — including the filing of tax rolls, which were coming due — for the assessors for Jefferson, Orleans, Plaquemines, St. Bernard, St. Charles, St. Tammany and Washington parishes.

That will likely mean a delay of similar length before bills are mailed out and revenue starts streaming – or, more likely, trickling – in.

Take the Lakeview area, traditionally one of the city's most stable sources of property tax revenue. Second District Assessor Claude Mauberret said he'll likely leave land values roughly constant but that all improvements in the area — buildings and houses — will be revalued at next to nothing. Given that most Lakeview residents are owner/occupants and thus shielded by Louisiana's $75,000 homestead exemption, the city and other entities that share property tax revenue, chiefly the School Board, will receive almost no money from that area next year, Mauberret said.

According to the city's assessors, the Nagin administration has indicated that it would like to mail out tax bills based on the tax roll that was completed before Katrina hit. They unanimously oppose that idea, saying it would be completely unfair, especially since Orleans is the only parish in the state that requires taxpayers to pony up for the coming year instead of paying for the past one.

"I don't know how the mayor can send bills to Lakeview and expect them to get paid," 5th District Assessor Tom Arnold said. "It's absurd. If you just got a tax bill and you lost your job and your house, how are you going to pay it?"

Arnold noted that the assessors themselves are almost entirely dependent for their operating funds on a small property tax millage. "I may be out of business Jan. 1, too, but that doesn't give me the right to do this," he said.

Brenda Hatfield, Nagin's chief administrative officer, disputed the assessors' contention that the administration wants to send out bills ahead of the revaluation.

"The administration has not taken a position on the timing of the tax bills," she said. "After all, most people in the administration also have been victims of having their homes devastated and truly understand the plight of our citizens. We understand the assessors' and the Tax Commission's concerns, and we will abide by their decisions."

Taking another look

Janet Howard of the watchdog Bureau of Governmental Research said the pending revenue shortfall makes it opportune to revisit the city's unique-in-America system of seven independent assessors, Howard said.

"The dramatic decline in the city's tax base will force them to streamline city government," she said. "Some of the sacred cows, including the seven assessors, are obviously candidates for re-examination. Do we really need, and can we afford, seven chiefs, some presiding over largely decimated areas?"

Arnold said his own district — the West Bank — was little damaged by the storms but that many properties must be revalued, including businesses that were looted or that now have no source of revenue.

"How do you tax them for stuff that doesn't exist?" he asked. "If a guy's out of business, I'm going to send him tax bills?"

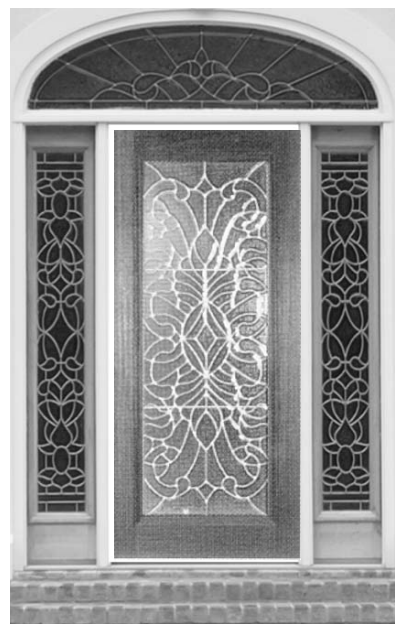
Mauberret, whose district includes Lakeview, the western lakefront and much of Mid-City as well as Treme and the French Quarter, said he plans a drastic revaluation.

"I'm going to reduce Lakeview substantially," he said. "I'm going to reduce Lakeshore (which is on higher ground), but not as much as Lakeview. Lake Vista, the same thing. Mid-City I need to reduce. All the way until the French Quarter. Everything outside the French Quarter is going to get pretty much wiped off the books. And the Quarter will have to be looked at on a case-by-case basis. It's unscathed for the most part, but there will be reductions."

It will be difficult to examine every property in the less-damaged areas, Mauberret said, but homeowners who can show pictures of major damage will get some relief. Those who feel that their homes are overvalued will be afforded appeals, as always, he said.

Mauberret noted that his plans are subject to change — for instance, if the Tax Commission tells him that what he plans to do is improper or illegal. There are also questions about whether homeowners with ruined houses can continue enjoying the homestead exemption, which by law requires that the holder "own and occupy" the property.

"I plan on wiping them (the devastated areas) off unless I get an order not to," Mauberret said. "I'll bring the case to court if I have to."



Third District Assessor Erroll Williams, whose district is by far the largest of the seven, and the most heavily damaged as well — it includes eastern New Orleans, Gentilly and the Lower 9th Ward, among other ruined areas — could not be reached for comment Wednesday. But it seems likely he will pursue a course similar to Mauberret's.

Assessors in the suburban parishes clobbered by Katrina — essentially all of them except St. John the Baptist — likely will follow a course similar to Mauberret's, even though suburban homeowners are technically paying taxes on the past year, not the year ahead.

Plaquemines Parish Assessor Robert Gravolet said even though state law dictates that assessments be based on the value of the property the previous Jan. 1, he doesn't think that would be fair. Nor does he support using a home's pre-Katrina value for the first eight months of the year and using the damaged value for the other four months, a method he said the Tax Commission recommended.

N.O. assessors want panel's order rescinded

ASSESS, from A-10

Those whose homes were destroyed deserve more relief, he said.

"They would pay on the land and maybe a portion of their building, a slab or something," Gravolet said. "If they sign a homestead exemption, for all practical purposes they would probably pay nothing, which would be justified in most people's opinion."

Looking for answers

Guglielmo of the Tax Commission said there may be some solutions in Louisiana law, proposed and on the books, that could help local governments get through the crisis.

For instance, a provision in the state Constitution lets the Legislature postpone tax collections. The state can then be authorized to borrow money on behalf of local governments so they can make ends meet. Guglielmo said she expects that option to be discussed in the upcoming special session of the state Legislature.

Another provision lets taxpayers seek a temporary deferment of taxes and pay by installments over a 10-year period.

Guglielmo said she is researching how other states and jurisdictions crushed by storms or other disasters have handled the problem.

"This is all such uncharted territory, really," she said.

Another unresolved question is what will become of the reassessment of all residential property in New Orleans that was ordered by the Tax Commission earlier this year, before Katrina, on the heels of a series of articles in The Times-Picayune that exposed widespread inequities in appraisals.

Arnold said the assessors want that order — which required up-to-date, uniform rolls by August 2006 — to be rescinded. The matter likely will be discussed Friday.

Howard of the BGR, which has been a persistent critic of local assessment practices, said it would be a mistake for the commission to lift its order. Howard said it might make sense to push the mandate back a few months to give assessors time to catch up with Katrina damage but that she sees no reason to give up on the notion of equitable tax rolls.

"Don't get rid of it," she said. "That problem remains even while we're focusing on this catastrophe. There may even be an opportunity here to really bring in expertise from outside. The assessors may be able to call on the resources of their colleagues on a volunteer basis."

Howard added that the homeowners who were feeling the brunt of the inequities before — chiefly those who bought higher-priced homes in recent years — might be hit even harder post-Katrina, especially if city officials attempt to close the revenue gap caused by the destruction of property by raising tax rates.

If that happens, "The impact of the inequity is going to be even more pronounced" than it already was, Howard said.

Hatfield of the mayor's office said it's too soon to begin talking about things such as tax hikes. The assessors say it's an idea that should be taken off the table before it's even brought up.

"I think there would be a revolt," Mauberret said. "That would be just ludicrous."

"The only way they can roll up the millage would be through public hearings," Arnold said. "Can you imagine the attendance at those public hearings?"

The federal government is going to have to step in and help, Arnold said.

"If the federal government, which helps all these foreign countries, can't do something, I don't understand it," he said. "If the federal government doesn't do it, the city of New Orleans is going to become the town of New Orleans."

Trailer park options sought

first trailer community, built in Baker outside Baton Rouge, has 400 families signed up to move in this week. FEMA plans to build several more trailer parks around Baton Rouge, and at least one in Orleans Parish. State officials would like to see other options.

"FEMA is not real good at thinking out of the box, because they're tied down by their bureaucracy," Jones told a House-Senate budget meeting on Friday. "They're also the only solution we have."

Quality-of-life questions

Life at the trailer parks will mean private sleeping quarters, but the tight rows of campers at the Baker site still won't offer much privacy.

The Baker site is seven-tenths of a mile from the nearest convenience store on Main Street and 1.5 miles from the only Winn-Dixie around. The campsite has no sidewalks or paved shoulder on the road to Main Street, but the state said shuttle buses will be provided.

Jones and others envision the camper-park communities as self-sufficient neighborhoods, complete with schools.

But critics say they will only tax and tap scarce resources in various parishes.

"Why would we want to locate these trailer parks in places where there are no jobs?" asked Rep. Tom McVea, R-St. Francisville, adding that schools and other services in his rural district north of Baton Rouge cannot accommodate newcomers.

Willa Mae Bennett, 35, fled from Hurricane Rita's assault on her Beaumont, Texas, home for Louisiana with her two young children, eventually landing in the Cajun Dome.

Bennett, seated on a sidewalk with Jasmine, 9, and James, 10, shook her head at what she called a complete lack of services for evacuees in Louisiana. She was still waiting for emergency food stamps. "It's only for Katrina victims," she said.

Shelters are no place to stay for long, Bennett said.

"You get somewhere to lay your head and your personal belongings. With no help from anybody else, we can't even ask for more."

Partial twin spans reopening slated for Oct. 31

Westbound bridge's target date is Jan. 14

By Meghan Gordon
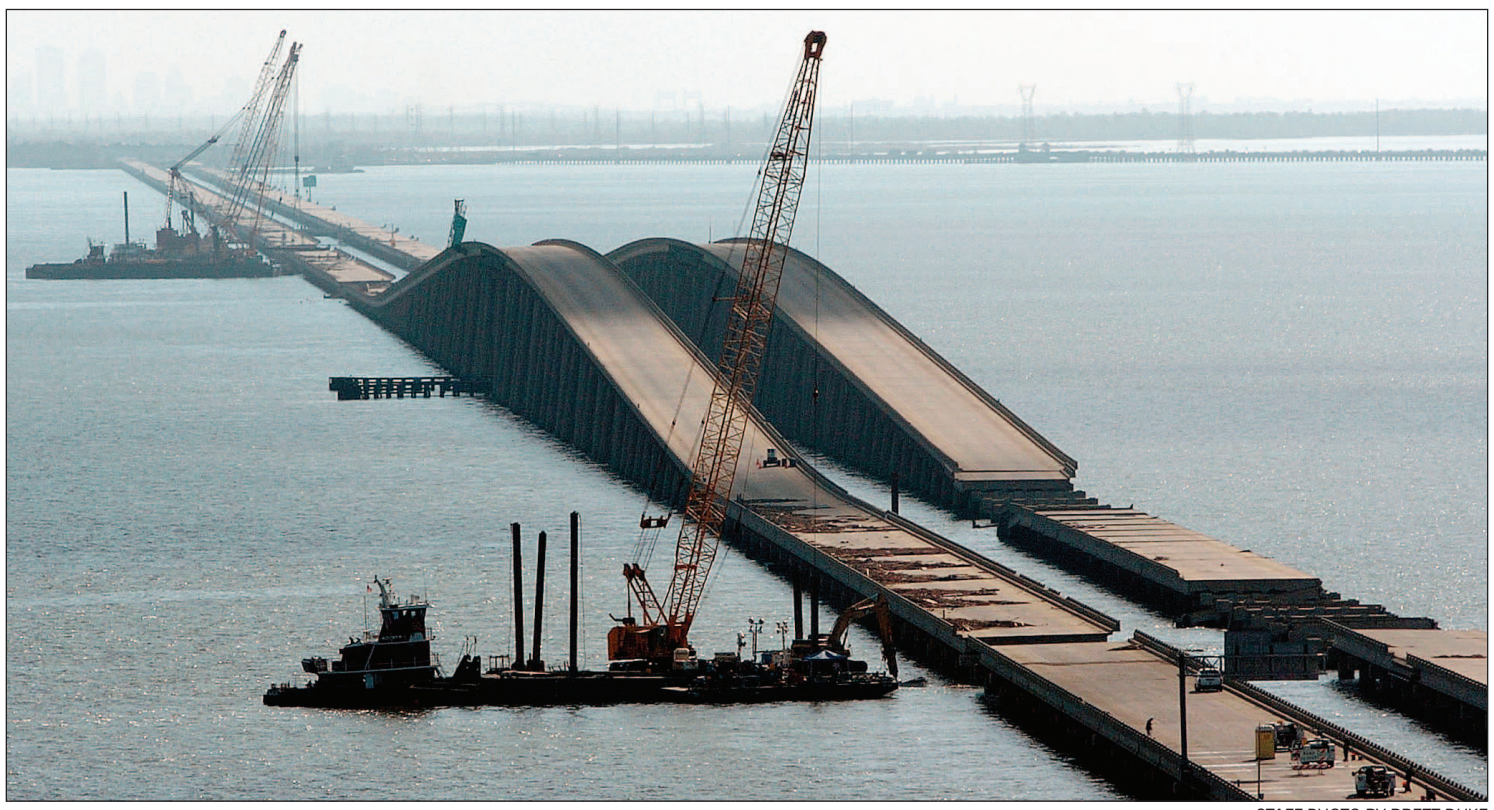
St. Tammany bureau

After flying over the shattered Interstate 10 twin spans, Gov. Kathleen Blanco on Wednesday cast the on-schedule project to restore the bridge as a hopeful sign of the region's economy getting back on track.



Boh Brothers Construction crews were on their 20th day of the 45-day first phase of a $30.9 million contract to restore the two-lane eastbound bridge. If completed on time, two-way traffic will resume on the less-damaged bridge by Oct. 31.

"I'm just as pleased as I can be that we were able to expedite the process of getting a Louisiana firm on site, working as quickly as possible and actually, I think, a little head of schedule," Blanco said from a work trailer on the northern end of the bridge.

Project supervisor John Horn of Volkert Construction Services told Blanco that 171 of the eastbound bridge's 433 spans have been repositioned after the tidal surge from Hurricane Katrina pushed them up to 5 feet out of line. Crews have recovered another 20 of the 39 eastbound spans that fell into Lake Pontchartrain, destroying the 65-foot segments. Fourteen spans from the westbound bridge have been installed on the eastbound bridge, he said.

"We're on schedule and feel really good about finishing within the 45 days," Horn said.

Blanco added: "That's in spite of the fact that Rita killed about four days of your work."

Boh Brothers Construction crews have 45 days to restore the two-lane eastbound bridge of the shattered Interstate 10 twin spans. If the company finishes early, it will get a bonus.

Boh Brothers will receive a $75,000 bonus for each day it finishes early, up to 15 days; or incur a $75,000 fine for every day after Oct. 31.

During the second phase, crews will install temporary bridge panels in place of the 265 missing spans on the westbound bridge by Jan. 14. The span taking motorists into New Orleans sustained the most damage, as the tidal surge whipped back out of the lake, Horn said. On Oct. 4, the state approved a contract change to restore two lanes on that bridge, instead of one mandated by the original contract.

Secretary Johnny Bradbury of the state Department of Transportation and Development said officials were still working to solidify federal financing for a new six-lane structure that will eventually replace the restored twin spans. He said the state is trying to have a contract in place by April for the project that is expected to cost $500 million.

Blanco said the new bridge would correct its predecessor's vulnerability to Katrina's storm surge.

"Where you had the elevation, you didn't have the losses," she said. "We would like to have a bridge that doesn't go out in any category (hurricane)."

Before a new bridge is built, though, Blanco said getting cars back on the twin spans is critical to rebuilding New Orleans and the north shore.

"It will certainly symbolize extensive recovery operations that are already in full play," she said. "We've got a lot of work to do in terms of restoring our housing for our people and things like that. But if our people can't even get into the city or out of the city or get to Slidell or out of Slidell, there's a tremendous amount of commerce that goes on between them just internally in Louisiana between the north shore and the city. We're trying to support both sides of this equation."

Horn supervised the restoration of the I-10 Escambia Bay Bridge near Pensacola, Fla., which suffered a similar fate last year during Hurricane Ivan. He said two-way traffic was restored to that bridge after 17 days, followed by a temporary patching of the second bridge within 63 days.

Lakeview residents learn awful truth

Homes are sludge pits with little to salvage

By Lynne Jensen, Michelle Krupa and Bruce Hamilton
Staff writers

A block from the 17th Street Canal breach that allowed floodwater to rise to the ceiling of their Lakeview home after Hurricane Katrina, Jimmy and Grace Leung came home to New Orleans on Wednesday, among the small contingent of residents who waited for the mayor's OK.

Covered in plastic and crouched over borrowed buckets filled with water, the Leungs cleaned all they could salvage: their daughters' school and music trophies.

"My daughters said don't worry because we are OK," said Grace Leung, a nurse at Charity Hospital. "But I just wanted to get something for them."

While in recent weeks many residents blocked from returning by Mayor Ray Nagin's ZIP code plan had found a way in anyway, Leung said she didn't mind waiting more than a month to visit her house. "Coming back early wouldn't have made a difference," she said.

No proof of ZIP code was needed to enter Orleans Parish on Wednesday, with almost the entire city reopened. The exception is the 9th Ward, still deemed unsafe to visit. Residents from other hard-hit areas - Lakeview, Gentilly, eastern New Orleans and parts of Mid-City – streamed in to have a look, although virtually all of them were in for just the day. Algiers is the only part of the city meeting the dual standard of having power and drinkable water.

The water rose so high inside the Leungs' brick home that it lapped the ceiling and ripped it down over the furniture, crushed into a moldy mess.

"I couldn't recognize my daughter's piano," Grace Leung said.

After cleaning dozens of brass-coated trophies and placing them in the back of their van, the Leungs left their unlocked house and headed back to Lafayette to clean up before picking up their children from school.

"If we can come back, we will build a two-story house and the new piano will be on the second floor," Grace Leung said.

ABOVE, Newlyweds Paola and Jose Corrada embrace in the moldy bedroom of their Lakeview home, their first home together. Residents of Lakeview, Gentilly, eastern New Orleans and parts of Mid-City were allowed to return to their homes Wednesday for the first time since Hurricane Katrina flooded most of the city.

LEFT, Wearing boots that are several sizes too big for her because they were the last pair left to buy, Grace Leung helps husband Jimmy Leung clean their daughter's music and academic trophies in front of their Lakeview home. 'If we can come back, we will build a two-story house and the new piano will be on the second floor,' Grace Leung said.

"I couldn't recognize my daughter's piano," Grace Leung said.

After cleaning dozens of brass-coated trophies and placing them in the back of their van, the Leungs left their unlocked house and headed back to Lafayette to clean up before picking up their children from school.

"If we can come back, we will build a two-story house and the new piano will be on the second floor," Grace Leung said.

Those driving into Lakeview by way of Metairie Road noticed a stark contrast on either side of the 17th Street Canal. In Jefferson Parish, young mothers pushed baby strollers and joggers roamed streets where children played on school grounds and consumers strolled into businesses.

Just across the canal, in Orleans Parish, the houses stood storm-struck and as silent as the cemetery along Metaire Road.

Whether modern brick or post-war bungalow, Lakeview houses suffered the same flooded fate. Many residents who returned for a look hit the highways into town at daybreak in new cars with temporary paper plates. Some chugged along backed-up roadways in first gear in rented hauling vans, hoping to find furniture and clothing worth saving. Few were successful.

Sandy Pitre, a nurse living in Lakeview near City Park, was one of the lucky ones. She had turned the attic space of her pink house on Hidalgo Street into a bedroom packed with antiques inherited and collected over the years. She showed up Wednesday to haul those items to her new home in Thibodaux.

In Mid-City, a smattering of residents returned to salvage items and check on their homes. Several said they cannot live there now, but that is their ultimate plan.

"I think the neighborhood looks pretty good, considering you had a Category (4) hurricane," said Leo Wagmann, who lives in the 3300 block of Esplanade Avenue. "It could be a lot worse."

Wagmann and his son were cleaning his house, which he said his father-in-law built in the 1930s. It survived Hurricane Betsy, he said, and "it can withstand anything."

But floodwater reached about 1 foot high throughout his house.

Waggman returned to New Orleans for the first time Wednesday. He planned to return to Galveston, Texas, where his ailing wife is living, but he vowed to return. "I'm not going to stay (here), but I'm not leaving the city," he said. "It feels good to be home."

On Gentilly Road, Jimmie Jackson and his wife, Catherine, surveyed their looted, damaged shotgun double and lamented their temporary exile. A guard at the state museum in the French Quarter, Jackson had evacuated to Houston after a stint at the Superdome.

He planned to be working at the Presbytere and Cabildo on Monday, but he couldn't stay.

"I feel relieved to be home," he said. "But I'm lost. As soon as I can get back in this city and thrive, it's my intention to do it."

Forgotston blasts re-entry plan

Nagin accused of discrimination

By Martha Carr
Staff writer

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin has been getting it from all sides these days, from critics who say he's moving too fast to repopulate the city as well as those who accuse him of deliberately dragging his feet in a scheme to keep the poor from ever returning home.

But the latest accusation, lodged Sunday in a nasty e-mail by self-appointed government watchdog C.B. Forgotston, apparently struck a nerve.

Forgotston, a resident of Lakeview, accused the mayor of discriminating against white New Orleanians by not including the Lakeview area in his re-entry plan. The e-mail also was sent to eight other public officials.

In fact, under Nagin's plan, white residents as well as African-Americans have been returning in large numbers to parts of the city that did not flood and have already been opened back up: Algiers, Uptown, the French Quarter and the Central Business District.

But Forgotston's focus was on Lakeview, which he described as "the largest, mostly white middle-class area of the city of New Orleans." Under Nagin's plan, Lakeview residents were officially permitted to visit the neighborhood starting Wednesday, though many had jumped the gun.

"There is no other way to describe it," Forgotston wrote of Nagin's timetable, "except as BLATANT RACIAL DISCRIMINATION."

"We keep hearing our public officials tell us that they want us back," continued Forgotston, a lawyer and former lobbyist best known publicly as a ceaseless critic of the gambling industry. "They say they want businesses to open. They say they want things to get back to normal as quickly as possible. Obviously, they aren't talking about a large segment of the white population of New Orleans that makes up

Crystal Philippi were busy packing. "I figured we'd beat the rush," Webster said, gesturing to the still street. "But there's no rush."

The couple remained in the city for a week after Katrina, and said the experience spurred them to move to Sacramento, Calif. "I saw a lot of people revert from humanity to an animal-type nature," Webster said.

A few blocks away, in the 2800 block, two neighbors chatted after cleaning and clearing debris from their yards. Both had been visiting for several days, but their block was still mostly empty.

"I haven't seen many people," Laurie Hart said. "They come and go."

Daphne Lesage said, "I've been back almost every day. This is the first day there have been automobiles on the road."

In eastern New Orleans, some residents were seeing their homes for the first time, finding scenes of mud-swamped ruin and near-desolation, many hauling trailers with the hope of salvaging a few belongings.

Streets mostly cleared of debris ushered shocked residents through neighborhoods where sedans still sat flipped on their sides and every structure showed some sign of devastation: a roof folded back on itself; a bay window blown to shreds; a brick wall smashed into a pile of rubble.

"It looks like a … bomb hit: just gray and brown and no people," said Dr. Carter Paddock, who visited his dermatology practice near Methodist Hospital to retrieve boxes of purple, orange, yellow and blue folders filled with patient records he planned to take to his Metairie office.

Paddock said managers of the Eastern New Orleans professional building said the structure would be useable within 60 days. "But who are we going to treat?" he asked.

Indeed, few residents ventured back Wednesday, even for a look-and-leave visit to homes in one of the hardest-hit sections of the city, and those who did return said they did not plan to stay, at least not in the short term.

Hiding swollen eyes behind plastic goggles and a respiration mask, Jamilah Pelrean and her husband, Damien, wandered around their one-story home on Crowder Boulevard where 6-year-old wedding photographs bred mold and the off-white carpeting was coated in a nearly black greenish hue.

"We just wanted to come back early because we figured everyone is going to be swamped with the (insurance) claims," Damien Pelrean said, adding that the couple intends to renovate or rebuild their home, which took about 5 feet of floodwater.

One block over, Pamela Powell and four family members trekked back and forth over a mud-caked dome of buckled wood flooring to tote out a few salvageable items - two television sets, a sewing machine and a plastic box of family photographs – amid a sea of muddy desks, couches and clothes.

"I wouldn't be surprised if they bulldoze all the houses in New Orleans east," said Powell, adding that she hoped to rent a space this week at a trailer park in LaPlace.

"Everywhere you look, it's just disastrous. Right now, we've just got to find a place that we can call home."

an ever decreasing minority of the city's citizens," he wrote.

"Perhaps, we should just hang a sign on I-10 coming into New Orleans — WELCOME HOME — WHITES NOT WANTED,'" Forgotston's e-mail said.

Forgotston's diatribe runs counter to criticism directed at Nagin last month by Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, the federal head of New Orleans' hurricane recovery effort. Allen sharply questioned the wisdom of the accelerated reentry timeline first announced by Nagin and then abandoned as Hurricane Rita's menace grew. With few medical services available, sketchy electrical service and uncertain water quality, moving people back into the city was "extremely problematic," Allen said at the time.

Nagin also came under fire from several black state lawmakers and New Orleans City Council members, who raised concerns about a meeting the mayor had in Dallas with a group of mostly white businessmen. Their fear: that the group was attempting to coordinate a recovery program that would discourage a large portion of poor African-Americans from returning to the city.

Nagin, who received Forgotston's e-mail while in a hospital caring for a son who underwent emergency surgery, fired back:

"Shame on you! I have seen lots of terrible things as it relates to this storm . . . I must tell you the worst thing through all of this is the racist comments coming from both black and whites. It is appalling and extremely offensive."

He continued: "If there ever was a time I wanted to cuss someone out, it is now! "However, I will resist the urge and just pray for you. May God bless you with the patience and understanding that we all need in this time of crisis! If the city is repopulated with small-minded, racist-thinking and -speaking blacks, whites and Hispanics, then we are all in deep trouble."

The mayor went on to chastise Forgotston for lodging irrational complaints without checking census data to see how many people of varying races live in the areas being repopulated. He also said if Forgotston had done his homework, he would understand why the mayor selected certain ZIP codes to open first.

"Next time, a cleansing Katrina-type storm will not leave anything for us to argue about," Nagin wrote. "The Bible says, 'If my people, who are called by my name, will turn from their wicked ways, then I, their God in heaven, will hear their pleas and heal their land.' Let's pray and humble ourselves."

Forgotston, in an e-mail Tuesday, said Nagin originally responded to him with a shorter version, then sent the longer one, which Forgotston believes was written or edited by the mayor's communications director, Sally Forman. Forman said the mayor accidentally deleted his original response to Forgotston before sending a copy to the other elected officials who received his message. So Nagin composed a second e-mail.

Convention Center's Phase IV in peril

Project on track days before storm

By Rebecca Mowbray
Business writer

Officials with the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center are figuring out whether the star-crossed Phase IV expansion to the Convention Center can proceed after Hurricane Katrina.

"Right now we're still moving forward," said Ralph Brennan, chairman of the Ernest N. Morial New Orleans Exhibition Hall Authority, the board that governs the sprawling, 1.1 million-square-foot Convention Center. But, he said, "That's all up in the air now."

Even before Katrina, the proposed 524,000-square foot expansion, one of the most expensive state-financed projects ever in Louisiana, had been beset by delays. A legal challenge to the initial award of the construction contract in October 2003 held up the project for 22 months, and in the meantime, rising steel prices and then a proposal to combine the project with a football stadium for the Saints nearly derailed it.

Thousands of New Orleans evacuees used the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center for shelter after Hurricane Katrina. The Convention Center and its insurance company, Zurich, are working on estimates for the cost of fixing the building.

The project finally appeared to get on track in August, just days before the storm, when the Convention Center board and the winning construction bidder, Broadmoor LLC, signed a contract. But Brennan said the parties never signed a notice to proceed before the storm hit. That's because the Convention Center needed to work out ways to keep costs down.

Now the oft-delayed project is once again in question, Brennan said.

It's unclear whether the cash-strapped state's $100 million commitment to the project still stands.

There are also questions whether the tourism taxes slated to pay the project's bonds can be restored to the usual $35 million or so a year. The taxes are collected from hotels and restaurants, many of which are closed. Even the hotels that are open are generating almost no taxes because occupancy taxes aren't collected on rooms rented by the Federal Emergency Management Agency for the relief effort.

And with all the questions about the future of the tourism industry, Brennan asked, "Frankly, do we need Phase IV?"

At a meeting this week, the Convention Center board's first since the storm, the group moved to evaluate its options.

Convention, Sports & Leisure International, the Minneapolis consulting firm that did the feasibility study for the Convention Center expansion, plans to survey meeting planners on their thoughts about holding meetings in New Orleans. John Kaatz, the principal of the company, said he expects that some of the answers may be logistical, such as when the city can host guests, and others may be emotional, such as whether their views of the New Orleans were damaged by the city's hurricane vulnerability or the looting and suffering that followed the storm.

Meanwhile, the state is looking at whether it can afford projects such as the Convention Center expansion.

Legislative Auditor Steve Theriot said a key consideration is whether the state will be required to contribute to the rebuilding effort. FEMA expects the state to pay for 25 percent for the cost of rebuilding after Katrina, which is estimated to total $250 billion.

The State Bond Commission says that most of the $120 million in capital outlay for the convention center can be recalled. Some $94.5 million of that money is scheduled to move to the top funding priority for next year, but with competing priorities after Katrina, the Convention Center money may not be appropriated.

"Of course, with the storm, the question is, do you do any capital outlay? You've got other needs now," said Whit Kling, executive director of the Bond Commission. "The governor chooses who gets in what priority and when they move."

The Convention Center and its insurance company, Zurich, are working on estimates for the cost of fixing the building, Brennan said. The Convention Center still hopes that the federal government will chip in — $1 billion of the proposed $250 billion Katrina relief bill in Congress is for tourism and Brennan hopes that the Convention Center will get some of that money.

At this point, April 1 is still the target date for re-opening the Convention Center. "For the moment, yes," Brennan said. "That's the best target date we've got."

But with the Convention Center shut down, the board voted this week to reduce the staff by more than half. About 190 full-time positions, mostly those who support events at the building, will be cut, leaving about 170 full-time workers.

Trucker shortage stymies port

Many evacuated, working elsewhere

By Jaquetta White
Business writer

Cargo ships gradually are returning to the Port of New Orleans, but a key commerce link is still missing: the truck drivers needed to ferry imports and exports to and from the port's docks.

The shortage of drivers — many of whom evacuated the area with their families and in some cases found other work — could create a serious problem if it forces shippers to divert vessels to other ports in the region.

"Without trucks, that cargo doesn't move," said Cathy Gautreaux, executive director of the Louisiana Motor Transport Association. "We're seriously concerned that ships could be diverted."

And any such diversion has the potential to become permanent.

Port spokesman Chris Bonura said the shortage has not reached crisis stage, even though shipping activity through the port continues to grow. The port expects to handle nine ships this week, nearly double the number it handled last week.

"There's starting to be a real need," Bonura said. "It's something that we identified early and need to address."

But Susan Howland, CEO of the Howland Group Inc., a maritime consulting firm outside Philadelphia, said the local truck driver shortage amplifies a current nationwide shortage and comes as companies already are struggling to find the fastest way to get their products.

"So many of these companies are these just-in-time deliveries," she said. "They can't afford to have their supply chain knocked out for a couple of days.

"The cargo has to go beyond the port. That access to and from the port is as critical as the marine terminal. When a critical piece of infrastructure is missing, then we start to see a ripple through the economy."

The Port of New Orleans is making grand attempts to lure back drivers. The agency has cleared transportation lanes for drivers and eliminated checkpoints on the routes. The port also is offering living space aboard military ships for drivers, many of whom have no place to live. But drivers who accept the housing will have to leave their families behind because there is not enough room.

"They're hesitant to come back without their families," Gautreaux said.

The motor transport association also is meeting with city and state officials to find ways to bring drivers back, Gautreaux said.

"We've thought of bonuses; we've thought of subsidies," she said. "We have nothing concrete as of yet. But we need to figure it out. We can't afford to lose ships to other ports."

But bringing back drivers is complicated.

Most truck drivers in New Orleans are independent owner-operators, not trucking company employees. Their skills basically allow them work anywhere.

And that's what many are doing.

Owner-operator Lionel Smith evacuated to and now is working in Houston. His home in Violet was destroyed, and he and his family are renting an apartment in the Texas city. In New Orleans, he carried cargo to and from the Napoleon Avenue Container Terminal. In Houston, he does the same job at the Barbours Cut Container Terminal, but he's paid $15 to $20 more for every move. Smith isn't planning a speedy return to New Orleans.

"The wages are so much better here," he said from his truck

Piles of rotting garbage raise their own stink

Nauseated neighbors try to tackle problem

By Jeff Duncan
Staff writer

Ben Sherman stepped away from the fetid piles of rotting meat littering the sidewalk in front of his Uptown business Tuesday afternoon and explained how a neighborhood bar owner suddenly has become an expert in the treatment of hazardous waste.

"The Homeland Security people told me that lime is what you use on decomposing waste," Sherman said.

Sherman and co-owner Steve Watson operate The Kingpin, a popular nightspot in the commercial pocket along Prytania Street in Uptown between Napoleon and Jefferson avenues.

They have delayed re-opening their bar for a couple of days, in part because of the potentially hazardous waste. The half-block long piles of meat and other spoiled supermarket products have been festering on the sidewalk since the owners of neighboring Zara's Super Market were seen emptying their freezers a few days after Hurricane Katrina struck in late August.

"We're ready to go," Watson said. "We've got to get our place open, but we can't get in there until they get that stuff up. I understand why they (the owners) did it. They wanted to save their business. But at the same time, it's irresponsible."

The owners of Zara's could not be reached for comment.

Waste and debris removal has been one of the biggest hurdles faced by business owners since they returned to Orleans Parish last week. Few agencies are up and running, and those that are operating are overwhelmed.

The trash bin next to Zara's is maintained by Metro Disposal Service of Harvey. Officials from Metro Disposal did not immediately return a call Tuesday.

"I've seen only one Waste Management truck since I've been here, and he drove by me," said Ben Lazich, owner of The Wine Seller a few doors down at 5000 Prytania St.

Rather than wait on city officials or licensed contractors, many business owners are taking matters into their own hands, as Sherman and three friends did Tuesday.

Wearing surgical masks, hip boots and protective glasses, the men spent most of Tuesday afternoon treating the squalid mountain. First, they used shovels to cover the spoiled refuse with lime. Then they covered it with large plastic tarps, weighed down with bricks and grocery carts.

It was a nasty job. The rancid pile included whole shoulders of pork, whole chickens, sides of beef, sausage, eggs, milk and vegetables.

As the men worked, swarms of flies attacked their legs and blurred their vision. From time to time, the wind would blow the lime onto their skin, causing it to burn.

"I'm slipping on maggots all over the place," Sherman said. "And they aren't little ones. They've been feasting for weeks. … But something had to be done. I couldn't stand looking at it anymore."

Not to mention smelling it. The stench was inescapable throughout the four-square block commercial area that's home to popular restaurants such as Crepe Nanou, Kyoto and Upperline.

A man and woman walking down Upperline Street to the Creole Creamery were forced to cover their mouths and noses as they made their way down the block.

"It's making me sick," said Guy Grissom, who runs a landscaping service out of his home on nearby Pitt Street. "I threw up last night after the wind shifted."

Neighbors and business owners have tried to reach the store owners and city officials to address the problem, but their efforts have proved futile. Meanwhile, the smell and potential biohazard worsens daily.

"I'm livid about it," Lazich said. "The whole neighborhood is upset about it. Wouldn't have been easier to bag up the waste so it would keep the smell down a little and be easier to pick up?"

Added Sherman: "The only thing I want to say is they (owners of Zara's) aren't invited to the Christmas party this year."

Sherman and Watson said they won't feel comfortable opening their doors until the reeking waste can be removed. The putrid piles cover much of the sidewalk that leads to their bar.

"This is just another casualty of the storm," Watson said. "We're all in the same boat on this. There's trash all over the city."

Other ports, FEMA offer drivers better pay

TRUCKERS, from A-15

while moving container cargo Wednesday. "I was looking to get in another form of business in New Orleans, because trucking in New Orleans, you weren't making any money. I was really looking to change careers."

But with his newly purchased truck — he lost his old one to floodwaters in Violet — he plans to work as a driver for the foreseeable future.

"Right now, Houston is home," he said.

Another big problem, Gautreaux said, is that the maritime industry is competing with FEMA for workers.

"The truck drivers are making a lot more money working for FEMA," she said. "It's short-term, but it's good money and you can't blame them."

Another driver, Darrell Williams, plans to work in New Orleans as soon as he buys a new truck. But he doesn't plan to pick up where he left off, moving port cargo. Instead, he hopes to join the FEMA debris collection team.

"If I get a truck, I'm going to get a dump trailer and work cleanup," Williams said. "I can make money doing that more than moving containers. The container business is going to be on hold here for a while."

Jack Jensen, owner of TCI Trucking in New Orleans, said those stories could be multiplied by 100 to better assess the trucking situation. Jensen's company usually runs about 120 trucks a day; they're down to 12 to 15 now, he said.

"The majority of our truck drivers are from the 9th Ward, and they're just getting to their trucks now," he said.

The one bright spot for TCI, he said, is that the office they opened in Houston just six months ago is now busy. About 40 trucks are operating there, up from 25.

"At least we've got some revenue coming in," he said. "It's just a different kind of work there. There's something for everyone."

Two insurance companies will coordinate adjusters

Plan to be tried in St. Bernard, Plaquemines

By Jeffrey Meitrodt
Staff writer

In an unusual display of cooperation, two insurance giants agreed Wednesday to work together to settle claims for homeowners whose properties were destroyed five weeks ago by Hurricane Katrina.

Allstate and State Farm, which together control 54 percent of the homeowner's market in Louisiana, pledged to send in an army of adjusters and work in the same neighborhoods at the same time. Adjusters for other insurers are expected to join in, effectively creating total coverage. The system will first be used in Plaquemines and St. Bernard parishes, but State Insurance Commissioner Robert Wooley said he hopes New Orleans officials eventually agree to adopt the approach.

The companies will work off grids created by local officials that chop Plaquemines and St. Bernard parishes into large squares consisting of about 1,000 damaged properties. To expedite demolition and rebuilding, the companies agreed to finish all work in one square before moving to another.

The benefit is that one area could be bulldozed at once and building permits could be issued for entire neighborhoods, greatly speeding rebuilding.

"There ain't no rule book for this – it ain't never been done before," Wooley said Wednesday while addressing about 30 insurance company representatives and a handful of local officials in Belle Chasse.

The only time that competing insurance companies agreed to cooperate in a similar manner took place in 2003, when about 4,000 homes were wiped out by wildfires in California, according to Paul Tracey, field operations manager for Allstate. By contrast, construction experts say more than 360,000 homes were damaged by Katrina, and as many as half of those homes must be completely rebuilt.

Wooley said the insurance companies were initially skittish about working together on such a large scale.

"These companies are so competitive they'll eat each other's young if you let them,'' Wooley said."It's been tough to get them together."

Still, policyholders shouldn't expect immediate results. Though the companies have embraced the concept, they have not agreed on a timetable for completing the work. During two meetings on the subject Wednesday, Allstate and State Farm representatives said they could definitely bring in enough adjusters to finish one square per week in Plaquemines and St. Bernard parishes, but they weren't sure if they could finish two squares, which would represent about 2,000 homes in each parish.

At one square a week, it would take up to six months to finish all the claims work in St. Bernard Parish, which local officials said is unacceptable.

"Most of them homes in this area were destroyed – I don't need an adjuster to tell me that,'' said Danny Menesses, chief administrative officer for St. Bernard."There are houses we're going to put on the grid that you can't even find anymore. They aren't there."

To drive the point home, local officials took the group on an hour-long tour, showing them neighborhoods where the flooding was so severe it deposited refrigerators, boats and cars on the roofs of Katrina-scarred homes. They saw hundreds of severely damaged homes, including more than a dozen that had been swept off their slabs.

"Words don't describe it,'' said Chris Winter, a representative for Crawford & Co., the world's largest independent adjusting firm."I didn't see a single property that wasn't totaled. Just incredible."

After the tour, Allstate and State Farm representatives said they'll study the grids and come up with projected timetables by early next week.

"The biggest thing is to establish a presence and quell our citizens' concerns that nothing is getting done," Menesses said.

Though adjusters have started visiting properties in the two parishes, little work has been done because so many property owners are not there to meet them. Under normal operating procedure, an adjuster can't work on a claim until the property owner is present.

But under the grid system, the companies will concentrate their efforts first on areas in which it is obvious that the vast majority of homes have sustained damages that are equal to or exceed the face value of the flood insurance policy.

Though it sometimes takes three or four days for an adjuster to complete work on a single flood insurance claim, insurers said the grid system will make it possible for adjusters to process two homes per day.

Most La. storm victims still not identified

Only 32 names made public

By Shaila Dewan
New York Times

BATON ROUGE — In a country that cherishes the names of the dead, reads them aloud, engraves them in stone and stitches them into quilts, it is odd that Hurricane Katrina's victims remain, more than a month later, largely anonymous.

There has been no accounting of their age, sex and race, nor of how they died or where they were found. As for how they lived, it is difficult to find even a Web site paying tribute to individual victims. With 972 deaths confirmed and the search for bodies declared complete, the state has released only 61 bodies and made the names of only 32 victims public.

In contrast, of the 221 dead in Mississippi, 196 have been identified, a state official said.

Like any silence, the one blanketing Louisiana's dead is ripe for interpretation. To some, including family members who wait in anguish, it is further proof of bureaucratic bungling or a lack of regard for the poor blacks who doubtless make up many of the victims. To others, it is a deliberate attempt to shield an embarrassing truth from view.

State officials, still in crisis mode, say compiling and releasing data about the dead is simply not a priority. They say several factors have contributed to delays: criminal investigations that have forced them to perform more autopsies than expected; the arrival of a second hurricane, Rita, which once again displaced their staff; and the condition bodies were in after spending days or weeks in the heat or water. The New Orleans coroner, Frank Minyard, has complained that pathologists from around the country have volunteered to help but that he awaits a trailer from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to house them. But critics say that the state officials have not released bodies whose identities are obvious and that Louisiana has imposed too tough a standard on confirming the names of victims.

Tattoos, driver's licenses and physical characteristics have been used in Mississippi. But they are apparently not enough for Louisiana officials, who said last week that either a fingerprint, dental or DNA match is required.

About 370 of the bodies at the temporary morgue set up by FEMA have been "presumptively" identified but await confirmation by one of those three methods.

Nor has the Department of Health and Hospitals been willing to make public information that it has collected, from the recovery locations to the autopsy results. Dr. Louis Cataldie, the state emergency medical director, has made it clear that he is bewildered by a reporter's request for precise numbers, saying at a briefing last week that there had been "six to seven homicides" and "there haven't been that many" children.

Asked afterward how many more bodies might be out there, he appeared exasperated. "There is one out there," he said. "That's all that matters, isn't it?"

After that briefing, the Department of Health and Hospitals posted the names of 32 of the dead on the Internet, but by the next morning the list was gone.

On the edges of the disaster zone, a much clearer picture of Hurricane Katrina's victims has emerged. In Houston, the Harris County Medical Examiner's Office lists the names of 53 evacuees who have died, most of natural causes and two by suicide. In Dallas, there are 23, including twins who died of "extreme prematurity due to maternal exhaustion and dehydration occurring as a result of Hurricane Katrina."

Don Morrow, the director of operations for the coroner in East Baton Rouge, said that among the evacuees who died in his parish there were 24 males and 44 females, that 36 were white, 30 black and 2 Hispanic, and that more than 60 victims were older than 50. Six were under 21; the oldest victim was 95.

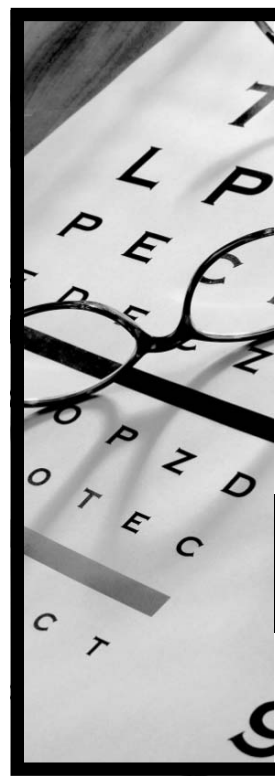
Those killed directly by the storm, which struck Aug. 29, remain the least known.

The lack of information has robbed the death toll, released each day in a terse statement from Dr. Cataldie's office, of a human face. "There really haven't been any stories of who they are," said Marian Fontana, who lost her husband in the World Trade Center and became a prominent advocate for Sept. 11 victims' families. "I think the way people really connected to 9/11 was people's lives, and I haven't heard any of that. It reminds me of the tsunami," where hundreds of victims ended up in mass graves. "It was a big giant number in a place far away."

Families of the victims have expressed frustration that the process is not moving more quickly. Memorial services and burials have been delayed indefinitely, and families must wait to file insurance claims, execute wills and settle estates. Even the few who have been are able to bury their loved ones question what is going on. One woman, Marion K. Babin, said it took weeks to get the body of her husband, Justin Babin, though he wore a hospital bracelet and medical dog tags listing his name and condition. Officials said that Mr. Babin had to be autopsied because he was found in a hospital and that the attorney general was investigating all hospital and nursing home deaths.

And some deaths unrelated to the storm have been caught up in the process. One of the 32 names released was that of Jason Curtis Zito, 30, who choked to death on a wad of tobacco on Sept. 23, his mother said.

Gary T. Hargrove, the coroner of Harrison County in Mississippi, said he was "quite surprised" to read that Louisiana had identified so few of the dead, and speculated that the lag was because of the state's blighted body retrieval effort, which began a week after the storm.



"We started recoveries on the Monday afternoon after the storm, as soon as the winds dropped below 60 miles per hour," Mr. Hargrove said, adding that 65 of the county's 88 bodies have been identified and 63 have been released.

But advanced decomposition does not entirely explain the discrepancy. Just as in Louisiana, Mississippi's bodies were too decomposed to be viewed by families - but many could be identified by physical characteristics. In Jackson County, 9 of 12 identities were confirmed, mostly by scars, tattoos, prosthetics or implants, said Vicki Broadus, the coroner.

Still, forensic experts who have dealt with mass casualties cautioned that every disaster presents distinct challenges.

"Every single disaster I've ever worked this comes up, like maybe they're doing too much," said Dr. Mary Jumbelic, the medical examiner for Onondaga County in New York, who worked on the tsunami last year, the aftermath of Sept. 11 and several plane crashes. Medical examiners have to pre-empt fears that families received the wrong remains, Dr. Jumbelic said. "That will be the question three months from now if the standards are not adhered to."

Dr. Charles Hirsch, the chief medical examiner of New York City, whose office handled the dead after the World Trade Center attack, said Louisiana, where parish coroners are responsible for issuing death certificates, had geographic and jurisdictional issues that did not arise with Sept. 11, where the disaster spanned only 16 acres and the bulk of the surviving family members were not dispersed throughout the 50 states.

Conservatives question Miers' nomination

Bush assurances fail to sway many

By Jesse J. Holland
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — Not satisfied with President Bush's word, conservative senators and others questioned Wednesday whether Harriet Miers was the best Supreme Court nominee a self-proclaimed conservative Republican president could find.

"I guess they thought we'd all just say 'Whoopee!' but that's not the way it works around here anymore," said Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss. He insisted there were many potential nominees more qualified than Miers.

The White House and congressional GOP leaders _ weakened by the Hurricane Katrina recovery, high gas prices, the war in Iraq and investigations of House and Senate majority leaders Tom DeLay and Bill Frist _ now find themselves defending Bush's decision to elevate his 60-year-old White House counsel to the Supreme Court.

Several conservatives, from Lott, a former Senate majority leader, to columnist George Will to John Thune, R-S.D., one of the newest conservative senators, continued to question Bush's decision even after the president made an impassioned defense of Miers in the Rose Garden on Tuesday.

"I just don't know her. I'm not going to jump out there and say this is a wonderful choice."
SEN. TRENT LOTT, R-Miss.

"I just don't know her," Lott said Wednesday. "I'm not going to jump out there and say this is a wonderful choice."

Added Thune: "A lot of folks were saying, 'Why wasn't it a Luttig, a Priscilla Owen, a Janice Rogers Brown, somebody that we know?' Conservatives see this as having enormous stakes and I think that's why there is so much weight attached to this, and a lot of anxiety and uncertainty about where she's going to come down."

Owen, Brown and J. Michael Luttig are all appeals court judges.

Miers is nominated to replace Sandra Day O'Connor, whose Supreme Court vote has been key on issues including abortion and affirmative action. Senate Republicans are looking to start Miers' confirmation hearings in early November, with an eye on getting her final confirmation vote by Thanksgiving.

With 55 Republicans, 44 Democrats and independent, Miers is expected to be confirmed by the Senate unless something unexpected happens before the vote.

"Conservatives are learning more everyday about Harriet Miers, about her history and I would remind you there was concern over Judge Roberts in the beginning," said former Republican Party chairman Ed Gillespie, who said he would shepherd Miers through the Senate in the same way that former Sen. Fred Thompson did for Chief Justice John Roberts. "This is not uncommon in the nomination-confirmation process. It's kind of the natural cycle."

White House spokesman Scott McClellan suggested that support for Miers would grow once senators looked "at her record of accomplishment."

In fact a number of Republican senators, including Judiciary Committee members Orrin Hatch of Utah, John Cornyn of Texas and Mike DeWine of Ohio, have come forward saying they plan to support confirmation.

"I see absolutely no reason that I would not vote for her," DeWine said following an hour-long meeting with Miers Wednesday. "The only reason I'm not announcing it today is I think we always need to have hearings."

Still, Thune said, "For conservatives, she is going to have to be very forthcoming in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee to give them the comfort level that they need, the confidence level that she is going to be a judge in the mold that the president indicated: a Scalia or Thomas."

Democrats are watching the Republican squabbling while working on document requests for Miers' work, once Bush officially sends her nomination to the Senate. They are not above trying to make the situation worse for the GOP.

Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, pointed out after meeting with Miers that she has not authorized anyone in the White House to speak for her views. The White House has been trumpeting favorable comments on Miers by Focus on the Family chairman James Dobson.

"I said, 'Would you disavow people who send out assurances that they know how you're going to vote?' She said, 'Absolutely,' " said Leahy. "She said, 'I will be my own person, I will be independent. Nobody has the authority or right or ability to tell how I'm going to vote.' "

SHEILA STROUP

Honor begins at home

For Sarah Mathews, 14, everything has changed in the past six weeks.

"The first schoolbus ride I ever had was Monday," she said. "It was exciting."

Sarah is good at finding sunshine behind the clouds. Her mother, Karen, says it's "the Girl Scout" in her daughter.

"When we took her back to our house, there were no tears. She was so strong," Karen said.

Edgar and Karen Mathews' home in the heart of Chalmette lay in ruins, and Sarah's recently redecorated bedroom was in shambles.

"I had wanted a new bedroom for a long time because we had this hideous wallpaper," she said.

All of Sarah's clothes and belongings, including the mementos from her summer adventure, were gone.

"I went on a Girl Scout trip to California, where we did things like wind-surfing and white-water rafting and rock climbing. It was just a fun time," Sarah said.

Fair share

The Mathews are staying in Mandeville with Karen's brother, Jimmy Hewitt; his wife, Pattye; and their daughter, Jade, 16.

And what used to be the dining room is now a makeshift bedroom for Sarah, Jade, and Sarah's brother, James, 16.

"We get along. It's really not too bad," Sarah said.

The parents came up with some "Katrina House Guidelines" to keep things running smoothly. There are rules about putting dishes in the dishwasher, making beds and, under Katrina Economics, one that makes the three teens laugh: "When eating snacks, ask yourself, 'Have I already taken my fair share of that item?'"

Monday, Sarah and James began classes at Fontainebleau High School with their cousin.

"It's my first public school," Sarah said.

She spent her elementary years at St. Robert Bellarmine School in Arabi and began high school at St. Mary's Dominican in New Orleans a few days before the hurricane.

"This is different, but it's going to be fine," she said.

Scout support

One thing that has helped Sarah since the hurricane is the friends she made at Sierra Magic, her August Girl Scout trip.

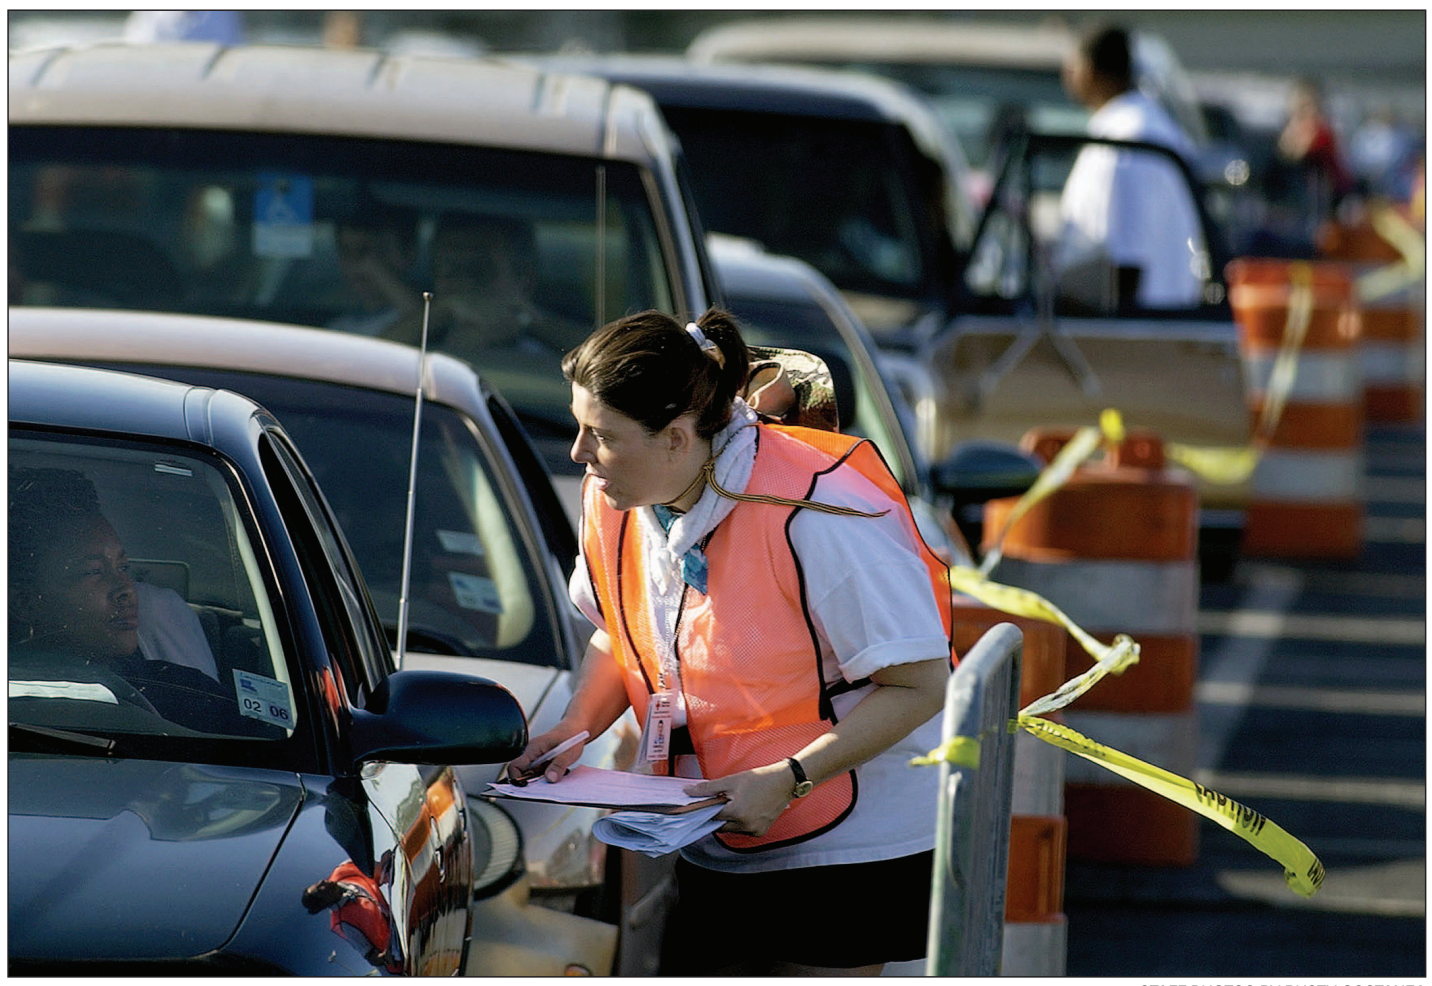
"We're on an e-mail list, and everybody was writing, saying 'We heard about New Orleans. Where are you? How are you?'" Sarah said.

When they found out she had lost everything, the letters and boxes began to arrive.

"I got pictures from the trip and gift certificates and clothes," she said. "And then the San Francisco area Girl Scout council sent me two packages with tons of stuff."

Between opening boxes full of good wishes, going to swim-team practice, doing homework and eating only her fair share of snacks, Sarah doesn't have time to think about the changes in her life.

"It just seems like a big ride that hasn't come to a sudden stop," she said.



She doesn't even mind that her mom has become a substitute teacher at her new school.

"It's fine," she said. "I can give her stuff I don't want to carry, and she can give me money."

Kenner Red Cross center hits limit before opening

Kimberly Jackson of Cambridge, Md., helps arrange financial help for a client in one of the 750 cars admitted to the American Red Cross drive-through center at Louis Armstrong International Airport on Wednesday, the center's opening day.

Kenner bureau

Just as has happened in other Louisiana towns, the American Red Cross was swamped Wednesday when it opened a drive-through center in Kenner for Hurricane Katrina victims seeking cash assistance.

By 5:30 a.m., 3½ hours before the site opened for business, the line of waiting vehicles had already reached the day's capacity.

"This is the first day of operation in Kenner," said Charles Blake, acting emergency services director for the Red Cross. "We're going to be refining our process."

Red Cross volunteers signed up about 750 cars, representing 1,300 households with a total of 5,000 people, Red Cross spokesman Ken Williams said. Each person is to receive about $350, depending on the size of the family, in the form of a check to be mailed within three days.

The drive-through center is in an employee parking lot just west of Louis Armstrong International Airport's terminal. It will be open daily from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. until the need subsides.

And if Wednesday's turnout was an indication, the need is great indeed.

Metairie resident Charlotte Salles was turned away long before the first application was taken Wednesday morning. She arrived at 4 a.m. and was directed to a line of vehicles, but two hours later she heard a voice over a bullhorn telling her and others near her in line to go home.

"This is just unacceptable," she said. "We're told the place opens at 9, but then we're turned away when we get there at 4. I can't continue to do this night after night."

At the other end of the line, in the very first vehicle, Destrehan resident Sharon Gulino said she had arrived Tuesday at 6 p.m. She said she was directed to another airport parking lot, where she waited until she was allowed at 12:45 a.m. into the employee parking lot where the Red Cross center set up.

Agnes Ardoin, seated, and her niece Kylie Badeaux take it easy as they wait to apply for financial assistance from the American Red Cross. Checks are to be mailed within three days.

"We knew it was going to be a long wait," Gulino said, adding that she packed crackers and bottles of water. "We kept our lights off and were real quiet and orderly."

Other people who were lined up at the center said they were directed to wait on Kenner Avenue, which they said turned into a "Mardi Gras atmosphere."

Brian Ardoin of Houma said he had hoped to "beat the traffic" by arriving at midnight, but no such luck.

"When we got here, they already had a bunch of cars," he said.

Authorities directed him to Williams Boulevard, where

Archbishop Rummel High School became the largest Catholic school in the New Orleans area Wednesday as students displaced by Hurricane Katrina from across the metro area swelled the enrollment of the Metairie campus to about 3,000 students in three distinct schools.

Battered and making-do like other New Orleanians, the metropolitan area's Muslims on Wednesday began the day-long fasts that mark the month of Ramadan, a period of reflection, prayer – and this year, most pointedly, charity.

"Definitely a time for charity," said Nabil Abukhader, the principal of the small Muslim Academy, an elementary school for Muslim children in Gretna.

Abukhader's school so far has recovered only 40 percent of the students it had enrolled before Hurricane Katrina struck.

More will likely come back, but it remains an open question whether the school, one of two

Coast Guard official visits church shelter in Zachary

Progress being made on housing, he says

By Susan Finch
Staff writer

ZACHARY — For the first time since he began overseeing the government's Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts early last month, Coast Guard Vice Admiral Thad Allen talked at length Tuesday with some of the 81,000 Gulf Coast storm evacuees depending on him to get out of shelters and into homes of their own.

