TOLD UNDER THE PALMS

By JEFFERSON BELL

"If you've heard the East a-calling, you won't never 'eed nothin' else. No, you won't 'eed nothin' else but them spiky garlie smells an' the sunshine, an' the palm 'trees an' the tinkly temple bells."—On the road to Maudslayi.

I had heard the East a-calling, so early Sunday morning, with a small party I had collected, we took the open road to Key Largo, the largest of the Florida keys, that group of islands Stephen Cochrane Singleton has immortalized in his charming story, "The Archipelago of Peace," published in the July and August Rudder. A. C. Halliwell, Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Mansfield and their son, Laddie, and Sandy, their colle, made up the party.

There was a generous basket of lunch, a suitcase, a Peasey-Peacey map, and we left our cars behind when the nose of the motor car was turned south in the balmy early morning. I went prepared for disappointment, for a woman had told me she had picnicked at Key Largo and found it a God-forsaken place. Instead, I found it teeming with adventures. Mr. Singleton had told me over the telephone that he would make it pleasant for us, so we looked him up and quite by accident landed at his headquarters. He had gone to the station to meet the train, a man told us, but would return soon, so we utilized the time by taking possession of an inviting long table in the pavilion at the water's edge and opening up Mrs. Mansfield's lunch basket.

While we were in the middle of this happy adventure, Mr. Singleton arrived. If you do not know Mr. Singleton you have missed something. He is an unusual type. A scholar well versed in literature and a poet, a cultured Pennsylvania man gone native and utterly abandoned to his love of Florida and everything Floridian, particularly that rocky
