

June Weddings Falling Off As Mere Man Becomes Bolder And Wants a Part in Plans

June seems to be losing its old-time lead as the month of weddings. This now fact at least prevails hereabout. When the little love bird gets in its work, it makes no matter what season of the year he bobs up. The next step is to the altar.

The rush, the bustle, the scramble of events just prior to the wedding is something that appeals to most young girls. But it is not like that to those who must go through with it for somebody else. June weather is always delightful in Florida, but the time has arrived at last when the bridegroom steps up and asks to be heard.

newly wed, going about hungry, actually hungry.

With no big weddings on the calendar, society drifts about more or less aimlessly, taking things as they come, with a greater number of smaller parties filling in the afternoon and evenings. Dances always appeal to the younger set, regardless of the weather. But the big bridge function, with a raft of afternoon guests, and the worry about refreshments, is not so appealing as in mid-winter.

Going Away Time

The girls and the boys back from college have settled into the summer routine. The older folk are going away for a brief spell or planning to go away first to the beaches around Tampa and later to summer homes in the mountains, where most of them will remain through part of September, or as long as they can stay away without keeping the children out of school.

Going away in summer, a habit everywhere, is a strong habit in Tampa, yet most of them who go come back to remark that after all Tampa is just as delightful as the mountains or the seashore in other states. The old home has comforts not provided elsewhere. The home properly built catches the bay breeze from any direction; the hotel suite gets it from one direction only, when it does not get it, even the mountain resort in daylight hours is terrible.

Parties on Calendar

No more Tampanians are going away or stay at home than in former times. Railway passenger agents say summer traffic, outbound, is just about normal. There are a few coming in, thanks to the cheap summer excursions, and many college friends of Tampa girls are coming here for a brief stay before the Tampa girls go elsewhere. So there will be many informal parties during the summer, with the same amount of bridge and dancing and bathing and motoring, but not on any pretentious scale like that of the winter season.

Wedding announcements pop out of the clear sky. So some unexpected ones may be forthcoming. It is always well and wise to qualify bald statements, especially when no man living—and no woman, for that matter—can tell just when the little love bird will begin picking at somebody's heart—and then it will all be over except the shower of rice.

Bridegroom Has Say

Given a chance to speak above the pre-nuptial din he clears his throat and suggests that inasmuch as he is a working person and cannot expect to be married more often than once in five or six years, he ought to have a say in fixing the time for the ceremony. There is a desire, maybe a business desire, to see New York. He would like to get a glimpse of a little mountain scenery. Yellowstone Park, Niagara Falls and some other spots are in his mind. So if it is just the same to everybody else he'd like to have that wedding in the fall. By that time his business affairs will be in better shape. He can leave town more easily. And if he can sell those lot, maybe the bank roll may be bigger.

All of this may be so much blather to the girl herself or the girl's mother, who fix the date. But if one may take the word of friends, and society damns a bit harder, the groom is entitled to vote, for, as they say, isn't he like the man at Blightampton—he pays the freight?

Why Not, Say Some

At all events, the wedding bells are not ringing too often. And why not, as a society matron wishes to remark, give the groom a word? Nowadays they marry young, often just out of school; often the groom who is to take on added responsibilities hasn't a job. Love may have twisted his mental stant on things; there is always the hope of a job being provided by the bride's father, just to keep his daughter near his own home. No father likes the thought of his child,
