Now the Bush administration is trying to change all that. That means trying to get around the corruption that made the city such a rotten place to do business. The White House is trying to do this by devising programs in which checks and benefits flow directly to recipients, not through local agencies.

That means challenging the reigning assumptions. Right now the White House is fighting with Louisiana over where to house evacuees. The state wants to put temporary trailer parks on far-away military bases, where there are no jobs and where they will live in "abject dependency," as one senior White House official puts it. The Bush folks want to put temporary housing within a mile of the original neighborhoods so people can become self-sufficient as quickly as possible.

On Thursday, the president was honest about the cost of all this, but he only began to lay out a plan. The Bushies are still trying to figure out how to help people from broken families and those with mental disabilities. They're trying to figure out where to cut government to offset the costs. There are arguments about what New Orleans should try to be, a smaller controlled-growth Portland, Ore., or a booming and spreading Houston.

Like Franklin Roosevelt in the New Deal era, Bush doesn't have a complete vision of what he wants to achieve. But he does have an instinctive framework.

His administration is going to fight a two-front war, against big government liberals and small government conservatives, but if he can devote himself to executing his policies, the Gulf Coast will be his TVA, the program that serves as a model for what can be done nationwide.

Next stop is dump for those whose homes are trashed

Allen Prestenbach of Lafitte empties his family's trash cans in Lafitte's temporary dump. The volume of trash in the New Orleans area, government officials said, will be unprecedented and could cost at least $1.5 billion to clean up.

Three refrigerators wrapped in duct tape rose above the garbage heap last week in front of Allen Gaudet's Old Metairie home, the tallest pieces in a mound that included a bookshelf, upholstered chairs, end tables, a wading pool, a computer monitor, a lawnmower and a half-dozen bags filled with moldy pots and pans.

"This is my pile," Gaudet said, standing next to the chest-high stash of items that were ruined when four feet of floodwater poured into his neighborhood Aug. 30 because of a breach in the 17th Street Canal levee. "And this is not even the construction" debris.

A few doors down, another sealed fridge containing the sickly sweet remnants of a whole, uncooked turkey had become the cornerstone for Steve Brinson's flood junk. With black mold inching up the drywall of his East Livingston Place home, he expected the heap to match Gaudet's in a matter of days.

"There'll be a lot of stuff piled up, and I have a pickup truck, so I'll be heading to the dump," Brinson said. "But stuff is stuff. It's just stuff. I've got my family. All of this is just stuff."

As tens of thousands of evacuees trickled home last week to find their houses in varying degrees of ruin, so began the arduous, smelly and often emotional task of carrying to the curb the soggy, mildewed vestiges of life before Hurricane Katrina. The volume of trash, government officials said, will be unprecedented and could cost at least $1.5 billion to clean up.

The estimates include: 22 million tons of construction and landscaping waste; more than 350,000 automobiles, with 1.75 million tires; 50,000 boats; and 1 million "white goods," such as washing machines and refrigerators. And that is state leaders' estimate for Louisiana alone, without debris from devastated areas of Mississippi and Alabama.

"There's no comparison," said Chuck Brown, assistant secretary at the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality. "At the largest landfill in the state, they process a million tons (of garbage) a year."

Included among the estimates are thousands of southeast Louisiana homes that may have to be demolished, according to the state's Department of Environmental Quality and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. Entire sections of New Orleans could be bulldozed, their wood-framed houses no longer stable after sitting for days in putrid floodwater. St. Bernard Parish officials have said structures in as much as 80 percent of the parish may be razed.

The cost, too, will be staggering. The sum skyrocketed to $1.5 billion Thursday, when three out-of-state firms won competitive contracts to direct Louisiana's waste management, said Bob Anderson, a spokesman for the Corps, which handles disaster debris cleanup for the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The deals included an initial cap of $500 million, with an option for another $500 million for each firm. The contractors are: Environmental Chemical Corp. of Burlingame, Calif.; Ceres Environmental Services Inc. of Brooklyn Park, Minn.; and Phillips and Jordan Inc. of Zephyrhills, Fla.

Ashbritt Inc., the Pompano Beach, Fla., company that led Louisiana's $3 million emergency debris collection effort, won an identical contract in Mississippi, Anderson said. The agreements require contractors to hire local and disadvantaged companies as subcontractors and likely will be the first of several deals enacted to handle hurricane refuse.

"The debris removal for the state of Louisiana will far exceed Hurricane Andrew," the Category 4 storm that caused $20 billion of damage and leveled entire communities in Florida in 1992, Anderson said. Crews hauled away 17 million cubic yards of debris after that storm, at a cost of $375 million.

The Corps estimates that Katrina has created 37 million cubic yards of ruin in Louisiana – enough debris to fill the Louisiana Superdome about eight times. The final tally, however, could reach 75 million cubic yards if all homes that have languished for weeks in the Lake Pontchartrain and tidal surge floods have to be flattened, Anderson said. Early estimates set the price tag for initial collection and disposal at more than $2 billion.

All refuse from Katrina likely will rest ultimately in south Louisiana, in part to protect the rest of the state and nation from unintentional infestation by the local Formosan termite. The region has ample landfill space to handle the influx of trash, Brown said. Indeed the owner of a landfill in Waggaman said he can accommodate 70 million tons of waste.

In addition, DEQ has designated 49 sites in nine parishes as zones for chipping and burning tree waste or for receiving garbage from residents, department records show. Three sites, including the Municipal Auditorium and the Fair Grounds in New Orleans, have opened for automobile collection. Lafreniere Park in East Jefferson hosts a growing pile of yard waste that last week was 100 yards long and five stories tall.

Still, officials are considering opening two or three shuttered landfills near New Orleans to deposit construction and demolition trash so hurricane garbage doesn't sap valuable space from operational dumps, Brown said. He added that many closed C&D dumps across the state don't have liners to protect against chemical seepage because they are not required by law. Brown would not say whether his department intended to hold public hearings before reactivating closed dumps. DEQ's Katrina emergency declaration, issued Aug. 30, does not specifically require public hearings on hurricane-related plans. A spokeswoman for Gov. Kathleen Blanco said hearings would not be required and that a citizen's appeal would not halt an emergency move such as reopening a landfill.

Besides dumping, Brown said the state "will recycle everything that we possibly can."

Wood waste will be mulched to fuel paper mill boilers; ash from burned limbs will be spread for soil enhancement; some fallen tree trunks may be bound like Christmas trees and hauled to coastal areas "so we can shore up the coastline."

Environmental Protection Agency teams will assist local authorities to rifle through vehicles, white goods and other property to remove Freon, gasoline, mercury, propane and other hazardous materials, then turn them over to contractors to salvage parts or send recyclable metals to collection yards, said Bill Hines, FEMA's deputy public assistance officer for debris.

Authorities also will try to remove chemicals and white goods from homes before they're bulldozed. "There will be a household hazardous waste sweep where we can," he said.

As official plans unfold, however, so too will improvised solutions, said Rick Richter, a regional director for the South Carolina Department of Health and Environmental Control. Richter said that after Hurricane Hugo in 1989, residents illegally burned all sorts of waste, wreaking environmental havoc and making a final storm-trash tally something of a mystery.

"We didn't want it to be done, things like roofing tar and shingles, PVC pipe, whatever they could put in a pile and set on fire," he said.

In Algiers, authorities on Thursday put up a fence around a pile of mattresses, chairs and other trash dumped in the parking lot of a shuttered Schwegmann's store. New Orleans Councilwoman Jacquelyn Brechtel Clarkson said the unauthorized dumping of trash from the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, which became a last-chance shelter during Katrina, absolutely had to stop.

"I want whoever did that to be hung," said Clarkson, who represents the city's West Bank. "We are rebuilding New Orleans from Algiers and the French Quarter, so we can't let Algiers become a dump. Algiers was contamination-free, and we didn't need some idiot to bring us contamination from the east bank, especially from the convention center."

MOVING STORM DEBRIS

State and federal inspectors are looking for land to serve as new landfill sites in Mississippi for debris from Hurricane Katrina. Some landfill sites are nearing capacity and can't handle the massive amount of storm waste.

Cleanup efforts in Mississippi and Louisiana:

COLLECTION
- ▶ Workers clear only roads and public property
- ▶ Tree limbs and brush removed from lumber, metal and household debris
- ▶ Bulldozers load debris in trucks to take to temporary lots

SEPARATION
- ▶ Debris at reduction sites is separated again
- ▶ Mattresses, vinyl siding, toys and rusted metal are shredded
- ▶ Trees and shrubs are burned or ground into wood chips

NEW LANDFILL SITES
- ▶ Approval takes months, but officials have sped up process
- ▶ Crews can have roads to new sites built in a week for debris

Evacuees may dry up Houston's job market

But many think they're better off looking in Texas

By Tara Young
Staff writer

STAFF PHOTO BY ELIOT KAMENITZ

Darnell Johnson, right, carries possessions out of an apartment in Houston as his wife, Telesha, and son Justin help pack up to move into a hotel. The displaced family plans to start a new life in Houston. 'It seems like it's going to be useless to go back,' Darnell Johnson said.

HOUSTON — As scores of other job seekers scurried past, Sabrina Lynn mentally checked off the companies she wouldn't interview with from a list of employers at a recent job fair.

Although she had come to terms with losing her job, her four-bedroom home and her car in eastern New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina, Lynn said she wouldn't take an entry-level position that would prevent her from providing the quality of life her family was forced to leave behind.

"I was in sales," said Lynn, disappointed that the major hotels in town weren't at the job fair. "I don't want to be out pounding the pavement for just anything. I'm too old for that."

With the reality that it will take months, possibly years, for life to return to normal in New Orleans, many Louisiana residents are relocating or, at the very least, finding temporary jobs in the Houston area.

Some are snatching up anything to make ends meet, while others are more calculated in their job searches as Houston area business leaders work to fill the void by hosting job fairs and networking events for the displaced.

Barton Smith, director of the Institute for Regional Forecasting at the University of Houston, estimated 20,000 to 30,000 people from the New Orleans area will be looking for employment during the next several weeks. That influx might stretch thin the job market. About 30,600 jobs were created in the area within the last 12 months ending in August. The numbers equated to about 10,000 more jobs in the Houston area than the previous 12-month period ending in August 2004, according to the Texas Workforce Commission.

The job market is "going to have a hard time absorbing workers," Smith said. "You are asking to absorb right now the number it took an entire year to absorb."

Crowded schools seek staff

The WorkSource, a public employment agency responsible for 13 counties in southeast Texas, including the Houston area, reported a threefold increase in the number of applicants from the usual 5,000 to 16,000 in the first two weeks of September.

Mike Temple, work force manager for The WorkSource, said he is confident the market would stretch to accommodate the increase.

"I think there's enough for everybody," Temple said. "Right now we always need people in health care, education and oil field related (industries)."

Many evacuees might find themselves working in education.

The Houston Independent School District, the nation's 7th largest school district with more than 200,000 students, recently held a job fair where a district spokeswoman said 1,000 applicants showed up. Applications are being processed to help fill the demand for more teachers and staff for the more than 3,400 students from Louisiana who have enrolled in the school system. Overall, the region has absorbed nearly 20,000 students, the Harris County Department of Education said.

Registering their 13-year-old twin boys and finding day care for their three younger sons is the next step for Darnell and Telesha Johnson of Marrero. who want to start a business in Houston.

The Johnsons, who are searching for financial assistance to help them secure an apartment, said they couldn't afford to travel to Jefferson Parish to see the damage for themselves. It was easier just to stay in Texas. "It seems like it's going to be useless to go back," said Darnell Johnson, who plans on helping his wife re-establish her online business while searching for a full-time job.

Houston seems right for now, said Telesha Johnson, who purchased a laptop computer and plans to have the business up and running again this week.

"I'm very interested in seeing what the city of Houston has to offer," Telesha Johnson said. "We are willing to work. We just need the opportunity."

'A better place'

Belinda Hart, who slept on her apartment balcony for several days before being rescued by helicopter with her family in eastern New Orleans, said she'll take whatever job comes her way to stay in Houston.

"I think that God has moved us to a better place," said Hart, who is four months pregnant and recently attended a job fair with her two young children. "I have no regrets."

The young mother said she will not miss the crime and violence that plagued New Orleans and was hopeful she and her children would have a better life in Texas.

"You have to look forward," Hart said. "You can't look back to what you've lost. Everyone that survived this, I believe they are here for a reason. "

Although some are not having any problems entering the Houston job market, others might take longer to find their niche, said Katy Greenwood, an associate professor in human development and consumer sciences at the University of Houston, who has worked in the past with displaced residents.

"You can't look for a job while you're grieving or under stress," Greenwood said. "I know a lot of them are still worrying about their families."

Most jobs won't be found at the unemployment office but through good old-fashioned networking, Greenwood said. The more contacts, the better, she said. "It's the perfect time to reassess," Greenwood said. "It's a whole new beginning."

'A lot more opportunity'

A fresh start is just what Thomas Taube of New Orleans is looking for. Although he still has a job at the Hotel Royal in New Orleans, he has lost everything else, said Taube, who has been attending Houston-area job fairs in search of work.

"At this point, I don't hold a lot of hope for anything," said Taub. While Hurricane Katrina might have swept away his belongings, Taube said Houston area residents have been more than generous to him and his partner, Thomas Harmon.

A friend has let them use a vacant home, and Whole Foods Market has provided Harmon with a new job and money for relocation, Taube said.

Harmon, who is from Houston and worked at Whole Foods in New Orleans, said the Austin, Texas-based company is working to find openings for all its displaced employees.

In the end, Harmon said, New Orleans residents who choose to stay in Houston will have more opportunities.

AN ARTFUL DODGE

The New Orleans Museum of Art in City Park survived with its facilities and collections nearly intact

THE APPEARANCE OF the New Orleans Museum of Art's great hall is unchanged since Hurricane Katrina blew through two weeks ago, but the atmosphere within the neoclassic interior last week was decidedly different.

Behind the reception desk where, ordinarily, genteel docents take admissions and dispense museum maps, a volunteer New York City policeman stood guard, a skeleton motif bandana around his head and a riot gun in his hand.

Other NYC officers patrolled the front steps and a squad of National Guardsmen monitored traffic at 1 Collins Diboll in City Park. What was once a welcoming cultural destination now has the forbidding feel of an armed camp. But the treasures inside are certainly safe.

A Category 5 hurricane, breeched levees, a loss of power and limited police protection in the early days of the disaster presented a worst case scenario for New Orleans museums. Some fared better than others, though, all things considered, the current situation could be much worse.

NINTH-GRADER AT HOLY CROSS

"Saturday afternoon I was just chilling with my friends on St. Claude Avenue. We got up early to prepare for a family reunion in Houma. The people on the TV said that if the hurricane hit, it would be pure devastation. Outside, it was just really beautiful. No one in the city had any reason to believe it was coming.

"We left for the reunion in Houma, thinking it would just pass. The whole day we kept saying, 'Ain't nothing going to happen.' We never believed it could all be gone. Sunday morning, my family headed toward Baton Rouge with my sisters. My friend and I were stuck in Houma.

"The roads to Texas were packed and we figured we couldn't get out. On Sunday afternoon, when Mayor Ray Nagin told us to get out or we'd be stuck, four of us and a baby headed for Lafayette. We drove all night and slept in the car at a rest stop. They slept. I didn't feel safe. People were everywhere at the rest stop wandering around.

"Then the storm hit.

"We couldn't find a hotel room, so, we drove all night back to Houma. For two days, we watched on the television the scenes from New Orleans. We saw all the violence, the chaos and we never saw our house, but we saw our neighborhood. I saw my friend from around the way in those waters, that nasty, nasty water. We knew nothing was going be the same. To us, it was impossible that it was all gone.

"I needed to be with my family, so, my friend's mother drove me to Baton Rouge. My family needed money, food and clothes. Not a lot, just something to get us by, but we couldn't find any help. For days, we stayed in the Bethany shelter watching and waiting for FEMA or the Red Cross to give us answers. My mom, she said we couldn't wait anymore. We had to get out of Louisiana. It took us 20 minutes and $280 to buy eight bus tickets.

"I never rode a Greyhound bus before. We normally take a plane to Atlanta. There's no money for plane tickets anymore. My momma just wants us to get our lives back.

"I want to go to school again. I don't want to be here (in a bus station in Baton Rouge) waiting on a bus. I want to be home — not squashed on a cramped bus with my knees all buckled up in somebody's back."

GUMBO? YEAH! YEAH!

When the going gets tough, the tough start cooking. At least they do if they're New Orleanians.

Begin with a gumbo, the ultimate Louisiana comfort food. It will be a challenge to make a gumbo in someone else's kitchen. Can a roux get dark but not burnt in an aluminum frying pan? Where in the world do those people keep their sharp knives? Don't they grow any okra in this part of the world?

It will be another challenge to make a gumbo in a town that isn't normally stocked with oysters and crabs and shrimp and andouille. But substitutions are allowed (DON'T try kielbasa), unconventional methods will no doubt be forgiven (anise does NOT have the same effect as file) and creativity will certainly be rewarded (shrimp and scallops DO make a sweet combination).

Avoid those hot sauces that come pouring out of the bottle in glugs rather than drops. And stay away from converted rice. Other than that, have at it. Your hosts will be charmed by the effort. Your family will be forever grateful.

And when you get right down to it, how bad can any gumbo be?

The NEW ORLEANS MUSEUM OF ART in City Park survived nearly intact

International Investigative Group guard Stephen Dux patrols the upstairs concourse at the New Orleans Museum of Art, which had only 24 out of 40,000 objects affected by Hurricane Katrina.

ARTFUL, from C-1

NOMA deputy director Jacqueline Sullivan, who road an airboat through flooded City Park to the museum last week, said that of the 40,000 objects at the museum, only 24 were touched by the storm. The museum building was virtually undamaged by the high winds or flood, though what Sullivan describes as hydroscopic pressure forced three inches of water through the building's foundation into the storage vaults, where it reached a few Japanese prints, photos and Native American kachina dolls.

The Sydney and Walda Besthoff Sculpture Garden beside NOMA had been prepared for the coming storm, with many of the more vulnerable elements moved inside. Only one piece, Kenneth Snelson's "Virlane Tower," a spare geometric obelisk made of tensioned steel wire and rods, valued at $500,000, had crumpled into the lagoon.

Sullivan said that three museum engineers and three security guards stayed in the museum with their families — 39 people in all — through the storm and the four days after, until National Guard troops asked them to leave, assuming the security duties themselves. Air conditioning has been restored to the collections after a short hiatus when fuel in a generator ran out and NOMA plans to open a remote office at the Louisiana Arts and Science Center in Baton Rouge in the next weeks.

"As soon as the mayor gives the OK, we'll reopen," Sullivan said. "Our exhibition schedule may change, but at this point we're flexible."

Elsewhere in the bedraggled city, things didn't go so smoothly.

By far the most harrowing tale of museum survival was told by Jake Staples, assistant director of facilities at the D-Day Museum, where 30 to 40 looters at a time marauded through the ground floor of the glass-faced building as he hid in a gallery on the second floor.

"From Wednesday night to Friday evening I was bunkered down behind the serpentine wall on the second floor," he said of his hair-raising ordeal.

Staples reports with relief that the museum exhibits went essentially untouched while "the gift shop and PJ's (coffee shop) got trashed."

Nowhere else was the drama so intense, though there were places that damage was more severe.

Much of the copper roof was torn from the Louisiana State Museum at the Old Mint at the foot of Esplanade Avenue, a depository of much of Louisiana's jazz memorabilia collection. The pieces of roof lay tossed onto the lawn like crumpled aluminum foil.

Angele Davis, secretary of Louisiana Department of Culture, Recreation and Tourism, said she sent recovery teams into the city immediately after the storm, combing through French Quarter museums. The teams found the vast majority of priceless items intact, among them Louis Armstrong's trumpet, surely as paramount a symbol for New Orleans as the Mississippi River. Only 1 percent of the museum's jazz memorabilia was wet by storm waters, Davis reported. Those objects are currently being gently freeze-dried at the LSU Library in Baton Rouge to prevent further damage, while tarps have replaced the copper sheeting to prevent further leaks.

"We're very fortunate that our state's cultural assets survived the brunt of the storm," Davis said.

Clay tiles from the roof of the Historic New Orleans Collection — a document, photo and regional painting archive in the French Quarter — broke free and smashed onto Toulouse Street, but no water entered the building during the storm.

Fearing possible post-Katrina damage, HNOC director Priscilla Lawrence led a Louisiana National Guard-escorted rescue party to the museum, removing two truckloads of historic documents, which have been stored in an undisclosed museum elsewhere in the state.

"We moved original manuscripts and artwork," Lawrence said, "just to spread the risk in case there was a fire. Everyday you heard something horrible was happening. There was so much military presence in the French Quarter, we felt perfectly safe."

The art galleries along Julia and Royal streets seemed largely intact when viewed from outside, with only an occasional broken windowpane or water stain to mark Katrina's passing.

At the Contemporary Arts Center, the Crescent City's Camp Street venue for cutting-edge expression, the fourth floor windows were punched through by the pressure of Katrina's hurricane-force winds, glass shards and rain showering into the atrium below, sparing the exhibit in the closed upstairs gallery.

"The old, old water tank on top of the roof ruptured and that slipped over to the Joseph street side," said CAC employee Neal Fuselier, who was escorted to the building by a police office friend six days after the storm. "That's what knocked the edge off the roof. But the art work is perfect, excellent, not damaged."

Security guards manning the lobby of the Ogden Museum of Southern Art, across the street form the CAC in the Warehouse District, reported that the museum was virtually untouched by Katrina, with continuous air-conditioning to the collection vaults throughout the aftermath of the storm.

Like NOMA, security guards were present at the Ogden until asked to leave by the National Guard on Friday. A remote office at the St. Tammany Art Association in Covington will be established in the near future.

"The damage to the city is tragic," Ogden curator David Houston from his refuge in South Carolina, "but it will cause a creative burst. Tragedies always do."

'Head-rocking' is no cause for alarm

QUESTION: When I put my 4-month-old son down to sleep, he shakes his head right and left pretty hard for a while and then falls to sleep. I think he's trying to get comfortable but he shakes his head quite a bit. Is this a need for concern?

— C.H.

ANSWER: Head rocking isn't uncommon as a soothing technique or a way of quieting one's self when a baby is adjusting to a transition like going to sleep. It can be like thumb-sucking or other soothing techniques.

With this kind of rocking, though, babies sometimes wear patches of hair off the backs of their heads in the process. Sleeping on their backs is difficult for active babies, who can more easily cuddle themselves and find their thumbs when lying on their bellies.

T. BERRY BRAZELTON

But our concern about the danger of SIDS (Sudden Infant Death Syndrome) makes it necessary to position babies this age on their backs, even though they then may resort to behaviors like this head rocking to soothe themselves.

When your baby is awake, you can prop him up at an angle at this age so he can look around, and begin to reach for a safe toy strung across his crib. Don't leave him too much. Carry him with you, or talk to him or play with him.

Are you worried about whether this head-rocking represents a neurological problem? It certainly needn't be, for many healthy young children do rock. If you're worried, check him out with his doctor and let him know your concern. He or she can look for other symptoms in order to reassure you.

Q. I have an 18-month-old child who is like a piranha. He bites two or three times a day at daycare and I dread the "Oh, no" reports I have to sign upon picking him up — not to mention the criticism I receive from the director because the other parents want my child kicked out of school. How can I get him to stop biting?

— C.K.

A. Biting is common at this age, but two or three times a day — on a regular basis — does sound excessive. It would be hard to blame the daycare staff and parents for being concerned about him.

Biting episodes usually occur when a toddler is losing control, or getting too excited. He may not yet have learned to socialize and biting is his way of engaging his peers and seeking attention, even if it's negative.

So of course the frantic reactions that biting usually sets off means he'll get plenty of attention, leading him to bite again. He may also need to bite again to try to figure out what all the fuss is about, or because the intense reactions around him give him a sense of power that very little else he can do ever does.

Perhaps the teachers could try to respond to some of the positive things he does with as much intensity. And you might look for a playmate his own age who won't put up with his aggressive responses, one who, when he bites, will say, "It hurts. I don't like it. I won't play with you if you bite."

To put a stop to all the biting, details about what sets it off and what settles it down are needed, but often these are lost in the panic reactions. Then, of course, no one knows what to do.

Ask for the details of some of these incidents at daycare. Are there warning signs in his behavior that might tip teachers off to move in early to distract or even briefly isolate him? Are there specific triggers, predictable events that upset him or overexcite him that can be avoided, or if unavoidable can be followed up with individualized soothing?

You might suggest that he either be given something safe to bite on before he bites anyone. Once he does, he needs to be put in a safe isolated place and told quietly, "No one likes to be bitten. When you can get yourself under control, you can play again."

But he'll need the teachers to return quickly to comfort him. If he tries to contain himself, he needs praise for that: "It's tough to be 2 years old and unable to control yourself."

Learning how is a lifetime project and you can start by teaching him how.

Be kind to your deadbeat of an ex

DEAR CAROLYN:

Three years ago, I broke up with my then-fiancé. We had dated long-distance the entirety of my college career. He's six years older, and his life had not changed a bit (same dead-end job, same crappy apartment, same pot-smoking) while I was in college. When I moved back home after graduation to be with him, I realized that I had changed and he hadn't, and that this wasn't the life I wanted or the man I wanted to marry. I gave back the ring, broke his heart, and understandably he felt betrayed. I moved away and have not spoken to him or seen him since.

CAROLYN HAX

Fast forward to today: I'm newly married to a wonderful man, I have a successful career, life is good. I've heard that my ex is working the same job and hasn't had a long-term relationship since our break-up. I'm also fairly certain he has heard that I'm married. I know one day my husband and I will run into my ex, since we return to my hometown at least once a year. How do I handle the situation gracefully? I don't wish my ex ill, but also have no interest in feigning friendliness that I do not feel.

Impending Awkwardness

DEAR AWKWARDNESS:

"Hi. This is (husband). I hope life has been treating you well." It's something you can say sincerely, I hope, even if you don't feel friendly.

Something else you can do: Level your head, so you can look him in the eye without looking down your nose. You may have outgrown him, and chosen connubial bliss over his cannabial rut, and therefore earned your pride and relief.

But don't vilify a guy you once found attractive, just to ease the burden of breaking his heart.

There's also no guarantee either of you is long for either station in life. He could very well clean up and soar as your marriage and hot career tank — and it's always better to find humility before it goes out looking for you.

HEY CAROLYN:

I'm a few months into a great relationship and we're both still working out the kinks. We have a ton in common personality-wise, but differ widely on issues of lifestyle preference: She hates anything mildly offensive, I just went to see "The Aristocrats" and loved it. She is pretty religious and quietly demands that I rise to her level. I work in entertainment and she refuses to have a TV or stereo. The list can go on. I say all this to ask, at what point do smaller clashes of lifestyle add up to a bigger problem of compatibility?

—Capitol Hill

DEAR CAPITOL:

Opposites do just fine — theoretically and anecdotally — when the love and respect are for any differences, not in spite of them, and when you're both confident in your own lifestyle choices.

The problems start when one of you wishes the other were different; wishes you yourself could be different; believes the relationship will get better if you work at it; even considers that it's your place to change, upgrade, educate, enlighten, break in, quietly demand things of, loudly demand things of, or disapprove of, the other person; thinks there's something wrong or lonely about doing cultural things separately; or feels a rush of relief upon meeting someone who watches TV.

New York Giants return specialist Chad Morton, who once played for the Saints, returned a punt 52 yards for a touchdown in last week's season-opening victory over the Arizona Cardinals. The Giants, who were scheduled to play at New Orleans in Week 2, will instead host New Orleans in the Saints' 'home' opener.

No matter where they play, the Saints promise to bring plenty of intensity

By John Reid
Staff writer

The Saints' don't care where they play. The game could be in San Antonio, Baton Rouge or like tonight, in East Rutherford, N.J., and the players promise to play with the same intensity and effort as they have in putting together a five-game winning streak, the longest in the NFL.

"We are like a bunch of stray dogs, scrapping like it's all or nothing," defensive end Charles

Grant said. "In a situation like we're in, that's all you can ask for."

The Saints are an inspirational force for a city devastated by Hurricane Katrina, which forced the team to move its business and football operations to San Antonio for the remainder of the season.

Tonight, the Saints (1-0) will be the designated home team in a nationally televised game against the New York Giants (1-0), although it will be played at Giants Stadium.

Even though the Saints didn't make the 2004 playoffs, they ended the season on a four-game winning streak. The same work ethic, the same intensity and the same effective execution that prompted the winning streak has carried over into this season. They went to Charlotte, N.C., in last week's opener and came away with a 23-20 victory against the Carolina Panthers, who came back Sunday to defeat the defending Super Bowl champion New England Patriots. The Saints used a ball-control offense to take control of the game, and then their defense held off a late second-half comeback by the Panthers.

"The guys got a spirit about them that I hope will continue for the rest of the season," Coach Jim Haslett said last week.

During the Saints' five-game winning streak, their defense has intercepted seven passes, including two last week by Jason Craft and Mike McKenzie, and has 14 sacks.

But they will be playing a Giants team that has plenty of offensive weapons, starting with New Orleans native Eli Manning, a second-year quarterback who completed 10 of 23 passes for 172 yards with two touch-

Eli not first Manning to weather storm

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — Way, way down on the list of what Hurricane Katrina did was this: It looks as though Eli Manning will never get to play a football game in the Superdome.

That should have happened Sunday, when the Giants and their second-year quarterback were scheduled to face the Saints in that famous building on Poydras Street.

PETER FINNEY

Well, here are the Giants preparing to welcome the Saints to one of those home games away from home, and here is Archie Manning saying he'll be watching his son from afar - on TV, from Mississippi.

Hornets to base operations in Oklahoma City

Team will announce decision this week

By Jimmy Smith
Staff writer

The Hornets will announce early this week that they will base their operations this season in Oklahoma City, keeping a smaller satellite office in either Baton Rouge or New Orleans, a source familiar with the plans said Sunday.

The team will have a split staff working both locations, with a larger group in Oklahoma City, where the NBA will announce that the team will play many of their "home" games this season in the 19,000-seat Ford Center downtown, a facility opened in 2002 that can accommodate the need for club seat and luxury suite sales.

It remains unclear, however, how many games will be played in Oklahoma City this year and how many at the Pete Maravich Assembly Center on the LSU campus in Baton Rouge.

Hornets officials are hoping that between eight and 12 games can be played at the recently renovated PMAC, which for two weeks served as a

Bertman: It was the most intense time I've ever had in my life

AD proud of LSU's relief efforts after Hurricane Katrina

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — As the humidity-soaked days of summer grinded onward toward the start of LSU's football season, the No. 1 topic among fans was the most physically visible.

Would the renovations of Tiger Stadium's west upper deck be finished in time for the season?

Athletic Director Skip Bertman's stock answer throughout was that barring a hurricane, the section would be habitable and every Tiger ticketholder would have a seat this season.

The statement turned out to be more ironic than prophetic.

The hurricane - the infamous Katrina - did come, precipitating the largest natural disaster in U.S. history on New Orleans and the Gulf Coast. Seemingly everything at LSU but the stadium renovation – still close to, if not right on schedule – was turned topsy-turvy in Bertman's world.

Two consecutive weeks he had to disappoint LSU fans by postponing the season opener and relocating the second home game. And in the grander scheme, the life-and-death matters, he watched his physical plant be turned into ground zero for the relief effort.

His long workdays suddenly revolved around daily morning and afternoon meetings with Chan-

Wave needs to look forward now

Leaders need to step up, steer team in right direction

By Fred Robinson

Tulane coach Chris Scelfo knows there are some positive things to build on from the Green Wave's 21-14 loss to Mississippi State on Saturday night in Shreveport.

Playing the way the Green Wave did after three weeks of uncertainty, coming back after being down 14-0 and forcing the Bulldogs to come up with a huge defensive series at the end of the game were all positives for Scelfo's team.

For Tulane's players, getting through the first game had to be like lifting a boulder off their shoulders. The past two weeks, especially last week, the team was bombarded by interview requests from the national media.

Now the Wave, which entered fall with the potential to be a bowl team, has to have its leaders move this team forward and put Hurricane Ka-

INSIDE GAME

SAINTS vs. GIANTS

Kickoff: 6:30 p.m. at Giants Stadium, N.J.
Coaches: Jim Haslett (43-38 in sixth season with Saints); Tom Coughlin (7-10 in second season with Giants; 75-70 in 10th season overall)
TV: ABC (outside of the Saints' and Giants' markets, the game will switch to ESPN at 8 p.m.).
Radio: WLMG 101.9-FM

KEEP AN EYE ON

TIKI BARBER: The Saints' biggest weakness is defending the run, and the Giants' tailback is exactly the kind of shifty open-field runner that causes problems for the Saints' linebackers and safeties. He is a threat both running and catching the ball and can make tacklers miss if he breaks past the line of scrimmage. The Giants will balance him with bullish rookie Brandon Jacobs, a Louisiana native who impressed in Week 1 with 39 yards and a touchdown on six carries. The key for the Saints will be to get ahead early and force the Giants to throw.

ELI MANNING: All attention has been focused on the Saints in this hastily scheduled Monday night opener, but it also will be the biggest stage yet for the Giants' second-year quarterback, playing on national television and against his hometown team. Manning has started only eight games, and the Saints would love to put pressure on him to play catch-up, so they can attack with defensive ends Charles Grant, Darren Howard, Will Smith and Tony Bryant – a formula that worked well last week against Carolina and Jake Delhomme. ... But then again, this could become Manning's coming-out party. A big, national stage is nothing new to last year's No. 1 overall draft choice.

GAME PLAN

The Saints would love a repeat of last week's first half in Carolina – emphasis on the word run. Putting the plan they had talked about all offseason into practice, the Saints ran the ball early and often, mixing in some short passes and controlling the clock. The Saints' game-opening touchdown drive lasted 15 plays. In the second quarter, they had a nine-play touchdown drive. They held the ball for 18 minutes in the first half and took a 14-7 lead into the locker room. That kind of play makes everyone better – quarterback Aaron Brooks isn't pressured to do too much, the defense stays off the field, and opposing offenses are forced to stray from their own game plans. ... The Giants' run defense, however, is stingy, so look for a test of wills Monday night.

KEY MATCHUP

JAMMAL BROWN vs. MICHAEL STRAHAN Brown, the Saints' rookie offensive tackle, passed his first test last week against Carolina's star defensive end Julius Peppers. But now he has to go against an all-time great in Strahan, who has 119.5 sacks. In his 13th NFL season, Strahan, who is list as questionable with back spasms, may not be as explosive or athletic as Peppers, but he certainly knows how to get the best of a rookie offensive tackle. He'll try to get in Brown's head – and into the Saints' backfield.

BY THE NUMBERS: The Saints are 6-13 all-time on "Monday Night Football," having lost five in a row dating to 1993. This will be only their second MNF appearance since 1994. The other was a 34-21 loss to St. Louis in 2001. ... The Saints had the oldest opening-day roster in the league, averaging 28 years, 228 days. But timeless special teams standouts John Carney, 41, and Fred McAfee, 37, can take some of the blame for that. ... Carney was selected the NFL's Special Teams Player of the Week this past week, making the Saints the first team to win the award five weeks in a row, dating back to last season. ... Tailback Deuce McAllister needs 10 yards to become the Saints' all-time leading rusher. George Rogers currently holds the mark of 4,267 yards from 1981-84. ... Under Coach Jim Haslett, the Saints are 25-16 on the road in the past five seasons.

FROM THE COACH'S MOUTH: "It was a long time coming (last week's game). We had a great offseason. We worked really well in the offseason. We had minicamps in the offseason, the OTA's. The last two weeks have felt like six months, so, I think it was just relief that they had the opportunity to play in a regular-season game. I know I was looking forward to it and I think that was the big thing where they were looking toward the opportunity to be playing. ... They'll be excited about playing on Monday night. They'll be excited about the opportunity to play in New York. And hopefully we can continue to keep playing well." – Haslett.

Saints look to continue their winning ways

downs in the Giants' 42-19 victory against the Arizona Cardinals in Week 1.

It was the most points the Giants have scored in a game since the 2002 season, and they had to overcome a 13-7 halftime deficit. Running back Tiki Barber rushed for 62 yards on 13 carries and scored a touchdown, and wide receiver Plaxico Burress caught five passes for 76 yards with a touchdown.

"The No.1 thing is that we have to stop the run and come out playing fast," cornerback Fakhir Brown said. "Hopefully, we can put a little pressure on their young quarterback."

The Saints sacked Jake Delhomme once last week, but linebacker Courtney Watson promises that they will provide a better pass rush tonight.

"Hopefully, we'll get them out of their comfort zone," Watson said. "We're going in with the same emotion and intensity that we did in Carolina. Right now, we fully understand what we're doing on the defensive side and the coaching staff understands what we do well, too."

Offensively, the Saints will try to control the clock again, relying on their physically tough offensive line and running back Deuce McAllister, who rushed for 64 yards last week. They controlled the clock for 32 minutes, 36 seconds compared to the Panthers' 27:24. The Saints also scored on their opening possession of the game for the first time since the 2003 season.

The Giants are likely to show more blitz packages to disrupt quarterback Aaron Brooks, who completed 18 of 24 passes for 192 yards with no interceptions last week.

Despite injuring his jaw and wrist against the Panthers after catching a team-high six passes for 71 yards, tight end Ernie Conwell did not miss any practice time last week.

"The Giants are the No. 1 rushing defense in the NFL and they're big, strong and physical," Conwell said. "They give you different schemes, mixing up their pressure. Clearly, this is a healthy defense, so there is no let up for us as far as what we have to do."

Archie Manning is a hurricane veteran

FINNEY, from C-5

Archie. "As a fan, I think it's great what the NFL is doing with the telethon on Monday, with the relief effort by the league and by so many of the players. I understand they've already raised $10 million, which is fantastic."

Archie counts himself as a hurricane veteran, remembering he was a quarterback at Ole Miss when Hurricane Camille hit the Gulf Coast in 1969.

"I had teammates who lost relatives and had their homes blown away," said Archie. "In New Orleans, you always kept hearing about the Big One and what could happen with the water surge from the lake and those kind of things. So Katrina did not come as a total surprise."

Archie said he could understand Jim Haslett's chagrin about being robbed of a home game, having the play the Giants in their back yard.

"The league felt a sense of urgency," said Archie, "that it was too quick to play the game in San Antonio or in Baton Rouge. They also had the telethon in mind. All in all, under the circumstances, I think the league acted wisely."

Back in the days Archie was announcing Saints games, there were times sons Peyton, Eli and Cooper, along with a friend, would play two-against-two pickup football after the game in the Superdome.

Obviously, Eli was looking forward to playing a real game there. Now, thanks to Katrina, the Giants and their young quarterback will be trying to snap a five-game winning streak by Coach Haslett's displaced invaders, going back to last year's 4-0 finish.

On the other hand, you have the 1-0 Giants looking for a 2-0 start for the first time in five years.

In last week's 42-19 win over the Arizona Cardinals, they trailed 13-7 at halftime (Manning threw two interceptions, one returned for a touchdown in the first half) before a five-touchdown explosion that included a punt return by ex-Saint Chad Morton, whom the Giants signed last week.

At a time the Saints were bonding because of Katrina in their 23-20 upset of the Carolina Panthers, Giants coach Tom Coughlin was using a game played on the fourth anniversary of 9/11 as a motivational tool.

"There was no way we were going to lose on that date for this great city and these great people," he said.

On the day of the terrorist attacks, Coughlin's son, Tim, escaped from the World Trade Center.

Today, in a way, opposing sides will be facing similar tasks.

The Giants' defense will be asked to handle Deuce McAllister on the ground, and in the air limit the damage of Aaron Brooks throwing the football to Joe Horn.

As for the Saints, nicked by some big Carolina rushes last week, it will be a matter of preventing Tiki Barber from running wild and not allowing the aerial combo of Manning-to-Plaxico Burress (that produced five catches for 76 yards last week) to get into a rhythm that could tip the scales.

Come tonight, so much for life on the football field.

Off the field, Katrina left an anxious mark on Giants defensive tackle Kenderick Allen of Bogalusa, a former LSU Tiger and New Orleans Saint. Allen spent six days wondering if his mother had survived the hurricane.

She did.

"There was no way I could concentrate on football," said Allen."I was up here wishing I was down there."

The day after defeating the Cardinals, the Giants agreed to donate part of their paychecks to Habitat for Humanity for hurricane relief. At one meeting, they raised $140,000.

Defense gives Colts a lift over Jaguars

Manning limited to 122 passing yards in 10-3 win

From wire reports

INDIANAPOLIS — The Indianapolis Colts have a new winning combination: patience and defense.

With Peyton Manning's wide-open passing game mostly grounded Sunday, the Colts pounded away at Jacksonville, breaking through in the final nine minutes with a six-yard touchdown run by Ran Carthon and letting their defense preserve a 10-3 victory over the Jaguars.

"We need to be able to win games like this," Coach Tony Dungy said. "Good teams have to win games that go any kind of way."

It wasn't pretty for the Colts (2-0), but it was effective.

Manning, the two-time MVP, was off the mark, overthrowing receivers much of the day and looking out of sync as the Jaguars pressured him. He finished 13-of-28 for 122 yards with one interception and a quarterback rating of 44.0 — his worst regular-season rating since December 2001.

The NFL records some expected to fall this week for most yards passing and touchdowns by a quarterback-receiver tandem never materialized. Manning connected with Marvin Harrison three times for 36 yards, leaving the duo 24 yards and three touchdowns short of their claim to bring the league's best tandem ever.

Instead, the Colts relied on a persistent running game. Edgerrin James ran 27 times for 128 yards, and Indianapolis used a 17-play drive that consumed nearly nine minutes before Carthon's late touchdown run finally gave the Colts the lead with 8:27 left.

Still, Indianapolis took the early edge in the AFC South title chase — protecting its home field against the only team to beat it at home last season — and got more help when Carolina beat two-time defending Super Bowl champion New England. That result brought a roar from the stragglers still left inside the RCA Dome.

"Every week it seems it's a different test," James said. "We show the fans what we can do."

The Jaguars (1-1) may have lost more than a game.

Quarterback Byron Leftwich hobbled up the field during the final two minutes as he nearly rallied Jacksonville. He got the Jaguars to the Colts' 22 before a pass to Jimmy Smith in the end zone was broken up by Bob Sanders on the final play.

Leftwich was injured on the second-to-last series when Raheem Brock sacked him from behind and bent him over awkwardly. Leftwich lay on the ground, reaching for his knee before limping off the field. He was X-rayed after the game.

"I don't want to say what it is right now, but it wasn't the knee," said Leftwich, who was in obvious pain on the final drive. "I'm happy the knee is OK."

Leftwich finished 16-of-29 for 198 yards, was sacked six times — three times by Montae Reagor — and continually took big hits.

Davis helps carry Panthers past Patriots

Running back scores 3 touchdowns

From wire reports

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — The Carolina Panthers know a Week 2 victory over New England doesn't come close to rectifying their Super Bowl loss to the Patriots two years ago.

Even so, their 27-17 victory over the Patriots on Sunday sure did feel good.

"It wasn't a revenge game or a get-back game, because that was a long time ago," said Panthers quarterback Jake Delhomme. "This was just a big win for us."

It certainly was no Super Bowl reprise because neither team played that well.

But the Panthers (1-1) did just enough to win, getting three touchdowns from Stephen Davis in the first regular-season meeting between the teams since the Patriots' 32-29 Super Bowl win two seasons ago.

But if it was any indication, neither team is ready to play for a championship and the Patriots (1-1) look nothing like a winner of three of the past four Super Bowls.

"Do you think we're going to win any more games playing like this?" Patriots coach Bill Belichick said. "We can't play like this. We have to play better. We have to coach better. This won't be good enough ... against anyone we play."

Delhomme, who threw an interception that Mike Vrabel returned 24 yards for a touchdown, finished 11-of-26 for 154 yards and no touchdowns.

It meant the Panthers had to rely on Davis, who ran for 77 yards and scored on three 1-yard plunges in his second game back from microfracture surgery on his right knee. Davis became the first running back to score three touchdowns against the Patriots since Curtis Martin did it in 2000.

"I'm fine," Davis said. I'm feeling great. I'm having no setbacks."

Seahawks start fast, then hold off Falcons

A week ago the Seattle Seahawks wilted in the Florida heat. On Sunday, they nearly wilted on their own, taking a 21-0 halftime lead and then holding on to beat visiting Atlanta 21-18.

Shaun Alexander ran for 144 yards and a touchdown and Matt Hasselbeck threw for 281 yards and two touchdowns for Seattle. Still, it was the defense that won it for the Seahawks (1-1), shutting down the Falcons (1-1) after Atlanta got the ball back with 2:39 left at its 27, trailing by three.

BUCS 19 vs. BILLS 3: Carnell "Cadillac" Williams surpassed 100 yards rushing for the second straight week, helping Tampa Bay dominate J.P. Losman and Buffalo for the Bucs' first 2-0 start in five years.

Williams carried 24 times for 128 yards and one touchdown. The performance followed a 148-yard, 27-carry debut in a season-opening victory at Minnesota.

Tampa Bay's defense scored on a safety and was every bit as tough on Losman as it has been on a list of young quarterbacks that includes Michael Vick, Donovan McNabb and Daunte Culpepper in recent years.

JETS 17 vs. DOLPHINS 7: Chad Pennington threw two touchdown passes, including a one-yarder to former Tulane standout Jerald Sowell in the fourth quarter, for New York, giving former LSU coach Nick Saban his first NFl loss with Miami.

BENGALS 37 vs. VIKINGS 8: Chad Johnson caught a 70-yard touchdown pass on the game's second play to spark Cincinnati.

The Bengals (2-0) dominated the Vikings (0-2), rolling up 337 yards and a 27-0 lead in the first half.

STEELERS 27 at TEXANS 7: Ben Roethlisberger led Pittsburgh to scores on its first four drives — a pair of field goals sandwiched around touchdown passes of 16 and 14 yards to Hines Ward — and the Steelers cruised.

Pittsburgh (2-0) won its 16th straight regular-season game.

EAGLES 42 vs. 49ERS 3: Donovan McNabb threw four of his five touchdown passes in the first 19 minutes, including a pair to Terrell Owens.

McNabb played three quarters, finishing 23-of-29 for 342 yards and tying his career-best for touchdown passes.

BEARS 38 vs. LIONS 6: Chicago scored touchdowns on offense, defense and special teams to blow out Detroit.

Thomas Jones led Chicago with 139 yards and two touchdowns on 20 carries. .

TITANS 25 vs. RAVENS 10: Steve McNair threw a touchdown pass and Rob Bironas kicked field goals of 39, 29 and 47 yards as Tennessee (1-1) beat Baltimore (0-2).

The Titans' defense had six sacks and got two turnovers.

RAMS 17 at CARDINALS 12: Kurt Warner fell a few yards shy of a memorable comeback against his former team. Warner, 29-for-42 for 327 yards in his first game against the St. Louis franchise he directed to two Super Bowls and one NFL crown, drove Arizona to the St. Louis 5-yard line in the final seconds. But a sack by Adam Archuleta and a false start by offensive tackle Leonard Davis preserved the Rams' victory.

BRONCOS 20 vs. CHARGERS 17: Jason Elam's 41-yard field goal with five seconds left lifted Denver (1-1) past San Diego (0-2).

Ron Dayne came off the bench and ran six times for 39 yards on the winning drive.

BROWNS 26 at PACKERS 24: Trent Dilfer led Cleveland (1-1) over Green Bay (0-2) for new coach Romeo Crennel's first win. Dilfer threw an 80-yard touchdown pass to Braylon Edwards and a clinching 62-yarder to Steve Heiden with 1:50 remaining.

Dilfer completed 21 of 32 passes for 336 yards.

JIM MILLER UNO athletic director

Miller staying the course for Privateers

UNO athletic director has his hands full in Katrina's wake

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

For UNO athletic director Jim Miller the map in The Times-Picayune only served to confirm what he already suspected - his home, in Lakeview near Canal and Robert E. Lee boulevards, was in an area inundated by the flooding caused by Hurricane Katrina.

Not far away, at Harrison and Argonne, Pizzazz, the women's active wear store started by wife Jane less than a year ago, is similarly under water.

"I generally try to get to bed at 10:30-11 (p.m.), but I wake up every night at 2:30-3 (a.m.) thinking about what might still be safe on the second floor, or 100 other different things," said Miller, who has not been back to check on his home. "I know that we're no different from thousands of other people out there.

"But I do know that I'm a heck of a lot more fortunate than a lot of them because I have a job."

That he does - overseeing an athletic department staff of 45 and 175 athletes on teams now scattered from Atlanta (swimming), to Las Cruces, N.M. (baseball), to Tyler, Texas (men's and women's basketball), to Thibodaux (women's golf) to Baton Rouge (track).

Miller, who has been working with the rest of the UNO administration from the LSU systems office in Baton Rouge, began visiting those coaches and athletes last week, making Tyler his first stop.

"It was really uplifting," Miller said. "Seeing our basketball team together was really encouraging, because they are in a good situation and in great spirits.

"I used to like to go around our offices and visit with our coaches for 15 minutes or so a couple of times a week. You can talk on the phone every day, but that personal contact is something I've really missed."

Whenever that time comes when Miller can again stroll around Lakefront Arena doing just that remains to be seen.

Plans are for classes to resume for the spring semester beginning in January, but Katrina left a 12-foot hole in the arena roof, and it's doubtful the building will be usable for basketball this season.

Figuring out where the basketball teams will play their home games is one of Miller's top priorities.

"We could use the Pontchartrain Center, the Alario Center or a combination of places," Miller said. "Our main thrust is getting things back on campus where we can have a functioning university where courses are taught and events are being held."

For Miller, 57, UNO is his first position in college athletics. After 11 years as a sportswriter in his native Louisville and Baltimore, he went through a variety of positions in the NFL, including executive vice president of the Saints from 1986-96.

The athletic department he took over at UNO in January 2003 was one with severe problems, some that remain. The Privateers were then and remain at the bottom of the Sun Belt Conference all-sports standings.

Men's basketball attendance has sagged into triple digits and the team hasn't advanced to postseason play since 1997. A makeover of Privateer Park has been stalled because of a lack of financing.

There appears to be a general indifference about athletics from the student body and the community as a whole despite the large number of alums in the New Orleans area.

And, as always, finances are tight for a program that depends on the university for survival.

Miller had shaken things up, changing coaches in every sport except men's basketball and women's golf and becoming more aggressive in marketing and fundraising. And in all of the team sports - basketball, baseball and volleyball - expectations were for improved performance this year.

Then came Katrina.

The easy course would have been to write off athletics for the year, perhaps permanently.

But that was never considered.

"The first time we got together, (Chancellor) Tim Ryan made the point to me that we've got to get back on track as soon as we can, and basketball in particular," Miller said. "Athletics means a lot to the university and the community.

"Katrina may have slowed us down, but it's not going to kill us."

The Miller family's own Katrina saga began with an evacuation to Baton Rouge to stay with Jane's family. After it appeared that at worst power wouldn't be restored for a few days, the decision was made to go to Louisville to visit relatives for the rest of the week.

Those plans were reversed when while getting a new battery in Jackson, Miss., the Millers learned of the breach in the 17th Street Canal, meaning their home was likely under water.

They immediately returned to Baton Rouge, where they've been since.

Miller recently purchased a home on Highland Road and plans to have the children, Layne, 11, and Connor, 9, in school there for the rest of the year.

"Connor's handling it pretty well because he's a boy; and our beagle Elmo, he's happy," Miller said. "But it's been tough on Layne. "She really liked going horseback riding in City Park. She was crying the other day because she misses Buttercup."

Miller said he has left many of the family matters to Jane because he is immersed in being responsible for the athletic department.

"Thank God for Jane," he said. "She's the best.

"She's lost her business, and that's a tremendous burden. But she's got things going here."

Life for the Millers, if not approaching normalcy, is getting into a routine. Family and friends in Kentucky have sent two trucks full of furniture and clothes. A brother donated his daughter's car.

The kids are in school, along with many of their classmates from St. Dominick's in New Orleans.

"I'm as deeply into work as I have ever been," Miller said. "In normal times it's like herding cats, and this makes it just more so.

"But you never escape the personal problems - your own and those of the people you work with."

Among Miller's regrets is that he had to leave behind two family Bibles from the 19th century plus a dictionary given to his great grandfather in 1873.

"I'm sort of the family historian," he said. "I was supposed to take care of that stuff."

But there is some good news filtering back. A neighbor reported that as of Wednesday, five feet of water remained in the house, but that's down from where it had been.

"Hopefully it didn't get the kids' stuff on the second floor," he said. "You're glad to hear anything like that."

Miller said he does not consider himself an overly emotional person, but admits that Katrina has affected him deeply.

"The first Sunday after the storm, we went to church and the priest asked all of the evacuees from New Orleans to stand," he said. "I just lost it right there - not because of what had happened to us, but because I realized that there are so many people who care about us and are concerned about us.

"Events like this are something you usually see happening in Bangladesh or some other country on TV, and you just go on to the next program. This is one you're living through - we're all living through."

LSU athletic department comes to rescue

BERTMAN, from C-5

cellor Sean O'Keefe and various other university officials and relief agencies such as FEMA. Events were in a constant state of flux and decisions were being made in rapid-fire order. Nearly every sport under his auspices was affected, displaced or delayed in some manner.

Now that the stress on LSU has eased somewhat, Bertman said what the school and athletic department accomplished in its role gives him a feeling of satisfaction and pride.

"I have never been more proud of the people in the athletic department and LSU in general," Bertman said. "(These kinds of tragedies) bring out the best and worst in people. But here at LSU I didn't see any bad things. I didn't see anyone who wasn't willing to help.

"It was the most intense time I've ever had in my life, the most serious. I worked real hard coaching the 1996 Olympic baseball team. That was physically hard. This was much more intense and much more important.

"It's different from Jim (Miller) at UNO and Rick (Dickson) at Tulane. First, they had to get a house and get to safety; they had to find a place for the teams. I can't relate to that. It must be awful for them."

Almost as quickly as the hurricane hit and the tragedy and destructiveness of the aftermath become apparent, LSU was springing into action. The Pete Maravich Assembly Center had been predetermined as a refugee site and quickly became "the largest triage site in the history of America," Bertman said, with 30,000 people coming through. The underground practice court became a temporary morgue and the Carl Maddox Field House a 500-bed hospital. Ambulances raced into and out of the campus while helicopters of all shapes and sizes ferried in evacuees, using Bernie Moore Track Stadium as a helipad. Alex Box Stadium was a drop-off point for evacuees, who were then bused to the Baton Rouge River Center.

Once the sites were determined, the relief effort needed able hands. About 3,000 student volunteers, many of them athletes and other athletic department personnel aided the dozens of doctors and nurses from across the country tending to the injured and sick while seeing things they'd never seen before.

"Every agency that came in here said LSU really stepped up to the plate," said Jim Fernandez, vice provost of academic affairs. "At no time was there ever a standoff or stoppage. Everybody in the athletic department did what they had to do."

Sports information student worker Bill Martin volunteered in triage and watched a man die. He then wrote about it in a poignant e-mail that made its way around the country. Videographer Doug Aucoin worked his usual 6 a.m. to 10 p.m. shift before volunteering at the Field House until 4:30 a.m. one morning. Equipment manager Greg Stringfellow stayed past midnight to wash donated clothing for the evacuees. Head trainer Jack Marucci cleaned out his medical supply cabinet and donated what he could. PMAC manager Dwight Johnson rounded up cots, mattresses, blood, IVs, telephones and whatever the emergency workers and security people needed. Football players visited with and comforted the sick and injured, gaining a new cadre of fans.

Bertman never said a word about volunteering.

"It just happened," associate athletic director Herb Vincent said. "People saw it and knew they had to help because they were in the middle of it. These are people that work long hours anyway and took it upon themselves to work some more."

Said Bertman: "One of the FEMA people said in his 25 years of experience he'd never seen anything better."

Coaches understood. Bertman held a meeting of all coaches explaining the situation and that some would be unable to use their facilities.

He didn't get one question from them asking 'When will I be able to get back into my facility?' or 'How long is this going to take?'

With the area around the PMAC buzzing like a beehive, it was apparent the first football game against North Texas couldn't be played on Sept. 3 in Tiger Stadium. That game was postponed and later rescheduled for Oct. 29.

With hotel space nonexistent because of the evacuees and emergency workers, LSU made the decision Sept. 6 to move the Arizona State game, set for Sept. 10, from Baton Rouge to Tempe, Ariz. It not only made it a tougher game to win but cost LSU $2.5 million.

"That just wasn't an issue," Bertman said.

Twice in a row was a tough one for LSU fans to swallow, though Vincent said most of the e-mail contacts they received supported the decision. Bertman said it was the toughest one the school had to make, and one that was made by the school as a whole and with its best interests at heart.

"This is bigger than an athletic department," he said. "No AD wants his football coach to play the opener on the road when it's supposed to be at home, especially when he's a new coach. We tried to play the game in the worst way and bumped into amazingly enough only one untenable obstacle. And that was no hotel rooms in a 200-mile radius around Baton Rouge, even in Shreveport. College football teams need 105 rooms and a full-service hotel.

"By game day things had settled down at the PMAC, but at the time we had to make the decision, the hospital was still here and we didn't want a huge traffic tie-up with helicopters and ambulances still trying to get in."

Bertman absorbed some criticism from anxious LSU fans, including one who e-mailed that LSU was a "university and not a hospital."

The result of the game brought an unparalleled sense of relief.

"I was emotionally invested in this game more than any game I've been involved in," Bertman said. "I wanted this game for the fans, for the players, for (head coach) Les Miles. Other than the national championship game, I can't remember being this emotionally involved."

There is still much unemotional involvement left for Bertman. Hotels will be tricky for visiting teams for the rest of the season, though residents are slowly filtering back to the New Orleans metro area. The Tennessee football team may have to arrive in Baton Rouge on game day and fly out that night for the Sept. 24 game.

LSU is set to host four Saints games, while officials from the Hornets, the Sugar Bowl and the high school state championship games are negotiating with LSU about using its facilities.

"The only ones I haven't heard from are the Zephyrs," Bertman chuckled.

"I didn't do anything personally except take my daughters (from New Orleans) in as evacuees. I watched people in our department spring forward and do some wonderful, great things. I was really proud of LSU and Louisiana."

Tulane running back Matt Forte tries to find a seam in Mississippi State's defense Saturday. The Green Wave's season opener was moved to Shreveport due to the effects of Hurricane Katrina.

Defense steps up for Tulane

trina behind it. When it does that, it will begin to win games.

OFFENSE – C-

Yes, Tulane came back in the second half with two scores, both fine plays – a stretched-out catch by Damarcus Davis in the end zone and an 18-yard, tackle-breaking run by backup tailback Jovon Jackson – but the offense let too many opportunities get away in the first half.

Quarterback Lester Ricard, the catalyst of this team, did not have a particularly good game (he completed 26 of 47 passes without an interception). He looked a lot the way he did in last year's game against Mississippi State. His fumble in the first half was the result of a good defensive play by State's Clarence McDougal.

Running back Matt Forte had a couple of good runs, but did not have the type of game (66 yards on 20 carries and 10 yards on four receptions) the Wave needed to win. That was mostly because of the offensive line's inability to handle the Bulldogs' front in the second half. With senior Chris McGee out for a good portion of the game, the Wave's offensive line had a pair of freshmen logging a good bit of playing time.

DEFENSE – A

It was deja' vu all over again.

For the second straight year, the defensive job was good enough to secure a win against the Bulldogs. The Green Wave gave up a couple of big plays in the second half, but it repeatedly turned back Mississippi State's offense.

Led by Anthony Cannon's 11 tackles, the defense held State to 225 yards and forced it to punt 10 times. The Bulldogs were held to one first down in the first half. The total performance was better than any performance by Tulane's defense last season. The problem is the Wave's defense is far ahead of the team's offense. It again must wait for the offense to catch up, score more points and take the pressure off of the defensive unit.

SPECIAL TEAMS – F

In spite of converting two fourth-down plays to extend drives, the Green Wave's special teams failed miserably. This was a major concern going into fall camp, and with Fred Smith's season-ending knee injury several weeks ago, the concern about Tulane's return game has grown.

A muffed punt by cornerback/returnee Izzy Route that put Mississippi State in superb position to break a tie at 14 late in the fourth quarter was the coupe de grace.

But there were more than enough blunders to go around. On the opening kickoff, a penalty negated a 50-yard return by Route.

Overall, the kickoffs were not very good, there were two fumbles on punt returns, an onside kick was botched, and even first-team all-conference punter Chris Beckman had a terrible game. After averaging 43.7 yards per punt last season, Beckman averaged 38.6 yards on 10 kicks, and had one punt that traveled 16 yards. This is an area that must improve immediately.

Vols lament special teams breakdown

LSU NOTES

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE – Everything that special teams did for LSU at Arizona State a week ago went against Tennessee in its 16-7 loss to Florida on Saturday.

The Volunteers had a field-goal attempt blocked, fumbled a punt and failed on a fake punt attemp. Any one of those could have made a difference for the Vols, who fell to No. 10 in The Associated Press rankings.

"We had a meltdown from a kicking game standpoint," Vols coach Philip Fulmer said Sunday. "Give Florida credit. They didn't make the mistakes to beat themselves and we did."

The fumbled punt led to a field goal and after Tennessee's next possession, freshman punter Britton Colquitt tried to pass for a first down when Florida failed to cover the Tennessee gunner. But Florida's Tony Joiner hustled over to break up the pass and set up Florida at the Vols' 32-yard line. The Gators kicked another field goal to make the score 13-7.

The pass was reminiscent of a play LSU made against Arizona State when LSU punter Chris Jackson completed a 12-yard pass for a first down from the Tigers' end zone, a risky play at best. Many teams instruct their punters to automatically throw the pass when the gunner (wideout) is left undefended. Fulmer said there was some miscommunication.

"We had a successful one last year with Mississippi as well," Fulmer said. "This particular case, that wasn't really intended to happen. It was my fault for not having communicated where the punter fully understood it. We have it in our system but last night wasn't necessarily meant to be one of those."

Despite those special teams blunders, Fulmer said there were other places the Vols could have played better. Fulmer used two quarterbacks, starting with former LSU player Rick Clausen. Erik Ainge came in after the second offensive series and played most of the remainder of the game.

Fulmer said an inability to take advantage of the Gators' man-to-man pass coverage was another disappointment.

"If we connect on some of those deep balls against man coverage things look differently, maybe we make them play differently," Fulmer said. "We just didn't make the plays in the passing game that we needed to make vs. man-to-man coverage."

ROOM AT THE INN: The Vols will have a hotel Saturday, but won't be staying in it Friday night. The team will stay in the Crowne Plaza Hotel in Knoxville on Friday and is scheduled to arrive by air in Baton Rouge around noon on game day. Fulmer said the Holiday Inn Select in Baton Rouge will allow them to use rooms and banquet rooms long enough to rest, get a meal and go through pre-game meetings and preparation. The Vols will fly home immediately after the game.

"If we had done anything differently, it would have displaced some people there that are working with the folks in New Orleans to help them get their power back up and we didn't think that was the right thing to do," Fulmer said. "I'll be interested to see how we react. I think we'll do fine."

QB DERBY: Fulmer said he won't make any decisions on the Vols' quarterback situation until film has been graded. Clausen, who started against Ole Miss for LSU in 2002, transferred to Tennessee in 2003. His older brother Casey starred there at quarterback. Clausen sat out 2003 and started the last four games last year because of injuries to Ainge and Brent Schaeffer, who has since transferred. He earned the Cotton Bowl MVP award hitting 18 of 27 passes for 222 yards and three touchdowns in a victory against Texas A&M. He was two of five passing against Florida for zero yards. Ainge was 14 of 29 for 147 yards.

"Rick has made a lot of progress," said Fulmer. "He's an older guy, mature. He's been around two good systems, LSU and ours. He's way ahead of the game compared to most guys who haven't played more than he has."

Oklahoma seizing opportunity of hosting Hornets

medical evacuation facility for Hurricane Katrina survivors.

Peter Fink, vice president for NBA events and attractions, toured the PMAC last Thursday and filed a mostly favorable report to league headquarters in New York, outlining the plusses and minuses of staging games there.

The primary drawback was lack of club seats and suites, and some of the other amenities customarily available in NBA arenas.

But the league and the Hornets hope to retain something of a local tie for the team this season, since it's likely the Hornets could not play again in New Orleans Arena until the All-Star break in February, if at all.

SMG regional vice-president Doug Thornton said Sunday that the Arena appears to be in worse shape than originally thought. Thornton said the building suffered extensive water damage on its south side, where floodwaters rose as high as four feet. The four locker rooms on the ground floor still have standing water in them, as much as six inches in spots. The Harrah's Courtside Club and the hardwood basketball court are also completely destroyed, he said.

"That building is a little worse than I first thought," Thornton said. "I'm a little discouraged by what we saw there."

The questions remain whether the Arena can be made playable in time to play part of the home schedule as originally planned and whether the city's infrastructure can be repaired sufficiently to house visiting NBA teams in luxury hotels downtown.

Team president Paul Mott could not be reached for comment Sunday.

And while Hornets owner George Shinn repeatedly has said he remains committed to play in New Orleans beyond this truncated season, officials in Oklahoma are seizing the opportunity to make the Hornets' temporary relocation permanent.

One state legislator, according to The Daily Oklahoman newspaper, has filed a bill aimed at the state picking up relocation costs if the team decided to move there next season.

Oklahoma House Bill 2061, filed by Rep. Joe Dorman, D-Rush, calls for the state to absorb relocation costs should the Hornets seek to move to Oklahoma City.

"Even by a conservative fiscal estimate," Dorman told the newspaper, "Oklahoma would receive a $9 million boost to our economy if the Hornets move here, even if it's only for a year. We will get new revenue from hotels, restaurants, concession sales and from new payroll. If we can spend a little to make a lot more, I want to make sure we do everything possible to get the Hornets here."

Fla. high schools can sympathize with La.'s loss

Sunshine State had to deal with multiple hurricanes last year

By Pierce W. Huff
Staff writer

Port Charlotte High School running back Jason Wood said he and his family lost almost everything last year when Hurricane Charley devastated parts of Florida.

He knows what people in southeast Louisiana are going through.

But what surprised him most about the ordeal, he said, is how a hated rival became a good friend in the wake of the storm.

Port Charlotte and Charlotte high schools were bitter rivals, competing in everything from football to volleyball.

But when the area, located on the Florida Gulf Coast between Fort Myers and Sarasota, was devastated by three hurricanes, including a big hit from Charley, the schools came together in an unprecedented way.

The schools had to share everything on the Port Charlotte campus because Charlotte High suffered extensive damage from the storm.

"I never would have believed it would have happened," Wood said. "Personally, it wasn't tough emotionally for me, because it was just good to be alive."

The school-sharing experiment went off without a hitch, and the rivals grew to have a new respect for each other, he said.

Patience and staying positive helped Florida high schools survive four hurricanes last year, and those same attributes will be important for schools in southeast Louisiana that are trying to rebuild their athletic programs in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Last year, the Florida High School Athletic Association had to reschedule athletic contests in football, volleyball, golf and swimming/diving because of the hurricanes that swept through the state.

John Stewart, the director of the FHSAA, said his association devised a plan to deal with the fallout from canceled and postponed games.

The plan in football was to allow affected schools the opportunity to play as many as three games in eight days and shorten the games to eight-minute quarters in accordance with National Federation of State High School Association rules. Teams also were encouraged to play district games if possible, which is the main FHSAA criteria for qualifying for the state playoffs.

The FHSAA allowed its volleyball teams to play up to five matches per week. The golf teams were allowed to play on their normal schedule provided they could find a course in the damaged areas.

The swimming/diving state championships were moved to the University of Florida, because there were no outdoor pools available in the Florida Panhandle area.

"People poured out their hearts and were good to us," Stewart said. "We felt fortunate."

With the state rules taken care of, schools affected by the hurricanes were left to make due as best as possible. In Charlotte County that meant Port Charlotte and Charlotte high schools sharing the same campus, everything from classrooms to athletic fields, from August 2004 to last April.

Port Charlotte students went to school and practiced during the day and the Charlotte students went to school and practiced in the afternoon and evening. The teams had to adjust their schedules so they could play at the same venues.

"Everything was turned upside down," Port Charlotte athletic director Mark Primerano said. "We had over 4,000 kids going to the same school every day."

But the end result of the school-sharing experiment was that the rivals developed a newfound appreciation for each other.

"When you go through something like that, you have no choice but to get along," Charlotte football coach Binky Waldrop said. "The kids were awesome. If there was any problem, it was between the parents and the grownups."

Primerano said the schools bonded.

"It just forced us to be open and mindful," he said. "We had to be patient and more patient, because all you can do at that point is to put things in perspective. It did bring about some normalcy for the kids just to play, but it was tough for everybody. Everybody sacrificed."

Pensacola Catholic football coach Greg Seibert said the best advice he would give Louisiana schools hopeful of playing this football season is make sure that everyone on the team is contacted as quickly and as often as possible.

Pensacola Catholic canceled two games and played an eight-game schedule in the aftermath of Hurricane Ivan, which rocked the Florida Panhandle.

"It was a big hassle," Seibert said. "There was no power for 15 days, and the school was without power for 2 1/2 weeks."

Seibert had a team meeting four days after Hurricane Ivan hit. He and his coaching staff addressed each of his player's concerns and pledged to be there for them.

It was tough at first. Pensacola Catholic lost its first two games, but the team rallied to finish 7-5 and was the state runner-up in Class 2B.

"The kids handled it pretty well," Seibert said. "They took everything in stride."

Primerano said he has tremendous sympathy for Katrina victims.

"We feel terrible for (southeast Louisiana)," he said. "At least we had roofs to fix, but some of you all don't have roofs to fix at all."

Many in Florida high school athletics say they're willing to give any advice and support to their Louisiana counterparts.

Stewart said he has tried calling and e-mailing Louisiana High School Athletic Association commissioner Tommy Henry since Katrina hit Aug. 29, but he hasn't been able to get through.

"He must know that there are literally hundreds of thousands of people who are offering their prayers and best wishes not only to him, but to the schools, athletes and people affected by the storm," Stewart said. "It will be a long, slow healing process, but he and the people there shouldn't let the difficulty of finding a solution get them down."

Primerano said the best advice he can give to south Louisiana schools is to be strong.

"Things will get better," he said.

NEWMAN OUTLASTS STEWART FOR FIRST WIN

Ryan Newman picked a good time to grab his first win of the season.

Newman, who barely squeezed into the Chase for the championship, got off to a fast start in NASCAR's 10-race playoff Sunday by outduelling points leader Tony Stewart down the stretch.

Stewart, who started from the pole, dominated through much of the race, leading 173 of the 300 laps in the Sylvania 300 at New Hampshire International Speedway in Loudon, N.H. But Newman won a late battle with Stewart, passing him on Lap 199 and holding the top spot by two car-lengths.

Following the final pit stops by the leaders, Newman found himself just ahead of Stewart when the green flag waved with 16 laps to go after the last of 10 caution flags.

Stewart, on the way to his 13th consecutive finish of eighth or better, was relentless in trying to retake the lead, pulling up to the rear quarter-panel of Newman's Penske Racing South Dodge time after time before finally slipping below him on the back stretch on Lap 292.

But Newman, whose last win came a year ago in Dover, wouldn't give up. He stayed with Stewart, got beneath the Joe Gibbs Racing Chevrolet on Lap 299 and pulled ahead, staying out front to win by 0.293-seconds.

Chase contenders Matt Kenseth and Greg Biffle finished third and fourth, followed by Dale Earnhardt, who is out of the Chase but running his first race with Tony Eury Jr. back as his crew chief.

Newman was ecstatic, finally breaking through for a win after season-long struggles - and doing it in the biggest race so far this season.

"We didn't know what was going to happen with us pitting before anyone else," said Newman, who gave up the lead to Stewart when he made his final stop on Lap 235, long before the other leaders. "Fortunately, it cycled through."

JOHNSON FIGHTING FOR LIFE

Leavander Johnson had worked a long time for his big night, 16 years to be exact. His first title defense turned tragic, however, leaving the veteran boxer in a fight that most with his kind of injury don't win.

Johnson was in a drug-induced coma Sunday following emergency brain surgery he underwent just minutes after losing his lightweight title the night before. He was in critical condition at the hospital's intensive care unit.

Doctors at first feared his condition was hopeless, but tests Sunday showed improvement in his brain and gave them hope that Johnson would survive.

"You certainly can't make predictions but I wasn't certain he would even survive last night," said Dr. William Smith, who performed the surgery. "My thoughts are that he's dramatically improved today so he seems to be moving in the right direction."

Johnson's family was keeping a vigil at the hospital, where he was rushed after being stopped by a flurry of punches Saturday in the 11th round of his IBF lightweight title defense against Jesus Chavez at the MGM Grand.

GOLF

CAMPBELL WINS GOLF'S LARGEST PRIZE

U.S. Open champion Michael Campbell won the World Match Play Championship in Virginia Water, England, on Sunday, defeating Paul McGinley 2 and 1 in the final by capitalizing on his opponent's errors in the closing holes.

Campbell wrapped up the match at Wentworth with a chip to 1 foot of the cup on the 35th green. He won the 33rd and 34th holes when McGinley bogeyed after poor shots.

"I was fortunate to win those holes," Campbell said.

Campbell earned $1.8 million, the largest prize in golf. The New Zealand native also advanced to the top of the European Order of Merit ahead of Retief Goosen. Campbell beat the South African in the semifinals Saturday.

Campbell won the opening hole and never trailed, but also never led by more than one through the morning round. He was 3 up after 23 holes, but his Irish rival won the 24th, 25th and 27th to square the match. They were still even with four to play.

"I didn't play as well today as I had the first three days," McGinley said. "If this was a stroke play event I'd have been well ahead because I played so well the first three days. But that's the way it goes. Michael played well today."

GORE COMES THROUGH ON SUNDAY

The collapse never came, even as a once-sizable lead dwindled to a single precarious stroke. This time, Sunday didn't crush Jason Gore. It belonged to him.

Gore, whose last-day unraveling already is part of U.S. Open lure, stood up to the 84 Lumber Classic field Sunday with big drives and steely nerves to win in Farmington, Pa., on the PGA Tour barely a month after being stuck in golf's minor leagues.

Gore's four-stroke lead with five holes to play was down to one over runner-up Carlos Franco by No. 18, but Gore landed his approach shot on the 468-yard par-4 on the lower fringe of the green. With a playoff looming if he didn't get up and down, Gore deftly lagged his putt from 91 1/2 feet to within 22 inches, and tapped in for a final-round 2-under 70, a $792,000 paycheck and the Tour victory he once thought might never come.

His 14-under 274 denied Franco (69) his first PGA victory since 2001 and was three shots better than third-place finisher Ben Crane (67).

Gore never finished higher than 18th during two previous stays on the PGA Tour, in 2001 and 2003. Now, he joins Paul Stankowski (1996) as the only golfers to win on the developmental Nationwide and PGA tours in the same year. The portly, big-swinging Gore is the first to do so after earning the automatic in-season promotion that goes to any three-time Nationwide winner.

Now, all those public course duffers who think they could make the leap to golf's big leagues have a new hero to go with John Daly. Gore, 31, looks as much like a spectator as he does a pro, and his caddy wears not a Nike or a Titleist cap, bur one plugging Pabst Blue Ribbon beer.

Jason Gore, this one's on you. And this wasn't an ordinary post-majors win, either, with most of the big names long since gone. The field for the $4.4 million event was unusually strong with four of the top six money winners, including Phil Mickelson and 2004 champion Vijay Singh.

Gore opened a two-shot lead through 54 holes following a 5-under 67 Saturday at the 7,416-yard Mystic Rock course, then never trailed on a Sunday that was a polar opposite of the U.S. Open. Franco, playing one group ahead of him, tied him briefly with a birdie on the par-5 No. 8, but Gore answered minutes later with his eagle on the same hole after hitting his approach shot to 12 feet.

COLLEGE FOOTBALL

GEORGIA TECH QB HAS MENINGITIS

Georgia Tech quarterback Reggie Ball was diagnosed with viral meningitis and it's not known if he'll be able to play in next weekend's crucial game against Virginia Tech.

Ball was being treated at Emory University Hospital, where he was expected to remain a second night. The school said the extra night was mainly a precaution.

The junior became ill Friday and was hospitalized the following morning, just hours before the Yellow Jackets defeated Connecticut 28-13 to improve to 3-0 for the first time since 2001.

Redshirt freshman Taylor Bennett started in Ball's place, throwing a touchdown on his first college pass but completing only 11-of-30 for 142 yards. No. 15 Georgia Tech would be a major underdog against the fourth-ranked Hokies if Ball can't return for next Saturday's game in Blacksburg, Va.

Viral meningitis is commonly found in college environments and is not nearly as serious as bacterial meningitis.

CLEMSON TE HAS SPLEEN REMOVED

Clemson tight end Cole Downer had his spleen removed Saturday night, just hours after he was injured catching a 6-yard pass in the fourth quarter of the Tigers' 36-30 triple-overtime loss to Miami.

The senior likely will miss the rest of the season, the school said.

TENNIS

RUSSIANS WIN FED CUP

Elena Dementieva refused to take credit for Russia's Fed Cup victory over France.

Perhaps she should.

The Russians won the title for the second straight year. Dementieva won both her singles matches in the best-of-five final and teamed with Dinara Safina to capture the deciding doubles for a 3-2 victory. The Russian duo beat Mary Pierce and Amelie Mauresmo 6-4, 1-6, 6-3 in Paris.

"It's not Dementieva's victory," Dementieva said. "We win as a team and lose as a team."

In the day's singles matches, Pierce rallied past Anastasia Myskina 4-6, 6-4, 6-2 to even the series at 2-2. Dementieva defeated Mauresmo in the opener 6-4, 4-6, 6-2.

"She carried the team this weekend," Mauresmo said. "She was so solid."

Dementieva sank to her knees in celebration after Mauresmo hit a forehand long on match point in the doubles finale at Roland Garros. Russia beat two-time champion France 3-2 in the final last year in Moscow.

"I've been waiting so long for this," Dementieva said. "I'm so happy."

DAVENPORT WINS WISMILAK INTERNATIONAL

Lindsay Davenport overpowered Italy's Francesca Schiavone 6-2, 6-4 to win the Wismilak International in Bali, Indonesia.

The top-seeded Davenport, playing in the Bali tournament for the first time, broke serve at the start of each set.

New storm threat ends homecoming for St. Bernard, N.O. residents

By Steve Ritea and Gordon Russell

Just as the region inched toward functional, the specter of Tropical Storm Rita prompted some officials across the New Orleans region to revoke plans for residents' return, fearing more rain could overtake already weakened levees and cause further flooding.

Mayor Ray Nagin suspended plans to let Uptowners return later this week and asked Algiers residents, who were allowed to come back to their homes Monday, to evacuate. And St. Bernard halted re-entry plans altogether and imposed a mandatory evacuation beginning today at 4 a.m.

"I'm hopeful people have seen the effects of Katrina, and that we won't have the same problems this time," Nagin said. "If anyone wants to sit this storm out with our soaked levee systems, then God bless them."

With Rita on the horizon, President Bush late Monday announced another visit to New Orleans, likely this afternoon. Earlier in the day, he expressed concern about Nagin's plan for the return and said his administration had passed that along to city officials.

"The mayor has got this dream about having a city up and running. And we share that dream," he said during a briefing. "But we also want to be realistic about some of the hurdles and obstacles that we all confront in repopulating New Orleans."

Bush added: "If it were to rain a lot, there is concern from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levees might break. And so, therefore, we're cautious about encouraging people to return at this moment of history."

As Hurricane Rita moved west toward southernmost Florida and the Florida Keys on Monday, forecasters warned the storm could reach Category 3 or greater

MISERY DOLED OUT EVENLY IN EASTERN NEW ORLEANS

Traveling forsaken roads east of the Industrial Canal, it is evident that floodwater does not discriminate.

From the small dwellings and businesses along Downman Road to the upscale homes of Eastover and Venetian Isles beyond Bullard Avenue, water marks linger, scarring the doors of deserted buildings across eastern New Orleans.

Hurricane Katrina has come and gone. But the aftermath of muck and misery remains.

Eastover neighbors and childhood friends Kendall Parker and Terrence Augillard drove together Sunday from their temporary refuge in Lafayette to face the massive cleanup of their stately homes, nestled in a gated community waiting to be gutted.

Best friends since their days at St. Augustine High School in New Orleans, Parker, 39, and Augillard, 41, attended dental school together and recently built dream homes for their families with the hope of living and retiring side by side.

Now they are sharing a portable generator, a water vacuum and whatever else it takes to start over.

"The plan is to get one house up and then the other," Parker said. "It's pretty overwhelming."

Several feet of water crashed into the dentists' two-story houses. In a sub-room used as a sewing space in the Augillard home, floodwater and fabric formed a colorful, stinky stew that Augillard attempted to suck out.

In the nearby dining room, a surreal scene was best witnessed from the upstairs balcony. Above the swirl of dark debris, the long, blond wood table was set with white china and crystal as though awaiting ghostly dinner guests.

In the Parker home, tropical fish swam in the huge downstairs fish-tank near toppled orange suede living room chairs, resting in mud. A weeks-old silver 2006 Lexus sat ruined in the garage.

"This is our dream house," Parker said. "Everything we studied hard for, worked hard for. Everybody is suffering in his own way."

While Augillard worked to remove remaining water from his house, Parker built a makeshift corral between their houses to hold ruined furniture and other items.

Against a brown backdrop of dead grass and shrubbery, rolls of orange plastic stood out, strapped to metal tiki torches, bird-feeder stands and whatever else Parker found to secure

FEMA cuts housing plan by half

Evacuees leaving emergency shelters faster than expected

By Jan Moller and Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — As unexpected numbers of Hurricane Katrina evacuees are leaving emergency shelters and finding temporary housing on their own, federal officials Monday downgraded their estimate for how many trailers will be needed in Louisiana for people displaced by the storm.

Federal Emergency Management Agency spokesman David Passey said the agency is now planning to bring about 50,000 trailers to Louisiana, down from last week's estimate of 100,000.

Passey said the previous estimate was based on an earlier number of people still living in shelters. But shelter populations have declined significantly in the past week, including 4,700 people who left Louisiana shelters Sunday alone, officials said. Passey said he did not know what became of those who left, but speculated that many people used their own resources or FEMA emergency dollars to find hotels or apartments in other states.

"The focus right now is how can we get the most people out of shelters and into housing," Passey said.

"We acknowledge there's not a single housing solution," he said.

The first temporary trailer parks will not be ready to accept evacuees until next week, when 580 units are expected to open in the town of Baker, just north of Baton Rouge. Several more are expected to be up and running in the weeks ahead,

Katrina fears haunt returning La. soldiers

Troops find families scattered, homes flooded

By Brian Thevenot
Staff writer

Minutes before heading out on one of his last combat patrols in western Baghdad, in treacherous rural territory that had claimed the lives of 35 soldiers in Louisiana's 256th Brigade Combat Team, Lt. William Besselman of New Orleans picked up a scrap of good news about Hurricane Katrina: It looked like the city had dodged a bullet.

When he returned from patrol 12 hours later, fatigued but comforted in the hope that his family and his hometown remained unscathed, he and the rest of the brigade confronted the grim reality. Levee breaks had inundated Chalmette and the 9th Ward with up to 20 feet of water – including his home at Jackson Barracks on the border between Orleans and St. Bernard parishes. The news only got worse; the 17th Street Canal levee breach flooded broad swaths of the city and strained law enforcement agencies lost control of the city.

"I was always worried about me not coming home – never that my family could be in danger," he said Monday as he toured his battered home inside the confines of Jackson Barracks, where New Orleans Guardsmen are stationed.

One of the first of the returning Louisiana soldiers to visit his home, Besselman relayed the story of angst over Katrina among soldiers already beaten down by a year of intense warfare marked by teary funerals for comrades. In Besselman's 19-man platoon alone, one soldier had died and eight suffered injuries, almost all from roadside bombs.

Standing in the home, surrounded by moldy furniture under a roof ripped open by wind and water, Besselman remained upbeat, even as he trudged through the stinking wreckage of his bedroom and those of his children. On an ironing board with a rotting cover next to him sat precious documents he had tried to dry out: his marriage certificate, his children's baptism certificates.

In Baghdad, upon hearing of the catastrophic flooding, Besselman had rushed to a computer to check his e-mail, finding a note from his wife saying that she and their four children had safely evacuated to a Gonzales hotel. Over the next few days, as soldiers continued their combat missions, they alternated between worry about their families, helplessness in being away at war and, Besselman said, anger and embarrassment at the reports of looting and lawlessness.

"We wished we were there" to enforce order, he said. "We were embarrassed. They did that in our own city. They didn't have to do that."

New Orleans Guardsman Brian McDow, in an e-mail from Alexandria where most of the troops are still stationed, said soldiers grew increasingly frantic as they watched news of the storm from abroad.

"With each minute that passed, we gathered around the televisions … and we watched Katrina do her work," he wrote. "Word spread like wildfire when the levees broke, and we all wanted to know where and how bad the city was flooding … What came as a horror to us was all the criminal activity during and after the hurricane. We all wanted to go to New Orleans and treat these thugs like insurgents."

McDow and other soldiers of the Louisiana Guard's 141st Field Artillery Battalion were taken out of Baghdad, via Kuwait, about a week after the storm hit. Besselman, who serves in the 156th battalion out of Lake Charles, left about the same time, on a flight out of Baghdad carrying about 130 soldiers who lived in New Orleans but served in battalions stationed in other areas of Louisiana.

Once back in Alexandria, the Guard released soldiers for four days to track down their families, McDow wrote. For many, that wasn't enough, and the Guard granted them extensions.

Upon returning home from Iraq, hundreds of Louisiana soldiers were unable to find their families for days, said Maj. Pat Simon, and some still have not.

"Myself, I had to drive from Alexandria to Lake Charles to Dallas and then back to Alexandria," McDow wrote. "I know some soldiers had to travel even farther to find their families."

The future for McDow and his brother, fellow Louisiana Guardsman Mike McDow, remains uncertain.

"I am … considering staying on active duty because I have no job or a home to go to," McDow wrote. "My brother … was able to see his home on Saturday. He said it had 5 feet of water inside. He will remodel, but doesn't know if he'll stay or sell."

As Besselman waited for about a week in Baghdad for a flight back home, a call from his wife, Stacie, desperately seeking help in finding her father, drove home the impact of the disaster. Besselman had a better chance of reaching her father from Iraq than his wife did from Gonzales.

Besselman's father-in-law, Guard Col. Lester Schmidt, had stayed at Jackson Barracks as the military compound was inundated with 10 to 20 feet of water. Once the levees broke, he and his son, Sgt. Lester Schmidt Jr., hopped in a boat and started rescuing people trapped on the roofs in the Lower 9th Ward and Chalmette.

"We tried to reach her father for five to seven days," he said.

Finally, Besselman got through to Louisiana Guard troops at the Superdome, who said they had heard his father-in-law on the radio, confirming he was safe.

Besellman's dog, Rogue, had stayed behind at the flooded military base after most of its soldiers had been evacuated. "He lived on MREs for a week until the Georgia National Guard brought him some dog food," Besselman said.

While Besselman struggled to get home, his wife went from Gonzales to Houston to Alexandria, where the couple now plans to stay and build a new life.

As he surveyed the wreckage of his home, Besselman downplayed any hardships he might have endured, either at war or in the aftermath of Katrina.

"My wife deserves all the credit," he said. "She moved all the kids around, and put them all in new schools. She's been the one taking care of the family while I've been out playing soldier for three years."

Debate grows over how to pay for Gulf Coast rebuild

Bush adamant on not raising taxes to finance huge costs

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — The staggering cost of rebuilding New Orleans and other hurricane-stricken Gulf Coast communities is sparking a debate over whether the United States must go further into debt or can offset the spending through cuts in discretionary spending, temporary repeal of some tax cuts passed in Bush's first term, or some combination of the two.

The Bush administration so far has ruled out any tax increases, including a temporary or permanent repeal of its first-term tax cuts, while Democrats have warned that Republicans will face a fight if they target for cuts programs that benefit the poor and middle class.

Keith Ashdown, spokesman for Taxpayers for Common Sense, said the costs of rebuilding the Gulf Coast, while continuing to fight an expensive war in Iraq and protect the nation from the threat of a terrorist attack, require both parties to move beyond rigid views on spending and taxes.

"If we're serious about paying this massive bill to do the right thing on the Gulf Coast, you have to keep any tool in the budgetary belt or you're not being fiscally responsible," Ashdown said.

President Bush said last week that he opposes any tax increase for fear it would make it harder to generate economic growth at a time the United States needs lots of private investment to resurrect the economy in the New Orleans area and other Gulf Coast communities.

Many congressional Republicans agree.

"The problem I have with raising taxes, I think it ends up bringing less revenue in the long run and is counterproductive and slows down the economy," U.S. Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., said Monday on Fox News. He said future generations will have to foot some of the bill for hurricane relief, just as "children and grandchildren paid for World War II because it was essential to defend our country."

But not all Republicans have ruled out any tweaking of tax revenues.

Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., one of the Senate's most conservative members, said he would oppose making some of the Bush tax cuts permanent unless he sees evidence that Congress is more serious about cutting spending that it has up until now. Sen. David Vitter, R-La., said although his preference is to rely on spending cuts to help defray the costs, he's willing to look at any proposal on a "case-by-case basis, although I'm very focused on doing nothing to counteract what we have the most need for: economic incentives to bring Louisianians and business back to Louisiana."

Two weeks ago, Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., was among a group of Democrats who urged Senate GOP leaders to put off a vote on legislation to repeal the estate tax paid by wealthy Americans, saying it would send the wrong signal to do so when so many Louisiana and Mississippi residents, many of them poor, were suffering. The vote was delayed, although some Republicans are saying they'll bring up the repeal legislation at a later date.

Landrieu issued a report in February saying that some of the tax cuts enacted during Bush's first term were a major reason why some Louisiana priorities, including coastal restoration and flood control, weren't getting sufficient federal financing.

At a White House briefing Monday, Press Secretary Scott McClellan was asked how the president can sustain the argument that the United States could continue to finance an expensive war in Iraq and help the Gulf Coast recover without asking for some sacrifice from Americans. McClellan said the president is committed to trimming unnecessary spending and will work with Congress to achieve new cuts.

Trevor Parry-Giles, a University of Maryland expert on how presidents communicate their priorities, said the reluctance by Bush and other Republicans to even consider tax hikes shows how strong the anti-tax philosophy has taken hold in the party.

"For so much of its recent history, at least since the tax revolt days of the late '70s in California, but even before, the Republicans have been guided by the principle that tax increases, every time, no matter what, are bad and should be avoided," Parry-Giles said. "That was one of the cornerstones of Ronald Reagan's appeal. When George H.W. Bush broke his 'no new taxes' pledge, he paid a dear price: a primary challenge from the right of his own party. His son learned that lesson well."

Air Force official says Keesler to be rebuilt to pre-Katrina condition

Base took big hit from hurricane

By The Associated Press

BILOXI, MISS. — Air Force Secretary Pete Geren says Keesler Air Force Base will be rebuilt to pre-Hurricane Katrina condition.

Geren's comments came Friday after he spoke to airmen at a base lecture hall.

Geren toured the base and said he expects the initial estimates of damage to reach $1 billion.

"It hit the base hard. As the president said, we need to get the Gulf Coast back up and running. We will continue to work with the community," he said.

Geren said the fact that about 1,000 airmen will resume their training classes Monday is proof of progress. He said the Air Force's next move is to secure financing from Congress for extensive repairs at the base.

Red tape hinders family's struggle

Their fresh start is stop and go

By Tara Young
Staff writer

HOUSTON — For one week at least, they had a home.

After spending two weeks in a $160 a night hotel room, Darnell Johnson found shelter and at an apartment complex in Houston for his wife and five children. It wasn't much, but the modest two-bedroom apartment represented a new start for the family whose Marrero home was damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

They bought beds and cleaning supplies, determined to make a fresh start. But on Friday, the family was forced to leave again after Johnson learned he did not qualify for the housing vouchers being issued by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. FEMA paid for lodging for 14 days.

"If you came on your own, you're on your own," said Johnson, 37, who has been turned away by disaster relief agencies housed at the George R. Brown Convention Center and Reliant Park because he didn't live at either site with his family.

It's been a disheartening experience for Johnson who stood in line for more than six hours to get assistance from the Red Cross. Johnson is worried about where the money is going to come from to pay for another hotel room.

In their sparse Houston apartment, which they had to vacate after a week, Darnell and Telesha Johnson are surrounded by their children, left to right, Jared, Darnell Jr., Tyrek, Justin and Terrell. The family is trying to make a new life in Houston after evacuating for Hurricane Katrina.

A total of 51,818 families have called FEMA for assistance in the Houston area, said Justin Dombrowski, an agency spokesman.

Given the number of people affected by Hurricane Katrina, it's taking a longer to assist everyone, Dombrowski said.

Although the Johnson family didn't qualify for immediate assistance like many of those living in Houston-area shelters, they should be working with their insurance company to line up inspectors to assess the damage at the home, Dombrowski said.

Once the damage is assessed, FEMA can provide additional assistance if needed.

Dombrowski said families such as the Johnsons should go to local housing authorities and see what assistance is there for them. While there won't be immediate housing matches, they at least will be in the system when an opening becomes available.

But it's the waiting for the opening that worries, Telesha Johnson, who has watched her family's bank account dwindle during the past three weeks.

"It's scary," said Telesha Johnson, 31. "You wonder, 'At what point am I going to run out?' "

The family, who has decided to stay in Houston, said they need assistance because their mortgage company has refused to defer their house payments. The vouchers would have helped absorb some of the expense of renting an apartment until their insurance company could come in to assess the damage.

Bills are coming in faster than they can pay them, the Johnsons said.

Although the Johnsons have had to move back into a hotel, the setback hasn't discouraged them from making Houston their home.

Their 13-year-old twin sons, Justin and Jared, will be enrolled in school next week and their 4-year-old, Darnell Jr., will be attending prekindergarten. Their younger children, Tyreik, 2, and Terrell, 1, will go to day care.

"What can you do, other than keep living and hoping that things will get better," Telesha Johnson said. "All we need is a fresh start. We'll create the ending."

Hurricane Katrina refugees get a visit from Laura Bush

Says recovery will be 'a long road'

By Pam Easton
Associated Press writer

HOUSTON — First lady Laura Bush served smothered chicken to Hurricane Katrina refugees Monday at the city's convention center shelter, still home to about 300 survivors uprooted by the storm.

Bush also met with religious leaders and volunteers during a three-hour visit to Houston.

"This type of relief never could have happened without all of us," Bush said as she sat in a semicircle of Muslim, Jewish and Christian leaders at the George R. Brown Convention Center. "It will be a long road for us. We have to stay with them every step as they rebuild their lives and it is not going to be easy."

Some refugees in Houston reacted with anger to President Bush's speech last week announcing the massive federal rebuilding effort along the Gulf Coast, complaining that he has ignored them while they were exiled. The first lady's visit seemed to salve some of that displeasure.

Bush said her husband plans to visit refugees in Texas this weekend.

"One of the most important things that happened is the first responders responded and that is very important," she said. "They did whatever they could to make sure people had what they needed. The government response is going to take a long time. We are going to have many, many months of continuing to work to make sure everybody has what they need."

Bush also stopped at a Home Depot store. The company has rehired about 10 of its displaced workers from Louisiana and Mississippi in the Houston area.

Refugee Keith Flores, who has worked at Home Depot for 20 years, said he's happy in Houston, but wants to return to New Orleans with his Great Dane, Duke, who is being cared for by the Humane Society.

Bush also stopped and talked with families at a center that helps homeless mothers who need child care while they look for work. She joined them in molding Play-Doh and gave out M&Ms and notepads.

Laura Bush hugs New Orleans evacuee Haikeem Washington, 4, at a day-care center in Houston on Monday. Mrs. Bush also served lunch to about 300 survivors still calling Houston's convention center home after having to flee Hurricane Katrina.

Temporary trailer park expected to open next week

and still others could take months to get established – if they ever do.

Officials in Livingston Parish plan to stall permits for trailer parks and prevent FEMA from setting up trailer villages until the parish gets more information about the impact of the new communities and who is going to pay for them.

"They don't have a plan," Ray Chidester, director of the Livingston Parish Office of Homeland Security, said about FEMA and the state. "There's so many questions they're not answering."

He said FEMA and state officials are offering no answers about basic infrastructure questions, such as dealing with new demands for sewer and water, garbage, schools, roads, fire fighting and security.

"We cannot go about it haphazardly as FEMA has done from Day 1," said Livingston Parish President Mike Grimmer. "As a responsible leader, how can I just say, come on down, and then ask the questions?"

At its peak the parish had 2,500 evacuees in shelters and now has about 200 in a Red Cross shelter in Denham Springs and fewer than 500 at various churches. Many evacuees found housing in the parish or are living with other residents, increasing the parish population by about one-third, Chidester estimates.

Not counting the school district and sheriff's office, the parish government has spent $500,000 on storm-related relief, with no assurance of how it will be paid back, Grimmer said. The total parish budget is $14 million.

The Livingston Parish school system also is under pressure. The fast-growing parish already had 700 new students for this school year even before Katrina, and now the system has another 1,200 students, all in a system with 21,561 students, officials said.

St. Charles Parish will make any new trailer park proposals go through the usual process of applying with the zoning commission and then the parish council. If an area is already approved for a trailer park, then FEMA can proceed. Otherwise the process could take 30 to 60 days to go through the normal channels, and there is no assurance it will be approved, a parish spokesman said.

East Baton Rouge Parish is cooperating with FEMA to establish trailer parks while also working with the federal Housing and Urban Development agency to fix existing apartments and houses for evacuees, said parish president and Baton Rouge mayor Kip Holden. New trailer parks are expected to be ready in three to four weeks, he said, at sites in Baker, at the city's airport and on a commercial site off Lobdell Boulevard.

FEMA has promised to provide transportation, food and security for people at the parks, Holden said.

Lafayette Parish officials said no site has been identified yet for trailer villages, but the parish is ready to work with FEMA to establish them.

State Sen. Edwin Murray, D-New Orleans, whose district was severely impacted by Katrina, said for the short term people need to get out of the shelters, and temporary trailer housing is an acceptable alternative. But he said officials should not lose sight of the need for new permanent housing in New Orleans.

Murray said trailer communities could be set up in various areas of the city or nearby parishes, possibly at Pontchartrain Park, on golf courses unusable after the storm or on private property, he said. City officials will have to consider zoning changes to accommodate trailer villages.

T.W. Prewett, who heads the Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness in East Feliciana Parish, said federal contractors have made several trips to the rural parish to scout possible sites but have not made any decisions. Should a site be chosen, Prewett said it could take weeks or even months before services such as water, sewerage and electricity could be made available to accommodate the newcomers.

"If they put anything up here in this parish, it probably would be as late as December," Prewett said.

While trailer parks have received the most attention, FEMA also is working to move people into rental housing, motels and other transitional housing while they await word on when they can go back to their homes.

By the end of the week, FEMA hopes to have 2,400 housing units available for evacuees that could house up to 8,000 people. Another 3,400 units are expected to be available by the end of next week, Passey said.

Perhaps his insurance agent would arrive to note the loss before the coming rain, Parker said, knowing that a storm called Rita looms in the Gulf.

"I don't think Katrina was the big one," said Eastover resident and New Orleans native Aaron Neville, living in Nashville with no plan to return to New Orleans soon. Maybe never.

"I'll keep my memories," Neville said by cell phone about his flooded house. "It's all moldy and mildew and I have asthma."

The award-winning singer said that he was out of town with "a couple of pairs of jeans and shirts and shoes" when the storm hit and that his family had to evacuate. "Now I'm afraid of my people being caught down there (for the next hurricane.)

The only song heard in Eastover on Sunday was that of a mockingbird, sitting in a fledgling, dead oak next to Neville's house. A large toppled tree blocked the front entrance and a cluster of downed trees covered the back yard.

Crows and buzzards appeared to be the only birds coasting above the brown grit, dead foilage and downed fences that cover eastern New Orleans.

Only a few areas, such as houses hugging Hayne Boulevard, did not flood.

Camouflage military trucks and electric-service vehicles roamed roads such as Hayne and Chef Menteur Highway, along with the occasional animal rescuer and resident.

Mile after mile of brick homes bear the mark of floodwater halfway up the front door. Motor boats and cars covered in dried muck sit askew in driveways and on neutral grounds.

Debris lines Chef Highway east of Powers Junction. Utility poles lean into the roadway at various angles, and clothing and plastic bags are stuck in trees edging the marsh on either side.

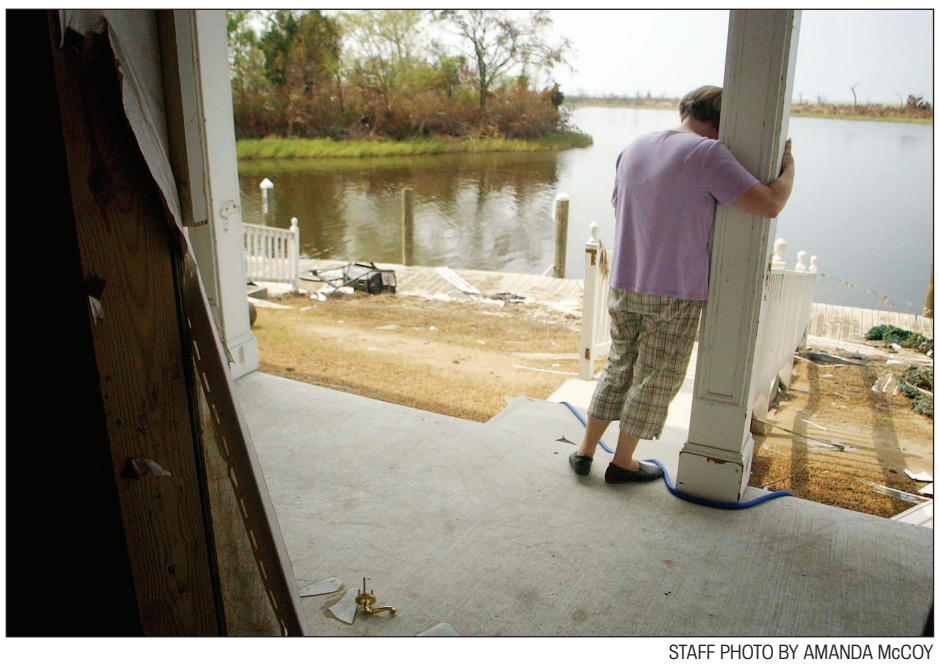
One of several overturned boats bears the spray-painted message: "We are OK."

Farther east, Ann and Wallace Rodrigue were not OK. They found their house in Venetian Isles a twisted mess: the walls of the ground floor and the staircase leading to the second floor gone, a hole in the roof.

Their daughter's house, which once stood down the street from them, lay in rubble two lots away from where it stood.

Like a giant checkers game, it appeared that a tornado picked up the house, and the pool behind it, and plopped it on the other side of the house next door.

Betty Brown and her husband Yancy, accompanied by friends Marva Barnum and Lafete Tucker, got their first look Friday afternoon at the havoc Hurricane Katrina wreaked inside their home on Morrison Road in eastern New Orleans.



At the sight of her grandmother's antique softa and chairs covered with mold and mud, Betty Brown broke into tears and collapsed in Barnum's arms.

Brown soon found that not all her keepsakes had fallen victim to the hurricane's fury: her grandmother's candy dish was still there, unbroken, and albums of cherished photos survived, perfectly dry, in the top of a hall closet.

Direct hit by Rita could topple levee system

strength by Thursday and could threaten New Orleans and the rest of Louisiana's coastline.

"Start making preparations to leave now" if you live on the coastal area, Gov. Kathleen Blanco said late Monday afternoon. "Prepare your family, prepare your house for evacuation."

A direct hit risks overtopping what's left of the city's hurricane-protection levee system, which corps officials and contractors are working feverishly to restore. Even if Rita is a near-miss that delivers heavy rainfall to the city, it could cause 2 feet to 4 feet of flooding in many areas that just dried out or haven't yet, New Orleans District Engineer Col. Richard Wagenaar said.

National Hurricane Center Director Max Mayfield warned that Rita seemed to be following a pattern of recent storms in having its initial forecast path erode eastward, shifting from Brownsville, Texas, on Sunday to Corpus Christi early Monday and then eastward to Galveston by 5 p.m.

Landfall is predicted for Saturday with winds of 120 mph.

Nagin said he had seen a forecast from a meteorologist who is "usually on the money," whom he did not name, that showed Rita landing in Terrebonne Parish as a Category 3 hurricane.

That would put New Orleans on the dangerous east side of the storm, likely causing a storm surge of 10 feet or more, he said. At the moment, he said a storm surge of 3 feet, or rainfall of 9 inches or more, would cause substantial flooding in the city.

Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen had already publicly questioned whether Nagin's timeline to bring back residents of the Uptown and French Quarter neighborhoods, among those least damaged by Hurricane Katrina, was overly ambitious.

Allen cited the lack of vital city services, including drinking water, sewerage, a working 911 system and a lack of functioning emergency rooms, and said the plan was "extremely problematic."

Earlier in the day, Nagin was quoted as sarcastically calling Allen the "federally appointed mayor of New Orleans."

At the news conference, he called Allen "a good man."

But, he added, "When he starts talking to the citizens of New Orleans, he's kind of out of his league. There's only one mayor of New Orleans, and I'm it."

But Councilwoman Jacquelyn Brechtel Clarkson, whose district includes Algiers and the French Quarter, urged residents to stay where they are until Rita's path becomes clearer. She estimated that about a third of Algiers' 60,000 residents returned Monday, the first day that Nagin opened up the city for re-entry.

Elsewhere in the region, Jefferson Parish officials said they were keeping a close watch on Rita, but they had yet to order any evacuation of those who recently returned to their neighborhoods.

"We're in such a state now, with our infrastructure so vulnerable, that we can't take a hit of any order," said Walter Maestri, Jefferson Parish's emergency management director.

"Obviously we're taking this storm very, very seriously," said Federal Emergency Management Agency spokesman David Passey. As Tropical Storm Rita moves closer to the Gulf of Mexico, the agency has started conducting a daily videoconference with the National Hurricane Center in Miami to track its progress.

If the storm were to take direct aim at south Louisiana, where thousands of federal workers are helping in the Hurricane Katrina recovery, FEMA would likely evacuate most of those employees and leave only an operational team in place to ride out the storm. But so far there have been no decisions on whether such an evacuation will be needed, Passey said.

"We're all going to know more in a couple of days" about where the storm is heading, Passey said.

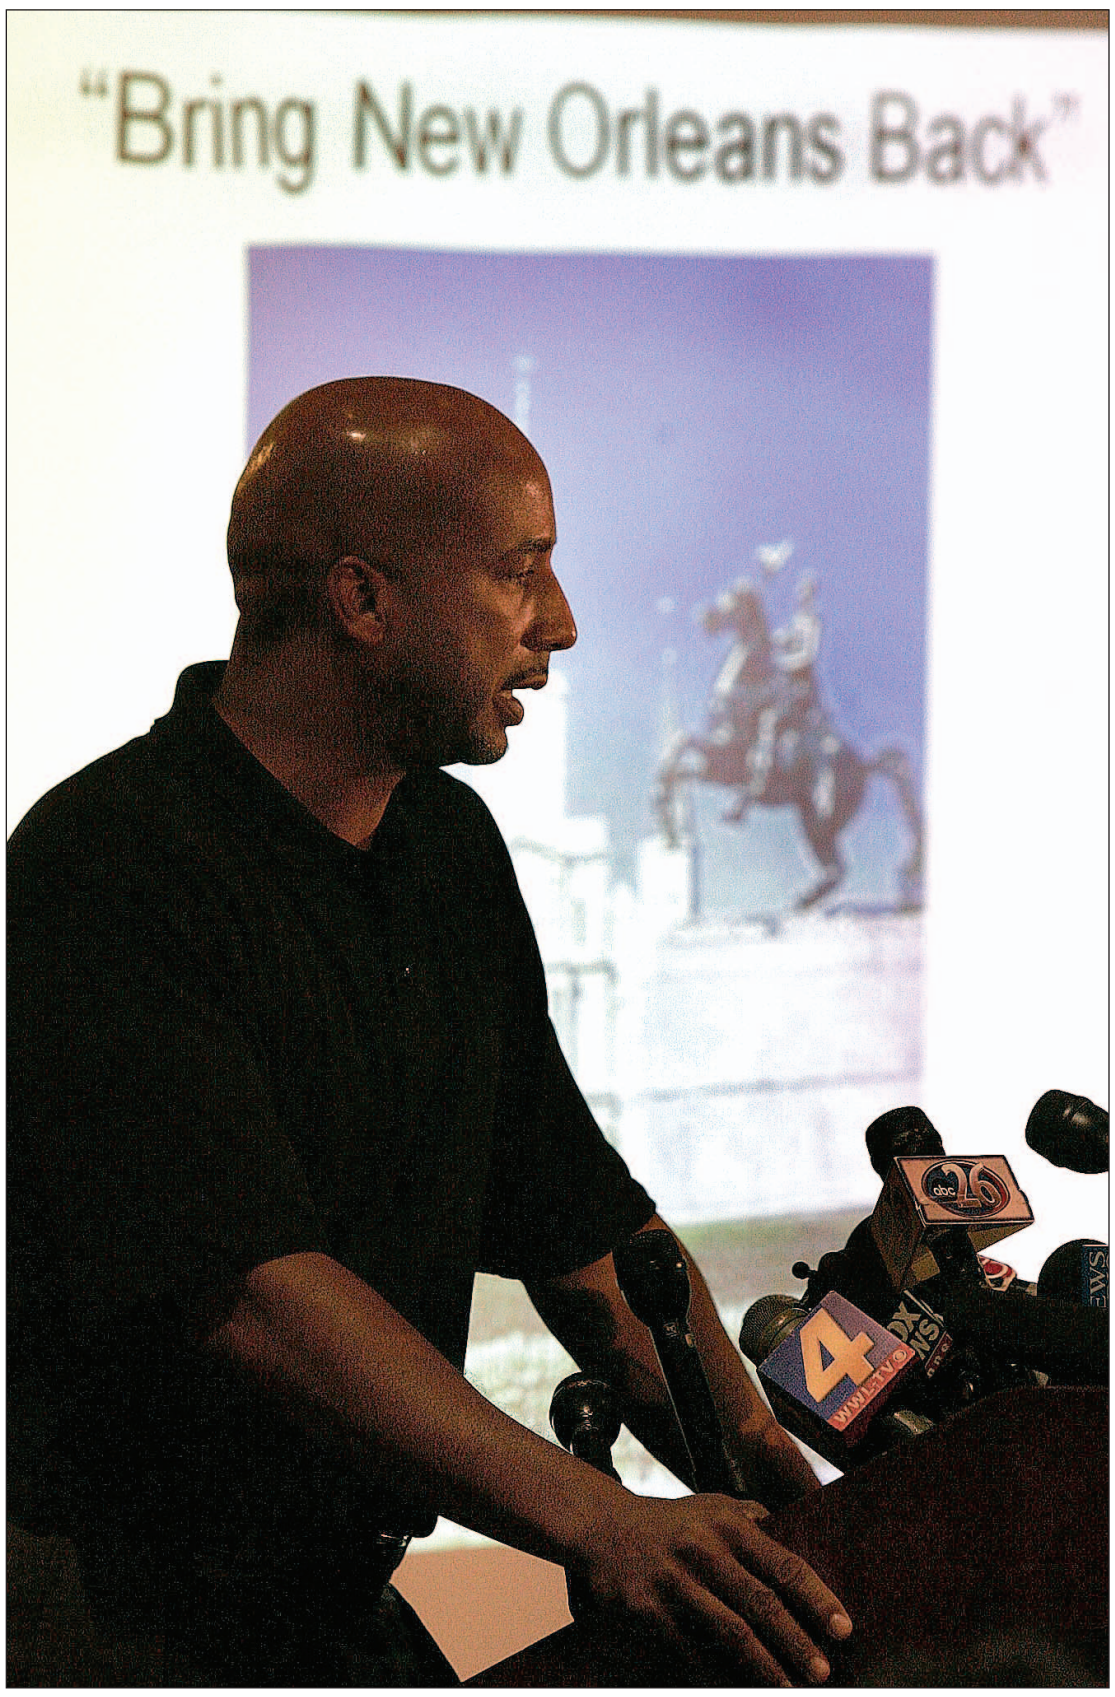
Work continued to repair the damage from Katrina's blast three weeks ago. At the 17th Street levee, dump trucks brought loads of crushed concrete as Boh Brothers construction workers continued to stabilize the berm that stands where the levee was breached.

"We're monitoring the situation 24-7," said Couser Hano, an equipment operator as he worked inside a bulldozer. "You don't ever second-guess Mother Nature."

The berm, he said, is strong, but workers were preparing for Rita. "It's stable. We've had bulldozers, cranes, dump trucks on it. You can put anything you want on it, and it's gonna hold."

On the city side of the breach, levee walls lay buried like tossed playing cards. Lakeview homes were shifted, broken and torn like drowned doll houses, and three large oaks were upended in a lake of seepage, their massive rootballs exposed. A chain-link fence snaked along riven earth pushed back from the canal. "Look," one worker said, pointing to ripples in the lake. "A gar fish."

Several 60-foot steel, sheet pilings had been driven into the canal at the Old Hammond Highway bridge, forming walls in the water near the sides of the canal. Corps officials said they were prepared to drive more piles and close the gap, and they were working to reinforce weakened areas of the levee system.



"We have contingency plans," said project manager David Wurtzel. "It really depends on the path of the storm. There are a lot of possibilities we can offer, as far as protection." He said crew members would be able to shut down their operation at the canal within four hours.

Wagenaar said workers also are moving temporary pumps to strategic locations throughout the city in anticipation of heavy rainfall accompanying Rita.

But the temporary pumps can only provide a very small fragment of the flow that the fixed stations are capable of," he said. "You can't compare even one of our 42-inch pumps to one of the 1,000 cubic feet per second pumps in the city."

Algiers residents allowed back ... for now

But Nagin wants them to leave before Rita

By Paul Purpura
West Bank bureau

Just as Algiers welcomed its residents home Monday, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin asked them to consider leaving again by Wednesday with Tropical Storm Rita churning toward the Gulf of Mexico.

About a third of the West Bank community's 60,000 residents have returned home after evacuating the region for Hurricane Katrina, said Councilwoman Jacquelyn Brechtel Clarkson, whose district includes Algiers. Though they had electricity and drinking water, residents found no grocery stores and few gas stations open.

But with the metro area a possible target of Rita, Nagin on Monday suspended his reentry plan.

Projected to land as a Category 3 storm, Rita could make landfall as far east as Terrebonne Parish, putting New Orleans on the eastern, or more powerful side.

"I'm asking everybody to start the (evacuation) process right now," Nagin said, adding that his order was mandatory for the east bank because levees breached by Katrina's storm surge are vulnerable to breaking again and pumping stations are not up to full capacity.

But Clarkson urged the residents to remain where they are until Rita's path becomes clear.

Though the New Orleans Police Department said it had no firm count on the number of people who returned to their Algiers homes Monday, officers manning checkpoints said it was fewer than expected. Streets remained largely devoid of civilian traffic.

"Stores, gas, I'm not even sure we can use the ATM," said Corey Hall, who returned home with his father, Clarence, to find their Easter Lane home in good shape after taking their families to Texas three weeks ago. "Looking at it that way, I don't want to bring my family home just yet."

Officials also warned that the emergency 911 phone number was not working, and said residents should call 552-4830 to report crimes and fires. The 6 p.m. to 8 a.m. curfew remains in effect.

With few services in Algiers, Clarkson asked residents to rely on grocery stores in neighboring Jefferson and Plaquemines parishes.

Of Algiers' three large groceries, the Winn-Dixie on Holiday Drive is expected to reopen Thursday at 8 a.m., with a limited cold food stock, a store manager said.

"There are some inconveniences," Clarkson said after opening an office at the Old Algiers Courthouse on Morgan Street. "God spared Algiers so it could lead to the rebuilding of the city of New Orleans."

In addition to a federal distribution center at Behrman Stadium, two church-sponsored operations were in full swing, providing water, ice, food and cleaning supplies to residents.

Lily Duke, who lives in Algiers Point, helped start one at Blaine Kern's Mardi Gras World last week, doing so with assistance from the Church of Christ.

She said the number of people seeking aid there has increased. On Sunday, more than 700 people passed through the site — 300 more compared with the day before, she said.

"These people coming here, they're going to need a lot of stuff," Duke said, acknowledging Algiers' lack of open grocery stores and gas stations. "I'm thinking another couple of weeks to a month before things get going."

St. Mary's Church, with federal and National Guard help, is distributing food, water and ice at its Gen. Meyer Avenue Center.

The church also serves free hot lunches, having fed 477 people Sunday with food donated by churches nationwide, said the Rev. James Brown, pastor of St. Mary's.

"Churches have heard about what we're doing and have sent us 18-wheelers of food," Brown said.

Important information from Entergy as you return home.

Wind, rain and flood damage to homes and businesses from Hurricane Katrina will likely prohibit customers from receiving power from Entergy despite our success in restoring its electric distribution system.

Attention Electric Customers with Property Damage
If your property has any water damage, please turn off the electricity at either the main fuse box or circuit breaker. Call a licensed electrician for advice when necessary. Don't step in water to get to the fuse box or circuit breaker.

A licensed electrician may need to inspect your property's electric wiring before Entergy can restore power to a home or business which has water damage from rain or flood waters.

Attention Electric Customers without Property Damage
Property owners without hurricane damage should still be cautious. Look for electrical system damage once power is restored. If you see sparks, broken or frayed wires, or the smell of hot insulation is noticeable, turn off the electricity at either the main fuse box or circuit breaker. Call a licensed electrician for advice when necessary. Don't step in water to get to the fuse box or circuit breaker.

Restoration crews have been working to repair the infrastructure of the electrical distribution system in order to be prepared to provide power to customers once their property is safely able to receive our services.

IF YOUR NATURAL GAS IS TURNED OFF, FOR SAFETY'S SAKE, LEAVE IT OFF

If you have pipe damage, you'll need a licensed plumber

To help ensure your personal safety and the safety of your property, Entergy has likely turned your natural gas service off. Please do not attempt to turn it on yourself. This could cause a safety hazard for you and your property.

If your home was flooded or sustained structural damage, you should contact a licensed plumber to inspect gas piping and make repairs.

Please do the following:

1) Have repairs made by a licensed plumber
2) Have repairs certified by a city inspector
3) Call Entergy at 1-800-ENTERGY (1-800-368-3749) when the repairs are completed

We will arrange to have gas service turned on at your home as soon as you have had a certified plumber and city inspector confirm that gas service is safe to turn on. Someone must be present for your gas to be turned on.

If you smell gas at your home or in any other building, you should leave the area immediately and go to a safe area and call us at 1-800-ENTERGY (1-800-368-3749) to report the location of the suspected leak.

Many in the dark about power status

Safety concerns can cause electricity to be withheld

By Keith Darce
Business writer

Over utility call center telephone lines, on radio shows, through e-mails and in every other imaginable way of communicating, the question gets asked over and over every day: Does my house have electricity?

For thousands of evacuees, turning the lights back on will signal the moment when they can return home and begin restoring the life they had before hurricane Katrina.

But answering that question is proving difficult, especially in the hard-hit parishes of Orleans, Plaquemines and St. Bernard.

And even as portions of the electricity grid are turned back on in areas of New Orleans that were spared flooding, there are no guarantees that power will flow to any particular home or business.

Teams from the region's biggest electricity monopoly, Entergy Corp., are scouring the power transmission system, looking at every pole, transformer and wire for damage.

Where no damage is found, electricity is being restored. But electricity is being withheld for safety reasons from homes and other buildings that have damaged circuit boxes or wires.

That means one person could return to his Uptown home later this week and find lights burning and the air conditioner running, while a neighbor returns to darkness and steamy heat.

"If you have wind, rain or flood damage to your home or business, we are not going to energize transformers to those buildings even though we may have the grid up and running there," said Dan Packer, chief executive of Entergy's New Orleans utility.

An Entergy employee leans out of a helicopter to repair insulation at the top of a 90-foot pole damaged by Katrina. Several poles were knocked down on the line, which runs from Michoud across Bayou Bienvenue.

"Safety trumps speed," he said. "We are working slowly and methodically."

Those words might frustrate evacuees anxious to start rebuilding their lives. Some people don't even want to move back home yet. They just want electricity flowing so they can turn on air conditioners to dry out flood-soaked furniture and walls, and halt the growth of mold.

But the dangers of powering damaged electrical systems are greater than those posed by lingering dampness, Packer said. Sending electricity through flooded or damaged circuits and wires could cause shorts that could spark fires.

"A massive fire in a neighborhood strikes me as one of the worst things that could happen right now," Packer said. "We're assuming that people want to come back to something with some value."

People in damaged buildings must get circuits and wiring fixed by a licensed electrician and cleared by a city code inspector before power will be restored by the utility, Packer said.

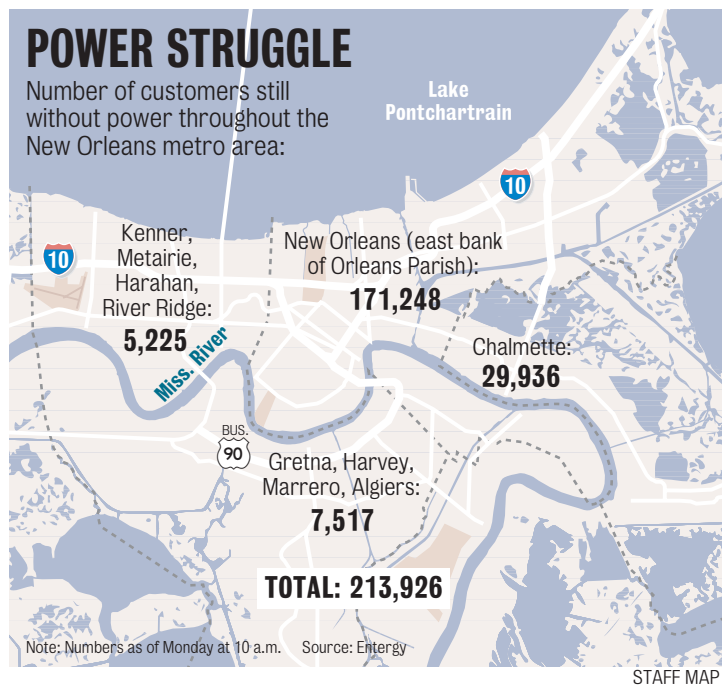
That's a tough assignment in a city that remains largely closed for business and evacuated.

Help could come from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which supplied an army of inspectors to Hurricane-damaged areas of Florida last summer in order to speed the process of restoring power to damaged buildings.

Officials with the city's Department of Safety and Permits are looking for ways to get electricians and inspectors into the city, Packer said.

Officials with the department were unavailable Monday afternoon.

As of Monday, power was back on in much of the Central Business District, the Warehouse District, the Bienville Street corridor in the French Quarter and Uptown areas around hospitals.



Electricity should be restored by the end of the week to the rest of the French Quarter and to Canal Street between Interstate 10 and the Mississippi River, Packer said.

Lights should be back on in other unflooded neighborhoods running along the river from the Bywater to Riverbend within two weeks.

Electricity lines running to the Superdome have been reenergized but the landmark building will remain in the dark until its internal electrical system is repaired, Packer said.

Cleco Corp. had restored power to 88 percent of its customers in the parishes of St. Tammany and Washington north of Lake Pontchartrain by Monday afternoon. About 9,200

St. Tammany customers remained in the dark, mostly in Slidell, Lacombe and Covington. In Washington, 41 customers still needed electricity.

Kitchens may be closed, forever

Many smaller restaurants likely won't reopen

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — An estimated one-quarter of the 3,400 restaurants in the New Orleans area will probably not reopen because of insurance cost, cash-flow or staffing issues, the chief executive officer of the Louisiana Restaurant Association said Monday.

Jim Funk said that the 25 percent projection is a minimum number and could increase.

Most of the causalities, he said, will probably not be the established restaurants like Commander's Palace or Galatoire's, but the mom-and-pop neighborhood places.

He said by the end of Monday, there were no more than 75 of the area's 3,394 restaurants open.

"The losses will be staggering," Funk said.

He projected that the $2.1 billion in annual sales at New Orleans area restaurants will be off by at least $500 million, because of the boarding up of restaurants after Hurricane Katrina or the inability to operate at full staff now.

One-third of the state's 10,628 restaurants are in the New Orleans area. Total restaurant sales across the state are about $5.2 billion a year, Funk said.

Katrina's timing was also cruel: It shuttered several restaurants at the time of year when their sales receive a boost from conventions.

"September is a good month, October is a great month, and November is a doggone good month,'' Funk said. "But now, a lot will depend on the repopulation" of the area and how fast the tourism and convention industry can bounce back.

"The jewels of our industry are the restaurants of New Orleans," he said. "That's where people go when they think of food."

But Funk admitted that "a lot of restaurants will have to tough time surviving. Some may open and there will be poor cash flow, and it will be a matter of weeks before they close."

He said some of the factors that may play a role in restaurants boarding up for good include how much insurance the restaurants had and how much it will cost to get insurance in the future. Also, he said, some operators might decide that they "don't want to fight this any more."

More than 53,000 of the 140,000 direct jobs supported by the state's restaurant industry are in the New Orleans area. Funk said some restaurants trying to open with skeleton staffs.

"We have employees scattered all over the board," he said. He said one New Orleans area restaurant has opened with nine employees instead of its regular complement of 30 to 40 workers.

As time goes by, Funk said, more restaurants will open. "There are a few open in the Veterans (Memorial Boulevard) corridor (in East Jefferson) now and some in New Orleans are trying to get open," he said.

Although sales have nose-dived in the New Orleans area, other areas of the state are reporting an increase in sales of 5 percent to 15 percent because many local residents have been displaced, but are still eating out.

But the increase in business in Baton Rouge, Lafayette and other areas will not offset the losses in the New Orleans area, Funk said.

Les Guerin, an official for Piccadilly Corp. and a member of the association's board, said one problem that may slow the reopening of New Orleans area residents may be a shortage of health inspectors or sanitarians to check out the conditions of the restaurants before they can open their doors.

Greg Reggio, owner of Taste Buds, the corporation that operates some Semolina and Zea's restaurants in the New Orleans area, said many restaurant operators will feel a cash crunch.

To ease the cash-flow problem, he said, he is trying to put together a coalition of restaurants to meet with Federal Emergency Management Agency officials to see whether it can use New Orleans area restaurants to cater to security and rebuilding forces in the New Orleans area.

"I want to see how we can get involved," Reggio said. "If they have a mouth, we can fill it."

After they return, New Orleans area residents will not have the disposable income they had pre-Katrina, he said, and restaurants will have to adapt.

"Prime rib is not going to be on my menu," he said. "I can't put a $12 hamburger on my menu, and nobody else can either."

NEWS IN BRIEF

NASA shoots for the moon by 2018

CAPE CANAVERAL, FLA. — It will cost $104 billion over the next decade to send astronauts back to the moon, NASA's chief said Monday, defending the price tag as an investment the nation can afford despite the expense of Hurricane Katrina. Described as "Apollo on steroids," the new moon exploration plan unveiled by the space agency will use beefed-up shuttle and Apollo parts and aims to put people on the moon by 2018. NASA Administrator Michael Griffin said he is not seeking extra money and stressed that NASA will live within its annual budgets of $16 billion. Funding within the human spaceflight program will be redirected to achieve this goal, and not "one thin dime" will be taken from science projects, he said. The $104 billion price tag, leading up to an initial four-person lunar landing and spread over 13 years, represents 55 percent of what the Apollo program would cost in today's dollars, Griffin said. Apollo development spanned eight years, from 1961 to the first manned moon landing in 1969. The new space vehicle design uses shuttle rocket parts, an Apollo-style capsule and a lander capable of carrying four people to the moon.

Power plays under way after election

BERLIN — German opposition leader Angela Merkel and the chairman of Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder's party made their first contacts with potential coalition partners Monday in a scramble for power after the country's inconclusive election. Voters denied both Schroeder and Merkel a majority, but each is demanding the chancellor's office. Their struggle could last weeks, even as business leaders and economists warn decisive action is needed to invigorate the sluggish economy. Germany's foreign policy — addressing such issues as Turkey's bid for European Union membership, Iran's nuclear program and U.S. relations — also remains on hold. Merkel's conservative Christian Democrats and their Bavarian sister party just barely beat Schroeder's Social Democrats 35.2 percent to 34.3 percent. The muddled result could lead left and right to link up in a so-called grand coalition. But either Merkel or Schroeder would have to yield the chancellorship, and many fear such a merger would be too internally divided to be effective. Other coalitions remained possible.

Ex-CEO gets 25 years in Tyco scandal

NEW YORK — Former Tyco CEO L. Dennis Kozlowski was sentenced Monday to up to 25 years in prison for looting the company of hundreds of millions of dollars, the climax of a case of executive greed replete with tales of a $6,000 gold-threaded shower curtain and a $2 million Mediterranean birthday party. Kozlowski, 58, was led out of the courtroom in handcuffs as his wife quietly sobbed from a bench three rows back. He will be eligible for parole after eight years and four months behind bars in a state prison in New York. Tyco's former finance chief, Mark Swartz, 44, received the same sentence, and state Supreme Court Justice Michael Obus ordered the defendants to pay a total of $134 million in restitution to Tyco International Ltd. In addition, the judge fined Kozlowski $70 million, and Swartz $35 million. Kozlowski and Swartz join a line of other executives sentenced to prison for lengthy stints after white-collar scandals that outraged the public. Former WorldCom Chairman Bernard Ebbers was sentenced to 25 years in prison for the $11 billion accounting fraud that toppled the telecommunications company that emerged from bankruptcy as MCI Inc. Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John Rigas was sentenced to 15 years in prison for his role in the looting and fraud at the cable TV company. His son and former finance chief, Timothy Rigas, got 20 years. Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay, former CEO Jeffrey Skilling and former top Enron accountant Richard Causey are expected to go to trial in January. Unlike WorldCom and Enron, Tyco survived the scandal.

An Iraqi boy uses a slingshot to hurl stones at British troops Monday in Basra, where two British soldiers were arrested for allegedly gunning down an Iraqi police officer. Witnesses said British tanks knocked down the walls at a jail to free the two soldiers.

Al-Qaida takes credit for London bombs

Two British soldiers freed from Iraqi jail

By The Associated Press

Al-Qaida deputy leader Ayman al-Zawahri said in a statement broadcast Monday that his terror network carried out the July 7 London bombings, marking the group's first direct claim of responsibility for the attacks that killed 52 people.

"The blessed London attack was one which al-Qaida was honored to launch against the British crusader's arrogance and against the American crusader aggression on the Islamic nation for 100 years," al-Zawahri said in the tape aired on Qatar-based al-Jazeera TV.

"In their final testament, the heroic brothers in the London attacks ... provided great lessons to the Islamic nation and Muslims in Pakistan to oppose the infidels," said al-Zawahri, who was shown wearing a white turban and speaking to someone who was interviewing him off-camera.

The attacks also killed the four bombers.

"This blessed attack revealed the real hypocritical face of the West," said grey-bearded al-Zawahri, who wore a black vest over a white shirt.

A spokeswoman for London's Metropolitan Police said she had no immediate comment on al-Zawahri's tape.

Meanwhile, in Basra, Iraq, British soldiers used tanks to break down the walls of the central jail in this southern city and freed two Britons, allegedly undercover commandos arrested on charges of shooting two Iraqi police officers, witnesses said. The Basra governor called the rescue a "barbaric" act of aggression.

But in London, the Ministry of Defense said in a statement that two British troops held by Iraqi authorities in Basra were released as a result of negotiations. It said the two service personnel were with British forces.

A Defense spokesman added he had no information suggesting they were freed as a result of any overt military action. But the spokesman stopped short of denying reports that British tanks crashed through the walls of a jail in Basra to free the two troops.

In a public humiliation, Arab satellite TV stations showed pictures of two Western men sitting on the floor of the jail building with their hands tied behind their backs. One of the men had a bandage covering most of the top of his head, the other had blood on his clothes. Television commentary identified them only as Britons.

While the Shiite-dominated south of Iraq, where 8,500 British troops are based, has been far quieter than Sunni regions to the north, Britons have come under increasingly frequent attacks in recent weeks. The British military has reported 96 deaths since the war began in 2003.

That compares with the deaths of 1,899 Americans who are stationed nearer the violent insurgent regions around Baghdad and stretching west to the Syrian border.

This past summer, freelance journalist Steven Vincent wrote a column in The New York Times accusing Basra police of being infiltrated by Shiite militiamen. Shortly thereafter, on Aug. 2, Vincent was abducted at gunpoint and his body was discovered that night on the side of the highway south of Basra. A senior British official said Islamic militants — and not Iraqi police — probably killed Vincent.

To the north Monday, an estimated 3 million pilgrims, some carrying signs reading "We welcome martyrdom," jammed the holy city of Karbala for a major Shiite festival in defiance of insurgent declarations of all-out sectarian war.

And an Iraqi court in Baghdad sentenced one of Saddam Hussein's nephews to life in prison for financing the country's violent insurgency and bomb-making after a previously unannounced trial. It was the first known trial of any of the former leader's family.

Elsewhere Monday, militants continued bloody attacks, killing 24 police and civilians and wounding 28 others.

North Korea makes deal to drop nuclear programs

But U.S. wants words backed by actions

By Burt Herman
Associated Press writer

BEIJING — North Korea agreed Monday to dismantle nuclear weapons and its atomic facilities in exchange for energy aid, economic cooperation and security assurances, a breakthrough that marked a first step toward disarmament after two years of six-nation talks.

The chief U.S. envoy praised the development as a "win-win situation" and "good agreement for all of us." But he promptly urged Pyongyang, which also agreed to international inspections, to make good on its promises by ending operations at its main nuclear facility at Yongbyon.

"What is the purpose of operating it at this point?" said Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill. "The time to turn it off would be about now."

Despite the deal's potential to help significantly ease friction between the North and the United States after years of false starts and setbacks, Hill remained cautious.

"We have to see what comes in the days and weeks ahead," he said.

President Bush called it a positive step, but he expressed some skepticism about whether North Korea will live up to its promises.

"They have said - in principle - that they will abandon their weapons programs," Bush said. "And what we have said is, `Great. That's a wonderful step forward.' But now we've got to verify whether that happens."

"The question is, over time will all parties adhere to the agreement," Bush said.

The agreement clinched seven days of talks aimed at setting out general principles for the North's disarmament. Envoys agreed to return in early November to begin hashing out details of how that will be done.

Then, the hard work of ensuring compliance will begin, officials attending the talks said.

"Agreeing to a common document does not mean that the solution to our problems has been found," said Japan's chief envoy, Kenichiro Sasae.

Another Japanese official, who spoke on condition he not be named, noted that there was no common understanding among the participants about the nature of North Korea's nuclear program.

The head of the U.N. nuclear nonproliferation agency welcomed North Korea's decision to allow inspections, saying he hoped his experts could take the country at its word as soon as possible.

"The earlier we go back, the better," said Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Hill and other envoys said the timetable for inspections had not been set, although they want compliance as soon as possible.

The talks, which began in August 2003, include China, Japan, Russia, the United States and the two Koreas.

The negotiations had been deadlocked over North Korea's demand to keep the right to civilian nuclear programs after it disarms, and the statement acknowledges the North has made such an assertion but doesn't go beyond that.

North Korea also had demanded that it be given a light-water nuclear reactor at the latest talks - a type less easily diverted for weapons use - but Washington had said it and other countries at the talks wouldn't meet that request.

Putting aside the question for now, the statement said: "The other parties expressed their respect and agreed to discuss at an appropriate time the subject of the provision of light-water reactor" to North Korea.

LABORERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION OF NORTH AMERICA

Local Union 689 LEGAL NOTICE
Its Officers and Members

Re: Local Union 689, New Orleans, Louisiana
Notice of Imposition of Emergency Trusteeship

Dear Brothers and Sisters:

As a result of the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina to New Orleans and surrounding areas along the Gulf Coast, Local Union 689 has and will continue to require emergency assistance from the International Union to assure that the rights and interests of our members are effectively served during this crisis.

Tragically, some of the officers and as yet undetermined numbers of the Local Union's more than one thousand proud members remain unaccounted for in the aftermath of the storm and massive flooding. In addition, although the Local Union's office building remains standing, it is inaccessible and cannot yet be inspected for possible damages. Since the disaster struck, the International Union has taken the lead on behalf of the Local Union to locate and assist our members, refer our members to work, find new job opportunities, and push recovery efforts forward.

In consideration of these exigent and unprecedented circumstances, I have placed Local Union 689 under the emergency trusteeship of the International Union, effective immediately. The affairs of the Local Union shall be conducted by James C. Hale, Vice President and Ohio Valley and Southern States Regional Manager. The Deputy Trustee shall be International Representative Darren Johnson. You may contact Vice President Hale at 25 Century Boulevard, Suite 305, Nashville, Tennessee 37214, telephone number (615) 885-7196.
This action is only part of the massive recovery effort that LIUNA has undertaken on behalf of our brothers and sisters in hurricane-affected areas. Other LIUNA-sponsored initiatives include:

Laborers' Care - This fund raising initiative continues to receive an overwhelming response from Laborers throughout the country who have opened up their hearts and their wallets to help their brothers and sisters in hurricane ravaged areas. Donations can be made online with credit cards at www.laborerscare.org, www.ovsslecet.org, or www.liuna.org. Checks should be made out to Laborers' Care, and mailed to the International Union's Headquarters at 905 16th Street, N.W. Washington, D.C. 20006, Attention General President's Office. For further information or assistance concerning donations, please call Terra McFadin at (615) 885-7828.

Membership Outreach Program - Laborers are urged to call our Toll Free 24- hour hotline number at 1-888-214-7994. We want to know where you are, how you are, and what we can do to help. Please call now.

Help Desk - Our members get the help they need from LIUNA and other agencies we access on their behalf, such as FEMA, the Red Cross, the Louisiana Department of Labor, and the Louisiana Food Stamps Office.

School Enrollment - We are arranging for the children of our members whose schools were closed or destroyed by the hurricane to enroll in schools safely outside hurricane affected areas.

Employment - We are conducting an aggressive outreach initiative to our local partnering contractors and those outside contractors who will be rebuilding the Gulf Coast area. Our goal is to ensure that our members play a vital role in these reconstruction efforts. In the meantime, we are taking steps to assure that all available members are referred for employment and that their rights as union members are protected. Contractors may contact us at (615) 885-7196.

Pursuant to the provisions of Article IX, Section 7 of the International Union Constitution, a hearing will be conducted by the Independent Hearing Officer to determine whether the Trusteeship shall continue. A separate Notice will be issued regarding this hearing.

In solidarity, I remain

Fraternally yours,

TERENCE M. O'SULLIVAN

Offshore oil industry expects one-two punch

Recovery incomplete, as Rita heads to Gulf

By Mary Judice
Business writer

Energy companies, still struggling to restore oil and gas platforms in the Gulf of Mexico after Hurricane Katrina, have begun shutting down operations and evacuating personnel in advance of Tropical Storm Rita.

Crude oil prices jumped 7 percent and natural gas prices closed 14 percent higher Monday in anticipation of further pinched oil and gas supplies.

Oil companies began bringing construction workers and project crews ashore Sunday in the first wave of personnel clearing from platforms and drilling rigs in the Gulf. Major oil companies with operations in the deep water Gulf launched the earliest evacuation.

Rita is expected to race through the heart of the Gulf, where energy operations ravaged by Katrina three weeks ago have not been restored to full operation. The damage affected all aspects of the energy supply chain from drilling rigs to gas processing plants and oil refineries which produce gasoline.

Art Hogan, chief market analyst for Jeffries and Co. in New York, said fear of more damage from Rita has fueled "one of the largest one-day moves in modern times" in crude oil trading.

On the New York Mercantile Exchange Monday, crude for delivery in October was up $4.39 a barrel to close at $67.39 a barrel. Natural gas rose $1.52 per million British thermal units to close at $12.66.

"It will certainly impact Gulf of Mexico volumes of gas and oil and probably will impact the offloading of oil tankers, which is why oil futures are up and gas is up," said Kenneth Beer, senior vice president and chief financial officer of Stone Energy in Lafayette.

There is concern that even if Rita strikes the Texas coast, it would further rough up the energy infrastructure.

As of Monday, about 56 percent of oil production in the Gulf of Mexico remained shut in and 34 percent of natural gas production was not being pumped. About one-third of the shut-in production was the result of onshore infrastructure problems, which includes pipelines, production facilities and oil refineries, according to the U.S. Minerals Management Service, the federal agency that oversees Gulf leases.

If the storm "continues westward, it will threaten the Houston Ship Channel and the many refineries along the Texas coast," said Marshall Steeves, an analyst at Refco Inc. in New York. He said about 5 percent of the refining capacity is out of operation "indefinitely because of Katrina and can't afford to lose more."

And consumers can expect to pay more for gasoline.

"What seems to be a pullback in gasoline prices may come to a screeching halt," Hogan said. More than $3 a gallon gasoline is a likely prospect, he said.

He said the higher prices would be fueled not only by higher crude oil prices but the availability of refining. The spot gasoline shortages experienced immediately after Katrina were not a result of a shortfall in crude supplies but "the inability to get crude and refined product delivered," Hogan said. Refineries were damaged and the pipelines that crisscross the country were out of service at first.

Shell Oil Co. began evacuating workers from the eastern Gulf on Sunday and said it would move employees from structures further westward as the evacuation continued. A total of 195 workers came ashore Sunday, and the company was in the process of bringing in an additional 350 workers on Monday.

BP said Monday it has evacuated nonessential personnel from the eastern Gulf and its deep-water platforms in the central Gulf in a recorded message.

Beer of Stone Energy said he would not be surprised if today "we would start the process of physically getting people out and shutting down facilities again." He explained that the majors, which have more people and are further out in the Gulf, typically evacuate before smaller independent companies, like his.

Energy Partners Ltd. tracked the storm Monday and is evaluating whether to evacuate workers in the western Gulf, where the New Orleans firm has 25 percent to 35 percent of its production, said Al Petrie, an Energy Partners spokesman.

SBA loans can help many get back on feet

Businesses of all sizes, homeowners and renters may apply

By Jaquetta White
Business writer

The Small Business Administration is offering loans to businesses, homeowners and even renters to help pay for damages and rebuilding costs associated with Hurricane Katrina.

The loans range from $40,000 to homeowners and renters to cover uninsured losses of personal property, clothing and furniture to $1.5 million to businesses for rebuilding.

During declared disasters, the SBA lends to businesses of all sizes as well as individuals, said Carol Chastang, a spokeswoman for the SBA Office of Disaster Assistance.

The SBA loans are designed to pick up where FEMA grants leave off, Chastang said. The main purpose of the loans is to assist with long-term rebuilding costs, whereas FEMA grants mostly are for temporary costs associated with displacement.

What FEMA offers is "a short-term fix," Chastang said. "If you're a homeowner and your house is underwater, you're going to need an SBA loan."

The SBA has issued more than 740,000 loan applications to hurricane victims along the Gulf Coast, and more than two-thirds of those were issued to Louisiana business owners and individuals. So far, eight loans have been approved in Louisiana for about $203,000, Chastang said. All were for home loans.

"With any given disaster, the majority of the loans that we make are for home loans," she said.

But the number of loan requests for businesses as well as the number of approvals for businesses and homes will grow in the coming months as SBA appraisers, business owners and residents are able to assess damage.

So far, the number of loan applications is comparable with those issued last year after four hurricanes tore through Florida. Last year's loans totaled $2.2 billion and were spread over 13 states. But because none of those areas was as densely populated as the ones affected by Hurricane Katrina, the loaned amount is expected to be greater for this storm.

To apply for an SBA loan, individuals must complete a FEMA application first, Chastang said. FEMA, which acts as the federal coordinating entity for disaster recovery, then refers individuals and businesses to the SBA. The SBA issues applications for disaster loans only to people who are referred by FEMA.

"In some cases folks will think they need an SBA loan and they really need a FEMA grant," Chastang said.

The SBA is offering four loans, one for homeowners and renters and three for businesses.

Home loans are capped at $200,000 for home damage and rebuilding or $40,000 for personal property loss. The interest rate on a home loan is 2.69 percent. The application deadline is Oct. 28, but Chastang said that date likely will be extended.

Of the business loans, one applies exclusively to small businesses. The economic injury loan, capped at $1.5 million, is for operations that might not have suffered physical damage, but suffered economic injury, Chastang said. It can be used to pay employees and other bills.