Allen spent more than two hours inside the new Family Life Center of Cornerstone Church. The center opened shortly after the storm to families with children from Orleans, Jefferson and St. Bernard parishes. Allen said residents asked how soon they can get into permanent housing, but they stressed the church has made them feel part of a loving family.

With help from local businesses and citizens, Cornerstone has been able to provide almost everything needed to give shelter residents "as much as we can in the form of a normal life," said Cornerstone associate pastor Charlie Watts.

The church helped enroll children in Zachary public schools and provided shelter residents with three meals a day, mattresses and bed linens, a big-screen cable television, internet access and help with transportation and getting identification cards.

Many of Cornerstone's evacuees eventually want to return to the New Orleans area, Watts said. Others are considering settling in Zachary, he said.

Among the shelter's satisfied customers is Louise Stevens, a 70-year old New Orleanian who had never set foot in Zachary before she and her son, daughter in law and their four children arrived after Katrina.

"These people love you," Stevens said. "God sent us here. We could have been sleeping under a bridge."

Allen, who made a much shorter visit earlier Tuesday to the much-larger River Center evacuation shelter in Baton Rouge, said during his visit here that while to some extent love can make up for "not having walls," what evacuees really want is permanent residences.

Preparations are moving as fast as possible, he said, to get people displaced by Katrina into travel trailers and mobile homes they can call their own.

For evacuees wanting to rent, Allen said, the Federal Emergency Management Agency is providing a three-month, $2,300 housing allowance that can be extended for another 15 months.

In Katrina's wake, Allen said, there is very little vacant housing in the New Orleans area: "If somebody really wants to go back to New Orleans, there may or may not be housing for two or three years," he said.

One member of Allen's entourage, Federal Emergency Management Agency employee Emilo Rodriguez of Florida, fielded complaints from some of the shelter's residents that the FEMA checks they'd applied for - and were told would be forthcoming - have still not arrived.

Rodriguez advised patience: "Understand that the mail is extremely bad," he told Yvonne Simmons, who groused that FEMA told her check was mailed out on Sept. 9.

"I probably would wait one more week," Simmons said. "If you don't receive it, go back there."

The Cornerstone shelter, which limited its occupancy to 125 people, had 70 residents left Tuesday. Another 360 people spent time there before returning to their homes or moving in with relatives or local families that took them in, Watts said.

Some other church-run evacuation shelters have begun closing their doors, but Cornerstone isn't among them, according to Watts. "We have told people we are not going to shut this shelter down as long as one family is still here," he said.

Allen's spokesman, Commander Brendan McPherson, said Wednesday that the admiral decided to visit the Cornerstone shelter because it fit into his schedule and offered him the opportunity to spend time from evacuees from the New Orelans area.

RAMADAN, from B-1

of its kind in the area, can finish the year, he said.

The loss of tuition income hurts, but he said a greater loss is that of the school's benefactors: those Muslim business owners and professionals who could be counted on for a donation to make up any shortfalls.

New Orleans' Muslims are scattered in Baton Rouge, Houston, Dallas and beyond. Many have returned. Many of those who run small shops have returned to confront the additional losses by looters who stole or destroyed what the storm spared, Abukhader said.

Before the storm, Muslims were dispersed throughout the metropolitan area, with some concentration on the West Bank and in Metairie, which fared relatively well after the storm.

Hundreds of Muslim families in New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish, however, were wiped out.

Currently, only two mosques appear to be functioning, albeit with reduced numbers, said Abukhader: Masjid Al Tawber in Gretna, and Masjid Abu Bakr al Siddiq in Metairie.

Whether their members can return to New Orleans in force depends on a number of things: jobs, schools and housing, said Abdur Rahman Bashir, the imam of Masjid Abu Bakr.

"But slowly, the people are coming back," he said.

Before the storm, devout Muslims came to the mosque to offer obligatory Friday community prayers in such numbers that the facility, which can hold 250 in its main room, had to schedule two sessions, Bashir said.

That hasn't happened since late August. But the numbers are growing, with 100 at Friday's gathering, he said.

While the daylight hours of Ramadan are periods of abstinence from food and water, evenings normally are devoted to breaking the fast together in group meals that strengthen the bonds of community.

With their numbers down and resources strained, that may be more difficult to do now, Abukhader and Bashir said. But the community will probably make every effort to reconnect during Ramadan, they said.

"It's important that we stick together," Bashir said.

In the way that Katrina changed everything for everybody, it also changed Ramadan for him, Bashir said.

In a time of self-disciplined attention to God, the self-denial of food and water during daylight will drive home the point, if it needs further emphasis, that many who were once well-off are now poor, or nearly so, Bashir said.

"Now we know the value of charity," he said.

dents – girls and boys wearing the uniforms of 14 other schools – gathered.

On Monday, members of Rummel's own all-boys student body returned to study in a morning shift, along with some visiting boys from the storm-closed Brother Martin High School in New Orleans, creating a school of 1,400. And in a separate part of campus beginning Tuesday, Christian Brothers School of New Orleans, also displaced by flooding, opened an all-boys school in exile with about 250 students.

"Teachers and students, we are creating memories, and we are making history," Principal Nancy Hernandez told the crowd assembled to launch the afternoon "transitional" school, which is expected to serve the students until many of their schools reopen in January. Hernandez herself is displaced; she is normally principal of Ursuline Academy in New Orleans, which plans to return in January.

The Rev. William Maestri, superintendent of schools for the Archdiocese of New Orleans, told the students that they carry the spirits of their closed schools with them, ensuring those institutions will survive.

"When we look around this gymnasium this afternoon, we cannot help but be filled with hope, hope because of all that you represent," he said.

The students were abuzz with talk about the biggest change for many of them: attending classes with members of the opposite sex.

Students from 14 other schools in the New Orleans area are attending Archbishop Rummel High School in Metairie. The enrollment at the school has swelled to 3,000 students in three distinct schools, and now includes girls.

Rummel President Michael Begg remarked that one of the main challenges of running the transitional school might be getting the Rummel boys to go home after their morning session, instead of waiting for the girls of the afternoon session to arrive.

The boys attending the afternoon school, where classes run from 1:30 p.m. to 6:10 p.m., were coy on the subject of girls. "It's going to be a different learning experience," said Alex Huerta, a junior from all-boys Brother Martin.

The girls focused on practical ramifications. "I have to get up an hour early to brush my hair and put on makeup," said Megan Kenney, a junior from Mount Carmel Academy in New Orleans.

Girls outnumber boys 3-to-1 in the transitional school, partly because Rummel could absorb some displaced boys into its morning shift. But co-educational learning also made its debut at Archbishop Chapelle High School in Metairie, where boys attended for the first time Wednesday, among 400 displaced students who mixed into Chapelle's regular classes.

Chapelle Principal Mary Beth Drez said applications from displaced students continue pouring in, so Chapelle also will open a second shift beginning Oct. 13. Registration for that program will continue through Friday.

Another adjustment for students at the Rummel transitional school will be studying alongside students from rival schools, such as girls from Mount Carmel and St. Mary's Dominican High School in New Orleans studying together, not to mention Brother Martin boys having to study on rival Rummel's campus.

But the students also found positive attributes in their new situation, such as the late start time, which many educators advocate as actually being more conducive for learning.

"I think it's going to be perfect," said Dominican junior Sarah Ann Tolleson. "We can sleep in and have a decent breakfast."

Seniors said the disruption of their senior year wrought by Katrina is upsetting, but that going through the experience together also bringsthem closer.

"It's going to make our senior year even more special when we get back," Mount Carmel senior Brittany Arata said.

others had lined up. He said Kenner police were called to the location twice when tempers flared because people tried to cut in line.

Despite the long wait, people who did get a spot in line were happy their wait for Red Cross money is almost over.

"At least we know there will be an outcome of this, even though we have to wait on the money," said Jennie Leonard of Harahan, who lined up at 2 a.m. and was allowed into the center's lot about 9:30 a.m.

National Guardsmen searched people at the front entrance to the center's parking lot for weapons, alcohol and drugs. Jefferson Parish sheriff's deputies stood guard over an ice chest full of seized weapons, including pistols, a shotgun, knives and baseball bats.

"They are going to search you, and they are going to be taking away" weapons, Kenner City Hall spokeswoman Karen Boudrie said.

Red Cross volunteers delivered a one-page application to each vehicle and were finishing the last applications about 2 p.m. If people are approved as living in a Katrina-affected area, their check will be mailed within 24 to 72 hours, Williams said.

Tammany cable slow to return

By Charlie Chapple
St. Tammany bureau

More than five weeks after Hurricane Katrina, about two-thirds of Charter Communications' cable television customers in St. Tammany still are without the service.

Kelly LeBouef, Charter's director of operations for St. Tammany and surrounding parishes, told local officials Wednesday that some 35,000 St. Tammany subscribers do not have cable, but that number should rapidly decrease during the next 30 days.

The company has 900 workers in St. Tammany, restoring 1,200 to 1,500 customers daily, LeBouef said.

"We hope to increase that to 2,000 a day," he said, adding that 90 percent of Charter's 52,000 customers should have cable within the next 30 days.

"We're spending $1 million a day to get people back up," he said. "We're working as hard as we can."

But apparently, that's not enough for hundreds, perhaps thousands, of Charter customers who have been switching to satellite TV.

"I got a satellite dish at my house today," Covington resident Carl Barrio said Tuesday night. "Waiting for cable to come back was getting ridiculous."

Randy Almond, a salesman for "Creel's, The Dish TV Place" of Longview, Texas, has been doing a booming business, working in the parking lot of Sav-A-Center in St. Tammany Oaks Shopping Center south of Covington.

Almond, working at a folding desk between two trailers loaded with satellite dishes, said Wednesday that's he's sold more than 800 DirecTV or Dish Network systems since shortly after Katrina. Almond said he decided to come to St. Tammany after his boss, David Creel, sold 47 satellite systems in four hours at a Mandeville shopping center parking lot. Almond said he has 16 crews installing the systems within two weeks after they're purchased.

10 suspects booked in relief card fraud

Red Cross stops giving out cards at two sites

By Richard Boyd
St. Tammany bureau

In an attempt to stem increasing efforts to obtain relief payments by fraud, Red Cross officials stopped handing out debit cards Wednesday at its two distribution centers in St. Tammany Parish.

Ten people, most of them from Baton Rouge, were arrested Tuesday for allegedly submitting fraudulent applications to receive the $300 debit cards, according to Slidell police.

Red Cross volunteers will still take applications at the two centers, at the former outlet mall in Slidell and at the Castine Center at Pelican Park east of Mandeville. Instead of giving debit cards to applicants right away, though, personnel will cross-reference each application and send people checks if it is determined that the requests for money are legitimate, Red Cross spokesman Ken Williams said.

Slidell police have been warning people waiting in lines at the Slidell site that Red Cross officials were flagging possible fraudulent applications.

On Tuesday, police closed in on 10 people who had driven through the checkpoints and submitted what appeared to be suspicious applications for aid.

Seven of those people are from Baton Rouge; two are from Denham Springs; and one from Donaldsonville, police spokesman Capt. Rob Callahan said.

Booked with access device application fraud were Baton Rouge residents Veda Primas, 36; Clary Myles, 23; Troy James, 26; Carlos Brooks, 18; Zahid Thomas, 28; Farron Tucker, 33; and Nancy Duronslet, 44; Maxine Biggs, 71, and Karla Polcyn, 20, both of Denham Springs; and Richie Giroir, 44, of Donaldsonville.

They are accused of either providing false names or the names of fictitious family members in an attempt to acquire cards, Callahan said.

Because each of the 10 suspects submitted fraudulent applications for as many as five cards — the maximum allowed per family by the Red Cross — with a total value of $1,565, they were booked with felonies.

Because of the alleged fraud at the Slidell center, the Red Cross in St. Tammany has stopped accepting any applications with Baton Rouge addresses, Williams said.

Baton Rouge-area residents who want to apply for relief from the agency should contact the Red Cross offices there for a center location, he said. After applying, they will be subject to an on-site inspection before any money is paid, he said.

Tammany lifts curfew

St. Tammany bureau

A parishwide curfew in St. Tammany, in effect since Aug. 28, was lifted Wednesday by Parish President Kevin Davis.

Davis took the action after informally polling local law enforcement officials during a morning briefing. Law enforcement officers, including those from the Sheriff's Office, all said they do not object to lifting the curfew.

The curfew had been in effect since the day before Hurricane Katrina hit, but its hours have been gradually reduced as the parish recovered from the storm. The curfew was shortened to only five hours, between midnight and 5 a.m., on Monday. Davis said at the time that he hoped to lift it completely by early next week.

Insurance firms sued over price tag on tree removals

Amounts offered too small, suit says

By Meghan Gordon
St. Tammany bureau

An estimated 200 St. Tammany Parish residents have turned to state court to demand higher compensation for the clean-up bills and lost property value of trees that Hurricane Katrina toppled in every corner of the north shore.

The class-action petition names Urban M. Craddock Sr. as the lead plaintiff, but Covington lawyer Shawn Reed said she has added dozens of names daily to the lawsuit against 17 insurance companies.

Craddock's insurer offered him $500 to remove the 40 to 50 fallen trees on his 16-acre property north of Pearl River — a sum that fell $59,500 short of the lowest estimate to clean up the mess, Reed said. Craddock also should be due reimbursement for the loss in value from the majestic oaks that were the focal point of his property, she said.

"We're here because we love our trees, and that's part of what we love when we're here. But the insurance companies are saying, 'We'll give you $500 for debris removal, but we won't cover the trees.' "
SHAWN REED
Covington lawyer

"They're saying basically that the trees have no value, and our position is that the trees do have value," Reed said. "They've just totally ignored that in our community we really think that our trees are important property.

"We're here because we love our trees, and that's part of what we love when we're here. But the insurance companies are saying, 'We'll give you $500 for debris removal, but we won't cover the trees.' "

Reed said insurers should have specifically excluded trees from homeowners' policies if they wanted to take the stance they have taken since Katrina.

Craddock, whom Reed said wouldn't comment because of pending depositions, was forced to clear what he could from his driveway to get in and out of his house. Reed said he left the remainder of the huge debris-removal project untouched, because he can't afford the estimates he's received.

Reed would not release a list of clients who hope to be named plaintiffs in the suit. She gave another example of an elderly woman who paid $7,000 to have two trees cleared.

"It's all the same story wherever we go," she said. "People are left with quotes to clean up this stuff."

Defendants named in the Sept. 29 petition include All State, American International Group, Lloyd's of London, CNA, GEICO, Hanover Insurance Co., Hartford Group, Liberty Mutual, Louisiana Farm Bureau, St. Paul Insurance, Traveler's, State Farm, USF&G, Safeco and Farmers Group.

Owners of St. Tammany property that were heavily damaged by falling trees during Hurricane Katrina have filed a class-action lawsuit to recoup the entire cost of removing the trees. The 17 insurance companies named in the suit are paying only a small amount of the cost. 'They're saying basically that the trees have no value, and our position is that the trees do have value,' said Shawn Reed, the Covington lawyer who is handling the suit.

Katrina felled more than merely trees

By Meghan Gordon
St. Tammany bureau

The small forest of long-leaf pines that Roy Wood bought in northwestern St. Tammany Parish after returning from World War II represented more than just the start of a young man's financial investment.

As his land holdings grew to 800 wooded acres in St. Tammany and Washington parishes, Wood's forests became a point of pride and an endless hobby. He studied the latest management practices to keep his land a healthy ecosystem, home to two of the dwindling gopher tortoise dens in the state.

Now 81, Wood stood recently among the twisted, shattered, mature trees that were but healthy saplings when he bought the land in 1946. The retired nuclear weapons specialists compared the scene to the outer edges of a multi-megaton blast.

Wood and some 10,000 family foresters in southeastern Louisiana who suffered enormous blows from Hurricane Katrina stand to lose 90 percent or more of the income they could have reaped from logging. Meanwhile, 3 billion board feet of damaged timber lay tangled on the ground, in danger of deteriorating before it can be sold for sharply depleted prices as plywood or pulpwood.

"It's got to be the most destructive force that's hit our country since settlement days," Wood said, adding that he remembers as a boy counting the growth rings of felled trees in Washington Parish. "I could count in excess of 400, so there had never been a storm like this."

Buck Vandersteen, executive director of the Louisiana Forestry Association, said the state's timber industry will likely take a $1 billion hit – one fifth its annual income – from Katrina's immediate damage and the subsequent rush to salvage fallen trees before they're stripped of all their value.

The staggering loss amounts to enough healthy wood to build 300,000 homes — twice Louisiana's total annual harvest, Vandersteen said.

About 65 percent of the damage was in Washington Parish, with St. Tammany and Tangipahoa parishes suffering most of the remainder of the damage.

Vandersteen said that although none of the damaged wood has gone to waste, it's quickly approaching that point. First, loggers are attempting to pick up fallen trees that weren't splintered so badly that they can no longer be used as plywood. The remaining wood that's picked up in time will be shredded into pulpwood for paper. Finally, timber that sits too long will have to be used as fuel wood, burned in boilers for energy.

"A lot of it will go to waste," Vandersteen said. "Our goal is to recover 40 percent of it."

Aside from the sheer volume of material awaiting pickup, Vandersteen said the task for loggers screeched to a halt when crews had to abandon all-mechanized cutting for on-the-ground power saws to untangle the clot of fallen trees. He said insurance costs have doubled for the more dangerous working conditions.

"Because the material is all down and it's crosswise and it's such a mess, productivity drops by about half than what it would normally be," he said.

The forestry association has been working with state and federal officials to line up grants and other assistance to help landowners reforest their devastated plots. Vandersteen said the future of timber, the state's largest agricultural crop, depends on starting the long process of replacing the hurricane-ravaged forests.

"What we worry most after this storm is that people's attitudes after this storm is, 'Oh, it is too risky. I'm going to let it grow up into weeds or I'm going to turn it in to a shopping center,' " Vandersteen said.

Greenlawn Terrace welcomes Alexander students

Green, red shirts differentiate pupils

By Mark Waller
East Jefferson bureau

A walk through the halls of Kenner's Greenlawn Terrace Elementary School on Tuesday revealed all the students in some classrooms wearing red shirts, while in other rooms they were in green.

Even in the cafeteria during lunch, there were tables with students in red shirts, and others with students in green.

But it's not a dispute over school uniforms or a feud between cliques dividing the students by clothing color. It's just one of the changes brought on by Hurricane Katrina: Greenlawn Terrace is now also serving as home to A.C. Alexander Elementary of Kenner.

Katrina destroyed a skylight in Alexander's cafeteria, allowing rain to enter. Alexander thus became one of the four Jefferson Parish elementary schools that could not reopen with most other Jefferson public schools Monday.

Alexander Principal Mary Jenks said it's unclear how long it will take to fix the cafeteria, so now Greenlawn has two principals' offices: the regular one occupied by Greenlawn Principal Kitty Croft, and one in the library for Jenks and her staff. In some classrooms, Greenlawn teachers work with Greenlawn students in their green shirts, while other classrooms hold Alexander teachers and students in their red shirts.

In the morning, Alexander students enter a different side of campus than the Greenlawn students. "Everybody who had an extra spot, like a gifted, speech, social worker, I took all of their classrooms away,'' to make room for the Alexander classes, Croft said.

The visiting students outnumber resident ones: 274 children from Alexander are on the Greenlawn campus, compared with about 140 Greenlawn students and 23 students displaced from other schools. So far, more than half of the two schools' pre-Katrina students remain away.

Croft said Greenlawn was fortunate to be able to operate and take displaced students. Storm water surrounded the campus but stopped at its edges, she said. Wind damage to buildings was minor, and the National Guard helped Croft clear tree debris.

The two principals said they were neighbors in Metairie for 25 years and have collaborated professionally for 15 years, forming a close friendship that has eased the task of merging the two schools. Both said they are committed to preserving Alexander's identity as a separate school.

"This is just a temporary setback for us," Jenks said. "We intend to go back."

The children seemed to take their new circumstances in stride Tuesday. Some Alexander students said they miss the central air conditioning at their home school because Greenlawn's window units are noisy. But they said they prefer physical education classes at Greenlawn because they get to go outdoors more than at Alexander. "It feels kind of still the same, because we have the same teachers, and we're doing the same work," Alexander fifth-grader Geoffrey Noot said.

Greenlawn students said they were glad to share their school and meet new friends.

"I hope for the best for them,'' Greenlawn fourth-grader Casey Murphy said about his Alexander peers. "It's kind of a little crowded, but we work hard. We work through it. I hope they get their building fixed, and they can go back."

Kenner seeks role in pump operations

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

The Kenner City Council will discuss a slew of hurricane-related issues at its meeting tonight, including a resolution asking Jefferson Parish to train Kenner workers to operate parish drainage pumps.

Kenner Mayor Phil Capitano submitted a resolution asking the parish to cross-train Kenner employees to operate the pumps, which city officials said would make the city more self-reliant during storms. Parish pump operators evacuated north of Lake Pontchartrain for Hurricane Katrina.

Capitano's resolution also asks Jefferson Parish to consider a system that would drain south Kenner into the Mississippi River, rather than into Lake Pontchartrain. After Hurricane Katrina, Kenner officials said, water from south Kenner flowed into lower-lying north Kenner, flooding some of the neighborhoods there.

"There are a number of improvements and modifications to the system which could help prevent or alleviate the catastrophic flooding which occurred during Katrina," the resolution states.

Another hot topic on tonight's agenda is garbage and trash pickup.

Some Kenner residents have complained that pickup has been slow or, in some cases, nonexistent since the hurricane.

Last week, Capitano warned Waste Management that it had violated its contract by not picking up garbage quickly enough. He also signed a contract last week with Ramelli Janitorial Service Inc. to handle half of the city, while Waste Management handles the other half.

"Obviously there's been a breakdown in the whole city of Kenner," said City Councilman Marc Johnson, who requested the garbage discussion. He said he has talked with some people who haven't had garbage picked up in the past three or four weeks.

"It's horrible. If we've hired another company to come in, then what are they doing?" Johnson asked. "We shouldn't be this far behind today."

The council is also scheduled to consider a resolution, submitted by Councilman Dominic Weilbaecher, that asks Capitano to provide the council with all contracts and invoices, both submitted and approved, since Aug. 28.

The meeting begins at 6 p.m. in the council chambers in Kenner City Hall at 1801 Williams Blvd.

Jeff OKs Katrina contracts

By Kate Moran
East Jefferson Bureau

Jefferson Parish accumulated $18.8 million in bills for food, medicine and emergency cleanup in the days after Hurricane Katrina, and it has approved dozens of other contracts that will add millions more to its tab, according to documents distributed to Parish Council members this week.

The parish used a basic form of competitive bidding before awarding the contracts, placing calls to several companies to obtain verbal estimates, but much of the work nonetheless fell to companies that have contributed generously to parish leaders in the past.

Among the roster of familiar names are Boh Bros., which received a contract for water line repairs, and Brown, Cunningham and Gannuch, which provided storm surge and damage assessments.

The Jefferson Parish Council called an emergency meeting Wednesday to approve the contracts and authorize payment of invoices already submitted to the parish. The work was previously sanctioned by Parish President Aaron Broussard, who has the authority to sign contracts in emergency situations. Normally, that task would fall to the council chairman after formal action by the Parish Council.

But the council deferred a vote on the contracts on the advice of parish attorney Tom Wilkinson, who said he was not certain the council had the power to act because state law confers emergency powers on Broussard. The council will take up the resolutions again at its regular meeting this Wednesday.

"Everybody who has done work will be getting paid," Council Chairman Tom Capella said. The documents provide the first glimpse into spending parish officials conducted in the hectic days after Katrina, and more information is expected as officials continue assessing storm damage.

Chief Administrative Assistant Tim Whitmer said the Federal Emergency Management Agency will reimburse the parish for the lion's share of its emergency spending.

The parish has earmarked only a few of the contracts, including one with Greg Cantrell Inc. to restore the landscaping in public areas, that likely will not be eligible for the federal refund. Cantrell received a second contract with the parish to plant shrubbery at mobile homes parks.

The largest of the contracts went to Jim Tatman's Mobile Homes, a Louisiana company that will receive $8.7 million to provide trailers for police officers, firefighters and medical workers.

The parish paid Certified Cleaning of Metairie $3.2 million to clean the Joseph S. Yenni Building, the east bank complex of government offices that sustained heavy damage in the hurricane.

The parish issued a second contract to Mechanical Construction for $310,000 to repair the cooling tower at the Yenni building. The company's owner, Joseph Jaeger, contributed $2,000 to Broussard during his most recent campaign.

Whitmer said the parish hewed to the competitive bidding guidelines laid out by FEMA by seeking estimates for work by telephone. In the days immediately after the storm, however, when many workers had evacuated the area, the parish sometimes had to issue a contract to the first company it could find.

In the Yenni building, the parish needed to remove water immediately to prevent the growth of mold, he said; cleaning costs would have soared if the water were left to stand.

Shaw Environmental, a company generous to Gov. Kathleen Blanco during her campaign in 2003, won a contract with the parish to coordinate "all matters" related to fallout from the hurricane. The company will work with several subcontractors, including Tatman's Mobile Homes.

Boh Bros. Construction gave at least $2,000 to Broussard in the 2003 election, and Cajun Construction also donated to Broussard; both received contracts to repair water lines. Another donor, Durr Heavy Construction, which gave $5,000 to Broussard in the same election, will serve as the general contractor for mobile home sites.

Brown, Cunningham and Gannuch donated at least $5,000 to Broussard.

Documents provided by the parish did not specify the value of the contracts.

Mayor's Court set to return in Harahan

By Matt Scallan
East Jefferson bureau

Harahan will resume its Mayor's Court docket on Oct. 11 at 5:30 p.m. to hear cases originally set for Sept. 13, Mayor Paul Johnston said.

Cases originally set for arraignment on Sept. 27 have been reset for Oct. 25.

The court office is open from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Monday through Friday so defendants can pay fines. For cases scheduled for arraignment, fines can be paid until 3 p.m. on the day of the arraignment, Johnston said.

Johnston also said residents will receive a $5 credit for garbage collection on their next bill because of a lack of service during September. He said the city's cleanup is well under way, but asked residents to segregate their garbage into three piles: trash, including tree limbs and construction debris; bagged leaves; and garbage.

The piles are important because the city pays substantially more to dispose of household garbage than it does to dispose other types of waste. Contractors can grind up branches and leaves. Wet sheetrock can be hauled off to landfills designed for construction debris.

Johnston said residents should put garbage in the regular cans.

"If they don't get everything on the first round, we're asking people to pick up what's left and put it in the empty can. We're catching up."

Jeff judge election scheduled April 1

East Jefferson bureau

Gov. Kathleen Blanco has scheduled an April 1 election to replace Alan Green, who was convicted of a corruption charge three months ago while a judge of the 24th District Court in Jefferson Parish. The runoff, if necessary, will be April 29.

The winner will serve the rest of Green's term, which runs through 2008.

The election dates are the same ones on which Jefferson's six municipalities will be choosing city officials to four-year terms.

Meanwhile, no new dates have been set for balloting in Jefferson and Orleans parishes that originally was scheduled for Oct. 15 but postponed after Hurricane Katrina.

These include a Jefferson-wide seat on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeal, the 2nd District seat on the Kenner City Council, the 4th District seat on the Jefferson School Board and community services taxes or fees in three New Orleans neighborhoods: Kingswood, Touro Bouligny and Twinbrook.

Blanco on Sept. 14 issued an executive order indefinitely delaying the balloting.

Defense contractor tries to find footing

Textron bringing in workers old, new

St. Tammany bureau

Like other major defense contractors in southeast Louisiana, Textron Marine and Land Systems is struggling to get its factories and shipyards back in operation in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Among Textron's contracts are ones worth up to $660 million to build armored security vehicles, or ASVs, used primarily by military police patrols and local security forces in the war in Iraq.

The company is bringing back as many workers as possible — and hiring additional ones — in an effort to get its main plant in eastern New Orleans and its finishing plant in Slidell back in full production by late November.

St. Tammany Parish President Kevin Davis said Tuesday that the parish is helping out by allowing Textron to place as many as 100 house trailers on the golf course at storm-devastated Oak Harbor Estates south of Slidell to house displaced workers.

Not everyone is happy about that decision, he acknowledged, but insisted the full operation of the two facilities "is important to our economy, to Slidell and to the whole parish."

Government officials, workers to get day off

St. Tammany bureau

Schools will be in session Monday, which is Columbus Day, but it will be a holiday for all but essential personnel in St. Tammany Parish government and most municipal offices.

Parish President Kevin Davis, at a daily briefing this week, urged local government officials to "give your employees a break." Most agreed, including those from Covington, Folsom, Mandeville and Slidell.

Davis said, "We've been going 24-7 for five or six weeks" since Hurricane Katrina struck Aug. 29. "We're real stressed." He's among them, he added, and said he was looking forward to a three-day weekend.

"The majority of our employees have been working long, hard hours since Hurricane Katrina without time off to take care of their own homes and families," he said.

Davis urged contractors and others to obtain all necessary parish permits before Friday "so that the work of rebuilding St. Tammany will continue uninterrupted."

State gets $20.9 million grant for charter schools

State hopes to use money for repairs

By Steve Ritea
Staff writer

Louisiana has been awarded a $20.9 million grant to help reopen charter schools damaged by Hurricane Katrina, as well as to create new charter schools or expand the capacity of existing ones, the federal Secretary of Education has announced.

The announcement has piqued interest in creating charter schools in the New Orleans area, said Gary Wheat, charter school program administrator for the state Board of Elementary and Secondary Education.

Earlier this week, the board of directors at Benjamin Franklin High School, the city's premier magnet school, voted unanimously to reopen as a charter school in January. The decision is subject to approval by the Orleans Parish School Board or BESE.

Lusher School already has won approval of its charter from the School Board. Lusher School officials also hope to reopen in January, with financial assistance of as much as $1.5 million from Tulane University, which will give spots at the school to children of faculty and staff.

Seven of the nine charter schools in New Orleans were damaged by Katrina. Two Uptown schools, the Milestone SABIS Academy and Sophie B. Wright, sustained minimal or no damage and are planning to reopen soon.

The grant, funded by President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act, covers costs of supplies and salaries but cannot be used to repair buildings, Wheat said. The state has asked for a waiver, however, to allow some of the money to be used for repairs, he said. It is expecting an answer next week. FEMA money could be available for those repairs if the grant money cannot.

Charter schools that sustained the most serious flooding are New Orleans Charter Middle School, the International School of Louisiana and KIPP: Phillips Academy. They are not planning to reopen this year, Wheat said.

Wheat said more federal money could be made available in the future if the current grant cannot provide enough assistance to existing, expanding or startup charters.

In 2003, lawmakers voted to let nonprofit groups take over an unlimited number of schools that have posted failing grades for four consecutive years. Five in New Orleans have been taken over since last summer.

Charter schools are independent public schools designed and operated by parents, educators or community leaders. Charter schools are operated free of charge to parents.

St. Bernard to keep tabs on finances

Without federal aid, coffers to dry up soon

By Manuel Torres
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

With hundreds of millions of dollars in reconstruction contracts to be handed out in St. Bernard Parish in the next few months, the Parish Council on Tuesday asked President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez' administration to report monthly on who is getting the work, as well as on the parish's finances.

The request, unanimously approved by the council, comes as officials said they want to get a handle on the parish's coffers five weeks after Hurricane Katrina devastated the area. Council members also indicated they want to ensure St. Bernard handles the work with transparency and that the parish does not get overcharged.

"There's not only snakes in your house; there could be other snakes," said Councilman Mark Madary, referring to a contractor who offered the parish trailers at a very high rent. The parish did not take the offer.

His comment drew a sharp reply from Rodriguez.

"Don't tell me there are hidden snakes. There are no snakes," Rodriguez said.

The exchange, not unusual during typical council meetings, stood out during what was mostly an emotional and subdued meeting on the Scotia Prince, the cruise ship that parish officials are using as a temporary home. Several residents cried as they told the council their Katrina stories and sought advice on how to resume their lives.

"I'm lost. I got my little trinkets out of my house. What do I do next?" pleaded Chalmette resident Audrey Bello, who with her husband lost their home and a small private school they operated.

Council members said the monthly report they seek from the administration would help them make informed decisions about the parish's finances.

Rodriguez and the council said the parish will run out of cash after two more payrolls unless they get federal aid. Rodriguez was scheduled to testify in Congress today to boost the state's request for money for local governments.

But council members also asked for a report on whom the parish is employing and which companies are receiving reconstruction contracts. So far, the parish has hired one firm, IDB, to oversee its massive cleanup, in a deal that officials said could reach $128 million. FEMA is expected to reimburse the contract's cost.

Giving a glimpse into the gargantuan needs in the parish, the council also listened to reports from 15 federal and state agencies working in the parish. Progress is coming, though in some cases a bit slow.

For example, the Federal Emergency Management Agency has tagged the first 6,000 travel trailers for temporary housing for St. Bernard government agencies and residents, and it has identified six sites to put them on. But leases have been signed for only two of the sites, and nobody could verify that the trailers are available now.

But things are moving faster in other areas. A FEMA Disaster Response Center and several private insurance companies have set up shop at the parking lot of the new Wal-Mart in Chalmette. Officials hope the facilities will help residents get assistance and move their insurance claims along. Officials also said a temporary medical clinic will be set up at the same site in two weeks.

Residents at the meeting who asked when they can get a FEMA trailer were told they must apply at one of the agency's disaster response sites. But officials assured them they could park that trailer wherever they are living, even out of state, as long as the site passes an inspection and has power, water and sewer access.

But a FEMA representative warned the audience that "we don't have enough trailers, guaranteed."

In other matters, the council:

▶ Said no property in the parish will be demolished without the knowledge of its owner. "We need to respond to widespread rumors," Rodriguez said. "Nobody is going in your property unless you say so."

▶ Suspended the parish's ordinance banning the burning of trash so that the state's Department of Environmental Quality can do controlled burns of storm debris with the authorization of the St. Bernard Fire Department. The waiver does not affect private residents and businesses, which are still not allowed to burn their trash.

▶ Gave contractors in charge of collecting storm debris the authority to access the land and exterior of a private home or business in cases where the property owner is not present. Councilman Lynn Dean voted against the measure, saying the government should not pay for collecting debris in private property.

▶ Changed the time of its next meeting, scheduled for Oct. 18, from 7 p.m. to 11 a.m. Officials said they hope to be back in the parish's government complex by then.

Free ride almost over for Causeway drivers

Tolls to return Monday on bridge

By Paul Purpura
West Bank bureau

Free passage across Lake Pontchartrain comes to an end Monday, when the Causeway Commission resumes collecting tolls.

Meanwhile, officials with Crescent City Connection, which spans the Mississippi River, are awaiting word from the state on whether they may also reinstate tolls the same day.

To help evacuation traffic move more quickly, officials from both bridges suspended toll collection before Hurricane Katrina made landfall Aug. 29. National Guard and emergency vehicles, prevalent in hurricane recovery efforts, will continue to have tolls waived, officials said.

Causeway officials will resume collecting tolls from civilian motorists Monday at 5 a.m., bridge General Manager Robert Lambert said Wednesday. With the Interstate 10 twin spans between eastern New Orleans and Slidell closed for repair, the Causeway is seeing a larger volume of traffic. But that doesn't mean Causeway officials are trying to capitalize on the increase, Lambert said.

"We're clearly not looking to gain off that," he said, adding that he expects the twin spans to reopen "before most people believe."

The Causeway averages about $40,000 in toll collections daily, Lambert said, but the loss of revenue does not threaten the jobs of bridge employees. Fewer dollars could have a "short term" effect on the bridge's budget, but higher toll revenue in coming weeks are expected to compensate for the loss.

Though the Crescent City Connection has resumed ferry service, officials have not received approval from the state Department of Transportation and Development to reinstate tolls, said Randy Paisant, the bridge's assistant director. The amount collected daily on the CCC was not available Wednesday.

The ferries at Jackson Avenue and Canal Street resumed service with one boat each on Sept. 16, and they are operating free of tolls from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., Paisant said.

But if the state approves, toll collection for the ferries might resume Monday, too, he said.

The Chalmette-Algiers ferries, however, are not in service because of damage to the boats and landings during Katrina, Paisant said.

The motor vessels Capt. Neville Levy and Sen. Alvin T. Stumpf were knocked loose from their moorings in Algiers by stray barges and were pushed by the surge and wind to the levee and batture downstream, Paisant said. Their hulls and propellers were damaged, and a private contractor is expected to move the ferries back to water by early next week, Paisant said.

"It's a delicate operation to do so without causing further damage to the boats," he said.

The ferries will be put in dry docks for repairs, but Paisant said it is not known when ferry service will resume between Chalmette and Algiers.

Sheriff furloughs more than half of his employees in St. Bernard

Tax revenue can't cover their salaries

By Manuel Torres and Paul Rioux
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

Illustrating the financial wasteland Hurricane Katrina has made of St. Bernard Parish, Sheriff Jack Stephens on Wednesday temporarily laid off more than 200 employees, more than half of his workforce, citing the lack of tax revenue needed to run his office.

Stephens placed the employees on indefinite furlough and said they will be called back as money for their salaries becomes available and a need for their jobs arises. He said he had no choice as sales and property tax revenues, which make up most of his budget, have evaporated since the storm flooded the entire parish Aug. 29.

The cuts shrank the Sheriff's Office from around 400 workers to just 182, but did not affect deputies assigned to law enforcement duties, Stephens said. On the contrary, he said, remaining deputies will receive a $500-per-month raise as an incentive to not seek work elsewhere. Stephens said he will not receive the raise.

"They have no place to live; they're separated from their families; and they don't know how much longer they'll have a job," Stephens said of the employees getting a raise. "We have to give them some reason to stick it out."

Stephens' announcement came a day after New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin laid off 3,000 people, or half the city's workers, citing financial strains. Other local government entities that also depend on taxes have warned they are also reeling from the effects of Katrina and are considering personnel reductions.

The St. Bernard Sheriff's Office cuts affected mostly administrative employees and personnel assigned to duties no longer needed now that almost all parish residents are living elsewhere and commerce is practically nonexistent in St. Bernard, Stephens said. The targeted jobs included some positions at the parish jail and workers assigned to collecting taxes, guarding school crossings, and serving court subpoenas, among other functions.

Stephens, who has been warning for weeks about dwindling cash reserves, received more than $12 million from the Federal Emergency Management Agency last week. But by law the money can be spent only on overtime and other emergency expenses such as temporary housing and replacing equipment destroyed by the hurricane. FEMA cannot allocate money for salaries of existing employees.

The Louisiana congressional delegation and state and local officials have been pushing Congress to consider appropriating money to keep local governments and sheriffs from going bankrupt and having to shut down.

In the meantime, Stephens said he is considering using the FEMA money to make payroll for his remaining employees as a stop-gap measure. He said he would replace the cash later with whatever money Congress may approve or future revenue as the parish rebuilds. Asked about the legality of such a move, he said he had no alternative.

"If that's not legal, go ahead and take me away in handcuffs right now because my hands are already tied," he said. "There's nothing else I can do."

Plaquemines sets meetings for public school employees

Classes to begin in parish Oct. 17

St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

The Plaquemines Parish School Board will have two meetings Thursday for employees planning to return to work when schools reopen Oct. 17.

Instructional employees will meet at 10 a.m., and at 1 p.m. support staff will gather at the Belle Chasse High School auditorium, school district spokesman Paul Springer said Tuesday.

The meetings are in preparation for employees' return to work, Springer said. The three public schools in the Belle Chasse area will resume classes a week later.

The school district expects about 600 of its 750 employees to return. About 145 have said they want to return but do not have housing, Plaquemines Secondary Education Director Carol Roberts said.

Only about 20 employees said they have taken jobs elsewhere, she said. The School Board has requested 40 travel trailers and six mobile homes to house essential personnel who lost their own homes in Hurricane Katrina, Superintendent Jim Hoyle said.

Body is thought to be nursing home patient's

Parish coroner finds feeding tube telling

From staff reports

The body found behind St. Rita's Nursing Home in St. Bernard Parish on Saturday had a feeding tube in it and was probably that of a nursing home patient who died during Hurricane Katrina, the parish coroner said Monday.

Rescuers found the woman's body in a wooded area behind the facility near Poydras, but officials said Saturday that it was not clear whether she was a patient at the home, where 34 people were found dead inside after Katrina.

Coroner Bryan Bertucci on Monday said the woman had a feeding tube in her, an indication that she was receiving medical care and a sign that she may have been a patient at the home.

"There's no ID, but all indications would be that she was a (nursing home) patient," Bertucci said.

He said it is also possible that the woman was a nearby resident of another facility who died during the storm and whose body floated to the area.

The owners of the home have been charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide for failing to evacuate the home ahead of the hurricane.

It was unclear Monday whether a charge would be added because of the new body. The attorney general's office and National Guard searched the building and surrounding areas again Monday, with no additional bodies found, parish spokesman Steve Cannizaro said.

Restoration of ruined levees begins along the Gulf outlet

CHALMETTE: The Army Corps of Engineers begins work rebuilding a 6-mile stretch of levee extending along the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet from Bayou Bienvenue east. The grass in the foreground is at the top of the levee, and the Lockheed Martin Space Systems Michoud assembly facility is visible at far right.

Category 3 shield sought by June 1

By Manuel Torres
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

Sweating under sunny skies Wednesday afternoon, a work crew running a half dozen bulldozers shifted sand along the washed-out hurricane protection levee that separates the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet from the marshes just north of St. Bernard Parish.

It looked like very unceremonial work — leveling the remains of an earthen levee almost entirely washed out by Hurricane Katrina, so that it can eventually be raised again. But the labor marked a milestone: the start of the first of 40 gargantuan projects that over the next eight months are set to burn $400 million to restore flood protection around the New Orleans area to its pre-Katrina levels.

"This looks pretty mundane; like watching grass grow," said U.S. Army Corps of Engineers spokesman Alan Dooley, as the earth-moving machines toiled in the background. "But it marks the beginning of the road back to recovery."

It'll be a race against the clock. The Corps, which maintains the levees and is overseeing the work, says it can restore the levee system to a Category 3 hurricane level of protection by June 1, the start of the 2006 hurricane season. It'll also be a monumental task that will repair one tenth of the metro area's levee system, using almost 3 million cubic yards of material: enough to create a pile the size of a football field and æ of a mile high.

More important, the work may in many ways help determine the fate of the metro area, as residents try to gather the confidence to rebuild in St. Bernard, eastern New Orleans and other areas that got pummeled by Katrina's surge.

A wall of water — or surge — as high as 22 feet washed away much of the levees along the MRGO and the eastern flank of the city. It's the severity of the damage there that prompted the Corps to start the rebuilding there, said Col. Louis Setliff, with the Corps' Task Force Guardian, the group planning the rebuilding.

The hit that levees took there was evident during a tour Wednesday of the section now under repair. An errant barge that partially crushed the floodwall near the floodgate at Bayou Bienvenue still sat over the damaged structure, and the surge twisted nearby sheet piling as it rushed towards Chalmette neighborhoods. The levee's earthen mound, formerly 17 feet high, was gone in sections extending hundreds of yards. Corps officials had no need to bend as they walked under a gas pipeline formerly buried in the levee.

The section to be fixed by the first contract is a 6-mile stretch of levee extending along the MRGO from Bayou Bienvenue east. A second contract, expected to begin in two weeks, will repair a 7-mile stretch east of Bayou Dupree in St. Bernard Parish. The third contract to be let will fix levees in eastern New Orleans to the east of the Pump Station No. 15, located near the Michoud facility.

Corps officials Wednesday did not know which contract would follow, but they said that with one-tenth of the metro area's flood protection system needing repairs, they expect to have dozens of projects and hundreds of employees working simultaneously in a few months.

"We have never seen this in the New Orleans district," said Walter Baumy, a one of the district engineers working in the effort.

Most repairs will not be as daring as the now-well-known images of military helicopters dropping giant sand bags in breaches along the Industrial, 17th Street and London canals.

"This is not as dramatic. But this is how you get long-term protection," Dooley said.

The entire rebuilding plan could change in midstream if Congress decides to write the check to upgrade the area's protection to a level sufficient for a Category 5 hurricane, a move Louisiana officials are pushing for. The massive effort would take years and cost as much as $3 billion.

Baumy said such a change could mean some of the current rebuilding would have to be redesigned or may even need to be torn down. But he said the area cannot stay "in a holding pattern" without repairing levees while Congress determines what to do in the long run.

"That's a chance you cannot take," he said.

Plea deal reached in fatal '02 crash in St. John

Trucker accepts lesser charge

By Allen Powell II
River Parishes bureau

A Texas trucker who was charged in a massive 2002 crash along Interstate 10 that killed a Florida man pled guilty to a reduced charge Tuesday that carries a maximum sentence of five years imprisonment instead of 30.

William Moore of Kemp, Texas, decided against fighting the original charge of vehicular homicide in court, accepting a plea agreement for negligent homicide with the St. John the Baptist Parish district attorney's office.

Jury selection in Moore's trial was scheduled for Tuesday before 40th District Court Judge Madeline Jasmine. LaPlace attorney Daniel Becnel III represented Moore.

Vehicular homicide applies to any death caused by a vehicle, particularly if someone drives that vehicle while under the influence of alcohol or drugs. It carries a maximum sentence of 30 years imprisonment and a $15,000 fine. Negligent homicide applies to any death caused by negligence and has a maximum sentence of five years imprisonment and a $5,000 fine.

A Dec. 5 sentencing hearing in Moore's case has been scheduled before Jasmine.

Moore is accused of killing Mark Mackaness, 40, of Jacksonville, Fla., in July 2002 after the Jeep Cherokee that Mackaness was riding in was struck from behind by a tractor-trailer driven by Moore. The Jeep burst into flames, and Mackaness was trapped inside. He was pronounced dead at the scene. The driver of the Jeep was pulled from the vehicle by another motorist but sustained several injuries.

Besides the crash that killed Mackaness, there were five other accidents along the same stretch of rain-slicked highway on that day, including several others allegedly involving Moore's truck.

St. John Parish code enforcement officer Edward "Skipper" Songy was killed in one of those incidents, police said, when a vehicle hit him as he stood on the side of the road directing traffic.

At the time of Moore's accident, law enforcement officials did not believe drugs or alcohol were involved, but lawyers for the driver of Mackaness' Jeep accused Moore during a civil trial of being intoxicated with methadone. Those attorneys said his intoxication led to the crash.

Officials with the district attorney's office could not be reached for comment. Fred Mackaness, the father of the victim, also could not be reached for comment on the plea agreement.

Merge parishes into one

It would seem with such a small number of people remaining in our region and planning to return, we should take advantage of this situation to bring our newborn metropolis into the modern age and dispel some of those horrible images that have mortally wounded our tourist industry.

We have now seen, as has the world, where the institutions of segregation and discrimination have gotten us: a large percentage of the population living in poverty, a robust crime rate, a school system in disarray.

To solve all of these problems, as well as having the resources available to rebuild our region, we should consolidate the three connected parishes, Jefferson, Orleans and St. Bernard, into one.

Are we our brother's keeper? Do we have enough to help others? To help ourselves?

I know it's not in our history to work together, but maybe we should put it there.

Kenner mayor is proud of city's response to storm's challenges

Re: "Who benefits from drowned Jefferson Parish?" Your Opinions, Sept. 29.

I take exception to Gene P. Inman's claims in his letter regarding conditions in Kenner during Hurricane Katrina. Wind damage in Kenner was anything but "minimal." Thousands of homes and businesses in Kenner sustained wind damage. For more than two weeks we did not have water or sewage services, and only 30 percent of the city had power. Had residents returned too early, additional damage would have been caused by sewage backups, not to mention the danger from downed power lines and ruptured gas lines.

Mr. Inman gives the impression that it was my decision to stop the pumps prior to the storm's arrival. No Jefferson Parish municipal mayor has authority over the pumping system. All pumping stations, drainage systems and pumping station staff are controlled exclusively by Jefferson Parish. The massive flooding in Kenner after the storm disturbs me greatly.

The suggestion that I would cause harm to Kenner for the sake of one federal dollar is utter nonsense and an insult. The city is reimbursed for some of the emergency services provided, and to get federal assistance we must painstakingly document all expenses. The city will lose a great deal of its cash reserves in this disaster.

Mr. Inman said he hopes we are "proud" of our work. Frankly, I am very proud. I am proud of my staff, which pulled together in the worst possible conditions and worked around the clock for four weeks to get Kenner moving again. I am proud of the Kenner firefighters, police officers and city workers who helped keep homes as safe as possible. We immediately began the rebuilding of our city infrastructure and jump-started commerce by allowing businesses to return to the city after only two weeks.

Pay to evacuate? Why not?

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, it has become clear that the proper evacuation of the thousands of poor people in our city was a major problem. Some have said that those who stayed did so because they are too dependent on government handouts and waited for the state and FEMA to bail them out. I think the problem was more subtle.

I doubt anyone consciously said, "Let's just sit around here and wait for the water to rise. The government will come in and fix us up." Instead, people stayed for two main reasons. First, some stayed because they felt the storm would not hurt them. They figured that in the past no hurricane had destroyed their homes, there was no reason to think Hurricane Katrina would be any different. This hard-headed attitude is a product of poor education.

The second reason (and the more prevalent, I think) is lack of funds. Who wants to jump on a bus and be left off in Dallas with $5 in his pocket? This is a very real and understandable source of anxiety.

This second reason can be solved. I propose that at the beginning of hurricane season, the state issue hurricane cards to eligible citizens. These cards would be a kind of voucher that would only be activated in the event of a mandatory evacuation order. At that point each card would be linked to an account with a modest amount of money — say, $250. This money could be spent only outside the evacuation area, and the account would be closed in about a week. If the evacuation remained in effect three days later, more money could be issued.

Critics might argue that this plan is tantamount to paying residents to leave the city. It is. On the other hand, putting up a few dollars ahead of time to get people to leave town sounds like a small price to pay to make sure the events at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center and the Superdome never happen again.

School Board should act or step aside

Re: "School Board politics emerge intact," Oct. 3.

As three displaced families and parents of eight Orleans Parish schoolchildren, we are compelled to respond to article on the overwhelming inertia of the Orleans Parish School Board. At a time of the most catastrophic natural disaster in our countryís history, members of the Orleans Parish School Board cannot find a way to put aside their egos and personal needs in order to put New Orleans' children's needs first.

Our lives are in New Orleans. Soon we shall have utilities and drinkable water and should be able to come home to rebuild the city that we love. But because the schools are not ready for our children, we cannot come home. The boardís leaders appear more interested in advancing their own agenda than to admit they are in over their heads. They should accept the offered help and expertise from concerned specialists from across the state and country.

Have we all not suffered enough? We beg of those on the School Board, please do what is best for the children. Either consult and work with state and national authorities who can lead New Orleans schools forward, or step aside and allow those who are interested and willing to do so.

OUR OPINIONS

Bitter medicine

Because of the destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina, plenty of employers in the metro area are being forced to make painful choices. Government agencies are no exception. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin announced Tuesday that the city is laying off 3,000 employees — about half its work force — because it can't afford to keep paying them. For much the same reason, St. Bernard Parish Sheriff Jack Stephens laid off more than 200 employees. Other public agencies may well end up making similar decisions in coming weeks.

Unquestionably, these layoffs represent a hardship for public employees, many of whom have also lost their homes, and for the New Orleans area as a whole. The loss of thousands of jobs could hamper efforts to get the local economy moving again, and evacuees who have no source of income left will have even less of a reason to return.

Nevertheless, the choice is straightforward: If there is no money to pay people, there is little option but to cut the public payroll.

Some commentators have suggested that any aid given to Louisiana will be squandered through profligacy and cronyism. The layoffs show that Mayor Nagin and Sheriff Stephens understand the depth and breadth of their communities' predicament and are trying to be fiscally responsible, even under the worst possible conditions. That ought to reassure federal and state officials and others who are watching local reconstruction efforts with a skeptical eye.

A key danger of these cuts, of course, is that they will hinder local governmentsí ability to provide the services necessary to attract residents back.

The cuts in New Orleans will not affect workers whom the mayor's office deemed essential: police officers, firefighters, emergency medical personnel, health and safety inspectors, and sewerage, water and sanitation workers. Likewise, in reducing his office's work force from more than 400 to 182, Sheriff Stephens suggests that he focused on employees whose jobs are currently unnecessary. Workers assigned to guarding school crossings and serving subpoenas, for example, wouldn't have much to do anyway now that virtually all St. Bernard residents have evacuated. In the meantime, deputies who are staying on are getting a $500-a-month raise, to dissuade them from taking jobs elsewhere.

It's not yet clear whether these changes will be sufficient to stop the flow of red ink without crippling the government bodies involved. Mayor Nagin hinted that if the city's bleak revenue forecasts don't improve, Tuesday's layoffs could be only the beginning. Under current rules, money from the Federal Emergency Management Agency cannot be used to pay for the regular salaries of government employees; the idea, understandably enough, is to focus money on relief services rather than on propping up potentially bloated government agencies.

But Katrina is the rare disaster that threatens the continued existence of a community the size of New Orleans. FEMA officials and members of Congress need to consider making an exception — under rare circumstances and subject to strict controls.

With or without FEMA aid, though, the challenge facing local government agencies is formidable. When the population of a city or a parish plunges, its government will likely have to adapt and shrink accordingly. The reality is grim, but pretending otherwise won't make the problem go away.

Don't hold your breath

To learn that a federal agency is bogged down in bureaucracy doesn't exactly qualify as a news flash. But even the most cynical among us must be stunned to learn that, as of earlier this week, the U.S. Small Business Administration had only approved 14 of its low-interest loans to businesses that were damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

Only three of those businesses are in Louisiana, and it's unknown whether any are in the New Orleans area. By all accounts the problem is the mountains of paperwork that owners must complete. Requiring applicants to provide lots of records is perfectly acceptable under normal circumstances, but this isn't a normal circumstance.

So many small businesses in the Gulf Coast region were incapacitated by Katrina that the area's economy is threatened. According to Gov. Kathleen Blanco, about a third of the state's private businesses were disrupted by the one-two punch of hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Katrina alone damaged about 68,000 small businesses in Louisiana.

Therefore, it behooves the SBA to expedite loan applications. The longer the area's businesses are shut, the less likely residents will be to return.

Tony Martinez, director of the Small Business Development Center in Baton Rouge, says his office has helped 30 business owners submit applications to the SBA and that the agency hasn't finished reviewing any of them. He also said a regional SBA official told him that business owners can expect a 90-day turnaround on their loan applications.

SBA spokeswoman Carol Chastang disputes that. She says the agency's goal is to have applications approved within 30 days. That's better than 90 days, of course, but it's far less speedy than it needs to be.

The SBA requires that applicants have detailed records showing the previous three years' worth of revenue on a month-to-month basis. They also must wait for a government inspector to come and look at the damaged business. U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal wonders why the SBA doesn't just assume that businesses in certain ZIP codes sustained heavy damage and forgo the time-consuming visits. It's a very good question.

Loan Program Director Herb Mitchell says he lacks the authority to waive legal requirements for government loans. If so, the Bush administration needs to give him that authority. Not every rule needs to be waived, of course. But the SBA does need to nimbly adjust to the needs of the business owners it was created to help.

It hasn't adjusted yet. And because it hasn't, many business owners and the economies that depend on them continue to suffer.

A chance for better health care

NICHOLAS D. KRISTOF

Wendy Spino, left, of Chalmette gets a shot Sept. 17 from Sherry Holland, a nurse from Columbia, Md., at Westwego Elementary School. Doctors, nurses and emergency medical technicians set up shop in the school cafeteria to provide care for those in need.

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, we have an opportunity to construct something far more important than higher levees: a national health care system that looks less like a tightrope and more like a safety net.

A dozen years after President Clinton's health reform efforts were destroyed by the insurance industry's duplicity, it's worth trying again. The health care system is steadily becoming more gummed up in ways that are impossible to hide.

One of the bumper stickers attacking the Clinton plan read, "If You Like the Post Office, You'll Love National Health Insurance." That wouldn't work today: The Postal Service runs a system that is manifestly more rational and efficient than our health care system. For starters, imagine a postal system that refused to deliver letters to or from 45 million Americans — except on rare occasions, by ambulance.

"This is one of those fleeting opportunities where a catastrophe creates an opportunity to rebuild something better than before," said Dr. Irwin Redlener, president of the Children's Health Fund and associate dean of the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University.

In a sign of the growing disenchantment with our health system, 13,000 doctors have joined Physicians for a National Health Program, which lobbies for a single-payer government-financed health program.

There are four main problems with the existing system. First, it leaves out 45 million uninsured Americans, and their number is rising. Second, it is by far the most expensive in the world, costing 15 percent of our national income, yet our outcomes are awful — U.S. life expectancy is worse than Costa Rica's. Third, our business competitiveness is undermined when, for example, medical expenses add $1,500 to the sticker of each General Motors car. Fourth, our system is catastrophically inefficient. According to a study in The New England Journal of Medicine, health administrative costs are $1,059 per capita in the United States and just $307 in Canada.

A single-payer system would be most efficient but probably is not politically feasible at the moment. The smart new book "The Health Care Mess" suggests a variety of more gradual approaches that would face less opposition.

Whatever the mechanism, all children should be covered. It's a disgrace that we use public funds to save the lives of nonagenarians but not those of 9-year-olds. And kids are a bargain: per capita medical spending is $1,525 for children younger than 5, and $9,000 per person aged 65 to 74.

A second principle is that we should put less emphasis on curative medicine and more on public health and prevention, everything from preparing for avian flu to encouraging exercise. Sure, we can buy more "left ventricular assist devices," which cost $210,000 per patient installed, or buy Erbitux for colon cancer, at $17,000 per month of treatment. But as a wise new book, "Prescription for a Healthy Nation," argues, you get more bang for the buck when you promote healthier lifestyles, such as by fighting obesity, cigarette smoking and the like.

Raising cigarette taxes saved far more American lives, for example, than an army of neurologists ever could. In the same spirit, I'd like to see a French fry tax. And imagine the health gains if we banned potato chips and soda from schools.

Reforming the health system won't be easy. In the real world, poor kids don't see doctors not only because they're uninsured, but also because Mom doesn't have a car, can't easily get time off from work or doesn't speak English. Those are hard nuts to crack, but one reason to think that we can do better is that much of the world does better.

I've been thinking of health care partly because of something that happened when I was on vacation in August. My kids and I were stacking firewood for my parents on the Yamhill, Ore., farm where I grew up, when suddenly the 7-foot stack collapsed — on top of my youngest. She was knocked down and pinned, her face bleeding, under a pile of logs.

I had insurance and a car to get to the emergency room — and in the end the logs (stained with blood) turned out to be in worse shape than my daughter. She's just fine. But that instant was heart-stopping in its terror, and the system routinely does fail such children in need. Isn't it worth fighting one more time for reforms so that we Americans can get health care every bit as good as Canada's?

ON OTHER ISSUES: Justice Harriet Miers?

Excerpts from the debate over President Bush's Supreme Court nominee

President Bush certainly thought he was making the safe and clever choice when he nominated Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court. Precisely because the choice was too clever, it could prove to be dangerous to both Bush and his party.

In selecting his White House counsel, Bush seemed determined not so much to satisfy anyone in particular as to offend no one at all. Many voices insisted that Justice Sandra Day O'Connor needed to be replaced by a woman. Democrats who had supported Chief Justice John Roberts said they would battle hard against any right-wing ideologue. Social conservatives said they would not be satisfied with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales or anyone else who showed signs of being treacherously moderate on abortion.

Miers got to the top of the list because she could check the first box and leave the other two blank. Since so much of her career has been outside public view — either as a corporate lawyer or as a loyal Bush insider — Democrats eager to keep a staunch conservative off the court have no idea where she stands on most issues.

— E.J. Dionne, in The Washington Post

Here's what people at the White House told me after Bush announced to nearly everyone's surprise that Miers, 60, now the chief White House legal counsel, was his pick to replace Sandra Day O'Connor: After running the judicial selection process along with Karl Rove — the process that led to the Roberts nomination — she had become a candidate for the high court herself.

The president and others at the White House have had long discussions with her about judges. She and Rove were involved in questioning at least five candidates for the court vacancy Roberts has filled. From those talks over the months, I'm told, it became clear to Bush that she had exactly the philosophy of judicial restraint he favors and that she wouldn't "grow" as a justice and turn into a swing vote or a liberal.

Also, I'm told, the president is fully aware of the stakes in this nomination. Roberts' replacement of William Rehnquist as chief justice was simply a conservative replacing a conservative. But Miers would succeed a swing justice. With her, I'm told further, Bush believes he would be altering the ideological makeup of the court, moving it to the right.

— Fred Barnes, in The Weekly Standard

On the major legal debates of her time, Miers has remained largely silent. Perhaps this is because she hasn't had the public opportunity to express her views, but a rational worry is that she doesn't have well-developed opinions about the reach into state prerogatives of the Commerce Clause, the separation of powers, the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, the breadth of the right to privacy, and so on. The lesson of other Republican nominees without such fixed views — Harry Blackmun, (David) Souter, Anthony Kennedy — is that they always drift to the left once they get on the court.

We aren't talking here, by the way, about Miers' personal views on abortion. GOP advocates yesterday were making much of the nominee's fight, in the early 1990s, to stop the American Bar Association from endorsing abortion on demand and public financing. For some social conservatives, this may be enough to assure them that Miers will vote correctly. But a judge is not a policymaker, and the problem with the Supreme Court's line of "privacy" cases isn't solely their policy result. It is that the justices invented a right in the "penumbras" and "emanations" of the Constitution and then stole the decision-making power from the people and their legislators on these social issues. What matters is where Miers stands on the Constitutional question.

Apart from his personal loyalty, this lack of a public record may have been Bush's main reason for nominating her: She won't be an easy ideological target, and so the left won't be able to find the "extraordinary circumstances" to sustain a filibuster.

— editorial, The Wall Street Journal

In this 2001 photo, Harriet Miers, then staff secretary at the White House, confers with President Bush over personnel forms. Bush nominated Miers for the Supreme Court Monday.

Why does President Bush's nomination of White House Counsel Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court remind me of Patty Hearst marrying her bodyguard? I can see how Miers might turn out to be a brilliant pick. But her proximity and loyalty to Bush are burdens, not virtues. They raise extra doubts that need to be overcome — i.e., doubts that wouldn't be raised in an equally under-résuméd and unknown candidate who wasn't Bush's in-house lawyer: 1) This is the Supreme Court, which is supposed to be an independent branch. That means loyalty should count for less and prickly integrity for more. . . ; 2) Even in the executive branch, where cronyism has a long, honorable and effective tradition, it hasn't been working conspicuously well of late for President Bush; 3) This sends a message to all sorts of ambitious, competent GOPers that the only real way to get the big promotions in a Bush administration is to actually work with Bush personally.

— Mickey Kaus, on Slate.com

Running a state lottery does not qualify anyone for the Supreme Court. Solving a property rights dispute is also not a qualification, even if the client becomes president. Clerking for a federal district court judge and serving on a city council are meager additions to a resume for this job. Heading up a large law firm can demonstrate ability as a lawyer and manager but provide little experience with constitutional principles. Working as counsel to the president does inevitably involve major public issues, including questions of constitutionality. The counsel's job would be a significant qualification if it had been held for years rather than months.

All in all, Harriet Miers' work experience makes her one of the least-qualified nominees for the Supreme Court in many decades. While such a thin resume is disappointing, it is not by itself disqualifying. But it does place Miers in a position of having to prove her case to the Senate.

—editorial, in the Boston Globe

I worked with Harriet Miers. She's a lovely person: intelligent, honest, capable, loyal, discreet, dedicated... I could pile on the praise all morning. But there is no reason at all to believe either that she is a legal conservative or — and more important — that she has the spine and steel necessary to resist the pressures that constantly bend the American legal system toward the left.

The rumor mill

Did you know that a monster crocodile was fished out of the New Orleans floodwaters? Had you realized that sharks were swimming through the submerged streets of the Lower Ninth Ward? Did you see the photographs of Katrina, the ones showing the hurricane menacing New Orleans like a "Wizard of Oz" cartoon twister? In the weeks after Hurricane Katrina, all of those rumors were present on the Internet in one form or another. I personally received the crocodile photograph — an authentic picture, apparently, taken in Congo some years ago.

Yet although all of these rumors were in the air — or in the cyber-air, to be more precise — none of them took hold. Few people were worried about monster crocodiles or sharks. The fake photographs of Katrina looking like the thing that blew Dorothy out of Kansas somehow never made it onto the evening news. Nevertheless, many did believe the other rumors: the babies being raped, the rat-gnawed corpses floating in the streets, the police officers being shot point-blank in the head, or the snipers firing at helicopters. These reports surfaced not only in mass e-mails but also on talk shows and in the press around the world. And now it seems that they were no more real than the man-eating sharks.

Although investigations by The Times-Picayune, the New Orleans police and the National Guard have turned up a few bad incidents, none of the more grotesque stories of the horrors at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center or the Superdome can be substantiated.

Where did they come from? For once, it's really not possible to blame "the media," although naturally many have. For once, the sociologists — and there's a whole flock of them who study rumors — have something interesting to add. They point out that the main influence on whether people believe rumors is the reliability of the sources — in this case, senior New Orleans officials. Some of the stories of infant rape came from New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin. The tales of armed gangs of thugs outgunning the police in the convention center came from New Orleans' police chief, Eddie Compass. (Compass recently resigned.) More important, both told these stories on television, to Oprah Winfrey — possibly the most trusted woman in the nation.

But there was more. In fact, New Orleans post-Katrina was a textbook example — or perhaps I should say the perfect storm — of the conditions that rumors require to flourish. A lack of good communications is always a condition for phony stories, and the telephones in New Orleans were down. A few true examples of bad behavior, inevitably embellished in the retelling, always help too — and according to The Times Picayune, one of the four bodies (not 200, as rumored) recovered from the convention center might really have had stab wounds. Gunshots really were heard. As National Guard soldiers have confirmed, conditions in the convention center really were crowded and primitive, infants and old people really were starving and dehydrating in the heat, and help really was shockingly slow.

But in the end, the fact that so many people believed, as Nagin put it, that the crowds had degenerated into an "almost animalistic state" must have had deeper roots. For the rumor sociologists also tell us that the most deeply believed rumors are always the ones that express some profound public anxiety. Some think that anxiety had to do with race: As I am not the first to note, few would have believed that 25,000 white, middle-class suburbanites had reverted to an "almost animalistic state" within a few days. But then, I'm not sure that 25,000 black middle-class suburbanites would have inspired such stories either, and certainly black officials such as Nagin and Compass wouldn't have repeated them.

What I'm guessing the Katrina rumors revealed was not precisely racism but a much deeper fear of the poor, even of poverty itself. What I'm guessing they revealed is our imaginary picture of what life would be like without the civilizing elements and the social markings to which we're accustomed: our houses, our cars, our clothes, our possessions, our reputations, our authority. If all that was gone, who knows how our next-door neighbors would behave, how we would behave. Maybe the people across the street would turn out to be thieves. Maybe the people who live across the city, in the neighborhood we never visit, would turn out to be murderers.

Or maybe not — but we don't know, which is why we imagine murder and rape. Perhaps it's not so odd that the mayor and the police chief immediately assumed the worst about their own city. Monster crocodiles, in the end, are a lot less threatening than life without possessions, without status, without law.

Because of damage to the Superdome caused by Hurricane Katrina, the 2006 Sugar Bowl will be played in Atlanta. Officials say it is imperative to have the Superdome ready for the 2008 season, when New Orleans will host the national championship game and a BCS game.

Sugar Bowl to be played in Atlanta

Game at Georgia Dome for one year only

In what is planned to be a one-year hiatus from New Orleans, this season's Sugar Bowl will be played at Atlanta's Georgia Dome.

The bowl's executive committee, meeting via a conference call Tuesday night, approved moving the game out of state after hearing a report that not enough hotel rooms could be made available in New Orleans and Baton Rouge to play the Jan. 2 game at Tiger Stadium.

Already the bowl had been forced from New Orleans for the first time in its 72-year history because of damage done to the Superdome by Hurricane Katrina. An official announcement on playing the game in Atlanta will be made Friday.

Plans are to play the 2007 Sugar Bowl at the Superdome if it is reopened by then. If not, the game would be played at LSU. Hotel availability isn't expected to be a problem by then.

Sugar Bowl executive director Paul Hoolahan has said that it is imperative that the Superdome be reopened by the 2008 game because that is the year in which New Orleans is scheduled to host both the national championship game and the "regular" Sugar Bowl under the BCS' double-hosting format, which debuts next season.

When it became apparent that the Superdome was out for this year, Hoolahan said that every effort would be made to keep the game in Louisiana. At the same time though, he pursued a parallel track for an alternative site. The SEC, which provides the anchor team for the game, insisted that the game be played within the league's region and Atlanta was identified as the preferred site.

In the end, the lack of hotel rooms was an obstacle that could not be overcome for keeping the game in Louisiana.

A typical Sugar Bowl brings enough visitors to New Orleans to fill approximately 32,000 hotel rooms. Far fewer than that are expected to be reopened by December, and many of those are being used by displaced hotel employees and hurricane recovery workers.

All available hotel rooms in the Baton Rouge area are taken as well.

Ex-Packers cornerback says he fits in better with New Orleans

SAN ANTONIO — Saints cornerback Mike McKenzie fully expects to be showered with boos when he returns to Green Bay's Lambeau Field this Sunday.

But he insists he will be one of the happiest guys in the stadium.

McKenzie, who spent his first 5½ seasons with the Packers before pressuring the team to trade him last October, said he wanted out of Green Bay for a number of reasons. Reportedly those reasons included his desire for a better contract, his disrespect for head coach Mike Sherman, his frustration with some of the team's assistant coaching hires and his distaste for living in Green Bay.

But more than anything, McKenzie said Wednesday, he became tired of the team underachieving year after year.

"It was really a situation where you've been somewhere for a while and you have good teams and you really just consistently find a way to blow it and come up short," said McKenzie, who had boycotted the media in Green Bay last season but openly discussed his departure Wednesday, both in San Antonio and in a conference call with the Green Bay media.

Hornets center Jamaal Magloire says he holds no resentment to the Hornets, who tried to trade him this past summer. 'It's part of the business, so I really didn't take it personal at all,' Magloire says.

OKLAHOMA CITY — Hornets starting center Jamaal Magloire reported to training camp this week with no resentment toward management for exploring the possibility of trading him to the Toronto Raptors this summer for two first-round draft picks.

The Raptors passed on the offer, keeping their selections at Nos. 7 and 16, and Magloire rose back into the Hornets' plans.

Magloire said he doesn't have ill feelings because he understands all 30 teams in the league explore trade offers all the time, and most players don't remain on the same team for their entire career. Magloire is entering his fifth season with the Hornets, who drafted him as the 19th pick in the 2000 draft.

"It's part of the business, so I really didn't take it personal at all,'" Magloire said. "They've got to listen and do what's best for the team."

Former general manager Allan Bristow, who resigned last week, was involved in trade negotiations with the Raptors several days before last June's NBA draft.

"Are there things on the table? Yes,'" Bristow said on June 27. "Talking about Jamaal specifically, he is our starting center, and we think he's a huge piece of our puzzle. But I think we have to explore all our options."

Those options were explored, and after the second day of training camp Coach Byron Scott definitely has Magloire in his plans for this season, impressed by his attitude and work habits.

"He's never come in here with a bad attitude," Scott said. "He's been a true professional

'Rook' J.R. Smith is graduating into a leader

JOHN DESHAZIER

He looks at the "youngsters" on the basketball court, senses that their heads are spinning, watches them playing tentative and fragile, not quite sure where to go and when to be there, and knows exactly how they feel.

"I look at some guys and some of the mistakes they make, and they're the exact same mistakes I made," he said. "It's a pretty big (learning) cycle."

And J.R. Smith, grizzled veteran of 20, is ready to help.

"I want to teach some of my peers how to play this game," he said.

Yes, that warrants a chuckle, because Smith, the Hornets' first-round draft pick last season, still is learning it himself. And he'll be that way for a while.

But the key is that he is learning the game, the evidence being a rookie season in which he segued from benchwarmer to reserve to starter to bright future of the franchise, flashing the potential to carry a team for stretches of games and showing enough star power to bring fans to their feet.

Fifteen-year-old Michelle Wie, who turned pro Wednesday, will make her debut next week on the LPGA Tour at the Samsung World Championship.

GOLF

WIE TURNS PRO: Michelle Wie, the Hawaii teen who has been competing against golf's best players since she was in the seventh grade, turned professional Wednesday. "I'm finally happy to say I'm a pro starting today," Wie said, wearing a pink Nike shirt and high heels that made her look even taller than 6 feet. "The first time I grabbed a golf club, I knew I'd do it for the rest of my life. Some 12 years later, I'm finally turning pro, and I'm so excited." It had been reported for weeks that Wie would go pro by her 16th birthday next week. She has signed endorsement deals with Nike and Sony said to be worth $10 million a year, and her first act as a professional was to give some of it back. Wie pledged $500,000 to the U.S. Golf Hurricane Relief Fund, set up by the major golf organizations. She made the announcement she was turning pro at the Kahala Mandarin Oriental Hotel, next to the 10th fairway at Waialae Country Club where, at age 13, she shot a 68 in the Sony Open, the lowest score ever by a female competing on the men's tour. Wie will make her professional debut next week on the LPGA Tour at the Samsung World Championship, an 18-player field at Bighorn Golf Club in the California desert. She also will play in the Casio World Open in Japan the week of Thanksgiving, her sixth time competing against men. She has yet to make the cut against men, but has more than held her own on the LPGA Tour. Wie was runner-up at the LPGA Championship to Annika Sorenstam, and tied for third at the Women's British Open. She has made the cut in her past 16 LPGA events dating to 2003, and would have earned about $640,870 on the LPGA Tour had she not been an amateur. That would put her 13th on the money list in only seven starts.

BASEBALL

MACHA, A'S 'PART WAYS': Oakland manager Ken Macha was out of a job Wednesday after failing to reach an agreement on a new contract. "We decided it's best to part ways at this point," General Manager Billy Beane said in a conference call. "We offered a three-year deal with a club option and they countered with a three-year deal without a club option," Beane said. "I don't think we were ever going to be able to bridge the gap. It was a significant gap." The option would have allowed the A's to decide whether to keep Macha after three seasons. "It was a compensation issue," Beane said. Macha led the A's to the AL West title in his first year as manager in 2003, the club's fourth straight playoff berth. But Oakland failed to reach the postseason the past two years despite a 91-win season in 2004 and 88 victories this year. Macha had said he hoped to return to the A's, and said late in the season he thought the team would make a quick decision. "There are no hard feelings whatsoever," Beane said. "This is part of the business." The A's went 88-74 this season, but seemed out of it in May when they had two eight-game losing streaks and finished the month with a 7-20 record. But Oakland rebounded with another strong second half, overcoming injuries to key players such as shortstop Bobby Crosby and No. 2 starter Rich Harden. Beane met Monday with the 55-year-old Macha, who was still in the Bay Area as of Wednesday and had yet to return home to Pittsburgh for the offseason. Macha was 275-211 in three seasons with the A's. He came to the Oakland organization in 1999 following four seasons as a manager in Boston's farm system. He was promoted from bench coach when Art Howe left for the New York Mets following the 2002 season.

AUTO RACING

CREW CHIEF PLANS APPEAL: Crew chief Todd Berrier plans to appeal his two-race suspension and will be in Kevin Harvick's pit for Sunday's NASCAR Nextel Cup race at Kansas Speedway. The appeal is expected to be heard early next week by a National Stock Car Racing Commission panel. Berrier announced his plans Wednesday and will be allowed to work with the team. "We feel we have a responsibility to GM Goodwrench and all of our sponsors, as well as all of our fans, to stand up for what we think is right," team owner Richard Childress said. Berrier was sent home and Harvick's Chevrolet was disqualified last Friday after NASCAR found several violations in the trunk of Harvick's car after he qualified second at Talladega Superspeedway. On Tuesday, the crew chief was fined $10,000, suspended for an additional two races, until Oct. 19, and put on probation until Dec. 31.

WALTRIP'S PENALTIES OVERTURNED: Michael Waltrip's penalties for allegedly making an inappropriate gesture during a race last month were overturned. NASCAR had accused Waltrip of gesturing during the Sept. 18 race in New Hampshire after Robby Gordon threw his helmet at Waltrip following an accident involving the drivers. Waltrip was fined $10,000, docked 25 points and placed on probation until the end of the year. Waltrip denied making the gesture and appealed to the three-member National Stock Car Racing Commission. The panel said two members found TV footage "inconclusive," and the commission then voted to rescind the penalties.

TENNIS

PUERTA TESTS POSITIVE: Argentina's Mariano Puerta tested positive for a banned drug following his loss in the French Open final and faces a possible life ban for a second doping offense, the French sports newspaper L'Equipe reported. Puerta's lawyers said the player denied committing a doping offense, and his agent called the report an "injustice." Puerta tested positive for the stimulant etilefrine after his four-set loss to Spain's Rafael Nadal in the June 5 final, L'Equipe reported, without citing sources. Puerta told associates he had taken medication to fight the flu at the time of the tournament, L'Equipe said. The 10th-ranked Argentine won a second-round match Wednesday at the Japan Open, beating U.S. qualifier Eric Taino 6-3, 6-4. This would be Puerta's second positive test, putting him at risk of becoming the first tennis player to receive a life ban for doping.

DAVENPORT ADVANCES: Defending champion Lindsay Davenport overpowered Italy's Francesca Schiavone 6-2, 6-2 to reach the Porsche Grand Prix quarterfinals in Filderstadt, Germany. The top-seeded Davenport has won this tournament twice and is going for her 50th career singles title. Davenport will next face Anastasia Myskina, who defeated Dinara Safina 7-6 (6), 6-7 (3), 7-5 in a baseline duel between Russian friends. Daniela Hantuchova of Slovakia pulled off the first upset of the tournament, beating 10th-ranked Patty Schnyder 6-4, 6-3.

HRBATY REACHES QUARTERFINALS: Fourth-seeded Dominik Hrbaty of Slovakia beat Germany's Florian Mayer 7-6 (5), 6-1 to move into the quarterfinals of the Open de Moselle in Metz, France. Hrbaty will next play Argentina's Agustin Calleri or Mark Philippoussis of Australia. In other first-round matches, Australia's Peter Luczak downed Yuri Schukin of Russia 6-4, 7-6 (4); France's Paul-Henri Mathieu beat Igor Andreev of Russia 7-6 (5), 6-4; and France's Arnaud Clement beat Germany's Tobias Summerer 7-6 (3), 6-4.

COLLEGE FOOTBALL

UTAH COACH REPRIMANDED: The Mountain West Conference reprimanded Utah coach Kyle Whittingham for comments he made about Atlantic Coast Conference officials in Saturday's loss at North Carolina. The Utes were penalized 12 times for 101 yards, including a roughing-the-passer call that nullified an interception return for a touchdown. Whittingham was still angry about the officiating Tuesday during the MWC conference call. "We've been very good penalty-wise up until this game," Whittingham said. "All I can say is I'm quite thankful we don't have to play a game with an ACC refereeing crew again this year. That was miserable and I'll leave it at that." Although Whittingham's comments were directed at the ACC crew, Mountain West commissioner Craig Thompson said they violated MWC sportsmanship standards. Whittingham issued a statement after the reprimand was announced. "My comment regarding ACC officials was unfortunate and poor judgment on my part. You can't beat a good team when you commit five turnovers," Whittingham said.

FLORIDA ATLANTIC at LOUISIANA–LAFAYETTE

Time: 7 p.m. at Lafayette; TV: Cox Sports TV

WHAT TO LOOK FOR

▶ ULL freshman Michael Desormeaux, who relieved starting quarterback Jerry Babb after he sprained a shoulder on the first series in a 24-21 loss last week to Central Florida, likely will get the start in the Ragin' Cajuns' Sun Belt opener.

▶ ULL (1-3) fell behind 21-0 to Central Florida before tying the score, but a field goal with three seconds left decided the game. Desormeaux completed 14 of 26 passes for 119 yards with two interceptions, and he carried 17 times for 76 yards.

▶ The Cajuns, who didn't sack an opposing quarterback in their first three games, got five sacks against Central Florida. ULL cornerback Michael Adams made 12 tackles.

▶ Florida Atlantic (0-5, 0-1), coming off a 61-10 loss to Louisville, has been outscored 188-60 this season. The Owls' other non-conference losses were against Kansas, Oklahoma State and Minnesota.

Quarterback Danny Embrick paces the Florida Atlantic offense. He has completed 64 of 117 passes for 850 yards and six touchdowns, with four interceptions.

Win would put Georgia in SEC driver's seat

Bulldogs can take control in East with victory against Vols

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — LSU, Tennessee and Florida were the SEC teams getting the most preseason love from prognosticators.

Now it's Georgia sitting on top, with Alabama right behind.

The No. 5 Bulldogs can strengthen their hold as the lead dog in the league with a victory when they visit No. 8 Tennessee on Saturday.

Georgia coach Mark Richt, whose team was off last week, isn't dodging the big game question, either.

"No doubt about it," he said. "There is so much riding on it for both teams. If we win, we continue to be one of the conference's top teams. If we lose, we lose control of (our destiny in) the SEC East.

"They are not a good team but a great team."

A victory by Georgia would all but eliminate Tennessee from the SEC East race. A loss would mean Georgia would have to win the rest of its games to create a possible three-way tie with Florida and Tennessee if those two also finish with one conference loss.

Georgia lost to the Volunteers in Athens last year, but has won the past two meetings in Knoxville, including a last-second 26-24 victory in Richt's first season.

"That was a very important win for us," he said. "When you have a victory like that, it makes (fans) believe in a hurry."

Coach Mark Richt's Georgia Bulldogs can strengthen their hold atop the SEC East with a victory at Tennessee on Saturday.

ALABAMA: Wide receiver Tyrone Prothro, who suffered a broken leg in the Tide's 31-3 victory against Florida, is out for the rest of the season but is expected to be able to play again, according to the doctor who operated on him. Prothro had no ligament or tendon damage but broke both his left tibia and fibula and had a steel rod inserted. He caught five passes for 134 yards and two touchdowns, including an 87-yard scoring reception on Alabama's first play from scrimmage. . . . The Tide is on the cover of this week's Sports Illustrated.

AUBURN: Auburn's 48-7 victory against South Carolina was Gamecocks coach Steve Spurrier's second-worst loss as a head coach, and second consecutive big SEC loss.

South Carolina lost to Alabama 37-14. Some of the coaches on Wednesday's SEC teleconference were asked if there was any satisfaction in seeing Spurrier, who often won by big scores at Florida, take a beating.

"Steve and I are good friends," said Auburn coach Tommy Tuberville. "He's beaten up on me, and I've beaten up on him. (There's no) satisfaction in that. I would never run up the score. It's downgrading to the players. I've been on that side before."

GEORGIA: The Bulldogs didn't spend the off week just working on Tennessee. Richt said players and coaches autographed footballs and helmets to be auctioned to raise money to be donated to the hurricane relief effort. Check georgiadogs.com for more information.

TENNESSEE: Junior defensive end Daniel Brooks was dismissed from the team after an on-campus altercation with Vols basketball players Jemere Hendrix and Andre Patterson, according to The Tennessean. Brooks already had been suspended for the Vols' first three games for a previous incident and was scheduled to be redshirted. Tennessee football coach Phillip Fulmer said Brooks was on a zero-tolerance policy, even though he said Brooks didn't necessarily instigate the conflict, which was the result of a simmering feud between Brooks and Patterson. Hendrix was dismissed from the basketball team and Patterson suspended indefinitely.

MISSISSIPPI STATE: Despite a sprained knee in preseason, a bruised shoulder against Auburn and being knocked unconscious against LSU, Bulldogs running back Jerious Norwood expects to play Saturday at Florida. He practiced this week, albeit under limited conditions.

In addition to a mild concussion against LSU, he suffered a neck sprain, which is causing him more problems than the concussion. "My head's getting better, but my neck feels the same," he said.

OLE MISS: The Rebels are ninth in the SEC in total offense with a 298.5-yard average and are last in scoring offense (14.2), first downs and third-down conversions, and second to last in rushing offense (97.8). Ole Miss was held to a season-low 50 yards rushing by Tennessee last week and had a minus-3 yards after three quarters.

2007 game to be at Superdome or LSU

SUGAR BOWL, from C-1

"We couldn't have fans scattered from Mobile to Lafayette to Jackson (Miss.) driving in to Baton Rouge on the day of the game," one bowl official said. "That's not what the Sugar Bowl experience is supposed to be."

Hotel rooms are not a problem in Atlanta.

Hoolahan found that out last week during an inspection visit to the city.

"I think Paul was surprised to learn he had a choice of four different headquarters hotels," said Bob Schuler, vice president of the Atlanta Convention and Tourist Bureau. "The period around the Sugar Bowl is one of low occupancy for our hotels, so we can easily accommodate the fans.

"We're going to do everything to create a quality bowl experience. It won't be New Orleans, but the teams and fans will find plenty to do."

"We wanted them to play here if they could," said LSU associate athletic director Herb Vincent. "But, considering the circumstances, they did what was best for the Sugar Bowl. If they need our help in the future, we'll still be here."

Playing the Sugar Bowl in Atlanta will make for a busy football weekend in the city. The Peach Bowl is scheduled for Dec. 30 and the Atlanta Falcons will host Carolina on Jan 1.

The Sugar Bowl, which has an estimated economic impact of $200 million annually, is the second major college event to be forced to another state because of Katrina.

Last week, Bayou Classic officials announced that their game between Southern and Grambling will be played in Houston.

This is not the first time a bowl game has been forced to another location.

The 1942 Rose Bowl was played in Durham, N.C., because of the fear of having large crowds on the West Coast immediately following Pearl Harbor. The 1994 Gator Bowl was played in Gainesville, Fla., because of renovations being made to Alltel Stadium in Jacksonville, Fla.

Much work ahead for Tulane's athletic director

Aftermath of storm has Dickson working nonstop

By Fred Robinson
Staff writer

RUSTON - Now that Tulane athletic director Rick Dickson has gotten a handle on all but one of the sites for the Green Wave's remaining 'home' football games, you'd think he could sit and take a deep breath.

Not a chance. For Dickson, there aren't any free moments.

In less than two weeks, basketball practice begins for Tulane's men at Texas A&M in College Station and for the women at Texas Tech in Lubbock. And, in four months, Tulane's baseball team, coming off of its second College World Series, will hit the practice field with the season to start a month later.

Dickson knows his work is far from done.

This week, Dickson, who has been working out of an office in Dallas, is scheduled visit Tulane's campus and inspect the facilities, including Fogelman Arena.

"I can't honestly say what the condition of Fogelman is right now," Dickson said. "Unofficially, there are reports that it's mostly OK."

Even if Fogelman is ready for the basketball programs to utilize it, Dickson said, that won't happen for some time.

"We're going to be on these campuses (of Texas A&M and Texas Tech) for the first term, so anything done in the first term will be done in Lubbock and at A&M," he said.

Dickson has met with men's coach Dave Dickerson, in his first season with the Wave, and women's coach Lisa Stockton and has made adjustments in both schedules. Tulane will not play some of the schools it was scheduled to host.

"They won't be playing some of the guaranteed games because it makes no sense to pay $50,000 to bring somebody in to College Station," Dickson said. "Without naming those schools, those are the kinds of decisions that have to be made."

Dickson said there have been talks about playing games against the schools hosting the Wave's basketball programs - A&M and Texas Tech.

By late December, Dickson is hoping all of Tulane's student-athletes are back on campus, which means the basketball teams would be home in time to play their Conference USA games in Fogelman.

"We're going to play our regular home-and-home games with people, conference and non-conference. Tulane's big non-conference games are with LSU (a single game) and UNO (a pair of games).

As for baseball, the sport that has been a huge revenue producer the last few seasons, Dickson said he hasn't had time to think much about it.

"Right now, I think it's premature to say what's going to happen (with baseball). I'm assuming the condition the field was in when we left, it was mostly demolished, is going to render it unplayable," Dickson said.

Turchin Stadium, the Wave's home diamond, is undergoing a massive renovation. The grandstands have been torn down, while pilings have been driven for the new facility. It was expected to be ready for the Wave's season opener in February. That will not happen.

According to Dickson, Landis Construction Company, which is doing the renovation, has moved its crew over to the Wilson Center, which had about five feet of water on the first level.

"The best way for me to describe it is to say (baseball) is in one of those logjams on the Causeway right now," said Dickson.

The biggest problem with the baseball program, unlike basketball, is it will not only lack a facility for its games, but the team will have to find a place to practice.

There are only a handful of facilities in the New Orleans area capable of providing Tulane with a facility comparable to Turchin Stadium.

Baseball coach Rick Jones said he is still hoping the new stadium will be ready by the time the Green Wave begins conference play.

"I'm going to trust the administration," Jones said. "I do believe we have an opportunity to have another good team."

Tulane offense offended by running game

SLU held Wave to only 28 yards

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

They couldn't even fake smiles.

As Tulane's offensive players left the field Saturday, each player glumly stared ahead, even as dozens of fans near the locker room dutifully cheered. Tulane beat Southeastern Louisiana 28-21, but the Green Wave's offense - notably its ground game - was invisible.

Running back Matt Forte carried 13 times for 26 yards. Jovon Jackson carried six times, gaining 12 yards. The only thing consistent was the lackluster two-yard average.

"It wasn't so much that it was a I-AA team, or it was Southeastern Louisiana - none of that matters," offensive coordinator Frank Scelfo said. "What mattered was, man-on-man, we didn't get it done. We lost. And our kids up front have a lot of pride. And they were embarrassed about it."

Tulane will face Houston this Saturday in Lafayette. On paper, that's good news. Houston is ranked eighth in Conference USA in rushing defense, allowing 148.2 yards per game. But Tulane remembers last season's 24-3 loss to the Cougars, in which it ran 30 times for 65 yards. And it remembers Saturday.

"Our offense wasn't in sync on Saturday. We didn't get into a rhythm," said Forte, who ran for 87 yards and two touchdowns at Southern Methodist the week before.

"I think it was an embarrassment that we weren't able to move the football on the ground as well as we should have," Scelfo said. "That falls on the offensive line, and they know that. We're going to go as they go. We had been pretty decent running the ball, and we didn't run it at all last week. It's not hard to look and find out where the most improvement needs to take place."

The veteran line took some hits last Saturday, as seniors Chris McGee, Joe Traina and Matt Traina missed some snaps because of injuries. Matt Traina, the left guard, rested Wednesday, but all three are expected to play Saturday.

But last Saturday in Baton Rouge, the offensive line had trouble containing the Lions' defensive line.

"I got frustrated because, in the first half, they were stopping the run, and I got antsy," said Forte, who had just 15 yards in the first half. "I wasn't being patient with my runs, and

CHRIS SCELFO

I missed a couple of cuts a few times. And a few times it just wasn't there."

Tulane wasn't able to set up short yardage situations on third down. The Wave had 22 third downs, 19 of them were third-and-six or longer.

Tulane's net 28 rushing yards were its worst since 2002 against Texas Christian, when Tulane finished with minus 53 ground yards. Since Chris Scelfo became coach in 1999, only three times did the Wave have a smaller rushing total than last Saturday - the Texas Christian game, 15 yards against Southern Miss in 1999 and eight yards against UAB in 2001.

So how will the Wave remedy its run game? Forte said it comes down to intensity, intensity, intensity.

"I'm going to try to stay (focused) on our inside running drills, make it more intense," he said. "I'm going to get it more intense, try to get the guys up. Usually we go through practice and aren't excited like we are during a game. I'm going to get excited this week, like a game situation."

"I think there's more of a sense of urgency," Frank Scelfo said. "We saw it in practice on Tuesday."

Scelfo also said Jackson could play more against the Cougars. Against SLU, the senior had six carries to Forte's 13. The week before, Jackson had 16 and Forte had 20.

"Last week they played about the same number of snaps," Frank Scelfo said. "The plays aren't called based on who is in there in tailback. They're called based on a situation. When Matt was in there, he got a few more carries. They understand it, and they know their roles."

After Forte's explosive end to 2004, coaches began comparing him to former Tulane running back Mewelde Moore, a school record holder and current Minnesota Viking. But Forte, only a sophomore, is the first to admit his 2005 hasn't reached expectations - thus far.

"I'm kind of disappointed in myself right now, because I'm not performing the way I'd really want to," Forte said. "I'm really trying to prove it to myself."

Healthy Green puts Tigers' offense on bubble

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — LSU's 37-7 victory against Mississippi State on Saturday marked the return of the bubble screen.

The play - a quick pass toward the sideline along the line of scrimmage - was used effectively by Rohan Davey and Josh Reed in 2001 and by Matt Mauck and Skyler Green in 2003.

An ankle injury to Green last season sidelined it but he hasn't forgotten how to execute the play. Green tied a career high with nine receptions against the Bulldogs, several on the bubble screen.

"I love it," Green said. "It's blind faith, that's what Coach (Jimbo Fisher) always says. You are running to the sideline with your head turned hoping your guy has blocked the guy shooting in to make the tackle. You can get killed on that play."

The play gives Green a chance to use his shifty moves in the open field and relies on him getting a block from a wide receiver or an offensive tackle. Green used it to make good yardage, though he was unable to break a big play.

"If one guy just thought about taking a bad angle I would have broken loose," Green said. "The key to the play is the blocking. If you get the blocking and the safety takes a bad angle, you can have a big play."

INJURIES: Miles said wide receiver Craig Davis (foot) and center Rudy Niswanger (ankle) are expected to play. Guards Pete Dyakowski and Brett Helms (knee) are doubtful. Miles also said Mario Stephenson, who missed the Mississippi State game because of a death in the family, will be back.

LAST MAN: Green also has returned to form on punt returns. He leads the SEC and is 11th in the nation with a 16.8 yard average. However, he's yet to break one for a touchdown and the main culprit is the opposing team's punter, something his teammates and coaches have razzed him about. "I'm still ironing some things out," he said. "I've just got to get the punter out of my hair, make him miss and get into the end zone. Every time I've broken one I get tackled by the punter."

OPTIONS N OPTION: Vanderbilt is one of the few remaining college teams that runs the option and the Commodores don't do it as much with the development of senior quarterback Jay Cutler as a passer. But Miles said the Tigers still have to be wary.

"We have to constantly be aware of the sets they run it out of, and your responsibilities as it pertains to the keep or pitch," he said.

Hollis developed work ethic at junior college station, Hollis says, laughing. Yep, buy her an Icee, thumb through the magazine rack and play a few Scratch-N-Wins. How about a college hangout?

LSU, from C-1

"We'd all just go to the gas station," Hollis said.

Ready to enroll at Tuskegee after finishing his prep career as the leading tackler defensive MVP in the Alabama High School All-Star game, Hollis was wooed by the East Mississippi Community College coaching staff, which dangled the chance to play Division 1A football in front of the youngster's face. That was enough for Hollis to switch commitments.

"I never even visited, and the first time driving there, I'm like, 'Where am I at?'" Hollis recalls. "I was just ready to play football and get into my books. It didn't matter if we were playing in someone's backyard, I was ready to play."

Performing underneath lights that attracted more bugs than fans, Hollis excelled in obscurity, collecting 104 tackles and four sacks in 2002. The gas station manager never did thank him, though, as the No. 2 junior college linebacker in the country attracted extra business at the pumps.

"There wasn't anything but the school and football, so that became all I thought about," Hollis said. "I look at guys like Ray Lewis and football is all they do. That was me. Football and school was all I did, so I knew nobody was going to outwork me. Going to the small town, that was an adjustment. But, after that, it was just work."

In order to meet his target playing weight, Hollis ran extra conditioning with the players.

"Everybody on this team has nothing but respect for him," Cameron Vaughn said. "He's a great guy, one of the hardest workers you'll ever meet. Kind of like an Eric Alexander in the fact that he gives his all and gives it up every play."

Actually, Hollis is so liked among his peers, it didn't take much to mend fences with Daniels, who unfortunately wound up on the infamous end of Hollis' one-hit wonder.

"I apologized," Hollis said, laughing. "'I'm sorry, man. I didn't see you.'"

ESJ, Hahnville to tee it up again

A rare rematch provides Wildcats chance for revenge

By Lori Lyons
Staff writer

There have been few occasions when two River Parishes high school football teams have played each other twice in a season.

Lutcher and St. Charles have done it twice. In 2003 and 2004, the Bulldogs and Comets met in the regular season and again in the playoffs. The same thing has happened between Riverside and West St John three times. Lutcher and St. James played twice in 1984 and again in 2002.

But until this year, East St. John and Hahnville have never played more than once in a season. Once was enough.

The Wildcats and Tigers have played 27 times, and 10 of those games have been won by a touchdown or less. Five times, one point was the difference.

But both rivals needed an opponent for Sept, 17 after Hurricane Katrina left their schedules in shambles - both were scheduled to play Orleans Parish teams whose seasons were canceled. Hahnville coach Lou Valdin and East St. John coach Larry Dauterive agreed to play a non-district game.

A single point proved to be the difference. As time expired, Hahnville quarterback Larry James threw a Hail Mary pass into the end zone and receiver Laron Byrd caught the ball. It was Hahnville's sixth straight victory against East St. John.

Dauterive has never defeated the Tigers. Now it's time for the rematch, this time in the District 5-5A opener. This time, East St. John has two games behind it. This time, there's a revenge factor. This time should be different. East St. John 28, Hahnville 27.

OTHER GAMES

ST. JAMES 27, RIVERSIDE 25: The Wildcats nearly beat Destrehan last week. In the end, Destrehan had too much depth. This week, the Wildcats will be the ones with more depth.

ST. CHARLES 41, DONALDSONVILLE 38: Finally playing in Class 2A where it belongs, Donaldsonville is on its way to its first winning season since 1996. But it will find its district opponents very tough, starting with St. Charles.

WEST ST. JOHN 38, WHITE CASTLE 13: The Rams aren't used to being winless in October. After tonight, they won't be.

LUTCHER 28, SALMEN 6: It's a victory just for the Spartans to be playing this week.

CURTIS 24, FORT WALTON (FLA.) CHOCTAWATCHEE 7: Curtis very rarely loses two in a row. It's hard to pick against the Patriots, even though they'll be traveling.

EAST JEFFERSON 13, KING 6: This is the opener for both teams. The Warriors appear to have lost fewer players because of Hurricane evacuations.

HIGGINS 24, COX 6: Mother Nature certainly didn't make Cox's inaugural season any easier, did it?

LAST WEEK: 4-2

Pearl River looks to rebound

Young Rebels team coming off 2 defeats

By Marty Mule'
Staff writer

Nothing these days is normal, including this football season. Just ask Pearl River coach Joe Harris.

A month ago, Harris had the daunting task of trying to replace a bevy of four-year starters, like all-purpose runner Steven Sylvas, who helped the Rebels to a pair of 6-4 seasons.

Now 6-4 seasons won't stop the football world, but Pearl River made the playoffs in each of the past two years, something that hadn't happened before.

A bigger challenge lay ahead this season as Harris set out to rebuild with a new group of youngsters. At least that's what he thought was the challenge.

Then along came Katrina. The season opener was pushed back, then the second game.

If that wasn't bad enough, Harris lost some of his players. Some were displaced and some took jobs doing repair and cleanup work.

Pearl River kept practicing. Harris was forced to use several of his young players on offense and defense.

And the lack of an opponent quickly grew old.

"We were getting anxious," Harris said. "We were getting tired of hitting each other."

So with Rita looming and another Friday night game in jeopardy, Harris and his young Rebels moved things up a day. They went to Loranger 24 hours early for their game.

What's that old saying? Be careful what you wish for.

Pearl River was on the short end of a 42-6 thumping.

The following week Pearl River was beaten 40-20 by Albany.

"It's hard," Harris said of so many of his young players going both ways. "I don't mind that in itself. We always play some kids on both sides of the ball. But these kids are so young and inexperienced. It's hard enough to ease into the game, to get the grasp of things little by little. To just throw them in and to expect the same kind of results is not realistic."

In trying to build the Pearl River program into a major factor in District 9-3A, Harris' young players need meaningful experience, games in which they can compete and have what they do on the field truly count for something.

That begins tonight when the Rebels play Christian Life, the first game this season in which Harris' young team has a real chance at victory. Christian Life has gone through four coaches in four years, which says something about the historical quality of the program.

"I just hope we're ready to play," Harris said.

OTHER GAMES

PEARL RIVER 30, CHRISTIAN LIFE 12: Quarterback Jessie Williams and the Rebels' offense come to life against Christian Life.

SLIDELL 24, ST. PAUL'S 21: On the theory the home field is often the difference between even teams.

FONTAINEBLEAU 20, COVINGTON 14: It took the Bulldogs a half to get going in their opener. The Lions never did get into gear.

PONCHATOULA 24, MANDEVILLE 14: Jamarius Poche helps shut down the Skippers.

HAMMOND 17, NORTHSHORE 14: A late score by powerful Tors running back Matt Betts seals the deal.

No Doubt, Bulldogs need her defense

Senior gives up offensive role to play libero

By Tammy Nunez
Staff writer

Alise Doubt can't quite put her finger on what has changed this season for the Fontainebleau volleyball team.

No new star player arrived in the Bulldogs' gym before or after Hurricane Katrina. In fact, the lineup is similar to last year's, same players, same system.

But this season the Bulldogs are off to a hot start, including a victory against rival Covington last week.

The Bulldogs entered the week 3-1 and 1-0 in District 4-I. The only Fontainebleau loss was against defending Division I state champion St. Joseph's Academy.

"It's not that we have any new Fontainebleau players, but we have just come together. And that sounds cheesy, but it's true," Doubt said.

Before Thursday, Doubt, a senior, had never been on a Fontainebleau team that beat Covington. The Bulldogs defeated the Lions 25-16, 25-19, 25-10. Doubt and Sara Fradella led the Bulldogs with nine digs each.

"It's great being able to say we finally beat Covington," Doubt said. "It was more than just another match."

Even in the loss to St. Joseph's, the Bulldogs played some of their best volleyball of the season.

"For the first time since I have coached at Fontainebleau, we were not in awe of the competition, but looked forward to it," Fontainebleau coach Judy Tyrl said. "I believe (playing St. Joseph's Academy) helps us to understand how critical your fundamentals are when competing, especially against that level of competition."

Doubt said St. Joseph's is similar to Mandeville, a team that St. Joseph's has not been beaten in district play in two seasons. The Bulldogs play at Mandeville on Tuesday.

"St. Joe's was a really good team for us to play to get ready for district," Doubt said. "We really learned how important our blocking and covering our hitters is. (Up until St. Joe's), we weren't having a lot of our hits come back at us. I expect Mandeville to have very powerful hitters and put up a huge block.

"I like hitting, but I love defense. I love being able to stop someone who thinks they're going to get a kill, and to be able to take that away."

Putting Doubt at libero, a defensive position, means she can't swing or make kills. It's a tricky proposition for Tyrl, who knows that while Doubt plays libero, the offense could be missing something.

"It is still a tough decision as to play Alise all around or as a libero," Tyrl said. "She definitely needs to be on the court as much as possible."

What isn't lost, no matter what position she plays, is her spirit, Tyrl said.

"Alise is our captain this year and is a great example of diligence and performance, and provides encouragement and accountability to her teammates," Tyrl said.

There's no doubt she'll be needed in the Mandeville match. The Skippers haven't lost a step despite losing setter Allison Entzel, who moved following Katrina.

Mandeville won the St. Joseph's Academy Tournament last weekend, had two players on the All-Tournament team and is off to a 3-0 district start after beating Covington 25-8, 25-21, 25-9 on Tuesday.

Beating Mandeville comes down to a scrappy defense led by Doubt.

"It's not so much we put the ball down every time we swing," Doubt said. "It's hanging in there in those rallies and making the other team make a mistake."

WHERE Y'AT?

A weekly update on displaced prep athletes:

BASTROP BRONCHOS

Five Port Sulphur football players are now members of the top-ranked Class 4A football team from Bastrop and the displaced Bronchos are making their presence felt. Senior receiver Jeremy Sylve, a 2004 All-Metro selection, had seven receptions totaling 103 yards with two touchdowns in Bastrop's 45-23 victory against Ruston this past Friday. Sophomore quarterback Randall Mackey passed for 104 yards in a relief effort, and senior tailback Jamal Recasner had a 73-yard scoring run. Also playing for the Bastrop are defensive end Jody Ancar and linebacker James Brown.

"They are probably my five best kids," said Port Sulphur coach Cyril Crutchfield. "That's not too bad going from a 1A program to Bastrop and playing. They might have a chance to win a state championship."

Former Bronchos assistant D'-Carlos Holmes, who left Port Sulphur for Bastrop before school started, is the person responsible for bringing the five Bronchos to Bastrop, Crutchfield said.

Mackey, however, is home sick and wants to return to be with his mother, Crutchfield said. Under Louisiana High School Athletic Association emergency legislation passed in September, Mackey could return to the metro area, enroll at another school in the area and be granted immediate eligibility by Commissioner Tommy Henry through the LHSAA hardship program.

OH BOY, ROY

Former Belle Chasse quarterback Adam Roy continues to impress at his new school, Alexandria Senior High. Roy completed eight of 12 passes for 90 yards and four touchdowns in the Trojans' 47-7 victory against Marksville this past week. Alexandria is 3-1, 3-0 since losing the season opener against Bastrop. The Trojans open District 3-4A play against Tioga this week.

NEWMAN NATIONALS

Newman football players are scattered throughout the state and nation. Four Greenies — Will Langenstein, Mattox Hall, Jeremy Sinclair and Robert Riess — are playing at Kincaid High in Houston. Linebacker Lewis Irving, Kevin Stephens and Brett Wainwright are playing for Dunham in Baton Rouge. Here is a list of some of the others players and where they are: James Horner and Doug Prechter, Memorial High in Houston; Matt Mann, University High in Baton Rouge; Matt Braun, Ryan Swayze and Clarke Armatis, Episcopal in Baton Rouge; Marc Cordes, Kansas City; Mandela Kazi, Country Day School in Louisville, Kentucky; Michael Harris, Savannah Country Day in Savannah, Ga.; Matthew Czerniak, St. Bernard School in St. Paul, Minn.; Demian Reed, Amherst Regional High School in Amherst, Mass.; and Bruno Vetter, Lower Merion High School in Ardmore, Pa.

EXODUS TO TEXAS

Katy and Taylor high schools, located in Katy, Texas, a suburb of Houston, have added several New Orleans area players. Katy High has 10 metro area players, including brothers Brandus and Brandon Mercadel of Clark High. Katy also picked up Kennedy players Vincent Smith and Brad Jackson, John Paul Hammette of Gregory High, Donny Bornholdt of Grace King, West Jefferson's Cory Theodore and DeJean Turner, Fontainebleau's Lonnie Pitts and Abramson's Nathaniel Willis. Among the six players from the area playing for Taylor is Brother Martin kicker Eric Hill. Taylor is now the home of another Catholic League athlete, Rummel basketball star Dwight Lewis, one of Louisiana's top seniors.

Editor's note: The Times-Picayune Sports Department will run a weekly update on metro-area student-athletes displaced by Hurricane Katrina and now competing for other schools around the state and nation. If you know of an athlete displaced by the storm and competing somewhere else, e-mail us at tp-preps@yahoo.com. Please include a contact number so we can verify the information.

Coaches make sure team can compete

By Pierce W. Huff
Staff writer

Greg and Jenny Caro, Sacred Heart's husband-and-wife cross country coaching team, consider themselves fortunate.

Although they lived in a shelter in Belle Chasse for 21 days after Hurricane Katrina hit, their house in Gretna suffered only minor wind damage, and they were allowed to return home last week.

But something has long been more important to the Caros than their home. For the past nine years, the girls on the Sacred Heart cross country team have been the childless couple's surrogate children.

When Katrina forced Sacred Heart to move operations to Grand Coteau last month, the Caros followed the school. Once a week for the past three weeks, the couple has made the three-hour drive from the West Bank to the school's new campus, near Lafayette, so the team could practice.

"What the coaches are doing just shows that they really care about the girls on the team," said sophomore Meggie Schmidt, who won the Class 4A state championship last year.

Sacred Heart freshman Bethany Burst said that the Caros' weekly practice trips have been a boost to the team. "It shows that they are dedicated to the team, and that we should be dedicated to the team, too," Burst said.

Sacred Heart athletic director Mike Barnes said the Caros have gone above and beyond the call of duty. But the Caros, who have been married for 13 years, don't see what they are doing as special.

After Katrina hit, the couple said they needed to coach the team as bad as the girls needed to get back in shape.

"We've given our life to the kids, and we coach them because (they're) our babies," Greg said. "We wanted to get some normalcy for our kids' lives. It doesn't matter how rich a family is or how poor a family is, everyone down here has been affected."

A few days after Katrina hit and the school moved, the Caros contacted Barnes about finding a way to continue practicing and competing in meets.

The Caros decided to make the trip once a week, and Burst's parents agreed to let the couple spend the night on the sofa bed in their hotel room in nearby Opelousas.

The Caros conduct the Sacred Heart practices on Wednesday and Thursday, and they e-mail the runners their weekly training schedules. They also drive to all of the Cardinals' meets.

"That's just Greg and Jenny," Barnes said. "They are really passionate about what they are doing and passionate about the kids and working for Sacred Heart. When they told me what they wanted to do I wasn't surprised one bit."

Jenny said she knew the couple made the right decision the first time Sacred Heart had a workout after Katrina.

"I could just tell from the looks on the girls' faces," Jenny said. "Some of the girls were in shock and thinking, 'Oh my God! My coaches actually came up here.' "

The long drive from the West Bank to Grand Coteau has been getting easier each week for the Caros, and Sacred Heart has improved in its two meets this season. Schmidt has dropped her time by 37 seconds in the past two weeks and could be a threat to win a state title for the second year in a row. Burst, juniors Rayne Housey and Margot Bienvenu and senior Amanda Barrett also have come on strong in the past two weeks and could be ready to give Sacred Heart the depth it needs to win the Class 3A state championship.

"We were thinking we could win a state championship pre-Katrina, and we're thinking we can win a state championship post-Katrina," Greg said.

But in a lot of ways, the Caros and Sacred Heart are just thankful to have a team this season.

"We have 12 runners on our team now, and we had 35 on our team last year," Greg said. "A lot of our girls were displaced and moved to Houston, and one of the runners moved to Connecticut."

Sacred Heart is one of the few metro area teams running cross country this season.

"It's been tough, but we just want to get the team together and compete in state," Jenny said. "If we do that, it doesn't matter where we'll finish because we'll consider ourselves winners."

NOTES

SACRED HEART TO FACE FAMILIAR DISTRICT FOES

Sacred Heart has relocated to the Lafayette area but still will compete in District 9-II volleyball against Blenk and Immaculata. St. Mary's will not play this fall. The Cardinals, the reigning Division II state champions, are 7-3 after advancing to the final of the St. Joseph tournament this past weekend. They play in the St. Thomas More tournament in Lafayette this weekend.

DE LA SALLE WILL PLAY

De La Salle is set to resume classes, and the Cavaliers also will have abbreviated football and volleyball schedules, head football coach Richard Walker said. The Cavaliers will play a three-game football schedule that concludes with a District 9-3A championship pairing at Lutcher on Nov. 4. The Cavs' first game is against Shaw on Oct. 22 at 2 p.m. at Hoss Memtsas Stadium followed by an Oct. 22 meeting with Rummel at 7 p.m. at Joe Yenni Stadium.

NO FALL BALL AT BELLE CHASSE

Belle Chasse is scheduled to resume school Oct. 17, but the Cardinals will not have football, volleyball nor cross country this fall, Athletic Director Bob Becnel said. The decision to cancel the three fall sports seasons was made Monday, Becnel said.

METRO MEET IN JEOPARDY

The Metro Championship has been New Orleans biggest high school cross country meet for more than 35 years, but this yearís race is likely off. Brother Martin cross country coach Dennis Panepinto, the meet director, said he doesnít know if the race will be held Nov. 9 as scheduled because of damage to the area and the low number of teams. He doesn't think that the Lakefront course — the metro area's most frequently used cross country venue — will be ready in time for the meet. Panepinto also is concerned about having the meet because there are a small number of teams running this season.

STRONG BEGINNING

Brother Martin, behind four runners with top 20 finishes, began its season by winning the St. Joseph's Invitational last Saturday. Andy Florek, a senior, won the meet, finishing the three-mile course in 15 minutes and 57 seconds. Senior Kyle Hecker was eighth (16:45). Senior Mark Buchert (17:04), sophomore Kenneth Schiffman (17:15) and sophomore Will Kirkikis (17:27) rounded out the Brother Martin top finishers.

TODAY'S GAME

EAST JEFFERSON (0–0) vs. KING (0–0)
Time: 6:30 p.m. at Joe Yenni Stadium.
Last week: Neither team played.
Last year: King won 21-20.
Notes: King had about 30 players on hand for practice this week. But King's Rob McGill, a 6-foot-7 tight end, has transferred to Ouachita Christian in Monroe. East Jeff opened practice with 31 players, including 10 starters on offense and seven on defense.

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL PLAYOFFS

Ensberg leads Houston in NLDS Game 1

His five RBIs push Astros ahead of Braves

From wire reports

Tim Hudson was expected to give the Braves a better chance in the first round of the playoffs.

Instead, Hudson had control problems in his postseason debut with Atlanta and the Braves are facing another division series deficit.

Hudson walked five — one intentional — and hit a batter, giving up seven hits and five runs in 6⅔ innings Wednesday as the Houston Astros beat the host Braves 10-5 in the best-of-five opener.

The five walks and five earned runs were career highs in eight postseason appearances for Hudson, who came to Atlanta from Oakland in a December trade.

The Braves hoped Hudson could team with John Smoltz to give them a strong duo of power pitchers with postseason experience.

After the departures of Tom Glavine and Greg Maddux and Smoltz's move to the bullpen, the top of the rotation lacked a true ace as the Braves were eliminated in the division series each of the last three years.

With the addition of Hudson, and Smoltz back in the rotation, the Braves hoped they had the two lead starters who could help them return to the World Series.

Hudson had not issued as many walks since June 13, when he walked five in 2 2-3 innings in a 7-3 loss at Texas. He also walked five in a 4-3 loss at Boston on May 20.

Hudson allowed 15 walks in his last five starts of the regular season. His 65 walks this season are the second-highest total of his career. His career-high 82 came in 2000 when he won a career-high 20 games for Oakland.

Hudson didn't appear comfortable in the early innings. Often high with his pitches, he walked four and hit a batter in the first three innings. In the fourth inning, he threw a pitch to Brad Ausmus over catcher Johnny Estrada's head.

He didn't walk another batter until giving Lance Berkman an intentional pass in the seventh before Morgan Ensberg's third run-scoring hit of the game. The single gave Houston a 5-3 lead and knocked Hudson out of the game.

Three of the hits off Hudson were doubles. Two led off an inning and another, by Craig Biggio in the third inning, came with one out. Biggio scored on a two-run single by Ensberg after Hudson loaded the bases with two walks.

Ausmus scored after a leadoff double in the fourth for a 4-1 lead.

Game 2 will be played today at 7 p.m. Turner Field with Smoltz going up against Astros ace Roger Clemens, who had a 1.87 ERA during the regular season.

Mussina's sore elbow no problem for Yanks

TUESDAY'S LATE GAME

New York takes opening ALDS game against Angels

From wire reports

ANAHEIM, CALIF. — Joe Torre insisted on a playoff-tested pitcher. With Randy Johnson unavailable to go in Game 1, that left New York's manager with only one option: Mike Mussina and his tender elbow.

The right-hander never appeared to be hurting, or just hid it well. It helped to watch rookie Robinson Cano's clutch hit that gave the Yankees an early lead.

Mussina pitched scoreless ball into the sixth inning, Cano lined a three-run double in the first and New York beat Bartolo Colon again, defeating the Los Angeles Angels 4-2 in Game 1 of their AL division series Tuesday night.

"We just wanted Moose because of his experience," said Torre, who needed Johnson to pitch in Saturday's AL East clincher at Boston. "If Randy was available, obviously he probably would have gone there. We just felt that experience is so important, especially when you're opening on the road."

Mussina struck out four and didn't walk a batter, giving up five hits in 5⅔ innings, then Torre went to his bullpen to finish things off.

Mariano Rivera saved it for the Yankees, who looked completely fresh — even after a cross-country trek on the heels of a seven-game road trip to end the regular season. They traveled West late Sunday, one day after clinching their eighth consecutive division title with a victory over the rival Red Sox.

Darin Erstad's ninth-inning RBI single cut it to 4-2, just the 10th earned run allowed by Rivera in 71 career postseason appearances. But the right-hander got pinch-hitter Casey Kotchman on a popup to extend his major league record to 33 postseason saves in 37 opportunities, earning his first postseason save since blowing chances in Games 4 and 5 against Boston in the 2004 AL championship series.

New York scored all four runs with two outs and wasted little time getting to Colon, a 21-game winner and leading contender for the AL Cy Young Award.

"When you're pitching on the road and you get to go to the mound in the first inning with runs, that's a big deal," said Mussina, who missed much of September with elbow trouble. "This is only the third time I've been to the mound since I had three weeks off. One was good and one was bad, so I didn't have any idea what to expect."

Off-court dress code may not fly

Players object to 'business-like attire' rule

From wire reports

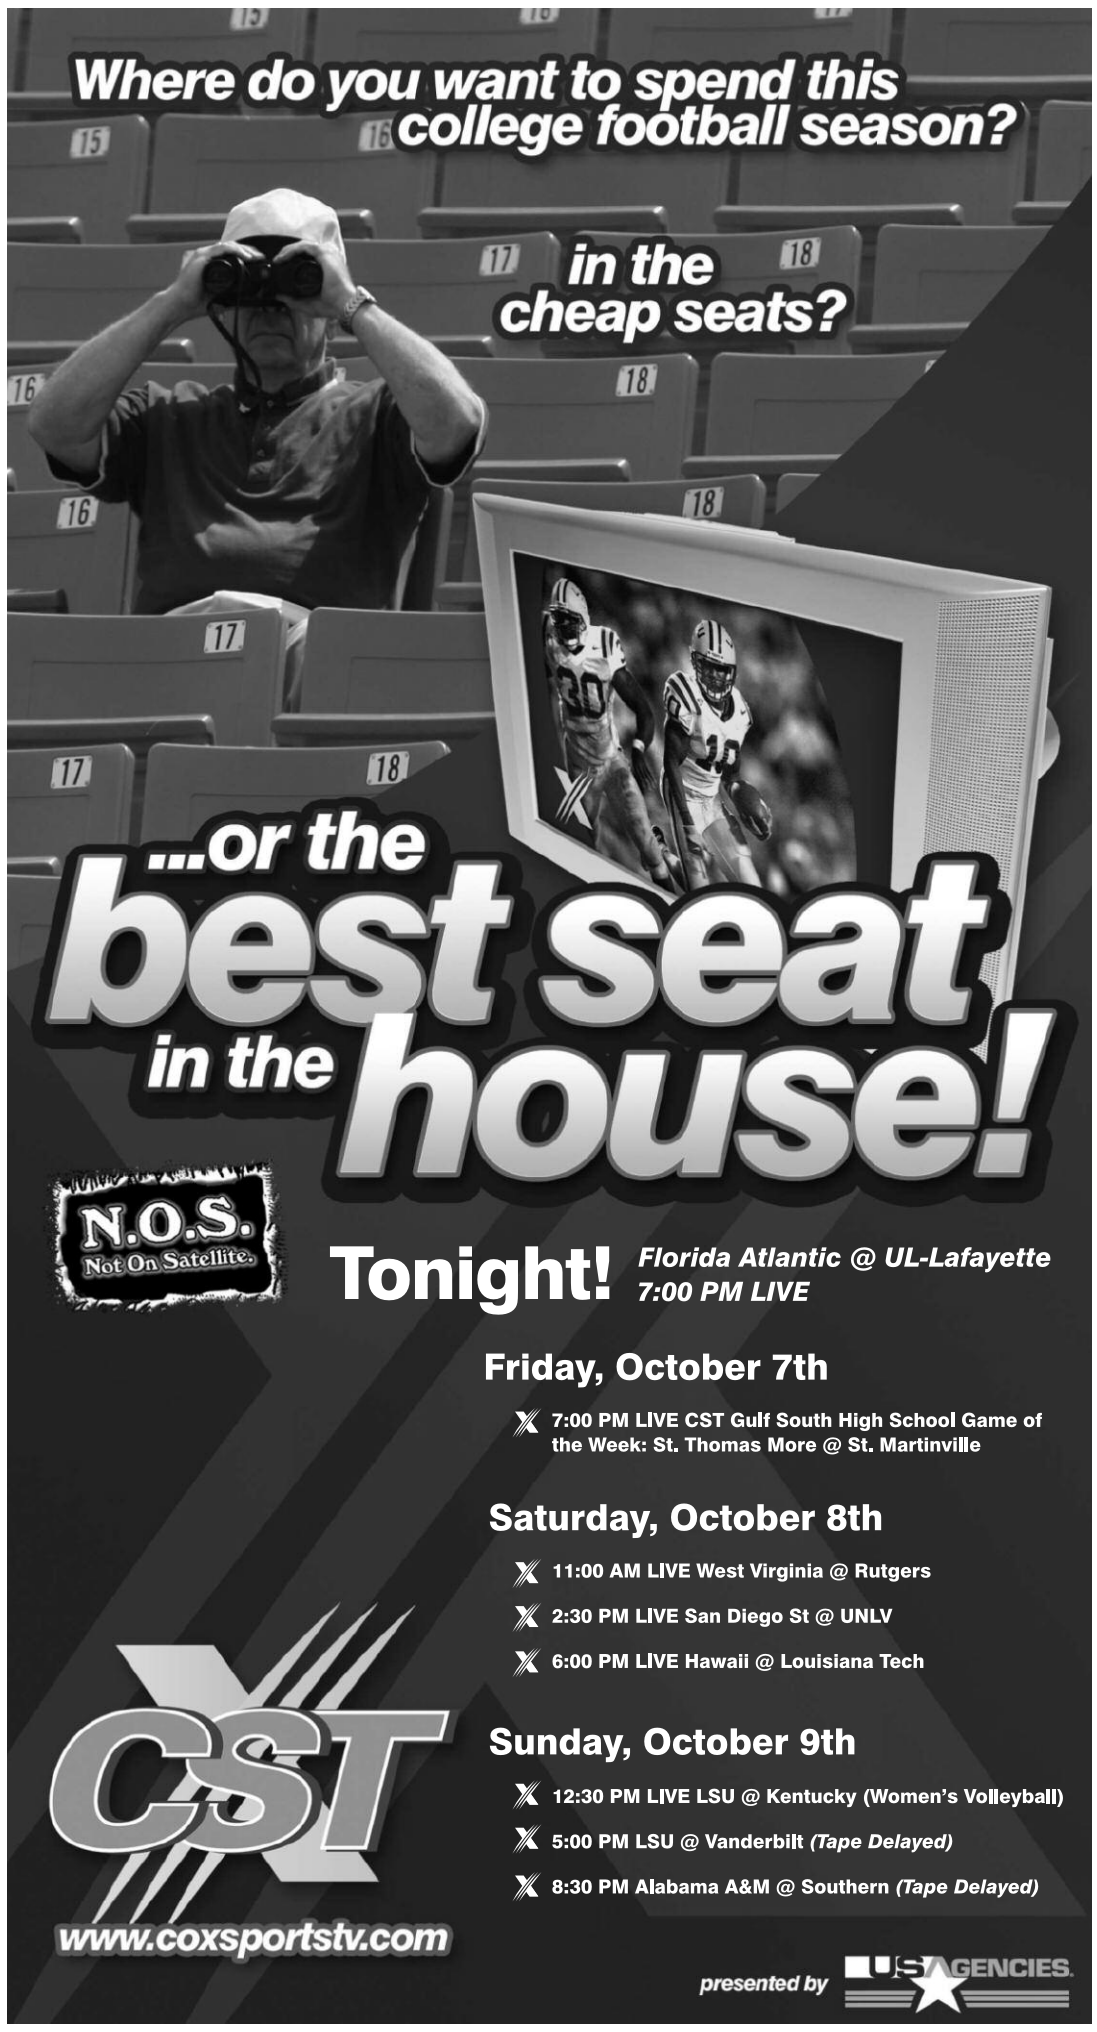
NBA players have been warned an off-the-court dress code likely will be instituted this season for team functions, ESPN.com reported. Players will have to wear business casual clothes, such as a sport coat and slacks, for all team affairs. Commissioner David Stern told The Boston Globe that the dress code would exclude jeans.