"It's aimed at helping businesses cover their operating expenses had the disaster not occurred," Chastang said.

The interest rate on the economic injury loan is 4 percent. The application deadline for the economic injury loan is May 29.

The remaining business loans, also capped at $1.5 million with a 4 percent interest rate, apply to businesses and nonprofit organizations of any size. They are to assist with costs associated with rebuilding a facility and replacing machinery and equipment, Chastang said. The deadline to apply is Oct. 28.

Loan amounts are determined on a case-by-case basis. Borrowers will be allowed to defer payments for up to one year, Chastang said.

Although it usually takes 19 to 21 days from the time an application is filed until money is received, Chastang said, waits will be longer this time around.

"This one we've got to say something different because we don't want people to expect it that soon," she said, though she could not give a timetable. "This situation takes us out of the normal situation because people can't get to their homes and businesses."

SHEILA STROUP

Branching out after tragedy

Our daughter Claire e-mailed me a week ago to say she and her boyfriend Randall were going to take off work and come from Atlanta to take part in our post-Katrina cleanup. This is the daughter who once told her father, "My fingers are too tired," when he asked her to turn on a light switch.

"Please don't come," I told her. "It's bad enough having two people trip over dogs in the dark. It's hot, and there's nothing to eat at our house. Being pioneers is no fun."

But they insisted on coming, power or no power. And they stopped in Laurel, Miss., first to spend a day cleaning up Randall's grandmother's yard, which was also full of trees and limbs.

They arrived in Covington Friday afternoon with a chain saw, two brand new blades for Stroup's saw, long pants, work gloves and a pair of willing hearts.

Tossed in a basket

Saturday morning, we went over to the house where my mother used to live and spent four hours sweating profusely and clearing the back yard of fallen trees. The men wielded chainsaws while Claire and I dragged branches and hunks of trees out to the curb.

"My fingers are getting tired," I said numerous times, but it felt good to be working together.

I couldn't help being relieved Mom had not lived to see the wrath of Katrina. She would have been terrified of evacuating, but how could she have stayed?

I kept thinking about my friend, Dorothy McLeod. I had finally heard from her on Friday, after more than 2 1/2 weeks of worrying.

Dot, in her 70's and in poor health, lived in Gentilly near Lake Pontchartrain. She had evacuated to a motel in eastern New Orleans like she always does when a hurricane looms and had ended up being carried up to the roof by two men and "tossed into a basket" attached to a helicopter.

"Have you ever ridden in a basket under a helicopter?" she asked me.

Signs of hope

Dot has been relocated to a nursing home in Fort Worth. The bag containing her clothes, medicine, identification and money never made it there, but her great sorrow is that she had to leave her cat, Poupon, behind.

"For nearly 13 years, he slept in my arms," she said, through her tears. When we talked, she was also fretting about her dear friend, Henry Kraft (who has since been located in Knoxville, Tenn.). She had called a local television station to ask how she should go about looking for him, and the woman she talked to said she'd try to help.

A few hours later, a big bouquet of flowers was delivered to Dot's room.

"That woman had never heard of me before today, and she sent me flowers," Dot said.

In some small way, those flowers are helping Dot live in a room far away from everything she knew and loved.

Like tired fingers and new chainsaw blades, they are a sign of grace after the storm.

Pumping station operators ride out storm, and more in 21 days filled with courage and ingenuity

Dave Howard's dog, Sugarfoot, stayed with him as he and a few co-workers kept the four pumps at Jahncke Pumping Station No. 14 operating almost continuously.

Staff writer

The morning before Hurricane Katrina roared into New Orleans, Dave Howard got a call from his supervisors at the Sewerage & Water Board directing him to report to work at Jahncke Pumping Station No. 14 alongside the Lake Pontchartrain levee in eastern New Orleans.

"They told me to bring enough stuff to last me a couple of days," Howard said.

Two days turned into 21 days.

Howard and a few co-workers staffed their posts nonstop until last Sunday – except for a quick trip to Ochsner Medical Center for shots - when they finally got 24 hours of R&R.

With a mixture of determination and what Howard, age 52 with 30 years at the water board, calls "old-fashioned Yankee ingenuity," the group managed to keep the station's four pumps up and running nearly the entire time.

The storm itself had been plenty hairy. It rattled the solid concrete building, leaving cracks in all four corners, and ripped off the roof. Water from the lake scoured out a section of levee adjacent to the station. Things only got worse after the wind subsided.

The television, which mostly worked, was describing all manner of mayhem taking place in the city. Thugs were

Shrimpers often ride out storms on vessels

Barreling out of the Gulf of Mexico with winds topping 140 miles per hour, Katrina struck first and hardest at the fishing communities of lower Plaquemines Parish.

The front side of the hurricane pushed a massive surge of water up the Mississippi River that overtopped a 65-mile stretch of levee in Plaquemines, sending violent torrents ripping through an estimated 6,000 houses, stores, schools, churches and marinas.

Amazingly, only three bodies have been found among the ruins in the three weeks since the storm passed. But officials fear the good news might be about to Boats from Empire were dumped onto Louisiana 23 by Hurricane Katrina. Many other boats are thought to be at the bottom of nearby Doullet Canal, and officials fear the bodies of shrimpers, who traditionally ride out hurricanes on their vessels, will be discovered there.

Rita halts returns home

Damaged levees leave St. Bernard vulnerable

By Paul Rioux
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

St. Bernard Parish officials on Monday halted the return of parish residents and called for a mandatory evacuation starting today, as Tropical Storm Rita churned into the Gulf of Mexico and threatened to affect the parish.

Officials made the decision late Monday after a conference call in which they said Gov. Kathleen Blanco asked them to evacuate and Corps of Engineers officials said Katrina's damage to the parish's levees means the area is vulnerable to even a small surge.

"The governor told us to leave," said Council Chairman Joey DiFatta.

Earlier in the day, officials had announced they would let in those residents scheduled to come in today, but would close the parish for the rest of the week. They said they would decide whether to evacuate or not after reviewing the storm's path.

The storm is projected to hit Texas. But Katrina, which flood-

Parents may not get tuition back

Schools say money needed to keep faculty

By Mark Waller
East Jefferson bureau

Now that many of them have enrolled their children in new schools in new cities, parents of students displaced from New Orleans area private schools are turning to a new financial question: What happens to the tuition money they paid before Hurricane Katrina chased them away?

The answers vary, with some private school officials saying the money can be transferred to new schools and others saying the disrupted schools must keep the tuition money so they can continue paying faculty members in hopes that the staff will return when the school reopens.

"It's a frightening thing for a school," said Chris Proctor, new headmaster of St. Martin's Episcopal School in Metairie, which plans to reopen Oct. 3. "The thing that makes a school unique is the faculty. Schools desperately want to hang on to their faculties."

The tuition question involves several thousand dollars for each displaced student and weighs on thousands of families who fled Katrina and its aftermath. Louisiana has the highest percentage of students in nonpublic schools of any state, and three New Orleans area parishes – Jefferson, St. John the Baptist and St. Bernard – are in the Top 10 counties nationwide.

St. Martin's is not offering tuition refunds for the lost portion of the school year, Proctor said,

Garden hoses bring water from canal to cool pumps

roaming the area around Jahncke, and some people came by to curse out Howard and his coworkers for failing to keep them dry. One person smashed out the windows of the S&WB truck parked on Hayne Boulevard in front of the station. Security arrived after that, in the form of a single National Guardsman.

There were "friendlies," too, Howard said: A couple who needed to use the station's power to treat their asthmatic child dropped off some turkey sandwiches. Howard and his group shared military rations with other "friendlies" awaiting rescue on the levee.

But the pumps kept running with one exception: A spell of two days early in the crisis, when the city's water supply gave out and the pumps had to be shut down before they overheated.

During that lapse, Howard and his cohorts – including electricians John Alexander and Bobby Brouillette and diesel mechanic Steve Tregre - devised an alternative: They'd run one pump at a time until the temperature in the gear boxes reached 150 degrees. Then they'd shut it off and fire up the next one until it, too, was nearly fried.

The Thursday after the storm, Tregre came up with a better idea: Use the water from the Jahncke Canal, which the station pumps into the lake, to cool the pumps. Sure, the water was nasty and full of debris, but these were desperate times, with at least three feet of water – full of feeding alligator gars - pooled around the station and nearby homes virtually inundated.

Making it work wasn't as simple as dropping a bucket into the canal. Had the water been routed into the normal heat exchangers, it would have ruined them. So the crew bypassed the system. They found a sump pump to suck out water, ran a couple of garden hoses up to the deck, and allowed the water to pour directly onto the gearboxes.

The crude fix worked. And it is still in place, for there's still no water pressure in eastern New Orleans – which is at the far end of the area the water board serves.

Things are gradually returning to normal at Jahncke, save for the crew of guardsmen and the motley collection of dogs and cats taken in by Howard and his men. The surrounding neighborhood is nearly dry, and on Thursday afternoon, a group of Entergy workers restored electrical power to the station.

Since the night of the storm, the plant had been running off a massive diesel generator that normally runs no more than a day or two at a time. The behemoth engine sucks up 3,300 gallons of diesel and 20 gallons of motor oil a day.

During his trip to Ochsner, Howard saw firsthand the devastation of his beloved hometown, including the flooded area around Carrollton and South Claiborne avenues where he grew up. It hit him hard.

"It seemed so surreal," he said. "I couldn't really believe it. I love the old New Orleans, the architecturally significant old houses. It sort of broke my heart a little bit. But we'll be back. We'll come back."

Howard, who makes a "whopping" $14.59 per hour, disdains the notion that he's a hero.

"I don't consider myself a hero," he said. "I'm just a dedicated employee. And there are quite a few of them here."

ed almost the entire parish with as much as 20 feet of water, destroyed much of the levees that protect the parish.

"We're starting all over again. The only difference is I don't have as many people to evacuate," said Larry Ingergiola, the parish's emergency preparedness director.

Hundreds of St. Bernard residents had streamed into the parish daily since officials launched a two-week re-entry plan on Saturday to let people assess the Katrina's damage. But only a few residents remain. Another 700 civilians, including parish employees and emergency and health workers, are also in the parish.

"It's like a recurring nightmare," said Councilwoman Judy Hoffmeister, referring to the possibility that Rita may affect the area. "If I see four horsemen and an angel playing the trumpets, I'm going to get on my knees because this is it."

St. Bernard, like much of the eastern sections of the New Orleans area, is a sitting duck for any major storm. More than 90 percent of levees along the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet, which were supposed to protect the parish from storm surges, got wiped out by Katrina.

Finding humor in the possibility of a new storm affecting the area, Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez said Rita would have little to destroy after Katrina.

"We're going to have to give Rita an IOU because she can't do any more damage," Rodriguez said.

Ingergiola said a new evacuation will protect new generators, trucks and other equipment bought to replace what Katrina ravaged.

"I can't go buy a new fleet of trucks every 10 days," he said.

Meanwhile, officials have also been treating some of the people returning. Two people were hospitalized with severe depression, after witnessing the devastation of their property. Dr. Paul Verrette, the parish medical director for emergency operations, said more cases may surface when people are allowed to access more devastated areas in the eastern portions of St. Bernard.

"It's a traumatizing thing. Overnight, an entire community lost everything," he said.

As many as 20 other people have been treated for cuts, mostly from shattered glass, and for injuries related to falls in the slick muck that cover everything.

With an estimated 100 shrimp boats sunk in canals and about a third of the parish still underwater, a pivotal question hangs over the tally of dead. How many residents tried to weather the storm in boats or locations still unchecked by rescue teams? It's a question being asked most frequently of Plaquemines' fishers, including hundreds of Vietnamese ancestry who traditionally have stayed aboard shrimp boats during hurricanes to safeguard what for many was their sole source of income.

"The boat was like their house, their business," said Tuan Vo, a 34-year-old shrimper who worked out of the fishing village of Empire, where the center of Katrina passed by on Aug. 29. "A lot of fishermen would stay. They were afraid to leave; many didn't have insurance. Maybe the storm has floated them away too."

Vo, who evacuated to Texas and later Canada, returned this week to search for his 50-foot trawl boat, Miss Christina.

That the boat could not be found after several hours of searching was not surprising: The Mississippi River floodwaters that decimated lower Plaquemines picked up and carried some vessels a half-mile or more from where they had been tied. Hulls of boats that were overturned and sunk now poke from the water all along the 15-foot deep Doullut Canal in Empire, a waterway previously regarded by fishermen as a "safe harbor" where they could ride out storms.

Katrina has debunked that maritime legend.

Boat graveyard

A sonar survey taken last week indicated that up to 100 sunken boats are resting on the bottom of the canal, said Parish President Benny Rousselle. The Kostmayer Construction Co., a contractor hired to fix the mangled locks at both ends of the canal, is scheduled to begin pulling up the vessels this week.

If there are more dead in Plaquemines, they likely will be found in those boats, said parish Emergency Operations Director Jesse St. Amant.

"Boat people feel like that is the safest place," he said. "It's what my grandmother used to do. Every time a storm was coming, she'd get on her boat."

More than 90 percent of Plaquemines' 27,000 residents evacuated before the storm hit. For many, it was a familiar ritual.

"You grab your guns, a handful of pictures and some clothes and go," said Hewitt Gauthier Jr., a 47-year-old Nairn resident who runs a fleet of oilfield crewboats. Gauthier's wife, Robin, said: "We evacuated so many times and we were able to just come back the next day. This was our third time this year. We'd just unpacked from last time."

Trapped in the chaos

But if leaving was the grudgingly accepted norm for most, a stubborn few in Plaquemines always stayed. At least 250 people were rescued in the week after Katrina, Amant said.

According to rescuers' accounts, about a half-dozen people were plucked from St. Patrick Church in Port Sulphur, and 10 others from the government building just up the road. In Diamond, a man was found living in a makeshift shelter on the levee after his house washed away. Down in Venice, near the mouth of the Mississippi, another man was rescued from a treetop.

At least four shrimpers from Empire also made it out alive, including Kent Frelich, who videotaped the storm from the cabin of his boat in the Doullut Canal.

A copy of the video provided by Rousselle showed waters up to 12 feet deep knocking boats against one another while winds peeled the roof of a tin shelter in a matter of moments.

As the eye of the storm passed, the video showed a pair of shirtless survivors whose boat had gone down trying to claw their way through the diesel-soaked debris choking the canal. The unidentified men took refuge on Frelich's boat for the remainder of the storm.

After the back side of the storm moved through, the video showed a scene of utter destruction: smashed fuel docks and ice houses, boats stacked atop one another on the Louisiana 23 bridge, houses left splayed across the road after being floated off their foundations.

Except for the four shrimpers, the only sign of life depicted in the storm's immediate aftermath is a tattered-looking black dog cowering atop a forklift at the canal's edge.

Searches come up empty

Other parishes have seen their death tolls skyrocket in recent days as floodwaters receded, but no bodies have been found for more than two weeks in Plaquemines. Airboats and helicopters continue to crisscross areas of the parish that are still flooded, from Home Place south about 25 miles to Venice.

"The level of destruction down there is such that there's really no place for bodies to hide," Rousselle said. "We've been circulating around there enough to think somebody would have run across them."

He added in a whisper, "You would think by now they would have started smelling."

Reports of missing persons have poured in steadily since the storm hit. Some have proven false; others are impossible to verify with evacuees scattered across the country.

Vo, the Empire shrimper, said many of his fellow fishers have been reluctant to return, figuring their homes and businesses are gone. His sister-in-law, Ida Nguyen, said she fears the worst, knowing many fishermen already had stayed through two storms this year, Tropical Storm Cindy and Hurricane Dennis.

She had hoped to see those fishermen when her family evacuated to Houston.

"Usually, I see all the faces I know. But this time, I didn't see them," she said.

Abita Springs springs back from the storm

But many residents still without power

By Richard Boyd
St. Tammany bureau

During a brief lull as Hurricane Katrina moved through the area on Aug. 29, Abita Springs Mayor Louis Fitzmorris ventured outside Abita Elementary School to take a peek.

His heart sank. All he could see was downed trees.

"I was certain that the entire town had been destroyed," he said. "There was just a mountain of trees. I climbed up on some of the fallen trees and could not see a single house, just stacks and stacks of blowndown trees. I have never felt so desolate."

The mayor was certain that beneath all those trees were all of the town's houses and businesses smashed to splinters.

Today, most of the trees have been removed, the streets have been cleared, most municipal services have been restored, and the tally is not as bad as initially feared. Fitzmorris was showing signs of post-storm weariness but was mostly upbeat recently while giving an assessment.

"We have counted 120 homes . . . that have moderate to severe roof damage from falling trees, mostly our town's cherished pine trees, and hundreds and hundreds of them just snapped like toothpicks. But most of the houses can be repaired."

Of the 120 houses, 15 were destroyed.

After evacuating his family to Alabama and then Raleigh, N.C., Fitzmorris, Town Clerk Donna Kilpatrick and her husband and three town workers hunkered down at the elementary school to ride out the storm.

"We probably got back out too soon on that Monday afternoon because soon after that brief lull, the wind gusts picked up again strong for several more hours," Fitzmorris said. "But we got out anyway. It was scary at times," but using a four-wheeler and a chainsaw they began the process of clearing the major roads.

"We had the town open in two days after the storm," he said.

Then work began to clear interior streets. "As we opened the streets, to our great joy we were finding that more and more homes had been spared, and the center of town businesses for the most part were not seriously damaged," Fitzmorris said.

"Our biggest problem now is that our gas system was badly damaged. I don't have a time frame yet for getting it up and running," he said.

Fitzmorris said he is frustrated that many residents still don't have electricity because they are customers of Washington-St. Tammany Electric Cooperative. "The Cleco customers in town have had power for days but most of the town is still without power. I am upset that Washington-St. Tammany is recovering so slowly. After this is all over, I am going to talk to Cleco and see what we can do to make them our town provider," he said.

So far, 100,000 yards of debris has been hauled away from the town. The mayor expects the total clean-up bill to be more than $1 million, which he said will be covered by FEMA. Two of the town's sewer system pumping stations were damaged and the one on Bryan Street was demolished. "But it has been replaced as of Friday," he said.

Fitzmorris said he finally realized how lucky Abita Springs was when someone from the "Today" show contacted him and said they wanted to adopt a small town hit by the storm and do daily reports on its recovery.

A crew and producer surveyed the town but decided to look elsewhere because Abita Springs did not have enough destruction to qualify for what they wanted to spotlight, the mayor said. He said he told the producer "Thank goodness," and the TV crew left town.

Some schools take displaced pupils for free

partly because it still plans to offer a full academic year, albeit one that will run later than usual. "We're fortunate that we're going to offer a product, so we can charge tuition and not worry about it," he said Monday.

Proctor and officials from other schools in the Independent Schools Association of the Southwest said many member schools in different states are offering free education to displaced students. That should help some families who cannot return to their homes even though St. Martin's is reopening, Proctor said.

The association has 11 schools in New Orleans and surrounding parishes, including St. Martin's, and five more across the state.

There are exceptions to the practice of taking displaced students free of charge, especially at other ISAS Louisiana schools, said Geoffrey Butler, executive director the association, which is based in Fort Worth, Texas, and also includes schools in Arizona, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma and Texas.

Butler said some Louisiana schools outside the New Orleans area are not offering free tuition to families who are buying houses and appear to be settling into their new schools and towns permanently. Free tuition, he said, seems more appropriate for temporary dislocation.

"They expect the families will return to their home schools when they are available," Butler said.

Stephenie Gaudet, mother of a fourth grader at Louise S. McGehee School in New Orleans now attending an Episcopal school in Panama City, Fla., said she is eager to return her daughter to McGehee, an ISAS school that Gaudet described as offering an umatched educational opportunity for girls.

McGehee is not offering tuition refunds, and Gaudet said she understands the school's need to maintain solid financial footing and entice its faculty back. At the same time, she said, she and her husband are temporarily out of work thanks to Katrina and would welcome any help with their costs.

An Internet statement from Isidore Newman School in New Orleans, another ISAS school, which doesn't anticipate a full reopening until January, said its families are expected to honor their tuition obligations because the school considers its students still to be Newman students even while they attend schools elsewhere.

The statement emphasizes the other independent schools that are helping by offering free temporary schooling. It said displaced parents who must pay tuition at their new schools will be able to apply for credits against their Newman expenses over four semesters. Parents of seniors may seek refunds or receipts treating their tuition payments as tax-deductible charitable contributions.

Hanging on to tuition money let schools maintain their long-term viability, according to the Newman statement.

"Nearly 85 percent of the school's income is spent on faculty and staff salary and benefits," the statement said. "If Newman refunded all the tuition and fees collected this year, there is no way we could pay Newman employees, and without them Newman is just a bunch of buildings."

Catholic schools closed by Katrina, meanwhile, are taking a different approach, relying on donations and emergency financing by the Archdiocese of New Orleans to keep paying teachers, while at the same time, letting parents transfer tuition dollars elsewhere.

"Our situation is rather simple: The tuition follows the student," said the Rev. William Maestri, superintendent of archdiocese schools.

Maestri said the money may be directly transferred for students attending other schools in the archdiocese, such as Catholic schools that have already reopened in St. Charles, St. John the Baptist and St. Tammany parishes. For students now living outside the New Orleans area, direct transfers might still be possible, or parents may receive refunds to use in paying tuition at their new schools, Maestri said.

Some private school parents also buy tuition refund insurance, but school and insurance officials said Monday that such policies are not designed to cover disasters that close schools.

Carl Stockfleth, chairman of A.W.G Dewar Inc., a Quincy, Mass., company that offers tuition insurance, said the policies normally cover mid-year student withdrawals from a school because of illness, parent job transfers or the student having difficulties at the school. Typically about 15 to 20 percent of parents buy the insurance, he said.

FEMA center opens in St. Tammany Parish

Hundreds show up to file for help

By Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

Three weeks after Hurricane Katrina devastated much of metro New Orleans, the Federal Emergency Management Agency finally opened its first major Disaster Recovery Center in St. Tammany Parish on Monday in the John Slidell Park gymnasium in Slidell.

The center will be open from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. seven days a week "until the need has been completely eliminated - or as best as we can," FEMA spokesman Mark Haimann said. "We don't have any end point for this one."

Asked whether a DRC would be established in Covington so west St. Tammany residents could be helped more easily, he said that it would make "perfect sense" and that he will bring the matter to the attention of his superiors.

At midafternoon, hundreds of east St. Tammany's hurricane homeless, with the help of FEMA, contract agents, Small Business Association officials and volunteers who typed information into laptop computers, sat at tables filling out forms or lounged in the bleachers waiting for their names to be called for the next step in the process.

A Lake County, Fla., sheriff's deputy posted at the park entrance told motorists who drove up, "I've got good news and I've got bad news. The bad news is it's a 5½-hour wait. The good news is that they're here seven days a week for the next six months."

Many of those who came already had managed to register by telephone, 1 (800) 621-3362, or online at www.fema.com, and were at John Slidell to see about receiving up to $2,000 in cash assistance and/or temporary housing help, Haimann said. State officials also offered free legal assistance to those who needed it.

Haimann acknowledged about one-third of the Slidell area is still without phone or Internet service.

FEMA has 11 such centers statewide. That includes two that opened this weekend in neighboring Washington Parish, but he added that "we're registering 3,000 to 4,000 people a day" in St. Tammany.

Thus far, almost 90,000 homeowners, businesses and others have registered with FEMA, including at least 36,000 in the Slidell area, he said. By late afternoon, an estimated 400 to 500 people had signed up for help at the center.

Now that most shelters have been closed, temporary housing or housing allowances were the highest priority for the majority of those who came to the center Monday as federal and state agencies worked with parish and municipal officials to bring in as many as 20,000 small trailers and other mobile residences to the parish.

Asked how long it would take to bring in thousands of such residences to the battered Slidell area and other hard-hit parts of the parish, Haimann said there isn't yet a specific timeframe for that. However, he added, he believed it wouldn't be too much longer.

That issue is now being decided at the Washington, D.C., level, with input from local and state officials, he said. "I don't want to give anybody a false sense of hope. But once they get the train on the tracks, it's pretty fast getting here."

About 40 trailers already have been moved into a trailer park off Interstate 59 near Pearl River, officials said, and efforts are under way to bring several hundred more to a trailer park off Shortcut Highway southeast of Slidell.

Haimann said he understood the frustration that many people in the parish felt about displaced persons from St. Tammany staying temporarily out of state receiving FEMA and American Red Cross financial aid, although those still in the parish could apply for it only by calling the FEMA number or the Red Cross at 1 (866) 438-4636.

"I heard some people were saying that Slidell felt like the forgotten city, but we haven't forgotten them," he insisted.

Mayor Ben Morris was among those the most vocal in his criticism this past week about FEMA's slow response in the disaster recovery effort. On Monday, while still not fully satisfied, he welcomed to Disaster Recovery Center to Slidell.

"I'm so glad they're here," he said. "It's been tough ... People need housing and they can't get it. It's not been a very effective system, but at least they're here.

St. Tammany still waiting for trailers from FEMA

2- to 3- week wait for temporary housing

St. Tammany bureau

Parish President Kevin Davis said Monday it likely will be two to three weeks before large numbers of FEMA trailer homes arrive in St. Tammany for displaced parish residents.

A major concern is the 850-plus residents staying at eight shelters in parish schools.

Those in the shelters "have no place to go back to," Davis said, noting that they must be moved to other locations before Tammany schools reopen on Oct. 3. The North Shore Harbor Center is a possible location for some of the residents, he said.

In other news:

• Davis, after informally polling municipal and parish law enforcement officials, decided to keep intact a parishwide curfew of 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. until further notice.

• Bellsouth officials reported that about 8,000 customers in St. Tammany were without telephone service Monday morning. Local outages have stemmed from crews picking up debris near telephone lines and accidentally cutting lines, company officials said. Some 12 splices to the local lines have had to be made since Friday, officials said.

• Cleco officials reported that 85 percent of St. Tammany customers have had power restored. The 11,000 customers still without power included about 5,600 Slidell-area homes and businesses too heavily damaged for the restoration of power, officials said.

• Washington-St. Tammany Electric Cooperative officials reported that 70 percent of its customers in Washington, St. Tammany and Tangipahoa parishes have electricity. Cooperative chief executive officer Jeff Kilpatrick said 74 percent of the utility's customers in St. Tammany have power. The 30 percent without electricity includes some 6,500 customers in St. Tammany, 110 customers in Tangipahoa and 7,200 customers in Washington, he said.

• Davis said he met recently with Coast Guard Vice Admiral Thad Allen, who is heading the federal recovery effort in the New Orleans area, who told Davis that the problem with FEMA's slow disaster response is because of lack of personnel. "The problem is not enough people," Davis said, adding that he was told the agency only has 2,400 workers. To beef up FEMA, Davis said workers from other agencies, such as the Department of Agriculture, are being temporarily shifted into FEMA jobs.

6 booked with soliciting sex online

Investigators posed as storm-stranded teens

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

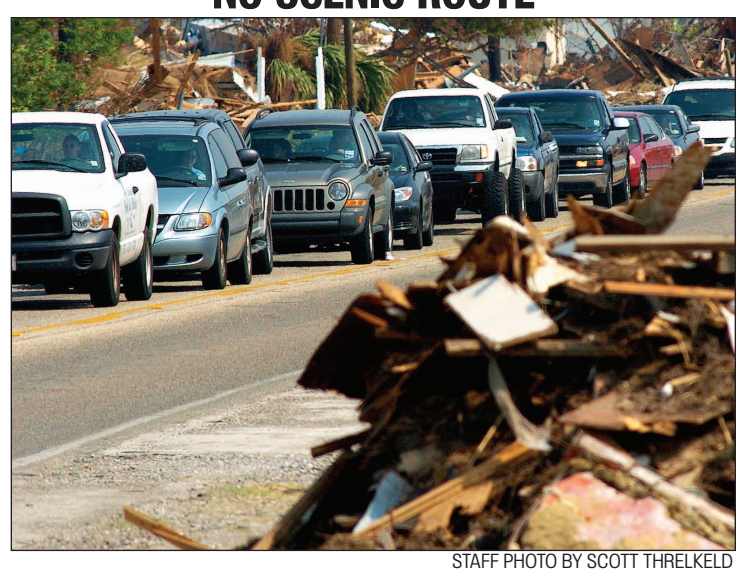
BATON ROUGE – Five men and one woman have been arrested for allegedly attempting to make dates for sex with investigators posing as teenage girls stranded in Hurricane Katrina evacuation centers, Attorney General Charles Foti said Monday.

Foti said his investigators posed as 13- to 15-year-old girls who were living in centers or whose parents were missing or evacuated to other parts of the state or nation.

Foti said the investigators received "immediate hits" on Internet chat rooms and were solicited for sex.

The six arrested during the past eight days are: Perry Davies of Baton Rouge, arrested Sept. 11; Henry Duncan of Baton Rouge, arrested Sept. 12; Ralph Polk II of Lafayette, arrested Sept. 13; Michael Christopher Aguillard of Lafayette, arrested Sept. 13; and Kylie Bellard and Khristopher Kyzar of Hammond, both arrested Sept. 15.

All were booked on the newly established crime of computer-assisted sexual solicitation of a minor, which carries a penalty of up to 10 years for a first offense and a mandatory 10 years and up to 20 years for a second offense, Foti said.



He said three more arrests on similar charges are anticipated. The six arrests took place in Lafayette and Baton Rouge, he said.

Foti said Aguillard was arrested again Friday, this time on charges of felony carnal knowledge of a juvenile and indecent behavior with a juvenile after allegedly soliciting a teenager for sex online in the past and having sex with the teen.

Foti did not say when the sex rendezvous took place.

He called the conduct "reprehensible," especially in light of the disaster and the heartache people are going through.

Deputy fired for desertion, arrested for looting

Men accused of taking guns from Buras home

By Matthew Brown
West Bank bureau

A Plaquemines Parish Sheriff's deputy fired last week for desertion in the wake of Hurricane Katrina was arrested Monday and accused of looting guns from a flooded Buras home while he was still a deputy, authorities said.

Buras was covered by water at the time of the incident, and authorities allege the former deputy and an accomplice used an airboat to access the area.

The former deputy, James Mitchell, 21, of 511 Farmington Place, Terrytown, and Brent E. Trauth Jr., 20, of 1108 Epsilon Drive, Belle Chasse, were booked with looting, violation of curfew and unauthorized entry of a business. Mitchell also was booked with malfeasance because the crime allegedly occurred before he was fired Sept. 16 for a 2 ½-week absence after August 29, the day Hurricane Katrina hit, said Maj. John Marie with the Sheriff's Office.

Mitchell had been in the Sheriff's Office field training program just a few weeks after recently graduating from the police academy, Marie said.

Mitchell and Trauth initially were arrested Sunday night on the curfew and unauthorized entry charges after a deputy spotted them riding a dune buggy near the former Alpine Mud Products building, at 8391 Belle Chasse Highway, Marie said.

Marie said Sheriff Irvin "Jiff" Hingle had received a tip that the men had been in an airboat owned by Louisiana Bowfishing, for whom Mitchell once worked.

With the cooperation of Trauth's father, Marie said an investigator recovered from Trauth's house six rifles and shotguns that had been taken from a residence in Buras last week. The men were then rebooked on the additional charges.

Looting carries a maximum penalty of 15 years in prison, a $10,000 fine or both. Malfeasance carries a maximum penalty of 5 years in prison, a $5,000 fine, or both.

Tammany food stamp relief to end today

Residents must apply at Slidell auditorium

By Kadee Krieger
St. Tammany bureau

Tuesday's deadline is for St. Tammany residents only. Residents of other parishes who are now in St. Tammany should call Sharon Tucker, director of field operations for the state Office of Family Support, at (225) 342-0495.

St. Tammany residents have until today at 4:30 p.m. to apply for disaster relief food stamps, unless the Food Stamp Disaster Program is again extended.

The food stamp applications will be taken from 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. at the Slidell Municipal Auditorium, on Second Street across from City Hall.

The parish's food stamps operation was moved Monday to Slidell from the main office on Louisiana 21 in Covington because the auditorium is able to handle many more applicants at a time, said parish food stamps manager Ann Stone.

Stone said the Covington office is still open, but anyone who is looking for food stamps as a direct result of hardship after Hurricane Katrina should go to Slidell.

She also said anyone who wants to apply for regular food stamps should wait until after Tuesday if they have received stamps in the past two weeks.

The food stamps program is meant for those who have loss of income or lost significant amounts of food because of the hurricane. The disaster program was scheduled to end Sept. 16, but was extended to Tuesday, Stone said.

She said she does not know if the program will be extended again.

Tuesday's deadline is for St. Tammany residents only. Residents of other parishes who are now in St. Tammany should call Sharon Tucker, director of field operations for the state Office of Family Support, at (225) 342-0495.

‘Gatemouth’ Brown buried near boyhood home

Delbert McClinton and B.B. King send tributes

By Keith Spera
Music writer

ORANGE, TEXAS — A banner above the lectern at Mount Calvary Baptist Church spells out the house rules: “Let the Preacher Do the Talking! Let the Ushers Do the Walking!”

Clarence “Gatemouth” Brown, lying beneath the banner in a bronze-tinted steel casket, likely would have appreciated the no-nonsense directive. On the bandstand and in life, the 81-year-old Brown did not suffer fools, or foolishness, gladly.

He died Sept. 10 in Orange, Texas, his boyhood home, after fleeing his Slidell residence as Hurricane Katrina stalked southeast Louisiana. At a repast following Saturday’s funeral, friends devoured barbecued chicken and ribs with potato salad and dirty rice and joked that God had made Brown endure the sloppy chord changes perpetrated by the Mount Calvary guitarist.

“I’m surprised Gate didn’t get up out of that coffin and take that guitar,” said Terry Phillips, who spent many months caring for and chauffeuring Brown as the musician battled lung cancer, emphysema and the heart ailments that finally killed him.

Had he risen up, Brown would have been dressed for the occasion. In repose he wore his trademark black cowboy hat, a black Western shirt embroidered with elaborate yellow and green flowers, and an oversize belt buckle belonging to his brother. Brown’s own buckles were likely submerged in a Slidell bayou, along with most of his possessions.

News that Katrina destroyed his house, with his gun and model-ship collections and 50 years of career artifacts, left Brown “pretty depressed,” said Jim Bateman, Brown’s friend and manager of 29 years.

Brown was a storm victim almost as surely as the people in St. Bernard Parish and the lower 9th Ward. Sheer force of will had sustained him for months, as he struggled to render his strikingly original and precise medley of blues, big-band swing, country, jazz and Cajun music. An oxygen tank became as constant a companion onstage as the Firebird guitar with the customized leather pick-guard.

As Katrina bore down, a weakened Brown finally consented to allow a daughter, Renee Brown, and ex-wife Yvonne Brown to evacuate him to Orange. Heavy traffic transformed what is normally a five hour drive into a 12-hour ordeal.

After several days in Orange, an effort was made to move him to Austin, where club owner Clifford Antone had agreed to look after him. Saxophonist Eric Demmer and his wife, Dusty, traveled from Houston to Orange in a borrowed limousine on the night of Monday, Sept. 5, planning to pick up Brown and drive him the five hours to the Texas capital.

Clarence ‘Gatemouth’ Brown was buried in his trademark black cowboy hat.

But Brown appeared to be much frailer than when they last saw him in Slidell on Aug. 21.

“I was shocked at his condition,” Dusty Demmer said. “I was afraid he might die if we took him to Austin.”

So instead, they summoned an ambulance; it rushed him to the Medical Center of Southeast Texas in nearby Port Arthur. Doctors inserted a stent to relieve pressure on blocked arteries. Four days later, on Sept. 9, Brown checked out of the hospital. He died the following day at his niece’s apartment in Orange.

Grief and reunion

The humble Mount Calvary church is tucked into a leafy, working-class pocket of Orange, the first Texas town to greet westbound travelers on I-10. Built with a low ceiling, cheap wood paneling, frosted not stained glass, and an uneven floor that creaks under red carpet, Mount Calvary’s sanctuary hosted 54 attendees the Sunday before the funeral.

“I’m surprised Gate didn’t get up out of that coffin and take that guitar.”

TERRY PHILLIPS, Brown’s caregiver and chauffeur

Nearly four times as many souls settled into the cushioned pews for 90 minutes of music and memories in honor of Brown.

The funeral functioned as a family reunion. At least two of his children by different women had never met. A great-nephew who spoke during the service confessed that he “wasn’t real close” to Uncle Gatemouth. “I was just scared of him.”

B.B. King, Delbert McClinton and New Orleans singer-songwriter Shannon McNally sent flowers. Austin guitarist Jimmie Vaughan attended, as did the six members of Baton Rouge guitar-pop band the Benjy Davis Project. Like Brown, they are managed by Bateman; Brown’s guest appearance on the band’s upcoming CD is his final recording.

A 1982 Grammy for his “Alright Again!” album served as the funeral’s touchstone. Custom gold embroidering inside his coffin lid trumpeted the award, spelling out the category – Best Traditional Blues Album – and album title. The album artwork dominated the cover of the glossy funeral bulletin.

Commercial success on par with B.B. King’s eluded Brown. But among musicians and discriminating fans, the broad scope of his musicianship was unparalleled.

“He was the No. 1 guitar slinger from the Gulf Coast,” said a somber Vaughan. “I learned a lot from his records. I never dreamed that I would grow up to meet him and play with him.”

During the service, Gene Gunulfsen, a frequent collaborator, reprised an a cappella “For Now, So Long,” a farewell from Brown’s 2004 “Timeless” album. Backed by an electric keyboard, guitar and an eight-voice male choir, Pastor Joe Roberson sent up an exhilarating “I Got Nothing but the Holy Ghost.” Urging congregants to “put your hands together,” he gripped the lectern, hunched his shoulders in time with the rhythm and rocked the house with a gritty high tenor voice.

Pastor George H. Brown, no relation to the deceased, delivered a 30 minute sermon that only occasionally referenced the Grammy winner lying before him. His cadence was that of Bill Cosby posing as an elderly preacher. In a knee-length cream jacket and matching vest, he described how he was once “crazy in my mind and no sense in my soul,” then found salvation.

Military salute

Having concluded his talk, Pastor Brown announced “the undertakers are coming.” They slowly wheeled Brown’s casket down the center aisle, as a procession of pastors, family and friends followed, quietly singing “I’ll Fly Away.”

A black Cadillac hearse – Brown always loved black Caddies – transported the body two miles to Hollywood Cemetery. There he was laid to rest between a water tower and drainage canal, alongside the graves of his mother, sister and uncle in a grassy field studded by magnolia and cedar trees and cement slabs.

Under a punishing sun, a seven-man honor guard – Brown’s honorable discharge from the Army qualified him for a military funeral – fired three volleys, followed by a trumpeter’s taps. A chaplain from a veterans’ group oversaw the ceremonial folding of the flag draped over the casket.

Gatemouth Brown had reached the end of a long road, back in Orange, where it began.

Kenner employees accused of pocketing supplies

Workers were also victims, CAO says

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

The city of Kenner will investigate allegations that Chief Administrative Officer Cedric Floyd and other city workers took clothes and supplies from trucks that were hauling items for hurricane victims, a Kenner official said.

Floyd also will no longer oversee the city’s distribution center, the city said.

Phil Ramon, chief of staff for Mayor Phil Capitano, said Floyd is needed elsewhere as the city recovers from Hurricane Katrina.

“It wasn’t like he was removed or dismissed,” Ramon said. “After we reassessed it, there was no reason to keep the CAO out there. He was brought back to City Hall.”

Floyd, who started overseeing the distribution Sept. 1, said city workers, whom he pointed out were hurricane victims too, took only necessary items.

“It was no abusive situation,” he said. “The city workers had the opportunity to get a few things for their family just like everybody else.”

News reports surfaced Sunday detailing accusations from a National Guardsman and a truck driver who delivered supplies that Floyd and city employees took new clothes and other supplies from the trucks at the distribution center in a parking lot at 25th Street and Williams Boulevard. Ramon said Monday that the city is investigating the reports.

But, he added, “I haven’t gotten any type of official complaint. We’re not saying he did anything wrong.”

The city has since moved the donation center to the Wentwood gym at 2001 34th St., although National Guardsmen are still handing out water, ice and meals ready to eat at the Williams Boulevard parking lot.

Floyd said that move, along with his handing over the reins of the donation distribution to Edgar Bernard, Kenner’s community services director, has been planned since Labor Day.

“That was not long term,” Floyd said. “I’m back at City Hall.”

The line of cars at the parking lot stretched down the street on Monday, but there was no line at the Wentwood gym several hours after the donation center opened there. Bernard said the word had not gotten out that it was open.

Floyd said city workers distributed supplies to about 1,500 to 3,000 people daily while he was in charge.

“If the police or the National Guard saw a crime, they should have arrested people at that time,” Floyd said.

POINT OF UNEASY RETURN

Driven by feelings of relief and anxiety, residents poured back into Algiers on Monday to discover the fates of their homes and businesses. They started to resume their lives amid an altered landscape, where mold and tree branches were probably easier to find than an electrician, ice or a hot cup of coffee.

The breach in the 17th Street Canal allowed water to pour into Orleans Parish.

Questions for the Corps

Congratulations and a hearty thank you to John McQuaid of The Times-Picayune for his persistent coverage of the floodwall breaches that brought such a devastating blow to New Orleans. Whenever these questions become uncomfortable for the Corps of Engineers, they fall back to a simple mantra.

"The city's defenses were designed for a Category 3 storm, and Category 4 Katrina overwhelmed those defenses. We built what was ordered."

But this simple line obscures an essential distinction that should be obvious to a room full of engineers. The measure of a hurricane is wind speed; the measure of a levee or floodwall is water. Apples and oranges. What they mean to say is that the system was designed to withstand the water associated with a Category 3 storm along a particular path.

If we can dispense with this ridiculous oversimplification of the problem, the more serious questions can be addressed about the variety of failures in the region. For example: If the storm surge experts at LSU are correct, "overtopping" is unlikely to have occurred at 17th Street or the London Canal; what else may have caused those failures? Or this one: Endless news footage showed water rushing from the Lower 9th Ward into the Industrial Canal, not the other way around; did all that water come from the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet?

I don't want to disparage the heroic efforts of the Corps and its contractors as they undertook the dangerous and challenging job of closing these breaches. But, with insurers denying coverage for damages related to these breaches, responsibility for the failures is now a multibillion-dollar question.

Demand an independent probe

After the criminally inept response of the federal government to Hurricane Katrina, it is hard to believe that Louisiana's junior senator failed to vote for an independent commission to investigate what went wrong. In a vote along party lines the Senate failed to call for an independent commission. Sen. David Vitter put his party ahead of his constituents' right to a unbiased and accurate accounting of the federal government's response.

An independent investigation into the actions of this administration before, during and after Katrina is the right of its citizens. The federal government is criminally negligent for failing to maintain the infrastructure of South Louisiana. It is in the realm of possibility that the failure of the levee system was preventable. In June 2004, the Army Corps of Engineers budget for the levee construction in New Orleans was slashed. Jefferson Parish emergency management chief Walter Maestri commented that "It appears that the money has been moved in the president's budget to handle homeland security and the war in Iraq, and I suppose that's the price we pay." Many Louisiana citizens have now paid with their lives.

In June 2005, funding for the New Orleans district of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers was cut by a record $71.2 million. One of the areas hardest hit by these budget cuts was the Southeast Louisiana Flood Control Project, which was created after the May 1995 flood to improve drainage in Jefferson, Orleans and St. Tammany parishes. These cuts were made even though a catastrophic hurricane hitting South Louisiana was one of the top three risks facing this country.

The federal response was no accident but the result of four-plus years of Republican policy and budget choices that favor ideology and partisan loyalty over honest and competent governance. We deserve an independent commission just as the victims of 9/11 did. And just as the federal government made cash payments to the victims of 9/11, the government needs to step up and make cash payments to the victims of Hurricane Katrina, citizens who have paid the price for this administration's gross incompetence.

We are the lucky ones

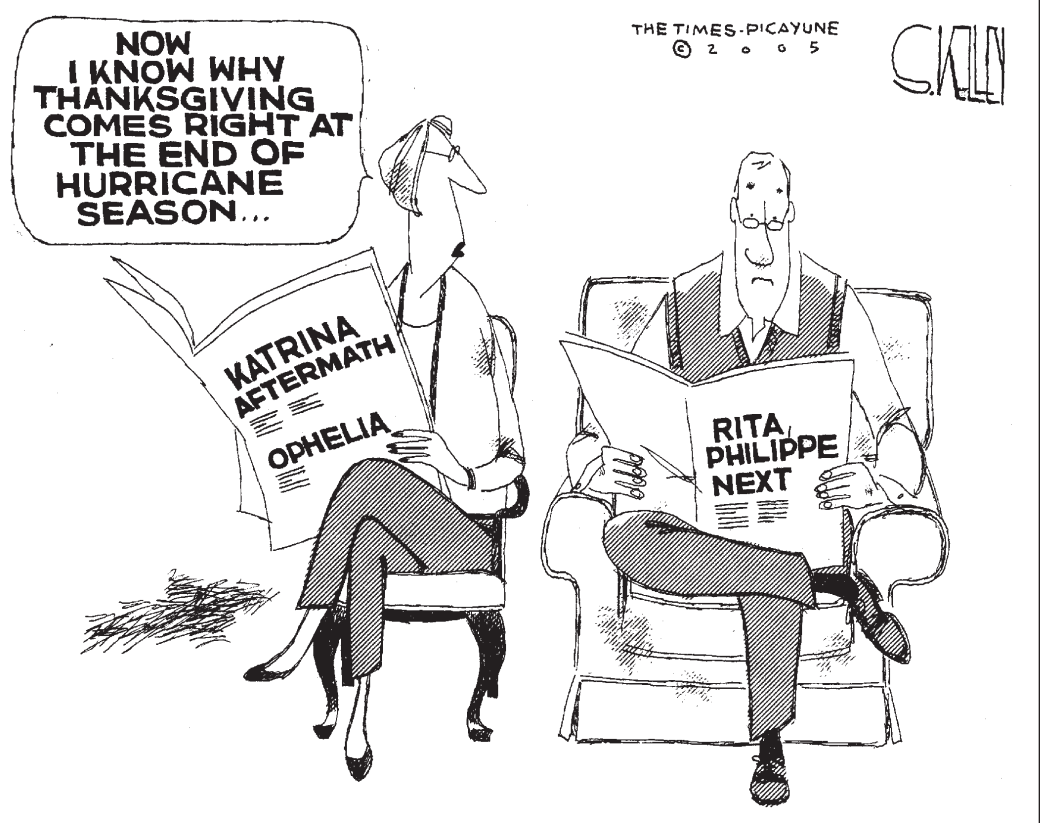
What does it mean to miss New Orleans? That is something so many of us native New Orleanians are now experiencing. We, the proud. We, the displaced. We, the people who made the South our home, no matter the odds against us. We now know what it means to miss New Orleans.

We are numb. We are dismayed. We are locked onto every national television station, remotes in hand, as we feel the nausea that overcomes us. We are homeless. We are evacuated. We are the truly lucky ones. We are alive and safe.

We fled with a few days' worth of clothes and some of our pets. We brought the dog, but the cats would not come out. So we left them, knowing we would be back in a few days. We left knowing that we had vacation days that we could use. We were not Bonnie, who works in a hotel on Canal Street, who had to stay until it was too late to leave. Where is she now? We are not Katie and Jane, who stayed in a three-story house and who by God's hands were rescued by air by the National Guard almost a week after the waters rose.

We drove to Mississippi or Alabama, Texas or Florida. We stayed with friends and family or in hotels. We are the lucky ones. What we believed to be the usual day or two days away from our jobs now finds us receiving charity from family and friends. Again, we are the lucky ones. We have become what we never believed we could become ñ homeless, jobless, moneyless, hopeless. Mostly just numb.



What is to become of my family? My town and my community that is my home? My friends and neighbors, coworkers and structures that used to be called home? When can we go home again? Will it ever be home again?

We are not the ones who experienced hell in the Superdome, or fought for food and water at the Convention Center. We are not the nurses who stayed in hospitals to care for the sick. We are not the poor with no other family and friends than those next door in New Orleans. Where did they go?

We are the survivors who will show the world again what we know as the best city in the world. Where do we go from here? And when?

We wake up every morning hoping that it is a bad dream. Only it isn't. It is a bad reality. And we miss New Orleans.

Our Opinions

From the bottom of our hearts

Southerners have always opened their homes and their arms to wayward kith and kin. It was common a few generations back for a distant cousin to come for supper and stay for a month.

In that tradition, cities across South Louisiana have taken in stranded evacuees from New Orleans and the submerged suburbs fanning out from the city. From Houma to Lafayette and beyond, our neighbors have drawn us close. Nowhere has the welcome been warmer, though, than in Baton Rouge.

Inundated with 250,000 temporary residents, enough to double the size of the city and strain the capacity of every road, grocery store and gas station, the people of Louisiana's capital city have been gracious, patient and welcoming.

Early on, a billboard on Interstate 10 flashed this message: NO plus BR equals One. And that is the way this merger of cities has felt.

The kindnesses done to those of us who were forced out of our homes by wind, water and official decree will never be forgotten.

St. Bernard Parish resident Carol Becnel talked about the kindness of strangers Saturday as she saw her decimated home for the first time. Every gesture touches her heart, she said.

"I wish I was the one being kind," she said. "I don't like being on the receiving end, but God is working through these people."

And if those of us who have benefited so much from the generosity of our distant cousins across South Louisiana can ever return the favor, we would love to do so.

When care means evacuating

Almost all of St. Bernard Parish suffered immensely because of Hurricane Katrina, but the toll at St. Rita's Nursing Home near Poydras was especially high. The hurricane's storm surge flooded the single-story building from floor to ceiling in half an hour or less. Neighbors and firefighters managed to save about two dozen residents. Thirty-four residents died.

The obvious question is why residents were still in the home at all. Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti says state law required the owners of the home, Mable and Salvador Mangano, to follow a mandatory evacuation plan filed with the parish government for hurricanes stronger than Category 2. St. Bernard and state officials maintain that Mrs. Mangano, the home's administrator, refused an offer by the parish to send buses to help.

Mr. Foti announced last week that the Manganos had been booked on 34 counts of negligent homicide. The attorney general's office and St. Bernard authorities are right to take this case so seriously.

Formal charges, of course, do not amount to a conviction. The Manganos are entitled to contest the accusations against them, and their lawyer, James Cobb, maintains they are innocent. He disputes the assertion that parish officials offered to help his clients move residents out. Mr. Cobb says that arresting the couple is "ridiculous" amid the "problems with the evacuation at all levels of the government."

He also argues that the Manganos and others at the home saved dozens of people, including residents, staffers and their families; and that any deaths were the result of breached levees rather than a failure to evacuate residents in advance of the storm. But long before Katrina, emergency-management planners worried in public about the possibility that a hurricane could overwhelm the metro area's levees.

Besides, the storm cannot be an all-purpose explanation for any misconduct in which individual people might have engaged. Nursing homes must look out for the safety of the people in their charge. If it turns out that St. Rita's did break the law and put patients at unnecessary risk, then those responsible ought to be punished.

While traveling can be traumatic or physically harmful for some nursing home patients, staying in a low-lying area when a ferocious hurricane threatens can be deadly. And it was at St. Rita's.

Unfortunately, Louisiana's enforcement of any number of safety regulations for nursing homes has been unacceptably lax. An investigation by this newspaper earlier this year found that poor care by nursing homes resulted in the deaths of at least 33 residents since 1996. But homes face minimal penalties even when patients are killed or maimed. In this environment, it would not be surprising if some homes failed to follow the letter of state laws concerning hurricane evacuation.

After the horror of Katrina, nursing home owners — along with plenty of other people in the New Orleans area — are more likely to take the deadly power of hurricanes more seriously. Unfortunately, hindsight won't bring back the victims of this storm.

DON'T LET THE PLIGHT OF THE POOR FADE FROM VIEW

STEPHANIE GRACE

So now they know.

Now everyone in the country and many across the globe has gotten an up-close look at what we in New Orleans have been seeing for years: the poverty, crime and general despair that have long lurked just under the city's decadent facade. The thousands of people who lived so close to the edge that it took just a few terrible days to push them over. The developing-world conditions that really did, and still do, exist in this prosperous, confident nation. The racial divide that was so apparent in all those heart-wrenching pictures.

One of the astonishing things about all the outside coverage is that people seem so surprised.

The cycle of entrenched poverty is suddenly breaking news, being discussed with an intensity to rival the country's newly discovered vulnerability to terrorism after Sept. 11 four years ago.

The New York Times public editor issued an astonishing apology for failing to bring the "poverty so pervasive that it hampered evacuation" to its national readers' attention before the storm. Newsweek ran a cover package headlined "The Other America," that declared that "for the moment at least, Americans are ready to fix their restless gaze on enduring problems of poverty, race and class that have escaped their attention." Many other news organizations have followed suit.

And so have politicians.

"I hope we realize that the people of New Orleans weren't just abandoned during the hurricane," Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., chided his colleagues on the floor of the Senate. "They were abandoned long ago — to murder and mayhem in the streets, to substandard schools, to dilapidated housing, to inadequate health care, to a pervasive sense of hopelessness."

Across the party divide, even President Bush abandoned his free-market rhetoric and pledged to put government to work addressing persistent, systemic inequalities.

I have to admit that, a month ago, I wouldn't have predicted this outpouring. I always figured that people knew, but just didn't care.

Or maybe they knew a little and cared just enough to be intermittently sad, to feel a few minutes of empathy for the children who had to walk through virtual war zones to attend dilapidated schools — but not enough to stand up and shout about it.

It always felt like society, including government at all levels, had accepted that New Orleans and other big cities would always have an underclass. There was concern, but precious little outrage.

Until Katrina.

So the question is: What do we do with all this newfound outrage?

Although it's an important start, curing persistent poverty is hardly as simple as writing a big federal check. If it were, the problem would have been solved a long time ago.

The real work will come down the road, as local and national experts try to hammer out public policy solutions in health care, housing, jobs and education. It's a huge, hard, long-term and utterly necessary job.

All of us who are haunted by the people we couldn't help in the days after the storm can help now. Some of us can offer time, resources or expertise, as so many already have. All of us can raise our voices and say "never again" — and keep saying it long after the media and politicians have moved on to the next big story.

After what we've all seen, it's the least we can do.

New Orleans a tragedy in black and white

PAUL KRUGMAN

By three to one, African-Americans believe that federal aid took so long to arrive in New Orleans in part because the city was poor and black. By an equally large margin, whites disagree.

The truth is that there's no way to know. Maybe President Bush would have been mugging with a guitar the day after the levees broke even if New Orleans had been a mostly white city. Maybe Palm Beach would also have had to wait five days after a hurricane hit before key military units received orders to join rescue operations.

But in a larger sense, the administration's lethally inept response to Hurricane Katrina had a lot to do with race. For race is the biggest reason the United States, uniquely among advanced countries, is ruled by a political movement that is hostile to the idea of helping citizens in need.

Race, after all, was central to the emergence of a Republican majority: essentially, the South switched sides after the passage of the Civil Rights Act. Today, states that had slavery in 1860 are much more likely to vote Republican than states that didn't.

And who can honestly deny that race is a major reason America treats its poor more harshly than any other advanced country? To put it crudely: a middle-class European, thinking about the poor, says to himself, "There but for the grace of God go I." A middle-class American is all too likely to think, perhaps without admitting it to himself, "Why should I be taxed to support those people?"

Above all, race-based hostility to the idea of helping the poor created an environment in which a political movement hostile to government aid in general could flourish.

By all accounts Ronald Reagan, who declared in his Inaugural Address that "government is not the solution to our problem; government is the problem," wasn't personally racist. But he repeatedly used a bogus tale about a Cadillac-driving Chicago "welfare queen" to bash big government. And he launched his 1980 campaign with a pro-states'-rights speech in Philadelphia, Miss., a small town whose only claim to fame was the 1964 murder of three civil rights workers.

Under George W. Bush — who, like Reagan, isn't personally racist but relies on the support of racists — the anti-government right has reached a new pinnacle of power. And the incompetent response to Katrina was the direct result of his political philosophy. When an administration doesn't believe in an agency's mission, the agency quickly loses its ability to perform that mission.

By now everyone knows that the Bush administration treated the Federal Emergency Management Agency as a dumping ground for cronies and political hacks, leaving the agency incapable of dealing with disasters. But FEMA's degradation isn't unique. It reflects a more general decline in the competence of government agencies whose job is to help people in need.

For example, housing for Katrina refugees is one of the most urgent problems now facing the nation. The FEMAvilles springing up across the gulf region could all too easily turn into squalid symbols of national failure. But the Department of Housing and Urban Development, which should be a source of expertise in tackling this problem, has been reduced to a hollow shell, with eight of its principal staff positions vacant.

But let me not blame the Bush administration for everything. The sad truth is that the only exceptional thing about the neglect of our fellow citizens we saw after Katrina struck is that for once the consequences of that neglect were visible on national TV.

Consider this: in the United States, unlike any other advanced country, many people fail to receive basic health care because they can't afford it. Lack of health insurance kills many more Americans each year than Katrina and 9/11 combined.

But the health care crisis hasn't had much effect on politics. And one reason is that it isn't yet a crisis among middle-class, white Americans (although it's getting there). Instead, the worst effects are falling on the poor and black, who have third-world levels of infant mortality and life expectancy.

I'd like to believe that Katrina will change everything — that we'll all now realize how important it is to have a government committed to helping those in need, whatever the color of their skin. But I wouldn't bet on it.

JARVIS DEBERRY

Light or dark shouldn't matter

New Orleans is a place with its own distinct culture, and everybody displaced from the city can now be considered a cultural emissary.

People in the cities that have welcomed us are in for quite a lesson: how we cook, how we talk, how we parade and mask, throw parties and dance and drink, how we separate ourselves according to slave-era hierarchies, with some lighter-skinned black folks making distinctions between themselves and those who are darker skinned.

Oh, you thought only the good vibes would travel?

As we smile at the thought of our endearing quirks and traditions spreading to, and maybe even taking root in, towns and cities across America, we can't expect the things that embarrass us to stay put. We can only shudder and hope that as an unprecedented number of New Orleanians are exposed to the outside world they find it more difficult to cling to the prejudices that kept the city separate.

Friday afternoon in a store in Memphis, Tenn., a New Orleanian asked my friend Treasure Williams for help. "Where are all the light-skinned black people?" she said.

She asked her question the way you or I would ask directions to the local grocery.

I'll point out — just to heighten the absurdity — that Treasure has a dark complexion. When I met her five years ago she wore dreadlocks. Today she wears her hair braided. Nothing about her appearance suggests that she's the go-to person for information about light-skinned enclaves. The fact that the woman asked her anyway is proof that she did not understand her question to be offensive.

So what did this dark-skinned black woman with African features say to this light-skinned black woman with African features?

"I laughed," Treasure told me. "Incredulously."

Here's how Treasure interpreted the question: "Where are the people I'd rather be talking to at this moment?"

That's a fair interpretation. But the woman's question says a lot more than that. It reveals a belief that light-skinned black people everywhere form exclusive communities, that they form their own clubs, churches, schools and 7th Wards.

I quickly learned how New Orleanians use "7th Ward" as a shorthand. For some who grew up there, it's a code for light-skinned and important. People from other parts of the city might use it to mean stuck-up and imperious. A member in a writing workshop I belong to once read aloud a story that revealed a virulent animosity toward black people with light complexions. When the other writers in the room expressed alarm at her prejudice she held firm. "Oh, you know how people in the 7th Ward are," she said.

It's now 2005, and most black people in this country have sense enough not to make judgments on the basis of complexion or ask for directions to light-skinned communities.

Even as the neighborhood declined and crime and blight increased, even as those with money built homes elsewhere, "7th Ward" came to define a concept, even if the actual place was no longer the exclusive domain of folks with a particular skin color and hair texture.

I told Treasure that the woman she met Friday was looking for Memphis' equivalent of the 7th Ward, but alas, that city doesn't have one. I guess if the woman chooses to be around black people at all she's going to have to risk being associated with people with dark skins. How will she ever survive?

We can look to slavery for the roots of this intra-racial prejudice. Slaves with lighter complexions were thought to be more attractive, more intelligent, more industrious. In short, more white. I don't know of a place in this hemisphere where people of African descent haven't at one time or another made distinctions among themselves based on complexion. But it's now 2005, and most black people in this country have sense enough not to make judgments on the basis of complexion or ask for directions to light-skinned communities.

Not everything that was in New Orleans was worth preserving. When the city reforms, let's hope that those who return have held fast to the culture, traditions and attitudes that have made New Orleans great but that they've rid themselves of some junk. The obsession over complexion should be one of the first things tossed in the trash.

Commissioners dealt a tough hand by Katrina

Tagliabue, Stern express support for New Orleans

NEW YORK — In their Manhattan headquarters, the NFL's Paul Tagliabue and the NBA's David Stern are two commissioners trying to fight their way through the biggest problem ever laid on their desk, simply because Hurricane Katrina was a natural disaster that touched more people than any catastrophe in the history of this country.

PETER FINNEY

Tagliabue was at Giants Stadium in East Rutherford, N.J., on Monday night, watching the "home" opener of Tom Benson's New Orleans Saints.

And Stern intends to be in Oklahoma City in early November when the New Orleans Hornets open at "home" in a 19,000-seat arena that will be "home" for all but six of 41 dates in an 82-game regular season.

Depending on the condition of New Orleans Arena (where damage was worse than first reports indicated), some of the six games might be played in the Arena, the others at LSU's Pete Maravich Assembly Center.

For this season, the remaining Saints' "home'' schedule is fixed, three at San Antonio's Alamodome, four at Tiger Stadium.

Tagliabue was already looking ahead, saying he shared the sentiments of J. Wayne Leonard, chief executive of Entergy, the power company that serves New Orleans and post-Katrina, moved its headquarters to Clinton, Miss.

It is Leonard's plan to return to New Orleans "as soon as possible." Leonard said he wanted "to be at the table when decisions are made about money that needs to be put into restoring the Gulf Coast, into schools, into restoring mass transportation."

Tagliabue also wants to be "at the table."

"I want to be engaged," said the commissioner, "in talks about the future of sports in New Orleans and the Superdome."

As for 2006, when the Saints are expected to return to their practice facility on Airline Drive, Tagliabue said he's planning to be in Baton Rouge on Oct. 30 when the Saints play Nick Saban's Dolphins and have discussions with LSU officials and start "focusing on scheduling options" regarding Tiger Stadium next season.

As for the Alamodome, Tagliabue said former San Antonio mayor Henry Cisneros was correct in saying the city was not out to "steal" someone else's team at a time when "a national tragedy" grew out of an

Fans travel long distances to cheer on Saints

By Aaron Kuriloff

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — Freddie Taylor and his wife Rita spent four days in a flooded high-rise on Chef Menteur Highway. They drove out of the city in a truck packed with children and didn't stop until they reached Alexandria, La. Then they made their way north, through Tennessee and the Shenendoah Valley, across Pennsylvania and all the way to Staten Island. And there, a few days later, the Taylors suddenly found themselves in the Giants Stadium parking lot, the honored guests of a local congressman.

It was a longer road than he ever imagined, but Freddie finally got his wife to a Saints game.

"It feels great," he said. "It's good to get my mind some relaxation. … We don't have anyplace place to live, but we're going to the Saints game."

The Taylors, all seven of them, once you add Freddie and Rita's five children, were among 1,200 in the New Orleans Diaspora brought to Monday's game by the largesse of the National Football League and dozens of relief and charity organizations. From Hyannis, Mass., to Washington D.C. and beyond, displaced Crescent City residents boarded buses and made their way along Interstate 95 to the Meadowlands.

Added together, the Saints faithful in the stadium might have totaled 2,000. Maybe 3,000. But for one night, these men, women and children — especially those now sleeping in church halls, armories and public schools — made up a rowdy and defiant community.

There were some trappings of home. While the sweet, clear notes of Irvin Mayfield's warming up his horn for a pregame rendition of "America the Beautiful" drifted across the parking lot, a group of about 30 people raised black and gold banners, donned black home jerseys and began to laissez les bon temps roulez.

League heads to discuss site for Sugar Bowl

No decision expected to be made until next month

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

Sugar Bowl officials will meet with the 11 Division I-A conference commissioners Tuesday to discuss where this season's game might be played, but no decision is expected on the site until next month.

"We're zeroing in on what is in the best interests for all parties," said Sugar Bowl executive director Paul Hoolahan, who, along with bowl president Mark Romig, will address the commissioners in Chicago. "We have to keep our options open on parallel tracks.

"But the bottom line is that we are prepared to do whatever is necessary to keep the Sugar Bowl a viable player in the BCS rotation."

With the Superdome unavailable, the options for the Jan. 2 bowl are LSU's Tiger Stadium, with most fans housed in New Orleans-area hotels, or another site like the Georgia Dome in Atlanta.

Romig said his preference is to play in Baton Rouge, although he said he was aware that factors such as the lack of hotel space might make that difficult.

"We are still in the research and discovery stage," he said. "We want to be part of the recovery of Louisiana, and that means playing the game in Louisiana.

"But we are also cognizant that the availability of hotel rooms is a major

Oklahoma City council to vote on lease agreement with Hornets

By Jimmy Smith
Staff writer

With the team poised to announce its 2005-06 base of operations in Oklahoma City, city leaders there are finalizing a lease agreement that will enable the Hornets to play a yet unspecified number of games in the 19,000-seat Ford Center.

Mayor Mick Cornett told The Daily Oklahoman on Sunday night that he will ask the city council to approve the agreement at a special Wednesday morning meeting.

"Everything is going well," Cornett told the newspaper, "but we still have a few details to work out. I'm confident everything will be completed by Wednesday."

A source familiar with the team's plans said Sunday the bulk of the Hornets' staff will set up shop in Oklahoma City this year, though the team will have a smaller satellite office in either Baton Rouge or New Orleans this season.

The Hornets are attempting to play up to a dozen games in Baton Rouge this season at the Pete Maravich Assembly Center on the LSU campus.

'The challenge was to make this a meaningful season'

NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue sat down with Times-Picayune columnist Peter Finney and staff writer Mike Triplett on Monday at the NFL offices in Manhattan. Here is a partial transcript of the interview:

The Times-Picayune: Why did the NFL want to play as many games in Baton Rouge as possible?

Tagliabue: (The league needed to look into all the logistics of when Baton Rouge could be ready) That was the key for me, was just to buy a little time. That's why we put this game here. And then if we had been able to play the Oct. 2 game over in Baton Rouge, we would have. But it just was not possible. You're living there; you know what's going on up there.

TP: Do you understand where (Saints coach Jim) Haslett's coming from: The team is practicing in San Antonio, wants to play?

Tagliabue: But the key thing is that even from a coaching standpoint, the whole challenge from late August forward was to make this season a meaningful season, a season to fight for, a season to compete in, rather than to make it a lost cause. So how do you make it a season to fight for? You do it by making every game a big, big matchup, including the first home game. We could have put this game – in fact, we offered to put this game – at neutral sites, like the Georgia Dome and Texas Stadium and Reliant Stadium. But what group of players wants to go into play at a divisional opponent's stadium, like the Georgia Dome? I mean, I played sports; you want to go in, you want to be challenged to compete. Go into the other guys' den and beat 'em. And make the game what it's become.

(Tagliabue then made reference to a cover story about the game in Monday's USA Today sports section, and later talked about the coverage on national network TV morning shows. Tagliabue then also pulled out a Fats Domino CD from his collection of "college albums": "When the Saints Go Marching In." They should put out a new edition, a 2005 edition. They should have a special edition of that for the first LSU game. Do an extra stanza or two relative to (Nick) Saban in there.)

TP: What's your gut feeling, 2010? Will there be a New Orleans Saints team?

Tagliabue: You know, I think it really turns on, "What kind of a New Orleans will there be?" That really is the question. And we're going to do everything possible to make sure there's a New Orleans Saints. But people larger than us and institutions larger than us are going to have to succeed in making sure there is a robust, healthy New Orleans, you know, with fans and businesses and all the things you hope a city can have. But certainly we're going to do everything we can to try to keep the New Orleans Saints as the New Orleans Saints. And when you read all these different points of view, including the president's speech, you don't know what to conclude. Because the president's speech, I think he said it himself on Friday, was just the beginning of a road map. Now you've got to fill in the roads and the street signs and you've got to start investing. I saw an interview with the head of Entergy, and I thought he made a very positive point. "Yes, we're committed to New Orleans. But it depends on a lot of decisions being made in the right way. And we hope to have a seat at the table in those conversations." And I think that pretty well is where I am. We need to have a seat at the table. We need to be engaged. I can't sit here in New York; that's the reason I went to Baton Rouge to talk about the schedule. And at some point, hopefully, we can sit at the table and talk about the future of sports in New Orleans, specifically the Superdome or whatever you want to call it, and the Saints.

TP: A new stadium would never take shape without some sort of long-term commitment on Saints owner Tom Benson's behalf?

Tagliabue: Right. It's going to have to be a two-way street. I was on the Saints' radio during the preseason, with Bobby Hebert. And it was my understanding at that time – this goes back to early- to mid-August, this was well before Katrina – that the focus was going to be on a successful season and that Mr. Benson and the governor were going to have conversations after the season. That's what I said, and I said that I would be available to try to make the conversations productive. And then a few days later I saw that they were maybe going to be at it again right now, in August and September. So even before Katrina, you kind of needed a game program to keep track of what was going to happen from week to week.

TP: Everybody calls the Saints a small-market team, so to speak. But the deal they had in place was a good deal by NFL standards, right?

Tagliabue: Well, I don't know that much about the deal. I know there was a payment, I know about the various issues. To me, the issue has always been – I think I said this two or three years ago – the issue has always been about the market. And at that time, they were making a lot of efforts to move east to Gulfport and Biloxi and across I-10, and I think they were doing a good job of selling season tickets. They got a pretty good boost in the season-ticket sales at one point. And now it seems like when you go toward Baton Rouge and Lafayette, you've got fans over there. You know, it's got to be like the Kansas City Chiefs, where you go out two or three hundred miles. In Kansas City, you can do it in a series of concentric circles. In New Orleans, you're a little bit more like the Baltimore Ravens. You've got the Gulf of Mexico, and they've got the Chesapeake Bay. And of course, that's a much more populous area, but you've got the Redskins right to the south and the Eagles to the north and the Steelers to the west and the Bay to the east. But I thought two or three years ago when they were really focusing in the "Gulf Coast Saints" concept with (executive vice president) Arnie Fielkow, they were doing pretty well, in terms of reaching out beyond the immediate city of New Orleans, which I've always felt is the issue. But you know, whether it's Indianapolis or Buffalo or New Orleans or San Diego or any other city, I think it's our responsibility to have a team which the fans and the business community can support long-term. We cannot get into situations where we have to have governmental subsidies to support an NFL team. The fans have to be there, and the business community has to be there. And I give credit to Indianapolis, because I think that they've managed to accomplish that out there, with their business community and with their fan base. But that's the challenge for every team.

TP: Next year, when the Saints practice again in New Orleans, wouldn't it be logical that all the games be played in Baton Rouge?

NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue said Monday he wants to be a part of the discussion in the rebuilding plans of Louisiana. He said the New Orleans' reputation as the favorite Super Bowl site of NFL owners will play a role in helping shape the Saints future in the Crescent City.

Tagliabue: Well, the first thing we have to do is talk to LSU about that. It was beyond what we were trying to do a week ago today, when we were up there. But that's a conversation that I think we need to have with Bernie Boudreaux (chairman of the board of supervisors) and his people. What would a Saints schedule, in sync with the LSU schedule, look like? And how would that work from the standpoint of LSU? And how would it work from the standpoint of the fans of both teams? And I just don't know enough about any of those issues. We talked a little bit last Monday with Doug Thornton and with Bernie and (LSU chancellor) Sean O'Keefe about, once the New Orleans airport opens up, then could the visiting team for the games at LSU, could they stay at the Airport Hilton at Louis Armstrong Airport? And could they take buses over to Baton Rouge the day of the game? So we talked a little bit about the drive time for fans in the whole region to access games at LSU. But it was really in the context of this year's games and the teams traveling from the Louis Armstrong airport over to LSU. We never really got beyond that to take a look at, where are the fans and how would you put 15 to 20 games in one stadium on a college campus, especially since they play most of those games on a Saturday night. But that's something we're going to have to start looking at real hard, soon.

Right now, my focus goes from tonight to the 30th of October. Because I think the critical thing now, after this event tonight, which is turning from a logistics standpoint into like a mini-Super Bowl preparation for our staff – we've got people working 22 hours a day. But then we've got to do the same thing with respect to the four games at LSU and make sure that they're presented in the right way and that there's outreach to the fans and that tickets get sold in the right way. I read some stories about LSU ticket-holders in the New Orleans area and about tickets lost, just floating out to sea. I don't know what the situation is with Saints ticket-holders. I asked Mr. Benson last week, I know he's got his people working on it, "How many of the Saints' season-ticket holders actually have a ticket that you can find? And how many of them are going to be in a position to go over to Baton Rouge?" Because hopefully you've got some of that. But on top of that, you're going to have to sell a lot of tickets to new fans who haven't customarily been going to Saints games.

I'm going to be at LSU for the first game, that Oct. 30 game. So I would think that maybe that's the time that we could sit down with Bernie Boudreaux and Chancellor O'Keefe and Mr. Benson and start focusing on the 2006 scheduling options, that type of thing. Because I think that's the next priority, once we get through tonight, from our perspective. Then we've really got to start looking at the logistics for those four games this year, then start talking about next year.

TP: Is it also too early to decide what kind of commitment the NFL wants to make toward helping the team stay in New Orleans, such as awarding the city a Super Bowl, etc.?

Tagliabue: We really haven't discussed that. That's going to be a membership decision, obviously. Even on the issue of playing this game here in New York, I had a conference call with Mr. Benson and a half a dozen owners and we had a very thorough conference call in terms of what the alternatives were. Obviously we knew we had to play someplace outside of the Gulf Coast region. But we did talk about the Georgia Dome and Texas Stadium. They were both available yesterday. And that would have been analogous to what we did with the Chargers-Dolphins game when we had the wildfires in San Diego. We played it over in Phoenix, in the Cardinals' stadium. But it really seemed that the overriding theme here was taking this first Saints home game, quote-unquote, and making it the centerpiece for the rebuilding and the recovery effort. And the choice was clear. Do you have a mega-spotlight on the region and the needs of the region, through the New Orleans Saints? Or do the New Orleans Saints become a minor-league story by playing in the Georgia Dome in front of 25,00 people? So, there was no reason to have it be a minor-league story. It had to be a major-league story.

In fact, on that call, (Patriots owner) Bob Kraft said that, "What is uncanny to me is that after 2001, the Patriots became America's story because it was about patriotism and the nation was under attack from a foreign enemy." And after the Patriots won the Super Bowl, he said, "We are all Patriots." And he said, "This is the same thing for the Saints. We are all Saints in 2005." And that was the choice between this type of a platform on national television with an unprecedented "Monday Night Football" doubleheader, or some other alternatives that would have made it clear that the team is Louisiana's team. But how do you do that? Do you put them in a stadium that's closest to Louisiana, like Atlanta? You know, the idea that people from New Orleans were going to travel to Atlanta under these conditions was obviously not correct. The only people that we felt would respond with passion and understanding and empathy was the people of New York. They've been through it four years ago. So that was the reason.

And like I say, from a players' standpoint, what's better, to play on a national platform with the whole area that you represent, knowing that when the going gets tough, the tough get going? Or playing in a jury-rigged setting with 25,000 to 40,000 fans, which is what the Georgia Dome could have been? Maybe it would have sold out, but you wouldn't have had the same empathy that you had from the people of New York. And I was well aware as soon as it happened, that the first Giants home game after 9/11 was the Saints. And I met the head of the police department, the head of the fire department down on the field.

TP: What about Baton Rouge supporting both LSU and the Saints for a full season next year?

Tagliabue: It's a little bit like Bear Bryant at Alabama, when we used to talk about a team in Birmingham. It was like Bear had a stranglehold on the Alabama fans. But we heard that in Tennessee, too, when we were looking at Nashville. We were told by a lot of people that it was a Volunteer state. And I think the Titans have demonstrated that with the right city, the right team, the right presentation, a place like that can support both college football and the NFL.

TP: When discussing options for Monday's game, was San Antonio an option?

Tagliabue: No. San Antonio was not in that conversation. I talked to Mr. Benson before the conference call and told him the choices we were looking at were New York, Atlanta, Dallas and Reliant Stadium (Houston). We would have had to do that on a Monday night. And that our policy and our precedents were that you play in another NFL city, in another NFL stadium. The precedents we had were the 49ers after the earthquake – they played a game down at Stanford, which is analogous to playing at LSU. And then we had the most recent example was the wildfire crisis in Southern California; we moved the Chargers and the Dolphins into Arizona in the Cardinals' stadium. So I told all the owners the choices we were looking at for the first game were NFL cities. It was not going to be the first game in a non-NFL city. We were not going to look at Birmingham. We were not going to look at Orlando. We were not going to look at San Antonio. We were looking at NFL cities. That was our precedent. Whether we changed that down the road once we had more time to think about it, that would be a conversation we would have later. Because our staff had done a lot of work, and they had looked at places like Orlando and Birmingham. In fact, Bart Starr called me up about Birmingham. He said, you know, people down here would be in a position to do it at Legion Field. You could have done it in various non-NFL cities, but. ...

TP: In this situation, does the Alamodome make sense because the Saints are practicing there?

Tagliabue: Yeah. From a players' standpoint, doing it on Monday night I felt was a dream of a lifetime, which is reflected in the players' comments. Then ABC and ESPN were terrific, not only in figuring out how we could do the telecast, but in committing to the Hurricane Katrina rebuilding effort.

TP: In reference to Jim Haslett's comments about being disappointed about playing in New York, do you think part of it was a motivational tool?

Tagliabue: The one thing I noticed was that the AP put a story out which speculated about the idea that they would play every game on the road in another NFL city, which was ridiculous. The day we announced that they were going to play in New York, we sent a memo out to all the NFL teams that under no circumstances would they play in the stadiums of their divisional opponents, Atlanta, Tampa Bay and Carolina. So from Day One, we were clear on that. We focused on the divisional games, because that's a primary determinator of the (division race). But I think that (story) is the first thing the coach saw. And the problem was, we sent the memo out, but the Saints never saw it, because their fax machines weren't working, until the following Tuesday. That Tuesday, I was talking to Mr. Benson and Coach Haslett on a conference call, and neither one of them had seen the memo. They had no fax, they had no e-mail. We were barely able to communicate with them over cell phones.

TP: The fact that it's a very popular Super Bowl site, that helps New Orleans out down the line in the unknown future?

Tagliabue: Absolutely. I would think the success of the prior games would be a big factor for a lot of people – for a lot of owners, and for a lot of other people as well.

TP: Is San Antonio dangerous territory because they are openly considering these three games as a tryout to prove they can be an NFL city?

Tagliabue: I think their former mayor, Henry Cisneros, I think he put it well. They have got to be clear what their motives are. To be helpful in the context of a national tragedy that grows out of an unprecedented disaster. And their motive is not to steal someone else's team. He said that.

TP: Stealing the Saints aside, they quickly sold over 50,000 tickets. Might this turn into an opportunity for that city to prove that they should be in the mix?

Tagliabue: Ever since we approved the move of the Raiders and the Rams, I've been saying that our goal is to get a team back to L.A., either through expansion or whatever, and we're not going to be moving any teams into small markets. We're going to be moving up in market size, not either down or flat. That's our goal. So that's been my mindset. We've had enough teams move from large markets to small markets. So if – if – any teams are relocated in the future, the objective is going to be to concentrate them, put it this way, in markets that can really support them. Gene Upshaw said it the other day about Jacksonville. I think Jacksonville, long term, we knew what we were getting into. We knew we were getting into the growth of Northern Florida. But Jacksonville was an expansion decision consciously made by the entire membership. Relocation of a team involves a whole different set of issues.

TP: The 2010 Super Bowl is completely off the table for New Orleans?

Tagliabue: Yeah, we decided that a month or six weeks ago, that the three cities that lost out to Tampa would be the three cities that would compete for the game we had tentatively committed to New York.

Tagliabue wants Saints to remain in New Orleans

"unprecedented disaster."

He was firm on one point. San Antonio was "not" considered as a possible site for Monday night's game. The commissioner made it clear he wanted the game played in an NFL city and an NFL stadium. He also did not want any Saints "home" games played on the field of division foes Atlanta, Tampa Bay and Carolina.

What he pushed for Monday night was a match that would be the "centerpiece for the city's rebuilding and recovery effort." In other words, "a mega-sportlight."

He talked about New England winning the Super Bowl in 2002, the season following the 9/11 terrorist attacks, when the cry was "we are all Patriots."

Now, Tagliabue suggested, Katrina has left fans coast to coast shouting "we are all Saints."

Would New Orleans' undisputed reputation as the NFL's favorite Super Bowl city play a role in the Saints' future?

"Absolutely," said the commissioner. "It would be a big factor for a lot of people and a lot of owners."

As for government involvement, Tagliabue was also clear.

"Whether it's Indianapolis or Buffalo or New Orleans or San Diego or any other city," he said, "I think it's our responsibility to have a team that the fans and the business community can support long term. But we cannot get into situations where we have to have governmental subsidies to support an NFL team."

Earlier, on a day Harry Connick Jr. and Branford Marsalis were involved in game-day entertainment, Tagliabue was holding the Fats Domino album "Blueberry Hill," which includes a familiar song: "When The Saints Go Marchin' In."

It's one the commissioner, a graduate of St. Michael's High School in Union City, N.J., knows well, and for a long time.

"It was our fight song," said the boss of the National Football League.

Stern: Hornets have to plan for year

Team could play limited amount of games in N.O.

NBA commissioner David Stern and other league officials sat down for an interview with Times-Picayune columnist Peter Finney and staff writer Mike Triplett on Monday at the league's Manhattan offices to discuss the future of the Hornets in New Orleans in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. The following is a partial transcript of the interview:

Times-Picayune: What does it look like right now?

David Stern: This is a day-to-day proposition. We're trying to juggle a lot of different eventualities. We know that we believe it will be several months before the (New Orleans) Arena is serviceable. So our theory is that we want to find an interim facility, where we can do the best job possible in terms of both seeing an arena that has people in it, and that does as little disruption to the traveling schedule of visiting teams as possible. And at the same time, we want to also schedule a series of games in Louisiana. And that's the juggling act that requires us being in detailed discussions, on the one hand with Oklahoma City, on the other hand with the officials of Louisiana, so that we can make arrangements for some games to be played in Baton Rouge.

TP: Any other spots in Louisiana besides Baton Rouge?

Stern: Well, right now we have an exhibition game scheduled for Bossier City. … And we have no certain sense of the economic viability of the games in Louisiana. We're just going to play them.

Russ Granik, deputy commissioner: Well, we almost know that we can't be strong economically, because the building, the Maravich Center, only holds 13,000-something.

Stern: But that doesn't matter. You know, George Shinn feels strongly that he has made a commitment to Louisiana. Louisiana has made a commitment to him. And he wants to play a number of games in Louisiana. We have suggested strongly that the right number is five or six, and that trying at least internally to accommodate the early suggestions of the LSU folks, we're trying to focus on the winter break and the spring break.

TP: Five or six until the arena can be used?

Granik: For the season. The team has to make a plan for the year. You've got season tickets to sell. I think the NFL can a little more readily put a game in New York, and it sells out. But we have, counting exhibition games, it's 43 dates. We've still got to plan for the season. So I think the discussions that we've had, we'll have an understanding up front; those are the games that will be played in Louisiana for this season. But if some of them can end up back in New Orleans, that will be terrific.

AP PHOTO

NBA commissioner David Stern says that his concern is not only finding a home for the Hornets this season, but making sure it doesn't severely disrupt the traveling schedule for the visiting teams.

TP: Because as of right now, you don't know if the arena is going to be ready?

Granik: They've told us they think the arena can be ready by January, February. But nobody knows about the surrounding areas, the infrastructure, whatever else you might need. It doesn't appear that the basketball arena was as damaged as the Dome. No holes in the roof or anything like that.

Stern: The last thing that we want to do is to somehow be involved in pushing people to do things faster than makes sense for what their other goals are. We read the newspaper, the ongoing discussions about city and state vs. federal opinions. We read about the need to move into temporary housing and develop other cities. On the one hand, we recognize the potential that sports holds to sort of distract and entertain. But on the other hand, it can't become the story. So our early decision here has been, look, let's find a place that is temporary and that is the closest place, so that it represents no great distraction for the visiting teams. On the other hand, once we decided to find a temporary city, Oklahoma City came in and said, 'Look, we're no strangers to tragedy, and we'd very much like to be helpful. By the way, we happen to have this building here.' We said, 'OK, let's have an economic plan that makes sense. So if we give you this many dates, can we do this, can we get that, can we make this into a season, so that when the Hornets return, they don't go back hobbled.'

TP: How much of that agreement has officially been announced?

Stern: A lot's leaking out. We're there negotiating today.

Granik: We're talking to LSU, but we're not as far along with that. I don't want to suggest that somehow we have a deal on a certain number of games. But I think we all have a certain sense of what could work and what wouldn't work.

TP: And the New Orleans part of it is that if they tell you at some point what could work, then you would play there?

Stern: Whatever number of games we're going to play in Oklahoma City, we're going to play there. In my mind is, once we announce a game in Louisiana, if the building were ready, that game could easily be moved to New Orleans. It's right there. Not, 'Oh hello Oklahoma City, sorry we scheduled this and sold tickets and got sponsors and now we're going to pull it back.' That's not a commercially viable idea from a league perspective. And we want teams to be able to plan where they're going and how they're going, etc.

TP: The Hornets will play 41 home games?

Stern: That's correct. And the bulk of them will be in Oklahoma City, and a number of them will be pledged to Louisiana. And by the way, we're going to make the right deal with LSU. It's just that they're backed up.

We told George and the staff, look, let us do this. We're going to do what's best for the league and you and Louisiana, we think, at the same time. So allow us, because you guys as a staff, you can imagine, their heads are spinning. … But George Shinn has made it clear that they are the New Orleans Hornets. The team will be representing New Orleans.

TP: The situation is a little different than with the Saints. It sounds like San Antonio and Oklahoma City are making similar efforts, but San Antonio is seen as more of a takeover, while Oklahoma City seems like a generous offer.

Stern: Well, you know, the response from Oklahoma City has been very dignified, very understanding. Now, obviously, one understands that a city gets an opportunity to show that it's a great helper, a true simpatico city, and also, it happens to have a basketball facility ready to go. And very much, I think there are many citizens and businesses that would like the opportunity to demonstrate that it's a major-league city. And we very much understand that. But there is enormous compassion that gets expressed at every turn. That's why we thought it best for the sensitivities involved that the NBA handle the process.

The stuff that we've read about, the pressure that's been put on Baton Rouge by the influx of offices, buildings, people. We've said, yes we're going to do it. But in terms of housing and access to the visiting teams and moving to the arena, what we didn't do is what other businesses did, we didn't say, OK we're going to buy 60 units. We did this on faith, on the theory that somehow or another there would be adequate housing, transportation, office space or something at the right time to make this happen. But it was imprudent of us to go start buying stuff or renting stuff.

TP: And it's too early, you guys haven't started talking about future endeavors when the team returns to New Orleans or anything like that?

Stern: You know, one thing that we have been doing here is, we took a step back so that our players could express themselves and shine. And they've been great, the WNBA and the NBA players, and our union, have been terrific. The Houston game and the visitations by our players to the shelters, this has been the most heartfelt outpouring of response by our players that I have witnessed in my almost 40 years of being involved in the NBA. And they're not asking for anything in return. It's really been quite extraordinary, and appropriate. Clearly, the images have touched our players greatly.

And George Shinn has not only made the move to New Orleans, but expressed his confidence and intentions by buying out Ray and becoming a 100 percent shareholder. Obviously, he was looking to bring in some additional investors, but I think that's on hold. I can tell you that there have been no shortage of interested groups who see this as an opportunity to advance the interests of their particular city, that they see as a potential NBA city, who have offered to pay a substantial premium for the team, and George has said no. It tells you where his heart is.

TP: Would there be any thoughts or discussions of putting an All-Star Game in New Orleans or any similar gesture down the road?

Stern: Let's let it play out and see how it works. The most important thing is what we can do to assist the victims. … Thus far, everyone we have spoken to has been more than understanding just to touch base with Cox and SMG and the mayor. You know, we just want to do the right thing and not just make some gestures that seem like gestures. But George has been terrific.

Fans 'home' in New York City

FANS, from C-1

"I was born and raised in Chalmette," said Troy Majnerick, who was struggling into an undersized Rickey Jackson jersey. "My grandparents spent 13 hours in their attic up in Arabi, waist deep in water, before the next door neighbor chopped through the roof. They made it up here now."

This group of Who Dats came together thanks to a Saints fan website, and they shared beers and swapped screen names such as "Jerseyyat." Sean Carroll said he'd tried to find crawfish for a parking lot boil, but the only local source proved too expensive. Sausages, chicken and clams served for eats instead, though someone mixed up a round of Hurricanes strong enough to make anyone forget the difference.

"I've never been to a Saints home game," said Alex Jonak, who introduced himself as the No. 1 Saints fan in New Jersey.

Giants fans, dressed in blue, stopped by the encampment. Those with kind words found themselves rewarded with Mardi Gras beads. Some were black and gold. Some were red, white and blue. One local commented that the Saints had become America's team. A Saints fan pointed him to a banner strung across the back of a truck with Virginia plates:

"Thanks America, but the Saints are New Orleans' team."

Inside the stadium, New Orleans Police Chief Eddie Compass praised New York's welcoming efforts, but said he was still solidly backing the nominal home team.

"When people talk about getting back to a normal lifestyle, nothing in New Orleans is more normal than football," he said.

Joe Jeanjeaques waved a Fleur de Lis banner nearby.

"I've got 36 people staying in my house in Dallas, Texas," he said. "I came up hear to get away from the 36 people."

The Taylors also described the game as a welcome escape.

"I was stressing on this," said Freddie Jr., the 22-year-old middle child. "It hit me. I exhaled and said 'We're alive. Now what would we like?' Well, I'd like to see the Saints game."

The younger family members agreed. Rita, however, frowned.

"I would like a house, myself," she said.

Hornets still working out details for playing in Oklahoma City

HORNETS, from C-1

Hornets officials, including team president Paul Mott, were unavailable for comment Monday.

In other league news Monday, the NBA announced working agreements with NBDL teams for each of its 30 teams.

Under the new collective bargaining agreement ratified over the summer, NBA teams can send as many as two players on their inactive list to the development league.

Hornets players would be assigned to Tulsa (Okla.) of the NBDL, along with players from Chicago, Milwaukee and Indiana.

"They're really going to benefit both players and teams," Stu Jackson, NBA senior vice president of basketball operations, said in a conference call Monday. "For players it will allow them to get playing time that they might not have gotten under the old system. For teams, it gives them another option and flexibility in player development."

No player can be assigned to the NBDL more than three times in a season, though there is no limit on the length of the assignment.

Defense bearing brunt of criticism

Pelini's schemes are talk of Tigers fans

By William Kalec
Staff writer

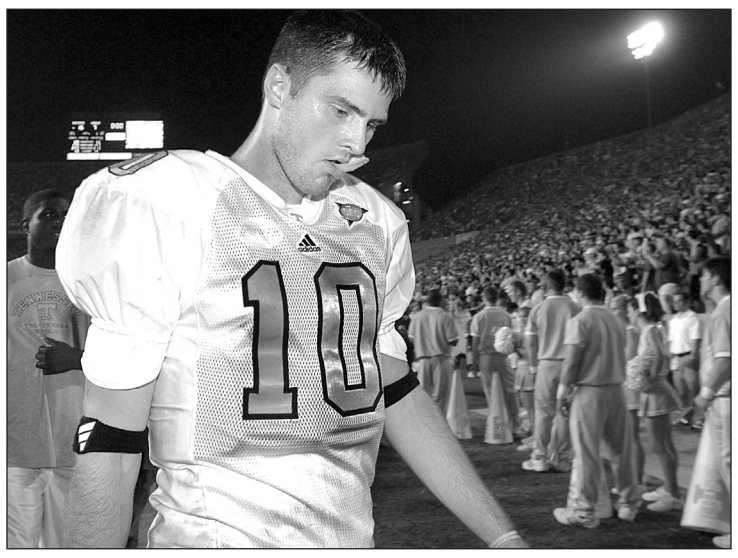
BATON ROUGE — Spam doesn't have this long a shelf life.

For the past week, every Monday morning quarterback has sent a heaping helping of criticism toward Bo Pelini's perceived passive defensive scheme. Fans have been dumping on the Tigers' new defensive coordinator after a rather generous performance against Arizona State on Sept. 10.

Listen to the radio. Overhear a restaurant conversation. Call your grandmother. It's the talk of the swollen town. As political strategist James Carville said last week, even surviving an awesome, humbling natural disaster can't wipe away the tendency for LSU fans to find something to complain about.



Yes, LSU won although the Tigers allowed 461 passing yards to Sam Keller and 100 yards rushing. Doesn't matter that disturbing dish was served 10 days ago, these Chicken Littles can't seem to get enough.

So with its still-interested readership in mind, the media went back for leftovers at Les Miles' weekly press conference, addressing one of the few hot-button issues to surface during Tennessee week.

And though Miles failed to rattle any cages with his quotes, he did toss a bone to those begging for some semblance of the not-so-far-gone days featuring intense man-to-man coupled with a cornucopia of blitz packages – a trademark of Nick Saban's regime.

"They probably played a little bit more man (coverage) than was played in the first game," Miles said of the fundamental differences in his defense compared with Saban's. "That's not to say that won't be played a little bit more extensively in the second game. It really kind of depends on who we're playing."

On paper, at least, Tennessee and Arizona State seem to clash offensively, which hints to some sort of defensive shakeup. Through two games, Erik Ainge and Rick Clausen are 40 yards shy of matching Keller's individual performance against Pelini's bunch, not to mention several football fields behind when you add what Keller did in the Temple and Northwestern games. Tennessee's Gerald Riggs Jr. piles up most of his yardage between the tackles compared to the Sun Devils' tandem, who take handoffs out of the spread formation and are more finesse than physical.

Although he struggled last week against Florida, Erik Ainge will be the starting quarterback for Tennessee this week against LSU.

"I think it's a matchup," Miles said. "How do our players match up vs. their players? How does a man scheme, with a quick-release passing opportunity for them, either give them opportunities or take them away? I understand, 1-2-3, let it rip, put the ball in the air, and then it's their players vs. your player when it's man-to-man.

"Certainly, you can see that working to our benefit and you can also see that working against us. So, I think it's the mix – the ability to let that corner know he has some help and, when we choose, put him out there man-to-man."

While Pelini's defense did concede mounds of yards, the Tigers were placed in prime locations to force fumbles or pick off Keller. Almost forgotten is Ali Highsmith's key strip of the football inside the LSU 10-yard line, when the Sun Devils appeared on the verge of increasing their lead to 24-7 in the third quarter. And on the final drive, Chevis Jackson had an ideal opportunity to slam the door, but it slipped through his hands, certainly not Pelini's fault.

"There are so many things to take into a account no matter what our scheme was," defensive tackle Kyle Williams said. "We definitely gave up more yards and more points than we wanted to. I think we're OK. I think we improved last week. We cleared up some things, and I think we'll do some things different to get ready for Tennessee."

Tigers 'can't wait' for home opener

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE— LSU players will probably get as big a welcome from their fans Saturday as ever seen in Tiger Stadium.

Because of Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath, the season opener was postponed and the next game was relocated. Also mixed in was an open date, giving LSU only one game in the season's first three weeks.

This weekend, the No. 3 Tigers will be playing their first game at home against the No. 10 Vols.

LSU fans have been itching for their Death Valley atmosphere, and the players, who are tired of practicing, are ready to play wherever.

"It's rare for us to be preparing for a game at all, so it's a plus to be preparing for a home game," said LSU defensive tackle Kyle Williams. "It's exciting either way.

"We're going to get it from both (all) sides – our team, their team and our fans. It's going to be a great night to play football here."

"It means a lot," said center Rudy Niswanger. "You usually open up the season at home, but we didn't get that due to other circumstances. … We're ready to play in front of our fans in our stadium and our atmosphere. We can't wait for it."

ESPN is sending its "GameDay" crew to broadcast from Baton Rouge, and the network's morning show "Cold Pizza" will broadcast live from LSU. Tigers coach Les Miles said he isn't worried about any added hype or distractions after the way his team has handled the past three weeks. "I think we've handled a lot of outer stuff," he said. "I don't think that's going to be an issue. (We're) just being prepared to play and looking at our opponent."

part of the equation, because fans have to stay in the area where the game is being played."

In past years, visiting Sugar Bowl fans occupy upward of 30,000 of the city's 38,000 hotel rooms. But, even if most of the downtown hotels normally used during the Sugar Bowl are fully functional, many rooms will be used by hotel workers still out of their homes and by recovery workers.

"It is a whole different landscape," Romig said. "You got to add the recovery workers and their needs to the equation as well."

Atlanta would have plenty of hotel rooms because the Peach Bowl is played there Dec. 30 and those fans would have departed by the time most Sugar Bowl fans would be arriving.

Romig added that the ultimate decision on this year's game will be made by the Sugar Bowl's executive committee, with input from the BCS, and especially the SEC.

Beyond this season's game is the larger question of when and if the Superdome will be refurbished.

Hoolahan said his hope is that the building, which was severely damaged by Hurricane Katrina and those who used it as a shelter, will be usable for the 2006 season.

"We need to see it repaired and up to snuff as soon as possible, whether it's for the short term or the long term," he said. "We're going to lose this year, but we can't afford to lose another one with the new contract cycle beginning."

The Sugar Bowl is scheduled to host the championship game and its regular bowl game at the end of the 2007 season as part of the new "double hosting" system. Hoolahan said last week that the Sugar Bowl faced the risk of losing its spot in the championship game rotation if a major stadium is not available in New Orleans in 2007.

Hoolahan also said the Sugar Bowl offices at the Superdome were ransacked during the stadium's use as a shelter, but that little of the bowl's memorabilia collection was missing.

"They looked first in the kitchen and then in every desk and filing cabinet, I guess for money or valuables," he said. "So there wasn't much to take, but it's a real mess."

After today's meeting, Sugar Bowl officials will work with a subcommittee chaired by SEC assistant commissioner Mark Womack until a decision on this year's game is made.

"Whatever we do this year is just a temporary solution," Romig said. "The Sugar Bowl ultimately will be back in New Orleans."

Scelfo: Wave will improve Saturday

Coach laments missed chances against MSU

By Fred Robinson
Staff writer

RUSTON — Tulane coach Chris Scelfo wasn't quite ready to go out on a limb and guarantee a victory when the Green Wave travels to Dallas this weekend to take on Conference USA opponent Southern Methodist, but he was more than willing to predict a better performance from his team.

Scelfo made it clear Monday that had the Wave capitalized on a couple of opportunities, the team might have come out of the contest with a victory over Mississippi State instead of a 21-14 loss.

"I expect us to play a lot better (against SMU). I'd be disappointed if we do not play four quarters like we played the last two (quarters) on Saturday, from the standpoint we only had two penalties in the second half," Scelfo said.

But it wasn't just limiting penalties in the second half that had Scelfo optimistic. The offense came to life and produced both scores in the second half. The Wave drove 83 yards in 10 plays, and used six plays to cover 28 yards following a 36-yard fumble return by Sean Lucas.

"We settled down and executed on offense and made some plays. A couple of catches Bubba (Terranova) made, K.P. (Kenneth Guidroz) made, and Damarcus (Davis) and Preston (Brown), that's what we have a chance to be."

While Scelfo was praising the receivers for the catches in the second half, he was just as critical for the many passes that were dropped. A couple of the dropped passes could have kept drives going, and at least one of the drops, Scelfo said, would have been for a long gain or a touchdown.

"We've got to catch the football," he said. "We do it every day in practice; we've got to catch it on Saturday. This was our first game. I expect us to be better this Saturday."

Scelfo said junior quarterback Lester Ricard, who completed 26 of 47 passes for 179 yards, was a little too charged up for the Mississippi State game. Scelfo said getting him to play the way he did in the second half has to be a goal.

"Offensively, the only thing we need to do a better job of is to get Lester under control early in the game," Scelfo said. "He was way too high. He wasn't nervous; he was just way too high. We've got to get him on an even keel, as he was when the year progressed last year.

"We know Lester has the potential to be as good as any quarterback that's ever played (at Tulane), and he'll get in that groove. When he gets in that groove, we're going to be a better offensive football team."

Ricard, who threw for 135 yards against the Bulldogs in his collegiate debut a year ago, said he felt fine going into Saturday's game, and believes it was one of his best efforts.

"Looking at the film, I felt like I was right where I was when I got hurt last year," Ricard said. "Everybody talks about last year's Navy game being my best game, but I thought this was my best game. My reads were good and nothing rattled me. I think it was my best game as far as controlling everything and not panicking. We had some incompletions, but that's going to happen."

As for being a little "too high," Ricard said he was just eager to get on the field after the long wait.

"I think I was as calm as I've ever been," Ricard said. "I was just ready to play. We all were a little antsy about playing. You couldn't settle anyone down after what we'd been through. Everybody was antsy to play."

Despite a muffed punt that was recovered by Mississippi State and led to the winning touchdown late in the fourth quarter, Scelfo said he was pleased with the play of the special teams. Other than the team's receivers, the kicking game was his biggest worry. After using three kickers Saturday night, Scelfo said he's fine with that phase of the game.

"We made both extra points, which was a big concern of mine going into the season," Scelfo said. "That's the one position I was laying awake every night fretting about. I'm not laying awake worrying about our kickers right now. I've got confidence in them."

Downsized Holy Cross opens season Saturday

Tigers to play Fisher missing top two players

By Jim Derry
Staff writer

Even the worst storm to hit New Orleans wasn't enough to cancel Holy Cross' football season.

The Tigers have assembled about 30 players, and they began practice Monday at Millerville Academy in Baton Rouge in preparation for their season opener Saturday at Fisher at 5 p.m.

Approximately 200 students from Holy Cross and Cabrini have combined and will attend night classes at the Dunham School in Baton Rouge.

Although the offense will be without quarterback Lance Lacoste, who is starting at quarterback for Class 1A St. Mary's in Natchitoches, and All-Metro running back Moncell Allen, who is playing for Providence Day High School in Charlotte, N.C. Athletic Director Greg Battistella and Coach Barry Wilson have put together a five-game schedule and hope to find opponents to fill their open dates in weeks 6 and 10.

"The schedule is a little lower level than we're used to, but it's just great for the kids to be able to buckle the helmets again and for the coaches to be able to coach," Battistella said. "We had 350 people at the Holiday Inn Select (in Baton Rouge) for a meeting (discussing how and when school would reopen)."

Ten of 11 defensive starters will play, along with some of the offensive starters, including senior wide receiver Cass Hargis. Although Battistella would love for all of his players to be here, he understands their plight.

"Lance Lacoste has a great situation in Natchitoches, and he is with his family, so he is going to stay up there," he said. "We're having a little trouble communicating with Moncell. He has a new cell phone number, because his New Orleans number wasn't working, but we know he's in North Carolina, and we're tryingto get a hold of him."

After the Tigers face Fisher on Saturday, the remainder of the schedule, all on the road, includes Lutcher on Oct. 14, St. Charles Catholic on Oct. 21 and Salmen at Southeastern Louisiana's Strawberry Stadium on Oct. 28. Battistella is uncertain of the Tigers game against Helen Cox, scheduled for Oct. 1 at Hoss Memtsas, because he has not received a confirmation from the Cougars.

Also, they are trying to move the three games currently scheduled for Fridays (Lutcher, St. Charles and Salmen) to Saturday so the dates won't conflict with the students' class schedules. Regardless, they know they'll be playing Saturday in Lafitte.

"We're just glad to be playing football again," Wilson said. "We don't have everybody – only about 30 – but we have a chance to get back out there. This is a chance to give the kids a break from all this and to get their minds off this tragedy. I am excited about it, and we just gave the kids their equipment, at least what was dry anyway, and it's great to see them happy."

NOTE: Holy Cross is looking for an opponent with an open date the weeks of Oct. 7 and Nov. 4. For more information, contact Battistella at (985) 788-8219.

St. Tammany schools players few, far between

Coaches waiting as familes trickle in

By Marty Mule' and Tammy Nunez
Staff writers

Not only does football seem a little different in east St. Tammany Parish right now, but there aren't as many football players as there used to be.

On the first day of practice for public schools, more than half the athletes for the area's high school teams were missing in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

"Of course, a lot of families are just trickling back right now," said Northshore coach Frankie Jabbia. "We don't really know how many of our kids will eventually be back; maybe all, maybe not. All this kind of puts football in perspective, that it's certainly not the most important thing in the world despite all our emotions on Friday nights."

Jabbia said 37 Panthers from a roster of 67 were at practice.

"Whatever we have, that's what we'll play with," he said.

The Panthers were scheduled to play Ponchatoula on Friday at Northshore. But the game was moved to Ponchatoula because of damage to Northshore's facility.

Fewer than half of Pope John Paul II's 65 players practiced Monday. Thirty of the Jaguars' 65-man team have been out. PJP II will play Live Oak at 7 p.m. at Pope John Paul II on Friday.

"I'm glad," Jaguars coach Chris Lachney said. "I think it's important for us to play, to return to a degree of normalcy. Football will do that, and hopefully we'll be back at full strength (in numbers) before long."

Displaced Salmen, which will not be able to play at its damaged stadium, held a team meeting Monday. The Spartans, whose District 10-4A schedule was wiped out by Katrina, likely will not be able to play until Oct. 7.

"Maybe we'll be surprised," Salmen coach Jerry Leonard said."But I can't count on anything."

Pearl River coach Joe Harris worked with 34 Rebels from a team of 60 Monday.

"I think some of our kids are just getting back," Harris said, "so I'm not concerned at the moment."

The Rebels play at Loranger on Friday. West St. Tammany schools have struggled with communication as their athletes return home. Covington coach Darryl Graham said he has only been able to talk with about 15 of his players.

"I think our guys have done a good job of letting each other know what is going on," Graham said. "Word of mouth has worked I guess because these guys hang out together so much."

As for what to expect on the first day of practice, which was held Monday evening, Graham was less sure.

"I'm sure they're going to be rusty, but they also are excited to be out of the house and doing something they've worked so hard on."

The Lions are hosting Slidell on Friday in a District 4-5A opener at 7 p.m. pending repairs to the light poles. If the lights cannot be fixed, the game will be played at 6 p.m., Graham said.

Mandeville coach Rodney Corkern had one hope for Monday's first practice since the storm.

"I just hope we still have the kids we had," Corkern said.

Corkern had trouble contacting his players because of the cell phone and land line disruptions, but is also looking forward to taking the field again.

For the thousands of National Guardsmen patrolling the desolate and decimated streets of New Orleans, home is wherever help is needed.

SOME TAKE REFUGE in tents, others sleep in air hangars, more reside in vacated public school classrooms. For many there is no running water and no shower. Some have postponed college graduations to be here because of missed classes. Others make the sacrifice of being far from children and spouses. But all of the 25,000 National Guardsmen that we talked to — representing all 50 states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands — gave the same response when asked why they've come to New Orleans at the lowest point in the city's history: "We are here to help."

"I was glad to have the opportunity to help rather than watching things on the news," said Cpl. Eamon Graham of the Oregon National Guard. Graham's current "home" is a second-floor classroom at the Frederick Douglass School in New Orleans, where his National Guard unit is based. Members of his unit cleaned the mess left by residents who turned the building into a makeshift shelter, and repaired the damage done by vandals. Despite the lack of running water, "It's a great place to be living right now," Eamon said.

For Spc. Krys Jackson of the Illinois Army National Guard, the mission was more personal: She has relatives in New Orleans. Her grandfather was in the hospital when the hurricane hit. "I was here for five days before I found out that he'd been airlifted to Texas," she said. "If it weren't for the guard troops doing the airlifting, he wouldn't have escaped."

Their day-to-day routines are anything but routine — one day they may be clearing trees with chainsaws, the next day patrolling flooded or wind-sheared city streets by boat or by truck, the next day knocking on doors in search of God-knows-what. The personal toll is high, but so, says Master Sgt. Roger McBride of the California National Guard, are the rewards.

"I do this for selfish reasons," he said. "It's the good feeling I get from helping people."

MY STORM STORY

Hurricane Katrina: In their own words

"Never in a million years did we think we would have a storm surge like this. When the storm got really bad, the wind was bending 70-foot trees like plastic spoons.

"We went to a neighbor's house. The windows there were flexing with the wind's force, and when the electricity went out, I started walking to my house to get a generator. On the way, I saw a wall of water about a foot high rushing toward me. I decided to go for my boat, not my generator.

"By the time I got it off the trailer, the water had swollen to about 7 feet.

"We pointed the boat toward Almonaster Blvd. We saw coffins floating out of tombs . . . one on a church doorstep.

"At the Industrial Canal levee, I saw 18-wheelers (parked in a truck lot). A Peterbilt is a water-tight machine. I'm not a thief. I'm a mechanic. But I've got my family. I decide the water is only 3 to 6 feet high. I say to my family, 'Get in, or you're staying here.'

"We head to Chef Menteur (Highway). It looked like someone had put someone's town in a blender and dumped it out.

"I'm not sure how many days had gone by. We proceeded West. We stopped to sleep and shower in a hotel. When we came back out to the Peterbilt, it had been stolen. We had $500 in cash, and I bought a piece-of-junk Dodge van for $300. We spent $97 for gasoline. Three hours later, it blew up on the interstate.

"A street-sweeper towed us in after we stopped at Wal-Mart for some rope. We spent our last $100 on a cell phone. We called relatives from Lake Village (Arkansas) to come get us. Even the strangers here (at Wolf Creek Baptist Camp) treated us like long-lost relatives.

"I'll be back home as soon as they open up the highways, and if they don't, I know where I left my boat.

"It's not about what happened. It's about putting it back."

New Orleans means always having to say they're sorry

CHRIS ROSE

CHEVY CHASE, MD. — I am writing this from the house where I grew up. It's a thousand miles from New Orleans.

Could be a million, really.

I have come to visit my wife and children, who have settled here amongst my family and old friends in a place we know and trust.

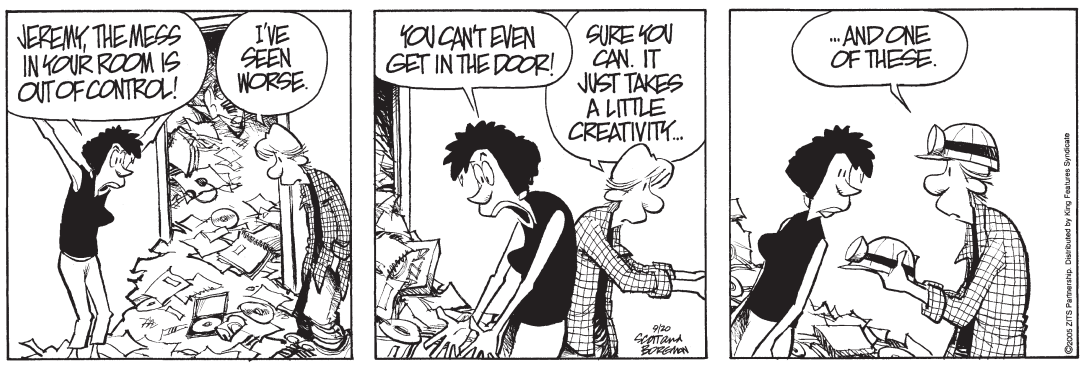
My gang, they live what looks like a normal life here now. School. Shopping.

Play dates and birthday parties. Next week, my wife says she's going to start going to the gym.

A normal life. Without me.

Life goes on, I guess. But it's hard to bond the disconnect between what life was like before Aug. 29 and what it's like now.

Talk about loose ends.



Don't get me wrong: Chevy Chase is an amazing place. It was a homey, professional-class neighborhood when my parents moved here in 1963 and is now a profoundly wealthy suburb of Washington, D.C., where famous people live.

It took a hurricane to make it happen, but now my family lives in the same ZIP code as George Will.

No fun playing 'the hurricane victim' game

ROSE, from C-5

That's almost funny.

It's impossible not to like it here. It's so clean and everyone is so educated and polite and everyone cleans up after their dogs and we pass three crossing guards on our walk to school.

Although the streets are familiar to me — I've come back many times over the decades — I can't help but feel lost here. Like I'm moving underwater.

After living in the specter of curfews and military troops and arson and desperate squalor, maybe for the first time in my life I get a hint of what post-traumatic stress really is. Low-grade, to be sure, but you feel it.

I don't recognize any of the kids and I don't know who the parents around me are and I suppose this happens to everyone who relocates to another city but I don't think "relocate" is really the word for what we did.

What happened was, our lives and social structures and friendships and classmates and easy routines were blown across the globe on one fateful morning and now everything is different.

Just like that.

My daughter, she runs into the gym for her homeroom exercises and she starts playing one of those crazy hand-clapping games with a little girl I've never seen before and who is that girl? What are they saying to each other?

I used to know the language and rhythm of her school in New Orleans but here, I stumble.

At the entrance to the school, there is a folding table set up where parents can contribute to a fund to buy backpacks and school supplies for the victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Victims. That's the mantle we wear now. And that sucks. In our lives — in all of our lives — the people we want to be are the rescuers in the boat, not the people plucked from the water, but that's what so many of us have become.

At my son's school, I was introduced to the teachers and administrators the other morning. "This is Jack Rose's father," they would say, and you could see it in their eyes right away: Oh, the Hurricane Boy.

Don't get me wrong, they're unbelievably generous and kind to us. In private, I cry when I think about what everyone here is willing to do, how much strangers here — everyone across this country, it seems — wants to help, wants to make us feel welcome.

But still, my son is the Hurricane Boy and that's not going to change overnight. In my hometown, we are the hurricane family. Evacuees, refugees, whatever.

When I am introduced as someone from New Orleans, people sometimes say: "I'm so sorry."

New Orleans. I'm so sorry.

That's not the way it ever was before, not the way it's supposed to be. When people find out you're from New Orleans, they're supposed to tell you about how they got really drunk there once, or fell in love there, or first heard the music there that changed their lives.

At worst, people would say: I've always wanted to go there.

But now, it's just: "I'm sorry."

Man, that kills me. That just kills me.

And by the time this runs in the newspaper, I'll be on my way back to the city, back to Sorry Town. And I'll leave my hurricane family behind here in what you could only call Pleasantville, and somehow I'll find the means to reconcile the two lives, the new and the old, the temporary and the permanent, a thousand miles apart.

It might as well be a million.

Not the biggest tale of hardship you're going to hear from this storm. Far from it. Just one man's journey. One guy wondering what the light at the end of the tunnel looks like.

Wondering where this all will take us. Wondering if any kids will come by our house on Halloween this year. Wondering who will set up their ladders on the corner where we always watch our Mardi Gras parades. Wondering who will be sitting under our shade tree at Jazzfest.

It's not premature to think about these things. They are the familiar — and very special — touchstones of our lives.

They are the city where I live. The city that exists, at this moment, as a fond memory.

In one of the few times the Saints got to Giants quarterback Eli Manning, Will Smith was flagged for illegal contact.

Displaced Saints are generous "hosts" with six turnovers in loss to Giants

By Mike Triplett
Staff Writer

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. – They've roamed this country for weeks now, evacuating to northern California, seeking refuge in south Texas, playing on the road at Carolina and at "home" in New Jersey.

And everywhere these gypsy Saints have gone, they've been enveloped in an aura that has signaled this is no ordinary team, and these are extraordinary circumstances.

That aura Monday night, however, was bad from the start.

This one just didn't feel right – even some of the supposedly welcoming touches, like having "Saints" painted across the west end zone at Giants Stadium, and the team from New Orleans rushing out of the tunnel last in their home-field black jerseys.

Then the Saints fumbled away their opening kickoff return – the first of six turnovers on this deflating evening.

And they approached a franchise record with 13 penalties for 92 yards on their way to a disappointing 27-10 loss to the New York Giants, evening their record at 1-1.

"We fed them on a platter, and they ate," Saints receiver Joe Horn said of a loss he called "embarrassing."

Their plight having landed them on a national stage in a prime-time, made-for-TV event, the Saints for the first time looked like a beleaguered team that has been bounced about this country, like the square white ball in the classic video game Pong.

Coach Jim Haslett and many of the players said they felt the same energy, emotion and enthusiasm before the game as they had one week earlier before an inspired season-opening win at Carolina.

But, said Haslett, "We just didn't control it very well this week."

And sure, several players took another opportunity to complain about being sent across the country to play their "home opener" at Giants Stadium. Quarterback Aaron Brooks called it "patronizing."

But they all said it was no excuse – certainly not for such a colossal collapse. None of the underlying factors could be blamed for this performance.

"You know, we take this thing day by day," Haslett said. "I've been in four complexes in four weeks, moving offices, three hotels, now an apartment. But that has nothing to do with what we did on that field today. We sucked on that field, if you want to know the truth.

"We haven't done that in a long time. I don't know if there was just so much buildup for this one game. It was just one game, and they built it up like it was the Super Bowl, for obvious reasons. But we just didn't do a very good job."

The pregame ceremony was riveting – stirring renditions of "America the Beautiful" from Irvin Mayfield's trumpet and the "Star-Spangled Banner" from Harry Connick Jr.'s voice and Branford Marsalis' sax.

And the accompanying relief efforts were much appreciated – Haslett's opening comments were actually a "thank you."

Wherever your rooting interests lie, and however you felt about NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue's decision to play this game on this night in this city, you'd have to agree this performance was a shame. A letdown.

It was the exact opposite of a week ago, when every break seemed to bounce the Saints' way, a magical force seemingly on their side.

On this night, the Saints could do no right. Every glimmer of hope followed by a more spectacular flub.

- That opening kickoff – Michael Lewis received the ball, ran 10 yards and pitched to Fred McAfee, who fumbled it away. Three plays later, the Giants led 7-0.

- The Saints' defense forcing a three-and-out late in the second quarter, only to give it right back with an interception

New York receiver Plaxico Burress had five catches for 64 yards in the Giants' 27-10 victory against the Saints on Monday night at Giants Stadium. Saints defensive back Jason Craft, left, had four tackles.

Saints should put debacle out their minds

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — Well, there's always time for a first.

Right, Jim Haslett?

"First time I'm taking a four-hour plane ride after a home game," said the coach of the 1-1 Saints.

One by one, Jim Horn, Aaron Brooks and Deuce McAllister talked about going back to San Antonio to "look at the film" so mistakes can be corrected.

You know what I say?

I say, burn the film.

It would only torment an already tormented football team.

And what will the film show?

It will show 22 penalties, 13 by the team that lost 27-10 before a crowd of 68,031 in Giants Stadium.

It will show a house of horrors.

It will show Joe Horn, stretching to get the football into the end zone and winding up fumbling it in for a touchback instead.

It will show John Carney, who beat the Panthers with a 47-yard field goal last week, hitting the left upright from 29 yards.

It will show Carney kicking a 21-yarder with time running out in the first half, but only after the offense, facing a first-and-goal at the nine, failed to make it a 21-14 game. Footnote: A dropped potential touchdown pass by tight end Ernie Conwell did not help the cause.

PETER FINNEY

Sadly, the film will show Michael Lewis suffering possibly a season-ending injury on a kickoff return.

"Look at it this way," Horn said, "the Giants beat us, but they didn't kill us. It's irrelevant where we played the game. We got our butts kicked. We got no excuses."

The film will show Brooks outgained Eli Manning in the air 375 yards to 165. But it will also show Brooks throwing three interceptions, half of his team's turnovers.

Looking into the immediate future, Brooks wasn't sure.

"It could wear down on us," he said about having to play 16 games on the road, "but it's something we have to find a way to deal with."

It took the NFL's vagabonds only a few seconds to discover New Jersey was not Carolina.

A week ago, the Saints opened with an impressive 9 ½-minute drive and a 7-0 getaway.

This time it was a fumbled kickoff and a 7-0 start by the Giants after a 10-yard drive.

And that wasn't all.

Inside Giants Stadium, the message board said: WWW.SaintsHurricaneFund.org.

On the field, it was something thrown by Brooks. Four plays later, the Giants led 21-7.

- A Brooks fumble and interception in the third quarter, when the "visiting" team's 21-10 lead was still within reach.

- Finally, an apparent meaningless touchdown pass from Brooks to Horn late in the fourth quarter. Only Horn fumbled as he reached for the goal line, the ball bouncing off the pylon and being ruled a touchback.

"We put ourselves in the hole right off the bat," defensive end Darren Howard said. "And we kept digging the hole with all those penalties and turnovers."

The running game, which propelled the Saints to victory at Carolina, and which was supposed to do the same week in and week out this year, was shut down handily by the Giants' defensive front – perhaps as devastating to the Saints' cause as all those penalties and turnovers.

After seeing his team gain 72 yards rushing on 22 carries, Saints center LeCharles Bentley fought the words as they came out of his mouth: "Yes, they won (the battle at the line of scrimmage)," Bentley said. "As much I hate to say it, they won the battle up front. They played us a little differently than we were expecting – a lot differently. And we didn't adjust."

Brooks made as many big plays as disastrous plays, throwing for 375 yards and a touchdown. But he said he and his teammates did not deliver in the red zone, time and again.

Horn and Donte' Stallworth combined to catch 17 passes for 284 yards – big numbers that didn't add up to much. Horn fumbled once, and Stallworth had one glaring drop deep down the field.

Five of the 13 penalties came on special teams on a night when everyone joined in the blame.

Tailback Deuce McAllister, who surpassed George Rogers as the franchise's all-time leading rusher, actually apologized to all those displaced fans this team had hoped to inspire, as the hope swept across the locker room that they could make up for this game.

"They beat us, but they didn't kill us," Horn said, promising the Saints would bounce back Sunday at Minnesota – their next trip to a faraway corner of the country. "We better."

"Like I told the players after the game," Haslett said, "We've overcome a lot more than that one game."

Saints tailback Deuce McAllister found little room to run against the Giants on Monday night. He was held to 47 yards on 15 carries.

Promising start takes ugly turn

FINNEY, from C-9

like WWW.SaintsSpecial-Teams.Ouch.

Haslett's special-teamers drew five of the 11 first-half flags following the gaffe on the opening kickoff.

As for Brooks in the first half, although he threw one pick, he had a couple of back-to-back drops and had six double-digit-yardage completions, including a 21-yard touchdown strike to Horn.

The biggest turnaround came with the Saints trailing 14-7, when Will Smith knifed through on third down to nail Manning for minus-eight yards, moving the Giants out of field-goal range.

Hold it. Illegal contact on Sedrick Hodge. First down Giants.

Two plays later, it was 21-7 after a 12-yard run by Tiki Barber.

After that, the Saints never got closer than 11 points.

"You can't get caught up in the emotion. I just like to apologize to our fans for the way we played. And I'd like to thank the NFL for all the money they raised for hurricane relief."

DEUCE MCALLISTER

Did the Saints get caught up in the emotion of last week's 23-20 upset of Carolina? "You can't get caught up in the emotion," McAllister said. "I just like to apologize to our fans for the way we played. And I'd like to thank the NFL for all the money they raised for hurricane relief."

It won't help Jim Haslett sleep any better, but look at it this way: A 27-10 "home" loss raised $2.4 million for the cause, for the scars Katrina left behind far, far away from the New Jersey shores.

It was a Queen-size party before the game

By Steve Politi
Newark Star-Ledger columnist

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — Queen Inertia is accustomed to jambalaya and crawfish, not sausage sandwiches. She prefers bars and jazz bands, not a parking lot and boom boxes. Usually, when the Queen shows up at a game for her beloved New Orleans Saints, she will arrive dressed in a full gold-and-black costume. Last night, she only had her tiara and scepter.

Everything else is back in her house.¶

Everything else is underwater.

"I evacuated with my New Orleans Saints earrings," she said, her fingertips touching the fleur-de-lis shaped jewelry, as she tailgated in the strange surroundings outside Giants Stadium. "I couldn't leave them behind."

Her real name, the one she uses in her temporary home in West Long Branch, is Jeanette Meyer. But to her Mardi Gras krewe, she is the Queen Inertia of the Mystic Orphans and Misfits. The Queen has partied before dozens of Saints home games over the years.

She has never done it in New Jersey.

No, this was different - for the Giants fans, for Saints fans, for the entire NFL. Two teams played a football game last night in the Meadowlands, but really, it was much more than that.

It was a fundraiser. It was a rock concert. But most importantly for the hundreds of Saints fans who found a way to get here, it was a distraction from the misery in their lives.

Imagine that. The Saints, a team so bad over the years fans have donned paper bags to home games, providing people with a rare moment of joy and hope.

"Hey, that's one of the things that makes New Orleans so resilient," said Paul Gelston, a city resident who helped organize a group of evacuees to attend the game. "If we can survive 35 years of being Saints fans, we can survive a little water in the house."

Gelston smiled. He knows many of the evacuees still do not know if their homes can be saved, or when - if ever - they would return to the city. But for one night, at least, they could regain a measure of normalcy in their lives with football.

He helped get tickets for about 20 transplants, some of whom he met while waiting for aid at the Red Cross in Montclair. The group included Albert Marshall, who has seven relatives from New Orleans living in his small two-bedroom house.

Their days are spent waiting in lines, filling out forms. His uncle, Edward Gabriel, needed his hearing aids and eyeglasses replaced. His niece and nephew, Kedra and La-Mont, needed new schools. Their homes are gone, but at least everyone is OK.

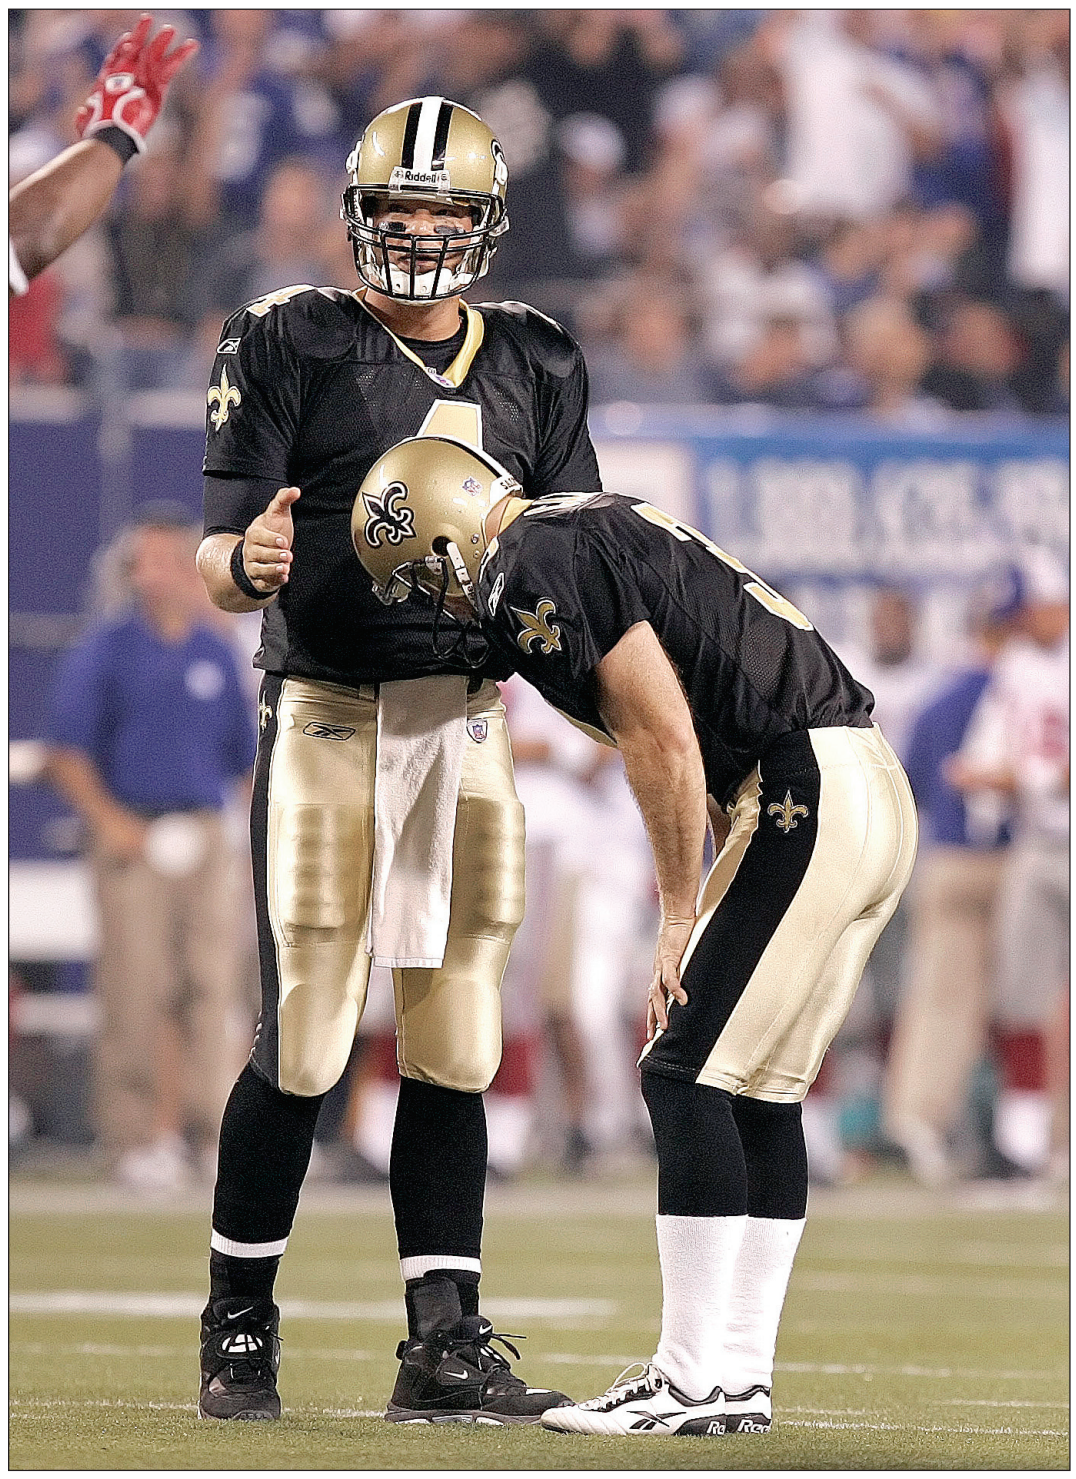
That was a concern for weeks after the storm. One relative who stayed behind spent two days on a roof, then another two days floating on an inflatable bed. Another was missing until last Sunday, and when Gwendolyn Thomas, the matriarch of the family, heard the news that he was OK, she passed out in church.

"This like a release," Albert Marshall said. "They've been going every minute since they've been here. This is a chance to take a break, relax, and take their minds off everything."

Yes, football. Yes, the Saints. They fumbled the opening kickoff? Of course they did. The Giants recovered and scored a touchdown? Of course they did. They have grown up with bad football teams. This team might not make the playoffs, but it still has become an inspiration.

Donyea Hoffman-Goodman has 33 members of the same family staying in her 11-bedroom Phenomenal Women Outreach Center in downtown Newark. They had no jerseys to wear, so they spent the hours leading up to the game makings signs with magic markers and construction paper.

Charles Acevedo drove up from Virginia to watch. He wore a hand painted T-shirt that read, "Katrina Took My Jersey." The jersey, he figures, is still in his closet back home. The problem is, the roof on his house collapsed, and the entire place is covered with sludge and mold.



"For a lot of us," said Brian Epstein, the Queen's boyfriend, "it was like a giant eraser came out of the sky and erased our lives. Just like that. I'm still numb."

Epstein lost his fishing business to the floodwaters. The Queen watched the casino where she works get washed into the one next door. Their house is still flooded. They came to West Long Branch, to stay with his parents and wait for a sign they could return. They are still waiting, and probably will be for months.

Until then, they make do. The Queen was walking through the parking lot when she heard the familiar sound of jazz music playing on a small compact disc player. Joe Pinto, a Hasbrouck Heights resident, welcomed them over for some food.

But the Queen and her friends came for the music. She lifted her scepter in the air and started dancing to the trumpets. She turned and smiled and let out a big laugh.

For a moment, her problems were forgotten. For a moment, in a parking lot a thousand miles away from Bourbon Street, Queen Inertia of the Mystic Orphans and Misfits felt right at home.

This was the way the night went for the Saints. Ordinarily one of the more accurate kickers in the NFL, John Carney missed a 29-yard field goal in the fourth quarter.

Manning coolly thwarts Saints

Second-year pro shows 'outstanding poise'

By Aaron Kuriloff
Contributing writer

Eli Manning played one of his best games as a professional Monday, completing 13 of 24 passes for a touchdown and no interceptions to lead the New York Giants past the New Orleans Saints 27-10.

Although Manning has yet to throw a touchdown pass outside Giants Stadium, he still got his first official road touchdown, since New York was technically the visiting team. He led touchdown drives of 10, 86, and 36 yards.

"He had outstanding poise, outstanding control," said Giants coach Tom Coughlin. "He managed the game very well. He didn't have an interception or a fumble. So, from that standpoint, he has improved."

Though the Giants scored all three of their touchdowns in the first half, Manning's best series came in the fourth quarter. With the Giants leading 24-10 but the outcome still in doubt, the New Orleans native and former Newman standout led a 14-play, 68-yard drive that consumed 6:47 and ended in a 30-yard field goal by Jay Feely.

"That was a big-time drive where we put some plays together well," Manning said.

Manning's teammates praised the second-year quarterback's effort, saying he looked better from one game to the next.

"He commanded the huddle," said defensive end Michael Strahan. "He commanded the offense. And he's only going to get better."

Manning said last week that, despite growing up in New Orleans, he had never played in the Superdome. But playing against the Saints held special significance.

"It was important for me, playing against the team I grew up rooting for," Manning said. "I went to all the games. It's the team my dad played for."

Tickets are good for any Saints home game

Lewis may have suffered torn knee ligament

By Aaron Kuriloff
Contributing writer

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — Saints ticket holders can use their seats to attend games at Tiger Stadium or the Alamodome, save their tickets for the 2006 season, or seek a full refund, under a ticket policy announced on the Saints Web site last week. Tickets can be applied for comparable seats to any of the team's remaining home games, in any combination the holder wishes, based on availability. Details on pricing and seat availability at Tiger Stadium will be released today. Though no announcement has been made concerning where the team will play in 2006, ticket holders who do not wish to attend Saints home games this year will have their tickets automatically credited to 2006, or they can receive a full refund – either by contacting their point of purchase, including Ticketmaster, or by writing the Saints at: New Orleans Saints Ticket Returns, c/o The Alamodome, 100 Montana St., San Antonio, Texas, 78203.

LEWIS INJURED: Michael Lewis, the former beer delivery truck driver who became a Saints wide receiver and return man, was taken from the field in the fourth quarter following an injury to his left knee. The initial diagnosis was a torn anterior cruciate ligament. Lewis, All-Pro in 2003, had just crossed the 30-yard line when his leg gave out and he collapsed near the 35. New Orleans' backup returner, Az-Zahir Hakim sat out Monday night's game with a hamstring injury. Wide receiver Donte Stollworth returned the game's final punt, for 27 yards.

Saints coach Jim Haslett said he didn't yet know the extent of Lewis's injury/ "It didn't look good."

4,271 THE HARD WAY: Running back Deuce McAllister, who came into the game needing 10 yards to pass George Rogers and become the Saints' all-time leading rusher, accomplished that with a seven-yard run early in the first quarter. McAllister, who was drafted by New Orleans in 2001 with the 23rd pick in the first round, became in 2004 the first Saint to rush for 1,000 yards in three consecutive seasons.

Rogers finished his stay in New Orleans with 4,267 yards. McAllister finished the game with 47 yards rushing, to give him a career total of 4,308 yards.

HENDERSON IN: A 13-yard hookup between Brooks and Devery Henderson helped the Saints gain a first down and move out of the shadow of their end zone midway through the second quarter. It also was Henderson's first NFL catch. The former LSU standout –he led the SEC in 2003 with 11 touchdowns – spent most of last season on the inactive list and was playing Monday night in only his second NFL game.

SWEET CHARITY: The teams gave more than a few hours of entertainment to those on the Gulf Coast Monday. Officials with the Saints, the Giants and the NFL Player's Association announced Monday that the three groups would donate a combined $2.4 million to Hurricane Katrina relief efforts. The Saints and Giants donated $1 million from the game's ticket receipts, the Giants added an extra $400,000 and the Player's Association added an additional $1 million on behalf of all NFL players. League wide, the NFL has donated about $11 million to Katrina relief.

Giants running back Tikki Barber pledged an additional $100 for every yard he gained during the game, and $500 for every touchdown. Barber, who during the game became the first player in Giants history to pass 7,000 career yards, finished with 89 all-purpose yards and two touchdowns, but failed to reach his minimum $10,000 pledge.

EXTRA POINTS: Michael Strahan's sack of Aaron Brooks late in the second quarter gave him 120 ½ for his career and made him the 11th NFL player to reach 120 sacks since the league started keeping the statistic in 1982… The Saints special teams committed five penalties in the first half … Cornerback Fakhir Brown did not play because of a knee injury

One common north shore quest: See the Saints

Rare circumstance sends fans scrambling for routine escape

By Tammy Nunez and Trey Iles

Each person who gathered in the smoky, dark confines of Buck's Black Jack Saloon on Highway 190 in Covington on Monday night had a varying tale to tell. But they shared the desire to see the Saints play the New York Giants on television despite cable outages and satellite blackouts.

The fans at Buck's found the game. They bonded over some of the only visuals on the north shore, cheap beer, agony from Saints miscues and frivolous penalties, and the instant bonding of a roomful of fans willing Saints success.

Buck's was just one of several places where north shore residents gathered and for a few hours tried to resume normal lives in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, watching the Saints stumble their way to a 27-10 loss.

Fans dressed in Deuce McAllister jerseys and Saints hats crowded into restaurants, many throughout the area serving only a limited menu.

The Slidell WOW Wingery Cafe offered John Sconza and wife, Kathy, two rare pleasures in one place in a city devastated by Katrina. They got to watch the Saints game and use the restaurant's wireless internet setup.

"It's kind of an escape for us,'" said Sconza, whose house in Eden Isles was flooded.

They weren't the only Slidell residents to use the restaurant as an escape. Restaurant manager Nick Nastasi, a Slidell High graduate, said fans started filling WOW at 5:30 p.m., an hour before the game.

"It was like this for the (Saints') first game,'" Nastasi said. "It was packed.'"

Lenus Jack, 35, did everything he could to see the game. When Hurricane Katrina wiped out his cable and Charter Communications proved unreachable, he put an express order in for DirecTV.

"I tried and tried, but I couldn't get the game, so I came (to Buck's)," Jack said.

Jack wasn't alone.

Roomates Steve Besnard, 22, and Chris Barbot, 23, lost cable service in the storm also, so they called the WOW Cafe and Wingery on Highway 21 and got there to secure a table. The pair was disappointed when the restaurant's cable feed cut off right before kickoff. It eventually returned, but not in time for them.

Several hundred Saints fans traveled to New Jersey and temporarily escaped the misery of Hurricane Katrina's aftermath to attend the Saints-New York Giants game Monday.

"When they couldn't get the game up, we came here," Besnard said.

A big sign reading "Saints on TV" called fans to Buck's like a siren in Greek folklore.

It drew 30-year-old Fred Wild, too.

"We got three refugees (from Algiers) staying with us and all they want to watch is flood stuff on TV. I'm like, that's great, but I need to watch the game," Wild said. "This place is great. The game is on, and the beer is cheap, just $3 for a Corona."

As the night wore on, there were fewer and fewer high fives exchanged by the hodge-podge at Buck's.

The Saints were undone by penalties, turnovers, and a defense that couldn't hold.

But at least the fans saw the game among others who had "the faith."

"I watched the game in Memphis last week and there were only about five Saints fans," Wild said.

"That surprised me because there were so many people from New Orleans there. I thought there would have been more Saints fans."

Throughout the north shore, standing-room-only crowds cheered when things went right for the Saints and grimaced at every bad play.

After the Saints were called for holding late in the first half, one fan at the WOW in Slidell wearing a McAllister jersey said, "Don't you (referees) know we're hurricane victims down here? Give us a break."

TEXANS FIRE COORDINATOR

The Houston Texans fired offensive coordinator Chris Palmer on Monday following the team's second straight loss. Palmer will be replaced by offensive line coach Joe Pendry, according to a source who asked not to be identified because the team had not yet made the announcement. Palmer, who has been the offensive coordinator since the team's inception, also called the plays. The Texans lost to Pittsburgh 27-7 Sunday after losing to Buffalo 22-7 in the opener. Houston has averaged the fewest yards (170.5), fewest passing yards (66.5) and points (7) in the NFL through its first two games. In Sunday's game, quarterback David Carr appeared to be confused and bewildered. He was sacked eight times, the most since the expansion year in 2002 and one shy of the most in the team's 50-game history.

VIKINGS GETTING NEW STADIUM

The Minnesota Vikings and Anoka County have agreed on a plan for a $675 million football stadium with a retractable roof in suburban Minneapolis. The sides intend to reveal how they want to pay for the stadium in a news conference today in Blaine, north of Minneapolis. "We've been working around the clock and we are just putting the finishing touches on the agreement," Vikings executive Lester Bagley said. Bagley said the deal calls for the football stadium as part of a broader development project. The county would seek permission from the state Legislature to enact a 0.75 percent sales tax to help pay for construction and ask for the state to chip in for road projects around the site. Last week, new Vikings owner Zygi Wilf held a series of meetings with top lawmakers, including Gov. Tim Pawlenty, about the stadium. At those meetings, he told the elected officials he was willing to contribute at least $250 million to the project.

AROUND THE NFL

New York Jets running back Curtis Martin has a strained right knee and his status is uncertain for Sunday's game against Jacksonville. Coach Herman Edwards said Martin was undergoing tests, and would wait for results before determining if he can play. Martin, who led the NFL in rushing last season, was injured in the first quarter but stayed in the game and finished with 72 yards on 31 carries. . . . Jacksonville quarterback Byron Leftwich apologized for his actions against Indianapolis and vowed to play against the New York Jets despite a strained groin muscle. Leftwich was caught on camera directing two obscene gestures toward Colts defensive line coach John Teerlinck during the Jaguars' 10-3 loss Sunday. . . . Oakland receiver Ronald Curry re-injured his right Achilles' tendon and will miss at least this week's game against Philadelphia and possibly more. Curry was injured in the final two minutes of Oakland's 23-17 loss to the Kansas City Chiefs on Sunday night and the severity of his injury won't be known until doctors get the results of his MRI exam. . . . Anthony Clement, a veteran offensive tackle who spent seven seasons with the Arizona Cardinals, signed with the San Francisco 49ers. To make room on the roster, San Francisco waived defensive back Dwaine Carpenter. . . . Carnell Williams arrived at Tampa Bay Buccanneers practice wearing a protective boot on his sprained left foot, but said he expects to play this week. . . . Seattle wide receiver Alex Bannister, a former Pro Bowl special teams selection, has broken his right collarbone for the third time in a year. His status for the rest of this season is unknown. . . . Jacksonville released receiver Chad Owens after the rookie fumbled two punts and mishandled another before getting benched in a 10-3 loss at Indianapolis. . . . Detroit cornerback Fernando Bryant separated his shoulder in the 38-6 loss to the Chicago Bears and will be out several weeks.

COLLEGE FOOTBALL

GEORGIA TECH QB OUT OF HOSPITAL

Georgia Tech quarterback Reggie Ball was released from the hospital Monday after being treated for viral meningitis. Ball became ill last week and spent two nights at Emory University Hospital. He missed a 28-13 victory over Connecticut. The junior has been cleared to attend classes today and be at practice in the afternoon, though his activity will be limited, Coach Chan Gailey said. It's too early to determine if Ball will be able to play Saturday against fourth-ranked Virginia Tech.

Robby Gordon spins into the wall at the NASCAR Sylvania 300 Sunday at New Hampshire International Speedway.

AROUND THE NATION

Michigan safety Ryan Mundy is expected to miss the rest of the season with a nerve injury. Mundy started all 12 games at free safety as a sophomore last season, and was expected to start again this year. He intercepted two passes and was fourth on the team with 51 tackles last season. . . . Oklahoma backup quarterback Paul Thompson will switch to wide receiver, Sooners coach Bob Stoops said. "He's an excellent athlete who's worked hard and we want the opportunity to get him on the field," Stoops said. "(Quarterback) Rhett Bomar has got four years in front of him and he's ahead in some areas right now."