Team functions would include team flights, traveling to and from games and at public appearances. The Atlanta-Journal Constitution reported the dress code would be backed up by NBA fines.

"The dress code is, to me, a continuation of things," Stern told The Globe. "It's a small thing that contributes to a sense of professionalism. It's what the job entails. We've always moved to the fashion of our players. Years ago, the fashion was a jacket and tie. Now, it's a much more casual approach."



Allen Iverson told The Philadelphia Daily News he will fight any new dress code.

"I dress to make myself comfortable," Iverson told the Philadelphia Daily News. "I really do have a problem with it. ... I'll fight for."

SZCZERBIAK HAPPY AGAIN: Wally Szczerbiak wasn't sure he wanted to come back to the Minnesota Timberwolves. Relegated to sixth man last season, Szczerbiak expressed frustration with how he was being used and said he would rather be traded than spend another season coming off the bench in Minnesota.

"I was an All-Star in this league and it seemed like some people forgot that, for whatever reason," Szczerbiak said this week as the Timberwolves opened training camp.

CLIPPERS WAIVE WILLIAMS: The Clippers requested waivers on point guard Frank Williams. He averaged 2.9 points and 1.9 assists in his first three NBA seasons after being taken by Denver as the 25th overall selection in the 2002 NBA draft.

Four hobbled Saints return to practice

Horn has 'no doubt' he will play Sunday

By Mike Triplett
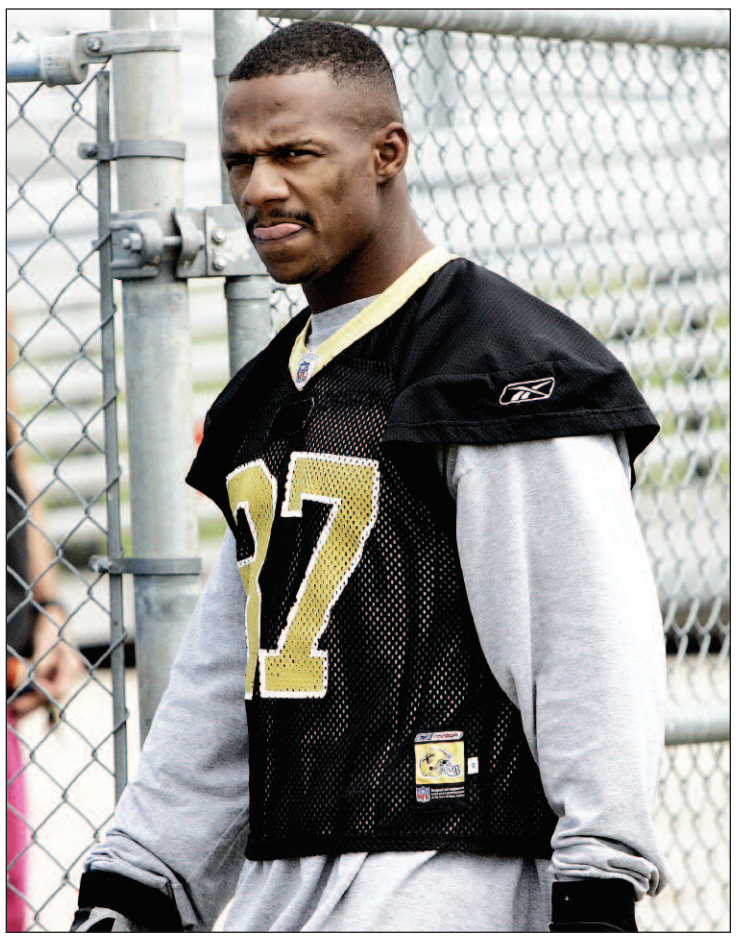
Staff Writer



SAN ANTONIO — Joe Horn, Fakhir Brown, Jermane Mayberry and Aaron Stecker were back in practice Wednesday after missing last Sunday's victory over the Buffalo Bills with injuries.

Horn, who was sidelined for a week and a half with a hamstring injury, said he did not expect to play against Buffalo, but this week he has "no doubt" he will play at Green Bay.

"I knew it was pretty sore (last week) and I could've played on it, but I probably would have hurt it more," Horn said. "I knew I had to get it rested, get it well so I didn't wind up being out for four or five weeks."

Brown, a starting cornerback, has missed the past three games with a bruised bone in his knee. Mayberry, a starting guard, has missed the past two games with a shoulder injury. Stecker, a backup tailback/kick returner, sprained his ankle during the Week 3 loss at Minnesota.

Those who did not practice Wednesday were receiver Az-Zahir Hakim (knee), guard Kendyl Jacox (ankle), linebackers James Allen (hamstring) and T.J. Slaughter (groin) and safety Mel Mitchell (hamstring).

AP PHOTO

Saints receiver Joe Horn, who missed last week's game against the Buffalo Bills with a hamstring injury, vows to play at Green Bay on Sunday.

Saints coach Jim Haslett said he expects Hakim and Jacox to return to practice today, but he wasn't sure about the other three. If Mitchell can't play, cornerback Jason Craft may be used as a backup safety.

HOWARD HONORED: Defensive end Darren Howard was selected the NFC's Defensive Player of the Week for the second time in his career after getting two sacks, forcing a fumble and batting away a pass against Buffalo.

Howard was the subject of trade discussions this past offseason, mostly because of contract issues and the Saints' depth at his position. But Haslett said the team was not looking to "get rid of him" unless they could upgrade their team in the process.

"We thought that Darren's value to this football team was a lot," Haslett said. "It was just a money issue at the time, and in order to trade Darren we wanted equal value. The only team that was even close was Dallas. But obviously we felt it wasn't equal value what they wanted to offer."

ETC.: The Saints practiced indoors Wednesday but will head outside to the San Antonio School District Spring Sports Complex on Thursday and Friday to prepare for an outdoor game at Green Bay. Lambeau Field will hardly be the "frozen tundra," with an early forecast of 60 degrees for Sunday. Haslett said cool weather in San Antonio this week should help them get a feel for their conditions.

McKenzie to face his former team

SAINTS, from C-1

"You really just need change. So that really was the situation there. I enjoyed my time there. It's a first-class organization. But, for me personally, I really just needed change.

"My only regret is that I didn't win a championship while playing in Green Bay. Outside of that, there's no regrets at all."

The Saints have certainly had no regrets since trading this year's second-round draft pick and quarterback J.T. O'Sullivan to the Packers in exchange for McKenzie and a conditional late-round draft pick in 2006.

McKenzie had five interceptions in his 10 games with the Saints last year and added another in Week 1 this season. He is a positive locker room presence, is regularly available to the media and brings a swagger and confidence onto the field with him - a far cry from his reputation of being distant and aloof.

"I'm always going to give a guy a chance. And Mike passed with flying colors," Saints receiver Joe Horn said. "Let me tell you something, you're only aloof and you're only a locker room cancer when you've got people around you that you don't get along with, and guys that you just don't feel. Mike feels us. Mike loves the guys that he's around. He's having fun.

"I'm not going to say there's bad guys down in Green Bay with him. But, obviously, there must have been more haters than friends."

McKenzie insisted then and now that his contract was not the main reason for his unhappiness in Green Bay - the five-year, $17.1 million deal he signed in 2002 had him ranked barely among the top 20 cornerbacks in the NFL by 2003.

The Saints did not guarantee McKenzie a new contract when they traded for him but said they would be open to discussing an extension.

Sure enough, after his instant impact, he signed a new five-year, $22 million deal this summer with a $7 million signing bonus.

"We researched him. We knew he was always on time for meetings, and he was a good guy. And he really just wanted change basically," Saints coach Jim Haslett said. "We talked to a lot of people who had him and some coaches who were there when he was there, and nobody had anything negative to say.

"You know, they said he's a little different, which he is. But he's a good guy. He's a good person. He wants to be a good player. He works hard, and he's got playmaking ability. Everybody's different. If you're playing football, you're a different kind of cat anyway."

McKenzie joined the Packers as a third-round pick out of Memphis in 1999 and started all 16 games his rookie season. Green Bay made the playoffs in 2001, 2002 and 2003 but never advanced to the NFC championship game.

McKenzie said he felt the Packers' second-round overtime loss to Philadelphia in January 2004 (the infamous fourth-and-26 conversion by the Eagles) represented Green bay's last window of opportunity to reach the Super Bowl.

The Packers fired defensive coordinator Ed Donatell after that, but McKenzie was apparently not pleased with the team's replacement, Bob Slowik - who was replaced after last season.

"He was a great Xs and Os coach, but sometimes when it comes to the heat of battle and having to make calls, that's different from just sitting in your office and going over tape," McKenzie said of Slowik.

McKenzie was also reportedly disappointed that assistant defensive backs coach Lionel Washington was passed over for promotion.

McKenzie admitted that he didn't exactly fit in with the Green Bay culture and preferred to spend offseasons in Memphis or his hometown of Miami.

All of those issues led to him sitting out the 2004 offseason workouts, the entire training camp and the first week of the regular season. He signed with agent Drew Rosenhaus - his fifth agent in five years - and asked for a trade.

He reluctantly returned to the team in Week 2 but only played in one game before a hamstring injury sidelined him.

Though McKenzie insisted again Wednesday that he did not fake or milk the injury, that speculation was rampant at the time.

Eventually, Sherman, who is also Green Bay's general manager, lowered the team's asking price in a trade to remove the distraction, if nothing else.

"I've always been a Mike McKenzie fan," Sherman said during his conference call Wednesday. "He's a good kid. He helped us win a bunch of ballgames here, and watching him on tape he's one of the best corners in the National Football League, so he's playing well down there.

"I have no hard feelings for Mike at all. I wish we could have gotten it resolved there. We didn't, but we moved forward."

So, too, has McKenzie.

"For me personally, things worked out for me," McKenzie said. "Truthfully, once I left Green Bay, a lot of that stuff kind of went in the rear view, and I've been since that time really looking forward to being here with my teammates and working on ways for us to get better, to find a way for us to get to a championship.

"Outside of Katrina coming through our region and having that devastation, I'm happy to be here in this locker room, with these guys. You know, we've shown great resilience. We've grown tighter as a team in these situations. And I wouldn't want to change anything for any reason."

Rams' Martz has heart infection

Coach says he can be treated with antibiotics

From wire reports

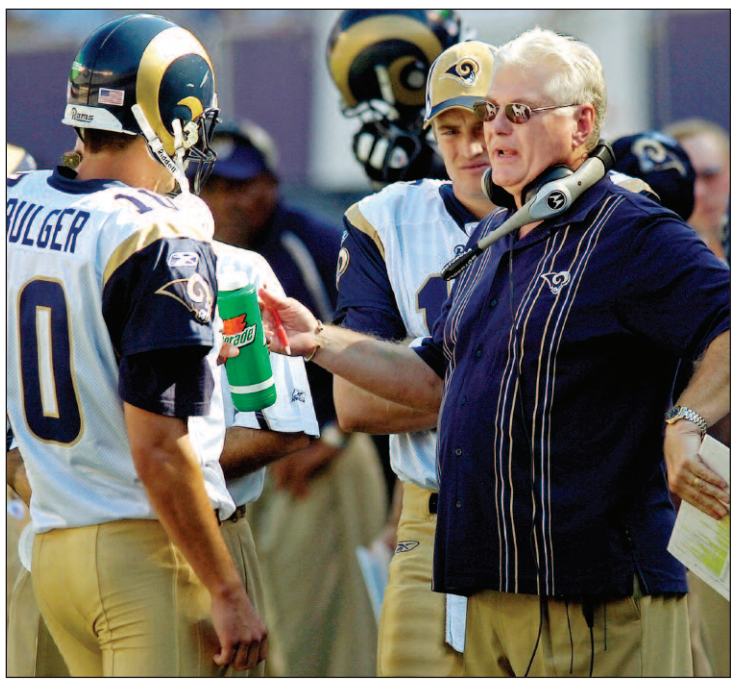
St. Louis Rams coach Mike Martz has an infection of the heart that will require treatment with antibiotics and keep him out of practice for a couple of days.

"I haven't been feeling good for four or five weeks, and there is some type of infection in my body that has gotten worse," Martz said Wednesday. "They think they've identified what it is."



Martz, 54, said doctors believe he has endocarditis, a bacterial infection of the heart's inner lining or the heart valve. Martz will undergo a series of blood cultures in the next week to confirm the diagnosis.

Treatment involves taking antibiotics over a long period of time, Martz said.

"This is something that if you let it go, it could become a real issue," Martz said.

Martz was hospitalized last Friday with what doctors believed was a sinus infection. He was released the next day and coached the Rams on Sunday in their 44-24 loss to the New York Giants.

TESTAVERDE TO START: Vinny Testaverde, nearly 42 years old, has not thrown a pass in a regular-season game since January. And he has had about a week to learn the Jets offense.

AP PHOTO

St. Louis Rams coach Mike Martz has a heart infection that will keep him out of practice for a couple of days.

This is the player coach Herman Edwards has entrusted to help save the season.

Edwards selected Testaverde his staring quarterback Wednesday, with hope he can spark their floundering offense. Though Testaverde was on the verge of retirement a few weeks ago, he is now put in the tough spot of trying to get the Jets some victories.

His first start comes Sunday against Tampa Bay, the team that drafted him No. 1 overall in 1987. He will be the fourth-oldest quarterback to start in the Super Bowl era, behind Steve DeBerg, Warren Moon and Doug Flutie.

Testaverde, signed a week ago when Chad Pennington went out for the season with another torn rotator cuff, watched from the sideline as third-stringer Brooks Bollinger started in a 13-3 loss to Baltimore. The Jets did little to help Bollinger. But Edwards pointed to one statistic that helped him make his decision: Bollinger was 4-of-16.

ROGERS SUSPENDED: Detroit wide receiver Charles Rogers was suspended Wednesday for four games for violating the NFL's substance abuse policy.

"I will make no excuses for what I did, and I accept full responsibility for my actions," Rogers said in a statement released by the Lions. "I let down a lot of people, mainly myself."

The suspension is the latest in a series of problems for Rogers, the second choice in the 2003 draft, who missed much of his first two seasons after breaking his right collarbone twice.

AROUND THE NFL: Starting wide receivers Bobby Engram (ribs) and Darrell Jackson (knee bruise) are both listed as doubtful for Seattle's game Sunday at St. Louis. If neither can play, Joe Jurevicius and Peter Warrick will start. ... The Seahawks signed veteran punter Tom Rouen on Wednesday and released Leo Araguz. ... Philadelphia All-Pro safety Brian Dawkins and Pro Bowl middle linebacker Jeremiah Trotter sat out practice Wednesday, but neither is expected to miss Sunday's game at Dallas. Both are listed as questionable.

Magloire working to regain All-Star form

every single day, and he knows this is where he's going to be playing for the time being and he's giving us 100 percent.

"I think Jamaal, no matter what he says in the papers, he's always said that he would love to someday play in Toronto, and that's understandable. It's his hometown.'"

But Magloire said his main objective is to be a team player, who is focused on proving he can return to the level achieved during the 2003-04 season when he played in all 82 games and made his first All-Star game appearance.

Last season, Magloire's streak of playing in 290 consecutive games ended after he fractured his right ring finger in November and was placed on the injured list. He also had problems with back spasms, and he missed 51 games with the injuries.

"My pride is the biggest thing, and I always want to play at the top level,'" Magloire said. "I always want to be considered one of the best in the NBA. Being out of the loop for a year just made me more eager to come back. I'm coming in with a new attitude. I'm resilient, and I want to work hard, and it's time to get the show on the road."

To get into shape this summer, Magloire said, he ran on hills, stairs and even did some sparring work in the boxing ring. Some of the Hornets players have noticed the way he's handled Scott's rigorous running drills at training camp.

"I think he's different guy coming into this year than he was last year," veteran forward P.J. Brown said. "He's definitely more focused, like he's on a mission. He wants to regain his form where he was two years ago. He's not saying very much, but he's saying enough when he has to and doing everything that coach is asking him to do."

Magloire is the Hornets' highest-paid player, earning about $8.5 million per season with a year remaining on his contract after this season.

"Hurricane Katrina has put everything in perspective, there are so many other things more important right now (than trade issues)," Magloire said. "Everything will work out for me because I've always had a good attitude. One day the ball will be in my court, and I'll be able to shine."

Smith aiming to become complete player

DeSHAZIER, from C-1

He even has his name back, after being called "Rook" so often last season that there had to have been times he forgot his real name himself.

"That's a good feeling," Smith said of being able to call someone else "Rook." "That's the best feeling in the world right now."

It's among the few pleasures he has while he and his teammates go through training camp at Southern Nazarene University in Oklahoma City, Okla., rather than the Alario Center in Westwego, and prepare for regular season home games to be played at the Ford Center in Oklahoma City, rather than New Orleans Arena.

Like everyone else, Smith has an adjustment period to go through.

The classes he was hoping to take at Tulane (he took courses there last season) will have to be taken in Oklahoma City. He's determined to remain a "student-athlete," he said.

Mom and Dad won't be living with him this season. They're home in New Jersey, watching over a younger brother who, for the first time, will be able to play football this season. Probably, Smith and rookie point guard Chris Paul, this year's first-round pick, will find a house and room together.

And, of course, there's the matter of transforming into the elite player that the Hornets feel they drafted, the one he full well believes he can be.

"I just want to be a more complete player, work on my ball-handling, jump shot," said Smith, who averaged 10.3 points, two rebounds and 1.9 assists per game last season, when he shot 39 percent from the field and started 56 of 76 games. "I want to be a better all-around player, a lot more calm on the offensive and defensive end."

Familiarity will help with that. A year in Coach Byron Scott's system means there should be a lot less indecision for all of the returning Hornets, who far too often last season were a step slow doing this, a tad late doing that.

It might help Smith, especially, because he will have added responsibilities. In addition to playing shooting guard, he also will be counted on to play small forward in some situations. Likely, he'll have some problems defending there. Likely, he'll present his share of problems, too.

"I'm just looking forward to getting out there and playing," he said. "Doesn't matter where, just getting on the court. I'll play the 5 (the center) if that's what they need me to do."

Wherever Smith plays, Scott will ride him hard again, just like last season.

"He told me the other day he's going to be even harder on me this year," Smith said. "He's trying to help me become the best player I can be. But I always put pressure on myself to be the best player I can be."

The best he can be seems to be very, very good. But it's going to take at least a little longer to get there, because even though Smith is ready and willing to help the "youngsters," he still is very much one himself.

Their houses are fine. Their families are safe. Their jobs are secure. So why are Katrina's unscathed so miserable? The guilt is killing them.

By Chris Bynum

Angele du Passage was flying from New Orleans to Atlanta last week when a flight attendant asked her the dreaded question.

"She bent down, leaned in towards me and quietly asked, with a concerned look on her face, 'How are you?' " said du Passage, a national sales manager for Sheraton New Orleans Hotels.

"I had to say, with a guilty look on my face, 'I am fine, thank you' - and really meant it."

It is a daily indignity for du Passage, who says she feels like former Disco Queen Gloria Gaynor: "I did survive. But I do not feel like singing." The Mandeville resident has been struggling with feelings of guilt since Katrina spared her home from wind and flood damage, while the homes of neighbors and co-workers were smashed by falling trees or submerged in floodwaters.

SURVIVOR GUILT REMEDIES

- ▶ Don't overcompensate by overworking or worrying nonstop because you feel you don't deserve your good fortune.
- ▶ Don't punish yourself for having moments of joy. Feeling joy does not mean you are "spitting in the face of the pain of others."
- ▶ Don't postpone your life. That has nothing to do with respecting those for whom you feel empathy.
- ▶ Don't bottle up your feelings. They will eventually come out as anger, resentment or depression. Moments of humor are just as profound and appropriate as moments of sadness.
- ▶ Do something to help those who didn't survive the storm so well. It will make you — and them — feel better.

In The Big Moldy, what used to be a disability now qualifies as a gift: He can't smell a thing

Maria Montoya

At the time, it qualified as a tragedy: Little 10-year-old Jason Glas took a spill and fractured his skull.

"I fell down in one of those blow-up play houses at a fair," said Glas, "and soon after we figured out I couldn't smell anymore."

Poor Jason, everyone thought. He'll never smell the gumbo cooking in his momma's kitchen, or the chicory coffee that fills his cup at Cafe DuMonde, or the perfume on his girlfriend's neck.

And then came Katrina, and the pungent funk that followed it, and now all anyone can say is: Dude! Can you clean out my refrigerator for me?

'It's unbelievable that something so good could come from an accident that at the time was pretty bad,' says Jason Glas, who lost his sense of smell at age 10.

Laughter is the best medicine for the authors of a 'Sound of Music' storm parody

Ellen Steigman and her husband John Valentino took in evacuees to their north shore home because they sustained only minimal damage.

Steigman, a part-time stand-up comic and schoolteacher, and her husband, an art professor at Southeastern Louisiana University, boarded fellow members of the Krewe du Vieux Carnival organization and other wayward nomads for some time. Each night they had big communal dinners.

And a few bottles of wine.

"Everything for me is a song," said Steigman, whose comedy material in New York included such routines as "Why There's No such Thing as a Romantic Jewish Dinner" and "Life in New York: Do These Things Happen to Just Me?"

"I always tried to be clean and not denigrate anybody," she said.

And now she's into evacuation and hurricane humor.

"I enjoy making people laugh, especially in a time like this. It's good to create pleasure out of pain. If you don't laugh, you cry."

So one night, the one-liners started flying. Things started getting a little crazy. Steigman got out her laptop. Everybody contributed. As she says, "Take five people who have been cleaning out and packing up three post-Katrina homes. Combine with a comedienne and art professor. Add a couple bottles of wine. Stir."

The result was a takeoff of "My Favorite Things" from "The Sound of Music." They called it, "My Favorite Things Are Debris." It was written by Steigman and Donna Musarra with an extraordinary creative effort from local actor Greg Baber and the equally deranged minds of David Mervis,

Sorry survivors

GUILT, from C-7

Add to that a daily deluge of depressing TV and newspaper images from shelters and storm-ravaged communities and the song in her head changes to "Help Me Make It Through the Night."

What du Passage and others who were spared Katrina's destruction are feeling is so common that the dictionary has a term for it: "survivor guilt," defined as "a deep feeling of guilt often experienced by those who have survived some catastrophe." The term was first coined when referring to the emotional state of many who lived through the Holocaust.

In the case of Katrina, some people who escaped the storm and quickly returned to somewhat normal lives say they feel unworthy and unable to enjoy their blessings. How can they when so many others' lives are in shambles?

Rabbi Robert H. Loewy of the Congregation Gates of Prayer in Metairie, now temporarily displaced to Houston, said the emotion is as common as it is misguided.

"People may feel guilt, which is usually connected with having done something wrong, or at least the feeling that others think you may have done something wrong," he said. "Of course, they did not do anything wrong. The fact that they are not suffering and others are is a simple reality."

But it's a reality du Passage cannot help but take personally, no matter how irrational those feelings may be.

"I work at a downtown hotel in New Orleans, and most of my co-workers live in the city as well. They still have not been to their homes," she said. "All I had to deal with was lost power and a loud generator for two weeks. But now my son is back in school. My husband and I are back at work, and life goes on.

"The guilt just never ends."

The most constructive way to cope with such strong emotions is "not to think about things in black and white," says Wayne Sotile, director of Psychological Services for the Wake Forest University Healthy Exercise and Lifestyles Program in Charlotte, N.C.

Sotile, who was born in Donaldsonville, La., said he has "over 500 relatives between New Orleans and Baton Rouge" and has been touched both personally and professionally by Katrina.

"The fact that you may be happy, even relieved, is not the same as being happy or relieved at someone else's expense," he says.

"It is important to recognize that 'survivor guilt' comes from a good heart," agrees Randy Quevillon, chairman of the psychology department and faculty member of the Disaster Mental Health Institute of the University of South Dakota. "It's a pro-social feeling."

Quevillon says that survivor guilt tends to be temporary in its intensity. And Sotile points out that, if channeled properly, it can be turned into something tremendously productive.

"Pay attention to the theme (behind the feeling of guilt) — that you want to give something back," Sotile said. "Do something directly for those who have been traumatized . . . little acts of kindness help. Being kind is a way to counterbalance the scales of awfulness."

Something as simple as not being impatient in the grocery line, he says, could impact the storm survivor ahead of you.

Each individual, Quevillon said, must evaluate what form of generosity feels right for them. It's not a bad idea, he says, to take time for a reality check with friends and family about the options you plan to explore. Overextending oneself for the sake of others is not the healthiest approach, especially when it is at the expense of personal responsibilities that are already in place.

Remember to cut yourself some slack, he says.

"Escaping into a good book or a movie can be an energizer during these times that you want to give back to the community," he said.

It's also important, Sotile added, to remember that no one is unaffected by a disaster on the scale of this one.

"One need not minimize their own measure of inconvenience," he said.

That's hard for public school teacher Pat Kaschalk, who has lost her job as a result of the storm but still feels guilt for not doing more to help her poor students' families before the storm.

"I have never been a wealthy person, but I know that I have had an easier life than many of the people who have suffered the most from this event," Kaschalk said. "I had 16 years of a decent living wage in this city, which is much more than many of the hardest hit people have had. My house, though not unscathed, is, I think, dry.

"What bugs me is the fact that I didn't work more to help alleviate the economic disparity before the hurricane. Now so many families whose hearts are in the city won't come back because they had so little economic opportunity before."

Kaschalk knows what she would like to do with the survivor guilt she feels.

"There will be a lot of sheetrock to hang, painting to do," she said. "My dream would be to paint and hang sheetrock alongside them."

That kind of reaction, said Rabbi Loewy, is both sensible and spiritually sound.

"Gratitude is the appropriate response, not guilt," he said. "We are not so all powerful as to determine whose house will be flooded and whose will not. Those who were more fortunate than others can look upon their good fortune as an opportunity to help those who suffered."

Benefits on the boards

Theaters in New York and elsewhere rally behind the N.O. arts community

By David Cuthbert
Theater critic

Four of New Orleans' "cherce" cabaret performers will join Tony winners, nominees and Big Apple cabaret stars Oct. 16 in "Heartsong: The Concert for New Orleans," a Hurricane Katrina benefit for local theater artists at Symphony Space in New York City.

The latest additions to the more than 40 performers on the bill are Ricky Graham, Banu Gibson, Cynthia Owen and Harry Mayronne. They join Kitty Carlisle Hart, who will introduce the show and Bryan Batt in the New Orleans contingent.

Cabaret performers who have played Le Chat Noir, which is one of the producers of the event, are Karen Akers, Andrea Marcovicci and Karen Mason, who headline an impressive array of talent.

Also scheduled to appear: Donna Murphy; actor-playwright Charles Busch; Ann Hampton Calloway: Liz Calloway; Boyd Gaines, original "Fantasticks" star Rita Gardner; Andrea McArdle, the original "Annie;' Lee Roy Reams; Heather MacRae; Steve Ross; Janis Siegel; Judy Blazer; Jim Caruso: Lina Koutrakos; Steven Lutvak; Laurel Masse; Mark Nadler; Marnie Nixon (everyone's singing voice in the movies); Joyce Randolph; Sally Mayes; Marilyn Sokol; Brett Somers; KT Sullivan; and Julie Wilson, chanteuse empress of Manhattan nightlife.

Alex Rybeck, who has also appeared at Le Chat, is music coordinator for the concert.

Money raised from the event will go to the Contemporary Arts Center, the Heartsong Performing Artists Fund and the Andy Kruzik/Heartsong Animal Fund of the Greater New Orleans Foundation (GNOF).

Awarding of money will be overseen by the CAC and GNOF and a small committee of volunteer producers, theater owners and managers who work within New Orleans theater community. Only individual artists and performers will be eligible.

The list of producers is almost as long as that of the performers. Erv Raible Cabaret & Concert Artists International is overseeing the event, along with Wendy Bailey, John Hoglund and Raible, of the Cabaret Conference at Yale University, in association with Le Chat Noir and its owner Barbara Motley, New Orleans producers Jacquee Carvin and Patrick Lee, Lois and Richard Nicotra, Lorenzo's Cabaret and the Hilton Garden Inn on Staten Island. Tickets for the event are $50, $100 and $200.

"Heartsong: The Concert for New Orleans" takes place Sunday, Oct. 16 at 7 p.m. at Symphony Space, Broadway and 95th Street. For reservations, call 212-864-5400.

TIMING IS EVERYTHING: One of the acts that was due to play Le Chat in the fall was Amanda Hebert in "Late Nite Catechism II: Sometimes We Feel Guilty Because We Are Guilty." Motley sees the show as an ideal benefit for Catholic schools in Louisiana and Texas that have taken in New Orleans school children.

"We could play Houston, Lafayette, Alexandria and end up at Le Chat," she said.

'I didn't smell one thing'

SMELL, from C-7

"It's unbelievable that something so good could from an accident that at the time was pretty bad," says Glas, now 18 and suddenly the most popular member of his family, if not the entire city.

It wasn't until last week, when Glas returned to an uncle's home in Old Metairie, that he realized just how precious — and profitable — this malodorous immunity might be. The workers his uncle had hired to clean out the house, which had taken on 5 feet of water, were overcome with nausea. Glas didn't smell a thing.

"We were trying to remove the fridge and the guy helping out kept having to stop to go outside," Glas said. "He kept asking me, 'You really can't smell anything, nothing at all?' I didn't smell one thing."

His uncle was so appreciative he paid Glas $15 an hour for his work — more than twice what he makes in a week as a supermarket bagboy. Good money for a college student.

There are drawbacks, of course. Glas said he is worried that he can't smell natural gas, or the smoke from a fire in another room. But under the stinky circumstances, the benefits definitely outweigh the drawbacks.

"I can't even imagine how bad the smell is and I'm happy that my aunt and uncle didn't have to deal with it," Glas said. "Everyone has already been through so much, this is just one less thing they had to deal with themselves."

While he said he is considering helping others in the same stinky situation, he does have his limits. He may have lost his sense of smell, but his vision is intact and sending all of the appropriate messages to his brain that say: DO NOT TOUCH.

"I won't mess with sewage or anything gross like that," he said. "I may not smell it, but that's just too funky."

Born in Chicago, Steigman grew up in Philadelphia and went to college in Boston. She and her husband, a New Yorker, lived in Buffalo and moved here a month before 9/11.

"I'm a born and bred Yankee," she said. "When we first got here, it didn't feel like home. It's home now. I feel myself becoming a regional spokesman. I'm more connected to Louisiana and the area. I'm part of it. I feel like an ambassador."

But, she added, "Trying to explain this to people up north is impossible."

It's odd on the north shore, she said, where things are starting to get back to normal. Now, she said, she's even starting to miss things that weren't normal but had started to look normal.

"Downed trees are not normal. But then they started to look normal. Then they took that pile of brush away that was in front of my house and I said, 'Where's my barrier? Now I have to look at my neighbors.'

"I drive past blue tarps and think nothing of it. There's something wrong with this, isn't there?"

It's evacuation humor, that's all. Steigman says it makes her want to make signs that say:

"Exile: It's not just for Jews anymore."

BATON ROUGE — After calling around, searching for friends and family who have not been heard of since Hurricane Katrina, some New Orleanians are making one last call in desperation – to funeral homes.

"We get people calling every day because they can't find out what's going on," said Belva Pinchon, a funeral director at Gertrude Geddes Willis Funeral Home. "I can't tell you the number of calls we get every day."

But funeral home directors can't give them the answers they are looking for.

Almost six weeks after Katrina struck, and as the Louisiana death toll from the storm nears 1,000, only 32 names have been released to the public. And of those, no ages or identifying factors were released.

"I think there's a concern out there for that," said Billy Henry, Bultman Funeral Home manager. "They think people were evacuated, but they don't know."

By contrast, 52 evacuees

You can drink the water, state says

All-clear stops at Industrial Canal

By Gordon Russell
Staff writer

Tap water is drinkable once again across a broad swath of New Orleans' east bank.

That was the word from state officials on Thursday and a huge boost to the effort to repopulate a desolate city as quickly as possible.

For many families considering a return to New Orleans, the lack of water suitable for drinking and cooking was a major reason to stay away. Now the problem has disappeared on the city's east bank from the Jefferson Parish line to the Industrial Canal.

The lack of potable water several weeks ago was at the heart of U.S. Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen's reluctance to embrace Mayor Ray Nagin's accelerated plan for repopulating the city.

Potable water is still not available in eastern New Orleans or the Lower 9th Ward, two of the neighborhoods hardest hit by Hurricane Katrina. Algiers has had drinkable water since days after the storm.

"It's something we're very excited about," Nagin spokeswoman Sally Forman

Trailer park opens in Baker to house Katrina's homeless

BAKER

When Hurricane Katrina transformed Wanda Evans from a resident of a New Orleans public housing complex into an evacuee, she lost the thing she valued the most: time alone.

That changed Thursday, when Evans, 41, a diabetic, became one of the first dozen occupants of a Federal Emergency Management Agency trailer park in Baker, a short drive northwest of Baton Rouge.

And at least among the initial residents, the consensus was that the trailers offered a vast improvement over what they had faced for the past month.

"I don't have to take showers with other women anymore. I don't have to flush a toilet somebody left something in before I use it. I can sleep when I want to," said Evans, whose itinerant

Craig McDaniel of Algiers moved into the Baker trailer park Thursday. 'The peacefulness, being comfortable – I think it's great,' he said.

Archdiocese lays off 881 employees

The Archdiocese of New Orleans said Thursday it has laid off 881 employees in its sprawling charitable, housing and other ministries. The number does not include hundreds of teachers and parish employees already let go by pastors in dozens of decentralized parishes and schools severely damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

The archdiocese, which says it employed 9,000 people before the storm, is still canvassing its church parishes, particularly in Orleans and St. Bernard, to develop an accounting for the total number of jobs lost, said archdiocesan spokesman the Rev. William Maestri.

The number will be large, however. Of its approximately three dozen New Orleans

Slow action by federal agencies and contractors to help local businesses pushed tempers to a boil Thursday at a "Back to Business" workshop in downtown New Orleans designed to help local businesses grab bigger pieces of the billions of dollars in government aid flowing into the region.

"I need you to tell the big contractors that we're here," shouted Darrin Blystad from the floor of a ballroom in the Sheraton Hotel near the end of a panel featuring officials from the federal Small Business Administration and city and state economic development offices.

He warned that while many subcontracts for recovery work have gone to out-of-state firms, local businesses like his pest control and mold

Lawmakers try to keep La. bailout afloat

Local governments, hospitals need cash

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Before Congress adjourns today for a one-week recess, Louisiana lawmakers are racing to stitch together a financial bailout to prevent further layoffs by local governments struggling for survival in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita.

Negotiations were taking place late Thursday between members of the Louisiana congressional delegation, the House and Senate, and the Bush administration.

Sen. David Vitter, R-La., said Thursday afternoon that he had reached an agreement with the White House and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., to make $750 million in low-interest loans available to local governments in southeastern Louisiana and three hospitals that remained open following the Aug. 29 hurricane.

An aide to Frist said that the bill has the backing of Senate Republicans, and Democrats were being polled. A White House spokeswoman would say only that negotiations were still taking place.

"There are a lot of numbers flying around," Jeanie Mamo said. "We recognize the urgency. We're committed to it."

On the House side, Rep. Richard Baker, R-Baton Rouge, said he too had struck a deal with the White House. But a Baker spokesman cautioned that the deal was far from final.

"The White House doesn't pass legislation," Michael DiResto said. "Our intimate understanding is that there are members of Congress in both chambers that have reservations (about the legislation). ... We can't say this is 100 percent done."

Helping the cause of the Louisiana lawmakers is that they aren't asking for new spending. Instead, they want Congress to loosen the restrictions on the $62.3 billion it has already approved for hurricane relief and recovery. By law, the money can't be used for such things as paying salaries of police and firefighters, although it can be used to pay overtime for those and other emergency workers.

Under the approach outlined by Vitter, the six hardest-hit parishes – Orleans, Jefferson, Plaquemines, St. Bernard, St. Tammany and Washington – could apply for the emergency loans and use them to pay essential workers. Three hospitals – East Jefferson General Hospital, West Jefferson Medical Center and Ochsner Foundation Hospital – also could apply for the loans. With just a third of their normal number of patients, hospital officials have said they will be forced to lay off health care workers if they don't get financial assistance quickly.

Louisiana lawmakers have been seeking a stopgap bailout. The effort took on renewed urgency with a week-long congressional recess looming and the announcement earlier this week that the city of New Orleans plans to lay off 3,000 workers.

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., has pressed for a larger package. She urged Frist and President Bush on Wednesday to carve out $14.3 billion for local governments and hospitals.

Her proposal contains a $9 billion request that would loosen Medicaid eligibility rules and pay for medical coverage for thousands of hurricane evacuees. Senate conservatives and the White House have strongly criticized the measure as wasteful and unnecessary.

Landrieu balked at an earlier White House proposal that, according to aides, would limit the loans to $5 million and require that they be paid back. Vitter said the cap has since been lifted and the president would have the authority to forgive the loans.

"This program would clearly allow for the forgiveness of loans," Vitter said.

Congress was preparing to leave Washington today for the Columbus Day recess and return Oct. 17.

FEMA contracts made without bids to change

Deals were made quickly after storm

By Bruce Alpert and Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Hundreds of millions of dollars in no-bid contracts awarded in the wake of Hurricane Katrina will be canceled and re-bid competitively, the new head of the federal disaster agency said Thursday.

David Paulison, who took over the reins at the Federal Emergency Management Agency two weeks ago, told a Senate committee Thursday that when time is of the essence, it makes sense to skip what can often be a cumbersome bidding process.

"Sometimes you have to do them because of the expedience of getting things done," Paulison said. "And I can assure you that we are going to look at all of those contracts very carefully. All of those no-bid contracts, we are going to go back and rebid."

The stakes are high as firms from all over the nation vie for a piece of the $62.3 billion so far allocated for relief and recovery.

Paulison told The Associated Press after the hearing that he didn't know the total amount of all the no-bid contracts, but said they included four for $100 million each for housing and construction in the days after the storm.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers awarded four contracts worth up to $500 million each for debris removal. Paulison said reviewing those contracts will be "high on our priority list."

Sen. David Vitter, R-La., filed legislation Thursday that would make it harder for FEMA to award no-bid contracts in the future. The bill would allow non-competitive awards in emergencies, but also put a six-month deadline on them and require congressional notification.

One week after former FEMA Director Michael Brown was put on the congressional hot seat for what all parties have conceded was an inadequate response to the hurricanes, it was Paulison's turn Thursday. Members of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee pressed him especially about the agency's decision to put firefighters volunteering for Katrina relief duty through several days of "sensitivity training" and for choosing out-of-state firms over local companies for lucrative recovery contracts.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., told Paulison, a former Miami-Dade Fire Department chief, that senators realize he's "new on the job," but warned him to expect to hear an "accumulation of anger and frustration" from the committee over FEMA's handling of the Katrina relief effort.

The agency was vilified for a detached, bureaucratic approach that left thousands of people stranded in New Orleans for days after the Aug. 29 hurricane. Under pressure, Brown resigned two weeks ago.

Committee Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, said several hundred firefighters from across the nation were frustrated that they were required to undergo sensitivity and sexual harassment training in Atlanta, and then given tasks of handing out leaflets, instead of providing direct help to those trapped in the floodwaters of New Orleans.

Lieberman said if the training is required by current laws or regulations, he wants to change that immediately.

"This is the classic case, you know, when the house is burning, I mean, or people are drowning, you don't want to send them for two or three days of sensitivity training," Lieberman said.

Collins also expressed frustration that despite more than $2 billion in spending on temporary housing, thousands of hurricane evacuees in Louisiana remained in shelters.

She said that FEMA had purchased more than 120,000 trailers and mobile homes. But as of last week, she said, the agency had placed just 109 Louisiana families in those homes.

"More than a month after Katrina's landfall, frustration, concerns and questions about FEMA's responsiveness and planning persist as Gulf Coast residents work to put their lives back together," Collins said.

A reason for the delay in housing placements, Paulison said, is the agency's desire to place people as close as possible to their original homes.

"And that's what slows things down, particularly around New Orleans," he said, "You know there's nothing there locally where we can put places right now. It's still pretty wet."

Unlike his predecessor at FEMA, who in House testimony mostly blamed "dysfunctional" officials in Louisiana and New Orleans for the recovery problems, Paulison struck a more conciliatory tone. He said he wanted to learn from congressional investigations and would heed the advice he's getting from Congress as well as local officials.

"Sometimes you have to do them because of the expedience of getting things done. And I can assure you that we are going to look at all of those contracts very carefully. All of those no-bid contracts, we are going to go back and rebid."

DAVID PAULISON
Federal Emergency Management Agency director

Asked about complaints that FEMA under Brown had become a dumping ground for people with connections to the Bush administration, but without practical skills in emergency management, Paulison was diplomatic.

"I fully support the fact that those types of positions should be political appointees," Paulison said. "They have to carry out the president's policies and guidelines. However, I do feel that the person has to have the capability of doing the job."

CORRECTIONS AND CLARIFICATIONS

Elections only in Kenner, Harahan: The Times-Picayune incorrectly reported Thursday which Jefferson Parish municipalities will elect city officials April 1. Only Kenner and Harahan will hold elections on that date.

Employee return date corrected: Plaquemines Parish public school employees are expected to return to work Monday. A story in Thursday's editions gave an incorrrect date. Students will return to the Belle Chasse-area schools Oct. 17.

Not from Lakeview: C.B. Forgotston lives in the East Lakeshore subdivision, which is adjacent to Lakeview. A Thursday story about his exchange of e-mails with New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin gave the wrong neighborhood.

Golf pro misidentified: In Saturday's Sports section, Ryan McEvoy was wrongly identified as the head golf pro at Belle Terre Country Club in LaPlace. That job is actually held by Bruce Bell.

Levee restoration work must wait on probe

Vitter urges faster action

By John McQuaid
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Some work to restore the New Orleans levee system to its pre-Hurricane Katrina strength cannot begin until an investigation is completed into levee failures that led to major flooding in parts of the city, the Army Corps of Engineers says.

The investigation will take "a short period of months," Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, the corps' chief engineer, told a Senate hearing Thursday, creating a tight schedule to meet the agency's deadline to fortify the city by the start of the next hurricane season, June 1.

"As we try to restore pre-Katrina conditions, we want to ensure that we are not putting in any kind of a flawed design," Strock said. "So we're very interested in understanding if these levees performed as designed, or whether there was some problem with our design."

Teams of forensic engineers from the corps, the American Society of Civil Engineers and the National Science Foundation are surveying the levee breaches in the 17th Street and London Avenue canals, collecting evidence this week in an effort to determine a cause or causes for the failures.

Floodwaters in the canals may not have been high enough to flow over the tops of the floodwalls, but they collapsed anyway. Experts say that points to human error – a possible design, construction or maintenance flaw.

STAFF PHOTO BY ELLIS LUCIA

Two panels of the 17th Street Canal containment wall lie in the Lakeview neighborhood. The Army Corps of Engineers said work on restoring New Orleans' levees to pre-Katrina strength won't begin until an investigation into the causes of the failures is complete.

The investigation must be complete before the corps can let contracts to repair the floodwalls, Strock told members of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

Sen. David Vitter, R-La., pressed Strock on the timing of the repairs. "The announced schedule to even get back to pre-Katrina protection is next June, which is the beginning of next hurricane season," he said. "So that means if it slips at all, it goes into the next hurricane season."

Later, Vitter said that he favors a faster resolution.

"The timetable is inadequate," he said. "That is a disastrously unambitious schedule. … I'm tired of living by the old corps schedule."

Vitter proposed compressing the schedule and giving the corps additional work to do. "We need to bring the (levee) system back to pre-Katrina levels before June and outline a plan to bring them up to Category 5 before next hurricane season," he said.

Vitter also sent a letter to committee Chairman James Inhofe, R-Okla., requesting a hearing on the levee and floodwall breaches.

"There is no excuse for the tragic loss of life in Louisiana, but if the cause of this flooding is in any way related to the design, specifications or construction techniques used in developing our floodwalls or levees we must address these flaws immediately," the letter said.

Inhofe also reiterated earlier accusations that environmental groups were to blame for Katrina's flooding because they opposed a corps plan dating to the 1960s to put control floodgates at the passes into Lake Pontchartrain. An environmental group filed suit to block the project and a judge ordered the corps to revise it. The corps dropped the project.

Inhofe quoted several former corps officials lamenting the demise of the project and blaming environmentalists.

"Many experts who were involved in that process nearly 30 years ago are convinced that the project the corps abandoned because of the environmentalist lawsuit, in all likelihood, would have saved New Orleans," Inhofe said.

However, Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif. disputed Inhofe's assertion, citing a report by the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, that said that the original design would have made Katrina's flooding worse.

Scope will be narrow for special session

Blanco wants focus on hurricane issues

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Gov. Kathleen Blanco is pushing for a narrowly focused special legislative session beginning Oct. 23 and is asking her Cabinet members to submit legislation to her as soon as possible.

Blanco spokeswoman Denise Bottcher said it is Blanco's intention to focus on a narrow range of issues at the special session, such as legal maters due to interruptions caused by Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita.

Bottcher said lawmakers also will be asked to ratify the executive orders Blanco issued in the wake of the hurricanes that suspended certain state regulations or laws.

Bottcher said the Oct. 23 date has not been firmed up but is still "a working date." Rep. John Alario, D-Westwego, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, said lawmakers have been told to prepare for a special post-hurricane session from Oct. 23 to Nov. 3.

Blanco has told her staff and her department heads that if anything can wait until the general session in March, it should be taken up then, Bottcher said. In March, lawmakers will meet for 60 days taking up all issues except taxes.

Legislators, including Alario, are pushing for a special session in January to deal with fiscal issues following the state's loss of revenue. Officials of the Division of Administration, the arm of the governor's office that handles budgetary and fiscal matters, did not comment on Alario's assessment.

Meanwhile, Rep. Danny Martiny, R-Kenner, chairman of the House Committee on the Administration of Criminal Justice, said his panel will be looking at hurricane-spawned legislation dealing with where to try criminal cases outside of the defendants' home parishes if a courthouse can't be used.

Secretary of State Al Ater said he will ask Blanco to include in the legislative session a bill giving him authority to declare a state of emergency for elections, such as the February citywide elections in New Orleans, so regular election procedures can be modified to allow city voters who may not be in Orleans Parish to cast their ballots.

He also said he is trying to compile a mailing list of all displaced registered voters, comparing records of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other relief groups with the rolls of registered voters to send them a notice that they still have voting rights in their home parishes unless they re-registered in another parish or state.

Bottcher did not say if Blanco would include Ater's request in the special session.

HOUSTON — Finding a job in Houston was the last thing Keisha Stephens wanted to do.

But after Mayor Ray Nagin announced the layoff of 3,000 city workers this week, the mother of three said she had no choice.

"I'm quite sure I'm going to be one of the ones laid off," said Stephens, 31, who worked as a senior taxicab investigator for the city's Transportation Department.

Stephens was not alone in her search Thursday at Destination Occupation, a regional job fair organized by Harris County and the city of Houston. With more than 200 prospective employers, evacuees who lost their jobs after Hurricane Rita and Hurricane Katrina were vying for positions alongside Texas residents at the George R. Brown Convention Center.

Originally organized for Katrina victims, the fair was opened to Rita evacuees and others in search of jobs.

As she scanned the crowded room and began looking for possible job opportunities, Stephens said she is not bitter about being laid off and doesn't blame Nagin.

"He's really fighting for our city," she said. "I understand. I am not angry."

She said she'd rather be laid off now so that the city could save money, rebuild and rehire her again one day.

Gentilly resident Shanna Washington walked through the job fair clutching a stack of applications and said she no longer wants to live in New Orleans.

"I haven't been back, and I don't want to go back," said Washington, who worked at a Walgreens pharmacy in New Orleans. "I want to reside here. I found an apartment. Now I want to look for a car and a job."

Foot traffic was steady Thursday at the Houston Independent School District's job booth. But few jobs were available.

Although 20,000 students have been registered in Houston-area schools, the Houston Independent School District has only absorbed about 5,300 Hurricane Katrina students, said Robin Williams, a district recruiter who attended the job fair.

As they're searching for jobs and permanent places to stay, many parents have opted to keep their children out of school, Williams said. "We have had a great outpouring of teachers; we just haven't had the students enroll."

Keith Bowman, a former dispatcher in New Orleans, didn't know where to begin.

He'd escaped the floodwaters of New Orleans by making it to the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center and eventually to a bus, which took him to Arkansas. He decided to come to Houston after hearing about the opportunities being made available to Hurricane Katrina evacuees.

Bowman said he'd worked at the same company for 15 years and knew that in Houston, he wouldn't be making the same amount of money he had made in New Orleans.

"They can't pay me what I was making there. Now it's time to swallow your pride and take what you can get. We have no choice right now."

"They can't pay me what I was making there," he said. "Now it's time to swallow your pride and take what you can get. We have no choice right now."

Kimiko Austin, 23, of Marrero said most of her family has returned to New Orleans, but she decided to stay in Houston.

Austin said the storm-ravaged city depresses her. "It looks a mess out there," said Austin, a pharmacy technician.

Ralph Walker of Gretna already has a job but was searching the booths for part-time work Thursday.

"I came to Houston with my friends," said Walker, 19, who is working at a Houston-area Wal-Mart and wants to go to college. "I'm looking for a part-time job to better myself."

Edward Scannell Butler III

Edward S. Butler III, radio host, activist

Edward Scannell Butler III, a New Orleans radio host and anti-communist activist who debated Lee Harvey Oswald on the air three months before President Kennedy's assassination, died Aug. 31 of a heart attack at Louisiana Heart Hospital in Lacombe. He was 71.

Mr. Butler was born in New Orleans, worked in Holmby Hills, Calif., for many years and most recently lived in Slidell. At the time of his death, he was awaiting heart surgery to correct problems that arose immediately before the arrival of Hurricane Katrina, said his brother, Perrin Butler of Metairie.

During a stint in the Army, Mr. Butler worked with the Defense Intelligence Agency while stationed at the Army Management School at Fort Belvoir, Va. Later, he co-founded The Information Council Of The Americas, a nonprofit organization that became involved with aiding people displaced by Fidel Castro's communist revolution in Cuba.

In the course of his work with the council, Mr. Butler came in contact with Oswald, who was promoting a pro-Castro organization in New Orleans and seeking help from the American Communist Party. Mr. Butler confronted Oswald on a New Orleans radio show in August 1963 and forced him to admit that as a Marxist, he had gone to the Soviet Union and tried to renounce his U.S. citizenship.

Oswald soon moved to Dallas, killing Kennedy on Nov. 22, 1963. In 2002, Mr. Butler recalled his on-air debate with Oswald:

"He wore a very heavy wool suit in August, a very hot August day in New Orleans. He was parboiling, but he didn't have a bead of sweat on him, and he was very self-contained.

"I was shocked when I heard he had killed Kennedy. I would not have been shocked if he had tried to kill me. I was concerned about the guy from the minute I met him."

After Kennedy's assassination, Mr. Butler wrote a study of political revolution, "Revolution Is My Profession," in which he predicted unrest in the United States during the 1960s and 1970s and the rise of terrorism. He also produced a television show based in large measure on the Oswald radio debate, as well as a feature film examining the nature of the Castro regime: "Hitler In Havana."

During his years in California, Mr. Butler produced and starred in a weekly television show, "The Square World Of Ed Butler," and appeared in documentaries, including two series: "Spirit '76" and "Spirit U.S." He also published a West Coast magazine, "Westwood Village Square."

More recently, Mr. Butler managed radio station WTIX-AM in New Orleans, where he conducted an afternoon talk show.

Mr. Butler is survived by five children, Edward Scannell Butler IV of Redondo Beach, Calif., Nola Butler of Pasadena, Calif., Matthew Thomson Butler of Beaverton, Ore., Clarkston Butler of Slidell and Dawn Butler Edelen of Lafayette; four grandchildren; two brothers Perrin Butler of Metairie and Rhett Butler of Troy, Ala.; and a sister, Lynn Butler Mauney of New Orleans.

A memorial service will be at a later time, when travel restrictions related to Hurricane Katrina are sufficiently eased. For information, call Perrin Butler at (504) 831-5958.

Evacuation keeps hospital patients at bay

Public health care future in doubt

By Jan Moller
Staff writer

At the Poland Avenue Wharf, next to a virtually empty neighborhood, sits a 250-bed floating hospital with almost no patients.

The USNS Comfort has seen a total of 54 patients in the eight days since it arrived from Baltimore to serve as the temporary home for Charity Hospital. Only eight patients were there Thursday morning, and an operating suite had two mannequins dressed to look like medical personnel to show the touring media what the facility looks like in busier times.

"We're not seeing the numbers we want to see," said Dr. James Aiken of Louisiana State University, the ship's civilian medical director, who said he is "very concerned" that the Comfort will soon be redeployed, leaving New Orleans without a fully functioning public hospital as residents begin to return.

Aiken blamed the location of the boat – far away from parts of the city that are returning to life – for the lack of traffic. And he's predicting that the patient load will pick up once more residents return and start to rebuild.

But whether a new Charity Hospital will be there to serve New Orleans for the long term remains an open question. Donald Smithburg, chief executive of LSU's Health Care Services Division, said Charity and University hospitals were decimated by Hurricane Katrina and need to be replaced.

"The (old) facilities are unusable for health care purposes," Smithburg said. "That doesn't mean the public hospital system is down and out."

Most of the damage at Charity involved the mechanical and electrical systems, which were housed in the basement and were submerged by the flooding.

"Katrina dealt a death knell to the already marginal system that existed," said Walt Adams, who conducted a structural analysis of Charity and University and recommended that both buildings be torn down.

But at a hearing Thursday before the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee, Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., said he was told by some Oklahoma National Guard troops who were assigned to Charity Hospital after the hurricane that the facility had only limited water damage.

STAFF PHOTOS BY MATT ROSE

Structural engineer Walt Adams has recommended that Charity Hospital and University Hospital be torn down because of storm damage. 'Katrina dealt a death knell to the already marginal system that existed,' he said.

According to Dr. James Aiken, left, doctors aboard the USNS Comfort have seen only 54 patients since the ship arrived at the Poland Avenue Wharf to serve as Charity's temporary home.

Coburn said he knows that LSU administrators had plans to build a new facility before the hurricane but "had not gotten funding." He told acting Federal Emergency Management Agency Director David Paulison that he does not think the federal government should pay for a replacement hospital and suggested LSU was trying to use the hurricane as a way to get LSU but structural engineers and environmental experts who determined Charity Hospital was a total loss. He said that Coburn "should tour the facility so he can see for himself the extent of the damage."

Smithburg also said that although the hospital had plans to build a new facility because Charity lacked modern medical facilities, such as the ability to offer private or semi-private rooms, the process had not gotten far enough along to evaluate financing options seriously.

Smithburg said Charity Hospital would cost $340 million to repair and $561 million to replace. Repairs to University Hospital, an adjacent office building and the power plant that served both hospitals would cost $149 million, while the replacement cost would be about $250 million, he said.

A structural survey by Adams Project Management Consulting determined that Charity Hospital was 60 percent damaged by Katrina, and that University Hospital sustained 51 percent damage. If the federal government agrees with those assessments, LSU could be eligible for at least partial financing to replace the facilities rather than restore them to their prestorm condition.

In the meantime, LSU is setting up modular field hospital in the parking lot of University Hospital that could start receiving emergency patients by the end of next week and have 200 beds operating by late December.

The drive for a new hospital could get a boost when LSU's School of Medicine reopens its New Orleans campus in January, officials said, reacting to rumors that LSU was looking to move the school to Baton Rouge. "The intent is to take everybody back to New Orleans," said Charles Zewe, a medical school spokesman, who said plans are under way to reopen the school's main New Orleans campus in time for the Jan. 18 start of the spring semester.

Students at LSU's medical school, dental school and allied health programs have been attending classes at LSU's Pennington Biomedical Research Center in Baton Rouge, while some nursing students are being taught at a nearby movie theater complex. A Finnish ferryboat, which docked at the Port of Baton Rouge on Wednesday, will provide temporary living quarters for as many as 1,400 medical students starting this weekend.

In the meantime, other universities have sought to take advantage of LSU's plight by trying to lure away some of its top research faculty, Zewe said. "It's a major problem for us, and it's been a major problem for us since Day 1 of the storm," Zewe said. "A lot of our fellow research universities have made some of our best people some very lucrative offers."

So far, however, fewer than a half-dozen faculty members have left the school, and most medical students appear willing to stick it out as well, he said. Zewe said classroom attendance has averaged close to 100 percent since Katrina.

Group wants warning about health risks

Tests will monitor contaminants

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — An environmental research group says the federal government is failing to adequately inform the public about the health risks caused by Hurricane Katrina and is critical of New Orleans' plans to allow citizens back into the city.

People returning to the area and many recovery workers do not understand the severity of the problems and are not using proper protective clothing or gear, the nonprofit Natural Resources Defense Council said.

Representatives of the organization, which has offices in New York and Washington, D.C., visited Louisiana this week to stress their concerns with state lawmakers and other officials about the conditions of the air and sediment left by the floods.

The group is launching its own field tests to monitor contaminants in the environment, said Erik Olson, senior attorney with the Council. Financing for the tests is provided by a variety of individuals from around the country, he said.

"We're very concerned about the level of air pollutants in much of the city," Olson said. "We're concerned about widescale repopulation of the city."

The Environmental Protection Agency has more than 650 employees or contractors working in the Gulf region to assess conditions and begin remediation. The federal agency has warned that flood waters that covered much of the New Orleans area were contaminated by fuel spills, sewerage and other harmful materials, and that much of the sediment left by the floods is contaminated.

On its Web site, the EPA publishes its sampling results from hundreds of stations in the region.