AUTO RACING

GORDON, KAHNE AVOID SUSPENSION

Robby Gordon and Kasey Kahne avoided suspensions when NASCAR penalized them for road-rage incidents in New Hampshire. Gordon was fined $35,000 and docked 50 points in the driver standings for intentionally trying to hit Michael Waltrip's car during Sunday's race at New Hampshire International Speedway, throwing his helmet at Waltrip's car, and cursing during a television interview. Kahne was fined $25,000 and penalized 25 points in the standings for intentionally hitting Kyle Busch's car in retaliation for an earlier accident.

"There have been a growing number of incidents lately where drivers have taken matters into their own hands," NASCAR president Mike Helton said. "Such unsafe and inappropriate behavior has to stop. NASCAR will use whatever means necessary to stop it." Waltrip was fined $10,000 and 25 points for using an obscene gesture during the televised broadcast, and his car owner, Teresa Earnhardt, was penalized 25 points.

BASEBALL

AROUND THE MAJORS

Cincinnati Reds first baseman Sean Casey was examined by a spine specialist and cleared to participate in light physical conditioning, but there's no timetable for his return to the lineup. Casey, 31, was briefly knocked unconscious and suffered a concussion after a collision on the field in Friday night's game at Pittsburgh. He was taken off the field on a stretcher. . . . The Boston Red Sox called up reliever Craig Hansen, the team's first-round draft, from Double-A Portland. The right-handed closer from St. John's, selected 26th overall in June, signed a $4 million, four-year contract earlier this year.

The record was broken during the auction's seventh day, 2,216 horses into the 5,110-horse catalog for the sale, which runs through Sept. 26. IRVING, TEXAS — As much as the Washington Redskins would've settled for any kind of victory over the Dallas Cowboys, this one was especially sweet.

Mark Brunell passed to Santana Moss in stride for touchdowns of 39 and 70 yards in the final 3 minutes, 46 seconds, then the defense made it stand up, giving Washington a 14-13 victory over its top rival Monday night. The Redskins won for only the second time in 16 games against the Cowboys, their longtime NFC East rival, and for the first time at Texas Stadium since 1995.

The comeback was stunning because Washington hadn't crossed the Dallas 27-yard line until Moss' first touchdown, which also was the first of the season for the Redskins (2-0). The second one put the Cowboys (1-1) behind for the first time and silenced a crowd of 65,207, their largest since 1995.

The lure was partly Washington, but mostly a halftime ceremony featuring the induction of Troy Aikman, Emmitt Smith and Michael Irvin into the team's Ring of Honor. They were enjoying a great performance from Dallas' new-look defense and seemed only mildly irritated by Coach Bill Parcells' conservative game plan.

It didn't seem to be a big deal when Jose Cortez's second field goal pushed Dallas' lead to 13-0 with 5:58 left.

Then the Redskins – 0-for-their-past-25 games when trailing after three quarters - changed everything.

The touchdowns by Moss came 1:11 apart, so the Cowboys still had time to regain the lead. They seemed to be in good shape, when rookie Tyson Thompson returned the kickoff to the 48 after the first Washington touchdown.

A six-yard run by Julius Jones followed, then came two incompletions. Going for it on fourth down, Drew Bledsoe passed short to Terry Glenn across the middle, but he couldn't get the yards needed for a first down. After the stop, defensive lineman Joe Salave'a threw open his arms, leaned back and jiggled with delight, and cornerback Walt Harris bounced up and down as if on a pogo stick.

The Cowboys had one last drive, starting on their 21 with 36 seconds left. They got to their 41, then went to a desperate measure on their last play - Bledsoe passing to Jones and him lateraling to Glenn. He was tackled at the Washington 43, then rose to his knees and threw the ball up in disgust while the Redskins began celebrating perhaps the most satisfying victory in Joe Gibbs' second tenure.

It's the first time Parcells has lost a game with his team leading by 13 or more points in the fourth quarter, a streak of 77 games.

Brunell was 20-of-34 for 291 yards with an interception, but the most important thing was how he remained cool despite everything going wrong for 3 1/2 quarters. His first breakthrough was a 20-yard completion to James Thrash on fourth-and-2 midway through the first touchdown drive. That touchdown came on fourth-and-15.

Moss, acquired in an offseason deal for Laveranues Coles to be the Redskins' deep threat, caught five passes for 159 yards. Clinton Portis ran 17 times for 52 yards.

Bledsoe was efficient, but was never asked to do much more than hand off to Jones (22 rushes, 81 yards) and throw short passes. He was 21-of-36 for 261 yards and remained interception-free in his second go-round with Parcells.

He's being asked to manage games, not win them, which means few deep passes. His first came on the opening drive of the second half, when he used a flea-flicker to open up a 70-yard pass to Glenn for their first touchdown connection since they were teammates in New England. It was Dallas' longest play since October 2002, pre-Parcells.

Bledsoe and Glenn hooked up on a 43-yarder to set up Cortez's kick that made it 13-0.

Cortez, who made field goals of 41 and 33 yards, missed a 41-yarder on the opening series. The Cowboys also squandered a chance to try a field goal after getting a turnover in Washington territory in the closing seconds of the second quarter.

President picks Katrina inquiry chief

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — In appointing his domestic security adviser to investigate the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina, President Bush has selected someone with a prosecutor's reputation for tenacity who served at the upper echelons of the Clinton Justice Department.

But Frances Townsend's background wasn't enough to convince some Democrats that the president is serious about finding out what went wrong in the slow and muddled government response to the Aug. 29 hurricane that swamped New Orleans.

Democrats have complained that Republicans are attempting to control a congressional inquiry into the delayed pace of hurricane assistance, and Bush's selection of a member of his staff to lead the White House probe only heightened that criticism.

"The Bush administration can't investigate its own failures," a spokesman for Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said.

In an interview with CNN, Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., echoed those concerns. "How in the world can we get to the truth as to what went wrong with Hurricane Katrina, how can we really hope to discover the incompetence that led to all the human suffering and devastation if the administration is going to investigate itself?" Durbin asked.

But the White House said the appointment of Townsend would fulfill Bush's vow to review the post-Katrina response and figure out "what went right and what went wrong."

Bush last year appointed Townsend, 44, to reorganize the nation's intelligence services after the failures leading up to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Since then, she has been Bush's top homeland security adviser.

Her proximity to Bush's inner circle is all the more remarkable given that she began her career as a prosecutor in Brooklyn, N.Y., under District Attorney Elizabeth Holtzman, a liberal Democrat. She went on to prosecute mob cases in the U.S. attorney's office under Republican Rudolph Giuliani.

Although she once described herself as a lifelong Republican, Townsend came to Washington in 1993 to work in the Clinton administration, where she was described as a confidant and friend of Attorney General Janet Reno.

"She had the ability to get to the heart of the issue," Reno told U.S. News & World Report last year.

Reno appointed Townsend to head the Office of Intelligence Policy and Review, where Townsend worked closely with the FBI in securing wiretaps of terrorism suspects. The office was sharply criticized by the Sept. 11 Commission and the Government Accountability Office for failing to pick up on terrorism activity in the United States, and for neglecting to share what it did know with other agencies in the government.

Townsend was moved out when Bush was elected. She was reassigned to the Coast Guard, which after the Sept. 11 attacks played a central role in anti-terrorism efforts. Townsend soon found herself as a deputy on counterterrorism to then-National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice, a role in which she focused on blocking terrorist financing. Last year, with Rice's blessing, she became the top White House adviser on homeland security.

St. Bernard seeks to innovate to get insurance cash moving

By Jeffrey Meitrodt
Staff writer

Faced with a deluge of complaints about long delays in getting insurance adjusters to visit flooded homes in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, the National Flood Insurance Program announced Tuesday that it will do away with many of its usual requirements in order to speed the arrival of big checks to many victims of the catastrophic storm.

For owners of federal flood insurance, the announcement could mean the arrival of up to $250,000 in a matter of weeks, as opposed to months.

"Katrina is the largest flood disaster in our nation's history, and it requires us to take a new look at how we process flood insurance claims," said David Paulison, acting under secretary for emergency preparedness and response for the federal Department of Homeland Security. "Our mutual goal is to get families into the recovery process as quickly as possible."

Though flood insurance is backed by the federal government, it is sold by insurance companies, which also are responsible for handling claims. The maximum benefit for dwelling damage is $250,000.

Many insurance companies have been cutting checks for $2,500 to $5,000 to help displaced policyholders with their living expenses, but they have been reluctant to pay larger settlements without first having a property inspected by an adjuster.

That has frustrated many state and local officials, who say it is obvious that whole neighborhoods were wiped out by Katrina, and that the government should fork over the cash as quickly as possible.

"We had 100 percent devastation down here, and I haven't seen an adjuster yet," said Joey DiFatta, president of the St. Bernard Parish Council. "We need some relief for these people."

State Rep. Karen Carter, D-New Orleans, said the new policy "will permit people to move forward with their lives. This is what we have been begging for."

Louisiana Insurance Commissioner J. Robert Wooley said Tuesday's announcement "is a big piece of the puzzle."

Wooley said the announcement means that thousands of homeowners in Orleans, Plaquemines and St. Bernard parishes will find their claims put on a "fast track," enabling many of them to collect the full value of their policies without waiting for an adjuster to visit.

To determine which properties qualify for the expedited process, insurers will review aerial photographs, flood data and policyholder information.

"It will be possible to pay the policy limits through dialogue with the insured and without waiting for a site visit to adjust the loss," the announcement said. "The process may be used for homes that "have been washed off their foundations, affected for long periods by standing water or when only pilings or a slab remain."

Wooley said the new arrangement should help quicken the pace of recovery in the New Orleans area, but he said it doesn't solve all the problems. He said he is still working on an arrangement that would dramatically reshape the way private insurers are dealing with the crisis with their homeowners' policies.

As it stands, adjusters are spending most of their time on the fringes of the disaster, sometimes working on claims involving minor damage. Wooley said it is important to get those adjusters to areas that sustained the biggest losses as quickly as possible.

He wants to start with St. Bernard Parish, which Wooley visited last week.

"It's the worst situation you can think of," Wooley told state lawmakers last week, when describing his visit. "It will make you cry to see it. It's horrible."

To make sure that flooded homes don't become a health hazard, Wooley said, insurance adjusters should coordinate their activities, sending in armies of adjusters to the same neighborhood at the same time so that demolition of ruined properties can begin as quickly as possible.

As it stands, he said, adjusters are visiting homes in a "helter-skelter" fashion, visiting properties in Mandeville one day, and Slidell the next.

Insurers said they've never had to do business any other way, because gaining access to destroyed property usually isn't a major problem.

Wooley said local officials will have a key role in notifying residents of what is going on, and arranging for the demolition of properties in such a way that residents can go into the properties and remove any items of sentimental value.

If he can get the process started in St. Bernard, Wooley said, it could be used in other parts of the metropolitan area, including Plaquemines Parish and parts of Orleans Parish.

He said the process could help New Orleans avoid becoming a "trailer city," in which large numbers of displaced individuals are forced to live together while waiting for the adjusters to finish their work.

This way, he said, residents could move into their neighborhoods as soon as their homes are demolished, living in a trailer in their own back yard while construction of a new home takes place in front of them.

Congress asked to help cover added expenses

Kerry Laster is desperately seeking school buses. And teachers. And textbooks.

The superintendent of Concordia Parish schools is coping with nearly 500 new students infused into her poor, east-central Louisiana school district because of Hurricane Katrina's disruption of the education system in the New Orleans area.

"We don't even have any schools with this many students in it," Laster said Tuesday of the evacuees, who represent a 13-percent jump in Concordia's enrollment. "This is like I've added a whole school."

Across Louisiana, in every district outside the storm-damaged area, school systems have gotten swarms of students displaced by the Aug. 29 hurricane. With the help of volunteers and a hope that the state and federal governments will eventually reimburse them, they are overspending their budgets and finding resources on their own, many expressing feelings of neglect by state authorities in a time of crisis.

The federal Department of Education says about 372,000 students from Louisiana and Mississippi are unable to attend classes at their normal public or private schools because of Katrina. Louisiana's education department, which has assigned an agency liaison to each school district in the state, counted 39,518 student evacuees enrolled in Louisiana public schools Monday.

Thousands more evacuees have enrolled in private schools, not counted by the state education department.

The East Baton Rouge district, which includes the state capital, has absorbed the largest number of evacuees, with 6,313 new students bulging the normal student body by more than 13 percent.

Tensas Parish, one of the state's poorest and least populated parishes, is handling an increase of 253 students in a system that had only 918 before Katrina. That's a 29 percent increase, the largest of any district in the state.

"It has been a tremendous expense on our school system," said Arthur Johnson, Tensas schools assistant superintendent.

"Try to be creative" is the message to school systems from state schools Superintendent Cecil Picard, who is looking for long-term compensation from the federal government while advising local authorities to solve their immediate problems as best they can without state money.

Picard is banking on a federal Department of Education request to Congress for $1.9 billion in aid to compensate school districts, up to maximum of $7,500 per evacuee student. The agency has requested additional funds to compensate private schools and colleges.

In Louisiana, politics may decide how much the districts get. If the federal money is approved, it will flow to the state, which will have the flexibility to divide the funding between the districts serving evacuee students and the districts severely damaged by the storm. The state Legislature will have to be involved in allocations that involve the state's school funding formula, likely setting off a regional tug-of- war.

So far, communication between the state and the districts has been inadequate, officials in some parishes say.

"We can't get a straight answer," said Rochelle Cancienne, public information officer for the St. Charles Parish school district, which has accepted 1,313 evacuee students and will begin phasing them in Monday. "There's just a lot of unknowns right now."

The burden of new students is straining the St. Charles district's supplies of buses, meals, textbooks, teachers and classroom space. Destrehan High School alone has about 500 new students. Superintendent Rodney Lafon is planning to testify before Congress about the problems Thursday.

Resourcefulness and generosity have benefited many parishes. The town of St. Clair, Minn., has targeted Concordia schools for help with uniforms and other supplies. Calcasieu Parish schools have seen a "tremendous outpouring from the community" that will probably result in the parish not feeling a substantial financial impact, Superintendent Jude Theriot said.

Iberville Parish schools raised $12,500 in donations for uniforms, textbooks and desks, while also finding counseling for faculty and students dealing with grief. "We're going to find the money somewhere," Iberville Superintendent Martin Bera said.

Iberia Parish has picked up 50 to 100 new students per day in recent days, many of whom brought very little with them, said Superintendent Eugene "Sonny" Baudry Jr. But the "list just goes on and on" of people and organizations that have helped, he said.

Teachers were also displaced by the storm. Casper said 343 public school teachers who evacuated the New Orleans area have found jobs in other districts. But about 1,600 displaced teachers are looking for jobs, Casper said.

The number of evacuee students fluctuates day to day, and as public and private schools reopen their doors in the New Orleans area, the evacuee students are expected to stream back to their former homes.

It is possible that some Orleans Parish public schools could reopen as soon as January, said Steven Alschuler, a spokesman for Alvarez & Marsal, a consulting group that is trying to put the system back on its feet. Engineers and architects are assessing the condition of Orleans schools and will make a public recommendation on reopenings in about 10 days, he said. The health and safety of students and staff are the top priorities, he said.

The Jefferson Parish School Board is planning to reopen some undamaged schools Oct. 3.

Louisiana is not the only state hosting evacuee students. Florida has 6,000 Louisiana students, and Texas has "tens of thousands," said state education department spokeswoman Meg Casper.

Limited service expands at Armstrong International

Southwest starts up Tuesday; American, today

By Kate Moran
East Jefferson bureau

In yet another sign that normalcy is returning to Louis Armstrong International Airport, Southwest Airlines restored limited service Tuesday with two flights a day to Houston.

Southwest, the largest carrier to serve New Orleans, resumed service sandwiched between Continental, which restarted with four flights a day on Monday, and American Airlines, which will offer three flights a day to Dallas beginning today.

The lights were dark Tuesday at most of the restaurants and shops that line the airport concourses, and traffic remained far below the 174 flights per day that served the airport before Hurricane Katrina struck. Yet the slow trickle of passengers reported no glitches or higher prices as a result of the limited service. Many were heartened to see life returning to the airport.

"This feels good," said Juanita Grissom of Covington, as she collected her baggage after stepping off Southwest's first flight from Houston. "I'm delighted to be going home."

The airport expects United Airlines to resume flights in early October and US Airways to follow shortly after with limited service. By November, the airport could be supporting 30 to 40 flights per day.

But a spokeswoman for the airport, which relies on tourism to fuel demand, said it was not known when service would be restored to full strength.

"It depends on how the city rebounds," said Michelle Duffourc, the airport's public information officer. "As the tourism returns, so will the market and the number of flights."

Baton Rouge has absorbed some of New Orleans' air traffic in recent weeks. Continental instituted temporary service from New York to Baton Rouge and switched to larger aircraft to accommodate residents and relief workers who needed to travel in and out of Louisiana. But Duffourc said New Orleans already is matching Baton Rouge in traffic, and she did not expect the latter to siphon business from Armstrong International in the long run.

"New Orleans is always going to be the larger market," she said.

The Southwest check-in area was quiet Tuesday morning after the airline sent its first passengers to the terminal for the 11:30 a.m. flight. Station manager Dave DeMeyer said the first flight was sold out and the second one later in the day was two-thirds full.

DeMeyer said the airline will monitor demand during the next 10 days before deciding when to resume additional flights. However, a spokeswoman for the airline's corporate office said Southwest had no timeline for when it might bulk up service again.

"We plan to rebuild as the city rebuilds," said the spokeswoman, Paula Berg. "New Orleans is an important city to us. We have employees who are anxious to get back to work, but we don't want to give anyone false hope for when we will start more flights. We're looking at this much as we would look at a new startup city. We'll watch the trends."

Southwest has 400 employees who live in the New Orleans area, about half of whom work at the airport, and Berg said the company had to scramble to locate all of them in the wake of the hurricane. In addition, it has had to retool its entire flight schedule and call thousands of passengers who would be affected nationwide.

"It's not as simple as blocking out New Orleans," Berg said.

A Continental spokesman said the airline has scheduled flights only through February but would watch how demand unfurls. For now, the airline is running four round trips a day between New Orleans and Houston, and one round trip between New Orleans and Newark, N.J.

The airlines that are running had not yet made plans to abate service as Hurricane Rita moved toward the Gulf of Mexico, Duffourc said. Most airlines continue to fly until they face wind gusts of at least 30 mph, she said.

Armstrong International had only two of its four concourses open to passengers Tuesday. While those areas looked normal except for the shuttered stores, the airport estimates it will have to spend at least $55 million to repair damage from the hurricane. Temporary panels now cover sections that winds sheared off the roof of Concourse C, and several hangars were blown over. Duffourc said some sections of the airport still have to be investigated to make sure they are structurally sound. During the next 16 months, the airport expects to lose $70 million in revenue.

Stephanie Walker, director of operations for Hudson News, which runs newsstands and leases other retail space, said some businesses cannot reopen until damaged carpets are ripped up or mold caused by leaky ceilings is scrubbed away. Hudson News, which was open Tuesday, was selling week-old magazines because many of the local vendors that provide merchandise have not reopened.

Business, though, has been "wonderful," Walker said.

"It's picking up every day."

Preservation teams to inspect N.O. homes

Group fears huge loss of historic black buildings

By Susan Finch
Staff writer

All of the estimated 100,000 New Orleans houses and other buildings flooded by Hurricane Katrina will be carefully examined by teams of safety and other experts before consideration is given to demolishing any of them, a city government employee said Tuesday.

"The public is concerned about coming home and not finding their houses; that's not going to happen," Vieux Carre Commission Deputy Director Dan Brown told more than 50 preservationists who met in Baton Rouge to discuss ways to minimize loss of New Orleans' historically significant buildings and cultural sites.

Brown said every flood-damaged house or building in New Orleans, whether or not it is located in a historic district, will be visited by one of 100 assessment teams the city will field, and photographs of each building will be posted on the Internet.

"It will be a methodical, open process," he said.

The city's Safety and Permits Department is working with the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other federal agencies to establish inspection guidelines.

Also at the meeting, Karen Huff of the Society for Black History said she had spent the past six days tallying Katrina's damage to the city's "African-American landscape."

"We are looking at probably the largest loss of African-American buildings in the history of the United States," said Huff, adding that her group will be working to help limit the damage. Her organization is equipped to help residents salvage old photos and other artifacts damaged in the hurricane, she said.

"Try to imagine New Orleans without the canopy of trees that is almost as important as the architecture that gives New Orleans its character."
historic landscaping expert

National Trust for Historic Preservation President Richard Moe, whose organization helped host the meeting, said based on his tour of the city, he's confident that wholesale loss of New Orleans' houses can be avoided, especially if measures pending in Congress win approval. One would give owners of historic homes a 30 percent tax credit against qualified expenditures to repair storm damage, he said.

Homes weren't the only Katrina victims to elicit concern from meeting participants. Susan Turner, an expert in historic landscaping, urged FEMA to keep New Orleans' trees in mind in its planning.

"Try to imagine New Orleans without the canopy of trees that is almost as important as the architecture that gives New Orleans its character," she said.

Mary Elizabeth Paltron, a lawyer who heads one of New Orleans' many neighborhood organizations, said it's vital to bring homeowners and renters into the discussion of what happens next in the city.

"Get them involved on a regular basis, please," she said.

When you needed us...

Among the thousands of stories of heroism, survival and ingenuity that have come out of Hurricane Katrina, one that will resonate within our community for years to come is the story of how EJGH's doctors, nurses and staff pulled together to provide constant care to our patients, and the people of our Parish.

While the media was filled with horror stories of hospitals in crisis, EJGH stayed FULLY operational and self sufficient throughout Katrina and during the trying days in her immediate aftermath. Not only did EJGH continue to care for our patients, our staff reached out to the community and provided necessary medical care to evacuees on I-10 and the surrounding area, even evacuating an entire nursing home at one point.

We never lost power or hope as everyone pulled together to provide quality care to those in need. EJGH set up an emergency pharmacy providing necessary medicines, free of charge, to anyone needing to fill a prescription.

Now, as residents reclaim Southeastern Louisiana, our work continues. Already, we have provided more than 33,000 immunizations to local residents, fire fighters, disaster relief workers and first responders. ## Pump repairs just a drop in the bucket

By Martha Carr
Staff writer

The east bank of New Orleans may not have safe tap water for up to two more months, Sewerage & Water Board officials revealed Tuesday, further jeopardizing plans to begin a staggered repopulation of unflooded Uptown neighborhoods and the French Quarter.

Hurricane Katrina decimated New Orleans' water, drainage and sewer systems, and officials said they are working aggressively to restore services as quickly as possible, but the job is one of unprecedented proportions.

The road to recovery was complicated Monday when New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin ordered an evacuation of the sparsely populated city, fearing that even minimal bad weather from Hurricane Rita could overwhelm the already beleaguered infrastructure.

Algiers residents who had returned to their homes were told to leave.

Uptowners who had hoped to return this week were asked to put off their plans indefinitely.

S&WB Executive Director Marcia St. Martin said Tuesday that she is making plans to staff all operable pump stations if Rita threatens, as long as it is safe for employees. If it appears workers may be at risk, they will be moved to the city's water purification plant off Claiborne Avenue until the storm passes, then sent back to their posts, she said. Many of the city's pump stations have only recently come online.

Crews also worked Tuesday to repair the roof of the city's power plant on Claiborne Avenue in preparation for Rita.

During the height of Katrina, a fire erupted at the plant when winds blew in a window and rain ignited electrical equipment. It was contained by employees armed with fire extinguishers.

The power plant was flooded two days later, shutting down all water, drainage and sewer systems except for those stations with backup generators. It was the first time in the water board's century-long history that there was an almost complete failure of all systems.

No one wants a repeat performance, St. Martin said.

But the water board is facing other problems. Only 430 of the agency's 1,200 employees have reported back to work, requiring that the many of the same employees who stayed on site for Katrina remain in place for Rita. The agency also lost its entire $35 million fleet of vehicles when Katrina flooded the maintenance facility on Peoples Street. FEMA has authorized the S&WB to rent vehicles, but not all have arrived, St. Martin said.

Fortunately, much of the slack has been taken up by private contractors who have been hired on an emergency basis. Most, among them Boh Bros. and Drennan Construction, have held contracts with the S&WB in the past and are familiar with the city's systems, she said.

"What the public really needs to know is that nothing will be abandoned," she said. "I'll be here. We'll all be here."

Huge task ahead

Barring further damage from Rita or subsequent storms, the water board is still facing a huge task in rebuilding the city's infrastructure.

While the east bank water purification plant is operational,

Katrina caused untold damage to the 1,600-mile maze of underground pipes that carry water to homes and businesses. Lines were snapped, cracked and busted all over town when trees were uprooted, houses wiped off their slabs and fire hydrants toppled.

Floodwaters 20 feet deep also destroyed the only wastewater treatment plant that services the east bank, located on Florida Avenue near the St. Bernard Parish line. Repairs to that facility could cost $156 million and take nine months, during which time the city has no other alternative than to send untreated sewage generated west of the Industrial Canal into the Mississippi River, St. Martin said. East of the canal, sewage may have to be sent to Lake Pontchartrain through a newly engineered bypass system or possibly through open drainage canals, officials said.

"We are currently working with the EPA on how to collect sewage and dispose of it," she said. "We are trying to see if there is any way to do any basic treatment at the end of the pipe, but we don't know yet."

As for water, it is flowing through the taps on the east bank, but is not suitable for washing hands, bathing, cooking or drinking unless boiled for three to five minutes. Officials warn that harmful bacteria could be present from floodwaters or muck that has infiltrated broken pipes, and that residents run the risk of catching a range of intestinal illnesses if they consume the water in any way.

The West Bank water purification plant suffered minimal damage and drinkable water has been restored in Algiers. The plant is operating at full capacity, and is supplying FEMA tankers around the clock with potable water that is being trucked to different sites in the CBD where relief workers and government officials are being housed, St. Martin said. Sewage also is being successfully treated by the West Bank sewer treatment plant, she said.

Pipe repairs under way

This week, the board overcame the first major obstacle to repairing the water system: getting rid of the floodwaters.

Now, St. Martin said, contractors will work simultaneously making pipe repairs and removing mounds of debris and hulking trees that are blocking crews from the underground pipes. Once enough holes are patched, the board can chlorinate and flush out the system, then test for chemicals and bacteria.

Finally, the state Department of Health and Hospitals must certify the water quality.

Until a significant number of breaks are repaired, normal water pressure cannot be restored. The board now is pumping out millions of gallons to a handful of customers, and it's all flowing into the ground through breaks in the system, which is acting as a sieve, she said.

On the sewer side, only one of the city's 65 pump-and-lift stations, which move sewage through a series of underground pipes to the now-defunct wastewater treatment plant, is operable. All were flooded, St. Martin said, and will take time to repair. Many also will have to be rerouted to bypass the plant and dump sewerage directly into the Mississippi River.

The agency's goal is to repair the stations in the zip code areas that the mayor is aiming to reopen in time for re-entry by residents, St. Martin said.

"The Corps said the city would be dry in October, and it's nearly dry now," she said. "Same goes with water and sewer. We intend to beat the projections we've set for ourselves."

S&WB workers wishing to return to work should call (877) 863-9405. A tent city has been established to provide workers with food, shelter, sanitary and laundry facilities.

Blanco orders state to tighten its belt

Hiring, non-storm travel expenses are frozen

By Jan Moller
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — With state revenues expected to take a drastic hit from the damage caused by Hurricane Katrina, Gov. Kathleen Blanco ordered state agencies Tuesday to freeze travel and new hiring and to stop spending money on supplies and major repairs.

Blanco's executive order, signed late Monday, came five days after she announced the fiscal belt-tightening in a rare joint session of the Legislature and more than three weeks after the storm laid waste to much of southeast Louisiana's tax base.

State budget officials won't know for months exactly how revenues will be affected by the storm. "It's obviously a ton of money," said Greg Albrecht, the chief economist of the Legislative Fiscal Office, who said he expects to have ballpark estimates to release when the Joint Legislative Committee on the Budget meets Friday.

Administration officials said that the executive order is an "initial step" expected to save taxpayers $30 million to $50 million, and that more cost-saving measures are likely once the state gets a better handle on the extent of the budget hit.

The directive makes exceptions for several agencies, including State Police, the Department of Corrections, and for travel and other expenses related to the Hurricane Katrina recovery effort. It also allows employees of the Office of Tourism and the Department of Economic Development to continue "all travel associated with promoting or marketing the state of Louisiana and/or its products."

The spending freeze also does not address several large items included in the $18.7 billion budget approved by the Legislature in late June, such as $37 million in pet projects requested by individual lawmakers for their districts and $16 million for projects controlled by the governor's office in urban and rural district.

Routine field travel by the Department of Public Safety and Corrections, the State Fire Marshal, the members of the Board of Elementary and Secondary Education and several other agencies also will be allowed. Other agencies can still hire new workers or buy equipment with written permission from the Division of Administration.

Although the state has already spent hundreds of millions of dollars in storm expenses that were not in its budget, much of that money is expected to be reimbursed by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Several state agencies already have begun tweaking their budgets in response to the storm. At the Department of Health and Hospitals, Secretary Fred Cerise ordered agency employees to restrict spending on items that are not reimbursable by FEMA.

Automobile destruction likely tops 200,000

For many, insurance won't replace cars

By Rebecca Mowbray
Business writer

If you lost a car in Hurricane Katrina, you're not alone.

State Police estimate that more than 200,000 cars were lost in Louisiana. So far, State Farm Insurance, the largest insurer in Louisiana, has recorded 48,140 auto insurance claims in Louisiana, 62 percent of State Farm's auto insurance claims from the four states affected by the storm.

"I would imagine those numbers will continue to rise," said Fraser Engerman, a spokesman for State Farm.

The owners of those 200,000 cars are likely to be reaching into their own pockets to buy new ones.

Basic liability insurance, the kind that's required by the state to protect drivers against hitting another vehicle, or collision coverage, which covers a car if it hits something regardless of who is at fault, won't cover losing a car in a storm.

And if the car was parked on its owner's property when it was destroyed, a homeowner's insurance policy is unlikely to help. "Homeowners insurance excludes losses to automobiles," said Michelle Levy, spokeswoman for Farmers Insurance. State Farm and Allstate, the state's second largest insurer, agree.

Those with comprehensive auto insurance are likely to fare the best. Comprehensive insurance, which is often required if a car is financed, covers damage from floods, fires, theft, vandalism and civil unrest – essentially any type of damage not caused by a collision.

The Louisiana Department of Insurance doesn't track what percentage of Louisiana vehicles carry comprehensive insurance, but Loretta Worters, vice president of the Insurance Information Institute, a trade association sponsored by the property-casualty insurance industry, said many people don't carry comprehensive insurance because it's too expensive.

Most people drop comprehensive insurance by the time their car is five to seven years old, Worters said, because the value of the car usually is not worth the cost of the insurance.

But even with comprehensive insurance, many Louisiana drivers are likely to face out-of-pocket expenses to replace a vehicle. Comprehensive insurance pays according to the value of the car that was totaled, not the amount of the loan that bought the car or what it would cost to replace the car.

"It would always be what the (Kelley) Blue Book value of the car is," Worters said. "The Blue Book value may not be the same as what it would cost you to replace it."

So if a person bought a car for $25,000 two years ago, a comprehensive auto insurance policy might pay only $20,000 for a flooded car because car values depreciate quickly. If a person had a loan for that $25,000 car, the insurance might not cover the amount remaining on the loan.

"It's not necessarily replacement of your loan cost. It's replacement based on the value of your automobile," said Bobby Ann Clark, spokeswoman for the state insurance department.

That is, unless a driver has supplemented the comprehensive policy with something called "gap insurance," which, as the name implies, fills any gap between the value of the car and the cost of replacing it or paying off the loan.

But the good news is that the Federal Emergency Management Agency might be able to help where insurance leaves off.

Mike McCormick, a FEMA spokesman, said that if a person receives housing assistance from the agency and still has unmet financial needs, the application is forwarded to the U.S. Small Business Administration, which handles disaster loans for FEMA. Loans granted through the SBA are low-interest loans. McCormick said some of that money can be used to replace a car.

If a person fails to qualify for a loan through the SBA, the application gets kicked back to a FEMA grant program dealing with unmet needs. As much as $4,400 is available through that program for replacing transportation lost during the storm. But McCormick said disaster victims might not be able to use that money toward an expensive car because FEMA's role is to restore people's basic capacity to live their lives, not to replace luxury items.

The Internal Revenue Service also offers relief. People can claim a tax deduction for things such as cars by amending this year's tax return or filing the damage on next year's tax return.

Data on powerful hurricanes limited

LEVEE, from A-1

But that estimate is a piece of guesswork based on old data that experts say underestimates the risks in some spots.

Even if accurate, the risk estimate says that statistically, the long-term likelihood of a flood overflowing the levees is not significant – in New Orleans, for example, it was estimated at 10 percent in a 30-year period, the current lifespan of the levee project.

Some areas within the levee system have always been more likely to take a hit from hurricane storm surges than others, corps engineers say. Among those are the hardest hit areas of New Orleans' Lower 9th Ward, eastern New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish. Katrina's storm surge washed over levees to the east of the city and put those areas under water in a matter of hours. The hurricane levee intended to protect St. Bernard was all but destroyed.

Corps officials say that Katrina's powerful storm surge would have overwhelmed all but the highest levees and that their risk estimates are used mainly to justify their financing requests to Congress as required by law.

But the flaws and differences in flood risk built into the current levee design will likely have to be addressed when the levee system is rebuilt and upgraded to defend against the major storms, something that President Bush promised in his speech in New Orleans last week.

"They really need to re-analyze how to rehabilitate the levees using a current risk-based analysis. That can be easily done, that's what needs to be done. They really have to take all the calculations and weave that into a new design," said Lee Butler, an engineering consultant and former corps computer analyst who found possible deficiencies in the corps' levee designs in a study he did for The Times-Picayune.

For that to happen, though, Congress would have to get involved. Corps project manager Al Naomi said that the current congressional mandate doesn't allow for such variations.

The corps based its levee design on a fictional, meteorologically inaccurate "standard project hurricane" devised in the 1960s, based on characteristics of past storms that had flooded the city. In the 1990s it used computer models to analyze the system. They showed that the levees could protect the city against a fast-moving Category 3 or weaker storm, but could fail if struck by a slow-moving Category 3 storm or something stronger.

But that is a crude way to look at the problem, experts say. The strength categories of the Saffir-Simpson scale used by meteorologists are based on wind speed – not the storm surge flooding that poses the most serious threat to the New Orleans region. Hurricanes come in all sizes and move at different speeds. Some Category 1 or 2 storms can cause more severe flooding than Category 3 storms, for example.

"The storm category characterization is too simplistic. It's as simplistic as the color code for terrorism alerts," Butler said.

The clearest example of that is that some areas inside the system have turned out to be significantly riskier than others.

The reason for the differences is geography. On open water, a hurricane storm surge is shaped like a giant dome. When that dome hits a low-lying coastal area, it rises and runs into a varying landscape of marshes, lakes, levees and other man-made structures. Some of those areas are naturally more exposed to storm surge waters than others – and more likely to be inundated.

The corps breaks it down this way: The West Bank has less than a 1 in 500 chance of being flooded by a storm surge in a given year.

For central New Orleans and the east bank of Jefferson Parish, the figure is about 1 in 300. Flooding is likelier because those areas front Lake Pontchartrain, which is open to storm surge water flowing in from the Gulf of Mexico.

In the Lower 9th Ward, eastern New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish – areas quickly swamped by Katrina – the corps' figure is 1 in 200. The odds of flooding are higher because the areas are more exposed to the Gulf of Mexico than anywhere else in the region. They are closer to marshes, Lake Borgne, and the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet, all direct conduits for storm surge water from the Gulf.

But there is evidence that the risk is even greater. The levees in that area come together in the shape of a "V." Computer modeling shows that a large storm surge moving into such a confined space will rise unusually high, something not accounted for in the corps' risk estimate.

Butler's 2002 analysis, a rough estimate based on a computer projection from historical flooding in the area, showed that the risk of levees along the eastern edge of St. Bernard being overwhelmed was closer to 1 in 100 each year – double the corps' estimate.

Such numbers make the risks seem small. But if it's calculated over decades, it grows considerably. A 1 in 100 chance in a given year rises statistically to 33 percent over 40 years – the kind of time scale that governments and engineers need to think about if they want protections to last.

But it's not clear the corps can even take such statistics into account in its designs. Naomi said the mandate from Congress calls for the entire region to be protected from the same strength of storm

"All things being equal, you still have the same level of protection wherever you are" within the system, Naomi said. The levees protect against a certain maximum storm surge height: 11.5 feet.

The corps isn't authorized to adjust for variations in the landscape that make severe hurricane flooding a more frequent occurrence in some areas. Building higher levees in those areas would conflict with the corps' legal mandate.

"I can't go above it by law," Naomi said. "That's what I am authorized to do. Anything above that means I have to spend money that Congress specifically authorizes for that purpose. Only then we can go build it. It's not simple."

Another problem for corps officials is accurately predicting the risks. Engineers use a combination of data from past flooding and computer modeling to make estimates. But because powerful storms are rare, it's hard to get accurate projections because there isn't much data.

"Look at the stock market. It's as if you had only two years of data to make a decision versus 50 years of data," said Leon Borgman, a retired professor of geology and statistics at the University of Wyoming who specializes in flooding projections. "Fifty years allows you to catch trends, look at some of the big depressions. If you just had two years of data, you are the mercy of what happened in those two years. With a levee, instead of two years, we've got a century. But we've got only a dozen events of real significance to go by."

Data from Katrina's flooding will be added into future calculations, Borgman said, and that will produce results showing the risks are slightly higher than previously projected.

Identity theft claims rise as relief doled out

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — About two dozen inquiries about identity theft have surfaced in the flood of paperwork spurred by Hurricane Katrina relief efforts, the state attorney general reported Tuesday.

No arrests have been made on identity theft charges, but the complaints are still under review.

Isabel Wingerter, director of Attorney General Charles Foti's Public Protection Division, said identity theft is now the most prevalent type of complaint submitted by Katrina victims.

In the days after the hurricane, the office logged 1,263 complaints of price gouging, which were investigated, Foti said. Some were dismissed as unfounded, and others are being reviewed, he said.

"It never ceases to surprise me how these things come in waves," Wingerter said. "We go from one issue to another."

First, she said, the calls dealt with price gouging. Now identity theft has surfaced, mainly among people filing claims for federal relief who find that their names or Social Security numbers already have been filed with federal officials by someone posing as a Katrina victim.

"Most people are applying online," she said. "Then they get the message that their applications have already been submitted."

The next batch of complaints, she said, will probably center on contract fraud or shoddy repair work by crews hired to repair homes and businesses damaged by Katrina.

Wingerter said anyone who is a victim of identity theft must file a police report with local police or with investigators from Foti's office. The attorney general's office will then notify federal officials, such as the Office of Homeland Security's inspector general, about the possible fraud.

People who think they have been victims can call Foti's consumer protection hotline toll-free at 1-800-351-4889 or visit www.ag.state.la.us.

In the meantime, the victim should notify credit card companies, credit bureaus, banks and other financial institutions, mortgage companies, landlords and other creditors of the theft.

Foti said of the 1,263 price-gouging complaints his office has received, 818 involved service stations that customers felt charged too much for gasoline.

He said his office is looking into other complaints and meeting with the service stations about possible refunds.

He said his office has also issued a subpoena to a small oil company, which he did not identify, regarding allegations it overcharged customers.

He said his office has also received 172 complaints about hotels overcharging Katrina victims, 73 for stores overcharging on food items, 69 dealing with price gouging on generators and 72 dealing with overcharging for housing or real estate.

Foti said as an added safeguard for donors who contribute to relief efforts, he has put into effect emergency rules – effective Tuesday – that require all charities that collect money for hurricane victims to register with his office. They must provide the organization's name, location, how much has been collected and distributed, and detail how much of the collected money goes to administrative overhead costs.

Evacuees are offered relocation to Arkansas

military base. But Harris County, Texas, officials, who absorbed 27,100 evacuees at local shelters during the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, said ordering the remaining 4,000 out was for their own safety. The move also would free up manpower to take care of the area's own residents as the storm approached, they said.

Only 240 evacuees had accepted the offer by Tuesday afternoon; many others decided to find apartments or shelter elsewhere, officials said.

"If they want to go somewhere else, they are free to do so," said Coast Guard Lt. Joe Leonard, who has been in charge of the 21-day effort to shelter evacuees at Reliant Park and the George R. Brown Convention Center.

On Tuesday, 10 commercial planes took evacuees from Houston to Fort Chaffee. Leonard said he expected that the last evacuees choosing to go to Arkansas would be flown out today. About 40 who were afraid to fly were taken to the base by bus.

As Louisiana residents learned that Hurricane Rita was threatening the Texas coast, many showed obvious signs of post-traumatic stress. Some stood in front of the Reliant Arena with their bags, unsure where they were going but determined not to be shipped away to Arkansas. Others stood in long lines at the makeshift U.S. Post Office, waiting to change their address to alert family members of their next Bob Muir of St. Bernard says he made arrangements last week to go to Corpus Christi, Texas — and he was still going, despite the threat of Hurricane Rita.

"I don't have a choice," said Wayne Sylvester, a 9th Ward resident who chose to go to Arkansas. "If I were to stay here, where would I live?"

Three weeks was not enough time to recover from the storm, Sylvester said. "I've been through so much," he said, wearing an "I Survived Katrina" T-shirt. "I'm tired. It's just so hard."

"It's time to go," said Maurice Brown of Violet, who found an apartment Tuesday.

"We had notice that everybody had to leave," Brown said. "It's not like this snuck up on us."

Brown said he used money he received from the American Red Cross and the Federal Emergency Management Agency to help him.

"People can't stay here forever," Brown said. "They got to realize that. They have to move on."

On Tuesday, residents could be seen packing up the possessions they had managed to accumulate during their stay. They used trash bags, boxes, suitcases and grocery carts to haul away their belongings.

Although they were told late Monday that the Reliant Arena would be vacated by Tuesday night, several evacuees still were in their bed clothes at noon.

Volunteers from the Red Cross and other agencies gingerly prodded them to make a decision.

Roy Grant said he would take his chances in Baton Rouge with his wife and two children.

"It will be an old Army base in Arkansas," Grant said. "That's way too far."

Grant said he was told if he did not go to Arkansas, he would be on his own.

"We are practically on our own now," he said. "Everybody has a lot of tension. They're frustrated."

In addition to the one-way plane ride to Arkansas, flights to and job opportunities in many cities across the nation were posted throughout the shelter.

Puncture wounds, falls are common

INJURIES, from A-1

beer," said Crosby, a 52-year-old Gretna resident.

After eleven days and no tetanus shot, however, Crosby lost two toes to infection and gangrene, said Dr. Brian Cain of West Jefferson Medical Center in Marrero.

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, residents returning to wrecked homes and streets without traffic signals are showing up at clinics and hospitals with all sorts of injuries that, in other times, would be less common. Rusty nails puncturing feet, ribs broken from amateur repairers falling off roofs and infections from untreated mosquito bites are among the complaints, along with stress and dehydration. While patients with chainsaw injuries — usually a common affliction seen at emergency rooms after a hurricane or major storm — haven't begun to show up en masse, physicians say it's only a matter of time.

Crosby said he thinks he stepped on the nail while walking over storm debris a few days after Katrina struck the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29. It punctured his right foot between two toes. A diabetic, Crosby has limited sensation in his feet and didn't know the wound was that serious.

"Don't wait to get treatment. That's my only regret."

ELMORE CROSBY, who lost two toes to infection after stepping on a nail from Katrina debris

Dr. Frank Culicchia, a West Jefferson neurosurgeon, has treated five fallen roofers in one week, including one who died from massive head injuries and another who was paralyzed from the waist down.

"It's very dangerous," Culicchia said. "If I've seen five people in one week, imagine how many other injuries are out there that didn't come to the emergency room."

He said homeowners should leave roof repairs to professionals.

But even the slightest scratch could turn into a big concern.

"Simple cuts can become full-blown infections," said Cain, recalling a New Orleans police detective who picked up a severe infection from walking on a blistered foot through floodwaters.

At risk are not only the returning residents, but the remaining rescue workers, law enforcement personnel and anyone else who slogs through contaminated muck, Cain said.

"Don't wait to get treatment," Crosby said Tuesday from his hospital bed at West Jefferson. He was treated only after a friend suggested he get a tetanus shot. "That's my only regret."

Disease also can catch a ride into the human body via mosquitoes — either through bites that become infected or directly from the bugs themselves.

"We don't know what they've been feeding on in this toxic soup," said Kerry Jeanice, clinical manager for the emergency department at West Jefferson Medical Center.

"Animal encounters," a categorical catch-all Jeanice uses to include mosquito, ant, dog and snake bites, as well as cat scratches, are on the rise, he said. Dog bites, in particular, have been pretty nasty, he said. Reports of roaming packs of wild dogs have been common.

Also, residents ripping out wet carpet or removing ruined furniture often aren't drinking enough water, resulting in a rise in dehydration cases, Jeanice said. And the anxiety caused by the hurricane's devastation has jolted those with long-standing heart conditions.

A surprising post-Katrina trend has been the number of motor vehicle-related injuries, said Dr. Joseph Guarisco, director of Ochsner's emergency department. Traffic signals are not functioning in many areas, stop signs are down, and law enforcement agencies aren't focused on traffic control.

"Residents should be careful," Guarisco said. "It's a free-for-all out there."

4,000 refugees told to leave as Hurricane Rita threatens Texas

HOUSTON, from A-11

In the midst of the chaos of people scrambling to find last-minute places to stay, Carl Wright was at peace Tuesday.

Wright, who lost the use of his legs almost 20 years ago, sat in a wheelchair and waited for a bus ride to the airport. A company had paid to relocate him to Colorado Springs, Colo., he said.

Wright, who used his upper body to pull himself and his wheelchair into the attic and then onto the roof of his Uptown home, said he won't be returning to New Orleans.

"I don't want to go anywhere near water again," he said.

Bush praises decision to halt residents' return

or early Saturday, forecasters said it could hit anywhere between Mexico and southeast Louisiana. Gov. Kathleen Blanco warned people in shelters in southwest Louisiana to be ready to head north instead of west.

About 175 buses were standing by to help about 4,200 Katrina evacuees in Lake Charles and Lafayette evacuate again, said Lt. Col. Bill Doran of the Louisiana National Guard.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin announced Tuesday that he and federal and state officials will proceed with a plan to evacuate the few residents remaining in the city, using 500 buses laden with food and water for people needing transportation.

This time, authorities said, the evacuation will not turn into the debacle that followed Hurricane Katrina, in which tens of thousands of refugees were stranded in miserable conditions at the Superdome and the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center for as long as six days.

"We're learning as we go," Nagin said. "We're a lot smarter this time. We understand what it takes to mobilize away from the threat of a hurricane."

This time, the Superdome and Convention Center will not be staging areas, said Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, commander of the armed forces stationed in the city.

"It ain't going to happen," he said.

As officials fretted about Rita's approach, President Bush made his fourth visit to New Orleans since Katrina to praise work being done to revitalize the local economy, saying it will lead to "a vibrant New Orleans and surrounding parishes."

In an appearance with Nagin at the Folgers coffee plant, which sustained about $20 million in losses because of the storm, Bush talked with contractors and employees, asking some if they had received the promised $2,000 payments from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to pay for basic needs after an evacuation.

"He asked us individually if we had gotten our money, and those of us who didn't he asked why," said Danny Carreras, whose Arabi house was demolished by Katrina.

At the plant, Bush praised Nagin's decision to put the return to New Orleans on hold in light of Rita's march across the Gulf and possible threat to southeast Louisiana.

"He made a wise decision to say to people, 'Be cautious about returning here,' because a rain of any amount could cause these levees to break again," said Bush, who attended a briefing on Rita with Blanco, Nagin and Honore aboard the USS Iwo Jima.

Bush also visited Gulfport, Miss., before returning to Washington.

The timetable for people to return to New Orleans by ZIP code is in limbo, said Nagin, because electrical service is spotty in some places and potable tap water may not be available for two months, according to Sewerage & Water Board Director Marcia St. Martin.

Algiers residents who had been permitted to move back into their homes Monday were ordered to leave Tuesday, as were business owners who began trickling back into the city over the weekend.

"I know the people of this city have been away from their homes and businesses for three weeks now," Nagin said. "I'm asking you to just hold on for a little longer."

According to Tuesday's National Weather Service tracking maps, Rita seemed poised to strike Galveston, where a 1900 hurricane that killed about 8,000 people, one of the biggest natural disasters in U.S. history.

Even if that forecast holds, New Orleans could have a storm surge as high as 2 feet, said Ed Rappaport, the National Hurricane Center's deputy director.

In Galveston, a coastal city about 40 miles southeast of Houston, officials told residents to begin leaving.

Tuesday was "boarding-up and decision day," city spokeswoman Mary Jo Naschke said.

Rita could reach Category 4 strength today.

Meanwhile, as southeast Louisiana struggled to return to normal after Katrina, Public Service Commission officials announced that power had been restored to about 78 percent of the approximately 900,000 homes that lost electricity.

About 22 percent, or 239,904 households, mainly in Orleans and St. Bernard parishes, still lacked power, said Arnold Chauviere, chief of the commission's utility division.

"We would like it to be faster," he said. "Utility companies have hired extra work crews. I think they are doing the best they can under the circumstances."

In New Orleans, 169,308, or 84 percent, of the 201,369 Entergy customers who lost power still did not have it Tuesday, 22 days after Katrina struck.

Eighty percent of Entergy's Plaquemines Parish customers and 99 percent of St. Bernard Parish households had power, he said.

Chauviere said 213,739 BellSouth customers and 85,082 Cox Communications customers still were without phone service.

Staff writers Ed Anderson, Frank Donze, Michelle Krupa and Gordon Russell and The Associated Press contributed to this report.

President Bush autographs a can of coffee for Folger's coffee employee Emory Zimmer, left, during a tour of the company's plant on Almonaster Boulevard in eastern New Orleans on Tuesday. Bush praised Mayor Ray Nagin for suspending plans to return residents to the city.

Rescue workers take John Lyons, 72, to a waiting ambulance Tuesday after discovering him alive in his Bienville Street home. Lyons rode out Hurricane Katrina with his wife, Leola Lyons, whose body was found in the home. She had been dead for five days, officials said.

Victory, tragedy emerge from single address

Man pulled from house, but so is wife's body

By Brian Thevenot
Staff writer

John Lyons was rescued from his flood-damaged Bienville Street house Tuesday, 20 days after riding out Hurricane Katrina there.

His wife, Leola, wasn't as fortunate. A mortuary team removed her body from the home, where flies massed on a front window screen. She had died five days ago.

Agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives found 72-year-old John Lyons in the home, at 2508 Bienville St., after responding to a tip, said Charlie Smith, team leader for the agency's special response team.

The Lyonses appeared to have ridden out the storm in the house, which had a water line showing the flood reached about 3 feet inside the home in the wake of the Aug. 29 storm. The couple apparently stayed there ever since, Smith said.

Mortuary teams from Kenyon Inc., the private company contracted to retrieve bodies from the flooded and hurricane-ravaged city, pulled the body of Leola Lyons from the home.

"We found the husband alive but her dead," Smith said. "They had been married for 40 years."

The home, one side of a shotgun double, had been marked "NE" in spray paint, apparently indicating that someone had checked the house previously but been unable to enter. The Kenyon team left a different mark – "KEN 1" – indicating the retrieval of one body.

The discovery of a survivor in the city so long after the storm is exceedingly rare. But John Lyons appeared fine, Smith said. He was taken to Ochsner Foundation Hospital.

Smith said the ATF agents were responding to a tip from a worker at Snee Chemical in Harahan.

"The guy asked me to check on his sister," Smith said.

Smith let the mortuary team take over the scene once John Lyons was rescued.

"I didn't go into the house. I had no desire," Smith said. "He came to the door. That was good enough for me."

Orleans lawyers are asked to contact federal courts

Communication center established in Lafayette

From staff reports

The federal courts in Louisiana are trying to track down New Orleans lawyers who have relocated because of Hurricane Katrina, asking them to register with a "communications center" set up in Lafayette.

Gary Zwain, appointed by a court order to oversee the operation, said Tuesday that lawyers need to be contacted so that cases can be moved forward.

There are 5,934 cases pending before the Eastern District federal court, based in New Orleans, almost all of which involve New Orleans lawyers. In addition, about half to three-quarters of the 9,441 cases in the U.S. District Court in Baton Rouge involve New Orleans attorneys, while lawyers from the city were involved in another 600 to 700 cases in the U.S. District Court in Lafayette.

Lawyers with the larger firms in New Orleans, many of which also have offices in other cities, will likely be able to quickly get back on their feet and assess the status of their cases. But solo practitioners could need additional help in rebuilding damaged case files and figuring out when they can be ready for hearings and trial, Zwain said.

"We are trying to put together criminal defendants and their lawyers," he said. "A lot of criminal lawyers do not work as part of a large firm. That is going to be a big job."

Attorneys are asked to contact the communications center at (337) 235-2444 or (866) 456-8297 or visit www.laspecialmaster.com. The center will forward the collected contact information to the federal courts.

Grandma's legacy is storm-proof

When my grandmother died, there was no reading of the will, no made-for-television moment, no surviving relatives anxiously awaiting word of whether she had favored them with a monetary remembrance.

For most of her life my grandmother cleaned other people's houses. What money she did make in those days of post-slavery wages, she invested in the education of her three girls. She wanted to be sure that they could "earn some bread without scrubbing floors."

A few years before her death in 2002, my mother bought my grandmother a set of bedroom furniture. Each piece featured a marble top and pickled wood sides. I bought a piece and added it to the set.

By then, my grandmother's fading health had made it clear that she wouldn't live forever. But I figured that set of furniture, a nicer one than she had ever owned before, might be our inheritance. I imagined future generations saying, "that furniture belonged to your great, great grandmother."

That furniture spent several days in Hurricane Katrina's waters. It's certainly damaged and probably ruined. And it's unlikely to be handed down much further.

Living legacy

So what did Lucille Crump Moore leave us?

We inherited the Crumps on Maringouin Bayou, the descendants of General and Celie Crump. We inherited the old tales of how General Crump, owned his own land and had the newspaper read to him because he himself couldn't read.

We inherited the bonds my grandmother nurtured to those people and to this small place several miles west of Baton Rouge.

We inherited Dot Stewart, who looks more like my grandmother than any of my grandmother's own children.

We inherited Cousin Sis and her determination to take control of any situation and her brother, Benny, whose graying hair is the only clear indication that he has aged since those summers that I spent in Maringouin 30 years ago.

We inherited Doris Steele with her warm smile and welcoming attitude. And we inherited her husband, Uncle Melvin, who left Virginia decades ago, fell in love with this woman and this place, and never looked back.

Warm port in a storm

It is to these people that we fled in advance of Hurricane Katrina's winds and waters.

They welcomed us with succotash made from fresh-picked okra and with a bond forged generations ago by people who seemed to know that this moment of emergency might come.

As thoughts of a quick return home gave way to the reality that it would be weeks, perhaps months, before we could return to New Orleans, they made provisions to make our extended stay comfortable.

Had I gotten my wish, had my grandmother left me expensive jewelry or the money to buy a shiny sports car, my inheritance might well have vanished in the raging waters of the storm.

But my inheritance is very much intact. And it is unlikely to be tarnished by anything as fleeting and fickle as inclement weather.

SEEING WHAT CAN BE SAVED

A tour of New Orleans Episcopal churches finds few undamaged

By Bruce Nolan
Staff writer

The first moments inside the shuttered, once-flooded St. Luke's Episcopal Church on North Dorgenois Street Tuesday did not bode well.

The air was still and dank, heavy with mildew.

Presiding Bishop Frank Griswold, the leader of the Episcopal Church USA, Louisiana Bishop Charles Jenkins, and a small party of Episcopal relief officials could see the water marks shin-high against the ends of the pews.

But then, a gift.

Walking up the center aisle, they found the altar high and dry on its platform, still set for a Sunday service.

Three weeks after wind, flood and widespread looting sparked by Hurricane Katrina, St. Luke's remained locked, pristine, unviolated.

The altar's heavy gold candlesticks flanked a golden chalice and a Missal for the recitation of the Mass. Cruets containing water and wine, with another chalice, stood unmolested in a nearby alcove.

And off the sanctuary, the sacristy proved to be intact. The sacred golden vessels Episcopalians use in worship stood where they had been left.

"This is good," said Elvia James, the little church's senior warden. "This isn't bad. We can survive this, with God's help."

The experience at St. Luke's was a slight lift in a grim tour of Episcopal churches in New Orleans. None was undamaged.

A few, like the Church of the Annunciation on South Claiborne near Napoleon Avenue, were devastated.

St. Paul's in Lakeview stood on dry ground for the first time in weeks. But a waterline eight feet up the exterior wall suggested what would be inside the still-locked church.

The landmark Christ Church Cathedral on St. Charles Avenue did not flood, but took rain damage when a skylight over the altar shattered.

The best of the lot, appearing to have only minor roof damage, was the Chapel of the Holy Comforter, a facility for students at the nearby University of New Orleans.

The tour was Griswold's chance to see Katrina's devastation first-hand. It began Monday in Ocean Springs, where the storm demolished homes and businesses and swept their slabs broom-clean. In New Orleans, he found

'It was mass chaos'

Strains from storm drive nurse to brink

By Bruce Hamilton
Staff writer

On her sixth straight night in Methodist Hospital in eastern New Orleans Elizabeth "Liz" Welch, a registered nurse, was near the breaking point.

She was dehydrated, hungry, exhausted. She had been caring for patients under nightmarish conditions. She had contemplated, even anticipated, her own death. But when relatives of patients began to rebel against their caregivers and nearly rioted, her resolve crumbled.

"This so broke my spirit," she wrote later in an online journal that documents the experience, it "made me wonder if I was even in the right profession."

Welch, a LaPlace resident, had packed clothing and headed to work for her night shift Aug. 27, two days before the hurricane hit. Despite dire predictions, she was prepared to stay through the storm.

At 6:30 a.m. on Aug. 29, "all hell broke loose." Katrina tore off part of the roof, blew out windows and raked rooms of their contents. For the next three hours, she and other staffers helped move patients to interior sections of the building. The power went out, and 8 feet of water engulfed the first floor, swamping its emergency room, morgue, laboratory, pharmacy and cafeteria.

About 120 staff members remained with more than 100 patients and countless relatives and children, who ran around unsupervised. "The place was packed," she said. "It was mass chaos."

Still, Welch tried to be professional, even as power failed, temperatures spiked and toilets backed up. "That night was hell. Absolute hell," she wrote. Patients cried for help. Welch was one of three nurses caring for about 25 patients, giving them head-to-toe assessments. They made their rounds together to conserve flashlight batteries and waited for sunrise to write up charts.

Storm doesn't can star's movie plans

Quaid vows to keep his film in N.O.

By Michael Perlstein
Staff writer

It was one of those only-in-New Orleans celebrity sidewalk encounters, post-Katrina style. But, in some small way, it may help revive the city's reputation as Hollywood South.

An impromptu meeting between actor Dennis Quaid and New Orleans Police Chief Eddie Compass on Tuesday ended with a commitment by Quaid to return to New Orleans as the site of his next movie. The only catch: Compass wants a walk-on role.

"If there's any way we can do it here, I want to do it here. This is the place that really needs it."
DENNIS QUAID
actor

"Get me in there, brother, even if it's as an extra," Compass told the actor as the two hugged and posed for pictures at the police staging area at Harrah's New Orlean sCasino.

Quaid had been set to begin filming his self-penned "Shame on You" in New Orleans later this year, but the hurricane scuttled those plans. Location crews had been scouting replacement sites in Shreveport and Baton Rouge, Quaid said.

But after landing in the city on a relief mission Monday night, Quaid said he is determined to return to New Orleans to shoot his film, which he is directing himself.

"Can we get in here by Jan. 1?" he asked Compass. "If there's any way we can do it here, I want to do it here. This is the place that really needs it."

Quaid, the son of an electrician who was born and raised in Houston, said he has carried a soft spot for New Orleans since starring in the 1987 film "The Big Easy," which filmed in the city.

"I've spent about a year of my life here between the four movies I've filmed," he said. "I can't imagine how devastated people must feel."

Quaid said he was in town to bring medical supplies and money in support of International Hospital for Children, the non-churches and neighborhoods first pummeled, then drowned.

As the leader of the 2.4 million-member church, Griswold's mission was part fact-finding – but only partly.

"I'm just 'being with' – being with the bishop, with clergy, with people and whoever wants to see me," he said.

In his storm tours, Griswold said he was urging clergy to care for their people, but to beware "exaggerated generosity" – a regard for others so complete that it neglects self. Like a chaplain to chaplains he reminded them "that we have to take care of ourselves too. As we look out for others, we have to be gentle with ourselves."

In coming weeks, he said, he would tell the national church that its moment was coming to render help. After the first wave of emergency help recedes, New Orleans will find itself downshifting for a long, marathon slog largely out of the eye of the sympathetic public.

That will be the church's call to step in with longer term relief to victims, neighborhoods and churches, he said.

Jenkins, meanwhile, surveyed his churches as pastor of a battered diocese of 20,000 persons in 52 churches – most of them damaged.

A book languishes outside St. Paul's Episcopal Church in Lakeview on Tuesday. The church has a water line eight feet up the exterior.

In recent months, his name has been floated as a possible replacement for Griswold next year. Earlier this year, Jenkins agreed to submit to a vetting process by a national search committee selecting nominees to stand for election to succeed Griswold.

Now, Katrina's destruction of his diocese has prompted him to rethink any notions of national office, he said.

For the moment, nothing is clear, he said, except the need to rebuild New Orleans as a better, more equitable, more open city.

"The people of this city need to hold the captains of industry, their political leaders and their religious leaders accountable," he said.

"The rebuilding of this city has to be open, and it has to be collaborative.

"We can come back as the Las Vegas of the South. We have a wonderful opportunity here. As wonderful as Mardi Gras is – and it's wonderful – we can't base our economy on Mardi Gras."

'Everyone cried and lost it at some point'

HERO, from B-1

The nurses dispensed with the dress code, and Welch began working in pajamas and flip-flops. Outside the window, an apartment building had been consumed with fire; the Pep Boys' roof was in shambles. She saw a snake chasing fish through the parking lot. Slivers of vehicles were visible above the water's surface like curved backs. The breezeway was submerged.

By Wednesday night, Aug. 31, the stink inside – from stopped toilets and the sweat of bodies - was overwhelming. A doctor confiscated a bedside commode and ordered everyone to use biohazard bags for their waste. They were running out of water, and the nurses limited their intake to ½ glass per day. When patients took pills, they were given only a sip. Welch had barely slept – only a few hours scattered over several days – and she ate only a few peanut butter crackers she had brought from home.

After the generator in the ICU went out, staff took turns "bagging" patients on ventilators by hand, helping them to breathe. Patients began to die, and a new morgue was set up in the operating room. There was no way to contact families of the deceased. It was a dreadful, soul-wrenching situation for those whose profession is dedicated to saving lives.

"Everyone cried and lost it at some point," Welch wrote. "Things got miserable."

After seeing a body in the water, she sent a text message by cell phone to friends, asking them to prepare a decent funeral for her. "I believed I was going to die. Everyone did. We had daily prayer ... we sang 'Amazing Grace.' I wanted to believe God would save us. It was getting hard to have faith. Very hard."

Still, there were hopeful signs. Welch could see people waiting on roofs to be rescued, and when helicopters retrieved them, everyone around her cheered. Military helicopters began to evacuate patients, and eight to 10 of the strongest men on staff carried the heaviest patients through stairwells. The hospital's parent company, University Health Services, also sent helicopters, and they later began to take staff members with small children.

But in the predawn hours Sept. 2, the relatives of patients thought they were being left behind. They believed promised evacuations were lies; they became abusive.

Welch and her colleagues were trying to sleep in chairs in the middle of a hallway. A flashlight shone in her eyes. "There are our nurses," a voice behind it said. "If we see them leave, I will stab one."

The nurses tried to reassure everyone that they would not be abandoned. But many were still agitated.

"My professionalism just about flew out the window," Welch said. She thought about the sacrifices she had made for patients and members of their families who took refuge in the hospital. She had given up food, sleep, water; it seemed those she helped were turning against her.

On the seventh day came deliverance. The nurses went to the roof for evacuation, where cold water and Cokes were waiting. They were flown to Northshore Regional Medical Center in Slidell, took showers and cooled off in air conditioning powered by a generator. Welch was bussed by UHS to Dallas, where she began to reassemble the pieces of her life.

Now home in LaPlace, Welch misses her colleagues, with whom she strengthened bonds during their horrible trial.

"I saw them sweat, bleed, cry, pray, pour their souls out," she wrote. "I still cry every night, thinking of what would have happened, what did happen and what is going to happen."

She is thinking of finding work at a travel agency, perhaps in Shreveport. People have been telling her she saved lives, but Welch doesn't feel like a hero.

"We did what we did," she said. "We did what we could do."

Tammany's Fontainebleau closed as park rebuilds

Thousands of trees down, several camps destroyed,

By Richard Boyd
St. Tammany bureau

The facilities at Fontainebleau State Park near Mandeville were nearly destroyed by Hurricane Katrina, and the park will be closed to the public for the foreseeable future.

Three group camps scattered among the park's sprawling grounds between Bayou Castine and Cane Bayou were reduced to rubble and will have to be rebuilt.

The sandy beachfront and nearby Olympic-size swimming pool were destroyed.

Toppled throughout the park were thousands of trees, including the hardiest of pines that had survived a severe pine beetle infestation a decade ago.

Cleanup work is under way, but the amount of downed trees makes it difficult to get around the grounds of the 2,800-acre park.

"It will be a long process of rebuilding the park but it will be done," said Sharon Broussard, spokeswoman for the Office of State Parks in Baton Rouge.

It's too early to put a price tag on the damage, Broussard said.

All of the park's camping sites were heavily flooded by the storm surge from Lake Pontchartrain, and they are still littered with storm debris. In addition, the electrical wiring and campsite power connections will have to be checked and likely rewired before visitors can use them again, Broussard said.

The storm also caused extensive damage to a new wetlands walkway that afforded visitors views of birds, wildlife and sweeping vistas of the lake and adjacent marsh, including summer and fall sunsets. That will also be repaired, Broussard said.

STAFF PHOTOS BY CHUCK COOK

Thousands of downed trees in Fontainebleau State Park were felled by Hurricane Katrina's strong winds as park officials conduct controlled burns of the lumber remnants.

Also gone are the pavilions used during the summer months for elaborate group picnics by busloads of visitors who visit the park on weekends.

Ironically, Fontainebleau's current $7.9 million expansion project fared much better. It includes creation of 10 raised cabins at the lakeshore near Bayou Castine.

Contractors had completed framing all 10 cabins and installed windows before Katrina, but they had not begun interior work that included drywall and plywood.

"In retrospect, that was good, because had the interior work been done, it would have been ruined, so we won't lose too much time," Broussard said. Windows were blown out, but only minor damage was inflicted to the cabin exteriors.

Pylons that had been installed for a beachfront pier survived the storm. Only the foundation work had been done on a planned visitor's center, so that work will not be slowed, Broussard said.

"We have no power yet at the park except at the office just off U.S. 190, so we cannot even open (the park) to rescue workers or for storm evacuees still seeking refuge," Broussard said.

Fontainebleau State Park Ranger Greg Thomas walks past a park bench buried by sand from Lake Pontchartrain , a victim of Hurricane Katrina's powerful storm.

But on Louisiana 22 east of Madisonville, Fairview-Riverside State Park should reopen in about two weeks and will be available for evacuees to use for camping – free of charge – until the end of October.

Otis House, the park's centerpiece, was not damaged. Several trees fell and camping areas were flooded but they have since dried out and cleared of most debris.

The state's newest park, Tickfaw State Park in Tangipahoa Parish, will reopen in a few days, Broussard said, and will also be offered to evacuees free of charge until the end of October.

profit organization he helped launch with a local doctor. The group usually provides assistance to children in Latin America, but "this is the place that needs the help now," Quaid said.

Quaid, who saw Katrina's devastation during a drive through the city Tuesday, compared the destruction to what he saw in New York City after Sept. 11, only bigger.

"It's so widespread. It's just so huge," he said.

The actor, known for marquee roles in films such as "Everybody's All American" and "The Right Stuff," said he is convinced the city will bounce back.

Cable TV still off for 25,000 in Tammany

By Charlie Chapple
St. Tammany bureau

Cable television service to most of St. Tammany Parish should be restored within one to two weeks, a spokesman for Charter Communications told local officials Tuesday.

But some areas of rural northern St. Tammany, including Folsom, Sun and Bush, could be without the service for four to six weeks, according to James A. Laurent Jr., Charter's director of government relations in Louisiana.

"In those areas, we still need our pole routes (for cable lines) restored," he said.

He said about 25,000 of Charter's 90,000 customers in the parish still are without cable services.

Service has been restored to the area around the parish government complex on Koop Drive north of Mandeville, and Access St. Tammany, the parish government's information channel, should be back on the air in two to three days.

Cleco officials reported Tuesday that 88 percent of its customers in St. Tammany have electricity. They said the company's goal is to have power available by Monday to every home and business in the parish capable of accepting electricity.

A spokeswoman for Washington-St. Tammany Electric Cooperative said Tuesday that 77 percent of its customers in St. Tammany Parish have electricity. There are 5,792 customers in St. Tammany who do not have power, utility marketing manager Coylean Gilmore said.

The reports by the utilities were made during Tuesday's briefing of local, state and federal officials working on recovery efforts in St. Tammany.

In other news, Causeway Police Chief Felix Loicano said the southbound span of the Causeway will be closed to traffic from 8 p.m. to 5 a.m. daily through Oct. 3 because of a curfew in Jefferson Parish. Jefferson officials have informed Causeway officials that the parish's curfew will be in effect until at least that date, Loicano said. The southbound span across Lake Pontchartain from Mandeville to Metairie will be limited to emergency traffic during those hours, he said.

Algiers church opens doors and hearts to those in need

A reverend's mission now feeds hundreds

The day after Hurricane Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast, throwing the New Orleans area into chaos, the Rev. James Brown opened St. Mary's Church in Algiers just as he has done three times a week for eight years.

There would be impoverished and homeless people to feed.

That day, he and 15 church volunteers served 19 people.

Now, about 500 people line up for free hot lunches, served daily from 11 a.m. to 1:30 p.m., at the community center at 3815 General Meyer Ave.

"How you doing, sir? Got an appetite?" volunteer Carey Peyton, the church's minister of music, asked an elderly man who walked in out of Tuesday afternoon's sweltering heat.

"I got a little one," the man replied with a chuckle before getting in line for lunch.

"The needs motivate me," Brown said. "I see needs. That's why I didn't leave (during Katrina). I knew there would be a lot of needy people."

Churches nationwide have heard of Brown's work and have donated food and supplies. The American Red Cross and the Salvation Army have donated cleaning supplies for distribution. The military has chipped in water, ice and military MRE's (Meals, Ready to Eat). An Army major general and colonels have visited and agreed to lend support, Brown said. California National Guard soldiers provide security and help in the kitchen.

The church has garnered national and international media attention, attracting the interest of a private group in Israel that shipped cases of clothing to St. Mary's for distribution.

The Rev. James Brown assists volunteers in unloading boxes of clean-up kits donated by the Salvation Army on Tuesday. Since the day after Hurricane Katrina hit Louisiana and the Gulf Coast, Brown and members of his church have been serving hot meals and providing supplies to community members in need.

George Rainey, owner of Rainey's Restaurant and Catering in Algiers which is known for its gumbo, began running the kitchen nine days after Katrina passed. With his business temporarily closed, Rainey said his philosophy is that businesses rely on communities, so during a crisis, businesses should serve the community. But he deflected attention to Brown.

"He's a miracle to Algiers," Rainey said of Brown.

"He took it on himself," state Sen. Francis Heitmeier, D-Algiers, said of Brown's community service. "When you talk about heroes, this guy is one."

Still, the city of New Orleans has not formally recognized St. Mary's as a "point of distribution," Heitmeier said. Such a designation would open the church as a hub for Federal Emergency Management Agency services and allow the church to recoup its out-of-pocket expenses, Heitmeier said.

Volunteers at Greater St. Mary Missionary Baptist Church in Algiers have been serving hot meals for more than 500 daily, and the church is providing relief supplies to those who need them.

City Councilwoman Jacquelyn Brechtel Clarkson is working to get St. Mary's that designation, he said. "This guy needs some assistance," Heitmeier said.

Food Bank hours, mission expanding

The Covington Food Bank, which is normally open three days a week to provide food to the needy in St. Tammany and Washington parishes, will reopen Thursday at 840 N. Columbia St. with new hours and a new mission.

The Food Bank will now act as the New Orleans area representative for Second Harvesters, according to Food Bank manager Jackie Catalanotto.

That means the Food Bank will provide food for "anybody from anywhere," Catalanotto said. First-time clients will need to bring a Social Security card and a picture ID.

The Food Bank will be open weekdays from 9 a.m. to noon and will provide boxes of food as well as personal-care items, she said.

Volunteers and large boxes are needed.

"FEMA sent 10 wonderful firefighters from Kentucky, California and West Virginia to help us," Catalanotto said. They swept, packed supplies and generally helped get the place up and running, she said. She also found plenty of help from her church parish at St. Benedict's, north of Covington.

"These are bad times," she said, but added that good people are helping one another get through. Someone from Knoxville, Tenn., was in town helping to clear trees and decided to donate $10,000 to the Food Bank, she said.

The All Saints Medical Clinic, which recently opened next to the Food Bank in expanded quarters, also will reopen Thursday for minor medical needs.

The Food Bank and medical clinic operate as part of the St. Vincent de Paul Society in its newly expanded offices on Columbia Street in downtown Covington. Volunteers for the Food Bank and medical clinic are welcome. For more information, call (985) 893-3003.

TP, WWL-TV to be honored for coverage

N.O. media kept working in trying conditions

From staff reports

BATON ROUGE – The efforts of The Times-Picayune and WWL-TV to continue providing crucial information to the New Orleans area and its evacuees in the wake of Hurricane Katrina will be honored with this year's Manship Prize for Exemplary Use of Media Technology, LSU officials announced Tuesday.

"The Times-Picayune continued to operate on the World Wide Web, and WWL-TV continued to broadcast even after they were forced to evacuate New Orleans," said John Maxwell Hamilton, dean of LSU's Manship School of Mass Communication. "They were a vital conduit of information for evacuees and others trying to find out what was happening after Hurricane Katrina. Their actions epitomize calm in the face of a storm. They were out but not down."

The two news outlets were faced with reporting one of the largest natural disasters in the nation's history without electricity, telephones or offices. The Times-Picayune turned to its affiliated Web site, NOLA.com, to provide news, photographs, information and a missing persons forum for three days until it could resume publishing a printed version at The Courier in Houma.

The newspaper also provided Web logs for specific sections of flooded areas, allowing Internet users to share information through citizen journalism.

While continuing around-the-clock updates on NOLA.com, The Times-Picayune has shifted printing operations to the Mobile Press-Register, a sister Advance Publications newspaper, and is circulating more than 130,000 copies of the paper in areas where access is available.

WWL-TV used a tower and transmitter at the company's facility in Gretna to remain on the air continuously after the hurricane to provide information to displaced residents. It also streamed all its coverage onto the Internet and then partnered with Louisiana Public Broadcasting for an even broader outreach.

"Publishing and broadcasting are most crucial at times when they are most difficult to do," said Stephen Banning, an assistant professor of mass communication and chairman of the Manship Prize Committee. "The news media are more important than ever during a crisis situation when it is vital that people be informed."

The Manship Prize is sponsored by LSU's Manship School of Mass Communication and financed by an endowment from the Douglas L. Manship family. The Manship School faculty awards the prize annually to someone who has "demonstrated exemplary use of new media technology." Previous winners include Brian Lamb for his work at C-SPAN, Michael Bloomberg for financial reporting on the Internet and Barry Cooper for his work with Black Voices.com.

The prizes will be awarded Sept. 30 during the Manship School of Mass Communication's annual dinner. An event open to the public will be announced at a later date.

Expecting fiscal famine, Westwego looks to feds

City seeks a slice of $100 million loan

By Joe Darby
West Bank Bureau

Anticipating drastic drops in sales taxes, fees and fines as the city struggles to resume operations after Hurricane Katrina, Westwego must have financial help if it is to continue as an independent city, Mayor Robert Billiot told the City Council this week.

The council authorized Billiot on Monday to join Jefferson Parish in seeking a $100 million federal disaster loan and gave the mayor permission to seek a separate loan of up to $10 million from the State Bond Commission.

City accountant Jim Butler told officials that FEMA grants will cover additional costs incurred by the city in dealing with the storm and its aftermath, but the federal agency will not pay for lost revenue.

Billiot said substantial losses are expected in coming months in sales taxes, city court fines and Westwego's share of taxes from the Boomtown Casino in Harvey.

In a worst-case scenario, with no outside financial help, "everything would stop, and Jefferson Parish would have to take over" most city services, Billiot said, although he doesn't expect it to come to that.

The City Council's actions mean Westwego can accept part of the $100 million disaster loan sought by Jefferson Parish, although the parish would have the right to designate how that money will be apportioned and spent, Billiot said.

"We'll submit an invoice and they will give us the money," he said. "If we think we need to buy 100 gallons of gas and they think we need only 50 gallons, we get paid for 50 gallons."

Billiot said Westwego must provide local matching money for several high-profile projects, including historic Sala Avenue improvements, a new sewer force main and a farmers-seafood market.

"If the parish says they want us to just continue our daily operations and we can't (spend money to) grow, I will go to the State Bond Commission," the mayor said.

To deal with the city's financial crisis, officials should look at "minimizing costs across the board," Councilman Johnny Shaddinger said. City employees may have to forgo their annual 2 percent raise next year, Billiot said.

The council also passed two resolutions allowing trailers to be used as temporary homes in the city.

One measure will allow residents whose homes are uninhabitable to put small trailers or campers on their property while repairs are made. The permits will be issued for 90 days, and will be renewed if necessary.

The second resolution gave 90-day permits to National Gypsum and Southern Scrap Material companies to place up to 15 trailers on their properties for workers who have lost their homes, because of the importance of those firms to the local economy.

Councilman Ted Munch said National Gypsum manufactures wall board, a commodity that will be essential to the rebuilding of the New Orleans area.

On motion of Nancy LaHaye, seconded by Betty Dinette and carried, the following Resolution was offered:

RESOLUTION

This resolution is to certify the existence of an extreme public emergency due to Hurricane Katrina and the resulting damages to the property and school facilities of the Plaquemines Parish School Board and to provide notice of such public emergency as provided by La. R.S. 38:2212D.

WHEREAS, due to Hurricane Katrina, the Plaquemines Parish School Board has suffered destruction and damages to its property, including the various schools located within the Parish of Plaquemines; and

WHEREAS, La. R.S. 38:2212D provides that advertisement for public bids shall not apply in cases of extreme public emergencies; and

WHEREAS, there is need to provide for repairs to the three schools located in Belle Chasse, Louisiana and in the other schools and facilities of the School Board when the sites become available for repairs.

BE IT RESOVLED AND ORDAINED that the Plaquemines Parish School Board, at a legally convened special meeting, hereby certifies that an extreme public emergency exists due to the damages and destruction resulting from Hurricane Katrina to all of the schools and other facilities of Plaquemines Parish School Board including, but not limited to, the three school sites located in Belle Chasse, Louisiana and pursuant to said extreme public emergency, the Superintendent of Schools, or its Director of Finance and Management, are authorized to, without the necessity of advertising or complying with the formalities of La. R.S. 38:2212, et seq., to negotiate all contracts necessary to restore all of the schools and facilities of the Plaquemines Parish School Board to operating condition in compliance with all applicable code and regulations to provide for the safety of the students, teachers, and staff upon reopening of the schools and to take all other actions necessary and required to complete the emergency repairs.

RESOLVED AND ORDAINED that notice of the provisions in this Resolution shall be published in The Advocate located in the Parish of East Baton Rouge where the School Board's administrative offices are presently located and due to the lack of any newspapers operating in Plaquemines Parish or in the greater New Orleans area.

Upon roll call, in open meeting, the vote on the motion was as follows:

YEA: Nancy LaHaye, Anthony St. Philip, Joyce Lamkin, Sharon Branan, Paul Lemaire, Bobby Benefield and Betty Dinette
NAY: None
ABSENT: Byron Williams and Carlton LaFrance
ABSTAIN: None

The motion passed by a vote of seven (7) "Yea" votes, no (0) "Nay" votes, no (0) "Abstentions" and two (2) members "Absent"

St. Charles rejects video poker stop

Paradis residents call plan 'death warrant'

By Allen Powell II
River Parishes bureau

After impassioned pleas by parish residents, the St. Charles Parish Council on Monday voted down a rezoning proposal that would have paved the way for a video poker truck stop in Paradis.

The truck stop has been a hot issue among Paradis residents since early August, when it was brought to the Planning Commission. Paradis Investment LLC was hoping to use about 10 acres along U.S. 90 for the 24-hour business, which called for about 50 video poker machines and 80 employees.

Under parish law, the land needed to be rezoned from commercial to light industrial to allow the video poker truck stop to be built. In addition, video poker truck stops can be located only along U.S. 90, Louisiana 3127 or U.S. 61 in St. Charles Parish under the law. The council would have had to rezone the 10-acre parcel for Paradis Investment and then issue a special use permit for the building.

Parish residents near the proposed truck stop, and several from other areas, told the council that the plan amounted to spot zoning – a notion disputed by some parish officials - and that gambling would be bad for the community.

"I don't believe you should give up this community for this building," said Ralph White, who lives slightly north of where the truck stop was slated to be built. "If you rezone this thing to M-1, you would be signing the death warrant for this community."

Along with several other residents, White also raised the issue of what would happen to the land if the truck stop closed or was never built. They said any kind of light industrial plant could move into the area and depreciate the quality of life of residents there.

Sandra Morris said she has lived in her quiet community for 45 years and that she fears the truck stop would ruin the lives of families there.

"What good is gambling? Can you tell me?" Morris asked the council during her emotional statement.

But the people trying to build the truck stop said residents were trying to punish them for trying to set up a business that is already allowed in St. Charles Parish. Debbie Dufresne Vial said St. Charles Parish already has two video poker truck stops operating, and another one was approved Monday. She said the truck stop would bring needed economic development to U.S. 90.

In addition, the business would generate about $200,000 annually for the parish through poker revenue alone. The parish already receives more than $500,000 from the more than 220 video poker machines operating in truck stops, lounges and bars, but that amount is far less than several neighboring parishes get, Vial said.

Vial said the truck stop would employ off-duty police officers for continual security and would not create an undue amount of traffic and noise.

Political fight extends to damaged apartments

Mayor, officials argue over what to do with holdouts

By Matt Scallan
Kenner bureau

Kenner officials and owners of the storm-damaged Redwood Apartments continued efforts Tuesday to coax about 50 remaining residents into leaving, but only 17 of them boarded a bus bound for a shelter in Baker, north of Baton Rouge.

The apartment complex, normally home to about 1,800 people, has become the latest battleground in a years-old political war between Mayor Phil Capitano, who wants to move the residents to shelter outside Kenner, and Police Chief Nick Congemi, who, with City Councilman Michael McMyne, accuses the mayor of trying to drive working poor people out of the city. The complex's owner, Dorvin Development, barred reporters from the site Tuesday, after several days of seeing the squabble play out in the news media.

Though privately owned, the apartments are governed by federal regulations designed to provide housing for low-income residents.

About 50 residents stayed through Hurricane Katrina on Aug. 29, and others have returned since and stayed — even though their apartments in some cases are badly damaged. They say they have no other place to go.

Capitano said he's concerned that the complex is so badly damaged that power cannot be restored to it. He arranged for a bus to take willing residents to Baker.

But McMyne, whose district includes the area, said Kenner should create a temporary shelter for the residents, preferably at the Susan Park Playground gymnasium where troops assisting the city's rescue efforts were housed until today. Many Redwood residents are Hispanic Americans and do not speak fluent English.

"I don't think you can just tell them to leave. I think you need to have a conversation with them so they can make their own decisions," McMyne said.

Capitano countered that the owners of other private apartment complexes damaged by Katrina are refunding deposits to tenants so they can leave and repairs can begin.

"They're telling them that they cannot provide a safe environment, and that's what's happening here," Capitano said.

A variety of relief agencies, including the Kenner Police Department, are delivering food and water to Redwood. Chief Congemi carried the precinct that includes the complex in the March 9, 2004, mayoral election, which he lost to Capitano.

Capitano said state and federal relief agencies have strongly advised him not to open any more shelters, particularly with Hurricane Rita now threatening the Gulf Coast. But he said he can't force Redwood residents to leave.

"We've got another storm bearing down on us, and if we open up a shelter, we're going to be responsible for those people," he said.

Capitano said he did ask the state fire marshal to determine whether the Redwood complex is habitable.

"It is not fit to live in," he said.

Orleans schools' health benefits stable for now

'Nobody's having their insurance canceled'

From staff reports

New Orleans public school employees will retain their health insurance coverage even if they are unable to find other temporary employment, said a spokesman for Alvarez & Marsal, the New York turnaround firm working to right the district's finances.

Although the district's current health coverage will remain in effect only through September, "nobody's having their insurance canceled," spokesman Steve Alschuler said Tuesday.

The Alvarez & Marsal team is "working on details of a plan now that will be as helpful to employees as possible in terms of premiums," he added.

Details of that plan should be announced in the next few days, Alschuler said.

The Orleans Parish School Board last week placed all of its employees on emergency leave, effectively terminating pay and benefits other than health insurance. They have been advised to seek temporary employment elsewhere or to apply for unemployment benefits. Workers had previously been instructed to pick up paychecks at Western Union facilities beginning Sept. 14. Those checks were for the payroll that was to have been distributed Sept. 2 but was delayed by Hurricane Katrina. They will get no additional pay until they return to work.

School Board officials said they hope to open some schools by Nov. 1, and they have asked employees who will be available to work at that time to submit applications for reinstatement beginning Sept. 26. Student registration also is scheduled to begin at that time.

St. Charles schools awaiting money promised by FEMA

By John-John Williams IV
River Parishes bureau

Like many Hurricane Katrina survivors, the St. Charles Parish public school district is playing the waiting game.

Since being cleared for $4 million in relief money from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the school system has been eagerly awaiting a check. District officials have been given several dates for when the money will arrive. Most recently, they said, they were told it would be in their hands at some point this week.

Initially, St. Charles officials thought the money would arrive in the first wave of relief funding. But harder-hit parishes such as Orleans and Jefferson received the first round of money, said Rochelle Cancienne, director of public information for the district.

What sets St. Charles apart from other districts is that it is open. Classes started last week for students not displaced, and there are plans to allow more than 1,600 displaced students to start classes next week.

Before schools could be opened, more than $2.8 million in repairs had to be completed. District officials hope the FEMA funds will replenish the money used for recovery work.

The district had a fund balance of $12,558,000 on June 2004, officials said. District officials did not know the fund balance Tuesday.

The $2.8 million in damage is expected to increase as the district identifies other storm-related damage not found in initial observations. The $4 million initially requested was an early estimate of total damage, and any remaining money will be returned to FEMA, Cancienne said.

Much of the initial estimate was for cleanup and disposal. The maintenance cost was $735,000.

Several schools also sustained roof damage. One of the hardest-hit schools was the newly built Raymond K. Smith Middle School in Luling, which had $400,000 in damages.

Larry Sesser, executive director of plant operations for the district, said heavy, sustained winds took a lot of the trim off of the building and ripped off a gymnasium door.

"It's going to be a lengthy task," Sesser said about the repair effort. "The roofs are intact. They had an extreme test."

New Sarpy Elementary School in Destrehan received some of the most severe roof damage in the district. Sesser estimated that $80,000 will be needed to repair the school.

It will cost the district $100,000 to replace food lost because of the hurricane.

The district's Satellite Center, which will house vocational programs for high school students, racked up $1 million in damages and delay costs. The district will not be reimbursed for any of those damages because it technically does not own the site. The site still belongs to contractor Aegis Construction.

The completion of the Satellite Center will be pushed back another 20 days, officials said.

"Now we're looking at November," Superintendent Rodney Lafon said. "Happy Thanksgiving."

Children of displaced teachers find home in St. Charles Parish

By John-John Williams IV
River Parishes bureau

One worry has been eliminated from Wendy Rock's life.

Her Metairie home is filled with mold, forcing her family to live in a friend's house in Luling. Her husband's job at St. Paul Episcopal School in Lakeview is gone. The culprit: an estimated eight feet of water. Rock's son Davidson, 6, attended first grade at the school.

A little relief is on the way for Rock, a counselor at Hahnville High School. Her employer, the St. Charles Parish public school district, has allowed 27 employees displaced by Hurricane Katrina to enroll their children in parish schools for the remainder of the school year.

"The main benefit is that I have a school for him to go to," Rock said of her son. "At this point, I didn't have a school for him to attend. It's nice also that we are all here together as a family."

In the past, teachers who lived outside of the parish could not send their children to St. Charles schools. Consistently ranking among the best in the state in standardized test scores, St. Charles has long been an option for students to get a top-notch education without the costs of private school. But there is a cost associated with a St. Charles Parish education: St. Charles has one of the highest property tax rates in the state.

"This was an effort made to accommodate teachers in need … so that they could continue their jobs and have a place for their kids to go to school," said Rochelle Cancienne, director of public information for the district.

Davidson started Tuesday at Mimosa Park Elementary School in Luling, the third school he has been enrolled in this semester. He attended St. Paul's before Katrina hit and a school in Atlanta when his family evacuated.

Mimosa Park is located near a preschool program where Rock's 4-year-old daughter is enrolled. Both are only a couple of miles from Hahnville High School.

"That's really convenient and easy … to keep the kids close while I'm at work," Rock said. "Those are the main benefits."

The deviation from policy concerns at least one School Board member.

Sunny Savoie said all teachers should be allowed to have their children attend district schools. Savoie said it would create a morale problem among staff if some teachers — displaced or not — were the only ones allowed to send their students to St. Charles schools.

"If we open it (the policy), we open it for everybody," Savoie said at a committee meeting held last week.

"People have been displaced; it's a hardship," said board President Mary Bergeron. "I hope other employees would understand that."

Bergeron also emphasized the financial strain additional students would put on the system.

"If we open it up for everybody, we are not going to be reimbursed for that," Bergeron said.

Teachers who have not been displaced by the storm should not be allowed to send their children to district schools, said board member Alfred Green.

"We are in no way changing the policy," said board member John Smith. "The only thing we are asking is to waive that policy for one year."

There is no plan for the district to waive the policy and allow all teachers to enroll their children in the district, Cancienne said Monday.

The board will vote on the policy tonight at its monthly board meeting at the district's central office in Luling. The meeting will start at 6:30 p.m.

Hurricane Rita halts St. Bernard reconstruction

By Manuel Torres
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

Cleanup and reconstruction efforts came to a halt in St. Bernard Tuesday as contractors began complying with a mandatory evacuation prompted by the threat of Hurricane Rita.

Silence replaced the sounds of bulldozers and emergency vehicles as hundreds of civilians and emergency personnel began leaving the parish. Officials said most nonessential personnel should leave by today. But elected officials said they are waiting to see where Rita heads before deciding if they themselves will evacuate.

Most parish officials rode out Katrina in the parish.

St. Bernard ordered the evacuation late Monday after Blanco told officials that they needed to leave, and the Army Corps of Engineers warned that levees destroyed by Katrina offered little or no protection from any type of storm surge.

With the reconstruction progress suspended, officials turned their attention to their mounting fiscal troubles and put pressure on Entergy to begin restoring power in St. Bernard. The entire parish was flooded by Katrina and power is out throughout the area.

"We don't even have a light bulb turned on here," Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez said.

Rodriguez chastised Entergy for not restoring power to the parish yet. Entergy has said that the transmission lines feeding St. Bernard suffered extensive damage, but the company has indicated that they expect to restore a substation in Arabi by the end of this week. Rodriguez said officials are primarily concerned with returning power to the parish's two refineries.

Parish officials are also trying to find ways to pay for their expenses and keep government functioning. The parish has received over $31 million from FEMA, and Rodriguez said they might also be able to tap reserves accumulated to build a new water plant.

"We should be able to make payroll and be alright," he said.

At the sheriff's office, Sheriff Jack Stephens painted a much bleaker picture. He said his department paid employees Tuesday, but he said he needs a cash infusion of at least $800,000 to make payroll for his 400 employees two weeks from now.

Stephens said that while he is seeking FEMA's help, he has asked the state to help him secure a private loan.

The crisis in the sheriff's office underscores the fiscal hit local governments suffered after Katrina, which in St. Bernard wiped out practically the entire sales tax base and destroyed many of the properties that generate taxes that pay for many public services.

Stephens, who acts as the parish tax collector, said that with almost all parish residents displaced, he doesn't even know where to mail tax bills that were to be sent out next month.

"Even if we had addresses, most people will not be able to pay the bill," he said.

On top of trying to pay for daily expenses, government entities are trying to replace equipment Katrina destroyed. Stephens said his department will need about $6.5 million to replace 70 of the department's 110 vehicles and other equipment that flooded.

As he lamented his situation, and pondered whether his office will be reimbursed for expenses caused by Katrina, Stephens compared the situation to a patient waiting for medical test results.

"It's like doing a biopsy," he said, "and not getting the results to see if you have cancer or not."

Displaced officials drop anchor on cruise ship

But St. Bernard 'home' far from luxurious

By Paul Rioux
Staff writer

More than 400 people are staying in the Scotia Prince as they help clean up St. Bernard Parish. Parish President Henry 'Junior' Rodriguez and his wife, Evelyn, are among those staying on the ship.

With virtually every structure in St. Bernard Parish destroyed or rendered uninhabitable by Hurricane Katrina, finding a place for local officials and cleanup workers to live was a difficult task.

But a recently de-mothballed cruise ship has provided temporary shelter for a place with a desperate need for it.

The Scotia Prince is home to more than 400 people who are helping clean up the mess Katrina made of the parish. The Federal Emergency Management Agency has agreed to pay $52,000 a day to keep the 470-foot ship docked at the Chalmette slip for six months, with an option for three more months.

While the Scotia Prince is not a posh, top-of-the-line cruise ship, those who now call it home are happy to have it in St. Bernard.

"It sure ain't the Carnival Cruise line, but we were pretty desperate for housing," said Larry Ingargiola, the parish's director of emergency preparedness. "You could have brought us a pirogue with a bed in it and we would have taken it."

He said the ship is a stop-gap measure as parish officials build a trailer city near the government complex on Judge Perez Drive to house firefighters, sheriff's deputies, parish employees and others helping to rebuild the parish.

The six-month contract will cost $9.5 million, which is being billed directly to FEMA, Ingargiola said. The three-month option would cost another $4.75 million.

While everyone onboard seems grateful to have a place to sleep and three hot buffet-style meals a day, some say the vessel seems more like a glorified ferry than a cruise ship. And they have a point.

Built in 1972 in Yugoslavia, the ship served as an overnight ferry from Portland, Maine, to Nova Scotia, with a 200-car capacity. The eight-deck vessel was lengthened and refurbished to serve as a cruise ship in 1987 by Prince of Fundy Cruises.

The ship's captain declined to be interviewed, but a crew member said the Scotia Prince had been dry-docked for an extended period before it was hurriedly cleaned and supplied in Miami and sent to the St. Bernard Port.

After the ship arrived last week, it took several days for the crew to work out some kinks. Most notably, the air-conditioning system kept shutting down, leaving "passengers" lying awake at night in the heat.

Also, some of the cabin door locks had become difficult to open because of inactivity.

One of the ship's two "suites" is reserved for Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez and his wife, Evelyn. "It was nice. It even has a tub," Evelyn Rodriguez said. "But we only stayed there one night because I have a little claustrophobia."

Claus Boettcher of Pinneberg, Germany, found ample space for his 6-foot-5 inch frame in the cabin he shares with three men from the Federal Agency for Technical Support, a German agency helping repair the parish's water pumps.

Before arriving at the Scotia Prince on Sunday, he had been staying on a naval ship with up to 30 people in a cramped barracks-style room. "The distance between the tip of your nose and the bunk above you was approximately 30 centimeters," or about a foot, he said.

Besides a little extra nose room, the ship offers a few other amenities. The duty free shop has been turned into an American Red Cross commissary to dispense toiletries, snack food and clothing. The casino has satellite phones and wireless Internet access. But the most popular spot is the Concorde Dining Room, where a recent lunch offering included beef tips, tuna melt sandwiches and steamed vegetables.

"The food is pretty good," Parish Councilwoman Judy Hoffmeister said. "It sure beats an MRE."

U.S. asked to finance N.O. health facilities

LSU can't afford to replace Charity

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — The federal government is being asked to foot the bill for temporary medical units in New Orleans until new facilities can be built to replace Charity Hospital, which officials said likely will be declared a total loss as a result of Hurricane Katrina-related damage.

The requests, made during meetings Tuesday with White House and congressional officials, calls for the Pentagon to provide the USS Comfort, a Navy hospital ship, to be used as a temporary replacement for Charity Hospital. The USS Comfort has been deployed off the Gulf Coast, but is now being sent offshore to ride out approaching Hurricane Rita.

Dwayne Thomas, the chief executive officer for Charity, now known as the Medical Center of Louisiana at New Orleans, said the federal government is also being asked to provide portable military medical field hospitals to take over medical care when the Comfort is deployed elsewhere.

There was no immediate comment from the Navy or White House, but Thomas and Donald Smithburg, vice chancellor and CEO of the LSU health care system, which operates Charity, said they got a sympathetic ear from the Bush administration and members of Congress.

"How many will stay, how many will repatriate to New Orleans has yet to be determined," Smithburg said. "But we know we have a responsibility to care for the underinsured, the uninsured."

Smithburg said that even before Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans, officials were planning for a replacement facility because it was aging building that has been deteriorating. Given the hurricane's impact on the LSU system's revenue picture, he said, the system is no longer able to join in the financing and is looking for the federal government to provide the entire $750 million cost of building a new medical center in New Orleans, along with a new facility in Baton Rouge, budgeted for another $600 million to $700 million.

William Jenkins, chancellor of the LSU system, said doctors, nurses and orderlies performed "heroically" as Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans, continuing to treat Charity patients despite a loss of power, and dwindling supplies of food and medicine while awaiting an evacuation that took five days to complete.

Thomas said the hospital has been the only source of medical care to tens of thousands of New Orleans residents who lack health insurance, and those numbers are likely to rise as people return to the city, in many instances without their previous jobs or homes.

"I do believe that they will return, and we will be there to serve them," Thomas said.

Rita has offshore workers packing up again

By Jaquetta White
Business writer

Energy companies in the Gulf of Mexico on Tuesday continued evacuating workers and halting production in preparation for Hurricane Rita.

For Stone Energy, the task is discouraging. Stone had returned to about 80 percent of its production capacity in the three weeks since Hurricane Katrina churned through the Gulf. Now the company is faced with perhaps losing any gains it had made while production is stopped for as long as four days, said Kenneth Beer, the company's chief financial officer.

"With Rita, everyone is going to have to come off the platforms again," Beer said. "Obviously from a safety standpoint and security standpoint, it's the right thing to do. But with energy prices so high, it's hard to turn off the tap."

Stone isn't alone. Majors and independents throughout the Gulf, including Shell Oil, Chevron Corp. and BP PLC, continued to evacuate Tuesday with the approach of Rita, which grew Tuesday to a Category 2 storm.

According to a report released by the Minerals Management Service, 136 platforms and 15 rigs were evacuated in the Gulf as of Tuesday afternoon. The amount of oil flow that was halted, or "shut in," corresponded to about 58 percent of daily production in the Gulf and nearly 35 percent of daily natural gas production.

On Friday, before news of then-Tropical Storm Rita was widespread, 56 percent of daily oil and 34 percent of daily natural gas production remained shut in following Katrina.

Since Aug. 26, about 26 million barrels of oil and 120 billion cubic feet of gas have remained shut in. That's equal to Gulf oil and gas production of 4.7 percent and 3.3 percent, respectively.

Beer said the current shut-in could cost Stone about $8 million over four days of lost revenue. That doesn't include such costs as hiring helicopters and boats to move personnel ashore.

"The big, big cost is, we're not able to produce and get revenue for four days worth of volume. (Four days) is a big number right now," Beer said.

For Marathon Oil, the shutins will be a step in the wrong direction. Just one of the four platforms the company operates in the Gulf escaped damage from Hurricane Katrina. That one, its largest, had started producing again during the Labor Day weekend and had reached its daily maximum production capability of 17,000 barrels of oil and 17.5 million cubic feet of gas.

It was evacuated Tuesday.

Dominion Resources, which has several undamaged platforms in the Gulf and has received clearance from the MMS to resume production, has not done so because it has nowhere to send its product, said David Auchter, a company spokesman. Pipelines on the floor of the Gulf that carry oil and gas to shore were damaged during Hurricane Katrina.

The worry now is that Hurricane Rita could further damage those lines and leave production shut in for a much longer period.

Markets shook off the news. Crude oil futures prices, which surged more than $4 a barrel on Monday, on Tuesday fell $1.16, to $66.23 a barrel, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Entergy unit in N.O. may file for bankruptcy

Hurricane caused millions in damage

By Keith Darcé
Business writer

The high cost of repairing hurricane-damaged power networks and a potentially crippling loss of customers is forcing Entergy New Orleans to consider filing for bankruptcy protection, the electricity and natural gas utility's parent company said Tuesday.

Even if Entergy New Orleans does move to reorganize its finances through a bankruptcy proceeding, the company will continue operating.

News of the bankruptcy possibility came on the same day Moody's downgraded Entergy New Orleans' debt five steps to junk status.

Repairing damage caused by Hurricane Katrina could cost all of Entergy's Gulf Coast utilities $750 million to $1.1 billion, the company said. Entergy New Orleans' portion of those costs could run from $325 million to $475 million.

Those figures are estimates and could change as utility crews gain access to areas that were flooded after the storm and make a more accurate damage assessment, Entergy Corp. said.

The costs could prompt some of the company's utilities to seek higher rates from regulators, a move that could be especially painful to utility customers who already are facing higher cooling and heating bills because of rising prices for natural gas, the main fuel at power plants in Louisiana.

A bankruptcy filing could help shield customers, many of whom lived in poverty before the storm, from bearing a larger portion of the recovery costs while protecting the integrity of the utility, said Entergy Chief Executive Officer Dan Packer.

Entergy earned $933 million in 2004 on revenue of $10.1 billion.

Entergy New Orleans has lost business from as many as 130,000 customers who evacuated the city. That represents 69 percent of Entergy New Orleans' customer base. Another 35,000 to 40,000 Entergy Louisiana customers have been displaced. The utilities don't know when those customers will return to their homes and businesses and reconnect utility services, Entergy said. The displaced customers account for $160 million to $190 million in annual revenue for Entergy New Orleans and $50 million to $60 million in annual revenue for Entergy Louisiana.

Although Entergy New Orleans accounts for only about 3 percent of the parent company's earnings, Wall Street is closely monitoring the crisis, said Debra Bromberg, a utility stock analyst at Jefferies & Co. in New York. "Investors in the near term will be mostly concerned about being able to adequately recover costs from the hurricane," she said.

The company hopes to recover some of its storm costs from insurance payments, federal assistance and changes in the rates that its utilities charge customers.

Entergy New Orleans holds about $400 million in property insurance policies, Bromberg said.

Already, company executives have talked to federal lawmakers about providing money for utility restoration and repair work through the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act, community development block grants and other relief programs created in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

In a prepared statement, Entergy said it believes it has the financial liquidity to meet its obligations as well as pay for restoration efforts. But the combination of lower revenue and increased costs because of the storm, which are concentrated at Entergy's New Orleans unit, "are expected to create liquidity constraints at that company."

In addition to considering filing for bankruptcy protection, Entergy said it is considering other options, including advancing money to the New Orleans unit and taking on debt.

About 226,000 Entergy customers, mostly in New Orleans, remained without power Tuesday. At the peak of the disaster, 1.1 million Entergy customers were in the dark in Louisiana and Mississippi.

Shares of Entergy fell 85 cents Tuesday to close at $74.39 on the New York Stock Exchange.

State starts reviving its cultural economy

Post-9/11 New York has lessons to offer

By Rebecca Mowbray
Business writer

Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu and national tourism industry leaders said the New Orleans hospitality industry can rebuild by leveraging Louisiana's cultural assets, lobbying for federal financial assistance, and learning from New York's comeback after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"We're here today to announce our plan to rebuild the cultural economy of the state of Louisiana," said Landrieu, whose office is in charge of state museums, parks and tourism advertising. "We have to rebuild the metropolitan area of the city of New Orleans, because this area is the soul of America."

Landrieu's news conference Tuesday at the Shaw Center for the Arts in Baton Rouge was the first official gathering of the tourism industry since Hurricane Katrina hit three weeks ago. At Landrieu's side were tourism and convention leaders from across the state and national tourism industry executives, all wearing stickers that said "New Orleans Louisiana Rebirth: Restoring the Soul of America."

Landrieu called for business assistance and workforce development for all entities in the state's tourism industry, which employs 120,000 people and generated $9.9 billion in visitor spending last year. A national and international advertising and public relations campaign is also needed to restore the image of New Orleans and Louisiana after images of flooding and looting were beamed around the globe.

Landrieu has created the nonprofit Cultural Economy Foundation to handle relief donations related to the arts, and has created a national advisory board of tourism and arts leaders from across the country to help guide New Orleans' reconstruction. National industry groups the Tourism Business Roundtable and the Travel Industry Association of America pledged their support and lobbying muscle for rebuilding the Louisiana tourism industry after the hurricane.

"I can promise you as an American and a New Yorker that you were there for us, and we will be there for you," said Jonathan Tisch, chief executive of Loews Hotels, which has a property in New Orleans, and chairman of the Tourism Business Roundtable.

TIA and the Tourism Business Roundtable sent an open letter to federal policymakers Tuesday detailing the economic impact of the Gulf Coast tourism industry and asking for federal help.

The groups recommended federal financing for local tourism promotion because groups such as the New Orleans Metropolitan Convention and Visitors Bureau have no budget now that their members are shut down and tourism taxes are not being generated. They also recommended congressional action to increase the business meal tax deduction and restore the spousal travel deduction to spur visitation and spending along the Gulf Coast. Other recommendations called for a variety of tax programs to assist displaced tourism employees, to help companies that continued to pay or house workers after the storm, and to help small businesses get loans and make business investments.

While there are some similarities between New York and New Orleans, the situations differ because New Orleans is completely shut down and will be unable to accommodate visitors as quickly as New York did. And, while Americans had a patriotic response to the terrorist attacks by wanting to travel to New York, it's unclear whether Americans will want to make the same sympathy visits to New Orleans after seeing the widely broadcast images of looting in the city after the storm.

But Tisch said he's confident that travelers will return to New Orleans.

Roger Dow, president of the Travel Industry Association, emphasized the economic reasons why the New Orleans tourism industry will bounce back. Rebuilding the Gulf Coast tourism industry is critical, Dow said.

Other tourism industry leaders at the meeting pledged that their attractions would reopen as soon as possible.

Ron Forman, president and chief executive of the Audubon Nature Institute, said that most of the damage at the Audubon campuses was at the Aquarium of the Americas, where about 10,000 aquatic creatures died. The sea lions were saved and went to Houston, and the penguins and the sea otters are staying at the Monterey Bay Aquarium.

In order to reopen, the Audubon Institute needs to stabilize its facilities by getting the water and electricity running, and it needs to replace the animals that died. Forman estimates that bringing back the Audubon Institute will cost about $25 million.

Although Six Flags New Orleans was flooded during the storm and its parent company, Six Flags Inc., has put itself up for auction, Terry Prather, the park's general manager, pledged that the park will reopen.

Eastern New Orleans resident Betty Brown helps her husband, Yancy Brown, slide in through a slit in their home's garage door. They had tried the front door, but the key would not turn in the lock.

Some areas aren't ready for people

Sunday's, Monday's and Tuesday's papers contained stories about residents returning to their homes in Lakeview and New Orleans east to assess damage and salvage whatever they could. However, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin has not yet issued the green light to people living in these areas to return. Surely I am not the only person wondering how these residents managed to dodge the checkpoints that are supposedly in place to prevent such unauthorized re-entries.

By printing such stories, you are encouraging others to attempt to re-enter the city before it has been deemed safe to do so.

Why couldn't FEMA get in? I did

Re: "Need, response proved out of sync," Page 1, Sept. 18. I read with interest reporter Bill Walsh's excellent review of the events leading up to Hurricane Katrina's landfall and the first few days after. I would add a couple of items:

The assertions of FEMA and military representatives that they could not get to the city have proven to be, shall we say, untrue. Many of us returned to the city in the days following landfall. I returned three times in the first week, the first time in the early afternoon of Monday, the day Katrina hit, as the storm was waning. Among the many places I drove my father-in-law's pickup truck were the Superdome and the Veteran's Memorial Boulevard bridge across the 17th Street Canal.

Mr. Walsh states that when President Bush arrived almost a week after the storm, a long-awaited convoy of food, supplies and troops rumbled ahead of him into New Orleans through deep water. What he didn't mention was that if this convoy had bothered to ask, it could have taken the high and dry Camp Street off-ramp to the Convention Center and wouldn't have gotten a tire wet. The arrogance and ineptitude were astounding.

Bywater resident wants to return

I am an arts administrator living on Alvar Street between Chartres and Royal streets in the Bywater. I was there for the hurricane and was not evacuated until the Friday afterward. I am anxious to return, since there was no water in my neighborhood from about St. Claude Avenue to the river.

Meanwhile, I have a couple of requests to make of The Times-Picayune. Please send more copies of the newspaper to the Lafayette area. There are thousands of New Orleanians here, and we can't get our hands on The Times-Picayune.

Also, please ask the city to publicize when people from the Faubourg Marigny and the dry part of Bywater will have utilities back on and can return. We hear about the French Quarter, but nothing more.

And please look into the fact that the American Red Cross is helping evacuees all over the country, but not in Lafayette! It is ridiculous! Three weeks after the storm, no help is available from the Red Cross. People are truly angry and frustrated here.

Educating America

First, let me applaud the heroic efforts of The Times-Picayune during this disaster. An unfortunate circumstance has shown the world The Times-Picayune's commitment to journalism.

I would like to suggest using the approaching Hurricane Rita to educate the rest of America about what would need to occur to completely evacuate New Orleans, in real time, in the face on an impending hurricane disaster. As so much criticism has been placed on our leaders since Hurricane Katrina, a real-time exercise showing the necessary time line would demonstrate to America that we are not slow Southern morons who don't know when to come in out of the rain.

We would need to start evacuating the city now in order to be safe from the hurricane at landfall. Would America support federal dollars being used to evacuate New Orleans each time a hurricane was three to four days from landfall?

Using Rita in her current state with a real-time analysis would help show the rest of the world what so many Louisianians have been trying to get across to everyone who asks why†they didn't evacuate.

A frustrating search

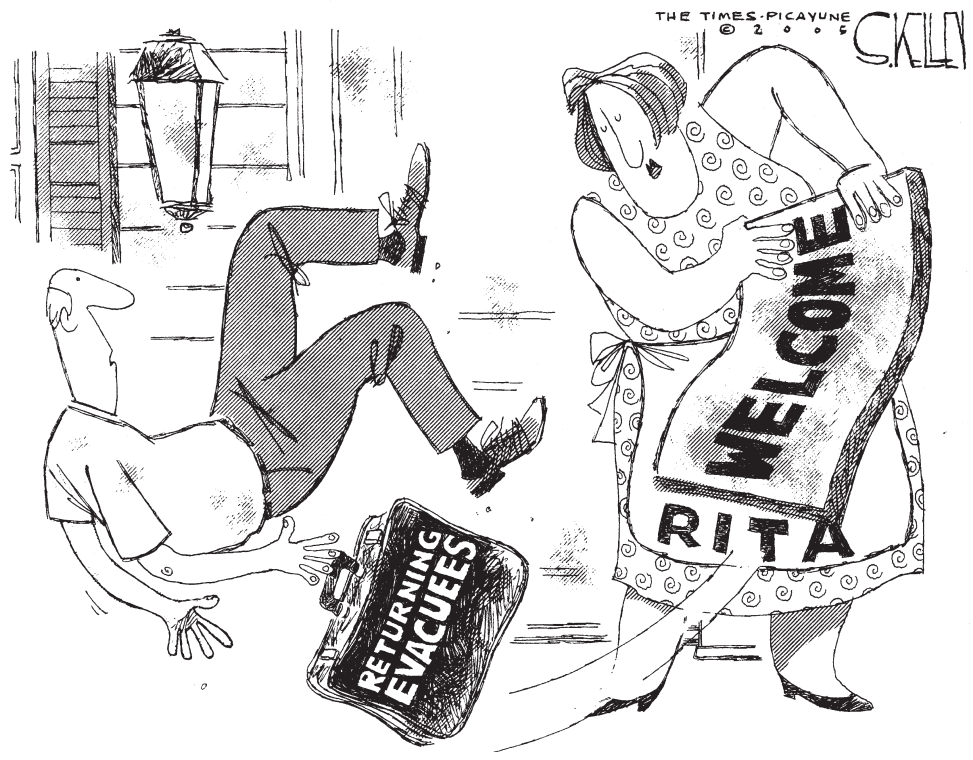
I am a pet owner frantically searching for my cats. I registered with the Humane Society and the SPCA. We were told to look for pictures of our pets on Petfinders.com. If you see one that resembles your pet, you are to call the number given for the shelter.



However, when I called the number given, I was told that the phone number is incorrect and that they do not have information regarding lost pets. The person who answered gave me a number for the SPCA. I called for two days before reaching an SPCA administrator. She told me that the SPCA office is unmanned and that they will not provide that information either, even if they do happen to answer the phone. She sent me back to Petfinders and the shelter. But the number on Petfinders does not lead people to their pets. That number must be changed.

Many who are searching for their pets have no access to computers. Their pets are being shipped all over the country after a short stay in Baton Rouge or Gonzales. The overtaxed volunteers there are frustrated because people aren't coming to look for them, apparently unaware that many of us, myself included, don't have cars any more, if we did before Katrina.

It isn't only that rogue groups of rescuers have made it hard for us to find our pets, as the SPCA claims. The SPCA's system has made it impossible.

The SPCA administrator told me that the group's sole focus is on rescuing as many pets as possible, which is commendable. But what will happen to these thousands of animals when their owners can't find them? Many well-loved pets, like my ill, 15-year-old† cat, will be euthanized while the SPCA and the Humane Society reap donations from people impressed by their efforts.†I, as a pet owner, am far from impressed. I'm outraged.

More embarrassment for Kenner

Kenner Mayor Phil Capitano and Police Chief Nick Congemi don't have to like each other. But when a hurricane threatens the city, the two elected officials should be able to cooperate on keeping the public safe.

Instead, Hurricane Katrina only intensified the political rivalry between Mr. Congemi and Mr. Capitano. The resulting lack of coordination between police and other city agencies is an embarrassment to the city, and it could have put human lives at risk.

Members of the mayor's camp say police failed to return phone calls from City Hall. They also say that, after the storm, Mr. Congemi's department ran a separate relief operation from police headquarters rather than joining with the rest of city government. Most seriously, Mr. Capitano's administration accuses the Police Department of getting in the way of other city agencies' work. According to Fire Chief Mike Zito, a police officer in an unmarked car stopped the Fire Department's chief medical officer as he tried to deliver tetanus shots to a shelter.

For his part, Mr. Congemi insists that the Police Department merely executed its own emergency-preparedness plan. By contrast, he suggests, City Hall officials failed to prepare sufficiently for the storm and are trying to blame him for their problems.

If the chief has specific evidence of a lack of preparation on the administration's part, he should make it public. Regardless, any Police Department hurricane plan that doesn't involve close work with the city's chief executive is no plan at all. And while Mr. Congemi maintains that his department works "with anyone who comes in the door," the rest of city government isn't just anyone.

The situation in Kenner is ludicrous. As much of the rest of the metro area lay devastated, Mr. Congemi and Mr. Capitano's chief administrative officer, Cedric Floyd, took the opportunity to tear into each other before a Times-Picayune photographer and a visiting CNN crew.

Mr. Floyd was delivering food to an apartment complex with a number of low-income Latino residents when Mr. Congemi accused him of "trying to run them off." Mr. Floyd accused the police chief of discriminating against minorities. Mr. Congemi responded, "You run off your mouth about how much you care about these people, and you don't give them anything."

Lovely. Viewers in Peoria, London and Timbuktu surely wondered why two top Kenner officials were shouting at each other in their city's time of need.

Nursing private grudges at a time of public crisis is a risky political strategy. If Kenner's elected officials don't change their ways, voters might start casting about for leaders who'll put the general welfare first. Watching the two sides blasting away at each other is annoying under the best of circumstances. But amid a cataclysm, the pettiness ought to stop.

Question of control

Louisiana's congressional delegation has known for some time that a first-hand look at the state's coastal erosion problems is more convincing than words alone, and they're wisely using that strategy to build support for Hurricane Katrina recovery.

A band of 14 senators, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and Sen. Thad Cochran of Mississippi, who chairs the Appropriations Committee, toured the ravaged region by helicopter and inspected downtown New Orleans on the ground. What they saw clearly had a strong impact on them.

Sen. Edward Kennedy said he had seen extensive television coverage and had talked to evacuees. "But nothing — nothing, nothing, nothing — compares with seeing for ourselves the devastation that we have seen for the last few hours and we'll continue to see," he said.

The senators pledged support for rebuilding efforts, and that's something this region badly needs to hear. Sen. Cochran said the resources will be made available, and Sen. Frist said Congress will act "swiftly and decisively" to rebuild the region.

Though no one is disputing the need for significant federal help, the question of who will control the money looks likely to provoke more dissent. Some senators favor out-of-state auditors to keep an eye on spending. Sen. Cochran said, "We're going to come back again and again to see that it's done right."

Their concern is not without foundation. It's clear that the deluge of spending on homeland security that followed the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks included some very questionable items. According to Washington Post reports, for instance, $5.4 million was spent on nine months' salary for the chief executive of an events logistics company that was created and then folded during the life of the contract.

Louisiana also has a reputation to overcome. Regrettably, our state is known for political corruption at every level of government. That tag is not entirely fair at this point, but it will be difficult to shake.

Still, Sen. Mary Landrieu was adamant about the need for local control. "Louisiana will be rebuilt by Louisianians. New Orleans will be rebuilt by New Orleanians," she said. That viewpoint must prevail if this region is to revive and thrive.

Oversight is one thing, control is another. It's good that Senate leaders understand the scope of this disaster and are committed to helping us overcome what could otherwise be a fatal blow. But that doesn't mean we can't figure out what needs to be done here.

Kermit Ruffins plays his trumpet to an appreciative crowd peppered with displaced New Orleanians at Sammy's nightclub in Houston.

RUFFIN IT IN HOUSTON

Kermit Ruffins and other New Orleans musicians are finding warmth, hometown fans and a place to play in Texas

By Keith Spera
Music writer

HOUSTON – Like hundreds of previous Thursdays, Sept. 8 found Big Easy trumpeter Kermit Ruffins in his element: Onstage, black fedora over a blue bandana, cold beers at the ready, easing into "When It's Sleepy Time Down South."

But Ruffins was not at Vaughan's, the tumble-down Bywater watering hole where he reigned most Thursdays for more than a decade. He was 500 miles west at Sammy's, a downtown Houston nightclub.

After fleeing Hurricane Katrina, Ruffins landed in Houston alongside scores of fellow musicians and New Orleanians. A hastily organized coalition dubbed NOAH, for New Orleans And Houston, welcomed them.

Years ago NOAH's Jeff Kaplan, by day a broker of inner-city Houston real estate, paid a visit to Donna's, the North Rampart Street brass band hotspot, and was immediately smitten with the scene and its characters. When he learned of the displaced musicians now in his midst, he quickly secured 30 apartments in midtown and has worked tirelessly to get them settled.

Meredith Grover dons an Irish Channel T-shirt at Sammy's, where she finds a willing dance partner in fellow evacuee Mike Higgins.

"These guys are really making Houston home," Kaplan said.

He also arranged for Sammy's to serve as a de facto headquarters for the transplanted brass band community. Co-owner Sammy Ralford, an R&B singer and longtime fixture of Houston nightlife, readily agreed to take in the New Orleanians.

So on Sept. 8 Ruffins joined members of the New Birth Brass Band, the Lil' Rascals Brass Bands and Bonerama at Sammy's, to initiate this new residency in exile, which continued the following Thursday.

All involved followed very different paths to Houston, some more harrowing than others.

TV and radio broadcasters take audiences back to their hurricane-damaged homes

By Dave Walker
TV columnist

It's homecoming week.

The experience of returning to a household that was blown, tossed and soaked by Hurricane Katrina — the heartbreaking re-entry to places where lives were lived, left behind and maybe lost — has already been previewed by two awfully beautiful stories by local broadcast newsmen.

WWL-Channel 4 meteorologist Carl Arredondo took a photographer on his return to his storm-surge-drenched Slidell home.

DAVE WALKER
On the Air

WWL AM-870 news director Dave Cohen packed a tape recorder into his flooded Metairie house. The story opened with the sound of water sloshing at his feet.

The first sign of the water's fury at Arredondo's place: Garage doors in most of the neighborhood had buckled inward. As viewers saw, the same thing happened to the interior walls of his house. Two highway exits inland, the storm-surge water mark measured more than 3 feet from the floor.

"I saw things — I saw furniture rearranged — that boggled my mind," Arredondo said. "I saw a toy chest that had been in my son's and stepson's room that had been moved completely out of the room, through a hallway, into a living room and almost into the kitchen.

"To think about it being moved from one side of the house to another, it was amazing to know that water could've done that.

"Then again, one little table that had a lamp and two crystal thermometers was in the same place it was when I left."

Arredondo had watched and reported on the campaign waged by Katrina's eyewall. He realized that the vector of destruction knew his address.

"My perspective may be different than everyone else's," Arredondo said. "I know what the damage of a storm can be. I expected some damage when I saw the eyewall hit Slidell.

"I was prepared for wind damage. I didn't expect the water to get that far."

Hardest was seeing the damage to little things his family loved. A basket of favorite stuffed toy animals was ruined.

"I've never put much value on material things," he said. "I know things can be replaced."

"To see those (toys) soaked and muddy — that's where I

A family of New Orleans police officers lost their homes but not their hearts

MARKSVILLE — Personal loss and tragedy took a back seat for the Palumbo family, all members of the New Orleans Police Department, who had a five-day R&R break here after working 14 straight days and going four-plus days without a shower.

Thirty-year NOPD veteran Sam Palumbo, 54, of the 8th District (French Quarter) had an aunt drown along with 33 others in St. Rita's Nursing Home in St. Bernard Parish and he got water in his Metairie home. His son Andrew Palumbo, 28, a seven-year veteran of the vice squad, got married in 2004 and his wife is expecting their first child. He lost the home he had just renovated on Louis XIV Street in Lakeview where the floodwaters topped the gutters. Son Sammy Palumbo Jr., 24, a 3-year veteran of the 6th District (Central City) put it more succinctly:

"I used to live on Avenue B right off 36th Street - used to. The break was around 40th Street, four blocks from the 17th Street Canal," he said.

All three are Archbishop Rummel High graduates. But what the Palumbos really are, said Sam, is "a police family." His dad is a retired NOPD and Jefferson Parish sheriff's officer. A brother worked for the NOPD and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. His sons always wanted to be cops. The work has been brutal, the hours long, and their losses severe. But — no complaints. In conversations he's had with other fellow officers, he estimates that 70 percent of the NOPD's officers lost their houses.

"You don't have time to think about your own house or take care of it," Sam said. "You're trying to save people and dodge bullets. You're patrolling the city. That's what we do."

Like many other brave officers, the Palumbos spent much of their time in boats, pulling people off of rooftops, coaxing them out of their homes, ferrying them in vans to the Convention Center and the Superdome. But even after they did that, there was a feeling of helplessness.

"People were sick, begging for help and there's nothing you can do," said Andrew. "I'm looking at people on the interstate literally dying. There's no EMS to call, no hospital I can take them to. There was this old guy who came up and said he just had triple bypass surgery. A helicopter landed on the interstate. We got him there. I'm assuming he got help but I don't know. There was no one we could call."

A teenager during hurricanes Betsy and Camille, Sam Palumbo said that he knew "when the big one they've been talking about for years hit, we could be in for a long ride." Then, when the next day dawned and the officers who had been bunkered down at the Marriott and the J.W. Marriot Hotels, like Sam, took a look around and they felt a little better.

Police family rides out a 'big one'

LIND, from C-1

"The sun came up and the eye was just passing and my feeling was we escaped another one." Then, "all hell broke loose when the levees broke and we lost communication with each other."

Once the radio went out, they commandeered boats and ran the interstates with vans. There were civilian volunteers, he said, who came from New Iberia and Lafayette, including "a few guys who used their vacation time to come here and help."

"I was riding on I-610 and you'd look on both sides toward the 3rd District and the 5th District and Jesus, it was just amazing - all water," he said. "We'd been getting in the water every day and it was just getting worse and worse. The water, it's wasn't brown — it was black. We'd tell the driver to get moving — it stunk that bad.

"Chef Menteur was dry," said Sammy Jr., "but to think that from Chef to Hayne Boulevard and from Downman Road to the Venetian Isles was under water — that's just about all of New Orleans east. And the east is a big area."

Sam Sr. was in a Blackhawk helicopter flying over some of the flooded areas, including Old Metairie. "It was weird," he said. "We went over Metairie Country Club and you could see about three greens and two tee boxes — that was it. You could see a few more at New Orleans Country Club, but not much more."

Sam Sr. also went on camera with NBC-TV's Ted Koppel after he learned about his aunt. "I told him, do not ask the name of a nursing home or where it was. I would not want to find out my relative died that way on TV."

A TV crew from Spain asked Sam to find them a body. Palumbo asked them why they were here covering a hurricane in the Gulf. He said their reply was that "the Europeans feel that this storm has crippled the most powerful country in the world."

Palumbo told them that was hardly the case.

His personal worst moment, he said, came when he was with the South Carolina Department of Natural Resources, who came in to help out. "You live in that city all your life, and there are so many memories. We passed St. Matthias Church at Broad and General Pershing, under water. That's where Debbie and I got married," he said. "I lost it. I know that neighborhood like the back of my hand. Debbie lived on Walmsley, off Rendon. There are so many good memories . . ."

A veteran officer on any large city police force has seen his share of death and bloodshed, sorrow, loss and despair. "Yes, you do get hardened by looking at so many crime scenes and seeing bodies," Sam Sr. said. "But this was different. You look, see a body floating and then you've got to move on and see if you can help the next person. There's no helping the last."

What was difficult, he said, was that "most of the people who died during this storm were helpless. It was worse than a murder scene. These were helpless people who died for no cause at all."

Morale, said Sammy Jr., "got low when we heard people (officers) were leaving. But when other police and other fire departments started coming in, well, your morale goes back up."

And when the food and water was dropped in, that made it even better.

"But it's still tough when you know you've lost everything you had."

Sam's wife, Debbie, and Andrew's wife, Maritza, five months pregnant, evacuated to a cousin's home in Marksville before the storm. They didn't bring many clothes, but they got all the family photos, wedding albums and the baby clothes.

"Friends keep calling and checking on us," Andrew said. "I tell 'em everybody's safe and alive. You can rebuild a house — you can't rebuild a life. I just thank God that I didn't have to go in a boat and pull my wife off a roof."

At one point during the most terrifying part of the storm's aftermath, Debbie Palumbo called her husband Sam Sr. after watching some horrifying scenes on television. "She asked me, 'Why are you still there?'

"Because it's my job," he said.

Houston rocks, but it's no gig like home

Ruffins' only previous storm evacuation was in 2004 for Hurricane Ivan, which spared New Orleans with a last-minute eastern drift. He sensed the Big Easy would not be so lucky with Katrina.

"I looked at that thing on TV and said, 'I'm getting out of here,' " he recalled. "It was like common sense."

Before driving to Baton Rouge, he visited a half-dozen watering holes. "We were joking like, 'Hey, this place might be underwater,' " he said. "Just kidding, that normal New Orleans humor. And sure enough, it was the big one."

He arrived in Houston with an entourage of 34 family members and two dogs. He called on a wealthy acquaintance, the former owner of a record label, who promptly provided hotel rooms and apartments.

"Houston ain't nothing to play with," Ruffins said. "They really take care of you."

• • • • • •

Others were not so fortunate. As Katrina approached, New Birth Brass Band trombonist Glen David Andrews stacked most of his belongings in two rear rooms of his Treme home — rooms subsequently crushed by a falling tree, then filled with 6 feet of floodwater.

Left with "nothing but life," Andrews spent 36 hours in the hellish squalor of the Superdome, surrounded by "looters, dead babies and feces." He was finally bussed to the Astrodome in Houston.

He's performed in more than 30 countries, but no longer has a passport or a trombone. He would miss the Astrodome's 11 p.m. curfew to be at Sammy's, but needed the camaraderie more than a cot.

New Orleans trombonist Corey Henry sits in with Kermit Ruffins for a set at Sammy's, a Houston nightclub adopted by some evacuated New Orleanians.

"This is the first day I haven't cried," he said.

Dewon "Itchy" Scott plays drums in Ruffins' band and trumpet in the Lil' Rascals Brass Band. He also left New Orleans empty-handed. He and his wife spent several days trapped by floodwaters in the darkened Booker T. Washington High School. A helicopter finally plucked them from the roof and deposited them on Interstate 10 in Metairie near the Galleria, where they boarded a bus for Baton Rogue and then Houston.

"Look at this," Scott said, indicating the two drumsticks in his back pocket. "That's all I have."

The Sammy's reunion cheered him greatly.

"I never thought I'd see so many musicians again," he said. "It's a blessing and an honor. I'm overwhelmed. I took all of my emotions out on my drums."

• • • • • •

Outside Sammy's, the New Birth Brass Band orchestrated a mini-second line parade, much to the surprise of disembarking passengers at the nearby Greyhound terminal. Bass drummer Tanio Hingle led his crew down the sidewalk, as cars whizzed by on Main Street.

In New Orleans, Mardi Gras beads worn outside Carnival season are the mark of a tourist. At Sammy's, they functioned as badges of honor.

Hingle and his bandmates are bullish on Houston. "They're showing love for all of us," said snare drummer Kerry Hunter. And Ruffins reports receiving "job offers like crazy."

They predict their weekly New Orleans residency at Sammy's will liven up the otherwise lonely downtown. "This ain't gonna be dead no more," Hingle said.

At Sammy's, "we're running it like we're at home," Scott said. "This can be like Vaughan's every Thursday."

Not exactly. The ramshackle Vaughan's is tucked away in an old, residential neighborhood. Ruffins and his Barbecue Swingers set up in a dark corner, on the floor. The building appeared ready to collapse even before Katrina.

Sammy's, in the shadow of skyscrapers, boasts valet parking, a stage, sleek lights, plush banquettes and elegant framed portraits of jazz singers. In honor of the evening's guests, someone taped a picture of the Treme Brass Band's "Uncle" Lionel Batiste to the door.

Despite the warm embrace, said the New Birth's Hunter, their adopted hometown can never replace home.

"In New Orleans, you know you've got the Rebirth Brass Band at the Maple Leaf on Tuesday, the Soul Rebels at Le Bon Temps on Wednesday, Kermit Ruffins at Vaughan's on Thursday, Mardi Gras Indian practices on Sunday, Bob French at Donna's on Monday," Hunter said.

"New Birth could have a gig every day in New Orleans. You can't do that here in Houston."

Diehard New Orleanians must make other adjustments.

A Sammy's bartender boasted that his establishment stocks "just about every beer you could want."

But not Abita.

In Houston, alcoholic beverages stay inside, no exceptions. All drinks must be consumed by 2 a.m., again no exceptions.

And those who arrived late, assuming Ruffins would still operate on "New Orleans time," missed his set. He finished well before midnight, his normal starting time at Vaughan's.

Keyboardist David Torkanowsky traveled from Lafayette for the gig, then returned to Lafayette afterward.

"I drove three hours to play for 20 minutes," Torkanowsky said. "But it feels good to play. And Kermit is one of the bandleaders I respond to without hesitation."

Among the New Orleans expatriates gathered at Sammy's was Ira "Dr. Ike" Padnos, producer of the Ponderosa Stomp, the annual Jazzfest gathering of dozens of lost legends of blues, R&B, rockabilly and New Orleans music.

Padnos left New Orleans with two boxes of old records and little else. He and his wife reveled in seeing the displaced musicians onstage again.

"Get them working, so others can appreciate what they do and they don't feel like they're waiting around in despair," Padnos said. "It's at least a chance to have their dignity, and to do what they love.

"When they hear the music, they'll feel all right. They'll feel like they're home."

• • • • • •

As the evening wore on, it took a toll. Ruffins' eyes are frequently red, but rarely so tired and sad.

A man wearing a Jazzfest T-shirt approached the trumpeter, tears streaming down his face. He lives in Houston but loves New Orleans.

"I'm so glad you're alive," he said. "I've seen you at Vaughan's and the Funky Butt. I love you. God bless you."

After midnight, Lil' Rascals trombonist Corey Henry led a cheer: "New Orleans, we're gonna rebuild, y'all!"

Henry finally shut down the band, but the people wanted more. Bryson Neville, a percussionist in cousin Charmaine Neville's band — and a Superdome survivor — commandeered the microphone.

"Scream for New Orleans!" he shouted.

The response is long and loud, fists and voices raised in defiance of the creeping realization of all that is lost.

Then someone cued up a recording of the Rebirth Brass Band's "Do Whatcha Wanna," and the dance floor filled again.

No one wanted the night, or New Orleans, to die.

Reporters became the story

WALKER, from C-1

guess I got the emotion. I knew it was the things they loved the most.

"That kind of thing means more to them than they do to me. I knew they were going to be sad."

Cohen's homecoming story "was more out of necessity than anything," he said. "I had to keep working. I also had to take care of my home and my family.

"I told my boss that I was going home (and that) that was going to be the story I told."

Cohen's family had evacuated to Alexandria before landfall, allowing him to throw himself at his work — overseeing 40 or so newspeople, several borrowed from radio stations in other cities, covering the catastrophe.

Cohen was on the air when news broke that the 17th Street Canal levee had been breeched, and instantly understood the implications to the thousands of people listening to his voice. Also to the people he worked with.

"My stomach dropped," he said. "My heart dropped. My energy level dropped. We thought we had dodged the atomic bomb. We knew we might be devastated by this hurricane. We didn't know the city would fill with water. That was a real tough moment.

"Both personally and professionally, a very difficult moment, to suddenly have to deliver that kind of news."

By the time he made it to his house, Cohen had surrendered to the notion that he'd had some damage, and was sort of OK with it.

"I convinced myself early on that it's just material, it's just stuff," he said. "Two of my rooms were flooded. The water mark on the back of the house was over a foot. I had to pull out the carpet in two rooms.

"I had some missing shingles. I have no fences anymore. All the fences had blown in around the house. I saw that I have some damage. It's reparable.

"I echo the sentiment of a lot of people I talk to. It's not the damage, it's not the missing shingles, it's not the fence, it's not the power tools I lost. It's the fact that a million people lost their jobs, that I can't see my family every day."

Cohen's radio story had the perfect New Orleans ending. After Cohen dragged his ruined carpet out to the street, assessed his damage and maybe had an intimate conversation with a higher power, he fired up his backyard grill and threw a barbecue.

"When I realized that my home was damaged, the first thing that came to my mind was, 'What do I do now?' "

CARL ARREDONDO
WWL-TV meteorologist

Reporters from Seattle, Kansas City and Buffalo, N.Y., who'd been contributing to WWL's coverage came by. Harry Smith of CBS' 'The Early Show' showed up with his producer, photographer and sound tech. Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard came by.

The gathered ate charred meat. Beverages were taken. The unique fellowship that exists between survivors of extraordinary circumstance transpired.

Then Cohen went back to work.

The existential sadness in both of these stories was the unspoken job ahead for both homeowners.

At the time of his homecoming, Cohen had been working nonstop, every minute of it evident in his on-air voice.

Like everybody, Arredondo had begun mentally cataloging the messy work of resurrecting a life — all while slogging through seven-day futurecasts for his meteorologist-depleted station.

Dealing with the insurance adjuster.

Cutting out the drywall.

Documenting every ruined toy.

"Each DVD," Arredondo said. "The kids' books on their shelves. Each one of the books has to be counted. That seems like such a time-consuming thing."

Letting viewers or listeners experience those first wrenching impressions — showing, not telling, your audience the details of what will be weeks and months of collective anguish — was brave work.

There's been a lot of that lately, by people in all kinds of jobs.

"You can report on and cover hurricanes," Arredondo said. "All our lives in this business, you see people affected, you see homes damaged. It's a distant thing. When I realized that my home was damaged, the first thing that came to my mind was, 'What do I do now? What are the steps?'

"I've seen people lose homes, but that was the point where it ended. I never saw what happened after that.

"I felt helpless."

Multiple pricing available for Saints at LSU

From staff reports

The Saints on Tuesday announced home-game ticket prices for the four games to be played at Tiger Stadium, starting with the contest against Nick Saban's Miami Dolphins on the weekend of Oct. 30. A formal pricing plan for the three games the team will play at the Alamodome in San Antonio was announced last week.

The Saints' other games in Tiger Stadium: the Chicago Bears on the weekend of Nov. 6, the Tampa Bay Buccaneers on the weekend of Dec. 4 and the Carolina Panthers on the weekend of Dec. 18. Exact dates and times will be announced by the NFL in the near future.

For Saints games, full capacity for Tiger Stadium will be 79,000, which is 15,000 more than capacity for Saints games at the Super-

Saints don't make the grade

Turnovers and penalties are to blame for loss at Giants

By Mike Triplett

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — Less than 90 seconds into Monday night's game against the New York Giants, the Saints were playing from behind. And for the full 60 minutes, they looked like a team that was never in control.

AT MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

Sound a little like the early months of the 2004 season?

Trailing 14-0 in the first quarter, 21-7 in the second and 27-10 when the game finally, mercifully ended, this was such a far cry from the Saints' commanding performance one week earlier at Carolina.

This time, the Saints never established the running game and Nothing seemed to go right for the Saints Monday night, even when it seemed to go right. Joe Horn was on his way into the end zone for a touchdown in the fourth quarter when the ball slipped out of his hands, hit the pylon for a touchback.

Saints will finish the season as winners

JOHN DESHAZIER

Well, they won't go undefeated.

Still, the Saints are going to emerge from this nomadic season as winners. Even if a couple of clunkers like their 27-10 loss to the Giants on Monday night are tossed into the mix. Even if there are times that they look distracted during games.

"We sucked on that field," Coach Jim Haslett surmised, correctly, after the game. "It had nothing to do with where we live. We were just poor."

But poor as they were - and the Saints were awful - it won't routinely be that way, if only because it'd be hard to be that rank regularly.

Six turnovers, four of them via quarterback Aaron Brooks' three interceptions and one lost fumble, and 13 penalties is way past any team's norm. That kind of incompetence isn't acceptable even for a team that is displaced, one whose emotions have been yanked to the extreme, one that'll spend more time packing and unpacking luggage this season than some flight attendants.

AP PHOTO

One of the big reasons the Saints lost to the Giants on Monday was because they weren't able to get Deuce McAllister and the running game going. McAllister was held to 47 yards on 15 carries.

But it is correctable, assuming players can focus on the games more than the peripheral stress. That, though, is a heck of a lot easier said than done.

"We lost a football game that I felt we should have won," receiver Joe Horn said, after the Saints dug a hole by fumbling the opening kickoff, then kept on digging as the game progressed.

And yet, it's difficult to hammer these Saints, especially this early, especially considering the extenuating circumstances.

Publicly, they have been telling anyone who will listen, and perhaps privately even are willing to toe the same line, that they aren't looking for sympathy. They're in an unforgiving business – witness the Giants' total willingness

Sugar Bowl could move to Atlanta

But officials are still trying to stay in Louisiana

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

Sugar Bowl executive director Paul Hoolahan said Tuesday that it would be "gut-wrenching" to move the game to Atlanta for one year, but that the odds of that happening are 50-50 right now.

Hoolahan met with the 11 Division I-A commissioners who govern the BCS to discuss possibilities of holding the bowl in Atlanta or LSU's Tiger Stadium because of damage to the Superdome during and after Hurricane Katrina.

No decision is expected for two weeks.

"First and foremost, we want do everything possible to play the game in Louisiana," Hoolahan said. "And that is still doable. But we face formidable challenges, and we are trying to deal with them rationally instead of putting our eggs in one basket. In the end, we have to do what is in the best long term interests of the Sugar Bowl, not just the short term ones."

Hoolahan, who attended the meeting with Sugar Bowl president Mark Romig and senior associate director Jeff Hundley, emphasized that the biggest obstacle to playing the Jan. 2 game at LSU is hotel rooms.

Paul Hoolahan
'First and foremost, we want do everything possible to play the game in Louisiana'

A normal Sugar Bowl fills 32,000 of the 38,000 rooms in the New Orleans area.

Virtually all rooms in Baton Rouge, less than 10,000, are occupied by evacuees and recovery workers with no date as to when they might become available.

In New Orleans, many of the major hotels anticipate reopening in the coming weeks, but Hoolahan said upward of 20-25 percent of their rooms would be used by displaced employees and many of the others are reserved for recovery workers.

"We are working every day to assess the situation with the city and state tourism officials, the restaurants and the merchandisers," Hoolahan said. "Time is of the essence, but we feel we can have a pretty good idea of where we stand in about two weeks.

"Above all, though, we are committed to running the game at the same level which we have traditionally run it. We are not going to diminish this game in any form or fashion."

Atlanta would have plentiful hotel rooms, especially since that city's Peach Bowl is played on Dec. 30, meaning there would be little overlap of visiting fans. There also are ample training facilities for the overlap of time that all four teams would be there.

Peach Bowl executive director Greg Stokan pledged his office's help in whatever the Sugar Bowl would need, including

THE BUZZ IS IN OKLAHOMA CITY

Hornets will play 35 games there, six at the PMAC

By Jimmy Smith
Staff writer

The NBA will announce at a midday news conference today in Oklahoma City that the Hornets will play the bulk of their home schedule this season at that city's Ford Center.

Hornets owner George Shinn, Coach Byron Scott, General Manager Allan Bristow and team president Paul Mott are expected to be in Oklahoma City for the league's disclosure.

The team and the league will announce the Hornets will play 35 games in Oklahoma City and six in Baton Rouge at the Pete Maravich Assembly Center on the LSU campus, though three of those scheduled sometime in March could be moved to New Orleans Arena if repairs to the facility can be made.

"I think the games in Baton Rouge will start in mid-December based on the parameters we got from the people at LSU," Mott said Tuesday. "We're still in negotiations."

The team is waiting, Mott said, for the green light from the NBA to also reveal its plans to base the bulk of its operations in Oklahoma City this season, though a source familiar with the Hornets' plans said earlier in the week that the team would also have a smaller office in either Baton Rouge or New Orleans.

Mott said the team has already identified office space in Oklahoma City.

Lack of premium club seats and box suites, in addition to a seating capacity of about 13,000, make the PMAC a somewhat undesirable venue for the Hornets and the league for more than a half-dozen games, though both would like to keep some sort of local ties in a season that has been affected by the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Oklahoma City has offered the Hornets a 19,000-seat arena, replete with more than 3,000 club seats, and nearly 50 private suites, and a calendar with no date conflicts.

The city and Hornets were finalizing a lease agreement Tuesday that is expected to be approved by the Oklahoma City city council at a special morning meeting today.

With the decision to play most of the home schedule in Oklahoma City, the team's original plans to hold training camp at the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs, Colo., are being reconsidered.

The University of Oklahoma in Norman, about 30 miles from Oklahoma City, has been mentioned as a possible site for training camp, Mott confirmed.

"They reached out to us and made it clear they'd be willing to work with us," Mott said, adding that Bristow is in Oklahoma City scouting possible training camp facilities that also include several other state and private universities.

"We're looking at what makes the most sense," Mott said.

The Hornets are scheduled to begin camp Oct. 4.

Red McCombs must have known something. First, he unloaded the Minnesota Vikings to a New Jersey land developer named Zygi Wilf for $600 million. Then, Hurricane Katrina forced the Saints to evacuate New Orleans and temporarily settle in McCombs' old stomping grounds of San Antonio, which also happens to be Tom Benson's home away from home.

Now the Vikings, 0-2, are playing so poorly that even Hagar The Horrible, the comic strip plunderer, wouldn't claim them.