But the council criticized the EPA for "serious shortcomings" in its test reporting and in its warnings to citizens.

"The EPA air sampling so far has been very limited, and does not include enough chemicals or locations to form a full picture of the problem in New Orleans," according to a council report.

EPA officials in Dallas referred questions to staff in the agency's field operations, who did not respond Thursday.

Mayor Ray Nagin said Wednesday that he has asked the Dallas EPA office to conduct more environmental tests in the city, especially in the Lower Ninth Ward, which flooded during Katrina and then again when levees breached during Hurricane Rita.

Nagin has repeatedly raised concerns about the environmental risks, one of the reasons he is strongly suggesting that people not resettle permanently in certain areas of the city. The mayor has opened certain ZIP codes, which were relatively dry, to people who want to come back to live there. But the city is suggesting that people only visit the non-targeted zones and wait until further notice before resettling.

Council members said they are not opposed to repopulating the city in the long term or to people coming in temporarily to check on their damaged homes, but the group is concerned about the prospect of hundreds of thousands of people returning to the area permanently before the real dangers are known, Olson said.

The group's concern extends beyond the city to any place where high levels of contaminants are found, such as St. Bernard Parish. The contaminant levels vary from place to place, Olson said, and the council is particularly concerned about high levels of benzene found is some areas. Benzene, probably left over mainly from fuel spills, is a carcinogen, he said. It could degrade to become less of a problem over a matter of weeks, he said.

Meanwhile, as the sediment dries and is stirred up, and as demolition work intensifies, an increasing amount of pollution will rise into the air, according to the council report. That matter could include dust, bacteria and toxic chemicals posing problems if inhaled.

"A simple dust mask is not effective for protecting people from most of the contaminants in the air," the report says. The council recommends high-quality respirators, especially where there is evidence of oil or fuel spills, and rubber boots and vinyl gloves.

Children, the elderly and people with asthma or heart conditions should not return to previously flooded areas at this time, the group recommends.

The EPA web site for sampling results is www.epa.gov/katrina/testresults. Residents can type in an address and see the technical results of samples taken in their neighborhoods.

Tropical Storm Tammy leaves Georgia messy

Rain soaks city; many lose power

By Russ Bynum
Associated Press writer

BRUNSWICK, GA. — Tropical Storm Tammy turned subdivisions into lagoons as ankle-deep water seeped into at least two dozen homes after the storm soaked this port city with more than 4 inches of rain before weakening Thursday to a tropical depression.

Joseph and Michelle Floyd woke up Thursday at 1:15 a.m. to find 1 1/2 inches of water in their bedroom, prompting them to flee with their three young children. They came back hours later and had to wade through knee-deep water to get to the front door.

"It rained all day yesterday and there were just puddles — it really didn't seem that bad," Michelle Floyd said as a boy four doors down paddled a small boat on flooded Green Swamp Road. "We just assumed we were all right."

Tammy's gusty winds, reported at 46 mph on nearby St. Simons Island, toppled trees and power lines as the storm came ashore late Wednesday near the Georgia-Florida state line. With the heaviest wind and rains north and east of its eye, the storm left Florida practically unscathed.

More than 16,500 utility customers lost power from Savannah to St. Marys 100 miles to the south, but officials reported mostly mild damage.

In South Carolina, another 9,500 customers lost power, mostly in the Beaufort area, and an oceanfront home in vulnerable Edisto Beach collapsed. Hilton Head saw nearly 6 inches of rain and Charleston had more than 2.

In Georgia's Glynn County, 24 to 36 homes in Brunswick and the surrounding county had flooding and some roads had up to 3 feet of standing water.

Tammy was the 19th named storm of the Atlantic hurricane season, which began June 1 and ends Nov. 30.

The 2005 hurricane season is tied for the second-busiest since record-keeping started in 1851; 19 storms also formed in 1995 and 1887. The record for tropical storms and hurricanes in one year is 21, set in 1933.

Honore takes tour of 'Rita parishes'

Ravaged region struggles to recover

By James Varney
Staff writer

U.S. Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honore talks with Freddie Richard, director of Homeland Security in Cameron Parish, about the cleanup effort after Hurricane Rita.

Touring the Louisiana coast this week to survey damage from Hurricane Rita, Army Lt. Gen Russel Honore looked out at a landscape so pocked and torn it appeared to suffer from emphysema.

Throughout small towns along the southern coast in what he calls "the Rita parishes," the toll of that area's battle with the hurricane seems enormous.

West of New Iberia, countless blue roofs dot the landscape and it seems as if houses have exploded from the inside. Walls are intact, but belongings have been scattered, leaving swaths of south Louisiana strewn with wreckage like nut shells on a saloon floor. Piles of moldy furniture line the roads, with only some homes on rises offering evidence of how thin the line was between doom and grace as a storm surge from the Gulf, estimated at 20 feet high, tore inland.

The closer Honore's Wednesday tour got to ground zero of Rita's landfall, the worse the damage. By Cameron Parish, most of the communities are matchsticks on slabs.

"My wife took more than 50 pictures for insurance purposes before we left," said Freddie Richard, the parish's Homeland Security director. "But it turned out not to matter. There's nothing left that you can fit in the palm of your hand."

Richard and other parish officials, along with some troops, are working out of the 38th Judicial District, a courthouse in the town of Cameron that has been turned into an emergency command post. The courthouse, only recently pumped clean of mud, stands amid a sepia world and is ringed by dead trees, once a picturesque grove of oaks. The only green comes from splotches on the soldiers' camouflage fatigues.

Over the next week or so, Richard wants residents to return for a "look and leave" before the parish is locked down again for a massive cleanup. In some respects, the task in Cameron is easier than it is in New Orleans: Once the place is essentially swept, rebuilding can begin. But for the roughly 10,000 left homeless, the pain of loss is just as great.

"There's still high water around in places, but much of this was always marsh and I ain't worried about disease," Honore said after touring the site on foot and meeting guardsmen from Alabama in nearby Creole.

After those stops, it was back in the Blackhawk and on to Erath.

At the small City Hall he was surrounded by a knot of townspeople and by Councilman John LeBlanc, a 19-year political veteran who the mayor, who is ill, has appointed as his temporary replacement.

"Without all the help we've gotten here, we wouldn't have survived," LeBlanc said, describing how the town's tiny schools were wiped out by flooding and how elementary school students are being bused some 25 to 30 miles each morning to Maurice.

"We want our kids back in town," he said. "It's hard to see your kids bused that distance every day."

In each of the towns, Honore urged soldiers to work harder and asked residents what they needed. Honore reminded the small crowd that they can get temporary housing through FEMA — a trailer right on their property — and he encouraged them to sign up more elderly or computer illiterate residents who might be unaware of such programs.

He promised to look into reports of people scavenging through the piles of sodden, moldy belongings — trash heaps to some but important insurance evidence to homeowners. He promised to return.

And then, the long hopscotch complete, Honore headed back to New Orleans.

These morale-boosting, fact-gathering trips may be coming to an end soon for Honore. Though he declined to offer a departure date, he already has replacement staff up and running, and the number of boots he commands on the ground has dwindled from about 21,000 to 1,400, he estimated.

Whether the situation on the ground will approve sooner rather than later will depend more on Louisianians than federal troops, he said.

"The parishes need to find the mechanisms to deal with all of this," he insisted. "But we're not talking about soft people here. You can look at all the death and destruction or you can stay focused on the mission and realize there's a lot of work being done to save lives."

Campground sued for price-gouging

36 more cases under investigation

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — State Attorney General Charles Foti has filed a lawsuit alleging consumer price-gouging in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina and has 36 other complaints under "active investigation," officials said Wednesday.

Foti spokeswoman Jennifer Cluck said a lawsuit was filed Tuesday against the operators of Natalbany Creek Campground, accusing the owners of tripling the monthly rates charged to evacuees.

The civil lawsuit was filed in Tangipahoa Parish and was allotted to 21st Judicial District Court Judge Zorraine "Zoey" Waguespack. No hearing date has been set.

Officials at the campground, at 30218 Louisiana 16 West in Amite, did not return telephone calls seeking comment.

Cluck said Foti's office has received almost 2,100 complaints of price-gouging, but many have been dismissed and others have been negotiated for restitution.

Many of the 36 active investigations involve gasoline companies accused of overcharging evacuees, Cluck said. She said Foti is trying to resolve those cases by negotiations and getting rebates for consumers.

State law allows a merchant to increase prices of goods and pass those costs along to consumers if the merchant is having trouble obtaining items for sale. Those increases have to be reasonable, Cluck said.

The day after Katrina hit the region, according to the lawsuit, the campground raised the rental price of camp sites from $22 a day plus tax to $30 a day plus tax.

Two weeks later, the suit says, the campground owners "abruptly eliminated daily rates altogether (and) increased the rental price to $900 per month plus hotel and sales tax."

The suit asks Waguespack to rule that the campground violated the state's unfair trade practices and consumer protection law and that restitution be made to people who were evacuated and overcharged at the campground.

Cluck said the judge can order a civil fine of $500 for each day's violation, as well as restitution and triple damages.

N.O. evacuee hits jackpot at casino

Woman wins $1.6 million

By The Associated Press

OPELOUSAS — After more than a month of living with dozens of displaced relatives in Opelousas, Jacquelyn Sherman, an evacuee from New Orleans, told her niece she was depressed.

That all changed when she won $1.6 million — before taxes — playing a slot machine at Evangeline Downs Racetrack and Casino.

"When it happened, I didn't know what was going on," Sherman said. "I had just put in my $20 in the 'Wheel of Fortune' machine when it hit. My feeling about this win is better than being blessed. Thank you, Lord."

Sherman had evacuated to her sister's home in Opelousas as Hurricane Katrina threatened New Orleans. After a month with no end in sight and no prospects, she and her niece began to pray Tuesday.

"I told my aunt that God works in mysterious ways and that I had prayed that something good would happen for the whole family to be happy," Jamie Sherman said.

Later that night, Jacquelyn Sherman and her sister decided to entertain themselves with a trip to Evangeline Downs. Before she knew it, Sherman went from having practically nothing to being a millionaire.

"I have to get an attorney and make some decisions about my future," she said Wednesday at a news conference at the racetrack. "It hasn't all sunk in right now. I'm tired. We were up very late last night and back here very early. I plan to go home right now and rest, take a nap. I have so many thoughts going through my mind about what to do and how to do it."

Jacquelyn Sherman's win is the single largest jackpot won since the casino's opening.

Bush warns of 'radical Islamic empire'

Speech comes as backing for war dips

By Tom Raum
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — President Bush accused militants Thursday of seeking to establish a "radical Islamic empire" and said the United States and its allies had foiled at least 10 plots by the al-Qaida terror network since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

He also warned other nations not to support or harbor groups with al-Qaida ties.

In a speech designed to revive flagging public support for the war in Iraq, Bush said Islamic radicals are using that nation as a base for attacks. Such radicals are being sheltered by "allies of convenience like Syria and Iran," Bush declared in a speech before the National Endowment for Democracy.

Polls show declining American support for the war that has thus far claimed more than 1,940 members of the U.S. military. Bush's policy faces a crucial test in Iraq's Oct. 15 referendum on a new constitution, a vote that Bush has said terrorists will try to derail.

In remarks clearly aimed at those seeking a withdrawal of U.S. troops, Bush said: "There's always a temptation in the middle of a long struggle to seek the quiet life, to escape the duties and problems of the world and to hope the enemy grows weary of fanaticism and tired of murder.

"We will keep our nerve, and we will win that victory," he said.

Asked about the president's singling out of Iran and Syria as "allies of convenience," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "They continue to move in the wrong direction."

AP PHOTO

Amid flagging support for the war in Iraq, President Bush said Islamic radicals are using that nation as a base for attacks and that the United States can't afford to retreat.

Likewise, British Prime Minister Tony Blair said in London that explosive devices that have killed U.S.-led troops were similar to those used by the Iranian-linked militant group Hezbollah.

"There is no justification for Iran or any other country interfering in Iraq," Blair said at a news conference with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani.

Iran's ambassador in London, Seyed Mohammad Hossein Adeli, said the charges were not supported by evidence, adding, "We are against any kind of action which might jeopardize or destroy the stabilization process of Iraq."

At the White House, McClellan was asked about Bush's reference to 10 foiled terror attacks, including three in the United States. He said some of the information the president based his remarks on remains classified.

McClellan mentioned the conviction of Iyman Faris, a Columbus, Ohio, truck driver who authorities said plotted attacks on the Brooklyn Bridge and a central Ohio shopping mall. Administration officials have previously claimed success in breaking up terror cells in New York, Oregon, Virginia and Florida.

He also mentioned Jose Padilla, a former Chicago gang member who converted to Islam and allegedly plotted with top al-Qaida commanders to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a U.S. city. Padilla, whose plot never materialized, was designated an enemy combatant by Bush and is being held without criminal charge at a Navy brig in South Carolina.

"We have been successful in disrupting certain plots. Some have been made public or are in the public domain, like Richard Reid," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told reporters. "Others are classified."

Shoe-bomber Richard Reid is serving a life sentence after a failed attempt to blow up an American Airlines flight in 2001.

Democrats challenged Bush's arguments on the Iraq mission. "The president went into Iraq under a false premise, without a plan, and has totally mismanaged our involvement," said House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California. "Now he is trying to justify his actions with a series of excuses."

Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts said Bush "continues to invent a false link between the war in Iraq and the tragedy of Sept. 11." Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., said Bush "has offered America a false choice, between resolve and retreat."

Bush said Islamic extremists hope to use "the vacuum created by an American retreat" to gain control of Iraq and use it as a base for launching attacks against other countries.

"The murderous ideology of the Islamic radicals is the great challenge of our new century," he said. "Like the ideology of communism, our new enemy teaches that innocent individuals can be sacrificed to serve a political vision."

"The militants believe that controlling one country will rally the Muslim masses, enabling them to overthrow all moderate governments in the region, and establish a radical Islamic empire that spans from Spain to Indonesia," Bush asserted.

"Against such an enemy, there's only one effective response: We never back down, never give in and never accept anything less than complete victory," Bush declared.

Countering claims that the U.S. military presence in Iraq is fueling radicalism, Bush noted that American troops were not there on Sept. 11, 2001. He said Russia did not support the military action in Iraq, yet a terrorist attack in Beslan, Russia, left more than 300 schoolchildren dead in 2004.

Man charged with passing secrets from White House

FBI analyst allegedly gave him information

By Mark Sherman
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — A former police official in the Philippines was indicted Thursday on charges of passing classified information from an FBI analyst to current and former officials in that country.

The FBI is investigating whether the analyst, a former Marine, also provided classified information taken from the White House when he worked in the vice president's office, government officials said.

Federal prosecutors in Newark, N.J., did not seek an indictment against the analyst, Leandro Aragoncillo, 46, because he is negotiating a plea, according court records.

His alleged go-between, Michael Ray Aquino, 39, of Queens, N.Y., was charged with conspiracy and acting as an unregistered foreign agent.

The charges mirror those filed in September, when Aquino and Aragoncillo were arrested. Both have been jailed in federal custody in New Jersey since their arrests.

Aquino attorney Mark Berman said his client, a former deputy director of the Philippines National Police, rejected a plea deal.

"There's a fundamental difference between Aragoncillo and Aquino," Berman said. "Aquino is not an FBI agent and had no reason to know that the information the government laid out in the indictment was classified."

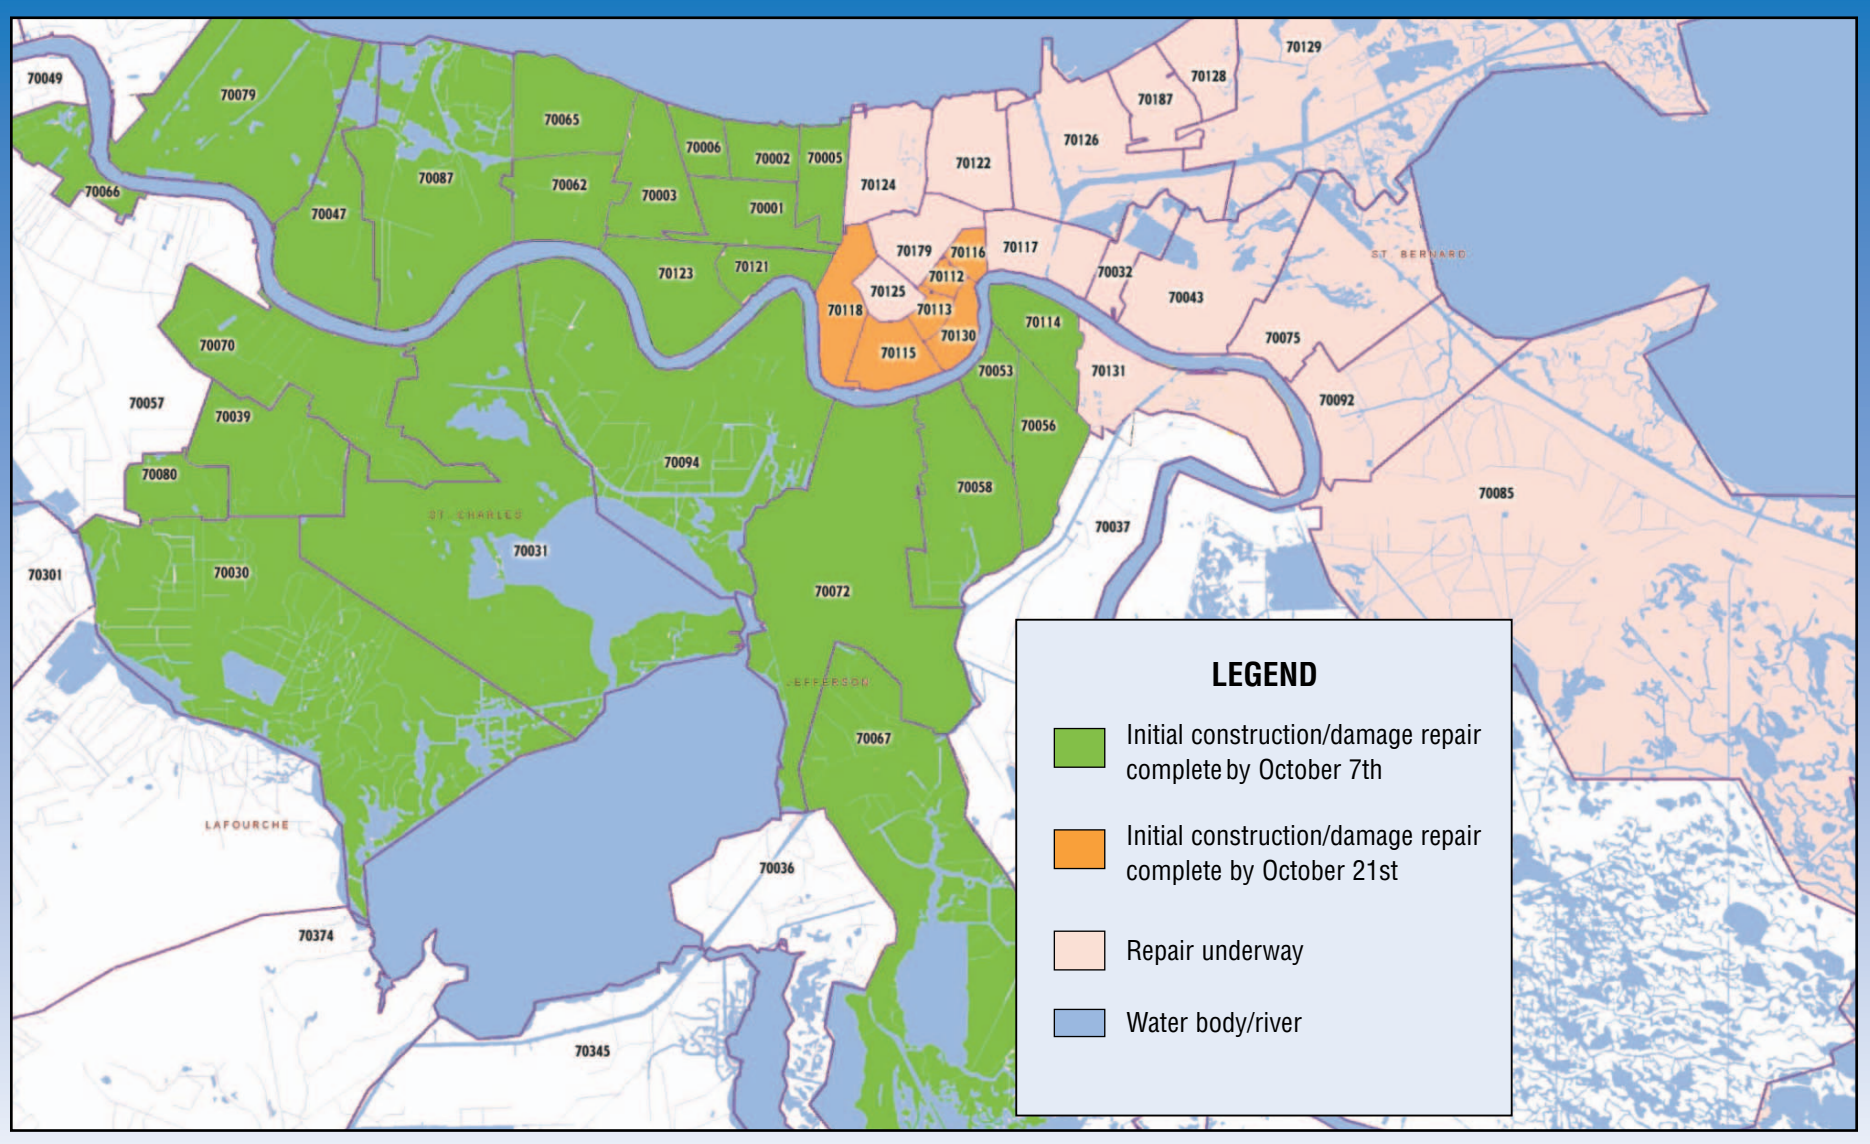
Filipino Justice Secretary Raul Gonzales said the criminal complaint against Aragoncillo suggests the information could have been intended to destabilize the government in the Philippines.

Aragoncillo worked at the White House from 1999 to 2001 and was assigned to the vice president's office under both Al Gore and Dick Cheney.

White House officials said Wednesday they were aware of the investigation but would provide no details.

"It is an ongoing investigation, and as such all questions should be directed to the FBI," White House press secretary Scott McClellan said. "We are cooperating fully with the investigation."

McClellan declined Thursday to discuss the investigation or Aragoncillo's specific duties while he worked in the offices of Gore and Cheney. "We're not going to have anything further on it," he said.



Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department would not comment on an ongoing investigation, first reported Wednesday by ABC News.

A law enforcement official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the case, said investigators were examining all of Aragoncillo's postings in which he had access to classified information, including the White House.

Aragoncillo was hired to work at the Army's Fort Monmouth, N.J., in July 2004 and began sending classified information and documents in January, according to an FBI complaint made public last month. The documents' contents have not been made public.

Aragoncillo's public defender, Chester Keller, declined to say whether his client was cooperating with investigators.

heartbreaking homecoming

Home sweet home. There's no place like home. Most clichés about home ownership are heartwarming. But that's not the experience of untold thousands of New Orleanians now, and certainly not for Jamilah and Damien Pelrean. They had their Crowder Boulevard house built for them two years ago and lavished care on its details. This week the Pelreans returned to find little left of worth. They may get to the point many others have, in which the only phrase that rings true is: You can't go home again.

400 families to live at site in Baker

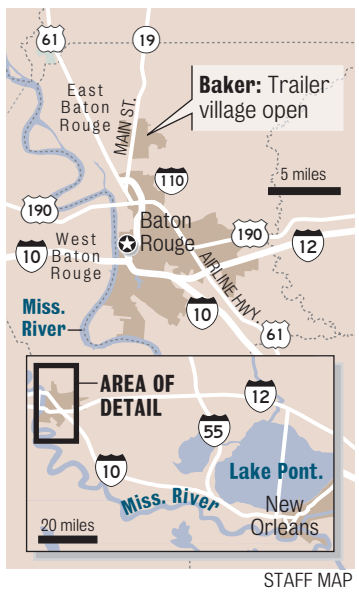
life began with a four-day stay at the Superdome.

A gymnasium in Ft. Worth, Texas, later would provide the roof over her head. Then came a short stay at a friend's house in Gilmer, Texas. That was followed by two weeks at the River Center shelter in Baton Rouge – until the big day when an American Red Cross worker told Evans she was leaving.



"I smiled, hugged her and said, 'For real?' " said Evans as she settled into her furnished Puma trailer with central air conditioning, heat, a combination shower and tub and a space that combines a living room, dining room and kitchen, complete with oven, microwave, refrigerator and freezer.

Mixed in with the Puma are Jay Flights, Springdales, Nomads, Cougars, Dutchmen, Outbacks, Cruisers, Tundras, Salems and Coachmen – 573 trailers in all, compliments of FEMA. The treeless expanse off Groom Road in Baker has been developed like a small suburb, said James McIntyre, a spokesman for the agency, which hired private workers to install utilities and build roads. The site, with its own streetlights, is enclosed with a tall chain-link fence and has security guards posted at its entrances.

"It's the largest trailer park we've built in Louisiana," McIntyre said.

A site under construction in Slidell, scheduled to open later this month, will have about 125 trailers, he said. And trailers have been set up in a collection of parks in Louisiana.

The agency has 1,500 trailers available in the state, but only 686 have families in them, McIntyre said.

STAFF MAP

Displaced residents such as Evans can stay in a trailer at least 18 months, he said.

And that suits Evans just fine.

"I always wanted a mobile home, and the Lord has blessed me with one," said Evans, who smiled broadly as she pointed to the home's amenities. "I love it."

Evans, who lived in the 7th Ward before moving to the Lafitte public housing complex less than a year ago, boasted about the "brand-new" smell of her Puma and how clean everything is.

"I smoke like a choo-choo train, but I'm not going to smoke in here," Evans said. "I want it to always smell this way."

She said the combined living room, dining room and kitchen is her favorite, noting that it allows her to do pretty much everything in one place. The bedroom by the front door ranks second. On Thursday, nearly everything she owns was scattered on top of her bed in clear plastic bags: clothes, shoes, towels, linens, pillows and a stuffed Tweety Bird, a gift from a nurse at the River Center shelter.

'I don't have to take showers with other women anymore. I don't have to flush a toilet somebody left something in before I use it. I can sleep when I want to,' Evans said about her new home.

"I'm so happy, I can cry," said Evans, who did.

She said she'd be comfortable living in the Puma forever and added that she doesn't intend to make an effort to get to know her neighbors for a while.

"I want to enjoy my peace and quiet," said Evans.

It's a sentiment embraced by Craig McDaniel, 46, of Algiers.

McDaniel, who lived in Huntlee Village in Algiers before ending up at the River Center shelter, rode on the same FEMA bus with Evans to the Baker trailer park.

"The peacefulness, being comfortable – I think it's great," McDaniel said. "Everything seems to be fine.

"I can adapt to this real easy," said McDaniel, who also is a diabetic.

McDaniel and Evans are among 400 families who have been assigned to the 573-unit trailer park, McIntyre said. All of them previously resided at shelters, he said. Most, like Evans and McDaniel, have special health-care needs, he said. Other groups that likely will populate the trailers are the elderly and families with young children. FEMA is trying to determine what, if any, transportation should be provided to the new residents, McIntyre said.

Ken Dyer, president the defense division of the KETA Group, a private company that is managing the trailer park, removal company are sinking toward the edge of ruin.

"You're going to rebuild a city and nothing is going to be here," he said.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco rapped the SBA for approving only a handful of the 1.6 million disaster loan applications filed with the agency in the nearly six weeks since Hurricane Katrina ravaged the area and wrecked the region's economy.

An SBA spokesman said Thursday afternoon that the agency has approved nine business loans in Louisiana related to hurricane damage worth $1.2 million.

"These numbers must change," Blanco told the crowd of nearly 2,000 that filled the room and spilled into the lobby. "If there is any Louisiana business or worker who is able to do the job, they should get those jobs.

"It's our people who have been displaced and are out there struggling, wondering what will happen to them each day," she said.

SBA field operations director Al Judd blamed the slow pace of processing loan applications on two factors: The volume of requests, which already is triple the highest level by the agency following any other disaster, and difficulties sending inspectors to business sites to assess damage and determine the appropriate loan amount.

SBA administrators have talked about ways to speed up the process, such as distributing a portion of the loan before assessing property damage, but no changes have been made thus far.

"We've been having all sorts of discussions on how to tweak the process but they all have their own downsides," Judd said.

The charged atmosphere of the gathering once again laid bare criticisms about the federal government's recovery and reconstruction effort that have circulated for weeks. With much of the region's population still evacuated and workers in critically short supply, many businesses are struggling mightily to reopen their doors, make payroll and keep bill collectors at bay. With little or no cash flowing from customers, many businesses are hoping to get government loans or grants to stay afloat.

The SBA's Disaster Loan Assistance program provides low-interest, long-term loans for up to $1.5 million to businesses of all sizes to cover damage to property, machinery and inventory. The money also may be used to pay bills and operating expenses.

Even with the frustrations, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin told the gathering that the region is on the cusp of a remarkable economic renaissance.

"You are sitting in a city and a region where we will probably spend a minimum of $10 billion a year (in reconstruction money) for the next 10 years," he said. "You are in a position to create wealth not only for yourself but for your children and your children's children."

Still, much of the talk Thursday focused on the difficulties that Louisiana businesses have had tapping into the recovery.

Mike Olivier, state secretary of Economic Development, told the crowd about recent efforts by his office to assemble a group of Louisiana restaurants and caterers to supply as many as 190,000 meals to government contractors who otherwise would be stuck feeding their workers military meals ready to eat, or MREs.

He found enough local businesses to produce about half of the meals, but problems drawing up the contracts with the federal government have scuttled the deal, he said.

"We've got to find a better way. This is simply unacceptable. We're sick of it, dammit," Olivier said.

During a question-and-answer session, eastern New Orleans tow truck operator Walter Coleman said he has tried without success to win work from a California contractor that has been towing hundreds of flooded cars to several sites around the city.

Coleman lost his home and workshop to the flood, but he saved his fleet of 12 tow trucks by driving out of the city in advance of the storm.

When Coleman called the towing contractor, he was told he would be put on a waiting list for work and that no priority was being given to Louisiana companies.

At one of the salvage yards earlier this week, Coleman said, he watched wreckers with license plates from Texas, Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee deliver vehicles.

"I'm out of my home, out of my work, out of everything. And I look around me and see everyone else making money," he said.

For some, clean water is sign to return

WATER, from A-1

said Thursday. "It's something the mayor has been pushing for, because the Sewerage & Water Board testing was showing good signs, but we needed the regulatory agency to sign off on it. We hope it makes it easier for citizens in New Orleans to live in their own homes, for those who still have homes."

Some evacuees, particularly those with kids, said the availability of clean water might be enough to bring them home.

Nicole Frilot, a cashier at an airport gift shop who owns a house in the Carrollton area, has been staying at the River-Center in Baton Rouge with her three children, aged 3, 5 and 11.

Provided her relatives tell her that her home appears habitable, Frilot said, "Yeah, we'll go back," upon hearing about that the water had been certified potable once again.

Business owners who have been trying to make a go of it without clean water also cheered the news.

"It'll make my life less expensive," said Gary Wollerman, owner of the French Quarter barbecue joint Zydeque, which re-opened last Friday. Wollerman has had to wash pots and pans in bottled water - in sinks that hold 60 gallons at a time — and serve canned soft drinks to patrons instead of fountain cokes, he said.

"On the consumer side of it, if you pay a buck fifty, you normally get free refills, but we can't do that with the cans," Wollerman said. "So it's a better deal. Also, in a barbecue restaurant, people expect unlimited sweet and unsweetened tea. And we haven't been able to brew it. So now we can kind of meet guests' expectations."

The state certification was based on a series of tests conducted by the water board over the past five days using state-approved methods. Forty-three samples were tested from sites around the east bank. All samples tested negative for coliform colonies, said Marvin Russell Jr., the water board's water purification superintendent.

The state Office of Public Health - which is charged with enforcing the federal Clean Water Act in Louisiana - signed off on the results, according to chief engineer Doug Vincent.

Since Sept. 12, Russell said, about 350 water samples have been taken from across the city, mostly from fire hydrants. Of those, nine were positive for coliform, with one sample positive for fecal coliform, an indicator of contamination by sewage. All the formerly positive sites have been retested and found to be negative, Russell said, adding that recent national media reports claiming city water was "polluted with sediment, toxins and bacteria" were baseless.

It's been a long road to recovery for the water board. Two days after the storm, the board's water purification plant, on South Claiborne Avenue near the Jefferson Parish line, lost power due to flooding. For more than a week, no water at all could be delivered through city pipes to homeowners and businesses.

When service was restored, the water was deemed unsafe for drinking, cooking and bathing because of massive leaks in the system's 1,600 mile maze of pipes, which resulted in a loss of water pressure and the possibility of impure water seeping into pipes. Some board officials speculated at the time that it could be three months before water quality could be guaranteed.

Since then, water board workers - aided by private contractors, as well as public utility crews from Lafayette and Little Rock, Ark., among other places - have been busy making repairs to the system. Most of the leaks are being detected visually, rather than through testing, Russell said.

A lot of work remains to be done.

Russell said that the east bank system is pumping out about 100 million gallons a day — less than the typical pre-Katrina level of 115 million gallons, but far more than he would expect given the slim population.

Not only are there few customers, the area east of the Industrial Canal has been "valved off," meaning no water at all is being pumped there.

If the system weren't leaking, Russell guessed it might be pumping from 30 to 50 million gallons a day with the current population. But he said it's difficult to form an accurate estimate without knowing how many people are in town.

Despite the persistent leakage, Russell said water pressure in the system is basically normal, at about 60 pounds per square inch.

Though the water is now considered safe, Russell said that residents and business owners should let both hot and cold faucets run for 10 to 15 minutes before drinking it for the first time. He also said residents should allow icemakers to run "a few cycles" before using the ice.

Russell said work will be stepped up in the area east of the Industrial Canal, but he could not estimate when that portion of the system would be activated. Businesses in that part of town are eager for service, he said.

"I had a guy muscling me the other day who has a business out on Michoud Boulevard, wanting to know when he'd have water," Russell said. "It's like a drunk driver crashing into the bayou, and before the car's even been pulled from the water, he's asking the mechanic, 'When will you have it fixed?'"

Criticism not of volunteers, but of bureaucracy

to the crowd of weary people spooling out behind her.

The Red Cross served 1,000 people at the hospital on Saturday, and since Hurricane Katrina struck Aug. 29, the agency has channeled aid to more than half the families hurt by the storm. But no matter how many people it serves, the Red Cross continues to play catch-up with demand.

In the process, one of the country's most familiar and beloved charities has suffered something of a black eye, unusual in the history of the organization that Clara Barton organized 124 years ago. Perhaps not since the terrorist attacks of 2001, when the Red Cross angered donors by diverting money intended for World Trade Center victims to other charitable ventures, has it ignited such a firestorm.

"When people hear about the Red Cross, they think about an organization that is going to be on the front lines," said Havidan Rodriguez, director of the Disaster Research Center at the University of Delaware. "But the Red Cross does not have the resources the government has. It takes time for its pledges to turn into real money.

"Volunteers are working extremely long hours," Rodriguez said. "But problems are emerging, and people are complaining about the lack of adequate response by the Red Cross."

No 'tremendous presence'

In the first days after Katrina passed, it was the Federal Emergency Management Agency that storm victims pilloried for its flatfooted response to the hurricane. Then the victims began calling the Red Cross assistance hotline, only to wait hours before they connected with a live voice.

Suddenly, the Red Cross found itself with a growing contingent of detractors.

The faultfinding spreads beyond the men and women braving the phone lines and bread lines for help. While some local officials have expressed gratitude toward the charity, others have publicly denounced its Katrina deployment as sluggish and inadequate.

"I have seen them giving meals away, but aside from that, I have not seen them having a tremendous presence in giving out the resources they collected nationally," Jefferson Parish Councilman Chris Roberts said. "A lot of residents I have spoken to feel that, in a time of need, they didn't have their act together."

Last week, the Red Cross opened centers in Mandeville, Slidell, Baton Rouge and West Jefferson to distribute debit cards to storm victims, letting them avert the interminable wait on the phone line. But the lines at the relief centers were long, too.

On Sunday, it launched six more centers to distribute food and cleaning supplies to the residents trickling into the east bank of New Orleans. Another financial aid center opened Wednesday in Kenner, again attracting a stampede.

The people marooned from their houses and desperate for cash wonder why the Red Cross, which is in the business of responding to disasters, took almost five weeks to bring financial assistance to the hurricane strike zone.

Residents grumbled that they had difficulty finding out where the distribution centers were located, because the Red Cross did not announce them until the last minute. They relied on reports from police and rumors from neighbors, and many hopscotched from site to site until they landed in the right place.

Roberts, the Jefferson councilman, said having an online site where people could register for assistance would have made the whole process simpler.

"You have people waiting for five or six hours to have a operator come online," Roberts said. "At least FEMA gave people the opportunity to apply over the Internet."

Scramble to open sites

The Red Cross is roughly halfway toward collecting the $2 billion it hopes to raise for hurricane victims, and in spite of the storied delays, its staff says it has succeeded in delivering aid to 700,000 families. Every day, the agency says, it pumps about $35 million to those in need.

Kay Wilkins, chief executive of the Southeast Louisiana chapter, said the Red Cross never planned to open centers where people could obtain financial assistance in person. The phone hotline, which has handled 30,000 calls a day, was supposed to be the vehicle for people to get help. But when the line was overwhelmed, the agency had to scramble to rig up an alternative.

After moving on to the debit-card method, the Red Cross changed its distribution system again this week. Instead of getting cash cards on the spot, customers now must provide an address where the agency can mail a check within three days. The Red Cross says the new method will allow staff to check who has already received assistance, instead of relying on the honor system to prevent double-dipping.

"We did not bargain for having a million people trying to access an 800 number at the same time," Wilkins said.

Wilkins and other Red Cross leaders say they are proud of the effort mounted by volunteers. Indeed, criticism of the agency has not focused on the volunteers but on the ponderous, bureaucratic movement of the Red Cross as a whole.

In the days immediately after the hurricane, some parishes were left virtually alone to feed and care for emergency workers and the residents who had ignored evacuation orders. While Red Cross workers began meeting with parish leaders the weekend after the hurricane, the agency did not have boots on the ground in New Orleans until 10 days after the storm.

32 victims' names released

from New Orleans who died have been identified in Houston by name and hometown. Most of the 167 people confirmed to have died because of the hurricane in south Mississippi have been identified and released to families.

But there was a difference that worked in favor of Harris County, Texas, said Stacey Mitchell, a spokeswoman for the county's Medical Examiners Office: Many of the people who died there were surrounded by family members who could identify them quickly.

In Louisiana, Mitchell said, many people were found in water or discovered after days or weeks in their homes.

Those factors, as well as short staffing, could draw out the task of identifying the bodies to a year, Orleans Parish Coroner Frank Minyard said Thursday.

"We're all trying to do our very best," said Minyard, who said he hitchhiked to Baton Rouge after being rescued from his flooded office because he wanted to be part of the process.

"There have been missteps," he said, "and that's putting it mildly."

He and Dr. Louis Cataldie, the man in charge of identifying the dead, spoke at a news conference Thursday in which the dominant theme was the slowness with which names of victims are being released and the absence of any accompanying information, such as home parish and the cause of death.

There have been about 340 presumptive identifications, Cataldie said, but he is delaying releasing their names until their identities can be confirmed.

"I don't know when you will get that data," said Cataldie, the former East Baton Rouge Parish coroner. "I'm looking at means to increase the rate. ... It's going horribly slowly."

The National Association of Medical Examiners has offered as many as 20 medical examiners who will perform autopsies in two-week shifts.

Some of the bodies from Memorial Medical Center, Lindy Boggs Medical Center and St. Rita's Nursing Home are being regarded as potential evidence in criminal cases, slowing the release of many of those names, Minyard said.

On Thursday, the state Department of Health and Hospitals did release some data: Of 747 victims, 41 percent were African-American and 35 were percent white. Nearly 23 percent could not be identified by race.

They were also broken down by age. Aside from nearly 62 percent whose ages could not be determined, the biggest group, 14 percent, was made up of men and women older than 75.

And many of those, Henry said, are the ones that people are calling his funeral home about.

"There are lots of 80- and 90-year-olds in Lakeview," Henry said. "People don't know if they were evacuated."

Slow response not entirely agency's fault

RED CROSS, from A-16

The Red Cross also delayed moving into Jefferson Parish for more than a week after Katrina because the U.S. Department of Homeland Security advised workers to wait until the National Guard could secure the devastated areas.

"I was a little bit busy to wonder where they were, but in the first three weeks, we were on our own," said Larry Ingargiola, emergency preparedness director in St. Bernard Parish.

Wilkins said the Red Cross moved into heavily damaged areas as early as it could. Sending volunteers in earlier with food and water, when emergency workers were conducting search and rescue missions, would have created a false sense of security among the people the government was trying to truck out. Plus, Wilkins added, the volunteers could have become victims themselves.

"People needed to evacuate the city. That was the message the mayor was sending," Wilkins said. "Our people could have hampered the rescue effort. We were meeting buses of evacuees when they would come to different areas. What the Red Cross does during a national response is feeding and sheltering, and we were positioned well for that."

Response plan troubles

No one is complaining that the agency failed to provide emergency housing. More than five weeks after the hurricane, the Red Cross still is running more than 300 shelters that house 50,000 displaced people. In collaboration with FEMA, it is helping thousands more to pay for hotels.

The complaints began when parish leaders could not find the agency's telltale red-and-white smocks in the days immediately after the storm.

Dave Neal, director of the Center for the Study of Disasters and Extreme Events at Oklahoma State University, says the slow response was not entirely the fault of the Red Cross because its movements are bound up in the overall federal response plan. If the government moves slowly, then the Red Cross will too. At the same time, Neal says, the Red Cross does not have the flexibility to resort to deficit spending, as the federal government does, to speed up its response to an epic disaster such as Hurricane Katrina.

"The Red Cross does a lot of good work, but sometimes they don't get their message out as well as they should," Neal said. "One of biggest misconceptions is that they get money from the federal government. Even though they're part of the national response plan, there might be other parts of the bureaucracy that don't see them as equal.

"Yet the public has expectations they should be right there."

Neal argues that the way the government began planning for disaster relief after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks was not conducive to improving the response of the Red Cross. The government directed money to police officers and firefighters for equipment and training to handle biological agents, for example, instead of harmonizing all the relief agencies.

"We have defined disaster preparedness as giving equipment to emergency responders. But we've been so focused on the first-responder aspect that we haven't stepped back to look at bigger picture of how we manage this," Neal said. "Sure, we give people fancy equipment, but how do we manage and coordinate all this?"

Some observers in the nonprofit community now are questioning whether the Red Cross, which along with the Salvation Army has collected the bulk of post-Katrina charitable donations, should have such a monopoly on providing aid. They say more charitable groups should be brought into the fold, especially as New Orleans moves from relief to rebuilding.

"There is a lesson perhaps to be learned that as the larger public donates money, they should not look just to the Red Cross. There are other nonprofits that provide immediate relief as well as long-term assistance," said James Ferris, director of the Center on Philanthropy and Public Policy at the University of Southern California. "There seems to be an overwhelming bias in the media to encourage people to give to the Red Cross as opposed to other possible providers."

The public gives to the Red Cross in such large numbers that some of the hurricane victims — themselves previous donors — felt a sense of entitlement that aid should be readily available.

"We work for a living. This is where we donate our funds," said Simlin, the Metairie resident who was waiting in line at West Jefferson Medical Center. "This is something you do all your life, and when you're in need, it's hard to get anything."

For its part, the Red Cross offers assurance that it will get aid to all who need it, if only they can be patient. Staff members say beleaguered people should not feel they have to camp overnight at the aid distribution centers to get their share of the available aid.

"We want people to understand that they don't have to go the minute they hear a rumor a site is opening up," said Mary Dooley, a spokeswoman in Baton Rouge. "We are going to be here for weeks to come."

Storm revives school voucher issue

ARCHDIOCESE, from A-1

and St. Bernard schools, apparently all are closed but one, St. Andrew the Apostle in Algiers. In addition, dozens of the church's approximately 70 parishes in Orleans and St. Bernard are still out of business.

Maestri, who serves as both archdiocesan spokesman and Catholic schools superintendent, saved the layoffs disclosure for the end of a wide-ranging news conference otherwise filled with announcements devoted to extraordinary recovery efforts and church offers of hospitality.

The archdiocesan layoffs came two days after the city announced it was letting 3,000 workers go because it cannot make payroll.

The church's announcement demonstrated again how Katrina's economic damage continues to accrue, even as recovery efforts gather momentum.

The archdiocese had asked all its employees to check in with supervisors by Monday. It said it would offer two weeks severance pay and assistance finding new jobs to those it had to lay off.

The church also announced a number of initiatives to help restore New Orleans, including a plan to reopen an elementary school in the French Quarter – perhaps the first attempt since the Aug. 29 storm to welcome children back into New Orleans.

The announcement symbolized a tiny step toward normalcy, "an important time for hope" for the battered city, Maestri said.

Other initiatives the church announced Thursday included:

▶ Plans to offer vacant church land as sites for mobile homes or other temporary housing. Archdiocesan building officials are inventorying church properties to determine their suitability for such uses, Maestri said.

▶ Plans to expand Archbishop Chappell High School in Metairie to a second shift of evening students. Separately, Jesuit High School announced plans to reopen in the late afternoon and evenings at St. Martin Episcopal School in Metairie. Jesuit hopes to return to its Mid-City campus on South Carrollton Avenue in January, said the Rev. Tony McGinn, its president.

The church said it expected on Oct. 17 to open Cathedral Academy, a small French Quarter school educating about 220 children through eighth grade.

City officials, although eager to welcome residents back to begin rebuilding the community and its economy, have also made clear that returning is best suited for families that are mobile, flexible and healthy.

But city officials have told the church they support the plan to open the school, Maestri said. The city's health department has also signed off on the school, he said.

Catholic educators will make a special effort to enroll the children of police and firefighters in the cathedral school, partly because they represent a fixed population that must be served, Maestri said.

The archdiocese will set up reIn addition, the archdiocese has identified nine other relatively undamaged schools that may reopen at some point this year if city services permit, Maestri said.

They are Bishop Perry, Holy Ghost, Holy Rosary, St. Alphonsus, St. Joan of Arc, St. Joseph Central, Leo the Great, St. Peter Claver and St. Stephen.

Maestri asked for patience among parents as schools try to follow archdiocesan policy that tuition will follow displaced students from a closed archdiocesan school to new archdiocesan school.

Promised 90 percent tuition refunds are being delayed in many cases because school enrollment records were destroyed, he said.

He said the system has asked host schools to honor a 45-day waiting period in which they will not demand tuition payments from displaced parents who have not yet received refunds from their old schools.

Maestri also called on state and local education officials to reopen conversations with the church about providing education vouchers to parents to send children to Catholic schools.

For three years, the archdiocese has tried strenuously, but in vain, to lobby the state Legislature to send parents tuition vouchers they might use in private schools.

The effort is strongly opposed by public educators and teacher unions, who fear in part that public schools would be left with depleted resources and the most problematic students.

But the post-storm environment and the subsequent wreckage of private and public education in New Orleans have revolutionized the context of the politically sensitive debate, which must be renewed "without the old divisions," Maestri said.

"I think for the time being we can no longer ask the old questions, such as who's responsible for providing education," he said.

Blessed - "ADJECTIVE: highly favored or fortunate; characterized by happiness and good fortune."

Prior to Hurricane Katrina, "blessed" was an often used word. Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.

Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. # Cervical cancer vaccine 100 percent effective

Findings a result of two-year test

By Linda A. Johnson
AP business writer

An experimental vaccine to prevent the most common forms of cervical cancer proved 100 percent effective in a two-year test on more than 10,000 girls and women, drug maker Merck & Co. says.

Merck is hoping to win Food and Drug Administration approval for the vaccine, Gardasil, and put it on the market as soon as late 2006. It would be the first vaccine to prevent cervical cancer, a disease caused almost exclusively by a highly common sexually transmitted virus called the human papilloma virus, or HPV.

Doctors expect the vaccine to be routinely offered to girls — and boys, too, because they can spread the virus to their partners — before they become sexually active, though the practice is certain to run into opposition from conservatives and religious groups.

"I see this as a phenomenal breakthrough," said Dr. Gloria Bachmann, director of the Women's Health Institute at Robert Wood Johnson Medical School in New Brunswick, N.J.

Worldwide, cervical cancer is one of the most common cancers among women. It kills nearly 300,000 a year, including about 3,700 in the United States. About 20 million Americans have some form of HPV, which in addition to cervical cancer can cause painful genital warts.

The genetically engineered vaccine prevents cervical cancer by blocking infection from the two strains of HPV that cause 70 percent of all cases of the disease.

The study included 10,559 sexually active women ages 16 to 26 in the United States and 12 other countries who were not infected with either of the two virus strains, called HPV 16 and 18. Half got three vaccine doses over six months; half got dummy shots.

Among those still virus-free after the six months, none of those who received the vaccine developed either cervical cancer or precancerous lesions during two years of follow-up, compared with 21 of those who got dummy shots.

"To have 100 percent efficacy is something that you have very rarely," Dr. Eliav Barr, Merck's head of clinical development for the vaccine, said. "We're breaking out the champagne."

The study, which was financed by Merck, will be presented Friday at a meeting of the Infectious Diseases Society of America.

A second analysis showed that after just one dose, the vaccine was 97 percent effective. Barr said the 97 percent rate was more "real world," given that patients sometimes miss or delay follow-up shots.

Barr also noted that a small number of women in the study developed dangerous precancerous lesions caused by HPV types other than 16 and 18.

The immune system clears most HPV infections in a year or two, but several types of HPV can persist, cause cervical cancer or trigger other cancers in the genital area. There is no cure for HPV, but the cancers can be treated and an improved Pap test is catching more cases of cervical cancer before it spreads.

Bachmann said that to fight the disease, students would have to be vaccinated in high school, middle school, even elementary school, before they become sexually active.

Merck, hammered by slumping profits and facing roughly 5,000 lawsuits over its withdrawn painkiller Vioxx, is seeking to beat rival drug maker GlaxoSmithKline to market with the first cervical cancer vaccine.

GlaxoSmithKline still is enrolling patients in final-stage tests to determine whether its vaccine prevents cancer, and does not expect to have initial data until late next year. Spokeswoman Danielle Halstrom said earlier research showed it has a 100 percent success rate in blocking two virus strains, HPV 16 and 18.

The Merck vaccine was also found to reduce infection from two other HPV strains that cause 90 percent of genital warts cases.

Merck is continuing research on Gardasil and will soon report on four years of follow-up on the women in this latest study. The company also will explore whether the vaccine's effectiveness wanes over time. In addition, Merck has been studying Gardasil's effectiveness in boys 9 to 15.

Strange world of life at shelters

In this place, you find chairs and cots, playground equipment and a public school, the laughter of children and the alarming sight of men carrying large automatic rifles.

This place is the River Center, one of the many Baton Rouge area shelters for Hurricane Katrina evacuees.

The sight of heavily armed soldiers walking around and between the rows of cots where people eat, sleep, play and dream is strange and problematic.

"It's devastating. A lot of the kids, they are afraid of the soldiers. It's intimidating," said Albert "Chui" Clark, a shelter resident who lived in the Faubourg Treme before the hurricane.

"Psychologically, it's no different than when they go through the neighborhood and they see an individual pull a gun," Clark said.

Reports exaggerated

In the early days after Hurricane Katrina, with the bandits and looters of New Orleans took center stage, it might as well have seemed to the world that we were a lawless people, incapable of behaving well even under dire circumstances.

Since then, a truer picture has emerged. The number of murders, rapes, shootings and stabbings were grossly exaggerated in the early media reports. Yet it seems this negative image of our city and its people remains embedded in the national mind.

Residents of the River Center are forced to wear plastic wrist bands. While these may assist officials in determining who belongs in the shelter and who does not, it also makes it easy for folks around Baton Rouge to separate "regular" citizens from shelter residents.

"It stigmatizes you,'" Clark said, echoing the sentiments of other shelter residents. "It singles you out as 'one of those people,' one of those people who have been associated with those hoodlums from New Orleans."

Security measure

Shelter authorities contend that they mean no offense.

"The guidelines we are going by are what was sent by Louisiana, Louisiana's request," said Maj. Richard Shackleford of the Kentucky National Guard.

"Louisiana requested our presence from the state of Kentucky and this is what we deployed with, and this is what we keep.

"That decision doesn't come from my level. If they say to us, 'okay, you will not carry that weapon any more,' then that's the order we would follow."

"The wrist band really acts as a security measure and an identification measure for shelter residents," said Julia Ann Easley, a supervisor with the American Red Cross.

"We have heard those concerns and we have recommended to shelter residents that they could get some gauze from our medical clinic and wrap the band in gauze while they are outside. Or they can wear a long sleeve shirt."

Let's see if I have this straight: In addition to losing their homes, their livelihoods, their neighborhoods and their lives as they knew them, it seems shelter residents are now being advised to abandon the age old wisdom that dictates short sleeve shirts in 90 degree heat.

That's a lot to give up.

Pump workers' evacuation angers Jeff residents

Officials ordered them out before Katrina

By Sheila Grissett
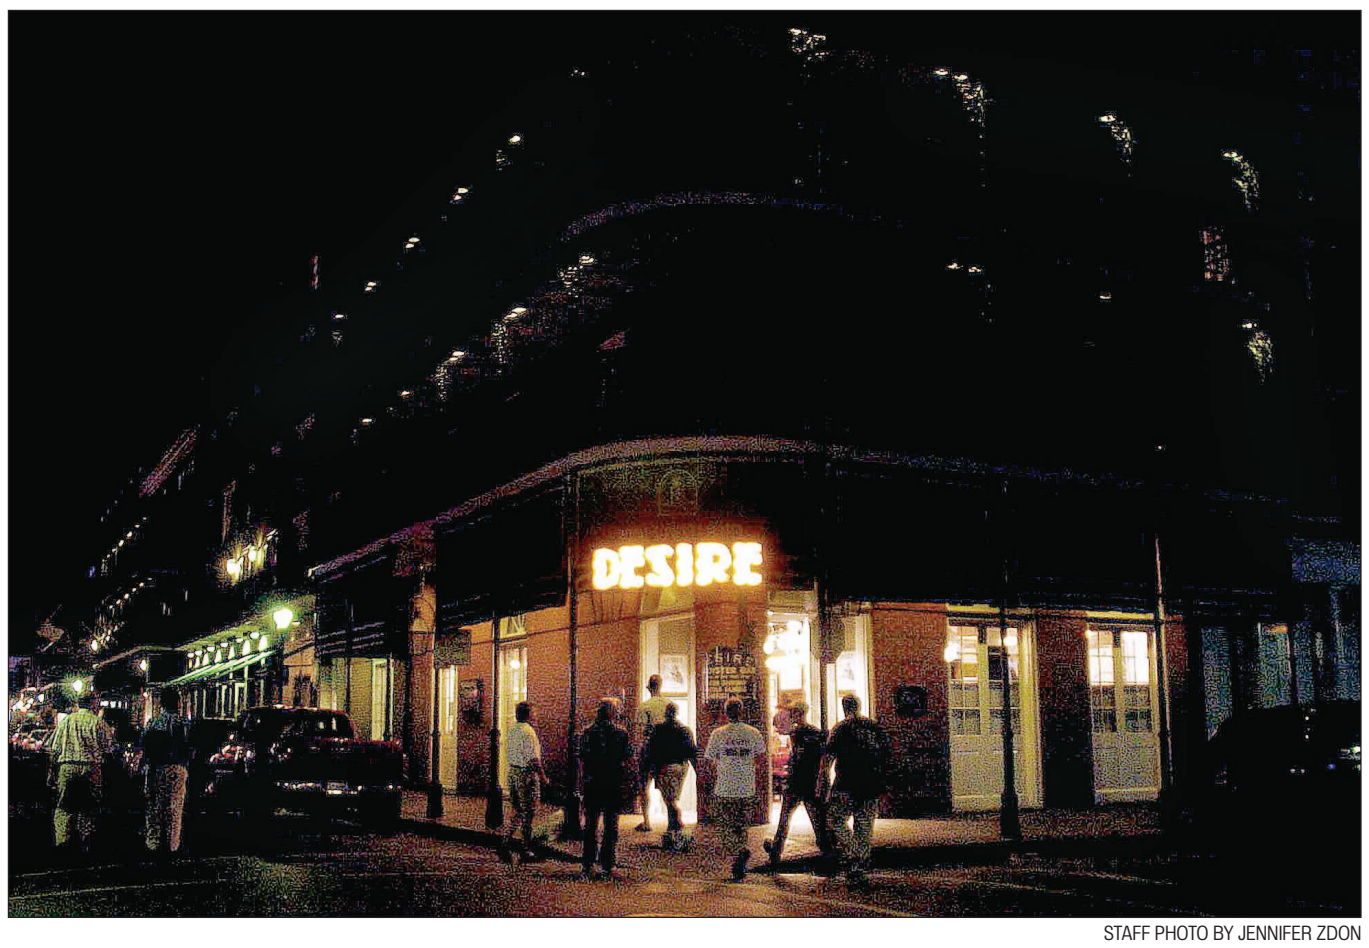
East Jefferson bureau

A sense of outrage and disbelief is growing in Jefferson Parish at the decision by Parish President Aaron Broussard's administration to evacuate drainage pump operators the day before Hurricane Katrina flooded southeast Louisiana on Aug. 29, according to extensive interviews with residents this week.

They are frustrated that they didn't know of the plan beforehand, stunned that the pump operators weren't returned to their posts for more than 24 hours and anxious that parish officials have been slow, in their view, to justify the decision in light of the ensuing destruction.

But mostly they are mad.

"This wasn't an act of God. It was an act of stupidity, and we're the little guys now stuck between the parish and the insurance companies," said Danny Callahan of Metairie. "We are the ones who have to pay for the decisions politicians make.



"Higher insurance rates, deductibles, financial ruin. I don't want any politician deciding what they think is best for me. When he pays the mortgage on my house or takes my place in filing for bankruptcy, then he can make the decisions."

Administration officials say they still are analyzing data on the hurricane and its effects, and that the full implications of the decision won't be known for some time.

But in general, they say Jefferson's drainage systems were never designed to withstand a storm as furious as Katrina, and that the decision to evacuate the pump operators was intended to save the lives of employees who would be unlikely to survive a Category 4 or 5 hurricane in stations built to Category 3 standards at best. Moving the operators to safety, in this case to Washington Parish, ensured they would live to pump out the floodwater quickly after

Curfew now midnight in N.O.'s 'open' areas

Most of the lights were off at the Royal Sonesta on Bourbon Street on Tuesday after 8 p.m., but many people still roamed the French Quarter after curfew. New Orleans police said Thursday that the curfew's start had been rolled back to midnight.

In a move that could bolster commerce by allowing businesses to remain open later, the New Orleans Police Department said late Thursday the nighttime curfew for "open" areas of the city has been pushed back from 8 p.m. to midnight. Streets still will stayed closed until 6 a.m.

Capt. Marlon Defillo, the department's spokesman, said "open" areas of the city include Uptown, the Garden District, the Central Business District and the French Quarter. Other parts of town, including Lakeview, Mid-City, Gentilly and eastern New Orleans would remain under an 8 p.m.-to-6 a.m. curfew, with access to the Lower 9th Ward still completely restricted. Algiers had no curfew, he said.

Algiers charter school plan gets good grades

Financially, it may be the only way to go

By Steve Ritea
Staff writer

A plan to charter all 12 New Orleans public schools in Algiers could be the only way to get them open, School Board Vice President Lourdes Moran said, noting the district's grim financial picture following the storm.

While it's too early to tell what the district's financial future holds, Moran said, it's also possible that more charters could be considered on the city's east bank. "It's a good possibility if we're really concerned about our children and education and rebuilding New Orleans," she said, but emphasized that her plan is focused only on the West Bank.

Meantime, the West Bank chartering plan seeks to have schools open in November and available to returning students all across the city, much the same as a plan by the district. Damage assessments show eight schools on the West Bank can accept students, allowing capacity of up to 7,111, depending on student interest. So far, 1,800 students have said they plan to return, district officials said.

While the district is not broke, Sajan George, the chief operating officer installed in the district by turnaround firm Alvarez & Marsal, said $50 million in bonds the district won state approval to sell before the storm now cannot be issued because the tax revenue backing them has all but disappeared.

NOPD investigation of Cadillac cops may involve brass

Dozens may have fled in 'commandeered' cars

By James Varney and Walt Philbin

Acting New Orleans Police Superintendent Warren Riley said Thursday that as many as 40 officers from the department's 3rd District, including the commanding captain, are "under scrutiny" for possibly bolting the city in the clutch and heading to Baton Rouge in Cadillacs from a New Orleans dealership.