After a loss to Tampa Bay 24-13 in Week 1 at the Metrodome, a dazed Wilf drove aimlessly around the Twin Cities for five hours, wondering perhaps if McCombs had sold him a lemon.

Quarterback Daunte Culpepper is performing like a journeyman with no touchdown passes, eight interceptions and the NFL's lowest quarterback rating of 41.6 after two games. In Sunday's 37-6 loss to the Cincinnati Bengals, Culpepper threw five interceptions and had two lost fumbles nullified by penalties.

This is the same player who posted a 110.9 passer rating in 2004.

Reports surfaced Tuesday that Culpepper is playing with an unspecified injury to his right knee, initially sustained against Tampa Bay. Culpepper alluded to the injury Monday night on the radio.

Running back Michael Bennett, who fumbled twice against Cincinnati, has been so ineffective that he might be benched for Sunday's game against the Saints at the Metrodome.

Mike Tice, who's operating in the final year of his contract, might not survive past midseason if his team doesn't get it together soon. He's off to his worst start since going 0-4 in his rookie season in 2002.

And a defense that added five starters during the offseason looks unsettled, especially against the Bengals. On the second play from scrimmage, Cincinnati quarterback Carson Palmer collaborated with a wide-open Chad Johnson on a 70-yard touchdown pass.

And the rout was on.

"We have a veteran group with a lot of pride, and we're embarrassed with the way we're playing," Culpepper said. "I'm determined to fix it. One thing we've got to do is stay together."

A players' only meeting is called for Wednesday.

LAST MEETING: Vikings won 38-31 on Oct. 17 at the Superdome in a game played on ESPN. The Vikings amassed 605 yards, the most against a Saints team in franchise history. Culpepper carved up the Saints' defense, completing 26 of 37 passes for 425 yards and five touchdowns.

VIKINGS ON OFFENSE

What offense? When a team falls behind 27-0 in the first half, as it did against the Bengals, you might as well chuck the game plan. At first blush, the Vikings appear to miss wide receiver Randy Moss, who McCombs dealt to the Oakland Raiders during the offseason. But the Vikings didn't fulfill their lofty expectations with Moss and the Raiders are 0-2 with him now. Their biggest loss may be offensive coordinator/quarterbacks coach Scott Linehan, now on Nick Saban's coaching staff in Miami. Tice stayed in-house to replace Linehan, promoting offensive line coach Steve Lomey. At the moment, the Vikings' can't get the ball to any receiver on a consistent basis. Travis Taylor leads the team with 10 catches for 113 yards. Teams are doubling Nate Burleson (six catches for 93 yards) and putting a safety in the box to stop the run. Bennett has rushed nine times for a team-high 35 yards. The offense also misses veteran center Matt Burk, who decided to skip the 2005 season and undergo hip surgery after team officials declined to guarantee his 2006 salary. The return of right tackle Mike Rosenthal and fullback Jimmy Kleinsasser from injuries has made little impact. Look for Tice to give former Tulane running back Mewelde Moore more playing time against the Saints in an effort to jumpstart the offense.

VIKINGS ON DEFENSE

The off-season additions of defensive lineman Pat Williams, linebackers Sam Cowart and Napoleon Harris, and defensive backs Darren Sharper and cornerback Fred Smoot were expected to make the Vikings a legitimate Super Bowl contender in the NFC. Instead, the Vikings can't get off the field in crucial third-down situations. Sharper, who returned an interception 88 yards for a touchdown in Week 1, sprained his left knee against Cincinnati and is questionable. Cowart strained his left calf against Tampa Bay and is questionable against the Saints after missing the Bengals' game. Antoine Winfield and Smoot are solid cornerbacks. Opponents appear to be picking on the third cornerback in passing situations.

VIKINGS SPECIAL TEAMS

A sign of struggling times in Minnesota: Tice opened his Monday press conference applauding the effort of punter Chris Kluwe. The free agent is averaging 51 yards per punt, with a net average of 42.1 yards. Rookie wide receiver Troy Williamson, the seventh overall pick in the draft, has averaged 12.7 yards per kick return. Keenan Howry is averaging 9.8 yards per punt return. Kicker Paul Edinger has not missed a field-goal attempt, converting from 53 and 22 yards.

BY THE NUMBERS: 10 - Turnovers by Culpepper after two games (eight interceptions, two fumbles). Last season, he threw 11 interceptions in 16 games.

WORTH REPEATING

"Stay within the scheme, go down the list, ba-boom-, ba-boom, and that takes cares of the rhythm with the passing game." — Tice on Culpepper.

"I have to get back to playing within myself and doing what I have to do - make plays." — Culpepper.

Saints offensive ineptness means 'F' on report card

GRADES, from C-5

certainly were not able to stay committed to it later in the game.

This time, quarterback Aaron Brooks was asked to do too much. And though he dazzled at times, throwing for 375 yards, he threw three interceptions and fumbled a shotgun snap from center LeCharles Bentley.

And this time, the Saints never had the opportunity to rattle sophomore quarterback Eli Manning's cage in his first "Monday Night Football" appearance.

Manning was far too comfortable playing with a 14-point lead.

Other things happened on Monday night that probably never will be repeated this season – five penalties on special teams in the first half; 13 penalties by the Saints overall in the game; six turnovers, including a fumble on the opening kickoff return and a late fumble by Joe Horn at the goal line that tumbled out of bounds for a touchback.

But the most important lesson learned is that the Saints are a much better team – who isn't? – when they don't dig themselves into an early hole.

And they did not handle adversity well the first time it was presented this year … on the football field, that is.

OFFENSE F: Some football math: 422 yards is supposed to equal way more than 10 points. The Giants' offense, for example, scored 27 while gaining just 257 yards. But the Saints turned the ball over time and time again and were downright dreadful in the red zone.

This was one of the more spectacular up-and-down performances of Brooks' career. He threw some beautiful and accurate bullets and looked totally in command at times, finding his receivers deep downfield. But the turnovers were devastating, and they didn't just occur when the game was out of reach. He fumbled and threw a pick on the Saints' first two drives of the second half.

Giants quarterback Eli Manning had a solid game against the Saints, going 13 of 24 for 165 yards and one touchdown to lead the Giants to a 27-10 win.

AP PHOTO

But perhaps the most undervalued aspect of this game was that the Saints were never able to establish the run – their supposed bread and butter this year - against a steadfast Giants defense. For the Saints' sake, this was just a terrific performance by the G-Men and not a blueprint that other defenses can follow throughout the year.

DEFENSE C-: This loss was not the defense's fault, by any stretch. But on a night when they needed to provide a momentum swing, the Saints defenders forced zero turnovers (one fumble came on special teams).

The Giants did not score a touchdown in the second half, despite four Saints turnovers. But they did score three touchdowns in the first half. The first came after that fumbled kickoff return. But the next came on an 11-play, 76-yard drive, and the third came after a penalty on linebacker Sedrick Hodge on third down.

SPECIAL TEAMS F: The most inexplicable part of this game was the performance from one of the league's most consistent special teams units. Veteran Fred McAfee fumbled away a handoff from Michael Lewis on the opening kickoff, which was followed by all those penalties. Then kicker John Carney missed a 29-yard field-goal attempt off the left upright in the fourth quarter.

Of course, this area will be better. But adding injury to insult, the Saints lost Lewis to a knee injury late in the fourth quarter, and was scheduled to have an MRI on Tuesday night. But Haslett said the prognosis is not good. The Saints have guys who can fill in, but Lewis is a special part of this team.

COACHING C: It's impossible to blame the coaches, who must have wanted to rip the game plan to shreds somewhere between the 13 penalties and six turnovers. Perhaps some might suggest they did not have their team in the right mental state for this game, but the Saints seemingly had a good week in practice, riding the emotion of last week's win, and they had handled their plight extremely well to this point.

This was just one of those games that spiraled out of control. The real coaching job begins today, with the Saints needing to prove the sting of this loss won't linger. They travel to Minnesota this weekend – their fourth consecutive road trip, this one on a short week following a Monday game.

FUMING HASLETT

Saints coach rants about 'home' game in New York

From wire reports

SAN ANTONIO — Now that he has been through the experience of playing a "home" game on the road, and came away a loser, Saints coach Jim Haslett is furious about it all.

Back at the team's temporary home in San Antonio, Haslett said Tuesday the Saints were at a competitive disadvantage in their 27-10 loss to the New York Giants at Giants Stadium on Monday night - even if they were wearing their home jerseys and saw their nickname painted in one of the end zones.

"They could have done that anywhere," Haslett said. "They could have played that game in Baton Rouge. They could have played it in San Antonio and could have done the same thing.

"To play it in Giants Stadium, to give them another home game and to put us in a situation where we couldn't hear … It wasn't why we lost that game, but …"

When the league told the Saints they had to play in New Jersey, Haslett would only say it put his team behind the eight-ball. Yet after seeing his team commit six turnovers and 13 penalties, he let loose.

"It wasn't a home game," he said. "I look up at the scoreboard and there are signs, 'Let's Go Giants'. The referees, when they flipped the coin, they asked us if we wanted heads or tails. They had no idea who the home team was and who was away. The crowd noise we had to deal with, we never had to do a silent count at home."

Saints quarterback Aaron Brooks had some strong comments about all the hoopla surrounding the game.

"They made this seem like the Super Bowl," Brooks said after the loss. "We played a team that outplayed us today, but it was way overdone. Setting up a stage, traveling out here, was uncalled for.

"Try not to patronize us next time, traveling us to New York, saying we're playing a home game."

Haslett tempered his remarks with appreciation for the in-game telethon that featured current and former NFL star answering telephones in the effort to support those affected by Hurricane Katrina. The league said Tuesday that $5 million was raised for the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund in about 6 1/2 hours.

"The whole thing was a great cause and the NFL did a great job of raising money for the Gulf Coast," Haslett said.

The Saints won't have any more home games in an opponents' stadium. The remaining seven games initially scheduled for the Superdome will be played at Tiger Stadium and the Alamodome in San Antonio, where the team has its practice site and headquarters.

"I don't think (an NFL team) has done that many games traveling," he said. "I think that's something that will be answered in January or February because I really don't know. Hopefully we handle it better than what we did yesterday."

The Saints were attempting to maintain the league's longest winning streak dating to last season. New Orleans won four straight to end last season and defeated the Carolina Panthers in their season-opener.

During their roll, the Saints had eight more turnovers than their opponents. On Monday night, it was the Giants that came away with five more.

The edge began eroding when Fred McAfee fumbled on the opening kickoff on an attempted reverse. New York scored three plays later.

Many of the penalties came on special teams. One possession started on the 14-yard line instead of the 28 because of a Mike McKenzie roughness penalty on a kickoff return. Another was backed up to the 5-yard line when Fred Thomas was called for blocking above the waist on a punt return. And another drive started on the 15 when Terrence Melton was called for holding on a kickoff return.

"The penalties were our fault and the turnovers were bad decisions," Haslett said. "You've got to hold onto the ball. We had poor field position all day because of our own doing. Special teams were ragged all day on our return units."

Even if McAfee would have held on to the ball, the Saints would have started their first drive of the night from their own 16 on the failed reverse.

"That's not the great way to start the game - a turnover and seven quick ones," Haslett said.

Now the Saints (1-1) are getting ready for another road game, this time in Minnesota. It will be the fourth consecutive week they fly to a game, counting the preseason.

"We lost one game and this team's overcome a lot in the last month, so that one game is nothing compared to what we've had to overcome," Haslett said. "It's just the way it was played out - a Monday night and all the things that were going on. We didn't deal with the situation very well.

"We'll forget it and we'll move on and try to play better this week."

Saints know there'll be days like this

to smack them every time the opportunity presented itself – so they won't receive any slack between the lines anyway.

But the Saints, who will endure a season unlike any other in NFL history, unable to play a single game in their home city of New Orleans, need a break in the worst way.

And they're going to have to create their own luck. They're going to have to stop feeling put upon and get back to being the team they believe they can be.

"It seemed like an away game to me," Haslett said of Monday's game, which was played at Giants Stadium in East Rutherford, N.J., but, to the chagrin of the Saints and their fans, was designated by NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue as a Saints home game.

They'll all seem like away games to a degree, since none will be played at the Superdome this season, and maybe ever again. Which means the Saints will be forced to make themselves at home, whether in Baton Rouge, San Antonio, Atlanta or Minnesota.

All of this means the Saints are going to have to be a tad more businesslike, rather than riding waves of emotion. Because - while adrenaline aided them mightily in the season-opening victory at Carolina – it all comes down to simple execution. And if the execution isn't there, like it wasn't Monday, the result on the scoreboard can be sobering, if not downright embarrassing.

Not so shameful, though, that we should be eager to write off the Saints, who have gained admirers nationally through their willingness to forge ahead.

Not much this season will appear to be fair for New Orleans, whether playing the Giants in a "home" game at Giants Stadium, or splitting its real "home" games between one city that loves college football (Baton Rouge) and another city (San Antonio) that's working its tail off to make the Saints feel at home, but isn't New Orleans and, therefore, isn't home.

AP PHOTO

The Mississippi connection: Saints running back Deuce McAllister and Giants quarterback Eli Manning both played college ball at Ole Miss.

But the inconvenience doesn't amount to a pimple on an elephant's backside when compared to the major tragedies that others have endured and continue to rebuild from.

And, in the end, the Saints will finish the season as winners, just for having survived it.

Lutcher struggles to find opponents

Bulldogs only team to play football in District 10-3A

By Lori Lyons
River Parishes bureau

Lutcher football coach Tim Detillier said his phone has never been so busy, and he's not about to miss a single call.

"It might be a game," he says, after excusing himself to answer the phone.

These days, Detillier will take any game he can get.

Among the things Hurricane Katrina tore apart was District 10-3A. What was to be one the state's biggest football districts, with eight teams, is reduced to one, Lutcher. It appears unlikely that any of the other teams in the league will field football teams this season.

The good news is that the Bulldogs automatically qualify for the playoffs. The bad news is Detillier has to search for seven opponents.

The reclassification process last year put Lutcher into a geographical nightmare of a district that included Lawless, Clark, Hannan, De La Salle, Landry, St. Bernard and Karr. This week, Lutcher was supposed to face St. Bernard. Instead, the Bulldogs will be taking on Class 5A powerhouse Hahnville at 7 p.m. Friday in Lutcher.

And, with more and more schools reopening, Detillier's written-in-pencil revised schedule has been revised and revised again.

"I'm on my fifth schedule right now," Detillier said. "I have been diligent, I'll say that. I started working on it with my lantern in the dark way back when. No one in the state of Louisiana has pressed the redial button as many times as me, I promise you."

When asked if it compared to trying to reach FEMA, Detillier said: "FEMA? They've got a team? I'll play 'em. I'll even feed them."

After Friday's game with Hahnville, Lutcher has an open date. Then the Bulldogs are scheduled to play Salmen on Oct. 7 and Holy Cross on Oct. 14. On Oct. 21, it's either King or St. Martin's. On Oct. 28, it's either Assumption or Kentwood. On Nov. 4, it's definitely Riverside. And all games will be played at Lutcher.

"The silver lining to all this is, we might actually make a little money," said Detillier, who has agreed to split the gate with all opponents. "With the schedule we had, we were going to take a beating. But this schedule should make my spring sports a little happier."

But all of Lutcher's sports teams are concerned about their because of the uncertainty within the district. With Orleans Parish schools closed until further notice, Detillier still has no idea what has become - or will become - of his district. None of the district's other coaches has contacted him, but Detillier said he's working under the assumption that none of the teams will play football or volleyball.

"It doesn't appear that way," Detillier said. "So I am scheduling games with that assumption."

And, if the circumstances leave Lutcher the only team remaining in the district, Detillier said he will not claim the district championship.

"Someone asked me the other day if we were going to order T-shirts," he said. "I said, 'No.' We will not be the district champs. We will be the representative of our district. We will represent our district in the playoffs."

Even if the Bulldogs are declared district champions, Detillier said scheduling is still important.

"I'm scheduling games with power points in mind," he said. "Yeah, I may have a spot in the playoffs, but I don't want to be the 32nd seed."

That's why Detillier decided to play Hahnville.

So far, the Bulldogs have played Class 5A opponents St. Amant (lost) and Thibodaux (won). Hahnville has defeated Central Lafourche and East St. John.

"I hope we give them a good game," Detillier said. "But let's be honest. There's no way we're supposed to win this game. But that's not the most important thing. We want to play. We need to play. That's the main thing."

Patriots' quarterback Mitchell to return

Ehret coach uncertain about how many players will return

By Mike Strom
Staff writer

Ehret got a boost Monday when Coach Billy North said senior quarterback Chris Mitchell, a member of The Times-Picayune's blue chip recruiting list, will play for the school when the Patriots begin their season Oct. 7.

Ehret will open its season against Destrehan in a District 5-5A game Oct. 7.

Mitchell made contact with North on Saturday after a journey that took him throughout the state and to Beaumont, Texas, where he had enrolled in school.

Mitchell, his mother, sister and brother evacuated their Lincolnshire home in Marrero prior to Hurricane Katrina and ended up in a Bossier City hotel for about a week. From there, Mitchell traveled to Baton Rouge to stay with a sister for four days, then to Lafayette to stay with another sister for two days, then back home to check the condition of his family's residence and finally to Beaumont.

While in Beaumont, Mitchell enrolled at Central High School and practiced at receiver for one week, but played in no game because of a Texas rule requiring him to be in school for 15 days to establish eligibility.

"I never thought I'd be coming back," Mitchell said Monday. "(Because) we didn't have nothing to come back to except for living with my grandmother (in Woodmere). Our home is destroyed. I never thought we'd be playing again. Then when I heard Jefferson Parish schools were opening on (Oct. 3), I just hoped to come back to school."

Being displaced and homeless, Mitchell said, "was hard to swallow. We never played our first game and I was going to have to fit into a new school."

Despite having his cell phone disconnected, Mitchell said he did manage to keep in touch with a handful of teammates - receivers Anthony Roussel and Jywin Caesar, linebacker Brandon Washington and defensive tackle Charles Crayton.

All four are expected to return to Ehret as is standout defensive tackle Drake Nevis, who is at Terrebonne High School, North said. The farthest flung Patriot is senior offensive tackle Marque Black, who is playing in Boston, but attempting to return.

"It will be good to have some of these kids that have been in the program back," North said. "But it's not like we're rounding up kids. I can't tell you how many we will have."

North has begun trying to find housing for players that need it. He picked up Mitchell on Monday at Ehret where they toured the school fieldhouse and found their equipment intact and lying where it had been placed following Ehret's jamboree exhibition against Holy Cross on Aug. 26.

"It'll be nice to be around people I know," said Mitchell, whose hair is styled in dreadlocks. "Where I was, they don't talk like us. They thought I was from Jamaica. When I'd talk to people, they'd be like, 'What are you saying?' I'd be like, Never mind.'"

Though he'll play quarterback this season, Mitchell is expected to play wide receiver in college. He excelled at the position the past two seasons.

As a junior, Mitchell earned All-Metro honors after catching 64 passes for 970 yards and 12 touchdowns for an 11-1 Ehret team that advanced to the Class 5A state quarterfinals.

Ehret will resume practice at 3 p.m. Monday in anticipation of the re-opening of Jefferson Parish Public Schools on Oct. 3. North urges any displaced Ehret football player to contact him at (504) 343-8038.

"The first time that any of my kids have called me, not just Chris, has represented a great sense of relief to know that they were alive and safe," North said. "The problem was my cell phone had not been working for some time after the storm. It was horrendous. So it was nice to know they were safe and that I don't have to worry about them anymore."

Ehret, West Jeff to remain in District 5-5A

Idea to create All-Jefferson League fails

By Mike Strom
Staff writer

An attempt to form an all-Jefferson Parish Class 5A football district has failed.

Ehret and West Jefferson will play football in District 5-5A this season as scheduled after the district's six principals met Tuesday and agreed to keep the league the same.

Jefferson Parish Public Schools athletic director Manny Barocco asked the Louisiana High School Athletic Association executive committee last week about the possibility of merging Ehret and West Jefferson with fellow Jefferson schools Bonnabel, Higgins and King in a revised District 7-5A. The merger would have been in effect for the 2005 football season only.

But the request drew a protest from East St. John, Destrehan and Hahnville officials, who would have had to fill two playing dates in an already storm-shortened season.

Ehret and West Jefferson officials expressed concerned about the safety of their student-athletes given that the District 5-5A openers are scheduled Oct. 7 and their schools are scheduled to open four days earlier on Oct. 3. Jefferson teams would have no more than two weeks to prepare for opponents that would have been practicing and playing games for a month.

The River Parish principals, also concerned about the possibility of facing Ehret and West Jefferson in the state playoffs, countered with a proposal to allow the Jefferson schools to leave the district, but only under a written stipulation that the two schools would not compete for championship honors this season.

Principals Lale Geer of West Jefferson and Clothilde Cobert of Ehret rejected the counter proposal.

"We all agreed that we're going to stay in the same district," Cobert said. "We don't know what's coming down the road and we don't have the energy to waste dealing with this. We expressed our concern about us being out of school and them being in school. But the biggest concern was us just needing to sit down and talk.

"We don't know what problems we're going to face, so we can't dilly-dally with this. We've got to get moving forward."

Destrehan coach Steve Robicheaux told Cobert that his program was willing to delay their teams' Oct. 7 opener for two days until Sunday to give Ehret more time to prepare. West Jefferson opens at Assumption on Oct. 7.

Ehret and West Jefferson are scheduled to resume practice Monday.

Both teams will practice at 3 p.m. Ehret players can contact Coach Billy North at (504) 343-8038. West Jeff players should call Coach Hank Tierney at (504) 874-2303.

Crusaders relieved to have cross country season

Smaller numbers has coach worried

By Pierce W. Huff
Staff writer

Brother Martin has established itself as one of the state's top cross country programs.

The good news for this season is that the Crusaders, despite being displaced by Hurricane Katrina, will have a team and high expectations like most other years.

Though Brother Martin will not field programs in major sports during the fall and winter, the Crusaders' cross country team begins its season Saturday at the Roundtable Run in Baton Rouge, hosted by Episcopal of Baton Rouge.

Brother Martin, the Division I runnerup last season to rival Jesuit, has moved to Baton Rouge Catholic's campus and will run in the Baton Rouge area for the rest of the season, primarily at the Highland Road course.

But Brother Martin coach Dennis Panepinto is worried about the future of his program.

The Crusaders averaged 150 runners on its team in years past. But the squad will have only 16 runners this season.

Fewer runners means that Panepinto will not have a chance to stockpile talent and develop runners like he's done in past seasons.

"Now you just don't know what some of the young kids are going to do," he said.

Having a season will be good, though, Panepinto said. Most local teams have missed about three weeks of practice and two meets. Many, including Jesuit, will not compete this season.

It will be a long time - probably not this season - before teams run again on the Lakefront course, the cross country venue of choice for most metro area teams.

Schultheis eager for cross country to get back on track

Blenk coach optimistic about saving season

By Pierce W. Huff
Staff writer

It was more than two weeks ago that Blenk senior Courtney Schultheis, her twin sister Judy, and the rest of her family fled Hurricane Katrina for her grandmother's residence near Beaumont, Texas.

The Schultheis girls enrolled at Kelly Catholic High School and ran for the cross country team. It was nice to compete in a sport that they love, Courtney said.

But Courtney Schultheis, one of the area's top female cross country competitors, said she was ready to be back home, running for Blenk.

Her wish came true Tuesday when Blenk, which is scheduled to resume classes Oct. 3, held its first cross country practice since Kartina hit.

Schultheis expects her family to return home by the end of the month and is eager to run in a meet again with her Blenk teammates.

"I missed my team so much," she said. "Competing in Texas was nothing like running with my old team."

Though she's glad to be back, Schultheis said she's worried about what the cross country season will be like this season in the metro area.

"I wonder about where we're going to have these meets, and who is going to be there, because kids at the schools have moved throughout the country," she said.

That's the case at Blenk. Several runners who moved and enrolled at other schools were missing from the first practice.

But Blenk coach Tom Chiocchio, who lost his home in the storm, said he thinks the cross country season in New Orleans can be saved.

"I think it's going to be done on an individual basis with some of the runners," Chiocchio said. "My goal is that I want to host a cross country meet (on the West Bank) this season in New Orleans, and I don't care if I just have two teams."

THE WORLD IN SPORTS

MASCOT BAN IS EXTENDED TO BOWL GAMES

The NCAA is requiring bowl games to ban the "hostile" or "abusive" use of American Indian nicknames, mascots and logos beginning next year. On Tuesday, the NCAA announced it is extending its prohibition to include bowl games. The decision was made after Bowl Championship Series officials sought a ruling after determining they could not impose the prohibition, NCAA spokesman Bob Williams said. Only one Division I-A school, the University of Illinois, will be affected. "We received a written request from the BCS to take appropriate action as it related to bowl games," Williams said. "The BCS didn't feel it had the governance structure to do what was necessary." In August, the NCAA released a list of 18 "offenders," four of which play Division I-A football. But three, Florida State, Central Michigan and the University of Utah, have been granted extensions, dropping the number of schools to 15. The University of North Dakota also has filed an appeal, the NCAA said. NCAA Divisions I-AA, II and III were already included in the ban because they have a playoff system. The NCAA announced in August that the ban would be imposed at all NCAA championships. That is scheduled to take effect in February. Although the NCAA does not run bowl games, it does sanction them. So the governing body agreed to add the mascot ban to its list of requirements to be licensed. The prohibition will extend beyond the five BCS bowl games and include all postseason games.

LSWA HONORS 3: Three players, including a pair of defensive standouts, have been chosen players of the week by the Louisiana Sports Writers Association. Derrick Smith of Louisiana-Lafayette earned offensive honors, and the Cajuns' Johnny Felders shared the defensive award with Lawrence Darby of McNeese State.

PENN STATE REVAMPS FIELD: Penn State is replacing the natural-grass turf at Beaver Stadium after divots kept popping up on the field during the first three games. Workers began removing the old turf Monday, and the new sod is expected to be in place later this week, spokesman Jeff Nelson said. Penn State plays its first road game Saturday against Northwestern. Chunks of turf popped up on the field during Penn State's opener against South Florida three weeks ago. Since then, workers have had to run out on the field during timeouts to replace the divots. The Nittany Lions host Minnesota on Oct. 1 and Ohio State the following week.

COLLEGES

MEET IS MOVED: The SEC Cross Country Championships, scheduled to be hosted by LSU on Oct. 29 at Highland Road Park, have been moved to Fort Jackson, S.C., and will be hosted by the University of South Carolina, it was announced Tuesday by the SEC office.

"We wish we were hosting the meet here and that (Hurricane) Katrina had never happened, but unfortunately that isn't the case," said LSU track and field coach Dennis Shaver. "Knowing the short amount of time South Carolina was given to secure a facility and the necessary manpower required to host such an event, we are very lucky and grateful that they are willing to do so." The meet, still scheduled for Oct. 29, will include all 23 of the SEC's men's and women's cross-country teams.

WAVE GETS GOING AGAIN: The Tulane women's soccer team will take the field for the first time in its new hometown of College Station, Texas, today, taking on Sam Houston State at 7 p.m. Today's game will be the first for the Green Wave (0-3) since the UAB Nike Classic on Sept. 2-4.

BASEBALL

HAMPTON TO MISS 2006 SEASON: Atlanta Braves pitcher Mike Hampton will have major elbow surgery next Wednesday and will miss the 2006 season. Hampton, a 33-year-old lefthander, will have Tommy John surgery in New York, where he was examined last weekend by Dr. Dave Altchek. Hampton made 12 starts this season, going 5-3 with a 3.50 ERA.

BASKETBALL

FRANCE ADVANCES: San Antonio Spurs point guard Tony Parker scored 13 points as France stunned host Serbia-Montenegro 74-71 to reach the quarterfinals of the European Championship. Dallas Mavericks forward Dirk Nowitzki scored 33 points as Germany beat Turkey 66-57 to move into the quarterfinals. In Thursday's quarterfinals, France will face defending champion Lithuania and Greece plays Russia. On Friday, Germany will play Slovenia and Croatia will face Spain.

CHICAGO GETS A SKY: Chicago's WNBA franchise announced that the new team will be called the Sky, with light blue and yellow as its colors. The team has been without a moniker since February, when the league awarded real estate developer Michael Alter an expansion franchise to begin play next year.

Tennessee names Ainge starter

Both Vols QBs played poorly against Florida

By William Kalec
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE – If Rick Clausen is ever going to throw an official pass in Tiger Stadium, he better hope starter Erik Ainge chucks a few balls into the ground or over the reach of his receivers for a couple of possessions.

After choosing the former LSU transfer the starter before the Florida game, Tennessee coach Philip Fulmer again changed his mind, anointing the sophomore Ainge in charge of the offense for Saturday's LSU game. Ainge started the season-opener, a closer-than-expected 17-10 home win against UAB.

"I want to make clear (the decision) bears no reflection on Rick's ability or leadership or anything like that," Fulmer said. "Rick has done a great job for us, and this team is going to need him as we go through the year. And certainly the staff is counting on him."

Fulmer struck the gong quickly on Clausen last Saturday night, yanking him in favor of Ainge after just two series. Clausen did get to conduct a first-half ending two-minute drive, but spent the remainder of the evening on the sideline. Clausen completed 2 of 5 passes for 0 yards.

Ainge hardly lit up the scoreboard, either. Less than half his attempts were complete and no Vols receiver had more than 27 yards.

"Erik went to work yesterday and worked really hard - as he has," Fulmer said. "He worked with a purpose in mind, I believe, and I'm sure he has the mindset to prove that he can use his talent to help us win football games."

LSU coach Les Miles said he'll prepare for both quarterbacks.

"Both have the ability to throw the football. Receivers, they put them in the right place," Miles said. "I think they are both quality quarterbacks."

INJURIES: Wide receiver Dwayne Bowe, who missed the entire Arizona State game with an undisclosed ankle injury, practiced without hindrance Tuesday. Wide receiver Craig Davis wore a limited-contact green jersey but participated in passing drills.

AFTERNOON DELIGHT: Since no network or cable stations with broadcast rights to SEC football decided to pick up the Oct. 1 LSU-Mississippi State game in Starkville, Miss., school officials have set kickoff for 1:30 p.m. LSU officials said a decision regarding TigerVision, the school's in-house pay-per-view network, for the Mississippi State game will be made in the coming days.

BACK IN THE DAY: Tennessee's unique travel schedule - the Vols are leaving Knoxville on Saturday morning, instead of heading to Baton Rouge on Friday night - is nothing new for its players.

"A lot of these players have driven five hours on a bus, gotten off the bus and played a high school football game," Fulmer said. "So I'm hoping that it won't be a distraction, and I don't think it will be."

Green Wave back in familiar digs

Tulane to play SMU this week

By Fred Robinson
Staff writer

RUSTON — After spending a week at Southern Methodist University in Dallas prior to relocating in Ruston, Tulane's football team is headed back to some familiar surroundings this week in Texas.

The Green Wave will begin Conference USA play against the Mustangs on Saturday.

Although Wave players got to mingle with some of SMU's players during their brief stay in Dallas, Tulane coach Chris Scelfo said the familiarity with the area will not be an advantage for his team.

"We didn't do a whole lot while we were there,'' Scelfo said Tuesday. "We went to practice and stayed in the hotel. (The players) will at least know where the stadium is.

AT DALLAS, TEXAS
TULANE VS. SMU
7 p.m. Saturday

"The players know each other, but it's sort of like high school. When you play on a Friday night in high school, you know everybody on the other team."

The difference heading into Game 2, Scelfo said, is he and his staff knows a lot more about SMU than it did about Mississippi State. Still, the Mustangs won't be an easy target, he said.

"I know SMU's going to be ready for us, and I know our kids are going to be ready to play, too. It's going to be two teams that are pretty evenly matched, and the one that makes the least amount of mistakes is going to have a chance to win," Scelfo said.

"We know more about SMU, but we've got some things we have to worry about with our football team that we have to get corrected. Regardless of what we know about them, if we don't get those things corrected, it's going to be another long night for us."

LANDRY'S BACK: Junior tight end Jerome Landry, who missed Saturday's game against Mississippi State, was cleared by the Green Wave training staff and returned to practice. Landry said he hadn't received the go-ahead to play earlier because he hadn't completed therapy on his left knee. Landry sat out the 2004 season after suffering torn ligaments in the 2004 spring drills.

MCGEE TO PLAY: Left offensive tackle Chris McGee, who suffered a sprained left ankle in the first quarter of the Mississippi State game, was walking around Tuesday with the ankle heavily taped. McGee did not practice, but said he'll be ready for the SMU game. McGee missed most of the first three quarters before playing most of the fourth quarter. McGee's absence forced a pair of redshirt freshmen - Michael Parenton and Troy Kropog - to get more playing time than was planned.

With Parenton and Kropog leading the way, the Wave had 17 freshmen, including nine freshmen, to play against Mississippi State.

UNDER THE LIGHTS: For the first time since relocating at Louisiana Tech, the Green Wave will hold a night practice today. Senior strong safety Tra Boger said the evening practice will be good for the team.

"It's going to give us an opportunity to have more meeting time before we go out on the practice field," Boger said. "We'll get more preparation time and have a chance to look at more film."

The Wave's workout is scheduled for 8 p.m.

RIDING IN STYLE: It takes a little bit more than walking downstairs and out the back door to get to the practice field for Scelfo. Not to worry, though, Scelfo has found a solution. These days, Scelfo can be seen riding from the Thomas Assembly Center to the practice field in a supped-up golf cart. It's a little bit smaller than a VW Beetle, but it seats four. It doesn't have room for golf clubs.

Finding a perfect match for Tiger no easy task

Woods to pair with Couples hoping to reverse trend

From wire reports

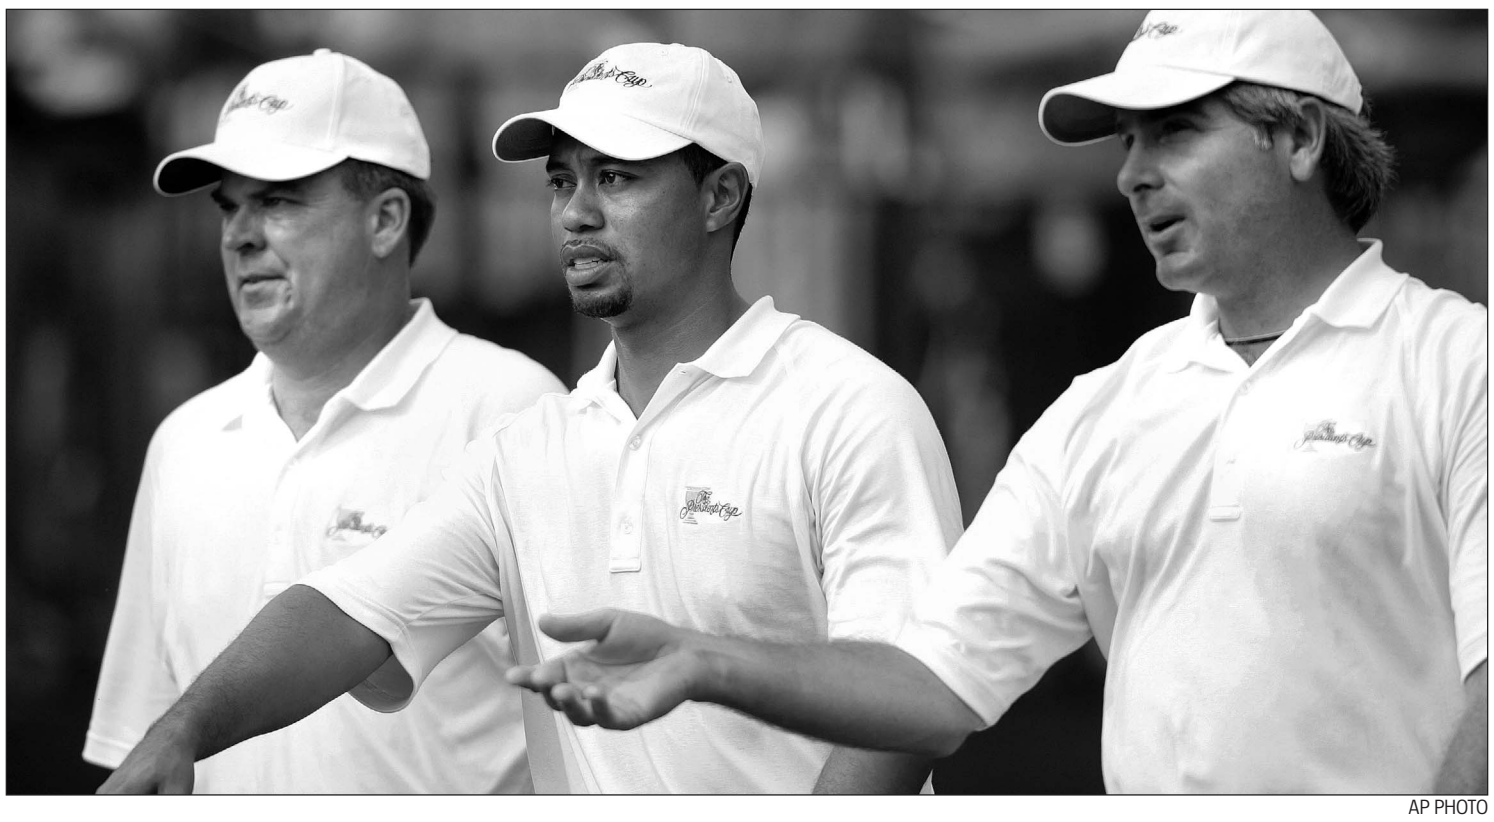
GAINESVILLE, VA. — Tiger Woods has been paired with some of his best friends.

He also has been paired with Phil Mickelson.

In the seven Ryder Cup and Presidents Cup matches Woods has played since 1997, the U.S. captains have had no trouble finding him a partner for better-ball and alternate-shot matches.

Finding one who fits is another matter.

"Everybody wants to play with him," Davis Love III said Tuesday, searching for a reason why Woods already has had 14 partners in 28 matches. "Everybody gets their turn."



Fred Couples likely will get another turn at the Presidents Cup, which starts Thursday at the Robert Trent Jones Golf Club. Woods and Couples played twice at Royal Melbourne in 1998 and were 1-1 as a team. The loss came on the 18th hole when Craig Parry chipped in from 50 feet.

What makes for a good partner?

"Being comfortable is the best thing about it," Couples said. "Everyone thinks they can play with everybody, and they all get along great. But when you're on the course, you have to know the guy pretty well because you're not going to win every single time you play, and you have to be able to say the right things and have some fun."

Woods is supremely comfortable with Mark O'Meara, his best friend on tour. That didn't help them in 1997 at Valderrama - Woods' first Ryder Cup - when they went 1-2.

Two other close friends are Notah Begay and Charles Howell III. Those are the only players with whom Woods was paired for all four team matches at the Presidents Cup - Begay in 2000 at RTJ, Howell in South Africa in 2003. Both times, their record was 2-2.

AP PHOTO

Tiger Woods, center, talks with Fred Couples, right, and Kenny Perry on Tuesday during practice for the Presidents Cup at Robert Jones Golf Club in Gainesville, Va. Woods has had difficulty with his partners during Presidents and Ryder Cup play. He is scheduled to play with Couples Thursday during the first day of competition.

The uncomfortable side is Mickelson. U.S. captain Hal Sutton put them together for the first two matches last year at Oakland Hills.

"I felt like history needed it. I felt like the fans needed it. And most of all, I felt like Phil Mickelson and Tiger Woods needed it," Sutton said.

It proved to be a disaster. The best two Americans rarely spoke to each other in losing both matches. The lasting image was Woods trying to keep a straight face when Mickelson nearly hit 3-wood out-of-bounds on the final hole of alternate shot with their match all square against Darren Clarke and Lee Westwood.

Woods also played with David Duval in 1999 when they were Nos. 1 and 2 in the world, an act of desperation by Ryder Cup captain Ben Crenshaw. They lost on the 18th hole to Clarke and Westwood.

There have been partnerships through the years that have been tough to beat - Seve Ballesteros and Jose Maria Olazabal; Love and Couples, who have played together 10 times in the Ryder Cup and Presidents Cup; Jack Nicklaus and Tom Watson, who never lost a match.

The search for a stable partner for Woods continues, and the record reflects futility. Woods has lost only one singles match in seven cups, yet his team record is 10-17-1. He has a winning record with only two players - Love (2-1) and Chris Riley, who won his only match with Woods last year at the Ryder Cup.

Asked how many partners he has had in the Ryder Cup and Presidents Cup, Woods guessed it was 16.

Asked for a reason why so many, he went blank.

"I have no idea," he said. "I've had some great times with my partners, trying to go out there and win points. Unfortunately, I haven't won as many points as I'd like."

His ideal partner?

"A guy that makes a lot of birdies," Woods said. "If my partner makes a bunch of birdies, we're going to have a great time."

Even that might not make a difference. Woods still recalls the time he and Paul Azinger shot 9-under 63 in a better-ball match at The Belfry and still lost to Clarke and Thomas Bjorn.

Even more staggering is his 0-6 record in better-ball matches at the Presidents Cup.

"In better ball?" Couples said. "That's best ball? That's when you use his seven or eight birdies every round? That's pretty surprising. But again, I've watched a lot of it, and I think he's ready to change all that."

To get an idea how many partners Woods has gone through, consider two other perennial cup players. Love has played in every Ryder Cup and Presidents Cup since 1993 - 11 events - and has had 13 partners. Mickelson has played in 10 cups dating to 1994, and he's had only 11 partners.

Love played the majority of his matches with Couples. Mickelson has played at least five times with three players -Tom Lehman, David Toms and Duval.

"I think it would be cool to play with the same guy," Woods said.

Maybe that would have happened if a partnership paid off earlier in his cup career. After going 1-2 in the '97 Ryder Cup, Woods and O'Meara never played together in the next two cups. Woods and Love went 2-0 at The Belfry, but their latest partnership ended in a 4-and-3 loss at Oakland Hills.

Make yourself U.S. captain for the day. Who does Woods get as a partner?

"Phil. They did good together," said Adam Scott of the International team, as the room broke into laughter.

Stuart Appleby had another solution to finding Woods a partner.

He was told only four Americans on this Presidents Cup team have ever played with Woods in cup competition - Love, Couples, Mickelson and Leonard.

"All the rest of them, I guess," Appleby said.

sharing his game's season ticket list.

"We hope they are able to play in Louisiana," he said. "But we are prepared to help make the Sugar Bowl in Atlanta everything it should be."

Hoolahan had expressed the hope that the Superdome would be operating again in 2006, but on Monday NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue indicated that the league and the Saints are acting on the assumption that it will not be and are making arrangements to play at LSU next season.

Superdome officials have said they will do their utmost to have the stadium operational by 2006.

"If the Superdome is unavailable next year, we will play in Baton Rouge and hopefully we won't be dealing with the other external issues," Hoolahan said. "We'll just cross that bridge when we come to it."

But Hoolahan also said that having the Superdome or an alternative stadium in New Orleans by 2007 is essential if the Sugar Bowl is to maintain its spot in the national championship rotation.

The Sugar Bowl is scheduled to play host to both the title game and its regular game in 2007 under the "double-hosting system" that goes into effect next year.

There is no timetable for knowing about the Superdome's viability for 2006, Hoolahan said, adding that his focus is on this year's game.

"There has to be sensitivity on all levels because this has been a devastating event," Hoolahan said. "At the same time, there is not a lot of time to make critical decisions that need to reflect the quality and tradition of the Sugar Bowl.

"It's also not a unilateral decision, but one that has to be made with all of our business partners. But in the end, we fully intend to maintain our position as one of the premier bowls in the nation."

Vikings' stadium plan will cost taxpayers

From wire reports

Minnesota Vikings owner Zygi Wilf put a costly stadium plan on the table Tuesday, joining baseball's Twins and the University of Minnesota's football squad in outlining a combined $1.5 billion in proposed stadium construction.

And taxes - either new or redirected - would pay much of the overall bill.

The Vikings' financing plan would require taxpayers to kick in nearly $400 million toward a $675 million, retractable-roof stadium with about 68,000 seats in Blaine, a suburb north of Minneapolis.

The public would pay another $115 million to improve the roads and highways around the stadium complex. In all, the plan calls for roughly $280 million in local taxes and $230 million in state help.

JAGUARS LOSE DARIUS: The Jacksonville Jaguars have lost starting strong safety Donovin Darius for the rest of the season, ESPN.com reported.

MARTIN'S KNEE OK: New York Jets running back Curtis Martin should be able to play this weekend against Jacksonville after an MRI exam on his strained right knee showed no damage.

BOLLER OUT LONGER: Baltimore Ravens quarterback Kyle Boller is likely to be out until the end of October because of his injured right toe.

Galveston Independent School District buses carry evacuees north on Interstate 45 out of the Texas city Wednesday. With Hurricane Rita barreling toward the Texas coast Wednesday as a Category 5 hurricane, Louisiana officials struggled to prepare citizens and levees for the perilous possibility that a last-minute change of direction could put the battered state at risk of even more destruction.

"Once the storm gets in the Gulf of Mexico, there's no telling where it's going to go," New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said, adding that he should have a better indication today of Rita's course.

Despite the uncertainty about where Rita might strike, police and National Guard officers urged New Orleanians to leave town as soon as possible. This group included residents exiled by Hurricane Katrina who had returned to the city this week to try to resume their lives.

"The goal is to stay in New Orleans, but with Rita out there, I don't know," said Alex Curtis, who, with his parents, runs the Brass Menagerie on Magazine Street.

Even if Rita follows its expected route and strikes Galveston, Texas, rain and storm surges are possible in New Orleans, which

Bridge exposes racial divide

When the Superdome and the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center deteriorated into anarchy and food and water ran short, many who tried to escape the flooded streets of New Orleans found their paths blocked.

Gretna police fired shots over the heads of evacuees streaming across the Crescent City Connection, as bullhorns blared for them to go back to New Orleans.

In Plaquemines Parish, dozens of sheriff's deputies raised shotguns and pistols to turn back a convoy of school buses attempting to take storm victims to safety at the Naval Air Station-Joint Reserve Base in Belle Chasse.

And in Westwego, arriving evacuees had two choices: Leave immediately, or go to an overcrowded shelter with few supplies where armed guards accompanied by a police dog prevented anyone from leaving.

The confrontations occurred largely along racial lines: African-American residents of poor sections of New Orleans facing off against majority white law enforcement agencies.

Elected law enforcement officials remain unapologetic over their response and say they would take the same steps if the city flooded again.

Nagin foresees a much smaller city

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Mayor Ray Nagin said Wednesday he foresees the New Orleans of the near future as a city of about 250,000 people, about half its population before Hurricane Katrina devastated the city in late August.

As Nagin addressed questions from elected officials and the public at a meeting in the state Capitol, he defended his policies to allow citizens limited access to re-enter the city in the short term and to rebuild New Orleans in the long term.

"We are going to lose a significant portion of our population" in the next 12 to 18 months, he said, partly because the city's infrastructure will not be able to handle more. After establishing a population of about a quarter of a million, "then we'll build from there," Nagin said.

"Let's start to dream about where we can be post-Katrina," he said.

Plenty customers, few workers vex East Jeff eateries

Key obstacle: lack of employee housing

By Bob Ross
East Jefferson bureau

At Houston's restaurant in Metairie, workers completed repairs to the Katrina-damaged floor Wednesday morning while a cable technician rewired a television set near the bar. Darren Newell, service manager for the usually crowded restaurant, said Houston's has the OK from state health officials and enough supplies on hand.

"I could open today, to be honest," he said.

The problem for Houston's these days, and for many restaurants and other companies throughout East Jefferson, is finding enough workers to staff the businesses. With Jefferson Parish stirring to life and owners and managers pushing to reopen quickly, some lower-paid employees – the dishwashers, wait staff, clerks and manual laborers — remain dispersed across the country by the Aug. 29 storm, leaving these businesses in a bind.

"Our people are in Houston, Atlanta, Dallas and elsewhere, and they don't have places to live here," Houston's kitchen manager Dan Maloney said. Some tell him they can't return without a home for themselves and their families.

For example, the Houston's location on Veterans Memorial Boulevard normally has about 35 people working each of the two daily shifts, for a total of at least 70 people, plus managers. Newell and Maloney said only about 42 employees have returned.

And Houston's won't open until it has enough employees and can offer a full menu, they said. Newell said he and Maloney

Hospitals seek money from Congress

EJGH, West Jeff and Ochsner face layoffs

By Bill Walsh

STAFF PHOTO BY ALEX BRANDON

Charity Hospital, which was devastated by Hurricane Katrina's floodwaters, has been called a total loss. Louisiana State University, which runs the public hospital, has appealed to Congress for $750 million to redevelop the facility.

WASHINGTON – Three of the more than a dozen emergency hospitals in the New Orleans area were able to remain opened as Hurricane Katrina blew through and officials at the facilities now are appealing to Congress and the Bush administration for financial assistance as they struggle to stay in business.

The pre-hurricane exodus from New Orleans left East Jefferson General Hospital, West Jefferson Medical Center and Ochsner Foundation Hospital operating with a third of their normal patient load, officials said, and the hospitals will be forced to cut services and staff by the end of the month if they continue to hemorrhage money.

The storm-decimated hospital sector in New Orleans was already facing shortages of doctors and nurses before Katrina and now faces the possibility of residents returning without enough medical staff to treat them, health-care officials said.

"It's a huge problem," said John Matessino, CEO of the Louisiana Hospital Association. "Doors have been opening (to medical staff) to have them come to other states. When hospitals think about reopening, where will they get the staff?"

Congress moved quickly in the wake of Katrina to approve $62.3 billion in emergency rescue and recovery assistance. But the money can't be used to pay operating expenses at hospitals. Together, the three hospitals that remain open in the New Orleans area are losing $75 million a month, administrators say. All are not-for-profits and the East Jefferson and West Jefferson facilities are publicly owned.

The Senate Finance Committee is drafting legislation that could bail out hospitals and other health-care providers in Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi, but the bill's future is uncertain as lawmakers grow increasingly concerned about how the nation will pay for Katrina, with a price tag expected to soar to more than $200 billion.

A group of House Republicans unveiled a list Wednesday of suggested spending cuts that would be painful even to many of those whose lives were disrupted by Katrina. The group suggested cutting $24 billion in road and bridge projects earmarked in the recently passed transportation bill, increasing premiums and co-insurance on Medicare recipients, boosting the cost of home health care and delaying for a year the prescription drug benefit for seniors.

"I think our seniors have gone 220 years without a prescription drug benefit," Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Texas, said. "I don't think they will begrudge us having them wait one more year."

Still, other lawmakers say there remains a strong sentiment in Congress for helping those trying to hang on or rebuild after Katrina.

"There is sympathy for doing something," Rep. Jim McCrery, R-Shreveport, said. "I think they make a strong case for some kind of assistance."

Eleven acute-care hospitals in Orleans, Jefferson and St. Bernard parishes shut down during Katrina and most of them aren't sure when they will reopen. Some sustained such severe flooding, with some owners that haven't been able to get inside to assess the damage.

Louisiana State University, which operates the public Charity Hospital in New Orleans, is calling the facility a total loss and has asked Congress for $750 million to redevelop it. LSU officials were in Washington on Tuesday appealing to members of Congress for financial assistance.

Ochsner and the public hospitals in East Jefferson and on the West Bank all remained open during and after the storm. They escaped bad flood and wind damage and kept the lights on with emergency generators. East Jefferson housed 3,000 people during Katrina, 100 of them evacuees.

Dr. Mark Peters, CEO of East Jefferson General, said he will begin laying off staff in the next week and a half without a financial bailout. He said he fears that if they leave, they won't come back.

"They are facing the uncertainty that a lot of people are," Peters said. "As we lose doctors and the population returns, we will have a looming crisis."

Peters is scheduled to testify today before the House Energy and Commerce Committee in a hearing about the health care implications of Katrina. The three operating hospitals are seeking $300 million in assistance to help them cover expenses.

"We're not asking for any kind of windfall. We're asking for immediate help so we can keep operating," Gary Muller, president and CEO of West Jefferson Medical Center, said. "Winter is coming. We know there are only three hospitals. We're it for the immediate future."

The outlook for the once-bustling New Orleans area hospital sector is uncertain. Jim Montgomery, president and CEO of Tulane University Hospital and Clinic, said in a letter to staff that severe water damage on the first floor could take several months or more to repair. Tenet Healthcare Corp.'s Lindy Boggs Medical Center and Memorial Medical Center also remain closed indefinitely. Touro Infirmary had hoped to reopen its emergency room Wednesday, but delayed when New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin ordered the city evacuated as Hurricane Rita churned through the Gulf of Mexico as a Category 5 storm.

The Navy's 270-bed floating hospital, the USNS Comfort, docked in Pascagoula, Miss., for several days after the storm to assist with medical services in the Gulf Coast region. Louisiana officials had asked that the boat come to New Orleans, but Hurricane Rita has put those plans on hold.

"The plan right now is to get out of the way of the storm and see where it is needed," Navy Lt. Trey Brown said.

CORRECTIONS AND CLARIFICATIONS

Sentence on levee system risks erred: A sentence in a story Wednesday on risks in the New Orleans levee system was incorrect. It should have read: "Even if accurate, the risk estimate says that statistically, the long-term likelihood of a flood overflowing the levees is not insignificant."

Word omitted: A word was inadvertently omitted from a quote in a story published Wednesday on Episcopal bishops touring damaged churches in New Orleans. In speaking of the need to rebuild New Orleans as a better, more equitable, more open city, Louisiana Bishop Charles Jenkins said: "The people of this city need to hold the captains of industry, their political leaders and their religious leaders accountable.

"The rebuilding of this city has to be open, and it has to be collaborative.

"We cannot come back as the Las Vegas of the South. We have a wonderful opportunity here. As wonderful as Mardi Gras is – and it's wonderful – we can't base our economy on Mardi Gras."

House passes tax breaks for Katrina victims

Some would help employers pay workers

By Mary Dalrymple
AP tax writer

WASHINGTON - The House approved $6.1 billion in tax breaks Wednesday to help families recover from Hurricane Katrina and to encourage Gulf Coast businesses to reopen their doors, or at least keep employees on the payroll.

The House passed the bill 422-0 as the Bush administration urged residents to get out of the way of another approaching storm, Hurricane Rita, that was threatening Louisiana and Texas.

The vote sent the bill to the Senate, where lawmakers hoped for quick final approval.

"This aid comes at exactly the right time to help victims of Hurricane Katrina as they rebuild their lives," said Treasury Secretary John Snow.

Rep. Jim McCrery, R-La., said tax writers aimed most of their assistance at individuals and donors. The tax breaks for businesses mean "those businesses, we hope, will be employing and paying residents of the affected area," he said.

Lawmakers intend to follow the immediate aid with a broader package of tax breaks to encourage rebuilding, particularly in New Orleans. President Bush proposed creating a Gulf Opportunity Zone with about $2 billion in special tax breaks encouraging businesses to build or expand in the region.

Congress first responded to the hurricane's devastating blow by approving more than $62 billion for recovery and rescue. The cost, expected to increase, has caused wrangling within the GOP over whether to cut government spending elsewhere to meet Katrina's price.

Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., rejected calls to delay a Medicare prescription drug benefit or rescind recently passed "pork barrel" highway projects, but a band of almost two dozen conservatives announced proposals to take both steps.

"We do not have to raise taxes" to finance the recovery from Katrina, said Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Texas. "We do not have to pass debt onto our children."

The group of House conservative stalwarts acknowledged that they had no agreement among themselves on a more than $500 billion roster of ideas, many of which — such as cutting public television subsidies — have been resoundingly rejected.

The tax breaks passed Wednesday would waive penalties for hurricane victims who need cash for expenses and recovery and want to use money stashed in protected retirement accounts like IRAs. The Treasury Department had already ruled the storm qualified as a hardship and permitted early withdrawals of retirement funds.

Also under the bill, families that rely on the child tax credit and the earned income tax credit could protect those benefits throughout job losses, residency changes and family separations caused by Katrina. The bill would let taxpayers use 2004 income to calculate the credits, which can mean a bigger benefit.

Other assistance lets taxpayers recoup more of their unreimbursed and uninsured losses, and waives taxes imposed when debts, such as mortgages, are forgiven.

Two tax credits encourage Gulf Coast businesses hit by the storm to keep going. One offsets wages paid to employees hired in the region over the next two years. Another helps small businesses hurt by the storm who continue paying their employees through the end of the year.

Most of the tax help is directed specifically at those hit by Hurricane Katrina and would not necessarily apply in other regions hit by hurricanes before the end of the storm season.

Expansion of bus system planned in Baton Rouge

New Orleans drivers to claim the new jobs

By Jan Moller
Capital Bureau

BATON ROUGE – In an attempt to alleviate traffic congestion in the state capital caused by an influx of Hurricane Katrina evacuees, federal authorities announced a plan Wednesday to expand bus service in Baton Rouge during peak commuting periods.

The Capital Area Transit System is expecting to augment its fleet with 46 regular buses and 71 smaller buses, which will be operated by drivers from the New Orleans Regional Transit Authority.

David Fukutomi, infrastructure chief for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said plans also are being made to launch "bare-bones" bus service in the New Orleans area starting as early as next week.

"This is a win-win," Fukutomi said. "It helps alleviate two problems: unemployment and the increase in traffic."

The buses are being supplied by the U.S. Department of Transportation, since many buses in the New Orleans area were destroyed or incapacitated by Hurricane Katrina, and the bill is being paid by FEMA. Local authorities are working out schedules for the additional routes, the details of which will be announced shortly, Fukutomi said.

On a separate matter, a U.S. State Department official said only one foreign national has been identified among the nearly 800 people who died during the storm. Joseph Sullivan, who is heading up efforts to identify and locate foreign nationals who were trapped by Katrina, said a British citizen who was a longtime resident of the United States is among those who perished.

The State Department's early estimates were that about 1,000 foreign nationals were unaccounted for after Katrina. Most of those have now been found, and the missing now number in the "low hundreds," Sullivan said.

Tests wash away lake pollution fears

'No toxic soup' from storm, official says

By Mark Schleifstein
Staff writer

Although polluted floodwaters have been pumped into Lake Pontchartrain for the past two weeks, as shown in this Sept. 10 photo taken over eastern New Orleans, officials say that early tests indicate that the lake has not suffered any significant environmental damage.

Based on one or two samples taken in dozens of locations around Lake Pontchartrain during the past two weeks, the federal Environmental Protection Agency, the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality and the Lake Pontchartrain Basin Foundation said Tuesday that the lake seems fairly healthy.

"We've heard a lot during the last 10 days about a toxic soup in Lake Pontchartrain," said foundation Executive Director Carlton Dufrechou. "I'm here today to tell you that there's no toxic soup in Lake Pontchartrain."

EPA on-scene coordinator Max Dodson and DEQ Secretary Mike McDaniel were a bit more circumspect, stressing that the sample results announced Tuesday were the first of what could be a five-year program to monitor potential environmental threats to the lake from Hurricane Katrina.

But the initial test results did indicate that concerns about pumping floodwaters with low amounts of oxygen, high levels of sewage and an unknown amount of toxic materials may not have hurt the lake much, even though the floodwaters pumped into the lake represented 4 percent of the 640-square-mile lake's volume.

Al Heinrichs, director of water quality assessment for DEQ, said the floodwaters did reduce the dissolved oxygen in the lake near the entrances of north shore rivers and bayous and south shore drainage canals.

Oxygen levels were below state standards at the West Pearl and Tchefuncte rivers and Bayous Lacombe, Bonfouca, Cane and Liberty.

All probably were caused by decomposing plant matter and other materials, he said.

High levels of fecal coliform were found in Bayous Bonfouca and Liberty, but in both cases were not much higher than levels normally present at this time of year, he said.

Several fish kills reported on the north shore were the result of the low oxygen, he said. There were no detectable levels of industrial organic chemicals in any of the north shore samples.

Despite concerns that the floodwater pumped out of New Orleans and Jefferson Parish might result in low oxygen levels on the south shore, that didn't happen, according to samples taken a half-mile from shore at the Duncan, Suburban, 17th Street, and Industrial canals and at Little Woods in eastern New Orleans.

Fecal coliform, an indicator of sewage contamination, also was at low levels at all of those sites, although one test directly in the plume of water being pumped from the 17th Street Canal did measure 2,000 colonies, above the state standard for swimming, but right at the state standard for boating and fishing.

But, the dissolved-oxygen content was low right at the mouths of Bayou Labranche and the Industrial, Duncan and Suburban canals.

Heinrichs also said turbidity – cloudiness in the water – also was fairly low, which could reduce the negative effect of the storm water on underwater vegetation.

Officials haven't tested Rangia clams, small mussels that have made a major recovery along the south shore. And they also haven't determined the effects on other organisms living on the lake's bottom, other than finding that crabs were still moving in the water.

Sampling at the Chef Menteur Pass and Rigolets exits from the lake also showed low levels of fecal coliform, which should be good news for oyster farmers concerned that pollutants from the storm water in New Orleans might have reached their oyster beds.

Officials said there's also been no indication of any algae blooms in the lake, a common occurrence when high levels of nutrients are added to the lake during warm, sunny weather. Sample teams reported numerous live fish bait and mullet and a number of crabs in traps along the south shore.

McDaniel said no sampling has been done south of New Orleans in areas along the Mississippi River that have been hard hit by oil spills. A DEQ official said only one boat launch that could be used by sampling teams has been opened that far south.

EPA coordinator Dodson said his staff is working with the Army Corps of Engineers to reduce or stop the pumping of groundwater from canals as the water reaches its lowest level and the contaminants in that water become more condensed.

McDaniel said he doesn't believe that dust and contaminants that might end up in rainwater in canals after thousands of homes are torn down in the city will add much to the contaminant load in the lake.

"What we're hearing is that the way they're going to be handling the debris, that's not going to be a great concern, or at least it will be a manageable one," he said.

Katrina taught lessons, emergency officials say

Everything's ready for Hurricane Rita, White House says

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON – The White House says it has learned lessons from the slow reaction to Hurricane Katrina and will be ready when Hurricane Rita makes landfall this weekend.

Although some state and local officials are skeptical, it appears that the televised images of suffering caused by Hurricane Katrina have motivated people in the path of Rita to take action.

Galveston County, Texas, Commissioner Stephen Holmes said that unlike during past hurricanes, thousands of poor residents and senior citizens without cars came forward early to seek help in getting out of town. And government officials, he said, have responded with convoys of school buses to get people out of potential danger along the Texas Gulf coast as the hurricane was upgraded Wednesday to a Category 5 with winds of 165 mph.

"There's no doubt in my mind that people learned the lesson from Katrina," Holmes said. "We're very organized and so far 15,000 have been evacuated on school buses."

Current predictions have the storm coming ashore somewhere along the Texas or southwest Louisiana coastline.

Although Galveston residents have been able to use their usual hurricane evacuation shelters in Huntsville and College Station, Holmes said, people in other portions of Texas have had to go much farther north than normal because their shelters were full of Katrina evacuees from Louisiana.

"There are no hotel rooms to be had in Houston because we had 55,000 evacuees from Louisiana," said Rep. Gene Green, D-Texas, whose district includes a large seaport and runs from Houston almost to the Galveston line.

Green said he's happy that the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Bush administration are giving assurances that the government is better prepared for Rita than it was for Katrina, which tore through Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama on Aug. 29. "I would hope they learned some lessons from all the problems in New Orleans, but in my lifetime of dealing with FEMA I've found that it has taken them much too much time to get in position after a hurricane, a week, for example, after Tropical Storm Allison," Green said.

In a speech Wednesday, President Bush said that the government is "ready for the worst" from Rita, while FEMA officials said that they have positioned food, ice and water for quick distribution once the storm hits. Pentagon officials said that they have 319,000 National Guard troops ready to respond to Rita, a far larger force than was readied for Katrina.

"I think we're going to be ready when it does hit land," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said.

Communications a priority, officials say

FEMA, from A-4

David Paulison, who was named acting director of FEMA after Michael Brown resigned in the wake of criticism of the government's slow response to Katrina, said he'll rely "much more heavily" on the Pentagon and National Guard than the agency did for the August storm. He said the biggest difference will be improved communications among federal, state and local officials, allowing quicker response to emergencies than was the case for Hurricane Katrina, when communication systems failed across the board.

But Paulison said it's important that people in the potential path of the hurricane in Louisiana and Texas evacuate, because flooding and blocked roadways and bridges could mean long waits for rescue. People in New Orleans waited for as long as a week on rooftops and in attics before help arrived.

"We know that there is going to be a period of time before help gets to you," Paulison said. "So you need to make sure you have your family's plan in place, your evacuation plans in place. Make sure you have food, water, medicine, all the things you need to survive for a couple of days on your own."

In Houston, Mayor Bill White said that the city had a plan in place to move people without cars from low-lying areas, but he conceded that it lacked the "government vehicles to go and evacuate everybody in the area."

In New Orleans, city and state officials were criticized for not mounting a more aggressive effort to evacuate residents without transportation.

In Houston, White pleaded for people with cars to help their neighbors without vehicles to get out.

"We need the citizens, who are the first line of defense and neighbor caring for neighbor in this community, to do your job and to go out and to actively look for those who may need assistance," White said.

U.S. Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, said he wishes he could offer his constituents more optimism that FEMA is ready for Hurricane Rita. "If history is any indication, then no, I don't think they're ready," he said. "They are still not prepared for doing all that's required for Katrina."

As an example, he said, FEMA is supposed to provide overtime pay to local sheriff's deputies responding to the emergency but has yet to do so. This is a problem, he said, because local law enforcement agencies are rapidly running out of money, with their tax base virtually dried up.

Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, said that if Rita hits the Gulf, citizens can only hope their state, federal and local government officials are ready.

"I hope that, God forbid, if Rita hits the Gulf Coast, federal and state authorities will work better together and follow the design and effectiveness demonstrated by the military presence in Louisiana with a defined chain of command and accountability at all levels," he said.

Melancon said he is also concerned that FEMA's new focus on Rita will "slow even more" the process of providing help to people displaced by Katrina.

WHY THE LEVEES BROKE

The six breaches of the New Orleans levee system had one thing in common: the levees that failed all had concrete walls atop earthen berms. There is no agreement as to why they failed, other than the design would have been challenged by a storm stronger than Category 3. An LSU professor thinks two different types of failures occurred:

FLOODWALL CONSTRUCTION: To form a floodwall, sheet pilings, a sort of steel fence, are driven into the compacted dirt of the levee. Then reinforcing steel rods are threaded through the top of the piling, and concrete is poured to encapsulate the top of the piling and form the wall.

NEW YORK TIMES GRAPHIC

OVERTOPPING THE INDUSTRIAL CANAL
Three breaches on the Industrial Canal flooded the 9th Ward and St. Bernard Parish. There is evidence that a powerful surge driving in from the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet overtopped the levee, eroding the earthen berm from the inland side.

BOWING ON THE 17TH STREET AND LONDON CANALS
Ivor van Heerden, an associate professor of civil and environmental engineering at LSU, thinks the levee failures that flooded the heart of New Orleans partly stemmed from flawed levee designs. Water pressure from inside the canals pushed through the canal side of the earthen berms and the concrete panels, much like a bulldozer. This is a controversial theory, because it suggests that the wind and wave forces on the levees were less than Category 3 strength and that the inherent design may not have taken into account water pressure.

Expert: Surge didn't top some floodwalls

By Mark Schleifstein
Staff writer

Storm surge from Hurricane Katrina topped the levee wall along the eastern side of the Industrial Canal, likely causing it to fail, said Ivor van Heerden, an associate professor of civil and environmental engineering at LSU. But it was probably the pressure of water inside the canals that caused walls along the 17th Street and London Avenue canals to breach, he said.

Van Heerden is better known for the storm surge modeling he and others at LSU's Hurricane Center produce to help emergency planners in determining whether evacuations are needed.

But this week, van Heerden has traveled along the damaged canals to try to learn why they gave way, flooding large sections of New Orleans.

At issue is whether the walls failed because they were stressed beyond their design limitations. Army Corps of Engineers and Orleans Levee Board officials have said the floodwalls could withstand a storm that contained elements of both a Category 2 and Category 3 hurricane.

Based on his walks along the canals and modeling conducted in the days after Katrina hit the coast, van Heerden said he thinks the 17th Street Canal did not receive storm surge greater than what should have been expected in a Category 3 storm, while the London Avenue Canal received surge near its design standards.

The Industrial Canal walls did receive Category 3 or greater stresses, he said.

Van Heerden was quick to point out that he's no levee expert and was not involved in the design of the levees.

But he said what caused the walls to fail was becoming clearer and raises questions about their design.

He said that based on oily marks along the wall of the 17th Street Canal above the area where it failed, water in the canal never topped the walls.

The day after the storm, corps civilian engineer Al Naomi, project manager in charge of the Lake Pontchartrain and vicinity levee program, said he believed the water did top the wall, and that the force of the water falling to the earthen part of the levee scoured it away, causing it to fail.

On Wednesday, however, New Orleans District engineer Richard Wagenaar said that theory is being questioned, because no evidence has been found of scouring along that canal.

Van Heerden said his search also turned up no scouring along the 17th Street Canal. But he said there was evidence that the water had somehow pushed some pieces of the wall as much as 20 feet outward when they failed. He also found no scouring along either side of the London Avenue Canal.

Instead, he said, the walls of the London Avenue Canal clearly looked like they had been bowed outward.

"The wall panels are offset from each other, so there are gaps between each," he said.

All three sets of levee walls were built using an I-shaped design, rather than a stronger inverted T-shaped design.

A 2000 version of an Army Corps of Engineers levee design manual says that "for stability reasons," such walls rarely exceed 7 feet tall. The walls along each of the canals averaged 11 feet or taller.

Wagenaar said Wednesday that the walls are the subject of a three-day-old forensic investigation and that the corps has been ordered by Congress not to destroy any documents dealing with them.

He said investigators had begun taking photographic evidence and were attempting to gather whatever other evidence they could even as efforts were made to plug the levee gaps temporarily. Eventually, some wall panels may be removed for further forensic testing, he said.

But both he and Orleans Levee Board Chief Engineer Stevan Spencer disagreed with van Heerden's assertions that Katrina did not deliver forces that went beyond the levee's design.

Wagenaar said debris on the inside of the Lake Pontchartrain lakefront levees in Metairie indicate that powerful waves atop the storm surge reached 17 feet or higher, which would have been beyond the forces for which the walls were built.

"They weren't designed for this strong of a storm," Spencer said.

Wagenaar hinted that the design of the wall may have been influenced by local pressure. For instance, he said, corps officials had originally recommended that floodgates be built at the end of each canal, but that those recommendations were vetoed by local officials as the levees were designed.

"There's a whole bunch of lessons to be learned about the actual physical construction of this system," Wagenaar said. "Do we even need canals? Why not just build 20-foot-wide pipelines to the lake to act as conduits for storm water?"

Van Heerden said that he found no evidence of paint from the barge on the concrete walls that fell in that area.

Evacuees denied entrance to West Bank

GRETNA, from A-1

"If you are in your house and they're rioting all around to get in, are you going to let them in?" asked Gretna Police Chief Arthur Lawson. "We saved our city and protected our people. Our plan worked and we're going to stick with our plan. Next hurricane, we're going to secure our city the same way."

Lawson added that evacuees "actually would have been better off where they were, because we didn't have anything for them."

He said his city of 17,000 was overwhelmed with its own problems at the time: flooded neighborhoods, a barge that damaged the Mississippi River levee, and the daily task of feeding 800 city employees and other emergency personnel.

Officials from Plaquemines and Westwego also said their own problems were too great for them to shoulder someone else's.

But New Orleans elected officials bristle at the suggestion they should have kept residents in the city. While acknowledging their own preparations came up far short, they say getting people out quickly after supplies ran short became the only option.

"If he (Lawson) is saying they would do the same thing over again, is he saying the same woman who died on the ramp because she couldn't get over the bridge, is he saying he would let that woman die again?" said City Council President Oliver Thomas. "I don't think he's thinking that. I think he's talking political. He's just trying to make white folks in Gretna think he's protecting them from all those poor black people from New Orleans."

Lawson insists he would have taken identical measures "if it had been any ethnic group" coming into his city.

The chief's stance has turned him into a folk hero among his constituents. Signs nailed to telephone poles and planted in highway medians proclaim "Thank you and God bless Chief Lawson" and "Balls is spelled Arthur Lawson."

Sitting on the front steps of her shotgun-style house on Monroe Street, just a few paces from where Gretna police had placed barricades to keep out New Orleans residents, city resident Ida Koenig offered a more mixed reaction.

"If they were stopping looters, God bless 'em. But maybe it was just people getting out of harm's way," said Koenig, 59. "The good suffered for the bad."

But Walter Maestri, Jefferson Parish Emergency Management director, said West Bank law enforcement was justified in its aggressive reaction, particularly given the partial burning of the Oakwood Shopping Center on Aug. 30.

The fire, attributed to arson, occurred across the street from a bus stop where thousands of displaced New Orleans residents – primarily women and children – had been cordoned off by Gretna police and Jefferson Parish sheriff's deputies.

"That was the fear — these people that came out of the Superdome, they had no food, no water. They were desperate and, let's be honest, there were some thugs among them," Maestri said.

Westwego Chief Dwayne "Poncho" Munch said at one point a call came over the police radio warning of "400 to 500 looters coming down the (West Bank) Expressway toward Westwego."

That marauding army never arrived, and most looting turned out to be homegrown.

This week, the Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office reported 266 looting arrests since Aug. 29. That included 110 residents of the parish's East Bank, 111 from the West Bank and three from out of state. The remaining 42 – about 16 percent of the total – were from New Orleans, said sheriff's spokesman Col. John Fortunato.

Lawson said few, if any, of the 50 people arrested for looting in Gretna came from other jurisdictions.

"We were not herding criminals, for God's sake," said New Orleans Councilwoman Jacquelyn Brechtel Clarkson, referring to the city's attempt to march people across the Crescent City Connection on foot after evacuation buses were delayed. "We were sending poor, honest, distressed people who should have been picked up 48 hours earlier."

But both Lawson and Munch attributed the low numbers of New Orleans looters to locking down their cities. "The sh— got deep when all those people were coming through on that Wednesday and Thursday," Munch said. "If you wasn't here, shut your mouth, because you don't know."

In Plaquemines Parish, Sheriff Jiff Hingle said he was forced to turn back the school bus convoy headed for the Naval Air Station because the evacuees "would have become our problem."

"All they were going to do was end up destroying my community," he said. "I feel very, very sorry for them. But they would put such a burden on us that we would collapse."

John Pine, director of the disaster science and management program at Louisiana State University, said the actions on the West Bank underscore how ill-prepared the entire region was for the disaster.

"People are raising a lot of questions about race and class discrimination," he said. "In the law, there's two forms of discrimination: One is intentional. One is unintentional.

"I look at this situation and see it's not so much the intent of the decision-makers. It just worked out that way."

But Pine added that the images played out in the media – poor minorities struggling to survive in the face of floodwaters and hostility from their neighbors – have left a mark that will be hard to erase.

"Our state is embarrassed," Pine said.

Blessed - "ADJECTIVE: highly favored or fortunate; characterized by happiness and good fortune."

Prior to Hurricane Katrina, "blessed" was an often used word. Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.

Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. This is a very limited opportunity, and availability is restricted.

We have employment opportunities available in the Sales Department, including management availabilities.

Sales Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 5pm
Service Hours: Mon - Fri 7:30am - 6pm • Sat 7:30-4

We are committed to rebuilding Jefferson Parish and Southeast Louisiana. We need your support. Together, we will prevail and have a better place to live and work than before Hurricane Katrina.

As you read this, Ray Brandt Toyota, its employees and families, and the residents of Southeast Louisiana all have something in common; we are truly "blessed".

Predictions of bigger, better N.O. may be only half right

NAGIN, from A-1

The city plans to hold meetings in cities where many New Orleans residents sought refuge "so the entire community will have a say in the new New Orleans," Nagin said.

The mayor said he still plans to name task force to direct the rebuilding of the city. It will have about 17 people on an executive committee, plus other committees with racial and ethnic segments of the city's population represented. The design of the task force is not final, he said, "but I think you're going to be happy at the end of the day."

The city's priorities are continued rescue efforts, followed by more evacuations, picking up the deceased and clearing debris, Nagin said. The next priority is to set a schedule for people to re-enter the city so they can check on their homes, he said.

Several elected officials urged Nagin to move quickly to let people back into city, even if temporarily.

"People just need to get those little pieces of their lives they can hold onto," said state Rep. Peppi Bruneau, R-New Orleans.

New Orleans City Councilwoman Cynthia Willard-Lewis called for a comprehensive timeline of re-entry plans for all of the city's neighborhoods. Her request was couched in a statement that she wants to see the entire city rebuilt, and wants a commitment from Nagin that the city would not set a plan to repopulate only certain ZIP codes.

Mayor Ray Nagin arrives at a meeting of New Orleans officials and residents Tuesday at the State Capitol in Baton Rouge.

Nagin warned that, if people come back to the city to stay, they should know that hospital facilities are well below the normal standard and that sewer service is faulty. "Our levee systems are beaten down," Nagin added, pointing to the potential for more flooding if further rain stresses the water barricades.

"Make sure you are a very mobile person" if you come to New Orleans, Nagin said.

Nagin last week identified several ZIP codes where residents could re-enter the city in a phased schedule over several days, but he pulled back from that plan when Hurricane Rita became a threat to the region.

The mayor said he has heard concerns about gentrification and that the targeted areas for re-entry tend to favor a repopulation of the city by white residents.

Those initial re-entry areas were targeted because they are dry, Nagin said. Collectively, 55 percent of the population in those ZIP codes is black, 42 percent white and the rest Hispanic, he said.

When Rita moves out of the way, the re-entry will start again on an expedited basis, Nagin said.

Nagin is concerned about people getting hurt in the unsafe conditions, especially in demolished neighborhoods.

"I struggle with, 'Are we moving too soon? Are we moving too slow?' " Nagin said. "You guys are pushing me in an area I don't want to go. I don't want to lose another person."

The entire City Council and nearly all the state lawmakers representing New Orleans attended the meeting.

Some chains bringing in staff from other cities

WORKERS, from A-1

called every apartment complex in East Jefferson to find places for their workers.

"Whenever I could, I asked to get on a waiting list," Newell said. "One place told me I was number 259."

The crunch for employees is evident just by driving by some of the major thoroughfares. Signs are sprouting up announcing businesses are looking for workers.

For many restaurants that are open, the crowds are huge. At the Burger King in the Lowe's parking lot on Veterans near Division Street, the drive-through line Wednesday extended onto Veterans. A Domino's in Fat City had four customers crammed on a bench in the small store and two more waiting outside. The Raising Canes on Veterans was filled with customers inside and in the drive-through, with some parking in the Veterans median and dashing across three lanes of traffic to the store.

Frank Ortolano, general manager of Chevy's in Kenner, buses tables at the Chevy's in Metairie on Wednesday. The chain's Metairie location is running with help from employees of the Kenner and Marrero locations.

The wait at Chevy's on Veterans Boulevard near Severn was 20 minutes shortly before noon, and Frank Ortolano sweated heavily as he carried a plastic container filled with dirty plates, glasses and silverware.

Before Katrina hit, Ortolano was general manager of the Chevy's location on West Esplanade Avenue in Kenner. Now with many employees still out, Ortolano and other managers of Chevy's bus tables, greet customers and wait on tables.

"You do what you've got to do," Ortolano said.

The Metairie location opened on Monday, with the staff from Kenner and Metairie merged, said Darryl Morrissey, front-of-the-house manager for the Kenner location. The two locations have 120 employees, but that's down to just 15 since the storm, Morrissey said. Twenty-five others are managers.

"The biggest problem is no housing," he said of getting more Chevy's employees back in the area and on the job. "Many would come back right now if we could find a place for them to stay."

Morrissey said at least six employees lost everything they own to Katrina, and he knows of 15 who have said they don't plan to return to the area. Some call and ask if they still have a job.

"We tell them whenever they can come back, we need them," he said.

Chevy's managers also are trying to hire new workers, but there is virtually no time to train them.

Large chains such as Outback Steakhouse have an advantage because they can bring in workers from other locations. The Outback location on Severn Avenue was finishing preparations early Wednesday for its re-opening later in the day, manager Elizabeth Lecky said.

But if she had to do it only with the employees from her store, it would be extremely difficult. Lecky said. Only about 20 of the 100 employees have returned.

With help of other Outback locations, Lecky said, the store is actually overstaffed and prepared to handle large crowds.

"But we are really trying to locate our employees," she said. "We are just worried about everyone."

The same is true at Canes, manager Tom Register said. The store has help in from locations in Baton Rouge, Slidell and elsewhere, because only about one third of the staff from the Veterans store has returned. Register said the total devastation in parts of New Orleans hit many Canes employees hard.

"A lot of our people are from New Orleans, and that is a big part of it," he said.

Across the large parking lot from Houston's, Khalil Khalil, owner of Phoenicia Restaurant, said he is hiring because only one of his 10 employees has returned. Katrina pushed nine inches of water into the restaurant, and Khalil worked hard to get it cleaned and ready to open Tuesday.

He needs to get new employees and continue to work to try to help his current crew get back. He needs to put more signs up on Veterans so people will know his business is open and that he will hire waiters and waitresses. And there are insurance and a host of other issues that consume his time.

Still, he manages to smile as he looks out to a largely empty parking lot, waiting for customers.

"I am the person here who is doing everything," he said. "But there is only so much you can do."

Workers with Boh Bros. Construction Co., under the supervision of the Army Corps of Engineers, close the 17th Street Canal with about 50 feet of 22-inch-wide steel sheet pilings. The canal will remain closed until the threat of storm surges passes.

RITA, from A-1

was inundated by Hurricane Katrina and subsequent levee breaks.

Given the possibility of more water for the already saturated city, the Army Corps of Engineers began Wednesday to close with steel sheet pilings the 17th Street and London Avenue canals, both of which were damaged by Hurricane Katrina, to provide protection for those parts of the city. They are to remain closed until the weather threat passes.

In neighboring St. Bernard Parish, Lake Borgne Levee District officials said they are on schedule to complete repairs of the 66-mile levee along the parish's northern and eastern flanks in time to protect against a potential for a 2- to 4-foot storm surge.

In Jefferson Parish, an official said a storm could push a tidal surge of 3 to 5 feet into Barataria Bay and threaten a weak point in the parish's storm defenses: the Harvey Canal levee. Anything over 5 feet could top the levee and cause widespread flooding, emergency management director Walter Maestri said.

But as of Wednesday, there were no plans to evacuate the estimated 200,000 Jefferson Parish residents who have returned since Hurricane Katrina. Maestri said that with relatively few gas stations or grocery stores reopened, evacuees would not be able to stock up on needed supplies before they hit the road.

"People are not ready to move again, and our infrastructure is such that we can't move again," he said.

With maximum sustained winds of 165 mph, Rita achieved the top ranking on the Saffir-Simpson scale Wednesday, only a day after becoming a hurricane. It was heading west across the Gulf of Mexico, but it is expected to turn northwest before landfall.

If Rita hits Galveston, which is about 40 miles southeast of Houston, it will smash a city where a 1900 hurricane killed about 8,000 people in one of the biggest natural disasters in U.S. history.

Watching Rita's march across the Gulf were Texas officials and Louisianians who had headed west to Texas seeking refuge from Katrina and were facing the possibility of moving yet again.

Some who had landed in Houston were thrown into deeper turmoil Wednesday when city and Harris County officials shut down the last two shelters there. About 350 Louisianians chose to board National Guard flights to Fort Chaffee, Ark., while those who stayed behind were told to prepare or evacuate or find a safe place to ride out the storm.

"We have to leave right now. They say the storm is coming," said Hilda Young, who had been looking in vain for some sort of temporary housing. She is in Houston with seven children and two other adults, and she said she didn't know where they would go.

Nevertheless, Houston Mayor Bill White said in a televised news conference Wednesday that displaced Louisianians in Texas' biggest city will not be overlooked.

"We will not forget that there are dislocated Americans with us," said White, who has not yet called for evacuation of the city.

But in that same conference, he assured the public that the city's resources were not drained by sheltering Louisiana refugees from Katrina.

"We will not and have not compromised services to Houstonians," he said.

Just across the border in southwest Louisiana, 195 Katrina evacuees with special medical problems were moved by bus Wednesday to safer shelters north of Interstate 10, along with 41 caregivers.

Areas south of that highway, which girds the southern part of Louisiana, are at the greatest risk of flooding from hurricanes.

Officials in Calcasieu Parish, the largest parish in southwest Louisiana, will decide today whether to order an evacuation, said Dana Newsome, a spokeswoman for the state Emergency Operations Center.

So far, she said, the only parish where such an order is in effect is Orleans because levees are fragile and water from Katrina still stands in some streets.

Despite that order, some people declared they weren't budging.

"We've never felt safer," said Peggy Flores as she stood in front of her two-story home at 1026 Franklin Ave.

"Why burden other states?" she said. "I'd rather take my chances here than in a shelter or on the road. If I'm going to die, I may as well die right here."

But Jerome Sterling of Bridge City had a decidedly different response – "Hell, no!" – when asked if he would ride out Rita.

Les Wisinger agreed as he packed a van with fabrics and furniture for his family business, Harper's Antique store on Magazine Street, as it moved to temporary quarters in Mississippi.

If Rita strikes, "everything that wasn't wet or destroyed will be," he said. "And even if they do turn the lights on, what have you got? There's nobody here."

Just back from a Dallas evacuation center, Oscar Medema, 40, spent part of his first day cleaning up the yard at his Uptown home, a tiny swatch of greenery that Hurricane Katrina didn't touch. The rest of the time he was looking for work. Perhaps it would be cleaning up storm debris or office buildings, he said.

Like thousands of other city residents, Medema is about to start over in a city grappling with acute poverty and rampant crime before a natural disaster tried to wipe it off the map. But, unlike most evacuees he met last week at a Dallas shelter, Medema chose to pick up the pieces of his life at home – not in Texas, Arkansas, Utah or Detroit or any of the other locales that have welcomed the diaspora of displaced New Orleanians.

"I thought about it a little bit," Medema said of the idea of starting fresh in Dallas. "If my house was a total loss, I would have started over. It's cheaper for me to do everything from here."

By everything, he explained, he meant renewing his driver's license and finding work.

Medema evacuated to Dallas after riding out Katrina at his Robert Street home. Tuesday night, he caught a ride back to New Orleans with a couple from New Iberia.

Those he met at Dallas' Reunion Arena, which opened as a Red Cross shelter for Katrina victims on Aug. 31, were from the Lower Ninth Ward, Central City and eastern New Orleans, some of the poorest corners of one of the poorest cities in America. He understands why many never want to return and sees it supported by evidence that Texas has proved to be a receptive landing spot for New Orleans evacuees.

In Houston, where an initial 27,000 moved into the Astrodome, all but about 3,500 have found their way to other quarters, the first step toward starting a new, more independent life.

Reunion Arena in downtown Dallas held just under 1,000 evacuees at its peak, said Celso Martinez, a spokesman for Dallas government. Tuesday night, fewer than 100 people remained.

Many left the shelter for jobs and housing, and found quick and efficient access to food stamps and other welfare benefits, Martinez said. They had no problem getting temporary identification cards, and they put their kids in schools there and liked what they found in a new city.

"Dallas made it real easy for them to get it real quick," Medema said of the food-stamp debit cards provided by the state. "The school system there was really great. The system took them in in the first few days. They told me that when they were here, they were out of work. When they went to Dallas, they found work immediately."

Many told Medema they're not coming back to their ruined hometown. They have, finally, had their fill of it.

"If they can find jobs and another home, they're going," Medema said outside his modest shotgun house on Wednesday. "Since there is nothing to come home to, they're going to start a new life. A lot of them were single parents."

At the Dallas shelter, Medema said he volunteered for 12-hour shifts handing out water and food. He spent a lot of that time talking to fellow New Orleans residents.

Oscar Medema, 40, returned to New Orleans after evacuating to Dallas after Katrina, and he has been living in his Uptown home. He says many of his family and friends don't plan to return, but that he is here to stay. He spent the day cleaning up around the outside of his house and scraping together supplies for his stay at home.

"Some older folks recognized me," he said. "It was kind of like a warm feeling. They got somebody they know to help them out."

With no car, Medema walked Uptown streets Wednesday, trying to track down a weed-eater to work on his high grass. Cleaning up the front porch and yard was a chore and a half, he said, but he was thankful for having something to come home to: a house, and a job lead. He was hoping a friend would bring him a couple bottles of water, though.

Medema's perspective is not limited to his Uptown neighborhood. He has connections to Central City and has seen the same inclination among some of that district's poor residents to seek new lives away from New Orleans.

Central City, along Martin Luther King Jr. Boulevard by the B.W. Cooper public housing complex, was a vacant debris-strewn picture of hopeless loss this week. The body of a dead dog, the same one that was there a week ago, shriveled on the neutral ground in the hot sun. An overturned limousine sat a few blocks down Earhart Boulevard, right beside a hearse. Cars had water marks that showed they had been swallowed by the flooding.

In the 3500 block of Martin Luther King Jr. Blvd., a boat was dry-docked at the entryway to one of the Cooper stairwells. On the stoop, someone had left a picture frame, with two young people posing confidently. Toys littered the walkway, including a pink Barbie play set still in its box and a "super cap gun" that also hadn't been opened. The gun promised realistic bullet action.

The area was not entirely untenanted, however, and some of those on the streets Wednesday were, like Medema, diehard New Orleanians.

James Pellet pedaled by on his bicycle, saying he was staying in town and actually on the way to Winn-Dixie. He was staying with a bunch of people, he said, but didn't want to give the address.

Pellet pedaled with a purpose. Asked if he would evacuate for Rita, he said, "For what reason? Why?"

Up the road a piece, Brentley Duplessis, 47, walked alone down the empty streets. Duplessis, who grew up in Pontchartrain Park and parts of Uptown, said he knew the Morial family, the Nevilles and other local luminaries. His heart was heavy, he said, but it remained in New Orleans.

"I wanted to come back," Duplessis said, having evacuated from the Superdome debacle to Arkansas. "I caught a plane back today. I have to find my sister."

Repeatedly, Duplessis gently tapped his chest with one fist and said, "I always keep them here."

Duplessis, wearing a white cap and a Nike shirt, trudged along in the sun and politely turned down offers of a ride. At Euterpe Street and Oretha Castle Haley Boulevard, right outside Café Reconcile, Duplessis surveyed his hometown.

He carried a palm-sized notebook filled with names and phone numbers, including Marc Morial and Ivan Neville. He ticked off the neighborhoods he grew up roaming: the 7th Ward, the 8th, the east, Central City.

Duplessis said he liked Arkansas, "Them people did a lot for us." But he said he needed to return home, to check on people.

"Our city will never die," Duplessis said, in a voice choked with tears.

It will also be on the lookout for car-theft rings that take advantage of the hurricane to steal cars and dispose of them elsewhere in the country.*

National mayors group lends hand to Nagin

It vows to provide personnel, aid

Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – The United States Conference of Mayors has pledged assistance and support to New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin in his effort to rebuild the storm-stricken city.

The group, with a headquarters in Washington, D.C., will provide staff and lobbying support and help coordinate the many offers of aid in the form of personnel and equipment pouring in from the nation's mayors and cities.

'Mayors across this country are already sending supplies to these areas, we are providing housing for displaced citizens, and we will continue to provide cash donations for these affected areas,' said the conference's president, Mayor Beverly O'Neill of Long Beach, Calif.

O'Neill and other conference officials met with Nagin and New Orleans City Council members in Baton Rouge last week. The support from the conference was arranged in part by Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu and his father, Moon Landrieu, a former mayor of New Orleans who was once a president of the mayor's conference.

The group made a similar pledge to communities on the Mississippi Gulf coast.

Men accused of fraud against relief workers

Charity used to steal identities, police say

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE – Two men were arrested Wednesday on charges of promoting a fake charitable activity that targeted more than 2,500 New Orleans area police officers, firefighters and emergency workers involved in the Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts, Attorney General Charles Foti said.

The two were arrested Wednesday shortly before 5 a.m. in Green Bay, Wis., for falsely impersonating Salvation Army employees and for conspiracy to commit identity theft of the rescue workers.

Foti identified the two as Scott Benson, 47, of Green Bay, and Chris Armstrong, 35, of Orlando, Fla.

Foti called the scheme 'despicable' because it promised to pay the officers and firefighters $5,000 each for their roles in rescue and recovery efforts. They claimed the money was donated by the national media giant Viacom, Foti said.

He said the pair obtained the identities of the victims and their family members based on forms that had to be filled out. Foti said the data could be used to files false claims with the Small Business Administration and with the Federal Emergency Management Agency for disaster relief.

Besides New Orleans police officers and firefighters, those who were eligible to sign up for the vouchers included Orleans Parish Sheriffís Office deputies, Jefferson Parish Sheriffís Office deputies, emergency personnel, and state and federal law enforcement agents.

Foti said the two men posed as Salvation Army volunteers and convinced the officers and others to sign up for the free $5,000 in the past week.

Foti said the two set up a registration table behind Harrahís New Orleans Casino, a base for emergency operations. He said they set Tuesday as day to hand out the $5,000 vouchers, and about 1,500 recipients lined up to receive the money before learning the money and the men were not there.

Foti said the pair will be extradited to the state.

If convicted, Foti said, Benson and Armstrong would face up to 10 years in prison and a $10,000 fine for conspiracy to commit identity theft.

Private schools may share in U.S. disaster assistance

Proposal would help public schools more

By Laura Maggi
Capital Bureau

BATON ROUGE – The effort to direct taxpayer dollars to pay for private school tuition has been a hot-button issue for years in the Louisiana Legislature, although it has been consistently unsuccessful. But Hurricane Katrina is poised to change that, at least temporarily, with officials along the political spectrum saying that both private and public schools will need assistance.

The U.S. Department of Education has proposed that up to $1.9 billion be dispersed to public schools that have enrolled at least 10 students from the region hit by the storm, as well as up to $488 million to help families whose children are attending private schools. A spokesman for U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said that a recovery plan to be unveiled by the state congressional delegation today will include monetary assistance for private schools, although the bulk of the education proposal will be directed toward public school districts.

This move is likely to be opposed by many of the traditional opponents of school vouchers, including teacher unions and other public education advocates. The Louisiana Federation of Teachers opposes the plan, said Les Landon, a spokesman for the union.

'We are unalterably opposed to any scheme that will take badly needed public education funds away from the public school children and send them to the privileged private and religious schools,' Landon said. 'It is shameful that voucher supporters will use a catastrophe like this as a pretext to raid the public treasury.'

Education Superintendent Cecil Picard did not have a comment about the proposal to help pay for private school tuition as part of the relief effort, with a spokeswoman noting that there are still 'several proposals floating around.'

Picard has said that he believes $2.4 billion will be needed for school districts that are teaching displaced students, as well as additional money to help compensate teachers who are unemployed because of the storm, said Meg Casper, a spokeswoman for the state education department.

The details about exactly who would be eligible for federal private school assistance are still being worked out, said Chad Colby, deputy press secretary for the federal education department. For example, it is not clear whether this money would be available for students who were in public school before the storm who are now attending a private school.

'We are saying this is an unprecedented one-year plan to help students displaced by a natural disaster,' Colby said. He noted that these details would have to be spelled out in legislation that Congress would need to approve before any money would be coming into the state.

The Rev. William Maestri, school superintendent for the Archdiocese of New Orleans, said that the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina should change the way people think about how to pay for education. 'The question can no longer be who is providing the education,' said Maestri, who has been a prominent supporter of school vouchers for the past few years.

Catholic schools have reopened in St. Tammany, St. John the Baptist and St. Charles parishes, and will soon be open in Jefferson Parish, Maestri said. At the same time, many of the approximately 13,000 students from Orleans Parish and St. Bernard Parish have enrolled in schools in those areas, as well as in Baton Rouge, he said.

The archdiocese has opened up its own satellite schools in Baton Rouge, as well as helping place students in existing Catholic schools, he said.

'There is an enormous economic and financial challenge facing us as we try to provide that education,' Maestri said.

Federal government rushes aid to Texas

Bush urges people to get out of path of Category 5 Rita

By Lara Jakes Jordan
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — The federal government rushed hospital beds, rescue teams and evacuation buses to Texas on Wednesday in an urgent effort to brace for Hurricane Rita.

President Bush, pledging to be "ready for the worst," declared a state of emergency in Texas and Louisiana as his administration moved to improve on its lackluster early response to Hurricane Katrina. He pleaded with people in the region to comply with mandatory evacuation orders issued in New Orleans and Galveston, Texas.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency sent nearly 1,200 medical and rescue personnel into Texas as Rita grew to a Category 5 storm — the highest level on the Saffir-Simpson scale — in its sweep across the Gulf of Mexico. FEMA also asked the Pentagon to send 2,500 hospital beds to potential disaster zones in Louisiana and Texas, and was sending 200 buses to Texas to move residents out of harm's way.

Officials said rescue teams and supplies already in Louisiana to deal with Hurricane Katrina's aftermath would remain there to respond to Rita.

"I urge the citizens to listen carefully to the instructions provided by state and local authorities and follow them," Bush said in a speech to the Republican Jewish Coalition. "We hope and pray that Hurricane Rita will not be a devastating storm, but we have got to be ready for the worst."

Bush said federal, state and local governments were in close coordination as Rita moved closer. Though supplies were deployed amid ongoing discussions with local and state authorities, acting FEMA Director R. David Paulison made it clear the administration would take no chances in being ready for Rita after disaster-response mistakes that followed Katrina three weeks ago.

"We want to make sure we're ready," Paulison told reporters in Washington. "We'd rather pre-position more assets than we need than not have enough."

He called Rita "a huge storm."

Paulison said the Pentagon was working to bring specialized communications equipment to Rita's forecast strike area to ensure local emergency first-responder teams would be able to talk to each other after the storm passed though. Failed communications systems across the Gulf Coast severely hobbled Katrina response teams.

The Pentagon was to send six heavy-lift helicopters to transport rescue teams, and Texas Gov. Rick Perry already had activated some 5,000 National Guard troops to assist.

Test-taking sites for SAT shifted

Students either displaced by Hurricane Katrina or scheduled to take the SAT at a location affected by the storm must arrange to take the test elsewhere, according to The College Board, which administers the exam to college-bound high school seniors.

Any student scheduled to take the test Oct. 8 should call (866) 392-3017 or (609) 771-7600 to arrange to take it in the city they have evacuated to, provided spots are still available. Students remaining in the New Orleans area may have to travel outside the region, said Chiara Coletti, a spokeswoman for the College Board.

Spots for additional test-takers are being added to current test-taking sites across the nation, she said. The College Board is planning to release on Monday a list of sites with available spots for the Oct. 8 exam.

All fees normally associated with such changes will be waived, Coletti said.

High school students not applying for early college admission can take the test for free in November and December if they were displaced by the storm.

All high school sophomores and juniors in storm-affected areas can also take the PSAT at no cost. Those students or their parents should call (609) 771-7070.

House panel hears plans to overhaul Amtrak

Proposal may put Northeast routes in private hands

By Donna de la Cruz
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON - Putting routes in the Northeast under private control and other steps to make Amtrak profitable drew attention on Wednesday from a House panel.

At the hearing, the chairman of the passenger railroad, David M. Laney, said all 20 of the high-speed Acela Express trains had returned to service. The trains, which operate between Washington and Boston, stopped running in April after the discovery of cracks in brake discs. Limited service resumed in July.

Among the overhaul ideas discussed was the Bush administration's plan to eliminate Amtrak subsidies while setting aside $360 million for service in the Northeast.

Amtrak is requesting $1.82 billion for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1, compared with the $1.2 billion it now receives.

One Senate proposal would cut Amtrak's operating subsidy by 40 percent, leaving the railroad with $3.3 billion over six years. This approach would give the railroad $4.9 billion over six years for capital grants.

A competing plan in the Senate would give Amtrak a $1.4 billion subsidy next year.

Judging Roberts a winner, Democrats add their support

By Jesse J. Holland
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — Chief Justice-nominee John Roberts, his confirmation secure, picked up support from fractured Senate Democrats on Wednesday as President Bush met lawmakers to discuss a second, probably more contentious, vacancy on the Supreme Court.

The Judiciary Committee's senior Democrat, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, announced his support for Roberts shortly after leaving the White House, guaranteeing bipartisan backing for the nominee in todayís vote by the panel.

But Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, longtime liberal stalwart Edward Kennedy and former presidential candidate John Kerry all are opposing Roberts, underscoring a split among the Senate's 44 Democrats on whether they can or should mount even symbolic opposition to the successor to the late William Rehnquist.

Republicans control the Senate and the Judiciary Committee, so majority support was already assured for the panel's vote today and for confirmation next week.

However, some of the Democrats' liberal supporters hoped that a strong vote against Roberts would signal to Bush that replacing retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor with a far-right conservative would lead to a bigger fight in the Senate.

Leahy, who has led filibuster fights against Bush's lower-court nominees, said in a speech on the Senate floor, "I do not intend to lend my support to an effort by this president to move the Supreme Court and the law radically to the right."

But Roberts "is a man of integrity," said Leahy. "I can only take him at his word that he does not have an ideological agenda."

Other Democrats, including Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Max Baucus of Montana, also have announced their support. Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Mary Landrieu of Louisiana are leaning toward voting for Roberts, and Kent Conrad of North Dakota is viewed as a possible vote for him as well.

Roberts is "very well credentialed," Landrieu said Wednesday.

The other six Judiciary Democrats — Joseph Biden, Herb Kohl, Charles Schumer, Dick Durbin, Russell Feingold and Dianne Feinstein — have yet to announce their votes.

Durbin and Schumer were confronted by television producer Norman Lear and other major party supporters during a trip to the West Coast over the weekend, according to party officials familiar with the conversation.

These Democratic supporters are strongly opposed to Roberts, and want Durbin, the second-ranking Democrat in the Senate, and Schumer, the head of the campaign committee, to oppose his confirmation.

Leahy's decision was "inexplicable and deeply disappointing," said Ralph Neas, head of People for the American Way.

The stakes become greater with the next nominee, and "the next nomination is going to be a great deal more contentious," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the Judiciary Committee's chairman.

The conservative Roberts is replacing Rehnquist, a reliably conservative vote on the court. Bush's next nominee will replace O'Connor, one of the court's swing voters on affirmative action, abortion, campaign finance, discrimination and death penalty cases. Replacing her could give the president a chance swing the court to the right on many issues.

Laura Bush reiterated in an Associated Press interview Tuesday that she hoped the president would name a woman.

Specter cautioned President Bush during the Wednesday morning meeting that nominating either Priscilla Owen or Janice Rogers Brown — two appeals court judges Democrats filibustered but eventually allowed to be confirmed — to the O'Connor seat could cause problems, according to a congressional official familiar with the meeting. That official spoke on condition of anonymity because the give-and-take was considered confidential.

The senators offered some names to the president, who did not share his own opinions. White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Bush was considering a diverse list.

Among candidates widely mentioned are: federal appellate judges Owen, Brown, Edith Brown Clement, Edith Holland Jones, Emilio Garza, Edward Charles Prado, Alice Batchelder, Karen Williams, Michael Luttig, Harvie Wilkinson, Michael McConnell and Samuel Alito. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, lawyer Miguel Estrada and Maura Corrigan, a member of the Michigan Supreme Court, are also considered possibilities.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he urged the president to announce his decision within the next 10 days or so. Frist said a new justice could be confirmed "by Thanksgiving if that nomination comes quickly enough."

Specter suggested that the president wait a while, and said he had talked to O'Connor about staying on through the full 2005-06 term.

"It would be quite a sacrifice for her, but she's prepared to do it if she is asked," Specter said. "By next June we'll know a lot more about Judge Roberts ... than we do today."

U.S. presses case against Iran nukes

But push to involve U.N. Security Council faces stiff opposition

By Andrea Dudikova
Associated Press writer

VIENNA, AUSTRIA - The United States on Wednesday urged fellow board members of the U.N. atomic watchdog agency to do their "duty" and haul Iran before the Security Council for violating its nuclear treaty commitments. But the timing of a vote on the issue appeared in doubt.

A new European Union proposal on Security Council referral that was circulated late Wednesday appeared to back away from a call for immediate action in the face of strong opposition from more than a dozen of the 35 board members of the International Atomic Energy Agency meeting in Vienna, including Security Council members Russia and China.

The new draft still called for reporting Iran to the council – but only at a future session, if it continues defying board demands, including reimposing a freeze on uranium enrichment related activities, according to senior diplomats accredited to the IAEA. The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to disclose the confidential details of the draft.

Iranian Vice President Gholamreza Aghazadeh arrived in Vienna to campaign against the U.S.-European motion and said his country would honor the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty regardless of the board's decision, despite Iranís displeasure over the push to involve the Security Council.

Aghazadeh spoke to reporters after meeting with representatives from Russia, China and the Nonaligned Movement, all of whom oppose the U.S.-European motion, which is expected to be introduced at the board meeting.

In Moscow, the Foreign Ministry criticized attempts to report Iran to the U.N. Security Council as "counterproductive," the Interfax news agency reported.

"This will not contribute to the search for a solution to the Iranian problem through political and diplomatic means," Interfax quoted a Foreign Ministry statement as saying.

The chief U.S. representative, meanwhile, lobbied board members to support the motion, formally a EU initiative that is being orchestrated in close consultation with Washington and backed by Australia, Japan, Canada and others at the meeting.

"We agree with the European Union and a growing majority of the board that the time has come to report Iran's (nuclear) noncompliance to the Security Council," U.S. delegation head Gregory Schulte told the meeting. "It is now time for the board to do our duty."

Meeting participants, who spoke anonymously because of the sensitive issues on the agenda at the closed conference, said the EU, Australia, Canada and Japan also demanded referral.

Tehran insists its nuclear program is solely for energy production, despite U.S. and EU concerns that it could be used for nuclear weapons.

Iraqi rally denounces 'British aggression'

Governor threatens to end cooperation

By Thomas Wagner
Associated Press writer

BAGHDAD, IRAQ — Hundreds of Iraqi civilians and policemen, some waving pistols and AK-47s, rallied Wednesday in the southern city of Basra to denounce "British aggression" in the rescue of two British soldiers.

The Basra governor threatened to end all cooperation with British forces unless Prime Minister Tony Blair's government apologizes for the deadly clash with Iraqi police. Britain defended the raid.

In London, British Defense Secretary John Reid and Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari tried to minimize the effect of the fighting, saying it would not undermine the relationship between the two nations or their determination to lead Iraq to peace and democracy.

But the fighting raised new concerns about the power that radical Shiite militias with close ties to Iran have developed in the region, questions about the role of Britain's 8,500-strong force in Iraq and doubts about the timetable for handing over power to local security forces.

There has been disagreement about just what happened late Monday, when British armor crashed into a jail to free two British soldiers who had been arrested by Iraqi police.

According to the British, Shiite Muslim militiamen moved the two soldiers from the jail to a private home while British officials tried to negotiate their release with Iraqi officials. After raiding the jail, the British say they rescued the soldiers in a nearby private home in the custody of Shiite militias.

Earlier that day, a crowd attacked British troops with stones and Molotov cocktails.

Iraqi Interior Minister Bayan Jabr disputed the British account. He told the British Broadcasting Corp. the two soldiers never left police custody or the jail, were not handed over to militants, and that the British army acted on a "rumor" when it stormed the jail.

But Basra's governor, Mohammed al-Waili, said the two men were indeed moved from the jail. He said they were placed in the custody of the al-Mahdi Army, the militia of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

"The two British were being kept in a house controlled by militiamen when the rescue operation took place," al-Waili said. "Police who are members of the militia group took them to a nearby house after jail authorities learned the facility was about to be stormed."

At first, Basra police said the two British soldiers shot and killed a policeman before they were taken into custody, but on Tuesday al-Jaafari's spokesman, Haydar al-Abadi, said the men – who were wearing civilian clothes – were grabbed for behaving suspiciously and collecting information.

Lisa Glover, a British Foreign Office spokeswoman in Baghdad, said the two soldiers "were challenged by armed men in plain clothes ... and they obviously didn't know who they were being challenged by." But "when Iraqi police asked them to stop, they did," she told The Associated Press.

Massive pet rescue effort is not without claws

Working together key for welfare groups

By Doug MacCash
Staff writer

A dog enticed from the roof of a flooded house into the arms of boat-born rescuers. Crates of mewing cats loaded into evacuation vans. Notices of stranded pets spray-painted on abandoned house fronts. These are some of the most widely-broadcast, iconic images of the New Orleans area's struggle to survive in the weeks after Katrina.

The removal of thousands of stranded pets from the flooded region by scores of professional animal rescuers from across the country is a self-evident success. Yet the head of one local animal support agency said the experience also was hampered at times by territorial infighting between some animal rescue groups that rushed into the disaster zone.

Despite profound communication problems, the early days were relatively well managed, with a single, unified list of requested rescue addresses and rescued pets, said Laura Maloney, director of the Louisiana SPCA. But she said in later days, the rescue effort sometimes dissolved into factionalism as organizations from all over the country vied for their slice of the disaster.

Maloney said she understands her colleague's duty to serve animal owners in need ñ and is quick to note the various groups saved some 3,000 animals in the region ñ but she feels the scattered efforts were at times counterproductive.

'It's like the rescue of a seeing-eye dog named Molly, she said. 'It took us 6 hours to get her. If someone else was spending 6 hours doing the same thing, then that's 6 hours wasted.'

Maloney attributed some of the infighting to 'political wrangling of the national organizations for fund-raising opportunities,' adding ,'I think they're all looking for the highest profile.'

The various organizations have since arranged themselves into a somewhat uneasy shotgun marriage, Maloney said, allowing the rescues to take precedence over infighting.

'We're trying to organize the lists again,' she said.

Shirley Minshew, an employee with the Cape Cod, Mass.,-based International Fund for Animal Welfare, removes a cat from a sweltering townhouse located on Constance Street in New Orleans Wednesday. The removal of thousands of stranded pets by professional animal rescuers from across the country is a self-evident success, but it was sometimes hampered by territorial infighting between some animal rescue groups rushing into the disaster zone.

is a typical example of a professional animal handler†that flooded the region in the days after Hurricane Katrina came ashore Aug. 29. Minshew, 52, is a veteran of more than 20 animal-threatening natural and man-made disasters, including oil spills to earthquakes. She said she's never seen such widespread need for her services as she has since arriving in New Orleans on Sept. 1.

On one recent sweltering afternoon, Minshew worked feverishly to remove several cats from a hot, feces strewn townhouse on Constance Street, first seducing them with gentle coos, then snatching them with cobra-quick jabs.

One gray tabby sunk its teeth into her forearm; another sliced her wrist with a claw. Each wound required quick first aid in the house's oven hot bathroom, a smear of blood and alcohol flowing into the tiny sink.

As one cat was captured, others would appear out of nowhere, ricocheting around the baseboards like furry pin balls. Eleven cats in all would be removed in what she described as a rescue of average difficulty, before the 5:30 p.m. curfew required rescuers to retreat from the city.

The captured cats were delivered to a veterinary triage center in a grocery store Uptown New Orleans parking lot, joining other cats and dogs treated by sweating volunteer veterinarians under the row of olive green tents.

Maloney said animals at the city's animal shelter on Japonica Street in Bywater had been evacuated to Houston prior to the hurricane. An emergency plan by the Louisiana SPCA and the Department of Agriculture utilized the Lamar-Dixon Exposition Center in Gonzales, 70 miles west of New Orleans on Interstate 10, where evacuated animals from across the region would be warehoused until they could be reunited with their owners.

In the first chaotic days when animal rescuers weren't allowed into the stricken city, many evacuating residents busied themselves rescuing theirs and neighbor's pets, sometimes risking their own lives to do it. Many other residents refused to leave with rescuers, fearing the fate of their pets. Some police and fire department rescuers welcomed pets into their evacuation boats with their owners; while others insisted animals be left behind.

The uncertain plight of animals contributed to the chaos.

Volunteer and animal control professionals arriving in Gonzales were separated into two groups:†those with rescue experience would go to the flood site, while a larger group would stay behind to care for the animals as they arrived.

Maloney estimated that at any one time, 300 animal rescue workers were on hand, with 80 land-and-water rescuers work flooded streets.

While organizing the massive effort led to some friction between agencies, Lou Guyton, director of the southwest regional office of the Humane Society U.S. in Dallas, said that after leaping through some initial bureaucratic hoops, the overall rescue effort was a tremendous success.

'I think that it was one of the monumental rescues of all time,' Guyton said. 'The Louisiana SPCA had an excellent plan in place. Plans are wonderful, but nobody was ready for a disaster of this magnitude. The state gets to say who gets to come and who gets to go. I had to go through the official process to come in. The Louisiana SPCA was very helpful. Everybody wanted to help, and there was room for everybody to help.'

In recent days, the pace of the rescue effort has slowed from the fevered first weeks of the storm's aftermath. Rescuers in the city are removing fewer animals as the streets dry, supplying them with food and water instead. And most rescue efforts may wrap up in the coming week, especially if residents begin flowing back into the neighborhoods.

But on Monday, the 12-person water rescue team that included Minshew continued its work, slogging through black, custard-thick mud in Gentilly. The drama of the early days had dissipated in the record heat, but there were still animals to be found.

SHEILA STROUP

Tour for Cure shifts gears

A parade of power trucks passed our house Sunday, followed by one man on a bicycle.

On a normal September Sunday, Stroup and I would have gone for a long bike ride instead of hauling tree limbs out of our yard, and we would have seen dozens of other cyclists along the way.

For years, riders in padded shorts and bright jerseys have appeared on country roads in St. Tammany Parish during the scorching days of late summer.

Their goal? To pedal themselves into shape for the annual MS Tour for Cure. The 2-day 150-mile ride from Southeastern Louisiana University in Hammond to Percy Quin State Park in McComb, Miss., is held the first weekend of October. Except this year.

"Everything's just different this year," Brian Berrigan said. "From now on, everything is going to be BK and AK, Before Katrina and After Katrina."

Postponement inevitable

Brian is president of the Louisiana Chapter of the National MS Society. He's staying in Baton Rouge now, but when I talked to him Tuesday, he was at the MS office in Metairie, which had two feet of water in it after the hurricane.

"I'm looking at mold, and I've been tearing out carpeting," he said.

Much as he and tour director Jessica Salter hated to postpone the 23rd MS Tour for Cure, it was inevitable for several reasons.

"First of all, we rely on 600 volunteers, and they're scattered all over," he said.

Second, finding a place for 1,200 or so riders to stay in McComb would have been impossible because the park and local hotels are full of electric company and relief workers.

And then there are the fabulous feasts Mike Maenza of Mr. Mudbug Catering always prepares for hungry cyclists.

"He's busy making thousands of meals a day for the power companies," Brian said.

'After Katrina' plans

Brian and his board are planning a one-day 75-mile ride in late winter or early spring in place of the fall ride, and they know the "After Katrina" October 2006 Tour for Cure will be the biggest and best ever.

"We were getting record numbers on our training rides this year, and rookie riders were absolutely incredible," he said. "One of our rookies is 80 years old."

In the meantime, Brian is making the best of things. He has already rescued the T-shirts that didn't get ruined by the hurricane and donated them to some shelters. "You're going to be seeing a lot of MS Tour for Cure T-shirts in Baton Rouge," he said.

He hopes they'll remind everyone why we ride: Because even when our hearts are focused on Katrina, people are being diagnosed with multiple sclerosis, and sometime After Katrina, we will find a cure.

Riders who registered for the Louisiana MS Tour for Cure can take part in other fall tours across the country. For information about MS bike tours and After Katrina help for MS patients, call (800) FIGHT MS or go to www.mssociety.org.

Sue Claverie walked into the middle of Carey Street, camera in hand and surgical mask over her nose and mouth, surveying the damage wrought more than two weeks earlier by Hurricane Katrina.

"Everything is gone," Claverie said, her eyes filling with tears. "My restaurant was filled with the most beautiful stuff. It was just really elegant."

She clicked a few photos to document the destruction at the Victorian Tea Room, hoping at the same time to avoid the putrid smell emanating from the pile of furniture, drywall and insulation on the sidewalk out front.

Although she was able to salvage some teapots and treasured china, little remains of the business Claverie and her husband, Dave, have owned for the past 13 years.

TRIAGE IN HELL

In the worst of situations, local health-care worker did what she does best: help

HURRICANE HEROES

Medical worker cares for people stranded on 'hell's island'

When Fats Domino went into a diabetic crisis at the makeshift triage center at the New Orleans Arena, a day and a half after Hurricane Katrina had leveled much of the city, it seemed to Sherry Watters that the situation must have finally bottomed out.

Unfortunately, it hadn't: Two more miserable days would pass before Watters, her fellow health-care providers and the hundreds, perhaps thousands, of people they were taking care of would be rescued from the "hell's island" that the Superdome and adjacent arena had become.

Domino, happily, was soon carted away in a helicopter – not because of his celebrity, according to Watters, but because his plight was so dire. In fact, Domino, who was hallucinating, thought he was at the arena to perform a show, she said, and was refusing to eat despite the pleas of medical workers.

Things hadn't begun well at the makeshift medical center, and they steadily went downhill from there.

Within hours of the time Watters, 48, an employee of the state Department of Social Services, reported to work at the Dome on the day before Katrina made landfall, it was clear that trouble lay ahead.

"There were two doctors and two nurses for hundreds of patients per hour," she said in an e-mail about her experience. "The residents of entire nursing homes were being dropped at the door without paid staff to support them. Hospice patients on the verge of death were brought in. One lay on a table, barely alive, for hours. It was so crowded, hot and chaotic; there were not enough cots or space."

Soon there were too many needy people, as well as not enough necessary supplies and little information.

"The thing that everyone wanted most – information about what was happening and where they were going – was unknown to us, too," said Watters, whose friends teasingly call her "Saint Sherry." "There was no one in charge with good information. Trying to find even the simplest answer required asking at least five or six people and the answer would still be unclear."

Among other questions, there were no clear rules about how many healthy family members could stay with an ill relative. Entire families were brought to the triage center, only to be told that the sick could only have one caretaker. Many families were split up. "Families had to choose between parents, spouses and children in only minutes, possibly to become separated indefinitely and into uncertainty, since no one knew where anyone would be sent," she wrote.

Originally, the special-needs crowd was kept in the Dome, in a separate area from the general population of able-bodied peo-

Capitano suspends Floyd with no pay

Kenner Mayor Phil Capitano suspended a top aide, Cedric Floyd, without pay on Wednesday amid an investigation into whether Floyd took more than his fair share of Hurricane Katrina relief supplies from the donation center he supervised.

Police said they raided Floyd's home Tuesday night and hauled off several truckloads of relief goods, including new clothing, cases of food, medicine and tools.

Military officials at the city-operated distribution site, located in a parking lot in the 2500 block of Williams Boulevard, had initiated the complaint against Floyd, said Capt. Steve Caraway, a Police Department spokesman. Based on the military's information, a 24th District Court judge issued a search warrant for Floyd's house, Caraway said.

Floyd, Capitano's chief administrative officer, said the items at his house weren't stolen but were destined for an outreach program in the Susan Park subdivision, for people who

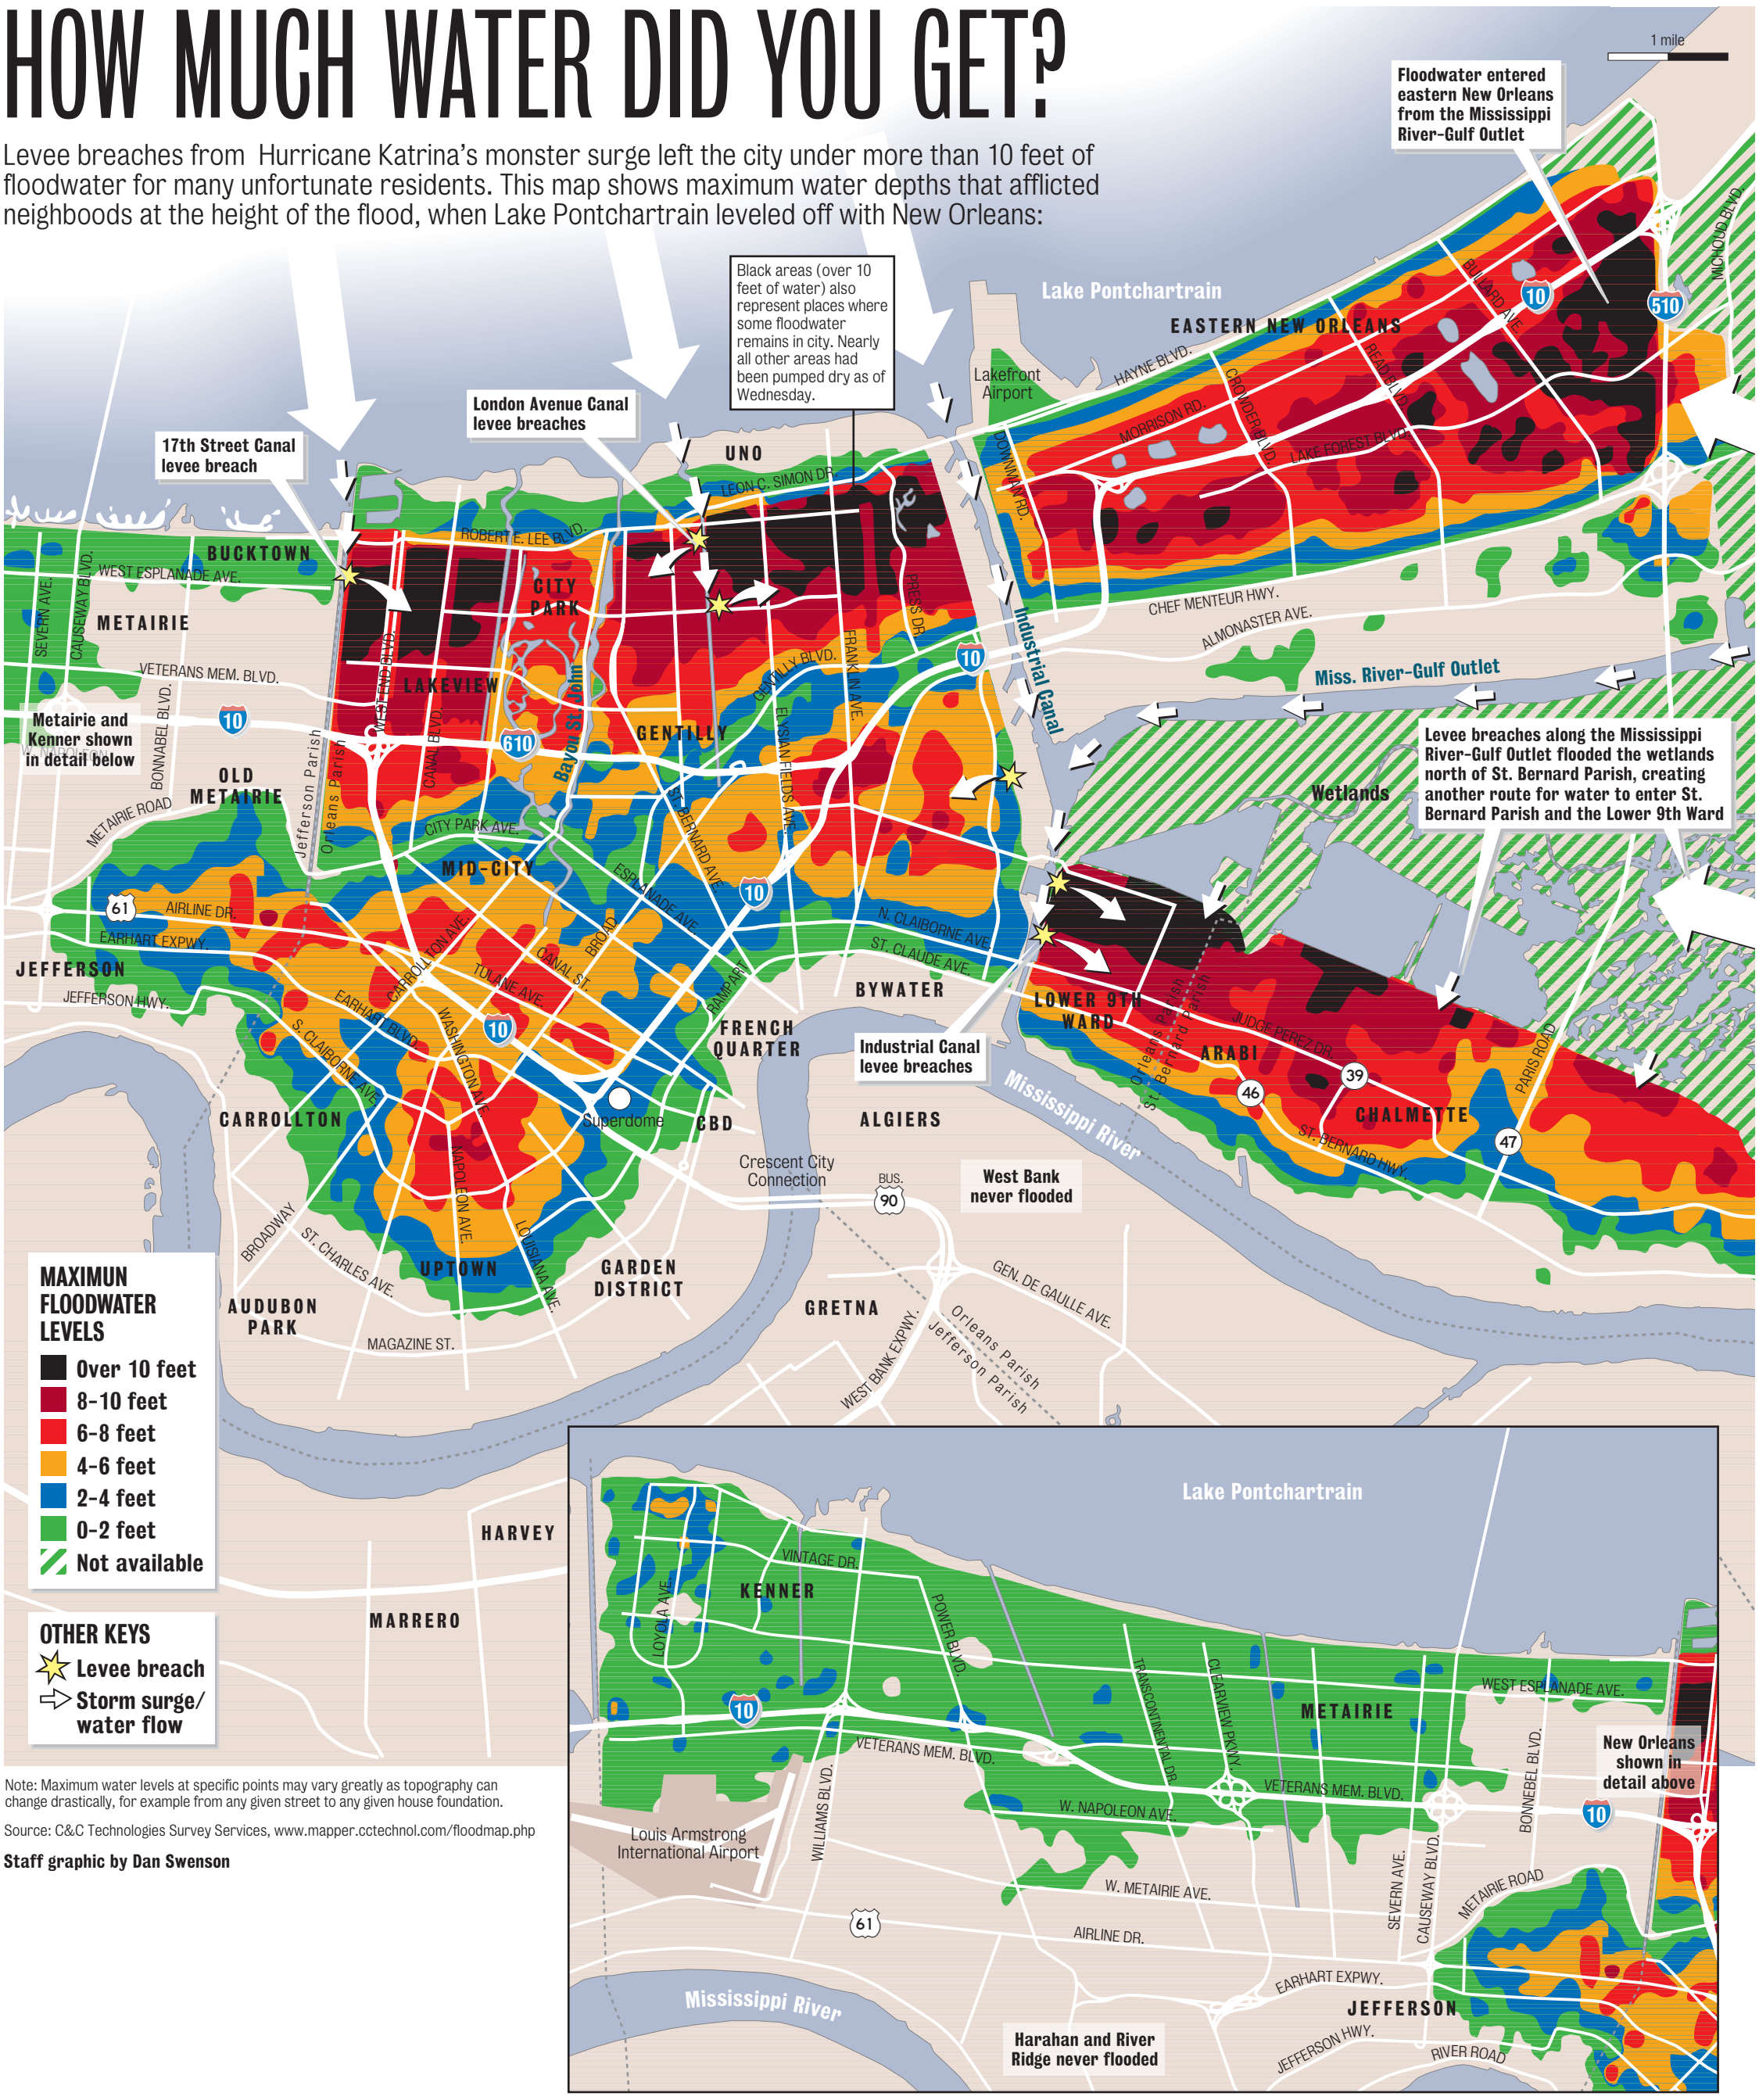
Thelma Landry shuffled into the Kenner postoffice on Williams Boulevard on Wednesday anddropped four birthday cards into the outgoing mailslot, including a belated one for her grandson, Keith, who turned10 back on Sept. 1.

Although she got to share cake and a birthday dinnerwith her grandson at a restaurant in Lafayette, where she and other relatives had evacuated for Hurricane Katrina,Landry was adamant about mailing the card to hisMarrero home once she returned to Jefferson Parish.

"I put a lot of faith in birthday cards," Landry said.

"I like to receive them, and I like to send them. Wealways mail birthday cards."



Her birthday greetings, along with tens of thousands ofother pieces of mail, are likely to be delivered soon now that the U.S. Postal

Levee breaches from Hurricane Katrina's monster surge left the city under more than 10 feet of floodwater for many unfortunate residents. This map shows maximum water depths that afflicted neighboods at the height of the flood, when Lake Pontchartrain leveled off with New Orleans:

Jeff court suspends cases until January

By Paul Purpura
West Bank bureau

Criminal and civil jury trials in Jefferson Parish have been postponed until January, the 24th Judicial District Court judges have decided as the parish's judicial system operates on a scaled-down basis because of Hurricane Katrina.

However, the court, closed since Katrina struck Aug. 29, is scheduled to resume operation Oct. 11, Judge Fredericka "Ricky" Wicker said.

Mass evacuations of parish residents have gutted the jury pool population, Wicker said. "We don't have enough citizens to subpoena an appropriate jury," she said.

Witnesses and victims are scattered, too, along with defendants in the Jefferson Parish Correctional Center who where evacuated to facilities statewide, said Jefferson Parish District Attorney Paul Connick Jr.

"We're going to need these people back, obviously, before we can process and proceed with the trials," he said.

Connick said about 350 people were arrested parishwide during the storm, and his office is setting up a special unit to screen the cases. He did not have a breakdown of the charges, but he said he expects to actively pursue cases involving looting, which carries a mandatory jail sentence of at least three years.

Unlike Orleans Parish, where evidence was lost to flooding, Jefferson Parish evidence survived, Connick said. Clerk of Court Jon Gegenheimer said court records were also spared.

"Since we're in cyberspace, the storm couldn't get to them," Gegenheimer said. "The paper records that we have are secure. There was nodamage."

Meanwhile, judges and magistrates are hearing emergency matters, such as injunctions and cases involving domestic abuse, and are setting bonds, Wicker said.

The statute of limitations and time-sensitive case deadlines have been suspended on orders of Gov. Kathleen Blanco and the state Supreme Court, she said.

First and Second Parish courts, which handle minor criminal and civil cases, are set to reopen Oct. 3, Gegenheimer said.

The Jefferson Parish Courthouse, meanwhile, is temporarily unusable, officials said. The building received minor damage from the storm and the sewerage system isn't working, officials said. Connick said the district attorney's building also received minor damage.

Jefferson Parish inmates who are housed in other jails around the state are being returned to the parish by the Sheriff's Office, where they are released to their homes or a "safe haven," Wicker said. The inmates are not being released in other parishes, she said.

Abita mayor may become full-time job

By Richard Boyd
St. Tammany bureau

Since he hunkered down at the elementary school with most of the town workers, police and firefighters to ride out Hurricane Katrina, Abita Springs Mayor Louis Fitzmorris had been on the job almost nonstop overseeing cleanup of the tiny town.

Tuesday night, the town's Board of Aldermen took stock of that fact and introduced an ordinance to make the mayor's job a full-time position with an annual salary of $40,000. If the measure is adopted next month, Fitzmorris would become the first full-time mayor in the 100-year history of the town.

Discussions to change the position from its current $18,000 salary and part-time status were under way among board members even before the storm, Alderman Troy Dugas said. "We have informally kind of kicked it around, thinking we might consider an ordinance toward the end of the current term in two years," he said.

"With the rebuilding going on and the need to get more business into town to spur some economic growth to offset the big financial hit we will suffer from this storm, it is imperative that we have a mayor on the job constantly."
Alderman TROY DUGAS

"But conditions have changed that. Our mayor has been working almost around the clock since the storm, and in fact was in many ways functioning as a full-time mayor almost from the moment he took office" in 2004, Dugas said.

"And with the rebuilding going on and the need to get more business into town to spur some economic growth to offset the big financial hit we will suffer from this storm, it is imperative that we have a mayor on the job constantly," Dugas said.

The proposed salary would match that of Mayor James Lavigne of Pearl River. In addition to the salary, Fitzmorris would be eligible for the town's health care benefits package provided for full-time employees.

Fitzmorris, who previously was an alderman, said he is in a position to accept the full-time job. He owns a pest control business but is making arrangements to hire someone to manage it for him.

"Frankly, I don't know what condition my business is in," he said. "I have been so busy with post-Katrina challenges, I have never really had much time to check on the business."

Lobby director Cynthia Ensminger, left, calls out addresses to deliver mail on Wednesday in the lobby of the post office on 17th Street in Metairie.

Postal officials took steps to save mail during crisis

MAIL, from B-1

Still, limited staffing will make daily deliveries to every residence and business impossible for now.

"At this point, we're just trying to deliver as muchas we can as fast as we can," Seewoester said.

So far, mail is being delivered in portions ofMetairie, Kenner, Gretna, Harvey, Belle Chasse,Jean Lafitte, Marrero and Westwego in Jefferson Parish, and in St. Charles, St. John the Baptist and St. Tammany parishes.

"Two days in a row," shouted Ron Chapoton with a grinas letter carrier Pam Butler walked into his Kenneroffice and placed a stack of letters on thecounter. Chapoton, a financial planner, said hisbusiness depends on mail delivery.

"We need to placeinvestments, and clients need to receive distributionchecks," he said. "Some of them are retirees and that's theirincome."

Butler and other carriers have been given marchingorders to avoid homes and businesses that appearunsafe, Kenner postmaster Charles Candilora said. If storm debris preventsdelivery, the mail will be returned to the post officeand carriers will try again later.

"It's pretty bad out there," Butler said as she movedswiftly down a line of business on Williams Boulevard. "A lot of trees down, a lot of power linesdown and a lot of refrigerators. And it doesn't smellgood at all. You kind of need a gas mask."

Carriers also will hold mail for houses orbusinesses where it appears residents have notreturned from evacuation, Candilora said.

Mail service for customersand displaced residents who filled out change-of-address forms won't be restored to their original address until they notify thepostal service they are back, spokeswoman Darla Stafford said.

"Until a change-of-address order is canceled, mailwon't be delivered to the permanent address," said

Stafford, who added that residents shouldn't worryabout filing multiple forms. "Our system willsupercede prior changes and go to the most recentaddress on file."

For people still displaced, it takes seven to 10 days after they complete a change form for their mail to catch up with them.

Mail service in New Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaqueminesparishes has not been restored due to safety issues,Seewoester said.

But postal officials were able to savealmost 1 million pieces of mail thanks to steps takenbefore Katrina arrived, said Tony Ruda, the Postal Service's recovery manager. All inbound mail was diverted away from the processing and distribution center in New Orleans to other sites, primarily in Houston. Postal employees in the New Orleans processing center also moved all in-house mail awaiting delivery to an upper floor to save it from flooding, Ruda said.

"We have since gone back in several times, removed all the mail from the New Orleans plant, processed that mail in Houston and sent it on to Baton Rouge" for later distribution, Ruda said.

By next week, Ruda said the Postal Service plans to have set up temporary sites to hand out mail to residents living in the devastated areas such as St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes. There, normal postal operations won't resume for weeks or months.

Displaced postal employees from those areas havefound their way to the Jefferson Parish mail stations, Candilora said. Although the two Kenner post offices are up to about 75 percent of their normal staffing, many of the employees there usually work out of the New Orleans offices,he said.

Only one third ofthe staff is back at the 17th Street post office in Metairie, which services zip codes 70002, 70005 and70006. Letter carriers are staggering the routes, meaning customers may receive mail only every other day for now, Candilora said.

Still, residents have seemed overjoyed to receive mail, even on such an irregular schedule. Letter carrier John Brehm said he's seen smiles, laughter and even a few tears.

"It's like things are getting back to normal," he said.

After hearing the metal flap on her mail slot clang shut, Lena Morina, 70, rushed to the door to catch Brehm and ask him to take some of her outgoing bill payments.

"It's so great to see a mailman," Morina gushed. "The garbage man passed by here this morning for the first time in three weeks. We were glad to see him too."

'Chief overreacted,' Floyd says

couldn't get to the Kenner distribution center. Also, he said, some of the goods that police seized were his personal property, not items from the distribution center.

"The chief overreacted not knowing anything about the program," Floyd said.

Floyd has been a controversial figure from the moment he was hired as CAO on Jan. 1, 2004, by then-acting Mayor Dominic Weilbaecher. Capitano kept Floyd, previously a self-employed demographer, in the position when he became mayor 2½ months later.

In some respects, Floyd has been caught up in a larger political struggle between Capitano and Police Chief Nick Congemi, whom Capitano defeated for mayor on March 9, 2004. But state Attorney General Charles Foti, whose staff is assisting Kenner police in the Floyd investigation, said he doesn't think that political infighting is behind the raid.

Capitano said he placed Floyd on administrative leave without pay pending the outcome of the inquiry. He said City Hall had already started its own investigation and had heard differing reports on Floyd's behavior as head of the supply distribution effort.

"We were still looking into it," he said.

Allegations that Floyd helped himself to relief supplies were first publicized over the weekend, after which he was relieved of supervising the distribution site. He had headed the effort from Sept. 1 until the distribution location moved on Friday.

While the National Guard is still in the parking lot handing out ice, water and food, Kenner moved its center of donated goods to the Wentwood Playground gymnasium at 2001 34th St. on Monday.

ple simply seeking shelter. But Tuesday, as the Dome filled with thousands of evacuees rescued from rising waters and rooftops, conditions grew increasingly foul.

"Many of the post-storm people did not have any belongings except the few clothes on their backs, and some did not have even that," Watters said. "Many had no shoes, and the water around the Dome and in the docks was contaminated with the trucks, urine, vomit and human misery."

The sick were moved to the nearby arena, which soon became a hellhole to rival the Dome, according to Watters, with human waste covering the floor.

There were occasional victories. Against all odds, Watters was able to match several family members who had been split up, including the family of a Lower 9th Ward child she mentors.

But the defeats easily outnumbered the wins. At least two patients died, including an infant who had suffered from exposure. The bodies were moved to a refrigerated truck.

The sick, as well as the tens of thousands of able-bodied people in the Dome, became increasingly restive as the days wore on and conditions went south. Some vented their anger at caretakers, including a woman who threatened "manslaughter" if buses didn't arrive soon.

"These people — our people — did nothing wrong," Watters said. "They were evacuees, not prisoners. No human being should have to live like that for even a minute."

To avoid angering the general population in the Dome, the sick were evacuated from the arena stealthily, Watters said. The evacuation took about a day and a half. By late Thursday, everyone was finally out, in trucks, ambulances and helicopters headed to Baton Rouge.

For Watters, there was one final indignity: She received a speeding ticket driving through Livonia en route to stay with relatives in Iowa. The officer insisted on taking her driver's license, her sole form of identification.

But there was a bit of a happy ending when she arrived in Iowa.

"When I got to my hometown, they had started a fund drive in my name," she said. "It's a strange feeling to see my own picture on the side of a collection can. And I'm on the front page of the newspaper. I got my tuberculosis and hepatitis tests. I got a tetanus shot. I got money from the Red Cross to buy new, non-fungus-filled shoes."

'You gotta laugh to keep from crying'

several miles inland and flooded Slidell's Olde Towne commercial district with more than 5 feet of water. Few, if any, businesses survived the storm intact.

Not even the Old Town Soda Shop, considered by many to be the area's anchor, escaped, its contents now strewn along the sidewalk and its owners rumored to be gone for good.

Inside the Victorian Tea Room, the majority of the restaurant's pink walls gave way to bare studs and its floors were covered in a half-inch of standing water and slimy black mud. Outside, customers stopped to offer their condolences.

"The quiche, oh man, it's going to get me upset," said Laura Feldhaus, noting her love of Sue Claverie's cuisine, including her to-die-for chicken salad and homemade bread. "I said we gotta go by and see."

Dave Claverie said the destruction has left his wife brokenhearted, especially given the fact that she just finished paying off in January the loan she took out to make repairs after the May 1995 flood.

"I just have to decide if I want to throw myself into it," Sue Claverie said. "I'm going to pray on it a couple of days and see what the man upstairs has to say."

Although Claverie could not say with certainty whether she would return, others on her block vowed they would be back.

"It's just a lot of work and no pay," said Karla Naulty, co-owner of Naulty's Shoe Repair, which her husband's family has operated since 1954. "We have a house note. We have to come back. We have no choice."

Naulty stood near the front door of the shop, careful to avoid the shattered glass that covered the floor when the storm surge blew out a window. Mold already has begun to form on the walls and the smell of wet leather permeates the air.

The Naultys took care to place shoes and equipment on the shop's highest shelves in anticipation of the storm's arrival. However, rising floodwaters caused the shelves to flip, tossing their contents into the drink.

Even though Katrina laid waste to the shop, it could not break Naulty's spirit.

"You gotta laugh to keep from crying," she said. "Like my dad said, you gotta lick your wounds and move on – start over."

Some of the regulars at Heidelberg's Bar have begun the healing process, despite the fact that their favorite hangout was ravaged by floodwaters, its warped wooden booths, popcorn machine and bar stools piled high on the sidewalk out front.

Don Dewitt is among those who have taken up residence outside Heidelberg's, at least for a couple of hours a night. They do have to bring their own booze, although owner Billy Heidelberg has been known to break out a bottle or two.

"It breaks my heart," Dewitt said. "This is the only place I go. I wouldn't have anyplace else to go. I wouldn't want to."

Heidelberg said he plans to rebuild, although he doesn't believe anything in the bar is salvageable. Elaine Thompson, owner of Vintage Antiques and Collectibles on First Street, looks to have been more fortunate.

A good deal of her stock consists of glass and china she has collected on trips around the world. Many of her wares floated in the floodwaters, gently resting on tabletops and in cabinets once the water receded.

However, her wooden furniture is ruined and mold has begun to form on the walls and underneath rugs, small sections of which she has begun cutting away with a knife. She can't stay inside for long because of the fumes.

At CJ's Discount Food Store two blocks away, Debbie Fernandez sat in front of the shop in a white plastic chair while her husband, Paul, hosed out the interior. A young man hauled food out of the shop in a wheelbarrow, dumping load after load onto the sidewalk and street.

Paul Fernandez said he has insurance on the shop but not its contents, estimating he lost approximately $25,000 in food and $10,000 more in equipment. He lamented the fact that four pallets of food had just arrived in the days before Katrina hit.

He couldn't say whether he would rebuild, noting that he would clean the shop and see what happens.

"We don't have the money to come back unless we get a loan," he said, "and I don't know if it's worth it."

Levee Board loses income sources

By Frank Donze
Staff writer

Step inside the venerable, art deco lobby of Lakefront Airport's administration building and brace for a surprise: An unfettered view of the runways to the north.

"The first-floor wall is gone," said Jim Huey, president of the Orleans Levee Board, which owns and operates the facility. "All you can see is airport."

Like much of the board's vast commercial empire, the airport was largely laid to waste by high winds and storm surges produced by Hurricane Katrina.

The Belle of Orleans, the casino boat that generates about 20 percent of the board's $20 million operating budget, was blown out of the lake. Joe's Crab Shack, the Hong Kong Restaurant and several businesses in the Lake Vista Community Center, commercial tenants that lease board property, are severely damaged.

Many of the boats that were docked in slips at South Shore Harbor now rest on the marina's promenade.

At the airport, more than a dozen hangars have been flattened. Sections of the largest of the three landing strips are unusable. Storage structures are little more than piles of debris.

Amazingly, the airport control tower suffered only minor damage. But with no electrical power to operate radar and lighting, it is useless for the time being.

The board, controlled by appointees of Gov. Kathleen Blanco, is scheduled to hold its first post-Katrina meeting today in Baton Rouge to assess the damage and begin to plot a recovery strategy that likely will rely heavily on federal assistance.

"Basically, all of our revenue sources are gone," Huey said. "I can't think of one that wasn't wiped out."

Much of the balance of the board's budget comes from property taxes, which also will be severely reduced by Katrina's destruction of homes and businesses. The first order of business on the agenda will be a declaration of emergency designed to relax public bid laws governing the awarding of construction contracts. Instead of the normal 25-day advertising period, the board will consider a 10-day or 5-day procedure for choosing companies to handle demolition, debris removal and reconstruction at the airport.

"We need some flexibility so we can get moving," said board attorney Gerard Metzger.

Metzger said the board expects FEMA to provide the bulk of the money to rebuild the airport.

While the immediate goal is to get the facility up and running, Huey said the board will be seeking federal aid to construct breakwaters in the lake north of the airport to mitigate the storm surges that caused much of the devastation.

Board members also will get a damage assessment from staff members, who have established a temporary headquarters in the Baton Rouge offices of George Carmouche, one of the board's legal consultants.

Huey said the report will include some good news.

For example, the covered boat slips at South Shore Harbor appear to have had only minimal damage. And the Mardi Gras Fountain, which reopened recently after a $2.5 million restoration, was unscathed.

Also untouched was a 600-foot stretch of the lakefront north of the fountain where the board built a promenade of patterned concrete that lived up to its hype and effectively halted erosion at the water's edge. Along other stretches of the lakefront, waves carved trenches between the greenspace and the seawall along the lake.

Huey said the success of the promenade project proves that similar construction would offer protection to Lakeshore Drive and the 75-year-old seawall from future storms.

Garbage relief is on the way in St. Charles

Trash firm pledges pickups by week's end

By Allen Powell II
River Parishes bureau

St. Charles residents frustrated by garbage and debris piling up in their front yards because of Hurricane Katrina-related interruptions to collections should have some relief by week's end, a Waste Management official told the St. Charles Parish Council this week.

Rene Faucheux, a spokesman for Waste Management, said Monday that the company will collect garbage at every house in the parish at least once this week, and added that the company should resume its twice-weekly pickups within the next few weeks.

Several council members said residents have complained that their trash has not been collected since Katrina hit Aug. 29, and the bags and debris are starting to take over their front yards. Councilman Brian Fabre asked Faucheux for a listing of exactly when trash is collected from every home so that he could verify residents' complaints.

Faucheux told the council that many of the Waste Management employees that operated trucks in St. Charles Parish lived in New Orleans' 9th Ward and haven't been able to return to work since the storm. Although nearly all of the company's trucks were spared in the storm, the lack of drivers has meant that only three to five of them have been operating in St. Charles since Sept. 7, instead of the normal six, he said.

The company also had problems getting to its main dump because of heavy traffic and high water, Faucheux said. St. Charles Parish has created a temporary dumpsite near the Bonnet Carre Spillway to accommodate some garbage and debris, and has hired outside contractors to supplement Waste Management. The garbage is held there until it can be brought to a landfill.

Katrina caused a significant increase in St. Charles Parish's population, which in turn has increased the amount of trash produced. Several council members said they've noticed homes with trash cans and bags of garbage across the lawn. While Faucheux said that Waste Management would collect trash from every can in the parish, he would not commit to picking up trash on the ground. Waste Management uses automated trash collection, and those trucks do not have the capacity to handle loose trash.

"I'm not going to tell you I'm going to do something I can't do," Faucheux said. "We're going to be picking more garbage in St. Charles from now on, we know that. But we're going to get back to regular service soon."

Slidell maps out tentative plan for debris removal

Neighborhood sweep will remove limbs

By Paul Bartels
St. Tammany bureau

An open letter to Slidell residents from Mayor Ben Morris, Police Chief Freddy Drennan and the City Council discussed the amount of trees on city property that have fallen on or hanging perilously over private property.

"Although the city is not legally responsible for those trees, the city will begin removing these trees as part of our systematic program to assist those in need," the letter says.

"The city is also beginning a comprehensive sweep of the neighborhoods from south to north and will assist with emergency cleanup efforts to those is need," city officials said.

A specific schedule wasn't available, but Chief of Staff Reinhard Dearing said the first priority for haulers hired by the Army Corps of Engineers would be the curbside mounds of cut-up trees, limbs and other storm debris in and around Slidell.

Pickups of construction debris leftover from homes and business exteriors will follow, Dearing said.

The final phase, despite the stink of rotting food in garbage cans that still haven't been emptied in some of the worst-hit areas, will be picking up household garbage and ruined appliances, including refrigerators and freezers.

Coastal Waste Management, the city's official garbage and trash collector for nearly 10,000 homes and several dozen businesses, has resumed household garbage collection in some areas, although the schedule is irregular. The company's routes are primarily in central-north and north Slidell.

Dearing said the company's general manager, Gus Bordelon, told him Coastal Waste has hired several contractors to assist with garbage and some debris removal.

"You know, after Isidore and Lili, we had 70 or 80 homes" where debris pickup was needed, Morris said, speaking of the back-to-back tropical storm and hurricane that clobbered the area in 2002. "Now, we're looking at thousands."

He waved his hand in despair and uncertainty.

"They'll be there when they get there," he said.

Slidell concert moved back to Heritage Park

St. Tammany bureau

A Sunday concert in Slidell previously slated to be held at John Slidell Park has been moved back to Heritage Park.

The free Bayou Jam concert, featuring the Bucktown All-stars, will be held from 5 to 7 p.m. at Heritage Park behind the Slidell train depot on Front Street.

The move was necessary because FEMA took up residence in John Slidell Park, said Kelli Gustafson, director of the Slidell Department of Cultural and Public Affairs.

Though Heritage Park is the traditional setting for Bayou Jam concerts, the city had moved it to John Slidell Park due to concerns that the inch-thick layer of dried mud that still covers most of Heritage Park could be liquefied if the city receives rains.

The city is trying to arrange to have vendors on hand to sell food and refreshments for Sunday's concert and is attempting to contact other bands previously scheduled to present concerts during the 2005 fall Bayou Jam concert series. "We're going to try to get them all," Gustafson said.

Shelters are being moved from Tammany schools

Classes are expected to resume on Oct. 3

By Charlie Chapple
St. Tammany bureau

The 800 to 900 people in shelters at St. Tammany Parish schools will be relocated this week as the school system continues preparing to resume classes on Oct. 3.

Red Cross officials said Wednesday that evacuees in shelters at William Pitcher Junior High and Pineview Middle schools in Covington, Abita Springs Middle School, and 5th Ward School in Bush will be relocated today to the Folsom Community Center. Residents at the parish's special-needs shelter at Covington High School also will be moved to the Folsom Community Center.

Plans call for relocating residents at four eastern St. Tammany shelters to the North Shore Harbor Center this week, Parish President Kevin Davis said. Some minor repairs are being done at the center so it can accommodate the evacuees, he said.

Davis said he hopes the center will be ready by this weekend, "or in the worst case (scenario), by Monday." Evacuees from eastern St. Tammany are staying in shelters at 6th Ward Junior High School, Riverside Elementary School, Pearl River High School and Northshore High School.

In other news from Wednesday's briefing on local recovery efforts:

• A BellSouth official said 8,150 customers in St. Tammany are without telephone service. Cuts in telephone cables are to blame for most outages, the officials said, noting that the company had repaired 32 cuts in major cable lines since Monday.

• A Cleco official said that 92 percent of the utility's customers in St. Tammany have power. The 8 percent without power includes 5,100 homes and businesses that are too damaged to take on electricity, he said.

• A Washington-St. Tammany Electric Cooperative official said 80 percent of its customers in St. Tammany have power. There are 5,029 customers in the parish without electricity, she said.

• Davis reported that the St. Tammany ARC headquarters and facilities for people with disabilities were heavily damaged by Katrina. "We've been told that STARC is in bad shape," Davis said. "They'll not be up and running for a while." Parish officials will see whether the Slidell organization qualifies for FEMA assistance, he said.

• Officials announced there will be a Small Business Association workshop Friday at 9 a.m. at the Slidell branch library for business and home owners interested in low-interest loans to recover from Katrina.

Marigny streets groove to the sound of music

Makeshift disc jockey keeps the noise alive

By Bruce Hamilton
Staff writer

The music is still alive on Frenchmen Street.

From a porch near the corner of Frenchmen and Chartres streets, the sounds of Dr. John, Professor Longhair and other New Orleans musicians pour out.

"This neighborhood is normally noisy, and I just wanted to make it noisy again," said musician Kenny Claiborne, 42, a lifelong New Orleans resident and one of the owners of the Mermaid Lounge.

Claiborne's "station" started out more as a personal need than a public service.

"By about day eight, I was going crazy because of no music," he said.

Claiborne turned his speakers toward the street from 2019 Chartres, and used his 3,350-watt generator to kill the quiet.

"It was an inspirational moment for the neighborhood," said German Bas, who lives around the corner. "That was the night that things started to lighten up here." Claiborne started spinning CDs, LPs and, with a borrowed Apple G4 computer, MP3 sound files for several hours each day.

Other neighbors cheered on the sonic mission, which has evolved with community needs. Claiborne started using his microphone to make announcements, town-crier-style. Passers-by and military troops congregated on the street outside and made requests. The stereo station became a focal point, a place to socialize.

And then one night at about 9, some police officers from out of state tried to stop the music.

He turned down the music at the officer's request. The next day, a fan in the neighborhood created fliers that read, "I (heart) Radio Marigny," and posted them on buildings to show the community's support of Claiborne's effort. She made a sun-bleached, pink "Radio Marigny (heart)" banner, which now flaps gently beside a New Orleans city flag above the porch.

The residents who remain are supportive. Herbert Laborde, 88, who was sitting Wednesday on Frenchman inside his business, Laborde and Sons Printers, said the music doesn't bother him.

"It's nice to hear there's somebody alive out there," he said. "Because I look out my door and north, south, east, west, there's nothing happening. There's life in the block somewhere. More power to him."

He has done about four "shows" in the area, playing for the Oregon National Guard, stationed at Frederick Douglass High School, and the "federal city" at Harrah's New Orleans Casino, where various police, military and federal agencies are located.

From the balcony of his Frenchmen Street home, Kenny Claiborne entertains the residents who remain in the Marigny neighborhood, which was known for its music clubs. Some live sets are featured in Claiborne's broadcasts, which also include announcements about lost animals and people in need of supplies.

STAFF PHOTOS BY JOHN McCUSKER

Kenny Claiborne hangs his laundry from the balcony that houses Radio Marigny: a loudspeaker hooked up to a microphone and CD player. He plays everything from classical to rock, with public service announcements in between.

Radio Marigny operator and musician Kenny Claiborne plays his guitar in his Faubourg Marigny home on Wednesday.

Military troops, he said, tend to want to hear heavy metal bands such as Pantera. New Orleans police, he said, want to hear Al Green.

During Claiborne's off-site shows, he even performed some live music on bass with guitarist David Jaurequi of Rockin' Dopsie Jr. & The Zydeco Twisters. The duet was mostly blues. Claiborne found some upbeat forms of music don't have the right emotional timbre for the situation.

"It's not like we're partying," he said. "It's too sad. I don't want to be fiddling while Rome burns."

With Hurricane Rita hovering in the Gulf, fewer people were around. "I'm just waiting for people to come back. It's so lonely," he said. He wants to visit his family in Austin, Texas, and his girlfriend in San Francisco when things return to normal.

Until then, Galactic and Stanton Moore, the Neville Brothers and the Soul Rebels will help keep him company – along with as his dogs, Stryker and Simon, and his listeners. "I'm just trying to keep the spirit alive as well as the body," he said. "New Orleans isn't dead."

Jeff schools push to open Oct. 3

By Mark Waller
East Jefferson bureau

Its Harvey headquarters are unusable thanks to Hurricane Katrina. There are questions about whether its damaged school buildings have enough temporary protection in case Hurricane Rita sends more rain. And there's a general uncertainty about how many students and teachers will return.

But the Jefferson Parish School Board on Wednesday continued its push for an Oct. 3 reopening of most of its schools.

The board used the Jefferson Parish Council's Gretna chambers for its third emergency meeting since Katrina because its Harvey building suffered extensive roof damage, rain intrusion and mold invasion. Administrators who worked at the Manhattan Boulevard address are moving their offices and files to the school system's warehouse in Marrero.

In the meeting dedicated to gauging the system's status, board President Ray St. Pierre said that delays in the first days after Katrina mean roof coverings and other temporary measures to protect schools could be lagging short of completion in time for any more assaults by bad weather.

"If we sit here exposed, Rita or other things like that will kill us,"

St. Pierre said.

Because of problems with insurance companies that were expected to hire contractors to temporarily protect damaged buildings, the school system started hiring contractors itself to do the work, but lost time in the process, St. Pierre said.

"We lost six days in there, and this could be critical," St. Pierre said. "There was a five- or six-day period there where we were really aggravated."

Michael Martin, a broker who represents the School Board in its dealings with several insurance companies, told board members that a communication breakdown led insurance officials for a time to believe the schools did not need many temporary patches.

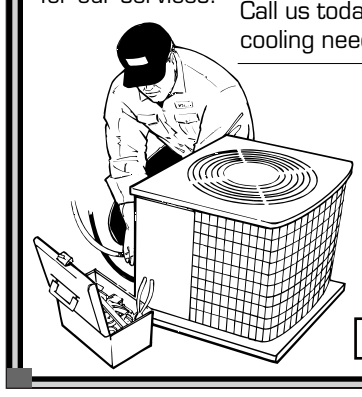
Superintendent Diane Roussel instructed Martin to investigate who had spread inaccurate information about the condition of schools.

As of Wednesday, school system officials reported that seven schools still have severe enough damage to be unlikely to open by Oct. 3. Those are A.C. Alexander Elementary, Lincoln Elementary, Terrytown Elementary, Woodmere Elementary, the independently operated Jefferson Community School and the John Martyn and Thomas Jefferson Schools, which serve as alternative and adult education sites, although Jefferson is slated to open as a magnet high school next year.



Another 28 schools are now listed as having some damage, but in most cases not enough to prevent the Oct. 3 reopening. And 52 schools are in ready condition.

"There's a lot of work going on," said David Taylor, assistant superintendent for facilities. "I think this next week is going to be critical, and hopefully the weather will hold out and this next storm will go farther south."

Rita could tear into oil industry

With Texas in crosshairs, refineries face grave danger

By Jaquetta White
Business writer

The price of retail gasoline easily will shoot to and perhaps exceed $3 a gallon if Hurricane Rita, which is tearing through the Gulf of Mexico, touches down in Texas, where about a quarter of the nation's oil is refined, energy analysts said.

Supply already is tight after Hurricane Katrina severely damaged oil rigs and platforms in the Gulf of Mexico and closed four refineries in Louisiana and Mississippi.

In the worst-case scenario, Hurricane Rita would deliver an even more crippling blow if it rips through the energy capital, Houston, and comes in contact with the nation's largest refinery or any of the other 18 refineries along the Texas Gulf Coast.

"It's like a one-two punch," said Fred Schuster, manager of the commodities trading desk at DRW Investments LLC. "We're already on our backs and we're trying to get up and you're kicking us while we're down."

Shuster said the aftermath of Hurricane Rita could bring "new highs in gasoline."

"It's just going to put such a strain on the system that we'll for sure see gasoline rise," he said. "It's very difficult to find this thing not having an ugly ending."

Schuster said he expects prices to rise to at least $3 a gallon and said there could even be shortages if those refineries are disrupted. He pointed to the explosion and fire at a BP refinery in Texas City, Texas, in March, as an example of the nonstorm disruptions refineries can face.

"When this thing went down because of the explosion, prices leapt," Schuster said. "Pump up the tires to the old Schwinn. You might be riding it."

Four refineries responsible for 5 percent of the nation's refining capacity are still closed after Hurricane Katrina, said Sharon Day, a spokeswoman for the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association. One of the facilities, a Chevron site in Pascagoula, Miss., is on track to open again in mid-October. The others, however, will be closed for months. Those include a Conoco refinery in Belle Chasse, an Exxon facility in Chalmette and a Murphy Oil site in Meraux.

"The last thing we need is to see another refinery shut out," said Ed Silliere, a floor broker for Energy Merchant Brokerage Inc., in New York. "We have a tight situation without this storm existing and now you add to this another storm, that could cause financial devastation."

Silliere said wholesale gasoline alone would jump at least 50 cents to $1 if a refinery is closed.

"There's no question gasoline would move," he said.

But a bigger concern, Silliere said, will be the availability of diesel fuel. While the United States is receiving some gasoline from other countries, he said, diesel fuel already is in short supply. If that supply became even more strained, the effects on crops in the Midwest, for example, would be disastrous, because farmers use diesel to power equipment.

Much of the worry surrounding Hurricane Rita involves refineries, but offshore oil and gas production are also concerns. According to the Minerals Management Service, 469 platforms and 69 rigs in the Gulf of Mexico had been evacuated by Wednesday at mid-day. The shutdown will result in the loss of production of more than 1 million barrels, or 73 percent, of daily oil production and 4 billion cubic feet, or 47 percent, of daily natural gas production.

"If these guys have to shut down for any longer, it's really going to put a crimp in our supply," Schuster said.

Real estate record rescue going well

Documents will be moved across street

By Greg Thomas
Real estate writer

The rescue of critical real estate records stored in the basement of the Orleans Parish Civil District Courthouse is nearly complete, with most stored in 18 refrigerated trucks hauled in by tractor-trailers and protected by armed guards from the office of Civil Sheriff Paul Valteau. The trucks are parked near the courthouse.

All of the records can be saved and eventually moved across the street to 1340 Poydras St., the recorder of mortgages and register of conveyances reported Wednesday.

Stephen Bruno, the New Orleans custodian of historical records, a gubernatorial appointee, and Gasper Schiro, register of conveyances, said a three-year lease to locate to the former Amoco building is close to being finalized. They may permanently relocate conveyance and mortgage departments there.

Bruno's operations, where records from colonial periods on are stored, have leased 10,000 square feet on the third floor of the building for several years.

Bruno, Recorder of Mortgages Desiree Charbonnet and Schiro all said that it is a "miracle" that the documents, estimated at 12 million pages, were not destroyed or damaged beyond repair in the courthouse basement or 1340 Poydras St. "They said we were looking at nine feet of water (on Poydras), and we only had three inches of water in the basement," Schiro said. None of the records was wet, but all were exposed to potentially damaging moisture.

Schiro, who has been register of conveyances for 27 years, has been trying to find new space for his operation since the 1980s.

He was adamant Wednesday of one thing: "We're never going back to the basement. Never. Never. Never."

Along with the good news came some bad, Charbonnet said. The judges ordered Civil District Clerk of Courts Dale Atkins, Charbonnet and Schiro to reduce their work forces by two-thirds. Charbonnet, Atkins and Schiro employ between 40 and 50 workers each.

Schiro said that since the judicial fund depends on fees, which are not coming in, there is no way to pay the employees.

Schiro said mortgages and conveyance departments are arranging temporary operations in Gonzales at 1026 Worth St. and are scheduled to be operational Oct. 3. Schiro said until then, no mortgages, liens or property transfers taking place in New Orleans – if there are any – can be recorded. Civil District Court Clerk Atkins and the clerk of the First Municipal District Court are expected to set up temporary operations at the same Gonzales location.

Officials take steps to keep flooded cars off the market

Next to the B.W. Cooper public housing complex, a flood-tossed limousine has come to rest on its roof. The National Insurance Crime Bureau is building a database of flooded cars that will be distributed to public officials in Louisiana and to insurance companies and departments of motor vehicles across the country.

Database will track where vehicles go

By Rebecca Mowbray
Business writer

Public officials and the insurance industry are creating a database that will track vehicles flooded by Hurricane Katrina and prevent them from turning up on used-car lots across the country.

"Our concern is that vehicles that were affected by the storm will be turned around and resold to unsuspecting consumers if they're not cataloged properly," said Lt. Allen Carpenter, supervisor of the Louisiana State Police insurance fraud unit.

Each time an insurance company takes a flood claim for a car, it will pass on the vehicle identification number, or VIN, to the National Insurance Crime Bureau, which is building a database of flooded cars. That database will then be distributed to public officials in Louisiana and to insurance companies and departments of motor vehicles across the country.

"We're keeping a running log on every vehicle that we can locate," said Dennie Huggins, vice president of field operations for the insurance crime bureau, which has set up an office in Baton Rouge. "We have thousands of VIN numbers already in it."

While the National Insurance Crime Bureau has tried to track flooded vehicles from previous storms, the Katrina database represents the group's most ambitious flooded-vehicle effort yet. The Louisiana State Police, the Louisiana Department of Insurance, the Louisiana Office of Motor Vehicles, the Louisiana Attorney General's Office, and the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality are all involved in the database initiative. They're working with the U.S. Attorney's Office, which has formed a Hurricane Katrina Task Force.

The title of each car in the database will be stamped to indicate that the car was flooded in Hurricane Katrina. In case someone tries to alter the title to sell the car to an unsuspecting consumer, motor vehicle registry officials across the county will also have access to the database, and will refuse to register any car that had been deemed a flood loss.

"We're here to protect the insured," said Huggins, whose nonprofit investigative group is financed by the property casualty industry.

The insurance crime bureau will also be on the lookout for car-theft rings that take advantage of a hurricane to steal cars and dispose of them elsewhere in the country, as well as for stolen boats, identity theft and false insurance claims from Hurricane Katrina.

Loretta Worters, vice president of the Insurance Information Institute, a trade association also sponsored by property casualty industry, said insurance companies total a car when the cost to fix the car exceeds its value.

If a car's electrical system is gone, it's generally totaled, Worters said. If only the brake pedals or carpeting is wet, the insurance company may say the car can be fixed.

When an insurance company totals a car, it sells it to a salvage yard for scrap, Worters said, but "unscrupulous people could go in there and try to sell it to unsuspecting buyers who are unaware of the vehicle's history."

When shopping for a used car, Worters said, people should go to reputable auto dealers and ask lots of questions to make sure a car isn't flood-damaged. Potential buyers should ask to see the bill of sale, ask to see the title, and ask whether the car came from a state where there has been flooding. It's also a good idea to run the VIN and take the car to a mechanic to be checked.

In the meantime, consumers should look for signs that the vehicle has been wet. Look for water lines in places that would be hard to clean, such as under the hood, around the engine, or inside the trunk. Also check for unusual wear and tear, such as rust in the glove box, mud in the trunk, discolored carpet and instruments that don't work, all of which are signs of flood damage, Worters said.

"It's something to think about," Worters said.

Ruth's Chris, pulling up stakes, moves headquarters from Metairie

Shift to Fla. affects 58 staffers

By Mary Judice
Business writer

The newest publicly traded company in the New Orleans area plans to leave the city as a result of Hurricane Katrina.

Ruth's Chris Steak House, which began trading on Nasdaq last month, has decided to make its temporary relocation to the Orlando area permanent.

The company said its Metairie headquarters was damaged, communications were down, and that the New Orleans area "would not be able to support our corporate office and our support center for an extended period of time."

The move affects 58 executives and corporate staffers who worked out of the Metairie office.

Ruth's two company-owned restaurants in New Orleans suffered flood and wind damage. Craig Miller, Ruth's president and chief executive, said he is optimistic the company will be able to reopen its Metairie restaurant on Veterans Highway. But company officials are far less optimistic about the Broad Street restaurant because they have been unable to assess the damage at that location.

A Ruth's restaurant in the Hard Rock Hotel & Casino in Biloxi, which was scheduled to open the weekend Hurricane Katrina hit, suffered significant damage and will not open until next year, the company said.

Miller said the company chartered a couple of prop planes and flew to New Orleans the first weekend after the storm to retrieve computer equipment.

"The first thing people took out were three pictures of Ruth and I," Miller said.

Miller said the company carried insurance on all of its facilities and expected to report a one-time gain in the third quarter because of the insurance settlements. Ruth's may also incur one-time charges for uninsured losses and asset write-downs.

Miller said central Florida is a vibrant economic area with several major restaurant chains and an available work force. The company received tax breaks from Seminole County, where it is renovating a 21,000-square-foot building to house its headquarters.

Katrina victims can expect tax relief

House, Senate pass changes to federal law

By Dennis Persica
Staff writer

Hurricane Katrina victims can expect some relief from their federal and state tax burdens, thanks to existing federal law and several changes that are expected to pass Congress soon.

Already, administrative orders from state and federal agencies have given taxpayers a delay in filing their income tax returns if they haven't already filed for 2004. The same applies to quarterly tax filings.

While the new filing date has been pushed back to Jan. 3 for those in the federally declared disaster area, legislation being considered by Congress could push that date back to Feb. 28, said Barry Kyle, tax director at LaPorte Sehrt Romig Hand, certified public accountants in New Orleans.

The House of Representatives and the Senate have worked out their differences over different versions of legislation to help storm victims. The House took final action on the bill Wednesday, and only Senate approval is needed now for the bill to go to President Bush for his signature.

Under existing federal law, taxpayers in a federal disaster area are allowed to claim their 2005 uninsured losses on their 2004 federal income taxes. This means that people may file an amended return for 2004, or if they already are late on their 2004 taxes, they may include the losses when they finally do file their taxes for last year, said Elizabeth Alford, tax director for the Postlethwaite & Netterville accounting firm in Baton Rouge.

For all practical purposes, taxpayers may delay that decision until April 15, 2006, when 2005 taxes are due. At that time, if they decide to claim the losses on their 2004 tax returns, they can file an amended 2004 return to claim the losses and file a 2005 return without claiming the losses.

Alford said that because a lot of people will have reduced income this year as a result of Katrina, many taxpayers may find it makes more sense to claim the losses on their 2004 returns, when their income was higher.

When it comes to deducting losses, documentation is the key, Kyle and Alford said.

Two IRS provides forms and worksheets to help taxpayers document their losses and insurance coverage. Publication 2194, "Disaster Losses Kit for Individuals," and Publication 2194-B, "Disaster Losses Kit for Businesses" are available at the IRS Web site, www.irs.gov.

Alford said she thinks the Internal Revenue Service will take into consideration the fact that much of the documentation will have been lost in the flood. "I think the IRS is going to be cognizant of the fact that people's receipts are gone," she said.

However, she added, taxpayers should try to get duplicate receipts from the stores where they bought the original item or from their credit card companies.

The emergency tax relief being considered by Congress would change the way uninsured losses are considered. Currently, uninsured losses have to be reduced by 10 percent of the taxpayer's adjusted gross income and then by another $100. Under the new law, both reductions will be eliminated, Kyle said.

The new legislation also is expected to make it easier to take an early distribution from IRA plans or a 401(k) retirement account.

Under current law, premature withdrawals require a 10 percent penalty. Under the new law nearing final adoption, people within the federally designated disaster area would not be subject to the 10 percent penalty and would not have taxes withheld from their distribution.

"Those penalties will be gone for these folks," Kyle said, referring to residents of the federally declared disaster area. Taxes will be due on the income, Kyle said, but the taxes on the IRA distribution will be spread over three tax years.

Regulations regarding loans from pension or profit-sharing plans, including 401(k) plans, also will be eased for Katrina victims, Kyle said.

Good Samaritans also will benefit from the revised tax laws in the wake of Katrina's devastation. Taxpayers who house hurricane evacuees for at least 60 days will be allowed a $500 tax deduction for each person housed, with a maximum $2,000 deduction, Kyle said. However, people who charge rent to evacuees are not eligible for the tax benefit, he said.

Businesses and their employees also get a break under current tax law for any assistance the companies provide their workers. For example, if a company provides assistance such as a per diem payment for living expenses while displaced or payments for funeral expenses or home repair, those payments are not considered taxable income to the employee, Kyle said. Such assistance also is deductible for the employer, he said.

A loose barge escaped from the Industrial Canal and into the Lower 9th Ward when Hurricane Katrina hit New Orleans. The neighborhood was still flooded when this photo was taken Sept. 10.

Canals invite floodwaters

I'm a graduate student at Tulane University who was busy working on a dissertation proposal about the history of flood mitigation in New Orleans when Hurricane Katrina struck. I'm profoundly frustrated at the lack of any kind of historical perspective in the media coverage of this storm.

The flooding that took out so much of our city and its suburbs was not the direct result of global warming, wetlands loss or levees left unfinished thanks to funding cuts. All of these issues are vitally important, but let's remember that the floodwaters came from the canals, while the lakefront and river levees held.

Even worse, the flooding that struck St. Bernard Parish and the 9th Ward has happened before: Nearly the exact same scenario was played out during Hurricane Betsy, as the storm surge was pushed through the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet and the Industrial Canal.

The most important question when we rebuild must be how we can do a better job of preserving public safety in the face of the inevitable demands of the shipping and real estate industries. It should be painfully obvious to all of us now that the MRGO should be closed immediately.

We should consider doing the same with the Industrial Canal. If the levee and floodwall improvements that were made after Betsy weren't enough to withstand this storm, there's no way we can trust that they can ever be made truly safe enough along a shipping channel that cuts through residential neighborhoods.

The Army Corps of Engineers has stated that the reason the drainage canals have floodwalls rather than levees is a simple matter of space consideration: They take up less room. We can't make such excuses again in order to allow real estate developers to create bigger subdivisions in areas that are drained swampland to begin with.

We can't completely restore the natural hydrology of the region without rendering it completely uninhabitable. But we can certainly stop creating channels that simply funnel floodwaters into the city, making all the lake or river protection in the world totally moot.

Why wasn't money poured into levees?

In simplest terms, the fault for many of the deaths that occurred in New Orleans, Jefferson, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes lies with the state and federal governments, which failed to provide funding to properly build and maintain the levee system.

Sure, it didn't seem important then, but was a few million or even billion worth those lives and the broken hearts of many who lost loved ones and property? No. No life, no matter how small and insignificant it may seem to the powers that be, is less valuable than money we print or foreign aid we give to other countries that have no appreciation for it.

I am fortunate. I moved from New Orleans years ago. But my mother's two sisters, my aunts and their husbands, and my cousins all lived either in New Orleans, St. Bernard or Slidell. They survived by the grace of God. I still haven't heard from family friends or "adopted" family and can only pray for their safety.

Contraflow, evacuations and such are all good when you have money. The homeless, the destitute and the unwanted have none, but they still have value as human beings, and no human being is expendable.

Taxpayer draws the line

New Orleans citizens, politicos and other self-interested people are making many demands on the citizens of the United States. They are demanding that New Orleans be redone this way or that way, or that way or this way, in a never-ending quest to profit from the storm.

The people of New Orleans knew for years that a flood risk existed, and they refused to fund adequate flood protection. Now they are asking me to provide not only that flood protection but to build a palace of gold in New Orleans.

I as a taxpayer am willing to go only so far. New Orleans and Louisiana have for years been notorious for corruption. I will do everything in my power to avoid Louisiana and New Orleans taking advantage of me by playing on my emotions. Listen up leaders of New Orleans and Louisiana: Do not steal my money.

I will be contacting my representatives every day, urging them to take precautions in what we provide for the disaster. New Orleanians need to do something for themselves. U.S. taxpayers will be there for assistance, but do not take advantage of us. You are on a world stage now. Do not blow it.

Bad reception — on TV and on the field

My cable service is MIK (missing in Katrina), so Monday evening I rushed home to turn on my new Direct TV to watch our Saints battle the New York Giants. I was hoping the Saints would keep their promise to bring "intensity and emotion" to the game and prove to be an inspirational force for a battered Louisiana.

The first minute of the game told me differently. I'd seen it before a hundred times: a pan to the sideline showing Coach Jim Haslett with a bewildered expression that screamed, "Duh, which way did he go?" Quarterback Aaron Brooks inexplicably mishandled another snap, and Joe Horn — oh, say it ain't so, Joe — fumbled the ball into the end zone for a touchback.

At a time when everything around most Louisianians has changed, the Saints have remained a bastion of consistency: a very poor and uninspired football team.

I think I'll cancel my Direct TV and go back to watching that gray and white fuzz they tell me is my cable TV service.

Drying out the welcome mat

Talk of getting tourists back into New Orleans when its residents can't even move back home may seem bizarre and premature, but early attention to this crucial industry is on target.

Rebuilding tourism is essential to rebuilding the city's battered economy, and we can't afford to ignore it while we deal with more immediate concerns. The tourism sector employs 120,000 people and generated $9.9 billion in visitor spending last year. Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, accompanied by local, state and national tourism and convention leaders, outlined plans Tuesday to bring the industry back to life.

Lt. Gov. Landrieu traveled to New York last week to talk with officials about post-Sept. 11 tourism. That's a useful model, though the situations aren't identical. After the terrorist attacks, people were uneasy about flying in general, something that hurt tourism around the world. Some were also nervous about traveling to a city that was obviously in the crosshairs of terrorists.

While New Orleans doesn't face those obstacles, officials at Tuesday's news conference said there's a need for a national and international public relations campaign to overcome the negative images of destruction and lawlessness that were beamed across the world last month. National tourism industry groups want federal money to help in that effort, since local agencies aren't bringing in revenue. That's a reasonable request.

Those groups also promised to lobby for increasing the business meal tax deduction and restoring the spousal travel deduction. These ideas deserve consideration — as long as they are targeted to encourage the revival of the New Orleans and Gulf Coast tourism market.

New Orleans suffered damage that's far more widespread than what New York faced in 2001. That city wasn't 80 percent underwater, nor was it emptied of its people. Our metro area has to clean up the mess; restore its roads, bridges and utilities; and get businesses, including tourism businesses, reopened, and get its work force back to work.

Lt. Gov. Landrieu understands how critical that last component is. While it's exceedingly fortunate that tourism assets such as the French Quarter were largely spared, New Orleans won't be the exciting, unique destination it has always been without its world-class chefs and talented musicians and artists. We need those people to help keep the city true to its soul as it is reinvented.

"This is a competition," Lt. Gov. Landrieu said. "At the end of the day, we're competing for citizens." If they come back — and every effort should be made to bring them back — the visitors will surely follow.

Unlovely Rita

A healthy respect for hurricanes goes with the territory in Galveston, where a 1900 hurricane took the lives of 8,000 to 12,000 of the island's residents, the highest death toll of any U.S. natural disaster.

That history should be reason enough to clear out before Hurricane Rita shows up. A mandatory evacuation has been ordered for all of Galveston County, which has 267,000 residents, and officials there say people are complying. Houston Mayor Bill White, whose city took in thousands of exiled New Orleanians after Katrina, was urging people in low-lying parts of his city to evacuate as well.

If anyone is reluctant to leave, the fresh reminder provided by Hurricane Katrina should dissuade those foolhardy enough to consider riding out this powerful storm.

There shouldn't be any argument with the decision to evacuate New Orleans ahead of Rita either, given the fragile condition of the levees and the possibility that flooding could recur.

The storm now looming in the Gulf of Mexico looks ferocious. Rita became a Category 4 storm soon after it entered the Gulf and could become stronger as it moves across the warm waters. People on the Texas coast have now seen what a Category 4 storm can do to buildings, bridges, roads and lives.

Fortunately, there are signs that emergency-management officials have learned from the New Orleans area's post-Katrina nightmare. Food, ice and meals, as well as medical and rescue personnel, have been put in place for a quick response. Speed will be crucial. No one should be left to the mercy of rising floodwaters, or abandoned to hunger and thirst.

Nobody can prevent the weather from repeating itself, but the mistakes made before and after Katrina can and must be avoided.That includes the mistake of deciding to stay in harm's way. Trust us, Texas. You don't want to try it.

LONG ON IDEAS, SHORT ON FOLLOW-THROUGH

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, speaking at a news conference Monday, called upon residents to evacuate again because of the threat of Hurricane Rita.

STEPHANIE GRACE

I'm irritated with Mayor Ray Nagin. And I've got to say, it's kind of a relief. In these disorienting and utterly distressing times, it's one of the few things that feels normal.

Let me say up front that irritation isn't the same as anger, although I know there are those who are fed up with his mixed signals on whether and under what circumstances they can finally return home.

I get that, but I also sympathize with Nagin's dream, as President Bush put it, to get the city "up and running" as soon as possible. I've seen how Jefferson Parish residents appreciated Parish President Aaron Broussard's insistence that they be allowed back in to assess damage ñ albeit far less of it overall ñ to their homes and businesses. I agree that Orleans Parish residents deserve the same consideration.

I just wish Nagin had thought the repopulation plan all the way through.

Almost immediately after it was unveiled, it became obvious that the devil would be in the details. Were people in the relatively unaffected areas meant to come back and look, as in those early days in Jefferson Parish, or move back to stay? What would they do without water safe enough to drink and bathe, a 911 system, power in some areas, and other necessities of ordinary life? Were stressed-out police and firefighters ready to take on the extra responsibilities? Federal authorities, who belatedly arrived on the scene but are now playing a major role in getting the city back on its feet, expressed genuine concern over health and safety.

Rita is the stated reason for abandoning speedy repopulation, and, with the status of the levees uncertain, it's a good one. But even if yet another hurricane weren't churning the gulf, the plan likely would have fallen apart. Just as in the past, Nagin didn't line up the support he needed before opening his mouth, and he didn't take care of the specifics. It's all so familiar.

In retrospect, the aborted return is a logical follow-up to Nagin's cathartic radio tirade against the federal government as he watched his constituents suffer and die needlessly on rooftops, at the Superdome and at the convention center in Katrina's immediate aftermath.

"You know, God is looking down on all this, and if they are not doing everything in their power to save people, they are going to pay the price. Because every day that we delay, people are dying and they're dying by the hundreds, I'm willing to bet you," the mayor let loose, to the cheers of so many who were just as frustrated by the lack of help.

Back then, the outpouring seemed like Nagin's defining Rudolph Giuliani moment. In hindsight, Nagin wasn't being Giuliani, he was just being Nagin.

He's always had a talent for saying what people longed to hear, as he did that fateful day, and for dreaming big, as he has been ever since order was restored and thoughts of the future became possible.

Nothing wrong with that. If ever there was a time for dreaming big, it's now, when the city is poised to flourish or founder based on decisions Nagin will make in the coming months — and without the undertow of inertia that has dragged down big ideas in the past.

But, as the whole repopulation drama has shown, the administration still needs to get a handle on its traditional weaknesses: follow-through and communication with other agencies.

People don't lie awake at night wondering whether the city will build a new municipal complex, just one of many Nagin initiatives that never got off the ground. But they do fret over their homes, their memories, how much of their old lives are still recoverable.

We're on very personal territory here, and that means the mayor holds a lot of people's hearts, hopes and fears in his hands. Straight talk and real results have never been more vital.

ON OTHER ISSUES ...

The Roberts nomination

The question whether Judge John Roberts is qualified to be chief justice of the United States has been rendered moot by his performance in the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings. He is so obviously — ridiculously — well equipped to lead the third branch of government that it is hard to imagine how any Democrats can justify a vote against his confirmation.

Start with his intellect. This is a man whose knowledge of constitutional law goes well beyond his intimate familiarity with seemingly every Supreme Court decision. It is rooted in a thorough understanding of American history. He quotes Hamilton in the Federalist Papers not to show off his erudition, but to buttress a point completely pertinent to current debates.

Next, his temperament. He has a quick wit, one that repeatedly disarmed even the prickliest of his questioners. You don't have to be an expert on reading "body language," as Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma claimed to be, to see that he is perfectly comfortable in his own skin, immune to pressure.

—David Broder
in The Washington Post

In his testimony, Roberts was brilliant, affable, engaging and amusing. He was also evasive, calculating and, well, slick.

"Would you say there's a general right to privacy?" Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) asked Roberts. "I don't know what 'general' means," Roberts replied. Fair enough, though I wish Schumer had also asked Roberts what the meaning of "is" is.

How senators vote on Roberts — and in particular how Democrats and moderate Republicans vote — depends on where they believe the burden of proof lies. The accepted Washington view is that deference should be paid to a manifestly qualified presidential nominee.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said that some of Roberts's potential opponents seemed to be saying that "the only way you can have a good heart is adopt my value system." That, Graham insisted, does "a great disservice to the judiciary."

But the doubts about Roberts have nothing to do with his good heart. The issue is the power about to be put in his hands and into the hands of President Bush's next appointee — power both will enjoy for life. The Senate and the public have a right to far more assurance about how Roberts would use that power than they have been given in these hearings. The Senate is under no obligation to give the president or Roberts the benefit of the doubt.

If senators simply vote "yes" on Roberts, they will be conceding to the executive branch huge power to control what information the public gets and doesn't get about nominees to life positions. The administration has stubbornly refused to release a share of Roberts's writings as deputy solicitor general. This is a dare to the Senate, and the administration is assuming it will wimp out. A "yes" on Roberts would be a craven abdication of power to the executive branch.

—E.J. Dionne

Darfur and genocide

President Bush doesn't often find common cause with Cuba, Zimbabwe, Iran, Syria and Venezuela. But this month the Bush administration joined with those countries and others to eviscerate a forthright U.N. statement that nations have an obligation to respond to genocide.

It was our own Axis of Medieval, and it reflected the feckless response of Bush to genocide in Darfur. It's not that he favors children being tossed onto bonfires or teenage girls being gang-raped and mutilated, but he can't bother himself to try very hard to stop these horrors, either.

It's been a year since Bush — ahead of other world leaders, and to his credit — acknowledged that genocide was unfolding in Darfur. But since then he has used that finding of genocide not to spur action but to substitute for it.

Bush's position in the U.N. negotiations got little attention. But in effect the United States successfully blocked language in the declaration saying that countries have an "obligation" to respond to genocide. In the end the declaration was diluted to say that "We are prepared to take collective action on a case by case basis" to prevent genocide.

Spinning Bush's speech

It was a perfect moment for the media to use President Bush's speech from New Orleans against him.

ABC correspondent Dean Reynolds corralled about 10 evacuees and put them in chairs in the parking lot of Houston's Astrodome where they watched the president's nationally televised address. Afterward, they were asked to comment.

All of the evacuees were black and apparently poor. Given the template of news coverage — a majority of black people are said to believe aid was slow in coming because white people like George Bush don't like them — one might have expected a unanimously negative verdict to the president's address.

The verdict was unanimous, but it was unanimously positive. One by one, the evacuees replied to Reynolds' questions. "What did you think of what the president said tonight?" he asked one woman. She replied, "I think the speech was wonderful." Did she find anything hard to believe? "No, I didn't," she answered.

Reynolds put his microphone in front of another evacuee. Surely the previous one must have been a fluke. What did the next person think of the president's promises? "I really believe what he said. I believe. I got faith," she said.

A slight note of desperation seemed to creep into Reynolds' voice. Quickly, the microphone went to another evacuee. Reynolds tried another tactic. Would the woman like to criticize the slow response of the federal government (meaning the Bush Administration) to the carnage left in Katrina's wake? The woman blamed state and local officials for their slow response, not the president.

A question to all: Wasn't there anything that anyone could object to in the speech? Apparently not. Back to you Ted Koppel.

This delicious moment, which came after the other broadcast networks had quickly returned to regularly scheduled programs, speaks volumes about the media coverage of Katrina and the edited messages they have tried to shove down the public's throat.

Those messages are: White Republicans hate blacks; big business and big Republican government are evil and won't help blacks; Democrats are good and are the only ones who care for black people.

Reynolds' interviews were live, so no one could edit the content. Viewers saw and heard for themselves what at least these black people felt and believed. The ABC guest booker must have had his or her own assumptions about how such an interview would go. Surely the assemblage of black evacuees would mean unfettered criticism of President Bush. Who's racist now?

Houston's predominately Southern Baptist, but also diverse religious community has united to help the hurricane victims. Members of the mostly-white and prosperous Second Baptist Church — whose pastor, Dr. Ed Young, was asked by Houston's mayor to head the faith-based assistance effort — defied stereotypes about rich, white evangelical Christians. They applied the teaching of their Master by getting down and dirty with the poor. The Houston Chronicle also carried ads from people in many states offering help to people in need of a place to stay and assistance in finding a job.

Politicians, race-baiters and the media have an interest in keeping the racial pot boiling. For the media, it provides conflict (and ratings) so that race hustlers can blather on about a pre-voting-rights, pre-open-housing America.

For the politicians, mostly Democrats, it affords them the opportunity to stir the class warfare pot and claim that only by voting for Democrats will blacks who are poor ever escape poverty. But the political and humanitarian realities are quite different from these templates.

True compassion is not demonstrated by government, but individuals. The fundamental cause of poverty is not race, otherwise how to explain the vast and growing black middle and upper classes? A child may be born into poverty, but if he makes decisions to stay in school and study, not produce children outside marriage, refrain from taking or selling drugs and committing other crimes, there is a strong likelihood he will escape poverty.

These are the messages the government and media should be sending instead of relying on the race-class liberal Democrat templates through which it filters most contemporary issues.

'Fitness was my salvation'

Evacuees committed to exercise say that working out helps them beat the stress of being away from home

STAFF ILLUSTRATION BY KENNETH HARRISON

Health and fitness writer

No air-conditioning. No lights. No running water. No excuses.

Just after Hurricane Katrina hit New Orleans, Steven Deitelzweig, a physician at Ochsner Clinic Foundation, resumed his early-morning workout at the Brent House Hotel on the Ochsner campus, where he had taken refuge.

"I worked hard to approach . . . some sense of normalcy," said Deitelzweig, whose home in English Turn escaped serious damage from the storm. "And fitness was my salvation.

"While I didn't have access to my home exercise equipment and comfort zone, maintaining my fitness routine was necessary for my emotional and physical well-being."

Pam Mather hasn't been as lucky. The Algiers bride-to-be evacuated to Baton Rouge immediately after a wedding-dress fitting.

"So I had my veil and underpinnings, but no running shoes or related clothing," she said. "I was packed for a weekend at my mom's, not three weeks away from home."

After a few days, she bought exercise clothes and inexpensive running shoes. "But I just haven't exercised as much. I ran a couple of times, and my fiancé and I spent a week in the D.C. area, where we walked around a lot. But I can feel my arms turning to flab and I feel really sloth-like."

10 TIPS FOR STAYING IN SHAPE WHEN YOU'RE OUT OF YOUR ELEMENT

1. BE CAUTIOUS. If you haven't been active since the storm, start slowly — 15 to 30 minutes of exercise two or three days a week — and build from there.

2. KEEP MOVING. All movement burns calories, so pace while you talk on the phone, do leg lifts while watching TV or lift weights while the coffee is brewing.

3. WALK, DON'T DRIVE. Pound the pavement for a few minutes in the morning. Take the stairs or stroll through the mall.

4. FIND A BUDDY. An exercise partner can serve as a motivator and a sounding board during times of stress. If necessary, contact a local community health center and ask if counseling services are available.

5. KEEP A JOURNAL. Jot down your activities and your thoughts each day to help you stay focused and motivated.

6. FORGET FORMAL DIETING right now. Instead, simply choose more healthful foods — fruit over chips, lean broiled chicken over cheeseburgers — and eat smaller portions.

7. SIP LOW-CALORIE DRINKS. Drinking water rather than calorie and carb-laden soft drinks can quench your thirst and help you feel full.

8. FIND QUIET TIME. Set aside 10 minutes a day (in the shower, while doing dishes or folding laundry) to sort through your thoughts or review your day.

9. STAY IN THE MOMENT. Your feelings exert a powerful influence over your physical health, Lucy MacDonald writes in her book "Learn to be an Optimist." Don't try to look too far into the future right now; just tackle the tasks at hand.

10. REST WELL. Experts recommended seven to eight hours of sleep a night in order to awake refreshed and better able to handle the day's challenges. Can't sleep? Consult a physician about medical remedies.

MY STORM STORY

Hurricane Katrina: In their own words

"My family left Sunday morning, heading to Alabama. (By Monday morning), all hell was beginning to break loose. The tree behind my home fell and the trees behind the street started cracking. The water started creeping through the flooring, and it started coming in fast.

"The patio door, I could see it had about 5 feet on the outside, and it was just pouring in through the door. Karoom! The front door came open. The water came through. Boom! It hit me, knocked me up against the wall, and I barely had time to grab the rungs of the ladder to the attic. I'm hearing all this, hearing wind tearing up neighborhoods. I'm thinking, man, I should have listened to my wife and left.

"About 12:50, it got quiet, real quiet. It was eerie, real eerie. I grabbed my waterproof bag with my camera and climbed onto the roof. All of a sudden out of nowhere a big old gust of wind came in and whoosh! It grabbed me and lifted me clear off my slippers, tossed me into the water.

"I'm in a current because the water is coming off the lake. I went around some trees, got to my neighbor's house behind me and saw his boat. I'm still holding on to the bag with my digital camera, fighting myself into that boat. I got into the boat and said, 'Oh, Lord, thank you Jesus.' I'm trying to paddle, then I saw it was chained to a pole. I was stuck on that boat (overnight).

"Tuesday, the sun was beating me down. I was waving and the helicopters were flying constantly. But none of them saw the boat. They probably thought I was rescuing people.

"That Wednesday, maybe about 1, I'm thinking, 'Lord, if I have to stay out here another night, I'm not going to make it.' I'm just sitting there and I heard somebody say, 'Is anybody there?' I'm yelling 'Over here!' And I'm hoarse because I've been yelling for three days, and sure enough, it was a boat coming around. I'm like, 'Oh, thank you Jesus!' I'm grabbing them and hugging them. It was two NOPD officers and a guy from Lafourche Parish.

"They gave me water and told me to drink it slowly. It was hot, and my wife will tell you I don't like water, but that water was like champagne."

WELCOME DISTRACTIONS

Trivial pursuits to take your mind off you-know-what

If you know what it means to miss New Orleans, the following films can put you back in that Crescent City state of mind.

— By Michael Kleinschrodt, movie critic

RUNAWAY JURY (2003)

New Orleans looks amazing in Gary Fleder's adaptation of the John Grisham legal thriller. Grisham's tobacco company has been changed to a gun manufacturer, but the story remains compelling. Strong performances from Gene Hackman, Dustin Hoffman, John Cusack and Rachel Weisz make this one of the classiest films made in the city.

THE BIG EASY (1987)

From classy to trashy. The lurid box art for Jim McBride's steamy crime thriller is a good indication of the movie to come. Dennis Quaid is a New Orleans police detective investigating a series of killings while prosecutor Ellen Barkin investigates police corruption. The accents are ludicrous, and the plot includes every New Orleans cliche in the book. And, yet, we love it.

PRETTY BABY (1978)

Louis Malle's wonderfully evocative film stars Keith Carradine as Storyville photographer E.J. Bellocq. In the fictionalized account, set in 1917, Carradine's Bellocq becomes obsessed with prepubescent Brooke Shields, daughter of prostitute Susan Sarandon. The movie was filmed at The Columns Hotel on St. Charles Avenue.

working out

helps beat the stress of being away from home

FITNESS, from C-1

For people displaced from their homes, separated from family, not to mention being thrown off their normal routines for eating and exercising, attention to activity and a healthful diet can be more important — and more difficult — than ever.

If you are returning to a workout schedule after an interruption of a few weeks, however, there is bound to be a period of readjustment.

"The first tip to get you to the next phase is to thank God you have the opportunity to actually do a workout at this point," said Charlie Hoolihan, personal training director of Pelican Athletic Club in Mandeville.

"Revel in the workout no matter how lacking it may seem compared to your pre-evacuation fitness level."

Hoolihan recommends resetting goals and personal standards down from peak fitness levels, and he cautions against working out too hard during times of stress.

"Remember that all stressors, whether from exercise, emotion, lack of sleep or illness, are cumulative and can build up," he said. "It is important to back off your physical intensity when your other stressors are building up.

"Most of us need to be working out to ease our minds more than to push our bodies. Going too hard during a time of stress is almost a guarantee that you will either get sick or injured."

Molly Kimball, a registered dietitian and sports and lifestyles nutritionist at Elmwood Fitness Center in Harahan, suggests people do their best to get back to their usual eating patterns.

"For example, if you usually eat small meals and snacks throughout the day, be sure to keep healthful snacks available," she said. "This will require extra planning, however, since people may not have access to refrigeration."

For snacks, she recommends stocking up on healthful nonperishables such as nuts, fresh fruit, whole grain crackers, whole grain bread and peanut butter.

"This is also a perfect time to use nutrition bars — they're portable and often fortified with vitamins and minerals," she said. "Look for a bar with at least 10 grams of protein, so it will be filling."

Another option: meal replacement shakes, she said. "These often come in packets of powder, already portioned out. You simply add water and stir, or use a cup with a lid and shake it.

"If you have access to refrigeration, or an ice chest, you can add more sources of protein: string cheese, yogurt, cottage cheese, maybe even lean deli meats."

As for fast food, Kimball advises, "Think of yourself in your 'usual' life. Many people switch into 'vacation' mode in unusual times, and have that 'what the heck' attitude regarding food."

Easier said than done, says Wayne Brown, who evacuated to Houston after his eastern New Orleans home flooded. His family has since relocated to St. Charles, Mo.

"We've eaten at either IHOP or Waffle House at least five times since this odyssey began," Brown said. "With the extra grease content and sugar content, you need something to fight that."

Brown bought running shoes at a department store and began taking daily walks or runs in Houston. Exercise was an important part of his "normal" life, he said, and is even more vital now.

"I use it to keep down the fat rolls and to try to lower my stress level," Brown said. "Since the stress level has been off the scale recently, it has come in handy."

As with all aspects of life after Katrina, however, remember to keep your temporary fitness failings in perspective. If ever there was a time for comfort food, this is it. There will be time to repair the damage later.

"It's important to recognize that the unholy trinity of you, Popeye's and a few Abita Beers is only an aberration," Hoolihan said. "If you need that comfort food because of the stressors in your life, go for it. Sit on Dr. Ben and Jerry's couch and let their healing magic cure you of all worries for the moment."

Katrina and 'Tide' are 'the same stuff'

TIDE, from C-1

the National Archives and the Library of Congress are here, enormous resources for a historian, but there's no question, New Orleans is home."

The ravages of nature have informed Barry's two best-known works, "Rising Tide" and this year's "The Great Influenza." But even after acquiring the in-depth knowledge of America's greatest natural disaster — before Katrina, that is — Barry seems shaken by the reality of what's happened to New Orleans, where he and his wife Anne have a condo in the French Quarter that seems to have been spared significant damage.

Barry, who grew up in Rhode Island, first came to New Orleans on a college trip for Mardi Gras. Later, he enjoyed a stint as an assistant football coach for Tulane University; the 1973 Green Wave went on to beat Louisiana State University that year, and Barry remains an avid football fan. In 1977, he worked on a special edition of the Vieux Carre Courier, commemorating the 50th anniversary of the flood, and his longstanding fascination with the river resulted in "Rising Tide" 20 years later.

The book is a compelling non-fiction saga of the power of the river and the hubris of men who attempt to control nature. Barry describes the passion of two 19th century engineers: James Eads and Andrew Humphreys, who disagreed over strategies to control the river — levees, outlets, or a combination of the two. The levees-only policy was eventually adopted and proved to be a disastrous one.

Barry takes the reader to the Mississippi Delta, where the Percy family of Greenville, Miss., was attempting to establish an empire along the river. The 1927 flood would be their undoing, as African-American workers remained captive on the levees, forced to work. The subsequent outrage led to the downfall of the Southern feudal system, and the Percy family would turn their talents to literature rather than land.

Finally, Barry comes to New Orleans, once the jewel of the South, where 57 powerful men set in motion a plan to dynamite the levee at Caernarvon (needlessly, as it turned out) and flood St. Bernard and Plaquemines Parishes. That willful destruction on April 29, 1927, would have far-reaching ramifications for the city: the collapse of the banks and the sugar industry when a post-flood boom did not occur; the national scandal of what happened to refugees from New Orleans; the rise of Leander Perez (who served as the attorney for flood victims seeking reparations); and the election of Huey Long, ushering in a new era. New Orleans would never quite regain its lost glory.

The Mississippi flood covered 27,000 acres of land, flooded the homes of roughly one million people, and the Red Cross subsequently fed and sheltered 667,000 people. Then, as now, the nation was under stress; then, as now, power struggles ensued.

Since Katrina struck, Barry has kept up a grueling schedule, comparing disasters then and now, providing historical context.

"Things got done more efficiently in 1927," he said. "One of the reason things worked so well in 1927 was that local people were able to move in quickly, knowing that money was behind them. But as New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said, 'Our plan was to get people to high ground, and then the cavalry would come. And the cavalry didn't come.' People who were left, who remained in New Orleans, felt abandoned — and they were abandoned."

In 1927, Barry said, the response to the event changed the way people thought about government, creating the sense that people should be cared for when they were victims of circumstances not of their own making. And while his handling of the 1927 disaster swept Herbert Hoover into office, Barry is not so sure what the political ramifications of the 2005 crisis will be.

"Beyond the (declining) approval ratings of President Bush," he said, "it's too soon to tell."

Just as the 1927 flood spawned a migration of African-Americans to Northern cities, so the 2005 hurricane will disperse the New Orleans population throughout the country. And just as African-Americans were trapped on the levees during the 1927 flood, in 2005 they were trapped in the Superdome and the Convention Center.

"Geographically," Barry said, "the movement of people is significant. I'd hate to compare it to Camille, but I think it's similar.

"We'll have to think long and hard about rebuilding," he said. "New Orleans can be less vulnerable to such destruction. It should be made impervious to it. As I wrote in 'Rising Tide,' the river is perfect. But if you make a mistake against it, it will find it and exploit it.

"The nation does want to help. America is an amazingly generous country, and that's a big plus for New Orleans."

One of the more hopeful messages Barry received after the storm came in an e-mail from a friend who had evacuated the city in the company of National Guard soldiers, one of whom was seeing the city for the first time. Even seeing New Orleans in its devastated state, Barry said, the Guardsman couldn't wait to come back.

In one of the curious ironies of this tough year, Barry's "Rising Tide" was the book chosen for the city-wide reading initiative, One Book, One New Orleans, and was discussed in reading groups and public forums throughout the city. Perhaps, in some odd way, reading those descriptions of the savage possibilities of water led a few more people to leave the city.

In a 1997 interview, Barry told The Times-Picayune, "What I think I write about is power. And there aren't many things more powerful than the Mississippi."

Walking along the river on that day, Barry remarked on the enduring power of issues concerning the river, appearing in newspaper pages from the 1840s to the present — "flood-plain usage, levees, who should pay for it, is it worth doing, what happens downstream — exactly the same stuff."

Those issues are coming around again. But Barry has no plans to write a book about Katrina and desert his work in progress, a tale of the 17th-century separation of church and state, based in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, centered on the figure of Roger Williams. Even though the hurricane would seem to call for Barry's particular gift of blending the grand sweep of history with the intense and moving personal narrative, such a work would be somewhere down the road.

"Obviously people have discussed this with me," he said. "But I don't know if I can deal with it emotionally.

"I've been wearing my old Tulane T-shirts in my office. It makes me feel better."

TALE of TWO CITIES

NBA to recognize Hornets as Oklahoma City's team as well as New Orleans'

By Jimmy Smith
Staff writer

The hurricane-decimated city's professional basketball team this season will be known as the New Orleans/Oklahoma City Hornets, the NBA said Wednesday, and the team's lease agreement with its temporary home leaves open the possibility that the Ford Center could be the venue for games next season as well.

Along with a new arena, the league announced the name "New Orleans" will be removed from the team's home jerseys, but remain on the road uniforms while each will bear a patch signifying the Hornets' presence in Oklahoma City.

Yet despite the cosmetic permanence that seems to be attaching itself to this 35-game site shift, league attorney Joel Litvin, as well as NBA commissioner David Stern and Hornets owner George Shinn, said that everyone expects the Hornets to return to New Orleans Arena by next year, perhaps as soon as March.

Six regular-season games are scheduled to be played at the Pete Maravich Assembly Center on the LSU campus, including three in March that could be played at the Arena if the damage to the facility, and the city's infrastructure, be repaired by then.

"We are New Orleans' team," Shinn said Wednesday afternoon. "We're not going to announce we're going tomove (to Oklahoma City), or anywhere else. I'm still traumatized by all this. I want to get back to New Orleans. When New Orleans is back, we're back. It's that simple.

"If everything was back now, we wouldn't be going through this thing. It's unfortunate, but this is a tragedy we're trying to deal with. We've got to do what a lot of other people have done with their lives and businesses. And that's go

Hornets' deal slap in the face to their fans

JOHN DESHAZIER

It was bad when the Saints and the NFL only found room to play four Saints games at Tiger Stadium in Baton Rouge, just one more than the three games that were awarded to San Antonio and the Alamodome.

It's worse that the Hornets and the NBA only found room to play six Hornets games at the Pete Maravich Assembly Center in Baton Rouge, 29 fewer than the 35 games awarded to the Ford Center in Oklahoma City.

Saints fans who felt slighted at the prospect of only having a realistic chance of seeing their team in person for half of its allotted home games now appear to have landed a windfall, compared to Hornets fans who will see their team play about 15 percent of its available home dates in Louisiana.

"If the games can't be played in Louisiana for whatever reason, I'm anxious for Oklahoma City to have a chance to prove that it's a major league market," Oklahoma City mayor Mick Cornett told The Associated Press last week.

Well, the games can't be played at New Orleans Arena, and we know the reason. But, still, even with the league needing to nail down dates in order for opposing teams to be able to map out travel plans, the league and franchise could have done better by Hornets fans, just as the NFL and Saints could have done better by Saints fans.

Instead, today, the pledge/vow by Hornets owner George Shinn to remain the "New Orleans Hornets" doesn't look like much. Not when the team will be called the "New Orleans/Oklahoma City Hornets" this season, the home jerseys will spell out "Hornets" instead of "New Orleans" and the road

Doucet making strides as WR

Everything coming together for ex-QB

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — When LSU wide receiver Early Doucet was in high school, he made big plays on a regular basis.

For him, it was instinctive.

He was usually the best athlete on the field, and as the quarterback of St. Martinville, he had the ball in his hands every play. When he ended his high school career two years ago, he was the No. 1 recruit in Louisiana.

Two weeks ago, Doucet made one of the biggest plays in LSU history when he soared through the air to bring down a fourth-down pass from JaMarcus Russell for the winning score in a 35-31 victory at Arizona State.

That catch was mostly the product of nearly two years of mistakes followed by corrections, study and practice. It reaffirmed that Doucet was well along in his transition from high school quarterback to college receiver.

"People forget Early was never a wideout in high school," said LSU offensive coordinator Jimbo Fisher. "He played quarterback, and they'd give him the ball and say, 'Here, go make everybody miss,' and nobody could tackle him and he made plays. Those guys all play fast with the ball. When you make the transition like Devery (Henderson) did, like Skyler (Green) did, you have to learn to play fast without the ball, and that takes time and understanding how to get open to get the ball.

"Our kids understand how to work and what it takes. They're willing to pay that price, and that's where I see it in Early."

The adjustment to wide receiver was "new" rather than "hard," Doucet said. There was more to it than he had ever imagined, even though, as a prep quarterback, he had some insight into what a receiver

Officials bristle at 'small town' description

San Antonio aiming to boost NFL reputation

By Mike Triplett
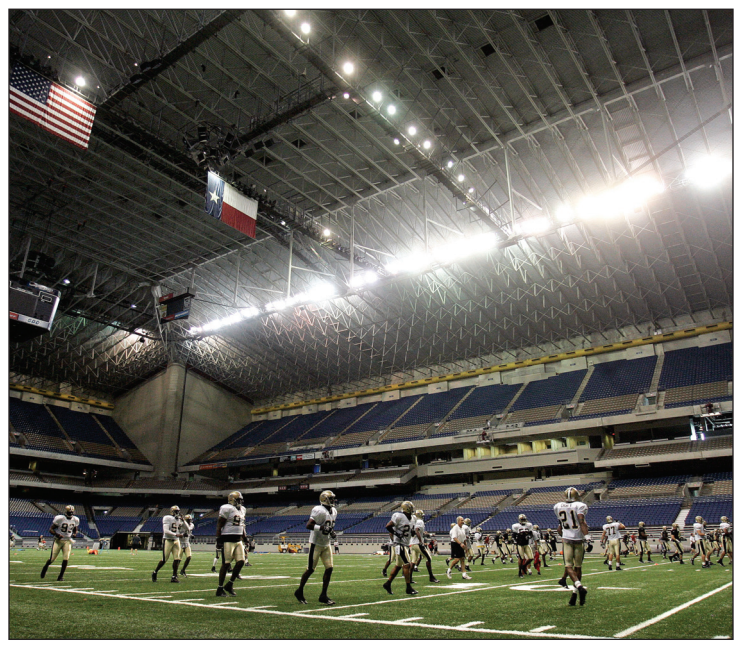
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — San Antonio officials took umbrage at some comments made by NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue during an interview with The Times-Picayune on Monday, suggesting that the city is a "small market" by league standards.

In a front-page article in the San Antonio Express-News on Wednesday, Mayor Phil Hardberger said, "Our market is becoming larger every day. But I can understand that people that don't live here, that live all the way across the United States, may not know that.

"The feeling the commissioner voiced, with due respect, is that of people who live a long way away and are not on the ground seeing what is happening here."



Unlike some other city leaders, Hardberger has not been openly campaigning to bring the Saints here permanently.

But the mayor, like most every government and business leader in the community, is hoping to improve San Antonio's reputation in the NFL's eyes this season. The Saints will play three home games in the 65,000-seat Alamodome, beginning with an Oct. 2 date against the Buffalo Bills.

Even before those games were officially announced, corporate leaders rallied to offer sponsorships and buy suites and seats.

The general public followed suit when tickets went on sale last week, buying more than 50,000 tickets on the first day and more than 100,000 by

The Alamodome will host three Saints game this season. City officials are hoping it will be an opportunity for San Antonio to show that it's worthy of landing an NFL franchise, but NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue gave the city little encouragement.

SAN ANTONIO — The Saints lost return specialist Michael Lewis for the season after he injured his left knee in the fourth quarter of Monday's 27-10 loss to the New York Giants.

Lewis, a New Orleans native and a fan favorite during his five seasons with the Saints, tore the medial collateral ligament and the posterior cruciate ligament in his knee and was placed on injured reserve Wednesday. He will have surgery next week once the swelling goes down.

Lewis, 33, was receiving treatment on the knee Wednesday afternoon at the Alamodome. He had no comment.

Toms cleared to play in Presidents Cup

Surgery to correct heart malfunction set after event

By Brian Allee-Walsh
Golf columnist

No one is more thankful to be playing the game he loves than David Toms, who one week ago had to be rushed by helicopter to a Pennsylvania hospital with his heart racing dangerously out of control.

Toms and 11 other members of the U.S. team open play Friday against an International team in the Presidents Cup at Robert Trent Jones Golf Course in Prince Williams County, Va.

A series of tests revealed an electrical malfunction in the upper chamber of Toms' heart, a condition that will require him to undergo a six-hour operation to correct the problem.

He will take medicine in order to play in the Presidents Cup and has assured U.S. captain Jack Nicklaus that he is ready to play and win points for the team.

"I really didn't know what was going on," said Toms, a former LSU All-American. "It obviously got kind of hairy there for about 45 minutes. I knew right away my vitals weren't very good. I was hurting real bad in my chest. At that point they don't know if you're having a heart attack. I didn't know what was going to happen to me really."

Toms, 38, has suffered a half-dozen heart-related incidents in the past four years, including one at the NEC Invitational last month.

The latest incident occurred last Thursday midway through the opening round of the 84 Lumber Classic. With his heart beating more than 180 times per minute, he suddenly dropped to his knees on the first tee, his 10th hole of the first round. He was carried off the course by stretcher to a waiting ambulance and transported to a nearby hospital.

The medical people actually stopped his heart and started it again with an electrical jolt. From that hospital in Uniontown, Pa., he was taken by helicopter to a Pittsburgh hospital.

AP PHOTO

David Toms said he is healthy enough to play in the Presidents Cup, beginning Friday. Following the Cup matches he is scheduled to undergo a six-hour operation to correct an electrical malfunction in his heart.

"It's become more frequent and that's why the doctors want me to go ahead and take care of it," Toms said. "I'm more at risk to wreck a car or pass out on an airplane or something like that."

Adam Young, director of the Shreveport-based David Toms Foundation, which has raised approximately $600,000 for the Hurricane Katrina Relief Fund, said Toms could resume playing competitive golf within two weeks after the surgery.

"If he has any repercussions he probably would do it immediately,'' Young said. "Even though the surgery apparently is a lengthy procedure it's not that evasive. He could be out of the hospital the next day. So it's nothing that would table him for too long."

Toms, a former PGA Championship champion and winner of the Accenture Match Play Championship earlier this year, is enjoying another banner season. He currently ranks fourth on the money list, behind Tiger Woods, Vijay Singh and Phil Mickelson, with $3,656,213 in 22 events.

How Toms will be used has not been determined. Nicklaus has been tight-lipped about his lineup, although there has been speculation that Woods and Fred Couples will be paired and Mickelson and Toms will be paired in two of Friday's six opening-round foursome matches. International captain Gary Player also has kept his lineup under wraps.

Toms played in the 2003 Presidents Cup at George, South Africa, where he compiled a 1-4 overall record (0-2 in fourball, 1-1 in foursomes and 0-1 in singles).

That competition ended in an historic 17-17 tie at The Links at Fancourt when Woods and Ernie Els finished tied after three holes of a sudden death playoff called because of darkness. Nicklaus and then-International captain Gary Player agreed to a deadlock after it was determined that the U.S. would not retain the cup as a result of the tie.

After the Presidents Cup, Toms is scheduled to play in three more events - the WGC-American Express Championship (Oct. 6-9), the Chrysler Championship (Oct. 27-30) and Tour Championship (Nov. 3-6).

"David's doing fine now that he knows what it is and what causes it and how it can be treated and cured," Young said. "He's OK both mentally and physically. We're just not sure when he's going to have surgery. He's going to see how he does this week with the medication and then make a decision next week."

Everything seemed in order earlier this week inside Fontainebleau's gym.

There were players hustling for loose balls, diving to the hardwood for digs and making a few high-swinging kills.

It seemed like a typical fall week for Fontainebleau's volleyball team - about as normal as things could be given the circumstances

Most of the players evacuated for Hurricane Katrina, none had been in school in September because of the storm, and the team hadn't been together in nearly three weeks.

That all changed with the Bulldogs' first practice Monday morning and the first match Tuesday night. The Bulldogs made the most of it, beginning their season with a 25-17, 25-13, 25-6 victory at home against Hammond. Fontainebleau is the only team in St. Tammany Parish that resumed its schedule.

"Our service receive was not good and that was a little concerning, but that comes with practice," Bulldogs coach Judy Tyrl said. "It was all a little rusty, but I think they were excited to get out there, have fun, and have a little competition."

Northlake Christian will resume its schedule today by hosting Fontainebleau at 5 p.m.

Many of the West St. Tammany teams are trying to locate players who have scattered across the country because of the storm. Though athletics were given the approval to begin this week, school doesn't start until Oct. 3.

St. Scholastica coach Danny Davis said he picked up six volleyball players, including senior Mount Carmel outside hitter Dana Leblanc.

Leblanc is awaiting medical clearance on an anterior cruciate ligament injury.

Fisher's opener marks the return of Jefferson Parish football

Gators play host to Holy Cross

Fisher, located in the tiny fishing village of Lafitte, has the second-smallest enrollment of nine senior high schools in the Jefferson Parish Public Schools System. The Gators, however, carry the distinction of being the first Jefferson school to return to the football field following Hurricane Katrina's devastating strike Aug. 29.

Fisher opens its season today at 7:30 p.m. at home against Holy Cross in a hastily arranged game in which each team has had less than a week of practice. The game was scheduled for Saturday, but was moved up because of the threat of storm surge in the Lafitte area created by Hurricane Rita's churn through the Gulf of Mexico.

The timetable for Fisher's return was set on a fast track Monday when approximately 30 players showed up for a voluntary meeting called by Coach Duane Foret. Another five players arrived for an informal workout Tuesday, with still another six calling Foret to say they also are returning.

The Gators expect to dress out 36 players from the original 72-man roster that one month ago was expected to contend with Newman for the District 11-2A championship.

"We're going to be the first ones back on the field only because we were the first ones back," said Foret, referring to Jefferson's initial re-entry plan that began with the re-opening of Lafitte, Gretna and Westwego. "We were just fortunate that that storm passed 20 miles to the east of us."

The sudden return of players initially surprised Foret, who had returned Sept. 14 to assist Principal George Hebert with the cleanup of Fisher's campus.

"As we were working on Thursday and Friday, kids started showing up,'' Foret said. "They were helping us pick up, picking up trees and stuff."

It was then that Foret decided to accelerate his team's return to the field by posting a sign detailing Monday's gathering. Foret also met separately with his seniors Monday, informing them of a revised seven-game schedule.

"We're giving our seniors a chance to have a senior year after thinking a few weeks ago that our season was devastated," Foret said.

Football a welcome respite from Katrina aftermath

Slidell to top Lions in battle of district favorites

By Marty Mule

Hurricane Katrina made us realize football, or anything as trivial as sports, is not all that important in the grand scheme.

Homes are gone, families are separated and lost loved ones - people's lives are forever altered.

There is no comparison, obviously, with the temporary euphoria of victories - or the disenchantment of losses.

But football has its place. Getting involved with a game can clear the mind, ease the stress of real-life problems, and provide a two-hour escape for folks who need something else to think about.

In a season that essentially opens on what should be the fourth playing date of the regular season, there is a game with potential league-title ramifications: District 4-5A favorite Slidell at Covington, the defending district champion. It's the kind of big-game scenario Tigers coach Wayne Grubb is comfortable with.

"For four weeks,'' Grubb said, "I've been sitting down watching CNN and getting more and more depressed.

"Yesterday I had two hours of happiness (at practice). I got into it. For a little period there, my mind was at ease."

It's like starting from scratch for Covington and Slidell. Neither could be the team they were expected to be at this juncture. Both teams are missing key players and have coaches and players with other concerns in the backs of their minds.

"It's a situation none of us have ever been in before,'' Grubb said. "All of us will just have to do our best. To tell you the truth, I'm looking forward to it. We've all been reminded football is not the most important thing in the world. But when they turn on those lights on Friday nights, we're into it."

SLIDELL 21, COVINGTON 14: Based on what was expected before the interruption of Katrina, Stephen Liuzza was the ignition to District 4-5A's best offense. He's missing the receiving corps of last season, but Liuzza will put up points for the Tigers.

FONTAINEBLEAU 20, HAMMOND 13: The Bulldogs lost a lot, and the Tors have excellent individual talent. This is a hunch that Fontainebleau coach Larry Favre isn't in nearly as dire straits as he would have us believe.

ST. PAUL'S 24, MANDEVILLE 7: The Wolves might have the best defense on the north shore with end David Boyce and linebacker Scott Ward. The Skippers' capable offensive line will open holes for tailback Timmy DeMelo, but not enough of them.

PONCHATOULA 17, NORTHSHORE 10: In a game between two ascending programs, Greenies linebacker Casey Waddell could make the play that makes the difference for Ponchatoula. On the other hand, the Panthers' Jeremy Wise is going to be a major weapon. The pick is based on the theory that the home field is an advantage.

GUEYDAN 21, NORTHLAKE CHRISTIAN 14: It would make a great story if the Wolverines win its first game, and quarterback Andrew Sherwood gives them a chance. However, the fact that Gueydan has played three games makes this improbable.

LORANGER 17, PEARL RIVER 14: Ricky James spurs the Wolves, though Pearl River middle linebacker Ben Galiano and his defensive sidekicks keep the Rebels close enough to possibly steal the win at the end.

POPE JOHN PAUL II 21, LIVE OAK 17: Jaguars coach Chris Lachney has numbers and talent now. Jaguars running back Chad Hindman and quarterback Richard Guillot would light up the scoreboard - if it were functioning.

Curtis salvages seven-game schedule; opens with road contest

By Bill Bumgarner

For a team that was set to begin the season with seven games, Hurricane Katrina has sent John Curtis coach J.T. Curtis back to his cell phone time and time again, trying to supplement a schedule and salvage the season. The results have the Patriots opening a makeshift seven-game schedule Friday with the first of three consecutive non-district road games.

The Patriots, who were set to open the season against Cottonwood High of Salt Lake City, and Daphne High School of Daphne, Ala., will journey to Ferriday in east central Louisiana for a 7 p.m. game.

The Patriots will play at East St. John on Sept. 30 before winding up non-district play at Choctawhatchee High in Fort Walton Beach, Fla.

Curtis will open league play against St. Charles. Curtis, who met Ferriday in a state championship game in the early 1980s, began practice Monday.

"We had about 65 to 70 players," Curtis said. "We had some schedule problems with Ferriday at one time but all has been worked out and everything has settled down."

The Patriots' standout running back-defensive back-return specialist Joe McKnight played for Evangel in a game against Longview, Texas, this past Friday, but he is expected to be in the Patriots lineup against Ferriday. McKnight could wind up with the distinction of playing with two state championship teams in the same season.

"Mentally we did not know what to expect Monday," Curtis said. "They were really not into it (practice). They were not a team. They were just there. And it was very awkward.

"But Tuesday, the players were totally different. They were ready to get rolling."

Now, Curtis has to address one last problem - finding enough buses to get his players to Ferriday.

RICE, HOUSTON POSTPONE GAMES

Rice and Houston postponed home football games scheduled for Saturday, and Texas A&M has pushed up its game against Texas State, in anticipation of Hurricane Rita's reaching the Texas Gulf Coast this weekend. The Aggies will play Texas State tonight instead of Saturday. Rice was scheduled to play Navy, but on Wednesday the game was rescheduled for Oct. 22. Houston was to play Southern Mississippi on Saturday. No makeup date was announced, but school officials said they were looking at Nov. 12 or 13. To make room, the SMU-Houston game originally scheduled for Nov. 12 was postponed to Nov. 19, when both teams have an open date. The Golden Eagles play at Marshall on Tuesday, Nov. 8. The Division I-AA game between Northwestern Oklahoma and McNeese State scheduled to be played in Lake Charles, was canceled.

NFL

TWO VIKINGS OUT: Minnesota will likely be without two starters for Sunday's home game against the Saints, wide receiver Nate Burleson and linebacker E.J. Henderson. Burleson, the Vikings' top receiver, sprained his left knee in last week's loss at Cincinnati, and is listed as doubtful. Henderson sprained his right ankle, and he's also doubtful despite playing the entire second half with the injury against the Bengals. But middle linebacker Sam Cowart should return from a strained left calf that kept him out against Cincinnati.

VICK QUESTIONABLE: Michael Vick was held out of practice Wednesday with a sore left hamstring, but the Atlanta quarterback said he may play Sunday at Buffalo even if he can't practice the rest of the week. "As long as I'm getting mental reps, I think I'll be able to go out there and execute the game plan," Vick said. "It's possible I may not practice all week. Who knows? I'm just playing it by ear right now. I just have to be able to be me." Second-year quarterback Matt Schaub, who made one start last season, ran the first-team offense Wednesday.

PANTHERS DB AILING: Carolina safety Mike Minter missed practice Wednesday because of a strained calf, an injury that could end his streak of playing in 64 consecutive regular-season games. "I hate being on the sideline," Minter said. "If we're out there playing, I want to be out there playing. I don't want to be over there watching. That's the worst feeling in the world. Even in practice, I hate that." Minter, who's in his ninth season with the Panthers, has not missed a game since he sat out the first two contests of the 2001 season with a knee injury. He's Carolina's all-time leader in tackles. If he can't play against the Miami Dolphins on Sunday, free-agent pickup Idrees Bashir probably will replace him.

BROWNS CUT QB: Veteran quarterback Doug Johnson, signed in the offseason to give Cleveland protection behind starter Trent Dilfer, has been released by the Browns. The club claimed rookie quarterback Derek Anderson on waivers from Baltimore. Johnson, who made 11 career NFL starts for Atlanta from 2000-03, was beaten out for Cleveland's No. 2 quarterback job by rookie Charlie Frye. Johnson, 27, started eight games in 2003 for the Falcons when Michael Vick got hurt.

LEFTWICH MISSES PRACTICE: Jacksonville Jaguars quarterback Byron Leftwich missed practice with a sore groin and was listed as questionable. But Leftwich insisted he will play Sunday at the New York Jets. "I'm fine. I'll be ready to play Sunday," he said.

BILLS DB QUESTIONABLE: Safety Lawyer Milloy had surgery to repair an injured right thumb, leaving his status uncertain for Buffalo's game against Atlanta on Sunday. Wearing a cast on his right hand, Milloy did not practice Wednesday and was one of three Buffalo starters listed as questionable.

PAIR MISSES WORKOUT: Quarterback Donovan McNabb and wide receiver Terrell Owens missed practice with injuries, but it's likely both will play in Philadelphia's game against Oakland on Sunday. McNabb, who sat out one practice last week with a bruised chest, hurt his groin right before halftime against the 49ers. Owens has a nagging abdominal/groin injury.

ETC.

SERENA BEATEN: Serena Williams was upset in the second round of the China Open in Beijing, losing to Sun Tiantian 6-2, 7-6 (7). Sun, ranked 127th in the world and fourth among Chinese players, took advantage of numerous errors by Williams, who said she was bothered by an ailing left knee.

F1 TO RETURN TO INDY: Formula One will return to the Indianapolis Motor Speedway next year despite the fiasco surrounding June's boycotted race. Speedway officials announced that the U.S. Grand Prix will be July 2, making it the seventh year the race has been run at the track. The race's future had been in question after only six drivers competed in the June 19 race as seven F1 teams pulled their cars off the track to protest safety concerns with Michelin tires.

UNO feeling at home in Texas

Privateers basketball teams face uncertainty

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

Bo McCalebb doesn't consider himself a Texan yet.

But a few more weeks, perhaps months, in the Lone Star State might change his mind-set.

McCalebb, with his fellow UNO basketball teammates, relocated to the University of Texas at Tyler because of Hurricane Katrina and could be there for the rest of the school year.

"It's been pretty much OK here," McCalebb said Wednesday. "The people have been very nice to us and are giving us a place to play. I'm ready to come back home, though."

That may not happen soon.

UNO plans to reopen its main campus for the spring semester in January, but the playing status of Lakefront Arena is unclear.

Privateers men's coach Monte Towe has told his team to be prepared to spend the entire season in Tyler.

"A couple of them didn't like hearing it," Towe said. "But that's got to be our mind-set right now. Where would our kids live? My home has been destroyed, so where would I live? There are just a lot of unknowns."

The Privateers already have set two "home" games for UT-Tyler, Nov. 19 against Belhaven and Nov. 26 against Louisiana Tech.

A Dec. 3 game against Southern Miss will be played at Hattiesburg. The Dec. 10 game against Loyola likely will be canceled, although Towe said he hopes to schedule another game in Tyler for that date.

The status of the Dec. 31 game against Tulane is undetermined, although Towe said he understands that the Nov. 22 date against the Green Wave will be played at Texas A&M, where the Tulane teams are housed.

Previously, a Dec. 29 home game against Norfolk State was swapped for a game at Kansas that will air on ESPN2.

The Privateers begin Sun Belt Conference play Jan. 5 at Denver, with the home league opener set Jan. 12 against Troy.

Although UNO athletic director Jim Miller is working to schedule the team's home conference games at the Pontchartrain Center or the Alario Center, Towe said he would prefer to play them in Tyler if the team is still headquartered there. The women's team has two "home" games set for Tyler, Nov. 29 against Nicholls State and Dec. 15 against Tulane.

A Dec. 3-4 tournament has been shifted to Kansas, and a Dec. 19 game against Mercer will be played in Macon, Ga.

The Lady Privateers open conference play with a Jan. 5 home game against North Texas.

"We're looking forward to getting back and playing in the city this season," Coach Amy Champion said. "We have a lot of pride in our program and want to represent our school and the city of New Orleans.

"Plus, our players really miss being at home, especially the ones from New Orleans who have friends and family they're away from."

Towe said the relocation has had an adverse effect on recruiting.

"It's going to be a real tough sell for a couple of years," he said.

Towe also said that one 2005 signee, junior college transfer Jeremie Davis, has not joined the team after a stressful evacuation during Katrina.

But the NCAA has said that basketball players who transfer from UNO and Tulane must still sit out a season, so Davis would be ineligible at other Division I schools this year.

Hornets' players bracing for the long road ahead

They'll be out of their routine even for home games

By John Reid
Staff writer

Hornets backup point guard Speedy Claxton is preparing for a long season, one he says will have him practically living out of a suitcase every day for the next six months.

On Wednesday morning, the Hornets announced their temporary relocation agreement with Oklahoma City, where they will play 35 of their 41 home games at the 19,675-seat Ford Center because of the damages New Orleans Arena suffered from Hurricane Katrina.

The team's home schedule includes six games to be played in Baton Rouge at the Pete Maravich Assembly Center, and there is a possibility in March the Hornets could return to the Arena for three games if repairs are complete and the recovery process in the city has made enough progress for a number of businesses and hotels to return to regular operations.

Regardless, Claxton is ready for an unusual season, starting with next month's training camp.

"It's going to feel like we're on the road for all 82 games," said Claxton, reached by telephone from New York City on Wednesday. "Even when we come home, we're going to be living out of a suitcase. I definitely know it's going to be a hard year.

"I've never been there (Oklahoma City) before and I don't know anything about the place or what the weather situation is going to be like there."

Claxton, who is expected to contend for playing time with top draft pick Chris Paul, was obtained in a midseason trade last season from the Golden State Warriors in exchange for point guard Baron Davis.

Claxton said he rented an apartment in New Orleans but has been unable to contact his landlord since Katrina.

He's unsure what type of housing arrangements the team will provide for the players in Oklahoma City. Most of the Hornets' players already have homes in the New Orleans area.

"This is new territory, new ground for everybody," said veteran forward P.J. Brown, whose home in Slidell was damage by Katrina and who has remained in Houston with his family for nearly three weeks.

"It's going to be a challenging year, no doubt about it. We're all professionals and these are tough circumstances, but we'll have to manage them and do the best job we can do. We are thankful to the state of Oklahoma and Oklahoma City to be able to take care of us at this tough time in everybody's life."

For the first time in his 12-year career, Brown said his family won't accompany him for the entire regular season. Brown said his children will remain enrolled in Houston-area schools.

Brown was anxiously awaiting word Wednesday afternoon regarding a possible mandatory evacuation of Houston because of the threat of Hurricane Rita, now in the Gulf of Mexico.

"There are going to be times when my mind and heart is going to be with my family,'' Brown said. "That's my foundation, my backbone. There are going to be some tough days ahead, but when it's time for that ball to go up, I'll be ready and prepared to give my best like I've always done. I just keep praying and hoping for the best for everybody (affected by Katrina)."

HORNETS, from C-5

somewhere else. It's temporary. But we don't have a choice."

Stern, in a league press release, said the decision to play a half-dozen games in Louisiana was made by the team and the NBA, "in anticipation of a return to New Orleans next season."

Yet the Hornets have an option, as a fall back, for a second year at the Ford Center for next season. "It's the league's hope and expectation that the team will be back in New Orleans next year," Litvin said at Wednesday's press conference. "But to protect against the unforeseen, we want to protect ourselves against the possibility that (New Orleans) wouldn't be ready. We know the Hornets would have a home for a second year, but it's our hope and expectation that this is a one-year, temporary move."

The lease agreement, approved by the Oklahoma City city council in a special meeting Wednesday morning, calls for the city, the state and a consortium of Oklahoma City businessmen to assume the financial risk if the Hornets' revenue drops this season. If the Hornets fail to earn 5 percent more than they made in New Orleans last year, that group would be required to pay the Hornets up to $10 million.

If the team exceeds last season's revenue by more than 5 percent, Oklahoma City would receive 80 percent of the proceeds to cover its expenses. If the overage covers all of the city's costs, the team and the city would split equally the remaining funds.

Oklahoma City mayor Mick Cornett said the agreement is complex but he said the city, state and businessmen involved felt the risk could be worth the potential reward.

"The ancillary impact of the NBA is incredibly large," Cornett said. "It's difficult to quantify, but undeniably strong."

The Ford Center, which opened in downtown Oklahoma City in 2002, seats 19,675 for basketball. It features more than 3,000 premium club seats and 49 private box suites.

The PMAC wasn't as attractive to the NBA because of its smaller (13,000) seating capacity and lack of any club seats or suites.

"As we've always been, we offered our facility for whatever they figured would be most advantageous to them," said LSU senior associate athletic director Dan Radakovich. "We're looking forward to having them here for those six games."

Shinn said some form of Oklahoma City identification with the team was necessary because of the way the city and its business and political leaders stepped forward to extend a helping hand.

"These people deserve something with the money they're guaranteeing," Shinn said. "They're stepping up with office space, housing, the arena. . . . we've got to show some enthusiasm. Everybody has got to understand the league is a business entity. They're trying to protect our interests and theirs so they wanted to have an extra year (on the lease) for safety's sake. The league did that. I didn't.

"If I don't generate money, I'm in trouble. These people have stepped up to try to keep us whole. I couldn't ask for anything else. I was seeing myself going to the bank borrowing lots of money. I don't see that happening now. It's bittersweet. We've got a place to land and a lot of support, which is positive. But you know, I don't know how the hell to explain it. It's not home. We've got to come back home to help with all the suffering there. . . . it's just hard to describe."

No decision has been made on where the team will hold training camp, team president Paul Mott said, and parts of the preseason schedule could be modified.

Mott said he hoped to have a decision on where the Hornets will train by the end of the week.

jerseys will feature an Oklahoma City patch.

That won't look like a team attempting to repay a favor. It'll look like one searching for, and having found, a place to land if or when the New Orleans economy doesn't rebound to the liking of the league and franchise.

This season, the people who want to see the Hornets in person the most will see them so little, the franchise best will be described by the title of an old Phil Collins album — "Hello, I Must Be Going" — than regarded as the team that fans faithfully, if not overwhelmingly, supported last season, the worst (18-64) in franchise history.

The money concern is understood. Every fan understands that operating a franchise is a business, employees must be paid, goods and services aren't free.

It's understood that the opportunity to make money and play in an NBA-type facility best is presented by playing in Oklahoma City, at a 19,675-seat facility that has more than 3,000 club seats and nearly 50 private suites, rather than in a 13,000-seat college arena that has a lack of premium club seats and box suites.

There aren't any date conflicts to play at the Ford Center, whereas LSU's weeknight home games overwhelmingly are played on Wednesday nights, which is the same night the Hornets play many of their weeknight home games.

And Oklahoma City is providing money to help pay for the Hornets' relocation and providing cash guarantees in case the team's revenues dip.

But even with all those pluses tilted in one direction and the negatives galloping toward the other, and the fact that it'll be 10 times the hassle to play at the PMAC than at the Ford Center, the franchise still should have fought like hell to play as often as possible in Baton Rouge, to show more allegiance, to reward the fans from the city that have embraced it.

More than ever, its fans need the team, not speculation or name-sharing. The displaced still will need to feel an attachment to something when the New Orleans Hornets begin playing, just as they do now.

And for those who were working their rear ends off in an effort to transform New Orleans into basketball country and to sell the Hornets as a viable entertainment option, who weathered last season and were looking forward to this one, the almost complete and total move to Oklahoma City is an insult to their injury.

None of us want to be inconvenienced, but those who "have" certainly are inconvenienced to a lesser degree than most, and are in better position to absorb the sacrifice that now must be made.

Six games isn't a sacrifice. It isn't even much of an inconvenience.

It's almost nothing, which is what the season will feel like for Hornets fans that were hoping - against hope, we now know - for the franchise to provide for them a needed escape.

It'll seem like a loss worse than nothing if it turns out that it's the franchise that's looking for an escape.

Dates, times finalized for Saints' home games

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — The Saints announced the dates and times of their seven home games in Baton Rouge and San Antonio this year.

All seven games will be played on the days they were originally scheduled. The only change is that the Sunday, Oct. 30 game against Miami and the Sunday, Nov. 6 game against Chicago, both in Tiger Stadium, will kick off at 3:05 p.m. - in part to give LSU ample time to prepare the field following Saturday night Tigers games.

The other two games in Baton Rouge (Sunday, Dec. 4 against Tampa Bay and Sunday, Dec. 18 against Carolina) are scheduled for noon kickoffs. All three games in San Antonio's Alamodome (Sunday, Oct. 2 vs. Buffalo, Sunday, Oct. 16 vs. Atlanta and Saturday, Dec. 24 vs. Detroit) are scheduled for noon kickoffs, as well.

As announced earlier this week, an Internet-only pre-sale for Tiger Stadium four-pack tickets will begin at 10 a.m. on Friday at www.neworleans-saints.com. Single-game Tiger Stadium tickets will be available by calling Ticketmaster at 1-800-877-0898 or by visiting the Saints' website or www.ticketmaster.com .

Tickets for the games in San Antonio are on sale now by calling the Saints at 210-208-9520, by calling Ticketmaster or by visiting either the team or Ticketmaster Web sites.

Stallworth to return kicks

SAINTS, from C-5

and Stallworth and Aaron Stecker will return kickoffs. Veteran receiver Az-Zahir Hakim is also an experienced return man, but he is sidelined with a hamstring injury.

"(Lewis) has the all-time record for total return yards in a season," Haslett said, "so it is a shame it happened to him, and it was unfortunate. But we have guys who can pick up the slack, and we won't miss a beat."

Lewis became the Saints' all-time leader in punt returns last season and ranks second in career kickoff return yardage, behind Tyrone Hughes.

His path to the NFL has become almost legendary. He did not attend college and worked several odd jobs to support his family, including driving a beer truck. He played in the Indoor Professional Football League, the Arena Football League and NFL Europe before joining the Saints in 2001.

Then, in 2002, Lewis set an NFL record with 2,432 combined yards on kickoff and punt returns, was named an All-Pro and earned a trip to the Pro Bowl.

Lewis, 5 feet 8, 173 pounds, has 28 career receptions for 553 yards and a touchdown, mostly as a No. 4 or No. 5 receiver.

This past month has been particularly hard on Lewis, who had many close family members living in the New Orleans area when Hurricane Katrina struck. Everyone made it through safely, but Lewis spent several tense days trying to get in touch with everyone back home.

Poole said it was unfortunate what happened to Lewis, whom he said became a close friend during training camp. But Poole said he is ready to step up.

The former Arizona Cardinals receiver spent the past two weeks with his family in Charlotte, N.C., where he attended the Saints' season-opening victory against the Panthers. He said he also watched Monday night's game with great interest.

"I mean, I've been with them, except for two weeks. So I felt like I was still part of the family," Poole said.

MOORE OR LESS: Minnesota Vikings tailback Mewelde Moore, a former Tulane standout, is not sure what his role will be against the Saints on Sunday at the Metrodome. Part of an unsettled backfield, the second-year player did not carry the ball in Week 1, then ran eight times for 29 yards last week against Cincinnati.

The entire Vikings offense is unsettled at this point, with the team off to an unexpected 0-2 start.

"My concern is just doing the things I need to do to help contribute and help this team out," said Moore, who also has returned four kickoffs this year. "That's the main thing I'm focused on, and whatever is asked of me, that's what I'm going to do 100 percent."

Moore, a native of Baton Rouge, said all of his family and friends made it through Hurricane Katrina safely, but many people he knows were affected by the storm.

ETC.: The Saints are 200 miles inland in San Antonio, but Hurricane Rita seems to be headed right for them again. The team is scheduled to fly to Minnesota on Saturday afternoon, and the hurricane is scheduled to touch land Saturday evening. The team has not changed its travel plans. ... The Saints went through an hour-long walk-through Wednesday without pads. They will return to a full practice today. ... Cornerback Fakhir Brown (knee), Hakim (hamstring), defensive end Charles Grant (toe), safety Dwight Smith (toe), tight end Shad Meier (knee), cornerback Jason Craft (ankle), defensive tackle Brian Young (foot) and linebacker James Allen (knee) are listed as questionable for Sunday's game.

Tagliabue says no move to San Antonio

SAN ANTONIO, from C-5

week's end.

According to the Saints, there are still approximately 19,000 tickets available for the Buffalo game, 7,000 for an Oct. 16 game against the Atlanta Falcons and 40,000 for a Dec. 24 game against the Detroit Lions.

However, Tagliabue's concerns about San Antonio won't likely be assuaged by ticket sales alone. Although San Antonio ranks eighth in total population, the total metropolitan area ranks 30th. The all-important television market ranks 37th. And there are already NFL teams in Houston and Dallas.

One of the city's counter-arguments is that nearby Austin, another growing area, should be counted as part of the San Antonio market.

Saints owner Tom Benson has longstanding business and personal ties to San Antonio, where he keeps a second home.

He has not announced any desire to move his team to Texas permanently. But he also has done nothing to quiet reports and speculation that he is interested in a move to San Antonio.

Still, even if that is Benson's intention, Tagliabue made it clear that the Saints' owner would meet with resistance.

When asked Monday if the three Saints games might offer San Antonio an opportunity to prove itself NFL-worthy, the commissioner said: "Ever since we approved the move of the Raiders and the Rams, I've been saying that our goal is to get a team back to L.A., either through expansion or whatever, and we're not going to be moving any teams into small markets. We're going to be moving up in market size, not either down or flat. That's our goal.

"So if - if - any teams are relocated in the future, the objective is going to be to concentrate them, put it this way, in markets that can really support them."

Tulane to host Houston at Cajun Field

Green Wave will face SMU at 1 p.m. Saturday

By Benjamin Hochman

RUSTON - Tulane's home football game against Houston on Oct. 8 will be played at Louisiana-Lafayette's Cajun Field. The game, originally scheduled for the Superdome, will kick off at 5 p.m.

"It just made the most sense, based on availability," Tulane athletic director Rick Dickson said. "We know that many of our fans have relocated along the I-10 corridor from Baton Rouge to Houston, and, with its central location in that region, Lafayette will be a great site."

Dickson said this Saturday's game at SMU, scheduled for 7 p.m., will be moved to 1 p.m. Hurricane Rita is expected to make landfall in Texas Saturday night.

Following the SMU game in Dallas, Tulane will play Oct. 1 against Southeastern Louisiana at Tiger Stadium. The game against Houston game will be Tulane's third home game played in Louisiana - the 21-14 season-opening loss to Mississippi State was played in Shreveport.

Tulane will receive all ticket profits from the game at Cajun Field. Tickets will go on sale Monday and will be available on Ticketmaster. The Ragin' Cajuns have a game at Florida Atlantic on Oct. 8.

CONTINGENCY PLANS: Texas A&M in College Station, Texas, is home to six Tulane teams, and classes have been canceled for Friday because of the Rita. The Green Wave will play a soccer game Wednesday. The women's volleyball team, originally set to fly to East Carolina via Houston, is making plans to fly out of Dallas today. If the team can depart, it will play the Pirates on Friday, then host Marshall at East Carolina on Sunday. Marshall was originally going to fly to College Station to play Tulane.

The remaining Tulane athletes, along with Texas A&M athletes, will be housed under Kyle Field, the football stadium, in the locker rooms.

"They are built like bomb shelters," Dickson said. "They are providing a safe haven."

Wave's Terranova has new attitude for senior season

Receiver gaining confidence while becoming a leader

By Benjamin Hochman
Staff writer

RUSTON — While the final minute ticked off the game clock, Tulane was 64 yards and a few dramatic catches away from tying Mississippi State.

And Tulane's oldest receiver was on the sideline.

Bubba Terranova seethed. The senior found Tulane receivers coach Darryl Mason. He told the coach that he wanted to play - and that he wanted the football.

"I heard it in his voice and saw it in his eyes," Mason said.

And on fourth-and-nine on its 48, Green Wave quarterback Lester Ricard completed a 13-yard pass to Terranova.

First down.

But the clocked had painfully ticked down to eight seconds, and Ricard's next pass was his last – a 39-yard heave, which fell incomplete.

While Tulane lost, Terranova grew up last Saturday. He emerged as a confident receiver and leader.

"I think last Saturday was the best game he's played since I've been here," said Mason, whose first season was Terranova's junior year. "He had a good year his sophomore year - before I got here - but on Saturday he was very competitive, he had a leadership role out there and he pushed himself.

"I just think his attitude came out in that game. He was vocal on the sideline, and I was kind of surprised."

Mason admitted that the 6-foot-3, 205-pound Terranova didn't push himself during the offseason as much as the coach expected. Then, Tulane's lone senior receiver injured his left knee, and missed the bulk of August practice while recovering from surgery.

"So I didn't know what to expect," Mason said. "I didn't think he was in great shape when we were about to start the season. But when the hurricane came, he had an opportunity (with time off), and I think he took advantage of it to get in shape. And then, when the game came, he stepped up."

Terranova said Hurricane Katrina demolishing his mother's home and his car in Slidell put his priorities straight. He talks to his mother, Patti, daily.

AT DALLAS, TEXAS
TULANE VS. SMU

Saturday

"As long as I know she's all right, it helps me get through the day," Terranova said.

And he cherishes his opportunities.

"(Dealing with the hurricane) definitely helped me as a man and as a football player. ... It just hurts you when you hear someone say, 'I still have one more year.' Or, 'I have three more years.' "

In his final 10 regular-season games, Terranova is expected to shift around the line of scrimmage. He is not a starter, but he is second string at both wideout and slot receiver.

In the opener, he made five catches - only Preston Brown, with nine catches, had more for Tulane. One of them was a nine-yard bullet from Ricard, one of the evening's highlights in the Green Wave's 21-14 loss.

"It was an out route," Terranova said. "I was fighting with the defender, and as soon as I turned around, the ball was two feet away from me."

"He provided leadership," said left guard Matt Traina, also a senior. "No matter how much you practice for game speed, there's nothing to prepare you for an actual game. He can provide leadership for younger guys who haven't been there yet."

TICKETS AVAILABLE: Tickets for the Tulane-Southeastern Louisiana game, scheduled for Oct. 1 at LSU's Tiger Stadium in Baton Rouge, are on sale through Ticketmaster.

Tickets are $30 for sideline general admission seats and $10 for end zone general admission, and can be purchased at Ticketmaster outlets in Louisiana and Mississippi, at www.Ticketmaster.com or by calling (800) 488-5252. There will be no charge for parking. Kickoff is set for 2:30 p.m.

Tulane football season-ticket holders who have purchased their 2005 season tickets will be able to pick up tickets for the Southeastern Louisiana game in advance at a location to be announced.

All Tulane, LSU and Southeastern Louisiana students with a school identification card will be admitted free.

Tulane athletics will receive all ticket proceeds for the game against Southeastern Louisiana. Tulane homecoming activities originally scheduled for that weekend have been postponed.

does.

In the Arizona State game, Doucet dropped three passes in the first half.

But Doucet rallied and combined all his learning with his unshakable confidence to make a play that lifted his team to victory and lifted the spirits of a hurricane-ravaged state. When the play broke down, the 6-foot, 206-pound sophomore reacted the way he was coached to in practice.

"We worked on the scramble drill in practice," said Doucet, who caught three balls for 62 yards. "(You) keep coming and get into the vision of the quarterback. We were in the same zone and we just connected on the play."

Said LSU coach Les Miles: "He came open late across the field and extended that route based on the scramble, and Ja-Marcus knew he was going to be in that area.

"Early made a great catch, a very difficult catch. He caught it with his hands in an awkward way at a high speed and he comes down with a foot in bounds. That was a big-time play."

Doucet savored the moment, but not for long. He came out of it with a bruised chest, which kept him out of practice last week, though he returned to action Monday. That's when he set out to rectify the drops, which he chalked up to first-game jitters and a lack of concentration.

AP PHOTO

LSU coach Les Miles said wide receiver Early Doucet made a 'big-time play' when he caught the winning touchdown pass against Arizona State.

"I don't think the drops were me not being able to catch the ball," he said. "It was lack of concentration. I was overexcited trying to do too much. Once I got relaxed, I looked the ball in and made some plays at the end. Being able to not get down and bounce back says a lot about the person. My teammates having confidence in me helped me shake it off."

"Being able to read coverages, getting off the press and knowing what to do in certain situations, each day I'm getting a little better. People think it's just running routes and catching balls, but there's a whole lot more to it."

As Doucet's knowledge and experience grow, it will only make him tougher for defenses to deal with. As a freshman, he caught 18 passes for 257 yards and two touchdowns, and he appears to have the size and tools to succeed at the next level.

"Early Doucet is going to be a really fine football player here for the entire time," said Miles. "He is dangerous with the ball in his hands. He has a natural ability to catch it. He's a big, strong physical wide receiver with fine speed. I expect the best football from Early Doucet, you're about to see."

STATE CAPSULE

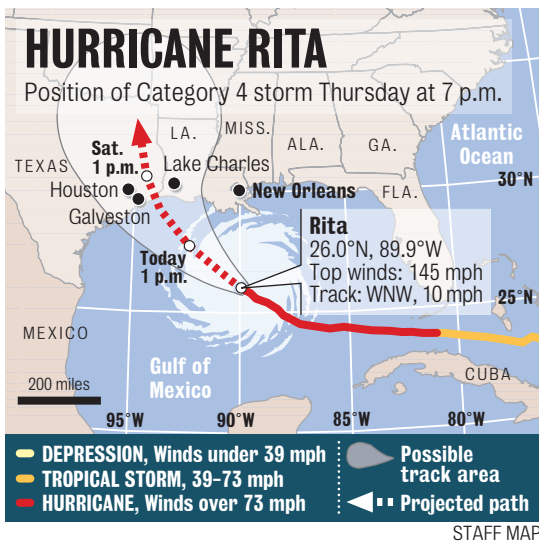
LOUISIANA-MONROE AT FLORIDA ATLANTIC (6:30 p.m. at Boca Raton, Fla., ESPNU): This Sun Belt game matches 0-3 teams coming off blowout losses against big-time programs.

The Indians lost to Georgia 44-7. A two-yard run by ULM quarterback Steven Jyles capped a 53-yard, third-quarter drive that made the score 17-7 before Georgia pulled away. The Indians, who began the drive by recovering an onside kick on the second-half kickoff, scored for the first time since the second quarter of their opener against Northwestern State.

Georgia outgained ULM 543 yards to 211. Jyles accounted for much of the ULM offense. He completed 17 of 32 passes for 119 yards with one interception and rushed for 32 yards on 18 carries, including three sacks. ULM's Joel Stelly, a Ray Guy Award candidate, averaged 45.3 yards on seven punts.

Florida Atlantic trailed Minnesota 40-0 at halftime before the Gophers eased up on the way to a 46-7 victory. Coach Howard Schnellenberger can't be accused of looking for soft opposition for the Owls, whose other losses were to Kansas 30-19 and Oklahoma State 23-3. Florida Atlantic, in its first season in Division I-A football, allowed a school-record 579 yards against Minnesota.



Eight freshmen are among the Owls' 22 starters. The offense relies on senior quarterback Danny Embick, who has completed 38 of 68 passes for 521 yards and three touchdowns, with one interception.

Gov. Blanco urges half-million residents to leave

New Orleans resident Tracy Johnson, 35, thought he was headed for safety a few weeks ago when he evacuated to Hackberry, in Cameron Parish. On Thursday, as Hurricane Rita approached, with its 150-mph winds, Johnson found himself fleeing again, this time with a new tactic: Head north.

Hurricane Rita churned closer to shore Thursday, downgraded to a Category 4 storm but still fierce enough to prompt the evacuation of about 1.8 million Gulf Coast residents and make officials and engineers in the New Orleans area order evacuations of low-lying areas and scramble to shore up levees weakened by Hurricane Katrina.

Rita, packing 150-mph winds, followed a west-northwest path in the Gulf of Mexico on Thursday but was expected to turn to the northwest today, poised to strike early Saturday somewhere between Galveston, Texas, and southwest Louisiana.

The storm's progress motivated Gov. Kathleen Blanco to urge about 500,000 residents of southwest Louisiana, especially people living south of Interstate 10, to head north as soon as possible.

"We feel it is very, very important that everyone leave now," she said at a briefing in Baton Rouge. "Everything is fragile. … Rita has Louisiana in her sights, and we must move."

When asked what people should do if they are determined to ride out the storm, Blanco replied, "Perhaps they should write their Social Security number on their arms in indelible ink."

Some people needed no persuasion.

In Texas, interstate highways became virtual parking lots Thursday, prompting state officials to set up the largest contraflow effort in the state's history to get drivers out of harm's way. Traffic crept at 2 mph, and some cars began to stall and run out of fuel.

"Stay calm. Stay patient," Gov. Rick Perry said in a televised news conference. "You've done the right thing. You will get out of the coastal region on time. … I would rather you be sitting in traffic for eight to 12 hours moving

Tax relief proposed for N.O. businesses

$250 billion plan is unveiled by La. senators

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON – Having just approved $6.1 billion in immediate tax relief for Hurricane Katrina victims, lawmakers began drawing up a package of longer-term incentives to revive the decimated New Orleans economy and draw employers to the region.

The legislation appears to be on a fast track as Congress and the Bush administration race to avoid a protracted economic slowdown in an important national commercial center during the long process of cleaning up and rebuilding after the Aug. 29 storm.

"We will have another tax bill, and I expect it will be very soon," said Rep. Jim McCrery, R-Shreveport, a senior member of the House Ways and Means Committee. "I think people realize this is truly an unprecedented emergency."

Louisiana's two U.S. senators were looking well beyond tax breaks Thursday when they unveiled a 500-page redevelopment package proposal touching on every sector of the state's economy and estimated to cost of $250 billion, more than the price tag for the war in Iraq.

Sens. Mary Landrieu, D-La., and David Vitter, R-La., said they don't expect to win approval for the long list of requests, but hope that it will serve as a guide to Congress as it formulates legislation to respond to the hurricane.

Among the more controversial items is a proposal to set aside half of the $5 billion in federal offshore oil and gas royalties for hurricane protection and coastal restoration. The delegation has for years pushed the idea, but has met resistance to steering so much money to a single state. Now, the delegation hopes to use the damage wrought by Katrina to strengthen its claim to the money.

Another proposal would create $4,000 vouchers for displaced public school students to use in private and parochial schools. National school vouchers have been strongly opposed by Democrats and teachers unions, who fear they will trigger an exodus from the public school system. But Landrieu said that with the displacement of 372,000 students along the Gulf Coast, extreme measures are needed.

"This government should step up and support students wherever they are," she said.

The so-called Hurricane Katrina Disaster Relief and Economic Recovery Act also calls for $50 billion for housing grants, $5 billion for six months of mortgage relief, $10 billion in economic develop grants to revitalize New Orleans, and $40 billion for hurricane protection projects proposed by the Army Corps of Engineers. It would have the federal government pick up 100 percent of the relief and recovery costs for two years, instead of the two months already in place. The bill also calls on the president to appoint someone to coordinate the multifaceted federal response with the power to "waive regulatory impediments" that may get in the way of speedy recovery.

"The person would have no authority the government doesn't already have," Vitter said. "It would be someone who could cut through the red tape."

Landrieu and Vitter will push to include some of their requests into the newest tax relief package being drawn up by Congress, which could get a vote before a weeklong recess begins Oct. 10.

Interviews with key members of the House and Senate indicate that Congress is likely to create a special class of tax-exempt bonds, similar to the Liberty Bonds authorized after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to speed redevelopment of lower Manhattan. The bonds would allow developers speedy access to low-cost financing in the Gulf Coast region.

Also under discussion is exempting businesses from paying taxes on insurance payouts connected to the storm. A Senate Finance Committee aide said that the current plan is to give businesses five years to rebuild without being taxed on the insurance proceeds.

The package, the aide said, would likely include tax code changes, such as those proposed by President Bush, to liberalize depreciation and expensing rules to make capital readily available for investment. The administration has proposed its own array of targeted tax breaks, a $2 billion Gulf Coast Opportunity Zone designed to attract business to the region.

Among other things, the recently passed tax relief bill gives tax credits to businesses with fewer than 200 employees that retain workers. Larger employers were excluded from the legislation at the insistence of House tax writers, who figured big companies already had incentives to hold onto workers and that some firms had business interruption insurance to cushion the blow of the hurricane.

A Senate tax aide said extending the benefit to large employers is "on the table." McCrery said the House may be willing to accept such a provision, but that he is still trying to assess the needs among large employers in the New Orleans area.

"I'm trying to understand it, because I have to explain it to my colleagues," McCrery said. "We reached the compromise (in the first tax relief bill) with the understanding that this issue would remain open."

Five FEMA teams continue search and rescue missions

New leaks halt work near Industrial Canal

By Gwen Filosa
Staff writer

The federal search and rescue effort continued Thursday in New Orleans, where five teams of the Federal Emergency Management Agency's Urban Search and Rescue unit scoured storm-scarred neighborhoods for survivors or victims.

But water seeping from new leaks in the levee along the Industrial Canal caused a search and rescue team to order evacuation of the Lower 9th Ward, cutting short the daily search, a second sweep of the area.

In Lakeview, crews found only two dogs by Thursday afternoon, said spokesman Mark Stone, a firefighter from Fairfax County in Virginia, who worked alongside about 80 rescue workers. They covered much ground, he said, and more than half of the entire city has been checked twice by rescue experts.

It is unusual for FEMA teams to still be in a search and rescue mode three weeks after the disaster, Stone said, but the work isn't finished yet. In Lakeview, the rescuers have found a few survivors in the past days, Stone said.

FEMA works under a rule, approved by city officials: If the flood water levels had reached 5 1/2 feet, the team would break into the house to search for people. Homes that had lower levels were only forced into if signs of life appeared from outside.

The new leaks complicated matters. The levee hurriedly rebuilt with riprap and gravel after Katrina to stop the flooding of the Industrial Canal into the Lower 9th Ward is punctured in several spots, with clear water running into the ravaged streets.

Caffin Avenue, right along the canal at St. Claude Avenue, had 1 1/2 feet of water in some places early Thursday afternoon. Water built up to several inches on nearby Jourdan Avenue.

A day earlier, those same streets had been dry.

On Thursday afternoon, the water level in the Industrial Canal had risen, experts said, and anyone walking along the shredded steel levee wall, ripped apart by the disastrous flooding a month ago, could spot several modest leaks in the new levee.

"Any drop of rain that falls is going to stay," said Chad Rachel, a civil engineer with the Army Corps of Engineers.

But he cautioned that the leaks have not grown to a crisis. "Don't expect a catastrophic failure," Rachel said Thursday. "It's localized seepage."

Pump station No. 5 in the Lower 9th Ward remains broken, and federal officials said they could do nothing else to stop the leaks in the gravel-topped levee that spans several hundred yards between the ruined historic neighborhood and the rising canal.

The area remained a sight of absolute ruin Thursday. Scores of homes off St. Claude Avenue near the canal were blown to bits by the hurricane and subsequent floodwaters. Other houses were knocked off their foundations and debris, from children's toys to appliances and cars, littered every square foot of the area.

Off Jourdan Avenue by the bridge, a red barge sat on top of a house.

Yet another part of the city blown apart by Katrina, the vast and mostly suburban eastern New Orleans also still held water in places Thursday. The Michoud Boulevard exit was impassable, filled with water and sludge.

The parking lot at Zephyr Field is covered with tents that hold workers in town for the Hurricane Katrina recovery effort. Some refer to it as 'life in the BoO,' which stands for base of operations. It's a makeshift home that offers food and warm showers and a place to sleep.

Army National Guard Sgt. HollyAnn Nicom and Sgt. John Laczkowski, both from Pattstown, Pa., toss a football at the Saints' practice field.

Inside the insulated tent where Jackie McCammon will sleep for the next few weeks, the air was thick and damp.

A standing fan provided little relief but McCammon, who is from Bangor, Pa., made the best of it for a few seconds, standing directly in front of the noisy machine and spreading her arms to catch the streams of air.

Tucked in a corner, her green Army cot was strewn with odds and ends: a walkie-talkie, Juicy Fruit gum, a pair of work gloves. A few practical colleagues had looped a laundry cord through the metal tent rods, and a collection of soggy towels hung from the line.

Even in the heat and the tight, cluttered quarters, McCammon found it difficult to complain.

"It's actually a pleasure to be here," she said, noting that a combination of edible food, reliable showers and laundry service was rare in base camps such as these. "And the camaraderie," she added. "You can talk with everyone."

Relief workers like McCammon, a hazardous materials specialist, are accustomed to this lifestyle after years in the search and rescue field.

Some refer to it as "life in the 'BoO,'" which stands for base of operations. It's a haven, a makeshift home that offers food and warm showers and a place to sleep, albeit briefly, before the demanding daily cycle begins anew.

In the past few weeks as many as 1,200 relief workers, military and civilian, have been eating, sleeping and regrouping at the Katrina Saints Camp, a search-and-rescue base located in the Saints' training facility and covering the Zephyr Field parking lot in Metairie.

Most relief workers are on rotation and people shift in and out at whim. This accounts for the constantly fluctuating population, according to Bernie Pineda, spokesman for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which is overseeing operations.

The camp had its first full day on Aug. 30. Daily responsibilities are varied. Some relief workers go out in the field and break down doors in the 9th Ward, tramping through muck and sludge, searching for survivors. Others stay behind and staff the portable showers, which are open for workers from 5 a.m. to 11 p.m.

Federal officials estimated that between the military and civilian presence, representatives are on hand from nearly every state in the union, including California, Missouri, Nebraska, Florida, Oregon, New Mexico and Pennsylvania.

Many relief workers have been in makeshift camps with portable toilets and green cots before. The locations differ, but those there take pleasure in the details, which seem mundane but can make a difference at the end of the tough day.

"Regular Coca-Cola is a big deal, believe it or not," said Alex Pellon, a member of the search-and-rescue crew from Miami-Dade, Fla. Generic sodas tend to be a camp staple, so "a good Coca-Cola goes a long way," he said.

Showers and food are also critical; both are provided by outside contractors who stay on the site and sleep in trailers on the grounds.

"Food is the biggest morale booster of any camp," said Joe Piotrowski, the director of operations for Port-A-Pit catering, which provides 3,700 meals in an average day. "If food's good, morale's up. It's the only highlight of their day."

A formal curfew is not in place, but some workers are expected to be back at their individual camps around 10 p.m. Army campers can leave the grounds only in pairs. Drugs are prohibited, and camp rules also forbid alcohol.

"I did it for a year in Baghdad so it's not going to kill me," Sgt. Haled Saleh said of the no-alcohol policy. "But it's not the best thing when you've got a daiquiri shop across the street."

Saleh, who is from Baton Rouge, sat on the sidewalk just outside the Saints' indoor practice area; he leaned against the building and chatted with Army buddies, trading stories from the day and passing cell phone photographs back and forth.

"What do we do at night? What you see right now, just with a little more profanity," he said. "There's not a lot we can do, per se. It's a fight against boredom."

Others pass evening hours playing spades in the Saints field house, hunched over small folding tables and gathered at card tables around the perimeter, near the glow of the weak lights. Paper and other ordinary amenities are rare, and the players at one table kept score on a piece of cardboard ripped off a box they found.

In the center of the field house, workers lined up cots in rows. The field is kept perpetually dark to allow people to sleep at all hours, so workers identify their beds by the marks on the turf and by a smattering of personal effects, such as Gatorade, foot powder or books that they keep on the cots or nearby.

"I'm right on the 20-yard line," said one man.

Pearl Davis, who cleans the training facility as part of a job she recently acquired through the forestry service, blocked off her bed and her friend's with the cots, creating a makeshift barricade.

This is her first time in a camp like this, she said.

The women, both from St. Gabriel, tried to upgrade the dormitory-like conditions with colorful comforters, photographs of their children, a box of Krispy Kreme donuts and plastic jars of peanuts and cashews.

Despite their initial worries about sleeping in a room filled primarily with men, Davis said she has rested easily the past few nights. Besides, sleep is welcome after the 12-hour cleaning shifts.

"I'll probably be asleep in 20, 25 minutes," Davis said wearily, resting for a moment on her inflatable bed. "And then, I'll be up again at 6."

Inmates from Orleans Parish Prison wait to be rescued from the floodwaters after Hurricane Katrina swamped their neighborhood. 'Typical panic, that's what it was,' longtime deputy Monte Davis said. 'People just get disturbed when they don't know what's going on. It was a mess.'

JAIL, from A-1

Gusman and called Attorney General Charles Foti for state reinforcements, the ensuing rescue operation was nothing short of heroic. Everyone escaped by boat as nearly every Sheriff's Office vehicle had been quickly and completely submerged.

Signs of the pandemonium can be seen throughout the sprawling complex of 10 concrete lockups, all of which took on 6 to 10 feet of water in the low-lying wedge of land off Broad Street between Interstate 10 and Tulane Avenue: tied-together blankets hanging from broken cell windows, scorch marks from fires, rescue boats scattered on streets and sidewalks.

Next to one smashed jail cell window, taped to the outside of the building, is a sign scrawled by an inmate, "We Need Help." On the perimeter of the same building, slung over razor-wire atop a 16-foot fence, a cluster of thick blankets marks an apparent escape.

Chief Deputy Bill Short said Thursday he could confirm only four escapes, but the Sheriff's Office computer system was fished out of floodwaters just a couple of days ago and a full head count by the state Department of Corrections is still under way. The four escapees were transfers from the St. Bernard lockup, Short said, and they bolted shortly after the storm by breaching the roof of the Intake Processing Center.

"They made it to the roof and decided they had to get out. As far as others, I just don't know," said Short, who was promoted to his new position a week ago in acknowledgment of his steely command of the 800-inmate House of Detention during the storm and its aftermath.

Other deputies said they knew of more than a dozen escape attempts. One inmate, an Australian tourist who rode out the storm in Parish Prison after getting arrested on Bourbon Street for criminal trespassing, said he saw some inmates get away from once-secure areas, although he didn't know how far they made it.

"We had no food, no power, no air-conditioning, no toilets," Ashley McDonald, the Australian tourist, said in earlier published reports. "A lot of people started breaking out and escaping and that's when attention was brought to the jail."

One thing Short said he knows for certain is that there were no deaths, not among the inmates, not among the 900 or so employees who reported to work, not among the scores of residents who floated or waded in from the surrounding neighborhood to the relative safety of the veranda of the high-rise Community Correctional Center. One group from the area, a woman and two men, used 2-by-6-foor boards to row a hot tub to the impromptu gathering point, Short said. Others who were stranded were fished out by deputies.

"Did we know exactly what to do?" Short asked. "Nobody did. It was a wild ride, but we must have done some good things because nobody died."

Separating fact from storm-spawned fiction about the prison's inundation has been difficult, especially since the prison complex was plunged into a virtual communications blackout and each of the 10 lockups became islands surrounded by toxic water. Rumors of massive jail breaks, Gusman being taken hostage and large-scale riots have proved false. Gusman was not available for comment for the past two days because of meetings, a spokeswoman said.

But first-hand accounts from three of the largest facilities – Community Correctional Center, the House of Detention and Old Parish Prison – revealed a harrowing five days before everybody was evacuated. All of the sources told about multiple resignations, deputies who tossed their badges to the ground and turned their shirts inside out, only to find themselves in the awkward position of being stuck by floodwaters alongside their former colleagues. Short estimated that if he tried today to reassemble the agency's 900 sworn deputies, he could probably scrounge up 700.

The shrinking security presence made it only more difficult to deal with the prison's most pressing problems: keeping order and ferrying people to dry ground. Deputies said the mission was carried out despite losing power the day after the storm passed, running out of food the following day and finding nearly all entrances blocked by water when help finally arrived.

"Typical panic, that's what it was, longtime deputy Monte Davis said. "People just get disturbed when they don't know what's going on. It was a mess."

The earliest sign of inmate unrest was heard, not seen, deputies said: the sound of splintering glass as prisoners smashed the buildings' narrow exterior windows.

"They were hungry, they were thirsty and most of all, they were hot," a Community Correctional Center deputy said. "We saw them just hanging from the windows."

Short said deputies eventually sanctioned the destruction.

"The inmates did break out windows," he said. "In some cases, our staff helped them. If you didn't break the windows, you didn't breathe."

Deputies said they repeatedly calmed inmates by telling them that food, water and rescue were on the way, but the message began wearing thin. In the Community Correctional Center, two commanders and a deputy said, inmates breached several layers of security, smashing visitor center security windows and breaking through stairwell doors.

The worst damage was done by inmates who broke off metal shower rods and dayroom benches, then used them as battering rams, they said.

"The knocked out some cinder blocks and breached some visitation booths," the deputy said. "It was like the movie 'Attica.'"

Until the cavalry showed up Wednesday in the form of SWAT teams from the state Department of Corrections, the deputies said they were forced to scare inmates back into cells by brandishing their pistols and occasionally firing off beanbags.

Several deputies and commanders said there were periodic reports throughout the complex that sounded like gunfire, but Short said he didn't hear much about the use of lethal force.

"I used my shotgun a couple of times to break a window," Short said. "At first I tried my flashlight, but I broke it."

One deputy with military experience rigged up makeshift hot water bombs by using the heating element in the prefab military meals distributed by the National Guard. "We threw the water bombs through the broken windows to keep them back," the deputy said.

While the security situation was growing more and more tense, rising waters forced deputies to move inmates from lower floors to higher floors, in some cases mixing hard-core inmates with municipal offenders, teenagers with career criminals. Short said deputies gave in to agitated inmates by giving them full access to the sixth-floor rooftop.

Orleans Parish Prison doors are held closed with a pair of handcuffs. Watermarks are about waist-high. Deputies said they repeatedly calmed inmates by telling them that food, water and rescue were on the way, but the message began wearing thin.

Short said his staff was able to quell most of the inmate unrest, and in some cases, older inmates stepped in to calm the more volatile prisoners.

"I hate to use the word babysat, but they stayed with them and kept them calm," Short said. "There were some inmates who acted out, but I'd say 99 percent acted responsibly."

Even in the areas where the inmates were calm, stress among deputies was rising with each passing hour because the Sheriff's Office had only five boats, not nearly enough to evacuate thousands of inmates and a growing population of civilians. On the Community Correctional Center veranda, the scene resembled a smaller-scale version of the notorious evacuation crises at the Superdome and Convention Center, with hundreds of people living and sleeping on prison cots and chairs, trash and other debris rising in piles around them.

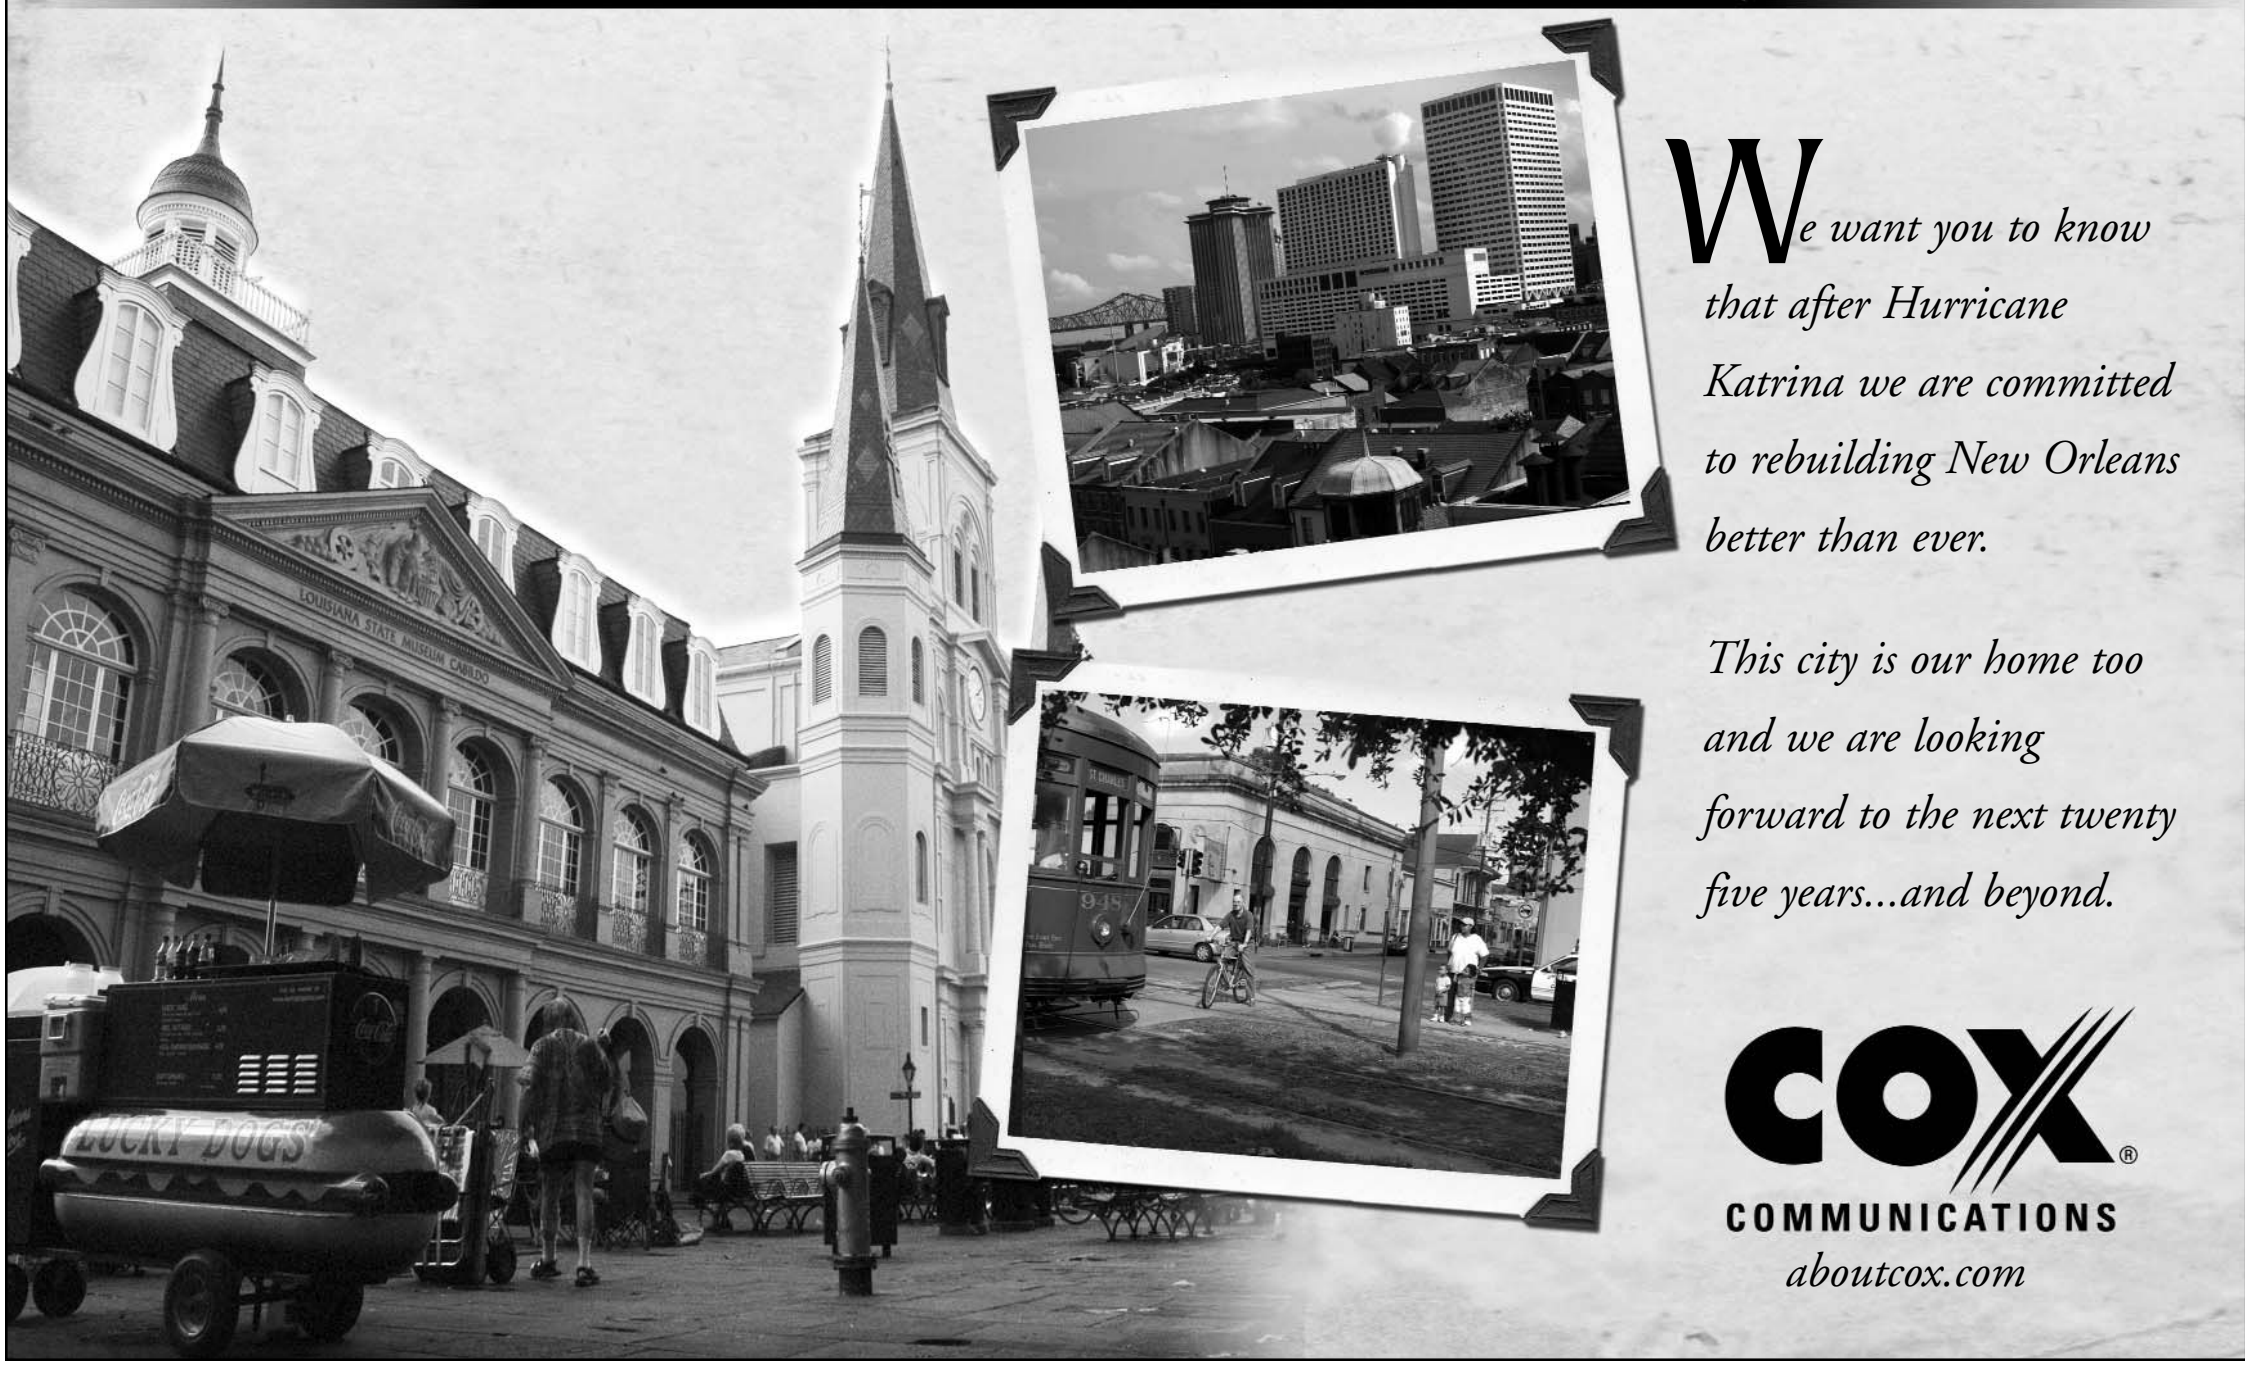
When one of the larger boats was idled with a fried motor, Short said he and his deputies crossed a rooftop and broke into an adjacent parking garage at police headquarters so they could "scavenge" car batteries for the boat's electric trolling motor. During a tour of the jail Thursday, Short showed how they used a downed utility line to lower the batteries to the boat bobbing in the water below.

Still, Short and others said, it took a call to Foti to regain complete security and get everbody out. Foti, Orleans Parish criminal sheriff for 30 years, responded quickly and forcefully by sending state Department of Corrections guards and SWAT teams. They were joined by a flotilla of 20 boats from the state Wildlife and Fisheries Department.

"DOC was a savior," Davis said. "When things weren't going fast enough, the attorney general lit a fire under people and got a lot of things going."

"One of the captains called Foti and said, "We're losing the battle," a deputy said. "They (DOC) showed up with all the things we didn't have: shotguns with beanbag rounds, tasers, rubber bullets, riot gear, bullet-proof shields."

Once the inmate outbreaks were quelled and enough boats were on hand to carry people out, one of the storm's last and most massive waterborne evacuations began to unfold over three days, from Wednesday until the last employees were fished out of the prison complex Friday.



Most of the civilians were dropped off on the Broad Street overpass, where military helicopters flew them to evacuation points. The inmates were either flown or boated to an elevated portion of Interstate 10, where they were assembled until DOC buses could take them to other prisons around the state.

During the building-by-building rescues, the lines between inmates and deputies, deputies and commanders, commanders and civilians grew invisible, Davis said.

"Position doesn't mean much in those situations," Davis said. "I worked side-by-side with the sheriff and, other than him being my boss, everybody was in the same boat. It was just regular people trying to survive."

Official says he warned of Katrina's punch

Mayfield: Devastation like nothing I have witnessed before

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON – Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center, told a congressional committee Thursday that "devastation along the Gulf Coast from Hurricane Katrina is like nothing I have witnessed before."

Mayfield said that the National Weather Service worked hard before the storm to let federal, state and local officials and Gulf Coast residents know the storm would pack deadly strength. Twenty-four hours before the storm struck land, the Slidell office of the Weather Service issued an advisory that said: "Most of the area will be uninhabitable for weeks, perhaps longer" and that "at least one half of well constructed homes will have room and wall failure."

Mayfield said he gave a frightening appraisal of likely damage to Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco 36 hours before the storm made landfall Aug. 29, and that she urged him to give the same briefing to New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin. Mayfield said he repeated the warning to Nagin about 45 minutes later.

The committee was set up by Republican House leaders to investigate what went wrong with the government's response to the killer storm. House Democrats called for a boycott of the panel, but allowed Reps. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, and Gene Taylor, D-Miss., whose Gulf Coast districts were decimated by the hurricane, to attend Thursday as non-voting members.

As Melancon joined other panel members in questioning Mayfield, he released a letter he sent to President Bush asking that a bipartisan commission be appointed. Its task, he said, should be to ensure that the process of determining "the failures that compounded the Katrina tragedy" is taken out of the hands of politicians and partisan committees."

"For that reason, as the representative of the homeless, the inundated, the destroyed and the dead, we ask you to give your full support to the formation of an independent, non-partisan commission," Melancon said.

President Bush, who is scheduled to fly to Texas today to review preparations for Hurricane Rita, has already appointed his national security adviser to review the performance of the government in the immediate aftermath of Katrina.

Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., appointed by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, to oversee the House investigation, said he hopes that House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi will drop her opposition and eventually appoint Democratic members to make the probe truly bipartisan. He promised that the panel's investigation would continue with or without them would "investigate aggressively what went wrong and what went right."

``Even armed with solid, advance information on Katrina's severity, the response of local, state, and federal officials was largely abysmal,'' Davis said. He was deferential to both Melancon and Taylor, allowing them to ask the first questions, although they won't have voting status because they are not formal Democratic appointees.

Pelosi said that she encouraged Melancon and Taylor to participate in the hearings.

"They should be there," Pelosi said. "It is their responsibility to find whatever venue they can to speak for their constituents."

But she said that as the Democratic leader she won't appoint members to participate in a process "I consider to be a whitewash."

"There is nothing in the performance of this Congress in its four years since President Bush has been president that says that they will exercise proper oversight," Pelosi said.

Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, was also invited by Davis to participate in the hearings as a non-voting member of the investigatory panel. He did not attend Thursday's hearing. Spokeswoman Melanie Roussell said Jefferson is focusing on helping pass legislation to provide immediate relief to his constituents, although he supports a full investigation.

The House panel is scheduled to next question Michael Brown, who resigned as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency after FEMA was roundly criticized for its slow response to the Katrina disaster.

Despite 'secession,' defiant Uptowner arrested

Media darling booked with drunkenness

By Leslie Williams
Staff writer

An Uptown man who gained national attention by publicly defying New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's mandatory evacuation order and boasting of living a "Lord of the Flies/Robinson Crusoe" post-Hurricane Katrina existence at his spacious home on St. Charles Avenue was arrested this week for public intoxication, police said.

A Louisiana State trooper arrested Ashton O'Dwyer on Tuesday at 12:10 a.m. in the 6000 block of St. Charles Avenue, said Officer Garry Flot, a New Orleans Police Department spokesman. The 57-year-old lawyer was booked at the Amtrak Station, which temporarily has replaced the Orleans Parish Prison. O'Dwyer was released later that day, Flot said.

In a relatively short span after Katrina hit Aug. 29, O'Dwyer appeared on ABC News' Good Morning America, CNN and the CBS Early Show. He was featured in articles published by Newhouse News Service, The Baltimore Sun, The Wall Street Journal, the Houston Chronicle and USA Today, which quoted him as saying: "This is the highest ground in the city. That's why the rich white men who built this city put their homes here."

In other articles, O'Dwyer described Nagin as "incompetent."

He showed reporters his weapons – a pistol and a shotgun – and declared his willingness to use them. At one point, according to The Houston Chronicle, he announced "that I have seceded from the city of New Orleans, the state of Louisiana and the United States."

"I am now an independent nation," he continued.

In a CNN Newsnight piece, O'Dwyer put his situation in perspective for a national television audience.

"I will leave when I'm dead. OK? Let them be warned, they come to my house, they try to evict me, they try to take my guns, there will be gunfire."

Officials expect the storm to make landfall Saturday morning somewhere between southwest Louisiana and Galveston, Texas.

seemed to have a learning disability.

"It's kind of hard to miss somebody like that," Jabon said, adding that even before he dialed the number the woman gave him for a north Louisiana motel, he was sure he'd found his cousin, Angelo, one of 70 or so members of the Saladino/DiBernarda/Maiaro family cast out of New Orleans when Hurricane Katrina swept in Aug. 29.

Most of them already had checked in, sending e-mail or calling the phone number Jabon posted on four of the dozens of Web sites that have sprouted since Katrina's frenetic emptying of New Orleans left families without their relatives' out-of-town contact numbers and with cell phone service largely disrupted.

Across the World Wide Web, queries have continued cropping up a full three weeks after the hurricane on sites listing pleas for sightings of cousins and grandchildren and neighbors or information where they might have fled, or whether they made it out at all. Elsewhere in cyberspace, e-mails and instant messages kept flying among those who'd already found each other, helping classmates and neighbors feel close to home despite an evacuation that left them hundreds of miles apart.

The indispensable nature of new media after Katrina has been evident at East Baton Rouge Parish's main public library, where the number of daily visitors ballooned from 1,500 to 3,600 after Katrina, with most heading straight to the computers to check digital mail, surf person-locator sites or chat over instant messaging programs, which provide real-time text-based conferences.

"The Internet has been a godsend," said Mary Stein, the library's assistant director. "In the first couple of weeks, land lines and cell phones aren't working right. But people can e-mail."

Mac Young, a junior at Jesuit High School in New Orleans, has located most of the 80 friends on his instant messaging contact list during his evacuation jaunts to Covington, Baton Rouge, Lafayette and finally Houston, where he and about 400 other boys from the Mid-City Catholic school have enrolled at Strake Jesuit College Preparatory.