"It is a subject that is under review," Riley said, stopping short of saying he has launched a formal investigation. Asked if Capt. Donald Paisant, who replaced Capt. James Scott as the 3rd District commander, was a part of that review, Riley said, "Certainly the commander of that district is under scrutiny."

Last week, after reports surfaced that the Louisiana attorney general's office was investigating the alleged theft of about 200 cars from Sewell Cadillac Chevrolet, possibly by NOPD officers, Riley revealed his Acting New Orleans Police Superintendent Warren Riley on Thursday repeated his promise to hold police officers accountable if they are found to have fled town in vehicles from a local Cadillac dealership.

Schools may be eligible for federal grant money

CHARTER, from B-1

Before the storm, he warned the board repeatedly that the district would "run out of money by September" if the bonds did not go through.

To open those first few schools on its own, George said, the district is relying on the state to continue paying Orleans the $16 million a month they received based on enrollment before the storm. The federal government also has to approve the district's use of $67 million in project-specific grants for other purposes so it can weather its fiscal crisis, he said.

"I don't know what kind of local monies are going to come into this district," Moran said. "The sales tax is dried up, and I don't know what really happens to the (property) taxes."

The charter movement is primarily motivated, Moran said, by a desire to access part of a $20.9 million federal grant to create new charter schools and expand and repair existing ones. That grant assures that a group of newly chartered schools would be financially stable, Moran said.

Although School Board President Torin Sanders, who has been opposed to charter schools, said it was too early to comment on the plan, he also did not appear to rule it out.

"The whole nature and intent of charters pre-Katrina and post-Katrina may be totally different," he said. "Post-Katrina we have to consider all options."

Moran said interim Superintendent Ora Watson seemed to support the idea when she first pitched it about two weeks ago, but Watson could not be reached for comment Thursday.

Charter schools are independently run by community leaders and free from many laws typically governing public schools, allowing them to establish their own curriculum and set their own schedules. Charters are subject to state accountability standards and laws, however, and each is governed by a board of directors.

Although charter schools typically are not beholden to large labor organizations, Moran said she is willing to work with the United Teachers of New Orleans.

"The teachers union can play a role," she said. "I don't want this to be seen that I'm trying to shut people out."

The current version of her plan calls for the School Board to serve on the charter board overseeing the West Bank schools at first, with members eventually rotating off and being replaced by members of the community in Algiers, Moran said.

The plan needs approval from the School Board or, failing that, approval from the state Board of Elementary and Secondary Education. Moran said she was unsure whether she would be ready to bring the issue up for a vote at today's School Board meeting, scheduled for noon in the New Orleans City Council chambers.

Rep. Jim Tucker, R-Algiers, said a study resolution he and Rep. Jeff Arnold, D-Algiers, passed during the last legislative session in Baton Rouge already had them beginning to put together a group set to explore whether West Bank schools should break off from the New Orleans Public School system. That effort was put on hold, he said, when Moran approached him late last month about her chartering plan.

The idea was pitched to about 20 community, business and religious leaders at a Wednesday meeting in Algiers led by Tucker, since Moran was required to be in Houston for her job.

City Councilwoman Jackie Clarkson, who represents Algiers, said a strong charter school system on the West Bank "could literally set the standard for the way the rest of the system goes."

Algiers resident Eileen Wrigley said she'd likely to see the schools chartered if only so they could be wrested from the control of the School Board. "I have no respect for their ability to run a school system," she said.

The Rev. Arthur Wadsworth, of Mount Pilgrim Fourth Baptist Church, said studies of charter schools' effectiveness offer conflicting information.

"I do think public schools work. Look at St. Tammany. Look at Edna Karr," he said, referring to the high-performing district high school in Algiers. "I'm just saying, 'Be careful. Be very careful.'"

Tucker emphasized that the charter schools would be all-inclusive. "The typical reaction is that charter schools are elitist," he said. "That is not the kind of system anyone is talking about."

Moran also tried to allay fears that students with behavioral problems would be ejected from the charter schools after Oct. 1, when schools typically receive state money based on enrollment. Allegations have cropped up in the past that other charters have done that, she said.

"We keep talking about a clean slate," Moran said. "Well, this is a clean slate. It frees up the schools from all the board policies which contradict each other, which people have not familiarized themselves with over the years, and it gives us an opportunity to implement new programs that are out there."

BESE member Leslie Jacobs said charters might be the best option for the troubled district in the world after Katrina.

"When you have a damaged home, at some point you have to sit back and assess whether it makes more sense to build anew rather than renovate," she said. "If it's two feet of water, you can renovate. If it's eight feet of water, you likely have to rebuild, and this district has been under water for a very long time."

Cleanup picks up steam in St. Tammany

But tax revenue may be disappointing

By Richard Boyd and Charlie Chapple
St. Tammany bureau

St. Tammany Parish's smaller municipalities have reported significant progress in recovering from Hurricane Katrina, but they are warning of possible belt-tightening and budget cuts because of lost sales tax revenue.

"I would estimate that we are about 60 percent in terms of debris removal from the streets, curbs and medians throughout Mandeville," Mayor Eddie Price said. "We have made a second complete pass of every street in the city and will continue until all debris has been removed."

Price said a deal he struck with the owner of the old Prestressed Concrete plant site on Monroe Street two weeks ago has sped up the process of debris removal. Instead of hauling loads of debris to a dump site in Slidell and losing hours in traffic, trucks can now unload at the Monroe Street site. Eventually all debris will be transported to a permanent dump site approved by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Covington Mayor Candace Watkins said Thursday that debris pickup in the city "is going really well," although it will be a long time before work is completed.

So far, contractors working under the supervision of the Army Corps of Engineers have collected about 200,000 cubic yards of debris, Watkins said. The trash, which is being temporarily deposited next to the city maintenance barn at the western end of 27th Avenue, has made a huge pile "about as big as the parish courthouse," she said.

Watkins said she hopes the pickup of "green debris" can be completed in about another month. But she said that she expects more construction debris as residents begin rebuilding and repairing homes and businesses. "It could be as long as a year before everything's picked up," she said.

All of Covington's municipal services are operational.

In Abita Springs, Mayor Louis Fitzmorris said the removal of tree and limb debris is nearly complete and crews are canvassing the town, cutting away mangled and dead limbs, cutting trees on rights-of-way and grinding stumps left behind.

"After that is done, we will then begin the next phase of removal of the debris removed from gutted homes. ... I am guessing that just about all debris of any sort will be removed from the town over the next three weeks," he said.

Debris from trees is deposited into a fire pit in the parking lot of the Abita Springs Recreation Department's baseball fields on Louisiana 36 on Thursday. Small communities in St. Tammany Parish say they are making significant progress in the cleanup of debris left by Hurricane Katrina.

In Madisonville, Mayor Peter Gitz said all trees and limbs that were cut and stacked along streets have been removed. "We still have some debris removed from gutted houses that needs to be hauled away, but I would say that about 90 percent of that has been done," he said.

Pearl River Police Chief Benny Raynor said his town also is rapidly recovering.

"The cleanup crews operated by the Corps of Engineers working through FEMA have made one complete pass of every street in town and the state highways through town, removing trees, limbs and items taken from destroyed and damaged homes. They are making the second complete pass now," he said.

He said the town's services were functioning. "We only lost services a short time after Katrina when we lost power,'' Raynor said. "Overall, we are making a good comeback."

In Folsom, Village Clerk Joyce Core said: "The Army Corps is making great progress in clearing away debris from damaged houses and the limbs and trees. We lost a large number of trees that fell on streets and property."

She said the wastewater treatment plant was out of operation for 24 hours after the village lost electricity when Katrina hit but was up and running on generators. "But all our power is back on, and we have full village services," she said.

Although the situation has improved in the municipalities and businesses have reopened, the economic impact of Katrina has yet to be felt, leaders warned.

"In August we only collected $350,000 in sales tax, about half of what we normally collect — and that was before Katrina," Price said. "Our September figures are going to be a disaster. ...

"We will just have to look at the figures and see where we are, and we may have to make some major budget adjustments to account for lost revenue."

Although Mandeville was slowed by Hurricane Rita, Gitz said business is booming again. Still, he said he expects to see a decline in sales tax revenue for the September collections, which won't be known until later this month.

Fitzmorris said business also is doing well in Abita Springs.

"I think all of my retail businesses in town are up and running, and they are all reporting great increases in customers. I think that is because this parish has at least 100,000 more people in it than before Katrina — and maybe even more.

"I shudder to see the September sales tax collections, because I don't think we will see much. But I am guardedly optimistic that a lot of that loss can be made up by the end of the year in the increased volume for our retail outlets. Maybe some of them would be staying open even longer and serving more customers if they had more employees; they are all looking for workers," he said.

own internal investigations. All told, Riley said 12 officers were under investigation for looting or failing to combat looting in their presence, four officers had been suspended and one had been reassigned.

He acknowledged then that an unspecified number of officers were being looked at for their alleged involvement in the Sewell incident, which took place in the first four days after Katrina ripped through town.

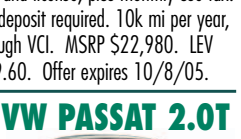
Riley said he was surprised to learn that "at least 40" 3rd District officers were in Baton Rouge after the hurricane. Riley said that at some point after a number of 3rd District teams were rescued from the Louisiana State University Dental School he spoke to clumps of them at the Hampton Inn and Suites on Convention Center Boulevard.

"At that point they were just settling in for the evening," he said. "A day or so later we learned they were in Baton Rouge, and they were immediately ordered to return to the city."

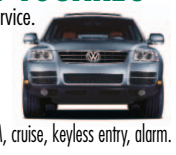
The story about the 3rd District's involvement at Sewell has percolated among the force for weeks and has some captains enraged, but Riley's statement was the first indication it has come to the attention of NOPD's highest circle.

The 3rd District was flooded out of its Moss Street headquarters, and officers had been trapped in the dental school for three days.

Riley said many of the district's cars had been washed out and that evacuating officers from the dental school proved difficult because the water level was 6 feet below the nearest windows. What's more, officers have related tales of living with no food or water for days, and carrying a 300-pound sergeant with a broken ankle up and down flights of stairs.



It remains unclear how many of the cases launched by Riley will be resolved, but he vowed Thursday, as he did when Mayor Ray Nagin appointed him as acting superintendent, to not let officers off the hook.



"The public will clearly see the change on this as time goes on," he said. "Discipline will be one of our top three priorities, along with professionalism and integrity, and we are doing all that we can to get to the bottom of this."

HURRICANE AFTERMATH

'This wasn't an act of God. It was an act of stupidity'

PUMPS, from B-1

Katrina passed, the officials say.

"The damage is done now. Homes are flooded," said Charles Miller, a small business owner and president of the West Jefferson Civic Coalition. "To me, the bigger question is: Is this going to happen again, or do we have a plan to keep it from happening in the event we have another major hurricane in two weeks? We're sitting here vulnerable, and the hurricane season isn't over."

Kenner resident Jackie Madden said the idle pumps are the talk of the town.

"Whether it's the beauty parlor or the bank, this is the topic of conversation, and there is such disbelief that the pumps were turned off while we were flooding," said Madden, former president of the East Jefferson Civic League.

Madden said she understands the desire not to put pump operators in harm's way.

"But I don't understand why they sent them so far? If they had stayed closer, perhaps they could have saved some neighborhoods, if not all of them," she said. "People just don't understand."

'Doomsday' plan

Broussard and Emergency Management Director Walter Maestri have said that pump station operators were among the caravan of public employees and equipment sent across Lake Pontchartrain to shelters north of Interstate 12 during the late afternoon and early evening of Aug. 28. At the time, Katrina was a Category 5 storm, packing 175 mph winds, although it subsided to Category 3 and 125 mph by the time the eye made landfall Aug. 29 about 10 a.m., according to initial reports from the National Hurricane Center.

It was the first time that the administration had implemented its two-year-old

"doomsday" plan, which calls for evacuating even essential personnel if a Category 4 or 5 storm threatens region.

"It was a matter of saving life," Maestri said. "You've got to distinguish life from property, and I don't think a lot of people are doing that. I think we're looking for a boogeyman."

Others say the distinction is not so clear.

"For bedridden people, flooding is a matter of life," said Coleen Perilloux Landry, a longtime community activist and retired Sheriff's Office colonel who helped evacuate nursing homes during Hurricane Andrew in 1992. "For elderly people who become easily confused and frightened, rising water is a matter of life. Who's to say how high water will get, especially when the pumps aren't on to drain it?

"I believe our homes would not have flooded in Hurricane Katrina had the pumps been running at the proper time," Landry said. "Now we have the agony — yes, agony — of trying to meet with insurance adjusters, fighting mold and mildew, and throwing our treasured possessions in a heap on the curb. ... What kind of faith can we have in our public officials to protect us?"

'Very difficult decision'

Parish Council members have not criticized Broussard's decision, but several have said they are discussing alternatives with the administration in hopes of balancing employee safety with the need to operate the multimillion-dollar drainage system.

Councilman Louis Congemi, who has estimated that at least 50 percent of the homes in his district flooded, predicted that parish officials will fast-track plans to build "safe houses" at all 18 major pump stations in order to keep personnel on site during stronger storms. Currently, five safe houses are under construction on the West Bank.

Council Chairman Tom Capella said he won't second-guess the president's decision in Katrina: "Now is not the time for Monday-morning quarterbacking. It's a very difficult balance, a very difficult decision."

But Capella said he's told the administration he's interested in seeing improvements made to the disaster plan.

"We'll sit down with Aaron to see if there's a closer shelter that could possibly house the operators," he said. "If another perfect storm hits us next week, it will be another tough decision that the parish president has to make. But if there's a way to get them closer, I'm sure we will."

Broussard, Maestri and nine other parish officials rode out Katrina in Jefferson's Emergency Operations Center in Marrero, which Maestri has said was constructed to withstand Category 4 winds. Broussard said other key personnel were sent north to shelters so that they would be safe — and available to re-establish parish government — had Katrina shifted a few miles to the west and destroyed West Jefferson.

Some emergency first responders, as well as some council members, rode out the storm in East Jefferson General Hospital in Metairie and West Jefferson Medical Center in Marrero, which also housed medical staff and seriously ill patients. Miller, the Civic Coalition leader, said his father had a leg amputated two days before the storm and spent Katrina in West Jefferson Medical Center.

"Now, if the hospital was safe enough for my dad and all those other people, why wasn't it safe enough for the pump station operators?" he said. "They could have left as soon as the storm was over and gone to work. But if it wasn't safe enough for them, then everyone there should have been evacuated."

Terrytown resident Jeffrey Haupt agreed that the hospitals would have provided close refuge for the pump operators and a quick return to pump stations.

"With no power and no one on there to turn on the standby generators, the suppression systems failed and the lake flowed into the canals," he said. "Hurricane Katrina presented a perfect scenario for back siphoning to be achieved, and the parish leaders allowed it to happen."

Automated pumps?

Callahan said the parish should equip the drainage system for remote-control operation if personnel won't stay on site.

"Whatever that would cost won't compare to the cost of the massive, massive damage done to homes and businesses in Jefferson Parish," said Callahan, an electrical engineer whose home near West Napoleon Avenue flooded.

Debbie Settoon, a former East Jefferson Civic League president and a consulting engineer in the oil and gas industry, said the technology exists to automate the pump system.

"I understand not putting people in harm's way. We evacuate men and women from the Gulf all the time," she said. "But why not instrument the pump stations to operate remotely? We do that every day. We operate platforms with no men on them."

Settoon was in Baton Rouge when she heard the news that pump stations had been evacuated.

"I couldn't believe it," she said. "I just screamed when I heard it, and then I started crying. It was the first time I cried. It was the straw that broke the camel's back, because I knew what it meant."

Curfew's 'for the marauders, not for the businessman'

CURFEW, from B-1

Defillo said he wasn't sure when the curfew hours had been revised.

Officials said they had enacted the curfew to protect residents from crime in the face of a reduced police force and spotty 911 service, as well as from getting hurt in ruined homes and neighborhoods still strewn with debris.

But many residents had routinely ignored the stricter curfew, going about their business as they tried to steer their lives back to a normal routine. Throughout the French Quarter and Central Business District this week, off-duty military and police personnel stayed outdoors well after 8 p.m., and they generally did not bother residents out for a meal or a stroll after curfew.

The same treatment had turned up in recent days in newly resuscitated pockets of Uptown, where the 8 p.m. curfew was increasingly flaunted by neighbors, tavern owners and even police, including many who no longer even acknowledged the cars that pass their posts on St. Charles Avenue and Magazine Street after 8 p.m.

Across Uptown, where just a few homes on every block appeared to be inhabited this week, many returned evacuees spurned the curfew order, saying it was more important to renew their pre-hurricane lifestyles than to follow it to the letter. Some maintained that the curfew simply did not apply to them.

Rene Brunet Jr., proprietor of the single-screen Prytania Theatre, sold tickets Wednesday night to a 7:45 p.m. showing of "Wedding Crashers" and paid no mind to how the film's two-hour run time would be impacted by the imminent lockdown. Brunet said the police had not bothered his establishment — thought to be the city's first movie house to illuminate its silver screen since Katrina — since it opened Monday night.

"This Uptown neighborhood is kind of upper crust," Brunet said. "We don't have the crime. We just don't have the things going on in other parts of the city. So I just don't think they've been enforcing (the curfew)."

Some business owners, however, had been forced to shut down at 8 p.m. At Igor's on St. Charles Avenue near Jackson Avenue, owner Igor Margan said National Guard troops accompanied by a pair of New Orleans police officers entered the bar Tuesday night, demanding that it shutter.

"The curfew is supposed to be for the marauders, not for the businessman who's trying to stay open, to pay taxes to a city that has no businesses paying taxes," Margan said, adding that he did not think that operating after 8 p.m. would tempt burglars to his bar. "I do feel 100 percent safe, especially now since I have the police department coming in to eat because there's no place else to eat."

Defillo declined to comment on spotty enforcement of earlier curfews, adding that residents still would be stopped at checkpoints at Orleans Parish borders and would not be allowed entry during curfew hours.

"I'm not going to second-guess what happened two or three days ago," Defillo said. "A person trying to enter the parish after restricted hours, they will not be allowed access."

The later curfew, however, seemed poised to please many business owners, including Shawn Stallard, a co-owner of Dos Jefes Uptown Cigar Bar, which had been ordering last call at 8 p.m. to stay in line with the strict curfew.

"We're a nighttime business," Stallard said.

New Orleans' restoration to end with statue's fingers, Hughes says

No timetable given for figure's repair

By James Varney
Staff writer

The fingers of Jesus — or at least the two stone versions of them shorn off the left hand of the statue in the garden behind St. Louis Cathedral — will not be restored until New Orleans is, Archbishop Alfred Hughes has decided.

Katrina reduced the serene courtyard in the rear of the church to a maze of shattered timber. An oak and a magnolia, both estimated by church officials to be more than 150 years old, crashed around the statue, which the church lights at night to create a distinctive, giant silhouette on the back wall of the cathedral.

Incredibly, the Jesus statue emerged nearly unscathed, losing only the thumb and index finger from the left hand. In the next few days, French Quarter residents marveled at the statue's brush with obliteration, and some of the faithful began to say Jesus had managed to flick the hurricane just to the east, sparing New Orleans even greater damage than it endured.

That story has gone all the way to Rome, said Monsignor Crosby Kern, who rode out the tempest in the St. Louis rectory, which dates to 1830. "Those old buildings can weather anything," Kern said.

"We have photos from a big storm in 1915 and both of those trees are in it. They weathered that, and they were big trees then. But this was unbelievable, and I saw it and just thought, 'The Lord is taking care of everything.' "

MONSIGNOR CROSBY KERN

In the heat of Katrina, however, the fate of other church assets seemed less certain.

"The wind was howling, and the slates were coming off the roof, just getting ripped off and sailing away, when I heard the crack of the branches," Kern recalled. He watched, astonished, as the trees bent and arced during their collapse, falling all around the statue but failing to hit it.

"We have photos from a big storm in 1915 and both of those trees are in it," he said of the now fallen oak and magnolia. "They weathered that, and they were big trees then. But this was unbelievable, and I saw it and just thought, 'The Lord is taking care of everything.'"

Paratroopers with the 82nd Airborne cleaned up the ziggurat of debris, found the stone digits and presented them to former Archbishop Philip Hannan, who served as a chaplain to the 82nd during World War II.

Like the statue, the famed cathedral suffered relatively minor damage given Katrina's ferocity, Kern said. The roof bore the worst of it, and some holes punched in the steeple allowed water to course into the organ box. But all of that can be repaired, Kern said.

A casualty of another sort was the Rev. Frank Montalbano, a faculty member at Notre Dame Seminary and a well known figure at the cathedral. After riding out the storm in the rectory with Kern, Montalbano, 83, promptly announced his retirement and moved to San Antonio, Texas.

"Well," Kern laughed, "I think he realized, 'maybe I don't have to put up with this anymore.' "

The decision to hold off on restoring the fingers to the statue's damaged hand until the city itself has mended was announced by the archbishop last Sunday, during the first Mass at the New Orleans landmark since Katrina.

Hughes did not say what benchmarks would be the basis of his decision that New Orleans had healed and that it was time for the fingers to be replaced.

Habitat for Humanity builds new program

It seeks to help reshape Gulf Coast

By Valerie Faciane
Staff writer

Paulette Lindsey was at the top of Habitat for Humanity's list for a new home in the Slidell area even before Hurricane Katrina struck. She was living in a trailer, but the damage it sustained from the storm worsened her plight. She and her children had to move in with her sister.

Amid all the recent turmoil, the 39-year-old St. Tammany Parish school custodian never dreamed that her home would come so soon, much less be broadcast on national television as it was assembled in New York and delivered to Slidell.

Last week, trucks towing the exterior and interior walls and roof of her 1,200 square-foot, three-bedroom, one-bath preassembled home arrived on Terrace Avenue in Slidell, along with NBC's "Today" show, elected officials, entertainer Harry Connick Jr., gospel singer Tracy Worth of Chicago, Habitat volunteers and many well-wishers who celebrated the arrival of what would become Lindsey's dream home.

The house was one of several built in Rockefeller Center by volunteers coordinated by Habitat for Humanity International as part of Make a Difference Today, a joint project of Habitat, the "Today" show and Warner Music Group. Habitat homes are also being assembled in Los Angeles and Jackson, Miss.

STAFF PHOTO BY DAVID GRUNFELD

Amy Verinder of the Jackson, Miss., branch of Habitat for Humanity takes measurements for the roof of a home in Slidell on Monday. The frame was built in New York.

Meanwhile, local volunteers with Habitat for Humanity East St. Tammany cleared about 30 trees from the property and poured the foundation for Lindsey's home, all between Sept. 26 and Oct. 1.

Habitat's good works are nothing new in Slidell, but after Katrina, Habitat is even more important in the city, Mayor Ben Morris said.

City trucks delivered dirt that Habitat purchased for the home's foundation, and the city made sure all the permits were in place, said Martin Bruno, director of planning for Slidell.

East St. Tammany Habitat for Humanity President Jim Thomas said he was "surprised and excited" to learn that Slidell would get the first home under the organization's new Operation Home Delivery program, a national effort to help the Gulf Coast rebuild after Katrina. Operation Home Delivery makes preassembled homes available to Habitat affiliates. The homes are built offsite and delivered "so we can get it done very quickly," Thomas said.

Short notice of Lindsey's home delivery forced the volunteers to work at a faster pace than usual, but that didn't bother Scott Richard, who has been a Habitat volunteer for 13 years.

"We're about helping people who need housing," Richard said. He said it's heartening to see so many people around the country interested in helping storm victims.

When workers poured the foundation for the house during the early morning Oct. 1, Debbie Crouch, assistant to the executive director of the East St. Tammany Habitat, was there, along with her son, Jay, his girlfriend, Heidi Gutierrez, and Gutierrez's son, Extor.

Gutierrez called the parents of several of her son's soccer teammates at 8:30 p.m. the night before, and at 5:30 a.m. the next morning, Vince Abbott, Phil Frazier and Wendy Way showed up to help, despite the fact that some of their homes were damaged by the storm as well.

East St. Tammany Habitat Executive Director Nancy Wood said she was amazed at the outpouring of support from people and organizations from all over the country who want to help victims of Katrina. She said the RV-Care-Vanners and students from Georgia and Ohio have signed on to volunteer.

"It's absolutely unbelievable," Wood said. "Our whole affiliate is just in shock."

East St. Tammany will need all the help it can get. Wood said that besides building new homes, Habitat needs volunteers to help repair 20 of the 24 houses it has built that were damaged by the storm.

Wood called the volunteers "the most beautiful dream coming out of a nightmare."

Thomas said East St. Tammany Habitat is scheduled to receive four more preassembled homes in the next couple of weeks. He said the lots will have to be cleared, but the families have already been approved.

"If we can get the support of the community, we can build these four houses and probably 25 more," Thomas said. He said what is needed are places for out-of-town volunteers to stay – such as churches and large buildings.

"For me, it's a dream come true, because I always wanted a safe and comfortable home for me and my children," said Lindsey, a New Orleans native who has lived in Slidell for the past 20 years. Her children, Tiron, 12, and Tonishia, 9, are equally excited.

"I'm just grateful for all the love and help that's going toward building my new home," Lindsey said. "I'm just taking it one day at a time, because it's overwhelming."

Need a tarp for your damaged roof?

The faith-based Operation Blessing is providing blue tarps in Slidell at the former Schwegmann's supermarket site, now America's Furniture Club, off Gause Boulevard and Interstate 10.

The organization also is helping homeowners install them.

Operation Blessing also reported Wednesday that its 18-ton crane and a Christian Contractors Association work crew have arrived in Slidell to help remove tree debris and patch damaged roofs, all for free.

Meanwhile, the Army Corps of Engineers is still providing tarps for homeowners. People can sign up for them at Slidell Memorial Hospital's Founders Medical Building on Robert Boulevard and now at the old Wal-Mart store as well.

In other Hurricane Katrina related news from the Slidell area:

▶ The Federal Emergency Management Agency no longer is handing out ice, water and MREs at the old Wal-Mart store off Gause and I-10. That operation closed late Tuesday.

▶ Feeding locations for hurricane victims are still open throughout Slidell. Among them are First Baptist Church Harvest Church in the John Jay Shopping Center, both on Pontchartain Drive; and Grace Memorial Church on Pearl Acres Street off Gause Boulevard East.

▶ The FEMA Disaster Recovery Center remains open at John Slidell Park on Robert Boulevard near Interstate 12 to help residents apply for disaster aid, including transitional housing or rental assistance. The center is open daily from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Jefferson casino is feeling lucky today

Treasure Chest to reopen Monday

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

Treasure Chest Casino in Kenner, one of Jefferson Parish's largest employers and the source of about $6 million a year for Kenner's coffers, will reopen Monday at noon.

And it can't come too soon for Kenner officials.

"We get a portion of every head that walks on the boat," said Phil Ramon, Kenner's chief of staff. "Nobody has walked on the boat for a while."

While the casino has been closed, it has cost the state about $1.98 million a month and Kenner about $543,031 a month, or $18,101 per day, in tax revenues, said Wade Duty, executive director of the Casino Association of Louisiana.

Kenner receives $2.50 for each passenger entering the casino, as well as 2 percent of net gaming proceeds, with revenues going to both city government and the police department.

Kenner uses Treasure Chest revenue for capital expenses and debt reduction.

"It makes a terrific impact on our budget," said City Councilwoman Jeannie Black said, adding that Kenner receives $5 million to $8 million annually from the boat.

Kenner will receive the entire $6.3 million it budgeted from Treasure Chest for the 2005-06 fiscal year that began in July, because the casino pays based on prior year profits, city Finance Director Duke McConnell said.

Any effect would be felt in next year's capital budget, McConnell said.

"If not made up, it would effect next year's budget," he said. "It could be made up, maybe not."

Duty said chances are slim that lost revenues will be recovered once the casino reopens because the market has shrunk. He said 85 percent of Treasure Chest's business is local.

"The New Orleans market is not what it used to be," he said. "I think it's going to look a lot different from what it used to."

The riverboat didn't receive much physical damage, but the communications systems that ran the casino's 970 slot machines needed to be repaired, said Rob Stillwell, vice president of corporate communications for Boyd Gaming, which owns Treasure Chest.

Open 24 hours a day before Hurricane Katrina, the riverboat will remain open from noon to 2 a.m., but will expand and hope to be at full capacity soon, Stillwell said.

"We'll build from there," Stillwell said.

Not including public agencies, Treasure Chest was one of the 10 biggest employers in Jefferson Parish pre-Katrina, according to the Jefferson Parish Economic Development Commission.

Boyd Gaming, which owns Treasure Chest, has only let go a handful of it 1,031 Treasure Chest employees, those who were asked to return to work, but refused, Stillwell said.

The company never interrupted its paychecks, agreeing shortly after Hurricane Katrina, to pay employees for the next 60 days, including an adjusted tip rate for those qualified positions, Stillwell said.

Son of councilman dies in wreck

By Allen Powell II
River Parishes bureau

A collision between a pickup truck and tractor-trailer on Louisiana 54 on Wednesday night killed the son of St. John the Baptist Parish Councilman Allen St. Pierre, but left the driver of the semi uninjured.

Darren P. St. Pierre, 35, of Garyville, died after his 2001 Chevrolet truck rear-ended a tractor-trailer hauling wastewater to the Garyville wastewater treatment plant, authorities said. According to a news release from State Police, St. Pierre was not wearing a seatbelt at the time of the accident, which happened shortly before 7:30 p.m.

Authorities say the accident occurred while the driver of the tractor-trailer waited to make a left turn from the westbound lane of Louisiana 54. St. Pierre, who was alone in his vehicle, collided with the rear of the truck. He was dead at the scene, authorities said.

According to the release, authorities believe St. Pierre was unaware that the truck had stopped because investigators did not see any skid marks, and it doesn't appear he slowed at all.

While State Police are still investigating the crash, they do not believe alcohol or drugs were a factor.

St. Pierre was married with a young daughter and worked at the Shell refinery in Norco.

Visitation will be held today at 4 to 5 p.m. for family and from 5 to 10 p.m. for friends at the Millet-Guidry Funeral Home, 2806 West Airline Highway in Reserve. Visitation also will be held Saturday from 8 to 9:30 a.m. at the funeral home, followed by a 10 a.m. Mass at St. Hubert's Catholic Church, 176 Anthony F Monica Street in Garyville.

Singer adds voice to relief effort

FeFe Dobson to sing at football game

By John-John Williams IV
River Parishes bureau

Have your song featured in an MTV movie soundtrack: check. Have the WNBA use another song for an advertising campaign: been there. Be featured in a Got Milk? ad: done that. Perform at the East St. John/Hahnville High School football game on Friday night: huh? What was Canadian rock star FeFe Dobson thinking?

Dobson has accomplished a lot in her young career but performing at the football game, while monumental to Louisiana prep sports fans, seems to be off the beaten path.

Dobson was approached about the idea a few weeks ago and immediately agreed to perform.

"Since the whole hurricane I wanted to give something back," the 20-year-old singing sensation said during a phone interview Thursday. "I wanted to get involved."

Dobson will perform the national anthem, sing two songs during halftime and give a 45-minute concert after the game.

Dobson's appearance is part of the Great American Rivalry Series, an event that highlights high school football rivalries across the nation, said Chad Howard, director of events and promotions for iHigh, Inc., the Lexington, Ky., marketing company behind the concept of the series.

In addition to the game and concert, iHigh will present two scholarships to the football player on each team with the highest grade-point average. The American Red Cross will also collect donations for the Hurricane Katrina relief effort throughout the game.

Donations will continue during upcoming games in Louisville, Dallas, and Las Cruces, New Mexico. Howard said iHigh also would donate $1,000 to the American Red Cross during the Louisiana game.

Dobson is a Toronto, Ontario, native whose 2003 self-titled debut album features the hit "Take Me Away."

East St. John High School principal Debra Schum admits she had not heard of Dobson before.

"However, some of my students had heard of her. The song 'Take me Away' jogs the memory," Schum said with a laugh.

Schum said the school has been buzzing with anticipation about the game and Dobson's performance. "They (students) want to know if they can get autographs," Schum said. "It is a pick-me-up."

Organizers expect a large crowd for the game tonight, which starts at 7 p.m. in Joe Keller Stadium in LaPlace. Admission is $6. Seating capacity is 5,000, but Schum said additional bleachers will be added, as well as a standing room only section.

Post-Katrina conditions at N.O. jail draw suit

By Doug Simpson
Associated Press writer

BATON ROUGE - A civil rights group filed court papers on Thursday demanding access to the New Orleans city jail to investigate allegations that the lockup became chaotic after Hurricane Katrina, with inmates abandoned for days, without food or drinking water, with floodwaters up to their chests.

It took three days to evacuate over 6,000 inmates from the lockup after the storm hit on Aug. 29, prison authorities have said. The prisoners are now being held at 38 state and local lockups around Louisiana.

The American Civil Liberties Union's court filings demand information about where each prisoner is locked up. The group also wants the sheriff's office to halt any clean up at the jail because it could destroy evidence that prisoners were left standing in bacteria- and petroleum-laden floodwater.

A spokeswoman for Sheriff Marlin Gusman said in an e-mail that the sheriff had not yet been served with the papers.

The court papers also said many of Gusman's deputies left their posts, creating security risks: "The dwindling security staff, depleted by massive job walk-offs by deputies, was forced to maintain order and improvise an evacuation without sufficient manpower, weapons or vehicles."

Gusman has said "seven or eight" deputies, out of a total security staff of about 650, left their posts.

West Bank struggles to cope with aftermath

Many blame Jeff for flood damage

By Joe Darby
West Bank bureau

They think of themselves as the orphans of Orchid Street, neglected, ignored and forgotten.

Almost six weeks after Hurricane Katrina flooded their Marrero neighborhood, the residents of Orchid Street say the piles of carpet and debris on their street have been untouched, local and federal government has done little for them and, worst of all, they believe their homes would not have taken on water if parish pumping stations had been staffed.

While much of the West Bank emerged relatively unscathed from Katrina, save for downed trees, power lines and other wind damage, Orchid Street, in the Kings Grant subdivision, is just one of several West Jefferson neighborhoods that suffered devastating damage but have received little attention.

"We evacuated to Lafayette and we saw no coverage about our area," resident Ken Chiasson said. "We saw New Orleans was flooded, and Kenner, so I told my wife, if they're not showing anything on the West Bank we must have done well. But when we got home and I saw my house..."

Chiasson and his neighbors are convinced that when Jefferson Parish evacuated its pumping station operators, the parish left them vulnerable.

"If the pumps had been on, we wouldn't have flooded," he said. "Within 24 hours of the flood, the pumps were turned on and I'm told the water just flowed out of here."

Parish spokeswoman Jacquie Bauer said parish officials are trying to assess the question of the unstaffed stations.

Flooding is nothing new to Orchid Street, residents say, as many homes have received water several times over the years.

Wayne Oubre, who has lived on Orchid since 1966, said he got two feet of water in his house. Taxpayer money spent on new drainage canals and pumping stations does no good if the pumps are not on, he said

"The police stayed, the firemen stayed. Why couldn't the pump operators stay?" he asked.

Other West Jefferson neighborhoods also suffered.

Yolanda Hunter, who lives with her husband and two children on Esher Place in Marrero's Westminster subdivision, said her home received more than two feet of water.

"We've paid all this tax money to build pumping stations that were supposed to protect us, but it didn't happen," said Hunter, adding that she doesn't have flood insurance.

"I'm going to stay and rebuild but we're going to make a decision down the line on whether we're going to sell the house or rent it out," she said.

Not far away, the home of Marie Stokes, on Fisk Court in the Lincolnshire subdivision, took a beating. Gaping holes were left in her roof and the living room ceiling collapsed, exposing insulation and rafters, as rainwater poured in. Plus, she said, she had more than two feet of flood water.

Stokes said she applied for a tarp to cover her roof, but as of Thursday, had not received one.

"I want to tear down this house and rebuild, but I'll have to see what my insurance company says," she said.

In any case, she said, she will decorate for Christmas this year. "I have 40,000 Christmas lights and I'm going to do it again this year, whether this house is here or not," she said.

In Harvey, the flood-prone Maplewood subdivision was struck again.

Verna Minor, who lives on Dogwood Street, was busy moving Thursday, a pile of ruined furniture on her front lawn. "I have no idea where we're going, and I've gotten nothing from FEMA, but I can't stay here," she said.

Minor worked at Meadowcrest Hospital, "but now I have no employment, no nothing," she said. "Life is hard, but it will go on and my family has each other."

"The city of New Orleans has no revenue stream coming in. We really are in pretty tight quarters."

MAYOR RAY NAGIN

Hotels get to decide who will get rooms

Feds drop plans for long-term leases

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – At the request of Mayor Ray Nagin, the federal government has dropped its effort to book long-term leases on 10,000 hotel rooms in the New Orleans area for recovery workers and evacuees, instead leaving it up to the hotels to decide who will fill the vacancies.

The change in tactics opens a new chapter in the city's quest to rebuild infrastructure and restock its work force after Hurricane Katrina, while also creating a stronger foothold to revitalize tourism and kick-starting a local tax revenue stream.

Hotel rooms booked by the Federal Emergency Management Agency are not subject to a room tax, a source of money the mayor said the cash-strapped city desperately needs.

The mayor laid off 3,000 city employees Tuesday due to a severe budget crunch.

"The city of New Orleans has no revenue stream coming in," Nagin told a group of state lawmakers at the state Capitol Wednesday. "We really are in pretty tight quarters."

The city had hoped to get a $200 million line of credit to help pay its bills, but the revenue picture was too bleak, Nagin said. He is now negotiating with a major bank for a $50 million line of credit. FEMA pays for specific clean-up projects and overtime for police and other vital workers, but does not pay for the city's basic operating expenses, Nagin said.

Members of the New Orleans hotel industry expressed frustration last month with FEMA's delay in signing contracts for six-month leases on blocks of accommodations totaling 10,000 rooms.

At the time, several hotels were eager to fill their vacant rooms while federal attorneys pored over the FEMA contracts. Among the glitches, some hotels wanted FEMA renovation money, but agency rules prohibit government payments to renovate the commercial buildings.

Even before Nagin's request to FEMA, some of the hotels had simply given up on the government bureaucracy and were pursuing customers on their own.

"We're just moving forward in a free-market environment," said Bill Langkopp, executive director of the Greater New Orleans Hotel and Lodging Association, who supports the mayor's request. "To my knowledge any room that is rentable is being rented."

The New Orleans area currently has about 5,000 hotel rooms, compared with an inventory of about 38,000 rooms before Katrina, Langkopp said. More rooms are becoming available as hotels get back in shape.

Hoteliers that are open said they were housing their own staff and trying to fill demands from companies involved in the recovery and insurance claims adjusters.

FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said the agency considered the mayor's request and decided to agree. Currently, the agency is leasing about 1,250 rooms in the city from Sheraton and another hotel, tax free.

The mayor and Langkopp said they have asked FEMA to find a legal way for the agency to pay the room tax on the agency-leased rooms, but have not heard back.

"You don't talk to FEMA," Langkopp said. "You make a request and you never know if anybody's on the other end."

McIntyre said he was not sure what FEMA's ultimate response to the tax question will be.

In the short term, the rooms would have gone primarily to a variety of people involved in rebuilding or running the city, with or without the FEMA contracts. But in the longer term and as the city's infrastructure started coming to life, FEMA could have begun to bring back evacuees who escaped to other cities and place them in the New Orleans hotel rooms, in keeping with state housing priorities.

Now that the hotels, rather than FEMA and other government officials, are deciding who their customers will be, evacuees returning to New Orleans with little money are unlikely to become tenants. Corporate clients and tourists are more likely to become the priority.

For those private sector customers, the room bills will come with an approximately 13 percent tax plus some fees, as before the storm. Most of that revenue goes to the Superdome Commission and the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, but part goes to the city, the Regional Transit Authority and Orleans schools.

Pre-Katrina, the room tax in New Orleans generated about $91million annually.

FEMA is housing police, emergency and recovery workers in two large Carnival Cruise Lines ships docked on New Orleans wharves on the Mississippi River.

Nagin and FEMA's state housing director Ron Sherman said they are pleased with how the cruise ship accommodations are working out.

As of Tuesday, the Ecstasy had 969 cabins filled and 67 vacant. The Sensation had 968 cabins filled and 52 open.

Jeff schools drop dawn start

Extended day, fewer holidays are options

By Rob Nelson
West Bank Bureau

Swayed by parental outcry, the Jefferson Parish public school system has scrapped plans to start school an hour earlier each morning. Schools Superintendent Diane Roussel said this week she has temporarily suspended the plan, which was to begin Monday and would have had some kids in school at 6:15 a.m., after School Board members told her about the public backlash to the revised calendar, which the board unanimously approved Sept. 29.

Roussel said she will reconvene the district's Calendar Committee to draft several alternatives to the extended morning plan, options the board likely will consider at its meeting Thursday.

Cutting holidays or adding time to the end of the school day are emerging as the likely alternatives, officials said. Still muddying the waters, though, is confusion about how many days the state Department of Education will require students to make up. Earlier reports said the department would excuse a "reasonable number" of missed days, but local officials said the state has provided no concrete answer about Jefferson's 24 missed days.

"I can't get them to say that right now," Roussel said.

In addition, it remains unclear whether instructional time that relocated students have earned in other states can be applied toward Louisiana academic standards, she said.

Some parents have complained that their children have been in a different school system for weeks and shouldn't have to come back to Jefferson and make up a full school year's worth of instruction.

With growing concern over the logistical hurdles and educational soundness of having students in class earlier, officials said it's likely that some holidays will be cut or that extra time could be added to the end of the school day.

"We're taking a step back and looking at (the calendar) again," Roussel said. Board member Gene Katsanis said he has received more calls from parents about the calendar than about any other issue during his 11 years on the board. "I agree with the parents that the start time was way too early," he said, adding that he supports adding an hour to the end of the day.

Under that plan, for example, 4:45 p.m. would be the latest dismissal time in his district, Katsanis said. He predicted the board will ultimately approve a calendar that both adds an hour to students' afternoon as well as slices some holidays.

Under the recently approved calendar, students have off from Nov. 21-25 for Thanksgiving, from Dec. 19 to Jan. 2 for Winter Break, from Feb. 27 to March 1 for Mardi Gras and from April 13 to April 17 for Spring Break. The current calendar also calls for the extra morning hour beginning Monday, with high schools facing the earliest start time at about 6:15 a.m. After a five-week hiatus, students returned to classes Monday on their pre-Katrina schedules to give students and teachers a week to settle back into class.

Roussel conceded that, no matter what calendar eventually passes, it's impossible to please everyone.

"Somebody's not going to be happy," she said. "We're about to make someone angry."

The debate over the calendar mirrors discussion earlier this year when board member Libby Moran requested the system look at later school start times. She argued that students would be more attentive later in the day, which would lead to greater academic success.

Critics cited logistical problems with busing, after-school jobs and extracurricular activities.

A spring survey of about 2,500 students, parents and teachers showed high school students and parents leaning toward a later start time but middle school students and teachers at both levels favoring their current start time.

Currently, high schools start about 7:15 a.m., middle school begin about 7:30 a.m. and elementary schools start about 9 a.m.

Meanwhile, the district is seeing steady growth in its enrollment. Opening day drew a total of 28,749 students, followed by 28,955 Tuesday and 31,003 Wednesday. On Thursday, 30,551 students attended class. The system served about 49,000 students in the days directly before Katrina.

The week before reopening schools, the system conducted five days of registration for students new to the parish or those who relocated within Jefferson. More than 2,600 students signed up, but hundreds more have registered by simply showing up at schools this week, officials said.

With administrators nervous about state funding, which is heavily tied to student enrollment, and teachers and staff fearing layoffs in the suddenly smaller system, Jefferson is keeping a close eye on how many students return.

Hundreds of students from the more devastated parishes of Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes have joined Jefferson schools, fitting with officials' hopes that the district will become an educational refuge for the displaced.

The School Board meets Thursday at noon in the Jefferson Parish Council chambers, 200 Derbigny St., Gretna.

N.O. residents get down to business

Restaurants, stores open their doors

By Bruce Hamilton
Staff writer

Your neighborhood might not have power, but you can make groceries, cut your curls, grab dinner, watch a movie and eat ice cream in New Orleans.

The city's skeletal economy is slowly growing muscle, especially in pockets of Uptown and the French Quarter, where small businesses are up, running - and busy.

Vast swaths of New Orleans were still without electricity Thursday, and commercial activity in those areas is nearly nonexistent. But fine dining, live music and other amenities are helping returning residents feel at home again.

"People are shocked we have fresh product," said Pete DeRosha, manager of the Sav-A-Center grocery store on Tchoupitoulas Street, which opened Wednesday morning.

Workers were restocking the wine shelves, and the smell of fresh bread wafted from the store's bakery.

"I was just looking for a cold drink," customer Nathaniel Sprague said as he waited to check out. "Not only was I surprised, I was thrilled."

The Winn-Dixie in Riverside Market also opened Wednesday, and manager Marla Hubble said the store had everything but its deli operating.

"It just feels good to get back to doing something normal," she said.

Amy Ferguson emerged from the store with a full shopping cart, her grocery bags piled atop a cooler. She pronounced herself "ecstatic."

Ralph Spindola fuels up Thursday at the Shell station on Magazine Street. He said he found the bison head on the side of the road on Jefferson Avenue.

Rudy Bergeron was back behind his elevated chair Tuesday, wielding scissors and a comb as he welcomed back customers to Golden Shears on Magazine Street.

"I usually come here anyway, so he was a sight for sore eyes," said Uptown resident Rene Dupaquier, who was moving back into his office at Crane Builders Inc. when he saw the barbershop was open.

"Having a barbershop open - that's almost as normal as you can get," said Dupaquier, a regular for 18 years. "I'm ready to get back here in a heartbeat."

Bergeron, who owns the shop, said he checked on it Monday and got so many calls he decided to open.

"Everybody's hair is just like mine," he said, brushing his slightly shaggy curls.

Before 1 p.m. on his first day back in business, Bergeron had already given about 15 haircuts; another 27 customers had left because he is the only barber in the shop and they couldn't wait, he said.

"I could have hugged him when I saw him in the window," said Phillip Griffin, a Tulane Medical Center professor.

Next door, Clement Hardware was selling cleanup tools - "Welcome Home" its sign read - and the Shell gas station across the street was filling tanks.

A few blocks away, John Ward set a sandwich board on the sidewalk outside National Art & Hobby.

"I've had one dollar in sales today," he said, but he wasn't complaining. A man who bought his daughter a sketchbook before the hurricane had returned for an eraser.

Ward said he had been open since Sept. 29, and he had $150 in sales one day, thanks to resilient artists. "Everybody is coming in a little," he said.

St. Charles Vision at 624 S. Carrollton in Riverbend was open Wednesday, and assistant manager Theresa Durr was trying to locate glasses that had not been delivered.

At the nearby New Orleans Original Daiquiris, Vice President of Operations Joe Pando drank a Diet Coke and had a sandwich. He said demand for daiquiris is surprisingly strong.

"It's going to be a prosperous time for us," he said, despite damage at several other locations.

Drug stores, especially CVS and Walgreens - have been at the vanguard of the city's reopening, and many restaurants have been stirring back to life.

In the French Quarter, several restaurants have been serving meals with limited menus for several days, among them Angeli's, Red Fish Grill, Bacco and Bourbon House.

Another Quarter landmark, the Port of Call restaurant on Esplanade, was cleared by health inspectors Wednesday, and the owners said they would open in time for Thursday lunch.

Eateries including the Magazine Po-Boy Shop also offered informal fare such as muffuleta and Zapp's potato chips. Uptown resident Wes Wallace said he enjoyed his fried catfish Wednesday.

For dessert, the Creole Creamery at 4924 Prytania Street had rich flavors such as bananas Foster and chocolate amaretto cheesecake. Owner David Bergeron said he opened Sept. 30 with six flavors; he was serving 14 Thursday, along with capuccinos and lattés.

"I'm trying to fill that need," he said. "It's been pretty steady."

If power outages make home life too boring, moviegoers could watch "Wedding Crashers" at the Prytania Theatre, which offered 5:30 and 7:45 p.m. showtimes. Police and military were admitted free.

And there were cocktails and life after dark, despite a curfew.

Drinks and conversation have been flowing nightly at French Quarter bars such as Molly's at the Market, Lafitte's Blacksmith Shop and Touche.

Marquee venues may still be dark, but musicians have been mixing it up along Bourbon Street, from acoustic, Jimmy Buffet cover songs to sidewalk buskers.

And the blues never left. Said one performer last week between songs: "I've been depressed for five weeks."

Wet records put house sales in limbo

Title searches, research come to a dead stop

By Greg Thomas
Real estate writer

Hundreds, perhaps thousands of pending home sales in New Orleans will remain in limbo until at least Oct 18 because critical mortgage, archival and real estate conveyance records that got wet in the basement of the Orleans Parish Civil District court during Hurricane Katrina have been moved to Boston, where they are drying and undergoing a special preservation process. That will prevent research necessary for home-sale transactions to close.

That shattered officials' plans to open a temporary Recorder of Mortgages, Register of Conveyances and Custodian of Notarial Archives offices in Hall A in the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center next week so that abstractors – the specialists who research title, lien, mortgage and other records for lenders, lawyers and Realtors – could process pending real estate sales.

Instead, the three offices will open for filings only, said Custodian of Notarial Archives Steven Bruno and Register of Mortgages Desiree Charbonnet. That means a transaction that closed just before Katrina hit will be able to be recorded. New records, such as construction contracts, which many major contractors will want to have filed as public records to ensure their deal is documented, will be accepted and become public record.

But Charbonnet said she was "sure there are going to be complaints" that full operations will not resume, as she and other officials said last week.

She said she had two major considerations: the health of workers handling the damp books and fear of damaging the books themselves. Some of the wettest books were sent to Chicago for intense restorative work, Bruno said.

It's estimated that there are 12 million pages of documents dating back nearly 250 years from the three agencies.

The main concern, according to Arthur Sterbcow, president of Latter & Blum Realtors Inc., is that no lender is going to release funds on a home or commercial property loan purchase without a complete research of title and mortgage records, holding up "hundreds, just hundreds" of pending sales as residents try to return to New Orleans.

Lenders, according to one real estate attorney, want to research filings at least 36 years back from the date of the purchase agreement for residential properties and 70 years on commercial properties to ensure clear title and that no other encumbrances on the property exist.

In the mortgage office, records have been computerized since 1987. Conveyances, where transfers of property are recorded, were also computerized beginning in 1985. But that's not enough information for abstractors, title insurance companies and mortgage companies to be satisfied to sign off on a transaction.

Mortgage and conveyance records, including leases, liens, military discharge papers, wills, contracts and other documents were kept in the 56-year-old basement of the court building, originally built as a bomb shelter to protect against nuclear attack during the Cold War. Older documents, many of great historical importance, such slave records and deed transfers written in French and Spanish from colonial times, were stored by Bruno at 1340 Poydras St. Those records were endangered when hundreds of windows were blown away by the powerful storm.

The documents had been drying for weeks in 17 refrigerated trucks outside the courthouse by Munters, a Swedish document restoration firm.

Charbonnet and Recorder of Mortgages Gasper Schiro had hoped to have the books removed from the trucks to finish airing them out at the Convention Center in preparation for opening all transaction business Monday.

But Munters said the documents weren't ready, the Convention Center wasn't suitable for finishing the drying process and the use of damp books risked damaging them. Munters opted to truck the records to warehouse space in Dallas.

But it turned out that Munters, working to salvage documents for hundreds of businesses aside from the court records, had no drying space left there, so the 17 trucks went to Boston, where dryers are finishing the process.

"I think we've done' the very best thing we could under the circumstances," Charbonnet said Monday. "I think I made the right call, even though my staff has been reduced to 13 and we'll be using Port-o-lets" because the rest of the Convention Center has not been cleaned.

Now the poor have an opportunity

Re: "Storm victims face misery by design," Oct. 5.

Paul Krugman's column states that the federal government is faltering on two critical issues: by giving permanent Medicaid to poor Katrina victims and offering trailers to the homeless. He criticizes Medicaid waivers for victims so they can get Medicaid in the areas that they have evacuated to. These waivers would entitle victims to services they were entitled to in their home states and no more. What is wrong with that?

Mr. Krugman feels that taxpayers should give all poor evacuees permanent Medicaid, not just waivers. Why? He goes on to say that many of these poor in need of Medicaid are childless adults of working age. If they are of working age and not on Medicaid due to a disability, then why do they need it? They have an excellent opportunity to go to work at a higher wage than before either in New Orleans or other metro areas.

Other articles the same day report signing bonuses offered by fast food outlets of up to $6,000 with a higher hourly wage than offered prior to the hurricane. Why don't some of these jobless people take those jobs with benefits and get off the dole, permanently?

As for Mr. Krugman's condemnation of trailers and his endorsement of rental-vouchers: Has he been here since the hurricanes? Where would one take a voucher to get a rental property? Does he not understand that there are vast parts of the city that are uninhabitable? The rental properties are gone. After the storm, I had no electricity, potable water, etc. I would have given my right arm for a good night's sleep in a cool trailer.

We have depended on the government so long that we have created an entitlement society where young people don't want to work but would rather stand in line for giveaways. It is time to break this cycle.

Spread the poor out (in trailers or wherever we can) and encourage them to apply for a job. They have to start somewhere if they ever expect to rise from poverty. Or just maybe, poverty is the condition where our elected officials want them — so it is easier to bus them to the polls on Election Day.

Many owe us foreign aid

If the U.S. government cannot provide interim funds to keep parish employees on the job, then the parishes should ask for foreign aid. This country has provided money to Israel, Egypt, Indonesia and many others. China, Japan, Taiwan, India and other countries benefit from their sales and services to the United States. We are now in need, and those who have profited from commerce with this country should be ready to provide assistance.

Don't bulldoze

Unfortunately, New Orleans didn't have a Rudy Giuliani for Hurricane Katrina or a Joseph Riley for its aftermath. After Hugo hit Charleston in 1989, Mayor Riley understood the importance of historic preservation and fought to prevent the wholesale demolition of his historic city.

Will New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin show the same leadership and protect New Orleans' architectural legacy? Or will he turn our beloved city over to carpetbaggers: federal bureaucrats, clueless politicians, big developers and insurance companies?

New Orleans is more than a local and state treasure, it is a world monument!

Careful what you ask for

We got exactly what we asked for.

We voted in the government we wanted because they promised tax cuts. They said government is the problem, and that they'd make it so small they could drown it in a bathtub.

Well, we got our tax cuts and our dysfunctional government.

Look who's drowning now.

Families need schools

Re: "Most Orleans schools staying shut," Oct. 4

I respectfully urge the Orleans Parish School Board, interim Superintendent Ora Watson and Alvarez & Marsal to open the viable schools on the east bank of the river. Several schools in Uptown New Orleans remain intact. Children certainly cannot return to the area without approval of the water; however, once this occurs, the school system should amend the New Orleans public school plan to open schools on the east bank. Our children need accessible schools in their general area. Driving to Algiers or enrolling in private school is not a financially viable option during this time.

Many parents and teachers are willing to work to clear up debris and litter to make the areas around the school available for students. Some of us may have our homes intact and our jobs to return to. However, if neighborhood schools are missing, it leaves our infrastructure in peril.

Illegal ads trash streets

With all of the debris caused by Hurricane Katrina piling up along our city streets, the last thing we need is businesses adding to this blight with illegal advertising. Yet I counted 50 illegal signs at one major intersection in St. Tammany Parish. It has been illegal to advertise on public property for decades. Yet an opportunity to make some fast cash off of the storm victims is too great to pass up. The unethical practice continues to snowball to the point where you cannot even read them because there are so many.

Ask your parish or city leaders why they let this continue. Better yet, ask the businesses why they are littering your streets. Ask the local businesses that are not littering and spending thousands of dollars a year to advertise legally how they feel about out-of-state competitors being allowed to break the law.

It should not fall to local citizens to take the law into their own hands, but I have noticed that forests of signs have been regularly removed from the entrances to several subdivisions. But perhaps this is the answer. If the visual blight offends you, remove the sign yourself. Perhaps then these businesses will stop littering your streets.

Displaced and rejected

Helping impoverished hurricane victims get the health care they need shouldn't be a hard sell. But a bipartisan bill that would provide temporary Medicaid coverage to those hit by Katrina and Rita — and help Louisiana, Mississippi and parts of Alabama with the additional cost — is going nowhere in the Senate.

The legislation, sponsored by U.S. Sens. Charles Grassley and Max Baucus, would provide coverage for five months to all storm victims who are below the federal poverty line, including childless adults between the ages of 19 and 64, a group normally excluded by eligibility criteria. It would also cover pregnant women and children whose income is 200 percent above the federal poverty line. Under the bill, the federal government would pay 100 percent of the cost of Medicaid coverage in Louisiana, Mississippi and parts of Alabama until the end of 2006.

That's a reasonable response to this catastrophe that will help victims, the states that have harbored them and hospitals and clinics that have provided care for them. The 6,000 storm victims in Louisiana alone who have been rejected when they sought Medicaid coverage demonstrates the need to temporarily ease eligibility requirements. That's more than half who've applied, and those figures only take into account people living in evacuation shelters and those who've applied for the program at a Medicaid office in Louisiana.

The bill's opponents, including the Bush administration, don't want an expansion of the Medicaid program, nor do they want the federal government to be stuck with the tab — nearly $9 million in the original bill, an amount Sen. Grassley is working to reduce to $6 million. The White House says the legislation could end up benefiting people who were not storm victims, a problem that could easily be addressed by amending the bill. Administration officials also claim that a solution is already available: a Medicaid waiver that gives states permission to loosen the rules.

But a waiver is not much of an answer for Louisiana. It would at least enable people with children whose incomes are below $19,350 for a family of four — the federal poverty line — to get Medicaid coverage for five months. But the state would have to pay 30 percent of the additional cost. That would be tough for a poor state such as Louisiana during normal times. Such an expense now, when the state is reeling from the one-two punch of Katrina and Rita, isn't feasible.

This necessary piece of legislation should not languish. Lawmakers understand that storm victims need food, water and shelter. They should also understand that people need to be able to see a doctor and get medicine if they become ill. In fact, evacuees may be more medically at risk than they were before Katrina turned their lives upside down. New Orleans area residents who went to Charity Hospital for care no longer have that alternative, and it's unclear when or if they will have a public hospital again.

Giving temporary Medicaid coverage to more hurricane victims won't solve all their problems. But it might keep them healthier in the immediate aftermath of the disaster — and put them in a better position to help themselves and their families. Helping Louisiana pay for the cost is also critical to the state's fiscal health.

Any approach to recovery that fails to take people's health care needs into account is by definition inadequate. Louisiana's poor have already endured an inadequate government response to their distress; they shouldn't have to live through another.

Garbage in, garbage out

There are many difficulties inherent to life in the city of New Orleans these days.

Power service is spotty. Phone service is iffy. Shopping is limited to a few drugstores and little else.

Still, parts of the city are coming to life, and Mayor Ray Nagin is urging more residents and businesses to make their way home.

If the city wants to help along the process, it needs to make sure the growing mounds of festering garbage scattered around town are picked up in rapid order. Parts of New Orleans have a strong aroma during the best of times. A fetid scent hangs over the French Quarter after throngs of tourists have had their fun. In the summer, the odor can be particularly pungent.

The rotting remains from homes and businesses in these post-Katrina days make the everyday scent of the French Quarter seem like the aroma of a sweet olive tree.

The spoiled remains of refrigerators are being put out on sidewalks, and some businesses have piles of refuse stacking up. On some stretches of the streets in the French Quarter, the odor is so strong it takes your breath away. Uptown, the parking lot and part of the street next to Zara's Supermarket is scattered with putrid meat and other decaying food. There appears to have been little or no attempt to bag up the garbage or contain its spoilage.

Decaying piles of food are a health hazard, and they are an impediment to the recovery of the city. How is a business owner supposed to lure back customers if his neighbor left a mound of rotting refuse next door? How is a homeowner supposed to clean up and start over if his front yard stinks to high heaven?

Yes, the city is in a financial crisis. And Mayor Ray Nagin's announcement Tuesday of massive layoffs to the city work force complicated the situation. If the city doesn't have the resources to handle garbage collection, the mayor needs to make sure that someone else — the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the National Guard, someone — gets the job done.

One way to make New Orleans a livable city is to pick up the trash.

Media may need anger management

Trucks and motor homes used by news organizations occupy the Canal Street neutral ground in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina on Sept. 11.

TOM ROSENSTIEL AND BILL KOVACH

Much has been made of the surge of emotion among journalists who covered the devastation of Hurricane Katrina and to a lesser degree Hurricane Rita. Jeanne Meserve of CNN broke down. Anderson Cooper, also of CNN, got mad. Shepard Smith of Fox was outraged.

Many have lauded the news media's newfound passion, and some have even wondered whether it might be a welcome sign of a new aggressiveness on their part.

But the praise has by no means been unanimous. "A 100-year journalistic commitment to a dispassionate report of facts seems to be in jeopardy," one well-known Washington journalism educator wrote us. Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour was moved to ask Cooper one night, "Is this an argument or an interview?"

The issue cuts to the heart of what it means to be a journalist at a time when the matter is more in doubt than ever. In a profession that pledges itself to suppress self-interest to ensure its credibility, are emotionalism and outrage ever appropriate? And if so, when do they go too far?

Emotional responses to breaking events have become increasingly common with the new technology that allows instant visual reports from any place on Earth: the World Trade Center, Fallujah, tsunami-stricken villages, a bloody schoolhouse in the Russian town of Beslan, and towns and cities ravaged by Katrina. The pictures provide the stimulus. Anchors, sometimes armed with little more information than viewers have, offer the response.

It would be difficult to argue that emotion from journalists on the scene witnessing such human suffering is always out of place. Journalists are in essence our surrogate observers. It would have been odd, even distressing to most, if reporters had reacted like journalistic robots to the devastation in the Gulf Coast — further proof, press bashers would be quick to suggest, that the media have lost their humanity.

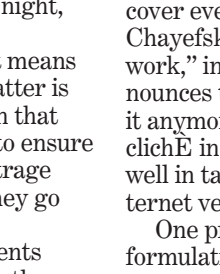
Rejecting that kind of emotional isolationism helped spawn movements such as civic journalism over a decade ago. The goal was to "reconnect" with citizens and present news in terms that made it more relevant to them. Bonding with audiences is also one of the forces that fueled the rise of the new partisan media.

Genuine human emotion drives journalism to higher levels of inquiry and gives journalists spine. Yet clearly there are risks to it. It can quickly descend into manipulative gimmickry, with journalists as professional emoters who cover events to express their outrage. Paddy Chayefsky explored this in the movie "Network," in which anchorman Howard Beale announces that he's fed up and isn't going to take it anymore. The angry everyman is an old clichÉ in the news game, one that is alive and well in talk radio, on cable TV and on new Internet venues.

One problem is that this kind of emotional formulation of the news can distort coverage. You search for stories that play that tune, and avoid those that do not. The emotionalism becomes the news, the brand, the gimmick. Information is deemed too cerebral and insufficiently visual.

The first sensible rule here would seem to be that emotion ought to come at those moments when any other reaction would seem forced or out of place — when it's the only organic response. When anchorman Walter Cronkite wiped his eyes after John F. Kennedy's assassination in 1963 or showed the sense of awe he felt over the space shots a few years later, it struck Americans as appropriate — as did the concern of anchors Tom Brokaw, Peter Jennings and Dan Rather after Sept. 11, 2001. Katrina qualifies. The emotion wasn't a journalistic device. It was simply what it was — a human reaction, difficult to control.

The second rule should be that once journalists have reacted in a human way to what they've seen, they must compose themselves to sort out responsibility for how and why things happened. The search for answers requires all their skepticism, professionalism and intellectual independence.



In a disaster of the magnitude of Katrina, we will continue to mourn what America has lost, and emotion will at times be part of the story. But we are now beginning to identify and learn from the mistakes, and the public will be called on to support or oppose decisions that will be made in its name.

Vested interests, political and otherwise, will supply the outrage and finger-pointing ad nauseam. That is the time when citizens most need journalists to have their wits about them, to apply serious critical and independent thought to questions that will cut through the spin and provide people the information they need to make up their own minds.

Human emotion is at the heart of what makes something news. But if journalists try to manufacture it or use it to bring attention to themselves, they're into something there is already enough of: reality entertainment.

Musicians stick out in square Atlanta

JARVIS DEBERRY

One of the things Jeremi Crump noticed after he arrived in Atlanta was the seeming absence of musicians who support themselves solely with their craft. New Orleans was a place teeming with musicians. Sure, some of them had so-called "day jobs," but a great number of them were devoted entirely to their music.

That ability of those New Orleans musicians to devote themselves entirely to their craft no doubt explains why the music was so good and why so many people — residents and tourists alike — flocked to the city's nightclubs to hear them.

But Atlanta's a different kind of city. More corporate. More nine-to-five-ish. A few months ago I bumped into a friend from New Orleans who told me his grandfather was still under the illusion that New Orleans and Atlanta were competitors. The grandson told the old man that while the two cities may have been neck-and-neck generations ago that the race has long since been completed, and New Orleans was not the victor.

I think my friend's verdict is mostly true. If we measure the two cities on the standard American scorecard, New Orleans just doesn't compare. But the funny thing about those of us who lived in New Orleans was our collective decision to adopt a different scorecard. After all, a city that shuts down completely for Mardi Gras and slows to a crawl during Jazzfest obviously isn't trying to keep pace with richer cities. People who chose to live in New Orleans did so in large part because it was a city so preoccupied with having good times that it wasn't trying to win a race.

That's why musicians flourished. It's also why the 23-year-old Crump, who went to Atlanta with his family members before Hurricane Katrina, was feeling a little out of his element when I recently interviewed him over the phone.

"I haven't been meeting any full-time musicians," he said. "They all have a day job. And (in New Orleans) I didn't have a day job. Everything I had was music-related."

Crump said he played keyboard for several bands in New Orleans including Vivid, Waterseed and Uisdom (pronounced like wisdom). He also taught piano, served as a musician for his church congregation, provided music for New Orleans area stage productions and made presentations to school-age children taking field trips to the Contemporary Arts Center on Camp Street.

When I talked to him on Sept. 28 he had already found some work. "I played one gig for pay so far. It was a very nice jazz gig at a museum. I played three or four other gigs just sitting in to network with other musicians. They give me every reason to believe that they will call me for work in the future." New Orleans percussionist Bill Summers let Crump know about a jam session that was pulling double duty as a relief effort for New Orleans musicians. He was approached afterwards by Atlantans who wanted to know if would be available to teach.

He had already begun when I talked to him.

Outsiders though they are, New Orleans musicians might not find it that difficult to find work. If they're competing against Atlanta locals who have to go home and shower after they knock off from their "real" jobs they'll have a leg up.

"I'm starting to get the impression that (venue owners) are really looking for people who can commit to the times of the gigs because so many of the (Atlantans) have day jobs. A lot of them can't commit to the time or the money." Those from New Orleans, by contrast, are less likely to have excuses about why they can't be at a certain place at a certain time.

Provided, that is, that they don't get lost. Crump told me he was still trying to figure out his way around the city, specifically how to distinguish one Peachtree address from another. Two venues can both be on Peachtree and not even be in the same municipality, he said. New Orleans never kept the locations of its music venues secret. On any night of the week, New Orleanians hungering for good music could head to the French Quarter, Faubourg Marigny, Rampart Street, Magazine Street, Tchoupitoulas Street or any number of other locations and expect to be satisfied.

Crump is a musician, but he doesn't know where people in Atlanta go when they want the same. "I have yet to find any kind of district where I can expect to hear any number of live music venues. I'm having a little trouble finding it."

No school for this board

Education does not always seem the principal concern of school boards, but it can sometimes prove a serious distraction.

Not the way Orleans Parish board President Torin Sanders plays it, however.

There won't be many of those tiresome teachers and students to get in the way until the fall of 2006, according to his plan.

All east bank schools will remain closed, Sanders declared the other day. If it weren't for a handful of schools on the West Bank that were largely unscathed by Katrina, Sanders could slough off the board's academic responsibilities entirely.

Sanders claimed that Mayor Ray Nagin shared his defeatist sentiments, which seemed odd. Nagin has been gung-ho about repopulating the city, and, indeed, has been roundly criticized in some quarters for unseemly haste. Keeping the schools closed hardly seemed the best way to encourage citizens to return.

Sure enough, Nagin said that as soon as water supplies receive a clean bill of health — which, in fact, happened for most of the city the next day — he favored exploring the possibility of reopening east bank schools.

Some of those schools looked as though they had been hit by a hurricane before anyone had heard of Katrina, and Nagin suggested this would be an opportunity for the board to "fix" itself.

A lot of people think the board should go fix itself, of course, but there are bound to be financial constraints. The system was broke before Katrina blew the tax base away, and where the money can be found to educate kids, let alone improve campus conditions, is a poser.

Alvarez & Marsal, the New York whiz kids charged with rooting out the fraud and mismanagement that have plagued public education in New Orleans as long as anyone can remember, do not think this is the time to give up, however.

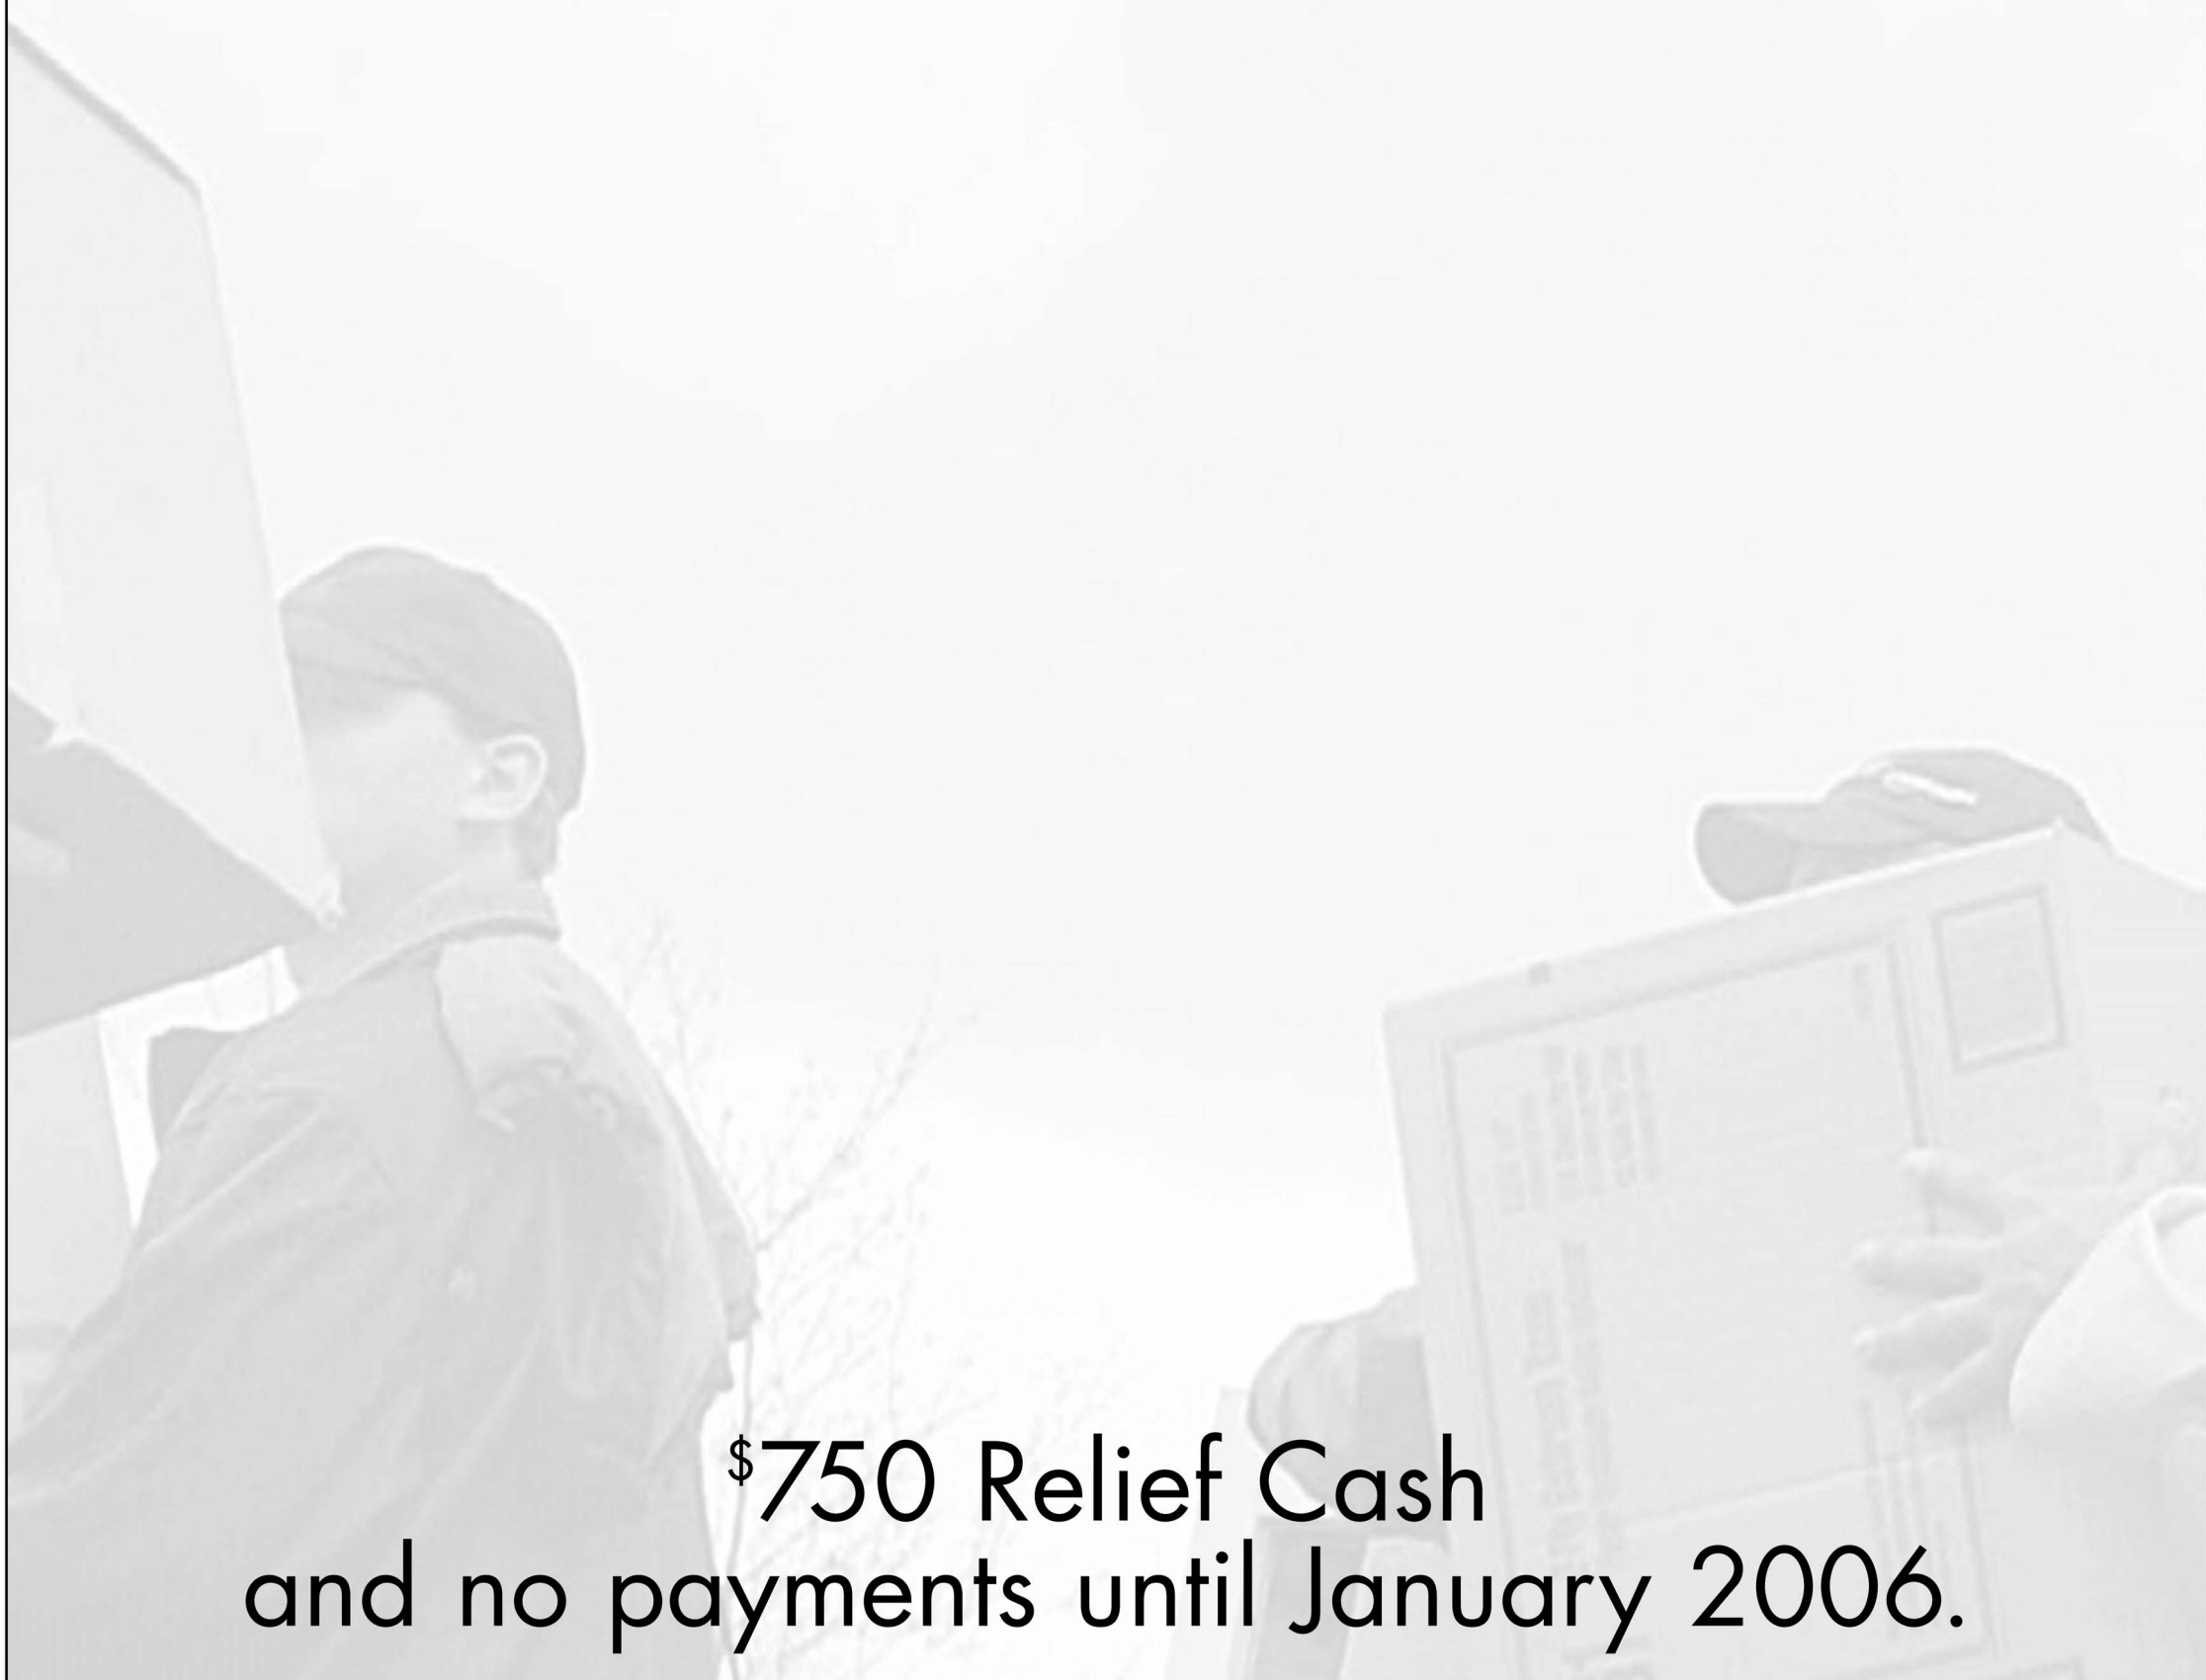
Bill Roberti, head honcho for Alvarez & Marsal in New Orleans, is weighing the possibility of opening some east bank schools in January. That would be jake with State Superintendent of Education Cecil Picard.

School Board Vice President Lourdes Moran is also in favor of the quickest possible reopening. It makes obvious sense, since there is no possibility of any semblance of normal life otherwise. The counsels of despair only make crisis harder to bear.

But there isn't much fight in Sanders and his interim superintendent, Ora Watson. They refused to budge and insisted nothing could be done. Watson suggested Nagin was against opening east bank schools until waste management was up to snuff, but his own pronouncements seemed to indicate he thought that could be achieved.

Watson and Sanders do not seem to grasp that their responsibility is to ensure that education is available, rather than find pretexts to cut it off. As Moran noted, the schools will always be lousy unless we "stop being shortsighted."

Sanders has argued that kids won't get enough classroom time if their schools reopen for the second semester. But students have enrolled in other systems all over the place and might not miss a beat if allowed to return in January. The notion that schools should be shuttered to further the interests of students is, in any case, a quaint one.



Perhaps not so quaint in New Orleans as in some systems, however, for it is unlikely that many evacuated students yearn for the academic rigor they were used to at home. Still, if Alvarez & Marsal are to improve public education in New Orleans, the sooner the schools are up and running the better.

The elite high school Ben Franklin was among those with hopes of reopening in January before Sanders made his announcement, and its board of directors has now unanimously voted to apply for charter status.

Lusher having recently done the same, it seems the city's best schools were concluding that academic excellence requires escaping the dead hand of the School Board before Sanders decided Katrina was a good excuse to close up shop.

ROMULUS, MICH. — South Florida heat prevailed over a city whose last Super Bowl was an icy one.

Miami was awarded the 2010 Super Bowl on Thursday, a record 10th time the city will host the title game and record 15th time it will be in Florida.

"We love our city and we love our area. We think the weather is the best. We think we have the best hotels, the best restaurants, the best beaches and the best golf courses," Dolphins owner Wayne Huizenga said.

Miami, Atlanta and Houston made a final pitch for the marquee event at an NFL owners meeting about 25 miles from Detroit's Ford Field, where the next Super Bowl will be played.

What would Falcons owner Arthur Blank do differently?

"I would take Atlanta and move it to the Caribbean," he joked.

An ice storm and frigid temperatures struck Atlanta in 2000, the last time the game was played at the Georgia Dome.

With New York, which had been conditionally awarded the game, out of the running, the NFL picked from three cities that lost a bid in May for the 2009 game, which went to Tampa, Fla.

OKLAHOMA CITY — On the first day of training camp, former European star Arvydas Macijauskas couldn't avoid drawing the attention of Hornets coach Byron Scott.

On a set play, Scott told Macijauskas to move back to the left side when forward Bostjan Nachbar moved into the post. Instead of moving left, Macijauskas ran inside with Nachbar.

"Right then I knew he didn't know fully what I was saying because of the language barrier," Scott said. "The thing about the language barrier is that most European guys are embarrassed to say, 'I don't understand.' So, they just shake their head and say, yes they got it. You just have to weather the storm. It's a process.

"They're going to get some things and some things they're not going to understand. When they don't understand them, the last person they want to talk to is the coach. But he is a wonderful kid and he works hard and he's got some good skills."

Dickson still 'hanging in there'

For Tulane athletic director Rick Dickson, the odyssey began Sunday morning, Aug. 28, Katrina Minus-1.

It began with a get-out-of-town bus trip to Jackson, Miss., with the football team and soccer team, after which the evacuees spent the night on air mattresses in a gym on the campus of Jackson State. They spent Monday night, once power was lost to hurricane winds, in a gym lit by oil lanterns.

Six weeks later, Dickson could be found in Mobile with the latest news, happy to announce Coach Chris Scelfo's Green Wave would play their Oct. 29 "home" game against Marshall in Ladd Stadium, home of the Senior Bowl.

So let's see what took place in that time frame. Approximately 7,500 of Tulane's undergrad students found their way to some 100 campuses around the country. Meanwhile, 12 of Tulane's varsity teams wound up going to Jeremy McGee's evacuation to Houston for Hurricane Katrina has resulted in him enrolling and playing football at McKinley High in Baton Rouge.

When Jeremy McGee left home with two uncles and a friend on the final weekend in August, he believed that they were headed off on nothing more than a brief excursion to Houston to take advantage of a hurricane holiday.

Nearly five weeks later, the blue-chip running back, who was expected to lead Edna Karr into the state playoffs, finds himself living in Baton Rouge, playing for the winless McKinley Panthers and being asked for something that right now he cannot deliver.

"It's crazy," McGee said. "We thought we were just going on a little trip. We thought we were going to Houston for a couple of days to have some fun. Then we started watching the news."

It was then that McGee realized he needed to find his parents, his dad Alcie and mother Genell, to pick up what few pieces of their lives remained following Hurricane Katrina's devastating strike.

"I would never have separated from my mother if I thought it was going to be a bad storm," McGee said. "She wouldn't have let me go. But none of us thought it was going to hit like this."

McGee said he expects to visit his family's Seventh Ward residence near the Fair Grounds this weekend. It will be his first trip home since evacuating. He has been told there was flooding

SAN ANTONIO — When veteran Pro Bowler Joe Horn missed last Sunday's game with a hamstring injury, there was little doubt that No. 2 receiver Donte Stallworth could step in and pick up the slack.

Stallworth did just that, rebounding from an early dropped ball to catch eight passes for 129 yards in the Saints' 19-7 victory.

But Stallworth, in his fourth season, isn't just able to carry the load on the field. He's grown into a valued team leader in the locker room - a veteran at just 24 years old who provides comic relief and sets the mood with his jovial attitude.

The evolution has been subtle over the past couple years, but Stallworth is no longer a first-round draft choice with something to prove.

Sergio Garcia shot a 67 on Thursday at the American Express Championship and is in a group that trails leader Colin Montgomerie by three shots.

WORLD OF SPORTS

GOLF

MONTGOMERIE TAKES LEAD: Coming off his first victory in 19 months, Colin Montgomerie appears hungry for more. Montgomerie showed no effects from an emotional victory four days ago in Scotland, matching his career-low score in the United States with a 6-under 64 that gave him a three-shot lead Thursday at the American Express Championship in San Francisco. Tiger Woods, Vijay Singh, Sergio Garcia and eight others were at 67 on a spectacular day at Harding Park, the municipal course along Lake Merced that got a $16 million makeover and held its own against the world's best players. It was right up Montgomerie's alley. He looked like the Monty of old with tee shots that split the tree-lined fairways, making the game look simple. The 42-year-old Scot ran off three straight birdies to close out the back nine, then added his lone birdie on the front with a wedge into 18 inches. What mattered more to him was no bogeys on his card. "If I can hit fairways, I can hit greens," he said. "And then I can score." Woods, who played Harding Park in junior high school when it was covered with weeds, stayed close until he stopped giving himself good chances, dropping a shot on the par-3 eighth and having to scramble for par at the end. "If I shot something between 2- and 4-under par, I thought it would be pretty good," Woods said. "They've done a wonderful job tucking the pins. The greens are firm, so you've got to be careful." It was the first test at Harding Park, which had not hosted golf's best players since the late 1960s. The course is considered relatively short at 7,086 yards, although the firm greens with subtle contours kept anyone from going outrageously low. "A muni just means it's owned by the city," Phil Mickelson said after stumbling to a 71. "It doesn't mean it's an easy or hard course." It was plenty easy for Montgomerie. He missed only two greens, and saved par both times with 10-foot putts that kept his momentum going - not only in the opening round, but in a summer that has turned his fortunes around more than he could have imagined. Montgomerie fell as low as No. 83 in the world ranking and failed to qualify for The Players Championship and the Masters in the spring. But as he coped with a divorce last year and controversy over an apparent rules breach in March at the Indonesian Open, he suddenly finds himself headed toward the top. He was runner-up to Woods at the British Open, then returned to St. Andrews to win the Dunhill Links Championship last week with a birdie on the final hole, moving him to No. 16 in the world and within range of an eighth Order of Merit on the European tour. Then came his 64, matching the 7-under 64 he shot at Riviera in the second round of the Nissan Open in February. "Ninety percent of it is carryover from Sunday," he said. "If I finished third or fourth on Sunday, I wouldn't have shot 64 today, simple as that." John Daly was tied with Montgomerie late in the round, carried along by prodigious drives. None fired up the fans more than driving the 350-yard seventh hole as Woods was standing off to the side waiting for the eighth tee to clear. Sadly for Daly, the epoxy on the hosel of his putter gave way late in the round, which contributed to three-putt bogeys on his final two holes for a 67. He was furious as he headed to the trailer to get it fixed. "Ninth time this year," he said. "I am so sick of this."

ROMERO, SKOLD SHARE LEAD: Argentina's Andres Romero and Sweden's Johan Skold shot 5-under 66s to share the first-round lead in the PGA European Tour's Abama Open de Canarias at Tenerife, Canary Islands. Skold three-putted the 18th green for his only bogey of the round. The 24-year-old Romero won the Morson International Pro-Am Challenge on the Challenge Tour in August and is 10th on the developmental circuit's money list. English left-hander Stuart Little was two strokes back along with Scotland's Marc Warren and David Patrick and South Africa's Titch Moore.

BASEBALL

STERNBERG TAKES OVER DEVIL RAYS: New York investor Stuart Sternberg took control of the Tampa Bay Devil Rays from founding owner Vince Naimoli on Thursday, promising better days ahead for a franchise that's finished last in seven of its eight seasons. The first order of business was to fire General Manager Chuck LaMar, who had been with the franchise since its inception. Assistant GM Scott Proefrock and player personnel director Cam Bonifay also were dismissed. "The time has come for dramatic change for this organization," Sternberg said, vowing to make the necessary corrections, on and off the field, to improve the team. Sternberg, who becomes principal owner, appointed Matthew Silverman team president. The moves follow the departure of Manager Lou Piniella, who sought a buyout with one season remaining on his contract after criticizing the ownership group led by Sternberg for being more concerned about the future than trying to win now. The ouster of Naimoli, who retains 15 percent ownership and becomes chairman, and LaMar had been expected for weeks. Sternberg did not announce a timetable for hiring a new manager and general manager. "The timing is not as important as getting the right people," Sternberg said. The Devil Rays began the 2005 season with a payroll of just over $29 million. After a horrible first half, the team went 39-34 after the All-Star break with a young lineup that figures to get better with more experience. Sternberg said the payroll will increase, but would not speculate on how much. "There are teams that spend quite a bit of money and don't have much success," he said. "There are teams that spend a bit less and have a lot of success. We just want to have success."

BUTERA TO ASSIST GM: The Toronto Blue Jays appointed Sal Butera to the position of special assistant to the general manager. Butera has scouted for the Blue Jays for the past 10 years, and spent the past two seasons as a major league scout. The former catcher played parts of nine seasons in the majors with Minnesota, Detroit, Montreal and Toronto. He will report to general manager J.P. Ricciardi.

TENNIS

CLIJSTERS CLOSER TO NO. 1: U.S. Open champion Kim Clijsters closed in on the top ranking, beating Croatia's Karolina Sprem 6-3, 6-2 to reach the quarterfinals at the Porsche Grand Prix at Filderstadt, Germany. The Belgian can become No. 1 by winning this tournament a third time. If Clijsters meets third-seeded Amelie Mauresmo in Saturday's semifinals, she could unseat injured Maria Sharapova. Mauresmo advanced when Jelena Jankovic retired with a virus after dropping the first set 6-0. Clijsters next faces fifth-seeded Elena Dementieva, who won 5-7, 6-3, 6-4 against France's Nathalie Dechy. Also, Nadia Petrova beat Elena Likhovtseva 6-1, 6-1. Clijsters wasted three match points before Sprem netted a forehand return. Sprem fought off three set points while trading power shots with the Belgian before tiring. "It was a harder match than the score indicated," said Clijsters, seeded second behind Lindsay Davenport. "I felt quite good. I did what I had to do."

FIGURE SKATING

KWAN HAS INJURY: Michelle Kwan strained a ligament in her right hip and withdrew from Skate America, the first Grand Prix event of the season, and this weekend's Campbell's International Figure Skating Classic. The nine-time U.S. champion hopes to be healthy for the Cup of China, Nov. 2-6 in Beijing. "Of course I'm very disappointed, but I see this as a temporary setback," Kwan said. "I intend to follow the doctor's orders, get well and be back competing as soon as possible." Kwan will take two weeks off from training, then gradually resume skating. Rehab could take up to a month. "This is a very painful injury, but with the prescribed rest and treatment I anticipate a full and complete recovery," said Dr. Leisure Yu, the orthopedic surgeon treating Kwan. The 25-year-old Kwan said she will try to make her third Olympic team. She already has Olympic silver and bronze medals, and is a five-time world champion. She'll be replaced at Skate America by Emily Hughes, the bronze medalist at last year's junior world championships and sister of Olympic champion Sarah Hughes. Alissa Czisny will fill Kwan's spot at the Campbell's Classic, which is Saturday in St. Paul, Minn.

'Birdman' not sold on NBA's wardrobe ruling

Point guard Bell showing promise

By John Reid
Staff writer

OKLAHOMA CITY — Chris "Birdman" Andersen isn't pleased about the possibility that he may have to buy a new wardrobe for this season.

That's because NBA commissioner David Stern is expected to institute a new dress code, making it mandatory for players to dress in casual business attire - a sport coat and slacks — for all team-related functions, including travel on charter flights.

"I can understand if the league said we could mix and match, like wearing a collared shirt with a sport coat and blue jeans," Andersen said. "Our character is that certain people have their own certain styles. They should put a rule in there where we can be casual, but not like I'm going to the office to be a lawyer."

But Andersen said he would abide by the rule. So will veteran forward P.J. Brown, but he isn't happy about it either.

"I think guys shouldn't be looking all sloppy on the bench with jeans," Brown said. "But trying to control what we wear on the road is not good. Sometimes we travel late, coming in at 3 in the morning. You want to be comfortable, and I don't want to be in a suit."

Point guard Speedy Claxton said a player's character isn't going to change because he's forced to wear a suit.

"I was on one of the best character teams in the NBA when I played for the San Antonio Spurs and we wore whatever we wanted to the game," Claxton said.

HUMP DAY: Thursday was hump day - the third day of workouts — at Hornets' practice, but Coach Byron Scott urged players to push through, despite weariness. He didn't take it easy. Instead, he put players through an intense scrimmage, where top draft pick Chris Paul got knocked down twice trying to get around picks. At one point during the workout, Scott yelled at his players to, "Quit crying over fouls."

"Right now, they're dealing with their feet and knees being sore because this is a different type of running than what they've been doing all summer," Scott said. "Right now, they've just got to go through it."

SHOWING PROMISE: Point guard Troy Bell is facing long-shot odds to make the roster this season, but he's working to make Scott's decision on the final roster a hard one. On Thursday, Bell ran the offense efficiently, defended Paul tough and three times made jump shots from beyond 15 feet. Bell was a first-round draft pick of the Boston Celtics in 2003 but was traded to the Memphis Grizzlies before the 2003-04 season started. The Grizzlies waived him before the start of last year's training camp. Bell played on the Hornets summer league team in Las Vegas in July.

SETTING PICKS: A priority Scott is emphasizing in training camp is for his players to set better picks than they did last year. In his offense, a high percentage of open shots come after picks are set.

"Big Cat (Jamaal Magloire) did a good job today as far as being aggressive and knocking people down, so guys can get open looks," Scott said.

AGGRESSIVE: Forward David West has been aggressive during the past two practices challenging a number of shots in the post. In the final year of his contract, expectations are higher for him to produce this season.

QUICK SHOTS: Shooting guard J.R. Smith sat out Thursday's practice because of a pulled groin, but he could resume work today. ... Hornets general manager Jeff Bower said he had no new updates to give regarding any trade discussions involving forward George Lynch, who has been banned from training camp by Scott.

Divac's second stay with Lakers ends

Knicks, Curry waiting for heart test results

From wire reports

The Los Angeles Lakers have waived Vlade Divac, a disappointment in his second go-round with the team.

The Lakers had the option of picking up a one-year, $5.4 million contract option or buying him out for $2 million. Divac will be owed the $2 million if he clears waivers.

The 37-year-old center underwent back surgery in January and played in only 15 games for Los Angeles last season, averaging 2.3 points and 2.1 rebounds. He had averaged 11.9 points and 8.3 rebounds in 15 previous NBA seasons, seven with the Lakers, two with Charlotte and six with Sacramento.

Taken by the Lakers with the 26th pick in the 1989 NBA draft, Divac was traded to the Hornets in 1996 for the rights to Kobe Bryant.

Divac would like to remain with the Lakers as an assistant coach and scout.

KNICKS AWAIT TEST: Eddy Curry's status with the New York Knicks remained unsettled Thursday, with the team waiting for medical tests on his irregular heartbeat.

Knicks president Isiah Thomas said the team does not have the information needed to evaluate whether Curry is healthy. Curry, the Bulls' top scorer last season at 16.1 points per game, missed the final 13 games of the season and the playoffs after his condition was discovered.

Curry, a 6-foot-11 center, was traded this week from Chicago with Antonio Davis for Tim Thomas, Michael Sweetney and Jermaine Jackson.

The club also was waiting for Curry's medical records from Chicago. The deadline for the deal is 6 p.m. Friday.

"Hopefully, this will be resolved soon," Thomas said. "Hopefully, the doctors will work fast and we'll see where we are."

Curry, 22 and entering his fifth NBA season, had refused Chicago's request for a DNA test to determine whether he was susceptible to cardiomyopathy, the ailment that killed former Boston Celtics guard Reggie Lewis and Loyola Marymount star Hank Gathers.

Thomas said the Knicks couldn't give Curry a DNA test because of New York's privacy and employment laws.

AROUND THE LEAGUE: The Sacramento Kings claimed center Luke Schenscher off waivers from the Denver Nuggets. Schenscher played four seasons at Georgia Tech, averaging 7.3 points, 5.4 rebounds and 1.3 blocks. The Nuggets signed him during the summer as an undrafted free agent. . . . The Lakers have signed center Adam Parada, a 7-foot center who last played in the NBA Developmental League. Parada, out of UC Irvine, averaged 5.2 points, 3.4 rebounds and 13.8 minutes in 23 games for the Huntsville Flight.

English and several other languages, but there are some English words he occasionally has trouble understanding.

To make sure he understands some plays, Scott points to the spot where he wants Macijauskas to be. It's all part of the adjustment period Macijauskas is going through.

"I know before I came here, it was going to be different," Macijauskas said. "The players are so athletic, and I've already learned that small things you must do makes a big difference (on certain plays)."

It may take him time to learn specific duties on some of Scott's plays, but he's already shown why the Hornets courted the sharp-shooter for two years.

"We were here a couple of days early, so I went over to a gym with him and we took shots and he didn't miss many," Hornets rookie point guard Chris Paul said. "If you leave him open, you're in trouble. So the best bet is not to leave him open."

On a play during Thursday's scrimmage, rookie free agent Sean Banks hesitated for a moment while covering Macijauskas. It turned out to be a mistake as Macijauskas easily made a baseline jumper from about 15 feet.

Macijauskas started to build his reputation as a shooter when he was 16 and signed a contract to play six games for Neptunas Klaipeda, a professional team in Lithuania in 1996. By the 2000-01 season he was a proven star. He was named a Lithuanian All-Star when he shot 59.1 percent from the field, 52.1 from 3-point range and averaged 16.9 points for Lietuvos Rytas Vilnius.

He made the All-Euroleague first team last season after averaging 16 points for Tau Vitoria, a professional team based in Spain.

"The things that set him apart from other good shooters is his number of trips to the free-throw line, which right away indicates he can play with contact and guard the ball," Hornets general manager Jeff Bower said.

"We all watched a ton of his games and he was not an unknown player at all when we signed him. We certainly don't claim to have discovered him either."

In camp, Macijauskas has had some difficulty adjusting to the athleticism of some of the Hornets' players. It's also apparent that he will have to come off screens to be an effective shooter because of his height disadvantage as a shooting guard.

"I don't think Arvydas is going to have a problem making 3-pointers," said Nachbar, who is from Slovenia. "It's going to be up to us to get him those shots because he's not going to be able to create those shots most of the time."

Scott is particularly eager for the preseason schedule to begin next week, so he can see how Macijauskas fares against certain defenses, particularly zone coverages. Macijauskas is eager to show he can have the same success in the NBA that he had in Europe.

"That's when you gain the respect of your teammates and coaches," Macijauskas said.

classes, and fulfilling scholarship obligations, at four locations within a somewhat reasonable shouting distance of the Big Easy.

Football and women's track and field are at Louisiana Tech in Ruston. Men and women's golf are at SMU in Dallas. Baseball and women's basketball are at Texas Tech in Lubbock. Men's basketball, volleyball, soccer, swimming, and men's and women's tennis are at Texas A&M in College Station.

"The cooperation with all of these schools has been outstanding,'' said Dickson. "We never forget these young men and women were student-athletes, and we did the best job we could in accomplishing this under difficult circumstances. It was something made easier by the way the schools involved accepted our people."

As for football, the location of only one game is still to be determined. The Wave lost its "home" opener against Mississippi State in Shreveport and won its second "home'' date against Southeastern Louisiana last Saturday in Tiger Stadium.

After facing Houston on Saturday in Lafayette, the Greenies play UTEP in Ruston on October 14, Marshall in Mobile on October 29 and will close out their "home"slate against Tulsa on November 19, in either Ruston or Monroe.

"If it's Monroe," said Dickson, "our football team will have played 11 games in 11 different stadiums. That has to be an NCAA record. Given the circumstances, Chris Scelfo has done a great jobkeeping things together. Like (with) other teams in the Gulf Coast area, Katrina left its mark. Some of the players and some of the coaches lost homes, and they've been uprooted, away from family and friends. But they've hung in there. That says a lot."

Dickson, who has set up in Dallas with a skeleton staff, is too occupied to look too far ahead.

If the Superdome is a lost cause as a future football home, would Tad Gormley Stadium be a possibility for 2006?

"We've played homecoming games there," said Dickson, "so it would have to be explored. Much would depend on how it came out of the flooding."

As for the present, what about Fogelman Arena for basketball this season? And what about Turchin Stadium, Tulane's baseball home, which Katrina caught in the midst of a major facelift?

"It looks as though Fogelman may have dodged a serious bullet," said Dickson. "But it's still to be determined."

And Turchin?

"That's another story. From what they tell me, thanks to Katrina, the sod inside Turchin wound up inside the Wilson Center. Because of priorities, getting the Wilson Center back in use to run the athletic program will be priority number one. Which means the baseball team will be looking at other options for available sites for the upcoming season."

Dickson had a more upbeat story from College Station.

"Our volleyball team was host to Notre Dame and Arizona State on the Aggie campus," he said. "More than a thousand Aggies showed up rooting the Wave on. They fit Aggie cheers to Tulane's. It was quite a scene."

Houston quarterback has dominated Wave

Kevin Kolb provides more headaches than a Sunday morning in Vegas.

In the past two seasons, Houston's electric quarterback peppered Tulane's defense with his misdirections, short passes and long heaves, dominating the Green Wave.

The schedule reunites Kolb and 11 angry men 5 p.m. Saturday in Lafayette.

"They've had our number the last couple years," said Tulane coach Chris Scelfo, whose team hosts the Cougars at Cajun Field. "Their quarterback is one of the best quarterbacks in the league."

Exhibit A - Oct. 11, 2003. Kolb, a freshman, showed up at Tad Gormley Stadium and picked apart Tulane's defense, jumping to a 14-0 lead, then 28-7 by halftime. In the 45-42 victory, Houston's quarterback finished 22 of 39 for 283 yards and three touchdowns.

Exhibit B - Oct. 30, 2004. Kolb, a sophomore quarterback, again had a 14-0 lead against Tulane, and then he ran in a 3-yarder in the second quarter to make it 21-0. He finished with 267 passing yards in the 24-3 win, including 60 from a pass to Donnie Avery, setting up the first touchdown.

On Saturday, the Wave's improved defense will face the No. 2 scoring offense in Conference USA, which averages 31.5 points per game. Kolb leads the conference with 298.5 total yards per game.

"I call him a playmaker," said Anthony Cannon, Tulane's senior linebacker. "He's not slow - he's got speed and a great arm. ... He's a system man, and they have a great system over there. He's been in it since high school, and he's comfortable in the system."

Kolb did play for Coach Art Briles at Stephenville High, before both men moved on to college. While Briles said "there's always room for improvement," he knows his offense is in good hands with his trusty signal-caller. This is quarterback, after all, who was the first true freshman to start at Houston. He has played in a bowl game. And after last season's frustrating 3-8 season, Kolb bounced back as a leader of the team. The Cougars are 2-2 and 1-1 in C-USA - including a heart-breaking overtime loss to UTEP - and No. 4 demands the spotlight on Saturdays.

When asked his quarterback's best assets, Briles shied away from physical attributes, though there are plenty. "His unselfishness and desire to win are the two things that come to my mind," the coach said. "We videotape every practice and every game, and our guys see it on the field - see how he practices, see how he works in the weight room, see where his heart is toward that team. It's a deal where we don't have to harp on it."

So how will Tulane stop this guy?

Cannon pointed to third downs. Kolb kills them.

"We'd stop him on first and second down, and third down we'd give up the play," Cannon said. "This year, getting off the field on third downs would be a big help to us. Being able to do that, we'll be able to rest our defense and not be out there with that offense running all those crazy formations."

Against the Green Wave, Houston was 14-for-21 on third downs in 2003 and 10-for-17 last year. Tulane (2-1, 1-0) can't get complacent or antsy on third down.

The 2005 Cougars are fourth in C-USA in third-down conversions (38.8 percent), and Tulane is sixth in opponent's third-down conversion (35.4). But this Cougars team has eluded third down very nicely this season — they lead the conference with 96 first downs.

Which C-USA team has allowed the fewest first downs? The Green Wave with 36.

Cutler's staying power energizes Vandy

By Jim Kleinpeter
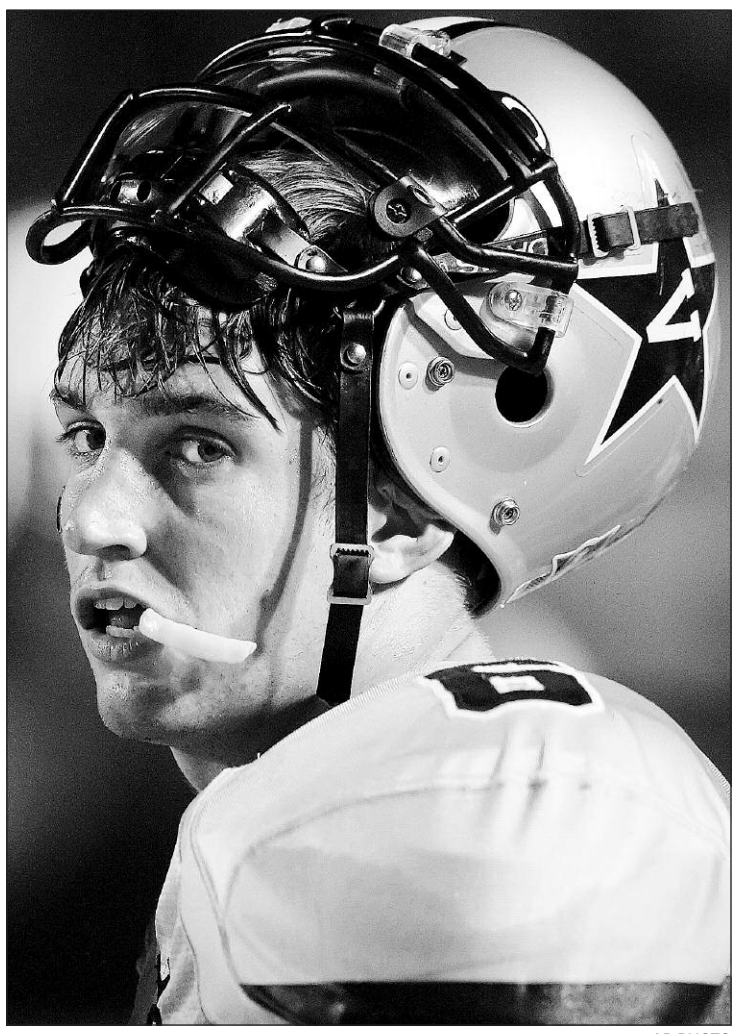
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — There haven't been many Vanderbilt football players faced with a realistic choice of staying for a senior year or moving on to the NFL.

Even in the rare instances when it has happened, it's hardly been a choice at all. Given the Commodores' misadventures on the field and dearth of victories, the pull of the NFL usually won out.

But quarterback Jay Cutler had enough faith in what he saw around him to stick it out one more time and the program is on track to reap a big reward.

With Cutler, the SEC's passing yardage leader, showing the way, Vandy started the season with four victories for the first time since 1984. The Commodores are two victories away from earning their first winning record and bowl appearance since 1982 and are hoping to get one of those Saturday when they host LSU.



Vanderbilt has managed six victories in the previous three years with Cutler at the helm. He has started every game but one since his redshirt freshman year. Along the way he has endured physical beatings as well as 29 losses.

When the NFL beckoned, Cutler listened — for a while, anyway.

"I think it was pretty close," said Cutler, who was advised that he would be taken in the third or fourth round. "Especially with the end of the season, we had been through some tough losses down the stretch. It was hard to take three years of losing, especially when you aren't used to it. I thought it might be best if I moved on. I took my time and talked to a lot of people, and it's turned out well for me."

Cutler has become the school's career touchdown pass leader with 45, and he's second in yardage and completions. He needs 982 yards and 34 completions to pass Greg Zolman, his immediate predecessor. He is averaging 275 yards per game this season.

He's connected on 126 of 206 throws (61.2 percent) for 1,376 yards and seven touchdowns with three interceptions.

AP PHOTO

Jay Cutler is Vanderbilt's career leader in touchdown passes with 45 and leads the SEC this season in passing yardage with 1,376.

But forget the stats. He's been a big part of the change in atmosphere at Vanderbilt and has dramatically improved his draft position.

Not a highly recruited quarterback out of Santa Claus, Ind., he has developed into a quarterback with all the right attributes. He can throw every type of pass from the bomb to the screen and is a dangerous runner, especially on the option. He has the size (6-4, 233) of the NFL prototypes.

"I don't know what else you can want in a quarterback," said Vanderbilt coach Bobby Johnson. "It would have been easy for him to go to the NFL and leave Vanderbilt behind."

Cutler didn't want to leave his teammates behind as it turned out. He was one of several seniors who wanted to see it through after all the bumps and bruises and hard times of playing through inexperience.

"Just the guys on the team, guys I came in with," said Cutler of his reason for coming back. "We were extremely tight. I'd feel bad leaving with one year left. We'd been through a lot together."

"He's the heart and soul of this team, a thoroughbred leader," said wide receiver Erik Davis, who has caught 35 passes for 445 yards and two scores.

The crystallizing moment was also one of sadness and tragedy. Running back Kwane Doster was shot and killed in his hometown of Tampa, Fla., and the team traveled to the funeral together, which bonded the players even tighter.

"I was still deciding when Kwane was killed," Cutler said. "As a team, we came together, went to the funeral together and it brought us closer together. I realized how much these guys mean to me and what a wonderful opportunity college is, to play in the SEC, and it shouldn't be taken for granted."

Just like Vanderbilt should no longer be taken for granted. The Commodores are 2-0 in the SEC and the team, especially Cutler, is catching the attention of opposing players and coaches.

"We have to control him," said LSU coach Les Miles. "He's their big playmaker."

Said LSU defensive tackle Kyle Williams: "We have to get to him quick. Hopefully, we can get in his face, make him hiccup and get some shots on him. If Cutler is on his game and the receivers are on their game, they can give you trouble passing the ball."

SLU faces tough task against Texas State

Bobcats QB Nealy presents problems for Lions' defense

By Tammy Nunez
Staff writer

HAMMOND — If nothing else, Southeastern Louisiana walked away from last week's game against Tulane with the proverbial moral victory.

The Lions might not have pulled off the upset. Still, they kept the game too close for comfort until the Green Wave and its No. 1-ranked defense eventually escaped with a 28-21 win at Tiger Stadium.

Many saw SLU's performance as inspiring. But all Lions coach Dennis Roland has to do to end any talk among his players of last week's game is pop in a tape of Saturday's opponent, Texas State.

The No. 14-ranked Bobcats - SLU's first conference opponent in 20 years - are near the top in every statistical category in the Southland Conference. The Bobcats returned nine of 11 starters on defense and have a 6-foot-5, 230-pound senior quarterback, Barrick Nealy, who is leading the conference in rushing with 349 yards on 37 carries with five touchdowns.

In addition to his league-leading rushing total, Nealy has completed 62 of 93 passes for 877 yards and averages 306.5 yards of total offense per game.

Lions quarterback Trey Willie is the only conference player ranked ahead of him in total offense with 141 rushing yards, 790 passing yards and a 310.3 average.

The Bobcats (3-1) were picked by the league's coaches and sports information directors to finish second. Their only loss was in a close game against Texas A&M.

Southeastern (1-2), on the other hand, was picked to finish last in the league and has yet to have a consistent effort this season, Roland said.

"(My players) want to be good in this conference," Roland said. "They've been looking forward to this for a long time. You've got to play the whole game. . . . You got to play week in and week out. The really good teams play up every week. That's the test. Will we answer the call?"

The Lions answered the call all afternoon against the Green Wave - even scoring their final touchdown on an untimed play to finish the game.

Roland hopes to see that kind of effort at home Saturday, beginning at 6 p.m.

"They were playing hard. I could tell it in their eyes," Roland said. "It was almost like they still thought they could win the game (with the no-time-left touchdown)."

Willie said he thinks the intensity is a hallmark of a team taking strength and motivation from Roland, who underwent treatment for cancer and was declared disease-free last week.

"I think we get that from Coach and the way he battles cancer," Willie said. "He's never given up, and we never gave up."

The Lions will enter Saturday's game a little banged up. Running backs Mario Gilbert and Jerald Watson are questionable, as well as receiver Josh Taylor, who suffered a bruised kidney against Tulane.

"College football is a physical game, that's part of it, and you have to deal with it," Roland said.

The Bobcats have their injury problems, too. Texas State receiver K.R. Carpenter broke his nose last week against South Dakota State in a game he caught five passes for 118 yards.

"I didn't know if I was going to make it or not," Carpenter told the Austin American-Statesman. "I broke my nose a little bit tonight, but I think I've broken it about nine times, so it's not that big of a deal."

Saturday's game will be the first time this season SLU will have to defend against a multi-dimensional quarterback.

"We knew (Tulane's) Lester Ricard didn't really want to run the ball," Roland said. "Going into this game, Barrick Nealy might like to run first. We have to defend against both. He's the real deal."

Leading scorer Carruth leaves USM basketball team

From wire reports

Leading scorer Rashaad Carruth has left Southern Mississippi's men's basketball team for personal reasons.

"I am going to concentrate on getting my degree from Southern Miss while I take care of some personal matters," Carruth said Thursday in a statement issued by the school. "(Coach Larry Eustachy) has been like a second father to me, and I am grateful for all he has done and continues to do for me."

Carruth, a guard, came to Hattiesburg a season ago with a troubled past. He played one season at Kentucky, but walked out after what he termed a misunderstanding with Coach Tubby Smith.

Last season, he averaged 13.4 points and led the team with 49 3-pointers.

FOOTBALL

SOONERS' BOMAR ON HOT SEAT: The first time he walked onto the field at the Cotton Bowl to play Oklahoma's biggest rival, fullback J.D. Runnels was a bit overcome.

He had been warned, just like he'll try to prepare this year's freshmen, but it still wasn't enough to keep his breakfast down once he experienced the overwhelming atmosphere of the Red River Shootout with Texas.

"It's hard to tell those freshmen what to expect whenever you're going out there and it's half orange, half crimson. Before my first one, I just kind of lost it there for a minute," said Runnels, now a senior captain.

"People telling you is one thing, but being on the field and seeing it is completely another," he said.

USC TAILBACKS THRIVING: The best two tailbacks in college football just might play for the same team. One, Reggie Bush, gets most of the attention. The other, LenDale White, probably doesn't get as much as he deserves.

Together, Bush and White have revived No. 1 Southern California's reputation as Tailback U, overshadowed in recent years by the dominance of Heisman Trophy-winning quarterbacks Carson Palmer and Matt Leinart.

"We definitely like to pound it in there and score big touchdowns," Bush said.

USC's legacy of outstanding tailbacks began in 1965, when Mike Garrett won the Heisman. O.J. Simpson, Charles White and Marcus Allen continued the tradition by being honored as college football's outstanding player, and Anthony Davis was another record-setting standout.

Saints expect best from Packers

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — The Green Bay Packers are either a struggling team that can't find a way to win or a sleeping giant ready to break through against the Saints on Sunday.

The 0-4 Packers have lost their past three games by a total of six points, falling at Carolina 32-29 on Monday night, losing 17-16 to Tampa Bay two weeks ago and losing to Cleveland 26-24 in Week 2.

"We are not familiar with losing, and that is one thing we stress in this locker room: Don't get familiar with losing, because we never lose games here," Packers receiver Donald Driver said. "I think a lot of guys know that, and they know the tradition behind the Green Bay Packers, so it is time for us to get on this road and start winning games."

Unfortunately for the Packers, that reputation keeps opponents motivated as well.

To a man, the Saints players and coaches have shown the utmost respect for Green Bay this week and don't seem to be taking their trip to historic Lambeau Field lightly - even if is expected to be sunny and 60 degrees for an early October game.

Most of that respect stems from the abilities of Packers quarterback Brett Favre, whom both Jim Haslett and Joe Horn dubbed the greatest to ever play the game.

"Any time they've got No. 4 on their football team, anything can happen," Saints quarterback Aaron Brooks said of Favre. "They could have an eight-game winning streak from here on out, so I'm not really too concerned about that. I'm only concerned about us as a football team going up there and trying to get a victory."

Penalties and turnovers have hindered the Packers, much 1like they tormented the Saints in both of the Saints' losses this season.

Favre has not been spectacular, with nine touchdowns and eight interceptions, though he had his best performance Monday at Carolina, throwing for 303 yards, four touchdowns and one interception.

The Packers lost their top receiver Javon Walker to a season-ending knee injury in Week 1. They have not been able to establish a consistent running game, with tailback Ahman Green totaling just 206 yards and zero touchdowns in four games. Green has missed practice this week because of knee and quadriceps injuries.

And the offensive line, which lost standout starters Mike Wahle and Marco Rivera in free agency, lost two more starters to injury Monday - center Mike Flanagan (hernia) and left tackle Chad Clifton (ankle). Flanagan will not play this week, and Clifton is questionable after missing practice Wednesday and Thursday.

Also on the Packers' lengthy injury report, linebacker Na'il Diggs (knee) and receiver Terrence Murphy (neck) are out. And tight end Bubba Franks (knee) and safety Earl Little (hamstring) have not practiced this week.

SAINTS INJURIES: Horn participated in limited action during Thursday's practice and remains questionable for Sunday's game after fully participating in Wednesday's practice.

Offensive guard Kendyl Jacox (ankle), linebackers James Allen (hamstring) and T.J. Slaughter (groin), and safety Mel Mitchell (hamstring) did not practice and all remain questionable.

Cornerback Fakhir Brown (knee), guard Jermane Mayberry (shoulder), receiver Az-Zahir Hakim

(knee), tailback Aaron Stecker (ankle) and tight end Shad Meier (knee) all fully participated in Thursday's practice.

TICKET UPDATE: The Saints still have about 55,000 tickets remaining for their Baton Rouge opener against the Miami Dolphins on Oct. 30, the first of four games they will play at Tiger Stadium this season. Capacity for the Saints games will be 79,000. The team has sold nearly 25,000 tickets so far.

There are slightly more than 2,000 tickets available for the Saints' next home game in San Antonio, Oct. 16 against Atlanta.

ETC.: The Saints added safety Brent Hafford to their practice squad this week after promoting cornerback Fred Booker to their active roster last week. . . . Saints' executive vice president of administration Arnold Fielkow is from Appleton, Wis., near Green Bay. Fielkow's friends and family will be celebrating his grandmother's 100th birthday while the Saints are in town this weekend.

Mularkey sends Losman to Buffalo's bench

From wire reports

Coach Mike Mularkey's secret is out. Wide receivers Eric Moulds and Lee Evans said Thursday that backup Kelly Holcomb is replacing former Tulane standout J.P. Losman as the starting quarterback for Buffalo's game against Miami on Sunday.

Moulds backed the decision, crediting Mularkey for attempting to provide a spark to a sputtering offense that has managed 29 points - two touchdowns and five field goals - in the past 14 quarters.

"It takes a good coach to say, `I'm going to sit the starting quarterback down and be able to go with somebody else and try to get a spark from Kelly,'" Moulds said. "A lot of coaches wouldn't have done it, so we respect him and we're going to back him 100 percent."