Even before Katrina hit, Young said, he was in touch with his buddies, many also Jesuit students. Beginning Aug. 28, they figured out where everyone planned to evacuate and whether any were following a similar path.

"I was online Sunday night, then Monday night the power's out, then I was basically online everywhere," he said, adding that his computer chats have linked friends as far away as Orlando and in cities throughout Louisiana.

Now, many of the guys are joining digital forces to persuade their parents to let them return to New Orleans to restart school at other local Catholic high schools until their own flooded campus is restored. "I know a couple of my friends are going to, and I want to go too because I just want to sleep in my own bed," he said.

Making such connections, however, has proven elusive for evacuees unfamiliar with the Internet or for those searching for friends whom they wouldn't expect to go online. Jackie Lewis, holed up since Katrina at the La Quinta Inn near Alabama's Huntsville Space Center, posted a message to two of her sisters, who rode out the storm with a dozen children in a pair of shotgun doubles on Myrtle Street in Gentilly.

But Lewis had little hope this week that Brenda Strong and Teresina Toledano ever would see the note at neworleans.craigslist.org. "They're not computer-savvy," she said. "They wouldn't know how to even start."

And if they did somehow get a Web connection, their chances of actually hitting upon Lewis' message probably would be slim, Stein said. Huge depositories of online information have bred as much aggravation as success, with many databases that list missing New Orleanians difficult or impossible to navigate by keyword or phrase.

"It's hard to search," Stein said. "After about the seven-thousandth entry, you don't see them so well, and maybe you miss that 2-year-old that you're searching for. They search by name, age, destination, medical condition, institution. We're seeing that there's a great need for standardization in these things."

At katrina.im-ok.org, users could be linked only by primary phone number. At katrinasafe.com, the American Red Cross's site, searchers could look for individuals by first and last name but could not scroll through lists of evacuees who had registered their location outside the storm-ravaged area. At the Hurricane Katrina Survivor Locator, a blog site, 447 Web pages about lost loved ones were viewable one at a time.

At the person locator at nola.com, a Web site affiliated with The Times-Picayune, some people searched for loved ones by street address, some by height and weight and others by physical traits such as a missing front tooth, a surgical scar or an eagle tattoo. Others beckoned relatives by their nicknames – "Tootsie" and "Too Short" and "Hammer" and "Cookie" – and ended their notes with a simple request: "If you are out there … please call."

For Keith Dabonne, just knowing his message about a loved one had been posted at the site provide solace as he waited for some nugget of news.

Dabonne, who lives in New York, first heard his grandfather was dead, swept away through the Lower 9th Ward by a surge too powerful for an elderly man to control. Then came reports that Eldridge "Mr. Eddie" Gabriel, an entertainer for more than six decades at Pat O'Brien's famous French Quarter bar, had been spotted at refugee shelters, maybe in Houston, maybe in Shreveport.

"I couldn't get any information speaking to (people at) the numbers that were given by the organizations, the Red Cross and all," Dabonne said. "At that point, I was as frustrated as I could possibly be. We decided to go to the Internet."

Hours after the winds died down, the photograph appeared online: a bald, mustachioed man dressed in a black sport jacket and a black satin tie grinned at the camera, a mole apparent on his left cheek. "We have not been able to speak with him since the night before Hurricane Katrina," read a note below the picture. "He has not been seen since. He takes heart medication and medication for high blood pressure."

"Then the floodgates opened," Dabonne said, "pardon my pun."

The calls and e-mails arrived from evacuees everywhere. Few had real answers; indeed, three weeks after the storm, the search for Gabriel trudged on. But every response to his Internet message stoked Dabonne's hope that he would find his grandfather.

"Without it," he said, "I wouldn't be nowhere."

out of that storm's path than taking a chance on staying."

On Thursday morning in Cameron Parish, about 40 miles east of the Texas-Louisiana line, fewer than 500 of the 9,000 residents remained, and the National Guard was working with sheriff's deputies to round up stragglers and urge them to flee.

"This is going to be worse than Audrey," Sheriff Theos Duhon said, referring to the 1957 storm that killed about 530 people when it struck that part of the state.

'A massive storm'

Rita is expected to dump up to 10 inches of rain, Blanco said, and send out hurricane-force winds across western Louisiana.

"This is a massive storm, a powerful storm," she said.

Because of Rita's size, with storm surges and tropical-storm-force winds that could extend as far as 160 miles from the center, officials on the other side of the state issued evacuation orders for Grand Isle, Crown Point, Barataria and low-lying parts of Plaquemines Parish.

In New Orleans, evacuation efforts continued, said Mayor Ray Nagin, who had scrapped his plan to let residents return home earlier this week because of Rita's approach.

Stressing what individuals can do to mitigate the storm's effects, Jefferson Parish Council Chairman Tom Capella urged everyone to check storm drains near their home to make sure they are free of debris that could clog the drain and make water rise.

"It's something that only takes five minutes but really can make a huge difference, especially with all the debris already on the streets," he said.

At his news conference Thursday afternoon, Nagin said New Orleans stands a 50 percent to 60 percent chance of receiving tropical-storm-force winds up to 75 mph, as well as storm surges as high as 5 feet.

But citing information from the Army Corps of Engineers, he said, "They can handle that type of storm surge."

To protect the New Orleans area from recurrences of levee breaches that inundated much of the city after Hurricane Katrina swept through last month, the Corps of Engineers put down 60-foot sheets of steel piling to block Lake Pontchartrain's tidal surge from the 17th Street and London Avenue canals. The Orleans Canal is not blocked.

"Metropolitan New Orleans can take about 6 inches of rain," corps spokeswoman Susan Jackson said. "Though a concern, it's not our main concern. . . . Storm surge is the real issue because it stresses the levee repairs and some areas that we haven't had time to assess and repair."

While New Orleans can withstand a 10- to 12-foot surge from the lake, St. Bernard Parish can take only a 5- to 6-foot surge, she said, because its pumps are working at 60 percent capacity.

At the 17th Street Canal levee on Thursday afternoon, workers used a bulldozer to load sandbags around the sheet pilings to seal up any leaks.

"I'm pretty confident that, based on current predictions, we will weather this storm just fine," said Duane Gatinski, who leads the corps task force charged with getting floodwater out of the city.

Rita chases evacuees out of Lake Charles

Masses uprooted again as hurricane approaches

By Jan Moller
Capital Bureau

ALEXANDRIA — Starting over is becoming a habit for Michael Brown.

After four years living on the streets of New Orleans, Brown, 50, had just finished a five-month stint in a drug and alcohol rehabilitation center and found steady work as a drywall finisher when Hurricane Katrina slammed into his adopted city Aug. 29.

With his landlord, a friend and three dogs, Brown rode out the storm at a Baton Rouge truck stop before ending up in a Red Cross shelter at the Lake Charles Civic Center. That's where Brown, and hundreds of other displaced New Orleanians, had spent three weeks trying to rebuild their lives.

"People were getting homes, jobs — everybody was getting served one way or another," Brown said.

Then word came down that a new storm, Hurricane Rita, was heading their way, and once again Brown was uprooted, this time as part of a giant caravan of cars and buses that got a police escort to the Rapides Parish Coliseum.

Nearly 500 evacuees arrived at their new temporary home early Wednesday evening. They are part of an estimated 3,000 Katrina victims in Calcasieu Parish to be transplanted to Alexandria, Monroe and Shreveport as the second major hurricane in a month threatened Louisiana's coast.

Cybil Menard, 5, daughter of Brian and Parry Menard of Houston, is stuffed into the back seat of the family car Thursday, headed east. Three weeks ago, it was Louisiana residents stuck in bumper-to-bumper traffic as they tried to evacuate from Hurricane Katrina. Now itís Houston residents fleeing Rita.

Dick Gremillion, director of the Calcasieu Parish Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness, said he expects the evacuation to last about a week — or as long as it takes to restore electric power to the region. "This is a temporary relocation," he said. "They're going to stay there until the storm has passed."

Sitting on picnic benches in a grove of shade trees outside the Coliseum, about two dozen evacuees interviewed Thursday expressed a mixture of weariness and frustration along with gratitude for the American Red Cross during a period that has forced all of them to rethink where and how they plan to spend their lives.

With their homes in New Orleans either destroyed or uninhabitable, the evacuees expressed the common goal of returning to Lake Charles, which for many had already begun to feel like home, as soon as possible.

"They've done everything possible to make people feel at home," said McKinley Guillory, 48, who was a FedEx driver before Katrina washed away his eastern New Orleans home and livelihood. A native of Lake Charles, Guillory was already contemplating moving there before the storm, in part so his children could escape the beleaguered Orleans Parish public schools.

Katrina merely moved up the timetable. "I was planning to move," Guillory said. "I just had to wait for God to move me. He don't work on my time. He works on his time."

After three weeks in Lake Charles, Guillory's children were enrolled in school and he was making plans: applying for loans, driving again for FedEx, buying a home, possibly starting a pressure-washing business on the side. Now his plans are on hold once again.

While many evacuees were thinking of starting over permanently in Lake Charles, no one appeared to have the same thoughts about Alexandria, where a bulletin board inside the Coliseum advertising jobs at Wal-Mart and nursing homes were all but ignored.

Nearly all of the two dozen evacuees sitting on shaded benches outside had kind words for their hosts in Lake Charles. "I wanted to stay in Lake Charles. I don't ever want to go back to New Orleans," said Hillard Hollerman, 57, of Harvey, who was evacuated to the Lake Charles Civic Center with about 15 members of his extended family.

Others are postponing a decision on their future until they have a clearer idea of what will become of New Orleans. Roland Handy, 56, has spent 31 years caring for research animals at Tulane University Hospital, including four harrowing days after Katrina until an evacuation helicopter arrived, and would like to go back to his job.

After several days of trying, he managed to get in touch with the university, but his efforts to get his paycheck forwarded to Lake Charles were postponed by Hurricane Rita. His daughter and grandchildren have already left New Orleans for good and made a permanent home in St. Louis, where the Red Cross helped set them up with a home and enroll the children in school, he said.

If Tulane doesn't reopen by Christmas, Handy said, he will likely join his daughter in St. Louis.

As for Brown, who had already found part-time work hanging drywall in Lake Charles before Rita forced another evacuation, he said he's determined to take the latest disruption in stride. "I've lived off and on the street all my life," he said. "But I've got the good Lord with me."

FEMA sends La. $457 million for repairs

Federal money goes to state agencies

By Laura Maggi
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Louisiana state government has received $457 million from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to be channeled to about 50 local entities or state agencies that are cleaning up after Hurricane Katrina, according to a document provided Thursday by state Treasurer John Kennedy's office.

Kennedy said that except for about $16.5 million in state advances that were sent to the sheriff's offices in St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes Wednesday, he did not know whether any of the money had been paid out. He said the state Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness is in charge of sending out the federal payments.

Many of the local governments in the New Orleans area are slated to receive some money, probably in installments, as they figure out how much damage was inflicted by the storm, according to documents provided by Kennedy's office.

For example, the city of Kenner is scheduled to receive $5.4 million, while St. Charles Parish public schools have earmarked $4 million.

It is unclear whether those allotments have been finalized.

According to the document, $352 million is slated for the state Department of Health & Hospitals. The undersecretary for that agency, Charles Castille, said that so far his agency needs about $10 million to recoup the money spent during the hurricane on special-needs shelters, medical triages for evacuees and other emergency expenses. Castille did not know what the other $342 million would be for.

The state Office of Emergency Preparedness has not responded to written requests for more documentation about how the money will be allotted.

Evacuee from Metairie killed in Chattanooga

By Bill Poovey
Associated Press writer

CHATTANOOGA, TENN. — A restaurant cook and dishwasher from Metairie has become the first Katrina refugee to be killed in a host community.

Don Maurice Airline, 24, was found dead on a secluded road with five gunshots to the head. Chattanooga police were considering the possibility that someone killed him to steal relief money the Red Cross gave him.

Detective R. Kenneth Freeman said he was sorry the shooting Saturday happened in Chattanooga, a city where the Red Cross, churches and social agencies are helping hundreds of Katrina refugees.

Freeman said Airline was the only homicide victim he knew of among the hundreds of thousands of Katrina evacuees. Another 1 million people were fleeing ahead of Hurricane Rita.

Airline's mother, Sheila Airline, 41, described the killing as "just senseless."

"For someone to take my child's life, they robbed him. I know they robbed him, because the Red Cross gave him money and the detective can't find it," she said Thursday in a telephone interview from Kenner.

Sheila Airline said she stayed with relatives in Louisiana when she evacuated Aug. 28.

"This is how God had it planned," she said. "He was evacuated out of the storm, and out of the storm he gets killed."

Airline said her son's funeral was set for Saturday in River Ridge.

Investigators found five handgun shell casings next to Airline's body, less than a mile from a Red Cross shelter where he had stayed.

Airline left a Chattanooga nightclub with at least two men and a woman hours before his body was spotted early Saturday on a roadside, Freeman said.

Roberts nomination is sent to full Senate

Judiciary Committee approves appointment

By Jesse J. Holland
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — The Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday approved John Roberts' nomination as the next Supreme Court chief justice, virtually assuring his confirmation by the Senate next week.

The official tally of 13-5 was anticlimatic, with the committee's 10 majority Republicans lined up solidly behind the conservative judge's nomination to the full Senate weeks in advance.

But the decision by three Democrats to join Republican efforts to make Roberts the nation's 109th Supreme Court justice outlined the division in the minority caucus over whether Democrats can, or should, mount even symbolic opposition to Roberts to send President Bush a message on his next Supreme Court nomination.

Five Democrats — Sens. Dianne Feinstein of California, Joseph Biden of Delaware, Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, Charles Schumer of New York and Dick Durbin of Illinois — opposed Roberts in the final vote, and many of the arguments merged with senators' worries about the upcoming replacement for the retiring Sandra Day O'Connor.

John Roberts
Panel's vote virtually assures confirmation

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., told reporters after the vote that he thinks Bush may name a replacement for O'Connor within days of the final vote on Roberts.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan commended the committee "for moving forward in a civil and dignified way," noting the White House hopes this sets an example for considering Bush's second nomination to the court.

Liberal groups that had opposed Roberts expressed disappointment with the committee vote, with Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, singling out Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis.

He said the Wisconsin Democrat was the only member of his party on the committee who voted in favor of both John Ashcroft to become Bush's first attorney general and now Roberts. Neas said Feingold's vote was a "tremendous mistake and a tremendous disappointment."

But Leonard Leo of the conservative Federalist Society said the fact that only three of eight committee Democrats supported Roberts was evidence of partisanship. "We're supposed to think the Democrats are being magnanimous? Give me a break," Leo said.

Easy confirmation expected

Roberts' confirmation as the 109th Supreme Court justice is all but assured because most of the Senate's 55 Republicans support him and Democrats have decided not to filibuster his nomination.

But Democrats who oppose his nomination said they can't take the risk that Roberts will prove a conservative ideologue on the court.

Feinstein told a packed Judiciary Committee hearing room that her vote was decided after Roberts refused to answer fully some questions from her and other Democrats in his confirmation hearing last week.

"I knew as little about what Judge Roberts really thought about issues after the hearings as I did before the hearing. This makes it very hard for me," said Feinstein, an abortion rights supporter.

"I cannot in good conscience cast a 'yea' vote," she said. "I will cast a 'no' vote."

Biden said his vote was a close call but that Roberts "does not appear to share the same expansive view of fundamental rights of previous nominees I have supported. I'm unwilling to take the constitutional risk at this moment in the court's history."

Feingold and Sen. Herb Kohl, both Wisconsin Democrats, and the committee's top Democrat, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, decided to support making the conservative judge the nation's 17th chief justice.

"I will vote my hopes today and not my fears," Kohl said.

Kohl said Roberts made it clear to him that he will be a modest judge, not an activist, and will approach arguments with an open mind.

"I take him at his word that he will steer the court to serve as an appropriate check on potential abuses of presidential power," Leahy told the committee and former Sen. Fred Thompson — Roberts' escort through the confirmation process — who watched from the crowd.

Looking to the future

Those statements likely are directed at the president, who is expected to soon make public his choice to replace O'Connor, who has been a swing vote on issues including affirmative action, abortion, discrimination and death penalty cases.

Replacing her could give the president a chance to swing the court to the right on many issues.

Widely mentioned candidates include judges Edith Brown Clements and Emilio Garza, both of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans. Others widely mentioned candidates federal appellate judges Janice Rogers Brown, Edith Hollan Jones, Alice Batchelder, Karen Williams, J. Michael Luttig, J. Harvie Wilkinson, Michael McConnell and Samuel Alito.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, former deputy attorney general Larry Thompson, lawyer Miguel Estrada and Maura Corrigan, a member of the Michigan Supreme Court, are also considered possibilities.

"We're already talking about the next nominee in code," noted Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C. "Senator Kohl, who voted yes, is talking about the balance of the court with O'Connor. Senator Feingold is mentioning that he may not be receptive to Justice Brown. I can understand it. That's the way this situation is in 2005."

Democratic Sens. Mark Pryor of Arkansas, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Max Baucus of Montana have announced their support for Roberts for when his nomination goes to the full Senate. Sen. Mary Landrieu of Louisiana has indicated she is leaning toward voting for him as well. Sen. Kent Conrad of North Dakota is also viewed as a possible vote for him.

Senate Democrats opposing Roberts so far include Democratic leader Harry Reid, Barbara Boxer of California, John Kerry of Massachusetts and New Jersey Sens. Jon Corzine and Frank Lautenberg.

The White House wants Roberts to be in place as the nation's 17th chief justice when the Supreme Court begins its new term Oct. 3.

Vatican document may ban all gay seminarians

Clergy demoralized; some vow to quit

By Rachel Zoll
AP Religion writer

Word that a soon-to-be-released Vatican document will signal that homosexuals are unwelcome in Roman Catholic seminaries even if they are celibate has devastated gay clergy and raised doubts among conservatives about whether an outright ban can be enforced.

A Vatican official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the document has not been released, said Thursday that the upcoming "instruction" from the Vatican's Congregation for Catholic Education will reaffirm the church's belief that homosexuals should not be ordained.

In recent decades, Vatican officials have stated several times that gays should not become priests because their sexual orientation is "intrinsically disordered" and makes them unsuitable for ministry.

The latest document is scheduled to be distributed within weeks, just as an evaluation of all 229 American seminaries gets under way under the direction of the same Vatican agency developing the seminary statement. The review, called an Apostolic Visitation, was ordered by Pope John Paul II in response to the U.S. clergy sex abuse crisis that erupted in 2002. Among the questions the evaluators will ask is whether "there is evidence of homosexuality in the seminary," according to the agency's guide for the inspections.

The Rev. Thomas Krenik, who taught for 10 years in St. Paul Seminary in Minnesota and wrote the guidebook "Formation for Priestly Celibacy," worries that a blanket ban on gay priest candidates will recreate the very conditions the Vatican wants to eradicate.

"For some men who happened to be homosexually oriented, they would go further in the closet," Krenik said. "That would be my fear, that this could become an even worse problem."

A gay American priest, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he feared reprisals from church leaders, said he and other gay clergy and seminarians felt "absolute horror" when they heard about the anticipated ban.

"I've spoken to gay priests who feel demoralized. I've heard straight priests say that they're embarrassed by it. I've heard priests both straight and gay seriously considering leaving," he said. "They couldn't believe that after centuries of either explicit or implicit welcoming of celibate gay clergy that the church would turn its back on them."

James Hitchcock, a church historian at St. Louis University and conservative commentator on contemporary Catholicism, said he thinks the ban is necessary considering that a study the U.S. bishops commissioned from the John Jay College of Criminal Justice found that most of the alleged abuse victims since 1950 were adolescent boys. But he conceded that the policy will be difficult to enforce, since candidates for the priesthood can hide their sexual orientation. He's also concerned that gays truly dedicated to remaining celibate will be unfairly excluded.

"In theory, one might say judge each case on its individual merits, but some doubt whether it would be done in a proper way," Hitchcock said. "There isn't going to be an easy solution. I think if you have a policy statement that homosexuals ought not to be studying for the priesthood at least it gives seminaries a way to act."

Estimates of the number of gay seminarians and priests vary from 25 percent to 50 percent out of about 42,500 priests in the United States. Whatever the percentage, many Catholics are worried that the priesthood is becoming a homosexual profession. As the abuse crisis intensified, church officials discussed their concerns more openly and more urgently, even though experts on sex offenders said that homosexuals were no more likely than heterosexuals to abuse children.

Critics ranging from gay rights groups to advocates for victims have accused the Vatican of scapegoating homosexuals to divert attention from the church's failure to protect children.

Other seminary leaders have said a ban is pointless, since many clergy candidates do not realize they are gay until after they are enrolled or even ordained. And Krenik questioned whether the problem of subcultures of sexually active gays was as acute as the Vatican believes.

On a wing and a prayer — and in-flight TV

Crippled flight's passengers tuned in to their own drama

By Tim Molloy
Associated Press writer

LOS ANGELES — Letting customers watch TV at their seats has been a JetBlue calling card since the airline took flight in 1999.

But the frill made for a bizarre experience as passengers aboard an airliner with crippled landing gear watched news reports about their own flight even as they prepared for an emergency landing.

Some of those aboard Flight 292, which landed safely Wednesday at Los Angeles International Airport, said later that they appreciated seeing news reports on what was happening. Others were horrified.

"It was absolutely terrifying, actually. Seeing the events broadcast made it completely surreal and detached me from the event," said Zachary Mastoon, a musician heading home on the Burbank-to-New York flight. "It became this television show I was inextricably linked to. It was no longer my situation, it was broadcast for everyone to see. It only exacerbated the situation and my fear."

Mastoon said the JetBlue employees kept passengers informed but that he heard worst-case scenarios from TV news reports. Realizing the risks, he started taking swigs from another passenger's vodka tonic.

"They were telling us there could be a crash landing, the landing gear could be torn off, and that there could be a fire. The gravity of the situation was much worse than any of us assumed," Mastoon said.

Some passengers, though, said they appreciated knowing as much as possible about their situation.

"I think on balance people were not upset," said Howard Averill, chief financial officer for NBC-Universal Television, who was traveling to a meeting in New York.

The airline said Thursday it had no plans to get rid of in-flight television during emergencies.

"It's far more valuable to customers who choose to watch, and customers who choose not to watch can turn their unit off," company spokeswoman Jenny Dervin said.

Official says he warned of Katrina's punch

Mayfield: Devastation like nothing I have witnessed before

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON – Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center, told a congressional committee Thursday that "devastation along the Gulf Coast from Hurricane Katrina is like nothing I have witnessed before."

Mayfield said that the National Weather Service worked hard before the storm to let federal, state and local officials and Gulf Coast residents know the storm would pack deadly strength. Twenty-four hours before the storm struck land, the Slidell office of the Weather Service issued an advisory that said: "Most of the area will be uninhabitable for weeks, perhaps longer" and that "at least one half of well constructed homes will have room and wall failure."

Mayfield said he gave a frightening appraisal of likely damage to Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco 36 hours before the storm made landfall Aug. 29, and that she urged him to give the same briefing to New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin. Mayfield said he repeated the warning to Nagin about 45 minutes later.

The committee was set up by Republican House leaders to investigate what went wrong with the government's response to the killer storm. House Democrats called for a boycott of the panel, but allowed Reps. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, and Gene Taylor, D-Miss., whose Gulf Coast districts were decimated by the hurricane, to attend Thursday as non-voting members.

As Melancon joined other panel members in questioning Mayfield, he released a letter he sent to President Bush asking that a bipartisan commission be appointed. Its task, he said, should be to ensure that the process of determining "the failures that compounded the Katrina tragedy" is taken out of the hands of politicians and partisan committees.

"For that reason, as the representative of the homeless, the inundated, the destroyed and the dead, we ask you to give your full support to the formation of an independent, non-partisan commission," Melancon said.

President Bush, who is scheduled to fly to Texas today to review preparations for Hurricane Rita, has already appointed his national security adviser to review the performance of the government in the immediate aftermath of Katrina.

Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., appointed by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, to oversee the House investigation, said he hopes that House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi will drop her opposition and eventually appoint Democratic members to make the probe truly bipartisan. He promised that the panel's investigation would continue with or without them would "investigate aggressively what went wrong and what went right."

``Even armed with solid, advance information on Katrina's severity, the response of local, state, and federal officials was largely abysmal,'' Davis said. He was deferential to both Melancon and Taylor, allowing them to ask the first questions, although they won't have voting status because they are not formal Democratic appointees.

Pelosi said that she encouraged Melancon and Taylor to participate in the hearings.

"They should be there," Pelosi said. "It is their responsibility to find whatever venue they can to speak for their constituents."

But she said that as the Democratic leader she won't appoint members to participate in a process "I consider to be a whitewash."

"There is nothing in the performance of this Congress in its four years since President Bush has been president that says that they will exercise proper oversight," Pelosi said.

Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, was also invited by Davis to participate in the hearings as a non-voting member of the investigatory panel. He did not attend Thursday's hearing. Spokeswoman Melanie Roussell said Jefferson is focusing on helping pass legislation to provide immediate relief to his constituents, although he supports a full investigation.

The House panel is scheduled to next question Michael Brown, who resigned as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency after FEMA was roundly criticized for its slow response to the Katrina disaster.

Bush's mind a world away from home

While President Bush was holding his news conference Thursday afternoon to discuss progress in the war on terror, the bottom right-hand side of the television screen communicated the following information about the approaching hurricane:

"Rita. Cat 5. Winds: 165 mph."

"Now the terrorists are testing our will and resolve in Iraq," the president said. "If we fail that test, the consequences for the safety and security of the American people would be enormous."

The text at the bottom of the screen read, "462 miles from the coast," referring to the Gulf Coast of the American homeland.

"What's a priority for me is to win this war on terror and secure the country, and to help the people down there to the extent that the law allows," President Bush said.

It seemed that the reporters at the news conference didn't share the president's priority, however. Most of their questions revolved around menacing hurricanes, past and pending.

Terror at home

I thought then of the stories I've heard and read in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

I thought of all of those terrified people who called 9-1-1 in the early hours of the hurricane in the hope that someone would be sent to rescue them from their flooding homes.

I thought of my friend whose Algiers home survived the winds and the rains but whose will to stay in that place was shattered when looters threatened to return to his neighborhood and gun him down if he thwarted their efforts to rob his neighbors.

I thought of east bank evacuees who managed to get to the Crescent City Connection only to be met by the sound of gunfire from Gretna police. I thought about the similarities in the enforcement tactics of the Gretna police and the looters.

I thought of the people huddled in the Superdome and the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, hot, hungry and thirsty, scared to travel in the darkness to the bathroom for fear or being robbed or raped.

I tried to imagine what Osama bin Laden or Abu Musab al-Zarqawi could do to us that would be more terrible than what many Americans have already endured in the past few weeks.

A deadly history

During one brief span of the president's speech, he made clear what we have to fear. He used the word "kill" six times.

"See, they don't care who they kill; they just kill. They kill innocent people. They kill women. They kill children. They kill election workers. And they've had a history of this before," the president said.

I assumed he was talking about Katrina and Rita. Hurricanes have a deadly history.

Corps: West Bank levees should hold

Concrete slopes cracked by Katrina

By Paul Purpura
West Bank bureau

Damage to some West Bank levees, which were hit by barges and a dry dock Hurricane Katrina tossed from the Mississippi River, embedding them in the concrete barriers, should not pose a threat to Algiers and neighboring communities during Hurricane Rita, the Army Corps of Engineers said Thursday.

The corps said it is focusing on New Orleans' east bank canals in preparation for Rita, on Thursday a Category 4 storm barreling through the Gulf of Mexico, and that the West Bank levees will be repaired before high water season.

Three barges, lashed together and broken from their moorings elsewhere, were thrown onto the levee in the 6100 block of Patterson Street in Algiers. The stern of one barge broke into the slope paving, the concrete pad that lines the levee's river side.

Bollinger Shipyards' dry dock was yanked from its moorings at Algiers Point by Katrina and was pushed two miles upstream, where it cracked the slope paving at the foot of Lafayette Street in Gretna, Police Chief Arthur Lawson said.

"That was a big concern during (Katrina), because we didn't know how that was going to play out," Lawson said of fears that the levee would break and the river would spill into Gretna.

The Corps of Engineers said the river's water level is low and is not in danger of topping the levees.

"We're not worried about the Mississippi River levee," spokeswoman Susan Jackson said. "Is it a concern? Yes, it is a concern, but it is not a top concern."

The corps' focus this week has been to shore up New Orleans canals that had walls breached during Katrina,

Catholic education officials are rushing to transform two Metairie schools into a kind not seen in Jefferson Parish since the population boom and crowded classrooms of the 1960s and 1970s: Platoons are returning to Archbishop Chapelle and Archbishop Rummel High schools.

Previously enrolled students at those schools, all girls at Chapelle and all boys at Rummel, will resume classes Oct. 3 from about 7 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. Beginning around Oct. 5, from about 1:30 to 6:10 p.m., the two campuses will host a second, coeducational shift of students from as many as 16 other Catholic high schools that remain closed because of Hurricane Katrina damage in Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes.

The Archdiocese of New Orleans already is running one such "transitional" site for Katrina-displaced students, at Kenner police obtained a warrant Thursday to arrest the city's chief administrative officer, Cedric Floyd, on a charge of malfeasance in office for allegedly diverting truckloads of hurricane relief supplies to his home.

His pending arrest not only subjects Floyd to prosecution but seems likely to fuel longstanding political differences between Police Chief Nick Congemi and Floyd's boss, Mayor Phil Capitano, who defeated Congemi in the 2004 mayoral election.

Police said they retrieved several truckloads of donated supplies from Floyd's home while executing a search warrant Tuesday night. They said they hauled off new clothing, tools and cases of food and medicine. Capitano suspended Floyd without pay the next day.

Until then, Floyd had been one of Capitano's top two aides, managing the daily government operations of Louisiana's sixth-largest city and supervising

A recreational vehicle park will serve as temporary housing for 50 displaced teachers who work for the St. Charles Parish public school district, the School Board said Wednesday night.

But getting the project up and running might be tricky.

The park is being funded by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, but it is not known how long FEMA will take to determine whether the displaced teachers qualify for the temporary housing.

"It's being handled in an appropriate time," promised Larry Sesser, executive director of physical plant services for the district. "We're patiently waiting. Hopefully (construction will

OMNI to clean up St. Tammany, Orleans

Long before weather forecasters uttered the name Katrina, a Slidell firm secured contracts to clean up the wreckage of any natural disaster to strike Orleans and St. Tammany parishes. Now more than three weeks into two debris-hauling projects, the contractor predicts those agreements will bring in $100 million before the last piece of trash is buried or burned. Brian Reine, managing member of OMNI Pinnacle LLC, runs the two massive operations from tent cities in Algiers and Pearl River. With an estimated 2,000 workers filling the ranks of his company and about 30 subcontractors, OMNI Pinnacle crews handle countless piles of tree branches, abandoned refrigerators, shattered plywood and ripped-out Sheetrock – all within an exacting protocol set by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. "You can't just go out and pick up a stump anymore, put it in your truck and get paid for it," Reine said. "They want to know exactly where the stump came from and if you back-filled the hole." OMNI Pinnacle trucks started pushing through St. Tammany Parish roads covered with mangled trees and power lines as soon as Hurricane Katrina's fiercest winds ceased on Aug. 29. Meanwhile, wheel loaders and other heavy equipment lined up at the Mandeville side of the Lake Pontchartrain Causeway. "We were getting ready to cross, and they told us to stop," Reine said. "The levees broke. So we weren't able to start until the next Monday." The workforce grew by the day, as Reine made contact with local subcontractors and out-of-towners when New Orleans-area crews couldn't be reached. Reine said this week that 60 percent of subcontractors are local, and more than half are minority-owned.

Storm closes schools in parish — again

Today's classes are canceled for all Catholic schools in St. Tammany Parish, as well as for Cedarwood School in Mandeville, and Christ Episcopal School and Kehoe-France Northshore in Covington, because of bad weather expected from Hurricane Rita. Northlake Christian School near Covington and Our Lady of the Lake School in Mandeville are set to reopen Monday for the first time since Hurricane Katrina hit, and the parish's public schools tentatively plan to reopen Oct. 3. In addition, the St. Tammany Parish public school system has canceled its high school football games scheduled for tonight.

Businesses ready, but lack workers

With displaced families taking over relatives' spare bedrooms and out-of-town work crews settling in for months-long building projects, St. Tammany Parish's booming population has almost all the makings of a boon for many local industries.
Yet the missing piece – workers – could hinder north shore businesses for weeks or months to come, a state Department of Labor official said Thursday. Jim Heap, the department's business service representative for western St. Tammany, said the parish had the lowest unemployment rate in the state before Hurricane Katrina. Now, several results of the storm have exacerbated the difficulty of finding workers, including the chunk of the St. Tammany work force that didn't return from evacuation sites and the surging population of new residents needing supplies and services.
"If you have a skill, your 'hireability' is better, but right now they're just looking for warm bodies to fill their ranks," said Heap, who said his office had logged Web postings for 1,000 job openings in St. Tammany. "The employer community is at the point of desperation."

'This is not a tutoring service'

SCHOOLS, from B-1

St. Michael the Archangel School in Baton Rouge. New Orleans area students who remain there could be merged into the regular St. Michael student body, and others could move to Rummel and Chapelle, said the Rev. William Maestri, superintendent of archdiocese schools.

Maestri also said three West Bank schools — Archbishop Blenk, Immaculata and Archbishop Shaw — will reopen in October, and one of them could take on a second shift of displaced students, if needed.

"That is in play," Maestri said. "These things are very fluid. We just have to make sure we are flexible as we can be."

The archdiocese lists 15 Catholic high schools in New Orleans and one in St. Bernard Parish. Some of these schools, notably Jesuit in New Orleans, are working up their own plans for educating students elsewhere.

Still, a huge increase of students seems likely for Chapelle, which enrolled 1,089 students in 2004-05, and Rummel, which counted 1,345 in middle and high school grades. Joe Serio, admissions and public information director at Rummel, said a recent Internet announcement to gauge interest in the Rummel-Chapelle transitional plan yielded 4,000 responses, crippling his electronic mail account.

Catholic schools in St. Tammany Parish already have enrolled an extra 2,000 students since Katrina struck Aug. 29, a one-third increase in St. Tammany's Catholic school enrollment, Maestri said. Schools in St. Charles and St. John the Baptist parishes also are reporting more students.

At Rummel on Thursday, crowds of parents and students gathered in the reception room to hear announcements from officials and sign up for the transitional school.

Nancy Hernandez, principal of the storm-closed Ursuline Academy in New Orleans, will serve as principal of the Rummel transitional school. She sought to assure parents that it will be a solid educational program.

"This is not a tutoring service," she said. "This is going to be six classes that they will be taking."

She also said the educators running the school will be sensitive to the myriad traumas the displaced students have experienced.

"It's going to be rough for many students," she said. "We will be worried and taking care of their emotional side as well as their academic side. You have our word on that."

Rummel President Michael Begg sought to assure parents that the transitional school will be able to complete a full semester, ending in January, because the month lost to Katrina is manageable, he said.

For students such as Matt Johnson, a sophomore from Brother Martin High School in New Orleans, the new setting at Rummel means a continuation of unusual circumstances.

Johnson and his parents have lived with his aunt in Baton Rouge and then in an apartment in Baton Rouge, all within the past four weeks. His father, Master Sgt. Gerald Johnson of the 1192nd U.S. Army Reserves, normally based in New Orleans but now operating from Baton Rouge, received orders to spend most of the past two weeks searching Louisiana for Katrina-displaced members of the military or their families.

With the family's house in Kenner in good shape and a possible return there by next week, Johnson now faces the prospect of attending Rummel, a longtime, fierce rival of his own Brother Martin on the playing fields and courts.

Still, he kept a positive outlook.

"At this time, we can't worry about that," he said.

Johnson said there could be some pluses to attending the transitional school. Particularly, it will be the first time since seventh grade that he has studied alongside girls.

"It's going to be different, now that we're older," he said.

Ship provides doctors showers

SHIP, from B-1

and whether his alma mater, Benjamin Franklin Senior High School, still stood.

Lansden and his crew of 22 – all but four from the New Orleans area – had weathered Katrina inside the merchant marine vessel, docked at Port Marrero to have its broken engines repaired. The monstrous fast sealift ship had been stranded, unable to move out of the path of the storm.

But despite all the fatal punches Katrina threw Aug. 29, the electric light bulbs still glowed that night on the self-sustaining Navy craft. Freezers stayed cold. Drinking water spewed from spigots. Television and radio stations transmitted clearly.

And beneath Lansden, in Pollux's massive fuel tank, sloshed 771,000 gallons of diesel fuel. All around him, a floating city with showers and food and medical supplies endured without pause.

"God had spared us from the storm," Lansden said days later. "We were on a 946-foot vessel with no engine power, and we passed through his storm undamaged. We had this blessing, and it was our duty to reach out and help those that had been hurt, who were stuck on a roof, who had been medevaced and needed help from the hospitals."

The captain found his cellular phone, with a 617 area code from the ship's Massachusetts origin. With local telephone service severed and satellite communication inoperable, that cell phone worked, and Lansden asked his commanding officer for permission to use his ship as an emergency platform.

"I am from this area, and these are my people," he said. "I grew up knowing what their needs would be."

The response: Sit tight; wait for approval.

The sun set. Darkness cloaked the metropolitan area. But about a mile from the Pollux, a single beacon cut the black: West Jefferson Medical Center. "You could see the helicopters were coming in from the Chalmette area and landing at the West Jeff heliport," Lansden said.

Hours passed, and there was still no written authorization from the Navy. But Lansden's Buick LaSabre had survived the hurricane parked on the river levee. He called his port engineer, Chris Keefe. The pair waited for daylight.

Maneuvering the sedan around a maze of electrical lines and aluminum siding cleaved off giant oil field silos, they headed to the hospital, where 425 patients, more than 1,000 staff members and 500 of their relatives struggled with a dwindling stash of supplies, no water to flush the toilets and generators too weak to power the air conditioning.

"We had two days of fuel left," said Gary Muller, the public hospital's president, "and we didn't know if we would have a fuel truck coming."

The crew staffing the dialysis unit had its own problem: More than 40 patients in varying degrees of kidney failure needed toxins artificially cleared from their blood. The process requires potable water, said Dr. Craig Thompson, who was assigned to the unit that day. But the public water system was broken.

The Pollux, able to cruise at nearly 38 miles per hour and carry 55,350 tons when fully loaded, was not designed to distribute fuel. So Lansden left West Jefferson with engineers from the Louisiana National Guard and headed to the Kinder Morgan pipeline field in Harvey, where workers got started rigging an outflow device that would siphon his ship's diesel into tanker trucks.

Meanwhile, a team of doctors went to the Pollux to survey its labyrinthine interior for any space that might accommodate a pair of 200-pound machines to service patients who had gone four or five days without dialysis. One man, Thompson said, had gained 16 pounds in water since his last treatment.

The doctors needed plenty of water to pump through the devices and enough space for grown men too weak to stand to receive their remedy: the laundry room. They went to work turning it into a medical facility.

Hours later, outside the ship, tankers started lining up along River Road to receive, at no cost, diesel fuel for generators that would sustain emergency workers through the first tenuous hours of rebuilding a region torn asunder by nature's deadly force. Ten thousand gallons left the Pollux that day.

The first trucks carried extra diesel to West Jefferson hospital. The queue was joined by Jefferson Parish Volunteer Fire Department trucks, including the ones that would be called upon in the coming days to save Oakwood Shopping Center in Gretna from vandals' flames.

As word spread of the gasoline cache, Jefferson government vehicles lined up behind the firetrucks. "We were desperate for fuel," Parish President Aaron Broussard said. The gas powered the parish's Emergency Operations Center in Marrero and East Jefferson General Hospital in Metairie.

With tankers lined up for blocks and the Navy's official approval of Lansden's request finally sent by fax, doctors and nurses pushed two wheelchair-bound men to the curb at West Jefferson, Thompson said.

They were set up by 4 p.m. Four hours later, the treatment was complete. The men shed more than a dozen pounds of water in the Pollux's laundry room, according to Thompson, and narrowly escaped having to be hooked up to ventilators to push oxygen into their increasingly poisoned blood.

"I don't know that they would have made it to the next day," the surgeon said.

The following morning, buses arrived to transfer the remaining dialysis patients to fully equipped medical facilities outside the storm zone. That Wednesday, another 25,000 gallons of fuel were turned out.

As the days progressed, Lansden kept close track of his fuel's destination, feeding only medical facilities, government vehicles and essential military outposts, including Naval Support Activity in Algiers and the Naval Air Station-Joint Reserve Base at Belle Chasse.

Federal Emergency Management Agency trucks showed up at the Pollux Sept. 4, nearly a week after Katrina. "They showed up and, no kidding, they nudged in front and said, 'We're FEMA,'" said Air Force Maj. Sean Conroy of the 159th Fighter Wing and the Louisiana Air National Guard's liaison officer in Jefferson Parish.

"Robert said, 'Nope. My ship,' and sent them to the end of the line," Conroy said. A FEMA spokeswoman could not comment on the events of Sept. 4 except to say her agency arrived that day in Jefferson to support state relief efforts.

The Pollux continued to fuel an untold number of tankers and opened a deck with showers, beds and hot meals to West Jefferson doctors, nurses and other staffers, according to Lansden, Jefferson government officials and hospital personnel.

As its diesel supplies dwindled in the three weeks after the storm, two merchant marine ships cruised down the Mississippi to reload the 1.2 million-gallon tank with 336,000 more gallons. As of Thursday, the Pollux had distributed 880,000 gallons of free diesel, the captain said.

Across the New Orleans area, word spread of the Pollux, the giant diesel lifeline sitting on engines so crippled they could not push the ship out of Katrina's path. Broussard called Lansden a "real military hero" and invited a network television crew to film his visit to the vessel to thank the captain.

Lansden promised to keep pumping fuel as long as recovery teams work to resurrect the city that was blown apart just outside his ship.

"When these lights went out and it was dark, there was nothing to do but try to make a difference out there," he said. "Tonight, when it gets dark, you're going to look out and see the lights on."

all personnel except for the Legal, Fire and Police departments. His annual salary is $82,522.

Capt. Steve Caraway, a Police Department spokesman, said officers informed Floyd's attorney of the arrest warrant and were told Floyd would turn himself in for booking. Malfeasance in office, a felony, occurs when a public official uses the power of his office to commit a crime.

Earlier Thursday, Floyd disputed allegations that he usurped loads of supplies intended for Hurricane Katrina victims, saying he was merely a conduit for moving the supplies from a city-run relief site to a Kenner church that would later distribute them to needy people in the Susan Park neighborhood.

"We gave stuff in bulk," he said. "What is too much?"

Floyd said the items were destined for Mark Mitchell, pastor of New Hope Community Church, and Mitchell agreed.

"We just kept missing each other to get these goods," Mitchell said Thursday.

On two earlier occasions, Floyd took donated goods to Mitchell instead of requiring the pastor to go to the city distribution center at 25th Street and Williams Boulevard, both men said.

Military officials who had been working at the distribution site initiated the complaint against Floyd.

State Attorney General Charles Foti's office is assisting Kenner police in the investigation.

West Bank floods not expected

LEVEE, from B-1

Jackson said.

The West Bank levees will be repaired before high water season, typically starting in December, corps spokesman John Hall said.

"The issue is to get the job done before high water season," Hall said. "That's when it would become a concern."

Charlie Conrad, whose Algiers home is a block from the broken levee, said he was concerned about storm surge from Rita. Katrina's surge and wind left a debris line about four feet from the top of the levee, well above where the barges punched through the slope paving, he said.

Three barges lashed together were thrown by Hurricane Katrina into the Mississippi River levee near Lennox Drive in Algiers.

"That worries me that the concrete's broken, that if we get another storm and get a surge, it would undermine the levee," Conrad said.

Jerry Spohrer, executive director of the West Jefferson Levee District, said Rita was not expected to create surge in the Mississippi like Katrina did. Slope paving, he said, serves as a hardened surface that prevents erosion, river debris and vessels from damaging the earthen levee underneath during high water seasons and worked as intended during Katrina.

"The slope paving in and of itself doesn't provide flood protection," Spohrer said. "The levee itself provides the flood protection."

Conrad, who returned home Sunday, saw the barges standing out above the levee and another one four blocks away that sat atop the levee.

The barges were among numerous river vessels that were tossed by Katrina, including the two ferries that were grounded just downstream from the Algiers ferry landing.

The Coast Guard did not have a count of vessels that were tossed ashore during Katrina.

"There are so many of them," Petty Officer 1st Class Michael O'Berry said, adding that Coast Guard salvage teams would notify vessel owners about moving them.

None of the grounded vessels threatened Mississippi River traffic, but the Coast Guard has been keeping an eye on Hurricane Rita and any surge that could come with it.

"Right now, we're not anticipating that, but that could change with Rita," O'Berry said.

Park to be built at Hahnville site

RV PARK, from B-1

begin) in a few days."

The park will be built at Eual J. Landry Alternative Center in Hahnville and will accommodate as many as 68 RVs.

The park is scheduled to be opened for six months, with a possible three-month extension. All costs for the setup, utilities and eventual removal of the units will be picked up by FEMA. FEMA also will provide security and maintenance for the trailers and grounds for the duration of the project.

With little temporary housing in the parish to begin with and an influx of thousands of residents displaced from the New Orleans area, the park seemingly was an inevitable solution for the district.

Many teachers extended a hand to colleagues who had lost their homes, but it was not enough, said Assistant Superintendent Felecia Gomez. "There were still 50 displaced teachers," Gomez said.

Now those 50 displaced teachers and their families will be allowed to live in the trailers.

Each unit is built to house up to four people, Sesser said.

"They are self-contained," Sesser said. "Each has a bedroom, bathroom and living area."

Completion of the project should take about seven days, Sesser said.

"I'm just pleased this is happening for our teachers that had no place to go," said board member Cindy Brasher. "I wish they were bigger, but you have to work with what they give you."

Bucktown took it on the chin, but many say they'll rebuild

Wind took Sid-Mar's, tops of some homes

By Bob Ross
East Jefferson bureau

Frank Schwartz sits on a barstool inside Daiquiri & Creams Deli in Bucktown, nursing a beer and staring at the television. He is in no rush to finish the beer. He has no place in particular to go.

"I lost everything I own," he said, with no trace of emotion. "I live day by day."

Schwartz, 58, was smacked with a double blow by Hurricane Katrina, which pounded Bucktown with ferocious winds and mostly minor flooding.

Like the landmark Sid-Mar's restaurant, which was blown off its pilings on Lake Pontchartrain and swept away to parts unknown, Schwartzís nearby apartment bore the brunt of the storm's fury. Katrina blew the roof off the Carrollton Avenue building and destroyed all his possessions.

He stayed at a friend's house to ride out the rest of the big blow on Aug. 29, likening his adventure to the Three Little Pigs: "I left the straw house and went straight to the brick house, man."

Later that day, with 40 mph winds still blowing at 11 a.m., he went out to the 17th Street Canal to check on his 30-foot Lafitte skiff.

"But it was gone, brother. Just nothing but a big pile of debris up against the bridge."

Standing on the levee with a friend looking at the debris in the canal, Schwartz said, one thought immediately came to mind: "Life as I know it is gone."

Now, 3 weeks later, Schwartz said he still hasn't seen even a piece of debris that he recognizes as part of the boat he used for commercial fishing. His other job, at Schaeffer's seafood restaurant, is also on hold because of storm damage.

STAFF PHOTOS BY RUSTY COSTANZA

Pilings and rubble are all that remain of Sid-Mar's restaurant, a Bucktown landmark. Wind proved to be more of a threat to the fishing village than water.

There are plenty of other people dealing with serious damage in Bucktown, the fishing village that has grown up where the lake meets the canal.

While the breach from the canal poured water east into New Orleans, not west into Bucktown, many Bucktown homes still took on anywhere from one inch to two feet of water. And the wind damage, particularly close to the lake, was fierce in spots. Several apartment buildings lost all or most of their top floor.

Trees and limbs were littered everywhere, and some older slate roofs were peeled off in spots.

Edward Lestrade, 84, said he was surprised by the damage to the slate roof on his Seminole Avenue home. The big, brown brick corner house had two different tarps to cover up exposed portions of the roof on Thursday, as Lestrade walked barefooted around his property to ensure he was ready for Hurricane Ritaís rain.

"Right now, I kind of wish the storm had just taken it out completely," he said of Katrina. "There's so much to do."

Closer to West Esplanade Avenue, water was often a bigger problem than wind.

Kim Wilkerson had about three inches of water inside her Nursery Avenue home. Her daughter, whose home two blocks away had two feet of water, tried to describe the damage in the neighborhood while Wilkerson was in Tennessee. But Wilkerson said she was still shocked when she arrived back in Bucktown earlier this week.

"You just look around, and you keep wanting to come across a block you know, that you recognize," she said. "But as you keep driving, that block never comes."

Jefferson Parish Council Chairman Tom Capella said Bucktown fared pretty well from a flooding perspective but was hit harder than many east bank neighborhoods by the wind. Sid-Marís, for example..

"That's kind of like a symbol of the area," Capella said. "But there's just no sign of it anymore. It is just gone."

But Capella said residents he has talked to are rebuilding, and those still evacuated are ready to return.

"No disrespect to these other areas, but people say they want to eat their crawfish here."

Capella said he has also heard, through back channels, that the folks at Sid-Mar's plan to rebuild in Bucktown.

That's also the plan for Malik Masood, owner of Seminole Convenience Store. Masood and his daughter were cleaning the front of the business on Thursday, getting ready for a health department inspection. Despite roof damage to the rear of the business, he is ready and eager to open.

Operating the 10-year-old store will keep his mind off his other store (destroyed) on Fleur de Lis just across the 17th Street Canal in New Orleans and his Metairie home (flooded).

He even manages to joke about the looters who took virtually all of the $26,000 to $28,000 in stock inside the Bucktown shop: "Everyone has a profession to do, so they just do their profession, which is stealing things," he said.

And although it might be easy to give up, Masood said, he refuses to do that.

Resiliency also is a part of Frank Schwartz, who said he was born in a fishing camp on the 17th Street Canal and will do what it takes to rebuild his life in Bucktown.

"There's a lot of work, and I'm getting old," he said, as his eyes started to twinkle just a bit. "But I'll do it."

Lafitte mayor's father dies

Storms force funeral to be delayed

By Joe Darby
West Bank bureau

With damage caused by Hurricane Katrina yet to be repaired and the threat of Hurricane Rita on the horizon, Jean Lafitte Mayor Tim Kerner has had his hands full trying to take care of the 1,500 people living in the bayou town.

But Kerner has the added burden of grieving for his father, Leo Kerner Jr., the founder and first mayor of Jean Lafitte, who died Sunday in Baton Rouge. Leo Kerner, 81, had heart disease.

Tim Kerner has been so busy trying to deal with the storms that he delayed funeral services for his father. Services are set for Monday, barring further complications from Rita.

Kerner recently cut his work day from 18 hours to 16 or 17 hours. He has been sleeping on a cot in his office.

"He's an extraordinary person, dealing with the hurricanes while suffering the loss of his dad," said Yvette Crain, the mayor's secretary at Town Hall. "He's been worrying about everybody else, whether they have electricity and things like that."

Police Chief Mary Jo Hargis, who like Kerner has worked long days since Katrina, said that under similar circumstances, she doesn't know whether she could function as well as the mayor has.

Ironically, Kerner said, he got to see his father before he died because of hurricane-related duties.

"I'd gone to see him earlier for a couple of hours at the Baton Rouge General (Hospital), and I wanted to go back, but everybody needed me here," Kerner said. "Then Congressman William Jefferson's office had arranged for the town to get the use of a Dodge truck. It had to be picked up in Baton Rouge, so me and my wife made the trip up there, and I went to see Dad. Just before we got there he had fallen across his bed. He was in and out of consciousness, and he died 14 hours later."

Leo Kerner was a justice of the peace from 1960 to 1981 and was instrumental in incorporating the fishing village into the town of Jean Lafitte. He was elected its first mayor in 1974 and served until 1991, when his son took over. The elder Kerner served as a member of the Town Council from 1991 until his death.

Leo Kerner Jr.
First mayor of Jean Lafitte died Sunday

"Before the creation of the town, we had gravel roads here, people got their water from cisterns, and the schools were terrible," Tim Kerner said. "There wouldn't be a Jean Lafitte without my dad."

Their town was battered by Katrina, and officials were preparing Thursday for what Rita might bring.

On Thursday, Kerner called for a voluntary evacuation, although he said he's cautiously optimistic that Jean Lafitte will not be severely impacted if Rita hits far enough west.

"They're expecting 3- to 5-foot tides, and we could handle that, although there might be some flooding in the low-lying areas outside the levees," he said. "But we're working to sandbag any gaps in the levees right now, we've got four 12-inch pumps ready to go, and we're picking up debris along the side streets. We've done a good job on picking up the debris so far."

Even though 30 residents were left homeless by Katrina, the town has been able to get supplies of water, food and ice from outside agencies, he said. "I know there are people a lost worse off than us."

In addition to his son Tim, Leo Kerner is survived by four other sons, Charles, Larry, Willie and Leo Kerner III; a daughter, Thelma Judice; a sister, Ida Mae Zar; and a companion, Amy Thompson.

73-year-old evacuee is freed from jail

Grandmother laughs at looting allegation

By Allen Powell II
River Parishes bureau

When Merlene Maten left her Kenner hotel room Aug. 30, she claims she was hoping just to grab clothes and food from her car before rising floodwaters made it inaccessible.

But instead of a quick trip to the car, Maten took a 17-day odyssey to various jails and a state penitentiary after a Kenner police officer accused the 73-year old, diabetic grandmother of looting a nearby grocery store for beer and sausages.

"In this particular case when the law is broken and witnessed by police, we have a duty to uphold the law. We have a duty to enforce the law (against) looting."
CAPT. STEVE CARAWAY
Kenner Police Department spokesman

Now free on her own recognizance after national news organizations brought attention to her plight, she awaits an Oct. 14 trial date for the looting charge. Maten, who evacuated from her New Orleans home, is staying with relatives in Breaux Bridge.

Attorney Daniel Becnel III of LaPlace said his client has several witnesses who will say she had her own food and had no need to steal from a store. He said his focus is on getting the charges against Maten dismissed.

Maten's journey, which included mandatory tours of the Kenner and Gretna jails, as well as a stop at a temporary New Orleans jail at the Greyhound bus terminal, began at about 9:30 a.m. on the Tuesday after Katrina hit.

Maten said a Kenner police officer demanded that she come to his car after he spotted her rooting through her car for supplies she took with her when she and her ill, 80-year-old husband evacuated on Sunday. After wading to the squad car, Maten said the officer accused her of kicking in the glass of a nearby store and looting it along with several other individuals earlier that morning.

Kenner Police Department spokesman Capt. Steve Caraway said officers saw Maten leave a store near the Kenner police station with beer and sausages. The officers applied the same looting laws that were used for others, he said.

"In this particular case when the law is broken and witnessed by police, we have a duty to uphold the law," Caraway said. "We have a duty to enforce the law (against) looting."

But Maten firmly denies ever leaving the hotel with her husband after they arrived. Although she admits to picking up a package of sausage she saw floating by her car along with other debris, she said she also brought her own sausage and other food when she evacuated.

Maten, a church deaconess, said she doesn't even drink alcohol.

"I don't even know where no store or nothing is around here," said Maten, who laughed at the idea of her 5-foot-2, 154-pound frame breaking down anyone's door.

Maten was placed in a holding cell at the Kenner; bail was set at $50,000. She said officers never allowed her to notify her husband that she was being taken into custody and that he sat in their room convinced something horrible had happened to her.

Maten said she was transferred to the Gretna jail and then to the temporary New Orleans jail. She ended up at the St. Gabriel Correctional Facility for Women, where she spent 11 days housed with about 40 to 50 other alleged looters.

At St. Gabriel, Maten said she and other inmates had regular prayer service and that she served as a de-facto counselor to many of the women, who referred to her as "grandma" or "mother" when they asked her to pray for them. She said her advice seemed to soothe some inmates.

Kenner seeking trailers to house workers

Lottery system to be used to distribute homes

By Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

Kenner is trying to secure 100 trailers for city employees and will allocate them through a lottery system, Mayor Phil Capitano's chief of staff Phil Ramon told the Kenner City Council Thursday.

Ramon said the city expects to receive $2 million from FEMA to buy trailers, as well as reimbursement for the 26 that the city has already purchased from a Baton Rouge company.

The first city-purchased trailers were distributed mainly to police officers and government workers who didn't evacuate and had available space for a trailer, deputy Chief Administrative Officer Carol Luna said.

Now, the city will begin a lottery that distributes temporary homes to police officers first, then firefighters, then city workers.

Ramon added that the city has opted to join Jefferson Parish in asking for a total of 4,000 trailers and is working to secure sites to locate trailers.

Kenner City Councilman Dominic Weilbaecher asked if city workers would be penalized if they can't return to work soon.

Ramon said all but 50 city workers returned when asked last Wednesday. Ramon said workers who have not returned can use vacation or comp time, but won't get paid if they don't have any of that time left.

"As for penalties, it hasn't even been discussed," Ramon said. "Our position is we want them to return to work as quickly and as safely as they possibly can."

He said employees should report to supervisors and can be put on a list if they need a trailer.

Federal aid, teacher retention is called key in Plaquemines

6 of parish's 9 schools damaged by Katrina

By Sandra Barbier
Staff writer

The fate of Plaquemines Parish's public education system depends on retaining the school district's employees and getting financial aid from the federal government, Superintendent Jim Hoyle said.

Hurricane Katrina damaged six of the parish's nine schools, possibly beyond repair, but plans are to resume classes Oct. 17 at Belle Chasse Primary, Belle Chasse Middle and Belle Chasse High schools, Hoyle said Wednesday.

Plaquemines students, including those displaced from schools in Phoenix, Port Sulphur, Buras and Boothville, and those who have relocated to the parish, will be welcomed to the three Belle Chasse campuses, Hoyle said.

Belle Chasse Middle School also sustained damage, but if its roof is not repaired by Oct. 17, those students will be temporarily relocated to the high school, Hoyle said.

The district may also platoon students, he said. Platooning involves having students and staff use a school in a morning and an afternoon shift, basically doubling a school's capacity.

"I think people will have to understand: In Orleans, St. Bernard, Plaquemines and maybe parts of Jefferson, it's a survival game right now," Hoyle said. "We're fighting for our lives."

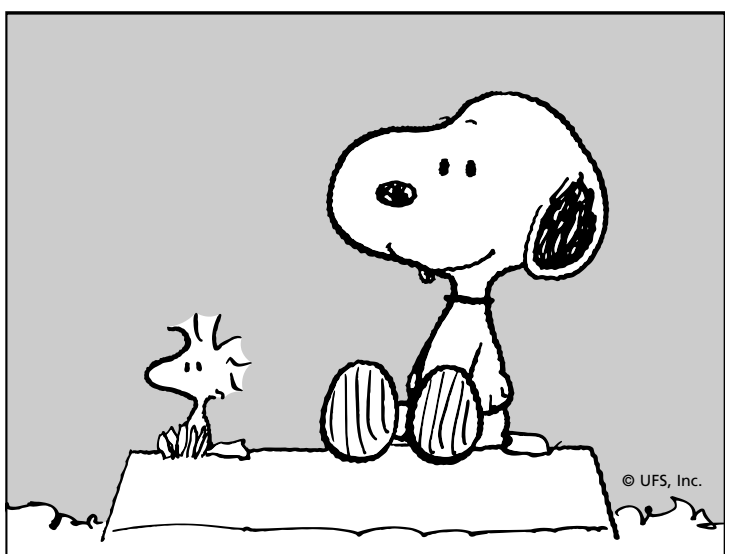
Critical to survival is financial aid, Hoyle said. "What kind of a sales tax is there? What kind of property tax? Essentially, they are nonexistent right now," he said.

"We need state help, we need federal help," he said. "We will not make it without the federal government."

State education officials have been supportive, but the district is looking to the federal government for major financial aid, which is needed quickly, Hoyle said.

"We'd like our answers yesterday, but we know it's a legislative process," he said, adding that money is needed to pay the district's employees and to provide benefits.

"What complicates that is most of these people lost everything," he said.



About half the district's employees lived in the southern half of the parish, which was the first part of the state hit by Katrina, he said. The loss included several apartment buildings operated by the Plaquemines Parish School Board for teachers, one of the devices the district used to attract and retain teachers in remote areas.

"We had great academics," Hoyle said, adding that the district's test scores were in the state's upper ranks and improving. "That's why I want to retain our people."

Buildings will be the next concern, he said. Three weeks after the storm, Phoenix High School still has water. Boothville-Venice High School, built on concrete pilings 18 feet off the ground after the old building was destroyed by Hurricane Betsy, still had 16 feet of water from a storm surge that entered the first floor, he said.

But Hoyle said school and parish officials learned from mistakes made after Betsy in 1965. Schools were slow to reopen and they lost their professional staffs.

"We've got to retain our teachers," he said.

JEFFERSON PARISH PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM — EDUCATION FOR A BRIGHTER FUTURE

The Jefferson Parish Public School System's School Board and Superintendent are concerned that everyone is safe and well.

Following Hurricane Katrina, we are working hard every day to restore our schools.

Some schools, which were not significantly damaged, will open the week of October 3 to receive students.

Principals, teachers, and support staff reported in last week to begin the process of cleaning and rebuilding our facilities in order to start school on time.

There are many challenges facing our system, but the Jefferson Parish Public School System will be ready to accept returning students and new students from surrounding parishes that were devastated by the hurricane.

In every challenge, there is great opportunity. The Jefferson Parish Public School System will seize the opportunity.

Jefferson Parish Public School System will return as a leader of advanced curriculum, challenged instruction, and supporter of economic development for our parish.

Levee Board chief got thousands in back pay

Opinions differ on his eligibility

By Frank Donze
Staff writer

Less than a month before Hurricane Katrina wrecked the Orleans Levee Board's finances and left the levees it maintains in shambles, board President Jim Huey requested and got nearly $100,000 in back pay that the agency's hired legal advisers — one of whom is a relative of his wife -- determined he was entitled to receive.

The payment for about $96,000, which was made without approval from the board or its staff attorney, came on the advice of Gerard Metzger and George Carmouche, two contract lawyers with close ties to Huey, who was originally appointed by former Gov. Edwin Edwards in 1992 and reappointed by Govs. Mike Foster and Kathleen Blanco. Carmouche, of Baton Rouge, is a first cousin of Huey's wife, Becky Metzger of Metairie, and has been a close friend of Huey's since the two attended high school together at Holy Cross.

After cursory research, board officials indicated several months ago that Huey, who has no formal administrative duties, was not eligible for any compensation beyond the $75 per diem that board members can receive for each day they work on agency business.

State lawmakers also rejected the extra pay for Huey. In the waning hours of the Legislature's 2005 session, state Sen. Francis Heitmeier, a Huey ally, tried unsuccessfully to make Huey eligible for a $60,000 annual salary by inserting the pay provision into an unrelated piece of legislation.

In a memo obtained by The Times-Picayune that was sent to Levee Board managing director Max Hearn about two weeks after the Legislature adjourned, Huey wrote that he had been informed that an earlier legal interpretation of state law rejecting his efforts to be paid a salary "was misconstrued."

Huey noted in the July 8 memo that while the agency "has a huge staff and an executive director who deals with day-to-day operations, I still spend a great deal of time discussing policy matters, signing contracts and holding meetings dealing with levee district operations."

Huey has also said that the job of president had gotten increasingly time-consuming since he took the helm, with the board taking on a variety of initiatives, ranging from the now-dormant effort to privatize Lakefront Airport, the construction of a new administration building and the rebuilding of Lakeshore Drive.

In the memo, Huey said, "the functions that I perform are administrative and clearly fall within the purview" of a state law that permits the presidents of other levee boards to collect a $1,000-a-month salary.

"I elect to draw the salary," Huey wrote, retroactive to June 19, 1996, the day he was chosen board president. Huey instructed Hearn to deduct all per-diem payments he had received through that date and to halt the per-diem pay immediately and initiate a regular monthly payment of $1,000 beginning July 19.

Contacted in Baton Rouge, where board officials have relocated temporarily and were preparing Thursday to hold their first post-Katrina meeting, Huey expressed anger and disbelief that The Times-Picayune would inquire about such a "minimal" issue while his agency and the entire state were scrambling to recover from a disaster and bracing for the approach of Hurricane Rita.

Huey, who labeled the payment "legitimate," charged that his board has been subjected to "horrible news coverage" in the weeks after Katrina laid waste to Lakefront Airport, the Belle of Orleans casino boat and much of the agency's other sources of revenue. Huey said he "probably" would resign after the payments become public.

"My heart has dropped. I've devoted so much of my time, effort and life to this place and now in the middle of a crisis when I haven't slept in days, I can't believe I have to deal with an issue like this when I've got all this going on," Huey said. "Look, I know it has to be addressed, and it would have been addressed at the proper time."

While he doesn't believe the salary requires approval from the full board, Huey said he had planned to seek ratification from his colleagues at a future meeting. Huey said he couldn't remember the exact amount of money he had received, but recalled that he netted about $57,000 after taxes.

Lacking paperwork, Hearn couldn't cite a specific figure, but said that $96,000 "was in the ballpark." He confirmed that Huey was paid the $1,000 salary in July, August and September.

Carmouche could not provide a copy of his legal opinion, but said he prepared the document after consulting face-to-face with state Attorney General Charles Foti. Carmouche said Foti, who could not be reached for comment, agreed there was legal precedent for Huey to collect the salary.

A key factor in his recommendation, Carmouche said, was his belief that Huey had earned the money over the past decade.

"He did the work without compensation," Carmouche said. "He was entitled to it.'

Congregants once were lost, but now are found

Churches locate scattered members

By Bruce Nolan
Staff writer

The same winds that shattered New Orleans neighborhoods scattered its faith communities, and in the weeks following the storm, once-solid New Orleans churches are struggling to reconstitute themselves worshipping in new, unfamiliar cities.

The rebuilding presents enormous challenges to displaced pastors struggling to find hundreds of church members scattered across the country. For those pastors, the stake is material as well as pastoral; most relied on their congregations for a significant part of their personal income.

In places such as Baton Rouge, Houston and Atlanta, displaced New Orleans pastors are locating a few score of their former church members and holding worship services in borrowed churches or university student centers.

Many are making plans to put down temporary roots in new cities, usually with an eye toward re-entering New Orleans as soon as possible.

"This is going to be a Herculean task. I've got people in 34 states: Denver, Oklahoma, Washington, you name it," said the Rev. Willie Gable of Progressive Baptist Church, once a Central City church of about 400 members.

In Houston, New Light Christian Center has devoted a portion of its Web site, www.newlight.org, to a listing of New Orleans pastorsí cell phone numbers so congregants can find them.

But that has proved to be a tool of limited usefulness.

Instead, pastors have found that the dense, thickly textured social networks that held their church members together is largely self-healing. Scattered church members are finding each other and their pastors by word of mouth, facilitated by cell phones and text messaging, many said.

"Church networks are very, very powerful. I think politicians don't understand just how efficient they are," said the Rev. Antoine Barriere of Household of Faith Full Gospel Baptist Church.

With Hurricane Katrina approaching Aug. 27, Barriere urged all the 1,000 members of his church to leave New Orleans. He launched word by cell phone that he and his family were headed for Houston.

When he arrived, he began to locate nearby church members and they began to locate him, he said. Word spread among church members hunkered down in Houston hotel rooms, relativesí homes and shelters that Barriere would conduct a worship service the following Sunday.

"The first couple of days, it was all text messaging," he said.

The first Sunday after the storm, about 80 members showed up for the first post-Katrina meeting of Household of Faith-in-exile, Barriere said. They prayed and sang together in Houston in the borrowed Good Hope Missionary Baptist Church.

By last week, the service had grown to 300, he said.

Some pastors have found themselves holding services for small bands of dispersed members in different cities every week since the storm.

Like some other pastors in the National Baptist Convention USA, the Rev. Charles Southall of First Emanuel Baptist Church kept a date to attend that denomination's annual convention in Atlanta the week after the storm. He located 50 or more First Emanuel members in Atlanta and worshipped with them, then returned to Houston to minister to First Emanuel members surfacing there, he said.

Bishop Paul S. Morton of Greater St. Stephen Full Gospel Baptist Church, the largest congregation in New Orleans, is steering church members in Baton Rouge, Houston and Atlanta to nearby churches affiliated with the Full Gospel Baptist Church Fellowship that Morton launched in the early 1990s.

At present, Morton or his wife, co-pastor Debra Morton, plan to provide weekend services in each city for Greater St. Stephen members, spokeswoman Angela Young said.

"I tell them we may not be able to come together in a church building but we're still a church," said the Rev. C.S. Gordon, who traveled from Dallas to Baton Rouge to hold a service last week with members of his New Zion Baptist Church. They met in the student center at Southern University, he said.

For all, the larger question is: Now what? What will these scattered communities look like in 30, 60 or 90 days?

Most pastors, such as Southall, Gordon and Gable, hope to stabilize their remnant churches close to New Orleans, often in Baton Rouge, building around a core of displaced members from New Orleans.

Southall said that, psychologically, the remnant church he hopes to nourish in Baton Rouge is merely a satellite location of his First Emanuel in New Orleans, until the congregation can return.

Some already have enrolled their children in schools in Houston or Atlanta, and will have to reconstitute their churches as best they can while anchored where they are.

Financially, the pastors are sometimes in as much economic trouble as their displaced flocks.

"I'm poor, but not broke yet," said Gable, who left New Orleans with one suit and a few changes of casual clothes. "I thought I'd be gone just a few days," he said.

Yet by many standards, Gable is lucky. His wife's job with a nonprofit foundation can be done from Baton Rouge as well as New Orleans. And Gable also pastors Macedonia Baptist Church in Hammond, which was unaffected by the storm.

Even so, Gable is digging deep into his credit card reserves, he said.

Ahead is nothing but uncertainty, many pastors said.

It was not clear when hundreds of small and mid-sized churches, and their neighborhoods, might be ready to be reoccupied. Nor does anyone know how many families who fled will come back, and how many will make new lives elsewhere.

"None of really know who we've lost," Gordon said. "We may not know until sometime next year.

"I'm starting all over," he said. "I know most of us are."

3 looting arrests made in St. Bernard

By Bob Warren
Staff Writer

Three people were arrested Wednesday for looting in St. Bernard Parish, the first looting arrests in the parish since Hurricane Katrina tore through Aug. 29, authorities said.

The three were booked after deputies stopped them on Paris Road Wednesday night and spotted dirty tools in their vehicle, St. Bernard Parish Sheriff's Office spokesman Steve Cannizaro said.

Cannizaro said deputies had earlier received reports of a vehicle seen driving through the Lexington Place subdivision in Meraux. Cannizaro said no one should be in the parish, which is closed to residents due to the threat of Hurricane Rita in the Gulf of Mexico.

The vehicle, a Chevrolet truck pulling a trailer carrying lawn care equipment, was stopped on Paris Road, and the trio inside could not explain why they had been driving through Lexington Place, Cannizaro said.

One of the three inside the truck, Paul Taylor, 33, 2708 Nunez Drive, Meraux, owns a lawn care business.

But in addition to the lawn care equipment, deputies noticed a laundry basket full of messy tools that appeared to have been taken from areas that flooded, Cannizaro said. During a search, deputies also found 3 ounces of cocaine.

Cannizaro said deputies believe the trio stole the tools from area residences.

Taylor, and Louis Jones, 38, and Temikia Jones, 31, both of 2609 Guerra Drive, Violet, were booked with looting and possession of cocaine with intent to distribute.

Nearly all of St. Bernard Parish flooded during Hurricane Katrina, and parish officials have worked tirelessly to drain the parish and clear the streets to enable residents to return to view their homes and salvage valuables. A plan to allow residents back to certain sections of the parish was put on hold this week after Hurricane Rita entered the Gulf.

"People shouldn't think we're not enforcing the law right now because we're in emergency mode," St. Bernard Parish Sheriff Jack Stephens said.

Some students must get to school on their own

St. Charles lacks enough buses for all

By John-John Williams IV
River Parishes bureau

Displaced students who attend private schools in St. Charles Parish will have to find their own ride to school for the time being, according to the transportation operations coordinator for the public school district.

With a projected influx of more than 1,600 displaced students, the district will have its hands full transporting the new students to school and currently does not have enough buses or drivers to provide service to the almost 400 displaced students that now attend private schools in St. Charles Parish.

St. Charles Parish Public School District currently provides daily transportation to 300 students attending Sacred Heart of Jesus School in Norco, St. Charles Borromeo School in Destrehan and Boutte Christian Academy, said Gary Martin, transportation operations coordinator for the school system.

The district is reimbursed the cost of transporting private-school students by the state, Martin explained, and it will continue to provide transportation to the private-school students who were enrolled before the hurricane. But, he said, the district cannot handle additional students at those schools.

St. Charles Borromeo reported to St. Charles that it received more than 300 new students.

"I'm sure the other schools have more students, too,î Martin said. "We don't have enough buses in our fleet (to accommodate the extra students)."

The districtís fleet of 150 buses provides transportation to 8,500 students daily, Martin said.

St. Charles ordered 18 additional buses.

"So far we've only received two," Martin explained. "Every district in the state has an influx of new students and has ordered more buses."

And even if St. Charles gets the additional buses, it does not have enough people to operate them.

"So far I have only been able to recruit two new drivers," Martin said. "I have tried to contact Orleans, Plaquemines and St. Bernard parishes in an attempt to hire new drivers."

Martin said he was encouraged that only about 400 students registered for district schools on the first official day of formal registration Wednesday.

"Only one-third registered," Martin said. "Friday afternoon Iíll have a firm understanding of what we are facing next week."

Kim Babineaux, administrator at Boutte Christian Academy, said she was unaware of the district's decision not to provide bus service to the new students.

"That hasn't impacted us as of yet," said Babineaux. The school currently has 11 new displaced students in addition to the 264 students who attended the school before Katrina.

You have been warned: Watch out for fraud

Contractors may prey on storm victims

By Greg Thomas
Real estate writer

With at least 360,0000 residences in the metro New Orleans area suffering "extreme to moderate" damage from Hurricane Katrina, building experts and insurance investigators are urging consumers to beware of rip-off contractors who may try to take advantage of storm victims.

The National Insurance Crime Bureau has established a Baton Rouge office and, in coordination with the Louisiana State Police, is investigating complaints of both unscrupulous contractors and consumers who may turn in bogus claims, said Fred Stadtler, a special agent with the NICB, an association representing more than 1,000 auto, homeowner and commercial insurance companies.

"A major portion of the population is going to get fleeced," said Philip Hoffman, president of the Home Builders Association of Greater New Orleans and owner of Hoffman Custom Built Homes of LaPlace.

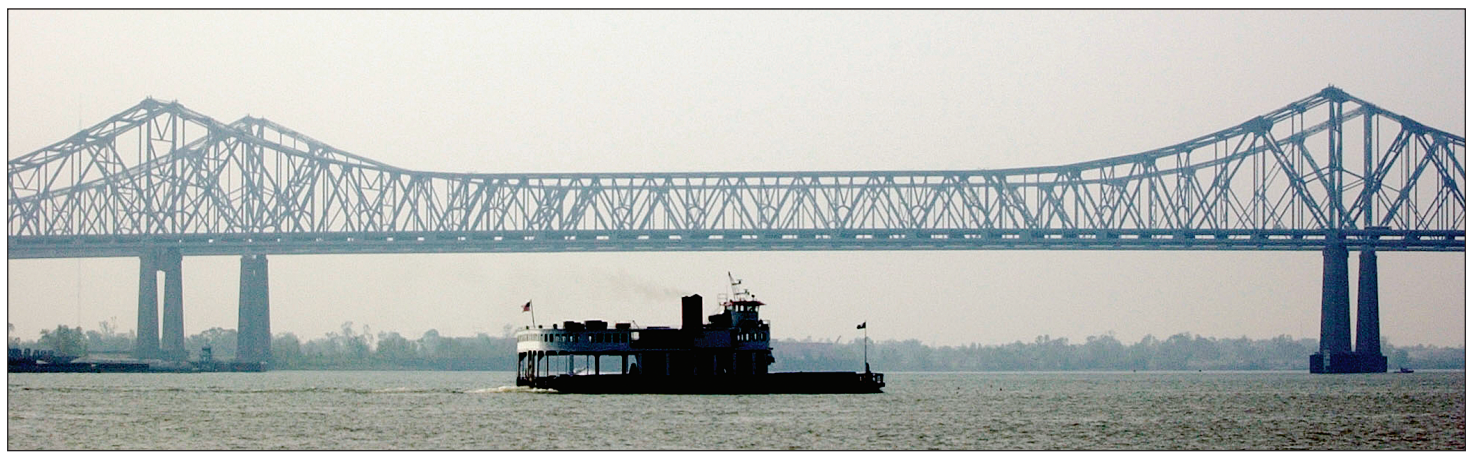
Hoffman said that after a disaster like Katrina, unlicensed workers often move into the area and go door to door trying to line up jobs with desperate homeowners.

One problem is that the massive reconstruction effort will require more builders than Louisiana has. Hoffman said reconstruction could require as many as 100,000 workers to get the job done. But members of the Home Builders Association normally employ just 10,000. And many licensed contractors in the metro area are now shorthanded because crew members have evacuated, lost their homes, or are out of contact.

The labor shortage could worsen if Hurricane Rita introduces a new round of devastation.

Local and state governments are establishing new policies and procedures to prevent rip-off contractors.Some parishes and the state are setting up streamlined licensing processes so all out-of-state workers will be checked out before they begin work, Hoffman said.

And recently passed legislation means more contractors must obtain a state license. Until 2003, only general contractors performing work valued at $50,000 or more were required to have a state general contractor license. But that year, the Legislature passed a law requiring contractors performing jobs valued at $7,500 or more to have a license through the Louisiana State Licensing Board for Contractors. The board also licenses mold remediation contractors and includes on its Web site, www.lslbc.state.la.us, information on state licensing requirements.



Stadtler recommends that consumers demand to see a contractor's state license, check references, even if the contractor is from out of state, read contracts carefully, pay invoices for work completed and never give a down payment of more than 10 percent for materials. He also advised to carefully watch out for the theft of delivered buildings materials.

Consumers with contractor problems should call (866) 310-7879 or send e-mail to complaints@lslbc.louisiana.gov. Consumers can verify a contractor's license at the same phone number.

Dock Board assesses port's future

30% of facilities wiped out by storm

By Jaquetta White
Business writer

STAFF PHOTO BY BRETT DUKE

Across an empty river, the Algiers ferry makes its way to Canal Street on Tuesday. The Port of New Orleans terminals along the Mississippi River were largely spared damage from Katrina.

The Port of New Orleans is operating at 15 to 20 percent of its capacity, the port's president and chief executive, Gary LaGrange, said Thursday during the first Dock Board meeting since Hurricane Katrina halted activity at the port.

The meeting is one sign that the port is attempting to return to business.

"The day after the storm, everybody was telling us it would take six months to start up again," LaGrange said.

Instead, the port has set six months from now as its goal to return to 100 percent capacity. Seventy percent capacity could be reached in three months, he said.

In a sign of recovery, five ships were docked at the port Thursday waiting to be unloaded. Already a container ship, steel ship and several barges have been worked at the port by crews living on military ships docked at an Uptown wharf.

Unfortunately, the ships in port Thursday could not be unloaded because of the threat of Hurricane Rita. They had to be tied down and instead will be unloaded Monday.

There are other challenges. For starters, about 30 percent of port's operating facilities were wiped out by the storm. Although terminals on the Mississippi River were largely spared, including the Napoleon Avenue Container Terminal, facilities downriver and especially on the Industrial Canal were all but destroyed. Among them are the Maersk Sealand terminal and the New Orleans Cold Storage dockside warehouse on Jourdan Road.

"I would say that France Road and Jourdan Road are close to being a total loss," LaGrange said.

About 52 million pounds of chicken leg quarters were frozen in the cold storage warehouse when Katrina struck. The chicken parts, which normally are shipped frozen to countries around the world, are rotting in the New Orleans heat and have been condemned by the United States Department of Agriculture and the Food and Drug Administration, said Mark Blanchard, the company's vice president. It will take three to four weeks to remove the chicken and clean the massive warehouse that housed it. The chicken will be taken to a landfill, Blanchard said.

"Business is certainly interrupted," he said.

New Orleans Cold Storage now is operating from its other offices in Houston and North Carolina, though the Houston office has been evacuated for Hurricane Rita.

Blanchard said his business could operate again in some fashion in November from another New Orleans warehouse on Alvar Street, which is smaller and has minimal damage. Since it is not a dockside facility, chicken stored there would have to be taken by truck to ships.

Meanwhile, nearly one month after Hurricane Katrina slammed ashore, there still are not enough truck drivers working at the port to haul cargo in and out. That is worrisome because truck drivers for the most part are mobile and can work from anywhere. LaGrange said some truck drivers might have permanently relocated.

"Truck drivers were hard to find before," LaGrange said. "That's a very vulnerable area now. Without trucks there are no ships. Without ships there are no jobs."

What's more, rail lines have been even slower than trucks to return.

Some, however, would say that the biggest obstacle will be in attracting customers back to the port whose cargo had been diverted to competing cities.

If you got a $2,500 check from State Farm Insurance for living expenses incurred in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, you might not want to spend it all.

Unlike Allstate Insurance and other major insurers doing business in Louisiana, State Farm will be applying its standard deductible to such payments. That means most of the company's policyholders could wind up being asked to pay back a big chunk of the money.

In fact, a State Farm spokesman acknowledged that is the reason some of its customers have refused the assistance. With 35 percent of the market, State Farm is the largest residential insurer in Louisiana. The $2,500 payment is the only help many of the insurer's customers will get from State Farm for Katrina-related losses.

"Technically, if you have this advance, you are going to have to substantiate what your additional living expenses were, and if your only (covered) loss is the loss of use of your home, your deductible does come into play," said John Wiscaver, a spokesman for State Farm's catastrophe team.

State Sen. James David Cain, chairman of the Senate Insurance Committee, said State Farm is making a "terrible decision.

"It is really not fair to the people of Louisiana to do that," said Cain, who has been sharply critical of the way insurers have responded to the catastrophic storm. "If that happens, we are going to hold some hearings to bring them to task. We may not be able to do anything to them, but maybe we can shame them to death."

NuStart scouts Miss., La. for new nuclear plant

Mary Judice
Business writer

Entergy Corp. plants in Mississippi and Louisiana could be potential locations for the first nuclear power plant built in the United States in more than 30 years.

A consortium of utilities called NuStart, which includes Entergy, said Thursday that it will develop an application for advanced approval of two potential nuclear sites: Entergy's Grand Gulf site in Port Gibson, Miss., and a Tennessee Valley Authority property in Alabama.

Entergy, meanwhile, said separately Thursday that it will develop a similar application for its River Bend Station in St. Francisville.

A decision has not been made on whether to seek an actual license for the construction of any of the reactors. The applications for advanced approval simply would allow for quicker completion of the project if a go-ahead is given. A decision on whether to build any of these plants will be made later.

"A new nuclear unit would also mean greater diversity of fuel, and that means more stable electric rates for our 2.7 million electricity customers," said Gary Taylor, chief executive of Entergy Nuclear.

Entergy has built and operated nuclear plants for many years, but five years ago the company embarked on a program of expanding its nuclear-generating capacity by purchasing operating plants. Today Entergy operates 10 reactors in Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi and the Northeast and is the second-largest nuclear generator in the United States.

FALCON

Larry F. Falcon. October 16,1935-September 19,2005. As Hurricane Katrina bore down on New Orleans, our dad evacuated to the Emerald Coast. Unfortunately, the destruction of his beloved city was more than his heart could handle. On Monday, September 19, 2005, he died suddenly here in Florida at Twin Cities Hospital after suffering two heart attacks. He leaves behind his daughter Jo Ann Falcom Toups and her husband Byron of Metairie, LA, his son Roger F. Falcon of Metairie, and daughter Mary Beth Mizell and her husband Chris of Niceville. He also had two wonderful granddaughters, Kayla Dufrene of New Orleans and Hannah Christianne Mizell of Niceville. His beloved wife Mary Jane Newell Falcon passed away just three years ago. Dad was born on October 16, 1935 in Norco, LA to the late Katherine and Leonce Falcon. He was a lifelong resident of Louisiana and lived in Metairie for over forty years. A graduate of Destrehan High School and Tulane University, he proudly served his country in the Army for two years. After his service, he taught history for 27 years, primarily at T.H. Harris Junior High in Metairie. Upon retirement he began a new career at the Louisiana Department of Motor Vehicles. He was loved by both colleagues and customers at the Kenner Driver's License Office. He really enjoyed all the people he met there until his second retirement several years ago. Dad will be remembered for his wonderful sense of humor. He almost always had a smile on his face and could make anyone laugh with his wry wit. He was also a devoted supporter of Tulane University athletics. He loved all Tulane sports but especially his beloved Tulane Green Wave football team. He approached each season with enthusiasm and optimism and was a season ticket holder for many years. We've entrusted Heritage Gardens Funeral Home with local arrangements in Florida but due to the circumstances in New Orleans we will be having a memorial for him there at at later date so that his colleagues, friends, and family can properly honor his inspired life. We'll miss you dad.

The flotsam and jetsam left behind by Hurricane Katrina included these textbooks, which ended up in mud near a rusted fence at Abramson High School in eastern New Orleans.

How better schools could save you

As I watched the most vulnerable suffer and die in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, several thoughts crossed my mind.

1. No education leads to no job, which leads to poverty and no car, which leads to - you guessed it — you ain't getting out.

2. No populace with marketable job skills leads to no corporations worth their salt willing to locate in or near New Orleans, which leads to no tax revenue and you guessed it — no schools or police force worth their salt.

3. The continued reliance on the Saints, Mardi Gras, tourism and low-income, dead-end jobs is short-sighted and produces a very unstable tax base.

In the rebuilding of New Orleans, I hope and pray that we will do the following:

1. Rebuild the schools from the inside out with achievement and discipline the rule rather than the exception. Sixty percent attendance on the first day of school is not a success.

2. Redevelop housing for New Orleans' poorest in the manner of the St. Thomas area. The poor must see success to achieve success.

3. The housing codes and levees must be rebuilt to withstand the worst, as we know the warming of the Gulf of Mexico only encourages more storms of the devastating strength of Katrina. Put federal money towards this rather than spending it all on patting down and frisking Amish ladies at the airport, as the Transportation Security Administration does now.

4. Develop trade schools in partnership with manufacturing industries spun off from the massive amounts of raw materials that come through the Port of Orleans.

5. Develop a climate of personal responsibility and achievement. This starts at the top.

In my 20 years in New Orleans, all I have seen is chicanery, shenanigans, greed and graft. This has got to change.

Don't wait for 'cavalry'

If Hurricane Katrina didn't prove the ineptitude of government in general and of our governor and the New Orleans mayor in particular, nothing ever will.

Our brilliant governor blamed President Bush and told everyone to pray. Mayor Ray Nagin blamed Bush and went on television and cursed and of course talked about the "cavalry" not showing up. Obviously he has watched too many John Wayne movies. He is the one who let many thousands of people fend for themselves during the evacuation. Many had depended on the government their whole lives for everything, and they just stayed and waited for the government to solve their problems one more time.

Of course Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton had to show up and spew their vile racial comments. I don't remember them or the NAACP sending one boat for rescue or one ounce of food for the stranded folks in New Orleans. Anyone with half a brain knows the problem is poverty, not race. Maybe Jackson and Sharpton should have been in New Orleans for the last 40 years asking the poor why they don't finish high school or have babies they can't afford and out of wedlock. The Advocate in Baton Rouge had a picture of one evacuee who had no money or place to go but had a 7-month-old baby and was five months pregnant! Could this be part of the poverty problem?

The feds couldn't find $17 billion to prevent the devastation in New Orleans, but are quick to spend $200 billion to rebuild the city: very typical.

For all the folks who have spent their lives waiting for the "cavalry" to solve their problems, I am here to tell you that John Wayne is dead. Get off your butt, get an education, get a job, don't have children you expect others to support, stay off drugs. And you can buy your own horses.

Is West Jefferson next?

The same floodwalls that failed at the 17th Street Canal and other areas of New Orleans are being built right here in West Jefferson, along the Harvey Canal. This design is now proven to be a failure. Who builds a wall that cannot withstand the water level to its full height? A floodwall does not know the difference between a Category 3 or 4 storm. It only knows water pressure, based on the height of the water. Do we want the same false sense of protection in our back yard?

We must demand that a thorough investigation is conducted to determine the failure of these walls. All new construction must be stopped and the floodwall design must be corrected before West Jefferson suffers the same fate that New Orleans did. It appears the Army Corps of Engineers is not qualified to handle floodwall design and construction. Would you hire a company with such a poor record?

Keep up the good work, Mr. Mayor

One of my sisters who lived Uptown near Loyola University evacuated and is staying with me in Mississippi. Although I am sad that she could not go back to check on her apartment and belongings, I wholly support most of the decisions New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin has been making.

As a New Orleans native, it kills me to hear others bashing the city. Now the mayor is getting flak about "flip-flopping," or allowing people into the city and then ordering them out as Hurricane Rita approached. It's easy for some people to talk: those who haven't been through a devastating situation, or those who have been in and out of the city, against orders.

I hope the mayor keeps up the good work and continues keeping the citizens of New Orleans and their best interests at heart. I think my husband said it best: "Not enough people in this country understand the concept of pride in and love of their home, because they don't stay in one place anymore. They just go where the money and easier life is." But those who stay and want to make their home better will make the best contributions to a community.

The mayor is right in thinking that pride and love will rebuild the city and bring back the culture, the essence of New Orleans.

OUR OPINIONS

Scouring for answers

As public officials and average citizens contemplate how to reclaim New Orleans from the wreckage caused by Hurricane Katrina, no question is more fundamental than how to protect the city better against future storms.

While the storm surge in some places may have exceeded the floodwalls' design standards, there are indications that at least some floodwalls failed in the face of conditions the system was expected to withstand. If so, New Orleans is surrounded by a hurricane-protection system that is more vulnerable to storms than metro area residents previously thought.

The eventual goal presumably will be a levee system that keeps storm surge out of Lake Pontchartrain and well away from the populated areas. That will take years. Protecting New Orleanians in the meantime, given the state of the current hurricane-protection system, will be a challenge.

The city's current hurricane-protection system includes earthen levees and concrete floodwalls, and the Army Corps of Engineers, which oversees the system, says it was designed to withstand a fast-moving Category 3 hurricane. Katrina came ashore as a Category 4 storm. But because its center passed east of the city, New Orleans was spared the hurricane's harshest winds.

After floodwalls gave in along the 17th Street, London Avenue and Industrial canals, the Corps' initial working theory was that the water in the 17th Street Canal topped the floodwall, scouring away enough of the earthen levee behind the wall that the concrete structure eventually gave way. But the Corps now says there is no evidence of scouring along that canal.

Furthermore, Ivor van Heerden, an engineering professor at Louisiana State University, says scouring was not the cause of the London Avenue levee breach, either, although the phenomenon could well be responsible for the failure of the Industrial Canal floodwall. While the walls of the latter canal did receive Category 3 stresses, he says, the walls of the 17th Street Canal did not. For their part, Corps officials and the Orleans Levee Board both maintain that Katrina was simply too strong a storm for the hurricane-protection system.

Separating hurricanes by category may be the wrong way to think about the problem, engineers say, because a slow-moving Category 3 storm could do more damage than a stronger, faster-moving storm that follows a different path.

Plenty of other variables also factor into how badly the metro area will fare during a hurricane. For example, a different (and more expensive) design for concrete floodwalls might have withstood Katrina better than the current one. Another source of uncertainty is the flood-protection system itself; computer models suggest that the configuration of certain levees east of the Industrial Canal could force any storm surge pushing toward that canal to rise more than it otherwise might. Also, some parts of the metro area, such as the eastern edge of St. Bernard Parish, are more flood-prone than other areas, and according to one study done for The Times-Picayune, are more flood-prone than estimates by the Corps would suggest.

Corps officials say that they aren't allowed to adjust for variations in the landscape. Doing so, they say, would exceed the agency's mandate from Congress. But if the levee system was built according to standards that don't take all the complexities of the problem into account, those standards are inadequate and need to be changed. Indeed, the entire system may well need to be rethought; a levee breach in one spot shouldn't mean near-certain inundation for much of the rest of New Orleans.

Any effective inquiry into the causes of the Katrina breaches, and into potential solutions, needs to incorporate knowledgeable voices from inside and outside the Corps. This debate is bound to get even more abstruse, and under those circumstances it's easy for average citizens to tune out.

But the future of New Orleans rests on resolving the technical problems that compromised the levee system when Katrina hit. And as the presence of another powerful hurricane in the Gulf reminds all of us, we need to address those problems quickly.

In the alphabet soup

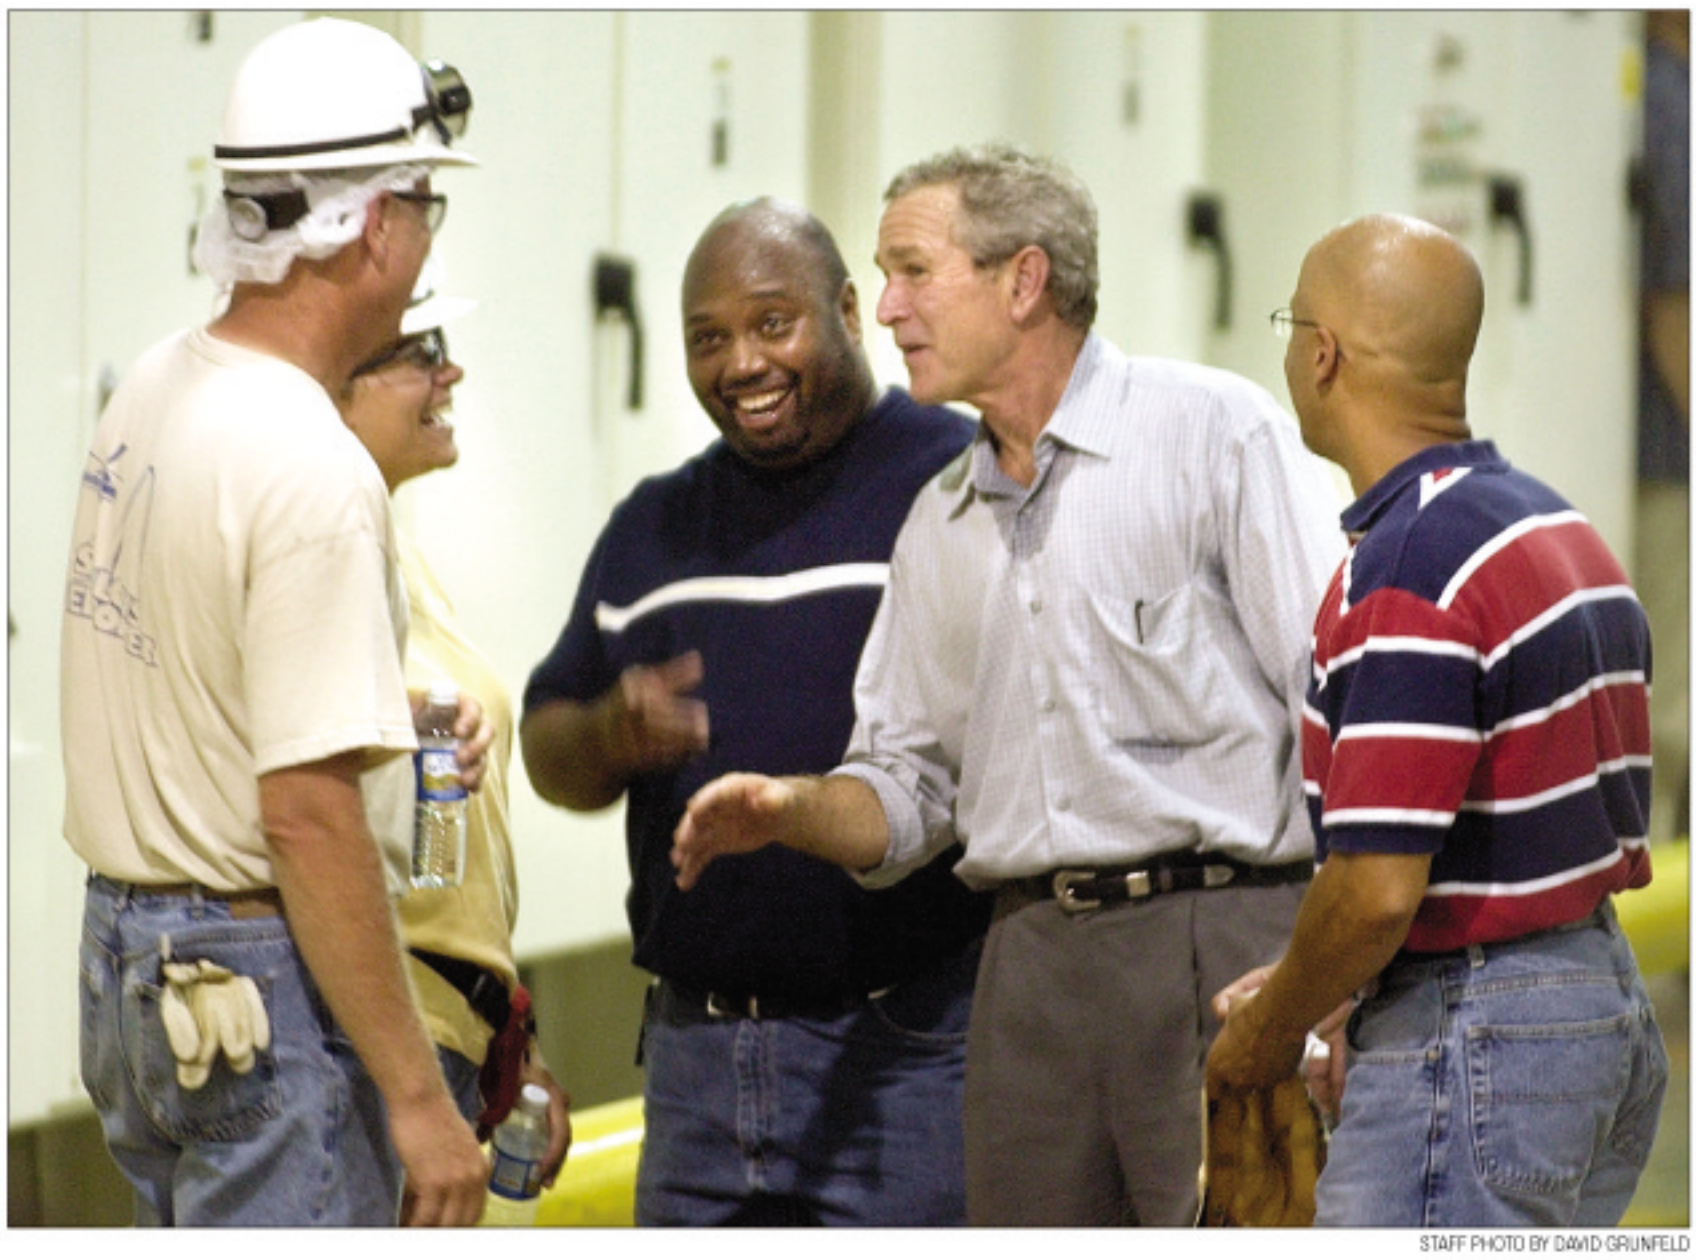
The race through the list of names this hurricane season was alarming even before Katrina made landfall. Now, though, we've arrived at the letter R, with more than two months to go.

Since the list skips the letters q, u, x, y and z, the World Meteorological Organization, which is in charge of naming storms, is facing the very real prospect of running out of names. If that happens, the WMO plans to begin using the Greek alphabet, providing another 24 names, beginning with Alpha and ending with Omega.

That's a dreadful prospect, not only for the ravaged Gulf Coast but for anyone who lives where a hurricane might strike. The last year with 21 storms was 1933, before names were regularly used, and we certainly don't need to break any more records this season.



A killer storm can come during a relatively inactive season, of course. Consider Hurricane Andrew. The Category 5 storm was the first of the 1992 season, which saw six named storms in all, and Andrew didn't hit until Aug. 24. The 2005 season, by contrast, has the unfortunate distinction of being an early and active season, with an unprecedented seven named storms in June and July. That would have made the season noteworthy even without a catastrophic storm such as Katrina.

And the 2005 season looks like it's going to have staying power. As people in Louisiana and Texas keep an anxious eye on Rita, we can only hope that the updated forecast, which calls for 18 to 21 named storms, turns out to be wrong and that we'll stop right now at 17 named storms.

A Hurricane Alpha would be more than our battered coast and psyches can bear.

CAN'T GO ANYWHERE WITHOUT SEEING BUSH

Employees of the Folger's Coffee plant on Almonaster Boulevard in eastern New Orleans share a chuckle with President Bush.

JAMES GILL

President Bush has been turning up in New Orleans so often lately that he brings to mind the reproof Dr. Johnson directed at Lord Chesterfield, whose offer of patronage came too late to do any good.

A patron, Johnson wrote, is one who ignores a drowning man's cries and then, when he is safely ashore, "encumbers him with help."

Bush descends repeatedly on a stricken coast that could really have used federal help long before Katrina. We had been warning for years that our flood protection could not handle The Big One.

But Bush was paying little attention. Even as the floodwaters covered almost the entire city, and FEMA floundered, he could make an ass of himself by asserting that nobody had anticipated the levees would fail.

The analogy with Johnson's drowning man goes only so far. We will appreciate every bit of help we can get now that the drowning's done.

There is a new aura of know-how about the federal relief effort, if only because it could hardly be as inept as it was when Michael Brown was in charge during the crucial early days. Government and private money will cascade in to help the recovery, regardless of any Gulf Coast missions Bush chooses to undertake.

Those missions may have helped morale, and there is no reason to doubt the sincerity of his concern for our plight. But it is not in nature for presidents to be oblivious to political considerations, and Bush keeps turning up just when his ratings could really use a boost.

The mess in Iraq was taking its toll before the bungled response to Katrina plunged Bush to new depths in the polls. This would be even more alarming for a president eligible to stand for re-election, but diminishing support is no small matter for Bush, since it will likely jeopardize his second-term agenda. It is not easy to wreck the economy, mollycoddle the rich, dismantle Social Security and promote creationist superstition if voters get the impression you are not such a great leader after all.

So it naturally became more or less impossible hereabouts to turn around without bumping into the president. He needed to make a success of reconstruction to compensate for the twin fiascos that brought him low.

At the same time, he evidently saw a chance to advance his second-term agenda after all. With the cost of reconstruction estimated at $200 billion, Bush should be even more confident of bequeathing the country historic deficits.

Finding a spare $200 billion in Washington should be easy. There is plenty of pork to be cut — the nation could survive without that bridge to nowhere in Alaska, for example — and fat-cat tax relief, if it ever was defensible, certainly isn't now. But neither Congress nor the administration shows any inclination to fiscal probity, and all that talk of offsetting reconstruction costs will fool nobody. Putting New Orleans and the Gulf Coast straight will leave the country further in debt, because government would rather be cursed by posterity than alienate a live voter.

And now comes Rita to bring not only another huge bill but a shot at political redemption. This time, wherever the storm strikes, we may be sure that the feds will be ready to swoop in as soon as soon as the recovery begins. Bush may not be far behind the vanguard, brimming with religious sentiment and trying to erase the images of abandoned masses in New Orleans.

Perhaps he will personally usher refugees into limousines that will take them to safety, and return later to bask in the adulation.

That is assuming Rita doesn't hit here, where there's hardly anyone left to rescue. If New Orleans should take another hit, Bush could not decently forbear to show up again, although he may have milked all the political rehabilitation to be had from hanging around and looking sympathetic.

It seems that we will be spared this time, however, and we will have to get used to fewer Bush sightings as he moves to pastures new.

Katrina reveals need for change of course

THOMAS L. FRIEDMAN

Following President Bush's speech in New Orleans, many U.S. papers carried the same basic headline: "Bush rules out raising taxes for Gulf relief." The president is planning to rely on "spending cuts" instead to pay for rebuilding New Orleans. Yeah, right — and if you believe that, I have some beachfront property in Biloxi I'd like to sell you. The underlying message of all these stories is that the Bush team sees no reason to change course in response to Katrina.

I beg to differ. Katrina deprived the Bush team of the energy source that propelled it forward for the past four years: Sept. 11 and the halo over the presidency that came with it. The events of Sept. 11, 2001, created a deference in the U.S. public, and media, for the administration, which exploited it to the hilt to push an uncompassionate conservative agenda on tax cuts and runaway spending, on which it never could have gotten elected. That deference is over.

If Bush wants to make anything of his second term, he'll have to do his own Nixon-to-China turnaround, reframe the debate and recast the priorities of his presidency. He seems to think that by offering to spend billions of dollars to rebuild one city, New Orleans, he'll get his leadership halo back. Wrong. Just throwing more borrowed money at New Orleans is not leadership. Bush needs to frame a new agenda for rebuilding all our cities and strengthening the nation as a whole. And what should be the centerpiece of a policy of American renewal is blindingly obvious: making a quest for energy independence the moon shot of our generation.

The president should have done that on the morning of Sept. 12, 2001. The country was ready. But the president whiffed. Katrina — nature's Sept. 11 — has given him a rare do-over. Imagine — I know it is a stretch — that the president announced tomorrow that he wanted an immediate 50-cent-a-gallon gasoline tax — the "American Renewal Tax," to be used to rebuild New Orleans, pay down the deficit, fund tax breaks for Americans to convert their cars to hybrid technology or biofuels, fund a Manhattan Project to develop alternatives for energy independence, and subsidize mass transit systems for our major cities.

And imagine if he tied this to an appeal to young people to go into science, math and engineering for the great national purpose of making us the greenest nation on the planet, to help liberate us from dependence on the worst regimes in the world for our oil, and to help ease the global warming that is heating up the oceans, making our hurricanes more intense and our lowlands more vulnerable. America's kids are hungry to be challenged for some larger purpose, which has been utterly absent in this presidency.

Americans will change their long-term energy habits and companies will develop green products only if they are certain the price of gasoline will not go back down. A gasoline tax — Americans have already shown they'll tolerate higher prices — and stronger regulation would force U.S. companies to innovate in what is going to be one of the most important global industries in the 21st century: green technologies. By coddling our auto and industrial companies when it comes to mileage standards and the environment, all the Bush team is doing is ensuring that they will be dinosaurs and that Chinese, Japanese and Indian companies will take the lead in green technologies — because they have to and ours don't.

Look at what Jeff Immelt, the CEO of GE, said: "America should strive to make energy and environmental practices a national core competency and by doing so, create exports in jobs. America is the leading consumer of energy. However, we are not the technical leader. Europe today is the major force for environmental innovation. European governments have encouraged their companies to invest (in) and produce clean power technologies. The same is true for nuclear power. And government policy that encourages this with subsidies and other incentives is giving European companies a leg up. While Europe has been a driver for innovation, China promises to be its market."

Setting the goal of energy independence, along with a gasoline tax, could help to solve so many of our problems today — from the deficit to climate change and national security. And Americans would pay it if they thought the extra money was going to renew America, not Iran, and not just New Orleans. And if the Texas oilman president became the energy independence president — now, that would snap heads and make this a truly relevant presidency.

No way, you say. Probably right. But either Bush does a Nixon-to-China or his next three years are going to be a Bush-to-Nowhere.

Saved by the Xbox

When P.J. Borne and his family needed a place to stay after Hurricane Katrina destroyed their Chalmette home, he got invitations from as far away as Louisville, Ky., and Jacksonville, Fla. He said there was even somebody in Connecticut who welcomed him and his family.

Borne didn't even know these people. At least not in the traditional sense. He didn't even know Jody Adams, the Grenada, Miss., man who took in the family from St. Bernard Parish. But Borne felt comfortable enough to move in, because he and Adams had fought together, along with the folks in Florida, Kentucky and Connecticut. They're part of a team of about 50 people who compete against others they've never seen on a video game called Tom Clancy's Ghost Recon 2.

"We met at a gas station for him to bring me to his house," Borne said of Adams. "That was the first time we physically met him besides seeing pictures of him on the Internet."

Video gamers have a reputation for being antisocial. They're recluses. Freaks. Losers. There are many stereotypes that have been applied to them, and the overwhelming majority of them are negative. However, Borne has nothing but wonderful things to say about his Xbox Live community. They're the network of people who saved him.

We should all be grateful that Hurricane Katrina struck during this technologically advanced era. It was bad enough in 2005, but imagine how disoriented and alone we would all be feeling if we hadn't been able to use our cellular phones and their text messaging functions. Imagine a storm of this magnitude striking us before we had e-mail accounts and Internet message boards to visit. Granted, the storm killed and displaced many people who didn't have such technology. Maybe they couldn't afford it. But for those of us who had become proficient with computers and mobile phones, that knowledge proved invaluable.

So, too, did P.J. Borne's hobby. He and his family evacuated to Baton Rouge before the storm, and he made sure to take his laptop computer with him. From a hotel room in Baton Rouge he accessed his team's Web site and let them know that, with their home destroyed, his family didn't have anywhere to go. Nor do they have jobs.

Borne, 25, had been working as a deputy at the Plaquemines Parish jail, but he told me he has been laid off since the storm. A friend has a computer company in Jackson, 115 miles south on Interstate 55, and he thinks he'll be able to work there. If that happens there's a chance he could eventually be transferred to New Orleans. Back home.

Borne said he'd been impressed by the hospitality of the people in Grenada, the Adamses in particular. The family of four not only hosted his family of five and their dog for almost a week, but they helped find the Bornes an apartment.

Meanwhile, his fellow gamers have also stepped up. They didn't stop offering to help just because the Bornes found a place to stay. Borne said the folks on his team had gotten together and raised money and bought his family gift cards for Wal-Mart and a gas card they can use at Shell stations.

Borne said the members of his team come from all walks of life. There are some teenagers, but most of them are adults. Some are former military, he said, but the only thing they all really have in common is team membership. They've competed together for about four years and have been quite successful, he said, but the team has always been more about camaraderie than winning.

"We're pretty open to just about anybody," he said. "It doesn't matter if you're good or not. We're basically just looking for somebody to have fun."

That fun paid off. "If it wasn't for them," Borne said of his Xbox Live community, "me and my family wouldn't have a place to be. We would be in a shelter."

‘United in a bond of pure tragedy’

Stars fall all over themselves to show their love for New Orleans music and to raise money for Hurricane Katrina relief

Dave Matthews, who drew record crowds at Jazzfest, hugs Jimmy Buffett, whose French Quarter bar Margaritaville is closed due to the hurricane damage. They were among the heavy hitters who performed Tuesday at ‘From the Big Easy to the Big Apple,’ a benefit in New York.

NEW YORK — The distance between the Mid-City Lanes and Madison Square Garden isn’t so great after all.

On Tuesday, the night after the New Orleans Saints staged a “home” game at nearby Giants Stadium, homegrown musicians and some famous friends joined forces for “From the Big Apple to the Big Easy,” a star-studded, sold-out, five-hour fund-raiser at Madison Square Garden for Hurricane Katrina relief efforts.

The result?

Lafayette slide guitar ace Sonny Landreth worked his six-string magic behind Jimmy Buffett and Dave Matthews as they harmonized on Neil Young’s “Heart of Gold.”

Irma Thomas sat side-by-side with Lenny Kravitz, slide guitar shaman Ry Cooder and accordionist Buckwheat Zydeco for a tour-de-force “Backwater Blues.”

Paul Simon — wearing a Jazzfest baseball cap — and partner Art Garfunkel ceded much of “Bridge Over Troubled Water” to Aaron Neville, whose own cap identified him as an “Evacuee.”

“As many times as I’ve sung this song,” Garfunkel said, “I don’t think it’s ever meant as much as it does tonight.”

Throughout “From the Big Easy to the Big Apple,” New Yorkers — and more than a few displaced New Orleanians — celebrated the music of the Crescent City. Quint Davis, producer of the New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival, teamed with TV producer Ken Ehrlich as co-executive producer of the event, which multiple cable channels broadcast as a pay-per-view special.

A simultaneous show at Radio City Music Hall featured an acoustic set from Dave Matthews and Trey Anastasio, plus Galactic and multiple Mardi Gras Indians.

But the main event was at Madison Square Garden, the self-proclaimed “most famous arena in the world.” Headliners were mostly icons of the baby boomers who could afford ticket prices

GONE WITH THE WIND

Fall movie season offers a respite from reality

By Michael H. Kleinschrodt
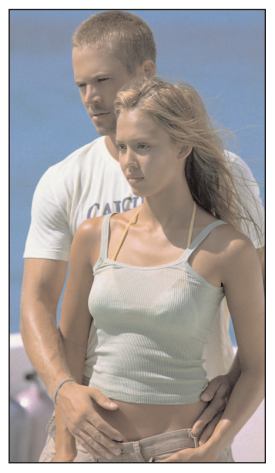
Movie writer

So... Have you seen any good movies lately?



In a New Orleans area devastated by Hurricane Katrina, it’s a safe bet that the answer is “no.” Area residents lucky enough to still have homes have been busy picking up the pieces of disrupted lives. Exiled New Orleanians wait in cities around the country for some sign that they can return home.

No matter where one’s current home is, there’s bound to be a movie theater nearby, offering the promise of air conditioning, iced beverages and a brief diversion from an all-too-real disaster that required no Hollywood effects.

It might seem frivolous to be talking about the movies at such a time, but, at their best, movies take audiences away from their troubles and remind them of their shared humanity.

As Tom Cruise’s Oscar telecast speechwriter said just after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, “Should we celebrate the joy and magic the movies bring? Dare I say it? More than ever. A small scene, a gesture, even a glance between characters can cross lines, break through barriers, melt prejudice or just plain make us laugh.” (You know Cruise didn’t come up with that on his own.)

The movies have been taking Americans’ minds off their worries ever since an impossibly elegant Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers danced the Depression away during the 1930s.

Paul Walker and Jessica Alba star in the underwater action, adventure ‘Into the Blue,’ which is set to open Sept. 30.

The fall movie lineup, or what remains of it, might not offer such swell hoofers, but it does offer hooves in “Dreamer,” a horse-racing tale filmed in the New Orleans area and expected to open Oct. 21. The movie is one of several inspired by true stories.

The calendar also includes a number of literary adaptations, many films with women in leading roles, and, surprisingly, two stop-motion animated films that buck the trend toward computer animation.

Just remember: All release dates are subject to change.

A little rain goes a long way in emptied-out New Orleans

CHRIS ROSE

The slightest rain fell here Thursday afternoon.

You know, the kind of New Orleans rain that just gives everything a light coat and sheen, that tamps down the dust of the old shell roads and washes down the oyster stink in the French Quarter gutters and slicks up all the playground equipment and makes New Orleans smell — is it possible? — so fresh. So Southern.

The kind of rain that falls even though the sun is shining. Does that happen in other places?

New Orleans rain has always been like drops of clarity in an otherwise murky habitat, sometimes too much, sometimes too little, but always a marvel to behold.

There’s always something that needs to be washed down here.

In “A Streetcar Named Desire,” Blanche Dubois said it best: “Don’t you just love those long rainy afternoons in New Orleans when an hour isn’t just an hour, but a little piece of eternity dropped into our hands — and who knows what to do with it?”

Indeed, what to do?

That’s was the rain that fell Thursday. And we needed it. Because the oyster stink is at noxious levels and the city is stacked with an Apocalyptic vision of dry kindling that requires only one dummy with a discarded cigarette to torch an entire block.

That’s one of the things that most catches the eye here — the trees. Or the lack thereof. I don’t know that anyone will ever be able to count how many trees fell or just plain withered and died under Katrina’s fierce hot breath, but I’m sure some expert will tell us in due time. Whatever the raw number, it won’t match the impact on the senses.

I can’t remember where I read it now, but someone interviewed a New Orleans artist who had returned home last week and this guy — whose very living hinges upon his interpretations of shadow, nuance and color — said the problem with New Orleans now is that there is too much sunlight on the ground.

That changes everything. Because if there was ever a town that couldn’t afford to surrender shade, it is this one, where a walk on a summer afternoon can be like sauntering through a blast furnace.

It had been three weeks since it rained — since you know when — and that’s as unfathomable a notion here as a September without fresh oysters.

Of course, by the time you read this, Friday, rain might not be such a charming enterprise here. And Blanche Dubois’ notion of eternity may not be so romantic.

Rita swirls out in the Gulf of Mexico, capriciously choosing its path of destruction and even the slightest brush of wind could take out so many more trees and the slightest rain — the kind that tourists with their Big Ass Beers in hand used to stand under French Quarter balconies and watch with a sense of comic wonder - could wind the clock back three weeks to that piece of eternity we don’t ever want to live again.

Under one of those French Quarter balconies, those famous mannequin legs at Big Daddy’s strip club improbably swing in and out of a window, an alluring, optimistic or delusional signal that the libertine times will once again return to the Old City. That les bons temps will rouler again some day.

Swinging in the rain. Drinking a hurricane instead of dodging one. Living in a place where the past and present and future have never collided so chaotically and without rational analysis.

There is no one who can tell us what tomorrow will bring. But, personally, I consider it a very bad sign that the killer hurricane that dances on our television screens and toys with our collective psyche is named after a meter maid.

That can’t be good.

THIS MOLD HOUSE

More tips for mending your broken home

Can this refrigerator be saved?

De-stinking your fridge and freezer will require more than one wipe-down. Here are some tips for eliminating those lingering odors.

REMOVE ALL PARTS OF THE REFRIGERATOR and scrub them separately. As you wash the interior, pay particular attention to cleaning the rubber gaskets on the doors.

REPEATEDLY HEAT AND VENTILATE THE INSIDE WALLS, warming them with a hair dryer, hot air popcorn popper or portable convection heater that blows warm air. (Don't use anything that can damage the walls.) Then, ventilate with a portable fan until the inside walls are cool. Repeat for several hours, or until the odor is almost gone.

ABSORB ODERS WITH ACTIVATED CHARCOAL FILTERS or a tray of loose activated carbon, which can be found at pet stores, drugstores, appliance service companies and hardware stores. Spread about three ounces on a sheet of foil or in a shallow pan, and place inside. After six hours, heat the charcoal at 350 degrees in an oven to reactivate it, and put it back in the refrigerator and freezer. Repeat until the odors are gone. If possible, run the freezer with nothing but the carbon in it for two days.

APPLY STRONG CHEMICAL DEODORIZERS from service companies and home stores, or scrub the refrigerator with an all-purpose cleaner such as Spic and Span or Soilax.

LOOK FOR ENZYME PRODUCTS THAT REMOVE PET ODORS. Wet the freezer interior with the product, and let dry. Re-apply if needed.

CRUMPLE NEWSPAPERS AND MIST THE PAPER WITH WATER. Stuff the fridge with big balls of damp newspaper until it is full. Every other day, replace the newspaper with new freshly moistened balls. After four or five times, the odors should be gone.

RUB THE INTERIOR WITH CUT, SMASHED, JUICY LEMON HALVES. No, we're not kidding.

IF THE REFRIGERATOR STILL SMELLS DESPITE ALL YOUR EFFORTS, seepage may have gotten into the refrigerator or freezer's insulation, and you may need to throw it away.

ranging from $50 to $500.

Cross-cultural symbolism abounded. Before the show, Curtis Sliwa, the founder of New York's famed Guardian Angels, barreled down West 31st Street outside the arena, clad in his trademark beret and red satin jacket, cell phone clamped to his ear. He nearly collided with a guy in a red, white and blue Mid-City Lanes bowling shirt.

Inside, fans in souvenir Jazzfest and Tipitina's shirts mingled beneath banners trumpeting the New York Knicks and the New York Rangers. Concession stands peddled 20-ounce Abita beers — for the very New York price of $7.50.

Ushers handed out Mardi Gras beads. Purple, green and gold balloons and foil decorated the lobby, where C.J. Chenier's zydeco band greeted attendees and the nonprofit Tipitina's Foundation promoted its new Katrina relief efforts.

In the main arena, pianist Allen Toussaint and his horn-heavy New Orleans band backed a quick succession of guest stars in the first hour: Lenny Kravitz, Elvis Costello, Jimmy Buffett — who sang Toussaint's "Fortune Teller" — and Paul Simon, who reprised Baton Rouge singer Jimmy Clanton's 1958 hit "Just a Dream." Clarence "Frogman" Henry's comic croaks and falsettos on "Ain't Got No Home" earned one of the night's first standing ovations.

More than a few New Orleanians had no homes to which to return. The three Dixie Cups lived in either eastern New Orleans or the 9th Ward, both devastated by Katrina's floods. "We lost everything," Athelgra Neville said backstage.

Still, they presided over a radiant "Chapel of Love," then teamed up with Irma Thomas and Cyndi Lauper for a joyous "Brother John"/"Iko, Iko" medley.

"It felt good to be onstage with so many great people," Barbara Hawkins said afterward. "I'm glad they included us."

Not surprisingly, Cyril Neville and Bette Midler made the evening's most overtly political statements. Neville's T-shirt decried the alleged "Ethnic Cleansing in New Orleans."

And the sharp-tongued Divine Miss M augmented her single song with a long anti-Bush tirade. "Ineptitude. Stupidity. Inequality. Global warming. The destruction of the wetlands. These are not just dangerous times...they are disastrous," Midler said. "The war, the hurricanes, Fox News...."

The more diplomatic U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said that New Orleans and New York are "united in a bond of pure tragedy. When the Crescent City called for help, the Big Apple answered. I am here tonight to say thank you."

During a brief set change, former presidents Bush and Clinton appeared on the Garden's jumbo screens, asking for donations. They were followed by a segment about New Orleans piano legend Professor Longhair, one of several scenes from filmmaker Michael Murphy's new "Make It Funky" documentary that aired during breaks.

Against background footage of flooding, fires and helicopter rescues in New Orleans, Elton John and his band rocked the dramatic "Funeral for a Friend." John reveled in meeting some of his New Orleans musical heroes backstage.

"Certainly it's one of the most privileged (nights) of my career to be onstage with people who have influenced me my entire career," he said.

Jimmy Buffett wore a "New Orleans" T-shirt early in the night, then changed into a "Pascagoula" shirt later, showing off his allegiance to, and affinity for, multiple points along the Gulf Coast. Given his star power and ties to the affected areas, Buffett received the night's longest set. To cap it off, Paul Simon joined him for Frankie Ford's "Sea Cruise."

Fats Domino, who was billed for the event but perhaps still had not recovered from the trauma of a rescue from his flooded home, did not perform. And a rumored Rolling Stones appearance did not materialize.

But there were surprises. Clinton strolled onstage to a thunderous ovation from the partisan crowd. He introduced John Fogerty, "my perk," Clinton said, "for all the fund-raising I've been doing."

An amped Fogerty then tore through a succession of Creedence Clearwater Revival anthems that took on a fresh resonance, given the setting: "Born on the Bayou." "Have You Ever Seen the Rain." "Bad Moon Risin'," and "Proud Mary."

Ed Bradley introduced Elvis Costello, a "true but unlikely member of the New Orleans music family," and Costello's "soul sister" wife, Diana Krall. With his wife on piano and the Dirty Dozen Brass Band backing him, Costello teamed with Rock 'n' Roll Hall of Fame producer Dave Bartholomew for the social commentary "The Monkey Speaks His Mind."

Troy "Trombone Shorty" Andrews, looking sharp in a charcoal pinstripe suit, jazzed "I'm Walkin" with trumpet fireworks. Kermit Ruffins sparked "St. James Infirmary," muting his trumpet bell with his hand. The New Yorkers immediately followed his lead on the "hi-de-hi-de-hi-de-ho" call and response.

With the show running late - New York, it seems, is not immune to "Big Easy time" - much of the audience trickled out after Simon & Garfunkel's three-song set. Those that remained witnessed the first-ever joint performance by the Neville Brothers and the original Meters, who share keyboardist Art Neville, and much history.

On side-by-side drum kits, the Nevilles' "Mean" Willie Green and the Meters' Zigaboo Modeliste locked into the "Hey Pocky Way" groove. Meters guitarist Leo Nocentelli applauded long and loud for Aaron Neville's "Amazing Grace" benediction.

For the all-star finale after midnight, the combined Dirty Dozen and Rebirth brass bands led a "When the Saints Go Marching In" second-line that included Buffett, Bartholomew, the Dixie Cups, Thomas and more. Rebirth then paraded across the floor of the arena with "Do Whatcha Wanna."

Earlier, Cyril Neville had led the Toussaint band for a loose-limbed, tenor sax-powered, strutting "Big Chief," bragging about the funk's pedigree: "We don't do this nowhere else but New Orleans."

New Orleans, and now New York.

Record in hand, McAllister sets sights on Vikings

Minnesota has worst run defense

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — It didn't feel much like a historical moment, lost in the chaos of the Saints' loss to the New York Giants on Monday night.

But early in the first quarter, on the Saints' first drive, tailback Deuce McAllister became the team's all-time rushing leader.

He now has 4,305 yards. Not bad for a 26-year-old back in his fifth season, who could still have another 10,000 yards or so in the tank.

"What Deuce has accomplished in just three years, I don't know if it says a lot about him or if there's been a lot of bad football going on for a long time," Saints coach Jim Haslett joked. "But he's a special running back and a special kid."

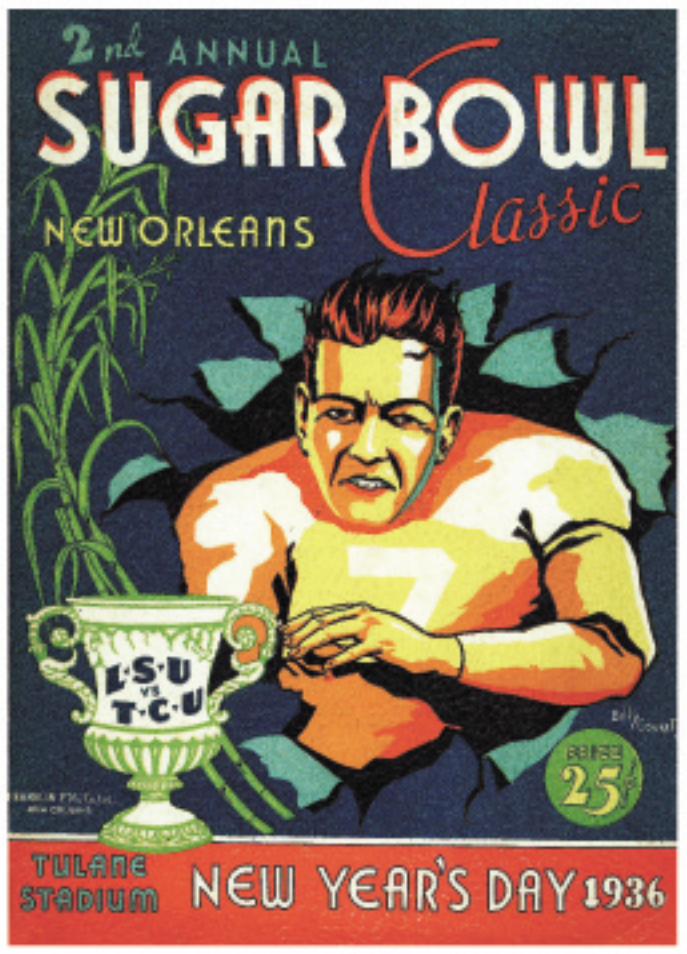
Still, McAllister said he didn't ask for any special recognition after breaking the record. He didn't keep any souvenirs such as the game ball or his game jersey.

"It wasn't a big deal. It's something that was expected to happen going into the season," McAllister said. "It will be something that we celebrate later on."

For now, McAllister is focused on some short-term goals - running roughshod Sunday over the Minnesota Vikings, the league's 32nd-ranked rushing defense.



McAllister is still waiting for his first breakout game this season. He ran for 64 yards and two touchdowns in a workmanlike Week 1 victory at Carolina. Last week he gained just 47 yards on 15 carries, and the Saints had to abandon the running game in the second half.

But McAllister said he is staying patient for now. He doesn't mind pounding the ball into the middle and chipping away at a defense.

LSU SPORTS INFORMATION DEPARTMENT

The Sugar Bowl began during the Great Depression at a Tulane Stadium that then seated 20,000.

Sugar Bowl needs to do what it takes to stay in La.

History lesson: Before there was a Super Bowl, there was a Sugar Bowl.

Before there was a Superdome, there was a Tulane Stadium.

Which is why, before the Saints played their first football game in the Big Easy, circa 1967, the Tulane Green Wave had played many, many football games, beginning in 1893.

Let's be clear on this. New Orleans would never have landed an NFL franchise had Tulane not made a sizable home available - a home with 80,000 seats.

PETER FINNEY

I bring this up because the site of this season's Sugar Bowl has come down to either LSU's Tiger Stadium or Atlanta's Georgia Dome.

And let's be even clearer on this: If it winds up at the Georgia Dome, it will be strictly on an interim basis, no more than one year.

How do I know?

Because I know Paul Hoolahan, the Sugar Bowl's executive director, someone who knows better than anyone that the Sugar Bowl belongs to Louisiana. And in Louisiana.

So why not play it in Baton Rouge this season?

LSU's Gaynell Tinsley gets ready to air it out against TCU during the second Sugar Bowl in 1936.

Because Hurricane Katrina's fallout, for at least the next six months, has eaten up the kind of hotel space required for New Orleans, not to mention Baton Rouge, to handle a Sugar Bowl crowd.

Available rooms are now being occupied, wisely, in New Orleans and elsewhere by thousands of workers involved in bringing the city back to life.

A No. 1 priority.

Question: If the Georgia Dome lands this season's Sugar Bowl, where would next season's Sugar Bowl be played?

Answer: At Tiger Stadium, a 90,000-seat facility with mucho suites. And it would be played there until there is a restored Superdome or a new Superdome.

All right, but supposed that takes two,

LSU-UT showdown moved to Monday

Third Tigers game altered by storm

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — The LSU-Tennessee football game scheduled for Saturday has been moved to 6:30 p.m. Monday at Tiger Stadium because of Hurricane Rita, the SEC announced Thursday.

The game will be televised by ESPN2.

SEC commissioner Mike Slive made the decision to move the game between the No. 3 Tigers and No. 10 Vols to insure the safety of the visitors traveling to the game. Tennessee was scheduled to fly into Baton Rouge on Saturday at about noon, but Hurricane Rita, a category 4 storm as of late Thursday, was expected to make landfall near the Lousiana-Texas border late Friday or early Saturday morning.

"After reviewing all of the information, I felt this was the best decision for the game," Slive said. "The safety of our student-athletes, coaches and fans is our priority. I understand this puts a burden on LSU and its administration, however the travel safety issues necessitate this decision."

TENN. AT LSU

LSU athletic director Skip Bertman said he lobbied for the game to be played Sunday night, but he said the commissioner felt the strong winds might not have subsided by then to allow Tennessee to fly in.

"He wanted to err on the side of safety," Bertman said. "It's his decision per SEC rules. We've got our night game, but it won't be Saturday night."

It's the third consecutive scheduled game affected by hurricanes this season. LSU postponed its season-opener with North Texas to Oct. 29 and moved it's second game with Arizona State to Tempe, Ariz., two weeks ago.

The rescheduling will give the Tigers only four days of preparation for the Mississippi State game Oct. 1. Tennessee has a home game against Ole Miss that day.

Hornets mull plans for ticket holders

Lack of computer system is slowing the process

By Jimmy Smith
Staff writer

The Hornets, hampered without their computers and server, are still formulating plans on how season-ticket holders who purchased them before Hurricane Katrina can receive refunds or go about applying those funds to next season.

The team, left homeless when New Orleans Arena was damaged in the storm, announced plans to temporarily relocate to Oklahoma City, where it will play 35 of its 41 home games at the 19,675-seat Ford Center. The Hornets' home schedule includes six games to be played in Baton Rouge at the Pete Maravich Assembly Center.

AP PHOTO

The Ford Center in Oklahoma City will be the Hornets' home for 35 games during the 2005-06 season.

Team president Paul Mott said Thursday he hopes the team's computer system will be functional in the next day or so and that the team will be able to access records of sales made before the hurricane.

"We will then reach out to our ticket holders as soon as we can and ask them if they'd like us to hold their money on account as a deposit on tickets for our 2006-07 return to New Orleans," Mott said. "And we'd certainly make an offer of some sort to make it financially worth their while, perhaps interest paid on the money, for example.

"We'd hope those people would do that. That would be best for us as a company. If it

Belle Chasse QB lands in Alexandria

Roy wins the starting job for 4A's 5th-ranked team

By Mike Strom
Staff writer

Belle Chasse senior quarterback Adam Roy was riding in a school bus, returning from a victorious effort in the Plaquemines Parish Jamboree, when he learned that Hurricane Katrina was bearing down on southeast Louisiana.

Less than three days later, Belle Chasse's senior quarterback and his family were in Hammond at his father's automotive repair shop, where they safely rode out the deadly storm. The Roys soon were headed to Alexandria to stay with relatives.

"Nobody had an idea it was going to be this bad," Roy said. "So we packed a few things in our bags thinking it was just going to be a couple of days and then we'd return. Then we found out the Gulf of Mexico was a lot closer to us than it was before."

Unlike many of his less fortunate peers, Roy has found safe refuge in a return to football at Alexandria Senior High, and the Trojans, who own the state's No. 5 ranking in Class 4A, have found themselves the quarterback that they previously lacked.

"Adam has been a good addition," ASH coach Butch Stoker said. "He's still learning our offense and we kind of overloaded

All remaining Saints-Bills tickets available to public

By Mike Triplett
Staff writer

SAN ANTONIO — Saints owner Tom Benson made a plea for more than 18,000 remaining tickets to be sold in time for the Saints' Oct. 2 game against the Buffalo Bills at the Alamodome.

With only 10 days remaining before the game, the Saints opened all remaining tickets to the general public Thursday.

"As the first regular-season NFL game ever in San Antonio, the Oct. 2 Saints-Bills matchup is the most important to sell out - selling out the first game sets the tone for the rest of the schedule," Benson said in a statement. "The NFL-imposed television blackout deadline to guarantee a sellout for the game against Buffalo is Sept. 29. So, for all intents and purposes, we have one week to get the Alamodome opener against the Bills sold out."

The Saints will play three games in San Antonio this season, including an Oct. 16 date against the Atlanta Falcons and a Dec. 24 matchup against the Detroit Lions. The Alamodome seats 65,000 for football.

When tickets for all three games went on sale last week, the San Antonio fan base quickly bought more than 50,000 tickets on the first day and more than 100,000 in the first week. But ticket sales have slowed since then.

The game against Atlanta has been the most popular, with only about 7,000 tickets remaining — likely because of the appeal of Falcons quarterback Michael Vick.

City leaders believe a lot hinges on the show of support from the San Antonio community during these three games.

The NFL has not regarded San Antonio as an NFL-caliber town, but city leaders would like to change that opinion in hopes of one day luring an NFL franchise, perhaps the Saints, as early as next season.

LIGHTENING UP: The Saints practiced in shorts and shells instead of full pads Thursday, giving their bodies a chance to make the quick turnaround from a Monday night road game to another trip the following Sunday at Minnesota.

The mood was lightened, too, when strength and conditioning coaches Rock Gullickson and Adam Bailey rode onto the Alamodome turf during practice on a motorcycle, honking the horn and wearing Viking horns and a Vikings foam finger.

One of the goalposts was also decorated with Vikings pennants and foam fingers. And, as the team pumped in simulated crowd noise during practice, there was the added sound of a Viking horn on every play, a computer-generated effect added by team employee Carter Sheridan.

ETC.: With Hurricane Rita approaching landfall, the Saints still had no plans to alter their travel schedule. The team is planning to fly to Minnesota on Saturday afternoon unless things change. ... Guard Jermane Mayberry injured his right shoulder later in practice. The extent of the injury is unknown. He is listed as questionable. Receiver Az-Zahir Hakim (hamstring) and cornerback Fakhir Brown (knee) did not practice.

SAINTS, from C-5

to come. I know I'm capable of having a 60-, 70-yard run," McAllister said. "Right now it's two or three yards and a cloud of dust. But that's how we're approaching it.

"I think that fits us with a power attack. Because come the fourth quarter, you know your big runs are going to come. People are going to get tired of tackling a 235-pound back."

McAllister said even when he gains just two or three yards per carry, he prides himself on making the defense work for it.

"You want to obviously make that first guy miss, or if you have to lower shoulder into him, then that's what you have to do," McAllister said. "But no one defender should ever tackle you one on one."

And this year, McAllister feels great every time he comes out of that "cloud of dust" - at least compared to last season, when he fought through a lingering ankle injury for his third consecutive 1,000-yard season.

Healthy and rejuvenated, McAllister had a terrific offseason. The team centered its offensive philosophy around him, promising to attack teams with a clock-controlling power run game.

"It's not just lip service," said McAllister, who signed a six-year contract extension at the start of training camp. "We're going out and doing it. The first 10, 12 plays, probably six of them are going to be runs. So teams know that they're going to have to stop the run."

The philosophy worked great in Week 1, when McAllister scored touchdowns in the first and second quarters against Carolina.

Deuce McAllister was held to 47 yards on 15 carries by the Gaints on Monday night.

AP PHOTO

Last week was an all-around disaster. The Saints' running game was OK, but they were taken out of their game plan early by a slew of turnovers and penalties.

The Saints hope to overcome that performance quickly Sunday in the Metrodome by setting the tone early. The team is confident that it can impose its will at the line of scrimmage because McAllister is such a splendid back.

"He's a dream back for an offensive lineman," center LeCharles Bentley said. "There will be times when there's nothing there, and he's going to create something."

Veteran guard Jermane Mayberry, who signed with the Saints in free agency this winter because of that power running philosophy, said McAllister has been even better than advertised.

"I'm very impressed with him," Mayberry said. "As an athlete, he's physical, big, fast. He has all the tools you want, and he's a smart player. As a person, he's a great guy, a real genuine guy.

"You'd have to search this league real hard to find a back more complete than he is."

The Vikings defensive front is supposed to be better than the early statistics indicate, with burly tackle Frank Williams and versatile lineman Kevin Williams leading the charge.

The Vikings allowed 167 rushing yards last week in a 37-8 loss to Cincinnati, and 146 yards to Tampa Bay in a 24-13 loss in Week 1.

"They're a team to be accounted for, especially up front," Bentley said.

doesn't work for them, and they need that money back, and many people may, we'd refund their money in some fashion."

Mott stressed that no plans have been finalized either way.

"I'm waiting for proposals," he said. "But we are going to play games in Louisiana as well, and fans can certainly use money on their account to pay for those games."

One additional game, an Oct. 25 preseason game against Shaquille O'Neal and the Miami Heat, has been moved to the Pete Maravich Assembly Center from its originally scheduled venue in Bossier City.

Mott said the Hornets plan to donate all of their proceeds from that preseason game to hurricane relief. Talks are scheduled with other sponsors and partnership entities to see if they will do the same.

The Hornets, Mott said, were well on their way to establishing record levels in season and group ticket sales in New Orleans this year before the storm halted those advances.

"I find it easy to get over any disappointments because of the bigger issues facing everybody's lives," Mott said. "But the (New Orleans) marketplace had embraced this team.

"We were having terrific sales. We'd more than doubled our full season ticket sales from last year and were steaming toward tripling it. When the league released group ticket sales at mid-July, we were No. 1 in the league in group sales deposits. This team has not been above the average in its time in New Orleans. People knew it was a great entertainment option. We were excited. And a lot of people in the marketplace were, too."

Mott stressed that the Hornets' New Orleans community outreach, a major part of the team's identity in the Crescent City, would not diminish this season, even though they would be stretched into the Oklahoma City area, as well.

"I'm committed to having a presence in Louisiana this season. What form that takes, I'm not sure," Mott said. "The place where we made one of our biggest splashes in the community was in community relations. So we're writing a business plan in that area for two locations.

"We're going to take our resources and spread them across a wider reach. We'll repay the citizens of Oklahoma City and provide them with their best NBA experience, because this might be their only one. But we'll try not to lose step with what we were doing in the New Orleans marketplace. We don't want people (in New Orleans) to ask, 'Where were you?' These are our fans. And our fellow citizens."

HOUSTON MAN WINS SENIOR AMATEUR: Mike Rice rallied to win the 17th and 18th holes for a 1-up victory over defending champion Mark Bemowski in the finals at Rocky Face, Ga. Rice, 65, of Houston, was down two before he birdied the 12th hole to close within one. Bemowski, of Mukwonago, Wis., hit an approach shot into a hazard on the 14th and conceded the hole, evening the match. Bemowski took the lead again on the 16th when Rice conceded his 1-foot birdie putt, but Rice evened it again on the 17th when Bemowski left himself a 30-footer for par and missed it. Rice won it on the 18th with a 2 1/2-foot par putt; Bemowski missed a 4-footer.

LANG WINS SENIOR WOMEN'S AMATEUR: Diane Lang won the U.S. Senior Women's Amateur Championship, beating four-time champion Carol Semple Thompson 1-up at Rye, N.Y. Lang, 50, from Weston, Fla., was playing in her second U.S. Golf Association event and first Senior Amateur. Semple Thompson, 56, a seven-time USGA champion, was playing in her record 102nd USGA event.

49ERS LOSE TE: Tight end Eric Johnson, the San Francisco 49ers' leading receiver last season, was placed on injured reserve Thursday because of a torn muscle in his left foot. Johnson, who hasn't been healthy since before training camp, will miss his second full season in three years. He sat out all of the 2003 season after breaking his collarbone in the 49ers' first exhibition game. But he rebounded to catch 82 passes for 825 yards last season. The 49ers used veteran Steve Bush and rookie Billy Bajema at tight end in the first two games, but waiver acquisition Trent Smith might get his first chance to play for the 49ers on Sunday.

AROUND THE LEAGUE: Jets running back Curtis Martin practiced and was upgraded to probable on the injury report. Martin has a bruised right knee. ... Jaguars quarterback Byron Leftwich (injured groin) returned to practice and remained optimistic he would play against the New York Jets. ... The Arizona Cardinals placed tight end John Bronson on injured reserve, ending his season. The Cardinals promoted cornerback Lamont Reid from the practice squad and re-signed wide receiver Carlyle Holiday to the practice squad. ... Carolina safety Mike Minter returned to practice and said he is confident his strained right calf won't prevent him from playing against the Miami Dolphins. "There's no pain; that's a great sign," said Minter, who has played in 68 consecutive games. "I went full speed, and I was able to break on the ball and do things I normally do. So I feel like I will play." Cornerback Ken Lucas missed his second straight day of practice with a shoulder injury and said he doesn't know if he will play Sunday in Miami. ... Quarterback Donovan McNabb and wide receiver Terrell Owens both practiced for the Philadelphia Eagles after sitting out a day because of injuries. McNabb, who sat out one practice last week with a bruised chest, hurt his groin right before halftime against San Francisco. Owens has a nagging abdominal/groin injury. ... The Washington Redskins placed defensive tackle Brandon Noble on injured reserve. Noble, who missed the 2003 season after reconstructive surgery on his left knee, underwent arthroscopic surgery on the same knee last week. The Redskins moved Aki Jones from the practice squad to take Noble's roster spot and signed linebacker Nick McNeil to the practice squad.

BASKETBALL

NAILON AGREES TO TERMS WITH 76ERS: Former Hornets forward Lee Nailon agreed to terms with the Philadelphia 76ers. Nailon, 6 feet 9, 238 pounds, averaged a career-high 14.2 points and 4.4 rebounds in 68 games last season for New Orleans. "Lee will give us some added offense and experience," 76ers president Billy King said. Nailon has averaged 8.9 points and 3.1 rebounds in five seasons.

PAYTON JOINS HEAT: Point guard Gary Payton has signed a $1.1 million, one-year deal with Miami. Payton and Jason Williams - another new Heat addition - will be the team's primary point guards entering training camp, which opens in less than two weeks. Miami lost starting point guard Damon Jones to Cleveland this summer as a free agent. Payton averaged 11.3 points and 6.1 assists for Boston last season.

PROSECUTOR TO RECOMMEND PROBATION: Community service and probation will be recommended for four Indiana Pacers players charged in a brawl with fans that broke out during a game last season, a Detroit prosecutor said, provided the players "take responsibility" by pleading guilty or no contest at pretrial hearings. Hearings for Ron Artest, Jermaine O'Neal and Stephen Jackson are scheduled for today in district court. David Harrison faces an Oct. 3 hearing.