GIBBS CALLS OUT ARRINGTON: The LaVar Arrington soap opera kept its grip on the Washington Redskins all week, with every development taking the shine off of a 3-0 start. On Monday, the three-time Pro Bowl linebacker wondered why he was playing so little. On Wednesday, Arrington and coach Joe Gibbs held an animated conversation after practice, just out of earshot but in clear view of reporters. On Thursday, Gregg Williams, the assistant coach in charge of the defense, offered the most candid explanation yet.

"We're pretty old-school coaches," Williams said. "You've got to do it in practice if you're going to do it in the game. I'm not going to relent on that. If you do it in practice, you'll do it in the game. If you don't do it, you don't get a chance to play in the game."

PATS' SEYMOUR OUT SUNDAY? The New England Patriots might be without three-time Pro Bowl defensive end Richard Seymour for Sunday's game in Atlanta. Seymour was not on the field Wednesday or Thursday during the time the media was allowed to view practice.

Stallworth beginning to live up to expectations

SAINTS, from C-1

"I think he's really matured this year, compared to his first couple years," Saints coach Jim Haslett said. "We drafted him when he was a junior. People forget that he was (21) years old. I think he's really matured the last couple years, but this year it's evident by his play and taking care of himself and understanding that, in order for him to be a good football player, he has to take care of himself on and off the field."

Even before the season started, this was shaping up to be a watershed year for the former Tennessee star, who became the clear-cut No. 2 receiver after the team let Jerome Pathon leave in free agency.

Stallworth was healthy for a full season for the first time last year after missing eight games with injuries over his first two seasons.

And this summer, he signed on with super-agent Drew Rosenhaus (Stallworth is signed through 2006 with a voidable option for 2007).

"I know with me being the 13th pick when I came in, I had a lot of pressure on me," Stallworth said. "I think I produced pretty well in the opportunities that I got. But I always know I can do a lot better. So, as the years go on, it's just a matter of me being consistent and playing that way when I get the opportunities."

Stallworth made an immediate impact on the Saints in 2002, catching eight touchdown passes, including at least one in his first four NFL games.

But then came the hamstring injury that sidelined him for three weeks. Then, in his second season, he missed five games with leg and ankle injuries that limited him to just 25 catches and three touchdowns.

No one was exactly calling Stallworth a bust, but there was a growing sense of impatience from the fan base, if not the team.

"The injuries are frustrating. You can't control them," Stallworth said. "But, as far as people judging me, I didn't really worry about that. The only people I worry about judging me are the guys in the locker room. Knowing that when I'm on the field, my teammates have respect that I'm going to go out and bust my chops every play and know that, when I am out there, I'm going to help this team win. That's all that matters."

Stallworth said he felt like he had a chance to break through last season, when he played all 16 games and caught a career-high 58 passes for 767 yards and five touchdowns.

"But obviously with me being moved into the full-time starting role, I was definitely able to get more opportunities," he said.

Stallworth leads the team with 20 catches and 317 yards this season, though he didn't catch a pass two weeks ago at Minnesota on a day that was bad for the Saints' offense across the board.

He may once again be the go-to guy at Green Bay on Sunday, depending on Horn's availability.

Horn participated in Thursday's practice in a limited fashion after fully participating in Wednesday's practice. He remains listed as questionable.

Haslett said that, even though Horn wasn't playing last week, his impact was felt through his encouragement of Stallworth and the other receivers.

Haslett said Horn and Stallworth have developed a good relationship.

"Donte is kind of his disciple," Haslett said. "He kind of follows him around. Donte kind of listens to everything, because Joe's been around the block a few times."

Stallworth agreed, saying it was natural to follow Horn's lead because he is such an accomplished receiver. But their exuberant personalities also meshed well together.

Horn said even though Stallworth came in with such a high profile as a top draft pick, he welcomed him and tried to mentor him the same as veterans like Andre Rison had done for Horn in Kansas City.

"This is his fourth year. My fourth year I was in the same boat," said Horn, now in his 10th NFL season. "So Donte kind of resembled me coming up. So I'm happy to see him being matured and making plays. To see him expand and grow and have games like (last Sunday), I'm very proud of that.

"Like I told him, I said, 'When I sit on my couch in a couple years, if I'm retired or whatever, I want to see you breaking records, my records. I want to see you and Devery Henderson starting at the X and Z.' My job is there for the taking. I say when you come to training camp, come to take my job. That's how you prepare."

Miami to host two Super Bowls in four years

SUPER BOWL, from C-1

The vote took three ballots, with Houston eliminated on the first. No city got the three-quarters vote needed on the second ballot and Miami won by a simple majority on the third.

"Obviously, it was very close," Blank said.

Some regarded Atlanta and Houston as favorites because Miami already had been picked for the 2007 game, but Blank said South Florida's weather won out. The 2008 Super Bowl will be played in suburban Phoenix. That means after the game in Michigan this year, there will be three Super Bowls in Florida and one in Arizona.

"If you look at the last number of votes, it's very clear the ownership feels strongly about having the game where the weather is generally warmer," Blank said.

When the NFL is not awarding a Super Bowl to a city — like Detroit — with a new stadium, Huizenga expects Miami to have a good shot at landing the game.

"I think a lot of it is weather-driven," he said. "It's a nice environment for our sponsors to take their guests. If you're a sponsor and you're doing business globally, to bring your guests to South Florida is pretty nice."

After 2010, Miami will top New Orleans' record of nine for hosting the most Super Bowl games. Three off the first five Super Bowls - in 1968, 1969 and 1971 - were in Miami and the last one there was in 1999.

"We know that the best Super Bowls in history were in South Florida," said William Talbert, president and CEO of the Greater Miami Convention and Visitors Bureau. "And we know the best place to hold Super Bowls is South Florida. We were somewhat of an underdog this time, but that never deters us."

Florida is in the midst of what will be a four-Super Bowl, six-year run with last season's game in Jacksonville, the 2007 game in Miami and Tampa being the title-game site two years later.

"The NFL is finally realizing that the people who go to Super Bowls like warm-weather cities because of all the activities that can take place," said Dick Anderson, who played in three Super Bowls with the Dolphins and chaired the Super Bowl host committee for Miami in 1989.

Atlanta (2000 and 1994) and Houston (2004 and 1974) has each hosted the Super Bowl twice.

The 2010 Super Bowl originally was awarded to New York on the condition that a new stadium be built. The stadium, which also was part of the city's unsuccessful Olympic bid, failed to win government approval.

Last week, the New York Jets and Giants agreed to build a new stadium in New Jersey that could be opened by 2009. Both teams - as well as the NFL and New Jersey - would like a roof, but the teams have said the $200 million additional cost is beyond them. A roof would allow the Super Bowl and college basketball's Final Four to be played at the state-run Meadowlands complex.

Cardinals go up two games on San Diego

With big lead early, Mulder stifles Padres

By R.B. Fallstrom
AP Sports Writer

ST. LOUIS — Mark Mulder tossed aside a pair of poor tuneup starts and put the St. Louis Cardinals on the brink of a playoff sweep.

Mulder pitched shutout ball into the seventh inning and the Cardinals once again built an early lead, beating the San Diego Padres 6-2 Thursday for a 2-0 edge in their first-round NL series.

Matt Morris will try to clinch it for St. Louis on Saturday at San Diego against Woody Williams.

The Cardinals, who led the majors with 100 wins this season, have advanced to the NL championship series four times in five chances under manager Tony La Russa. San Diego, which limped into the playoffs with an 82-80 record, hasn't shown any signs of stopping them.

Seven teams have rallied from a 2-0 deficit in division series play. The last team to do it was Boston against Oakland in 2003.

Mulder was 16-8 in his first season since being acquired from Oakland, but gave up seven earned runs in 5 2-3 innings in two starts after the Cardinals clinched the NL Central.

Mulder shut down a lineup stacked with seven right-handed hitters until the late innings and was backed by four double plays, tying the NLDS record.

The Cardinals' first four runs came on balls that didn't leave the infield, or in one case, even the catcher's glove. David Eckstein had a run-scoring groundout and a squeeze bunt, Yadier Molina had an RBI grounder and Albert Pujols drew a bases-loaded walk to finish Pedro Astacio after four innings.

As in Tuesday's opener, when the Cardinals took an eight-run lead behind Chris Carpenter before the Padres rallied in an 8-5 loss, it got a little closer at the end. A double by Khalil Greene, a single by Joe Randa and Xavier Nady's run-scoring single cut the deficit to 4-1.

Reggie Sanders, who drove in an NLDS-record six runs in Game 1, hit a two-run double off Rudy Seanez in the seventh that made the score 6-1. Sanders has eight RBIs in eight at-bats this series after totaling five RBIs in five previous division series appearances covering 68 at-bats.

Red Sox again in big playoff hole

WEDNESDAY'S LATE GAMES

Chicago one win from ALCS berth

From wire reports

The defending World Series champions need another big comeback, this time just to get out of the first round of the playoffs.

The Chicago White Sox will reach the AL championship series with one more victory over the Boston Red Sox, thanks to a pair of homer-filled wins at U.S. Cellular Field.

"I think people know what the Red Sox did to the Yankees last year, and with that lineup we can't slow down," winning pitcher Mark Buehrle said after Chicago came back to beat Boston 5-4 Wednesday and take a 2-0 series lead. "We've got to go out there and finish these guys as quick as we can."

Game 3 and, if necessary, Game 4 are at Fenway Park today and Saturday. A fifth game, if necessary, would be at Chicago on Sunday.

"The perspective is we're down 0-2. . . . I'd rather have it the other way," Boston manager Terry Francona said. "The comfort I have is our ability to play."

After a 19-8 loss to the New York Yankees in Game 3 of the AL championship series a year ago, the Red Sox won eight straight to win their first World Series title since 1918. Boston has won eight of its past nine when facing postseason elimination.

"Last year was last year; this has nothing to do with last year," Boston's David Ortiz said. "We made a comeback, but it was last year."

The White Sox trailed 4-0 Wednesday before scoring five runs in the fifth off David Wells, capped by Tadahito Iguchi's three-run homer. The drive over the left-field fence came shortly after a deflating error by Boston second baseman Tony Graffanino, who once played for the White Sox.

"I've had situations where I've erred," Iguchi said through a translator. "I understand Graffanino's feelings there, but I'm happy that his error gave me a chance to do something."

Iguchi, a 30-year-old major league rookie who played eight seasons in Japan, has been one of manager Ozzie Guillen's favorite players all season.

"One of the biggest reasons we are here is because of Iguchi," Guillen said. "He moves the guy over, he runs for me, he makes the plays, he hits home runs, he runs the bases right. This kid does everything for the team, and that's why I keep on saying he's my MVP."

The Red Sox, 14-2 losers in Tuesday's opener when Chicago homered five times, were shut out on three hits for the final six innings by Buehrle and rookie Bobby Jenks.

ANGELS 5, YANKEES 3: Orlando Cabrera's bat beat the Yankees when he played for Boston last October, and he did it again for the Los Angeles Angels on Wednesday. Cabrera scored the tying run after Alex Rodriguez's error and later hit a go-ahead single, Bengie Molina got two big hits and the Angels defeated the Yankees 5-3 to even their AL division series at one game apiece.

"This team always played the Yankees very well, so there's not a lot that I can tell these guys that they haven't done before," said Cabrera, who hit safely in all seven games against New York in the 2004 ALCS to help the Red Sox reach the World Series.

"You just keep the pressure on them the whole time and they are somehow going to crack up, and we're going to take advantage of any mistake they make."

DONALDSONVILLE (4–0) AT ST. CHARLES (4–0)
Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Donaldsonville defeated Port Allen 37-14. St. Charles defeated West St. John 29-12.

Notes: The District 5-5A opener for both teams. Destrehan enters ranked No. 4 in Class 5A. Ehret is operating on just two weeks of practice. The visiting Patriots have six two-way starters, unusual for a 5A program, but one necessitated by a roster of 34. The Wildcats allowed 20 points in their first three victories against Thibodaux, Terrebonne and South Lafourche before squeaking by St. James, then the top-ranked team in Class 2A.

WEST JEFFERSON (1–0) AT ASSUMPTION (2–2)

Notes: The District 5-5A opener for both teams. West Jefferson used a no-huddle offense against Salmen, and had two backs rush for 100 or more yards. The Bucs gained 291 yards on the ground and 356 overall. Sophomore Edward Robinson ran for 123 yards and two scores on eight carries, despite having only two days of practice. Tevin Conway also had 100 yards with a 58-yard touchdown run. The Bucs defense limited Salmen to 75 yards, 54 of it rushing. Assumption features one of the state's top backs in Carl Francis, who rushed for 257 yards and three touchdowns against Bourgeois.

Three of the six games Fishercoach Duane Foret was able to arrange are against opponents from Class 4A or higher. The Gators have all but one of their pre-storm starters back and a roster of 42 players. Senior quarterback Brad Navero scored Fisher's lone touchdown at undefeated Springfield, but threw three interceptions, all of which resulted in Springfield scores.

Time: 7 p.m.
Last week: Shaw did not play. Walker lost to Baton Rouge-Central 30-22.
Last year: Did not play.

Running back Johnny Owen, center, has made an immediate contribution at East St. John after moving from Brother Martin following Hurricane Katrina.

Like his father, Owen playing at East St. John

Running back chooses Wildcats after move from Brother Martin

By Lori Lyons
Staff writer

When East St. John opened its 2005 football season on Sept. 17 - two weeks late thanks to Hurricane Katrina - the Wildcats had a newcomer in the backfield with a familiar name: Johnny Owen.

From 1980 to 1991, Johnny Owen Sr. was the head baseball coach at East St. John. In 1990, his team won the Class 4A state championship with a 28-0 record.

Back then, Johnny Owen Jr. was just a toddler.

"I grew up on that baseball field," Owen Jr. said. "I remember walking in the halls, playing on that (practice field) tower."

Those memories have been coming back to Owen in the past month. When Hurricane Katrina struck, Owen was a junior starter for Brother Martin. As a sophomore running back last season, he rushed for more than 400 yards before he suffered a broken collarbone that ended his season. After Brother Martin was flooded by Katrina and forced to close, Owen transferred to a familiar place, East St. John.

"We looked at some of the other schools in the area," said Owen, who lives in LaPlace but had attended Brother Martin since he was a freshman. "I wanted to stay in a big school. And I knew this was a good program."

The Owen family sought the advice of Brother Martin head football coach Wayde Keiser, who had been a head coach at St. Charles Catholic in LaPlace and an assistant coach at East St. John.

"I told them they couldn't go wrong either way," said Keiser, who now is assisting at Vandebilt in Houma. "He needed to make his own decision. I'm just happy he's playing. I just want him to play somewhere."

Owen isn't just playing. That first week Owen earned a starting spot in the backfield and was the only displaced player to appear in the Wildcats' season-opening loss to Hahnville. On the first play of East St. John's third possession, Owen burst through the line and ran 78 yards for a touchdown. He finished the game with 83 yards. Against East Ascension he rushed for 107 yards on eight carries.

Owen Sr. said that seeing his son in an East St. John uniform has brought back memories.

"It's a little strange," said Owen, who is the transportation director for the St. John the Baptist Parish school system. "But with everything that's happened, we just feel fortunate that he's playing and that he's playing for a program like East St. John. He was looking for a challenge. If he could keep up with the athletes they have, it would make him a better football player."

Owen did not follow in his father's baseball shoes. He ran track at Brother Martin, competing in the 100 and 200 eters, the 400-meter relay and the 800-meter relay. His best time in the 100 meters was 10.8 seconds and he advanced to the Class 5A regionals last year, missing the state meet by two-tenths of a second.

"He's got legitimate sprinter speed," said East St. John coach Larry Dauterive, who has decided to rotate Owen with tailback Stanley Jackson. "And he'll get better as the season goes on. Right now, he understands his role. He comes in every other series and his job is to run the football. We have so many weapons. He's just one of them."

Move doesn't suit McGee

in the neighborhood, but that no water made its way inside the house. Hopefully, that means the clothes he left behind are still viable.

Other than that, the only things still standing concrete in his life are his love for his parents and the verbal commitment he made in August to play college football at UCLA.

Try as he might, McGee has found it difficult to blend into his new surroundings at McKinley, a Class 4A school located near LSU that takes an 0-4 record into Friday's homecoming contest and District 3-4A opener against Broadmoor.

He enrolled at McKinley primarily because of Karr coach Jabbar Juluke's urging that he stick with a magnet school program in order to assure his qualifying for an NCAA scholarship. He also visited Scotlandville, another magnet school in the Baton Rouge area, and received an inquiry from Southern Lab. He knew nothing about McKinley, much less that it was a program in transition being rebuilt by new coach Bruce Swinton.

"It really didn't matter much to me what school I went to because it wasn't going to feel right to me anyway," McGee said.

"Whatever team I went to wasn't going to feel the same as at Karr. I had worked the whole summer to prepare myself for this season at Karr. So I didn't concern myself with whether I went to a winning school or a losing school."

Though it hasn't been reflected in the victory column, McGee has made an impact with the Panthers, having rushed for 100 yards in each of his first two games while totaling 257 yards and two touchdowns on 30 carries, an average of 6.4 yards per carry.

He was approaching a third 100-yard game during last week's 49-0 loss to Istrouma when he was sidelined by a foot injury.

McGee said he is recovered sufficiently to play against Broadmoor.

Swinton, however, is looking for more than pure physical production. He needs a leader to inspire a team that began the season with 12 seniors.

"Jeremy has the moves of a Sunday running back, the professional moves that you can't teach," Swinton said. "He sees where there might be a hole and he finds it. And his speed is impressive. He can play some day on Sunday, but his maturity level must increase with him getting ready to go to the next level. I was hoping that he would be more of a leader for us.

"With the situation with Katrina happening, you have to mature more and act more like an adult even though you're 17 or 18. We didn't ask for this situation to happen, but we have to deal with it.

"It's hard for a 16- or 17-year-old when they're forced out of their element. But things are different from the way it was at Karr."

"It's easy for someone to say you need to step up and be a leader," McGee said. "I just don't feel like I'm in that position to come in and tell these guys what to do. That's going to take time because it just doesn't feel right to me."

McGee will likely benefit from the addition of Juluke to the McKinley faculty and coaching staff. After spending more than three weeks living with relatives in Houston, Juluke is in his first full week with the Panthers. Three other Karr players, safety Jared Berry and defensive linemen Patrick and Thomas Barnes, also are on the team.

"At Karr most of the pieces basically were in place and Jeremy was the main piece of the puzzle," Juluke said. "Now you come to a new team, which is a different puzzle, and you don't want to step on anybody's toes. Jeremy has to humble himself and become a team player in another role. He's the best player here, but it's not his team.

"At Karr he was the best player and had established himself to the point where other kids looked to him. So it's a hard transition. Here he's on a team that's not as successful as we were or as successful as we were expected to be."

So McGee will keep plugging away, hoping that this is the week the Panthers break through into the win column and he clears his own mental hurdle.

"Even if we would win a championship, it wouldn't really matter to me because it's not Karr," McGee said. "It wouldn't feel right to me. So I'm just trying to make the best of this situation right now. I hope we win. I'm going to do whatever it takes."

STAFF PHOTO BY ELIOT KAMENITZ

Former Karr running back Jeremy McGee, who has transferred to McKinley, has found it difficult to adjust in his new role. 'It really didn't matter much to me what school I went to because it wasn't going to feel right to me anyway,' says McGee, who has committed to UCLA.

New Orleanians step out and stay connected in their temporary home towns

By Nell Nolan
Society columnist

HOUSTON — "Okra, that's what I'm so excited about," said chef Monica Pope, award-winning Houstonian chef-owner of restaurant t'afia. She was the featured speaker at the Junior League Tea Room's most recent "relaxed Wednesday dinner," which was hailed as "Houston's Farmers' Markets with Monica Pope."

"Eat where your food lives" was one of the pronouncements made by Monica as she moseyed about, mike in hand, within the Tea Room's several areas. Lending an attentive ear were New Orleanians — and twins — Joan and Julie Fotiades, who were in the company of their Houstonian sister, Evelyn Poulos.

The Fotiadeses never really evacuated New Orleans. Just before the hurricane, they were in Memphis for a wedding. "So we just flew from Memphis to Houston," said Joan, who said that so much of her and Julie's time in Houston has been spent returning phone calls and trying to make contact with friends. Joan also praised her sister's hospitality. "Evelyn's been so wonderful to have us here."

St. Pete's Dancing Marlin included newlyweds Merrick and Veronica Lyons as diners on a recent Friday night. The hip, downtown eatery is owned by John Zotos, a best buddy of Merrick's Orleanian brother, Tom Lyons. (Their father is the celebrated architect Pio Lyons.) What made the experience so very special, according to Veronica, "was hearing the Rebirth Jazz Band from New Orleans playing."

Carlo and Rosemonde Capomazza have been spending their evacuee time in Oxford with son Stefano, a former restaurant owner and now a developer of condominiums. Carlo's happy to report that his Uptown home and shop on Magazine Street "have done well" through Katrina and its aftermath. Not so some of their country property.

Among those who've been in Oxford — and maybe were just passing through — have been Carl and Lois Downing, and Charlie and Dot Heidingsfelder and their daughters and sons-in-law, Molly Silvia and Dr. Charles and Ellen Manning and Cooper. Of course we all know the Manning connection to this Mississippi town. It's part of the pigskin pact. Also milling on Oxfordian turf have been Peter and Debi Dupuy, the Rev. Jesse and Nancy Adams, Anne Craighead, Walker Ronaldson, Courtney-Anne Sarpy, and Becky and Dick Currence. Their son, John Currence, has the acclaimed City Grocery restaurant in Oxford, which has seen a bit of NOEVAC (New Orleans evacuee) traffic of late.

The Downings' son, Doug, and his wife, Vaughn, along with their three cute boys, Michael, Andrew and James, are currently calling Houston home. Vaughn's pleased to be teaching part time at her boys' school.

The above Rosemonde's sister and brother-in-law, Karolyn and Paul Westervelt, made tracks to Lafayette. Carlo also reported that Dr. Quinn Peeper and Michael Harold headed to Memphis and the home of Quinn's parents; and that John and Bonnie Boyd were being housed in Shreveport by friends.

Concern from abroad came from Carlo's sister, Simonetta, who lives in Rome. When she and her husband and pals visited the Crescent City a few days before Easter, Prescott and Sarah Dunbar entertained them at the Dunbars' beautiful Garden District home.

From Paris have come concerned messages via Gerard and Antoinette Roubichou, former residents — and continued fans — of the Crescent City. They were asking about buddies Jackie and Alan Bartlett and Colette and Jim Stelly, among many others, as well as their former home on Marengo Street. Gerard is a former cultural attache at the Consulate of France in New Orleans and Antoinette taught at Newcomb College. Yet another Gallic voice of caring was that of Rita Dedeyan, who entertained Donna Kay Berger and a few other Orleanian friends during teatime at Laduree in Paris earlier in the summer. Rita was acting as a clearing house for her New Orleans friends, and came up with names to help all of us make contacts of our "lost" Crescent City kith. Moving on in Mississippi! Several Saturdays ago, Jimmy and Berthe Amoss were spotted at a Natchez-riverside restaurant with son Dr. John and daughter-in-law Dunbar (and her parents, the Smiths) and the latter couple's little sons, James and Jack Amoss. Nearby at the same spot were Thad and Gail Waters, whose home is in St. Joseph, La., but who have both logged time in New Orleans. She taught school and he was with a brokerage firm. Earlier that same afternoon, and after they had just toured Monmouth Plantation, the Waterses were introduced to Orleanians Diane and Dr. Robert "Bob" Jones. The Joneses had been airlifted out of New Orleanians — he, as a doctor, was tending to his medical work — and she was buying a purse in the gift shop for her essentials.

The docent at Monmouth said she "was awaiting Uncle Buzz and Les." That's our town's Buzz Harper, whose Natchezian roots are very strong, and Les Wisinger. The buzz on Buzz for years has been houses. His most recent Garden District transaction was the sale of his mansion on Prytania and Third streets. He bought it from Anne Rice, embellished it and opened it to a slew of fine charities, and sold it a few months ago to actor Nicolas Cage.

"I've never been on a ranch before and didn't know what to expect. It's so nice." So said Moonyeen Johnston, who has been logging Texas time with various family members. "I even have my own room," she said after describing a harrowing departure from New Orleans post-Katrina. Whereas the ranch, which family members have dubbed "Camp David," is outside Fort Worth, she has also been at the Houston home of her granddaughter Leslie Ward Wubbenhorst, and husband Rob. "They are so civic-minded," said Moonyeen, who expounded on Leslie and Rob's many recent volunteer efforts.

Riegel and Wicker sign off

WWL news reporter and WVUE weathercaster won't return

By Dave Walker
TV columnist

Her home near Lake Pontchartrain destroyed by Hurricane Katrina flooding, Stephanie Riegel spent a week reporting on the storm's aftermath as a Baton Rouge evacuee, then resigned her part-time job with WWL-Channel 4 to pursue freelance public-relations consulting.

More important, she said in a recent interview, she left WWL to devote more time to her children, ages 5, 8 and 8.

"They lost everything they had, too," she said. "I wanted to be (with them) as much as I could."

Riegel, who had worked at WWL since 1993, said that she and her family likely will reside for a while in Baton Rouge, from where her husband can commute to work on the north shore.

WWL management, she said, has been "wonderful — they were never anything but great to me."

Her new life as a self-employed consultant is going well but it's too early to tell if she'll miss reporting.

"Everything is so radically different," she said. "It doesn't really seem real."

Earlier, WVUE-Channel 8 general manager Jeff West announced that morning meteorologist Crystal Wicker took a weekend weathercasting job with Indianapolis ABC affiliate WRTV-TV shortly after Katrina hit town. But unlike WWL meteorologist John Gumm, her departure was unrelated to the storm.

"Indiana is home for her," he said. "She aspired to go there. The timing I think was as much a coincidence as anything."

The weatherman who came in from the storm

For any TV meteorologist, this was the hurricane of a lifetime: a Category 5 headed straight for New Orleans. And then WWL-TV's John Gumm got a call from his wife that changed everything.

PHOTOS COURTESY OF JOHN GUMM

John and Jennifer Gumm beam after the arrival of Connor Jacob Gumm, born at 3:20 a.m. the day before Katrina made landfall. The proud papa, a WWL-TV weatherman, evacuated with his family, then decided not to come back.

DAVE WALKER
On the Air

When Hurricane Katrina's projected path jumped west toward New Orleans that Friday afternoon in late August, John Gumm's wife "was basically ready to give birth at any second," he said.

The WWL weekend meteorologist, recently promoted to the station's top-rated morning newscast, immediately understood the implications of Katrina's drift to his city, his new family, himself.

The next morning he went in to work prepared to stay on the job for several days, while his wife, Jennifer, planning to ride out the storm with a friend, tried to prepare their Slidell home for a direct hit from a hurricane.

"She packed up all the photo albums and pictures, things like that," he said.

All that day, the storm track "didn't look good," said Gumm. "It looked like the nightmare scenario."

At 9:30 p.m. Saturday, "I get a phone call," he said. "It's her. She says, 'Hey, my contractions have started. I'm going to the hospital to see if they'll admit me.'

"I thought, 'Oh, that's great news.' I was really excited at that point (that) the baby was coming now rather than later. That could've been a catastrophe."

Gumm called Carl Arredondo, WWL's chief meteorologist, to let him know that he'd need emergency relief at the station.

WWL's weathercaster ranks were already depleted due to David Bernard's recent departure for Miami. (WWL would eventually bring in relievers Dawn Brown, a weathercasting veteran of stations in Philadelphia and San Francisco, and former WWL meteorologist Brad Panovich, now at WCNC-TV in Charlotte, N.C.)

Despite the station's staffing jam, nothing was going to keep Gumm from his wife.

Except, briefly, the new 10 p.m. storm track, which Gumm waited to deliver to viewers.

During the segment, anchors Karen Swensen and Mike Hoss made a cross-talk reference on the air to Jennifer being in labor.

Jennifer's parents, watching the Internet stream of the newscast from Indiana, learned for the first time that the arrival of their new grandchild was imminent.

Off the air, Gumm had an impromptu chat with New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, who'd come to the station to be interviewed on the 10 p.m. newscast.

"He came into the weather center and said, 'What's going on? How's it looking?'" said Gumm. "I said, 'This is the one we've feared.' He was talking about mandatory evacuation. I said, 'Yeah, I'd do it. I'd try to get the infrastructure in place and get the people out.' I wished him luck.

"He was actually the last person I saw before I left the station and drove across the twin spans to Slidell."

SENSE AND THE CITY

Sight and sound are improving, but the smell has a long way to go

New Orleans still unfolds itself to you in a sensual way. That was always her seductive forte, but it is different after the storm.

For instance, in the immediate days after the flood, it was sound: Choppers, jets, boats, sirens, big trucks, bigger trucks, chainsaws. And then at night, the damn scariest silence you never heard.

Then it was sight: The impenetrable darkness of the night, punctuated in the distance from time to time by a red or blue cherry top on a slow-rolling cruiser and most likely the driver — a young state trooper from some town in the Midwest suddenly dropped into Fallujah — was as terrified as you.

There were lots of monsters under the bed in those early days.

THE SLIGHTEST WIND SHIFT CAN TAKE YOU TO PUKE CITY.

Then came the blinding sunlight of morning — so much of it unfiltered by tree limbs after Katrina's indiscriminate and not-so-tidy pruning job — just slamming straight into your face and onto the ground.

Now the choppers are gone, and most of that other industrial noise, and at night you hear crickets. And the sunlight, so hellish weeks ago, is getting better with the approach of autumn, and the scary darkness is now sliced apart at night by streetlights and the yellow glow from occasional bedroom windows.

That leaves us the sense of smell. And, wow.

Louisiana balladeer Randy Newman once wrote a song lamenting Baltimore's civic downfall many years ago with the line: "Oh, Baltimore. Man, it's hard just to breathe."

That would be New Orleans now. It stinks here, just flat out stinks. There are random piles of residential and commercial trash just everywhere and even where there is no visible evidence, the slightest wind shift can take you to Puke City.

I mean it; it's rough. Even in places that are cleaned up and open for business, you can still smell the Aftermath. The CVS and Walgreens drug stores are open Uptown and even though the air-conditioning is blasting and they've cleaned the hell out of those places, you can still sense it when you first walk in, just barely taste it.

A friend of mine e-mailed me recently that when she walked into a grocery store, her daughter said to her: "Mom, it smells like ass in here," and I know that's not very appetizing terminology or imagery for a newspaper, but standard operating procedures have changed around here because New Orleans, it smells like, well . . . never mind.

MY STORM STORY

Hurricane Katrina: In their own words

"Our line (of Big Sway jeans) came out earlier this year, at the beginning of the year. Everything's been going great till this happened. We're probably in 27, 30 states.

"When I got (to the warehouse in Madisonville) it was so bizarre. It was like somebody took the boxes and just threw them around. We had them all in rows by style and sizes and it was just like someone came in here and picked them up and threw them around.

"They weigh 50 pounds a case. They were stacked up five, six, eight boxes high. The bottom case got wet and of course the cardboard collapsed. And the two or three boxes on the top would fall off — fall over into the floodwaters.

"We went through every box. Every jean. What was lost in the warehouse was the finished product. Tagged. The whole nine yards. Retail value was approximately $189,000. We lost a lot of our Lucile style and after that it was our Pearl. After that it was our Delilah. They retail from $176 up to $225.

"I loaded up 1,000 pairs of wet jeans — some were dry. We put them in big Hefty garbage bags in a trailer and drove them up to Baton Rouge to a washer house. They took them four, five days to wash them all and dry them all and bag them. I came and picked them up and brought them over to the Red Cross in Baton Rouge. They were fired up.

"I contacted the insurance adjuster and told them exactly what I was doing. I said, I cannot sit here and let them go completely to waste. Thousands and thousands of people are homeless and they don't have but the clothes on their back that they walked out with.

"He said, 'Man I think that's great.'

"I'm not going to let Katrina knock me down. Or Rita. I'm not going to just give up because this happened. We can't get anywhere if we don't get up."

THIS MOLD HOUSE

More tips for mending your broken home

LET THE SUN SHINE Get clothes and linens out of those damp closets and drawers and onto an old-fashioned clothesline

If clothing that must be dry-cleaned has been soaked in floodwater, or if clothes have been exposed to fiberglass insulation or are extremely molded, the items will likely have to be pitched, experts say. But you might have more luck than you think salvaging other hurricane-damaged clothing and linens — even after mildew has set in. Here are some expert tips:

WEAR PROTECTIVE GLOVES when handling items that have come in contact with contaminants, said Pamela Brown, a textiles expert with the Texas A&M Cooperative Extension.

SORT CLOTHING INTO PILES, separating what is worth salvaging and what isn't. Then, separate into laundry and dry-cleaning piles. Avoid storing clothes in plastic bags because it will speed mildew.

DIVIDE THE LAUNDRY PILE into colors and whites, then sort the lights and darks by fabric type. First remove all loose or caked-on dirt and rinse the items in cold, clean water repeatedly to get rid of as much mud as possible, said Rose Marie Tondl, a clothing specialist at the University of Nebraska Institute of Agriculture and Natural Resources.

AIR DRY CLOTHING THAT MUST BE DRY-CLEANED and take it to the cleaners as soon as possible. Talk with the dry cleaner about stubborn mold stains or damage to determine if the piece is worth trying to clean, Brown said.

TAKE ITEMS WITH DARK MOLD STAINS OUTSIDE and brush off the mold. Pre-treat the patch by dampening it with water and rubbing detergent into the stain, and then launder the items in hot water, detergent and chlorine bleach, if safe for fabric. Rinse well. If any stain remains, use lemon juice and salt. Once the stain is gone, dry the items in sun. Rinse thoroughly and repeat, Tondl said.

DISINFECT ALL CLOTHES by using the longest wash cycle, highest water level and hottest water temperature safe for the fabric, being careful not to overcrowd the washer. If clothes are contaminated, disinfectants that contain at least 80 percent pine oil, such as Pine-Sol and Al-Pine, are safe for most fabrics in the washing machine — except wool and silk. Add two tablespoons of disinfectant to the water before adding clothing. Add two more tablespoons in the rinse cycle.

BE CAREFUL WITH BLEACH. Liquid chlorine bleaches such as Clorox and Purex can be used on most fabrics but not on mohair, wool, silk, Spandex or resin-coated fabrics with durable press finishes. Two tablespoons of chlorine bleach per washer load will kill bacteria and won't cause substantial harm to clothing, Brown said.

LINE DRY IN THE SUN to help kill bacteria. In the dryer, use the highest temperature setting. Don't dry clothes that still have stains, or the heat will set them. Try laundering again with other stain removers, Tondl said.

The weatherman who came in from the storm

GUMM, from C-7

Accompanied by her friend, Jennifer had been admitted to NorthShore Regional Medical Center.

When Gumm arrived, "They hadn't given her the epidural at that point, though the contractions were getting more painful," he said. "She was still OK."

In a waiting room, Gumm saw a TV report that said Katrina's winds had increased to 145 mph.

"At that point, I thought, 'Oh boy, I don't think we'll be able to stay here,'" he said.

Connor Jacob Gumm was born at 3:20 a.m. Sunday.

Later that morning, Gumm spoke with Panovich, who told him that it appeared as if Katrina's eyewall could be headed straight for Slidell.

Gumm left the hospital to further prepare his rented home for the storm, and to pick up the family dog, Calvin, a bichon frise.

"I picked up as many things as I could," he said. "Baby things. Things we'd need to care of the baby. Actually, I didn't know what we'd need."

The approximate two-mile drive on the interstate from Gumm's house to the hospital took two hours.

"It was gridlock," he said. "Jennifer called me on my cell and said, 'Hey, there's a problem. The doctor needs to talk to you when you get here. He thinks we should stay so they can observe him a little longer.'"

There was some concern at the hospital that Connor had contracted Group B Strep, a potentially fatal condition for a newborn.

"The hospital wanted to keep him for observation," Gumm said. "At that point, I had to have the doctor explain what the risks are. I knew that the hurricane would be a threat, no doubt in my mind."

Connor was given a pre-emptive dose of antibiotics, and the Gumms hit the road for Nashville to stay with Jennifer's sister's family.

"Dog in front, Jennifer and the baby in back," he said.

It was 7 p.m. Sunday.

"I had been up, at this point, for 40 hours straight," he said. "I was a mess. The thought of driving at that point was really a little overwhelming."

A few miles from the hospital, Gumm ran into more evacuee gridlock.

"I thought, 'Oh, my goodness. Have I done the right thing?'" he said.

Jennifer's sister and her husband had already departed from Nashville to meet the Gumms halfway.

They met in Laurel, Miss.

"I can't remember what time it was, but I changed my first diaper in the back of an SUV in a gas station in Laurel, Miss.," Gumm said.

"I had been up, at this point, for 40 hours straight. I was a mess. The thought of driving at that point was really a little overwhelming."

The caravan — having driven through "lots of rain . . . the feeder bands were coming through and we were getting gusts up to tropical storm force," Gumm said — arrived at a motel in northern Alabama for a short rest stop at 6 a.m. Monday.

"I was able to watch TV at that point, and see where the storm was going," Gumm said. "At that point, I knew that this was the one."

He also began to feel "a sense of guilt" about not being at work.

"This is my job," he said. "This is the thing that I'm there for — a category 4 or 5 coming into New Orleans."

The Gumms arrived in Nashville at 11 a.m. Monday.

After a quick visit to a hospital, Connor was pronounced healthy.

After the storm had passed, Gumm got a report from a friend that his Slidell house had suffered significant damage from a downed tree.

Gumm saw it for himself over the Labor Day weekend, when he came back to salvage as much as he could, tarp the damaged roof and look for another place to live.

Gumm's plan at that point was to get Jennifer and Connor to her parents' house in Bloomington, Ind., then get to Baton Rouge, where WWL had relocated its news operation.

'The storm for us changed everything, like it changed things for so many people,' says John Gumm, with newborn son Connor Jacob Gumm. Fallen trees damaged the WWL-TV meteorologist's Slidell home, forcing their relocation to the Midwest, where they will stay.

Once everybody got to Bloomington, the plan changed.

Gumm had just signed a new contract with WWL.

Before the arrival of both Katrina and Connor, Gumm and his wife had begun hunting for a house to buy in the Slidell area.

"We were looking at houses in areas that really got flooded bad," he said. "Glad we didn't pull the trigger on that.

"We were planning on staying there long-term. We wanted to stay there and raise our children there.

"WWL is such a great television station to work for.

"The storm for us changed everything, like it changed things for so many people."

Jennifer, a social worker, knew that her workplace was in a New Orleans neighborhood that had suffered some of the worst flooding.

Though staying in Slidell would've been worse, her evacuation experience had been horrible.

"She was pretty traumatized by the whole event," Gumm said. "The way everything happened just kind of reinforced the idea to us that family pulled us through this.

"If it wasn't for our family helping us out, we couldn't have handled it. They gave us places to stay, helped us financially. Helped us with just about everything.

"Jennifer indicated to me, 'You know, I would just like to be a little closer to family, if possible.' After all we've been through, I understand that.

"So I called WWL and just basically asked them, 'Can you release me from my employment contract?'

"I admit I was in tears. I felt so horrible, knowing that they needed me back, and now I was leaving them in a very tight spot."

WWL management agreed "without hesitation," said Gumm. "They said, 'John, this doesn't change how we feel about you. We think you did a great job.'"

Gumm, who grew up in Ohio, is now looking for a meteorologist job in the Midwest.

He planned to return to the New Orleans area this week to pack up his desk at work and haul more stuff out of his Slidell home.

One of the keepsakes stored there is a school paper Gumm wrote in sixth grade.

"The assignment for that day was to write about your greatest dream," he said. "I wrote a paper — true story — that said, 'My greatest dream in life is to become a meteorologist and one day save a large city from a horrible hurricane.'"

Thinking back on his last air shift at WWL, Gumm said it's probably time to have that sixth-grade essay framed.

"Those 12 hours were probably the most important work I've ever done in my life," he said.

The hours following those have been pretty important, too.

Connor and Jennifer are "doing great," said Gumm. "He's keeping us up all night. He's healthy, doing just wonderful."

And, someday, he'll learn about when and how and, most importantly, where he was born.

"He's going to know what lagniappe means," Gumm said. "He's going to know what a po-boy is.

"He's going to know what Mardi Gras is all about.

"We're going to come back to visit. He's going to understand the culture down there.

"We hope to bring him back to a city that's better than ever."

TV columnist Dave Walker can be reached at davewala@yahoo.com.

New Orleans stinks, but it's picking up

ROSE, from C-7

I'm just trying to convey what it's like and I can certainly muster no better description than that.

On many streets, refrigerators are duct-taped shut and lined up along the curbside calling to mind nothing so much as the image of empty Mardi Gras parade ladders all in a row. All these structures, just waiting for something to happen.

Only problem is, there are no clean-up crews following these imaginary parades to remove the debris. So they stand, sturdy sentinels, fortress walls.

We should rename the streets around here Whirlpool Way, Amana Avenue and Kenmore Court, because that's what it looks like. The streets are paved in appliances. Where trees once stood, they are sometimes the only shade on a block.

Where are they going to put all these things? I don't suppose that they can be used to buttress our wetlands like they do with discarded Christmas trees every year, huh?

Do we even have any wetlands?

And, problem is, for every person who comes back here, either to reclaim residency or just to gather some valuables and clean up a bit, more garbage accumulates. Pity the folks who had been in the middle of home renovations when this hit, because their dumpsters are now brimming with a primordial stew so nasty that even the rats abandoned it.

THEIR DUMPSTERS ARE NOW BRIMMING WITH A PRIMORDIAL STEW SO NASTY THAT EVEN THE RATS ABANDONED IT.

Very strange side note here: There are no rats. Everyone talks about this, says the same thing — they haven't seen a rat since Day One. Here on Dry Land, where I live, we thought they'd over run us. But I don't know.

Anyway, I remember — until it was deemed injudicious by an image-conscious administration — when the city used to measure the success of Mardi Gras by announcing the accumulated tonnage of garbage that was collected during Carnival season. Well, by that measure, Kristina was a very successful hurricane.

Very.

Stink is a situation that TV and radio cannot successfully portray; olfactory being one of the senses not yet conquered by the airwaves or Internet. And until The Times-Picayune can successfully produce a scratch-n-sniff version of the daily newspaper — and this technology still seems to be at least three or four years down the road — then even we can only fail in our efforts to accurately capture the foulness of some of these street corners.

I don't mean to be complaining here, jumping on the gripe train and all that. Compared to losing a loved one, a home or a job, this is civic kibbles and bits. But in terms of livability, it matters. There seem to be 900 guys from Texas who've been trucked into town to cut down trees and limbs; aren't there a dozen guys from River Parish Disposal who can cruise around New Orleans every day picking up stuff?

The whole idea of it makes me very nostalgic, the radio playing in my back yard on autumn Sunday afternoons in New Orleans, after a Saints game, listening to Buddy D pitching River Parish Disposal: "Our business stinks, but it's picking up."

What a great slogan that is.

Buddy D. The Saints. Garbage pick-up. Ah, memories of my old New Orleans.

Katrina death toll surpasses 1,000

Storm is deadliest in state since 1893

By Karen Turni Bazile
Staff writer

The Louisiana death toll from Hurricane Katrina topped 1,000 on Friday, making it the most deadly hurricane in the state since 1893, when a Category 4 hurricane hit the barrier island Cheniere Caminada, killing 1,100 to 2,000 people, according to the National Weather Service.

The official state death toll for Katrina was 1,003, with 810 of those bodies at the state's St. Gabriel morgue. Those victims are primarily from St. Bernard and Orleans parishes. Also on Friday, the state released the identities of 42 more bodies, bringing the total identified to 73.

Nagin gambles on N.O. casino plan

Proposal would need approval from state, voters

By Frank Donze and Gordon Russell
Staff writers

Admitting he is desperate to jump-start New Orleans' shattered economy, Mayor Ray Nagin on Friday proposed creating a downtown casino district that would allow more than a half-dozen large hotels to open gambling halls that would compete directly with the giant Harrah's complex at the foot of Canal Street.

Nagin dropped the bombshell at an afternoon news conference where he reiterated that the city faces dire financial straits nearly six weeks after Hurricane Katrina ravaged the metropolitan area.

The mayor included his call for the drastic expansion of legalized gambling in a letter he sent this week to Gov. Kathleen Blanco. In the letter Nagin seeks Blanco's support for changes in the state's gambling laws and for another radical proposal: to give him the authority to start a citywide charter public school district.

He said he has asked the governor help him "jointly rewrite the rules as it relates to public education in New Orleans," creating at least 20 charter schools that would partner with foundations, universities and businesses.

"Now is the time to think outside the box." Nagin said, acknowledging that his casino initiative will generate significant opposition. "Now is the time to think about a bold vision for a cash-strapped city. We need solutions."

The announcement came just three days after Nagin laid off 3,000 municipal employees, about half the City Hall work force, citing evaporation of virtually all tax revenue.

During the next 12 to 24 months, Nagin told Blanco in the letter, the city "will be

Residents of the Lower 9th Ward are frustrated they have not been able to get in to see their neighborhood, parts of which, such as this section near the levee break, fared the worst in the city.

With residents desperate to return to New Orleans' last shuttered neighborhood, a re-entry plan has begun to emerge for the Lower 9th Ward, where some of the city's most disastrous flooding had drained to scattered ponds by Friday and only the echo of metal twisting in the wind broke the silence of a community still in exile.

State Rep. Charmaine Marchand, however, wants residents to be allowed to return as soon as Monday to homes between North Claiborne Avenue and the Mississippi River using a coordinated system of passenger vans that would ferry people across the St. Claude Avenue bridge and wind through streets that suffered massive flooding because of breaches in the levee lining the Industrial Canal.

"I know everybody needs closure," she said. "I need closure, too. I've been trying to

Levee failure theory gains support

Engineers think soft soil may be to blame

By Mark Schleifstein

A layer of soft, peaty soil about 25 feet below the base of the levee wall along the 17th Street Canal may have contributed to a breach that flooded much of New Orleans during Hurricane Katrina, a team of engineers said Friday.

Robert Bea, a professor of civil and environmental engineering at the University of California-Berkeley and a New Orleans native, said that the shifting of 35 feet of soil in the area of the breach was the result of the force of water on the wall overwhelming the ability of sheet piling beneath it to stay in place, which may have been the fault of the layer of peaty soil.

If the bottom of the piling didn't extend through the peaty soil to stronger soil beneath it, that may have caused the wall to fail and the earth to heave out, as is seen in the yards of homes along the eastern canal wall in New Orleans, said Bea, a member of a team of researchers financed by the National Science Foundation that is studying levee failures.

Crime rate barely a blip on the radar

He's not quite the Maytag repairman of police chiefs, but Warren Riley can say this about crime, the traditional bugaboo of New Orleans life: along with much of the city's population, it's largely gone, at least temporarily.

Before Katrina, each of the city's eight police districts averaged around 300-plus arrests a week, or about 2,500 total, NOPD spokesman Capt. Marlon Defillo said Friday. Since the hurricane, there have been 379 arrests in the entire city — fewer than 10 a day all told, and most of them for minor offenses.

Businesses' top woe is workers' housing

Places to live dry up in N.O.

By Ronette King
Business writer

Pepsi Americas' Elmwood warehouse holds 26 two-bedroom trailers, one trailer for children's recreation and one for washing clothes. The new arrangement is called Philville, after Phil Montero, the regional warehouse manager.

Ryan and Shantell Perez, married just five months, will live in one of the new trailers set up for employees at Pepsi Americas' distribution plant. Ryan Perez is the warehouse supervisor.

As New Orleans area business struggle to get restarted, the lack of housing for workers has popped up as one of the biggest problems. In fact, one old-line company is thinking of relocating if a solution isn't found soon.

"We've been in this city 103 years and we are not ready to leave yet," said Bob Maurer, president of Reily Foods Co. "We will make every effort to remain and to be part of the rebuilding of this city. The only reason we would leave is if we are forced to leave because they don't help us come up with a solution for housing."

With many of the city's apartments already filled with displaced residents and hotels brimming with relief workers from Hurricane Katrina, little housing is available within a two-hour drive.

And that has caused a problem for those companies that have managed to restore their factories and assembly lines and offices. They're hamstrung because many workers' homes were destroyed by the hurricane and can't find other nearby housing to resume work.

Some local companies have found the solution in trailers set up on their property by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Others have leased groups of apartments that the company sublets to employees.

At the Pepsi Americas distribution plant in Elmwood, a warehouse that normally houses vending machines is now home to 36 two-bedroom trailers, each stocked with bedding and toiletries supplied by the company for its displaced workers and their families. The space covers two city blocks and includes two additional trailers, one with washers, dryers and ironing boards, the other a recreation center for children. It is nicknamed Philville in honor of Phil Montero, the regional warehouse manager.

Although not many of the plant's 160 employees needed housing, Pepsi wanted to make sure they could get the distribution warehouse back to full capacity.

"We had customers up and operating," said Rita Weary, human resource manager for Pepsi Americas. "The one thing we wanted to do was make sure we could get our people back and the holdup they had was they had no place to live."

Days after the storm, Pepsi's corporate affairs department started working to procure the temporary housing. Montero, the warehouse manager, bought electrical lines and sewer lines into the warehouse to connect the trailers, both required for FEMA to supply the units.

"I just think we stood a much better chance of getting employees back if their families are able to come back," Montero said. "Other than that, we don't feel we had a good shot at getting our employees back."

At Kajun Kettle Foods in Elmwood, Pierre Hilzim did something a little different.

Days after the storm, Hilzim was trying to get the trailers on his own when he got a call from the Jefferson Economic Development Corp. asking whether any of his workers needed temporary housing. The state Department of Economic Development is administering the program for FEMA, and JEDCO has helped parish businesses get about 800 trailers so far, according to Jerry Bologna, economic development manager.

Kajun Kettle received 10 trailers and Hilzim set them up in the employee parking lot. With the trailers in place, the 24-year-old firm was able to get back up and running two weeks after the storm. Hilzim said the trailers house 10 to 17 workers a night but are available only to the workers, not their families.

"If you don't have your employees settled, you don't have a business," Hilzim said. "What we're doing is necessary for them."

Other employers scooped up some of the limited housing quickly. Immediately after the storm hit, Chase Bank, formerly Bank One, signed master leases for apartments in Gonzales, Jefferson Parish and other communities, and then rented them to bank workers. The bank company got a few recreational vehicles and parked those on bank property in some cases and rented those to employees, too.

Other workers are living in Baton Rouge and commuting to work daily in van pools that the bank helped arrange, said Michael Lulich, head of retail banking for southeast Louisiana who oversees the estimated 700 bank branch workers.

Also, Chase determined that child care was an issue for many workers, so Chase located a child care center on the West Bank that wasn't damaged but whose teachers had evacuated. Then Chase moved teachers from its Monroe mortgage servicing center to New Orleans to work in the child care center.

For Reily Foods, the solution isn't simple. Reily has resumed business with a skeleton crew, but needs many more. Maurer said he's tried unsuccessfully to solve his employees' housing shortage, and now he hopes local government can step in and expedite matters.

The maker of mayonnaise, chili mix, salad dressings and other foods, Reily operates two area manufacturing plants: one in eastern New Orleans, which produces Luzianne tea and private-label coffees, and the other is the Blue Plate mayonnaise plant on South Jefferson Davis Parkway. Reily's headquarters has been temporarily moved from Magazine Street to Knoxville, Tenn., where the company operates another plant.

Although the company has space on the site of its eastern New Orleans plant for trailers, the industrial location isn't conducive to family living, Maurer said. And with much of eastern New Orleans devastated, there are no nearby stores or other services for family needs. Maurer tried to put the FEMA trailers in trailer parks nearby off Chef Menteur Highway but was told FEMA trailers weren't welcome.

Maurer said all levels of government – city, state and FEMA - need to work with business to find a solution within the next 30 to 60 days. The city's long-term recovery depends on getting its workforce back to work, Maurer said.

If a company's employees can't return, he said, "then employers like ourselves have to begin to (ask) what are we going to do with our plants, how are we going to protect our franchise, how are we going to deliver products to people who depend on them?"

Federal cash would help cities pay workers

But money would have to be repaid

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Louisiana communities will qualify for low-interest loans to pay police, firefighters and other essential employees under legislation passed Friday by the U.S. House and Senate. But unlike previous disaster aid packages, the federal government is barred from forgiving the loans.

The legislation, passed by voice votes in both chambers, could avert some of the large-scale layoffs already announced by local governments, including in New Orleans. But the inability of Louisiana lawmakers to get an escape clause for the debts signals a tough road ahead for getting the massive federal assistance state officials say is needed to rebuild southern Louisiana.

Passage of the loan legislation, which provides as much as $750 million in federal loans, came after Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., kept the Senate in session through the night Thursday. She was attempting, without luck, to amend the legislation so the federal government could forgive the loans, as it has for some $227 billion in disaster loans over the past 31 years.

Landrieu said the insistence that all loans be repaid, even by communities that have lost virtually their entire tax base, amounts to treating the Gulf Coast "in some second-class fashion."

Her delaying tactics brought a rebuke on the Senate floor from fellow Louisiana Sen. David Vitter, R-La., who said her action threatened passage because the House might adjourn for the 10-day Columbus Day recess before being able to take up the legislation. Vitter later praised the House for acting with unusual speed.

Issue could be revisited

In an interview, Vitter said House GOP leaders and the White House had insisted on the ban on loan forgiveness because they didn't want to "invite the possibility" of loans not being repaid if it wasn't absolutely necessary.

But he said he has gotten assurances that if Gulf Coast governments are unable to repay the loans that the White House and House Republican leaders would support forgiveness in subsequent legislation.

The importance of the legislation shouldn't be minimized, Vitter said, because it provides critical loans that will enable parishes and municipalities in Louisiana and Mississippi to pay essential workers.

FEMA assistance currently can be used only to help pay for overtime pay, and loans are limited to no more than $5 million per entity, which "clearly is insufficient" for cities such as New Orleans, Vitter said. Those limits are lifted by the legislation passed Friday. The White House said President Bush would sign the bill into law quickly.

"What's important to real people in the real world in the real devastated area is that we get real help to them today, not give a speech, not filibuster."

SEN. DAVID VITTER, R-LA.

"What's important to real people in the real world in the real devastated area is that we get real help to them today, not give a speech, not filibuster," Vitter said in critical reference to Landrieu.

Landrieu said she wouldn't "respond in kind" to Vitter's criticism. The Democrat said she and Vitter, despite past disagreements, had been working together to gain loan forgiveness and other improvements in the legislation. She noted that the White House had initially insisted on a package no higher than $300 million and had been persuaded to accept a $750 million package.

After days of working together, Landrieu said Vitter "decided there was no more use in trying" for loan forgiveness even though she wanted to try one more day to improve the bill.

"The Gulf Coast states have been basically forced by the Republican leadership in the House to accept help under conditions that have never been imposed on any state, city, region, county, sheriff, mayor ever before in the history of the country," Landrieu said.

Blame game

There was some clear shifting of blame during Friday's debate on the House and Senate floor.

Rep. Richard Baker, R-Baton Rouge, said the House was stuck with the version that had passed the Senate because the Senate had already adjourned and Louisiana needed the help immediately.

But Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-La., didn't accept Baker's explanation.

"Sen. Vitter worked in this House for six years and knows its leadership," Melancon said. "He has placed the blame squarely at their feet, and I think they owe the entire Gulf Coast an explanation."

On the Senate floor, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., recalled how Congress had provided New York City with $20 billion after the 2001 terrorist attacks "without telling New Yorkers that, 'Well, you're just going to have to figure out how you're going to repay when you're not even sure there's another attack coming.'" The same good will should be given residents of the Gulf Coast, she said.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., made one final attempt Friday morning to get an amendment allowing forgiveness of loans if approved by Congress. But Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., objected, killing the amendment under Senate rules. Frist then moved to pass the original bill, with the controversial provision that states, "notwithstanding section 417 of the Stafford Act, such loans may not be canceled."

Neither Landrieu nor Levin objected, and the bill was declared passed.

Melancon said issuing loans to governments with no immediate prospects of recovering their tax base is untenable.

"My advice to them: Take the money and run," Melancon said. "Spend it on your sheriff's deputies, your firefighters and our public hospitals. Spend it and don't pay it back."

Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, said he is "greatly disappointed by the change in precedent" for loan forgiveness. So was Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, saying, "The federal government has forgiven over $227 billion in loans for other communities. What makes my city or the Gulf Region any different?"

Harold Turner, executive director of the Louisiana Sheriffs Association, said state sheriffs' departments have had a hard time qualifying for federal financing because they operate under different rules than counterparts in other states. Vitter said he's been assured the Louisiana sheriffs would qualify for the loans, although Landrieu said she would have preferred language that spelled out their eligibility.

"Right now we just have to pray that in fact we are included," Turner said.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco called passage of the bill "bittersweet" because it provides $750 million in "much needed funding through the Community Disaster Loan Program but doesn't allow for loan forgiveness."

Fannie Mae counts on major losses

Company may be down $550 million

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Embattled mortgage giant Fannie Mae disclosed Friday that it expects losses of between $250 million and $550 million because of hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

The largest U.S. buyer and guarantor of home mortgages made the estimate in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, which is investigating the company's accounting. The anticipated losses stem from Fannie Mae's guarantees of timely principal and interest payments on home loans and from its investment holdings of securities that are tied to mortgages in the affected Gulf Coast areas.

The Mortgage Bankers Association, an industry trade group, has estimated that some 360,000 single-family mortgages in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama were affected by Katrina and the ensuing floods.

Despite the losses, government-sponsored Fannie Mae said it expects to exceed the requirements set by federal regulators for its reserve capital as a cushion against risk.

Government-sponsored Fannie Mae has said it likely will not complete the reworking of its accounting, ordered by federal regulators, before the second half of next year. The company still hasn't filed its annual report for 2004.

Federal regulators accused Fannie Mae in the fall of 2004 of serious accounting problems and earnings manipulation to meet Wall Street targets, and the SEC in December ordered the company to restate earnings back to 2001 — a correction that could reach an estimated $11 billion.

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, its smaller rival in the $8 trillion home-mortgage market, have encouraged lenders to return September mortgage payments from people displaced by Hurricane Katrina.

Plans to help uninsured left hanging in Congress

Fiscal conservatives seek broad overhaul

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Flooded-out homeowners in southeast Louisiana shouldn't expect relief anytime soon from Congress, which left Friday for a weeklong recess with legislation to help cover uninsured losses still in the talking stages.

Tens of thousands of homes were flooded during Hurricane Katrina, and insurance companies have informed residents that the damage is not covered by their homeowners' insurance policies. Those with flood insurance policies face $250,000 caps that may not be enough to rebuild.

Mississippi has sued insurers to cover the losses, and some homeowners have filed private lawsuits as well.

A congressional fix for the problem is being discussed, but a consensus has been slow to take shape.

The most prominent proposal is by Rep. Gene Taylor, D-Miss., who wants to let homeowners buy into the National Flood Insurance Program to cover their losses from Hurricane Katrina. Under his bill, homeowners would pay 10 years' worth of premiums, plus a 5 percent penalty, to get the coverage. The bill has 32 co-sponsors, including Reps. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, and Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville.

But it is being eyed warily by fiscal conservatives, who are loath to expand the flood insurance program before it is overhauled. Critics have long complained that the program encourages people to stay in flood-prone areas by paying for repetitive losses.

Rep. Earl Blumenauer, D-Ore., a leading proponent of flood insurance change, is an unexpected supporter of the Taylor bill. But he said it would have to go hand-in-hand with broad-based reforms of the program such as mandating flood insurance for those in flood-prone regions.

Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, said getting some relief for people who didn't have flood insurance is a top priority. But he said it's been slow going in Congress.

"We've been told there is a comprehensive approach under development and we have been asked to wait to consider it," said Jindal, who declined to say who has asked him to hold up on legislation. "This has to be addressed sooner rather than later so people have incentive to rebuild."

Jindal said he is considering a bill that would set up a financial pool that state and federal governments would pay in to, along with the insurance industry. Industry officials say that companies are unlikely to support any plan that requires them to pay over and above what homeowners' policies require.

"We want to pay what we owe, not a penny less and not a penny more," said Jim Dudas, a spokesman for Allstate, which covers nearly 21 percent of the homes in Louisiana.

Since Katrina struck five weeks ago, Allstate has renewed efforts to push for a national catastrophe insurance fund paid for by those who live in high-risk areas. The fund would be backed by state and federal governments.

"Just as the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation protects depositors from losing money when banks are insolvent, the federal and state governments should act to guarantee that claims are paid after an extreme catastrophe," an Allstate position paper said.

Such a fund, however, would do nothing to bail out people in Louisiana whose homes are damaged or ruined and who lacked insurance to cover their losses. Congress is due back in session Oct. 17.