BASEBALL

PALMEIRO MIGHT NOT RETURN: Rafael Palmeiro's season with the Baltimore Orioles might be over. Orioles interim manager Sam Perlozzo said that if the first baseman had disclosed the name of a teammate who supplied him with the substance that led to Palmeiro's suspension for steroid use, it probably would be best that Palmeiro not return to the team. The Sun in Baltimore, citing unidentified sources, reported Thursday that Palmeiro had identified a teammate by name. "If in fact that was true, then it probably would not be a good idea" for Palmeiro to return, Perlozzo said. "It's all speculation as far as I know."

GRIFFEY TO HAVE TWO OPERATIONS: Ken Griffey Jr. will have surgery on his left knee and right hamstring Monday, presumably ending a stellar comeback season for the oft-injured Cincinnati Reds star. Griffey, 35, is expected to be ready for spring training. He will have arthroscopic surgery to clean out his left knee and treat scar tissue around his hamstring.

ETC.

NASCAR PROMISES PENALTIES: If NASCAR has its way, the road rage that has erupted in recent Nextel Cup races is over. NASCAR spokesman Jim Hunter said that Mike Helton, the sanctioning organization's president, will tell the drivers before Sunday's race at Dover International Speedway that such behavior will no longer be tolerated and that they will risk being suspended if there is more on-track retaliation. "With what Mike is planning to do at the drivers' meetings on Saturday, prior to the Busch race, and on Sunday is going to sort of give our guys, I don't want to say a final warning, but I think they'll clearly understand that we're going to do what we need to," Hunter said. "If we need to suspend people, then, starting at Dover, that's a possibility."

Decision upcoming on Bayou Classic's new site

Officials to decide between Houston, Shreveport

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

Grambling and Southern officials are expected to decide next week where to relocate the Bayou Classic, with the top two choices coming down to Houston and Shreveport, sources say.

The decision likely would have been made Friday, but the approach of Hurricane Rita prevented communication with officials in Houston.

"For planning purposes, we need to know something in order to move forward," said Angelia Weaver, Grambling's Bayou Classic coordinator and executive assistant to the school's president. "But things seem like they're changing overnight, so you never know."

Ralph Slaughter, vice-president for the Southern University system and Weaver's counterpart at his school, said that, while a decision about the Nov. 26 game was close, he still was trying to gather information.

"We've still got stuff coming in and then we have to reach a consensus decision with Grambling," he said. "This is a major event that has been around for a long time, and we want to do it right."

The Bayou Classic annually draws a sellout crowd of 72,000 in the Superdome and thousands of more come to New Orleans for related activities.

That would seemingly make Houston, which has offered its Reliant Stadium and would have more than adequate hotel space and other amenities, the most logical site.

But Shreveport has put in a strong bid as well.

"We are doing everything it takes to get the Bayou Classic here," said Brandy Evans, vice-president for communications for the Shreveport-Bossier Convention and Tourist Bureau. "The Bayou Classic should remain in the Bayou State."

Ken Antee, chief administrative officer for the City of Shreveport, said that Independence Stadium was being offered rent-free and that the game day costs would be covered as well.

Also, blocks of hotel rooms were being set aside at reasonable rates.

Shreveport's problem, however, is that Independence Stadium seats 52,000, some 20,000 less than Reliant, and that there are only about 8,000 hotel rooms in the area. The Bayou Classic usually occupies 10,000 hotel rooms in New Orleans, Weaver said.

"Our stadium size is what it is," Antee said. "Same thing with the hotels.

"But we still feel like we can accommodate this game and we can make this financially feasible to both schools. What we've presented to them can make this successful for everyone."

Weaver said that all things being equal, Shreveport was her first choice.

"Both universities would like nothing more than to keep the game in Louisiana," she said. "But we're just not sure, especially with so many displaced citizens still living there."

Houston officials could not be contacted on Thursday. But last week, Shea Guinn, vice-president and general manager of Reliant Stadium called Houston the ideal site.

"We are the nearest large city with all of the amenities and a stadium to play host to the event," he said. "Plus, we have many thousands of Louisiana residents living here who would be able to participate in the activities."

Those activities over Thanksgiving weekend, besides the game itself, including a battle of the bands on the night before, include a job fair and numerous alumni and private parties.

LSU's Tiger Stadium was considered, but the lack of hotel rooms in Baton Rouge and the unavailability of rooms in New Orleans made that idea not feasible.

Weaver said that, regardless of where the game is played this year, the Bayou Classic will return to New Orleans in 2006, if the Superdome is playable. If not, it likely would be played at LSU.

"We don't have any intention of moving the Bayou Classic," she said. "Everybody understands this an alternative for just one year."

Green Wave kickoff moved to 1 p.m.

RUSTON — Southern Methodist University athletic officials, keeping a close eye on Hurricane Rita, are confident the time change for Saturday's game with Tulane will avoid any problems the storm may cause in the Dallas area.

The Tulane-SMU game, scheduled for 7 p.m. at Ford Stadium, was moved to a 1 p.m. kickoff.

SMU athletic director Jim Copeland said the school is continuing to monitor the hurricane's projected path "and will take additional action" if it is necessary.

The weather forecast has Hurricane Rita moving into the Texas gulf coast near Houston early Saturday. It has already forced the postponement of Southern Miss' game Saturday at Houston. Southern Miss' game with Tulane on Sept. 4 was postponed until late November by Hurricane Katrina. The storm also forced the Green Wave to relocate its football team at Louisiana Tech and send its others athletes to three universities in Texas.

Hurricane Rita also forced Tulane's women's soccer team to call off a Wednesday match with Sam Houston State and a Sunday's match at Trinity. The volleyball team's Thursday flights out of Houston were cancelled and the team was forced to postpone its Conference USA road matches with East Carolina and Marshall.

Meanwhile, Tulane athletic director Rick Dickson, after conferring with associate athletics director Vince Granito in College State, Texas, has decided to leave six of the Tulane's athletic teams, 90 athletes in all, at Texas A&M. The school is about 250 miles from Houston.

The men's basketball and tennis teams, the women's tennis and soccer teams, along with the volleyball and swimming and diving teams, will spend Friday night in a locker room at Kyle Field, A&M's football stadium, according to a Tulane official.

Tulane's football team is scheduled to leave for Dallas at 9 a.m. today.

Also, the site of Tulane's Oct. 14 C-USA contest against Texas-El Paso has not been decided. A decision probably will not come until next week, Dickson said.

Tigers' Russell feeling more secure

LSU QB not worried about being pulled

By William Kalec
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Loaded with talent, absent of an identity, LSU is beginning to resemble its laidback quarterback, seemingly unfazed by the surplus of adversity gathered less than a month into this stuttered season. The Tigers are beginning to follow the tall guy with the tilted brim, trusting in a previously hidden confidence.

"Last year I was in and out," sophomore JaMarcus Russell said. "This year, hopefully I'll be in more than out."

If Russell comes anywhere close to mimicking his first wire-to-wire collegiate start against Arizona State, Matt Flynn and Ryan Perrilloux will likely remain on the shelf until the end of November - especially if LSU's receivers cut Russell some slack and hang on to a few more balls. Overlooked because of Arizona State quarterback Sam Keller's video-game-like statistics, Russell went 16-of-29 for 232 yards and a watershed touchdown pass in the Tigers' 35-31 victory over the Sun Devils.

APPHOTO

LSU's JaMarcus Russell was sacked on this play, but he was upright enough to complete 16 of 29 passes for 232 yards and the winning touchdown against Arizona State.

A popular pawn in the mind games Nick Saban loved to play, Russell spent much of last season lamenting his fragile, pass-to-pass status. In one series, out the next, back in, back out until it's over. Forget getting into a flow.

And even though Coach Les Miles decided to keep competition between the quarterbacks open right up until game day, offensive coordinator Jimbo Fisher assured Russell he stood on much more stable ground before kickoff.

"It's kind of hard. Because every time you do something wrong, you're always peeking to the sideline and see if he's coming to get you," Russell said Wednesday, just days before the No. 3-ranked Tigers' game against No. 10 Tennessee on Monday at 6:30 p.m.. "But you know, even if you do it right, you're still looking to see. But now, it's not like that. Coach says. 'Play like you're the only guy we have at that position.' Like nothing is going to happen.

"It gave me a great energy boost, confidence boost," Russell said, later. "Play like you have nothing to lose."

Teammates raved about Russell's offseason dedication, how he was almost reborn in the huddle, practicing with a sense of purpose. After ballooning a bit when seen at a summer passing camp, Russell dropped close to 15 pounds before August.

"When you are so much more gifted than everybody, you get away with bad habits," Fisher said. "Now, they're not bad habits at the (high school) level, because you're gifted. Physically, you can do whatever. And you're so much bigger than everybody. You can see things and do things that most guys can't.

"It's a testament to him that he's willing to go back to the basics and be a hard-working guy and do it from the ground up instead of just relying on his ability. And it's hard to do."

Russell admitted there were instances last season where he stepped to the line unclear exactly what route his receivers were going to run. Compare that to now, when Fisher said Russell checks off and makes adjustments freely.

"Ability is one thing. Then, you have to apply the knowledge with ability at the proper situation in the proper moment," Fisher said. "I mean, there's a lot more to being a great football player than being a great athlete.

"That's why there are only a few great ones. ... The guys that can maximize their ability with the situation and knowledge of the game, those are the ones ya'll write about."

Rita may cause more woes for N.O. Bowl

Official says storm 'changes the equation'

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

Hurricane Katrina already has forced the New Orleans Bowl to move from the Superdome. Now, Hurricane Rita may alter plans to play the game in Lafayette, officials' first choice as an alternate site.

Depending on Rita's effects, the storm could mean a lack of hotel rooms in Lafayette for the Dec. 20 game between the Sun Belt Conference champion and a team from Conference USA.

"We're close, but Rita changes the equation," said Billy Ferrante, the bowl's executive director. "We could see one group of people moving out but then bringing in another. We just don't know."

If the game can't be played in Lafayette, Shreveport would be the most likely destination. Several other cities, including Orlando, Fla., and Memphis, Tenn., have expressed interest in the game, but the Greater New Orleans Sports Foundation prefers to keep the game in Louisiana.

"We'd like to make a decision next week, but we've just got to wait and see what happens with Rita," Ferrante said.

Ferrante and Sports Foundation executive director Jay Cicero met with officials from Louisiana-Lafayette, a Sun Belt member, and the city earlier this week. Ferrante said the need for about 3,500 hotel rooms in a city that has about 4,800 is a sticking point in finalizing the deal.

Most of the rooms are currently occupied by evacuees and recovery workers. If Rita strikes southwestern Louisiana, the demand would grow.

However, ULL president Ray Authement has said that, since the game would fall during a holiday period, university housing could be used.

Ferrante said there's great enthusiasm in a city whose only previous bowl experience was the 1948 Camellia Bowl between Hardin-Simmons and Wichita State.

"The important thing to us is that they really want to take local ownership of the game," Ferrante said. "They look on this as a big event and it's a priority for the community to get behind it.

"They've basically told us that, whatever we need to make this work, they'll do it."

Ferrante also said Lafayette offers many of the amenities of New Orleans, albeit on a smaller scale. "The culture is a little different, but the entertainment, food and so forth are very much like they are in New Orleans," he said. "Fans would not lack for things to do."

If the Superdome is not operating in 2006, Lafayette again would be the likely site for the game, Ferrante said, hopefully without the hotel problem.

"We've talked about the possibility of not being in the Superdome next year," he said. "They said they'd love to have us."

Atlanta makes sense for Sugar, but just for one year

FINNEY, from C-5

three, four years?

So what.

During that time, you simply invite Sugar Bowl fans to make New Orleans their destination and, come game day, you encourage them to make a 90-minute trip to Tiger Stadium.

Here's the picture: Barring another disaster, God forbid, by bowl time in late 2006, New Orleans would be able to house, and entertain, a bowl crowd of approximately 30,000. And Tulane and the Saints would be ready to afford practice facilities to the teams, a couple of necessary items Katrina put off the charts. Temporarily.

Let's not fool ourselves. There are many cities out there ready to jump at the chance to replace New Orleans on the Bowl Championship Series calendar.

Include Atlanta in that number.

Given existing circumstances, however, since you want your event to go off smoothly, since you want New Orleans ready to welcome Sugar Bowl crowds in its customary fashion, the time line suggests Atlanta may make more sense than Baton Rouge as a site for a Jan. 2, 2006 Sugar Bowl.

But for one year only.

The key to all future Sugar Bowls comes down to one word: Superdome.

At the moment, no one knows whether Katrina damaged Dave Dixon's dream house beyond repair, whether it will make more sense to build a new one or restore the old one.

Make no mistake, since the French Quarter escaped a lethal blow, a Superdome, in some form, will be a telling showcase of the revival.

And let's not forget, when it comes to sports, what the Big Easy's bible tells us about a 72-year-old fixture.

On Jan. 1, 1935, a cozy Tulane Stadium of 20,000 begat the Sugar Bowl.

Sugar Bowl success begat a bigger home, a Tulane Stadium expansion, from 20,000 to 60,000 to 80,000.

A bigger home begat the Saints.

Which begat, with an assist from a unique city, Super Bowls IV, VI and IX.

Which begat the Superdome.

And Super Bowls XII, XV, XX, XXIV, XXXI and XXXVI.

So take a time out.

When you talk Sugar Bowl, a gift to a River City that helped heal some of the scars left by the Great Depression, you're talking about a story that takes you back to your childhood.

The Sugar Bowl was "The Little Engine That Could."

Northshore players happy to get back to work

Panthers to open season Tuesday vs. Covington

By Marty Mule'

Northshore volleyball players spent the first part of Monday's practice catching up on the past three weeks. They were happy to see each other again. Sixteen members of the team gathered at Clearwood Junior High to pick up where they left off and resume the season interrupted by Hurricane Katrina three weeks ago.

"They were excited and happy," Panthers coach Sandy Blancher said of the team's first get-together since the storm, which scattered evacuating team members from Virginia to Texas.

Two members of the squad did not return. Thirteen players had severe flooding in their homes. The families of every one of the 16 have either taken in people needing shelter or been taken in by others.

"It's been hard on everyone," Blancher said. "No one around here has had an easy time. I was pretty easy on them for the first practice or two because they needed some time to vent, some time to getting back being teenagers."

The Panthers' first match is Tuesday against District 4-5A's Covington. The question is, where? Covington's gym is a medical relief center, and Northshore's gym is an evacuation center.

"At the moment, we don't know where we'll play," Blancher said. "We only know we will."

She was glad to see her players, but Blancher could also see her team wasn't in volleyball shape. "You could see them gasping early," Blancher said, "and their passing was rusty, and, after a month without working out, their strength was not what it normally would be."

Blancher didn't care. She was overjoyed to see her team.

After a couple of practices, the Panthers have settled into what they were expected to be: a district championship contender.

Angele Hooks has picked up where she left off as an exceptional setter. Outside hitters Tiffany Aidoo and Heather Doiron seem better than they were, Blancher said.

Now Blancher said the team is ready for a match.

"I can't wait," Blancher said. "Neither can the girls."

More games canceled by hurricane threat

From staff reports

The threat of Hurricane Rita has canceled some metro-area football games scheduled for Friday night and postponed others until Sunday and Monday. North shore-based District 4-5A canceled its four-game Friday night schedule, though Covington coach Darryl Graham said the Lions' game with Slidell could be played Monday. According to Louisiana High School Athletic Association rules, all games must be played by midnight Monday.

Northlake Christian, playing in its first varsity season, must wait another week for its debut. The Wolverines were scheduled to play at Gueydan on Friday. However, Gueydan is located in southwest Louisiana, which could have severe weather from Rita.

Three River Parishes games have been moved to Sunday, including Hahnville at Lutcher (5 p.m.) and Varnado at St. James (3 p.m.) and East St. John at East Ascension (6 p.m.). South Lafourche at Destrehan will be played Monday at 6:30 p.m. and Riverside will play at West St. John on Monday at 7 p.m. Holy Cross at Fisher, scheduled to be played Thursday night, was postponed and will be made up either Sunday or Monday, Fisher coach Duane Foret said.

This weekend's prep football schedule: Friday's games - John Curtis at Ferriday at 7 p.m., Live Oak at Pope John Paul II at 7:30 p.m.; Sunday's games - Varnado at St. James at 3 p.m., Hahnville at Lutcher at 5 p.m., East St. John at East Ascension at 6 p.m.; Monday's games - South Lafourche at Destrehan at 6:30 p.m., Riverside at West St. John at 7 p.m.

Higgins, Cox getting organized for opener

Coaches don't know how many players will return

By Mike Strom
Staff writer

Higgins and Helen Cox high schools, like several other West Bank schools, both are scrambling to resurrect their football programs.

The two schools are set to resume practice Monday, their first work since Hurricane Katrina struck. Then on Oct. 7 at 7 p.m., they are scheduled to play each other at Hoss Memtsas Stadium in their first game.

"I think we're like all the other schools that have been affected by the storm," said Higgins coach Wayne Meyers, who returned home this week to begin cleaning the Marrero school. "We have gotten in touch with a lot of our players, who said that they are going to be back next week to start practice. It's important to start practicing because then word starts to get out that we're back."

Higgins expects to have back 15 starters, including nine on defense. Jefferson Parish Public Schools are scheduled to resume classes Oct. 3. Besides Higgins and Cox, Bonnabel, King, Ehret, West Jefferson and Fisher also are expected to resume playing football.

Cox coach Willie Brooks also has spent countless hours on his cell phone trying to stay in touch with his players while he was evacuated in Atlanta, but he is uncertain how many players to expect Monday.

"I'm an eternal optimist, but I'm looking at the West Bank and it's wrecked I don't know what these kids are going to have to come back to."

WILLIE BROOKS
Cox coach

"I'm an eternal optimist, but I'm looking at the West Bank and it's wrecked," said Brooks, whose program is in its first season of varsity competition. "I don't know what these kids are going to have to come back to. I'm talking to my kids, and, virtually to a man, they all want to come back. But will they be able to come back? It's up to the parents."

Cox's top player, receiver Ed Scott, is returning, Brooks said, but the status of quarterback Rudy Chattman remains in question.

"Rudy wants to come back," Brooks said, "but his grandmother's house is damaged and may have mold in it. He's been calling me every day. He is passionate about wanting to come back. He just doesn't know if he's going to return."

One of the big questions for Higgins is whether standout tailback Josh Brumfield can return.

Brumfield and his family evacuated to Texas. "Josh might be back," Meyers said. "We're not sure about a few people. Every day things are changing."

Cox players looking to contact Brooks should call him at (504) 975-6873. Higgins players can call Wayne Meyers at (504) 669-1758, Stephen Meyers at (504) 912-0573 or Higgins' football office at (504) 349-3371.

Higgins' coaches said only a few players have said they won't be returning.

"If the players have houses to come home to, they'll be coming back," Wayne Meyers said.

NOTES: Former Karr running back Jeremy McGee is enrolled and playing for McKinley in Baton Rouge,

McKinley coach Bruce Swinton confirmed Wednesday. McGee had 117 yards on 17 carries in McKinley's 18-6 loss to Glen Oaks last weekend. McGee is a member of The Times-Picayune's blue-chip list and committed to UCLA. McKinley is 0-2. ... Landry coach Skip LaMothe said he is considering assistant coaching job offers from Cox, Baton Rouge-Capitol and Scotlandville. Brooks confirmed his discussions with LaMothe to serve as Cox's quarterbacks coach. "I haven't made a decision yet only because I haven't decided where my two younger daughters are going to go to school," said LaMothe, who returned to his West Bank home this week. "The job I'd prefer to have is at L.B. Landry. This was our year." . . . East Jefferson's football program will resume practice Monday at the school. The Warriors first game will be Oct. 7 against Grace King at a time and site to be determined. Players should contact East Jefferson coach Henry Rando at (504) 888-7486 or (504) 469-5790.

International team leads early at Presidents Cup

GAINESVILLE, VA. — The International team was in foreign territory Thursday at the Presidents Cup. It was in the lead.

Retief Goosen and Adam Scott turned in a tag-team performance that buried Tiger Woods and Fred Couples in the opening match. Bringing up the rear were Mike Weir and Trevor Immelman, who birdied four of their first five holes in alternate shot for a dominant victory over David Toms and Stewart Cink.

When the first day of matches ended, the International team had a 3 1/2-2 1/2 lead.

One point isn't much, especially with 28 matches left. But considering how the International team typically starts at the Robert Trent Jones Golf Club, it was cause for celebration.

In three previous trips to this golf course on the shores of Lake Manassas, the Americans have twice led 5-0 and once led 4-1 after the opening day.

"Some places it could have been worse," U.S. captain Jack Nicklaus said. "Some places it could have been better. Tomorrow is another day."

Scott and Goosen got this day off to a resounding start. It started with a simple halve on the third hole, when Goosen hit a 60-foot putt to a hole that was just below a steep ridge. The putt settled 16 inches for the cup. Then it was a matter of waiting for Woods and Couples to self-destruct.

A poor chip by Woods cost them the fourth hole. Couples missed a 4-foot birdie putt so badly that it never touched the hole, as they fell two behind on the sixth. And when Scott made a 10-foot birdie putt on the par-3 seventh that juts out into the lake, the International team already was 3-up.

"The first match out is always important, no matter who you're playing," Scott said. "Gary (Player) wanted Retief and I to go out and give the guys something to see."

QB Roy resumes season in Alexandria

ROY, from C-5

him a bit at first, but he's doing a phenomenal job of picking everything up. He probably only knows about 40 percent of what we're doing, so we're staying with that 40 percent. But, he's a sharp kid. He's been taught well. He's a good player. Within a week or two, he'll have mastered everything we do."

Stoker, in his 30th season at ASH, is known for his affinity for the passing game. This year's Trojans, however, lacked a true dropback passer and were relying on receiver-turned-quarterback Keith Mills.

The Trojans also possess one of the top running back prospects in the nation in Chris Brown, a slashing 5-foot-10, 200-pound senior whose top prospective colleges, Stoker said, are Oklahoma, Arkansas, Tennessee, Mississippi State and Florida State.

Adding Roy was akin to finding the missing piece to a puzzle, with Mills being allowed to return to his natural position at receiver.

"It made us a better football team because it lets us play more good football players," Stoker said.

As a junior, Roy, who is 6 feet 3, 190 pounds, passed for 18 touchdowns and 1,085 yards while being intercepted twice in 114 attempts out of Belle Chasse's run-oriented wing-T offense.

"We've probably got one of the top five running backs in the nation," Stoker said. "But we're still going to throw it 25 to 30 times a game. We're not afraid of the forward pass. We think it's a great weapon. Adam is an accurate passer. He picks up reads well. He's got a chance to be a good player."

Roy made his first start for the Trojans last Friday in a 45-15 nondistrict victory against Bolton in which he completed eight of 12 passes, including one for a touchdown, while Brown rushed for 274 yards and three scores.

Stoker made the switch from Mills to Roy in the first quarter of the previous game, a 32-28 victory against West Ouachita. Roy did not play in a season-opening 21-17 loss to Bastrop, the top ranked team in Class 4A.

In seven quarters, Roy has completed 13 of 20 passes for 246 yards and two touchdowns while rushing for a third score.

"Our offense is a lot different than what he's used to running," Stoker said. "We do a lot of dropback passing and play action, too. So it's a lot different for him.

"But he's adapted well. We're just teaching him the reads and where to go with the football because he can get it there. I think the guy can play college football."

Green Bay Packers quarterback Craig Nall and Northwestern State coach Scott Stoker, Butch's son and a Division I-AA All-American quarterback at Northwestern State, are among the passers produced by Stoker.

Continuing his dream of playing college football was another factor in Roy enrolling at ASH, as was his parents' desire to find a school with a strong academic curriculum. Mike and Jane Roy also considered St. Thomas Aquinas in Hammond.

Roy said Ole Miss, Southern Mississippi, Indiana, Army, Louisiana-Lafayette, Louisiana-Monroe, Northwestern State, Southeastern Louisiana and Nicholls State are colleges that have shown interest in him.

"I knew they had a good football team here because I'm a football fan," Roy said. "I had looked on the Internet when I was trying to make a decision. I knew that they usually go deep into the playoffs.

"When we visited here, the thing Coach Stoker told me was that, if I was looking for exposure, I'd get it here. I just hope that I can supply some extra drive to this team to make it to the Dome or Tiger Stadium or wherever they're playing the state championships."

Roy and ASH are not playing this weekend because of the threat of Hurricane Rita. The Trojans were scheduled to play at LaGrange, but that game was canceled Wednesday. A replacement game against North

Vermilion that Stoker arranged Wednesday afternoon was canceled Thursday morning, leaving Roy and the Trojans sidelined until next week's trip to Marksville. ASH opens District 3-4A play one week later by hosting Tioga.

Roy is joined on the ASH team by three other displaced metro-area players - his brother Taylor, a junior receiver; former Belle Chasse linebacker Shawn Coloudrivich; and former O. Perry Walker defensive back Ryan Allen. The stark reality that Belle Chasse's season was wiped out and that his senior year was forever changed took time for Roy to come to grips with.

"I kind of had to pinch myself at first," Roy said. "It was disappointing to have lost our season. I kind of felt like a traitor (leaving Belle Chasse for Alexandria). Water rushed over levees on both sides of the Industrial Canal on Friday, threatening the 9th Ward, just drained from Katrina.

But the breaches threatened few lives, as New Orleans, from Lakeview to Uptown and from the Bywater to Mid-City, remained a vacant and scarred place, most residents waiting in exile as the second storm in less than a month bore down on Louisiana.

It was a respite interrupted by a new wave of fear. New Orleans, along with St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes, took water in familiar places, clearly unprepared for a grazing by Category 3 storm aimed for the Texas-Louisiana border. About 150,000 people had been evacuated from southwest Louisiana, with about 35,000 at in-state shelters, authorities said.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco said Task Force Rita was staged on the edge of the storm to provide relief after the hurricane Hurricane Rita bore down on the Texas-Louisiana border late Friday with winds of 125 mph, driving millions of evacuees ahead of its 15- to-20-foot storm surge and taking dozens of lives even before landfall.

Slicing northwestward across the Gulf of Mexico, Rita merely sideswiped metropolitan New Orleans. But her storm surge, accompanied by gusting winds and lashing rain, blew out a freshly repaired levee along the Industrial Canal and once again sent water coursing into the Lower 9th Ward.

There were also reports of significant seepage from the walls of the London Avenue Canal, which was breached by Hurricane Katrina on Aug. 29.

The National Hurricane Center said it expected Rita to hit the Texas coast in the vicinity of Port Arthur about daybreak today.

Displaced Voodoo Fest in Memphis this year

Proceeds will go to restoring N.O.

By Bruce Hamilton
Staff writer

The Voodoo Music Experience, an annual rock festival held in New Orleans since its 1999 inception, is relocating to Memphis, Tenn., because Hurricane Katrina wrecked plans to hold the concert at its scheduled venue in City Park.

Voodoo Fest, to be held at Memphis' Tom Lee Park on Halloween weekend, Oct. 29-30, is being recast as a fund-raiser to aid victims of Katrina and New Orleans itself. Proceeds will benefit the New Orleans Restoration Fund, an arm of the Entertainment Industry Foundation, according to concert organizers.

"Since our home base is New Orleans, it's been an especially difficult time for us, with staff losing homes and offices," said Stephan Rehage, the event's founder, in a statement released under the heading "Restore. Rebuild. Rebirth."

"Moving a festival of this magnitude has been no easy task," Rehage said. He expressed gratitude "to all the artists dedicating their time and energy to support the cause and to our incredible fans for their dedication and support." Asked why he chose Memphis, Rehage said, "The vibe of the city is very similar to New Orleans," and he planned to "turn Beale Street into Bourbon Street."

The event's profits will be allocated to national humanitarian organizations such as Mercy Corps and Habitat for Humanity and to local grass-roots organizations and cultural institutions such as WWOZ radio and Young Artists/Young Aspirations Inc.

To boost fund-raising, VH1 will broadcast highlights from the performances Nov. 5 in a primetime showcase. Its broadband Internet channel, Vspot, will also feature portions of the event.

Nine Inch Nails is the first confirmed act from the concert's original lineup of more than 40 acts, including New Orleans favorites Dr. John, the Neville Brothers, Kermit Ruffins, Big Sam's Funky Nation, Bonerama and World Leader Pretend.

Organizers are working to confirm or reshape the bill, which also featured national acts such as the Foo Fighters, Queens of the Stone Age, The Flaming Lips, Social Distortion, Cake, Ryan Adams and Billy Idol.

Former New Orleans resident Trent Reznor, frontman for Nine Inch Nails, told MTV he would support the festival.

"I look forward to being a part of this amazing New Orleans tradition," he said. "It's great that other cities have opened their doors to this year's event, and the New Orleans spirit will definitely remain in the air ñ that's something the floods cannot wash away.

"We are going to be part of the rebuilding process, and we are asking the entire music community to join us."

Rehage, who is from New Orleans, said it has been heartbreaking to see the coverage of Katrina, and the decision to make the concert a fund-raiser was virtually automatic. He said he plans to donate all the proceeds.

He said he is asking bands to "join in for the cause" and perform for free. Local acts Cowboy Mouth and Better Than Ezra have agreed to play.

Federal payroll offices vow to reopen

Timeline unclear, officials say

By Bruce Alpert
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — They can't say when, but federal officials are promising that two major federal employers will return to the New Orleans area as soon as conditions allow.

Agriculture Department spokesman Ed Loyd said that the National Finance Center in New Orleans, which processes payroll for 564,000 federal employees, didn't appear to be significantly damaged by Hurricane Katrina, although assessments of necessary repairs are ongoing. He said the department is committed to reopening the facility, which employs about 1,400 people.

The Space and Naval Warfare Systems Center, which processes payroll for the Navy and has more than 200 civilian employees, also is planning a return to the University of New Orleans Technology Center, where it is a major tenant. Capt. Fred Mingo, the center's commanding officer, said that cleanup already is under way, although he could not give a time estimate for reopening.

Both Mingo and Loyd praised their New Orleans employees for working overtime to ensure that none of the scheduled payrolls were delayed after Hurricane Katrina hit New Orleans on Aug. 29.

Some of the employees have been working at other federal facilities to oversee the payroll operations, Mingo and Loyd said.

Mingo said that many civilian contract employees were working at temporary offices in Baton Rouge. Loyd said several hundred Finance Center workers were at Department of Agriculture sites in Dallas and Philadelphia.

"Clearly, the processing of payroll for our federal workers is critical to enable government workers to do their jobs," Loyd said. "And we're very impressed with what the National Finance Center workers accomplished. Before the hurricane struck, they worked hard to ensure that the next payroll was ready to go. And then many of them, with just a single suitcase, knowing that their homes had been destroyed, went to work in Philadelphia and Dallas to handle the payroll. We appreciate their commitment. It was truly remarkable."

He said that workers at the Finance Center who have not returned to work are guaranteed paychecks until Oct. 1. After that, a decision on how to accommodate workers who can't get to work will be made, Loyd said.

Mississippi worries charm won't return to coast

Rebuilding to take history into account

By Emily Wagster Pettus
Associated Press writer

JACKSON, MISS. — As Mississippi recovers from Hurricane Katrina's destruction, many fear the development to come could erase the charm and diversity of the state's eclectic Gulf Coast communities.

The 80-mile coastline has been the home of fishing hamlets, seaside arts communities and, for the past 13 years, neon-lit casinos. Now, with about two-thirds of the homes in the state's southern counties destroyed or severely damaged, residents and officials hope the new landscape that emerges from the rubble won't be dominated by high-rise condos and tacky strip malls.

Even before Katrina, proposed condo developments prompted heated debate among locals who worried that concrete towers would block beach views.

"I hope we can preserve the historical ambiance that the beach in Mississippi has possessed over the years and not let it look like every other coastline in America," said former Gov. William Winter, longtime president of the state's archives and history board.

The scope of Katrina's destruction puts the Mississippi coast in an unusual position, said Robert Deyle, an urban and regional planning professor at Florida State University. Entire neighborhoods were flattened for a quarter-mile or more back from the beach.

"In most disasters, structures that have been destroyed are interspersed with structures that are still standing," Deyle said.

Though much of the coastline is still strewn shoulder-high with lumber and twisted metal, Deyle said cities soon will have a "clean slate" for rebuilding — and wealthy developers, from casino companies to condo builders, could buy land from homeowners who don't want to rebuild.

Katrina was indiscriminate in its destruction, obliterating or damaging trailers, middle-class brick houses, tin-roofed fishermen's cottages, Sen. Trent Lott's beachside home, concrete condominiums, century-old shore mansions, vacation bungalows and businesses large and small.

Charles Sullivan, who has written histories of the Mississippi Gulf Coast and of hurricanes, said Katrina wiped away much of the region's architectural character.

"Whatever it will be, it won't be what it was," Sullivan said. "As far as I know, Beauvoir is the only antebellum structure still standing between New Orleans and Mobile."

And even Beauvoir, the Biloxi beachfront home of Confederate President Jefferson Davis, was severely battered by Katrina.

Mississippi's coastline has 26 miles of manmade white sand beach in Harrison County, the center and most populous of the state's three coastal counties. The county is also home to the bustling state port in Gulfport, shrimp industry in Biloxi and 13 casinos.

Police ordered to stop disarming residents

Post-storm confiscations off target, judge says

By Bill Walsh
Washington bureau

WASHINGTON — Gun rights groups won a temporary restraining order Friday preventing police in New Orleans and St. Tammany Parish from confiscating residents' firearms in the flooded parishes.

U.S. District Court Judge Jay Zainey ordered the New Orleans Police Department and St. Tammany Parish Sheriff's Office to stop taking weapons from law-abiding people and to return any they already took.

In documents filed in federal court in Baton Rouge, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, Police Chief Eddie Compass and St. Tammany Sheriff Jack Strain deny ever ordering the confiscation of firearms.

But news reports quoted Compass as saying only law enforcement officials can have firearms, and Deputy Chief Warren Riley as saying, "We are going to take all the weapons."

Wayne LaPierre, president of the National Rifle Association, said his group documented 30 to 40 cases of people having their weapons taken away.

"In many cases, it was from their homes at gunpoint. There were no receipts given or anything else at a time when there was no 911 response and these citizens were out there on their own protecting their families," LaPierre said. "The worst thing about it is that it was at a time of complete collapse of the government's ability to protect people and they were trying to protect themselves."

In the immediate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina on Aug. 29, there were widespread reports of looting throughout New Orleans, sometimes involving local police. Some of those who didn't evacuate described hiding in their homes for fear of being victimized. At the outset, the city ordered police officers to ignore looters and focus instead on search and rescue. But within days, crime spiraled out of control and police were directed to restore order.

"The city should be held liable because people weren't allowed to protect their property. We feel extremely confident we will win suits for damages against the city."

ALLEN GOTTLIEB
president of the Second Amendment Foundation, which teamed up with the NRA to file the suit

To gain control of the situation, Gov. Kathleen Blanco issued emergency power orders, which allow authorities to regulate firearms. But the suit alleged that law enforcement officials overstepped their bounds by taking guns away in violation of the 2nd Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and violating due process by failing to give people receipts.

Police sometimes found themselves in confrontations with law-abiding citizens after Nagin ordered a mandatory evacuation of the city. Some residents insisted on staying, and police and National Guard troops forcibly removed them. According to the lawsuit, soldiers from one guard unit in Oklahoma were caught on tape handcuffing residents, confiscating their weapons and then letting the people go.

Allen Gottlieb, president of the Second Amendment Foundation, which teamed up with the NRA to file the suit, said Friday's court victory could pave the way for future monetary damages. Gottlieb said that if residents who had their guns taken away can prove any financial losses, such as from looting, they might have a case to win compensation from the city.

"The city should be held liable because people weren't allowed to protect their property," Gottlieb said. "We feel extremely confident we will win suits for damages against the city."

Zainey is a judge assigned to the Eastern District of Louisiana in New Orleans. He was nominated to the seat by President Bush. The Eastern District court was evacuated in the flooding, and all the cases from the Eastern District were transferred to Baton Rouge.

FEMA hotel contracts tied up

Other groups already are booking rooms

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — As New Orleans attempts to bring in workers to rebuild the city, hotel owners with vacant rooms say they are frustrated with a federal bureaucracy that for two weeks has held up contracts that could put thousands of people into hotels almost immediately.

On behalf of the city and state, the Federal Emergency Management Agency is trying to book long-term leases for 10,000 hotel rooms in the New Orleans area, including many downtown.

FEMA spokesman James McIntyre agreed that hotels have been waiting for the contracts to be signed, but he said federal attorneys in Washington are trying to make sure the contracts are legal before moving forward.

One of the problems appears to be the federal law on FEMA operations, which stipulates that the agency cannot renovate private property. Some of the hotels have requested assistance getting rooms in shape for occupants after the storm.

McIntyre said leases are "moving forward" on rooms that are ready and that do not need renovation assistance from FEMA. He said FEMA officials are concerned about the intense financial scrutiny they will receive after all the deals are done.

Bill Langkopp, executive director of the New Orleans regional hotel association, said some hotels have decided not to wait for FEMA and have signed leases with other contractors.

Hotels have received requests for rooms from the Army Corps of Engineers, private contractors, insurance companies and claims adjusters. A number of major institutions want six-month leases for large blocks of rooms.

"We realize there are other offers coming" to the hotels, McIntyre said. But he said the agency hopes FEMA will still be able to book a substantial number of rooms.

Patrick Quinn, a hotel developer and owner of several properties in New Orleans, including the Astor Crowne Plaza, said he has spent $3 million to $4 million to fix storm-damaged facilities and has about 1,400 rooms ready to lease. But he has been waiting two weeks for FEMA to finish the contracts and is trying to decide whether to sign a lease with other contractors, he said.

Quinn said FEMA personnel in Louisiana have been cooperative and that he realizes they are dealing with many issues.

"I'm sure it's more complicated than I know," Quinn said.

Quinn pieced together his own army of renovation and construction specialists to get his rooms back in shape after Katrina, and has housed many of them in his hotel rooms.

"We haven't been able to execute the contracts," Quinn said. "There are rooms sitting vacant right now."

Marriott regional manager Mark Sanders said FEMA had initial talks with the hotel about long-term leases, but has not come back with the contracts in hand.

McIntyre said FEMA has a contract with Sheraton.

There appeared Friday to be some confusion among the various state, local and federal agencies about who would be placed in the rooms if FEMA acquired them. McIntyre said FEMA would follow the direction of the city and state to determine who would go into the rooms.

Of the 10,000 rooms, the first 1,000 would go to essential personnel and people involved in the recovery effort.

Beyond that, he said, FEMA has been told that the state's first priority for hotel rooms in New Orleans would be for evacuees, not necessarily people who would take jobs to assist in the near-term recovery effort. The elderly, sick and single parents would have priority among the evacuees.

But state officials said the city's infrastructure is not ready to handle evacuees with special needs, and that the rooms would be used for workers and others to carry on the rehabilitation of New Orleans.

FEMA has already secured cruise ships and some hotel rooms for essential personnel. The request for 10,000 rooms would be in addition to those.

Texas can use lesson in evacuating a city

Louisiana plan called more efficient, orderly

By Bob Marshall
Staff writer

It certainly goes against the current trend among the nation's punditry, but Larry and Monica Ponoroff would like to suggest Mayor Ray Nagin and Gov. Kathleen Blanco as models for hurricane planning. Well, at least for the evacuation stage.

The New Orleans couple came to that conclusion about halfway through a 17-hour attempt to evacuate Houston on Thursday as Hurricane Rita headed for the Texas coast.

After about seven hours of baking inside their rental car in 95 degree heat on Interstate 45, they were out of food and water and had watched as their once-filled gas tank hit the "half" mark. Yet they were still inside metro Houston, no more than 35 miles from their starting point, and stuck in a line of traffic that appeared to stretch the entire 250 miles to Dallas - but was moving at inches-per-hour.

So they couldn't help thinking about their evacuation from New Orleans before Katrina whacked their home: 11 comfortable, orderly hours from the Big Easy to Houston.

"I think they could have taken page from Louisiana's book on this one," Monica Ponoroff said. "They should have called Kathleen Blanco and Ray Nagin and asked them 'How do we evacuate a city?' because they sure didn't have a clue.

"Eventually we gave up. We turned around and went back to the apartment. And that took us three hours. What a mess."

The Ponoroffs' ordeal is one of millions that will be told about what could be the greatest traffic jam in American history. They never saw it coming.

Best laid plans

Larry Ponoroff, dean of the Tulane University Law School, had been living in Houston since the end of August, when Katrina closed the New Orleans campus. He is part of a senior leadership group working to reopen the university.

Monica Ponoroff had recently returned to Houston from Chicago because the couple expected to reenter New Orleans this week. But on Wednesday, Rita intervened by aiming its fury at Houston. City and state authorities urged residents to evacuate, so the Ponoroffs made preparation Wednesday evening, and left their apartment Thursday at 5 a.m.

"Dallas is about 250 miles away and the drive normally takes about four to four-and-a-half hours, but we expected it might take up to eight with the traffic," Larry Ponoroff said. "So, we packed four bottles of water and a bag of clothes each. The Tulane group had arranged places to stay in Dallas. We didn't think we'd be on the road long."

The found out differently as soon as they turned onto I-45 in Houston.

"From the very start, it was bumper to bumper and just a crawl — when it moved at all," he said.

Like most other evacuees, the Ponoroffs turned off the car's air conditioning to preserve fuel. Unfortunately, the Texas sun decided to bake the concrete with 96 degree heat, a record for that day. Within a few hours, the trip had turned into an ordeal. By noon, it had become a scene out of a disaster movie.

"In very short order, it was just one huge parking lot, and it was obvious that the city had encouraged everyone to evacuate but had no idea how to handle the enormous number of cars," he said. "And I could see an even bigger problem developing, because they would soon have to find a way of caring for all the people who were falling out."

As Hurricane Rita threatens, Houston is in the rear-view mirror of Texas residents and Louisiana residents who had evacuated to the city for Hurricane Katrina. Many ran out of gas as they sat in bumper-to-bumper traffic.

Contraflow flaws

By Thursday, the Texas Department of Transportation had initiated the largest contraflow effort in the state's history and enlisted help from the private sector in Dallas and San Antonio to acquire gasoline to fill tankers they planned to position at rest stops along the evacuation route.

But even after the contraflow plan was initiated, traffic along northbound I-45 continued to crawl. Many drivers, gas tanks long drained, were unable to reach rest stops for help, prompting officials to find ways to reach them. Under the contraflow plan, the southbound lanes of I-45 were opened to northbound traffic and the eastbound lanes of Interstate 10 were opened to westbound traffic.

People were running out of gas, their cars were over-heating and breaking down — and so were they. By noon, after baking in the car for seven hours, the Ponoroffs began thinking of turning around. Authorities warned journalists during radio reports that there was no fuel, food or lodging along I-45 all the way into Dallas.

"We were trying to decide what would be safe: Going back and facing this very big hurricane, or staying on the road and possibly running out of gas, with no food or water ñ and still getting the hurricane," Larry Ponoroff said.

"Our one hope was that they had set up contra lanes somewhere north of The Woodlands, on the outer reaches of suburban Houston. We kept thinking once we got there, things would speed up, and we would be able to make to Dallas."

They reached the contraflow lanes around 7 p.m., about 14 hours and 35 miles after starting their journey. But very little had changed.

"We picked up some speed for a mile or so, then we were back in the crawl," Monica Ponoroff said. "We came up to a cop, and asked him what was ahead. He said, 'No gas, no water, no restrooms, no place to stay, just solid traffic.' We asked him if we should turn around. He said, 'That's what I'd do.'

"We were out of there."

Homeward bound

The scenes on the way back were almost heartbreaking, she said.

"The sides of I-45 and the service roads were just lined with people who had run out of gas or broken down. They were just walking around, milling around, hoping for help. They were stranded. I felt especially bad for the elderly and the kids. They'd been baking in this heat all day. And they didn't get anywhere. Now they were stranded."

Likewise, Minerva Martinez was back at her home Thursday afternoon with her family after taking the I-10 evacuation route, only to find herself stuck in traffic for nine hours. Martinez said her family made it to Katy, normally about a 20-minute trip from Houston.

"It took all that time," Martinez said. "There was no gas when you stopped to fill up."

Three hours later, the Ponoroffs made it back to their apartment, 17 hours after they had left. On the way back, they found a store open and purchased some hurricane supplies ñ flashlights, water, food. By then Rita had changed course away from a direct hit on Houston and was also losing strength. But it didn't matter. The Ponoroffs had had enough.

"The episode definitely changed my mind about evacuating from Houston, but not from New Orleans," Larry said. "Everyone in Houston has been wonderful to all of us since Katrina. They just need some lessons on ho to evacuate."

Bus carrying elderly evacuees rocked by explosions

As many as 24 residents are killed near Dallas

By Sheila Flynn
Associated Press writer

WILMER, TEXAS — A bus carrying nursing home residents fleeing Hurricane Rita caught fire and was rocked by explosions Friday on a gridlocked highway near Dallas, killing as many as 24 people, authorities said.

"Deputies were unable to get everyone off the bus," Dallas County Sheriff's Department spokesman Don Peritz said. He said he believed 24 people were killed, but that number could change.

The Dallas County medical examiner was still working to determine the number of fatalities, officials said.

The bus was carrying 38 residents and six employees of the Brighton Gardens nursing home in Bellaire, Texas, according to Sunrise Senior Living Inc., the McLean, Va., company that owns the center. The bus was en route to another home owned by the same company, according to a Baylor University Medical Center spokeswoman.

Early indications were that the bus caught fire because of mechanical problems, then passengers' oxygen tanks started exploding, Peritz said. He said the brakes may have been on fire. The bus was engulfed with flames, causing a lengthy backup on Interstate 45, which was already congested with evacuees from the Gulf Coast.

Sunrise said it was contacting family members.

"Our primary concern is for the safety of our residents, and we are shocked and saddened that this event occurred during our evacuation," Sunrise Chairman and Chief Executive Paul Klaasen said in a statement.

Emergency crews investigate the scene of a bus fire near Dallas. The interstate was shut down for about four hours after the fire but reopened after authorities made the unusual decision to move the burned-out shell of the bus quickly so hurricane evacuees could get through. As many as 24 people were killed in the fire, which officials said ignited the oxygen tanks of ailing passengers and sparked a series of explosions.

The National Transportation Safety Board sent a team of specialists and investigators to the scene.

The interstate was shut down for about four hours but reopened after authorities made the unusual decision to move the blackened, burned-out shell of the bus quickly so hurricane evacuees could get through.

"You have thousands of people who are in their vehicles trying to escape," Peritz said.

Tina Jones, a nurse from Ennis, Texas, was driving behind the bus when she saw it start to smoke and pull to the side of the road.

"I saw the smoke, and then there was an explosion," said Jones, who pulled over and helped treat cuts and bruises. She said she saw at least six bodies.

"I'll probably go home and have a good cry," she said.

Fred Witte, 74, said he heard three explosions from his property about 150 yards from where the bus caught fire.

"I was right there at the corner, and I felt the pressure," he said of the first explosion.

Peritz said the driver survived and helped emergency workers try to save people but that there wasn't much time before explosions ended rescue efforts.

"It's my understanding he went back on the bus several times to try to evacuate people," he said.

No emergency workers suffered major injuries.

Dr. Paul Pepe, the chairman of emergency services for Parkland Memorial Hospital in Dallas, said one woman was in critical condition and being treated for smoke inhalation but that most injuries were minor. A Parkland spokeswoman said the hospital was treating nine patients.

Baylor spokeswoman Maria Carpenter said the hospital had treated and released four patients, including two elderly sisters.

Interstate 45 stretches more than 250 miles, from Galveston through Houston to Dallas. The crash site is about 17 miles southeast of downtown Dallas.

Evacuation calls in Jeff were a false alarm

Phone program was meant for Jeff Davis Parish

By Matt Scallan
Kenner bureau

Some Jefferson Parish residents got a telephone call from Gov. Kathleen Blanco urging them to evacuate for Hurricane Rita on Friday, but the automated calls turned out to be wrong numbers.

The company distributing Blanco's message, Voicetouch Communications, which has completed similar notification programs in Florida, inadvertently included Jefferson Parish in calls telling residents to get out of coastal parishes farther west in Louisiana.

"They pulled the Jefferson Parish phone numbers along with the Jefferson Davis Parish numbers," Blanco spokeswoman Denise Bottcher said. "Once they realized their mistake, they stopped the calls in Jefferson."

Jefferson Davis Parish is about 170 miles west of Jefferson Parish.

Almost 300,000 Blanco calls were delivered. Bottcher said she did not know how many calls were mistakenly made to Jefferson Parish.

The call program is designed to ensure that residents who may not be watching television or listening to the radio get the word to get out, Bottcher said.

In the future, she said, the message will be customized for individual parishes.

WATER RETURNS TO N.O.

passes, with main bases in Oakdale, Ville Platte and Lafayette. Some National Guard troops would ride out the storm in affected areas to be ready immediately to provide help, she said.

In New Orleans, the Army Corps of Engineers kept watch over the city's vulnerable levee system, but was hamstrung by high winds that prevented planes and helicopters from plugging breaches sprung during and after Katrina.

"It's not the rain we're worried about. The storm surge is our biggest enemy," said corps spokesman Mitch Frazier at the 17th Street Canal, which broke open Aug. 30, spilling devastating flood waters across Lakeview and parts of Metairie.

Sandbags were on hand, and steel plates were in place at the mouth of the canal to hold back Lake Pontchartrain. The water level in Lake Pontchartrain had risen from 4 feet at midday to 4.5 feet above sea level by early evening, said David Wurtzel, project engineer of the 17th Street Canal for the corps.

"We're ready to move," Frazier said at about midday. "We're just waiting on Mother Nature to cooperate."

With only two major pump stations functioning, New Orleans was prepared to handle 6 inches of rainwater from Rita before major flooding. Officials planned to store runoff in 144 miles of underground canals, said Brenda Thornton, spokeswoman for the Sewerage & Water Board.

The subterranean reservoir would serve as a makeshift drainage system until metal sheeting, installed after Katrina, could be removed from breached canals at London Avenue and 17th Street, she said. Then the water would be pumped out.

"We just need to wait it out," Thornton said. "This is something we've never gone through before."

New Orleans Police Department 5th District Capt. John Bryson watches as water streams across Alvar Street near the Poland Avenue bridge, into the 9th Ward and the rebuilt Florida housing complex.

Rising waters

Many eyes also were on the Lower 9th Ward, where National Guard troops turned away drivers headed to the St. Claude Avenue bridge, directing hordes of reporters and photographers to the nearby Claiborne Avenue bridge to view flooding over the levees.

There, water coursed over a long, low spot on a levee, at a site damaged by Hurricane Katrina weeks before. White waves poured into already flood-ravaged neighborhoods to the east.

At midday, soldiers from the 82nd Airborne Division described 2.5 feet of water in the streets beyond the breach, flowing south to North Villere Street and east to Lemanch Street.

St. Bernard Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez, standing atop the Claiborne Avenue bridge, said the rising water posed little human threat to residents of the parish, which he said was virtually empty.

Two bodies an elderly woman and her son found Friday in an Arabi home, were deemed Katrina victims, authorities said.

The water rushing through the damaged levee was not the only concern. Hurricane Katrina damaged the locks dividing different water levels between Lake Pontchartrain and the Mississippi River. "They are not functional," Rodriguez said of the locks. "You can't open or close them, and right now they're open."

Lower portions of Plaquemines and St. Bernard parishes, submerged by Katrina, also flooded again Friday, and officials there said the new storm's punch was likely to knock the air out of their fledgling recovery efforts.

"It sets us back another month," Plaquemines Parish President Benny Rousselle said. "Looks like we'll be starting all over again."

Hundreds of emergency workers in both parishes evacuated ahead of the storm. Contractors hired to clean streets, as well as workers for private industries trying to restart their operations, also left the area and remove their equipment.

The storm also delayed some federal aid efforts. Federal Emergency Management Agency officials were waiting for Rita to pass to begin setting up a camp for 500 emergency workers in Belle Chasse, agency spokesman Earl Armstrong said.

While less dramatic than the Lower 9th Ward flooding, water also topped the west Industrial Canal levee, invading the industrial flats between a Florida Avenue warehouse and the New Orleans Cold Storage warehouse, then surging over France Street into newly built homes near Gentilly.

Stephen Browning, an Army Corps of Engineers director of programming, said the gap in the Industrial Canal levee that was flooding the 9th Ward was an "overtopping," not a break.

Water begins to fill the dip on Interstate 10 at the railroad tracks early in the afternoon on Friday.

Speaking about the Gentilly flooding, Browning said he didn't expect the water to rise past Almonaster Street. "It appears to be high ground," he said. "I don't see any additional danger to individuals and property. It's very dramatic, but not an emergency situation."

A section near the Lakefront, once dried out from Katrina, was taking water once again. The London Avenue Canal, also fortified by sheet piles, was seeping water into the Vista Park neighborhood, on the west side of the canal, which had several inches of street and lawn flooding in places. A day before it had been bone dry. In Vista Park, at the Edgewater Baptist Church at the corner of Pressburg Street and Paris Avenue, water bubbled up through the sewer.

One family, just home from evacuation before Katrina, was confident the bolstered levee system would keep them safe from the brewing storm. Mike Whelan had planned to ride out Rita with his wife and sons, ages 8 and 11, in their Bucktown home, three blocks west of the 17th Street Canal.

"We're glad to see these sheet piles," said Whelan, who still had electricity and running water Friday afternoon. "That's what kept us in town. Otherwise we would have evacuated."

Lone holdouts

Elsewhere, inside shuttered buildings where faucets still ran dry and electric lamps remained dark, other residents who weathered Katrina braced again for more wind and rain that three weeks ago drove off most of their neighbors, leaving them as hermits in a ruined city.

To his fifth-floor apartment on North Johnson Street, 67-year-old Jesse Vaughn welcomed a pair of special agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, who brought vacuum-sealed tuna, bottled water and yet another plea for Vaughn to abandon his stronghold.

"We could still take you someplace to get you some medical attention, get your $2,000 from FEMA, three hot meals a day," Special Agent David Millen said, kneeling next to the frail man to whom he had delivered provisions since the last storm, a job military personnel deserted last week. Millen and Special Agent Charlie Smith tried gently to coax him away from a building whose first floor reeked of urine and filthy floodwater. The effort failed.

"I think we will get some nice weather next week," Vaughn said. "We might get some stores opening up on Broad Street."

Vaughn could not leave, he said. He had promised his neighbors, the ones who escaped from the roof by helicopter after Katrina, that he would protect the stuffed backpacks and suitcases they could not carry with them to safety. He and another man were the lone holdouts in a dark building, where starving kittens prowled hallways strewn with soiled T-shirts and children's toys.

"You know we could get you some medical attention," Millen said.

"Somebody will be coming this way," Vaughn replied.

"I'm here now," Millen said.

"We got peace and quiet out here," the man told him.

Water seeps through the repair to the breach in the London Avenue canal on the Vista Park side of Pratt Drive near Robert E. Lee Boulevard.

Down St. Claude Avenue, the economy struggled to life not far from the breached levee at the Industrial Canal. Joseph Peters ran his tire repair shop at 3101 St. Claude and said he wasn't budging from Rita. Customers kept coming into his 9th Ward business, where Peters has been patching rubber on rescue vehicles since Katrina hit.

"We got one limping in," Peters said, watching a New Orleans Police Department cruiser. "We got a police car limping in with a flat."

Peters, a barrel-chested, gray-haired man with a teddy bear smile, said, "I'll be open through Rita. I'll do what I can."

Dale Stainbrook, a Bywater resident who said he shot at looters in his neighborhood eight times since Katrina. He planned to stay vigilant through the coming storm. "I'm sitting on a gold mine with my property," he said. "We never did take water."

RITA, from A-1

140 miles southeast of Port Arthur, headed northwest at about 12 mph.

Hurricane-force winds were expected as far as 100 miles inland, the hurricane center said.

Rita seemed poised to arrive as a Category 3 storm, having diminished from a top-of-the-chart Category 5 on Wednesday.

The storm was expected to plow through a region thickly planted with 12 percent of the nation's gasoline refinery capacity.

Industry analysts said it probably would disrupt regional supplies and further batter price-sensitive industries such as airlines.

More than 2.5 million Texans and residents of southwest Louisiana watched Rita's approach for days. Forecasters targeted the Texas coast even as the storm entered the eastern Gulf of Mexico on Tuesday.

Houston largely cleared itself Friday of a 100-mile-long traffic jam stretching from Galveston in the south, through the city and out its northbound arteries.

Outside the city, however, traffic was still bumper-to-bumper on highways leading to Austin and Dallas, officials said.

National Guard trucks ferried gasoline to stranded drivers up and down the interstates.

Water over the levees creates fear

NEW ORLEANS, from A-9

Stainbrook, 59, a contractor originally from Iowa, said arson and squatters staking claim in abandoned homes were his worries. "I'm protecting nine houses," he said. "We're higher-end here. They're going to come back and act like they live in these properties and go in the doors and take the jewelry."

It was clear from the littered neutral ground nearby that residents had emptied homes of ruined items and trash that nobody wanted. "Toxic Art," a handmade sign announced at the neutral ground between France and Mazant streets. "This exhibition will kill you!" Among the objects were 16 handmade wooden crosses, a hot-water heater, storm windows and paintings that included a bleeding valentine-type heart on a black canvas.

The city had tell-tale signs of potential disaster.

Lakeview was a haunted, sludge-coated scene of ruin. And homes that appeared spared along Grand Route St. John had parked cars with soaking floorboards.

Gentilly Boulevard at Florida Street, beneath the Interstate 610 overpass, was impassable due to standing water. Debris, so many tree limbs and battered buildings, piled upon street corners.

The sight of people who were not with law enforcement or news media was a rarity.

One young man pushed a load of antiques through a brief rainstorm across Esplanade Avenue, at North Johnson Street, explaining to a passerby that he was saving his grandfather's heirlooms before fading into the 7th Ward.

City officials appeared passive in the face of Rita.

Mayor Ray Nagin had nothing to say Friday. "No briefing today. Just watching the levees," said Brenda Hatfield, chief administrative officer, in an e-mail.

In Kenner, Mayor Phil Capitano urged residents to stay off the streets until Saturday afternoon, saying power lines were coming down in some sections of the city.

In St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes, officials said the full impact of the storm would depend on flood levels. They knew the storm's surge would threaten levees damaged by Katrina and in various states of repair late Thursday. But in Plaquemines, they were surprised when flooding by late morning, indicating some of the levee repairs were not holding. "It's a little earlier than we anticipated," said Plaquemines Parish Sheriff Jiff Hingle.

By mid-afternoon on Friday, floodwaters arriving from a spillage on the Industrial Canal waters were restricted to parts of Arabi. St. Bernard levees seemed to be doing their job, holding a surge that began pounding the area late Thursday night, said Col. Richard Baumy, a Sheriff's Office spokesman.

Floodwaters reached at least 2 feet on Claiborne Avenue and neighboring streets and got into northern Arabi by early afternoon. There, a raised railroad tract contained the attack, and parish officials hoped Rita's winds would shift and the flood would stop rising before it advanced further east.

Meanwhile, what passes for regular life after Katrina continued in the northern parts of Plaquemines that stayed dry during Katrina and seemed to be faring well under Rita. Even as winds picked up by midday, cars buzzed around gas stations, video stores were hoping, and at DeSalvo's Seafood, along Belle Chasse Highway, residents lined up for the post-Katrina special: shrimp spaghetti.

Yet even those businesses were feeling Rita's impact. Watching caravans of repair trucks heading north, a DeSalvo's waitress commented: "There go our customers."

Mayor Nagin:

We survived a post Katrina epidemic of medical myths propagated by poorly informed public officials - cholera, typhoid, inhaled e.coli, toxic mold, toxic gumbo and venomous snake bites. Our infrastructure is in shambles, but our air is not toxic and our waters are free of man-eating sharks. There are no diarrhea outbreaks even among folks who are drinking tap water.

It is time to turn on the electricity in cleared areas of the city including the French Quarter and major parts of Treme, Marigny and Uptown. There is no gas on in the quarter, so an excuse of gas generated fires is yet another myth. The continuing use of candles and generators are the real risk - fire and carbon monoxide poisoning.

The world assumes Louisiana is closed for business until you allow Entergy to turn on the switches to light our high and dry historic districts.

Thousands fill shelters in La.

RITA, from A-10

executive for the county surrounding Houston, told residents who had not left yet to stay where they were for the storm.

The evacuation itself became a lethal event.

As many as 24 elderly evacuees were killed when a bus carrying 45 clients from an assisted living center caught fire and exploded on Interstate 45 en route to Dallas.

The bus may have caught fire because of a mechanical problem, then blew up when flames reached patients' oxygen tanks, said Don Peritz, a spokesman for the Dallas County sheriff's office.

Two communities that stood to bear the brunt of the storm were Port Arthur, a city of about 58,000 that is home to industries that include oil, shrimping and crawfishing, and Beaumont, a petrochemical, shipbuilding and port city of about 114,000.

Lake Charles, another petrochemical center with about 72,000 residents, lay 50 miles to the east and well within Rita's damage zone.

Rita's strength, plus the example of the miseries Hurricane Katrina inflicted on New Orleans Aug. 29, flushed more than 2.5 million Texans and Louisianians out of their homes.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco said 98 percent of the residents of coastal Cameron Parish were gone by Friday. Although hurricanes in southwest Louisiana are rare, in 1957 Hurricane Audrey killed more than 400 people in Cameron Parish.

Overall, about 50,000 people have evacuated from southwest Louisiana, said Col. Jeff Smith, deputy director of emergency management for the state's office of homeland security.

By Friday evening, 44,000 Louisiana residents filled 315 emergency shelters. Authorities

National Guard is ready

RITA, from A-12

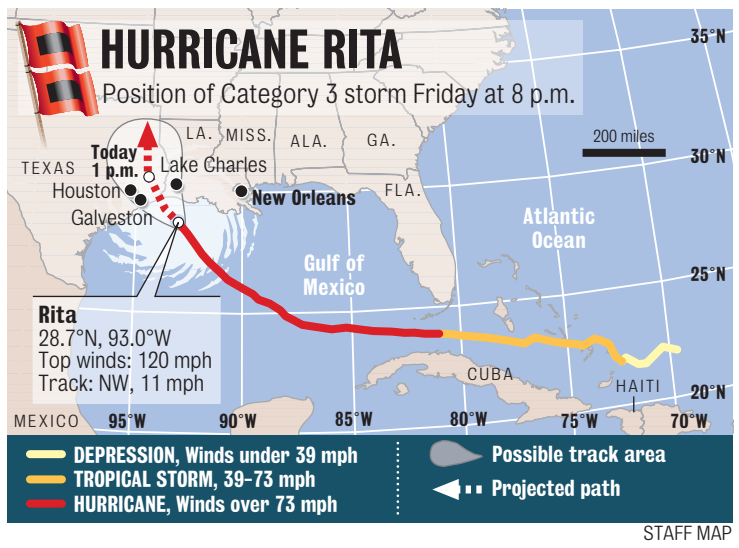
were looking for out-of-state shelters to handle any additional evacuees from the storm-threatened areas.

"We're stretched to the limit," Smith said.

The evacuations affected communities well inland. Louisiana's Jefferson Davis Parish — separated from the Gulf of Mexico by coastal Cameron Parish —was 60 percent evacuated, said Sheriff Ricky Edwards.

Blanco said the state's relief operation, called Task Force Rita, is staged on the edge of the storm in Oakdale, Ville Platte and Lafayette.



Some National Guard soldiers will ride out the storm in the affected areas and be ready immediately to provide help, she said.

In addition to the National Guard presence, Louisiana has 10,000 federal military personnel in Louisiana, and Blanco has asked Bush for 15,000 federal soldiers.

The state Department of Wildlife and Fisheries is standing by with 135 boats and personnel at the edge of the storm, officials said.

Vice Adm. Thad Allen, director of the federal response, said FEMA has ready enough food and supplies for 500,000 people for three days in Louisiana. He said all buses had been moved above Interstate 10. Most were based near Alexandria and prepared to move when needed.

Five Navy ships with the ability to deploy 800 Marines ashore are standing by in the Gulf of Mexico, Allen said.

STAFF MAP

President Bush canceled plans to travel to Texas to watch the coordination of state and federal storm relief efforts. He said he would monitor the storm, as well as the relief response, from a military facility in Colorado.

"We're now facing another big storm," he said. "Our job is to prepare for and assist state and local people to save lives and help these people get back on their feet. There will be no risk of me getting in the way. What I will do is observe."

Meanwhile, the Red Cross asked for more donations to help victims of Hurricane Katrina – and anticipated victims of Hurricane Rita as well. It said the $853 million it collected so far will meet less than half the need.

"We have a long way to go in our fund-raising to meet the needs of people from Katrina, let alone what we need to do for people from Rita," Red Cross Vice President Joe Becker told the Associated Press.

Rita still expected to pack a wallop

Landfall forecast near Texas border

By Mark Schleifstein
Staff writer

A weakened but still dangerous Hurricane Rita was expected to make landfall near the Texas-Louisiana border today, with a combination of high winds and storm surge pushing up the Calcasieu River through Lake Charles, threatening thousands of homes and dozens of petrochemical plants.

The hurricane, once a ferocious Category 5 with sustained wings of 175 mph, had diminished to a Category 3 on Friday. But that is still a major storm, strong enough to inflict pain on a region still reeling from the impact of Hurricane Katrina last month.

Easterly winds from Rita pumped water through Lake Borgne and the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet into the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway and the Industrial Canal, where it topped repaired levee breaches Friday, flooding a large section of New Orleans' 9th Ward for the second time in 26 days.

Rita was expected to go ashore just west of Sabine Pass in Texas, near the Louisiana border, as a Category 3 hurricane with winds of 120 mph.

Rita had the potential to mirror the path of Hurricane Audrey, which slammed into Cameron Parish and Lake Charles on June 27, 1957, as a Category 4 storm, killing more than 500 people in Louisiana and east Texas.

Audrey pushed a 10½-foot storm surge ashore along a path very similar to that predicted to be followed by Rita. The surge was topped by waves that were another 10 feet high.

At Lake Charles, where a maximum sustained wind of 105 mph was measured, the surge reached 7 feet, very similar to what was predicted from Rita.

With hurricane-force winds stretching 85 miles from its center and tropical storm-force winds stretching 205 miles, Rita was expected to batter most of Louisiana's coastline before pushing north-northeast through Texas today.

Even inland areas faced the threat of extensive flooding. Forecasters said the storm was expected to slow almost to a standstill over the next three days, threatening to drop as much as 25 inches of rain over east Texas and northwestern Louisiana before being picked up by a passing frontal system and moving northeast.

There is a chance that after three days, the remnants of the hurricane could dip south into Louisiana again before leaving the area, said Mark McInerney, a forecaster at the National Hurricane Center in Florida.

As the storm comes ashore, it could drop 20 inches of rain on some communities on the western side of the state. The New Orleans area could get as much as 6 inches of rain through today.

Friday by 8 a.m., Rita's surge water had reached about 7 feet, 9 inches in the Industrial Canal at its lock with the Mississippi River, and began topping several repaired areas where Hurricane Katrina toppled levee walls three weeks ago, said Col. Richard Wagenaar, New Orleans District engineer for the Army Corps of Engineers.

On the east side, the water ate deeply into the limestone gravel repair area, creating a new wall of water that began flowing toward St. Bernard Parish.

Corps officials hoping to plug the break were stymied by near tropical storm-force winds that forced the abandonment of a plan to reinforce the breaches with huge sandbags lifted in place by helicopters, Wagenaar said.

On the west side of the canal, corps officials were attempting to repair the breaks using other methods, he said.

Sewerage & Water Board and corps officials said the 44 percent of pumps working in the city could handle an estimated 6 inches of rain before renewed flooding began.

Wagenaar said additional topping of drainage canals was less likely from Rita, as the storm surge wasn't expected to raise the water in Lake Pontchartrain much higher than the 4-foot level it was Friday at midday.

With sheet piling closing the mouths of the failed 17th Street and London Avenue canals, Wagenaar said, the lakefront levee system looked like it could contain Rita's threat.

Eastern Texas and southwestern Louisiana, however, remained very much in harm's way.

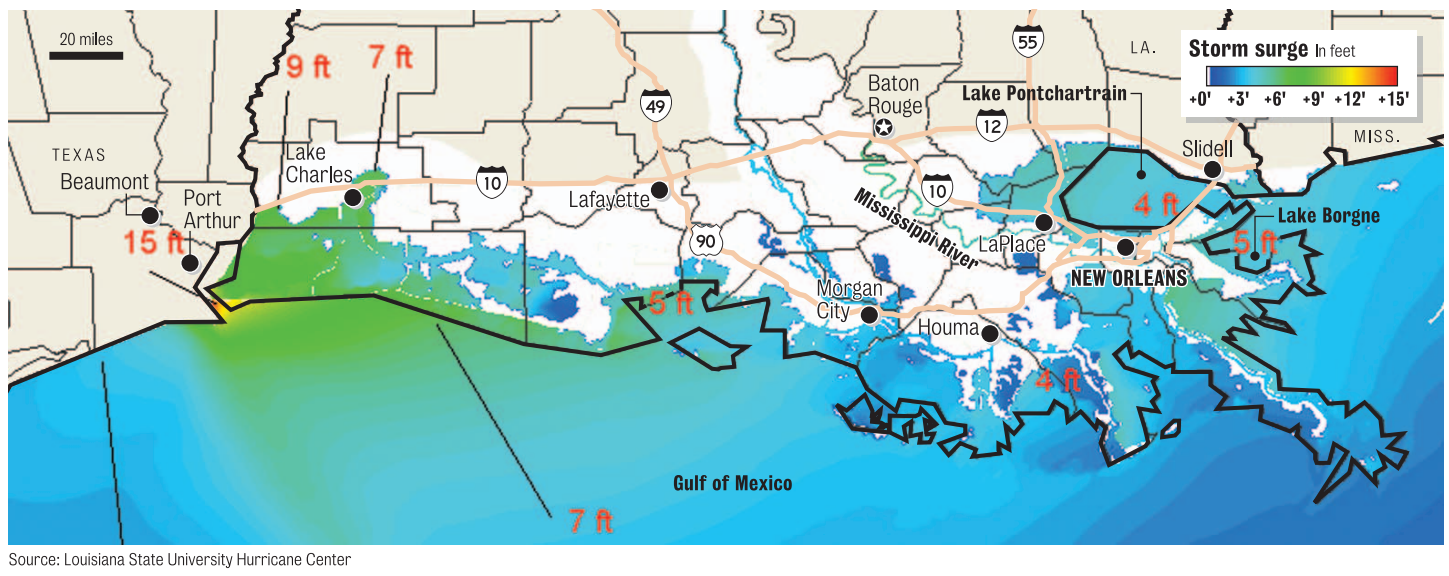
LSU civil and environmental engineering associate professor Ivor van Heerden said a storm surge model shared with emergency planners by his staff Friday indicated that southeasterly and easterly winds in advance of Rita would pump water through Mississippi Sound into Lake Borgne, raising the lake's surface as high as 5 to 6 feet above sea level.

Water is expected to push up the Calcasieu River into Lake Charles and reach heights of 7 to 8 feet in areas above Interstate 10, he said.

That's bad news for a series of refineries and chemical plants along the river and the lake's shoreline, van Heerden said.

"We're seeing all the agencies are really getting geared up to conduct search and rescue missions after the storm passes," he said. "In a briefing with Department of Wildlife & Fisheries and State Police officials, we warned them that there may be chemicals in the air and in the water."

Similar problems may face Port Arthur and Orange, Texas, both petrochemical centers on the shores of Sabine Lake. At Sabine Pass entering the lake, water could reach 17 feet or higher, and could still be 13 feet above sea level at the top of the lake.



"All of those chemical plants have the potential to be flooded, especially those at Port Arthur, where the levees are only 14 feet above sea level," van Heerden said. "Those are going to be virtually on the edge of the eye wall. You could see significant wind damage from those facilities, too, and you could see chemical releases."

RITA'S PREDICTED STORM SURGE

Storm surge pushed toward the Louisiana coast by Hurricane Rita this morning is expected to cause widespread flooding along the Louisiana-Texas border and as far north as Interstate 10 in Lake Charles. In New Orleans on Friday, the surge topped levee repairs along the Industrial Canal and reflooded parts of New Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes.

CHRIS ROSE

A ghost town gets more ghostly

It's hard to imagine that it could have felt any lonelier in New Orleans than it has for the past three weeks. But Friday, everything just disappeared.

What little life there was seemed to dissipate into the not-so-thin air of a colossal barometer drop. The Furies, it seems, are aroused.

The wind buffeted cars and put the heavy hand on already weakened trees. Magazine Street boutique signs – most hanging askew by only one chain after Katrina – spun in place like pinwheels. Loose power lines whipped and flapped across Uptown and Lakeview streets like fly fishing rods.

The rain came, misting one minute, blinding the next. Outside of the CBD emergency operations center, anywhere you drove, you saw . . . nobody.

The folks who had been trickling into town for the past week or so, checking on homes and businesses, simply ghosted. Police on the outskirts of town blocked all entry. The big National Guard camps in Audubon Park disappeared overnight without a sign that they were ever there.

So much for the repopulation plan. A TV station reported that there were only 500 civilians left in the city as Hurricane Rita set aim on the Cajun Riviera, all those miles away to the West, and you were hard pressed to find any of them.

A passing truck stopped me, and the guys inside asked for directions to the Nashville Wharf and it was good just to talk to someone.

The isolation can be maddening. The car radio just tells you bad things. You just want to find someone, anyone, and say: "How 'bout dem Saints?"

You know those classic New Orleans characters – the cab drivers, bartenders and bitter poets - who buttonhole you and natter on and on forever about tedious and mundane topics that date back to Mayor Schiro's term and when the Pelicans played out on Tulane Avenue? Usually when you're in a hurry somewhere?

I'd give anything to run into one of those guys right now. Go ahead and tell me about the fishing in Crown Point; I'll listen to just about anything you have to say.

I went to Walgreen's on Tchoupitoulas, which had been open most of the week, figuring there would be life there, but it had shuttered at noon. There was a sign on the door that said, "Now Hiring," and that's funny.

I guess.

The day before, the store's public address system was stuck in a time warp, a perky female voice reminding shoppers (both of them): "Don't let Halloween sneak up on you; stock up on candy early. You'll find great savings now . . . at Walgreen's!"

Truth is, there sure was a hell of a lot of candy there. Trick or treat.

As I drove around, the gray sheets of rain pushed around all the stuff in the street and, trust me, there's a lot of stuff in the street. For as far as you looked up and down every avenue, the same blank vistas.

Across town, the water was rising. Again. I suppose there were people there, trying to save our city again, though the cynical might ask: What's to save?

On dry land, the only place I found people gathered was at the fire station on Magazine Street in the Garden District. I went by to drop off some copies of the newspaper for the local guys and found about 60 firefighters from all over the country hanging out in a rec room watching TV and frying burgers.

That was perhaps the strangest sight of all, these guys just sitting around. Stranger in some ways than the desolation.

Because for once, with all this rain soaking the downed trees and rooftops, and nobody around to do something stupid like start a fire, they had nothing to do.

Just sit and watch TV in a haunted city.

Jeff coroner helps Orleans families

City overwhelmed with task of removing bodies

By Michelle Hunter
East Jefferson bureau

For 16 days, Bessie Grover's body lay in her bed, in her house on Rocheblave Street in New Orleans, as floodwaters rose around her, then fell, and temperatures soared past 90 degrees.

Her son and his wife and her daughters became increasingly despondent after getting little help from the Katrina-beseiged Orleans Parish coroner's office, which was underwater; the Police Department, which was busy trying to save the living; and other disaster agencies that weren't in the business of body retrieval.

"We didn't know what kind of condition she would be in," son Fird Grover said. "We thought she might wash out into the street and just become a number. Nobody would know who she was."

But Bessie Grover was buried last weekend in Woodville, Miss., where she was born and raised. The Grovers were able to take their mother home after the Jefferson Parish coroner's office made a trip into New Orleans on Sept. 13 at the family's request.

The Jefferson coroner's office, which remained open throughout Hurricane Katrina and afterwards, made several "humanitarian excursions" into Orleans and surrounding parishes in addition to serving its own constituents, said Dr. Charles Eckert, the chief deputy coroner.

Eckert has been acting coroner since Aug. 28. The elected coroner, Dr. Robert Treuting, said Friday that he evacuated for Katrina because he is recovering from therapy after a recent illness.

Since the storm, the coroner's office has collected 170 bodies, 30 of them confirmed deaths related to the hurricane, Eckert said. The others died of natural causes at hospices, hospitals and nursing homes during the storm.

It's possible that 20 to 30 more Jefferson deaths could be

Grand Isle dusting itself off

The 400-foot fishing pier in Grand Isle State Park, repaired after recent damage from Tropical Storm Cindy, was destroyed by Hurricane Katrina.

Barrier island's residents determined to rebuild

By Kate Moran
East Jefferson Bureau

GRAND ISLE — Donnie Willard of Grand Isle has spent the past few years on the downdraft of fate. The shrimper has watched as cheap seafood from Asia slowly eroded his income, and the stress of it has given him a haggard and rangy look older than his 48 years.

Hurricane Katrina, which shellacked his house with a thick layer of grime and washed the radar equipment from his boats, was just another cheap trick of fate. As he swung a hammer at the walls of his cousin's storm-ravaged house last week, Willard said he was determined to rebuild.

He forged on with a hangdog courage that moves forward because it knows nowhere else to go.

"The shrimping's done. Our houses are gone. My house is torn to lunch meat inside," Willard said. "But we keep going. This is all we know."

Three weeks after the hurricane, residents of Grand Isle have begun coming home to shredded fishing camps and trailers. The shrimp docks, the island's economic keystone, are gone. The campers that hugged every space in front of Bridge Side Cabins and Marina were vaporized.

The storm warped the bridge that connects the island to the mainland, preventing many locals from checking on their houses until the damage was repaired last week. Those who returned — only a fraction of the 1,500 year-round residents — have found that help comes slowly to the hinterlands.

Entergy New Orleans seeking shelter

Subsidiary files for bankruptcy protection

By Rebecca Mowbray
Business writer

Entergy New Orleans Inc., a subsidiary of New Orleans' only Fortune 500 company, filed a petition for Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization Friday after facing staggering repair costs from Hurricane Katrina and with few customers to provide revenue.

Entergy Corp. had warned earlier this week that its New Orleans subsidiary was considering bankruptcy as an option after Moody's Investors Service downgraded the company's debt to junk status. Entergy New Orleans will continue operating while it is re-organizing in U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, which is temporarily based in Baton Rouge instead of New Orleans because of the hurricane.

Dan Packer, the chief executive officer of Entergy New Orleans, said the step will enable the electricity and natural gas utility to move forward on essential storm repairs while shielding customers from the bulk of rate hikes.

"We thought it was critical to continue our restoration efforts," Packer said. "We really needed to be able to do something that would avoid severe rate shock. That's what we're trying to do."

In tandem with the filing, Entergy New Orleans asked the court to approve as much as $200 million in "debtor in possession" financing, or "DIP" loans from Entergy Corp. The company's board has approved that financing package.

Entergy New Orleans hopes to get $150 million of that money immediately to cover employee wages and benefits, pay for power purchase and gas supply agreements, and continue to repair its power grid to serve its gas and electricity customers. A court hearing is set for Monday.

Entergy New Orleans officials estimated that repairing damage from Hurricane Katrina could cost the company $325 million to $475 million, though those numbers could change once utility

SHARING MOTHERLY LOVE

Amid chaos, instincts take over, and a baby's life is saved

HURRICANE HEROES

Guard member helps save life of New Orleans infant

By Doug MacCash
Staff writer

Staff Sgt. Rikki Hurston knew that the cold, wet baby was in trouble the moment she saw her.

"I'd seen people pass away before," she said. "She had a look on her face."

Hurston, 32, is a wife and mother of four who works as a nurse practitioner in a Baton Rouge nursing home. She's also a Louisiana National Guard medic who, three days after Hurricane Katrina's wind and floodwater laid New Orleans low, was helping keep the chaos at bay in the Louisiana Superdome, a titanic pressure cooker of frustrated refugees.

The long days and nights had begun to blur together, Hurston said, as she helped guide traumatized, elderly survivors from the makeshift helicopter pad atop the Dome parking lot to the medical services in New Orleans Arena, a pistol on her hip to ward off possible assailants in those early, uncertain times.

Kenner official booked in theft of relief supplies

Some say Floyd case politically motivated

By Michelle Hunter
East Jefferson bureau

Kenner Chief Administrative Officer Cedric Floyd surrendered to authorities Friday afternoon and was booked with one count of malfeasance in office for allegedly stealing donated Hurricane Katrina relief supplies.

Kenner police who served a search warrant on Floyd's Kenner home Tuesday night said they removed several truckloads of food, clothing, tools and medicine meant for storm victims.

But some city officials have said Floyd's arrest is just another skirmish in the upcoming battle for the mayor's office.

"This is just politics," Kenner City Councilman Marc Johnson said at a news conference Friday afternoon at New Hope Community Church in Kenner just before Floyd surrendered. "This is all about the race to City Hall."

Johnson, flanked by his predecessor, former Kenner Councilwoman Wilma Irvin, alluded to next year's possible rematch between Mayor Phil Capitano and Police Chief Nick Congemi for blamed on Katrina once records, not yet submitted because of hasty evacuations, come in, Eckert said.

At least 80 bodies, including Grover's, have been released to relatives. Five have been sent to the makeshift federal morgue in St. Gabriel for identification, Eckert said.

With the retrieval of storm victims in Jefferson Parish thought to be over, Eckert said the coroner's office is now focused on finding families of those whose bodies remain at the morgue, so they can be released for burial.

Of the 30 storm-related deaths, seven were from carbon monoxide poisonings, including four in one Marrero house, Eckert said.

Two people were electrocuted.

Another case was that of an unidentified 16-year-old who was hit by a car at the Causeway Boulevard-Interstate 10 interchange in Metairie, a way station for evacuation of New Orleans residents in the days after Katrina blasted the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29, Eckert said.

The coroner's office also picked up three unidentified bodies at those staging grounds.

Two drowning deaths were reported, Eckert said. One man was found near the Metairie-New Orleans line around Metairie Country Club. Another was found in a canal on the West Bank.

Most of the other 15 storm-related deaths were bodies found in private homes after the person was reported missing, usually by a neighbor or relative who had returned and had not seen the person, Eckert said.

"On a number of occasions, we did find a person deceased in the house," he said.

The deaths were declared storm-related because there was some physical evidence the person made an effort to survive after the storm, Eckert said. But lack of water, food, or medication or the heat caused them to succumb.

No cause of death was sought in Grover's case, her son said. It was his wife, Juanita Grover, a Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office correctional officer, who contacted the coroner's office.

Hers was one of several calls for aid in other parishes, Jefferson coroner's investigator Anthony Buras said. At first, the staff tried to direct them to Orleans authorities. But when the people continued to call after receiving no help, the staff held a roundtable discussion.

"We asked ourselves, 'What should we do? Should we leave the body there? Or do we make an attempt to help these people?'" Buras said. "It was the right thing to do."

crews can more accurately assess damage after gaining access to areas flooded by the storm.

At the same time, Entergy New Orleans lost between 100,000 and 130,000 customers, so it has little revenue. Entergy New Orleans normally serves 190,000 electricity customers and 145,000 gas customers in New Orleans. The district is made up mostly of residential customers, which are less profitable than business customers.

"It's a timing issue for us as much as anything," Packer said. "We just needed a cash infusion to pay our bills immediately. We intend to pay everybody."

In the meantime, Sens. Mary Landrieu and David Vitter introduced a bill Friday to provide $250 billion in aid to Louisiana. The bill includes $2.5 billion for utility restoration costs. Packer said he's optimistic the utility portion of the bill will pass because there are precedents – such as after the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks — of helping out companies with extraordinary expenses from a disaster.

"I feel pretty comfortable that we'll get there," Packer said.

But even with the prospect of federal aid, Packer said Entergy couldn't count on that money, or upon when it would show up. In borrowing as much as $200 million from Entergy Corp., Entergy New Orleans needed to go through bankruptcy court to protect shareholders. "We thought after a lot of deliberations that this was the way to go," Packer said.

Analysts were unfazed by the bankruptcy filing.

Clint Vince, special counsel to the city of New Orleans for utility regulatory matters, said the bankruptcy filing was done with the knowledge and support of the City Council.

"I think it was an essential step for them to get a DIP loan from their parent company," Vince said. "It's a very positive step. It allowed Entergy New Orleans to stay in business and continue the rebuilding efforts until we can get some federal funding.

Given the extraordinary circumstances, it's not surprising," said Debra Bromberg, a utilities analyst with Jefferies & Co. in New York. Entergy New Orleans not only faces a huge drop in revenue, "the company is going to be incurring substantial costs to restore its system," she said.

Still, it is fairly rare for a regulated electric utility to file for Chapter 11 protection. The most recent major example came in April 2001 when Pacific Gas & Electric Co. of San Francisco filed for protection because of a huge run-up in costs of wholesale electricity, which it could not pass on to its customers. It emerged from bankruptcy in April 2004.

Entergy New Orleans is the smallest of Entergy's five utilities and is the only Entergy subsidiary included in the bankruptcy filing. Entergy New Orleans represented about 7 percent of consolidated revenues and 3 percent of consolidated earnings last year, according to the company. Entergy New Orleans has about 400 employees.

The law firm of Jones Walker is representing Entergy New Orleans in the bankruptcy filing.

Entergy Corp.'s stock increased 97 cents Friday to close at $72 a share. However, the stock was down for the week; it closed at $74.77 the previous Friday.

Shrimping business may be slow to come back

GRAND, from B-1

Insurance adjusters have been largely missing in action on this tiny island, known for its sport fishing and birding. Some National Guard troops arrived from Memphis, and a police and fire department from South Carolina adopted the island for a few days. But the visitors were all gone by Tuesday, leaving the mayor and a few others to piece together the wreckage. And, of course, Hurricane Rita was on the horizon.

"The only thing I got from FEMA was some gas," Mayor David Camardelle said.

But this is an insular place where people take pride in their resilience and self-sufficiency. And in the midst of so much loss, they are determined that the island will rebuild, a sentiment echoed by elected officials.

In the midst of so much loss, leaders from the mayor on up to the island's congressman said they are determined to reconstruct the island's shattered infrastructure.

As Louisiana's only inhabited barrier island, Grand Isle plays a role in preventing coastal erosion in the Barataria Bay. "It's a protective measure," said U.S. Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, whose district includes the island.

The island also deserves reconstruction because of its location near Port Fourchon and the Louisiana Offshore Oil Port, which are tied to 25 percent of the nation's oil production, Melancon said.

"With all this money this government gets (from oil production), what it costs to fix Grand Isle should be a pittance," he said. "They're glad to take it, but they don't seem to want to give it back."

Back to basics

After Katrina, the first to person to return was Aubrey "T-Black" Chaisson, the fire chief and public works director, who rode there on a wave-runner as soon as the wind and rain began to die down. The storm had pulled down power lines and tossed heaps of debris into the streets, but he plowed through in the island's oldest fire truck. The right front tire was in tatters by the time Chaisson reached the bridge at the other end of the island.

The mayor and other town workers were inching in trucks over the damaged bridge. When they finally crossed to safety, communications were primitive. Camardelle said he became so frustrated that he chucked a cell phone over the bridge. City workers ran handwritten notes between the mayor and the fire chief, who likened the service to the Pony Express.

Grand Isle, unlike concave New Orleans, has a higher elevation in the center than around the edges. While water covered the entire island during the storm, it drained quickly off the turtle-shaped land. Three weeks later, the streets are clear, and power and water are mostly restored.

The island's lone school hopes to join Jefferson Parish public schools in re-opening Oct. 3. Despite the progress, masses of furniture, plywood and waterlogged appliances were still wait along curbs for sanitation trucks to cart them off.

As reconstruction progresses, Camardelle said he wishes the federal government would trust local officials with money if it cannot provide them with workers. The town coffers are nearly empty, and the mayor says Grand Isle needs an infusion of federal cash to keep paying its workers.

"Why don't they just trust someone — say, here, Mr. Mayor, you know what your people need?" Camardelle asked. "I didn't get elected for nothing."

Jefferson Parish Councilman at Large John Young said that FEMA, in the wake of Katrina, has been "difficult to deal with across the board."

"David's frustration is shared by a lot of people in terms of FEMA," the councilman said.

Holding on

During the storm, seven people stayed.

Among the amphibious is Mike Santiny, otherwise known as Mike the Monkey, who earned his nickname as a boy when he fled police by climbing trees. Lounging last week at the fire station, adapted into a food distribution center, Santiny lit a cigarette and said he didn't leave because he had no better place to go.

"I didn't want to stay in no shelter," he said.

Santiny slept through the early hours of Katrina in his house but fled with his nephew and their small black dog when the wind started making a fearsome howl. He huddled on a neighbor's porch wearing a garbage bag as a rain slicker and could feel debris lashing against him when it was too dark to see what was happening around him. His house is gone, but he is one of many who said he will survive.

Dean Blanchard, who took in 80,000 pounds of shrimp a day at his docks, surveyed the damage last week from the buckled concrete dock where his office used to stand. The marauding wind and water dumped his equipment into the water, threw his storage tankers in a nearby yard and washed away several docks. He estimates he sustained $2 million in damage.

Thousands of shrimpers are now waiting for him to resurrect his operation. He estimates he can have a rudimentary system up in a week, but it will be months or longer before he is back at full strength. Even when more shrimp is coming in, many of the New Orleans restaurants that used to buy the harvest will be closed.

"It took me all my life to get to this point," Blanchard, 46, said. "What are my options? Even if I have to build back smaller, I have to start somewhere."

The island's oil operations did not fare much better. Camardelle said Exxon and BP both lost buildings and equipment, though their storage tanks are intact. He expects the companies to resume work and said Exxon donated $250,000 to the town.

With so much work to ahead, residents looked to the future.

"The shock is over. It's all work now," said Rene Gaspard, one of the owners of the Bridge Side marina, which lost its dry storage sheds, store and deli, and the trailers on one side of the motel. "We've got to rebuild and make it nice."

Guard member mothers masses

HERO, from B-1

A police officer appeared at a Superdome entrance, struggling to resuscitate a nearly drowned infant.

A family, including a 1-month-old, had been taken aboard a rescue boat. The boat had capsized and the baby was lost in the confusion. When the officer recovered the infant from the water, he had rushed immediately to the Dome.

"He was screaming, 'She's not breathing!' " Hurston said.

Hurston took over the mouth-to-mouth resuscitation. With every breath, the baby vomited "formula, mucus and toxic water."

But she began breathing. Before an evacuation helicopter arrived, the mother was reunited with her almost-lost child.

"She was in shock," Hurston said. "She asked, 'Can I touch her?' "

Hurston said the resuscitation is the saving grace of her Superdome experience.

"I'd put it right up there with giving birth," she said. "I never prayed so hard."

Hurston's most recent memory of childbirth was only 3 months old, when her son Burdon Drake Hurston was born. When she was deployed to the hurricane site, she took along her breast pump, intending to express milk for her son and refrigerate the bottles until she could return home. But it soon became clear that her stay would be longer than expected.

At first, Hurston threw away the surplus milk, but then, at the suggestion of a friend, she began offering bottles of milk to stranded mothers, one of whom had nothing but water for her child, another with a baby intolerant of formula.

"How do you offer a stranger your bodily fluids?" she said. "I told them I was healthy, had my shots and took my vitamins. I knew it would be better for them than formula."

Every time she offered milk, the mother accepted.

the Kenner mayor post. Capitano defeated Congemi in the 2004 election.

"He may be a lot of things, but he is not a thief," Irvin said of Floyd, whom she called a political animal. "The only person I know who is more political than him is Nick Congemi. And that is what Cedric is suffering from now."

Floyd, instructed by his attorney not to comment, watched the press conference from the pews of the church, which he has said was to have received the donations stored at his home. Floyd had been appointed to head up the city's donation distribution effort. He has been suspended without pay.

New Hope pastor Mark Mitchell said the church intended to distribute the supplies to residents of the Susan Park subdivision and members of the church-affiliated drug rehabilitation program. Floyd took the donations to his home, which is near the church.

Mitchell said he made arrangements to pick them up, but because of the storm, "we kept missing one another."

Before the church could get the donations, Mitchell said, police had seized them.

Kenner police had no comment on the case.

"That's something for the courts to decide," said Capt. Steve Caraway, a police spokesman.

Richard Bates, Floyd's attorney, said his client surrendered to authorities at Kenner police headquarters. Bates said he had arranged with state District Judge Hans Liljeberg for Floyd to be released on his own recognizance.

The case is being handled by the state attorney general's office.

Once officials in Baton Rouge investigate the case, Bates said, "they will conclude that they do not have a prosecutable case. No crime has been committed."

Parish may build insurance center

Adjusters would have base at port

From staff reports

St. Bernard Parish officials are discussing a proposal to build an insurance-adjusting compound on land at the Port of St. Bernard, which would serve as a first stop for residents returning to the flood-stricken parish.

The center, which would include office space and temporary housing for insurance adjusters, would provide a central location for residents to make contact with their insurance companies and get the ball rolling on settling their claims.

Parish spokesman Steve Cannizaro said Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez has pushed the idea as a method to help "begin the recovery of St. Bernard."

St. Bernard Parish, devastated by the flooding from Hurricane Katrina, had begun this week allowing residents to return to view their homes to see whether they could salvage anything. That plan was postponed when Hurricane Rita entered the Gulf of Mexico, but Cannizaro said officials plan to start it again when the latest storm threat passes.

"The faster we can get adjusters in here, the faster we can get the recovery started," Cannizaro said, adding the Rodriguez and Sheriff Jack Stephens are committed to getting as many residents as possible to rebuild their homes and lives in St. Bernard Parish. "We want people to rebuild and the sooner folks can talk to their insurance companies the better."

"We'd like to have them (insurance adjusters) here to answer questions when residents return," he said. "Then they could move on to the phase of deciding how to handle claims."

Cannizaro said the land at the port could accommodate office trailers and temporary housing where insurance company representatives could live to make access to their clients easier.

He said Rodriguez, Stephens, Plaquemines Parish President Benny Rousselle and several others joined in a conference call with state Insurance Commissioner Robert Wooley and insurance company representatives Thursday, and planned to discuss the issue again Monday.

Jeff schools poised to begin reopening

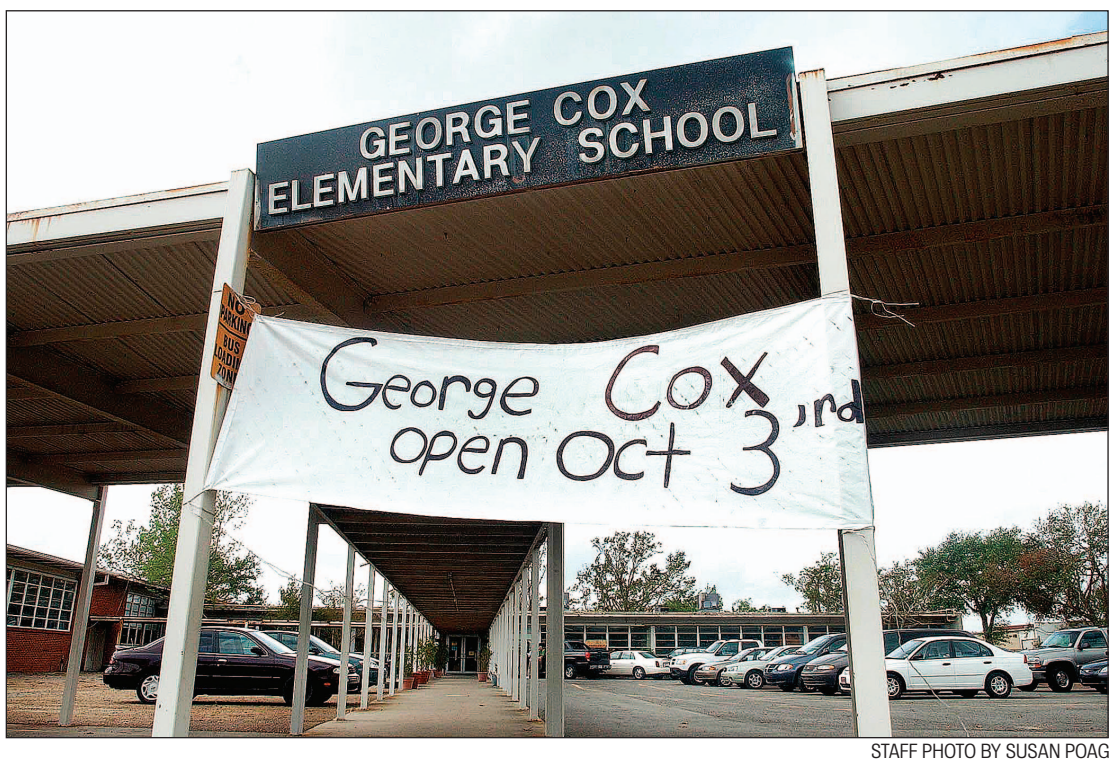
George Cox Elementary School's treasured butterfly garden has barely a tree standing, and every classroom had rain leak through the roof where air conditioners were shoved a few inches out of place by Hurricane Katrina's winds nearly four weeks ago.

But the rooms now clean and dry, and the garden and school playground have been raked smooth. Begonias are blooming by the front door.

"We could open tomorrow," Assistant Principal Liz Gurtner said Thursday.



For the past week, teachers, counselors, social workers, secretaries, custodians, contractors and National Guard troops have been working to prepare the Gretna school and others around Jefferson Parish for reopening Oct. 3.

Parishwide, the outlook has been steadily improving. Early assessments placed several schools on an iffy, or "B" list as far as being ready to open, and a few others were listed as closed.

Cox was on the "B" list, Gurtner said, but "we moved to an A-plus level in just five days."

A succession of assessments by the Jefferson Parish School Board, principals and staff refined a list of problems and necessary repairs.

Besides the leaks, three of the school's 10 portable buildings, several of which are decades old, were too damaged to use. But crews have made repairs and sanitized other rooms, and teachers picked up debris and combed the grounds around the school's play equipment for sharp objects.

George Cox Elementary School was considered to be in 'iffy' condition in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, but repairs and cleaning of the facility have progressed quickly. 'We could open tomorrow,' Assistant Principal Liz Gurtner said.

Green Park Elementary School in Metairie was spared the worst, with downed trees missing buildings and some spoiled food that had to be removed from the cafeteria, Principal Vic Castillo said this week.

"We were blessed," Castillo said. "I think that's a sign for us to get up and going for these kids."

Stephanie Sara, principal at Bridgedale Elementary in Metairie, also reported a campus in good condition, ready to take back an uncertain number of its 380 students. Soldiers from the Army's 82nd Airborne Division helped clear trees from the grounds. A few windowpanes still needed replacing Friday.

In addition to cleanup, the Cox staff spent Thursday morning trying to contact students' parents to let them know the school will reopen. With students and staff scattered across the country, it's an issue that has Gurtner concerned.

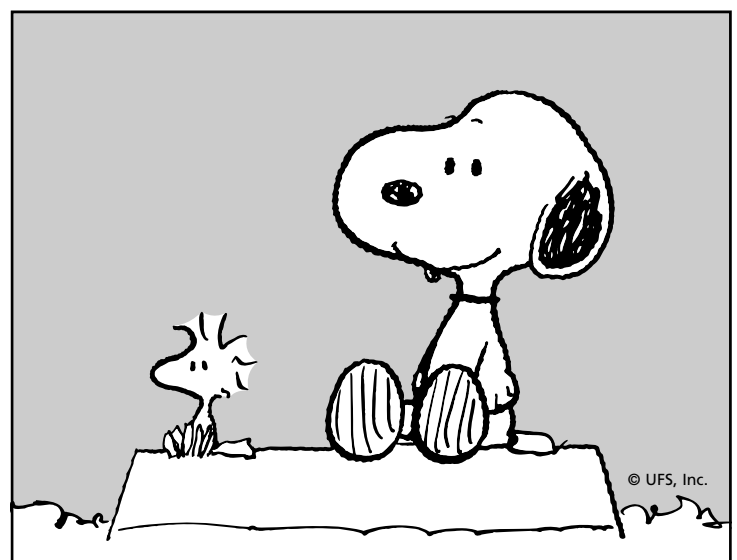
"We're worried that they don't know to come back," she said.

About 80 percent of the school's 512 students lived in apartment complexes in the Gretna area. Two of those complexes are still closed, Gurtner said.

However, all but three of Cox's teachers have or will return, she said.

Castillo said there is no telling how many of Green Park's 450 students will return, but he has heard from several families that said they will. The school might welcome a few displaced students.

"We lost some children and families from the community, but we will be in great shape here at Green Park," he said, adding that most of the faculty is returning.



The entire Bridgedale faculty is returning, Sara said, even employees without homes. The school has been working on finding places for them to stay.

After a Bridgedale student enrolled in school in Georgia, Sara said, that school contacted her offering help. "They're going to send backpacks for students that might have lost theirs in all the transition, filled with school supplies," Sara said.

For Cox, the next step working on its curriculum plans.

"That's what we want to do next week," Gurtner said. "And we have to plan activities, to get back the fun things kids do … back to some normalcy."

Gretna to shuffle cash to ride out slowdown

Hurricane withered revenue sources

By Joe Darby
West Bank bureau

Like all cities in the New Orleans area, Gretna faces a sharp drop in tax revenue, but the city will try to tighten its belt and shift money from improvement projects to daily operations until the economy returns to normal.

The Westwego City Council this week gave Mayor Robert Billiot authority to seek permission from the State Bond Commission to borrow up to $10 million and to participate in a $100 million loan made by Jefferson Parish. But Gretna Finance Director Rudy DuSaules said Gretna officials would put the city in debt "only as a last resort."

Almost all of Gretna's tax revenue, except property taxes, is being affected by Hurricane Katrina. Many stores remain closed and therefore are not generating sales tax, which provides Gretna with about $6 million a year.

DuSaules presented the city's financial picture to Mayor Ronnie Harris and members of the City Council on Wednesday night. Tax revenue from Boomtown Casino in Harvey is another major source of money for Gretna, adding about $1.9 million annually to the city's coffers. Boomtown has been closed, but DuSaules said he has been told the casino might reopen in a week or two.

Gretna officials hope casino money can play a key role in keeping the city solvent until its economy revives, DuSaules said. Normally, Gretna budgets money from Boomtown only to finance capital projects, such as canal improvements and a new police evidence room. But officials expect to use the Boomtown revenue to help pay for daily operations for a while, he said.

DuSaules said elected officials have not decided which improvement projects would be delayed.

DuSaules expressed frustration with the Federal Emergency Management Agency. The city submitted an application for a $750,000 grant, but FEMA questioned an expenditure of $20,000 for guns and ammunition for the Police Department. Instead of rejecting that one item, FEMA rejected the entire application, meaning it will be 10 more days or so before Gretna can receive money, he said.

The city soon will submit a second application of "well over a million dollars" for reimbursement of additional storm-related expenses.

By Allen Powell II

While officials in St. Charles and St. John the Baptist parishes say they have enough money to operate despite unexpected Hurricane Katrina-related expenses, they still anxiously await a combined $18 million in federal assistance to ease the burden.

Both parishes avoided the brunt of Katrina, but they incurred significant expenses assembling staff and resources for the storm and dealing with its aftermath, officials say.

The St. Charles Parish government, hospital, Sheriff's Office and School Board have requested about $16 million, and that number is expected to grow, parish spokesman Steve Sirmon said.

St. John has requested slightly more than $1 million for its government and Sheriff's Office, but the parish School Board has not finalized the amount it needs, said schools Superintendent Mike Coburn.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency has already approved more than $700 million in public assistance for several Louisiana parishes, cities and governmental offices.

Sirmon said St. Charles made its request about two weeks ago, and Jeff Clement, the St. John finance director, said the parish made its request a little more than a week ago.

Sirmon said he understands that St. Charles is perceived to be a wealthy parish that can fend for itself, but he said Katrina severely reduced the parish's ability to collect revenue, while also causing millions in unexpected expenses.

Sirmon said the parish has had significant overtime, transportation, fuel and infrastructure expenses that were not included in the annual budget. Although St. Charles isn't destitute, it could be without help soon, he said.

Clement said St. John has been able to make its payroll but noted that the parish government has spent about $840,000 on equipment rentals, overtime pay and debris cleanup.

St. John Sheriff's Chief Deputy Harold Klibert said the Sheriff's Office has spent almost $400,000 on storm-related expenses.

Shelters again open for local evacuees

By Sandra Barbier

Francisco Anncola came from out of town to do what he could to help the New Orleans area recover from Hurricane Katrina. But on Friday, he found himself in a shelter at Stella Worley Junior High School in Westwego, along with a handful of other out-of-towners assisting in the cleanup, as Hurricane Rita lashed at the region.

Clarence Creppel, 75, of Lafitte evacuated on a bus for Hurricane Katrina and stayed at three shelters over 14 days.

On Friday, Creppel found himself in yet another shelter, this time to ride out Hurricane Rita. Residents of Lafitte, Crown Point, Barataria and Grand Isle were under a mandatory evacuation order, and Jefferson Parish for the second time in four weeks opened a refuge at Stella Worley Junior High School in Westwego.

Steve Muth, shelter coordinator for Jefferson Parish, said that during Katrina and its aftermath, there were about 800 people at Worley, which served as a shelter for two weeks. "We kept them fed, and we had a roof over our heads," he said.

In contrast, the school was mostly empty Friday, except for parish and Red Cross volunteers, a handful of evacuees and about 45 people who had been working to clean storm-damaged buildings.

Ulises de Los Santos of Chattanooga, Tenn., who was staying in a warehouse near the Harvey Canal, said his supervisor at Industrial Craft Service Inc. had promised to move about 150 workers to a more secure place Friday morning.

But de Los Santos said he and several other workers were frightened by the worsening weather and decided to leave. About 50 of the workers stopped to talk to police, who then took them to the shelter, he said. Others in the shelter were veteran evacuees who considered themselves lucky to have a place to go.

Creppel said he had arrived back from his Katrina evacuation on Sept. 11 to find the roof of his house ruined. "I'm alive," he said. "I can always get my house straightened."

His neighbor, Allen LeBlanc, 68, said he was frustrated by having to leave home again so soon, but with "this one (Hurricane Rita) here, I'm afraid we're going to have more water."

Mercele Trudeaux, 54, of Barataria said the nurse who cares for her arranged for someone to drive her to the shelter. Trudeaux said she has seizures and other problems. "I'm worried about my little dog and my two cats," she said.

Among those running the shelter were Joseph Anastasio, a mental health worker from Baltimore, and Ken Stanyon, a volunteer from Modesto, Calif.

Anastasio said he spent the past two weeks delivering meals and "doing what we call 'compassionate conversation' with people."

Stanyon said he and his brother Neil had always wanted to volunteer in a crisis and decided they could help this time. "It's been phenomenal," he said. "It's wonderful to see people at their best on both sides of the line, people who are helping and people who are being helped."

Kenner suspends ban on trailers in driveways

Mounting overtime strains city budget

By Matt Scallan and Mary Swerczek
Kenner bureau

Parking trailers at Kenner homes is normally illegal, but Hurricane Katrina has led the city to bend the normal rules.

City officials say they can accommodate residents who want to park trailers in their driveways while overseeing repairs to damaged houses. Phil Ramon, the administration's chief of staff, advised residents with trailers to obtain a permit from the Code Enforcement Department and ensure that water, sewer and electrical services are correctly connected.

"Our Code Enforcement Department is working with people on this," he told the City Council on Thursday.

City Hall likely will give trailer permits to residents for limited periods, which can be renewed.

"I know that when you're dealing with contractors … three weeks can turn into three months, and a month can turn into a half a year," Councilwoman Michele Branigan said.

Some municipal employees already have trailers provided by the city in their driveways, and officials hope to get more soon. The Federal Emergency Management Agency is looking for sites to set up trailers for displaced residents and for its own workers, and Kenner plans to fast-track the permitting process, which normally takes 60 to 90 days, Ramon said.

Katrina is taking its toll on Kenner's budget as well as its landscape.

Finance Director Duke McConnell said city employees have earned $2.2 million in overtime since Katrina, which struck Aug. 29. The Police Department alone accounts for $1.5 million, and the Fire Department incurred $450,000.

He said the Fire Department and other administration employees are back on regular schedules. But he said he had asked for a report from the Police Department, which is run by elected Chief Nick Congemi.

The discussion was prompted by City Councilman Dominic Weilbaecher, who asked how much Hurricane Katrina is costing the city: "At what time are we going to sit down and revisit financially where we are?"

McConnell said it's difficult to project how the city's revenue stream will be affected because not all tax-paying businesses have opened. He said the balance in the general fund, which Mayor Phil Capitano fought to keep in the budget for emergencies, is invaluable. Ramon said the fund balance was about $4.6 million before Katrina hit.

"If we didn't have the fund balance, we wouldn't be able to operate right now," McConnell said.

He expects FEMA to cover the $4 million in bills for collecting debris as well as the $18,000 to $24,000 that Kenner is spending on trailers for city employees.

"We're working with them on a regular basis (to ensure) that what we're doing is going to be reimbursed," he said, adding that FEMA will reimburse 100 percent of the city's expenses for the first 60 days. "We feel the expenses we're incurring do meet the guidelines."

Weilbaecher suggested that the council might move money around in the budget to make sure "there's always something in the bank."

But city attorney Michael Power said that if money is needed, the administration should find another way to obtain it, such as getting money from the state, rather than redrawing the municipal budget.

Hurricane Katrina sent retail gas prices higher as oil facilities in Louisiana were shut down or sustained damage, such as storage tanks at Sundown Energy in Empire that were leaking oil Sept. 9. Four refineries in New Orleans and Mississippi remained closed Friday because of damage.

Rita could fuel gas price increase

Refineries shut down, but may be spared

By Mary Judice
Business writer

Hurricane Rita could cause retail gasoline prices to jump, possibly to as high as a national average of $3.75 a gallon next week, just as they did after Hurricane Katrina, analysts said Friday.

"There will likely be a brief (post-hurricane) spike as with Katrina," said Marshall Steeves, an analyst at Refco Inc. in New York. "Hopefully it will not be prolonged."

Gasoline prices were expected to climb even higher when the storm's projected track took it closer to the Houston area. But by midday Friday it appeared the area, which has a number of major oil refineries, would escape the full brunt of the storm.

However, the closure of many Gulf Coast refineries in anticipation of the storm, which was a Category 3 hurricane Friday afternoon, means gas prices will likely climb next week even if those facilities are not damaged, analysts said.

The Houston and Galveston areas are home to 12 percent of the nation's refining capacity, and most of those refineries shut down in anticipation of Rita. Clusters of refineries in Beaumont and Port Arthur, both in Texas, and in Lake Charles also closed. Four refineries in New Orleans and Mississippi remained closed Friday because of damage related to Hurricane Katrina, meaning that collectively, approximately 20 percent of the country's oil refining capacity was shut down along the Gulf Coast.

Long lines formed at gas stations in the Baton Rouge area Friday, where the average price of regular unleaded gasoline was $2.55 a gallon, according to AAA.

At the same time, crude oil and gasoline futures fell on the New York Mercantile Exchange on Friday, even as Gulf Coast evacuees were making their way north to escape Hurricane Rita. Crude for October delivery closed at $64.19 a barrel, down $2.31, and gasoline prices closed at $2.09 per gallon, down 5.4 cents.

"The market has effectively discounted most of the risk of the situation already," said Peter Beutel, president of Cameron Hanover Inc. in New Canaan, Conn., an energy consulting firm.

"We see a relief sell-off," Steeves said of the move downward Friday.

Oil platforms damaged by Hurricane Katrina also remained closed. The Minerals Management Service said Thursday 92 percent of the daily oil production from the Gulf was shut down.

State Farm relaxes rules on checks for living expenses

Policyholders won't need to document

By Jeffrey Meitrodt

Keep the money. No strings attached.

That was the message Friday from State Farm Insurance, which issued 90,000 checks worth $2,500 apiece in the wake of Hurricane Katrina to help displaced policyholders pay their living expenses.

As long as those customers don't seek additional money from the company for Katrina-related expenses, State Farm will not ask its policyholders to document how they spent the money or return any of it – even if they didn't spend it on hurricane-related living expenses, State Farm spokesman Dick Luedke said Friday.

"It's basically the right thing to do," Luedke said. "We don't see a need to go back to pursue them and said, 'OK, We gave you $2,500 and you only spent $2,200. Where is our $300?' That seems somewhat ridiculous."

Luedke's comments mark a sharp reverse for the company, which drew scathing reviews from state lawmakers earlier this week for announcing that the $2,500 payments would be subject to a policyholder's standard deductible. With a typical deductible running $1,000 to $2,000, that means many policyholders could have been asked to give most of the money back.

But State Farm now is following the course set by Allstate Insurance and Louisiana's other big insurers, which handed out millions of dollars for living expenses without such conditions.

However, if customers want to collect more than $2,500 for living expenses under the so-called civil authority clause, they'll have to provide receipts – and the deductible will apply, Luedke said. Under the civil authority clause, policyholders can collect up to 14 days of living expenses because local officials ordered them out of their homes.

State Farm policyholders can get reimbursed for up to two years of living expenses if wind made their home uninhabitable, but most of the homes wrecked by Katrina sustained water damage, not wind damage.

Shortages in store for retailers

As Rita nears, generators, water sell out fast

By Greg Thomas
Real estate writer

Shortages of cleaning supplies, which were common about a week ago when New Orleanians were thinking of returning home, have largely dissipated, retailers reported Friday. But that's not to say stores are free of shortages.

Face masks, for example, are still in short supply at several home improvement and hardware stores, as are rubber boots – items desired by people cleaning up flooded and reeking homes.

"We definitely keep having a run on those items," said Tammy Patton, owner of Patton Ace Hardware on Bluebonnet Boulevard in Baton Rouge.

And generators were nearly impossible to find Friday as Hurricane Rita closed in.

A Pep Boys Automotive Supercenter on Airline Highway in Baton Rouge received a shipment of 80 generators Friday at 10 a.m. and sold out in three hours, employee Avery Duplissey said. The store had to call police and locked doors to allow only a few customers to enter at a time, regardless of whether they were shopping for windshield wipers or the coveted generators.

Last week, rubber gloves, bleach, antibacterial soaps and other cleaning supplies were in short supply after New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin announced that he was going to allow nearly 180,000 residents to return to parts of the city that were not flooded, a decision rescinded amid pressure from federal authorities and cinched by the threat of Rita.

Several stores said they have recovered from that run. For example, a Baton Rouge Wal-Mart Supercenter on Friday appeared to have large supplies of basic cleaning supplies, such as bleach, mops, and the standard stock of soaps and detergents.

But with the approach of Rita, the store was swamped with customers buying a new round of storm supplies, such as nonperishable groceries, diapers and beer. The store was out of bottled water and had only one large box of baking soda, something New Orleanians will desperately want once they get refrigerators cleaned out.

Air fresheners were in great demand, the shoe department was out of adult-sized rubber boots, and the store had only one package of face masks. "We just can't keep them in," an employee in the paint department said.

The Home Depot operations manager on Airline Highway in Baton Rouge said he was fully stocked with cleaning supplies, but had sold his last generator at 11 a.m.

But he insisted he had most everything else. "I've got mops, buckets, garbage bags, gloves, dust pans, extension cords, spotlights, rags, paper towels, Shop Vacs," Byron Comeaux said.

But he was running short on face masks, too. "The U.S. Army came and in and took two big shipments of masks. ... They were cleaning up in New Orleans," he said.

Football fans turn cruel

As a New Orleans homeowner currently in the New York area, I was thrilled to snag great seats for the Saints' so-called home opener at the Giants' stadium, and I'm not even a football fan. I simply wanted to be there to support the Crescent City, and I eagerly anticipated attending the game as an escape from the horrors witnessed on the news for the past three weeks.

However, at the conclusion of Monday night's game I left the stadium stunned and in shock, and no, it wasn't because the Saints lost; it was due to the verbal assault spewed forth by Giants fans toward the people of New Orleans.

It was easy for New Orleanians to recognize one another even without their Saints gear on, for they had the pained, glazed look in their eyes that perhaps the people of the New York area remember from looking in the mirror on Sept. 11, 2001. Very subdued, we approached each other quietly, relating our tales, sharing information on neighborhoods, families and friends. Sometimes no words were required, our shared suffering was acknowledged with a simple smile, thumbs-up or peace sign.

But as I mingled with the Big Easy crowd, every conversation concluded with a discussion of the animals in Giants jerseys that surrounded us. "You won't believe what they said to me," one hysterical young girl announced. In disbelief, I thought surely these must be isolated instances; Americans couldn't possibly be so deliberately cruel to their fellow citizens as images of Hurricane Katrina's devastation flickered across the large television monitors.

Reality slapped me in the face when I became a victim of this abuse. I was taunted by Giants fans spitting venom like "the people of New Orleans are stupid," "you deserved what you got" and "hope you know how to swim," along with attacks that are far too vulgar for The Times-Picayune to print. I have been to other sporting events and never witnessed such vicious attacks on the opposing team's fans. Perhaps these imbeciles were oblivious to the fact that evacuee families and their children were present, or maybe they simply didn't care. It was one of the most disgusting displays of inhumanity I have ever seen.

Hopefully the Saints themselves received the warm welcome the New York press announced, but it is painfully clear the fans did not.

I expected a much better reception from a city that so recently experienced a catastrophic loss of its own. I would rather go sit in the muck and mire of the Superdome and get E. coli than enter the Meadowlands again.

Police stood up for West Jeff

As I sit here in central Mississippi, displaced from the home where I have lived my entire life, I am completely disheartened at the criticism of the actions of the Gretna and Westwego police chiefs.

Yes, I know New Orleans was ill-prepared for what occurred, but why should it be the responsibility of small municipalities such as Gretna to care for people whom the most populous parish in the state could not accommodate?

Gretna was a line of defense in a time of total chaos. I was there for the storm. I experienced first-hand the fear of not knowing what was happening because we lacked phone or television. We heard scattered reports that there were hordes of looters and angry mobs headed for us in West Jefferson. We heard that they burned our mall to the ground and were marching for the hospital. We had little water or electricity and were running low on supplies, but I now realize that these were minor inconveniences in the grand scheme of things.

Though we were doing better than New Orleans, neither Gretna nor West Jefferson was capable of caring for a city whose people shot at rescuers. We had people hurt and stranded, yet they did not try to harm those who risked their own lives to save them.

What happened in New Orleans would have happened on a wider scale if it were not for people such as Gretna Police Chief Arthur Lawson, who stood up and said "no." He knew that we were not going to be able to care for these individuals. And allowing them into the parish would only have scattered them farther from rescue.

Race is such an easy card to play at a time like this. Orleans Parish is predominately African-American, so it makes sense that those would be the individuals trying to flee. Ethnicity doesn't matter. What mattered was the lack of supplies or ability to care for thousands of people who would have had nowhere to go even upon entering Jefferson Parish.

The chief of police in Westwego said it all when he was quoted in The Times-Picayune: "If you wasn't here, shut your mouth, because you don't know."

To the police chiefs in Westwego and Gretna, all I can say is thank you. Thank you for protecting our homes and the hospital where I worked 24 hours a day for 17 out of 21 days. Thank you for protecting me so that when I could finally leave I was safe and could find my children and family. Thank you for standing up for us and what you thought was right. I couldn't agree with you more.

Blood on their hands

As a native of New Orleans, I have one simple question. When will Arthur Lawson, chief of the Gretna Police Department, be arrested along with the others who assisted him in trapping New Orleans residents trying to evacuate the city by foot — the only means they had — during a living hell that was not of their making? Why has no one called for the arrest of these heartless people?

OK, that's two questions.

Trapping starving, thirsty, sick and elderly people in rising floodwaters because of hype about alleged looters, most of whom were trying to feed themselves and others, is absolutely criminal.

Nothing, in my opinion, gives anyone the right to block public roads in a tragic situation from which tens of thousands of non-criminal residents were desperate to escape to save their lives.

These people have blood on their hands, and I hope it haunts them the rest of their lives.

Too close for comfort

Hurricane Rita didn't need to make a direct hit to cause big trouble for southeast Louisiana: A brush from the storm was more than sufficient to bring floods of water back into New Orleans and put evacuees — from Texas as well as Louisiana — onto highways.

Storm surge from Rita was stronger than anticipated, and it proved too much for the patch job on the Industrial Canal levee. It suffered several breaks Friday morning, bringing more flooding to the hard-hit Lower 9th Ward of Orleans Parish and St. Bernard Parish. The breaches proved that dire warnings about the levee system's fragility were not exaggerations. It also proved the wisdom of Mayor Nagin's order to halt the return of residents and evacuate those who had come back.

Areas that had begun the process of recovery were plunged back into crisis mode. St. Tammany Parish President Kevin Davis ordered a mandatory evacuation for those south of U.S. 190 and Louisiana 22. Others didn't wait to be told to leave; they formed long lines at gas stations and stores as they prepared to flee.

Victims of Katrina are jittery, plain and simple, and it's no wonder. If a hurricane were to threaten metro New Orleans a year from now, people would suffer Katrina flashbacks. The emergence of another big, powerful storm before we've even been able to dry out would try the nerves of the catatonic. Parts of our state that were spared Katrina and had been harboring the displaced from that storm are now in the bull's-eye.

Katrina evacuees now have plenty of company — about 2 million people in southeast Texas and southwest Louisiana were advised to flee — but this kind of misery doesn't love company. The sight of gridlocked highways full of Texans trying to get out of Houston before their tanks were emptied or their engines overheated were too freshly familiar.

Anyone who thought evacuation was something Louisiana bungled now should understand that emptying an entire city or region is no simple matter. The bus accident near Dallas that claimed the lives of at least 24 elderly evacuees should make clear the peril that's involved in moving so many people, including the most vulnerable. Poor people without transportation complained of being stuck in Galveston and Houston as the storm approached.

Texas Gov. Rick Perry asked people to say a prayer for Texas. His hope for divine intervention certainly resonates with Louisianans, who found the Lone Star state to be a strong and compassionate neighbor after Hurricane Katrina.

Louisiana is facing a double hit, though, and that will prove much harder for a smaller and poorer state to withstand. Rita has already added to our suffering. Today will tell us how much more.

Coming to whose relief?

The dreadful 2005 hurricane season has put thousands upon thousands of New Orleans area residents in dire need of aid. And in this environment there's no excuse for letting relief supplies go to waste or be used for private gain.

That's why the malfeasance in office charge against Kenner Chief Administrative Officer Cedric Floyd is so disturbing. Police in that city obtained an arrest warrant for him after raiding his home Tuesday and retrieving, they say, truckloads of donated clothing, tools, food and medicine. Military officials had initiated the complaint against Mr. Floyd.

Mayor Phil Capitano suspended him without pay Wednesday. If indeed Mr. Floyd used his public position to obtain supplies that he then hoarded for private use, he should be fired and subjected to appropriate criminal penalties.

Unfortunately, the political climate in Kenner has been so toxic lately — and the rivalry between Mayor Capitano and Police Chief Nick Congemi so intense — that it's hard to assess how strong the case against Mr. Floyd might be.

Mr. Floyd has served as one of two top mayoral aides during a polarizing time, and the former Jefferson Parish School Board member has proved to be a controversial figure in his own right. Most recently, he got into an embarrassing shouting match with Mr. Congemi in front of a Times-Picayune photographer and a CNN crew that arrived in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Mr. Floyd says he was merely helping to move supplies from a city-run relief site to a Kenner church that planned to distribute them, and the pastor of that church concurs with that account.

In any case, Mr. Floyd deserves his day in court. And given the political significance of the matter, it's crucial that outside law enforcement bodies be involved in the investigation. Attorney General Charles Foti's office is assisting, and Mr. Congemi would be wise to let that agency or some other impartial investigators take the lead.

The charge against Mr. Floyd is serious, and any proceedings against him need to be beyond reproach.

THE BIG UNEASY

With the Industrial Canal levee break in the background, twisted cars and empty foundations are all that is left after torrents of water flooded New Orleans' Lower 9th Ward.

Although Hurricane Katrina drowned much of New Orleans, the damage to America's economic infrastructure actually fell short of early predictions. Of course, Hurricane Rita may make up for that.

But Katrina did more than physical damage; it was a blow to our self-image as a nation. Maybe people will quickly forget the horrible scenes from the Superdome, and the frustration of wondering why no help had arrived, once cable TV returns to nonstop coverage of missing white women. But my guess is that Katrina's shock to our sense of ourselves will persist for years.

PAUL KRUGMAN

America's current state of mind reminds me of the demoralized mood of late 1979, when a confluence of events — double-digit inflation, gas lines and the Iranian hostage crisis — led to a national crisis of confidence.

Start with economic confidence. The available measures say consumer confidence, which was already declining before Katrina hit, has now fallen off a cliff. One well-respected survey, from the University of Michigan, says consumer sentiment is at its lowest level since George Bush the elder was president and "America: What Went Wrong?" was a national best seller.

It's true that gasoline prices have receded from their post-Katrina peaks. But even if Rita spares the refineries, a full recovery of economic confidence seems unlikely. For one thing, it looks as if we're in for a long, cold winter: Natural gas and fuel oil are still near their price peaks. Anyway, most families were already struggling before Katrina. A few weeks ago, the Census Bureau reported that in 2004, while Washington and Wall Street were hailing a "Bush boom," poverty increased and median family income failed to keep up with inflation. And it's safe to assume that most families did even worse this year.

Then there's the war in Iraq, which is rapidly becoming impossible to spin positively: The purple fingers have come and gone, and there are no more corners to turn. As a result, views for which people such as Howard Dean were once derided are becoming the majority opinion. Most Americans say the war was a mistake; a majority says the administration deliberately misled the country into war; almost 4 in 10 say Iraq will turn into another Vietnam.

And many people are outraged by the war's cost. The general public doesn't closely follow economists' arguments about the risks of budget deficits, or try to decide between competing budget projections. But people do know that there's a big deficit, that politicians keep calling for cuts in spending and that rebuilding after Katrina will cost a lot of money. They resent the idea that large sums are being spent in a faraway country, where we're waging a war whose purpose seems increasingly obscure.

Finally, fragmentary evidence — such as a sharp drop in the fraction of Americans who approve of President Bush's performance in handling terrorism and the failure of large crowds to show up for the Pentagon's "America Supports You" march and country music concert — suggests that the confluence of Katrina and the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks has caused something to snap in public perceptions about the "war on terror."

In the early months after Sept. 11, 2001, America's self-confidence actually seemed to have been bolstered by the attack: The Taliban regime was quickly overthrown, and President Bush looked like an effective leader. The positive perception of what happened after Sept. 11 has, needless to say, been a mainstay of Bush's political stature.

But now that more time has elapsed since Sept. 11 than the whole stretch from Pearl Harbor to V-J Day, people are losing faith. Bin Laden, it turns out, could both run and hide. It's obvious from the evening news that al-Qaida and violent Islamic extremism in general are flourishing.

And the hapless response to Katrina, which should have been easier to deal with than a terrorist attack, has shown that our leaders have done virtually nothing to make us safer.

And here's the important point: These blows to our national self-image are mutually reinforcing. The sense that we're caught in an unwinnable war reinforces the sense that the economy is getting worse, and vice versa. So we're having a general crisis of confidence.

It's the kind of crisis that opens the door for dramatic political changes — possibly, but not necessarily, in a good direction. But who will provide leadership, now that Bush is damaged goods?

Paul Krugman is a columnist for The New York Times.

The atmosphere isn't the place to deal with storms

Like a bad horror movie in which the villain keeps coming back, Hurricane Rita, the 18th storm of the season, is spinning toward an inevitable rendezvous with the Gulf Coast. We've already seen more death and destruction than the past 35 hurricane seasons combined. And many people, including some European and U.S. politicians, are hoping the carnage — represented most poignantly by the destruction in New Orleans — will help bring this country to its senses on dealing with global warming.

But understanding what this hurricane season is really telling us about why we're so vulnerable to climate-related catastrophes means facing up to an unavoidable fact: Efforts to slow global warming will have no discernible effect on hurricanes for the foreseeable future. Reducing greenhouse gas emissions and adequately preparing for future disasters are essentially separate problems.

ROGER A. PIELKE JR. & DANIEL SAREWITZ

Reducing emissions is a crucial environmental, economic and geopolitical goal. But if we are concerned about hurricanes, then we need to manage what is within our control on the ground, not what is proving to be beyond our control in the atmosphere.

The truth is, the number and scale of disasters worldwide has been rising rapidly in recent decades because of changes in society, not global warming. In the case of hurricanes, the continuing development and urbanization of coastal regions around the world accounts for all of the increases in economic and human losses we have experienced.

Even if tomorrow we could somehow magically put an end to global warming, the frequency and magnitude of climate-related disasters would continue to rise unabated into the indefinite future as more people inhabit vulnerable locations around the world. Our research suggests that for every $1 of future hurricane damage that scientists expect in 2050 related to climate change, we should expect an additional $22 to $60 in damage resulting from putting more people and property in harm's way.

None of this means we should not pursue reducing greenhouse gas emissions, or that mitigating climate change is a bad idea. But we simply cannot expect to control the climate's behavior through energy policies aimed at lowering greenhouse gas emissions.

The current international policy framework for reducing greenhouse gas emissions — the Kyoto Protocol — is far too modest to have any meaningful effect on the behavior of the climate system. And even the modest agreements reached under Kyoto are failing.

For example, the European Environment Agency reported in 2004 that 11 of the 15 European Union signatories to Kyoto "are heading toward overshooting their emission targets, some by a substantial margin." To make matters much worse, most of the growth in emissions in coming decades will occur in rapidly industrializing nations such as China and India, which are exempt from Kyoto targets.

To make matters still worse, because of the way that greenhouse gases behave in the atmosphere, even emissions reductions far more rapid and radical than those mandated under Kyoto would have little or no effect on the behavior of the climate for decades.

The implications are clear: More storms like Katrina are inevitable. And the effects of future Katrinas and Ritas will be determined not by our efforts to manage changes in the climate but by the decisions we make now about where and how to build and rebuild in vulnerable locations.

Do we have the will to pay the upfront economic and political costs of strict building-code enforcement and prudent land-use restrictions? Will we have the imagination to build resilience into the local economy, rewarding companies that find ways to preserve jobs after a disaster and contribute to a faster recovery? Do we have the decency to counter the market forces that cause poor people to live in the most vulnerable areas?

As we learn the lessons of this terrible hurricane season, the answers we give to these kinds of questions will create the conditions that determine the effects of future hurricanes. We are, that is, about to begin the process of managing the next disaster. What kind of disaster do we want it to be?

Roger Pielke Jr., director of the Center for Science and Technology Policy Research at the University of Colorado, Boulder, and Daniel Sarewitz, director of the Consortium for Science, Policy and Outcomes at Arizona State University, wrote this for the Los Angeles Times.

Katrina separates Kerry and Edwards

John Kerry and John Edwards ran for office together and they lost together, and they both gave major speeches about Katrina this week, but there the similarity ends. The two men might as well live in different worlds.

Kerry began his speech by making the point that Bush and his crew are rotten. He then went on to make the point that Bush and his crew are loathsome. In the third section of the speech, Kerry left the impression that Bush and his crew are evil.

Now we all know people so consumed by hatred for George Bush that they haven't had an unpredictable thought in five years, but in Kerry's speech one sees this anger in almost clinical form.

In the first place, not even Karl Rove's worldview is so obsessively Bush-centric as John Kerry's. There are many interesting issues raised by Katrina, but for Senator Ahab it all goes back to the great white monster, Bush. Bush and his crew should have known the levees in New Orleans were weak. Bush and his crew should have known thousands in the city would be trapped. (Did I miss Kerry's own warnings on these subjects?)

All reality flows back to Bush. All begins with Bush, ends with Bush, is explained by Bush and is polluted by Bush, cursed be thy name.

And as the speech stretches on, a second thought occurs: Doesn't this guy ever get bored? If Kerry ever makes an anti-Bush jab, he makes it again. The old DeLay jibes, he makes them again. The Wolfowitz attacks, he makes them again. Porn movies have less repetition than this, and yet the "Mission Accomplished" carrier deck scene gets hauled out again, for one feels this is not a normal speech designed to persuade or inform, but a primitive rite designed to channel group outrage.

John Edwards' speech had a different feel. Edwards took some hard shots at Bush, some of them deserved, but having left Washington after the election, Edwards is not so obsessed with power struggles. In his talk he roamed outward and spoke about the complexities of actual life.

He mentioned that the typical white family has about $80,000 in assets, while the typical Hispanic family has about $8,000, and the typical African-American family has about $6,000. That's an astonishing gap.

Edwards mentioned a woman in Kansas City who makes $9.50 an hour and can't pay her utility bills. He mentioned a boy in Chicago who designed a T-shirt about his absent father. It reads: "You won't be there. Should have, could have, would have." The T-shirt has a hole cut out in the shape of a heart.

Edwards weaved a story about the gnarly complexities of poverty in this country, about the tangled and reinforcing feedback loops that run between family breakdowns and economic insecurity. He concluded with a series of policy recommendations fit for the post-welfare-reform world.

No conservative would agree with all of them, but nobody could fail to find them interesting. While the old welfare policies allowed people to evade the world of work and enabled people to drop out of school and have children, Edwards proposed a series of policies designed to encourage work, to encourage responsibility, to help the poor build assets.

The Kerry-Edwards contrast is characteristic of the argument that divides the Democratic Party. On one side are those who believe that the party's essential problem is with its political style. The Republicans win because they are simply rougher, so the Democrats must be just as tough in response. They must match Karl Rove blow for blow. Democrats in this camp are voting against John Roberts just to show the world, and their donors above all, that they are willing to give no quarter.

On the other side are those who believe that the Democratic defeats flow from policy problems, not from campaign style or message framing. They don't believe that Democrats can win wrapped in their own rage, or kowtowing endlessly to their psychologically aggrieved donor base. For them, the crucial challenge is to come up with policies more in tune with voters.

Kerry speaks for the first group, which believes in more partisanship, and Edwards for the second, which believes in less.

I have discussions with my Democratic friends over whether the party will snap back to Clintonite centrism after the polarizing Bush leaves town. Some think yes. I suspect no. As Kerry's speech shows, the emotional tenor of the party has changed. The donors are aroused. Bush may end up changing the Democratic Party more than his own.

Rita 'sets us back another month'

By Manuel Torres
St. Bernard/Plaquemines bureau

For St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes, both hit hard by Hurricane Katrina last month, this week had started well. Residents were returning to some areas, federal aid was flowing in, and businesses were reopening or planning repairs.

Then came Rita.

The storm pushed floodwaters across most of lower Plaquemines and into some parts of St. Bernard, both of which had been submerged by Katrina on Aug. 29, and officials in both parishes said Friday that Rita's punch will likely knock the air out of recovery efforts.

Meanwhile, authorities also announced Friday that the bodies of two Arabi residents, victims of Katrina, had been found, bringing to 96 the number of St. Bernard Parish residents killed by the storm.

The areas that had been washed out by Katrina were virtual ghost towns this week. And officials said they will have to repeat their draining and cleanup efforts, forcing them to delay further the return of residents.

"It sets us back another month," Plaquemines Parish President Benny Rousselle said, rubbing his eyebrows as he told of Rita's storm surge sending floodwaters into communities south of Port Sulphur and parts of the parish's east bank. "Looks like we'll be starting all over again."

St. Bernard Parish Council Chairman Joey DiFatta said Rita will require renewed cleanup efforts but that the full impact of the storm will depend on how much of the parish floods. By mid-afternoon Friday, floodwaters arriving from the Industrial Canal were restricted to parts of Arabi.

"We'll have to reclean the streets, remove debris and basically start again in those areas," DiFatta said.

Bad breaks

Officials in both parishes knew the storm's surge would threaten levees that had been heavily damaged by Katrina and were still being repaired late Thursday.

But in Plaquemines, authorities were surprised when the flooding began by late morning, indicating some of the levee repairs were not holding.

"It's a little earlier than we anticipated," Plaquemines Parish Sheriff Jiff Hingle said.

But regular life, or what passes for it in the aftermath of Katrina, continued in the northern portion of the parish, which remained dry during Katrina and seemed to be faring well under Rita. Even as winds picked up by midday, cars buzzed around gas stations, video stores were hopping, and at DeSalvo's Seafood on Belle Chasse Highway, residents lined up for the post-Katrina special: shrimp spaghetti.

Yet even those businesses were feeling Rita's impact.

"There go our customers," a waitress at DeSalvo's commented as she watched caravans of repair trucks heading north.

In St. Bernard, the levees seemed to be doing their job, holding back a surge that began pounding the area late Thursday night, said Col. Richard Baumy, a Sheriff's Office spokesman. But Rita's waters sneaked in as the storm topped levee repairs along the Industrial Canal in New Orleans, pouring into the city's Lower 9th Ward.

Like an army heading for St. Bernard's gates, floodwaters reaching at least 2 feet marched down Claiborne Avenue and neighboring streets and got into northern Arabi by early afternoon. There, a raised set of railroad tracks was containing the attack, and parish officials hoped Rita's winds would shift and the water would stop rising before it advanced further east.

The waiting game

Officials in both parishes said they would not know the full extent of the flooding until the worst of Rita passes southeast Louisiana, sometime today. But they said Rita's effect in slowing down recovery efforts had begun even before the storm arrived.

Hundreds of emergency workers in both St. Bernard and Plaquemines evacuated ahead of the storm. Contractors hired to clean streets, as well as workers for private industries trying to restart their operations, also left the area and removed their equipment. Officials estimated it would take days for those crews to return.

The storm also delayed some federal aid efforts. Federal Emergency Management Agency officials were waiting for Rita to pass in order to begin setting up a camp in Belle Chasse for 500 emergency workers, agency spokesman Earl Armstrong said. He said the mini-town of air-conditioned tents will allow the workers to vacate a makeshift camp at Belle Chasse High School, where teachers need to start preparing to reopen the school to students next month.

In St. Bernard, the storm forced officials to halt the re-entry of residents. It was unclear Friday when the process may resume.

"We're not going to bring people back until it's safe again," DiFatta said, adding, "Whenever that is."

THE ELECTRONIC EYE OF THE STORM

Broadcasters shine during New Orleans' darkest days

STAFF ILLUSTRATION BY KENNETH HARRISON

I CAME HOME from a "Wheel of Fortune" taping at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center to discover that Hurricane Katrina's course had suddenly shifted toward New Orleans.

Turning on the TV at 9 p.m. that Friday night, I made a note that three stations were running on-screen graphics tracking the storm's coordinates.

One had the storm's center 540 miles from New Orleans.

Another, 590.

Another, 561.

Swell, I thought. Coverage of this storm will be as carefully synchronized as the Delta House's disruption of the Faber College homecoming parade.

I was wrong.

DAVE WALKER
On the Air

One of New Orleans' darkest hours has been the brightest for many local newscasters on both TV and radio.

Displaced by the storm, their own families dispersed in its aftermath and burdened by the crushing realization that many of their own homes had been damaged or maybe even totaled, countless New Orleans broadcast journalists have delivered lifeline, and sometimes life-saving, coverage of the immense disaster.

Peabodys for (almost) everybody, I say.

CBS affiliate WWL-Channel 4 kept its broadcast signal on the air to offer continuous comprehensive reporting and analysis.

NBC affiliate WDSU-Channel 6 lost its transmitter and split its news operation in two, departing New Orleans for Jackson, Miss., and Orlando, Fla.

ABC affiliate WGNO-Channel 26 evacuated early to WBRZ-TV, the Baton Rouge ABC affiliate also owned by WGNO corporate parent Tribune Broadcasting. In the early hours and days post-Katrina, the combined staffs did continuous coverage to give evacuees familiar faces to deliver all the bad news from home.

All three of the above have exploited multiple distribution outlets — including cable, satellite, broadcast digital subchannels in various cities and even signal sharing with a PBS affiliate (as was the case with WLPB, which has run an hour-long WWL newscast in late afternoon) — to get their coverage to viewers.

All three also employed Internet simulcasts.

Almost completely missing in action post-Katrina has been Fox affiliate WVUE-Channel 8, whose Jefferson Davis Parkway studios took on 5 to 6 feet of water. WVUE staffers were dispersed from Dallas (where meteorologist Bob Breck contributed to the post-storm coverage) to Baton Rouge (where anchor Nancy Parker appeared on a local station) to Mobile, Ala. (where anchor John Snell did reports for station WALA-TV and cable's Fox News Channel).

Nearly four weeks after landfall — has it been just four weeks? — interview notes and screen-and-speaker observations cram my notebooks as usual, but they're side-by-side with FEMA's phone number, insurance claim codes and the addresses of Baton Rouge apartment complexes and RV sales lots.

Reading my notes from watching the pre-storm weekend coverage seems downright spooky in light of the horror that hit.

The first entry for that Saturday morning has WDSU's Margaret Orr saying, "Dallas is looking good at this time."

Then there's a note from my first Walter Maestri sighting. "This is a bad lady," he said, speaking ill of the deadly Katrina.

Minor relief came when Jim Cantore popped up on the beach in Biloxi, Miss. The Weather Channel's rover is a catastrophe magnet, and I took his positioning as a positive omen that the storm would land a little east of New Orleans.

A little deeper still in the notebook, I've got WWL anchor Eric Paulsen interrupting meteorologist John Gumm and asking, on behalf of the audience, "Would you go ahead and leave now?"

Paulsen was rock solid every time I caught him

MY STORM STORY

Hurricane Katrina: In their own words

"The main thing I want to do is let my neighbor Yolanda Jenkins know that I have her dog, Pepper, here with us in Thibodaux. She's a twin and is with the New Orleans Police Department.

"I don't have a home. My girlfriend and I are here together with the dogs. If we would have stayed in the house, we would have drowned. We've got a double, and Marion's brother, Roosevelt, has an apartment in another part of the house. He's mentally ill and retarded, and he can't walk. We talked about getting to the attic, but we couldn't get him up there.

"The water was up to my neck. By the time we got to Roosevelt, we had to float him and his mattress to the stairs of the apartment behind the house. And I said, 'Brother, I want you to listen to me real good: You sit on these steps, or you're going to drown.'

"We all stayed in the upstairs apartment until Wednesday when the helicopter came. We were waving shirts and all sorts of things at the helicopters, but they were busy getting people off of roofs. They were in and out all night. You could hear the helicopters and see them.

"We couldn't get to any food or water, and Roosevelt is a diabetic. He's 50-something, but he's like he's a 9-year-old. I think it was Tuesday that someone on a boat gave us half of a half-gallon of water. When the helicopters came to get us, the man who rescued us had a hammer and made the window like a door so we could get out.

"All we had were the clothes on our backs. They took me first, then Roosevelt. I think he knows his first name, but I don't know if he knows his last one. We don't know where he is.

"The people who rescued us were angels. I wish I knew who they were. They took us over to the interstate. The bus was going to Baton Rouge, but I didn't get on it because I was waiting for Marion. And when she came, the next bus was going to Thibodaux. We're here in the house of the Lord. Our Father led us to his place and to Father Jim's house. Father Jim (Morris) let all of us with pets come here. We're going to stay for now.

"I would like to go back home, but my house is under water. I have insurance. I'm going to get me a new house. Who knows? If I get my money, I might come back here to Thibodaux and build a house. They are angels here."

PIANO MAN PLAYS ON

Phil Melancon, who performs at the Pontchartrain Hotel, is taking his music into the streets of the city

By Doug MacCash
Staff writer

It's 9 o'clock on a beautiful mid-September night in darkened, depopulated New Orleans. Phil Melancon, the Pontchartrain Hotel's cabaret-style piano man, is wrapping up his makeshift USO-style show with a wistful rendition of Randy Newman's "Louisiana 1927."

"They're trying to wash us away, they're trying to wash us away," he sings in a hoarse voice to the 22 members of the Oklahoma National Guard seated along the Napoleon Street wharf, all of whom seem far too young to have ever heard Newman's lamentation of a long-ago flood.

The chiming sound of his electric piano drifts over the moonlit Mississippi River, the mess truck that served supper earlier in the evening and the brightly lighted S.S. Pililaau supply ship anchored nearby.

It was the fourth of Melancon's post-Katrina shows. Although the audience was light and the band was set up a bit too far from the cement curb seating, the sound was good, some of the jokes seemed to have found their mark and the soldiers who drifted by clearly welcomed the distraction.

Melancon, 53, had spent the day arranging that night's event, driving to urban military encampments to gain permission

Broadcasters shine during New Orleans' darkest days

WALKER, from C-1

before and after the storm. Same goes for WWL's Mike Hoss. During the run-up to the storm, WVUE's John Snell conveyed the perfect mixture of gravity and grace under pressure. I've missed him ever since.

Later still, with various traffic cameras showing the evacuation exodus picking up, WVUE's Breck suggested viewers confiscate cell phones from their teenagers to free up airspace for important calls.

By early evening Saturday, CNN was airing a prepared piece spelling out the well-known worst-case scenario for poor New Orleans and its even poorer below-sea-level citizens.

Said the anchor, coming out of the piece, "That'll make you sit up and take notice, won't it?"

If you're in charge of FEMA, evidently not.

Meanwhile, all the cable networks were getting correspondents into position and into costume.

A TV rule of thumb: When the reporter is wearing a ball cap, wherever he or she is standing is going to get clobbered.

• • • • • • • •

The news, and storm track, didn't improve overnight.

My family evacuated. I stayed to watch as much coverage as I could for as long as I could.

WDSU's Ed Reams did a melancholy stand-up somewhere Sunday morning during which he observed, "What you love about New Orleans may not exist 24 hours from now."

Reams did some great work during this storm. His live Monday morning report from inside the Louisiana Superdome was the first time I heard that New Orleans' refuge of last resort was coming apart at the seams.

By late Sunday afternoon, the storm track was looking solidly dreadful.

Cable's Fox News Channel had dispatched anchor Shepard Smith to Bourbon Street to ask the predictable partiers there why they hadn't left.

Said one: "It's none of your f- - - - - business."

Fearing that Fox News might send Shep looking for me, I left town.

I was somewhere outside of Baton Rouge in stop-and-go traffic on Highway 61 on Sunday night when I heard WVUE's Breck and Snell, somehow talking on the radio, say that the storm track was tightening on a slightly east-of-New Orleans path.

Jim Cantore. Wearing a ball cap. Catastrophe magnet.

• • • • • • • •

My notes from Monday reflect the story arc of the day:

New Orleans pounded.

New Orleans dodges bullet.

New Orleans swamped.

WDSU's Roop Raj filed the first report I heard about window blowouts in downtown high-rises. Reams filed live from the Superdome, rainwater dripping on him from the failing roof.

Later in the day, WWL's Jill Hezeau had the first report I saw of a waterborne rescue team. There would be a lot more of those.

And Monday at dusk, WBRZ had the first helicopter tour of the flooded city.

WGNO meteorologist Bruce Katz narrated the live feed as it went on the air, spotting submerged landmarks near his house and realizing, in real time, that his house was probably flooded, too.

Shattering pictures. Shattering words.

Katz also did voice-over beneath the first looting footage I saw, and his unbridled outrage was righteous and so relatable.

Thereafter, my notes get fuzzy. We evacuated to a sainted friend's home in Prairieville, where the two most dependable antenna-delivered signals came from Baton Rouge stations WBRZ (to which WGNO retreated) and CBS affiliate WAFB-TV.

WWL's News Orleans signal faded in and out.

Also a fuzzy option was WDSU's faint signal, which came in on its usual channel number until Monday afternoon and then, once I discovered it later in the week, from the WPXL transmitter.

We had satellite-delivered cable news, though storm winds jarred the dish and I never quite figured out the array of clickers required to make it all work.

Internet access was also iffy, so I wasn't able to glue my eyes to the streaming Webcasts offered by WWL, WDSU and WBRZ/WGNO.

Several long days spent waiting for the cable guy to show up at our new Baton Rouge apartment were lived in a near-total media blackout.

So I'm delighted to not have an opinion on whether CNN's Anderson Cooper or NBC's Brian Williams gets the bigger bounce from Katrina.

I've been guilty of railbird writing about local news figures after past hurricane scares, but the career trajectories of bigfoot network news anchors, apparently an obsession in cities that weren't inundated with toxic sludge, seem comparatively trivial today. And probably will tomorrow. Given what they've seen, both Anderson and Williams likely agree.

Also trivial is the debate over the word "refugee," used for a while to describe the likes of me. It's not even my favorite new addition to the crisis lexicon. Those would be, in a tie, "dewatering" — as in removing water from my street - and "civil unrest" — as in civilians pillaging a defenseless city.

That last one I think I heard on a WWL Webcast during a rare moment of broadband connectivity.

As noted above, I wasn't in a position to monitor this impromptu experiment in worldwide new-media distribution of our local news.

Aaron Barnhart, the TV critic for the Kansas City Star, watched everything and wrote that WWL's Webcast was "indispensable," even when judged alongside the coverage that emerged from the muscled-up network and cable news forces.

Based on the pieces of it I saw, I couldn't agree more.

Katrina was clearly a watershed moment — pardon the soggy imagery — in the digital distribution of local TV news. Thousands of far-flung New Orleans residents were grateful for the high-tech tether.

• • • • • • • •

Without easy access to visual electronic media, I, like thousands of New Orleanians trapped either in attics or Baton Rouge traffic, leaned heavily on radio for news from home.

There's where my most indelible coverage memories were made, first on WWL AM-870, then on a Baton Rouge station carrying the camelback-shotgun marriage of New Orleans stations owned by the competing station groups Entercom and Clear Channel Communications.

Dubbed the United Radio Broadcasters of New Orleans, the experiment combined the air staffs of the competing companies. Though some of the oil-and-water host pairings were uncomfortable to listen to, others were pure magic.

Not to suggest breaking up a winning team at Clear Channel's WQUE FM-93.3, but somehow somebody's got to make the dream-team pairing of Monica Pierre and WWL's John "Spud" McConnell a steady thing once their respective companies get back to competing instead of cooperating.

About those memories: Nobody who heard New Orleans City Council President Oliver Thomas describe the bodies he'd seen in the water to WWL's Dave Cohen will ever forget it.

Same for Garland Robinette's interview with New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, the one that produced such an angry and despairing reaction from Nagin, and for Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard's call for succession.

Same for the live calls from people trapped in their homes, or calls from people looking for friends and loved ones.

Same, for that matter, for WWL's live interview with Antoinette K-Doe, widow of Ernie, who described her weeklong stand in the city, her evacuation to Georgia, her recovery by friends and her will to rebuild the iconic, flooded Mother-in-Law Lounge.

Unforgettable.

And, in case you were wondering, the "Wheel of Fortune" cast and crew made it out of the Convention Center in the nick of time. Episodes were taped all day Saturday before the storm, though audiences dwindled as the day wore on and official calls for evacuation grew more urgent.

The show's set, including the big wheel and bigger letter-board, was then struck and loaded onto trucks for return to Los Angeles.

Pat Sajak and Vanna White fled by air that night, but about 100 Los Angeles-based "Wheel" staffers stayed overnight to find that their Sunday flights had been canceled, so they bused it to Texas, then flew home.

The two weeks of New Orleans-themed episodes shot during the two days the show was here are scheduled to air starting Nov. 7.

Details aren't confirmed, but a show spokeswoman said that the episodes may not air as shot, but instead with inserted segments about Katrina's impact.

The tapings will show White visiting many local landmarks — perhaps some of the last footage ever captured of some of them.

MIXED SIGNALS

TV stations in various stages of recovery after Katrina

WWL–CHANNEL 4
Based from multiple locations early on, the WWL-TV news staff finally settled in Baton Rouge's PBS affiliate WLPB-TV. Before the approach of Hurricane Rita, the station had been planning a move back to its Rampart Street headquarters, putting a giant generator into place to power the building. "We want to be where the story is," said Bud Brown, general manager. The station has returned some CBS network programming to its airwaves, but expanded news coverage continues.

WDSU–CHANNEL 6
Working out of stations also owned by corporate parent Hearst-Argyle Broadcasting, WDSU's vigorous coverage has been carried in New Orleans by WPXL-Channel 49. A Baton Rouge signal was recently added on station WBTR-Channel 41. A bureau of reporters has been working out of WDSU's Central Business District home, which last week got Entergy power. This week, the station was beginning to pull its staffers out of its Jackson satellite office, but, pending Rita's path, planned to continue splitting its coverage between Orlando and New Orleans. Also this week, WDSU's WPXL signal began carrying some NBC prime-time programming.

WGNO–CHANNEL 26
WGNO's main transmitter was disabled by Katrina, but a reduced-power Channel 26 signal has been emanating from the station's old transmitter atop the World Trade Center at the foot of Canal Street. Earlier this week, plans were in the works for a full-power temporary transmitter. WGNO has recently been broadcasting a combination of its own news coverage, WBRZ newscasts and some ABC network programming, including the "Monday Night Football" game between the New Orleans Saints and the New York Giants. A transmitter failure just minutes before kickoff prompted Larry Delia, WGNO's general manager, to call WWL, which quickly switched to the game. WGNO's signal was eventually restored, and the game was simulcast in New Orleans. "I decided it was more important for viewers to see the game any way they could," Delia said.

WVUE–CHANNEL 8
Katrina crippled the local Fox affiliate. Footage shot by staffer Jeff Kent on the Tuesday after landfall showed the station's studios and offices on Jefferson Davis Parkway inundated by several feet of floodwater. "We're sending an environmental cleanup crew in before any of us go in," general manager Jeff West said. "It was under 5 to 6 feet of water." The station's transmitter, once thought ruined, is repairable and could be operating in a few weeks, West said. Meanwhile, the low-power WVUE signal which started operating Sept. 12, has been full power since Sept. 19. A looped 15-minute newscast, updated every two hours, aired via internet webcast starting Sept. 9, and over the air starting Sept. 12. Key news staffers, who evacuated to several different cities, have assembled at Mobile, Ala., station WALA-TV, from where WVUE will operate until temporary quarters can be arranged closer to home.

Not returning: Morning meteorologist Crystal Wicker, who took a weekend weathercasting job with Indianapolis ABC affiliate WRTV-TV shortly after Katrina hit town, West said. WVUE began broadcasting its full regular schedule — including live newscasts, Fox prime time and the relocated "Jeopardy!" and Wheel of Fortune" — airing Monday-Saturday at 6 and 6:30, respectively, on Sept. 19.

and assistance. At Audubon Park, where he'd earlier loaned his golf clubs to guardsmen so they could break up their day by playing a few holes, he posed for photos with new fans, thanking them again for helping tote his baby grand piano to an earlier show.

At De La Salle High School, soldiers servicing Humvees paused to compliment him on the show they'd seen the night before. "You're a very funny man," a passing camouflaged soldier called out.

As he drove from place to place through the fractured trees and limp power lines, he rehearsed jokes, some of which were far too Big Easy-oriented to be understood by his audiences from Oklahoma, Texas and Puerto Rico.

"Did you hear Chris Owens stayed during the hurricane? Yeah, she got caught looting. She was stealing a new coat ... from Sherwin Williams."

"You know water was a problem after the hurricane, so a lot of us started bathing in bourbon. One guy tried tequila, but he woke up and his worm showed no signs of life."

"You know President Bush is popular down here. We can relate to him. We both find ourselves in disasters we weren't really prepared for."

"They call it the eye of the hurricane, but they should call it the ass. I mean, it sits over you for a while, blows out the levees and leaves a bad smell."

Melancon admits not all of his jokes are funny, but, "You need the bad ones too."

Melancon didn't flee the city as Katrina bore down. Instead, he sat tight in the Uptown condominiums he manages, which the storm left battered and leaking, but unflooded. Even though chaos reigned in the streets in those early days, Melancon felt relatively secure.

"I wasn't scared the first week," he said. "I didn't go out at night. A cop friend of mine offered me a gun. I said, 'No, man, I'd shoot the wrong guy, like my foot or something.' "

He learned to enjoy MREs, the now-familiar packaged military meals. A long time vegetarian, Melancon found the veggie-burger meal especially agreeable.

He took occasional tours of the city. "My favorite scene was driving by the Rite-Aid on Carrollton. I was looking for a camera. So I looked in the front door and saw three girls inside wearing bikinis and nice shoes. So I said, 'You got any cameras in there? They said, 'No, we're out of cameras, you want some cigarettes?' I said, 'No thanks.' "

His evenings were spent sharing wine and conversation on his neighbor Marie's balcony. During daylight hours, he fed a friend's dog, repaired the condos as best he could and visited his business, The Neutral Ground Coffee House, an Uptown bohemian touchstone flooded with 3 inches of water.

Most importantly to him, by the time the National Guard restored order to the city, he'd spent much of the time interpreting the disaster irreverently in song.

"I wrote a whole album," he said, "a whole show. So I said to myself, 'Why am I sitting on this? I'll do shows for the soldiers.' "

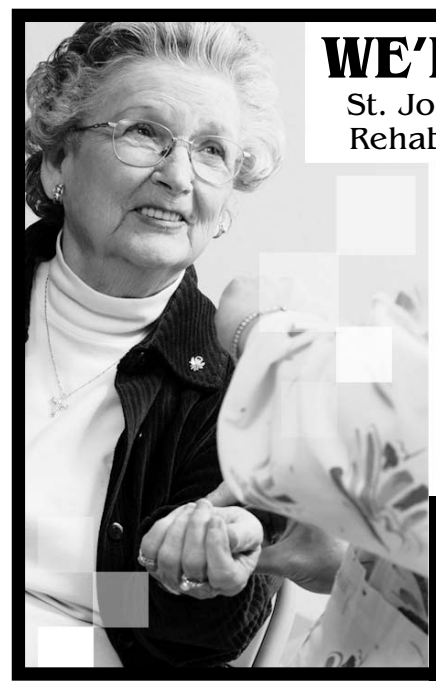
Melancon had assembled a pick-up band to flesh out the show: Darrell Mayeur on banjo, Kenny Gaines on piano and James Naylor on drums. In the hour before the Napoleon Street wharf show, they set up the lights, amplifiers and instruments, as the National Guardsmen watched from a distance and Melancon visited with welcoming officers.

At 8 p.m., the show began, Melancon trying out a few of his new hurricane compositions on a crowd that knew the results of the storm well.

"Lootin' in the morning, lootin' in the evening, looting in the summertime," he sang to twitters of muffled giggling among the co-ed troops.

His re-write of the show tune Oklahoma elicited less guarded guffaws. "Oh, the aromas that linger after hurricanes ..."

Melancon sprinkled jokes between songs, predictably producing more groans than laughs. He turned the stage over to the band that ran through some bluegrass pieces, including "The Ballad of Jed Clampett" and a pickin-and-grinnin' pastiche of the rock group Queen's "Fat Bottom Girls," which set combat boots tapping.



"I think I'm going to cry," said one young Oklahoman, when the band launched into "Foggy Mountain Breakdown."

Melancon returned to the cement stage to finish up with respectful readings of "Just a Gigolo," "Louisiana 1927" and an encore of "New York, New York."

"If you come back to New Orleans in the next couple of years," Melancon called at the end of the show, "come over to the Pontchartrain Hotel and I'll get you drunk."

LSU officials busy with change

Monday game vs. Vols to tax resources, routine

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — This season, LSU has played more moving games than football games.

They've moved one game back on the schedule, moved another out of town, and this week the school administration gets to try moving one back two days.

It's easier said than done.

Moving the game between No. 3-ranked LSU and No. 10 Tennessee to Monday night will have officials scrambling through the weekend to get ticket-takers, security, emergency personnel and other workers in place, along with trying to solve traffic and parking problems. That's not to mention anything else that might pop up.

"This is the first Monday night game in the modern era of LSU football, so it is hard to know what to expect from a weekday game," LSU athletic director Skip Bertman said. "Some of our normal procedures will change for this game because we have to be mindful of the local community. So I am hopeful our fans will be tolerant of these special circumstances."

"We feel like we have the running of a football game down pretty good, but this one has a lot of unknowns," associate athletic director Herb Vincent said. "We're going in blind, not knowing exactly what challenges a weekday game presents us. We think we know, but there's got to be something we're not thinking of."

Classes will not be in session at LSU on Monday, with the possibility of post-hurricane cleanup and the possible use of the campus as an evacuation center again. Then there is traffic and parking. Baton Rouge residents will be working Monday, and with the added traffic from the Hurricane Katrina and Rita evacuees, there will be many more cars on the road just before the 6:30 p.m. kickoff.

School officials are asking fans not to arrive until mid-afternoon or later. Usually roads coming into the campus are made into one-way streets up to kickoff, but Vincent said the school will not do that Monday. After the game, Dalrymple Drive, Highland Road and St. Phillip Street will be available for one-way traffic.

Rita also threatens to dump a significant amount of rain on the city, which could force LSU to close many of the grass parking lots. But the school has canceled classes Monday, which Vincent said should "streamline a lot of things for us."

"We have to make sure all the student vehicles are moved out of the football parking areas, and that should help," he said.

A typical Saturday night also requires about

SMU coach Phil Bennett will be coaching against a Tulane team that has seen its share of misery this season. The Green Wave has relocated to Ruston because of the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, and faced more travel headaches this week because of the advance of Hurricane Rita.

DALLAS — Tulane saw its Sept. 4 season opener postponed by Hurricane Katrina. Now the Green Wave is trying to stay focused for Saturday's game with Southern Methodist as Hurricane Rita bears down on the Texas/Louisiana border, about 300 miles from Dallas.

Katrina forced Tulane to postpone a game and find a new home. So far, Rita only has caused a time change. On Wednesday, SMU officials moved kickoff from 7 p.m. to 1 p.m. to avoid the brunt of inclement weather the hurricane is expected to bring the Dallas area.

The Green Wave left Ruston for Dallas at 9 a.m. Friday, and Athletic Director Rick Dickson said he's confident the team will be in good shape.

"This group has been through a lot, and I think, for the most part, we've pretty much insulated the kids from all that's going on and avoided unnecessarily alarming them," Dickson said.

He said because Hurricane Rita's path is expected to take it closer to Shreveport, he believes the game will go on without a hitch. It's what comes Tulane was right there at the end. That's the amazing thing.

Against a team (Mississippi State) that had played two games and was pretty well oiled, and in spite of displaying enough rust and kinks to have warranted a need for WD-40 more than for Gatorade, Tulane was right there at the end, a snafu or two away from upsetting the Bulldogs, which considering the circumstances, what would have been the most impressive victory in school history.

"There's more pride (than disappointment)," Coach Chris Scelfo said, the 21-14 loss last Saturday still fresh in his memory. "I was very disappointed that we lost the game, but I was so proud of our coaches and players. The character of this football team is so evident."

So evident that, entering today's game against SMU, you have to believe that the Green Wave (0-1) is ready to post a win against the Mustangs, who haven't had much to talk about since the days of Eric Dickerson and Craig James, days that contributed to the program receiving the death penalty because of an avalanche of NCAA violations.

For Tulane, the worst of the preparation period is over. Barring injury to a significant player or two, games won't get much more difficult than the season opener, because there won't be another time this season that the Wave will be similarly disadvantaged as far as game action, having not a single down of it while playing an opponent that had two games' worth.

"We have no complaints," Scelfo said, repeating the words that have become Tulane's mantra this season. "We're not going to use that as an excuse. We're glad to be playing, glad to be carrying the face and the

Tagliabue offers mayor his thanks

Earlier remarks by commissioner upset Hardberger

By Mike Triplett

SAN ANTONIO — San Antonio mayor Phil Hardberger received what he considered a "peace offering" from NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue on Thursday.

Tagliabue sent the mayor a fax, thanking Hardberger and the San Antonio community for "your unstinting and generous efforts in hosting the New Orleans Saints and affording the team a place to practice and play the three games now scheduled for the Alamodome."

Earlier in the week, Hardberger and other city officials took umbrage at comments made by Tagliabue in an interview with The Times-Picayune. Tagliabue referred to San Antonio as a "small market" and suggested the NFL would not be interested in relocating a franchise to the Alamo City.

"It was well received," Hardberger said of Tagliabue's fax. "I was glad to get the letter, and I intend to respond to it in kind. And hopefully he will come down and see what we have going for us down here."

Hardberger said earlier this week that, "The feeling the commissioner voiced, with due respect, is that of people who live a long way away and are not on the ground seeing what is

SAN ANTONIO — The early season struggles of the Minnesota Vikings can be attributed to a lot more than just the loss of Randy Moss.

But make no mistake, the often-controversial, yet game-breaking receiver has been missed.

For the first time in eight years, the high-powered Vikings offense is without one of the league's most dynamic threats. And quarterback Daunte Culpepper, among others, has struggled to adjust, throwing eight interceptions without a touchdown pass this season.

The Vikings are 0-2 as they prepare to host the Saints (1-1) on Sunday.

Moss was traded to Oakland in the offseason, partly to improve team chemistry, but Coach Mike Tice said his departure has "absolutely" changed the dynamic of Minnesota's offense.

Jockey Albarado insists he did nothing wrong

Indictment says he was allowed to carry too much weight

By Bob Fortus
Staff writer

Louisiana jockey Robby Albarado, one of five riders named in an indictment charging two former New York Racing Association officials with conspiring to allow jockeys to carry too much weight in races, said he did nothing wrong.

"I don't know nothing about it," Albarado, who has won six Fair Grounds riding titles, said Friday. "They throw my name in there, and I don't know why. They throw my name in there that I was overweight on certain days, and I don't know why."

The indictment, issued Wednesday by a grand jury in Saratoga County, N.Y., charges former NYRA clerk of scales Mario Sclafani and former assistant clerk of scales Braulio Baeza with 291 criminal counts in an alleged conspiracy. Felonies allegedly committed by Sclafani and Baeza include grand larceny and falsifying business records. The two men also are accused of defrauding horse owners, defrauding bettors and tampering with sports contests.

The indictment refers to the jockeys ñ Albarado, Jose Santos, Cornelio Velasquez, Herberto Castillo Jr. and Ariel Smith ñ as "co-conspirator jockeys." They weren't charged with any crimes.

"How are you a co-conspirator if you're not charged?" said Lenny Pike, Albarado's agent. "I've represented Robby Albarado for the last 10 years. For the last five years, his weight has been between 114 and 116 (pounds). Ö He's got nothing to hide. He's never been over 116."

The races in question took place between June 23, 2004, and Dec. 15, 2004, at New York tracks.

Albarado said investigators told him that they had evidence that he rode overweight at Aqueduct. "I've never even been to Aqueduct," he said.

The indictment alleges that Albarado rode overweight in several races at Saratoga.

In January, NYRA suspended Sclafani and Baeza, who was a Hall of Fame jockey. NYRA fired them Wednesday.

The New York State Racing and Wagering Board is investigating the matter. Neither NYRA nor the board has taken any action against the jockeys.

Woods breaks through for win

His first better-ball victory keeps Americans in hunt

From wire reports

GAINESVILLE, VA. — Tiger Woods finally found the secret to winning a better-ball match in the Presidents Cup.

Despite a sore back that had to be iced between shots, Woods carried along Jim Furyk and his sore ribs by making seven birdies on his first 12 holes for his first victory in this format. But when the second session of matches ended Friday, all that did was help the American team stay close.

Adam Scott and Retief Goosen again proved to be an International juggernaut, defeating David Toms and Fred Couples, and Vijay Singh came through with a clutch shot on the 17th hole that allowed him and Tim Clark to earn a halve and take a 6 1/2-5 1/2 lead into the weekend.

The six matches on a stormy afternoon ended 3-3, making Saturday a pivotal round. There will be five alternate-shot matches in the morning and five better-ball matches in the afternoon.

And if it is anything like the second round, it could come down to the final holes.

U.S. Open champion Michael Campbell of New Zealand was poised to deliver a dramatic victory until his approach struck the flag and rolled back into the rough. Then, he used the blade of his sand wedge to roll the ball toward the cup, and it spun all the way around the hole and popped out.

He and Angel Cabrera had to settle for a halve against Phil Mickelson and Chris DiMarco.

Singh hit a wedge that stopped three feet away for birdie on the 17th to square the match against Fred Funk and Stewart Cink, and the Fijian had a chance to win the match. But his 15-footer for birdie on the 18th never had a chance.

Scott Verplank and Justin Leonard also won their second match, combining for five birdies in a six-hole stretch and closing out Trevor Immelman and Mike Weir when Verplank's approach to the 17th stopped three feet away.

In the other match, Peter Lonard and Nick O'Hern of Australia rolled to a 3-and-2 victory over Davis Love III and Kenny Perry, leaving the American duo winless the first two days.

Woods was 0-6 in better ball during his three previous trips to the Presidents Cup, and he was paired with Furyk, who wasn't sure he would be able to play.

But it was Woods who was in the most pain, suffering what appeared to be back spasms on the sixth hole. A therapist pressed a cup of ice on his upper back between shots - one of those a 6-iron that nearly went into the cup for an ace on the peninsula-green seventh hole.

happening here."

The mayor said Friday that his defense of San Antonio was not part of an active pursuit of the Saints or any other NFL franchise. Instead, it was part of a larger sense of civic pride in a town that he feels is undervalued.

"For a long time, people thought of us as kind of a sleepy village," Hardberger said. "But for the last 10 years, this city has been growing and doing so well. I think people might not know that if they haven't seen it for themselves."

Tagliabue also thanked Hardberger for the city's "extraordinary outreach and generosity" in helping thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees. And the commissioner concluded by saying: "We will continue to work with the Saints, your administration and the Alamodome authorities to seek to ensure that the three games to be played in the Dome are successful in all respects. If I can be of assistance on any aspect of this, please do not hesitate to be directly in touch with me."

A COWBOYS TOWN: San Antonio's fan base and business community has shown strong support for hosting the Saints this year. But the majority of folks in San Antonio are still die-hard followers of the Dallas Cowboys.

As a result, the local Fox affiliate will show the Cowboys' game at San Francisco on Sunday instead of the Saints-Vikings game. That decision is made by the NFL office, but KABB general manager John Seabers told the San Antonio Express-News, "Our preference is we carry Cowboys games. The ratings are substantially higher."

The city did add a nice welcoming touch this week, painting "Saints" in large letters, along with the team's logo, outside of several windows surrounding the Alamodome. The Saints' first game in San Antonio is Oct. 2 against the Buffalo Bills.

INJURY REPORT: Guard Jermane Mayberry did not practice Friday after spraining his right shoulder at the end of Thursday's practice. Saints coach Jim Haslett said he did not know if Mayberry will be able to play Sunday against the Vikings.

Mayberry's backup, Montrae Holland, also missed practice. But Haslett said he was just being given a day of rest for a lingering knee problem. Holland is expected to be ready to play Sunday. Receiver Az-Zahir Hakim (hamstring) and cornerback Fakhir Brown (knee) did not practice all week. They are both listed as questionable but are more likely doubtful.

them on tape. Normally, that wasn't the case. We'd have to wait a quarter and a half to figure out how we'd play this particular week. It all started with how you play Randy Moss.

"But we have plenty of playmakers. We have to stop the turnovers and make sure that we can get some consistency about ourselves on the offensive side of the ball."

After two weeks, Moss leads the NFL in receiving yards with 257 and has caught two touchdown passes. The Vikings, meanwhile, have been woeful in a 37-8 loss at Cincinnati last week and a 24-13 loss to Tampa Bay in Week 1.

Culpepper threw five interceptions against the Bengals. He threw three against the Buccaneers, and also lost two fumbles in that game.

The three-time Pro Bowl quarterback will no doubt turn things around - perhaps Sunday. After all, Culpepper threw for a whopping five touchdowns and 425 yards last year in a 38-31 victory over the Saints at the Superdome.

But this has been a tumultuous year for Culpepper and the Vikings. Before Moss was traded, former offensive coordinator Scott Linehan left to take a job with the Miami Dolphins.

Then in the summer, Onterrio Smith, one of the team's top tailbacks, was suspended for the season for violating the league's substance-abuse policy. And Pro Bowl center Matt Birk elected to have season-ending surgery on his hip.

The Vikings also changed ownership in the offseason when Red McCombs sold the team to a group headed by New Jersey real estate developer Zygi Wolf.

"Nobody can really put their finger on one thing," Culpepper said. "It's a combination of a lot of different things. I look at myself and watch the film and say, ëYou know, I probably shouldn't have made that throw. I should have run it.'

"That's the thing I'm focusing on. I'm ready to get out there and get in the flow of things." Culpepper added, "It is tough. It's hard. I have been down before, and I am going to get up."

Tice and teammates have complimented Culpepper for still leading the team and not getting too down on himself or his teammates.

"He's not a Pro Bowler for nothing," said tailback Mewelde Moore, a former Tulane standout. "He's always encouraging everyone. He's still the leader and does what a leader is supposed to do in good times and bad times. And unfortunately, this is one of our down times, and he's definitely sticking up for everyone.

"He's definitely sticking up for himself, and that's all you can ask for."

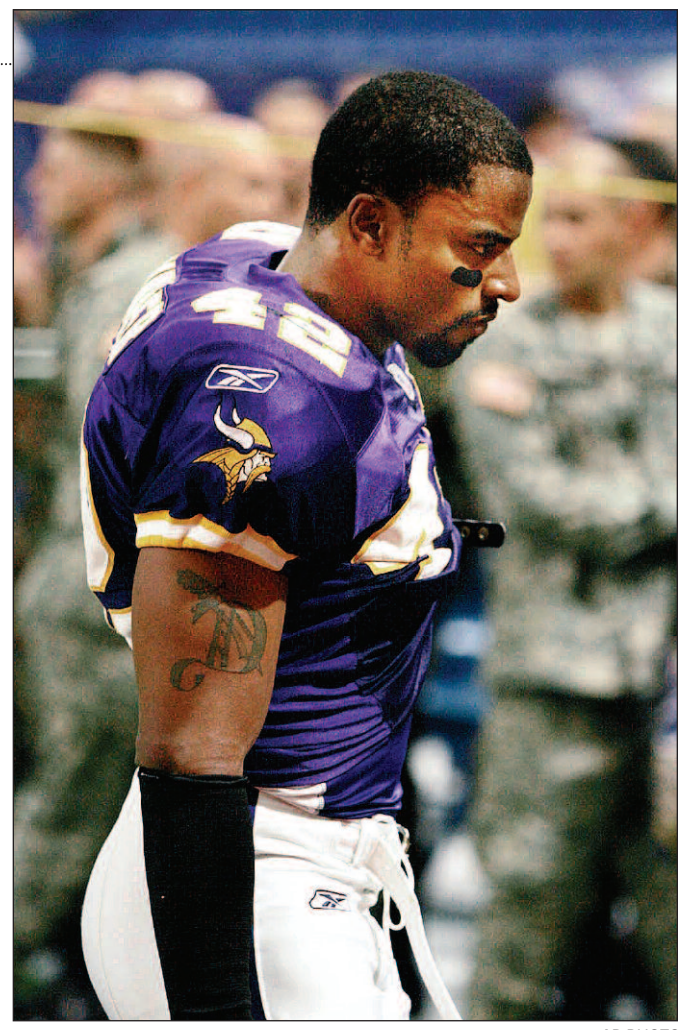
Culpepper is not alone in his struggles. The running game has been grounded, with a total of 110 yards in two weeks.

Starting tailback Michael Bennett has gained 35 yards on nine carries and fumbled twice against the Bengals. Tice turned to Moore in the second half last week, and veteran Moe Williams also is in the mix.

Nate Burleson was expected to be the team's top receiver with Moss gone. He has six catches for 93 yards and is listed as doubtful for Sunday's game because of a knee injury.

The defense, with six new starters, also has underachieved - though it's tough to play shut-down defense when the offense turns the ball over 12 times in two weeks. The Vikings' defense ranks 30th overall and last against the run.

"First off, we've got to stop the turnovers," Tice said, running through the laundry list of things that need fixing, touching upon the running game, the defensive chemistry, the team's "swagger," and communication both on the field and from the field to the sideline.



"We've got our work cut out for us," Tice said. "Our punter's punting well. That's good news. But we've got our work cut out for us."

Still, Saints coach Jim Haslett knows better than to take lightly a team that reached the second round of the playoffs last year.

All of the Saints likely remember that Oct. 17 game last season, in which Minnesota's offense gained 605 yards ñ the most yards surrendered in Saints history.

"They're a dangerous football team. We know that," Haslett said. "They got a lot of yards on us last year. They've got a lot of players. We know that they have great personnel and that they can put a lot of points on the board with their offense.

"Hopefully we won't get caught off guard based off the last two games, because we know they're a better team than that."

Mahelona catches eyes of Tigers offense

Standout DT is 'going to be a load'

By Jim Kleinpeter
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — You don't have to wait for the game to sample Tennessee defensive tackle Jesse Mahelona's intensity.

Just pick up the Vols media guide and glance at the cover.

You'll see the last thing opposing quarterbacks see before Mahelona sacks them: a closeup of Mahelona's piercing brown eyes.

In a little more than a year, Maheloha has gone from an out-of-place Samoan in Dixie to the heart and soul of the Vols' defense, not to mention cover boy.

Mahelona, a 6-foot-2, 297-pound All-SEC tackle and co-captain, will be the focus of LSU's offensive game plan against Saturday.

His numbers are as scary as his looks. Last year, he had a league high 18Ω tackles for losses, among them five sacks, despite being double-teamed during the latter part of the season. Last week, he led the charge against Florida, getting one of the Vols' five sacks and generally making it a miserable day for Gators quarterback Chris Leak, although Florida won 16-7.

LSU offensive coordinator Jimbo Fisher wants Maheloha accounted for on every play.

"He's going to be a load for us," Fisher said. "You can look at the film from last year. He was all over the field. When he didn't make tackles, he made the other guys make tackles because people had to double-team him, or he was forcing people to run in big loops because he was penetrating. He's a heck of a football player."

Tennessee defensive coordinator John Chavis said Mahelona was the best defensive tackle in the country last season, in which The Sporting News tabbed him as an All-American.

He almost didn't come to Tennessee. And, after he got there, he almost didn't stay.

Mahelona is a native of Kailua-Kona, where, in addition to football, he played basketball and soccer and was a member of the outrigger canoe team. He played two years at Orange Coast Junior College in Costa Mesa, Calif., and was set to sign with Oklahoma before he accepted an official visit to Tennessee ñ admittedly just to visit his brother, Steve, who was a running back at nearby Tusculum College.

"When I came here, I fell in love with it," Mahelona said. "I can't explain it. I just knew this was the place for me.

"I came here and saw the impact, the quickness of the game and never thought I could adjust as quickly and successfully as I have. The coaches let me do what I had to do and get comfortable. I look back on my choices and decisions. If I had not come here, I would not have been as happy as I am."

Happiness didn't come overnight. Mahelona was raw and struggled to learn the technical aspects of his position. Fortunately for the Vols, he made his transition during the spring of 2004.

"It took me that whole spring, and at times it was very frustrating," said Mahelona. "(Defensive line) Coach (Dan) Brooks was very patient with me. During two-a-days, I remember one practice in particular where ... I couldn't pick up a play. Coach (Dan) Brooks got on me, and I started to walk off the field, and Coach (Phillip) Fulmer grabbed me and talked to me and eased me. Ever since then, I took it upon myself to not miss an assignment, to know every play."

After getting the technique down, Mahelona was turned loose, and he progressed swiftly, an uncommon trait for junior college players, who often struggle in their first major-college season.

"He progressed very fast as a player, learning the system and the techniques," said Fulmer. "He's got a great motor, great intensity, a kid we feel is one of the leaders on our defensive team. In a short time, he's found a way to be one of those special guys in the conference."

It wasn't just the football that was hard. Being far from home and his Polynesian culture was difficult for Mahelona. At Orange Coast JC, he lived in a house with 10 Polynesians, next door to a house with 10 more. But that was a long way from Knoxville. Luckily, Tennessee has another Samoan on the roster, offensive tackle Albert Toeaina.

"We counted on each other to get through the adversity," Mahelona said.

Last March, Mahelona ran into some off-field adversity when his apartment burned down, and he reacted in anger by tearing a handrail off the fire truck fighting the fire. He paid for the damage and apologized to the fire department to avoid criminal charges.

Then, a local furniture store let Mahelona and his roommate use furniture for a month until they could get the items lost in the fire replaced. It turned out to be a violation of NCAA rules, and the two players had to reimburse the store $95.84 each to maintain eligibility.

Mahelona has brought some of his culture to the east. And his friends have some Volunteer mojo working to the west. Mahelona said friends back home have taken to flying orange and white Tennessee flags on game day, and they watch him play on a nine-foot television a friend bought a few weeks ago.

Certainly, they will be watching Saturday when the Vols play at LSU with their backs against the wall. One loss doesn't end a season, but two put a team out of the national championship picture. Mahelona is counting on coming back strong.

"I think that will judge the character of our team, how we bounce back," he said. "So far, I've been very happy with our last two practices. Everybody is flying around. Nobody is pointing fingers, and everybody is supporting each other. That's mainly because of the maturity of our team."

Miles rolls with storms' punches

LSU coach enduring season like no other

LSU coach Les Miles finally will make his Tiger Stadium debut Monday night as his third-ranked Tigers take on No. 10 Tennessee.

BATON ROUGE — It' s Saturday night in Death Valley and here comes' Öanother quiet evening at the Miles' household, secluded from the fabled lights often left on to burn aimlessly through the darkness as if to tease the new guy from high above.

Wait, fans said in New Orleans, Lake Charles, Shreveport, Lafayette, Covington, Texas and Mississippi, until you run past the goal posts beneath a gigantic blinding flash and a collective yell escorts the Tigers toward the sideline. It' s heaven with a hellish nickname, Miles was told repeatedly.

So he waited, excitedly, saying all the right things, never downplaying the significance of leading those 85 or so white jerseys out of that cramped tunnel. Looking forward to it, Miles always said. And as September slowly fades, he still does envision it, helplessly.

With twice as many hurricanes than wins on his abbreviated LSU resume, Miles again directed his anxious Tigers through what seems like suspended preparation Friday for a Tiger Stadium debut nearly nine months in the making, three weeks behind schedule. After this unscheduled shortened workout, LSU will practice Saturday and have a walk-through Sunday, and will be lodging in the on-campus Lod Cook Alumni Center on Sunday night.

Tennessee, which was supposed to fly to Baton Rouge on Saturday, still intends to arrive on game day since the local hotel situation hasn't improved drastically.

"It's interesting," Miles said. "Those teams that have to handle adversity and have to handle bumps in the road, they learn, hopefully, some great lessons not only in football but the rest of your life."

Preferring to keep kickoff on Saturday or Sunday, LSU officials were overruled Thursday evening by SEC commissioner Mike Slive, who decided to move the game to Monday for the welfare of those involved. According to The Associated Press, Tennessee athletic director Mike Hamilton was prepared to forfeit the victory to LSU to insure the well being of the Volunteers' players and staff scheduled to arrive approximately when Hurricane Rita was predicted to make landfall.

"(A forfeit) is a little better than kissing your sister," Miles said. "I think it would've been a real shallow victory. We certainly wouldn't have taken any credit for it."

"Naturally our strong preference would have been to play during the weekend," LSU athletic director Skip Bertman said, "but safety for student-athletes, fans and everyone else involved in a football game was the overriding factor for the commissioner."

The unforeseeable herky-jerky beginning of the Miles tenure has only escalated the pressure placed on Bertman's hire to replace Nick Saban. This skeptical fandom has picked at LSU' s lone game - a thrilling 35-31 escape from No. 15 Arizona State — more than a Thanksgiving carcass.

For two weeks and two more days, Miles has calmly addressed worn issues such as the Tigers' defensive woes, receivers dropping the ball, even his sideline fashion preferences. Funny, no one seems to call in and compliment the running game or JaMarcus Russell's arrival as a legitimate starter but they' ll gladly hold to bust on Miles' headset or morph Bo Pelini' s name with Lou Tepper's - Tepperlini or Pelpper.

Throughout the criticism and dire circumstances, Miles has been the cowboy in the browning white hat with plenty of real estate between the top of his head and the dome of his cap. Unexpectedly piled on top of the burden to replace a here-today-gone tomorrow legend in' Saban, Miles had to help players maintain focus while they uncomfortably housed relatives and passed armed guards as they drove away from practice - responsibilities surely not mentioned in his contract.

"The schedule throws you some curves now and then," Miles said. "Life does as well. It's not a big deal. People respond. This is a real mature team. I think they are handling it real well looking forward to monday night football."

Certainly, no coach in LSU history has dealt with a September comparable to this, and some serious library research is needed to find a first-year coach forced to scale this many hurdles so soon.

Just check out the list of obstacles circa August:

▶ Top offensive threat, Alley Broussard, suffered a season-ending knee injury
▶ Amp Hill transferred weeks before Dwayne Bowe and Craig Davis get hurt.
▶ Original home opener was pushed to October.
▶ Relocated "home" opener took place in a stadium built into the side of a mountain against a top 15 team' coming off a cupcake warmup.
▶ His makeshift home opener will compete for Neilson Ratings with the Chiefs-Broncos on Monday Night.
▶ Tiger Stadium might not be completely full considering the weekday kickoff.
▶ The midseason bye week is now filled with a game.
▶ LSU has a short week before its first conference road game.

And somehow, the guy still smiles on occasion. Earlier in the week, he even half-seriously, half-jokingly suggested the government dump dry ice into the Gulf of Mexico to quell the power source of these hurricanes.

"The decision of how you respond to things is personal choice, period," Miles said. "I've never found a way to respond negatively that made it better. If it made it better, I would. No, I can tell you, the time benefits us in certain regards — two more days to prepare certain aspects of our football (team) will be welcomed."

"The rest will be determined by what happens (Friday night) and (Saturday) with Hurricane Rita. This is our first game in new Baton Rouge with the new population. It doesn't necessarily affect traffic right here on campus, but it affects traffic everywhere else as you try to come to campus."

450 uniformed police from various agencies to provide security and traffic control. Vincent said there won't be as many available, and some could be called away for duties related to Hurricane Rita.

"We will have officers and intersections directing traffic," he said.

Vincent said there might be a shortage of game marshals and ticket-takers, jobs performed part time by people with full-time jobs. Many will not be able to get away from their full-time jobs, so the school plans to use student-athletes in those roles.

"The rest will be determined by what happens (Friday night) and (Saturday) with Hurricane Rita," Vincent said. "This is our first game in new Baton Rouge with the new population. It doesn't necessarily affect traffic right here on campus, but it affects traffic everywhere else as you try to come to campus."

The LSU ticket office will be closed today but will reopen from noon until 6 p.m. Sunday, and Monday from 8 a.m. until halftime of the game. Motor homes are asked to depart campus by 7 a.m. Tuesday morning, as classes will be back in session.

Site of Sugar Bowl emotional debate

By Ted Lewis
Staff writer

Chuck Zatarain is as Sugar Bowl as you can get.

His grandfather, Charles Zatarain Sr., was among the bowl's founding fathers, serving as its president in 1950-51.

His father, Charles Zatarain Jr., had a long-time involvement as well.

Chuck Zatarain was president from 1994-95 and rotated off the executive committee this year after a 17-year stint.

So it's enlightening to hear his thoughts on the idea of playing this year's game in Atlanta as opposed to staging it at LSU with most of the fans staying in New Orleans.

"I want to play the game in Louisiana,"he said. "But I just don't see where you are going to put all of the people.

"Atlanta is our best alternative. If we don't play the game at all, somebody else will take our spot in the BCS and nobody in New Orleans wants that to happen."

The debate regarding where to play the game is an emotional one, especially for those with ties to the game like Zatarain. The Sugar Bowl is a New Orleans event dating to 1935, and many think playing the game in Baton Rouge this season would be a powerful symbol of the area's determination to recovery.

It's also important to those who want to see New Orleans return to some semblance of normalcy as soon as possible primarily for financial reasons.

Among those is Steve Perry, president of the Greater New Orleans Convention and Visitors Bureau.

On Wednesday, he stood side-by-side with other state tourism officials encouraging people who have made New Orleans one of their favorite destinations to make plans to return as soon as possible.

But Perry recognizes that a typical influx of Sugar Bowl fans filling more than 30,000 of the city's 38,000 hotel rooms is not the same as small groups of tourists.

"We've got to make sure we can provide the experience that is appropriate and consistent with the history of the Sugar Bowl,"he said. "When New Orleans reopens for events like this, it's got to be the right time to be there. If it is possible this year, we'll do it. If not, we'll have to loan the game for one year to another city."

Playing the game in Baton Rouge is not a problem. Getting fans in and out of New Orleans plus to Baton Rouge for the game would be difficult.

The big obstacle is hotel rooms.

The Sugar Bowl may be thought of as a local event, but unless LSU is in the game 90 percent of those in attendance are from out of the area.

Most wind up in the large downtown hotels within walking distance or a short cab ride of the French Quarter, the Superdome and the other sites for bowl-related activities.

It's a big part of what has given New Orleans a major edge as a host not only for the Sugar Bowl, but Super Bowls, Final Fours and the Bayou Classic.

Perry is among those determining how many rooms might be available in New Orleans for the Jan. 2 game. He has about 10 days to do so.

But he may already know the answer. Mayor Ray Nagin in a Friday morning TV appearance said that the hotel operators in the city are going to be happy - because their rooms are going to be filled for months with recovery workers.

Displacing them for football fans would be inappropriate.

That's why when the Sugar Bowl's Board of Directors convenes by teleconference in a few days, they will vote to play the game in the Georgia Dome.

Due diligence will be made in trying to make things work for Baton Rouge. But they just don't.

"These are extraordinary times, and we all have to make sacrifices,"Zatarain said. "In the big scheme of things, the Sugar Bowl is small potatoes. Most people are just trying to survive and get their lives back together."

This is not the first time bowl games have had to be shifted because of an unexpected event.

In 1941, a week after the Japanese bombed Pearl Harbor, the Army declared that there could be no large crowd gatherings on the West Coast.

The Rose Bowl was moved to Durham, N.C., where Duke, already invited to the game, hosted Washington State.

The East-West Shrine game was moved to Tulane Stadium two days after the Sugar Bowl.

Both events returned to their home bases the following year.

And that's what would happen to the Sugar Bowl, although it's probable that next year's game would have to be played at LSU. Hotels in New Orleans should not be an issue then.

"The Sugar Bowl is going to be part of the rebuilding of New Orleans,"Zatarain said. "I don't know what's going to happen with the Saints and the Hornets, but we're not going anywhere. We're all having to make adjustments this year. But if we wind up in Atlanta instead of Baton Rouge, I think everybody will understand."

It's Harris time

If any organization has less credibility than FEMA these days, it's the BCS.

So it goes to reason that the BCS honchos are crossing their fingers and toes this weekend hoping that nothing goes wrong with the first release of the Harris Interactive Poll on Sunday.

For those who might not remember (and since Katrina we're all a little fuzzy on some things), the Harris Poll is replacing The Associated Press rankings in the BCS formula.

Because of complaints that there was too much prejudice in the AP and coaches' rankings, which remain part of the formula, because they begin with a preseason poll, placing teams who don't start out at the top at a disadvantage, the first release was delayed until after the fourth week of the season.

For this Harris voter, that was a good thing. Spending the last month dealing with Katrina tends to give one an unvarnished look at things when it does come time to actually cast a ballot.

For the Harris folks, that was a good thing, too. It took them several weeks to compile the panel of 114 voters, only to find out that four were working for ESPN, which is not allowing its employees to vote.

More embarrassing, one nominated voter, Jason Rash, did not meet the criteria of being a former coach, administrator or player or current media member. He was the son-in-law of Troy coach Larry Blakeley and basically was just an interested fan.

Replacements for those five plus two other dropouts have been found and everything is good to go for Sunday.

In fact, Harris did a test run last week and while they're not reporting any glitches, voters at least have not been made aware of any of the infamous "tweaks"that was routine with the BCS.

The Harris folks are determined to keep things aboveboard. One admonition to voters is not discuss rankings or voting patterns with anyone else on the panel. Sort of like Fight Club.

No matter how it goes, the Harris Poll isn't likely to be more flawed than the AP or coaches poll.

For example, just this week Michigan State is ranked behind Notre Dame, which it beat last week while in turn the Fighting Irish are ranked behind Michigan, which it beat the week before.

But if that's the only thing that's wrong with the first Harris Poll, the BCS honchos should be grateful.

When the BCS is involved, it can only get worse — and usually does.

QUICK PICKS

Tennessee at LSU

6:30 p.m. Monday, ESPN2
At least that's when they're saying they'll play. Just two days ago Skip Bertman was saying Rita would pose no problem for the game at all. Let's hope we're a better football prognosticator than Skip is a hurricane forecaster.
Spread: LSU by 7; Pick: LSU 21-17

Tulane at SMU

1 p.m.
And what about the poor Green Wave? If they want to avoid any more hurricanes we suggest that they play their next game in Alaska.
Spread: Tulane by 3 ½; Pick: Tulane, 14-6

Southern California at Oregon

2:30 p.m., ABC
OK, we get it. The Trojans are scary good. Playing four of the next five on the road, starting at noisy Autzen Stadium is a test, but USC should be more than up for it.
Spread: USC by 21; Pick: USC, 47-24

Georgia Tech at Virginia Tech

2:30 p.m., ABC
If the "GameDay"crew couldn't be in Baton Rouge, they picked the second best game of the weekend. The Hokies haven't allowed a touchdown for the past 10 quarters and with Yellow Jackets quarterback Reggie Ball coming off a bout with viral meningitis, the streak could be extended.
Spread: Virginia Tech by 11 1/2; Pick: Virginia Tech, 17-3

Purdue at Minnesota

11 a.m., ESPN
With Michigan and Ohio State not on the schedule and Iowa apparently not as formidable as believed, this could be the Boilermakers' toughest test. And it's one they'll fail.
Spread: Minnesota by 4; Pick: Minnesota, 33-27

Arkansas at Alabama

11 a.m., ESPN
It's not giving up 70 points to USC that has Razorbacks fans after Houston Nutt's hide. They just can't get over losing to Vanderbilt.
Spread: Alabama by 15 ½; Pick: Alabama, 36-14

Notre Dame at Washington
2:30 p.m., ABC
New Fighting Irish coach Charlie Weis shows ex-Fighting Irish coach Tyrone Willingham how you succeed at the nation's most storied program.
Spread: Notre Dame by 13 1/2; Pick: Notre Dame, 27-10

Boston College at Clemson

CRESCENT CITY CONNECTION

Chris Brown, Tennessee, TE, So. (Jesuit)
Brown, the Volunteers' starting tight end, has caught four passes, two in each game, for 35 yards, going into Monday's game at LSU.

"Chris is first and foremost a football player,"said Tennessee coach Phil Fulmer. "He can play a lot of different positions and we can do a lot of things with him. He's a really good athlete who really understands football and has a knack of finding a way doing what you ask. I am sure his emotions are going to be sky high going to back to Louisiana."

COACH'S CORNER

"I apologize to all of the people who have worn those uniforms and have supported us. I thought that was a very poor performance, especially on offense and the kicking game. We stunk it up. All I can do is tell them that we'll work hard to try to get it right."

— Stanford coach Walt Harris after the Cardinal's 20-17 loss to Division I-AA Cal-Davis.

INSIDE GAME

Tulane vs. Southern Methodist

THE VITALS

Kickoff: 1 p.m. at Ford Stadium in Dallas.
Records: Tulane 0-1; SMU 1-2.
Coaches: Tulane's Chris Scelfo (31-41, seventh season); SMU's Phil Bennett (7-31, fourth season).
Radio: North shore 104.7-FM and Baton Rouge 1210-AM; not broadcast in New Orleans.

KEEP AN EYE ON

TULANE WIDE RECEIVERS: Four receivers played for the first time last week, including Preston Brown, who led the team with nine catches for 117 yards. But Tulane wasn't too successful going deep. In fact, punter Chris Beckman threw the longest reception against Mississippi State, a 27-yarder to Brown on a fake punt. It will be interesting to see which receivers emerge in the next few weeks while quarterback Lester Ricard seeks comfort with some sure-handed teammates.

SMU'S RUNNING BACK DEMYRON MARTIN: In the Mustangs' thrilling 21-10 victory against Texas Christian, Martin ran for 118 yards on 26 carries (4.5 yards per carry), and scored two touchdowns. Seven days later at Texas A&M he had eight carries for eight yards. Sure, quarterback Jerad Romo is a scrambler, but for SMU to be successful, its running back must be a threat.

GAMEPLAN: Tulane's defense, which had a stellar showing against Mississippi State, will have a vastly different challenge against SMU. The Bulldogs played a lot of two-back offensive sets, where the Mustangs will be running a one-back, option-style offense ñ with a quarterback who is a confident passer. The key will be rattling Romo early. Even though the Mustangs were shellacked 66-8 by Texas A&M last week, Romo gained confidence after the first half. Tulane's veteran linebackers will be asked to contain the elusive quarterback.
On offense, Tulane will try to take advantage of SMU's adequate run defense. Last week, Tulane running back Matt Forte' ran for 66 yards and averaged 3.3 yards, but his backup Jovon Jackson, who had a couple of good practices this week, averaged 4.8 yards on six carries for 29 yards. Both backs are expected to contribute against the Mustangs.

KEY MATCHUP

TULANE QUARTERBACK LESTER RICARD VS. SMU'S SECONDARY: In 2004, Lester Ricard had one of the better second halves of any quarterback in the country. But in the 2005 opener, he looked eerily similar to the inexperienced quarterback in Tulane's 2004 opener. Ricard will have to make better decisions against an SMU secondary, which has shown some signs of success. The Mustangs have picked off five passes, and though it allows 245.7 pass yards per game, that number was skewed by the 405 yards thrown by Texas A&M last Saturday.

BY THE NUMBERS: Tulane senior linebacker Anthony Cannon led the team with 12 tackles last weekend, the 16th time he reached double figures in his career. With seven more tackles, he will crack Tulane's all-time top 10. ÖTulane does not have one senior on its defensive line. Ö In three games, SMU made only three touchdown receptions ñ one by running back DeMyron Martin and two by Bobby Chase, its leading receiver with 10 catches.

ODDS AND ENDS: The Green Wave traveled to Dallas on Friday afternoon. Ö SMU will play its first game against a Conference USA team since joining the conference this season. Ö Tulane spent 13 days in Dallas after evacuating New Orleans because of Hurricane Katrina, and the Green Wave spent a lot of time at SMU. The Green Wave ate in the Mustangs' cafeteria, SMU coach Phil Bennett spoke to the Wave, Tulane coach Chris Scelfo spoke to the Mustangs and the Green Wave attended SMU's opener against Baylor (the NCAA waived scouting rules for Tulane during the extenuating circumstances). Also, Bennett shared recruiting lists and evaluations with Tulane.

FROM THE COACH'S MOUTH: "Anything we can do to help Tulane, we're going to do it ñ other than from (1 p.m. to 4 p.m.) on Saturday." — SMU coach Phil Bennett.

Resilient Wave faces another challenging week

TULANE, from C-5

after the game that has him worried.

"The concern is not so much Dallas, but between Dallas and Ruston on the bus ride back," Dickson said. "My whole thing is making certain all of the kids are OK and maintaining a stable situation. In the event we do run into some problems after the game, we've got some contingency plans."

Dickson said a Louisiana state trooper will accompany the team to Dallas and will be in contact with Texas law enforcement that will monitor weather and advise the team. If necessary, Dickson said the Wave will spend the night at a facility at SMU.

Many of Tulane's players have grown accustomed to dealing with hurricanes. In 2002, the Green Wave had to alter its practice week before playing host to Texas because of Tropical Storm Isidore. Last season, Tulane's home game with Louisville was postponed until the end of the season because of Hurricane Ivan.

While Dickson is dealing with the possible problems the weather will cause, Scelfo is trying to make sure his players have their minds on their assignments.

"We're excited about playing. Obviously, the weather is going to be a factor for both teams," Scelfo said. "It's the first time we're going to be in the rain plan."

After seeing its first game postponed and being idle the second week of the season, Tulane opened the season last week with a 21-14 loss to Mississippi State.

However, there were encouraging signs. Tulane's defense played well the entire game, and the offense and special teams had their moments in the second half. Tulane held Mississippi State to 225 yards, its fewest allowed since 1997.

"Our guys have had a nice week of practice and are looking forward to it," Scelfo said. "We've got to do a nice job of throwing and catching, and we've got to eliminate mistakes and play as hard as week can."

Scelfo must try to avoid Wave letdown

DESHAZIER, from C-5

torch for Tulane University."

They almost carried them across the finish line first against the Bulldogs. The danger, of course, will be if the Wave is willing to settle for being close.

Can't blame the team if it would be, and it'd certainly be logical if Tulane experiences an emotional letdown sometime soon. The team understandably was jacked up for its delayed opener, undoubtedly was hyped at the prospect of hitting and being hit by players other than teammates, undeniably rode some of that emotion to a near victory over a team that probably was bigger and faster and stronger across the board.

But the chance of that lessens or, if it happens, the rebound occurs more quickly as the team settles into a routine. And now they have, because the routine couldn't be complete for players until they actually played a game. Until then, even the seniors still were experiencing something they never dreamed of having to deal with, having been moved and shuffled and postponed until those have become words they won't want to hear anytime soon.

"We're almost as close to normal as we can be," Scelfo said. "A lot of things are not like home, but Louisiana Tech (in Ruston, which is where the Wave currently is housed) has done a tremendous job making us feel welcome. We're the lucky group."

That Tulane is, considering the world of football into which they can withdraw daily, a time when they can concern themselves with something other than hurricanes and evacuations and disrupted lives.

Coaches actively are recruiting players, even without a home facility or campus to show them.

"Recruits can see what Tulane was before the storm," Scelfo said. "They've got to have confidence that it will be rebuilt better than before, like we do."

After the opener, you don't doubt that he can help instill that confidence. After that kind of effort, against a team that had such a significant head start, you get the feeling that this will be Scelfo's best coaching job.

Maybe, it already has been.

Curtis among many area teams Rita has impacted

Storm cancels or postpones games

From staff reports

John Curtis and north shore-based District 4-5A teams probably will have to wait another week to open their football seasons.

Their games scheduled for this weekend were canceled Friday by the threat of Hurricane Rita, though Curtis could possibly play Sunday. The storm canceled or postponed all games in the metro area Friday. Curtis was to travel Friday to play Ferriday, located in east central Louisiana. But Patriots coach J.T. Curtis said he was concerned about returning home in bad weather Friday night.

"Getting there was OK," Curtis said. "Getting back was the problem. So we decided against (playing Friday). There is a very remote chance we could play Sunday, but I doubt it. I'll know sometime Saturday."

Instead of making up their games Sunday or Monday, teams in District 4-5A opted instead to cancel this weekend.

This was to be not only the season opener for the eight-team district but also the first week of league play.

Pope John Paul II moved back its season opener against Live Oak to 2 p.m. Sunday. The game was scheduled for Friday night.

Metro-area teams are scheduled to play four games Sunday and two Monday. Two other games ñ St. Charles at Pine and Holy Cross at Fisher ñ might be rescheduled for this weekend.

According to Louisiana High School Athletic Association rules, all games in a given week must be completed by Monday at midnight.

BOXING

ETIENNE INDICTED: A Baton Rouge grand jury indicted former heavyweight boxer Clifford Etienne on charges including attempted first-degree murder, armed robbery, attempted carjacking and kidnapping, stemming from an Aug. 10 incident. According to an affidavit from the Baton Rouge police, Etienne fired a shot and forced his way into a check-cashing business and took more than $1,900. He ran out of the building and was spotted by police. The affidavit said Etienne jumped in a car with two children inside, but could not get it started. He got out of the car and pointed the gun at the police chasing him and attempted to fire, but the gun malfunctioned. Etienne got into a second car and pointed the gun at the driver. When the man asked Etienne for mercy because two children were in the back seat, Etienne pointed the gun at the man and attempted to shoot him, but again the gun jammed. While Etienne tried to clear the jammed gun, the driver got out of the car, and Etienne drove off. He wrecked the car and was caught by police.

NFL

HARRISON, WAYNE EXPECTED TO PLAY: Wide receivers Marvin Harrison and Reggie Wayne are both expected to be in the starting lineup Sunday when the Indianapolis Colts host the Cleveland Browns. Harrison sat out Thursday's practice after injuring his wrist in Wednesday's workout. Wayne, an Ehret alum, dislocated a finger on his right hand Thursday but returned to practice.

AROUND THE NFL: Philadelphia Eagles running back Brian Westbrook missed practice with a knee injury, but is expected to start Philadelphia's game against Oakland on Sunday. Coach Andy Reid held the Pro Bowl running back out as a precaution, just as he did with Donovan McNabb and Terrell Owens earlier in the week. Reid said Westbrook was hit above the knee in Sunday's win against San Francisco. ìI gave him the day off just to let that thing rest up and have him ready for Sunday,î Reid said. McNabb, Owens and kicker David Akers practiced and will play against the Raiders. . . . PALMEIRO'S SEASON ENDED BY ORIOLES: Rafael Palmeiro's baseball season is over, the result of a positive test for steroids that proved to be too big a distraction for his teammates to ignore. ìHe won't be dressing for the rest of the year,î Baltimore Orioles executive vice president Jim Beattie said. ìWe felt it wouldn't be appropriate for the organization.î The abrupt end to Palmeiro's season came one day after it was learned that he cited a vitamin B-12 he received from teammate Miguel Tejada as possibly causing the positive steroid test. The Orioles said Major League Baseball absolved Tejada of wrongdoing.
AROUND THE MAJORS: Astros starter Roger Clemens will miss his scheduled start today because of a sore left hamstring when wild-card leader Houston plays the Chicago Cubs. Clemens injured the hamstring Sept. 3. Astros manager Phil Garner said he doesn't expect him to miss any other scheduled starts. Clemens, who won a record seventh Cy Young Award last year at 42, strained his hamstring while batting in the second inning, and left the game against St. Louis three innings later. He made his next three starts, but didn't look like his usual dominating self. . . . Cubs second baseman Todd Walker, an LSU alum, strained his right knee running the bases in the first inning Friday. Walker spent more than a month on the disabled list after injuring his other knee. AROUND THE NATION: When Bob Knight leaves the school, associate head coach Pat Knight will take over the Texas Tech program, the Lubbock Avalanche-Journal and ESPN.com reported. Texas Tech hired Bob Knight in March 2001, six months after he was fired by Indiana. His contract runs through May 2009. . . . UCLA sophomore forward Josh Shipp will seek a second opinion before having surgery on his right hip to repair cartilage. The outpatient procedure was scheduled for Friday at UCLA Medical Center. In todayís doubles, twins Bob and Mike Bryan play Olivier Rochus and Kristof Vliegen. Sunday's reverse singles pits Roddick against Olivier Rochus and Blake against Christophe. Flood waters from Hurricane Rita continued to pour into New Orleans' 9th Ward on Saturday, overwhelming the beleaguered Army Corps of Engineers and threatening to inundate St. Bernard Parish while delaying recovery efforts in the already crippled city.

New levee breaches also swamped parts of Myrtle Grove in south Plaquemines Parish and Jean Lafitte in south Jefferson Parish, areas that were generally dry from Katrina.

In addition to the canal breaches, Rita's 5-foot storm surge and heavy rains flooded parts of Orleans and St. Tammany parishes. Rising water in Lake Pontchartrain also flooded low-lying parts of St. Tammany Parish, from Madisonville to Eden Isles.

Areas of Lakeview and Gentilly were under 1 to 2 feet of water, mainly because the pump stations that normally drain the areas are temporarily shut down to lighten the load on the Corps' makeshift dams on the 17th Street and London Avenue canals. Both dams held strong against the storm surge and were not in danger of flooding, officials said.

"We are working as hard and as fast as we can," said Lt. Col. Richard Waggenaar, the New Orleans district commander for the Army Corps of Engineers. "There's only so much we can do against the forces of Mother Nature. At some point, it just After ignoring a mandatory call to evacuate, hundreds of Lafitte residents were plucked from their homes by boat and helicopter Saturday after Hurricane Rita's winds pushed the waters of Bayou Barataria into the low-lying community.

"It's rising tremendously," George Bailey added.

Hurricane Rita slammed ashore early Saturday along the Texas-Louisiana border, dumping several feet of water into the southwest corner of the state and driving some residents to their rooftops to await rescue, although officials said widespread evacuations undoubtedly saved many lives.

"We don't anticipate a large number of deaths" in Louisiana from Rita, said Col. Jeff Smith, deputy director of the state Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness. "Most people chose to heed the governor's call to evacuate."

Rent payments offered for Katrina evacuees

But Blanco wants them to have La. housing

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Launching a new program to provide temporary living assistance and to clear shelters nationwide of people displaced by Hurricane Katrina, the federal government in the next few days will begin making lump-sum payments of $2,358 toward three months rent for each qualified evacuee who obtains housing anywhere in the country.

The news Friday took Gov. Kathleen Blanco by surprise and opened a new rift between her administration and President Bush on the critical issue of how Louisiana will lure back its citizens from the dramatic New Orleans diaspora caused by the storm. It also placed Blanco and Bush at odds over the option of erecting large trailer parks in Louisiana for evacuees.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the lump-sum payments, made by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, will cover temporary housing costs for "several hundred thousand" homeowners and renters whose homes were destroyed or are uninhabitable. After the initial lump-sum payment, further assistance will be available for up to 18 months depending on the circumstances, he said.

Low-income evacuees who before the storm received federal housing vouchers through the Department of Housing and Urban Development will continue to get financial support through local public housing authorities wherever they choose to live across the country.

"We're going to make sure that victims of this disaster, whatever their economic circumstances, get the necessary financial assistance to ensure that they can obtain a temporary residence for the time being," Chertoff said. "These programs have been designed to give families the maximum amount of flexibility and freedom to decide where they want to relocate and what they want to do over the next few months."

The issue of interim housing has become one of the most controversial among the debates on post-Katrina government policy. Federal and state officials want to get evacuees out of shelters and uncomfortable living conditions as soon as possible, but there is disagreement on where to place them until they can find permanent housing.

The longer evacuees become integrated in places outside Louisiana, state officials say, the less likely they are to return. If they find some form of housing in the New Orleans area, even temporarily, they can fill jobs and help restart the region's economy, the officials say.

Blanco has been pushing for a program to place evacuees in hotels and newly established trailer parks with community services in Louisiana, but she learned of the new federal initiative late Friday morning, just before Chertoff and HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson made the announcement in Washington, D.C.

"The announcement today from HUD and Homeland Security about rental assistance and housing vouchers may certainly address the needs of our friends in Alabama and Mississippi," Blanco said. "But it does little for Louisiana citizens who want to come home, and we'd like our citizens to be able to come to Louisiana for this interim period."

The FEMA rent payments will be a further inducement to keep Louisiana citizens out of state because, practically speaking, few of the payments can be used locally, Blanco said. Hurricane Katrina decimated the housing stock in the New Orleans region, and what was left there and across southern Louisiana has been bought or rented, she said.

Blanco on Friday asked FEMA to accelerate the purchase of blocks of hotel and motel rooms and to "dramatically speed the delivery of trailers for our transitional communities." These would be supplemented nearby with services for health care, education, child care and transportation.

"The path that I've outlined – moving our people from shelters or the homes of in-laws or friends and into hotels and transitional trailer communities here in Louisiana – gives our people hope," Blanco said. "It gives them a clear path that they can see, a path that will help them get their lives together and get them home to Louisiana."

Trailer and mobile home communities have been slow in coming, partly because of the complicated logistics of finding suitable sites that can handle the temporary villages.

Chertoff said FEMA continues to move forward to establish trailer villages in Louisiana and acknowledged that some towns and parishes want them because of the labor force they will provide. But if people decide to live in a FEMA-supplied trailer or mobile home, Chertoff said, they will not be eligible for the new rent subsidy.

"So it's not meant to substitute for the trailers, but it's meant to recognize the fact that as we speak not everybody can or necessarily wants to get into trailers," Chertoff said.

Establishing trailer villages with economic and social support services will require a complex government effort. Chertoff said the lump-sum payment program will reduce red tape.

Sen. David Vitter said no temporary housing solution is ideal, but the key to getting people back to Louisiana is to develop economic opportunities for them to return. He said he needed to learn more about Blanco's and FEMA's proposals to form an opinion on them. But whatever the solution, he said, he does not want the government to make evacuees' lives so uncomfortable that they use their poor conditions as the reason to come back.

FEMA relief programs can give an evacuee up to $26,200 for the emergency needs of food, shelter, clothing, personal items and medical conditions. The agency has sought ways to get initial payments of that cash quickly to the Katrina victims without requiring extensive paperwork and proof of need.

Soon after Katrina, FEMA expedited evacuee checks of $2,000 as an initial emergency payment. More than 747,000 households have qualified for some kind of assistance through FEMA on an immediate basis, and 648,000 of those have received more than $1.5 billion in expedited funds, according to the agency. The new rent program probably will cost about $2 billion for the three-month period, Chertoff said.

To receive the lump-sum payment by check or electronic transfer, evacuees from Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana must have registered through FEMA by calling (800) 621-FEMA or applying online at www.fema.gov. Applicants need to register only once, but should update their registration if their address has changed. The initial payment is calculated based on the national average fair market rent rate for a two-bedroom unit. The payment is portable and may be applied to temporary housing costs "for any location an evacuee determines," FEMA says.

"We're going to make sure that victims of this disaster, whatever their economic circumstances, get the necessary financial assistance to ensure that they can obtain a temporary residence for the time being."
MICHAEL CHERTOFF
Homeland Security Secretary

Eligible households will receive a letter describing specific rules and guidelines on the eligible use of the funds. Eventually, the submission of rental receipts and other documentation will be required.

Chertoff said the lump-sum checks and bank transfers would start flowing this week, but that people should anticipate it will take a few days to receive them. Those evacuees who have registered for direct deposit will get the money sooner, he said.

Blessed - "ADJECTIVE: highly favored or fortunate; characterized by happiness and good fortune."

Prior to Hurricane Katrina, "blessed" was an often used word. Today, as Ray Brandt Toyota and it's employees and families begin the long and arduous rebuilding process, we can now truly understand the meaning of the word "blessed". Our employees, like the residents of Southeast Louisiana have begun the task of rebuilding our homes and our business. We would ask for your support in "Jumpstarting Jefferson", as our Parts, Service, and Sales Departments are open and available to serve any of your needs.

Ray Brandt has authorized the New Car, Used Car, Parts, and Service Departments to provide the citizens of the affected areas with reduced pricing in all departments to help with the rebuilding process. Our new and used car departments sustained no water damage and the damage by the wind to a few of our units provide remarkable savings. Most of the slight damage is not even visible to the eye; rather than save the insurance money, Mr. Brandt would rather pass the savings on to the public as part of his contribution to the "Jumpstarting Jefferson" campaign. This is a very limited opportunity, and availability is restricted.

We have employment opportunities available in the Sales Department, including management availabilities.

Passenger ship from Europe will house medical students

LSU school faced threat to survival

By Robert Travis Scott
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — In a move to keep a major medical school in operation until it can reopen in storm-ravaged New Orleans, state and federal officials have secured a large passenger ship that will dock on the Mississippi River near Baton Rouge to house displaced students and faculty.

The Louisiana State University Health Sciences Center, which usually operates from its building off Tulane Avenue in downtown New Orleans, is the state's leading school for medicine, dentistry, nursing and public health. But like other local facilities it had to close when Hurricane Katrina struck Aug. 29.

School officials found new locations for classes and clinical training at the Pennington Biomedical Research Center and other sites in the state capital, but faced a more serious challenge finding accommodations for the center's faculty, students and staff.

Baton Rouge has been filled to the brim with evacuees scooping up all the available housing, making it impossible to find rooms for more than 1,700 students and personnel from the center who requested a place to live.

LSU attorney Ray Lamonica said the situation was so dire that the center's future was at stake.

"Housing was just critical to survival,î Lamonica said. Unless LSU found a solution quickly, many students and faculty would have moved to other states, the school might have had to shut down for the year and it could have lost its accreditation.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco's office worked with the Port of Baton Rouge to secure a dock on the west bank of the river at Port Allen. LSU officials, led by medical school Dean Larry Hollier and Associate Dean Keith Schroth, got agreement from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to use federal money to bring a passenger vessel into Baton Rouge to act as a dormitory.

The 712-foot ferry cruiser Finnjet will dock on the west bank of the Mississippi River at Port Allen and house 1,000 to 1,400 displaced students and faculty of the Louisiana State University Health Sciences Center.

FEMA officials quickly recognized the gravity of the problem and acted expeditiously, Lamonica said.

A 712-foot ferry cruiser called the Finnjet is now sailing across the Atlantic from its Baltic Sea home to Baton Rouge at a speed of 22 knots and is due to arrive Oct. 2, Lamonica said. From 1,000 to 1,400 people will live on the ship, which is operated by the Silja Line, a division of Sea Containers Limited.

Parking is available at the dock, and buses will shuttle people from the ship to the Pennington center. The school will provide additional housing in mobile homes on LSU property.

Lamonica said Health Sciences Center classes will begin this week.

Silja has a fleet of 12 passenger ships offering service between Finland, Sweden, Estonia, Germany and St. Petersburg, Russia.

The Finnjet was built in Finland in 1977 and renovated in 2004. According to the company's ship profile, the Finnjet has 493 cabins with 1,556 berths, a pool, sauna and cinema. It can hold 395 cars, but will not be used for that purpose while in Port Allen.

Recently the ship has been making regular runs between Germany and St. Petersburg.

Cavalry is coming for New Orleans music

CHRIS ROSE

Folk singer and '60s icon Arlo Guthrie is planning a road trip to help New Orleans' music industry recover from two devastating hurricanes. Sound gear and music equipment will be loaded into the City of New Orleans train to arrive in the city Dec. 17.

Help arrives in many ways these days, and one mission is coming on a train bound for glory: Folk singer and '60s icon Arlo Guthrie has announced a plan to charter the famed City of New Orleans Amtrak rail line to deliver sound gear and musical equipment to the city's ravaged music community.

The journey from Chicago to the Crescent City is intended to help the city's smaller nightclubs and music halls to get back into business and let the good times roll again; the presumption being that many venues have lost their fundamental operating infrastructure due to flooding, looting or just the random disappearance that seems so pervasive in the aftermath of Katrina.

On Dec. 5, the train loaded with lights, cables, soundboards, guitars and amps will embark on a 12-day trek, stopping at small towns and big cities along the way to pick up donations and host benefit concerts, arriving in New Orleans on Dec. 17. A legion of guest stars are expected to join the effort, though a list of prospects is unavailable at this early date.

Of the scores of classic songs written about this beautiful and poetic city, few strike such a wistful and longing chord as the rambling travel epic "The City of New Orleans," written by Steve Goodman but elevated into the public consciousness when Guthrie released it in 1972.

It's not really a song about New Orleans, per se, but about the vastness, isolation and sense of community of the American heartland. And its lyrics and melody have no doubt embedded themselves into the national consciousness as the images of this city's trauma and devastation have played out on TV stations day after day, night after night.

Guthrie's record company was closed Saturday and he was unavailable for comment, but in a statement released on his Web site this week, he said:

"When I think of New Orleans, I think of music. The city of New Orleans is America's first music city. New Orleans is the city that truly began America's contribution to the history of music worldwide. Without it, there'd be no popular music as we know it today.

"When I wonder what they might need in New Orleans to get back on their feet, the stuff that gets ruined under water, I think of all the sound boards, the cables, the lighting, the microphones, the instruments; I think of the stuff you need in the hundreds of little clubs and bars that bring the music to the street — the street that brings the people to the city. And I think of the many thousands of people who depend on those people for their livelihoods.

"I am determined to help restore all of those little places and bring the music back as soon as possible."

Nothing could be better news to a city that has lost its music, its rhythm, its vibe; a city that has virtually lost its way.

Of the vital elements necessary to get this city back on its feet, to help regain its identity, the neighborhood music club business — those dank, smoky, crazy juke joints are certainly at the top of the list.

New Orleans without music is not New Orleans. It's just another place on the map. And that simply won't do.

The day you hear the sound of Kermit Ruffins' trumpet bleeding out of the walls of Vaughn's nightclub in the Bywater and Jumpin' Johnny's Blues Party shaking the walls of the Maple Leaf, that is the day you know we're on our way back.

That's when you can say: "Good night, America, how are you?"

We're just fine.

Battered UNO plots comeback from 'war room'

Officials keep tabs on students, shift courses to Internet

By Coleman Warner
Staff writer

BATON ROUGE — Laptop computers and notepads crowd the top of a rectangular table laced with power and connection cables. A bulletin board crowded with cell phone numbers bears a simple proclamation: "The Urban Flagship Hasn't Sunk." A dozen or so administrators move about, edgy, a little bedraggled, trading bits of information, giving orders, apologizing for occasional profane outbursts.

Another morning in the "war room" of the University of New Orleans races by.

"That's Meg's office, that's Tim's office and this is my office," UNO Provost Rick Barton said, pointing to nearby chairs arranged around the table. He was referring to Chancellor Timothy Ryan and Ryan's executive assistant, Meg Cahill.

Private office space disappeared in Hurricane Katrina, which severely damaged about one-third of UNO's Lakefront campus in New Orleans and sent many of its students and staff members fleeing for shelter.

Now top administrators, many of whom lost homes and vehicles in the storm, are holed up in makeshift offices in the Louisiana State University System headquarters at LSU's Baton Rouge campus. There, they are employing a Web site, phone bank, laptops and cell phones in a furious bid to keep UNO alive.

"Welcome to UNO; this is their new home," LSU System President William Jenkins said as he darted through the hall. "They're going to be OK."

The remote command center took shape within 48 hours of Katrina's arrival, pulling together people who had evacuated to Ohio, South Carolina, Texas, Florida and Tennessee. The crisis-management effort is symptomatic of unprecedented challenges faced by leaders of several New Orleans-area colleges and universities as they try to assess water and wind damage, find alternate course offerings for students and persuade top faculty members not to move away for good.

"Our students need this educational vehicle, so it was important for us to get back" in operation, Barton said late Wednesday morning, as he awaited Ryan's return from a meeting about requests for emergency federal aid.

Sticking with it

The administrators draw hope from efforts by displaced students to reconnect and keep their academic training on track. About 800 displaced students showed up for a rally and informational meeting more than a week ago at the Baton Rouge campus, and about 9,000 of UNO's 17,300 enrolled students have made contact with staff members, officials said.

Barton was choked up by an e-mail from Wendy Desroché, a student who was scheduled to graduate in December, now taking refuge in Florida. She was thrilled to find new information on a revamped UNO Web site and that she was able to reach an academic counselor about her courses.

"I will not graduate from any other school other than UNO," Desroché wrote. "It is my home and UNO stands for everything that represents New Orleans. Regardless, I 'will' walk across that stage in my blue cap and gown. I will hold my head high, as I will be a part of the new and everlasting city that is in my blood."

Classes go online

Rapid-fire decisions have streamed from the war room since the hurricane, with Ryan typically acting after seeking consensus among his top subordinates.

Among the decisions: UNO isn't suspending academics this semester, opting instead to offer, beginning Oct. 10, hundreds of courses online and at UNO's Jefferson Center on Causeway Boulevard in Metairie, after the roof there is repaired. Mandeville High and Slidell High in St. Tammany Parish and John Ehret High on the west bank of Jefferson Parish also will serve as satellite course locations.

The quick shift to offering courses will allow UNO to continue employing nearly all of its 550 full-time professors, although hundreds of part-time instructors have lost their positions because of the storm, Barton said.

UNO officials hope to offer a mini-session of classes in December at the Lakefront campus and then resume full operations in January, even as they seek $103 million for repair or replacement of damaged buildings, along with

Boats are next target for search and rescue

A search and rescue mission of another sort is unfolding throughout the New Orleans area as officials begin surveying and salvaging boats and vessels battered by Hurricane Katrina.

Both the Coast Guard and the Army Corps of Engineers are helping with the effort, targeting damaged or sunken vessels and eventually clearing the smaller, private boats abandoned in streets throughout the region.

The Coast Guard is conducting an assessment to begin saving vessels and tracking down boat owners so they can file a salvage plan with the agency, said Lt. Kris Szczechowicz, a spokesman for the Coast Guard.

The location of vessels will be critical as recovery efforts continue, officials said. While the Coast Guard will handle commercial and recreational boats in waterways, the Army Corps of Engineers probably will handle those boats blown onto levees or trapped in hard-hit marinas.

No plans are yet in place for clearing the smaller boats scattered in cities and towns throughout the region. Dana Finney, a spokeswoman for the Corps, said those boats are not covered under a citywide contract for debris cleanup with the Slidell-based Omni Pinnacle company.

The boats, probably used for travel or rescue efforts in the days after Katrina struck, are "not part of the debris mission at this point," Finney said. In recent weeks, the main goal has been to clear streets, often pushing debris to the side of the road or onto medians.

Along with marine vehicles, more than 200,000 abandoned cars remain in New Orleans and will have to be removed, according to reports.

Finney said it's likely that some of the smaller boats might never be claimed and, in that case, the corps eventually will have to make plans to haul them away.

Local leaders might also take the reins with such cleanup efforts, Finney said, adding that the Corps does not automatically take over debris removal.

"If (parish leaders) have another method, that's up to them," she said, adding that the benefit of a Corps cleanup is that it's free.

According to a recent Coast Guard bulletin, vessels and barges must submit salvage plans.

Salvage plans should be faxed to Coast Guard Incident Command Post (ICP) in Alexandria at (318) 443-2573, Attention: Salvage Group. Contact the Salvage Operations Department at the ICP at (318) 443-2565 for more information.

$100 million for losses related to personnel. The money will be sought as part of a storm-related federal aid package for Louisiana colleges that will total in the billions of dollars.

Everything is on a fast track because UNO wants thousands of students who have enrolled in other schools across Louisiana and out of state — including about 2,000 at LSU in Baton Rouge — to return home, the provost said.

"Our people are on campus now," he said. "They're replacing windows."

Doing what it can

The scramble to get UNO back on its feet is laced with bitter personal stories of loss and upheaval. Referring to "Surviving Katrina 2005" T-shirts handed out to UNO students at the Baton Rouge gathering, Norma Grace, a vice chancellor, said, "As we gave these out to students as sort of a rallying thing, so many of them said, 'Thank you, now I have a change of clothes.'"

Business professor Ken Walsh, who was handed the task of managing a phone bank where five lines are lit up almost constantly on weekdays, said most students who call in "breathe a sigh of relief" learning that UNO is still a working entity. But every now and then a caller is distraught, needing mental health counseling or financial help of the sort that a wounded university can't furnish, he said.

"They'll be saying, 'I don't have a car. I lost my car. How do I get a new car?'"

After losing his house to the storm, Bob Cashner, dean of graduate studies at UNO, fretted over the fate of a priceless butterfly collection, one in need of strict environmental controls, on the second floor of a biology building.

Plans were being made to rush a refrigerated truck to the Lakefront campus Wednesday when Cashner got word that, despite weeks spent in sweltering conditions, the rare collection had escaped damage.

"The collection is in very good shape," he said. "We've got time."

Truckloads of loot recovered in homes

New Orleans Police Sgt. Dan Anderson of the 6th District on Saturday opens a trailer full of recovered looted items, most of which were found in the drier areas of Uptown and Central City. The merchandise included an ATM, a metal detector, a meat smoker and a deluxe aquarium stand.

Just as Katrina's receding waters revealed acres of ruined houses, flooded cars and pockets of bodies, the post-storm cleanup also raised the curtain on a trail of mass looting that left even the most jaded New Orleans police officers awestruck.

As search and rescue crews staged house-to-house searches for survivors during the past two weeks, they repeatedly stumbled upon stacks of merchandise -- from large appliances still in the box to knotted tangles of hastily pilfered jewelry.

Much of the loot is being recovered from the drier areas of Uptown and Central City in the 6th Police District.

"At first, we stored the stuff in the garage and locked the metal gate, but the stack grew too big, so we commandeered the trailer from the side of the road and started storing it there," said Capt. Anthony Cannatella, 6th District commander.

That 20-foot trailer rig was quickly filled back-to-front, floor-to-ceiling, so officers began putting everything into a 60-foot trailer until that was packed, too. They're now easily on their way to filling a 40-footer.

A peek inside the trailers revealed the scope of the mass theft: Bicycles, TVs, computers, printers, cameras, lamps, beer, wine, liquor, stereos, toys, clothes, bedding, diapers, power tools, vacuum cleaners, VCRs, DVDs, CDs, CD racks, clocks, an ATM, a digital metal detector, a meat smoker and a deluxe aquarium stand, for starters.

"C'mon," Cannatella said. "Why would anyone take a deluxe aquarium stand? Some of this is just ridiculous."

In normal times, the recovered goods would be methodically tagged and stored in the evidence and property room in the basement of police headquarters, but that storehouse and everything in it was ruined by water that reached the ceiling.

"We can't just allow thousands of dollars of stuff to stay out in the weather or sit in houses where we found it," Cannatella said. "I know it's crazy times, but we're trying to do things by the book here."

A large percentage of the items are still tagged with bar codes from the Tchoupitoulas Street Wal-Mart, a store that was all but cleaned out during six hours of utter pandemonium the day after Katrina hit.

"That's what shocked me most: the total devastation of Wal-Mart," Cannatella said. "We had people who destroyed stuff just out of meanness. Bottles of mustard and mayonnaise, wine, just smashed up against the walls and floors. They cleaned out the building and they destroyed it. The only things left on the shelves were the books and the educational materials."

The Wal-Mart was by no means the only store cleaned out. The Winn-Dixie grocery on Claiborne Avenue, the NAPA Auto Parts on Toledano Street and the Cash America pawnshop also were gutted, Cannatella said. Some smaller stores were set afire after they were pilfered. At the now half-emptied Rite-Aid on Carrolton Avenue at Oak Street, a commandeered forklift was used to peel back the metal security gate. At a credit union near Memorial-Baptist hospital, looters smashed through the flooded building in a boat.

"They got almost every store in the district," veteran officer Skip Daughtry said. "All the little corner stores, the grocery stores, they hit them all."

Sgt. Dan Anderson said he still can't get over the futility of the lawlessness. People carted off electronics when there was no electricity, furniture for houses that ended up under water and some piles of goods so unwieldy they were simply abandoned on the street.

"Talk about a lot of effort for nothing," Anderson said. "When that (17th Street Canal) levee broke, they had to leave it all behind."

Some looters, however, went to great lengths to try to protect their stash, Cannatella said. One group posted an armed lookout. A couple of others left their haul in abandoned houses guarded by chained pit bulls, one of which was shot by National Guard troops because the animal had gone berserk. While dozens of looters caught in the act were arrested, no one has been arrested in connection with the recovered goods.

Cannatella said one clever looter rigged a fake bomb using PVC pipes, electrical tape, wires and a desk clock. The realistic-looking device was sitting atop a pile of computers and other boxed items, Cannatella said.

"It kept my cops at bay for two hours. You can't take a chance that it might be real, so we called the bomb squad," he said.

Cannatella said he has spoken with Wal-Mart's loss-prevention managers on what to do with that store's recouped merchandise. One idea in the works is a plan to donate the items to officers who lost everything to the storm. In the 6th Police District alone, Cannatella said 52 of his 132 cops would qualify.

BRUISED BUT NOT BROKEN

Hurricane Katrina continues to challenge Entergy on several fronts, but customers, suppliers and employees can be assured that the company will overcome them.

Entergy New Orleans (ENO), Entergy Corporation's smallest utility subsidiary, is facing nearly half of the more than $1 billion in restoration costs associated with this destructive storm at a time when most of its 190,000 customers are displaced or unable to accept power. Everyone should know, however, that we have a plan to address this situation. The first part for ENO was to file for bankruptcy protection in federal court. We believe this filing permits Entergy Corporation — which remains financially strong — to fund ENO's restoration efforts in advance of receiving other forms of assistance. This is critical.

In addition, ENO, along with Entergy Corporation, is working diligently with the Louisiana congressional delegation, including Senators Mary Landrieu and David Vitter, to obtain direct assistance from the federal government to help rebuild the city's utility infrastructure. This aid will help ensure that our restoration efforts can continue at the same time that ENO's customers are assured they will not be burdened with unaffordable rates in the future.

ENO and Entergy Corporation are committed to the City of New Orleans. Our best efforts to rebuild the electric and gas infrastructure in the city are in the best interests of everyone involved and the most obvious actions we can take to show that commitment.

Meanwhile, we appreciate the tremendous support being shown to us as we work through this difficult situation.

Mississippi reports minor flooding

Rita brings in 30-mph winds

By The Associated Press

BAY ST. LOUIS, MISS. — Flooding was reported in low areas of Hancock County but Hurricane Rita spared most of the heavily damaged Mississippi Gulf Coast more misery, officials said Saturday.

In Hancock County, where a voluntary evacuation order was issued Friday, officials said search teams had been dispatched to flooded areas but there were no reports of injuries or major problems. Most of the flooding, which began Friday, occurred in low areas that normally flood during periods of high water or heavy rain.

At least one medical-relief center for victims of Hurricane Katrina reopened in the county on Saturday.

Rita made landfall early Saturday as a Category 3 storm just east of Sabine Pass, on the Texas-Louisiana line, bringing top winds of 120 mph and warnings of flooding rains.

Though winds continued to buffet Gulfport on Saturday afternoon, Harrison County Emergency Management Agency Director Joe Spraggins said the only damage reported was to trees and roofs already weakened by Katrina on Aug. 29.

"It wasn't nothing that we didn't expect, with 30 to 45 mph winds," he said.

Nor was flooding as bad as some had feared.

Amy Carruth of the Mississippi Emergency Management Agency said there were no immediate reports of significant Rita-related damage from other parts of south Mississippi.

However, much of the state remained under a tornado watch until Saturday night. A number of tornado warnings were issued during the day Saturday.

Paul Reese, a spokesman for the Hancock County Emergency Operations Center, said a Bay St. Louis radio station lost its transmitter in the latest foul weather.

The low-power FM station WQRZ was being operated by a couple from Bay St. Louis and moved into the emergency operations center after Katrina. With a temporary license from the Federal Communications System to boost power, EOC officials have used the station to provide emergency information to all of Hancock County, Reese said.

Reese said FEMA has arranged to distribute 3,000 battery-operated radios so residents could hear any additional reports of tornado watches or warnings.

The station should be back on the air once more fuel can be delivered to the transmitter site, he said.

Insured losses from Katrina are likely to dwarf Rita losses

$6 billion in damages are expected

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Insured losses from Hurricane Rita likely will be lower than those from Hurricane Katrina, according to two firms that track costs associated with disasters.

Eqecat Inc. of Oakland, Calif., estimated Rita's cost to insurers will be $3 billion to $6 billion. AIR Worldwide Corp., a risk modeling company based in Boston, forecast insured losses of $2.5 billion to $5 billion.

AIR Worldwide said it expects Beaumont and Port Arthur, both in Texas, and Lake Charles to sustain the most significant damage. Insured losses were expected to extend as far south as Galveston, Texas, and as far east as New Orleans.

Friday, before the storm took a turn to the northeast, Eqecat had estimated that losses from Rita could total $9 billion to $18 billion.

Total industry insured losses related to Katrina are estimated to range from $40 billion to $60 billion.

A MESSAGE TO OUR AFFILIATED PHYSICIANS AT MEMORIAL MEDICAL CENTER AND LINDY BOGGS MEDICAL CENTER

The last three weeks have been incredibly difficult for everyone in the Gulf Coast Region. I want to express my deep appreciation to all of you who worked side by side with our staff during and after the storm, under what were extremely challenging conditions.

With that intense effort now behind us, I know you are anxious to recover patient medical records and other equipment and belongings that are currently housed in our medical office buildings and hospitals. I want to assure you that we are working to facilitate the safe recovery of those items as quickly as possible.

Facilities Update

As you may be aware, the only Tenet hospitals currently operating in the Gulf Coast area, on a limited basis, are NorthShore Regional Medical Center in Slidell, and Gulf Coast Medical Center in Biloxi. Kenner Regional Medical Center recently began to reopen a few services on a very limited basis. Meadowcrest Hospital in Gretna remains closed and under the control of Jefferson Parish officials. Over time, we hope to restore additional services at these four facilities.

Hazardous Conditions

We have completed a preliminary evaluation of our most severely damaged hospitals, Memorial Medical Center and Lindy Boggs Medical Center, and based on initial damage assessments we have quarantined those facilities until we do further testing or remediation and can be assured that the air quality and other internal conditions do not pose a serious health risk. To minimize the danger, security fencing and private security officers will protect these facilities. We expect to have more definitive information about the environmental danger in the next few weeks. At this time, Memorial and Lindy Boggs will be closed indefinitely while we complete the damage assessment and remediation of these facilities.

Once it is safe to enter the facilities, we do not know what kind of condition the records, equipment and other materials may be in. The lowest floors of these buildings were flooded for an extended period of time, and the contents have been sitting in high heat and humidity, without air conditioning or free air circulation for several weeks. There is still no electrical power in the facilities. It is possible that some of the building contents will have to be handled as hazardous materials in order to be removed safely, and will have to undergo some form of hygienic treatment before they may be returned to you.

Process for Retrieving Records and Property

We have a dedicated team working on this project to help you to retrieve your records and possessions as soon as it is safe to do so. Here is the process we are establishing to ensure that you will be able to recover your items:

• We have put together a team, led by Dave Goodson, which will manage the coordinated efforts of the retrieval process. Beginning the week of Sept. 26 you should contact Dave at 504-329-0304 and provide your name, information about your practice, the property you would like retrieved from the facility, the priority for removal of these items, and your personal contact information. This information will be shared with the teams organizing the recovery of items from our buildings.

• Dave Goodson will contact you directly as we are able to re-enter the facilities and recover records and other items.

Affiliating with other Tenet Facilities

Our physicians are important business partners, and we want to do everything we can to support you, help you recover from Katrina and keep you within the Tenet system. We will do as much as we can to support you in resuming your practice. If you are interested in affiliating with another Tenet facility in the Gulf Coast region on a temporary or permanent basis, please contact the facility CEOs directly:

NorthShore Regional Medical Center
Mike O'Bryan Phone: 985-646-5051
Email: mike.o'bryan@tenethealth.com

Gulf Coast Medical Center
Michael Terry Phone: 228-388-0570
Email: mike.terry@tenethealth.com

Kenner Regional Medical Center
Paolo Zambito Phone: 504-464-8058
Email: paolo.zambito@tenethealth.com

Meadowcrest Hospital
Phil Sowa Phone: 214-505-4741
Email: phillip.sowa@tenethealth.com

If you are interested in affiliating with another Tenet facility outside of Louisiana and Mississippi, please go to www.tenethealth.com. Click on the "For Physicians" tab, then click the "For Opportunities" link. This will take you to a location that asks for information about your specialty, and the market(s) in which you are interested.

Office Rental Status

If you currently lease office space from Tenet in a medical office building at Memorial Medical Center or Lindy Boggs Medical Center, we have already abated your rent for a 90-day period from the date of the hurricane. This allows us more than sufficient time to do the necessary testing and inspections to assess the condition of the building and its contents, and make decisions about its future.

Information Updates

As we move forward, we will keep you informed of developments as frequently as possible. Because of impaired communication capabilities and our lack of contact information for many of our physicians, the most reliable source of information for you is our website. Please go to www.tenethealth.com or to the Lindy Boggs website, www.lindyboggsmedctr.com or Memorial's website, www.memmedctr.com to receive the most current information.

All of us are dealing with a human calamity. We pledge to you that we are focused and working intensely to recover from this disaster, keeping the best interest of our patients, physicians, employees and our communities foremost in our minds at all times. We applaud your courage, determination and professionalism during this ordeal.

Sincerely,

Bob Smith

Blanco wants to create hurricane aid program

La. victims would get help in applying for it

By Ed Anderson
Capital bureau

BATON ROUGE — Gov. Kathleen Blanco said Saturday that she wants to create a "Family Recovery Corps" to help victims of hurricanes Katrina and Rita get the federal and state benefits to which they are entitled.

"Our folks are getting frustrated" in shelters trying to call toll-free numbers and apply for benefits on Web sites, she said. "We want to help people navigate the system. They may be put on hold (on the telephone). It is frustrating."

Blanco called for a joint federal-state effort, but Vice Adm. Thad Allen, the chief federal officer coordinating the hurricane relief efforts, said he would have to review the proposal and consult with officials in Washington, D.C., before deciding whether to endorse it.

She said she would like to deploy 400 to 500 people to help Louisiana hurricane victims – in and out of state – get about $1 billion in personal and business help.

Blanco's chief of staff, Andy Kopplin, said the program is estimated to cost between $15 million and $20 million.

Blanco did not say whether the program would be staffed by existing employees or new hires.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco
'This will connect the benefits to the families'

"This will connect the benefits to the families," Blanco said. "Hopefully, we can do that more quickly and efficiently" than the prolonged process of applying for federal, state or private aid.

"It won't be easy," she said. "It will certainly not be inexpensive ... We want our families to know what benefits are available and how to access those benefits."

She said she will contact President Bush to seek his blessing to get the program running.

She said the program is designed to "solve the problems that have arisen" and defuse the frustration of hurricane victims. "People are not connecting with the aid (available)."

Dear Gary Muller, Medical Staff, Executive Staff and Senior Directors, Leadership Team, Nursing Staff, Hospital Employees and Volunteers, and Business Partners:

If never before had we had an extraordinary reason to be proud of our community hospital and health system, the time is now. Because of the present circumstance, I feel compelled to offer my thanks and praise. I join my Board Members of West Jefferson hospital in commending you for your brilliant and compassionate work before, during and following Katrina.

August and September 2005 will be a time we will, all, remember. Your deeds to prepare for the critically injured and seriously ill during and following Katrina are with exceptional merit. Your outstanding teamwork and humanitarian spirit was noted not just by us. The country and the world have come to know of West Jefferson Medical Center and your response to Katrina in her horrific wake. While the disaster cry of Katrina was heartless, your response was heartfelt and, at every turn, you made a difference to our patients and their loved ones.

I appreciate your effort and sacrifices during a time when our community was soaked in sadness. We know that many of you worked the 20-hour days and that your courage in the face of potential adversity was stronger than ever. Many of you were touched personally by Katrina. We are so very sorry for your losses.

I will be forever grateful for Mr. Muller's extraordinary leadership and your presence and dedication. You stayed the course to care for the vulnerable and you made decisions based on a fast-changing environment in Jefferson and the region. I also appreciate that Mr. Muller has provided vision for the entire healthcare system during these difficult circumstances. It is testament to his and the hospital family's relationships, that offers of help for our hospital and supplies came in from around the nation.

Thank you, West Jefferson, for keeping us informed through the hospital's web site and local, regional and national correspondents and the press. We've learned of West Jeff's amazing response to Katrina through stories near and afar as well as personal accounts. We are thankful for the military, the National Guard, the faith community, Sheriff's deputies, firemen, medical suppliers and businesses across the land who lent a hand. This was, no doubt, due to a positive outcome of your work and the leadership of our Parish President and the Council. You were offered every protection possible under the circumstances. This effort was multiplied by departments across the hospital and health system resulting in an unprecedented response to an unprecedented situation in our and our country's history.

With admiration for your work and leadership, I remain

Sincerely yours,

Charlotte Roussel

Rita victims generally wealthier than Katrina's

Most people in path had means to leave

By Stephen Ohlemacher
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON — Hurricane Rita smashed into a region that is wealthier, more mobile and much less densely populated than the one devastated by Hurricane Katrina.

Most of Rita's victims are by no means wealthy. But they are less likely to live in poverty, more likely to own a car, and less likely to be members of a minority group than Katrina's victims, according to an Associated Press analysis of census data.

Experts said the wealth and mobility of people in Rita's path — combined with a new sense of urgency following Katrina — led to a more thorough evacuation.

"They have cars," said Carnot Nelson, a psychology professor at the University of South Florida. "They have a way to leave. It's as simple as that."

Money and transportation were in short supply for many people affected by Katrina.

In densely populated New Orleans, more than 27 percent of the households had no access to an automobile, according to 2000 census data. The median family income, at $32,300, is nearly $20,000 below the national average.

Fred Medway, a psychology professor at the University of South Carolina, said Katrina's destruction provided incentive for people to flee Rita.

"They have seen what a hurricane can do," Medway said. "That's a very powerful motivator."

Rita made landfall along the Texas-Louisiana border and worked its way north, bringing floodwaters inland.

On the Texas side is Jefferson County, home to Port Arthur and Beaumont, two oil refining towns. To the north are Orange, Jasper and Newton counties.

On the Louisiana side is Calcasieu Parish, home to Lake Charles, and Beauregard Parish to the north.

The AP analysis of 2000 census data showed:

▶ A majority of residents in all six counties and parishes at the center of Rita's wrath were white. Jefferson County, where about 34 percent of the residents are black, had the largest minority population. Orleans Parish, by comparison, was 67 percent black.

▶ Rita's eye tracked over mostly rural areas. The most densely populated county or parish hit by Rita was Jefferson, with 279 residents per square mile. Jasper, Newton and Beauregard all had fewer than 50 people per square mile.

Orleans Parish had 2,684 residents per square mile.

▶ None of the counties or parishes had median family incomes above the national median of $50,000, but all had incomes above the median in New Orleans.

▶ All six counties and parishes had higher poverty rates than the national average of 9.2 percent. But none were close the 24 percent of families in New Orleans living below the poverty level.

▶ Relatively few people in the six counties and parishes did not have access to a car. About 10 percent of the households in tiny Newton County did not have a vehicle, the highest percentage among the counties. In New Orleans, 27 percent of the households did not have a car or truck.

Israel strikes back at Hamas, shakes cautious truce

Gaza incursion is set to begin today

By Ibrahim Barzak
Associated Press writer

GAZA CITY, GAZA STRIP — Israel launched a "crushing" retaliation Saturday against Hamas in Gaza with deadly air strikes, troops massed at the border and a planned ground incursion after militants fired 35 rockets at Israeli towns, their first major attack since the Gaza pullout.

The escalation threatened to derail a shaky seven-month-old truce and quashed hopes that Israel's ceding the coastal strip to the Palestinians would invigorate peacemaking. Israel's reprisals drew fresh Hamas threats of vengeance. Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas came under growing Israeli pressure to confront the militants.

Israeli Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz told security chiefs in a meeting that "the ground of Gaza should shake" and that he wanted to exact a high price from Palestinians everywhere, not just Hamas.

He promised a "crushing" response, including air strikes, targeted killings and arrest raids, participants said afterward.

Later, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Security Cabinet authorized a Gaza ground incursion that would begin by today, with artillery fire from the border, and grow in intensity until troops enter the strip later in the week.

Security officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to publicize details of the plan, said the operation would stop only if the Palestinian Authority asserted control over Gaza or Hamas declared an end to rocket attacks.

Israel also sealed the West Bank and Gaza, barring thousands of Palestinians from reaching jobs in the Jewish state.

The crisis erupted amid a major challenge to Sharon's leadership in his hard-line Likud Party and could strengthen the hand of his main rival, Benjamin Netanyahu, who warned the Gaza pullout endangered Israel.

A Likud vote Monday could determine whether Sharon quits the party, a move that probably would bring early elections and prompt him to form a new centrist party to capture mainstream voters.

The heightened violence followed a chain of events starting Friday with an explosion at a Hamas rally in Gaza's Jebaliya refugee camp. At least 15 Palestinians were killed and dozens wounded.

Hamas blamed Israel, claiming it fired missiles into the crowd, and said its rocket attacks were in retaliation. Israel denied involvement, and the Palestinian Authority said Islamic militants apparently caused the blast themselves by mishandling explosives.

A senior Palestinian security official confirmed Saturday that friction caused a rocket-propelled grenade in a truck to explode, which then ignited about 10 other grenades. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the investigation.

In a speech Saturday, Abbas also blamed Hamas and renewed demands that armed groups stop flaunting weapons in public. "We are required more than ever before to end this frequent tragedy that resulted from chaos and military parades in residential areas," he said.

Islamic militants took center stage in Gaza after Israel's withdrawal, holding military-style victory parades. Many Palestinians endorsed the militants' claim that they drove Israel out by force.

But the latest bloodshed appeared to put Hamas on the defensive.

The group called Abbas' position "a stab in the back of the martyrs" and a blow to efforts to work out differences between militant factions. Abbas has been trying to co-opt Hamas, mainly through the lure of parliament elections, and has rejected calls by Israel and the international community to confront and disarm militants.

In a nod to Hamas, Abbas reiterated Saturday that elections would be held in January as scheduled and that he would not let outsiders dictate who can participate. Israel has demanded that Hamas be barred.

Under an informal agreement between Abbas and the militants, a ban on displaying weapons was to take effect later Saturday, though it was unclear whether Hamas would honor the deal after the Israeli strikes.

On Saturday afternoon, Israeli aircraft fired five missiles at two cars carrying Hamas militants in Gaza City, killing at least two militants and wounding nine people, officials said. Other officials put the death toll at four.

The strikes meant Israel has resumed targeted killings of Palestinian militants, a practice suspended during the truce. During more than four years of fighting, Israel has killed scores of militants and bystanders in such attacks.

Hamas identified two of the dead as Nafez Abu Hussein and Rwad Farhad, local field commanders. Several hundred gunmen, some firing into the air, joined a funeral procession for Farhad, who was 17.

Farhad's mother, known as Um Nidal, said all three of her sons have been killed in fighting with the Israelis. "I am so proud," she said. "I wish I had more sons to offer."

Vowing revenge, Hamas called on followers in a statement to strike Israel "in every spot of our occupied land." At least three more rockets fell in Israel after the air strike.

Palestinian Information Minister Nabil Shaath denounced the strike as an "act of criminal aggression" and accused Israel of trying to destroy the cease-fire that had largely held since February.

On the other side of the border, Eli Moyal, the mayor of Sderot, the Israeli town hit by most of the rockets, criticized the Israeli response as "minimal and insulting." Israeli newscasts showed hysterical residents in Sderot crying and running for cover during an air-raid alarm.

Mofaz also ordered large numbers of ground forces to deploy near northern Gaza, the launching area for most Hamas rocket attacks. At one location, four armored personnel carriers, five tanks and four bulldozers joined a fleet of about 30 armored vehicles regularly deployed there.

Israel also set up five artillery cannons elsewhere on the border, an unprecedented step.

Past Israeli retaliation for Palestinian rocket fire has involved air strikes or ground incursions. Artillery fire is less precise than missiles, and artillery shells fired into densely populated Gaza could cause many casualties.

Army aircraft also dropped fliers throughout Gaza saying that Hamas had sparked the escalation. Hamas' lies are "driving you to destruction and despair," the flier said. It also said the Palestinian Authority must "act immediately" to stop the violence and threatened a harsh response to further attacks.

Despite the violence, several thousand Israelis and Palestinians participated in twin peace rallies Saturday night in Jerusalem and the West Bank town of Ramallah. Participants said the tensions in Gaza underscored the need to resume peace talks.

Navy office contracted planes in 'renditions'

Terror suspects allege torture after flights

By Seth Hettena
Associated Press writer

SAN DIEGO — A branch of the U.S. Navy secretly contracted a 33-airplane fleet that included two Gulfstream jets reportedly used to fly terrorist suspects to countries known to practice torture, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press.

At least 10 U.S. aviation companies were issued classified contracts in 2001 and 2002 by the obscure Navy Engineering Logistics Office for the "occasional airlift of USN (Navy) cargo worldwide," according to Defense Department documents the AP obtained through a Freedom of Information Act request.

Two of the companies, Richmor Aviation Inc. and Premier Executive Transport Services Inc., chartered luxury Gulfstreams that flew terrorist suspects captured in Europe to Egypt, according to U.S. and European media reports. Once there, the men told family members, they were tortured. Authorities in Italy and Sweden have expressed outrage over flights they say were illegal and orchestrated by the U.S. government.

The Gulfstreams came under scrutiny in 2001, but the Navy's role in contracting planes involved in operations the CIA terms "rendition" and what Italian prosecutors call kidnapping has not been determined.

"A lot of us have been focusing on the role of the CIA but also suspecting that certain parts of the armed forces are involved," said Margaret Satterthwaite, a New York University School of Law researcher who has investigated renditions.

The Navy contracts involve more planes than previously reported; other news outlets counted 26 planes; the AP identified 33 planes.

Italian judges have issued arrest warrants for 19 purported CIA operatives who allegedly snatched a Muslim cleric from Milan in 2003 and flew him to Cairo, according to FAA records cited by the Chicago Tribune, aboard Richmor's Gulfstream IV. The jet belongs to an owner of the Boston Red Sox who told The Boston Globe that the team's logo was covered when the CIA leased the plane. Another case involves two men taken from Sweden to Egypt in 2001 aboard Premier's Gulfstream V.

Neither the CIA nor a Navy spokeswoman at the Pentagon would comment for this story. Officials at the Navy Engineering Logistics Office, or NELO, in Arlington, Va., didn't respond to messages requesting comment.

Joseph Duenas, counsel for the logistics office, declined to provide the contracts, saying they "involve national security information that is classified."

The secrecy surrounding the deals makes it unclear why NELO issued them, but one reason may be the office's anonymity — the agency is so buried within the Pentagon bureaucracy that some career Navy officials have never heard of it.

The office has been around since the mid-1970s, according to a former employee who spoke on condition of anonymity because NELO's activities are secret. NELO operates under different names: it's also known as the Navy's Office of Special Projects, and its San Diego location is called the Navy Regional Plant Equipment Office.

The AP learned of the airplane contracts through a Freedom of Information Act request that focused on a different subject: permits granted to all 10 aviation companies that let them land at any Navy base worldwide.

Demonstrators demand troops come home

Thousands march in D.C. day of protest

By Jennifer C. Kerr
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON – Opponents of the war in Iraq marched by the tens of thousands Saturday in a clamorous day of protest, song and remembrance of the dead, some showing surprisingly diverse political views even as they spoke with one loud voice in wanting U.S. troops home.

The surging crowd, shouting "Bush out now" and "Peace now," marched in front of the White House and then toward the Washington Monument in an 11-hour marathon of dissent.

They were young people with green hair, nuns whose anti-war activism dates to Vietnam, parents mourning their children in uniform lost in Iraq, and uncountable families motivated for the first time to protest.

President Bush himself was out of town, monitoring hurricane recovery efforts from Colorado and Texas. The protesters shouted for his impeachment.

"We have to get involved," said Erika McCroskey, 27, who came from Des Moines, Iowa, with her younger sister and mother for her first demonstration, traveling in just one of the buses that poured into the capital from far-flung places.

"Bush Lied, Thousands Died," said one sign. "End the Occupation," said another.

While united against the war, political beliefs varied in the Washington crowd. Paul Rutherford, 60, of Vandalia, Mich., said he is a Republican who supported Bush in the last election and still does _ except for the war.

"President Bush needs to admit he made a mistake in the war and bring the troops home, and let's move on," Rutherford said. His wife, Judy, 58, called the removal of Saddam Hussein "a noble mission" but said U.S. troops should have left when claims that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction proved unfounded.

"We found that there were none and yet we still stay there and innocent people are dying daily," she said.

Arthur Pollock, 47, of Cecil County, Md., said he was against the war from the beginning. He wants the soldiers out, but not all at once.

"They've got to leave slowly," said Pollock, attending his first protest. "It will be utter chaos in that country if we pull them out all at once."

From the stage, though, the speeches were hard-edged and critical of Bush on far more fronts than Iraq. Groups representing a bazaar of causes attacked administration policies on the poor, on hurricane response, on the Cuban embargo and much more.

The protest in the capital showcased a series of demonstrations in foreign and other U.S. cities. A crowd in London, estimated by police at 10,000, marched in support of withdrawing British troops from Iraq. Highlighting the need to get out, protesters said, were violent clashes between insurgents and British troops in the southern Iraq city of Basra.

Cindy Sheehan, the California mother who drew thousands of demonstrators to her 26-day vigil outside Bush's Texas ranch last month, won a roar of approval when she took the stage before the march. Her 24-year-old son, Casey, was killed in Iraq last year.

"Shame on you," Sheehan admonished, directing that portion of her remarks to members of Congress who backed Bush on the war. "How many more of other people's children are you willing to sacrifice?

She led the crowd in chanting, "Not one more."

Supporters of Bush's policy in Iraq assembled in smaller numbers to get their voice heard in the day's anti-war din. About 150 of them rallied at the U.S. Navy Memorial.

Aneurysms patched in Cheney's knees

Vice president is in good condition

By Tom Raum
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON – Vice President Dick Cheney had successful surgery on Saturday to repair aneurysms on the back of both knees and was alert and comfortable after the six-hour procedure, his spokesman said.

Cheney, who has a history of heart problems, was under local anesthesia during the surgery at George Washington University Hospital.

"He will remain in the hospital for up to 48 hours to monitor his recovery. He is expected to resume a regular schedule when he is released to home," said Steve Schmidt, counselor to the vice president.

After the operation, Cheney was "awake, alert, comfortable," Schmidt said.

An aneurysm is a ballooning weak spot in an artery that, as blood pulses through, eventually can burst if left untreated. Cheney's aneurysms, known as popliteal aneurysms, were discovered during his annual physical in July.

Cheney had been scheduled to have only the right knee operated on Saturday but during the surgery his doctors decided to do both at once, Schmidt said. There were no complications.

Cheney had flexible stent grafts put in his knee arteries. During the procedure, the stent graft is threaded through a catheter inserted in the femoral artery at the groin down to the aneurysm site. Fully opened, it's like a little tube inside the artery, keeping the rushing blood from touching the weakened artery walls.

This is a newer technique for patching aneurysms, and an alternative to rerouting blood flow around the weak spot with a vein bypass.

Dr. Bernadette Aulivola, assistant professor of surgery at Loyola University Medical Center in Maywood, Ill., said about 60 percent of patients with this type of aneurysm in one knee also have it in the other. She said the surgery usually is performed on one knee at a time to avoid complications but that if both procedures went smoothly Cheney should recover quickly.

"When he goes home he should be back to normal, basically back to his baseline activity," Aulivola said.

Cheney, 64, has had four heart attacks, quadruple bypass surgery, two artery-clearing angioplasties and an operation to implant a special pacemaker in his chest.

Same-sex civil unions coming to Connecticut

But officials not sure how to handle new law

By The Associated Press

MIDDLETOWN, CONN. – Connecticut's new law allowing same-sex civil unions takes effect next weekend, and justices of the peace are still learning how to handle the new ceremonies.

"On Oct. 1, civil unions become law in Connecticut, but there is not a JP in that room who knows what to do with it," said Saul Haffner, president of Justices of the Peace of Connecticut, which held a conference Saturday on the law. "It's going to be a mess."

"This has nothing to do with religion. It's a contract. I will definitely encourage other people to think of it like that."

CARMELA APUZZO
justice of the peace in Orange, Conn.

Connecticut is the first state to pass a civil union law, which will confer the same rights as marriage, without court pressure. Vermont is the only other state that allows civil unions and Massachusetts is the only state that allows same-sex marriages.

The Connecticut law does not require justices and clergy to perform civil unions and some said they won't because of their religious beliefs.

Carmela Apuzzo, a justice of the peace in Orange, did not plan to perform civil unions until a priest told her she would simply be performing civil ceremonies.

"This has nothing to do with religion," she said. "It's a contract. I will definitely encourage other people to think of it like that."

Among the questions faced by justices is what they should say at the end of a ceremony. They were advised to pronounce couples "partners in life" rather than "husband and wife."

Civil union applications will have spaces for "party 1" and "party 2" rather than "bride" and "groom." And the seals cities and towns use to make licenses official will be changed to say "vital statistics" rather than "marriage, birth or death."

Haffner said justices of the peace expect a rush of couples who want to have civil union ceremonies on the day the law takes effect, or soon after. The 2000 census found 7,400 same-sex couples in Connecticut.

But Carol Buckheit of Love Makes a Family, the state's major gay rights advocacy group, said many couples did not schedule civil unions then because Oct 1 is a Saturday and it's not clear whether city and town halls would be open to issue licenses. Only a few town clerks have regular Saturday hours, although a handful will open on Oct. 1 just to issue civil union licenses.

Connecticut will recognize civil unions from Vermont and domestic partnerships from California, but not same-sex marriages from Massachusetts. Connecticut lawmakers who passed the civil unions law also defined marriage as between a man and a woman. Same-sex couples married in Massachusetts can have civil unions in Connecticut.

Lesbian settles with schools over banned yearbook photo

She wore a tux, not the traditional drape

By The Associated Press

JACKSONVILLE, FLA.. – A lesbian student has reached an out-of-court agreement about six months after her senior portrait was banned from the yearbook because she was dressed in a tuxedo.

Kelli Davis, now a freshman at the University of South Florida in Tampa, said she hopes the settlement will prevent future discrimination against students.

"It wasn't a gender-identity issue," Davis said. "I'm obviously a female; I don't try and be a guy. But I was being discriminated on because of my gender."

The dispute began earlier this year when Fleming Island principal Sam Ward pulled Davis' yearbook photo because it violated the dress code for senior portraits.

Davis said she wore a tux for her senior photo because it made her feel more comfortable than the traditional female attire, a fabric drape that looks like a dress in the photo. Those were the two options given to students.

The Clay County School Board approved the mediated settlement Sept. 15. It alters the way senior portraits are handled and forces the school system to provide faculty and staff with "sexual orientation" training.

The district entered mediation after Davis threatened to file a federal lawsuit.

When floodwater moves out, mold moves in

BOSTON GLOBE GRAPHIC

Spores more a threat to structures than people

By Bruce Hamilton
Staff writer

Among the problems New Orleans residents and business owners confront when they return is an often misunderstood, pervasive menace that can eat walls and invade lungs: mold.

As floodwater recedes, it leaves buildings moist and the air humid, an environment ripe for the fungi that disintegrate all things organic. The colorful colonies are festering, but they're not extremely dangerous.

"I don't think it's going to be a major problem," said Dr. Raoult Ratard, Louisiana state epidemiologist. "It's going to be very unpleasant."

Ratard said a few people will be allergic, but their allergies will be no worse than those for pets, ants or bee stings. He pointed out that blue cheese is full of mold, "and I love to eat blue cheese."

He said the problem also is aesthetic, because mold looks and smells bad. In flood-damaged homes, walls and other surfaces are stippled with dalmatianlike patches of black and green; fuzzy networks bloom on couches and along baseboards. The aroma is awful.

There are myriad forms of mold, virtually omnipresent in the air and on surfaces, and they affect people differently. Some can produce toxins, but experts dismiss the term "toxic mold" as an alarmist misnomer.

"The thing to do is take the word toxic out of this," said Dr. Jim Aiken, emergency preparedness director of the Louisiana State University Health Services Center.

The phrase is inaccurate, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Although certain molds are toxigenic, they are not themselves toxic or poisonous.

Nevertheless, the term inspires litigation and press releases such as one a contractor, www.startremodeling.com, issued Sept. 20, which warns "New Orleans toxic black mold victims" of a "disaster of epidemic proportions."

Although mold can make certain people sick, severe illness is rare, according to the CDC. Common reactions involve allergic, hay feverlike symptoms. Those who suffer

Fast response important in fighting mold

MOLD, from A-22

from chronic respiratory diseases such as emphysema should avoid exposure to large infestations, which may trigger asthma attacks or breathing trouble.

People who are already sick or have suppressed immune systems, as well as the elderly and children, also should avoid moldy environments.

"All mold should be considered a potential health hazard," said Claudette Reichel, a housing specialist at the LSU AgCenter. "It's a matter of level of exposure, combined with sensitivity, as well as the type of mold and the toxin it might produce."

For those returning to affected buildings, it's best to be prepared. A respirator is recommended, or a mask rated "N95" or higher, meaning its pores are small enough to stop spores, as well as nonporous gloves and eyewear.

Aside from health risks, mold poses structural problems in buildings because it attacks moist materials such as insulation, porous wall board, carpet, rugs or floor pads and paper-covered gypsum board.

"People who are going back to their homes after they have been wet are going to have a problem," Reichel said. "Structurally, decay fungi are a greater concern."

"People who are going back to their homes after they have been wet are going to have a problem,"
CLAUDETTE REICHEL
LSU AgCenter housing specialist

Unfortunately for some, a fast response is crucial to prevent or quell infestation. Some businesses already have begun remediation.

Fliers advertising "Biodecon: We spray for biohazard mold and mildew" are posted on Decatur Street, and massive ventilation tubes can be seen connected to the Marriott Hotel on Canal Street, coming out through the roof.

Kevin Phelan, founder of Biodecon, based in Richmond, Va., said his firm garnered $100,000 worth of contracts, including residences and businesses, in about three days. The mold problem, he said, becomes more significant as is left unchecked.

Once it's safe to enter a building, the affected areas should be ventilated.

All moldy materials should be torn out and removed. Because disturbing colonies can release spores, it's best to encapsulate mold, Reichel said, as in plastic bags, before moving it.

Once the materials are removed, residents can clean what's cleanable. A solution of bleach and water kills mold, but dead mold spores can have the same effect. "People think once you bleach, the mold is gone," Reichel said.

A bleach solution can be used on most surfaces, but it's corrosive; don't use it on metal or leather. After cleaning, use a disinfectant, then dry the area as quickly as possible. Air conditioning then helps to pull the moisture away.

Reichel warns residents to be patient and avoid the temptation to replace materials too quickly. Wicking moisture is easily trapped behind walls and in invisible areas.

"Make sure it's dry before you reinstall drywall or insulation," she said.

Rebuilding inches on in small Miss. towns

Thousands of homes have roof damage

By Holbrook Mohr
Associated Press writer

PETAL, MISS. — It was the wind, not a wall of water, that Katrina sent into this tiny town about 70 miles north of Mississippi's hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast. But the wounds are deep, and some people wonder if they will ever fully heal.

Almost every home in the town of about 10,000 was damaged, from torn roofs to collapsed carports. Even Petal's municipal buildings, from City Hall to the Fire Department, remained scarred almost four weeks after the hurricane.

"It's going to take months to rebuild, but it'll never be the same," said Elaine Freeman, 31, who was hanging clothes to dry on lines outside her damaged wood-framed home. "We're just trying to be patient. We'll have to get a new roof put on the house."

Throughout the town, blue tarps and clear sheets of plastic covered gaping holes in homes and businesses, and piles of tree limbs, siding and roofing still lined streets.

"We had so many trees down and power outages, it covered every street in the city," said Maj. Shawn Ellis of the Petal Police Department. "We were without power for weeks, and cable is still out in places, but the biggest complaint I'm hearing is that people feel like they're not receiving a response from the insurance companies."

The scene is a familiar one for many small inland communities in southern Mississippi, said Lea Stokes, spokeswoman for the Mississippi Emergency Management Agency.

"The eye of that storm went directly through our state," Stokes said. "We have received heavy damage reports from across south Mississippi. And several central and even some northern counties that usually don't see any type of hurricane damage are reporting damage."

In the area around Petal and nearby Hattiesburg to the northeast, more than 3,200 people have requested temporary repairs through Operation Blue Roof, in which tarps are used to protect damaged roofs, said Michael Logue, a spokesman for the Army Corps of Engineers. He said as many as 32,000 roofs could need repairs throughout south Mississippi.

Gary Napoleon sat next to a stack of plywood on the porch of his small, uninsured home and said he had no idea when his repairs would be completed.

"They won't turn the power back on because the roof is gone," he said. "I've been staying in here, but the mosquitoes are tearing me up and it gets so hot at night that you can hardly breathe."

Jim Faulk, a FEMA contractor from Pensacola, Fla., working in the Hattiesburg area, said it could be a year or longer before roofers are able to make permanent repairs to all homes.

So-called blue roofs are still a common sight in the Florida Panhandle nearly a year after Hurricane Ivan ravaged that area, he said.

'Now fighting on two fronts'

RITA, from A-1

make broad assessments because waters were still rising and officials could not get into most areas. Smith said early reports suggested there will be extensive flooding and power outages.

"We are now fighting on two fronts," Lt. Col. Pete Schneider, spokesman for the Louisiana National Guard, said of the Katrina mop-up in New Orleans and the relief efforts for Rita victims in southwest Louisiana.

Officials said they were cautiously optimistic about the condition of oil refineries in the region, although it was too early to survey the damage.

Rita made landfall around 3 a.m. between Sabine Pass, Texas, and Johnson Bayou in Louisiana as a Category 3 storm with maximum sustained winds of 120 mph, according to the National Weather Service.

The storm headed northwest, directly over Orange and Beaumont, Texas, doing most of its damage to the east in Cameron Parish, where 112 mph gusts were recorded. Storm surge along the Calcasieu River in Lake Charles was up to 8 feet as the storm headed north.

By Saturday afternoon, Rita had been downgraded to a tropical storm and was expected to become a tropical depression by the evening, stalling around Texarkana, where it is expected to dump 20 inches of rain over the next several days, forecaster Sam Shamburger said.

By late morning in New Iberia, a citizen flotilla of airboats and flat-bottomed watercraft was staging in the parking lot of a Lowe's home improvement store, preparing to rescue people who might have been stranded. They fanned out west and south, where Rita's winds brought Gulf of Mexico waters rising up to 15 feet in some places. Among the hardest-hit was the town of Delcambre, which was deluged to levels that longtime residents had never before seen.

Gabe Sigue and Glenn Bernard of New Iberia, who launched their boat at the edge of the floodwaters on Jefferson Island Road, set off in search of friends they feared were missing as a Coast Guard helicopter hovered above. With their friends Quinn and Amy Delcambre, they steered through water that reached the second story of several homes and businesses.

While the wind spared most structures, the floods overturned headstones at the local cemetery and left coffins bobbing nearby.

Waters roil in Lake Charles as the eye of Hurricane Rita makes landfall early Saturday. The storm hit around 3 a.m. between Sabine Pass, Texas, and Johnson Bayou in Louisiana as a Category 3 storm with maximum sustained winds of 120 mph, according to the National Weather Service.

By mid-afternoon, however, it became clear that most residents managed to escape the storm safely. Mitchell Lancour of Delcambre said he set out in his boat around 10 a.m., when the waters began rising quickly, to search for people to rescue. By 2 p.m., his search had turned up only a few animals left behind by their evacuated owners. "We came to look for people and we found five dogs," Lancour said.

Others spent the day trying to rescue prized possessions. On Avery Island Road southwest of New Iberia, two lanes of asphalt was the only dry ground as houses on both sides of the road sat in waist-deep water that was still rising by early afternoon amid intermittent rain and high gusts.

That's where Jace Marceaux, Juan Migues and two of their friends packed their pickup trucks and waded into Migues' mother's house to retrieve some favorite possessions. They carried crawfish pots, guns and hunting bows into Marceaux's truck before heading back to New Iberia.

In Vermilion Parish, rescue workers spent most of the day retrieving up to 100 stranded residents from rooftops.

"Water is coming up and we are just dealing with it," said Major Ron Sonnier of the Vermilion Parish Sheriff's Office.

Forty-one of the state's 64 parishes have partially or completely lost power, the governor said. Entergy reported about 495,000 customers without power in Louisiana on Saturday afternoon.

State adjutant general Maj. Gen. Bennett Landreneau said an additional 4,000 Guard troops from other states have been sent to Louisiana, part of the 15,000 more Blanco requested earlier in the week.

He said he expects more National Guard troops will be on the ground in the next day or two but could not say how many more.

In Lake Charles, Mayor Randy Roach has told citizens not to return home for at least two days because of widespread flooding, and transportation officials said that the Interstate 10 bridge over the Calcasieu River in Lake Charles was struck by barges and had to be closed. The city suffered wind damage and what was described as mostly minor flooding.

In that city, citizens were breathing a guarded sigh of relief early Saturday after the storm blew down thousands of trees and power lines but spared the city from the kind of flooding that officials had originally predicted.

"Really, it was less than I thought it would be," said Rita White, who rode out the storm at The Zone, a bar she owns on the east side of Lake Charles. Except for a few leaks and some tiles that tore off the roof, the bar was dry as of 11 a.m.

The city's downtown was virtually deserted by 9 a.m., when a group of seven nurses and medical technicians who had worked the overnight shift at Christus Hospital were surveying downed limbs and power lines beside the tony houses along River Road on the city's east side.

Kristi Abshire, who manages the hospital's catheter lab, said all but five of the hospital's 150 patients were evacuated in advance of the storm. Three more arrived in the early morning hours on Saturday as Rita was rolling in, she said.

But other communities were not as vigilant in heeding Blanco's call for a mandatory evacuation. Although Blanco said 90 percent of residents evacuated from parishes where it was mandatory, the mayor of Lake Arthur in Jefferson Davis Parish said Friday evening that about 80 percent of the town's 3,200 residents stayed put during the storm.

Giles himself was planning to endure the storm with a half-dozen family members at the Red Rose bar, which he owns. He said he wasn't worried about warnings from parish officials who said the storm could cause widespread flooding in the town, about 10 miles south of Jennings.

"They do that to scare people half to death," Giles said.

To the west, Houston was a virtual ghost town Saturday after 2.5 million residents fled the region in search of higher ground, but the devastation that everyone feared would match Hurricane Katrina never came.

Although some storm damage was reported downtown and the storm left hundreds of thousands without power, the city fared far better than officials expected, although communities to the east were more hard-hit by Rita.

Eighty miles away in Beaumont, trees were ripped up from the earth and the roof of the Hampton Inn had been peeled away by the storm.

By Saturday afternoon, many Texans who had evacuated to San Antonio, Dallas and Fort Worth began to come home.

Hoping to avoid the gridlock that clogged the region's main arteries, Houston Mayor Bill White and Texas Gov. Rick Perry took to the airwaves and asked residents not to come back immediately. Earlier in the week, hundreds of evacuees found themselves stranded along the highways after drivers drained area gas stations of fuel. State and local officials said they were working to make sure fuel would be available for drivers for the trip home.

Blanco likewise called on residents to conserve gasoline as some of the refineries in southwest Louisiana have been shut down by Rita and some in the New Orleans area have not come on line from Katrina's hit to southeast Louisiana three weeks ago.

"Don't just do idle driving," Blanco urged citizens.

Rita hampers Nagin plan to repopulate

NEW ORLEANS, from A-1

exceeds the capability of man."

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin toured the Lower 9th Ward and said the flooding in the area rose to as high as 12 feet to the top of roofs.

Rita's destruction delayed his re-entry plan by about three to five days. He said residents and business owners in Algiers could possibly return either Monday or Tuesday. He said he hopes to re-populate dry areas of Uptown in the 70115 and 70118 ZIP codes after that.

"Hopefully we won't have another event," Nagin said. "It's like your washing machine. First, Katrina was kind of the wash cycle. Rita seems to be the rinse cycle. I hope we get the opportunity to hang on the line and dry and not go through the spin cycle."

New Orleans Homeland Security Director Terry Ebbert estimated that less than 1,000 civilians remained in the city, not including relief workers and journalists. He said only about 70 people were evacuated for Rita.

The recent flooding postponed search and recovery efforts in the heavily flooded areas of the Lower 9th Ward and St. Bernard Parish, Ebbert said.

More than 400 first responders were ready to resume missions when the called upon, said Coast Guard Vice Admiral Thad Allen, who has been put in charge of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina.

New Orleans Police Superintendent Eddie Compass said there were no arrests in the city the past two days.

Dan Packer, CEO for Entergy New Orleans, said more than 800,000 homes were without power in Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas and west Texas. About 200,000 of those were in southeast Louisiana and New Orleans.

Nagin said the re-entry plan is contingent upon officials' ability to restore the area's power and sewage systems and to get the hospitals on line. He said the Touro Infirmary emergency room recently opened. A military hospital with surgical capabilities has also been started in the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center.

A retail operation, which was expected to include Lowe's, Home Depot, Sears and Rite-Aid, also was ready to open in the Convention Center once Nagin's plan is enacted. Goods are ready to be hauled in 18-wheel trucks.

Nagin said his plan to systematically repopulate the area during the next six months would provide a footprint that could support 250,000 to 300,000 people.

Despite the positive news, Nagin said he remains cautious.

"I'm always concerned about it because of our levee being so battered and beaten," Nagin said. "But with the Corps working the way they're working I'm getting more comfortable every day."

The biggest concern remains the Industrial Canal, where an avalanche of whitewater rushed through and over a wide breach that opened Friday morning along the waterway's east side and flooded largely uninhabited areas of the 9th Ward and the St. Bernard communities of Arabi and Chalmette.

A Chinook helicopter works to plug the breach in the Industrial Canal on Saturday. The Industrial Canal's size and depth up to 40 feet prevented the use of sheet metal – used on the 17th Street and London Avenue canals.

The water flowed into some parts of Chalmette, flooding north Buccaneer Villa and other neighborhoods north of Judge Perez Drive with as much as 8 feet of water, St. Bernard Parish officials said.

Some areas south of Judge Perez Drive had as much as 3 feet of water. In some areas, the flooding extended as far south as St. Bernard Highway.

As of 11:30 a.m., officials said water had advanced eastward to Packenham Drive, but they hoped that ongoing pumping and low tide this afternoon would slow or stop the flow.

At mid-day, the levees along the 40-Arpent Canal were holding and there was no flooding reported east of Packenham Drive, officials said.

Paris Road outside the parish levee system remained flooded, but that water was receding.

Rita's strong easterly winds created a 5- to 7-foot storm surge that arrived earlier and at higher than expected levels, compromising the repaired breaches, Corps officials said. The breaches were stacked 8 feet high with rocks and small stones but water levels in the canal were already about three feet higher than normal.

"We did not expect the surge to occur (Friday morning)," Waggenaar said. "We expected it this morning (Saturday)."

Waggenaar said officials wanted would more time to build the dam higher but had to work on breaches in other areas of the levee.

"Obviously, it's disappointing," Waggenaar said. "Hindsight is always 20-20. Shoulda, coulda, woulda."

The high winds, with gusts as high as 40 mph, delayed the Corps' efforts to repair the east-side breach using helicopters to drop 3,000- and 7,000-pound sandbags into the openings. The operation, using Army Blackhawk and Chinook helicopters to drop the 1,000 available bags, finally started around 2 p.m.

Repair work started earlier on the west side, where large flatbed trucks and heavy machinery deposited large rocks into the scour hole behind the levee. Sandbags and crushed stone were also piled on top to a height of 10 feet.

Waggenaar said the flooding on the west side of the canal was largely contained to the Desire-Florida area of the Ninth Ward. He said he hoped to have the west-side breach filled by Saturday night.

The other breach, though, will take longer. Even with auxiliary pumps and St. Bernard pumping stations running full time, he said it could take about two to three more weeks to completely drain the lower Ninth Ward and St. Bernard areas.

Pumping Station 19 in Orleans Parish, which is capable of pumping 2,000 cubic feet per second, will also be used to drain the area. The main pump station that serves the 9th Ward was rendered inoperable by Katrina.

"It's very disappointing," Waggenaar said. "There were people that wanted to get back in there. We've got to get that water out of there so these people can get back to their homes."

St. Bernard Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez criticized Corps engineers Friday, saying the repair job on the Industrial Canal levee was shoddy and accusing the Corps of exerting more effort to repair a breach on the 17th Street Canal at the Orleans-Jefferson parish line because it protects wealthier neighborhoods than those in the 9th Ward and St. Bernard Parish.

"We are working as hard as we can with the resources we have to repair all areas as fast as we can," Waggenaar said. "He has his opinion. The amount of work that we have done in three weeks across this region is a miracle."

Waggenaar also defended the Corps' repairs job, which also drew criticism Friday from state Sen. Walter Boasso of Arabi. He said the should have blocked the breaches in the Industrial Canal with sheet piling like it did at the 17th Street and London Avenue canals.

The Industrial Canal's size and depth up to 40 feet prevented the use of sheet metal, Waggenaar said. The sheet metal pilings that were driven into the ground at the 17th Street Canal were 50- and 60-feet deep and were supported by the Old Hammond Highway bridge, said David Wurtzel, the Corps' project engineer for the site. He said the water in the canal was about 20 feet deep.

"Those are very narrow and very shallow canals," said Stephen Browning, the director of programs for the Corps' South Pacific region. "The Industrial Canal is very wide and very deep and is also influenced by the river."

The temporary dams on the London Avenue and 17th Street canals will remain in place until water levels in Lake Pontchartrain drop. On Saturday afternoon, the lake was still about 3 feet higher than the water in the canal. Ideally, Waggenaar said the corps would wait until the differentials were within a foot before starting the six-to-eight-hour job of removing the sheet metal dams.

'It looks like a lake'

NEW ORLEANS, from A-26

Until then, the standing water in Lakeview and Gentilly will remain because the pumping stations can't start.

"We want to start pumping as soon as we can," Waggenaar said. "That's all dependent on Mother Nature and the weather."

Stray dogs outnumbered people in city streets across Mid-City, the 9th Ward and the 7th Ward. The Lower 9th Ward was inaccessible, as flooding from the levee breach of the Industrial Canal turned the 5000 block of St. Claude and, as far as the eye could see, into a lake.

The wind and rain made air travel in the city difficult at best, and boating was too risky.

"It looks like a lake, but you know there are houses down there," said Ted Reine, 22, of Marrero who Saturday signed a contract with CBS News to chauffer producers around the Lower Nine in his 18-foot flat boat. But the weather forced them to quit early. Hurricane Rita had stopped his dad's contractor business after 16 days of solid work.

A warm, sometimes gusting breeze rippled across the flood waters on St. Claude Avenue near Tennessee. Six-foot high flood waters again gulped the front yards of homes in the neighborhood, which had dried up following weeks of submersion.

Power lines whipped in the wind, licking at now moldy wooden frames and weatherboards.

Shawn Johnson, 30, also a contracted boater, said Friday's storm finished off many of the Lower 9th Ward homes that Katrina had already damaged.

"Katrina knocked a lot of homes off their foundations," Johnson said. "Now they're just falling apart."

From the near desolate and destroyed block of Lesseps and North Roman streets, military helicopters with several large sandbags dangling beneath could be seen headed toward the breached-again 17th Street levee.

A few volunteers from Food Not Bombs, a national grassroots relief organization, spent Saturday cleaning up a swatch of a 7th Ward neighborhood. The group drove its old blue bus into the city a week ago, from Hartford, Conn., to cook vegetarian meals for anyone who needed one. But the military checkpoint system slowed them down.

"It's hard to get through the city," said Ross Harmon, 26, who wore a face mask and dirty boots as he helped haul debris and garbage from the 1700 block of North Dorgenois Street. He pulled up a pant leg to show what National Guardsmen have named the "Creole Crabs," which Harmon insisted would clear up with no side effects in a week or so.

Further east, widespread flooding in north St. Bernard Parish unrelated to the breach in the Industrial Canal swamped the area. Rita's storm surge gouged Lake Borgne and swept more than four feet of water through low-lying areas.

"This is devastating," said B.C. Weinstein, a St. George fireman who tried to wade through the 3-foot deep water to inspect his shrimp boat that was moored along Bayou Bienvenue south of Highway 47. "I lost my home in Katrina and now I might have lost my livelihood. This damn storm messed everything up."

Hundreds of holdouts rescued

dor to plug three levee breaches. Nonetheless, an evacuation of neighborhoods surrounding the canal had not been ordered as of late Saturday afternoon.

The parish closed Peters Road while workers tried to contain the breaches with sandbags, and later Saturday the Army Corps of Engineers opened the canal's locks to allow water to flow into the Mississippi River.

Parish officials will continue to monitor the canals as long as Rita's gusts continue. Walter Maestri, the parish's director of emergency preparedness, said the winds likely will remain a threat through late today.

Anxiety over the Harvey Canal followed a frantic morning in which Jefferson Parish sheriff's deputies and National Guard troops had rushed to Lafitte to rescue residents by boat and high-water vehicles. Cost Guard and Navy helicopters also rescued residents. Those pulled from the quickly rising waters were taken to a shelter in Westwego.

Earl Bel stood beside Jean Lafitte Town Hall, soaked to the bone and wearing only black cut-off denim shorts. Moments earlier, he and four family members had been rescued from a raging Bayou Barataria, where the boat they had used to flee to higher ground capsized after striking the Kerner Bridge. Bel said he had expected a 3- to 4-foot storm surge, which would not have been high enough to affect his mobile home, which sits 4 1/2 feet off the ground.

But the last time he saw his home, it had a foot of water inside and his two dogs had drowned, he said.

"This is what I own, what you see," Bel said. "My boots, my clothes are somewhere down the bayou."

Caught by surprise

Jefferson Parish had ordered residents of low-lying Lafitte, Crown Point and Barataria to evacuate on Thursday at 6 p.m. Parish buses had been dispatched to the area to take residents to a shelter.

Parish Councilman Chris Roberts said hundreds of people ignored the order. Areas south of Goose Bayou received as much as 9 feet of water, Roberts said at midmorning, as water spilled over Jean Lafitte Boulevard and filled the front lawn at Town Hall, consuming Hurricane Katrina relief supplies.

"Some left, most didn't," Lafitte Police Chief Mary Jo Hargis said. "We knew we'd get water, but we didn't expect this amount."

Jefferson Parish Sheriff Harry Lee said about midday Saturday that his office had pulled about 10 truckloads of people out of flooded areas. About 20 people, many carrying pets and few personal possessions, were crammed into the back of the truck he was in, and still, he said, there were some holdouts left behind.

"A lot of people don't want to leave," Lee said.

At a shelter at Stella Worley Junior High School in Westwego, Andrew Perrin Sr., 82, said he and his wife, Theresa, 76, had evacuated for Katrina but decided to ride out Rita in their Lafitte home.

But when the water began to rise over the banks of Bayou Barataria, they moved to a friend's shrimp boat. When their son told them to leave the village, they waded through knee-deep water to Jean Lafitte Boulevard, where a military truck picked them up.

Counting on gravity

At Town Hall, Mayor Tim Kerner camped out in his office, looking grim. He had ventured into the flood earlier Saturday morning, and what he saw broke his heart: The Victoria Inn was submerged, and scores of homes were flooded and would likely have to be condemned, he said.

Only the newer homes, built seven to 11 feet above sea level to comply with new building codes were dry. Parts of the town, he said, will be uninhabitable for several days.

"When you think it's going to Texas, you don't expect to get much water," Kerner said.

Kerner said Hurricane Katrina left 30 Lafitte residents homeless. Rita, he said, will doubtless leave at least as many homeless.

The surge was caused by Rita's southerly winds as the hurricane headed for landfall near the Texas-Louisiana coastline. Winds were expected to remain out of the south through today, though the speed is expected to decrease during low tide, possibly allowing water to flow back out, National Weather Service meteorologist Fred Zeigler said. "Hopefully, gravity will overcome the winds."

Tommy Gates fled his home about 7 a.m. in his boat, the only way he could flee. About 3 feet of water inundated his home in four hours.

"I wasn't expecting that," Gates said. "We should have left. We really should have."

"Poverty didn't happen overnight, but now it's as if someone lifted up a rock and, wow, there they are, all those poor people!"

REESE FAYDE, CEO of Living Cities, a New York-based nonprofit group

American poverty laid bare by Katrina

Some see opportunity for drastic changes

By Martha Mendoza
AP national writer

SAN FRANCISCO — "Let me tell you about abandoned people," whispered J.R., his voice rising above the sighs and soft snores of people curled on the church pews around him.

"Those people who were abandoned in New Orleans," he said, "they were abandoned long before that hurricane hit. We all were."

J.R., who gave no other name, spends his days with 100 others, embraced in the holy warmth of a magnificent edifice, 103-year-old St. Boniface Church. Sunlight streams through stained glass, and gilded saints smile down upon them from the domed ceilings. The smells of sour, acrid clothes and bodies mix with the lingering scent of incense.

This looks like an evacuation center: row after row of desperate people and their sparse belongings, a backpack here, a blanket there.

But this roomful of displaced people is neither an emergency shelter nor a temporary situation.

This is an ongoing, daily, chronic disaster.

Ordinarily, the faces of America's poor are as hidden as their stories. But Hurricane Katrina has spotlighted the deep poverty that this country has failed to solve, a world of people who live without Social Security numbers and without running water, people who are too poor to shop at Wal-Mart and whose children go hungry.

Even as the economy strengthened in 2004, Census Bureau figures show that 37 million Americans lived under the poverty line, a jump of 1.1 million from 2003. People living in poverty have, in fact, been increasing steadily in this country since 2001.

For years, advocacy groups and researchers have been shouting the frightening statistics: 45.8 million people don't have health insurance; 25 percent of African-Americans (and 44 percent of Houston's black residents) live in poverty; 36 million Americans are hungry or at risk of hunger.

But before Hurricane Katrina exposed raw poverty and its consequences, no one has wanted to hear this, said Reese Fayde, CEO of Living Cities, a New York-based nonprofit group.

"You are made to feel you are detracting from something good, that you're not patriotic, that you're trying to focus on a niche issue," she said. "Poverty didn't happen overnight, but now it's as if someone lifted up a rock and wow, there they are, all those poor people!"

An 'invisible' epidemic

The Rev. Cecil Williams, a veteran social activist who leads San Francisco's Glide Memorial Church, said he keeps getting calls from people who say: "'Not only did we not know there was so much poverty, but also that so many of these poor people were black.'"

It's frustrating, Williams said: "We've been there all along, we've been saying the problem is not solved."

But in many cases, poverty is "invisible," said Rosemary Cubas, who lives in one of Philadelphia's poorest neighborhoods. She said that on her block, four or five families live together in one-bedroom apartments.

"You don't see our poor because we don't let them sleep on park benches or homeless shelters. We just squeeze in, and everyone is overcrowded and underfed."

Living on a very limited income, she said the problem is incredibly complex.

"Where do we go? Poverty is not only in the economics and the food, but also in the ability to see opportunity and take advantage of it. Poverty is also psychological and that leads you to either have hope or no hope, and if you have no hope you are truly, truly poor because you have no way out."
